INTRODUCTION TO SUB-SAHARAN AFRICA*

---

Sub-Saharan Africa is the region of the African continent located immediately south of the Sahara that extends to the Cape of Good Hope in the southernmost part of Africa, where the Indian Ocean meets the Atlantic Ocean. Often referred to as black Africa, this region extends to the Red Sea in the northeast, the Indian Ocean (including the island countries of Mauritius, Seychelles, Comoro Islands, and Madagascar) in the east, and to the Atlantic Ocean in the west (also including the island nations of Cape Verde and Sao Tome and Principe).

Sub-Saharan Africa has a land mass of approximately 9.4 million square miles and a population of approximately 700 million, out of the continent's 11.6 million square miles and 900 million people. It is a region characterized by immense geographical, cultural, linguistic, historical, ethnic, and religious diversity on one hand, and vast similarities on the other. Politics in the region involves a complex and persistent pattern of interaction among these forces in varying configurations and with varying results.

For a region so massive, sub-Saharan Africa's geographic and demographic diversity ought to come as no surprise; yet the impressions of many outsiders are colored by myth and stereotypes. The image most people once had of sub-Saharan Africa came from tales about dense rain forests and wild animals in the jungle. Although the mass media has made significant progress during the past quarter century to provide a more accurate portrayal of the region's diversity, misconceptions still abound about the region's vegetation and hence its people. The reality is that less than 25 percent—a percentage that has been declining since the 1960s owing to deforestation by people in search of land and firewood—of sub-Saharan African vegetation is rain forest.

These forests and mangrove swamps are vegetation belts that are highly localized only in west-central Africa. Otherwise, tropical grasslands, mountain savanna, Sahel savanna, desert, and temperate forests—the principal vegetation belts of sub-Saharan Africa—are spread across the continent almost equally. Sub-Saharan Africa's main rivers, lakes, and mountain ranges also showcase both the uniformity and diversity of the area. Some of the world's major rivers flow through the region: the Nile in the northeast, the Zambezi in the southeast, the Niger in the west, and the Congo in the west-center. Sub-Saharan Africa's mountain ranges rise from the landscape, including the Drakensberg mountain ranges in South Africa, the Mount Kilimanjaro and Mount Kenya in east Africa, the Cameroon ranges in central Africa, and the Foutah Djallon mountains in west Africa.

For centuries before European imperialism these features combined to influence economic, political, and military activities in the region. Mountains and deserts provided groups of people natural protection from their enemies. The rivers and lakes served as means of transportation, their resources provided families with their livelihoods, and the fertile terrains along their banks were used for agriculture. They were also sub-Saharan Africa's main attractions as well as Africa's means of contact with the outside world. European explorers, merchants, missionaries, slave dealers, and empire builders made extensive use of Africa's rivers.

Economic activities in sub-Saharan Africa have always depended on the type of vegetation prevalent in the region. Although farming is the principal occupation of most people, many in the arid and semiarid regions—especially the region from Mauritania and northern Senegal across to the Ethiopian highlands and Somalia, and also in the southern savanna regions that run from northern Angola to Botswana and South Africa—also raise livestock. Crops in the tropical regions are a mix of perennial tree crops—palms, coffee, cocoa, and rubber—cultivated mainly for export, and food crops such as bananas, plantains, and cassava that are cultivated for local consumption. Farmers in the arid and semiarid regions of the savanna grow mainly cereals and legumes (corn, beans, and peanuts) or drought-resistant crops such as cotton.

Over the years, economic activities, while important in bringing about a measure of improvement in the traditional lifestyles once prevalent in the region, have also generated serious strains between people and their environment owing to the decreasing ability of the ecology to sustain the types of activities it once used to. This has had important economic consequences. These economic consequences have, in turn, fueled communal conflicts over resources in various countries in the region, including Kenya, Nigeria, Cameroon, Sudan, and Zimbabwe.

Sub-Saharan Africa is characterized by a cultural, linguistic, ethnic, and religious diversity unmatched in the world. It counts more than 2,000 ethnic groups and over 750 linguistic groups. With the exception of Lesotho, Comoro Islands, and to a lesser extent Somalia, which are ethnically homogenous, the countries of sub-Saharan Africa contain highly diverse ethnic, cultural, and linguistic populations. More than 250 language groups are found in Nigeria, more than 200 groups in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, over 120 in Tanzania, and more than 70 in Ethiopia. Ethnic fragmentation is as prevalent in countries with smaller populations as it is in larger ones: Ghana counts approximately 50 linguistic and ethnic groups, Côte d'Ivoire 60, Cameroon over 100, and the Republic of the Congo 70. Nigeria, South Africa, Kenya, Ethiopia, and Mozambique have ethnic populations that are larger than the populations of many countries. The Hausa, Yoruba, and Ibo, three of the largest groups in Nigeria, exceed 15 million people each. And in South Africa, the Zulu and Xhosa number around 10 million each; and the Oromo (Galla) in Ethiopia total more than 22 million. In these and other countries, many smaller groups numbering only a few thousand also dot the landscape.

Associated with ethnic diversity is cultural and linguistic fragmentation. While most sub-Saharan Africans speak the indigenous language of the ethnic groups they belong to, most also speak one or more European languages, mainly the language of the European country that colonized them. The addition of European languages to the highly fragmented cultural situation has deepened social fragmentation even more. But the language of the colonial power has also served to integrate all groups within a country around a common language that belongs to none of them and is therefore not considered threatening.

Religion as a source of identity in sub-Saharan Africa has been growing in importance during the past 20 years. With the exception of a few countries—Nigeria, Senegal, Somalia, and Sudan—religion has not been as galvanizing a force in most countries in the region as it has been in other parts of the world. Slightly more than half of the population of sub-Saharan Africa is Christian in religious belief while about one-third is Muslim; the remaining people follow various indigenous beliefs.

People in various parts of the region show varying degrees of identification with particular religious beliefs. Most of the states in west Africa (with the exception of Côte d'Ivoire, Ghana, Benin, and Sierra Leone) have populations that are predominantly Muslim. Nigeria, Africa's largest state, is split almost equally between Christians and Muslims. A similar split exists in Ethiopia. For the remaining countries in the region (with the exception of Sudan, Somalia, and Djibouti, which are predominantly Muslim), Christian majorities prevail. There once thrived in Ethiopia a Jewish community that, for various reasons—its marginalization by Ethiopia's government and its desire (supported by the Israeli state) to reunite with other Jews—evacuated to Israel. Only a few Jews remain in Ethiopia. A much larger Jewish community thrives in South Africa. South Africa and Tanzania also have a sizable number of Hindus.

European Colonialism

The modern states of sub-Saharan Africa are products of European imperialism that culminated with the partition of Africa at a conference of the major European powers held in Berlin in late 1884 and early 1885. Called by the German statesman Otto von Bismarck, the conference gathered to deal with the claims of European powers to various territories in Africa. The Berlin conference laid the ground rules for colonial acquisition, recognized colonies that had already been acquired, and agreed to the principles of freedom of navigation. Key to the ground rules was effective control of a colonial territory by the colonizer and notification of all participating states before a territory could be recognized as belonging to the claimant.

The result was the division of Africa into spheres of influence by the various European governments. Britain received much of east Africa, while France received much of west and central Africa. Britain also retained its Nigerian and Ghanaian territories, which proved to be prized possessions. King Leopold II of Belgium received the present-day Democratic Republic of the Congo, and Portugal retained Angola and Mozambique. Britain also retained its prized possessions in southern Africa—South Africa, Rhodesia (now Zimbabwe), Malawi, and Zambia. After 1885, European governments embarked on bringing their new African colonies under effective control in what they called pacification campaigns. The pacification of Africa was the name given to the wars that Europeans fought against African resistance as the Europeans advanced to bring territories under their effective control.

By 1900, European colonizers had succeeded in establishing control over most of the territories they claimed, although in some areas Africans continued to resist colonial rule. The Europeans' initial approach to governing the territories was to farm them out to European companies to rule and, in return, the companies kept part of the profits and returned the remainder to the home governments. In various parts of sub-Saharan Africa, European-chartered companies organized and eventually controlled much of the commerce, administration, and security. Along the Niger River, the Royal Niger Company wielded its authority; in Kenya and Uganda in east Africa it was the Imperial British East Africa Company; and in Rhodesia, the British South African Company prevailed. Company rule lasted into the 1920s for the French colonies and into the 1940s for the Portuguese colonies.

Company rule was practiced by all the colonial powers as a means of holding down costs while maximizing benefits for the colonial administration. It was usually brutal, exploitative, and dehumanizing. Many Africans were forced off their lands, while others were forced into day labor or into harvesting wild rubber or gathering ivory in return for a meager wage that they often were made to pay back in the form of taxes to the colonial administrations. Apart from its brutality, company rule was ineffective and did very little to cut costs. Consequently, it was later abandoned in favor of rule by governments.

The administration of the African colonies by the colonizing governments varied in many ways depending on the administrative models employed. In general, two broad approaches of colonial administration were used. The first—direct rule—was the approach that France, Belgium, Germany, and Portugal used. The second approach—indirect rule—was the policy that Great Britain adopted. The two approaches were based on the differing conceptions that the colonial powers held about the colonized people and their vision of colonialism in terms of where it would lead—that is, what the end game of colonialism would be.

The British, who adopted indirect rule, saw the colonized people and their cultures as much too different to be governed directly by European institutions and European personnel; they believed Europeans and Africans had very little in common. Indirect rule also envisioned a future in which the British would one day separate from the colonies. The point of such separation would come when the colonized people had developed to the level at which they could govern themselves. Accordingly, colonialism was viewed as a mission undertaken by the British to civilize the Africans; after they became civilized, they would be given their independence. At that point the British would feel they had accomplished their mission and would leave.

Indirect rule emphasized the use of indigenous African institutions and leaders—the chiefs, customary courts, and those customs the British agreed with—to govern the colonies. In African societies with social organizations that were more egalitarian, the colonial administrations created chiefs. In some societies where political authority was organized around a chief and a counsel of elders, the British dethroned the chief if the chief was considered not amenable to British purposes, was stubborn, or was seen as a threat to the stability of British rule. British indirect rule was developed in northern Nigeria and soon spread to the entire colony and to other British colonies.

Direct rule was based on a different philosophy and a distinct vision of imperial development. It stemmed from the vision that Africans could become like the French if they were given the opportunity to do so by acquiring French values and culture. Also known as “assimilation,” the policy was built on the condescending premise that Africans were uncivilized and would want to be like French if only they were given the opportunity. Direct rule was also built on the ideals—liberté, égalité, and fraternité—of the French Revolution. The French believed that once Africans evolved through the acculturation process into civilized peoples, they would be given French citizenship with all the rights that went with it, without discrimination. This seemed contradictory because Africans were not treated as equals with the French unless they had become assimilated; neither could they determine their political destiny. Africans, in fact, did not have a choice; they were directed by the French. To become acculturated, Africans had to shed their African identity and replace their African cultures, values, spirituality, practices, and tastes with everything French. They had to denounce polygamy, convert to Christianity, adopt Christian names, and acquire a European education. Assimilation into the French culture thus separated Africans from their own culture and their traditional social structures.

Direct rule as practiced by the Portuguese and Belgians was different from the French way mainly in terms of the outcome for assimilated Africans. Assimilated Africans fared far worse in the Portuguese and Belgian colonies than they did in French colonies: they had few of the same rights as their Belgian or Portuguese counterparts. Toward the end of colonial rule, however, France abandoned its policy of assimilation and adopted a policy of association. Association was based on the notion that Africans were much too different to be governed directly, so they should be allowed to develop within their own traditional institutions at their own pace.

Decolonization and the Colonial Legacy

Perhaps more than any other force, colonialism stands out as the most important in shaping contemporary sub-Saharan Africa, whether for good or for bad. No area of African society was left untouched by the forces of colonialism. Geopolitically, the European powers drew the map of the continent according to their own motives, creating what would eventually become the present-day states in the region. In the process, they did not appear to follow a particular formula based on the local facts on the ground. The outcome was a state system in the region, but it was plagued by problems. Boundaries were drawn artificially, sometimes cutting through a clan’s territory and dividing families among different colonies (different independent states today). At other times when boundaries were drawn, little attention was paid to cultural differences, and different ethnic groups—some of which never got along—were gathered into a single state. Some states were so small that they were not viable economically, neither were they politically robust when it came to defending themselves. From the very beginning, many sub-Saharan African countries had little chance of competing in a world of major states.

Colonial economic activities also generated major disruptions in the region. Colonialism was motivated by three main goals: prestige (important for great-power status); captive markets for finished or manufactured European goods; and the need for raw materials for European factories, materials that could be extracted at artificially low costs. The mere existence of the territories satisfied the first objective whether the claimant was doing anything within it or not, just so long as the claimant was able to defend it from rivals. Securing colonies for markets and as sources of raw materials required the exploitation of those colonies. Exploitation required massive investment in infrastructure and investment in organizing the extraction of the raw materials and products from the region. Some of the main development-oriented activities of the colonial authorities—the building of roads, railways, and ports—were undertaken during this period. Typical roads and railways connected the sources of the various products in the hinterlands of the colonies with the coastal areas, for easy export of products to Europe.

The home governments considered colonialism a necessary undertaking, but they were unwilling to foot the bills. This limited the number of administrators who worked in the colonies. Most important, very little could be done in building colonial infrastructure such as roads, bridges, railways, and ports without a large infusion of money from the colonial budget. Colonial officials were thus left to devise strategies to raise the monies needed to put such infrastructure in place in order to exploit the resources of the colonies. The use of forced labor was one such strategy. Africans were often conscripted and forced to work on the various construction projects. At the same time, conscripts were often subjected to harsh and inhumane treatment that included constant whipping for what was called laziness and insubordination. Forced labor could succeed in the short run. The issue, however, was whether it could be sustained over a long period.

Investment in the acquisition of raw materials was also minimal. This was generally left to the domain of companies and enterprises. Some raw materials (minerals and wild rubber) were readily available in Africa's vast, marginally disturbed, terrain and required only labor and tools to extract. Forced labor was used in getting Africans to work in the mines for a bare minimum of compensation, especially in the Belgian Congo and in other colonies as well. For a pittance, Africans were also forced to tap wild rubber for the various concession companies; wild rubber was used in Angola and Mozambique by the Portuguese; in Cameroon by the Germans; in French Equatorial Africa by the French; and in Nigeria, Kenya, Uganda, and Rhodesia by the British—indeed, across the various colonies—in one form or another.

Cash crops (including tea, coffee, cocoa, cotton, peanuts, and bananas) were also introduced in the colonies. They were initially cultivated by European settlers whom the colonial administrators had lured into the colonies through offers of cheap land (acquired through the eviction of its African owners), low taxes, and cheap African labor. Africans who were evicted from their lands became landless and were thereafter compelled to work on the European farms for minimal wages. They then had to pay the taxes that were introduced in the colonies as a means of raising revenue because very little money was transferred from the home governments to the colonies. Over time, Africans were also brought into the cultivation of cash crops, in part to generate the cash needed to pay taxes. What was left after the payment of taxes was spent on European manufactured goods.

The imposition of taxes on the colonies significantly transformed African economic life. The traditional agricultural system that was based on subsistence farming was transformed into cash crop cultivation. People in areas where cash crops were not very productive sought work on European plantations or in mines so they were able to pay their taxes. African farmers sold their farm products only to European firms in the colonies organized purposely as middlemen between the African farmers and the overseas markets. The products were usually bought by the firms at below-market prices and then exported at higher prices, with the profits going to the middlemen. In addition, African farmers were forbidden to cultivate crops that might compete with European cultivators.

African businesses that emerged also found it difficult to compete with large European firms because they did not have access to capital (loans and other instruments for managing risk) from banks or insurers. Agricultural research and innovation were directed to the production of cash crops, while research and innovation on food crops lagged. Although many raw materials such as minerals and agricultural products were being produced in the region, they were not transformed into finished products there. Transformation and economies of scale (the jobs, other secondary industries, revenues, investments) all benefited the home country and not the colonies. Meanwhile, many of the finished products generated through such transformation were shipped back to Africa and sold there, creating more wealth for the home country.

The influx of European settlers under colonialism also contributed to the multicultural outlook of Africa. So did the arrival of Asians brought to work on plantations in South Africa and on railroads in Kenya and Uganda. Unfortunately, under the colonial administrations, the arrival of both European and Asian immigrants fueled the same process of subjugation of native Africans to the lowest ranks of the social and productive classes. In the postindependence period, these immigrant groups emerged to be the leading traders and owners of small businesses. Greek and Lebanese merchants dominated small businesses dealing in European products by interposing themselves between Africans and the European business and political classes.

Colonialism also affected education significantly, generating lasting changes. Much of the education was provided by missionaries, not by the colonial governments. Missionary education had a limited purpose in that it sought to enable Africans to read and write in order to read the Bible and undertake religious training. Only very few Africans received an education. Some sources place the ratio of those who had access to basic education (reading, writing, and history, mainly European history) to be one in ten in the most advanced of European colonies. In some of the worst, the figure was one in a hundred. Even so, some Africans advanced to pursue a university education, while still fewer continued to graduate school. Leading nationalist leaders in the region—Nnamdi Azikiwe (of Nigeria), Hastings Kamuzu Banda (Malawi), Félix Houphouët-Boigny (Côte d'Ivoire), Jomo Kenyatta (Kenya), Nelson Rolihlahla Mandela (South Africa), Félix-Roland Moumié (Cameroon), Kwame N. Nkrumah (Ghana), Julius K. Nyerere (Tanzania), and Léopold Sédar Senghor (Senegal)—had university degrees; and Azikiwe, Banda, and Senghor earned doctorates. Whatever the level of education, exposure to education opportunities gave to the few fortunate Africans access to jobs at the lower echelon of the colonial administration, religious missions, and European firms.

After more than three quarters of a century of European colonial rule, the countries of sub-Saharan Africa gained independence in the 1950s and 1960s, beginning with Sudan in 1956 and Ghana in 1957. Guinea, a French colony in west Africa, gained its independence in 1958 when it alone opted for immediate independence in a referendum that the new French government of Charles de Gaulle conducted in all of France's African colonies that year.

In 1960, France hastily granted independence to 13 of its west and central African colonies (Cameroon, Central African Republic, Chad, Republic of the Congo, Benin, Gabon, Côte d'Ivoire, Mali, Mauritania, Niger, Senegal, Togo, and Burkina Faso) plus Madagascar in the Indian Ocean. The rest of the French colonies chose to continue within the French Union for two more years before eventual independence.

Britain's colonies in west Africa followed their French counterparts. Nigeria gained independence in 1960, Sierra Leone in 1961, and Gambia in 1965. Unlike the process in British west Africa (which had taken place peacefully), the decolonization process in the British colony of Kenya in east Africa was marred by much bloodshed. The Mau Mau insurrection, led by members of the Kikuyu tribe unhappy with the confiscation of indigenous lands and championing demands for independence since the 1920s, reached a climax in 1952. Britain's insistence on putting down the insurrection with military force only emboldened the group. The Mau Mau mounted a guerrilla campaign that preoccupied Britain for four years and accounted for the deaths of more than 10,000 Kenyans (contrasted with approximately 100 Europeans). Kenya eventually became independent in 1963 but only after neighboring Tanganyika (Tanzania) and Uganda had gained independence from Britain in 1961 and 1962, respectively.

The next phase of the collapse of the British African empire occurred in southern Africa. This took place uneventfully with the exception of the situation in the Rhodesian Federation that was composed of Nyasaland (now Malawi), Northern Rhodesia (Zambia), and Southern Rhodesia (Zimbabwe). The main sticking point in the decolonization process was the dissolution of the federation. Nationalists in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland opposed the federation and had been canvassing for its dissolution at the same time that they were mobilizing for an end to colonial rule. Because of the large European settler population in Southern Rhodesia, these nationalists feared domination by a minority settler population after independence. This fear eventually was given some support after Britain dissolved the federation. Following the dissolution of the federation, Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland gained independence separately (and became known as Zambia and Malawi) in 1964. Southern Rhodesia (now Zimbabwe) was the exception in that it took a protracted civil war for it to gain independence. Other British colonies in southern Africa—Lesotho, Botswana, Swaziland, and Mauritius—became independent by 1968 without incident.

The situation in Rhodesia was a source of humiliation and embarrassment to the British government. The colonial government, dominated by white settlers, feared that Britain would abandon the colony and give independence to the territory on the basis of majority rule; thus the British would become a minority in the country of over 6 million black Africans. To prevent this, the administration, led by Ian D. Smith, a former military officer, unilaterally declared independence from British rule. Unwilling to confront the white-dominated minority government, Britain was sidelined as black nationalists led by Robert Mugabe and Joshua Nkomo embarked on a guerrilla war against the minority government to establish black majority rule. With the support of South Africa, the Rhodesian government fought a long civil war that lasted until 1979. With very little support outside of South Africa and a global economic boycott against the country, the Smith government was forced to accept a return to British rule to oversee the transition of the territory through elections to independence and majority rule in 1980.

The two other colonial powers in sub-Saharan Africa, Belgium and Portugal, made the least sincere efforts in preparing a transition to the end of colonialism in Africa. Moreover, they were the poorest, and Portugal's colonies were the least developed of the European colonies. Belgium and Portugal were occupying large swaths of land that were much bigger and much richer than the home countries. The pearl of the Belgian colonies, the Belgian Congo, was 905,563 square miles in size and much larger than Western Europe. It also contained a diverse mix of valuable minerals, including tin, copper, diamonds, and cobalt. Portugal's main colonies, Angola and Mozambique, were each larger than Portugal and also provided a wide mix of mineral resources. On the basis of the rationale for colonialism—a source for raw materials, captive markets for finished European goods, and the prestige that went with colonial possession—both Belgium and Portugal could ill-afford to lose such benefits, and they had no intention of leaving. They had also done the least to foster indigenous socioeconomic and political development.

Following minor changes in colonial policy in the mid-1950s, blacks were allowed to participate in local government in the Belgian Congo. Not surprisingly, given what was happening in other African colonies, this gesture was considered insufficient by the various Congolese parties that emerged to advocate complete independence. These demands reached a climax in January 1959, when a riot in Kinshasa forced Belgium to reconsider its policy. Hastily, the Belgians called an all-party conference in Belgium in January 1960 to discuss the conditions for independence. The result of the conference was the drafting of a constitution, an agreement on elections to be held in May 1960, and independence on June 30. Within a matter of a few months, the Belgian Congo became independent. Independence was soon marred, however, by internal conflicts characterized by regional divisions, ideological differences, ethnic tensions, competing economic interests, and personality conflicts among the new political elite. These internal divisions were in turn manipulated and reinforced by Belgian business interests at home and in the country, as well as American cold war diplomacy. The result was a bitter civil war that broke out only a few months after independence.

In 1962, Rwanda and Burundi, which first had been colonized by Germany and later administered by Belgium, were also granted independence. In these two countries Belgium employed a colonial practice of manipulating ethnic divisions to suit its interests. Belgium favored the Tutsi ethnic group, whom it deployed as overlords to dominate the Hutu majority, a practice that exacerbated age-old antagonisms between the two groups. This ethnic animosity spilled over into a massacre of Tutsis by Hutus in 1959 in Rwanda. Animosity continued in both countries after they were granted independence in 1962. The worst acts of violence took place in the 1990s when the nations of the world stood by while in 1994 the Hutu majority massacred over 800,000 Tutsis. Unlike in Rwanda, where the majority Hutus had gained power after independence, in Burundi the minority Tutsis had by default gained control of the country at independence through their king, Mwambutsa IV. His failure to reconcile the two groups started the country on a course of ethnic massacres and counter-massacres that continued into the early 21st century.

The Portuguese colonies of Angola, Mozambique, Cape Verde, Guinea-Bissau, and Sao Tome and Principe eventually gained independence in the mid-1970s, but the decolonization process in these countries was unplanned and bloodier than in other colonies. Decolonization was the result of both internal political dynamics in Portugal (including the overthrow of the dictatorial Salazar government in 1974 by junior military officers) and well-organized armed insurrections by African nationalists throughout the colonies. The new political leaders in Portugal moved to cut their losses by granting independence to the colonies, but this move came after a significant loss of life and destruction of property. Even so, just before independence in Angola in 1975, a civil war broke out between rival nationalist factions, the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA), the National Front for the Liberation of Angola (FNLA), and the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola (MPLA). Mozambique, whose main nationalist party, the Marxist-leaning Mozambique Liberation Front (Frelimo), had led a guerrilla struggle against Portuguese colonialism, found itself fighting against reactionary, right-wing Mozambique National Resistance (Renamo) insurgents supported by some Portuguese settlers and South Africa.

In all, by the 1990s, only Namibia and South Africa remained under colonial control. South Africa, which administered Namibia under a League of Nations mandate, refused to grant independence to the territory and also refused to accept the transfer of the territory to the United Nations (UN) as a trust territory as had been the case with all other League of Nations mandates. South Africa's obstinacy fueled Namibian nationalism, which culminated in a military campaign begun by the South West Africa People's Organization of Namibia (SWAPO) in 1966. By the late 1980s, SWAPO's campaigns, pressure from the UN, and the changing international situation caused by the collapse of the Soviet Union created a climate that led to South Africa's agreement for a settlement. In 1990, Namibia became independent.

Meanwhile, although South Africa had itself gained independence from Britain in 1910, only its white population—approximately 12 percent of the total—enjoyed all the rights and privileges of independence and full citizenship. The white minority had designed and put in place a form of internal colonialism known as apartheid and used it politically, economically, and socially to subjugate, oppress, and exploit its nonwhite majority population. Under apartheid, nonwhites were divided into three categories: Coloureds, Asians, and blacks. A similar system was implemented in Namibia. International pressure, domestic mobilization, and costly guerrilla warfare by African nationalists (mainly the African National Congress [ANC]) forced the white minority government finally to end apartheid and negotiate a transfer of power to its majority black population in 1994. With South Africa's transfer to majority rule, colonialism in Africa, which had started a little over a century earlier, formally came to an end.

Politics in Postcolonial Africa

Experiments with Democracy, Nation Building, and One-Party Politics

Politics in sub-Saharan Africa's postcolonial era has been as intriguing as it has been challenging. For most Africans, independence was considered a means to an end rather than an end in itself. Most believed, naively perhaps, that independence would bring an end to the injustice, oppression, and exploitation that they suffered under colonial rule. They viewed colonialism as the source of their miseries and independence as their salvation: independence would lead to improvements in their social and economic situations through job creation; new roads, schools, and hospitals; the return of lands expropriated under colonialism; better prices for farm products; and greater openness and participation in determining their destiny. In short, independence was welcomed with high expectations and hope for a much better future in contrast with the dark memories of the colonial past. The challenge the postcolonial leaders faced was to devise strategies that would rally the people around a vision, a common agenda, and a strategy for governance that could confront the challenges of economic and political development and satisfy popular expectations.

The goals of nation building and socioeconomic development were adopted as the main objectives of postcolonial public policy, with each state devising its own ideology and agenda on how to realize them. Thus, Africans and analysts alike measured politics in the postcolonial era by how well the new states fared in addressing their national goals. A gap began to develop between the citizens of the various countries and their political leaders regarding priorities and strategies. Political leaders sought to accomplish the nation-building goals before turning their attention to economic development, arguing that they needed national unity and political stability before they could deal with the daunting problems of economic development. Although ordinary Africans did not share this view, their political leaders proceeded to elaborate their visions.

The politics of African nation building was built on the widely held premise that the postcolonial countries were much too diverse ethnically and culturally and their political behavior and identities too narrowly focused on their ethnic or regional affinity groups to be guided by Western liberal democratic political philosophies or models. Drawing from the brief and limited experiences during the waning years of colonialism when limited home rule within a democratic framework was introduced in the colonies, and from their own experiences with democratic politics during the first few years of independence, political leaders in sub-Saharan Africa latched onto the single-party formula to serve as the basis for organizing politics.

During the final years of colonialism and the early years of independence, politics was more often dominated by ethnic or regional considerations than by considerations of the national interest. Political parties usually represented ethnic or regional constituencies rather than national mass movements, with voting during elections reflecting a similar ethnic or regional and parochial pattern. In a pluralist democratic political culture, this would be viewed as a healthy exercise in democratic rights and association. Political leaders in sub-Saharan Africa, however, saw the trend as undermining efforts at national unity. Emphasizing the need to forge a common national identity from the morass of ethnic and cultural pluralism, one country after another abolished multiparty democratic politics and replaced it with one-party politics. Despite differences in colonial experiences, levels of development, and history, by the mid-1970s most African nations—ranging from countries such as Senegal and Ghana (among the most assimilated into Western ways) to Tanzania, Zambia, Kenya, Cameroon, Côte d’Ivoire, and Gabon—had officially become one-party states.

The single-party systems established in sub-Saharan Africa differed from one country to another, but they also shared common traits. In most countries, the leaders employed tactics involving co-optation, intimidation, and coercion to do away with multiparty politics, while in other countries one-party rule emerged out of the dominant parties that controlled politics during colonialism, as was the case in Côte d’Ivoire and Tanzania. One-party systems also differed in terms of how the electoral process functioned. In most countries the party leadership merely prepared a list of candidates from different constituencies and submitted the list to the electorate, which was expected to legitimize the list through their votes for or against the entire list. Such systems made the party leadership very powerful, as they became brokers of party patronage and gatekeepers to public offices. Elections in some of the one-party systems such as in Kenya and Tanzania were slightly more competitive: the electorate chose from multiple names on the party lists for each electoral district.

Under one-party rule, other democratic institutions such as independent trade unions that were restructured and brought under the party’s control were co-opted by the party, or they were allowed to operate as private entities under significant regulation and constraint. Moreover, the private press was usually subjected to censorship, and certain individual rights were significantly curtailed. The legal systems also suffered tremendously, with little or no independence from one-party rule. Political leaders appointed judges, which gave them considerable influence over the courts. In most instances, this lack of judicial independence resulted in a forfeiture of due process and the rule of law.

Military and Politics

Another key element in the political culture of postcolonial sub-Saharan Africa is the phenomenon of the military coup d’état and prolonged periods of military rule. Coup d’état, the military overthrow of a government, first took place in sub-Saharan Africa in Togo in 1963. President Sylvanus Olympio was ousted by military force and replaced by his political rival, Nicolas Grunitzky. In the same year, Benin experienced its own coup. A series of coups and a succession of military governments soon followed in some of the more prominent countries, including Nigeria in January 1966 and Ghana a month later. By the mid-1970s, it was easier to count the number of countries without military governments than those ruled by the military, as most countries had now succumbed to military rule.

Leaders of coups in sub-Saharan Africa explained their takeovers by citing features unique to their single country as well as common rationales. Coups often were staged during periods of great political turmoil, such as when sitting leaders made major, divisive decisions; when leaders seemed unwilling to take bold actions on matters judged to be of immense interest to the public; when the leaders did not invest in the military’s welfare; and when the political leadership was viewed as too zealous. Coup leaders tended to justify their seizure of power in terms of saving the nation from civilian corruption, abuse of office by political leaders, and saving the country from ruinous factional politics that threaten to destroy national unity. Sometimes their rationalizations were focused on the poor performance of the economy, in which case coup leaders portrayed themselves being able to solve these difficult problems although their civilian or military predecessors had failed.

Ironically, the trend in the region has been for coup leaders or those they install in office to be changed mainly through later coups. Some countries—among them Nigeria, Ghana, Chad, Benin, and Burkina Faso—have experienced more than three coups. Most countries have experienced several forms of military rule, and only a few countries—Cameroon, Kenya, Tanzania, Namibia, Senegal, and Botswana—have either avoided coups entirely or prevented their success.

The record shows that military governments in sub-Saharan Africa have been just as corrupt, oppressive, divisive, and indecisive as their civilian counterparts. Moreover, the economies of certain countries (including Uganda, Central African Republic, Liberia, and Ghana) performed far better under civilian governments than under military rule. Ghana, for instance, while under successive military governments in the 1960s and 1970s, was without basic supplies even though it was among the richest of postindependent African countries. Successive military governments in Nigeria, culminating with that of Sani Abacha between 1993 and 1998, basically plundered the country and left it at the mercy of foreign creditors despite all its oil reserves and petrodollars. Liberia started experiencing its worst economic problems in the hands of Samuel Kanyon Doe, its military leader from 1980 to 1990.

Many military leaders have been just as ethnocentric as the civilian governments from which they seize power. Moreover, a disproportionate share of the notorious African dictators that the world has known, among them Idi Amin Dada of Uganda, Jean-Bédél Bokassa of the Central African Republic, Joseph D. Mobutu of Zaire (now the Democratic Republic of the Congo), and Sani Abacha of Nigeria, were military leaders. They were not only oppressive, they also bankrupted their public treasuries and pushed these countries countless years back as far as social relations and development are concerned.

The records of those military regimes that were average or moderate were not any better than their civilian counterparts on the index of governance. Most military governments banned political parties, and then their leaders took the civilian title of president. With some exceptions (as in Nigeria before Abacha's coup), press freedom was usually absent, as was due process and the rule of law. In Ghana under dictator Flt. Lt. Jerry John Rawlings, judges were kidnapped and killed as a form of intimidation. The military government of Gen. Etienne Eyadéma of Togo used torture, press censorship, and control over the judiciary as a tool for sustaining power.

Military governments also had to take responsibility for creating some of the economic problems of their countries as well as failing to address them successfully. By the 1980s, most countries were under military rule and had been so for some time; therefore the military leaders could not blame their predecessors for their current problems in the economy.

Politics in the 1990s: A Return to Competitive Politics?

Politics in sub-Saharan Africa took a dramatic new turn in the 1990s after the 30 years of one-party dominance and military rule following independence. Almost without preparation, governments in the region were confronted with popular and sustained agitation for change to more democratic systems. These challenges were not necessarily new—many of these regimes had often faced such pressures in spite of immense restrictions placed on political activities. What was new in the renewed calls for democratization was the geopolitical context. The Berlin Wall had fallen only a year earlier, in 1989, and in the communist countries of Eastern Europe citizens had been organizing massive public demonstrations for democracy. Similar calls were being made in the Baltic states in the rapidly crumbling Soviet Union. In many Latin American countries like Chile, Argentina, and Nicaragua, military dictators and juntas were replaced with civilian governments via free and fair elections. Africans who had been used to organizing demonstrations and strikes for change felt even more energized by the demands for greater democracy around the world. More important, however, was the fact that the main external obstacles to their goals, the foreign supporters and benefactors of their autocratic governments, could now be on their side.

Foreign powers that had in the past often protected the authoritarian governments (or turned a deaf ear to the complaints of prodemocracy activists) for ideological and geopolitical reasons (that is, preventing international rivals from extending their sphere of influence) were now more willing to pressure African governments to open their political systems in a post-cold war international system. With agitation from below by students, intellectuals, and workers and pressure from foreign allies of the government that advocated democratic change (including the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund [IMF], which included political liberalization and an end to corruption among its conditions for loan financing of development projects), African governments were forced to take action.

Most regimes tried to resist at first, but they often found themselves at odds with those whose support they would need in order to fight a lengthy battle—the donor countries. In some cases, as happened in Cameroon, the initial reaction was to resist the pressure to reform, but many eventually relented (the Cameroon president, Paul Biya, initially refused to open up Cameroon's system, but upon his return from a trip to France, he agreed to do so). Even leaders known for their harsh rule relented: President Mobutu of Zaire (now Democratic Republic of the Congo) became an early adherent of democratization. Within a period of a year, when they realized that the wind of change was irreversible, much of the old guard jumped on the bandwagon and became adherents of democratization. As it turned out, most leaders simply wanted to work from within so as to control the process and its outcome, with an eye toward preserving their own political skins.

The process and pace of democratization varied significantly from country to country. Some governments, mainly governments in the French-speaking countries, pushed for the organization of a sovereign national conference that would be responsible for drafting a constitution, appointing a transitional government to run the country, and organizing elections. Benin, the first country to challenge its government to democratize, used this formula. A second formula was that of amending the existing constitution and allowing for multi-party competitive politics. This formula was used by some French-speaking countries, among them Cameroon and Côte d'Ivoire. A third approach involved the drafting of a new constitution. Many English-speaking countries and countries making the transition from military rule employed this formula, among them Kenya, Nigeria, and Ghana. Not surprisingly, in some countries—Benin, Zambia, Republic of the Congo, Mali, and Malawi—the outcome of the elections that resulted was defeat for the incumbents. In many countries, including Togo, Cameroon, Kenya, Gabon, Ghana, and Burkina Faso, the incumbent leaders won under competitive elections. In many countries, the incumbent used various illicit tactics, ballot rigging, control of the media, finance, intimidation, and bribery to form parties in order to split the votes of the opposition to ensure victory. Nonetheless, by 2006, a number of countries had held three or more presidential elections and an equivalent number of legislative and local government elections under the new, more competitive political conditions.

Many countries in sub-Saharan Africa have taken major steps to open up their political systems. Across the region the media are much freer, there is greater individual freedom, and people are more able to organize and participate in politics than ever before. This is a far cry from the repressive political environment of the 1980s. However, these changes do not mean that sub-Saharan African countries are now full democracies. They can begin to approach that point only when elections can be conducted freely and fairly and then produce stable, peaceful leadership change. In contemporary sub-Saharan Africa, many of those who are leaders in 2006 were in power more than 20 years ago. Some countries have introduced term limits for political leaders, but such changes can be rolled back, as in Uganda and Chad, where the presidents later initiated constitutional changes so that they could run a third time (and in Nigeria as well, where a similar attempt by President Olusegun Obasanjo failed in 2006). These cases serve as a reminder that the leaders continue to contemplate manipulation of the countries' constitutions the way they used to routinely do under one-party or military rule.

Challenge of Development

Economic development preoccupied the newly independent states of sub-Saharan Africa almost to the same magnitude as the issue of nation building. Not least among the reasons was their view that economic development would enhance the efforts at nation building by deradicalizing the population and hence ensure stability. But besides the political need for development, the economic rationale was compelling: sub-Saharan Africa had emerged from colonialism without the capacity to sustain itself in a competitive global economy. While many of the countries had vast endowments of natural resources, the governments and productive sectors lacked the capacity to develop such resources. Worst of all, many had problems providing for some of the essential needs of their citizens—jobs, health care, education, and roads. The pursuit of economic development as a goal thus required fostering the productive capacity of societies, providing key goods and services for citizens, and finding ways to increase the size of national economies and raise living standards. These countries already had an economic base created during colonial rule. With few exceptions, and for better or worse, their leaders chose to build their economies upon the colonial framework, dominated by agriculture and mining. Efforts to build strong economies in the region have been undermined by a variety of factors, some of the leadership's making, others shaped by external forces.

Export-Oriented Agriculture, Import Substitution, Massive Industrialization, and Debt

Sub-Saharan Africa's leaders inherited economies that were based on commodities that in turn were dependent on exportation to the global market. In the years following independence, some countries chose to continue with an agriculture-oriented economic development policy. Countries that chose this strategy increased the cultivation of established agricultural commodities, and some diversified to other agricultural products as well. In Côte d'Ivoire, for example, the government embarked on a program of massive agricultural expansion, with much of that expansion based on large farms or plantations. Cultivators included many foreign planters, especially French nationals.

During the first decade and a half, this investment paid off, and many countries that had followed the model of development via agriculture were rewarded with high prices for their products in world markets, although world commodity prices fluctuated. Positive returns fueled even more investments in that sector. High prices for commodities continued in the 1970s, but then prices began to fall as production increased. This trend led to lower farm incomes as the global market reacted to the production increases with lower market prices. Consequently, farm incomes have fallen more than they have risen during the past 40 years. This situation adversely affected government revenues, leading to significant public deficits and a reduced capacity to provide services, maintain and develop infrastructure, and create an environment conducive to attracting investment capital. Faced with this state of affairs, African governments chose to borrow from international lenders to finance their budgets and continue national development plans.

While prices for Africa's main export commodities were falling, higher oil prices in the 1970s and 1980s not only reduced demands for Africa's agricultural products (as Western societies shifted their resources to pay for higher oil), but non-oil-producing sub-Saharan African countries also paid higher prices for the oil they were importing. With the exception of the oil-producing sub-Saharan African countries that saw increased revenues (at that time these comprised Nigeria, Gabon, Republic of the Congo, and Angola), African countries encountered only more deficits. In an effort to deal with the situation, these countries took on even greater debt to finance their budgets, provide services, and pay employees.

The persistence of the lower demand for agricultural products, and the high prices for oil that triggered a recession in the West hit sub-Saharan African economies hard. By the early 1980s, Africa's habit of borrowing to deal with the worsening economic conditions led to massive debt. Debt that in 1970 was $6 billion had increased by 1980 to $60.9 billion, by 1990 to $166 billion, and it continued upward to more than $200 billion in 2000. Interest on the debt also started to mount, so that Africa's export earnings were going mainly to service its debt without much left to reinvest in development projects or to finance annual budgets.

Efforts to deal with the regional economic crisis have centered on initiatives to reduce Africa's debt. Debt rescheduling, debt relief, debt forgiveness, and debt cancellation are some of the ideas that have been floated for addressing the problem. The fact that the bulk of the debt is owed to foreign governments, followed by international institutions, and then to private banks makes this even more complicated. Various enticements by the IMF and the World Bank have been put in place to help the countries; these include the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries initiative launched by the World Bank in 1996 to help cushion the burden that crushing external debt places on debtor countries and their economies. Countries that have completed the program have had their public debts and their debts to the IMF and World Bank cancelled or reduced.

Although sub-Saharan Africa's economic problems were partly the result of external factors, significant domestic factors were also involved. Apart from the continuation of the policy of dependence on agricultural commodities whose prices African countries had little direct influence on, African leaders made other costly mistakes by expanding other policies devised during colonial rule. They expanded some of the state-owned firms that they inherited from colonial governments, and they also created new ones. As part of the economic strategy of development, many countries in the region devised economic policies to promote industrialization. These policies, known as import substitution, called for the domestic manufacture of certain basic products so as to avoid importing them. The goal of import substitution was to generate economies of scale, create better-paying jobs, and generate new sources of revenue. Import substitution was also meant to promote industrialization as an alternative to agriculture-led development.

To implement the policy of import substitution, African governments encouraged local firms to invest in the productive sectors identified for import substitution investments. Where local capital was unavailable or insufficient, the governments created parastatals (state-owned firms) to invest in and exploit the targeted sector. Products reserved for import substitution investments were shielded from competition with overseas products through the imposition of high tariffs on goods from foreign competitors. Some of the parastatals were monopolies, while others often had competitors in the domestic private sectors. Because the parastatals would still operate with subsidies from the state even if they did not make a profit, they tended to drive competitors out of the market. Moreover, some of the inputs that went into the products manufactured by import substitution firms were imported at high prices. The higher prices of these inputs were then passed on to consumers through higher prices for the finished products. Consequently parastatals developed into inefficient political tools used to reward supporters of the regimes. In some instances they became a place to banish politically ambitious individuals so as to take them out of the limelight. Accountability was often lacking, management laxity was rampant, and the government often subsidized their budgets. Rather than promote industrialization and diverse economic activities, the policy of import substitution ended up siphoning money from the state, driving away foreign investment and competition, and promoting corruption and rent seeking.

While import substitution focused on small and medium-size economic activities, another economic strategy that some countries used was the strategy of massive industrialization. This was based on investment in heavy industries so as to move the country overnight to the status of an industrialized economy. But this strategy required massive capitalization. In addition, it required the importation of inputs for production, massive energy supplies, the presence of a skilled labor force, and a large market for the finished goods. Ghana, for example, adopted this strategy and invested in the construction of a dam to supply the energy necessary for industrial production in addition to making investments in the industries themselves. However, with neither the monies for the inputs nor the markets for the finished goods, some of the industries in Ghana found they had to operate at less than full capacity. The strategy of massive industrialization was also plagued by the same problems as import substitution strategies, that is, dependence on public subsidies, inefficient parastatals, and the encouragement of rent seeking, which merely deepened the economic crisis.

Corruption

Corruption played a major role in both the unfolding economic crisis and the mounting debt burden in Africa. Initially this fact tended to be overlooked or was not always given serious attention by outside observers. The totality of corruption has now grown to encompass billions of dollars per year, and its persistence represents a serious threat to African economic and political development; yet no institutional mechanisms had been set up to deal with it until the late 1990s. Monetary corruption (graft, bribery, and fraud) is very expensive for an economy; thus, it tends to overshadow other, more subtle forms such as procedural corruption and nepotism. While monetary corruption siphons money directly from the system, procedural corruption siphons time. Nepotism deprives society of people's skills and the benefits of promotion through merit. All three forms are rampant in sub-Saharan Africa and are serious impediments to progress in contemporary African political systems.

Monetary corruption has a strong, negative impact on economic development. Money siphoned from the state deprives it of the ability to pay for vital services and products or pay down external debts, forcing governments to borrow at even higher prices. Moreover, the illicit money is redirected from public accounts for private gain, thus depriving the public as a whole of the benefits. The $5 billion that President Mobutu is said to have stolen in Zaire could have paid for the building of several hospitals or other public infrastructure projects. Such is the cost of corruption, and all citizens pay for that individual transgression. In its annual corruption index, Transparency International, a Berlin-based organization that tracks corruption worldwide, lists most of the countries in sub-Saharan Africa among the most corrupt in the world. Critics call the worst African transgressor regimes "kleptocracies," implying that the regimes exist for no other purpose than to steal from public treasuries.

Structural Adjustment

As the economic crisis in the region deepened, the IMF and the World Bank stepped in to help with loans. Negotiations for these loans were often contentious because the loans came with strings attached. Both of these international financial institutions wanted guarantees that the loans would be repaid, and such guarantees required the African governments to agree to structural adjustment programs. Structural adjustments required the governments to restructure their economies to put them more in line with market economic principles. Structural adjustment programs generally included four main targets: revenue generation, reduction in the size of the government and public payrolls, market liberalization, and increasing productivity and demands. Specific steps ranged from reform of the country's tax system and tax collection, elimination of subsidies, removal of controls on agricultural prices, currency devaluation, tariff reduction, privatization of government-owned companies, and reducing and streamlining regulations.

Some African governments thought such structural adjustments would be political suicide; they believed such changes in policy would lead to political instability. This was particularly true about the elimination of many public subsidies, especially those on food. Moments after the implementation of structural adjustment programs in Zambia, which eliminated subsidies on grains, riots broke out in the country and a coup attempt was launched by disgruntled elements in the military.

Another contentious issue was that some of the measures hurt the most vulnerable because they involved cuts to basic services, social services, education, and health care. Also contributing to contentious relations between African governments and the two international lenders was the African governments' disapproval of the controls these institutions exercised over their economies. African leaders viewed such controls as infringements on their national sovereignty. In some countries, Nigeria for example, resentment and anger at the IMF's intrusion led to massive demonstrations that threatened the stability of the Nigerian government. After some countries signed agreements for structural adjustment loans, they found it difficult to stick with the program, although such structural adjustments would have helped in the long run. They eventually dropped out because of the sacrifices and hardships that the programs imposed, but dropping out only prolonged the economic crisis of sub-Saharan Africa.

HIV/AIDS

As sub-Saharan Africa sought solutions to its economic and political problems, another issue was brewing, an issue that would be as intractable as it was destructive. The HIV/AIDS epidemic will probably go down in history as Africa's worst public health epidemic, and it could not have come at a worse time, given the immense economic problems the region was already facing. Apart from not having adequate resources to mobilize against the epidemic, the stringent structural adjustment measures limited services—especially treatment—even more. As one tries to understand what the disease has done to the region, one cannot escape looking back to the early days to examine both actions and inactions. Although we need not dwell on hypotheticals, the debates and counterdebates about the African origin of the disease led to Africa's unwillingness to open its doors to experts working on it. To protect their national images, none of the African states wanted to be associated with a disease so terrible. For this and other reasons, sub-Saharan Africa's entry in the fight against AIDS came very late. By the time African governments confronted the epidemic, millions had been infected. Out of the more than 40 million people infected worldwide, 25 million—almost two-thirds of those infected—are in sub-Saharan Africa. In some countries, the percentage of the population affected is as large as 33 percent, although in others it is lower than 5 percent.

The AIDS epidemic is a health problem, but its impact extends deep into the very essence of African society, and it affects all aspects of African life. In economic terms, large public sums are required to deal with treatment, testing, and prevention. In addition, the most infected population cohort is the most productive in African societies, ranging in age from 20 to 49, which deprives the region of the backbone of its society and productive economy. Can countries in the region survive if they cannot produce for themselves?

Because AIDS is a disease transmitted through the most intimate aspects of human relationships, it is destroying the African family and is creating millions of orphans, many of whom are being cared for in orphanages or by community elders. Such care requires money, which is in short supply in the region. Will children who grow up in orphanages be able to acquire the values and traditions of their societies?

These are questions that have to be addressed by African governments. The more serious issue is finding ways of prolonging the lives of those infected with HIV but who have not yet developed AIDS. While scientific advances have led to the development of drugs that retard the mutation of the HIV virus into full blown AIDS, the cost of the drugs is much too high for the average African, whose annual income is less than $1,000. The challenge for African governments is to expand drug treatment by increasing the pool of recipients and to reduce the infection rate as they find ways of dealing with the social and economic problems the disease has generated.

The world has found various ways to support and help the effort to fight AIDS in Africa. After the United States increased its support to fight the epidemic during the final years of President Bill Clinton's term of office, the George W. Bush administration increased the amount of aid to $15 billion. Also, various private initiatives—the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation and the William J. Clinton Foundation's HIV/AIDS Initiative, for example—have focused attention on increasing access to drugs for a larger number of Africans infected with the virus.

Armed Conflict and Communal Violence

No single factor can explain the source of armed conflicts in sub-Saharan Africa. Conflicts in the region are the result of the multiple cleavages that cut across communities. These cleavages, including class, ethnicity, religion, geography, and ideology, are the breeding grounds for conflict. Their existence, however, does not necessarily mean that violence will occur and that if conflicts do take place they should succeed along preordained lines. Manipulation by the elites of Africa's various cleavages for their own purposes—turning various elements of the population or the government against each other—explains a great deal about the region's armed conflicts. Because the capacity of governments in sub-Saharan Africa is weak and the governments are often corrupt, their ability to respond is often inadequate or ineffective before the conflicts become lethal.

Armed conflicts are unfortunately major and regular occurrences in contemporary African politics. Very few countries have escaped armed conflicts of one form or another. Three broad types of armed conflicts have occurred in the region. The first is a conflict in which one group organizes a fighting force and militarily confronts the government or another group in the country over a particular grievance. This type of conflict has generated much instability, many casualties, and repercussions beyond the country through spillover into neighboring countries. This is also the type of armed conflict that often has invited foreign intervention. The second type of armed conflict is when one group in a country becomes involved in armed conflict with another group to settle a grievance. With few exceptions, this second form of communal conflict is often spontaneous. Effects of the second form could often be mitigated if the government would mediate impartially. A third common form of conflict is the coup d'état: one part of the government, usually the military, uses its guns to seize power. Sometimes this leads to tremendous bloodshed and extended conflict. At other times, the bloodshed is limited in time and scope.

Some of the continent's worst conflicts—among them the Nigerian civil war of 1967–1970; the conflicts in the southern African countries of Zimbabwe, Angola, Mozambique, Namibia, and South Africa during the 1970s, 1980s, and early 1990s; and the more recent civil war in Sudan—are cases of the first type of organized, armed conflict. During the 1970s and 1980s, armed conflicts in the Horn of Africa involving Eritreans, Somalis in the eastern region of Ogaden, Tigrayan people, and the Oromo (all groups in Ethiopia) fighting the government were also of the first type and had a similar effect. Other major conflicts that have taken place or are continuing in sub-Saharan Africa include the conflicts in the Great Lakes region involving Rwanda, Burundi, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and Uganda. The civil wars in Sierra Leone and Liberia that ended in 2001 and 2003, respectively, and that in the western Darfur region of Sudan that began in 2003 are other examples.

Conflicts in the region during the cold war often led to foreign intervention because each of the superpowers, the United States and the Soviet Union, sought to expand its sphere of influence or to counter the influence of its adversary in the region. This intervention often prolonged and complicated the impacted conflict. Unilateral foreign intervention during the post-cold war era has been infrequent and, instead of helping one side fight and win, has tended to be multilateral and intended to either separate the fighting sides to broker a cease-fire or bring humanitarian supplies to victims of the fighting. Thus, UN and African Union peacekeepers and various international nongovernmental humanitarian organizations have deployed large contingents in various conflicts.

The specific context of armed conflict in sub-Saharan Africa is also very important, as most conflicts involve a cluster of factors rather than one specific factor that has caused a conflict. Most conflicts have either an ethnic, religious, or resource context to them, or they are based on a manipulation of ethnicity and religion by elites seeking political or economic power. No magic formula exists to predict whether a country that is ethnically and religiously fragmented will be involved in armed conflict, although ethnicity has played the principal role in conflicts in Nigeria, Sudan, Liberia, Rwanda, Ethiopia, and Burundi. In Sudan, ethnicity has been at the root of the civil war between the north and south, and ethnicity has continued to be the dominant factor in the conflict in the Darfur region in the early 21st century.

Religion as a source of conflict in sub-Saharan Africa has not been as widespread as it has been in other parts of the world, probably because family and ethnic ties are more important in sub-Saharan Africa than is religion. A family or a village may be split along religious lines, with half its members Muslims and the other half Christians. Religious conflicts that arise do not easily lead to violence when those involved are members of the same family, village, or ethnicity. And yet, even with the moderating social ties of ethnicity and family, religious violence in Africa has been growing.

Nigeria has been a hotbed for religious tensions that spill over on many occasions into armed conflicts. Two types of communal violence have been associated with the Muslim-Christian divide in Nigeria. The first is based on political competition between Christians and Muslims, which goes back to the early years of Nigeria's independence when Christians from the south dominated the country's public sector because of their educational attainments in comparison with the less-educated Muslims from the north. Even though the Muslim northerners resented this, they accepted it and worked to change the situation by using their political power derived from their larger numbers to reverse the situation. Muslim assertiveness met with resentment among southern Christians, and the result was the civil war of 1967–1970 that displayed elements of religious animosity. The second form of religious conflict in Nigeria is associated with fundamentalist Islam's agenda of creating a theocracy. Since 2000, several Nigerian states in the predominantly Muslim north have instituted sharia, or Islamic law, and this has led to several confrontations with Christians. Violence between the two groups produced more than 3,000 deaths between late 1987 and 1993.

Sudan is another country in sub-Saharan Africa where religious conflicts have been profound. As in Nigeria, the conflict is between Muslims and Christians. Sudan adopted Islamic law in 1983, imposing it on the Christian south, at the same time that the south was at war with the mainly Arab north. Sudan also became a training ground for Osama bin Laden's al-Qaida followers in their fight against the United States and other Western targets. Although bin Laden was subsequently expelled from the country, the Islamist government has continued enforcing Islamic law.

Somalia is another country where Islamic law has only recently been introduced. The country has not had a viable central government since the overthrow of the government of Siad Barre in 1991. Years of civil war did not result in meaningful settlement, but peace talks between the warring factions finally generated a transitional government of national unity in 2004; however, the government has not been able to establish control of its entire territory. A group of Islamists sidestepped the new government (installed in the town of Baidoa and provided security by the African Union) to create a series of Islamic courts to rule territories under their control. The success of these courts so far has turned Somalia into another state in sub-Saharan Africa with Islamic law as its basic law. The Somali situation is much different from Nigeria or Sudan, given that Somalia does not have a viable central government but instead is controlled by warlords. The chaos and political turmoil make it easier for these factions to be infiltrated by or form alliances with groups with global terrorist missions rather than the local political goals that seem to concern the warlords today. Because more than 90 percent of Somalia's population is Muslim, the likelihood of the new laws remaining in place is unknown if political differences are settled. Ethiopia, an ally of the interim Somali government in Baidoa, is opposed to a theocratic government on its borders, a fact that could lead to problems with a Somali government that retains the Islamic courts and law.

Conflicts over resources—when groups and communities mobilize to demand what they consider to be their fair share of resources from the state—have been important components of conflicts in sub-Saharan Africa. This has been the case in the conflict in the Niger Delta region of Nigeria, for example, where armed regional groups have been battling oil companies and government troops.

Some conflicts are also motivated by the desire to control the government machinery to gain access to and control of the state's resources. Sometimes the resources might not have been the initial cause of the war, but once war begins, control over these resources becomes the basis for its continuation. Control over diamond fields in the war in Sierra Leone in the 1990s is one example. Charles Chankay Taylor's strategy in the Liberian war of the 1990s was to control the resource-rich region and the use it to finance his execution of the war. Laurent-Désiré Kabila in 1997 used a similar tactic. He went after mineral-rich Shaba against the government forces of Mobutu in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. And the discovery of oil in southern Sudan provided motivation for the intensification of the conflict by the country's government on one hand and by the Sudanese People's Liberation Army (SPLA) on the other.

The spillover of Africa's various communal armed conflicts is the consequent massive refugee population displaced by the ravages of the armed conflicts. Sub-Saharan Africa has one of the highest refugee populations in the world. UN figures put the number of refugees in the region at 4 million, second only to Asia with 9 million, out of a worldwide figure of 16 million refugees. The UN figure for sub-Saharan Africa does not include the millions of displaced people within their own countries. Often the countries that harbor the refugees, such as the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Chad, and Guinea, are themselves too poor and mired in their own armed conflicts to handle the influx.

Even more sobering are the many deaths that have resulted from armed conflicts. More than 800,000 people were killed in Rwanda alone in 1994, 4 million in the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo that began in 1997, and 200,000 in Darfur in Sudan. A spillover is the instability that the conflicts often cause in neighboring countries. The conflict in Rwanda in 1994 ended up generating conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo through the large refugee population camped in eastern Congo. The civil war in Sierra Leone throughout the 1990s was the contagious effect of the Liberian war and the support Sierra Leone received from Liberia.

Subregional Issues

The preceding discussion provides the backdrop against which to view contemporary African politics, a backdrop that is constantly being reinforced by new issues. Upon closer examination, some of the issues that seem new are merely offshoots of older, still unresolved problems that feed off newer environments. That is the case with more recent challenges that have surfaced in specific subregions and countries. Whether these newer challenges are localized within a specific country or subregionally, they often have implications for regional and global security. Examples include the crisis in the Darfur region of Sudan, the instability in Somalia, the peace settlement in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and the work of UN tribunals in Sierra Leone and in Arusha, Tanzania. In addition to these are the continental efforts within the framework of the African Union and its new vision, African Renaissance.

The Darfur Region of Sudan

The ongoing Darfur conflict represents, first, a major test of the international community's will to deal with the systematic massacre of a particular group of people for no other reason than that they are who they are. This is called genocide, but the Sudanese government and its supporters, including Russia and China, deny this. Second, the conflict exacerbates the poverty and misery in the region, a challenge that the government of Sudan or any government in Africa has failed to resolve for close to half a century. Apart from the 200,000 deaths from the conflict, it has created a refugee crisis. More than 2 million people have been displaced from their homes in Darfur, and over 200,000 have crossed into Chad. Third, the crisis is a test of the will to act on the part of the African Union and the United Nations before the numbers grow worse. In 1994, the UN failed to act decisively while similar ethnic massacres took place in Rwanda and Burundi. At that time the Organization of African Unity (now the African Union) was also ineffective. It appears that history is repeating itself only a little more than a decade later, and no clear end to the crisis is in sight. Fourth, the conflict has the potential of generating a regional war involving Chad, Sudan, and the Central African Republic. Chad already supports rebels in Darfur who are fighting against the Sudanese government, and Sudan supports Chadian rebels fighting to overthrow Chad's government. Rebels from Chad with bases in the Central African Republic have also been involved in operations to overthrow the Chadian government. The unpredictable nature of the situation came to the fore in April 2006 when Chadian rebels operating from bases in Darfur fought their way to Chad's capital, N'djamena, in April 2006 before being repelled. The rebels also initiated another offensive against the government in October 2006. Fifth, terrorist groups such as al-Qaida function best in chaotic situations where political order breaks down; thus, the possibility exists that al-Qaida could take advantage of the chaos in the region to build a base of operations there.

Somalia Again?

Somalia presents a dimension of chaos and insecurity rare even by African standards. For 15 years since the fall of the Siad Barre government in 1991, Somalia has had no central government. It has been governed by warlords, each controlling a different part of the country. Attempts to get the different groups to negotiate the creation of a viable government (mediated by other African countries and the African Union) were unsuccessful until 2004, when an agreement was reached on a transition government. Even so, some warlords refused to give up their arms and support the transition government. Because Mogadishu, the capital, continued to be controlled by warlords, the government was forced to establish itself in the town of Baidoa. The division of the country among warlords has made it a constant battleground, resulting in continuing anarchy and easy accessibility to global terrorist groups, including al-Qaida, for recruitment and other operational needs. The bombing by al-Qaida cells of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998 was traced to connections inside Somalia. Somali connections were also present in the attack on Israeli tourists in Kenya in 2002.

Efforts to set up a functioning central government have been complicated by the success of a new group known as the Islamic Courts Union (ICU) in seizing control of southern Somalia and Mogadishu, the capital, and uniting them under its control. The group stipulated its goal was to bring order and stability to the country through the institution of Islamic law, the sharia. However, Ethiopia views the ICU as a threat to its own interests, and some accounts say Ethiopia has deployed its forces in Somalia to protect the Baidoa government. Ethiopia fears that consolidation of an Islamic state on its border might embolden nationalist separatist groups within Ethiopia, especially in the Ogaden area occupied by ethnic Somali but also among the Oromo. The United States has also been concerned that the ICU could allow al-Qaida to build training camps in the country. The Bush administration even worked to preempt the success of the ICU by supporting an alliance of warlords to oppose it. Many fear that the situation could get out of hand and generate another subregional conflict in the Horn of Africa by bringing in Eritrea and other Islamic fighters on the side of the ICU.

Eritrea has already been supplying arms to the ICU, as has Ethiopia (to the Baidoa government), which has gone to war against Eritrea in the past.

International Terrorism

The United States has increasingly considered sub-Saharan Africa a crucial theater in the war on terrorism. Sub-Saharan Africa is a land of many porous borders, unstable governments, a large Muslim population, and a number of countries where no government exercises systematic authority throughout the territory. Some of the main terrorist groups, al-Qaida and Hezbollah, for example, have carried out operations in Africa against U.S. and Israeli targets, including the bombing of U.S. embassies in Tanzania and Kenya in 1998.

Some of those who carried out the bombing of the embassies were traced to Somalia. The Somali coast has also been a site used by pirates who have shot at cruise ships, probably in attempts to rob them. Somalia's attractiveness to terrorists and violent groups is due to the absence of any form of central authority with the power to govern throughout the territory. In 1995, Islamic terrorists used Sudan as a refuge as they planned and executed a plot to assassinate President Husni Mubarak of Egypt as his plane landed in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, for an Organization of African Unity summit. Osama bin Laden, leader of al-Qaida, found safe harbor in Sudan before he was expelled to Afghanistan.

Al-Qaida and Hezbollah were also attracted to other trouble spots of Africa—Sierra Leone, Liberia, and the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC)—all of which waged long civil wars during the 1990s and, for the DRC and Sierra Leone, into the early 21st century. The warring groups in these countries financed their wars mainly through the sale of diamonds and, especially the DRC, other minerals. The UN ban on minerals from these countries gave al-Qaida, Hezbollah, and perhaps other terrorist groups an opportunity to play a crucial role in circumventing the UN ban. Diamonds from Sierra Leone were often taken to Liberia under the guard of Liberian security personnel. From Liberia, the diamonds were then flown out of Africa. Al-Qaida and Hezbollah have also been linked to the diamond trade in the DRC. Other conflict areas in Africa, in Uganda, for example, where Lord's Resistance Army has been fighting the government for many years, provide territory conducive to international terrorist activities such as training and businesses used to raise funds.

Another attraction for global terrorist groups, especially jihadists, is the existence of sizable Muslim populations in many countries in the region (even though the Muslim population is smaller than the Christian population). But this advantage is stronger in eastern and southern Africa because many such terrorists, if they are of Arab or Asian descent, blend in more easily than they do in west and central Africa where Arab and Asian groups are much smaller and more easily segregated. Trouble spots in west and central Africa are better suited for raising funds through business activities than for establishing training camps. Thus, jihadist terrorists have been better established in Ethiopia, South Africa, Tanzania, and South Africa, countries where, although the Muslim population in relation to the entire population is small, the Arab and Asian segments of the population are much larger than in west and central African countries.

Fighting terrorists in Africa has been costly and complicated by economic factors and the nature of African borders. Africans have limited resources to put into intelligence gathering, communication, large counterterrorism units, and training programs. Various African countries have not been fully integrated by roads, railways, or by air. Roads are few and some are usable only during the dry season. Poverty and corruption fuel the instability in some of the countries of the region. Africa's large pool of unemployed people provides both breeding grounds for radical ideas and vulnerability to being recruited for a wage. Porous borders such as those shared by the DRC, Burundi, and Uganda provide ease of movement from one country to the other and allow terrorists to escape easily. Terrorists can also plan an operation in one country and execute it in another, as the Sudan-Chad border situation shows.

Fighting terrorism in Africa is also complicated by the fact that domestic groups seeking to overthrow their national governments could be viewed by those governments as al-Qaida-like organizations. If these dissident or illegal groups take refuge in a neighboring country, that neighbor might choose to deny requests for extradition to the home country. Such denials could unravel much of the cooperation that has been achieved in the global war on terrorism. War has brought African countries to cooperate with each other in ways they had not cooperated before. The war on terrorism has also led to new levels of cooperation between the United States and African governments in areas including information sharing, communication, interdiction, and the sharing of facilities. Djibouti and Kenya have allowed the United States to use their seaports and airports, and the United States has an intelligence-gathering post in Djibouti. Sudan, which once hosted Osama bin Laden, is reported to have allowed the United States to have access to files about certain suspects. Ethiopia and Kenya, both victims of terrorism associated with al-Qaida, have been working in collaboration with the United States to prevent al-Qaida from establishing a larger presence in Somalia. In addition, South Africa has an extradition agreement with the United States.

Niger Delta

Nigeria's Niger Delta presents one of the most enduring challenges that successive Nigerian governments have faced since the early 1990s. The estuary of the Niger River, the area where most of the country's crude oil is extracted, is covered by mangrove swamps that are difficult to access by people unfamiliar with them. Despite the oil produced in the area, poverty in the Niger Delta region is pervasive, and basic services are absent. In the delta, armed groups have been fighting the government, using tactics as varied as kidnapping, sabotage of infrastructure, and direct armed confrontation against government troops. Their grievance is that the area produces the country's vast oil wealth but does not receive its fair share of development projects financed by the oil revenue. They also complain that the oil pollutes the delta's environment and damages their principal means of livelihood—fishing. The groups accuse the Nigerian government of a form of internal colonialism, wherein the oil revenue is used for projects in other parts of the country because they are the home areas of the powerful and influential politicians. The Nigerian government denies this accusation and has labeled the groups as bandits instead of people with genuine or legitimate grievances. Sometimes the actions of the protesting groups have gone beyond protests: group members have broken pipelines and siphoned oil that they sell later in the black market. They frequently kidnap employees of oil companies and hold them for ransom.

Recently their actions have become bolder, and they have actually engaged government troops and defeated them, suggesting they have sophisticated weapons, training, and discipline. The unusual boldness and persistence of the armed groups has led to the suspicion that they are acting with the complicity of government officials in either the delta region or in the national government. In any case, the groups are well coordinated as they siphon the oil into containers and then transport it to the point of sale, usually in neighboring countries.

The impact of the conflict in the delta region goes beyond Nigeria. Nigeria has been immensely affected because the conflict led to a 25 percent decrease in Nigeria's oil production in early 2006, affecting oil company earnings. In turn, global oil prices have also been affected, with prices rising or falling depending on rebel activity.

Efforts by the United States to diversify its energy sources have led the United States to develop stronger relations with the oil-producing countries of the Gulf of Guinea in west Africa (Nigeria, Angola, Equatorial Guinea, Gabon, Republic of the Congo, Cameroon, and inland Chad). Currently 15 percent of the U.S. oil supply comes from this region, and it has been projected that by 2015 the region will supply 25 percent of U.S. oil needs. The impact on the United States of disruptions to oil production in the Niger Delta and political instability in Nigeria could be great.

Special Court for Sierra Leone

Between 1996 and 2002, Sierra Leone went through one of the most brutal internal conflicts in the contemporary world. By the time the war ended, thousands of people had lost their lives and thousands more were maimed, not by land mines but by machetes. The magnitude of the brutality and the abuses that took place led to the creation of the Special Court for Sierra Leone in Freetown, Sierra Leone. The special court is administered jointly by the government of Sierra Leone and the UN and is charged with trying those with the highest responsibility for war crimes and crimes against humanity committed in Sierra Leone between 1996 and 2002. The court applies both Sierra Leone law and international law in its proceedings. The court differs from the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR), located in Arusha, Tanzania, that hears cases about war crimes and crimes against humanity that took place during the Rwanda massacres because the ICTR was set up and funded by the UN Security Council. Charles Taylor, the former president of Liberia who was responsible for atrocities that took place during the Liberian civil war, was also indicted by the Special Court for Sierra Leone for his role in the brutal deaths or maiming of thousands of citizens of Sierra Leone during the war. Taylor's trial was later transferred to the Hague on grounds that he was a threat to peace.

Democratic Republic of the Congo

The Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC), a former Belgian colony that gained independence in 1960, is one of the most unstable countries in Africa. After many changes of government and one political crisis after another, army commander Joseph D. Mobutu seized power in 1965. He ruled the country, whose name he changed to Zaire in 1971, for 32 years (1965–1997) before he was ousted by Congolese rebels with the aid of troops from Rwanda. The Congolese leader of the rebel movement that ousted him, Laurent Désiré Kabila became president. Within 15 months, the coalition of Rwandan soldiers and the new Congolese government had broken down and the groups were at war with each other. Rwanda had backed the Congolese Rally for Democracy (RCD) rebel group against Kabila's government, and Uganda had supported another Congolese group, the Movement for the Liberation of the Congo (MLC) in an effort to oust the Kabila government. Zimbabwe, Namibia, and Angola became alarmed and, in an effort to check any expansionist ambitions of Uganda and Rwanda, sent troops to back the DRC in what had now become a regional war. This nine-year conflict led to over 4 million deaths and created a massive refugee problem.

Following the peace accords that brought about a cease-fire, in 2002 South Africa hosted peace talks that ended with an agreement for bringing the rebel forces into the government and setting up a power-sharing arrangement in the DRC. The agreement also called for a new constitution and the establishment of a timetable for elections after the transitional period. The new constitution was approved in December 2005, it came into effect in February 2006, and the first round of the presidential elections was held in July of 2006 with no one getting a clear-cut majority. The second round of the presidential elections was held on October 29, 2006, between Joseph Kabila and Jean-Pierre Bemba, the opposition candidate. Voter turnout was 67 percent. With 65 percent of the votes counted, Kabila led Bemba, 61 percent to 39 percent. Thus, Kabila is expected to win the election considered the most important in the country's history.

A New Scramble for Africa

In the strategic thinking of the major global powers, Africa has become more important than ever before because of the changes that have taken place in the international system during the past decade. These changes include, in particular, the increasing insecurity associated with terrorism as well as the rise of India and China as global powers and their vast and expanding energy needs. For the United States and Japan, which have been highly dependent on Middle Eastern oil, instability in that region has made that energy source too uncertain. The global war on terror has also influenced how the major powers, especially the United States, view the role Africa can play in global security. That role is one of partnership and cooperation.

The U.S. energy strategy is to diversify its oil suppliers as much as possible. Under that plan, sub-Saharan Africa is viewed as very important, despite the political risks. With 15 percent of current U.S. oil needs coming from Africa, the goal is that, by 2015, 25 percent of the U.S. oil supply will be from Africa. By 2020, that percentage is expected to rise further, and U.S. oil companies are investing billions of dollars—recently, $10 billion annually—in the oil sector in Africa. The United States will have to protect these sources of its energy; consequently it views Africa not just in terms of oil but also in terms of fighting terrorism. The United States has already been working with African countries on the fight against terrorism and other areas of mutual interest. India and China have placed Africa in their strategic thoughts about energy supplies as well. Thus, India and China have worked to increase investments and trade with Africa. Other countries, including Brazil and South Korea, have been working to increase their presence in Africa as well.

As 2006 comes to an end, the political situation in sub-Saharan Africa has been mixed. On the positive side, elections were held in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and we now await the results. In some of the trouble spots in the region, Sudan for example, the Darfur crisis remained unresolved, with no end in sight.

The Country

Located midway along the North African littoral and extending southward into the heart of the Sahara, Algeria is a Muslim country of Arab-Berber population, Islamic and French cultural traditions, and an economy in which the traditional importance of agriculture has been replaced by reliance on hydrocarbons, with petroleum and natural gas now accounting for more than 95 percent of exchange earnings. Women constitute only a small fraction of the paid labor force, concentrated in the service sector (particularly health care). The future role of women in government (and society as a whole) was one of the key issues separating the nation's Islamic fundamentalist movement from the dominant secularists in the 1990s.

For nearly two decades following independence Algeria was perceived by many as a model for Third World liberation movements: the socialist government attended to social welfare needs, while the economy grew rapidly as oil prices rose in the 1970s. Subsequently, declining oil revenues and poor economic management led to major setbacks. Once nearly self-sufficient in food, the country became highly dependent on foreign imports. Other problems included 25 percent unemployment, high population growth (more than one-half of the population is under 20 years old), an external debt estimated at more than $26 billion, a severe shortage of adequate housing, a widespread perception of corruption among government officials, and a spreading black market.

In the mid-1980s the government began to impose budget austerity while attempting to reduce state control of large industries and agricultural collectives, boost nonhydrocarbon production, and cultivate a free-market orientation. The pace of economic reform accelerated following an outbreak of domestic unrest in late 1988, which also precipitated the launching of what was initially considered one of the continent's "boldest democratic experiments." Although political liberalization was seriously compromised during the 1990s by confrontation with the fundamentalists, the government persevered with its new economic policies, thereby gaining partial rescheduling of the external debt and additional credits from the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank. Meanwhile, as mandated by the IMF, privatization accelerated, the collateral loss of some 400,000 jobs in the public sector contributing to growing popular discontent with fiscal policy. Burgeoning terrorist activity in the second half of the 1990s impaired foreign investment in a number of sectors, but it did not affect activity in the oil and gas fields in the southern desert, where oil reserves were estimated at about 16 billion barrels. Foreign investors were described in 2000 as exhibiting renewed interest in response to President Abdelaziz BOUTEFLIKA's free-market orientation and efforts to negotiate a settlement with antigovernment militants.

GDP growth of more than 5 percent was reported for 2004 and 2005, supported primarily by high oil and gas prices. As a result of significant budget surpluses, the government recently announced plans for large-scale spending increases designed to create jobs (official unemployment remained at more than 17 percent, with some observers suggesting the actual level could be twice that figure) and improve the housing and transportation sectors. Efforts were also launched to attract additional foreign investment to the non-hydrocarbon sector, although the IMF cautioned that substantial reform and modernization were still required in the banking system. International financial institutions also urged the government to accelerate its privatization program, described as having stalled recently in the wake of the budget surpluses and a lingering fondness among the population (as well as a number of government leaders) for public benefits associated with the socialist past. Meanwhile, Algeria signed an association agreement with the European Union in September 2005 and subsequently intensified its efforts to gain membership in the World Trade Organization.

Government and Politics

Political Background

Conquered by France in the 1830s and formally annexed by that country in 1842, Algeria achieved independence as the result of a nationalist guerrilla struggle that broke out in 1954 and yielded eventual French withdrawal on July 3, 1962. The eight-year war of liberation, led by the indigenous National Liberation Front (Front de Libération Nationale—FLN), caused the death of some 250,000 Algerians, the wounding of 500,000, and the uprooting of nearly 2 million others, as well as the emigration of some 1 million French settlers. The new Algerian regime was handicapped by deep divisions within the victorious FLN, particularly between commanders of the revolutionary army and a predominantly civilian political leadership headed by Ahmed BEN BELLA, who formed Algeria's first regular government and was elected to a five-year presidential term in September 1963. Despite his national popularity, Ben Bella exhibited an extravagant and flamboyant style that antagonized the army leadership, and he was deposed in June 1965 by a military coup under Col. Houari BOUMEDIENNE, who assumed power as president of the National Council of the Algerian Revolution.

During 1976 the Algerian people participated in three major referenda. The first, on June 27, yielded overwhelming approval of a National Charter that committed the nation to the building of a socialist society, designated Islam as the state religion, defined basic rights of citizenship, singled out the FLN as the "leading force in society," and stipulated that party and government cadres could not engage in "lucrative activities" other than those afforded by their primary employment. The second referendum, on November 17, approved a new constitution that, while recognizing the National Charter as "the fundamental source of the nation's policies and of its laws," assigned sweeping powers to the National Transitional Council adopted legislation banning the use of French in the public sector as of July 5, 1998, with the exception that universities were given until July 5, 2000, to switch to the use of Arabic only. In the wake of unrest in Berber areas, the government announced in October 2001 that the Berber language—Tamazight—would be elevated to a “national” language.)

(Ret.) Liamine ZEROUAL (nonparty), who in September 1998 had announced his intention to resign prior to the scheduled completion of his term in November 2000; reelected (due to internal FLN disputes, as the candidate of the National Democratic Rally and the Movement for a Peaceful Society) on April 8, 2004, and sworn in for a second five-year term on April 19.

Prime Minister: (See headnote.) Ahmed OUYAHIA (National Democratic Rally); appointed by the president on May 5, 2003, to succeed Ali BENFLIS (National Liberation Front), who had been dismissed the same day; reappointed on May 1, 2005.

the presidency. The third referendum, on December 10, reconfirmed Colonel Boumedienne as the nation’s president by an official majority of 99.38 percent. Two months later, in the first legislative election since 1964, a unicameral National People’s Assembly was established on the basis of a candidate list presented by the FLN.

President Boumedienne died on December 27, 1978, and he was immediately succeeded by assembly president Rabah BITAT, who was legally ineligible to serve as chief executive for more than a 45-day period. Following a national election on February 7, 1979, Bitat yielded the office to Col. Chadli BENDJEDID, who had emerged in January as the FLN presidential designee during an unprecedented six-day meeting of a sharply divided party congress.

At a June 1980 FLN congress, President Bendjedid was given authority to select members of the party’s Political Bureau, and on July 15 he revived the military General Staff, which had been suppressed by his predecessor after a 1967 coup attempt by Col. Tahir ZBIRI. As a further indication that he had consolidated his control of state and party, Bendjedid on October 30 pardoned the exiled Zbiri and freed former president Ben Bella from house detention. (The latter had been released from 14 years’ imprisonment in July 1979.)

Bendjedid was unopposed in his reelection bid of January 12, 1984, and on January 22 he appointed Abdelhamid BRAHIMI to succeed Col. Mohamed Ben Ahmed ABDELGHANI as prime minister. Thereafter, the regime was buffeted by deteriorating economic conditions, growing militancy among Islamic fundamentalists and students, and tension within the government, the FLN, and the army over proposed economic and political liberalization. The political infighting limited the effectiveness of reform efforts, critics charging that many of those entrenched in positions of power were reluctant to surrender economic and social privileges.

The pent-up discontent erupted into rioting in Algiers in early October 1988 and quickly spread to other cities, shattering Algeria's reputation as an "oasis of stability" in an otherwise turbulent region. Upwards of 500 persons died when the armed forces opened fire on demonstrators in the capital, while more than 3,000 were arrested. President Bendjedid thereupon adopted a conciliatory attitude, converting what could have been a challenge to his authority into a mandate for sweeping economic and political change. In a referendum on November 3, voters overwhelmingly approved a constitutional amendment reducing the FLN's political dominance by assigning greater responsibility to the prime minister and making him accountable to the assembly. Two days later, Bendjedid appointed Kasdi MERBAH, described as a "determined" proponent of economic liberalization, as the new ministerial leader, and on November 9 Merbah announced a new cabinet from which a majority of the previous incumbents were excluded. Collaterally, the president instituted leadership changes in the military and the FLN, the latter agreeing late in the month to open future legislative elections to non-FLN candidates. On December 22 Bendjedid was reelected to a third five-year term, securing a reported 81 percent endorsement as the sole presidential candidate.

The FLN's status was eroded further by additional constitutional changes in February 1989 that provided, among other things, for multiparty activity (see Constitution and government, below). Seven months later, arguing that economic reforms were not being implemented quickly enough, Bendjedid named Mouloud HAMROUCHE, a longtime political ally, to succeed Merbah as prime minister.

A multiparty format was introduced for the first time in elections for municipal and provincial councils on June 12, 1990. Contrary to expectations, the Islamic Salvation Front (Front Islamique du Salut—FIS), the country's leading Islamic fundamentalist organization, obtained 53 percent of the popular vote and a majority of the 15,000 seats being contested. Responding to demands from the FIS and other opposition parties, President Bendjedid announced in April 1991 that two-stage national legislative elections, originally scheduled for 1992, would be advanced to June 27 and July 18. However, the FIS called a general strike on May 25 to demand additional electoral law changes, the immediate application of sharia (Islamic religious law), the resignation of Bendjedid, and scheduling of new presidential elections. Clashes in the capital between fundamentalists and police intensified in early June, leaving at least seven dead, and on June 5 Bendjedid declared a state of emergency, ordered the army to restore order, and postponed the legislative poll. He also called upon the foreign minister, Sid Ahmed GHOZALI, to form a new government.

On June 18, 1991, Ghazali, described as a "technocrat" committed to economic and political reform, announced his cabinet (the first since independence not to be dominated by FLN leaders) and pledged "free and clean" parliamentary elections by the end of the year. The schism between the government and the fundamentalists remained unbridged, however, and top FIS leaders and hundreds of their followers were arrested when new violence broke out in Algiers in early July.

Following a period of relative calm, the state of emergency was lifted on September 29, 1991, and two-round elections to a 430-seat assembly were scheduled for December 26, 1991, and January 16, 1992. Again testifying to the remarkable surge in fundamentalist influence, FIS candidates won 188 seats outright in the first round (compared to 25 for the Berber-based Socialist Forces Front [Front des Forces Socialistes—FFS] and only 15 for the FLN). With the FIS poised to achieve a substantial majority (possibly even the two-thirds majority needed for constitutional revision), Bendjedid initiated talks with the fundamentalists regarding a power-sharing arrangement.

On January 11, 1992, Bendjedid, apparently under pressure from military leaders upset with his accommodation of the FIS, submitted his resignation. The High Security Council (Haute Conseil de Sécurité—HCS), composed of Ghozali and other top officials, including three senior military leaders, announced that it had assumed control to preserve public order and protect national security. (According to the constitution, the assembly president was mandated to assume interim presidential duties, but the assembly had been dissolved by a secret presidential decree on January 4. Although the president of the Constitutional Council was next in the line of temporary succession, the council deferred to the HCS upon Bendjedid's resignation, reportedly ruling that "prevailing conditions" were not covered by the basic law.)

On January 12, 1992, the HCS canceled the second stage of the legislative election and nullified the results of the first. Two days later it announced that it had appointed a five-man High Council of State (Haute Conseil d'État—HCE) to serve as an interim collegial presidency. Mohamed BOUDIAF, vice president of the country's wartime provisional government, was invited to return from 28 years of exile in Morocco to assume the chair of the new body.

Following its "soft-gloved coup" in early 1992, the military launched what was described as an "all-out war" against the fundamentalist movement, arresting numerous FIS leaders (including moderates who had been counseling against violent confrontation) in addition to some 500 other FIS members. Bloody demonstrations throughout Algeria erupted shortly thereafter, and on February 9 the HCE declared a new 12-month state of emergency. With most constitutional rights effectively suspended by the declaration, the government intensified its anti-FIS campaign, while militant fundamentalists initiated guerrilla activity against police and security forces. The unrest continued following Ghozali's reappointment on February 23, even relatively moderate fundamentalists being driven underground by a March decision of the Algerian courts, acting on an HCE petition, to ban the FIS as a legal party. Meanwhile, the nonfundamentalist population appeared to accept the military intervention with relief, since it feared political, legal, and social constraints should the FIS come to power.

HCE Chair Boudiaf was assassinated on June 29, 1992, while addressing a rally in the eastern city of Annaba. Official investigators subsequently concluded there was a broad conspiracy behind the attack without being able to identify those involved. Suspects ranged from militant fundamentalists to members of the "power elite" who may have felt threatened by Boudiaf's anticorruption efforts. (Only one person was arrested in connection with the incident—a member of the presidential guard who was convicted in June 1995 following a trial that shed little light on his motives or possible conspirators.) On July 2 the HCS named Ali KAFI, the secretary general of the National Organization of Holy Warriors (a group of veterans from the war of independence) as Boudiaf's successor. Prime Minister Ghozali, blaming corrupt government officials and radical fundamentalists equally for the country's disorder, resigned on July 8. He was replaced on the same day by Belaid ABDESSELAM, longtime industry and energy minister under former president Boumediene.

On February 9, 1993, the HCE extended the state of emergency indefinitely, declaring that steps toward restoration of an elected civilian government would be taken only after successful completion of the "antiterrorist" crackdown. Four months later it presented a blueprint for constitutional change, promising a democratic Muslim state and a free-market economy. In keeping with the new economic thrust, Prime Minister Abdesselam, viewed as strongly oriented towards state control of heavy industry, was replaced on August 21 by Redha MALEK, an advocate of privatization and other forms of liberalization geared to winning debt rescheduling from international creditors.

In October 1993 the HCE appointed an eight-member Committee for National Dialogue to negotiate an agreement among the legal political parties, labor organizations, and trade and professional groups on the nation's political future. However, talks were constrained by a mounting conviction among party leaders that full-scale civil war loomed unless the FIS was brought into the negotiations, a step the regime refused to accept. Consequently, the National Dialogue Conference held in Algiers in January 1994 was boycotted by nearly all the political parties, and its influence was extremely limited. The conference had been expected to name a president to succeed the HCE but failed to do so, reportedly because the military would not grant sufficient authority to a civilian leader. Therefore, on January 27 the HCS announced the appointment of Maj. Gen. (Ret.) Liamine ZEROUAL as president, his inauguration four days later coinciding with the dissolution of the HCE. Zeroual, who retained his former position as defense minister, was authorized to govern (in conjunction with the HCS) for a three-year transitional period, initial reports indicating he would seek a settlement with the FIS.

With debt rescheduling negotiations at a critical juncture, President Zeroual reappointed Prime Minister Malek on January 31, 1994, despite Malek's hard line regarding the FIS. Malek resigned on April 11, following the announcement of preliminary agreement with the IMF; he was replaced by Mokdad SIFI, who had held a number of ministerial posts recently. On April 15 Sifi announced the formation of a new government, described as largely comprising "technocrats" who would concentrate on economic recovery while leaving political and security issues to the president and the HCS. One month later the military-dominated regime set up an appointive National Transitional Council to act in a quasi-legislative capacity prior to elections tentatively scheduled for 1997. However, most of the leading parties boycotted the body, severely undercutting its claim to legitimacy.

A number of groups (including, most significantly, the FIS, FLN, and FFS) drafted a proposed national reconciliation pact in Rome in late 1994 and early 1995. The plan called for a cessation of antigovernment violence, the release of fundamentalist detainees, recognition of the FIS, and the convening of a national conference to establish a transitional government pending new national elections. Despite strong international endorsement of the proposal, the government quickly rejected it on the ground that no "credible" truce could be achieved. Further illustrating the sway held by the military's hard-liners, security forces subsequently launched a massive campaign against the Armed Islamic Group (Groupe Islamique Armé—GIA) and other militant factions that had claimed responsibility for a series of bombings and assassinations. At the same time, the Zeroual administration reportedly continued negotiations with the FIS in the hope that the Front's supporters could be reintegrated into normal political processes. However, the talks collapsed in mid-1995, and the regime subsequently began to implement its own schedule for a gradual return to civilian government.

The first stage of the transition was a presidential election conducted on November 16, 1995, in which Zeroual, running as an independent but with the support of the military, was elected to a five-year term with 61 percent of the vote. His closest competitor, Sheikh Mahfoud NAHNAH of the moderate fundamentalist Hamas Party, secured 25 percent of the vote, followed by Saïd SAADI of the Berber Rally for Culture and Democracy (Rassemblement pour la Culture et la Démocratie—RCD), with 9 percent, and Nourreddine BOUKROUH of the Algerian Renewal Party (Parti pour le Renouveau de l'Algérie—PRA), with 4 percent. President Zeroual's resounding first-round victory was initially seen as easing the "sense of crisis" somewhat, much of the electorate having apparently endorsed his continued hard line toward the militants. Zeroual, whose platform contained strong anticorruption language, was also reportedly perceived as a buffer, to a certain extent, against complete domination of political affairs by military leaders.

As anticipated, Prime Minister Sifi submitted his resignation following the successful completion of the election, and on December 31, 1995, President Zeroual appointed Ahmed OUYAHIA, former director of the president's office, to succeed Sifi. The government that was announced on January 5, 1996, included several members from Hamas and the PRA, seemingly as a “reward” for their participation in the presidential poll, which had been boycotted by several major legal parties (including the FLN and the FFS) in protest over the lack of an agreement with the FIS.

In mid-1996 President Zeroual proposed a number of constitutional amendments granting sweeping new powers to the president and banning political parties based on religion (see Constitution and government, below). Some 38 parties and organizations endorsed the proposals, although the absence of several major legal groupings (including the FFS and RCD) and, of course, the FIS (which would have been precluded from any eventual legalization under the revisions) undercut the impact of the accord. The government subsequently reported that 85 percent of those voting in a national referendum on November 28 had supported the changes in the basic law. However, opposition leaders and some international observers questioned those results and described the government’s claim of an 80 percent vote turnout as vastly inflated.

A new wave of antiregime attacks broke out shortly after the constitutional referendum of November 1996 and reached an unprecedented scale in July–August, despite (or perhaps because of) recent national legislative balloting and other progress toward full return to elected civilian government. Nevertheless, the administration proceeded with its timetable in 1997. Regulations for party registration were established in February, and new assembly elections were held on June 5, the balloting being dominated by the recently established progovernment National Democratic Rally (Rassemblement National et Démocratique—RND), with 156 seats, followed by the Movement for a Peaceful Society (Mouvement pour une Société Paisible—MSP, as Hamas had been renamed) with 69 seats, and the FLN with 62. After several weeks of reportedly intense negotiations, the MSP and the FLN agreed to join a new RND-led coalition government, which was announced on June 25 under the continued direction of Prime Minister Ouyahia. The RND also secured most of the seats in municipal elections conducted on October 23, although some were allocated to other parties after a judicial review of allegations of widespread fraud made by a number of groups, including the MSP and the FLN. The political transition was completed on December 25, 1997, with indirect elections to the Council of the Nation (the new upper house in the legislature), the RND winning 80 of the 96 contested seats. By that time, however, despite the progress on the institutional front, the wave of domestic violence had reached an unprecedented level.

As of early 1998 the government reported that about 26,000 people had died during the six-year insurgency, although other observers estimated the figure to be as high as 80,000. A special UN commission that visited Algeria at midyear placed the blame for the violence squarely on “Islamic terrorists” and argued that the Zeroual regime deserved international and domestic support. However, human rights organizations strongly criticized the UN report for inadequately addressing the harsh retaliatory measures on the part of government security forces. In that context, it appeared that differences of opinion had emerged within the military and political elite over how to proceed vis-à-vis the fundamentalists. Hard-liners subsequently appeared to continue to dominate that debate, possibly contributing to the surprise announcement in September by Zeroual (seen as having come to favor a dialogue with moderate Islamist leaders) that he would leave office prior to the completion of his term.

New presidential elections were initially set for February 1999 and then rescheduled for the following April. Meanwhile, Prime Minister Ouyahia resigned on December 14, 1998, and the following day the president appointed Ismail HAMDANI, a senator and former ambassador, to serve as head of a caretaker government pending completion of the presidential balloting. Hamdani’s cabinet, installed December 19, differed only slightly from his predecessor’s.

The April 15, 1999, presidential election proved to be highly controversial, as six of the seven candidates quit the race shortly before the balloting out of conviction that the poll had been rigged in favor of the military's preferred candidate, Abdelaziz BOUTEFLIKA, who had served as foreign minister in the 1960s and 1970s but had been on the political sidelines for 20 years. Despite the opposition's demand for a postponement, the election proceeded as scheduled, Bouteflika being credited with 74 percent of the vote. (The names of the other candidates had remained on the ballot despite the boycott. Official results declared former foreign affairs minister Ahmed IBRAHIMI, who ran as an independent but enjoyed the informal support of the FIS, to be the runner-up with 13 percent of the vote. None of the other candidates received more than a 4 percent vote share.)

Following surprisingly long negotiations, President Bouteflika named Ahmed BENBITOUR, a former foreign minister who was described as a "close friend" of the president's, as prime minister on December 23, 1999. On the following day, Benbitour formed a new government that included seven parties, all of whom remained in the cabinet named by Ali BENFLIS after he replaced Benbitour in late August 2000. However, the RCD left the coalition in May 2001 as the result of severe unrest within the Berber community (see Current issues, below).

The FLN dominated the May 30, 2002, legislative balloting, securing 199 seats, while the RND declined to 47. Prime Minister Benflis was reappointed on June 1, and on June 17 he formed a new government comprising FLN, RND, and MSP ministers.

Further successes by the FLN in the October 2002 elections appeared to kindle presidential aspirations in Benflis, who was dismissed by President Bouteflika on May 5, 2003; Ahmed Ouyahia returned to the prime ministerial post he had held from 1995 to 1998. In September 2003 Bouteflika also dismissed several pro-Benflis cabinet ministers, exacerbating tensions that subsequently split the FLN into two camps (see FLN, below, for details). The FLN dispute resulted in confusing circumstances under which Bouteflika was reelected (with 85 percent of the vote) on April 8, 2004, as the candidate of the RND and MSP, while Benflis secured only 6.4 percent of the vote as the nominal FLN candidate.

Constitution and Government

The 1976 constitution established a single-party state with the FLN as its "vanguard force." Executive powers were concentrated in the president, who was designated president of the High Security Council and of the Supreme Court, as well as commander in chief of the armed forces. He was empowered to appoint one or more vice presidents and, under a 1979 constitutional amendment that reduced his term of office from six to five years, was obligated to name a prime minister. He also named an 11-member High Islamic Council selected from among the country's "religious personalities." The 1976 document also stipulated that members of the National People's Assembly would be nominated by the FLN and established a judicial system headed by a Supreme Court, to which all lower magistrates were answerable.

In late 1983, as part of a decentralization move, the number of administrative departments (wilayaat) was increased from 31 to 48, each continuing to be subdivided into districts (dairaat) and communes. At both the wilaya and communal (town) levels there were provisions for popular assemblies, with an appointed governor (wali) assigned to each wilaya. The various administrative units were linked vertically to the minister of the interior, with party organization paralleling the administrative hierarchy.

On January 16, 1986, a referendum approved a new National Charter that, while maintaining allegiance to socialism and Islam, accorded President Bendjedid greater leeway in his approach to social and economic problems, particularly in regard to partial privatization of the "inefficient" public sector. Additional constitutional changes were approved by referendum on November 3, 1988. The revisions upgraded the prime minister's position, declaring him to be the "head of government" and making him directly responsible to the assembly. In effect, the change transferred some of the power previously exercised by the FLN to the assembly, particularly in light of a decision later in the month to permit non-FLN candidates in future elections. The role of the FLN was further attenuated by reference to the president as the “embodiment of the unity of the nation” rather than “of the unity of the party and the state.”

Another national referendum on February 23, 1989, provided for even more drastic reform. It eliminated all mention of socialism, guaranteed the fundamental rights “of man and of the citizen” as opposed to the rights of “the people,” excised reference to the military’s political role, and imposed stricter separation of executive, legislative, and judicial powers. In addition, the FLN lost its “vanguard” status with the authorization of additional “associations of a political nature.” Continuing the transfer to a multiparty system, the assembly on July 2 established criteria for legal party status (see Political Parties and Groups, below), and on July 19 it adopted a new electoral law governing political campaigns. The new code established multimember districts for local and national elections, with any party receiving more than 50 percent of the votes to be awarded all the seats in each. However, reacting to complaints from newly formed opposition parties, the government in March 1990 approved a system of proportional representation for the June municipal elections. After intense debate, the electoral law was further changed in 1991 to provide for two-round balloting in single-member districts in future assembly elections.

In announcing a one-year state of emergency in February 1992, the newly formed High Council of State suspended a number of key constitutional provisions, and over the next ten months it ordered the dissolution of nearly 800 municipal assemblies controlled by the FIS since the 1990 elections. In furtherance of its antifundamentalist campaign, the High Council of State in October also created three secret courts in which persons over 16 years of age charged with “subversion” or “terrorism” could be sentenced without the right of appeal. The state of emergency was extended indefinitely in February 1993, a transitional government being named a year later for a three-year period leading to proposed multiparty elections and a return to civilian leadership.

The electoral code was amended in 1995 to provide for multicandidate presidential elections, in two rounds if no candidate received a majority in the first round. Potential candidates were required to obtain the signatures of 75,000 voters to be placed on the ballot, and anyone married to a foreigner was precluded from running.

In connection with the planned transition to civilian government, the Zeroual administration in the spring of 1996 proposed a number of constitutional amendments, which were approved by national referendum on November 28. Among other things, the amendments banned political parties from referencing religious or ethnic “identities,” while codifying Islam as the state religion and Arabic as the official national language. The president was given authority to govern by decree in certain circumstances and to appoint one-third of the members of a new upper house in the Parliament—the Council of Nations. That second provision was viewed as one of the most significant aspects of the new charter because it gave the president effective blocking power on legislation. (New laws require the approval of three-quarters of the Council of Nations.) A Constitutional Council was established in April 1998, while a juridical State Council was installed two months later.

Foreign Relations

Algerian foreign relations have gone through a series of changes that date back to the preindependence period, formal contacts with many countries having been initiated by the provisional government created in September 1958. Foreign policy in the immediate postindependence period was dominated by President Ben Bella’s anti-imperialist ideology. The period immediately following the 1965 coup was essentially an interregnum, with President Boumedienne concentrating his efforts on internal affairs. Following the Arab-Israeli War of 1967, Boumedienne became much more active in foreign policy, with a shift in interest from Africa and the Third World to a more concentrated focus on Arab affairs. After the 1973 Arab-Israeli conflict, the theme of "Third World liberation" reemerged, reflecting a conviction that Algeria should be in the forefront of the Non-aligned Movement. Subsequently, Algeria joined with Libya, Syria, the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen, and the Palestine Liberation Organization to form the so-called "Steadfastness Front" in opposition to Egyptian-Israeli rapprochement. However, in conjunction with a softening Arab posture toward Egypt, Algiers resumed full diplomatic relations with Cairo in November 1988.

A major controversy erupted following division of the former Spanish Sahara between Morocco and Mauritania in early 1976. In February the Algerian-supported Polisario Front (see under Morocco: Disputed Territory) announced the formation of a Saharan Arab Democratic Republic (SADR) in the Western Sahara that was formally recognized by Algeria on March 6; subsequently, a majority of other nonaligned states accorded the SADR similar recognition. However, the issue split the Organization of African Unity (OAU), with Morocco withdrawing from the grouping in 1984 in protest over the seating of an SADR delegation. Concurrently, relations between Algeria and Morocco deteriorated further, with President Bendjedid pledging full support for Mauritania's "territorial integrity" and Morocco referring to the Polisarios as "Algerian mercenaries." Relations improved significantly in late 1987, however, and in May 1988 Rabat and Algiers announced the restoration of formal ties, jointly expressing support for settlement of the Western Saharan problem through a self-determination referendum. Subsequent progress in Morocco-Polisario negotiations permitted Algiers to concentrate on a long-standing foreign policy goal: the promotion of economic, social, and political unity among Maghrebian states (see separate section on Arab Maghreb Union).

Relations with Libya worsened in response to Tripoli's "unification" Treaty of Oujda with Rabat in August 1984 (see entries under Libya and Morocco) and continued to plummet as a result of Libya's expulsion of Tunisian workers in the summer of 1985. Algiers felt obliged, however, to defend the Qadhafi regime in the events leading up to the U.S. attacks on Tripoli and Benghazi in April 1986. Although Algeria resisted federation with its eastern neighbor (preferring to concentrate on more inclusive Maghrebian unity), agreement was reached in July 1988 for the free movement of people between the two countries and the launching of bilateral economic projects.

Ties with France, Algeria's leading trade partner, were temporarily strained by legislation in July 1986 making visas mandatory for all North Africans seeking entry into the former metropole; however, swift action by French authorities against Algerian opposition activists later in the year led to an improvement in relations. Earlier, in April 1985, President Bendjedid became the first Algerian head of state since independence to visit Washington, utilizing the occasion to secure Algeria's removal from a list of countries prohibited from purchasing U.S. weapons.

The victories of the Islamic fundamentalist movement in Algeria's 1990 and 1991 elections were characterized as generating "shock waves throughout northern Africa." The governments of Egypt, Libya, Morocco, and Tunisia (all struggling to contain fundamentalist influence) were reported to be greatly relieved by the military takeover in January 1992 and supportive of Algiers' anti-FIS campaign. The government/fundamentalist schism also led in March 1993 to the severing of ties with Iran, which the administration accused of supporting local terrorist activity. France, concerned over the possible influx of refugees should a fundamentalist government be established in Algiers, also supported the military regime.

President Bouteflika met with U.S. President George W. Bush in Washington in June 2001, their talks centering on "energy issues" rather than, as some reformists had hoped, democratization or good governance. Bouteflika returned to the United States late in the year to pledge Algeria's support for Washington's recently launched war on terrorism. Among other things, the aftermath of the September 11, 2001, attacks appeared to shine a more positive light, in the minds of many international observers, on the hard line adopted by the Algerian regime toward militant fundamentalism since 1992. In consonance with its renewed U.S. ties, the Algerian government refused in 2003 to permit domestic protests against U.S. actions in Iraq.

In March 2003 French President Jacques Chirac made the first formal state visit by a French leader to Algeria since the war of independence. The Algerian population warmly greeted Chirac, who pledged further “reconciliation” initiatives. (Relations with France deteriorated in early 2005 when the French parliament endorsed a bill that recognized the “positive role” that colonization had played in Algeria. President Bouteflika subsequently demanded that France formally apologize for its actions in Algeria, and a proposed French/Algerian “friendship treaty” remained unsigned as of April 2006.) Morocco also subsequently was reported to be seeking improved ties with Algeria, but the Algerian government remained committed to a self-determination referendum in the Western Sahara. Consequently, the border between Algeria and Morocco remained closed as of early 2006, although interest in negotiations on the issue appeared to have intensified.

Current Issues

Facing an extremely difficult task in convincing the Algerian populace and the international community of the legitimacy of the April 1999 presidential poll, President Bouteflika moved quickly to establish his leadership credentials by, among other things, announcing plans for a “civil concord,” which proposed amnesty for most fundamentalist militants in return for their permanent renunciation of violence and surrender of arms. The pact easily secured legislative approval in the summer and was endorsed by 98 percent of those voting in a national referendum on September 16. By the end of the cut-off date for the amnesty in mid-January 2000, upwards of 6,000 guerrillas had reportedly accepted the government’s offer. However, most of them came from the FIS-affiliated Islamic Salvation Army, which had already been honoring a cease-fire since 1997. Significantly, the GIA rejected the peace plan, and deadly attacks and counterattacks continued on a nearly daily basis throughout the summer of 2000. By that time Bouteflika had achieved only mixed results on the political front as well, as evidenced by the eight-month wait for the formation of a new government following the presidential election. Some analysts attributed the delay to efforts by Bouteflika to consolidate his authority, even, in some cases, at the expense of the military leaders who had propelled him to power.

Despite the partial success of the civil concord, some 2,700 deaths were reported in 2000 from the ongoing conflict, and an upsurge of antigovernment violence was reported in December. In early 2001 President Bouteflika promised an “iron fist” in dealing with the remaining militants. However, the government faced a new crisis in April when riots broke out within the Berber population in the Kabylie region after a young man died under inadequately explained circumstances while in police custody. Government forces responded with a harsh crackdown, and some 1 million demonstrators reportedly participated in the antiregime protests that ensued in the Kabylie region and other areas, including Algiers. More than 60 people were killed and 2,000 injured in the clashes, which, fueled by economic malaise and long-standing concern over the authoritarian rule of what one journalist described as the “overwhelming power of an opaque military leadership,” continued into 2002, prompting the leading Berber parties (the FFS and the RCD) to boycott the national legislative poll on May 30.

Deadly bomb attacks continued in 2003, mostly the work of the GIA offshoot called the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat (Groupe Salafiste pour la Prédication et le Combat—GSPC). However, the level of violence was greatly reduced from its height earlier in the decade (as one reporter put it, dozens killed per month rather than dozens per day). Most observers credited President Bouteflika’s resounding reelection in April 2004 to popular appreciation of the improved security situation, along with recent economic advances and Algeria’s renewed international status in connection with the U.S.-led war on terrorism. For its part, the Algerian military appeared to step back from its previous level of background political involvement, possibly under the opinion that the “Islamist threat” had been for the most part overcome.

A January 2005 accord between the government and Berber representatives called for enhanced economic support for Berber areas and appeared to reduce unrest within the Berber community. Even more significant was a national referendum on September 29 that overwhelmingly endorsed the government’s proposed national charter for peace and reconciliation. The charter called for amnesty for most of the Islamic militants involved in the civil war that had started in 1991, although leaders of the “insurrection” were barred from future political activity. Collaterally, the charter praised the role of the army in the conflict, effectively eliminating any possibility that excesses on the part of the security forces would be investigated. (It was estimated that 6,000–20,000 Algerians had “disappeared” as the result of the army’s anti-insurgency measures.) Most major political parties supported the charter, and President Bouteflika staked his political future on its passage. The government reported a 97 percent yes vote and an 80 percent turnout, although the latter figure was broadly discounted by opponents of the initiative as well as some independent analysts. (It was noted that turnout in Berber regions appeared to be less than 20 percent.) Despite protests over the perceived heavy-handedness of the government in stifling effective opposition to the charter, the consensus appeared to be that the vote was a clear indication that the majority of Algerians were prepared to put the matter behind them. (It was estimated that the conflict had cost more than $30 billion and left 150,000–200,000 people dead.)

For its part, the U.S. government declared that Algeria was “moving in the right direction” and agreed to consider an Algerian request to purchase U.S. armaments, provided an understanding could be reached that the weapons would remain within the country. Algiers also announced increased cooperation with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) regarding antiterrorism initiatives. Meanwhile, on the domestic front, the Bouteflika administration pledged to promote massive job creation through stimulus of the industrial and agricultural sectors throughout the country, assisted by development of new transportation networks. However, the state of emergency remained in effect “until terrorism is completely defeated,” and security forces launched a campaign in March 2006 against militant holdouts (officially estimated as numbering less than 800 at that time) in remote mountainous regions.

Political Parties and Groups

From independence until 1989 the National Liberation Front was the only authorized political grouping, Algeria having been formally designated as a one-party state. Under constitutional changes approved in 1989, however, Algerians were permitted to form “associations of a political nature” as long as they did not “threaten the basic interests of the state” and were not “created exclusively on the basis of religion, language, region, sex, race, or profession.” To operate legally, parties were also required to obtain government permits. The process of legalization began in August 1989, and multi-party activity was permitted for the first time at local elections in June 1990. By the end of 1991 there were nearly 60 legal parties. However, constitutional amendment of November 1996 and electoral law revision of February 1997 further restricted parties from referencing religion, ethnicity, or race. A number of existing groups were deregistered for failure to adapt to the changes by the deadline of April 1997. In addition, a number of other parties were told to disband in May 1998, either for failing to have the minimum of 2,500 members or for violating other new regulations. Twenty-three parties participated in the 2002 legislative balloting.

Government Parties

National Liberation Front (Front de Libération Nationale—FLN). Founded in November 1954 and dedicated to socialism, nonalignment, and pan-Arabism, the FLN led the eight-year war of independence against France. Although weakened by factionalism and disagreement over the role of the army in politics, the Front subsequently assumed complete control of Algerian political and governmental affairs.

By the late 1980s a cleavage was apparent within the FLN between an “old guard,” dedicated to the maintenance of strict socialist policies, and a group, led by President Bendjedid, favoring political and economic liberalization. The reformers having manifestly gained the ascendancy, Mohamed Cherif MESSAADIA, the Front’s leading socialist ideologue, was dismissed from the ruling Politburo in early November 1988. Subsequently, during the party congress in Algiers November 27–28, the Politburo itself was abolished, and the office of secretary general was dissociated from that of state president. (Bendjedid, however, was named to the newly created post of FLN president.) The delegates also voted to democratize the filling of FLN organs, approved the chief executive’s proposals for economic reform, and nominated Bendjedid as sole candidate for a third presidential term. Although not specifically empowered by the congress to do so, the Central Committee in June 1989 endorsed the creation of a multiparty system, some continued opposition to Bendjedid’s political and economic reforms notwithstanding.

Following the FLN’s poor showing (about 34 percent of the popular vote) in the June 1990 municipal elections, a number of government officials were dismissed from the Politburo amid intense debate over how to check the rapid erosion of the Front’s influence. In late June 1991 Bendjedid resigned as FLN president, and several other members of his administration relinquished their party posts as part of the government’s effort to distance itself from FLN control. However, Abdelhamid MEHRI, Bendjedid’s brother-in-law and close associate, was subsequently reelected FLN secretary-general.

Further illustrating the rapid decline in its electoral potency, the FLN won only 15 seats on the basis of a 24 percent vote share in the December 1991 first-round legislative poll. The party was subsequently reported to be divided over Bendjedid’s resignation as president of the republic and the assumption of power by the High Security Council. Mehri initially charged the army with having conducted a coup d’état and suggested the FLN might join forces with other groups, including the FIS, to oppose the new regime. Subsequently, however, the FLN Central Committee announced it would support the High Council of State, assuming adherence to that council’s pledge to return the nation to a democratic process. Meanwhile, despite widespread popular resentment over long-standing official corruption, FLN members reportedly remained entrenched in many formal and informal positions of local and national influence.

By late 1994 the FLN was firmly in the opposition camp, its leaders joining with those of the FIS, FFS, and other parties in negotiating a proposed plan for a return to civilian government. At the urging of Secretary General Mehri, the FLN formally endorsed a boycott of the 1995 presidential election, although it appeared that many party members voted anyway, a large percentage of their support reportedly going to President Zeroual. Mehri was subsequently dismissed as secretary general in January 1996 by the FLN Central Committee, and his successor, Boualem BEN-HAMOUDA, quickly distanced the FLN from the FIS and other antiregime groupings.

The 1995 electoral boycott having been widely acknowledged as a mistake, the FLN participated full force in the three 1997 elections and accepted junior partner status in the RND-led coalition government formed in June. However, despite the solidly proadministration stance of the FLN leaders, it was reported that a “reformist” faction, led by former prime minister Mouloud Hamrouche, continued to promote, among other things, a negotiated settlement with the FIS.

The FLN held its first congress in nine years in March 1998, electing a 210-member Central Committee and reelecting Secretary General Benhamouda, thereby underlining the party’s return to a “conservative tendency.” The FLN nominated military-backed Abdelaziz Bouteflika as its official candidate for the April 1999 presidential election, although a segment of the party supported Hamrouche, who ran as an independent and subsequently indicated his intention to form a new party. Benhamouda, viewed as a longstanding “rival” to Bouteflika, resigned as secretary general in September 2001; the post was later filled by Prime Minister Ali Benflis.

Following the resurgence of the FLN in the May 2002 assembly balloting (199 seats [to lead all parties] on a 35 percent vote share) and the October 2002 municipal elections, Benflis was reelected as FLN secretary general at a July 2003 congress, which also installed a pro-Benflis Central Committee. By that time it was clear that Benflis (who had been dismissed as prime minister in April 2003) planned to run for president in 2004, thereby causing a rupture in the FLN between his supporters and those of President Bouteflika. The FLN convention in December 2003 selected Benflis as the party’s standard-bearer, but an Algerian court (apparently under pressure from the Bouteflika administration) “annulled” that nomination and ordered FLN funds frozen. After Benflis secured only 8 percent of the vote in the April 2004 balloting, he resigned as FLN secretary general. At a party congress in February 2005, Bouteflika was named “honorary president” of the party, his supporters having clearly regained party control.

In addition, Abdelaziz Belkhadem, described as close to Bouteflika and a potential link to the moderate Islamic movement, was reelected as secretary general.

Leaders: Abdelaziz BOUTEFLIKA (President of the Republic), Abdelaziz BELKHADEM (Secretary General).

National Democratic Rally (Rassemblement National et Démocratique—RND). Launched in February 1997 in support of the policies of President Zeroual, the RND dominated the subsequent assembly, municipal, and Council of the Nation balloting, in part due to substantial financing and other assistance from sitting government officials, many of whom ran for office under the RND banner. Formally committed to pluralism, a “modern” economy (including emphasis on privatization), and “social justice,” the RND was widely viewed primarily as a vehicle for entrenched authority to participate in an expanding democratic process without facing a genuine threat to its hold on power.

The first RND congress, held in April 1998, elected a National Committee and a 15-member National Bureau led by Secretary General Tahar BENBAIBECHE. However, a serious split subsequently developed in the party over whom to support in the April 1999 presidential balloting. Consequently, Benbaibeche, who had complained that military leaders had been inappropriately pressuring the RND to back Abdelaziz Bouteflika, was dismissed as secretary general in January 1999 and replaced by Ahmed Ouyahia, who had recently resigned as prime minister. Ouyahia quickly announced that Bouteflika, the official candidate of the FLN, enjoyed the support of most of the RND.

By early 2002 the RND was described as having failed to attract as much popular support as originally expected, apparently because of the party’s ongoing ties to the military. The RND’s representation in the National People’s Assembly fell from 156 to 47 in the 2002 balloting. Ouyahia returned to the prime ministership in April 2003, and the RND supported Bouteflika in the 2004 presidential poll.

Leaders: Ahmed OUYAHIA (Prime Minister and Secretary General), Abdelkader BENSALAH (Speaker of the Council of the Nation).

Movement for a Peaceful Society (Mouvement pour une Société Paisible/Harakat Mujitamas al-Silm—MSP/Hamas). Formerly known as the Movement for an Islamic Society (Mouvement pour une Société Islamique—MSI) or Hamas (an acronym from that grouping’s name in Arabic), the MSP adopted its current rubric in 1997 in light of new national restrictions on party references to religion. The MSP is a moderate Islamic fundamentalist organization distinct from the more militant Palestinian formation also known as Hamas. It advocates “coexistence” with groups of opposing views in a democratic political structure and the introduction “by stages” of an Islamic state that would maintain “respect for individual liberties.”

Although it was reported in early 1992 that some Hamas members had been arrested in the sweeping antifundamentalist campaign, the government subsequently returned to its position that the grouping represented an acceptable moderate alternative to the FIS. Subsequently, Sheikh Mohamed BOUS-LIMANI, a founder of Hamas, was killed in late 1993, while another leader, Aly AYEB, was assassinated in September 1994, the attacks being attributed to radicals opposed to Hamas's ongoing dialogue with the government.

Hamas leader Sheikh Mahfoud Nahnah, who had announced his support for the regime's "antiterrorist" campaign but had described the nation as stuck "in a political dead end" in view of the "lack of trust between people and authority," received 25 percent of the vote in the 1995 presidential election. Two members of the party were subsequently named to minor cabinet posts in the government formed in January 1996.

After finishing second in the June 1997 legislative balloting, the MSP joined the subsequent RND-led coalition government, a decision that was described as putting the party's "credibility on the line" vis-à-vis the more hard-line grouping, the MR (or Nahda), which was competing for Islamic support. The MSP subsequently continued to pursue a middle road; it strongly criticized perceived electoral fraud benefiting the RND in the October municipal elections but also demanded stricter security measures in early 1998 in the face of escalating terrorist attacks.

Nahnah attempted to run in the April 1999 presidential balloting, but his candidacy was disallowed, ostensibly on the ground that he had not provided proof he had participated in the country's "war of independence" as required of all presidential contenders under the 1996 constitutional revision. Nahnah died in July 2003 after a long illness.

The MSP, which had seen its assembly representation fall from 69 to 38 in the 2002 balloting, supported President Bouteflika in the 2004 presidential campaign. Not surprisingly, MSP leader Abou Djerra Soltani also strongly endorsed the 2005 national charter on peace and reconciliation.

Leader: Abou Djerra SOLTANI (President).

Other Legislative Parties

Movement for National Reform (Mouvement pour la Réforme Nationale—MRN). The MRN, also known as Islah (Arabic for "reform"), was launched in early 1999 to promote the presidential campaign of Sheikh Abdallah Djaballah, who had recently split from Nahda. The MRN, supportive of eventual establishment of an "Islamic State," won 43 seats in the 2002 assembly balloting, thereby becoming the largest opposition grouping. Djaballah won 4.9 percent of the vote in the 2004 presidential poll.

Leader: Sheikh Abdallah DJABALLAH (Party Leader and 2004 presidential candidate), Lakhdar Ben KHALIF.

Workers' Party (Parti des Travailleurs—PT). The Trotskyist PT was one of the groups that signed the proposed national reconciliation pact in early 1995. It secured four seats in the June 1997 assembly balloting and subsequently continued to urge the government to negotiate with the FIS. The PT improved dramatically to 21 seats in the 2002 assembly balloting on a vote share of 4.8 percent. PT leader and women's rights activist Louisa Hannoun, described as the first woman to run for president in the Arab world, won 1.2 percent in the vote in the 2004 poll.

Leader: Louisa HANNOUN.

Algerian National Front (Front National Algérien—FNA/Jabhah al-Wataniyah al-Jazairiyah). Organized in June 1999 in support of the "downtrodden," the FNA received official recognition the following November. It won eight seats in the 2002 legislative poll on a 3.2 percent vote share. However, the proposed presidential bid in 2004 of the FNA leader, Moussa Touati, was rejected by the Constitutional Council.

Leader: Moussa TOUATI.

Renaissance Movement (Mouvement de la Renaissance/Harakat al-Nahda—MR/Nahda). Previously called the Islamic Renaissance Movement (Mouvement de la Renaissance Islamique/Harakat al-Nahda al-Islamiyya—MRI/Nahda), the party dropped the "Islamic" portion of its rubric in early 1997 to conform to new national regulations. Initially a small, moderate fundamentalist grouping, Nahda was promoted in the mid-1990s by the government as a legal alternative to the banned FIS. The grouping performed “surprisingly well” in the June 1997 legislative balloting, finishing fourth with 34 seats. By that time Nahda had adopted a tougher stance than the other main legal Islamic party (the MSP), and its leaders ultimately declined to participate in the new RND-led coalition government.

A Nahda congress in early 1998 reportedly directed that some authority previously exercised by long-standing leader Sheikh Abdallah Djaballah be turned over to Secretary General Lahbib Adami. The apparent rivalry between the two came to a head late in the year when Adami announced that the party had agreed to support Abdelaziz Bouteflika, the military-backed FLN candidate, in the upcoming presidential balloting. Djaballah consequently left Nahda in January 1999 and formed the MRN (above), taking nearly half of the 34 Nahda assembly representatives with him. Nahda fell to only one seat in the 2002 assembly poll.

Leader: Lahbib ADAMI (Secretary General).

Algerian Renewal Party (Parti pour le Renouveau de l'Algérie—PRA). A moderate Islamic group that first surfaced during the October 1988 demonstrations, the PRA announced in 1989 that it would concentrate on economic issues, particularly a fight to end “state capitalism and interventionism.” PRA leader Noureddine Boukrouh, described as a “liberal businessman,” won 4 percent of the votes in the 1995 presidential election. Two PRA members were appointed to the January 1996 cabinet, but the party was not represented in the June 1997 government. The government disallowed Boukrouh’s candidacy for the 1999 presidential election, citing insufficient signatures of support. However, Boukrouh joined the coalition government announced in December 1999. The PRA secured 2.2 percent of the vote in the 2002 assembly balloting.

Leaders: Noureddine BOUKROUH, Yacine TORKMANE.

Movement of National Harmony (Mouvement de l'Entente Nationale—MEN). The MEN secured 1.9 percent of the vote in the 2002 assembly balloting.

Leaders: Ali BOUKHAZNA, Amar LASOUED.

Socialist Forces Front (Front des Forces Socialistes—FFS). Long a clandestine group, the predominantly Berber FFS was legalized in November 1989. Having earned the enmity of the government in 1985 when he briefly formed a “united front” with Ben Bella’s MDS (below) to oppose the FLN, the FFS leader, revolutionary hero Hocine Aït-Ahmed, remained in Swiss exile until December 1989. The FFS boycotted the 1990 municipal elections but, after failing to create a multiparty coalition to “block” the FIS, presented over 300 candidates in the December 1991 legislative balloting on a platform that endorsed a “mixed economy,” greater regional autonomy, and official recognition of the Berber language. The FFS won 25 seats (second to the FIS) on a 15 percent vote share in the first election round, Aït-Ahmed strongly criticizing cancellation of the second prior to returning to self-imposed exile in Switzerland. The FFS subsequently joined the FIS and the FLN as the leading proponents of the unsuccessful January 1995 peace plan and boycotted the 1995 presidential balloting. However, Aït-Ahmed then called for “conciliation” talks with the government in apparent recognition of the Zeroual regime’s strengthened position following the election.

Aït-Ahmed, hitherto FFS general secretary, was elected to the newly created post of party president at the March 1996 FFS congress in Algiers. A 10-member secretariat and a 120-member national council were also installed. Dueling with the RCD for support within the Berber community, the FFS secured 20 seats in the June 1997 assembly balloting but was not invited to participate in the new RND-led government because of the Front’s insistence that negotiations should proceed with the goal of incorporating the FIS into the legal political process. A special congress in February 1999 nominated Aït-Ahmed as the FFS candidate for the upcoming presidential balloting, despite the reported poor health of the aging leader, who had recently returned from his self-imposed exile. A May 2000 congress reelected Aït-Ahmed as FFS president amid reports of deepening divisions within the party. In the wake of severe unrest in Berber areas, the FFS boycotted the 2002 assembly balloting. The FFS also called for a boycott of the 2005 referendum on the national charter for peace and reconciliation, arguing that the charter would “consecrate impunity” for perpetrators of violent crimes on both sides of the recent conflict.

Other Parties Competing in the 2002 Legislative Balloting

Ahd 54. A small, nationalist party, Ahd 54 (Ahd is Arabic for “oath,” reportedly a reference to principles espoused at the beginning of the war of independence) secured 0.9 percent of the vote in the 2002 assembly balloting. Its leader, human rights activist Ali Fawzi Rebaïne, won 0.7 percent of the vote in the 2004 presidential poll.

Leader: Ali Fawzi REBAÏNE, Toufik CHELLAL.

Patriotic Republican Rally (Rassemblement Patriotique Républicain—RPR). The RPR is a successor to the Algerian Movement for Justice and Development (Mouvement Algérien pour la Justice et le Développement—MAJD), a reformist group launched in November 1990 by former prime minister Kasdi Merbah, who had resigned in October from the FLN Central Committee. In March 1992 Merbah described the recently installed High Council of State as “unconstitutional” and called for lifting the state of emergency and creation of a “government of national welfare.” Merbah, a staunch antifundamentalist, was assassinated in August 1993, the government accusing Islamic militants of the act. However, no group claimed responsibility for the killing, and observers pointed out that Merbah had a broad spectrum of enemies.

In 1999 the government listed the RPR as the successor to the MAJD.

Leader: ‘Abd al-Kader MERBAH (President).

National Party for Solidarity and Development (Parti National pour la Solidarité et le Développement—PNSD). The center-right PNSD won a reported 1.6 percent of the popular vote in the June 1990 municipal elections. It secured 1.8 percent of the vote in the 2002 assembly poll.

Leader: Mohamed Cherif TALEB (President).

Other parties that competed unsuccessfully in the 2002 assembly balloting included the Front of Algerian Democrats (Front des Algériens Démocrates—FAD), led by Tayeb KABRI; the National Constitutional Rally (Rassemblement National Constitutionnel—RNC), which in 2004 announced it had changed its name to the Democratic National Front (still under the leadership of Sassi MABROUK); the National Movement of Algerian Youth (Mouvement National pour la Jeunesse Algérienne—MNJA), led by Omar BOUACHA; the National Movement of Hope (Mouvement National l’Espérance—MNE), led by Mohamed HADEF; the National Movement for Nature and Development (Mouvement National pour la Nature et le Développement—MNND), led by Abderrahman AKIF; the Progressive Republican Party (Parti Républicain et Progressiste—PRP), which had won three seats in the 1997 assembly balloting under the leadership of Idriss KHADIR; the Rally for Algeria (Rassemblement pour l’Algérie—RPA), led by Mohamed HAMMOUMA; the Rally for National Unity (Rassemblement pour l’Unité Nationale—RUN), led by Yacine LEKHAL; and the Union for Democracy and Liberties (Union pour la Démocratie et les Libertés—UDL), which had won one seat in the 1997 assembly election.

Other Parties

Republican National Alliance (Alliance Nationale Républicaine—ANR). The ANR was formed in early 1995 by several former government officials, including Redha Malek, prime minister in 1993–1994, and Ali Haroun, a member of the 1992–1994 collective presidency. Formally opposed to any compromise with the Islamic fundamentalist movement, the ANR was considered a vehicle for a presidential bid by Malek. However, Malek was prevented from contesting the 1995 election because he failed to obtain the required 75,000 signatures of support. Malek was reelected chair of the party by the June 1996 ANR congress in Algiers, which also elected a new 145-member National Council.

Despite retaining a seat in the cabinet, the ANR in early 2002 was described as “steering clear” of the upcoming legislative poll.

Leaders: Redha MALEK (Chair), Ali HAROUN.

Rally for Culture and Democracy (Rassemblement pour la Culture et la Démocratie—RCD). Formed in February 1989 to represent Berber interests, the RCD proclaimed its commitment to “economic centralism,” linguistic pluralism, and separation of the state and Islamic religion. It won 2 percent of the votes in the June 1990 municipal balloting.

In early 1994 Mohamed Ouramadane TIGZIRI, the RCD’s national secretary, was assassinated, apparently as part of the militant fundamentalist campaign against groups such as the RCD that advocated a secular, Western-style political system. The RCD’s strongly antifundamentalist leader, Saïd Saadi, is also prominent in the Berber Cultural Movement, described by the New York Times as having evolved into an influential political group in its campaign to have the Berber language sanctioned for use in schools and other public forums. Saadi captured 9 percent of the votes in the 1995 presidential poll, having been assured of the lion’s share of Berber votes because of the boycott by the FFS, the RCD’s primary competitor for support within that ethnic group. The RCD secured 19 seats in the June 1997 assembly elections but boycotted the December balloting for the new Council of the Nation. The RCD also announced in early 1999 that it was boycotting the upcoming presidential election. However, surprising many observers, the RCD subsequently joined the government coalition of December 1999, the party reportedly having become “increasingly closer” to President Bouteflika. The RCD left the coalition in May 2001 in the wake of severe government/Berber friction, and it boycotted the 2002 national and local elections. Saadi won 1.9 percent of the vote in the 2004 presidential poll.

The RCD strongly condemned the national charter for peace and reconciliation that was approved in 2005. The party also charged the government with fraud in regard to the official vote turnout for the related referendum. Meanwhile, another Berber grouping (the Movement for the Autonomy of Kabylie, led by singer Ferhat MLENNI) also rejected the charter as an exercise in “self-amnesty” by the Algerian authorities.

Leader: Saïd SAADI (President).

Democratic and Social Movement (Mouvement Démocratique et Social—MDS). The MDS rubric reportedly was recently adopted by the grouping formerly known as Challenge (Ettahaddi). Dedicated to “the revolutionary transition of Algeria to modernity and progress,” Ettahaddi had been launched in January 1993 as successor to the Socialist Vanguard Party (Parti de l’Avant-Garde Socialist—PAGS). The PAGS had emerged in 1966 as an illegal, but generally tolerated, heir to the Algerian Communist Party (Parti Communiste Algérien—PCA), which had been proscribed shortly after independence. Supportive of the Boumedienne government but less so of the Bendjedid administration, the PAGS reportedly applauded the 1988 unrest as helpful in its effort to “reestablish itself,” particularly among labor unionists. It offered a limited number of candidates in the 1990 municipal elections, without success, and boycotted the 1991, 1997, and 2002 legislative elections as well as the 1999 presidential poll.

Leader: Hachemi CHERIF (Secretary General).

Fidelity (Wafa). Organized by former foreign affairs minister Ahmed Taleb Ibrahim following his 1999 presidential campaign in the hope of coordinating nationalist and Islamist opposition groups, Wafa was subsequently denied recognition by the government on the grounds that it was essentially an FIS “clone.” Ibrahim was rejected by the Constitutional Council as a presidential candidate in 2004 and subsequently threw his support behind Ali Benflis.

Leaders: Ahmed Taleb IBRAHIMI, Mohamed SAID, Rashid LERARRI.

Democratic Front (Front Démocratique—FD). An anti-Bouteflika grouping, the FD elected former prime minister Sid Ahmed Ghozali as its chair during the May 2000 inaugural congress. Ghozali was not permitted by the Constitutional Council to run in the 2004 presidential election, and he subsequently announced he was supporting Ali Benflis in that campaign.

Leader: Sid Ahmed GHOZALI (Chair).

Socialist Workers Party (Parti Socialist des Travailleurs—PST). Legalized in early 1990, the Trotskyite PST supports “radical socialism,” non-payment of Algeria’s external debt, and secular government. The PST boycotted the 2002 assembly balloting.

Leader: Chawki SALHI.

Illegal Groups

Islamic Salvation Front (Front Islamique du Salut—FIS). The FIS was organized in early 1989 to represent the surging Islamic fundamentalist movement. Capitalizing upon strong antigovernment sentiment, it won control of a majority of town and departmental councils in the June 1990 municipal elections. Apparently to permit the broadest possible support for its effort to win national legislative control, the FIS leadership was subsequently reluctant to define its goals in specific terms. However, a significant proportion of the Front’s supporters appeared committed to the adoption and enforcement of sharia throughout Algeria’s theretofore relatively secular society and the imposition of measures such as the segregation of the sexes in schools and the workplace, a ban on alcohol consumption, and obligatory veils for women. FIS leaders also made it clear that a national fundamentalist government, even one that came to power through a multiparty election, would not feel bound to maintain a “Western-style” democracy.

In June 1991 FIS leader Dr. Abassi Madani, Ali Belhadj (his deputy), other members of the party’s Constitutional Council, and hundreds of FIS followers were arrested on charges of fomenting an “armed conspiracy against the security of the state” in connection with violent demonstrations in Algiers and other cities. Although hard-line FIS factions reportedly called for continued protest and an election boycott unless the detainees were released, the FIS ultimately participated in the December 26 legislative balloting under the leadership of the moderate Abdelkader HACHANI.

After winning 188 seats in the first round of the 1991 assembly poll, the FIS prepared to assume national political leadership, Hachani attempting to reassure the nonfundamentalist population that the FIS would “persuade, not oblige people into doing what we say.” However, the party’s plan to mount the world’s first Islamic state via the ballot box was thwarted by the military takeover of the Algerian government in early January 1992. Nearly all of the remaining FIS national leaders, including Hachani, were subsequently arrested, as were hundreds of its local and provincial officials, with upwards of 30,000 FIS followers reportedly being placed in desert detention camps. In addition, Algerian courts in March formally banned the FIS as a political party upon petition of the High Council of State, which also ordered the dissolution of many municipal councils under FIS control and their replacement by appointed bodies. The Front was subsequently reported to be sharply divided between members remaining faithful to the group’s official commitment to nonviolence and more radical adherents prepared to “move from words to rifles.” It was generally believed that the latter were responsible for a number of attacks on Algerian security personnel during the rest of the year and for the subsequent emergence of armed groups such as the AIS and the GIA (below).

In July 1992 Madani and Belhadj were sentenced to 12 years in prison for conspiring against the authority of the state, five other leaders receiving shorter terms. However, the imprisoned FIS leaders reportedly met with Defense Minister Liamine Zeroual in December 1993 to discuss measures whereby the FIS could be reintegrated into the political mainstream. In the wake of Zeroual’s appointment as president one month later, sporadic negotiations were reported between the government and the FIS, many reports suggesting that a breakthrough was imminent in mid-1995. However, the government finally declared the talks deadlocked, allegedly over the failure of the FIS leaders to renounce antiregime violence unequivocally. Consequently, no FIS participation was permitted in the 1995 presidential balloting, the Front calling upon supporters to boycott the election as a way of embarrassing the government. That strategy backfired, however, as heavy voter turnout and Zeroual's strong showing served to undercut the Front's insistence that it still held majority popular support. Postelection comments from some FIS leaders exhibited a conciliatory tone, observers suggesting that the Front would seek a compromise that would allow it to present candidates in the legislative elections planned for 1997. No such scenario developed in the first half of 1997, but, perhaps with the prospect of renewed negotiations in mind, the government released Madani on July 15, 1997, one week after Hachani had been freed when a court found him guilty of "inciting rebellion" in 1992 but sentenced him to time served. However, the nature of subsequent FIS/government talks was unclear, and Madani was placed under house arrest in September after he had called for UN mediation of the Algerian political impasse. Not surprisingly, the FIS urged its supporters to boycott the October local elections. It was reported in early 1999 that the FIS had encouraged its supporters to vote for former foreign affairs minister Ibrahimi in the April 1999 presidential balloting.

FIS leaders expressed the hope that President Bouteflika's civil concord of the second half of 1999 would lead to legalization of the party (perhaps under a different name), but prospects in that regard remained dim. Meanwhile, the circumstances surrounding the assassination of Hachani in Algiers in November 1999 were unclear, although the government attributed the murder to the GIA.

FIS leaders Madani and Belhadj were released from house arrest and prison, respectively, in July 2003, the former subsequently settling in Qatar. Both men were barred from political activity, although in 2005 Madani was reported to have contacted President Bouteflika regarding Madani's possible participation in discussion about the proposed general amnesty.

Bouteflika subsequently reportedly invited FIS leaders Rabeh Kebir and Anwar Haddam to return to Algeria, although Bouteflika indicated no inclination to permit the return of FIS leaders to political activity. In March 2006 the government announced that it would be up to the Algerian courts to determine Belhadj's fate in that regard.

Leaders: Dr. Abassi MADANI (in Qatar), Ali BELHADJ, Abdelkader BOUKHAMKHAM, Sheikh Abdelkader OMAR, Abdelkrim Ould ADDA (Foreign Spokesperson), Rabeh KEBIR (in Germany), and Anwar HADDAM (in the United States).

Islamic Salvation Army (Armée Islamique du Salut—AIS). The AIS, also previously referenced as the Armed Islamic Movement (Mouvement Islamique Armée—MIA), was an underground fundamentalist organization formed in response to the banning of the FIS in 1992. It was often described as the "military wing" of the FIS, although there were occasional reports of policy differences between the leaders of the two groups.

Initially, the AIS was formally committed to antiregime military activity, although, unlike the GIA (below), it attacked only "official" military and police targets. (Shortly after the formation of the AIS, its fighters, estimated at about 10,000 strong, were reported to be operating under a unified command with GIA guerrillas, but extensive fighting, apparently emanating from disputes over tactics, broke out between the two groups in early 1994.) In early 1995 AIS leaders called for dialogue with the government, indicating that they would accept any "peace settlement" negotiated by the FIS. The AIS declared a "cease-fire" in antigovernment attacks as of October 1, 1997, apparently to disassociate itself from the shocking (even by recent Algerian standards) wave of violence gripping the country.

In June 1999 the AIS agreed to a permanent cease-fire in connection with President Bouteflika's plans for a civil concord that included an amnesty for most AIS members and the restoration of their civil and political rights. In January 2000 AIS leader Madani MEZRAG signed documents formalizing the elements of the concord and announced the “dissolution” of the AIS, some 1,500 AIS members having reportedly been declared eligible for amnesty. Mezrag supported President Bouteflika’s reelection bid in 2004 and endorsed the 2005 national charter for peace and reconciliation, indicating his desire to help form a new legal party among former FIS/AIS supporters.

Armed Islamic Group (Groupe Islamique Armé—GIA). The GIA is an outgrowth of antigovernment violence that first broke out in the mid-1980s around the city of Blida. In the 1990s the Group emerged as the most militant of the underground fundamentalist organizations, its targets including police, government officials, journalists, feminists, and foreigners. Vehemently anti-Western, the Group reportedly supported establishment of an Iranian-style “theocracy” in Algeria and firmly rejected dialogue with the military-backed Zeroual regime.

The GIA guerrilla force was once estimated at 2,500–10,000 fighters, some known as “Afghanis” in reference to their having fought with the mujaheddin in Afghanistan. In early 1994 the Group was reportedly in control of many rural areas and several urban districts. However, the government subsequently claimed that its intensive “antiterrorist” campaign had significantly weakened the GIA. Moreover, many GIA leaders were killed by security forces or rival Islamists. In addition, one leader, Sheikh Abdelhaq Layada, was arrested in Morocco in 1993 and extradited to Algeria, where he was sentenced to death following his conviction on terrorism charges (see below for information on his subsequent release).

In mid-1995 the GIA was placed on the U.S. State Department’s list of “terrorist” organizations. Although deemed by mid-1996 to be stronger militarily than the AIS, the GIA was believed to have lost much of whatever popular support it might once have commanded as the result of its assassination campaign and sometimes indiscriminate bomb attacks.

Friction within the GIA was also apparent following the kidnapping and eventual murder of seven French Trappist monks in Algeria in the spring of 1996. After the GIA claimed responsibility for the deaths, GIA leader Dhamel ZITOUNI (a.k.a. Abu Abderrahmane Amin) was reportedly ousted from the Group. He was subsequently reportedly killed by Algerian security forces. The GIA leadership mantle subsequently reportedly fell to Antar ZOUABI, while reports surfaced in late 1997 of another GIA leader—Slimane MAHERZI (a.k.a. Abu Djamil), a young guerrilla who had reportedly served the militant fundamentalist cause in Afghanistan and Bosnia and Herzegovina.

The GIA was broadly accused of the bulk of the terrorist incidents of 1997–2000, most of which occurred in central Algeria, where the Group’s influence was considered the strongest. As the attacks grew more random and increasingly targeted civilians, some observers suggested that discipline had broken down within the GIA, a correspondent for the New York Times describing the Group as a “loose organization of roving bandits, including outlaws with little or no ideological commitment to Islam.”

Ahmed Zaoui, described as a prominent external leader of the GIA following his disassociation from the FIS in 1997, was reportedly in Burkina Faso in late 1998, having been expelled from Switzerland. The GIA’s Zouabi strongly rejected the government’s amnesty offer included in President Bouteflika’s civil concord of the second half of 1999, and most GIA fighters reportedly followed his lead. Zouabi was reportedly killed by security forces in February 2002; Rachid Abou Tourab was subsequently reported to have been selected as the new GIA leader. Meanwhile, like the GSPC (below), the GIA was included on the list of “terrorist” organizations subject to asset seizure by the United States as part of the war on terrorism announced after the September 11, 2001, attack.

Noureddine Boudiafi reportedly assumed leadership of the GIA in 2004; however, he was subsequently arrested, and the GIA mantle reportedly fell to Younes CHAABANE, who was killed during a security sweep in early 2005. By that time, the government was describing the GIA as “nearly extinct.”

Layada was released from prison in early 2006, apparently as part of the national peace and reconciliation process. However, some GIA fighters reportedly remained active at that point, having been blamed by the government for at least one attack in mid-2005.

Leaders: Sheikh Abdelhaq LAYADA, Nouredine BOUDIAFI (in prison), Mohammed SAID, Ahmed ZAOUÏ (in exile), Abdelmadjid DICHOU, Rachid Abou TOURAB, Ahmed BAICHE.

Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat (Groupe Salafiste pour la Prédication et le Combat—GSPC). Also referenced as Appeal and Struggle, the GSPC was established in 1999 by members of the GIA who were opposed to the parent group’s targeting of civilians but remained committed to attacks on military sites and personnel. Although some reports suggested GSPC leaders had begun negotiations with the government in late 1999 regarding President Bouteflika’s civil concord, that pact was ultimately rejected by the GSPC, which continued its guerrilla campaign. The GSPC was included on the list of proscribed organizations published by the United States following the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Several reports suggested that some GSPC fighters might have independently established ties with Osama bin Laden’s al-Qaida, although some observers doubted any formal connection between the two groups since the GSPC had never displayed any anti-U.S. sentiment.

By 2003 the GSPC was one of the few Islamist groups “still fighting,” hard-liner Nabil SAHRAOUI having supplanted GSPC founder Hassan HATTAB as leader of the group. In October 2003 Sahraoui said that the GSPC supported bin Laden’s jihad against “the American heretics,” and the GSPC was held responsible for several attacks on Algerian forces in 2003–2004. However, Sahraoui was killed by the Algerian army in June 2004, analysts suggesting that GSPC forces had dwindled to 400–450 guerrillas by that time. Another GSPC leader, Amari SAIFI, was taken into custody in late 2004. (Saifi, also known as “El Para,” was sentenced to life imprisonment in 2005, although in early 2006 his supporters were reportedly urging the government to consider an amnesty for him under the nation’s new peace and reconciliation process.)

The government blamed the GSPC for several attacks in 2005, while the GSPC claimed responsibility for an attack on an army base in Mauritania in June 2005. (The GSPC said it was avenging the arrest by Mauritanian authorities of a group of alleged GSPC adherents, described by the Mauritania government as having ties to al-Qaida.) However, in late 2005, Hassan HATTAB, one of the founders of the GSPC, subsequently said he believed most GSPC supporters were now willing to consider an amnesty agreement.

Defenders of the Salafi Call (Dhanat Houmet Daawa Salafia). One of the few Islamist militant groups active in Algeria as of 2005, this “Taliban-trained” grouping, another offshoot of the GIA, was reported to comprise about 150–250 fighters in western Algeria. Like the GSPC, it has been declared a terrorist organization by the United States.

Leader: Mohammed BENSLIM.

Legislature

The 1996 constitution provided for a bicameral Parliament (Barlaman), consisting of a restructured National People’s Assembly and a new upper house, the Council of the Nation. The former unicameral assembly, consisting of 295 members serving five-year terms, had been most recently elected on February 26, 1987, deputies being selected from a list of 885 candidates (three for every seat) that had been drawn up by the National Liberation Front (FLN). The first round of multiparty balloting for a new 430-member assembly was held December 26, 1991, with the Islamic Salvation Front (FIS) winning 188 seats, the Socialist Forces Front (FFS) 25, the FLN 15, and independents 3. A runoff round involving the top two vote-getters in the remaining districts was scheduled for January 16, 1992. However, the second poll was canceled on January 12 by the High Security Council, which also declared the results of the first round invalid. Subsequently, it was revealed that the former assembly had been dissolved by a secret presidential decree on January 4.

In April 1992 the High Council of State announced the appointment of a 60-member National Consultative Council (Majlis al-Shoura al-Watani) to serve in an advisory capacity to the government pending new assembly elections. The National Dialogue Conference of early 1994, in turn, authorized the appointment of a three-year National Transitional Council (Conseil National de Transition—CNT), which at its initial sitting in May encompassed 63 seats filled by parties, 85 by professional associations and trade unions, and 30 by government nominees, with 22 reserved for nonparticipating secular parties. The CNT was dissolved on May 18, 1997, in preparation for the elections to the bodies authorized by the new constitution.

Council of the Nation (Majlis al-Umma/Conseil de la Nation). The upper house has 144 members, 96 (2 from each wilaya) elected in secret ballot by an electoral college of the members of local councils and communal and wilayaat assemblies and 48 appointed by the president. The term of office is six years, although one-half of the initial members (elected on December 25, 1997) served only three years to permit 50 percent replenishment of the council every three years from that point. Following the balloting of December 30, 2003, the distribution of the elected seats was as follows: National Democratic Rally, 52; National Liberation Front, 31; Movement for a Peaceful Society, 10; Movement for National Reform, 2; Socialist Forces Front, 1.

Members are elected for a five-year term on a proportional basis from lists presented by parties or independents. Following the election of May 30, 2002, the distribution of seats was as follows: National Liberation Front, 199; National Democratic Rally, 47; Movement for National Reform, 43; Movement for a Peaceful Society, 38; Workers' Party, 21; Algerian National Front, 8; Movement of National Harmony, 1; Renaissance Movement (Nahda), 1; Algerian Renewal Party; and independents, 30.

Speaker: Amar SAADANI.

Communications

Press

After a long period of strict control of national and foreign press activities, the government introduced a new Information Code in mid-1989 that formally ended the state media monopoly and accorded journalists greater freedom of expression. It was succeeded in March 1990 by a more stringent code that mandated imprisonment for journalists who "offended" Islam or any other religion; the new regulations also stipulated that all new periodicals be printed in Arabic. However, the new strictures were not rigorously implemented, and an information "explosion" subsequently took place in the increasingly independent press. By mid-1991 there were reportedly more than 110 daily, weekly, and monthly periodicals, many of them fostered by a government program under which journalists in state-owned enterprises were offered a sum equal to two years' salary to help establish private publications. However, most of the new papers continued to be printed on government presses, which enabled the administration to suspend their issuance during the early phase of the 1991 state of emergency. Significant restrictions, largely directed at the Islamic fundamentalist press, were imposed following the declaration of a state of emergency in early 1992. A number of newspapers were also banned for a short time later in the year under a new decree permitting such action in cases of publications deemed to be operating "against public interest." In addition, journalists were permitted to report on "security matters" only with government authorization and only using information released by the state, stories on antigovernment activity consequently becoming quite limited. In part because they were often perceived as "apologists" for the government, journalists were subsequently targeted by fundamentalist radicals.

New restrictions, including harsh penalties in a revised penal code, have been imposed on the press in recent years, prompting protests from both domestic and international journalism organizations. Among other things, opposition candidates complained in 2002 about the high level of control exercised by the administration of President Bouteflika over all aspects of the media. Journalists have subsequently been jailed regularly for what the government calls "libel" but what free press advocates describe as legitimate criticism of officials. On the other hand, a reporter for Middle East International in 2005 opined that a degree of "genuine political debate" was apparent among some Algerian newspapers.

The following are dailies published in Algiers unless otherwise noted: el-Moudjahid (The Fighter, 440,000), former FLN organ in French; Algérie Actualité (255,000), government weekly in French; Horizons (200,000), in French; al-Chaab (The People, 150,000), former FLN information journal in Arabic; al-Massa (100,000), in Arabic. Other independent dailies include: Le Soir de l'Algérie (150,000), in French; Al Khabar (The News, 120,000), in Arabic; El Watan (The Nation, 80,000), in French; Le Jeune Indépendant (60,000), in French; Al Djazair al-Joum (54,000), in Arabic; Le Matin, in French; La Tribune, in French; al-Jumhuriyah (The Republic, Wahran, 20,000), former FLN organ in Arabic; Liberté (20,000), in French; Le Monde Aujourd'hui, in French; Le Quotidien d'Oran (Wahran), in French.

News Agencies

The domestic agency is the Algerian Press Service (Wikalat al-Anba al-Jazairiyah/Algérie Presse Service—APS). A number of foreign agencies maintain offices in Algiers.

Broadcasting and Computing

The government decreased its control over broadcasting services in 2000, although it retained a supervisory role. The former state-controlled Télévision Algérienne continues to service about a dozen stations. There were approximately 3.8 million television receivers and 250,000 personal computers serving 380,000 Internet users in 2003.

ANGOLA

REPUBLIC OF ANGOLA

República de Angola

The Country

The largest of Portugal's former African possessions, Angola is located on the Atlantic, south of the Congo River. The greater part of its territory is bounded on the north and east by the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC, formerly Zaire), on the southeast by Zambia, and on the south by Namibia. It also includes the small enclave of Cabinda in the northwest (bordered by the Republic of the Congo and the DRC), where important offshore oil deposits are being exploited. The overwhelming proportion of Angola's people are Bantus, who comprise four distinct tribal groups: the Bakongo in the northwest, the Kimbundu in the north-central region inland from Luanda, the Ovimbundu in the south-central region, and the Chokwe in eastern Angola. No native language is universally spoken, Portuguese being the only tongue not confined to a specific tribal area. Women have traditionally experienced equality with men in subsistence activities, and they were estimated to constitute 46 percent of the work force in 1996.

Because of its rail links with Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe, Mozambique, and South Africa, the port of Lobito served as a leading outlet for much of Central Africa's mineral wealth until independence was declared in 1975. Thereafter, civil war crippled the Benguela Railway and devastated much of the formerly prosperous economy, including the export of diamonds and coffee. Guerrilla activity resulted in massive migration of peasant farmers to cities or neighboring countries, and, despite its potential as a breadbasket for southern Africa, Angola became dependent on food imports to stave off widespread famine. In addition, black market activity flourished, contributing to substantial degradation of the local currency. Although the government attempted to stimulate the economy by reducing state control over industry and agriculture, its efforts were hampered by corruption, bureaucratic inefficiency, and the allocation of more than half of its income to military expenditure. Only oil kept the economy afloat, generating more than 85 percent of revenue and attracting private foreign investment. Vowing to promote a "mixed economy" with additional free-market influence, Angola became a member of the International Political Status: Formally independent upon departure of the Portuguese High Commissioner on November 10, 1975; government of the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola (MPLA) recognized by the Organization of African Unity on February 11, 1976; peace accord signed with rebel National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA) on June 1, 1991; multiparty democratic system approved by constitutional amendment on August 26, 1992.

Area: 481,351 sq. mi. (1,246,700 sq. km.).

Population: 5,646,166 (1970C); 13,912,000 (2005E). A census launched in 1982 was never completed; the 2005 figure is an extrapolation from recent UN estimates.

Major Urban Center (2005E): LUANDA (urban area, 2,825,000).

Official Language: Portuguese (although most Angolans speak tribal languages).

Monetary Unit: Kwanza (market rate July 1, 2006: 80.37 kwanzas = $1US).

President: José Eduardo DOS SANTOS (Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola); designated by the Central Committee of the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola—Labor Party (MPLA-PT) and sworn in September 21, 1979, following the death of Dr. António Agostinho NETO on September 10; confirmed by an extraordinary congress of the MPLA-PT on December 17, 1980; reconfirmed in 1985 and 1990; mandate extended following popular election on September 29–30, 1992, and extended indefinitely by presidential order on January 29, 1999.

Prime Minister: Fernando (“Nando”) Da Piedade Dias DOS SANTOS (Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola); appointed by the president on December 6, 2002; formed new government on December 9, 2002. (The prime minister’s post, previously held by Fernando José França Dias VAN-DÜNEM [Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola], had been unfilled since a new government was installed on January 30, 1999, when President dos Santos assumed authority formerly exercised by the prime minister.)

Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank in 1989, although assistance from those institutions was constrained prior to initial accommodation with leading rebel forces in June 1991.

The subsequent 18-month cease-fire, as well as military actions against other insurgents in the oil-rich Cabindan province, raised hopes for economic as well as political stability. However, such optimism was dashed in late 1992 by the outbreak of postelectoral violence, and in early 1993 coffee and cotton production were described as nonexistent while oil and diamond extraction had been severely constrained. Thereafter, in response to the 1994 peace accord and appeals from both government and rebel leaders, a conference sponsored by the European Union (EU) yielded pledges of nearly $1 billion to facilitate recovery from the country’s 20 years of military devastation. During 1995–1997 Angola enjoyed average annual real GDP growth of approximately 10 percent; furthermore, inflation fell dramatically 1997–1998. However, with the return of civil war in late 1998 the government’s economic energies again turned to fueling its war efforts.

In early 2000 the United Nations estimated that 4 million Angolans (approximately one-third of the population) had been directly affected by the conflict and that half of those individuals were “internally displaced.” Furthermore, observers reported that approximately 200,000 Angolans had sought refuge in Zambia, while another 10,000 had recently fled to Namibia. On a more positive note, the dos Santos government reported that GDP had grown in real terms by 3.5 percent in 1999, largely due to oil-related production. However, inflation remained out of control at 3000 percent annually before declining to 305 percent in 2000 and 125 percent in 2001. New French investment pushed oil production to nearly 900,000 barrels per day in late 2001, underscoring the country’s prominence in that sector. (Angola, already a major oil exporter to the United States and the second leading producer, next to Nigeria, in sub-Saharan Africa, is estimated to have reserves of more than 12.5 billion barrels.)

Despite its oil wealth, Angola remained in severe economic and social distress as of 2002 when the long-standing civil war finally concluded, leaving the nation's infrastructure in ruins and sapping government resources that might otherwise have gone to the health and education sectors. Life expectancy was estimated at less than 40 years, while 65 percent of the population lived below the poverty line and many people lacked basic medical care and educational opportunities. In addition, the IMF suspended its assistance after the war's end, citing, among other things, a lack of fiscal accountability on the part of the government. (Analysts suggested that billions of dollars in oil revenues had disappeared from government coffers and were hidden in secret offshore bank accounts.) In 2004 the government worked with the IMF on a plan to restore aid, but as of early 2006 no agreement had been reached. President dos Santos resisted renewed requests for fiscal transparency, a key obstacle to receiving IMF financial assistance. The IMF did, however, commend government officials for their commitment to lowering inflation, which was 10 percent at the end of 2005 and expected to be reduced to single digits in 2006. In addition, the IMF projected economic growth of 27.6 percent in 2006, boosted by the high price of oil. Meanwhile, the World Bank continued to give aid to the government to reduce the spread of AIDS, malaria, and tuberculosis.

GDP grew by nearly 15 percent in 2002 thanks to the robust energy sector and the return of international investment in the wake of the end of the civil war. Similar growth was achieved in 2004, which also saw inflation fall to more manageable levels. The government and transnational companies embarked on massive new initiatives to further exploit not only oil reserves but also Angola's significant deposits of diamonds, gold, uranium, iron ore, and other minerals and ores. However, as of early 2006, it was still not clear if economic expansion had extended substantial benefits to the general population, though the government had initiated an ambitious program of improving infrastructure (see Current issues, below).

Political Background

Portuguese settlements were established in eastern Angola in the late 15th century by navigators seeking trade routes to India, but the territory's present boundaries were not formally established until the Berlin Conference of 1884–1885. In 1951 the colony of Angola became an Overseas Province of Portugal and was thus construed as being an integral part of the Portuguese state.

Guerrilla opposition to colonial rule broke out in 1961 and continued for 13 years, despite a sizable Portuguese military presence. At the time of the 1974 coup in Lisbon, there were three principal independence movements operating in different parts of Angola. The National Front for the Liberation of Angola (Frente Nacional para a Libertação de Angola—FNLA), which had established a government-in-exile in Zaire in 1963 under the leadership of Holden ROBERTO, controlled much of the north; the Soviet-backed Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola (Movimento Popular de Libertação de Angola—MPLA), led by Dr. Agostinho NETO, controlled much of the central region plus Cabinda; the third group, the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola—UNITA), operated in eastern and southern Angola under the leadership of Dr. Jonas SAVIMBI. On January 15, 1975, the three leaders signed an agreement with Portuguese representatives calling for the independence of Angola on November 11 (the 400th anniversary of the founding of Luanda). The pact provided for interim rule by a Portuguese high commissioner and a Presidential Collegiate consisting of one representative from each of the three liberation movements. During succeeding months, however, the FNLA and UNITA formed a tacit alliance against the MPLA, whose forces at the time of independence controlled the capital. On November 10 the Portuguese high commissioner departed after a brief ceremony at Luanda, and at midnight Neto proclaimed the establishment, under MPLA auspices, of the People's Republic of Angola. On November 23 the FNLA-UNITA announced the formation of a rival Democratic People's Republic of Angola, with the central highlands city of Huambo (formerly Nova Lisboa) as its capital.

Within a month of independence, some two dozen nations had recognized the MPLA government, although the Organization of African Unity (OAU) had urged all countries to withhold recognition until formation of a coalition government. Meanwhile, Cuba had dispatched upwards of 18,000 troops in support of the MPLA, while both Uganda and Zaire had threatened to break diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union because of its involvement in the Angolan war. The revelation that American money and equipment were being channeled to FNLA forces through Zaire posed the additional risk of a U.S.-Soviet confrontation. By late December the Cuban troops, equipped with Soviet armored vehicles and rocket launchers, had helped turn the tide in favor of the MPLA, and some 4,000–5,000 South African troops operating in support of the Huambo regime were substantially withdrawn a month later. In early February 1976 the MPLA launched a southern offensive that resulted in the capture of Huambo and other key cities, prompting declarations by the FNLA and UNITA that their forces would thenceforth resort to guerrilla warfare. On February 11 the OAU announced that the MPLA government had been admitted to membership, following formal recognition of the Neto regime by a majority of OAU member states.

The FNLA and UNITA continued to resist government and Cuban units from 1976 to 1978, and in early 1979 they announced formation of a joint military force. Nevertheless, it subsequently appeared that Roberto's FNLA had been virtually annihilated in the north and that only UNITA was offering organized opposition to the Luanda regime.

On September 10, 1979, President Neto died at Moscow, where he had been undergoing medical treatment. On September 21 he was succeeded by José Eduardo DOS SANTOS (the minister of planning) as chief of state, head of government, and chair of the ruling party, which had been renamed the MPLA-Labor Party (MPLA-Partido Trabalhista—MPLA-PT).

In September 1984 the remaining 1,500 guerrillas and 20,000 civilian members of COMIRA (Conselho Militar para a Resistência de Angola), which had been founded by former FNLA members, surrendered to the Luanda government under a 1979 amnesty provision, its military members being integrated into the MPLA-PT forces. However, the confrontation with UNITA settled into an intractable civil war: the U.S.-backed rebels, charged with brutal intimidation of the peasantry, continued to dominate much of the countryside, while the government, supported by 50,000 Cuban troops and extensive Soviet aid, remained in control of most urban areas.

With over 300,000 people dead, an estimated 1.5 million dislocated, and the country's economy and social infrastructure in shambles, attention in the latter part of the 1980s turned to negotiation of a political settlement to the military stalemate. One major breakthrough was achieved with an agreement in late 1988 for curtailment of foreign military involvement in Angola. Domestic reconciliation proved more difficult, however, as a much publicized cease-fire agreement brokered by Zairean President Mobutu at a meeting attended by the leaders of 16 African nations in mid-1989 lasted only a few weeks. Subsequently, despite further fighting, government-UNITA talks continued, yielding, with the involvement of both U.S. Secretary of State James Baker and Soviet Foreign Minister Aleksandr Bessmertnykh, a peace settlement signed at Washington on June 1, 1991, that provided for a multiparty election in late 1992. Responsibility for monitoring the accord and organizing elections was assigned to a Joint Political and Military Commission (Comissão Comun Política e Militar—CCPM), consisting of Portuguese, U.S., USSR, MPLA-PT, and UNITA representatives, which was bolstered in early June by the arrival of a 600-member United Nations Angola Verification Mission (UNAVEM).

In July 1992 dos Santos named former planning minister Fernando José França Dias VANDÚNEM to the recently restored prime ministerial post, without, however, relinquishing his powers of executive leadership. Thereafter, despite clashes between MPLA-PT and UNITA supporters, pre-electoral activity continued, including the emergence of a number of opposition political parties and the return to Luanda of former MPLA-PT adversaries Holden Roberto and Jonas Savimbi, in August and September, respectively.

On August 26, 1992, the MPLA-PT endorsed constitutional revisions formalizing the government's dedication to a democratic system. Subsequently, the party also dropped "Labor Party" from its name. On September 8 dos Santos and Savimbi agreed to form a postelection unity government based on voting percentages derived from the balloting later that month. On September 28 the Angolan Armed Forces (FAA), drawn from the MPLA's Popular Armed Forces for the Liberation of Angola (FAPLA) and UNITA's Armed Forces for the Liberation of Angola (FALA), was inaugurated. However, at 8,000 troops, the FAA was far below its projected 50,000 strength, a shortfall attributed to UNITA's slow demobilization and consistent with reports that entire UNITA units remained intact outside the capital.

Although 11 presidential candidates and 18 political parties participated in balloting September 29–30, 1992, the polling was dominated by dos Santos, Savimbi, and their respective parties. On September 30 Savimbi, facing certain defeat, rejected the conclusions of international observers by declaring the balloting "rigged" and stated that he would "not accept defeat." By mid-October widespread violence was reported in the countryside, while for the first time UNITA and MPLA units clashed at the capital. Election results released on October 17 confirmed the MPLA's near two-to-one legislative victory, although dos Santos's 49.57 percent share of the presidential vote was constitutionally insufficient to avoid a second round against Savimbi, whose 40.07 percent vote share eclipsed nine other candidates by a wide margin. No presidential repolling subsequently occurred, as Savimbi's forces returned to military confrontation.

By October 1992 the MPLA-UNITA struggle had reached a previously unmatched intensity. On November 26 UNITA legislators boycotted the inaugural convention of the National Assembly, and, despite a new cease-fire agreement the following day, the fighting continued. On December 2 a transitional government was named, headed by Marcelino José Carlos MOCO, who had been appointed by dos Santos on November 27. Although dominated by MPLA members, the "unity" government provided for the participation of five opposition parties, featuring most prominently UNITA, which was assigned one full ministry and four deputy posts. Five days later UNITA agreed to join the government, and on December 20 the rebels reportedly accepted yet another peace plan, which was again ignored.

By mid-January 1993 tens of thousands of people had been reported killed, with Savimbi's forces on the defensive. On January 26 UN Secretary General Boutros Boutros-Ghali warned that if fighting continued, the remaining UN peacekeepers would be removed upon expiration of their mandate on April 30. The following day peace talks at Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, were abandoned. On March 6 UNITA recaptured its headquarters at Huambo after a pitched, 55-day battle that left over 12,000 dead, including 5,000 civilians. In addition to leaving the insurgents in control of over 70 percent of Angolan territory, the victory was described as pivotal to UNITA's transformation from a guerrilla force to a conventional army. Furthermore, UNITA's military advantage was evidenced by the government's subsequent willingness to make concessions at peace talks that opened on April 13 at Abidjan, Côte d'Ivoire. In mid-May the government agreed to a peace plan brokered by the UN, the United States, Russia, and Portugal that incorporated UNITA's demand for decentralized power sharing under a national unity government. However, days later UNITA rejected the agreement.

In response to UNITA's continued intransigence, the United States on May 18, 1993, announced its intention to recognize the dos Santos government, thus abandoning its attempt to use recognition to propel peace talks and formally signaling an end to its support for UNITA.

Subsequently, UNITA intensified its military activities, capturing oil-rich Soyo on May 26. On June 2 the UN Security Council unanimously declared UNITA responsible for the breakdown of peace negotiations and extended the UNAVEM mandate until July 15, albeit with a sharply reduced staff. In mid-July the UN continued the UNAVEM mandate until September 15 and threatened to impose an embargo on UNITA unless the rebels agreed to honor the 1991 accord, respect the 1992 elections, and enact a verifiable cease-fire. Heavy fighting nonetheless continued, and on August 20 the World Food Program agreed to a six-month emergency food operation to help alleviate the suffering from what one observer described as the "world's worst war." On September 20 UNITA announced a unilateral cease-fire; nevertheless, its military activities escalated, and on September 26 the UN imposed an embargo on oil and arms sales to the rebels. On October 30 and 31 UNITA agreed to withdraw from territory it had seized since the 1992 elections. However, the MPLA dismissed UNITA demands that "thousands of military prisoners" be released, UN forces be encamped in all towns it vacated, and UNITA fighters be integrated on an equal basis with government troops into an Angolan army.

In November 1993 a fresh round of peace talks opened at Lusaka, Zambia, and were reportedly going well until government negotiators insisted that UNITA civilian supporters be disarmed. Although the demand precipitated a temporary suspension of the talks, another cease-fire agreement was reported on December 10 to be near completion. However, three days later the negotiations were again suspended after UNITA accused the government of attempting to kill Savimbi in a bombing raid.

"Lusaka-2" negotiations were launched on January 5, 1994, with negotiators concluding an agreement on fundamental principles of national reconciliation on February 17. In March the government was reported to have offered four secondary ministerial posts to UNITA, which countered with a demand for the key portfolios of defense, interior, and finance. In late April agreement was reached on second-round conclusion of the presidential balloting that had been repudiated by UNITA in September 1992, although a deadlock ensued at midyear over UNITA's insistence that it be awarded the governorship of Huambo province. On September 5 the two sides agreed to a renewal of UNAVEM, whose existing mandate was scheduled to expire on September 30, and on October 31 they initialed a new peace agreement under which UNITA would be awarded eleven government portfolios and three provincial governorships. Nonetheless, heavy fighting continued, and on November 8 the rebel stronghold of Huambo again fell to government troops. Despite the absence of Savimbi, who was reported to have been wounded in an incident involving his own bodyguard, the latest peace accord was formally signed at Lusaka on November 20. On February 8, 1995, the UNAVEM mandate was extended for another six months amid evidence of tensions within UNITA because of hard-line opposition to Lusaka-2.

It was not until May 6, 1995, that a long-awaited meeting between dos Santos and Savimbi took place at Lusaka, at the conclusion of which the UNITA leader accepted his opponent as "president of my country." While there was no public mention at the meeting of demobilization of UNITA's guerrilla army, Savimbi later declared in talks with South African President Mandela that his group's revival of hostilities in late 1992 had been "stupid," and on May 31 the advance units of a projected 7,460-member UNAVEM peacekeeping force arrived in Angola.

On June 17, 1995, it was confirmed that Savimbi had been offered a vice presidency. While there was no immediate response from the UNITA leader, he was reported during a second meeting with dos Santos at Franceville, Gabon, on August 10 to have accepted, subject to a number of "understandings" that included a role in defining economic policy. On the other hand, Radio Angola announced prior to a joint appearance by the two rivals at the Brussels donor conference in September that Savimbi would not assume office until the demobilization or integration of UNITA military units had been completed in early 1996. The latter process was halted in December after government troops had launched a new offensive in northern Angola but was resumed on the basis of a new timetable negotiated with Luanda on January 9, 1996.

The new timetable was immediately disregarded by UNITA, only about 8,000 of whose 62,000-strong army had reported to UN-supervised confinement camps by mid-February 1996. Direct talks between dos Santos and Savimbi were held at Libreville, Gabon, on March 1, and the two leaders agreed that a government of national unity would be formed within four months and that a 90,000-member national army would be created from existing guerrilla forces. A further agreement on May 24 specified an immediate start on the integration of UNITA soldiers into a national force and the disarming of all civilians. Meanwhile, the UNAVEM mandate had been renewed on May 8, this time for only a two-month period, it being envisaged that UN forces would extend their patrols to the whole of the country.

The new agreements produced no greater urgency on UNITA's part, so that by the end of May 1996 only some 23,000 UNITA forces had been confined. Losing patience with the slow rate of compliance, President dos Santos on June 8 appointed a new government in which Van-Dúnem (then assembly speaker) returned to the premiership. Charged in particular with launching an urgent assault on corruption and government inefficiency, the new ministerial list contained no UNITA representatives, although government spokesmen stressed that UNITA would be included as soon as it had honored its undertakings under the 1994 Lusaka agreement. The UN Security Council renewed the UNAVEM mandate in July and again in October, the second extension including a warning to UNITA that sanctions would be imposed on the group if it failed to comply with the Lusaka agreement promptly. On November 13, 1996, the National Assembly, citing a lack of electoral preparations, adopted a constitutional revision that extended its mandate for a period of two to four years. On December 12 the UNAVEM mandate was extended to February 28, 1997, and the following day UNAVEM officials declared that UNITA had fulfilled its obligations as delineated by the Lusaka accord; however, the desertion of approximately 15,000 UNITA members from confinement centers coupled with reports of UNITA's involvement in the fighting at Zaire rekindled concerns regarding Savimbi's dedication to the peace process. Subsequently, implementation of the peace accord stalled in the first quarter of 1997, as Savimbi formally rejected the offer of a vice presidential appointment and demanded instead a role as "principal adviser" and the establishment of a "joint basic government." Both requests were promptly dismissed by the dos Santos government, which further asserted that Savimbi remained unwilling to relinquish rebel-held territory and completely disarm his forces.

On a more positive note, on April 9, 1997, the National Assembly met for the first time with its full complement of UNITA legislators and approved legislation naming Savimbi the "Leader of the Largest Opposition Party." On the same day, dos Santos took the first formal step toward the establishment of a unity government, naming Van-Dúnem as prime minister of a Unity and National Reconciliation Government (Governa da Unidade e da Reconciliação Nacional—GURN). Two days later, more than a dozen foreign leaders attended the inauguration of the GURN, which included eleven UNITA members. Savimbi refused to attend, citing personal safety concerns.

On August 31, 1998, the dos Santos administration announced that UNITA's legislators and cabinet members had been suspended because of UNITA's failure to adhere to the dictates of the Lusaka accord. However, most of the UNITA representatives were reported to have resumed their duties in September, some now apparently operating under the rubric of the new UNITA-Renewal faction (see UNITA under Political Parties). With relations between the government and the Savimbi faction of UNITA having deteriorated into full-scale war, dos Santos formed a new government on January 30, 1999, in which he left the prime minister's post unfilled and assumed the responsibilities of head of the government himself pending the "return of constitutional normality." The new cabinet included several UNITA-Renewal representatives but no Savimbi supporters. Dos Santos also announced he had taken over direct control of the armed forces as the government pursued what it hoped would be a final offensive against Savimbi's fighters.

In early 1999 the UN condemned the two combatants, asserting that their desire for a military conclusion to the strife had caused a humanitarian disaster; following the expiration of the mandate of the UN Observer Mission at Angola (UNOMA) on February 26, the peacekeepers were withdrawn. Meanwhile, heavy fighting continued, and by May approximately 10,000 people had been killed and 1 million dislocated.

By mid-1999 UNITA forces had reportedly closed to within 40 miles of Luanda; however, the government unleashed a fierce offensive highlighted by relentless air strikes. Reportedly aided by Western intelligence, government forces captured Bailundo in October, and in December UNITA forces fled from Jamba in the face of a government attack that originated, in part, from Namibia. For its open support of Luanda, Namibia suffered a wave of UNITA attacks. On the political front, President dos Santos continued to reach out to opposition party leaders at Luanda while at the same time remaining adamantly opposed to suggestions that he reopen negotiations with Savimbi.

In March 2000 the Angolan conflict once again captured international attention when the UN Sanctions Committee on Angola issued a report accusing individuals and institutions in nearly a dozen countries of ignoring sanctions against supplying or trading with the UNITA rebels. The document underscored the UN's efforts to tighten the application of sanctions, with the ultimate goal of derailing UNITA's war-making capabilities. (UNITA earlier had suffered another blow to its already severely tarnished image when the Southern African Development Community had formally branded Savimbi as a "war criminal.")

Significantly increased pressure on the government to resume peace negotiations was reported in 2001 from civic and religious groups as well as small opposition parties, a growing number of critics suggesting that the MPLA was using Savimbi and UNITA to distract attention from the administration's long-standing inability to confront the nation's social woes effectively. Savimbi declared himself available for new power-sharing talks, but dos Santos, apparently buoyed by recent military successes, adopted a hard line, demanding that UNITA forces lay down their arms as a precondition to negotiations. By the end of the year, government forces were reportedly in control of more than 90 percent of the country, UNITA having once again been reduced to waging a bush guerrilla campaign.

Savimbi was killed in a government ambush on February 22, 2002. On April 4, two days after the National Assembly had approved an amnesty for all participants in the long-standing civil war who now accepted a negotiated settlement, the government and UNITA signed a cease-fire that provided for disarmament of UNITA, integration of UNITA fighters into the Angolan military, and UNITA's return to normal political party activity.

In August 2002 the UN Security Council authorized the creation of the UN Mission in Angola (UNMA) to assist the government and UNITA in implementing the peace plan. (The UNMA was disbanded in February 2003.) An August 2 ceremony at Luanda formally marked the integration of 5,000 UNITA soldiers into the Angolan army.

Declaring an end to the "exceptional period" that had existed since 1999, President dos Santos on December 6 appointed Fernando Da Piedade Dias DOS SANTOS as prime minister. Collaterally, the administration, UNITA, and small opposition parties reportedly agreed on the delineation of authority between the president and the prime minister. However, the issue of upcoming elections remained unresolved as of early 2006 (see Current issues, below).

Constitution and Government

Under the 1975 constitution as amended, the government was headed by a president who also served as chair of the MPLA. In the event of presidential disability, the MPLA Central Committee was authorized to designate an interim successor, thus reinforcing the role of the party as the people's "legitimate representative." In December 1978 the positions of prime minister and deputy prime minister were abolished, while in November 1980 the legislative Council of the Revolution was replaced as the "supreme organ of state power" by a National People's Assembly, whose members were indirectly designated at meetings of locally elected provincial delegates. (The Council of the Revolution, subsequently renamed the Council of the Republic, continued to function as an advisory body.)

In late 1990 the government committed itself to a new constitution that would permit multiparty presidential and legislative elections. UNITA representatives were invited to help draft the document under the peace accord of June 1, 1991. Thus, on February 1, 1992, UNITA representatives (who boycotted a multiparty conference held January 14–26) agreed with the government that the September election should be held on the basis of proportional representation and that the post-electoral executive should be elected for a five-year term, while the assembly would serve for four years.

On August 26, 1992, the MPLA approved a revised constitution that, in addition to the February 1 stipulations, provided for a presidentially appointed prime minister to head a transitional government, the abolition of the death penalty, and, in keeping with the removal of "People's" from the Republic's formal name, the deletion of all constitutional references to "popular" and "people" as reflecting former Marxist tendencies. A new constitutional committee was established by the assembly in 1998 to address issues such as whether federal governors and the prime minister should be popularly elected and what authority should be invested in the latter. Negotiations between the government and the UNITA-led opposition on a new constitution began following the peace accord of 2002, but progress has continued at a slow pace. By the end of 2004, the National Assembly had abolished the Constitutional Commission (the object of a boycott by the opposition), announcing that constitutional revision would henceforth be handled by a government-dominated assembly committee. The constitution remained in the hands of the assembly in 2005 (see Current issues, below).

The country is divided into 18 provinces (províncias) administered by centrally appointed governors, with legislative authority vested in provincial assemblies. The provinces are further divided into councils (concelhos), communes (comunas), circles (círculos), neighborhoods (bairros), and villages (povoações).

Foreign Relations

On June 23, 1976, the United States exercised its right of veto in the Security Council to block Angolan admission to the United Nations. The stated reason for the action was the continued presence in Angola of a sizable Cuban military force. On November 19, however, the United States reversed itself, citing "the appeals of its African friends," and Angola was admitted on December 1. Senegal, the last black African state to withhold recognition of the MPLA-PT government, announced the establishment of diplomatic relations in February 1982, while the People's Republic of China, long an opponent of the Soviet-supportive regime, established relations in late 1983.

Relations with Portugal were suspended briefly in late 1976 and remained relatively cool prior to a June 1978 agreement providing for the mutual repatriation of Angolan and Portuguese nationals. Subsequently, relations were again strained by allegations of Portuguese-based exile support for UNITA rebels, although efforts were made to restore previously substantial trade links between the two countries.

Relations have fluctuated with neighboring Zaire (restyled the Democratic Republic of the Congo in 1997), which charged the Neto government with providing support for rebel incursions into Shaba (formerly Katanga) Province in March 1977 and May 1978. Shortly thereafter, President Mobutu agreed to end his support for anti-MPLA forces based in Zaire, in return for a similar pledge from President Neto regarding Zairean dissidents sited in Angola. In October 1979 the presidents of Angola, Zaire, and Zambia signed a more extensive trilateral nonaggression pact in Ndola, Zambia. Despite these agreements and a Kinshasa-Luanda security pact signed in early 1985, periodic accusations of Zairean support for Angolan insurgents continued to issue from Luanda.

In the south, Luanda's support for the South West African People's Organisation (SWAPO), which began operating from Angolan bases in the mid-1970s, resulted in numerous cross-border raids by South African defense forces deployed in Namibia. On the other hand, despite periodic encouragement of UNITA and an unwillingness to establish formal relations prior to the withdrawal of Cuban troops, both the Carter and Reagan administrations in the United States made overtures to Luanda, citing the need for Angolan involvement in the Namibian independence process. In early 1985 statements by dos Santos indicating a willingness to negotiate on Cuban troop withdrawal were offered by Washington as evidence of its "constructive engagement" policy in southern Africa; however, all contacts were suspended by Angola later in the year following U.S. congressional repeal of the "Clark Amendment" banning military aid to the insurgents, with repeated military activity by Pretoria having already reduced Luanda's willingness to negotiate. Relations with Washington deteriorated further in 1986, in the wake of a U.S. decision to give UNITA $15 million in military aid, including ground-to-air missiles.

By contrast, a series of meetings that commenced at London in May 1988 concluded at UN headquarters in New York on December 22 with the signing of two accords (one a tripartite agreement between Angola, Cuba, and South Africa, and the other a bilateral agreement among Angola and Cuba) for the phased withdrawal of Cuban forces, coupled with South African acceptance of the 1978 Security Council Resolution 435 that called for UN-supervised elections for an independent Namibia. Under the withdrawal provisions, to be monitored by UNAVEM, half of the Cubans were to leave by November 1989, with the remainder to depart by July 1991. For its part, Pretoria agreed to end military assistance to the UNITA rebels, while insisting that Luanda would be in violation of the accord if it permitted African National Congress (ANC) guerrillas to use its territory as a staging area for infiltration into Botswana, Namibia, or South Africa. (For the Namibia portion of the settlement, see articles on Namibia and South Africa.) In January 1989, three months ahead of schedule, Cuban troops began their withdrawal, although South Africa's apparent adherence to the accord was offset by a reported doubling of U.S. aid to the rebels.

In the wake of the June 1991 peace settlement, Washington pledged $30 million to assist UNITA in its transformation from a military organization into a political party, and, following a September summit meeting between presidents dos Santos and Bush, the United States reiterated its intent to restrict trade and investment until after multiparty elections. Nevertheless, dos Santos, citing a U.S. offer of humanitarian aid, electoral assistance, and the potential for postelection aid, stated that relations had reached a "turning point."

Resurgence of the Angolan civil war in late 1992 revived allegations by both combatants of military and financial intervention by neighboring states. Progovernment officials accused South Africa and Zaire of supporting UNITA efforts, while Namibia challenged UNITA to prove its allegation that Namibian forces were fighting alongside government troops.

Angola's foreign relations in 1993 were dominated by international efforts to thwart UNITA's widely condemned aggression and aid those adversely affected by the civil war. Most dramatically, on May 18 the United States announced its intention to recognize the Luanda government. The U.S. decision came after much exhortation by South Africa and Mozambique, both of whom feared that UNITA's refusal to accept the 1992 poll results might undermine their own election plans. Thereafter, France, Russia, and the United Kingdom announced that they were negotiating arms sales with the government.

Although both the MPLA and UNITA denied involvement in the fighting in Zaire in early 1997, observers there reported that MPLA units had provided at least rearguard and logistical assistance to Laurent Kabila's fighters, while UNITA forces had suffered heavy casualties fighting alongside the Mobutu regime's ultimately unsuccessful defenders. Meanwhile, at Luanda, government officials announced a reordering of their diplomatic priorities, with major emphasis being placed, in order of importance, on relations with the United States, France, and Angola's Asian economic partners. On June 30, 1997, the UNAVEM mandate expired, and its responsibilities were assumed by a new UN Observer Mission at Angola (UNOMA). In late October President dos Santos hosted a summit of the leaders of the Republic of the Congo, Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC), and Gabon during which the four presidents agreed to isolate UNITA as well as the Cabindan guerrillas.

In 1998 Luanda alleged that Burkina Faso, Rwanda, Togo, Uganda, and Zambia were either supplying the UNITA rebels or offering them safe haven. Meanwhile, international attention focused on Angola's prominent role in the civil wars in the DRC and the Republic of the Congo. President dos Santos sought to justify Angola's involvement there as an attempt to help prevent a "bloodbath" and expansion of the fighting. In September, Angola, the DRC, and the Republic of the Congo signed a border security agreement. Meanwhile, Namibia's willingness to let anti-UNITA troops operate from within its borders proved pivotal to Luanda's military successes in late 1999 (see Current issues, below).

In December 1999 the Portuguese legislature approved a "vote of protest" against Angola's ongoing fighting, thus prompting Luanda to register its own complaint that Lisbon was attempting to interfere in its affairs. Thereafter, international attention turned to a UN investigation into alleged efforts by UNITA supporters to circumvent sanctions against supplying or trading with UNITA.

Following the mid-2002 peace accord in Angola, U.S. President George W. Bush welcomed President dos Santos at the White House, underscoring, among other things, the importance of Angolan oil to the United States. At the same time, however, ties between Angola and China intensified, resulting in major Chinese investment in Angolan oil production in 2004.

Current Issues

Almost immediately after the death of UNITA's Jonas Savimbi in February 2002 it became clear that most Angolans were more than ready for the nearly three-decade-long civil war to come to an end. The transformation of UNITA into a functioning political party and the reintegration of UNITA forces into the military and civil society occurred surprisingly swiftly and smoothly. (It was estimated that 500,000–1 million people had died in the conflict, with 4–5 million having been internally or externally displaced.) Attention soon turned to plans for a return to a normal political process, including the writing of a new constitution scheduled to permit national elections, perhaps in 2007. In 2005 the MPLA remained strongly entrenched politically, despite regularly facing charges of corruption and economic mismanagement, particularly in regard to oil revenues. President dos Santos responded to severe criticism from the IMF and others by pledging greater transparency in governmental affairs and other reforms. The administration also embarked, with the assistance of eager foreign investors, on a series of massive projects designed to rebuild the nation's ravaged infrastructure. However, despite the appearance of an economic boom, observers cautioned that poverty and maldistribution of wealth were growing worse rather than better, leaving much of the population still without the basic services generally anticipated in resource-rich countries. In 2005 some 34,500 Angolans were repatriated from Zambia, where they had sought refuge during the civil war, putting a further strain on services.

The government was buffeted by allegations of corruption in 2005, one example being a line of credit from China meant for public works projects that some suggested was being used as a "political slush fund" for the upcoming elections.

Meanwhile, progress toward constitutional reform and elections slowed in 2005 as President dos Santos backed away from his initial affirmation that elections would be held in 2006. Sharp increases in oil revenues helped solidify the current administration's power, enabling it to rebuff opposition parties' attempts to impose political reforms. The constitution remained in the hands of the assembly in early 2006, and it was widely reported that elections would not be held until 2007, with Africa Confidential commenting that the government, by delaying elections a year, could then "steer a new constitution through parliament."

Political Parties

Angola was a one-party state for the first 16 years of its independence; however, in 1990 the government agreed to institute a multiparty electoral system, and, under legislation of March 26, 1991, more than 30 groups expressed interest in achieving formal party status. Thereafter, the imposition of strict registration guidelines limited participation in the September 1992 legislative balloting to 18 parties. (For information on several subsequent pro- and antigovernment coalitions, see the 2000–2002 Handbook.)

Government Parties

Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola (Movimento Popular de Libertação de Angola—MPLA). Organized in 1956, the Soviet-backed MPLA provided the primary resistance to Portuguese colonial rule in central Angola prior to independence. During its first national congress, held at Luanda December 4–11, 1977, the party was formally restructured along Marxist-Leninist lines and redesignated as the MPLA–Labor Party (MPLA–Partido Trabalhista—MPLA-PT).

Reflecting the dos Santos administration's increasingly pragmatic approach to economic problems, the party's second congress in 1985 adopted a resolution promoting several "Western-style" reforms, without, however, altering its alliance with Cuba and the Soviet Union or its hostility to the United States and South Africa regarding the UNITA insurgency (below). At its third congress, held December 4–10, 1990, at Luanda, the MPLA-PT abandoned Marxism-Leninism in favor of "democratic socialism" and endorsed multiparty elections in the wake of a peace settlement with UNITA. In consonance with those decisions, the party decided to drop "Labor Party" from its name prior to the 1992 elections.

Dos Santos was reelected as MPLA president at the 1998 and 2003 congresses, apparently positioning himself at the latter for a run in the presidential elections tentatively scheduled for 2007.

Leaders: José Eduardo DOS SANTOS (President of the Republic and President of the Party), António Domingos Pitra da Costa NETO (Vice President of the Party), Gen. Juliao Mateus PAULO (Secretary General).

National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola—UNITA). Active primarily in southern Angola prior to the Portuguese withdrawal, UNITA, whose support is centered within the Ovimbundu ethnic group, joined with the FNLA (below) in establishing an abortive rival government at Huambo in November 1975 and subsequently engaged in guerrilla operations against Luanda. Although its ideology was of Maoist derivation, the party's image within black Africa suffered because of U.S. and South African military assistance. In late 1982 UNITA leader Jonas SAVIMBI asserted that no basic ideological differences separated UNITA and the MPLA-PT and that the removal of all Cuban troops would lead to negotiations with the government. Although his subsequent avowals of "anti-communism" and increased solicitation of aid from Pretoria and Washington reportedly generated internal dissent, Savimbi remained in control.

In the peace accord of June 1, 1991, UNITA agreed to recognize the legitimacy of the dos Santos government until the holding of multiparty elections in September 1992. In March 1992 two of UNITA's most senior officials, Secretary General Miguel N'ZAU PUNA and Gen. Tony da Costa FERNANDES, left the party, ostensibly to focus on problems involving their native enclave of Cabinda. Late in the month, however, the two issued a statement at Paris charging UNITA with political killings and other human rights abuses. At midyear the party's election hopes were dealt another blow when Savimbi reportedly announced that a UNITA-led government would be composed of only black members, thus exacerbating the fear already existing in the mixed-race and Portuguese communities. Following the September election, Savimbi's rejection of the results and reports of UNITA military activities generated domestic and international condemnation. UNITA officials, however, blamed MPLA supporters for initiating the violence that broke out at Luanda in mid-October. In May 1993 UNITA's rejection of a peace plan that reportedly addressed most of Savimbi's demands appeared to reflect a split within the group between pro-negotiation moderates and fight-to-the-end hard-liners.

Meanwhile, on the diplomatic front, UNITA negotiators rejected demands in 1993 that its troops be withdrawn to their May 1991 positions, claiming that it feared MPLA reprisals against its supporters in the contested areas. In September the rebel leadership agreed to recognize the 1992 elections results. Thereafter, in late 1993 and into 1994 UNITA, propelled by Savimbi's apparently undiminished desire to rule Angola, continued its pattern of simultaneous diplomatic negotiations and military offensives.

On November 15, 1994, UNITA's Secretary General Eugénio Manuvakola signed a truce agreement on behalf of the rebels with the government. However, during a party congress in February 1995, UNITA hard-liners were reported to be dissatisfied with the peace agreement that was to have come into effect on November 22, and Manuvakola was replaced as secretary general by Gen. Paulo Lukamba Gato.

In addition to the four senior cabinet posts awarded the group in April 1997, UNITA representatives were also named to seven deputy ministerial positions. Amid speculation that UNITA was preparing to return to war, reports circulated at midyear that the group's military high command was planning on moving to the panhandle region along the Zambian border. Subsequently, General Manuvakola broke with the group, denouncing its hostile intentions.

Meanwhile, observers reported that a gap had developed between UNITA officials participating in the government at Luanda and those in Savimbi's inner circle, with the former attempting to distance themselves from the latter's confrontational stances. Evidence of the group's factionalization became apparent in February 1998 when the Luanda-based members ignored a Savimbi dictate to vote against a budget proposal. Thereafter, with the country once more poised for civil war, pro-Savimbi UNITA members fled Luanda in July, and, on August 31, the government announced the temporary suspension of UNITA representatives from the government and the assembly. In September Jorge Alicerces Valentim, a UNITA cabinet minister, announced that he and a number of other UNITA ministers and parliamentarians had aligned with General Manuvakola. Furthermore, the dissidents announced the suspension of Savimbi and, under the banner of UNITA-Renewal (UNITA-Renovado), appointed an interim group to lead the party until the convening of its next congress. Thereafter, a third UNITA strain emerged under the leadership of Abel Chivukuvuku, the party's parliamentary leader, and Armindo KASSESSA, both of whom had rejected UNITA-Renewal's entreaties. Chivukuvuku, reportedly popular with both UNITA military leaders and international mediators, in late October was reelected to his legislative post in what observers described as a direct "slap" at Valentim.

At what was labeled UNITA's ninth congress, delegates aligned with UNITA-Renewal convened at Luanda in mid-January 1999 and elected General Manuvakola president of the party. Meanwhile, Savimbi dismissed the Luanda-based factions as "irrelevant." Thereafter, the government intensified its efforts to persuade UNITA militants to disarm and play a role in the political process.

Following Savimbi's death in February 2002, UNITA quickly negotiated an accord with the government that ended the long civil war and provided for the integration of about 5,000 UNITA fighters into the Angolan armed forces. (Some 80,000 other fighters returned to civilian life.) The peace agreement also permitted reunification of the various UNITA factions, General Manuvakola suspending his UNITA-Renewal leadership to facilitate that initiative.

Again acting as a regular political party, UNITA elected its former representative at Paris, Isaias Samakuva, as its new president at a party congress in June 2003. (Samakuva defeated General Gato, who had served as interim leader since Savimbi's death.) In 2004 UNITA announced it was forming a Campaign for a Democratic Angola with some seven small parties in preparation for the next elections. In 2005 Samakuva announced his intention to run for the presidency. Meanwhile, a rift developed in the party after Valentim was removed from his ministry post in early 2005 and was then briefly suspended after publicly criticizing party leaders. He claimed party leaders were delaying his appointment to the assembly, though he was subsequently seated in April 2005.

Leaders: Isaias SAMAKUVA (President), Ernesto MULATO (Vice President), Abel CHIVUKUVUKU, Gen. Paulo Lukamba GATO, Gen. Eugénio MANUVAKOLA, Jorge VALENTIM, Mario VATUVA (Secretary General).

Angolan Democratic Forum (Forum Democrático Angolano—FDA). The FDA was organized by UNITA dissident and peace activist Jorge Chicoti to protest human rights abuses by the parent group and was registered in February 1992. Its ranks included a number of Angolan students overseas. The FDA secured one assembly seat in the September 1992 balloting.

The FDA's Paulo Tjipilica held the justice ministry in the MPLA-led cabinet until late 2004 and he was subsequently named the country's first "justice and ombudsman." Meanwhile, Chicoti continued to serve as deputy minister of foreign affairs.

Leaders: Jorge Rebelo Pinto CHICOTI (President), Paulo TJIPILICA, Manuel Adão DOMINGOS (Secretary General).

Other Parties

National Front for the Liberation of Angola (Frente Nacional para a Libertação de Angola—FNLA). Organized as a resistance group in 1962 in northern Angola, the FNLA was consistently the most anticommunist of the three major groups until the collapse of its forces in the late 1970s.

The FNLA was inactive throughout most of the 1980s; however, in 1991 longtime leader Holden Roberto announced his intention to seek the presidency and stated that the FNLA deserved to be accorded its earlier de facto parity with the MPLA-PT and UNITA. Nevertheless, at presidential and legislative balloting in September 1992 the FNLA fared poorly, with Roberto being held to 2.11 percent of the presidential vote and the party securing only five assembly seats.

At the FNLA's second congress in February 1999, delegates elected Lucas Ngonda party president. In addition, the party held balloting to fill its Central Committee and declared its willingness to participate in the government. The October 2004 congress reportedly agreed to have Roberto lead the party for the next ten months in an apparent effort to smooth over lingering friction between the FNLA's old guard and younger members. However, friction resumed in 2005 with division over Roberto's suspension of Secretary General Francisco MENDES in September, and the majority's discontent with Roberto's failure to hold another congress to elect new leadership. Roberto, however, maintained his leadership position.

Leaders: Holden ROBERTO (Party Leader), Lucas NGONDA and Ngola KABANGO (Deputy Leaders).

Social Renewal Party (Partido Renovador Social—PRS). The PRS finished third at the legislative balloting of September 1992 by winning six assembly seats.

At a congress in March 1999 Eduardo Kwangana was reportedly elected to lead the PRS; however, the incumbent party chief, António João Machicungo, rejected the polling, arguing that Kwangana's supporters had ignored party statutes in an effort to gain control of the grouping.

Leaders: António João MACHICUNGO, Eduardo KWANGANA, Lindo Bernardo TITO (Chair).

Democratic Renewal Party (Partido Renovador Democrático—PRD). The PRD was formed by survivors and sympathizers of the dissident Nito ALVES faction of the MPLA-PT, whose abortive 1977 coup attempt led to a violent purge of the parent party leadership. In September 1991 the PRD was the first party sanctioned by the Supreme Court to begin gathering the signatures necessary to secure legal status.

Leaders: Luís da Silva DOS PASSOS (President and 1992 presidential candidate), Noy da COSTA (Secretary General).

Liberal Democratic Party (Partido Liberal Democrático—PLD). The PLD won three legislative seats at the 1992 poll, party leader Anália de Victoria Pereira finishing tenth in the eleven-candidate presidential field. Pereira was renominated as party leader in July 2005 and was considered a possible candidate for the presidency in the next election.

Leaders: Anália de Victoria PEREIRA, Honorato LANDO.

Angolan National Democratic Party (Partido Nacional Democrático de Angola—PNDA). Originally styled the Angolan National Democratic Convention (Convenção Nacional Democrática de Angola—CNDA), the PNDA in September 1992 supported the presidential candidacy of Daniel Julio CHIPENDA, an independent who had reportedly left the MPLA in protest over the party's decision to present dos Santos as its standard-bearer. Chipenda captured only .52 percent of the presidential vote, with the PNDA winning one assembly seat.

At the party's national conference held May 23–24, 1997, delegates elected a new Central Committee and Political Bureau.

Leader: Geraldo Pereira João da SILVA (President).

Democratic Alliance of Angola (Aliança Democrática de Angola—ADA). Although garnering less than 1 percent of the vote, the ADA was able to win one assembly seat in September 1992.

Leader: Simba da COSTA.

Democratic Party for Progress—Angolan National Alliance (Partido Democrático para Progresso—Aliança Nacional Angolano—PDP-ANA). The PDP-ANA is a right-of-center humanist grouping previously led by a prominent university professor, Mfulumpinga Lando VICTOR, who was formerly affiliated with the FNLA. In mid-1992 Victor was named as a presidential candidate; however, there were no reports of his having received any votes in the September balloting, at which the party secured one assembly seat. Victor, a prominent opposition leader, was killed by unidentified gunmen in an attack at Luanda in July 2004. Sediangani Mbimbi, who had been acting president, was elected president of the party in April 2005, defeating Malungo Belo.

Leaders: Sediangani MBIMBI (Acting President), Malungo BELO.

Party of the Alliance of the Youth, Workers, and Farmers of Angola (Partido da Aliança da Juventude, Operários e Camponeses de Angola—PAJOCA). The PAJOCA won one seat at the legislative poll of September 1992.

Leader: Alexandre Sebastião ANDRE.

Social Democratic Party (Partido Social Democrático—PSD). The PSD secured one assembly seat in September 1992, while its presidential candidate, Bengue Pedro João, won less than 1 percent of the presidential vote.

Leaders: Bengue Pedro JOÃO, Dr. José Manuel MIGUEL.

Angolan Democratic Party (Partido Democrático Angolano—PDA). PDA leader António Alberto Neto finished third in the September 1992 presidential balloting, albeit with a vote share of 2.16 percent, far behind dos Santos and Savimbi.

Leader: António Alberto NETO.

Angolan Labor Party (Partido Trabalhista Angolano—PTA). The PTA was legalized in March 1995.

Leader: Angostinho PALDO.

Social Democratic Center (Centro Democrático Social—CDS). The CDS was legalized in November 1995.

Leaders: Mateus JOSE (President), Delfina Francisco CAPCIEL (Secretary General).

United Front for the Salvation of Angola (Frente Unida para a Salvação de Angola—FUSA). The FUSA was granted official registration by the Supreme Court in April 1996.

Leader: José Augusto da Silva COELHO (President).

Angola Democratic and Progress Support Party (Partido de Apoio Democrático e Progresso de Angola—PADPA). The PADPA's unsuccessful effort to organize a demonstration against a fuel-price hike in early 2000 was cited by observers as the impetus for a larger protest march soon thereafter. In August 2005 a senior party member was sentenced to 45 days in prison for an unauthorized protest outside parliament after his party was excluded from a panel set to supervise the next elections.

Leaders: Carlos LEITAO (President), Silva CARDOSA (Secretary General).

Minor parties also include the antiseparatist Angolan Party of African Identity Conservative (Partido Angolano de Conservadora Identidade Africana—PACIA); the Angolan Democratic Party for Peace (Partido Democrático de Paz de Angola—PDPA); the Angolan Democratic Unity Movement for Reconstruction (Movimento Angolano de Unidade Democrática para a Reconstrução—MAUDR); the Angolan Liberal Party (Partido Angolano Liberal—PAL); the Angolan Independent Party (Partido Angolano Independente—PAI); the Angolan National Ecological Party (Partido Nacional Ecológico de Angola—PNEA); the Angolan Social Democratic Party (Partido Social Democrático de Angola—PSDA); the Front for Democracy (Frente para a Democracia—FPD), led by Filomena Viera LOPES; and the National Union for the Light of Democracy and Development in Angola (União Nacional para a Luz de Democracia e Desenvolvimento em Angola—UNLDDA).

Separatist Groups

Since the early 1960s a number of groups have been active under the banner of the Front for the Liberation of the Cabinda Enclave (Frente de Libertação do Enclave de Cabinda—FLEC) in the oil-rich province of Cabinda, a sliver (7,300 sq. km.) of land between the Republic of the Congo and what is now the Democratic Republic of the Congo (formerly Zaire). The original FLEC was founded in August 1963 by Luis Ranque FRANQUE, who, encouraged by Portuguese authorities to continue separatist activities, refused to join other Angolan independence movements. In 1974 the Front's attempts to gain military control of the enclave were rebuffed by the MPLA and, in 1975, the movement broke into three factions: FLEC–Ranque Franque; FLEC–N'Zita, led by Henrique Tiaho N'ZITA; and FLEC–Lubota, led by Francisco Xavier LUBOTA. In November 1977 a splinter group styling itself the Military Command for the Liberation of Cabinda was organized, while in June 1979 the Armed Forces for the Liberation of Cabinda established another splinter, the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Cabinda (Movimento Popular de Libertação de Cabinda—MPLC). In the 1980s FLEC–UNITA, or UNIFLEC, was reported to be operating in Cabinda with South African assistance; however, the group's activities ceased following withdrawal of Pretoria's aid. In the early 1990s two other groups, the National Union for the Liberation of Cabinda (União Nacional de Libertação de Cabinda—UNLC), led by Lumingo Luís Caneiro GIMBY, and the Communist Committee of Cabinda (Comité Comunista de Cabinda—CCC), led by Kaya Mohamed YAY, were linked to separatist activities.

Anxious to create ties to the economically important region, both the government and UNITA named Cabindans to leadership positions in their parties. Nevertheless, in July 1991 a joint MPLA-PT/UNITA offensive was launched in Cabinda to eradicate the terrorists. Meanwhile, although past attempts to unify the numerous FLEC factions had proven short-lived, it was reported that four of the identifiable groups (FLEC–Lubota, the UNLC, CCC, and FLEC–R [Renovada]) were attempting to form a united front, FLEC N'Zita reportedly refusing to participate.

In mid-May 1993 FLEC responded to the U.S. recognition of Luanda by declaring that it did not extend to Cabinda and warning that “all those people with companies in Cabinda must choose between supporting the extermination of the Cabindan people or leaving the territory.” Following UNITA’s capture of Soyo in northwestern Angola in late May, the government, fearing a pact between the separatists and rebels, was reported to be attempting to form an alliance with a FLEC-R opponent, the FLEC-Armed Forces of Cabinda (Forças Armadas de Cabinda—FLEC-FAC), which was reportedly being led by Henrique Tiaho N’Zita, his son, Emmanuel N’ZITA, and José Liberal NUNO. However, after a new guerrilla offensive in Cabinda from mid-1995, government and FLEC-R representatives meeting at Windhoek, Namibia, in April 1996 concluded a cease-fire agreement that was thought likely to be observed by the other FLEC factions. Such optimism proved ungrounded, however, as the government was subsequently unable to reach an agreement with the FLEC-FAC or Francisco Xavier Lubota’s Democratic Front of Cabinda (Frente Democrática de Cabinda—FDC).

In September 1996 FLEC-R’s Central Council advised its president, Jose Tiburcio LUEMBA, and a second party leader, Jorge Victor GOMES, not to attend a meeting at Brazzaville, Congo, with government officials. Their decision to ignore the committee led to their ouster at an extraordinary general assembly meeting on January 24, 1997. Subsequently, Antonio Bento BEMBE, theretofore party secretary general, and Arture TCHIBASSA, described by Africa Confidential as the group’s “founder and most powerful leader,” were named party president and secretary general, respectively.

Meanwhile, in early 1997 heightened military and political activity was reported in the enclave as the government launched an offensive reportedly aimed at dismantling the military capabilities of the separatists. Its cease-fire having formally lapsed in January, the FLEC-R’s newly installed, more militant leadership also acknowledged having increased its military operations. In 1998 skirmishes between the militants and government forces reportedly intensified as the latter sought to neutralize its opponents (both FLEC and UNITA) in the region. Both FLEC-FAC and FLEC-R were reportedly involved in hostage-taking between 2000 and 2001, analysts suggesting that the proliferation of FLEC-related groupings had resulted in confusion among Cabinda’s 400,000 inhabitants, most of whom apparently would opt for independence or at least autonomy if offered a choice.

The Angolan government launched what was reportedly considered a successful campaign against the Cabindan fighters in late 2002, following conclusion of the peace accord with the much larger UNITA forces. However, tension regarding “the forgotten war” continued into 2005. By that time FLEC-R and FLEC-FAC had reportedly agreed to operate together as FLEC, with Tiaho N’Zita as the group’s leader and Bembe as secretary general. Although FLEC apparently indicated a willingness to negotiate with the government, no cease-fire had been achieved by February 2005, when a mass rally in Cabinda again underscored popular support for “self-rule.” Meanwhile, an unprecedented strike by Catholic clergy fueled further unrest in 2005 after the Vatican sought to replace a retiring bishop with a non-Cabindan.

In a setback to FLEC, Bembe was arrested in mid-2005 in the Netherlands, where he had been invited by the Dutch foreign ministry to participate in peace negotiations regarding the situation in Cabinda. Bembe, who was arrested for his alleged role in the kidnapping of an American oil company employee several years earlier, was released on bail but subsequently disappeared near the end of 2005. Many observers suspected Bembe was taken to the United States, though the Dutch had denied a U.S. request for extradition. Meanwhile, Tchibassa was serving a 24-year sentence in the United States on the same charge.

successor to the Council of the Revolution, which had served as a legislature since formation of the republic. Subsequent balloting was deferred until late 1986, when the legislative term was extended to five years and the number of deputies increased to 289. The list of candidates, all members of the MPLA-PT, was drawn up by the assembly's Permanent Commission.

In late 1990 the MPLA-PT approved liberalization measures providing for election of a restyled National Assembly (Assembleia Nacional) on a multiparty basis. Following balloting held September 29–30, 1992, for 220 seats (three seats reserved for overseas Angolans not being filled by mutual agreement of the parties), the distribution was as follows: Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola, 129; National Union for the Total Independence of Angola, 70; Social Renewal Party, 6; National Front for the Liberation of Angola, 5; Liberal Democratic Party, 3; and Angolan Democratic Forum, Angolan National Democratic Party, Democratic Alliance of Angola, Democratic Party for Progress—Angolan National Alliance, Democratic Renewal Party, Party of the Alliance of the Youth, Workers, and Farmers of Angola, and the Social Democratic Party, 1 each.

On November 13, 1996, the assembly overwhelmingly approved a constitutional revision extending the current legislature's mandate (due to expire on November 26) for a minimum of two and a maximum of four years. On April 9, 1997, the assembly met for the first time with the full complement of UNITA representatives in attendance. However, the status of the UNITA contingent became clouded in 1998 as relations between UNITA and the government deteriorated. The government announced on August 31, 1998, that the UNITA legislators had been suspended; however, many were subsequently permitted to re-assume their seats under an agreement between the government and UNITA-Renewal, the new UNITA faction opposed to longtime UNITA leader Jonas Savimbi. At the same time, some of the UNITA legislators restated their allegiance to Savimbi. Following Savimbi's death in February 2002, the UNITA factions reunified as part of the broad peace accord with the government.

The government in 2004 announced plans to hold new assembly balloting in September 2006. (The assembly had again extended its own mandate for an indefinite period on October 17, 2000.) However, balloting was subsequently put off until 2007.

Communications

Press

Following nationalization of the press in 1976, the government required all news disseminated by the media to conform to official policy. The government announced that press liberalization would be addressed in the course of a constitutional review launched in late 1990. However, domestic and international watchdog groups strongly criticized the government between 2000 and 2001 for tightening controls on the media and otherwise pressuring journalists. The negotiation of a proposed new press law was one of the major areas of disagreement between the government and opposition parties in 2004 as plans were made for the next national elections. However, in February 2006 the National Assembly approved the new press law, granting freedom of the press by prohibiting censorship and revoking the state's monopoly over television and news agencies. It was not immediately clear who would operate these media outlets.

The following are Portuguese-language dailies published at Luanda: O Jornal de Angola (42,000); Diário da República (8,500), government news sheet. Correio da Semana, a weekly, is published at Luanda by the owners of O Jornal.

News Agencies

The domestic facility is the formerly government-operated Angolan News Agency (Agência Noticiosa N'gola Press—ANGOP). A limited number of foreign agencies maintain offices at Luanda.

Broadcasting and Computing

The principal broadcasting services are Radio Nacional de Angola and Televisão Popular de Angola, both formerly controlled by the government.

There were approximately 417,000 television receivers and 35,000 personal computers serving 49,000 Internet users in 2003.

REPUBLIC OF BENIN

République du Bénin

The Country

The elongated West African state of Benin (formerly Dahomey) lies between Togo and Nigeria, with a southern frontage on the South Atlantic and a northerly bulge contiguous with Burkina Faso and Niger. The country's population exhibits a highly complex ethnolinguistic structure, the majority falling within four major tribal divisions: Adja, Bariba, Fon, and Yoruba. The principal tribal languages are Fon and Yoruba in the south and Bariba and Fulani in the north. Approximately 70 percent of the people are animists, the remainder being almost equally divided between Christians (concentrated in the south) and Muslims (concentrated in the north). The labor force includes nearly three-quarters of the adult female population, concentrated primarily in the cultivation of subsistence crops. Female participation in government has traditionally been minimal; the first female cabinet member was named in 1989.

Benin is one of the world's poorest countries, with an average per capita income of only $3 per day. It has been reported recently that 60 percent of adults are illiterate, while only 50 percent of school-age children attend school. The country also ranks near the bottom in other "quality of life" measures. The economy is based primarily on agriculture, with cotton, cocoa, and various oilseeds serving as principal sources of foreign exchange. Most of its quite limited industrial development supports cotton and palm-oil production. Its major trading partner, France, subsidizes current expenses as well as basic development. Black-market activity is widespread, and contraband trade, especially with Nigeria, is a significant source of income for many Beninois. Small deposits of oil and gas have been located, although exploitation has been minimal and significant impact from that sector on the economy is not currently anticipated.

The government adopted a strongly Marxist orientation in the mid-1970s but thereafter moved to privatize a number of state-run companies in an effort to counter high external debt, corruption, and severe economic stagnation. In addition, wide-ranging austerity measures were adopted, facilitating international aid agreements but also contributing to social unrest. In 1998 the International Monetary Fund (IMF) reported that Benin's

Political Status: Independent Republic of Dahomey established August 1, 1960; military regime established October 26, 1972, becoming Marxist one-party system 1972–1975; name changed to People’s Republic of Benin on November 30, 1975; name changed further to Republic of Benin on February 28, 1990, by National Conference of Active Forces of the Nation, which also revoked constitution of August 1977; multiparty constitution approved by popular referendum on December 2, 1990.

Area: 43,483 sq. mi. (112,622 sq. km.).

Population: 6,752,569 (2002C); 7,107,000 (2005E).

Major Urban Centers (2005E): PORTO NOVO (240,000), Cotonou (789,000).

Official Language: French.

Monetary Unit: CFA Franc (market rate July 1, 2006: 513.01 francs = $1US). (The CFA franc, previously pegged to the French franc, is now permanently pegged to the euro at 655.957 francs = 1 euro.)

President: Boni YAYI (nonparty); elected in second-round balloting on March 19, 2006, and inaugurated on April 6 to succeed Brig. Gen. (Ret.) Mathieu KÉRÉKOU.

Prime Minister: (Vacant). (Adrien HOUNGBÉDJI [Party of Democratic Renewal] had been appointed prime minister by the president on April 8, 1996; however, following Houngbédji’s resignation on May 8, 1998, President Kérékou did not name a successor, the post not being constitutionally required. President Yayi also did not include a prime minister in the cabinet he named in April 2006.)

implementation of a structural adjustment program in the mid-1990s had resulted in “real income growth, a decline in inflation, and a reduction in internal and external imbalances.” In August 1999 the IMF approved the release of further economic credits to Benin, citing the government’s commitment to maintaining a “stable macroeconomic framework” as one of the reasons for “robust”

GDP growth. Additional debt relief was announced in mid-2000, although concern was expressed in some quarters that the nation’s poor were not benefiting from economic advancement. In that context, opposition surfaced to IMF/World Bank insistence on further privatization of state-controlled enterprises, particularly in the cotton and power sectors, out of fear for the loss of jobs and an increase in prices. GDP growth averaged more than 5 percent annually from 2000 through 2003, and in 2003 the World Bank approved $460 million in debt relief for Benin, in part due to economic reforms, including improved tax collection, instituted by the government. However, growth subsequently declined (to 2.7 percent in 2004) under the effect of rising oil and food prices and falling prices for cotton on the global market. In the opinion of many observers, potential economic development was the dominant concern among voters in the 2006 presidential elections (see Current issues, below).

Political Background

Under French influence since the mid-19th century, the territory then known as Dahomey became self-governing within the French Community in December 1958. However, Dahomey permitted its Community status to lapse upon achieving full independence on August 1, 1960. During the next 12 years personal and regional animosities generated five military coups d’état, most of them interspersed with short-lived civilian regimes.

The country’s first president, Hubert MAGA, was overthrown in October 1963 by Col. Christophe SOGLO, who served as interim head of state until the election in January 1964 of Sourou-Migan APITHY. In December 1965, after a series of political crises and a general disruption of civilian government, Soglo again assumed power as president of a military-backed regime. Another military coup, led by Maj. Maurice KOUANDÉTÉ on December 17, 1967, ousted Soglo and established an interim regime under Lt. Col. Alphonse ALLEY. Following an abortive attempt at a new election in May 1968, the former foreign minister, Dr. Émile-Derlin ZINSOU, was appointed president of a civilian administration. In December 1969 the Zinsou government was overthrown by Kouandété, and military rule was reinstated. After another failed election in March 1970, the military established a civilian regime based on the collective leadership (Presidential Council) of the country's three leading politicians: Justin AHOMADEGBE, Apithy, and Maga. On October 26, 1972, following an unsuccessful coup attempt by Kouandété in February, the triumvirate was overthrown by (then) Maj. Mathieu KÉRÉKOU. The new president abolished the Presidential Council and Consultative Assembly and established a Military Council of the Revolution committed to a division of posts on the basis of regional equality.

On December 3, 1974, President Kérékou declared that Dahomey was to become a "Marxist-Leninist state," and two days later he announced that the nation's banks, insurance companies, and oil distribution facilities would be nationalized. Subsequently, he ordered the establishment of "Defense of the Revolution Committees" in all businesses to "protect the revolution from sabotage." On November 30, 1975, the country was styled a "people's republic" (to reflect the ideology officially embraced a year earlier) and was renamed Benin, after an African kingdom that had flourished in the Gulf of Guinea in the 17th century. The Benin People's Revolutionary Party (Parti de la Révolution Populaire du Bénin—PRPB) was established as the nucleus of a one-party system the following month. In August 1977 a new basic law was promulgated to reflect a commitment to three stages of development: a "revolutionary national liberation movement," a "democratic people's revolution," and a "socialist revolution."

In January 1977 a group of mercenaries had been repulsed by government forces in a brief but pitched battle in Cotonou. A UN mission of inquiry subsequently reported that the invaders had been flown in from Gabon under the command of an adviser to Gabonese President Bongo. The incident provoked an angry exchange between Presidents Kérékou and Bongo at a summit of the Organization for African Unity (OAU) in July 1978, after which Bongo ordered the expulsion of some 6,000 Benin nationals from Gabon. Most of the mercenaries as well as 11 Benin "traitors" (including former president Zinsou in absentia) were condemned to death in May 1979.

President Kérékou was redesignated for a five-year term as head of state and government on July 31, 1984, having launched a government austerity program that included the proposed privatization of many parastatal enterprises that had not responded to a recent campaign to improve efficiency and curtail corruption. Economic difficulties continued, however, forcing further cutbacks in government spending, which in turn precipitated serious university disturbances in mid-1985.

Unrest intensified among students, teachers, and civil servants in early 1989 as the government, facing a severe cash shortage, withheld scholarship and salary checks. The PRPB nonetheless maintained complete control of legislative balloting on June 18, the single list that was advanced being credited with 89.6 percent voter approval. Subsequently, on August 2, Kérékou, the sole candidate, was reelected to another five-year presidential term by a reported 192–2 assembly vote.

In response to continued difficulties that included damaging charges of official corruption and widespread opposition to an IMF-mandated structural adjustment program, the government convened an unprecedented joint session of the PRPB Central Committee, the National Revolutionary Assembly Standing Committee, and the National Executive Council (cabinet) in late 1989. That meeting followed the lead of Eastern-bloc countries by abandoning formal adherence to Marxism-Leninism. It also called for a national conference in early 1990 to consider constitutional reforms. The resultant National Conference of Active Forces of the Nation (Conférence Nationale des Forces Vivres du Pays) met on February 19–28, 1990. Assuming the unexpected posture of a "sovereign" body, the conference revoked the 1977 basic law, dropped the word "People's" from the country's official name, dissolved the existing legislature, and named Nicéphore SOGLO, a former World Bank official, as interim prime minister pending the formation of a "transitional government." Kérékou, after initially terming the proceedings a “civilian coup d’état,” endorsed the conference’s decisions and was designated to remain head of state with the defense portfolio (but not command of the armed forces) removed from his jurisdiction.

A 50-member High Council of the Republic (Haut Conseil de la République—HCR) was installed on March 9, 1990, to replace the former National Revolutionary Assembly; three days later a new government, containing no carryovers from the previous administration, was announced. In April the preliminary text of a new constitution providing for a multiparty system was submitted to the HCR. After being presented for public comment and revision, it was approved by a reported 80 percent of those participating in a December 2 referendum.

At parliamentary balloting on February 17, 1991, none of two dozen competing parties secured a majority, the leading party winning only 11 of 64 seats. Subsequently, at a second-round presidential poll on March 24, Prime Minister Soglo was elected president, defeating Kérékou, who became the first incumbent chief executive in mainland Africa to fail in a reelection bid. General Kérékou’s decision to run for reelection had been unexpected, having been announced less than a month before the presidential balloting. In an unusual appeal to the electorate, he had asked “forgiveness” from those who had suffered from “deplorable and regrettable incidents” during his 17 years of military-Marxist rule. The transitional government, in one of its concluding actions, responded to the mea culpa by granting immunity to Kérékou for any crimes committed while in office.

Hindered by the lack of an assembly majority, the Soglo administration’s first year was marked by legislative inaction interspersed by confrontations with assembly president and former presidential candidate Adrien HOUNGBÉDJI. In June 1992 President Soglo secured his first assembly majority when the progovernment legislative bloc, styled Renewal, was expanded from 21 to 34 deputies from ten different parties. However, on October 11, 1993, the administration was dealt a setback when 15 members of Renewal quit the group to form a new coalition styled the Independents, thus shattering the president’s 16-month-old legislative majority.

First results of the legislative election of March 28, 1995, showed opponents of the president with a majority of seats. After repolling in 13 constituencies on May 28, the opposition held a 16-seat advantage in the assembly.

On January 17, 1996, the assembly rejected the administration’s 1996 budget, and, in response, Soglo issued an edict enacting the budget, insisting that failure to implement his plan would imperil approximately $500 million of international assistance. Shortly thereafter, former president Kérékou announced his intention to contest the presidential elections scheduled for March, alleging that the incumbent’s economic policies had devastated Benin’s poor. Kérékou joined a field of seven other contenders, including Soglo; former assembly president Houngbédji of the Party of Democratic Renewal (Parti du Renouveau Démocratique—PRD); and Bruno AMOUSSOU, Houngbédji’s assembly successor and leader of the Social Democratic Party (Parti Social-Démocrate—PSD).

President Soglo secured a slim lead over Kérékou (35.69 percent to 33.94) in the first round of presidential balloting on March 3, 1996. However, both Houngbédji and Amoussou, third and fourth place finishers, respectively, urged their parties to support Kérékou, and at second-round balloting on March 18 the former president was returned to power with a vote share of 52.49 percent. On April 1 the Constitutional Court rejected Soglo’s claim that he had been the victim of polling fraud and a “vast international plot,” and on April 6 Kérékou was officially inaugurated. (An inaugural ceremony on April 4 had been ruled inadmissible because Kérékou had failed to recite the entire vow.) On April 8 the new president named an 18-member government headed by Houngbédji in the reestablished post of prime minister. Houngbédji’s PRD controlled the most cabinet portfolios, with four, while Amoussou’s PSD was second, with three.

In early May 1998 Kérékou met with the leaders of a number of small opposition parties and reportedly pledged to increase their representation in his government. On May 8 Prime Minister Houngbédji and his PRD colleagues quit the government amid speculation that they were about to be demoted in a cabinet reshuffling. Six days later the president named a new government that did not include a prime minister.

At legislative balloting on March 30, 1999, opponents of the president, led by Soglo's Benin Renaissance Party (Parti de la Renaissance du Bénin—PRB) and the PRD, captured a one-seat majority (42 to 41) in the assembly. (The PRB, PRD, and their allies performed well in the pivotal capital region, while supporters of President Kérékou dominated balloting in the north.) Confronted with a choice between assuming their newly won legislative seats or remaining in the government, six legislators-elect subsequently quit their cabinet posts. On June 22 Kérékou named a new government that included representatives from ten presidential-supportive parties (up from seven). The PSD controlled the most posts (four), followed by the Action Front for Renewal and Development-Alafia (Front Action pour la Renouveau et le Développement-Alafia—FARD-Alafia), which assumed two. No opposition members were included in the cabinet.

Seventeen candidates contested the first round of presidential balloting on March 4, 2001, with Kérékou finishing first with 45 percent of the vote, followed by Soglo (27 percent), Houngbédji (13 percent), and Amoussou (8 percent). However, Soglo challenged the results of the first round and refused to participate in the runoff, as did Houngbédji. Consequently, the balloting on March 22 pitted Kérékou against Amoussou, with the president easily winning another term by an 84–16 percent vote.

Significant economic growth and increased political stability appeared to solidify Kérékou's popularity prior to the March 30, 2003, National Assembly balloting, at which pro-presidential parties won 52 of 83 seats. Kérékou replaced about half the ministers in a June reshuffle, but he again declined to appoint a prime minister.

In the first round of presidential balloting on March 5, 2006, Boni YAYI, a prominent economist and regional banking executive, led 26 candidates with 35.6 percent of the vote. He was followed by Houngbédji (24 percent), Amoussou (15.3 percent), and Léhady Soglo (the son of former president Soglo), who secured 8.5 percent of the vote. Yayi scored a landslide victory over Houngbédji in the runoff on March 19 with 75 percent of the vote. The new cabinet, appointed on April 8, comprised a number of technocrats, although the PSD and PRB also were reportedly represented.

Constitution and Government

The Marxist-inspired Loi Fondamentale of 1977 was rescinded in February 1990 by the National Conference, which authorized the formation of the High Council of the Republic (HCR) to exercise legislative power during the transition to a new regime. The constitution approved by referendum on December 2, 1990, instituted a multiparty presidential system headed by an executive elected for a five-year, once-renewable term, with National Assembly deputies serving four-year terms. (Presidential candidates must be between 40 and 70 years of age and have been a citizen for 10 years.) The new basic law also provided for a Constitutional Court, a Supreme Court, a High Court of Justice, an Economic and Social Council, and an Audiovisual Authority.

The country is divided into 12 provinces (6 prior to 1997), which are subdivided into 86 districts and 510 communes. Local administration is assigned to elected provincial, district, town, and village councils.

Foreign Relations

Throughout the Cold War era Benin adhered to a nonaligned posture, maintaining relations with a variety of both Communist and Western governments. Traditionally strong military and economic ties with France were reaffirmed during meetings in 1981 and 1983 between Presidents Kérékou and Mitterrand, following a revision of treaty relations in 1975.

Although its early regional links were primarily with other francophone states, Benin later sought to consolidate its interests with the broader African community. Relations with Lagos, initially strained by Nigeria's expulsion of foreign workers in the mid-1980s, subsequently improved to the point that Kérékou felt obliged in July 1990 to deny rumors that Benin was to become Nigeria's 22nd state.

Benin has been a strong supporter of multilateral development through the Economic Community of West African States, while bilateral ventures have been initiated with Ghana, Mauritania, and Togo. However, in early 1993 Benin's border with Togo was temporarily closed following an alleged attack on the private residence of Togo's President Eyadéma, although the rebels escaped into Ghana. By late March some 70–150 Togolese officers had reportedly arrived in Porto Novo claiming they were fleeing a purge of army personnel.

In March 1996 Nigeria closed its border with Benin, alleging that Porto Novo had failed to give notice prior to its own recent election-day closures and accusing Benin's security forces of illegal crossings. However, the border was reopened and relations smoothed when newly elected president Kérékou and his Nigerian counterpart, Gen. Sani Abacha, signed a cooperation agreement in April. Subsequent trade between the two countries allegedly occurred primarily in the "informal sector dominated by smuggling and unrecorded business," and in early 2000 Nigeria urged Benin to remove the remaining "obstacles to free trade."

A confrontation developed between Benin and Niger in mid-2000 over Lété and some 25 other islands in the Niger River, where sovereignty has been disputed for four decades. In April 2002 the two countries agreed to submit the case to the International Court of Justice, although the two countries in June had reached a tentative agreement to redraw the border to settle other disputes. Improved relations also were apparent in the initiation of joint border patrols and an agreement among Benin, Ghana, Nigeria, and Togo to build an oil pipeline through their countries. On a negative regional note, Chad severed economic ties with Benin in 2003 after Benin's government granted asylum to a group of exiled Chadian opposition figures.

Relations between Benin and the United States underwent a dramatic improvement in 2003 when the two countries agreed to cooperate on security and military issues. (The United States also announced more than $300 million in aid in early 2006 for port rehabilitation and the promotion of small businesses.) Benin also has recently become more involved in regional security, participating in several recent regional peacekeeping missions, including those in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Liberia, and Côte d'Ivoire.

In July 2005 the ICJ allocated Lété (the most important of the disputed islands) to Niger, along with 15 of the other 25 islands. Also in 2005, Nigeria agreed to cede seven villages along its disputed border with Benin to Benin; collaterally, Benin ceded three villages to Nigeria. Meanwhile, a border dispute resurfaced between Benin and Burkina Faso, with Benin claiming sovereignty over territory beyond the Pendjari River. Burkina Faso contended the river constituted the border.

Current Issues

Supporters of the president appeared to win about 50 percent of the seats in the local elections of December 2002 and January 2003, the country's continuing north–south split remaining apparent in opposition mayoral victories in Cotonou (by former president Soglo of the PRB) and in Porto Nova (by former assembly president Houngbédji of the PRD). However, the Kérékou camp broke through the long-standing 50–50 electoral stalemate by winning 52 of 83 seats in the March 2003 assembly balloting, which marked the first time since 1990 that a president could count on a solid legislative majority.

Some observers worried that President Kérékou (constitutionally precluded from seeking a third term in 2006) might attempt to extend his tenure, particularly when he announced that the government did not have sufficient funds to conduct the March balloting. However, Kérékou ultimately accepted a peaceful democratic transition, resisting (apparently under heavy European pressure) the "temptation" to which a number of West African leaders had recently succumbed to remain in power through heavy-handed measures. With both Kérékou (Benin's leader for 28 of the last 33 years) and Soglo (precluded from another presidential bid because of his age) out of the picture, the campaign drew 26 hopefuls, including a number of independents who apparently believed that the electorate was ready to move beyond oldtime politics and concentrate on the troubled economy. Among the independents was Boni YAYI, who recently had resigned after 12 years as head of the West African Development Bank. The political newcomer pledged to combat corruption, promote small- and medium-sized businesses (particularly in the food-processing sector), and increase budget allocations for education and youth employment programs. His landslide victory also was attributed in part to the fact that he was of mixed tribal descent, had been born in the country's "middle belt," and was a Christian from a predominantly Muslim family, which helped him bridge the ethnic, geographic, and religious divides so prevalent in previous elections. In addition, Yayi, an economic advisor in the Soglo administration in the early 1990s, was viewed as a "modernizer" whose regional contacts would prove useful in helping Benin to deal with its "economically aggressive" neighbors (most notably Nigeria).

Among other things, the 2006 presidential results were seen as a severe blow to the traditional political class. Perhaps as part of an effort by traditional power-brokers to recover some of their lost influence, the assembly in June 2006 extended its term from 2007 to 2008, ostensibly to permit joint national and municipal balloting and thereby save budget resources.

Political Parties

On April 30, 1990, at the conclusion of a closed-door congress at Cotonou, the ruling Benin People's Revolutionary Party (Parti de la Révolution Populaire du Bénin—PRPB) voted to dissolve itself. The PRPB had been the country's only authorized political formation from its December 1975 founding until installation of the Soglo government in March 1990. Delegates to the congress approved the launching of a new grouping, the Union of the Forces of Progress, to replace the PRPB.

By 2002 there were reportedly more than 160 registered parties, a total that, according to a number of Benin's political observers, presented a hindrance to political development. A number of parties and civic organizations that supported President Kérékou formed the Union for the Benin of the Future (Union pour le Bénin du Futur—UBF), which served as the core component of the Presidential Movement (Mouvement Présidentiel—MP) that dominated the 2003 legislative balloting. Included in the UBF were the PSD, RDL-Vivoten, FARD-Alafia, and NCC. It was reported that some 120 groups supported the MP. Subsequently, the UBF, under the leadership of Joseph GANAHO, reported in late 2004 that a number of small parties had disbanded and merged into the UBF. However, references to the UBF ceased in late 2005 as it became clear that the Kérékou government was coming to an end.

The formation of the Coordination of Political Forces for 2006 was announced in early 2005 by some ten "pro-presidential" parties and groups. The leader of the alliance, Idrissou IBRAHIMA, secured less than 1 percent of the vote in the first round of the 2006 presidential balloting.

Social Democratic Party (Parti Social-Démocrate—PSD). In June 1995 the PSD's leader and former presidential candidate, Bruno Amoussou, captured the assembly presidency. Thereafter, in March 1996 Amoussou failed to advance beyond the first round of presidential balloting; however, for rallying behind Mathieu Kérékou, the PSD was awarded cabinet posts in April.

At a party congress on January 29–31, 2000, PSD delegates elected Amoussou chair of a new 19-member National Executive Committee. Amoussou, described by Africa Confidential as a "kingmaker" for his role in the 1996 election and strongly positioned in the cabinet, enjoyed solid backing in portions of southern Benin.

Amoussou finished third in the first round of the 2006 presidential election with 15.3 percent of the vote as a candidate of an alliance of parties. The alliance supported Boni Yayi in the second round and reportedly secured four seats (two for the PSD) in Yayi's new cabinet.

Leaders: Bruno AMOUSSOU (Coordinator and 2006 presidential candidate), Felix ADIMI (First Vice Chair of the National Executive Committee), Emmanuel GOLOU (Parliamentary Leader).

Party of Democratic Renewal (Parti du Renouveau Démocratique—PRD). Led by (then) National Assembly president Adrien Houngbédji, the PRD won 9 legislative seats in 1991 and 19 in 1995, its support centering in the south around Porto Novo. Houngbédji finished third in the first round of presidential balloting in March 1996 with 18.72 percent of the vote. Subsequently, the PRD's support proved pivotal to Mathieu Kérékou in the second round of balloting, and the new president rewarded the party by appointing Houngbédji as prime minister and naming four other PRD members to his new cabinet.

In May 1998 Houngbédji and his PRD colleagues resigned from the government amid reports that the president was preparing to demote them in a cabinet reshuffling. The PRD was subsequently allied with a number of other parties in an anti-Kérékou coalition as of mid-2000. However, the groups were unable to agree on a joint presidential candidate for 2001. In February 2003 Houngbédji was elected mayor of Porto Nova, but he lost the assembly president's position in April 2003. He finished second to Boni Yayi in the 2006 presidential runoff with 25 percent of the vote.

Leader: Adrien HOUNGBÉDJI (Former President of the National Assembly, Former Prime Minister, and 2006 presidential candidate).

Benin Renaissance Party (Parti de la Renaissance du Bénin—PRB). The PRB was founded in March 1992 by Rosine Soglo, the wife of (then) President Nicéphore Soglo. In July 1993 President Soglo announced his intention to “come down into the arena” to help the PRB serve as a “catalyst” for Benin's democracy movement, and in July 1994 he assumed leadership of the party. On October 1, 1994, the PRB absorbed the small Pan-African Union of Democracy and Solidarity (Union Panafricaine de la Démocratie et la Solidarité—UPDS), but it managed to gain only 20 of 83 legislative seats in two rounds of balloting in March and May 1995.

Among the reasons cited for Soglo's electoral defeat in 1996 was his increasing reliance on a small circle of family members and the exclusion of the supporters who had helped him capture the presidency. Furthermore, his followers' strident attacks on Kérékou were described as having backfired on Soglo's campaign.

In August 1998 PRB dissidents led by Nicolas TCHOTCHONE left the party and formed the African Movement for Development and Integration (Mouvement Africain pour le Développement et l'Intégration—MADI), with Tchotchone calling for the establishment of a “new economic and political order.”

In February 2003 Nicéphore Soglo was elected mayor of Cotonou. After the March 2003 elections, the PRB became the largest opposition party, with 15 seats.

With Nicéphore Soglo unable to run because of his age (over 70), the PRB presented his son, Léhady Soglo, as its 2006 presidential candidate. Léhady Soglo finished fourth in the first round of balloting with 8.5 percent of the vote. The PRB was reportedly given one seat in the new cabinet formed by President Boni Yayi following the election.

Leaders: Nicéphore SOGLO (President of the Party, Former President of the Republic, and 2001 presidential candidate), Léhady SOGLO (Deputy Major of Cotonou and 2006 presidential candidate), Rosine SOGLO (Chair).

Rally of Liberal Democrats for National Reconstruction (Rassemblement des Démocrates Libéraux pour la Reconstruction Nationale—RDL-Vivoten). Led by Sévérin Adjovi, an advocate for the reelection of former president Kérékou, the RDL-Vivoten secured three seats at legislative balloting in 1995. Adjovi served as minister of defense from 1996 to May 1998, at which time he was named minister of communications, culture, and information.

At legislative balloting in 1999 the RDL-Vivoten reportedly campaigned along with four other groups under the banner of the Movement for Citizens' Commitment and Awakening (Mouvement pour l'Engagement et le Réveil des Citoyens—MERICI).

Adjovi secured 1.8 percent of the vote in the first round of presidential balloting in 2006.

Leader: Sévérin ADJOVI (2006 presidential candidate).

Action Front for Renewal and Development-Alafia (Front Action pour la Renouveau et le Développement-Alafia—FARD-Alafia). At its launching in 1994 as a self-described “national unity party,” FARD-Alafia claimed to control five National Assembly seats, which increased to ten in 1995.

In September 1995 FARD-Alafia's leader, Dr. Alafia Saka Saley, called for a grassroots campaign to persuade former president Kérékou to compete in the 1996 presidential elections. At a party congress in April 1997 Saka Kina captured the secretary general's post, succeeding Saley. In addition, a 25-member Bureau was created to handle administrative functions.

In June 1998 FARD-Alafia suffered the defection of parliamentarians who were subsequently reported to have formed a new grouping, the Car-DUNYA (below).

Leaders: Jerome Saka KINA (Secretary General), Dr. Alafia Saka SALEY.

Our Common Cause (Notre Cause Commune—NCC). The NCC was founded as a vehicle for the presidential ambitions of Albert Tévoédjré, a former deputy director of the International Labour Organisation. Formally registered as a separate party, the NCC won six assembly seats in February 1991, with its leader placing third in the March presidential contest.

In November 1995 the NCC announced its support of former president Kérékou in the upcoming presidential campaign, surprising some observers at the pairing of the northern military leader with Tévoédjre, a purportedly “radical” southerner. In April 1996 Kérékou named Tévoédjre to his new government.

In late March 1997 a group of NCC dissidents, including Vice Chair Gratien Pognon, attempted to remove Tévoédjre from the party chairmanship. Accusing Tévoédjre of “single-handedly” controlling the party, the dissidents elected François Tankpinou as the new chair. However, the legality of their efforts was immediately challenged by Tévoédjre, who argued that the steering committee voting for his dismissal had lacked a quorum. Subsequent reports regularly referenced Tankpinou as the NCC chair, however.

Leader: François TANKPINOU (Chair).

African Movement for Democracy and Progress (Mouvement Africain pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—MADEP). Led by Séfou Fagbohoun, a wealthy businessman, the MADEP captured six seats in the 1999 legislative elections and in 2003 became the second-largest pro-presidential party, after the UBF. The MADEP's Antoine Idji Kolawolé finished fifth in the first round of the 2006 presidential poll with 3.25 percent of the vote.

Leaders: Séfou FAGBOHOUN (Chair), Antoine Idji KOLAWOLÉ (Speaker of the National Assembly).

Alliance (Alliance). The Alliance was a grouping of three propresidential parties formed prior to the 2003 legislative elections. The component parties were the Congress of the People for Progress (Congrès du Peuple pour le Progrès—CPP), led by Sédégnon ADANDE-KINTI; the Movement for Development Through Culture (Mouvement pour le Développement par Culture—MDC), led by Codjo ACHODE; and the Party of the Beginning (Parti du Salut—PS), led by Damien Alahassa.

Leader: Damien ALAHASSA.

Star Alliance (Alliance Etoile—AE). A platform for northern political figures, the AE includes the Greens (Les Verts); and the Union for Democracy and National Solidarity (Union pour la Démocratie et la Solidarité Nationale—UDSN), led by Adamou N'DIAYE. The AE secured four seats in the March 1999 poll, and thereafter an AE representative was named to the cabinet. The AE backed an opponent of the PSD's Amoussou in a contest for the assembly presidency and was subsequently excluded from the government named in June 1999. In the 2003 elections, the AE won three seats.

Leader: Sacca LAFIA (Chair and Parliamentary Leader).

New Alliance (Nouvelle Alliance—NA). Led by Soulé Dankoro, the NA won two seats in the 2003 legislative elections. Dankoro won less than 1 percent of the vote in the first round of the 2006 presidential balloting.

Leader: Soulé DANKORO.

Car-DUNYA. The Car-DUNYA was formed in 1998 by eight assembly members who theretofore represented FARD-Alafia. At legislative balloting in 1999 three of the eight defectors retained their seats, and thereafter it was reported that efforts were being made to reconcile the two groups, with the goal of merging their memberships.

However, the Car-DUNYA was excluded from the government named in June 1999 after its legislators backed an opponent of the PSD's Amoussou in a contest for the assembly's top post.

Leader: Saka SALEY.

Communist Party of Benin (Parti Communiste du Bénin—PCB). Founded in 1977 as the Communist Party of Dahomey (Parti Communiste du Dahomey—PCD) and secretly functioning for the next 12 years as the sole opposition party, the PCB filed for legal recognition in early June 1993. In 1990 the party had boycotted the National Conference, labeling it a “plot between French imperialism and its Beninois lackeys.”

Theretofore in opposition, the PCB allied itself with propresidential forces in May 1995, and at first-round presidential balloting in March 1996 PCB First Secretary Pascal Fatondji secured 1.3 percent of the vote. The PCB called for a boycott of the 2001 presidential balloting.

Leader: Pascal FATONDJI (First Secretary and 1996 presidential candidate).

Marxist-Leninist Communist Party of Benin (Parti Communiste et Marxiste-Léniniste du Bénin—PCMLB). The PCMLB was launched in early 1999 by dissident members of the PCB.

Leader: Magliore YANSUNNU.

Other groups allied with the President Kérékou prior to his retirement in 2006 included the Alliance for Democracy and Progress (Alliance pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—ADP), led by Sylvain Adekpedjou AKINDES; the Alliance for Forces of Progress (Alliance des Forces du Progrès—AFP), led by Valentin Aditi HOUDE; the Chameleon Alliance (Alliance Caméléon—AC); the Key Force (Force Clé—FC); the Impulse for Progress and Democracy (Impulsion pour le Progrès et la Démocratie—IPD), led by Théophile NATA; the Movement for Development and Solidarity (Mouvement pour le Développement et la Solidarité—MDS); the Rally for Democracy and Progress (Rassemblement pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—RDP); the Rally for the Nation (Rassemblement pour la Nation—RPN), led by De Sodji Zanclan ABEO; and the Together Party. At legislative balloting in 2003, the AFP, FC, IPD, MDS, and RDP all captured seats.

The African Congress for Democracy (Congrès Africain pour la Démocratie—CAD) presented Lionel Jacques AGBO as its presidential candidate in 2006. The candidate of the Rally of Liberal Democrats-Heviosso (Rassemblement des Démocrates Libéraux-Heviosso) was Leandre DJAGOUÉ. Agbo and Djagoue each received less than 1 percent of the vote in the first round. Meanwhile, the candidate of the Movement for an Alternative for the People, Lazare SÉHOUÉTO, finished sixth in the first round with 2.1 percent of the vote.

Legislature

National Assembly (Assemblée Nationale). Benin's unicameral legislature currently includes 83 deputies serving four-year terms and elected by party-list proportional representation in 24 constituencies. At the most recent election of March 30, 2003, the Presidential Movement coalition, which supported President Kérékou, won 52 seats (Union for the Benin of the Future, 31 seats; African Movement for Democracy and Progress, 9; Key Force, 5; Impulse for Progress and Democracy, 2; Alliance, 2; Alliance for Forces of Progress, 1; Movement for Development and Solidarity, 1; and Rally for Democracy and Progress, 1). Opposition parties gained 31 seats (Benin Renaissance Party, 15; Party of Democratic Renewal, 11; Star Alliance, 3; New Alliance, 2).

President: Antoine Idji KOLAWOLÉ.

Communications

Press

Press freedoms in Benin are considered among the most liberal in Africa. More than a dozen new press organs commenced publication in 1990, following abandonment of the prior censorship that had been imposed by the Kérékou regime. Le Matin, an independent daily, was launched in May 1994, and in August 1997 Le Point Au Quotidien, another independent daily, was founded. Other current publications include La Nation (4,000), government daily; Le Matinal (5,000), government daily; L'Autre Quotidien; Les Echos du Jour (3,000), independent daily; Le Pointau Quotidien (2,000), independent daily; L'Aurore (1,500); Le Béninois; La Dépêche du Soir; Le Progrès; L'Oeil du Peuple; Fraternité; La Nouvelle Tribune; Le Soleil; and Le Nouvel Espoir.

News Agency

The Agence Bénin-Presse operates as a section of the Ministry of Information.

Broadcasting and Computing

The government's Office de Radio-diffusion et de Télévision du Bénin broadcasts in French, English, and a number of indigenous languages throughout the country. There were approximately 301,000 television receivers and 26,000 personal computers, serving 70,000 Internet users in 2003.

BOTSWANA

REPUBLIC OF BOTSWANA

The Country

Landlocked Botswana, the former British protectorate of Bechuanaland, embraces a substantial area of desert, swamp, and scrubland situated on a high plateau in the heart of southern Africa. The country is bordered on the west by Namibia, on the south by South Africa, and on the northeast by Zimbabwe, with a narrow strip adjacent to Zambia in the north. The population is divided into eight main tribal groups, the largest of which is the Bamangwato (including an estimated 39,000 "San," or "bushmen," only 3,000 of whom continue to live in traditional nomadic fashion in the Kalahari desert). A majority of the people follow ancestral religious practices, but about 15 percent are Christian. Due in part to the large-scale employment of males in neighboring South African mines, 80 percent of households are headed by women who, however, cannot hold land title or control their crops, and therefore are denied access to funds and equipment under rural development programs. Female representation among senior officials has been limited.

At the time of independence Botswana was one of the world's poorest countries, dependent on stock-raising for much of its income because of an extremely dry climate that made large-scale farming difficult. Subsequent mineral discoveries initiated economic growth and raised per capita GNP to $2,980 in 2002. Botswana is one of the world's largest producers of diamonds, exports of which provide 75 percent of foreign exchange, 60 percent of government revenue, and 30 percent of gross domestic product. While extractive activity (also involving copper-nickel matte and coal) has yielded infrastructural gains, food production has remained a problem. Although a large majority of the work force is involved in subsistence agriculture, the largely barren soil has led to a dependence on imported food that is only slowly being overcome. The government's free-enterprise orientation and conservative monetary policies have attracted substantial foreign aid. Meanwhile, the lucrative diamond industry has enabled the government to amass large financial reserves, although international advisers have called for diversification in order to insulate the economy from fluctuations in global demand for diamonds. In response, the government has created the International Financial Services Center (IFSC), which has launched a number of projects to attract foreign investment and companies.

Political Status: Independent republic within the Commonwealth since September 30, 1966.

Area: 231,804 sq. mi. (600,372 sq. km.).

Population: 1,680,863 (2001C); 1,815,000 (2005E).

Major Urban Centers (2005E): GABORONE (213,000), Francistown (91,000), Molepolole (64,000), Selebi-Pikwe (54,000).

Official Language: English (SeTswana is widely spoken).

Monetary Unit: Pula (official rate July 1, 2006: 6.02 pula = $1US).

President: Festus MOGAE (Botswana Democratic Party); sworn in on April 1, 1998, to succeed Sir Ketumile Joni MASIRE (Botswana Democratic Party), who had resigned the previous day; sworn in for a five-year term on October 20, 1999, following the legislative election of October 16; sworn in for another five-year term on November 1, 2004, following legislative election of October 30.

Vice President: Lt. Gen. (Ret.) Seretse Ian KHAMA (Botswana Democratic Party); appointed by the president on July 13, 1998, to succeed Festus MOGAE (Botswana Democratic Party), who had been elevated to the presidency on April 1; reappointed by the president on October 21, 1999; reappointed by the president on November 8, 2004.

Current government programs focus on agricultural improvements, educational expansion, the promotion of tourism, revitalization of the public sector, and efforts to promote investment in the private sector in the hope that diversification would counteract growing unemployment (20 percent in 1999) among unskilled workers. Real GDP growth averaged nearly 8.5 percent annually from 1980 through mid-1998, slowed (primarily due to decreased diamond exports) to 4 percent in the 1998–1999 fiscal year, and rebounded to 7.6 percent in 1999–2000. In 2002 the government launched a series of privatization programs in the telecommunications and public utilities sectors. In 2003 GDP growth was 5.4 percent, while inflation increased to 9.3 percent. Inflation has recently averaged about 8 percent annually, while unemployment has remained at 15 percent despite the government's stimulus initiatives. GDP growth in 2004 declined to 4.6 percent. According to the IMF, real GDP growth in 2005 was 3.8 percent and similar growth was expected in 2006.

Political Background

A British protectorate from 1885, Botswana achieved independence within the Commonwealth on September 30, 1966, under the leadership of Sir Seretse KHAMA and has subsequently been regarded as a showplace of democracy in Africa. Following the National Assembly election of October 20, 1979, at which his Botswana Democratic Party (BDP) won 29 of 32 elective seats, President Khama was given a fourth five-year mandate. His death on July 13, 1980, led to the selection of Ketumile Joni MASIRE, vice president and minister of finance and development planning, to fill the remainder of the presidential term. Both Masire and Vice President Peter S. MMUSI were reappointed following the legislative election of September 8, 1984. However, the opposition Botswana National Front (BNF) showed surprising strength (20.2 percent) in that election and in simultaneous municipal balloting. At the election of October 7, 1989, the BNF vote share increased further to 26.9 percent (as contrasted with 64.8 percent for the BDP), although its representation fell from five (after a December by-election) to three. Presenting himself as the sole candidate, President Masire was reconfirmed by the Assembly and sworn in for a third term on October 10. On March 8, 1992, Mmusi, under pressure for alleged corruption, resigned the vice presidency in favor of Festus MOGAE, who retained his existing position as finance minister.

On May 12, 1993, representatives of the BDP, BNF, and four other parties met at Francistown to debate a recently released BNF proposal for electoral reform that included calls for the establishment of a multipartisan electoral commission to replace the existing presidentially appointed body and a lowering of the voting age from 21 to 18. Rebuffed by the government, the BNF declared six months later that it had tentatively decided to boycott the next election. Subsequently, however, it reversed itself, winning 13 legislative seats (to the BDP's 26) at the balloting of October 15, 1994. While the BDP's majority was sufficient to ensure the capture of all four nominated seats following President Masire's election to a third full term, the party's 53.1 vote share was the lowest in its 28 years of rule.

The unexpected gains of the BNF in 1994 were achieved despite rejection by the High Court at Lobatse of an opposition demand that the poll be canceled because of electoral roll deficiencies that allegedly favored the BDP. Contributing to the reduction in the BDF's majority were a series of corruption scandals, economic recession (triggered by declining diamond production and virtual collapse of the construction industry), and rising unemployment within a rapidly expanding urban population. Tensions generated by this combination erupted into serious antigovernment rioting at Gaborone in February 1995.

In late 1997 President Masire announced his intention to resign as head of state on March 31, 1998, and endorsed the succession of Vice President Mogae. Masire resigned as scheduled at an official ceremony that coincided with the conclusion of U.S. President Bill Clinton's visit to Botswana. On April 1 Mogae was inaugurated, and he announced the formation of a new cabinet on the same day. Two days later the new president nominated Lt. Gen. (Ret.) Seretse Ian KHAMA, son of Botswana's first president, to be his vice president. Khama, who had resigned from the military on March 31 to accept an appointment as minister of presidential affairs and public administration, captured a legislative by-election victory on July 6 (assembly membership being a prerequisite for the vice presidential slot) and, following assembly approval, assumed his new post on July 13. At new legislative balloting on October 16, 1999, the BDP secured 33 of 40 elective seats, and Mogae was consequently sworn in for a five-year presidential term. Mogae announced a new cabinet on October 21, retaining Khama as vice president (and thereby the heir apparent as the next BDP presidential contender).

The BDP maintained its legislative dominance at the October 2004 assembly balloting, and President Mogae was sworn in for another five-year term on November 1.

Constitution and Government

The 1966 constitution provides for a president who serves as head of state and government, a Parliament consisting of a National Assembly and a consultative House of Chiefs, and a judicial structure embracing a High Court, a Court of Appeal, and a Magistrate's Court in each district. The National Assembly currently encompasses 57 directly elected members, who vote on four additional nominated members. Sitting as an electoral college, the assembly elects the president for a term coincident with its own. (In August 1997 the assembly approved by two-thirds majority a bill limiting the president to two five-year terms.) The House of Chiefs acts as a consultative body on matters of native law, customs, and land, and also deliberates on constitutional amendments. The president can delay for up to six months, but not veto, legislation.

In June 1996 the government accepted opposition demands for an independent electoral commission and agreed to consider lowering the voting age from 21 to 18 and granting proxy votes to Botswanans living abroad. The latter two measures, in addition to a bill designating the vice president as the president's successor, were approved by popular referendum in October 1997.

At the local level, Botswana is divided into nine districts and five towns, all governed by councils. Chiefs head five of the district councils, elected leaders the remaining four. The districts impose personal income taxes to generate revenue, the local funding being supplemented by central government grants.

Foreign Relations

Although generally pro-Western in outlook, Botswana belongs to the Nonaligned Movement and has consistently maintained diplomatic relations with members of the former Soviet bloc as well as with the People's Republic of China. Botswana's relations with South Africa, its major trading partner and the employer of over half its nonagricultural work force, have been problematic. While avoiding official contacts with Pretoria and participating as one of the six Front-Line States (also including Angola, Mozambique, Tanzania, Zambia, and Zimbabwe) opposing minority rule in southern Africa, it attempted to maintain peaceful coexistence with its neighbor prior to the abandonment of apartheid. Tensions heightened in 1985, however, when South African Defense Forces (SADF) mounted a cross-border attack on alleged havens for the African National Congress (ANC), killing 15 people. Botswana subsequently vowed not to condone any "terrorist activity" from its territory and forced numerous ANC adherents to leave the country. Nonetheless, the SADF conducted another raid near Gaborone in May 1986, prompting the Masire government to inform the other Front-Line States that it "would not stand in the way" of those who might wish to initiate economic sanctions against South Africa. Despite its denunciation of three more SADF raids, Gaborone announced a joint Botswanan/South African resource development project in 1988, further underlining what critics termed Botswana's contradictory position as a member of both the South African Customs Union (SACU) and the anti-apartheid South African Development Coordination Conference (SADCC, subsequently the Southern African Development Community—SADC), whose headquarters were in Gaborone.

In 1992 the Namibian government, under pressure from opposition politicians to clearly demarcate its borders, claimed a small island in the Chobe river that had previously been assumed to be part of Botswana. In late 1993, following a series of minor encounters in the area, a team of specialists was appointed to resolve the dispute. With no settlement ensuing, the two sides signed an agreement in February 1996 providing for the dispute to be submitted to the International Court of Justice (ICJ), whose ruling would be accepted as binding.

Meanwhile, tension had also been generated by work on a multimillion-dollar air base some 40 miles from Gaborone, and in April 1996 Botswana confirmed that it was purchasing substantial quantities of sophisticated weaponry from various countries. As the only neighbor with an unresolved territorial dispute with Botswana, Namibia voiced particular concern at the buildup. However, the Botswanan government contended that the purchases met legitimate defense requirements.

Under the aegis of the Namibian and Botswanan Joint Commission on Defense and Security, an accord was reached in May 1998 with both countries reportedly agreeing to resolve border disputes through diplomatic solutions. In late 1999 the territorial dispute was resolved when the ICJ ruled in favor of Botswana.

In 2002 Botswana and Namibia agreed to the repatriation of some 2,000 Namibian refugees in Botswana, while in 2003 the two countries established an eight-member commission to begin final demarcation of the border. The reported influx of some 100,000 refugees from Zimbabwe led the Botswanan government in 2004 to enact a number of measures, including the erection of an electric fence in some areas, designed to increase border security.

Current Issues

The run-up to the October 1999 elections proved embarrassing for the administration and electoral officials as a brief state of emergency was required to complete sufficient voter registration and chaos surrounded the validation of candidates. However, the recent splintering of the BNF (see Political Parties, below) precluded effective opposition to the BDP, especially when the rump BNF failed to reach an agreement with the new Botswana Alliance Movement (BAM). Following the election, President Mogae pledged that the government would continue the defense buildup of recent years while also addressing the problems of burgeoning unemployment among young people and the AIDS epidemic. (It was estimated that at least 30 percent of the nation's young adults were infected with the AIDS virus, and life expectancy had fallen from 60 in 1990 to 47 in 1999 because of related deaths.)

Attention in 2001 was focused on the “land invasion” crisis in neighboring Zimbabwe (see article on Zimbabwe), negative publicity in the matter having adversely affected tourism in Botswana. President Mogae was among the leaders of several nations who pressured Zimbabwean President Mugabe to accede to the “rule of law” regarding land ownership in order to calm the turmoil. Mogae also attempted to facilitate a resolution to the civil war in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, which had contributed to an intensified campaign by nongovernmental organizations to convince potential diamond buyers to avoid gems emanating from areas of conflict. Among other things, the government feared that legitimate producers, such as those in Botswana, were being unfairly penalized by the antidiamond initiative. Meanwhile, on the domestic front, a degree of ethnic tension, previously not considered a problem, arose in 2001, particularly in regard to the Kalangas, who make up only 10 percent of the population but reportedly hold a majority of judicial posts. A national referendum in November endorsed revision of judiciary regulations; changes included an increase in the retirement age. Critics of the measures argued they were designed to fortify the Kalanga judicial influence.

Since 2001, the government has been challenged by domestic and international critics of its decision to forcibly resettle the last remaining bushmen out of the Central Kalahari Game Reserve. Some observers charged that the government’s relocation initiative was designed to permit expanded mining on the tribal lands. By 2005 some 3,000 bushmen had been relocated, although others had resisted the government’s financial inducements and pressure tactics. In 2006 several early court cases against the government on behalf of some of the bushmen were still unresolved. With tensions escalating over this matter, amid allegations of police brutality and arrests of some bushmen on charges of illegal hunting practices, the government denied mistreating the bushmen, stating that the bushmen could practice their culture outside the reserve and explaining that those arrested were “using horses, donkey, spears, and dogs” to kill animals inside the reserve.

On the political front, although the BDP won 44 of the 57 elected seats in the October 2004 assembly balloting, the BDP totals for 11 of those 44 seats were outnumbered by the combined totals of the votes for the BNF and the Botswana Congress Party (BCP). The possibility of an eventual chink in the BDP’s armor was also raised by internal disputes within the ruling party (see below). Meanwhile, President Mogae said in early 2006 he would not to seek a third term. At the same time, he said he would not leave office early (despite much speculation to that effect). Mogae’s insistence on remaining in office and the bushmen cases were seen as stumbling blocks to a scenario in which some observers outlined Vice President Khama’s early ascension to the presidency in 2008.

Political Parties

Government Party

Botswana Democratic Party (BDP). Founded in 1962 as the Bechuanaland Democratic Party, the BDP has been the majority party since independence. It advocates self-development on a Western-type democratic basis, cooperation with all states, and multiracialism. In June 1984 the BDP’s president, Sir Ketumile Joni Masire, announced measures to “democratize” party nominations through a revamped primary system. However, all candidates remained subject to approval by a central committee dominated by government ministers.

During a BDP congress in July 1993 divisions within the party widened when Peter Mmusi and Daniel Kwelagobe, both of whom had been forced to resign from the government in 1992 for alleged involvement in a land transaction scandal, were elected chair and secretary general, respectively, while traditional southern leaders failed to secure leadership positions. Immediately thereafter, the Mmusi/Kwelagobe faction was reported to be in conflict with the party’s “Big Five” cabinet members, led by Lt. Gen. Mompoti S. Merafhe, who represented the BDP’s propatronage, cattle-raising wing. Mmusi died in October 1994 and was eventually succeeded as BDP chair by Ponatshego KEDIKILWE, the minister of presidential affairs and public administration. The government reshuffling in late 1997 was reportedly hailed by party officials for balancing the number of northern and southern ministers.

On March 31, 1998, Masire resigned from both his national and party presidency posts, and on April 1 Festus Mogae assumed both positions. The BDP maintained its dominance in the 1999 assembly poll by securing 57 percent of the vote.

With Mogae's nomination of Lt. Gen. Seretse Ian Khama as the vice president of the republic, and thus the possible "heir," the factionalized structure of the BDP became more apparent. In June 2000 Kedikilwe resigned as minister of education, observers noting that Kedikilwe and BDP Secretary General Daniel K. Kwelagobe were uneasy with Khama, who had publicly called them the "old guard." However, at the party congress in July 2001 a compromise averted a possible crisis, and Khama was elected vice chair of the party, while Kedikilwe and Kwelagobe both kept their positions.

Kedikilwe was replaced by Khama as chair of the BDP at the 2003 congress, following which the party remained divided into two camps. One was led by Foreign Affairs Minister Mompoti S. Merafhe and Education Minister Jacob NKATE, both of whom had supported Khama at the 2003 congress. The other faction was led by Kedikilwe and Kwelagobe. Discord between the factions was renewed at the July 2005 congress, but Kwelagobe managed to fend off a challenge for his post from Local Government Minister Margaret NASHA after Khama intervened on his behalf in an effort to keep peace in the party. All remaining top party positions went to the pro-Khama faction, with Nkate retained as deputy secretary general.

Strife continued to increase to the point that in early December 2005 the BDP High Command ordered the dissolution of party factions. The so-called K-K faction (Kedikilwe-Kwelagobe) refused to disband, upholding its battle over cabinet posts and insisting on a meeting with President Mogae to push for power sharing at all levels of government. Mogae finally agreed to a meeting in February 2006.

Leaders: Festus MOGAE (President of the Republic and of the Party), Sir Ketumile Joni MASIRE (Former President of the Republic and of the Party), Lt. Gen. (Ret.) Seretse Ian KHAMA (Vice President of the Republic and Chair of the Party), Lt. Gen. Mompoti S. MERAFHE (Foreign Affairs Minister), Daniel K. KWELAGOBE (Secretary General).

Opposition Parties

Botswana National Front (BNF). The BNF is a leftist party organized after the 1965 election. Its principal leader, Dr. Kenneth Koma, was the only candidate to oppose Seretse Khama for the presidency in 1979, but he failed to retain his assembly seat. The party's share of the vote increased to 20 percent at the 1984 election, with its legislative representation growing from two to four; it also won control of the Gaborone city council.

In the late 1980s a number of right-wing members of the BNF defected to the BDP in response to the BNF's left-wing, procommunist orientation. In the wake of the October 1989 election, at which BNF assembly representation was reduced to three, Koma characterized its activists as "social democrats" who are "not Marxists." In the 1989 poll the BNF gained control of two local councils, including the capital, despite a loss of membership to two new splinter groups.

In August 1990 the BNF joined with the BPU and BPP (below) in forming a joint "Unity in Diversity" committee, which was formalized as a Botswana People's Progressive Front (BPPF) in October 1991. In 1993, however, Front members could not agree on whether they should boycott the next election if their demands for electoral reform were not met. As a result, the BNF contested the October 1994 poll in its own right, substantially increasing its vote share to 37.7 percent and winning 13 elective seats, including all 4 at Gaborone.

In mid-1998 the BNF was severely weakened by the withdrawal of a faction (reportedly including 11 legislators) led by Michael Kitso DINGAKE, who subsequently helped to form the Botswana Congress Party (BCP, below). The BNF was initially described in early 1999 as negotiating participation in the new Botswana Alliance Movement (BAM, below). However, delivering a blow to opposition legislative hopes of cutting into the BDP majority, the BNF ultimately decided to run its own candidates in all districts, securing 6 seats on 26 percent of the vote.

Although he did not take responsibility for the defeat, Koma announced in January 2000 that he would step down as the party's president. At a November 2001 congress, Otsweletse Moupo beat Peter WOKO, who was supported by Koma, and became the new BNF leader. Koma was expelled in 2002 for reportedly encouraging factionalism and moved on to help form the New Democratic Front (NDF) with other BNF dissidents in 2003 (see below).

In the 2004 elections, the BNF secured 12 seats. Following the election, a rift emerged within the party between supporters of Moupo and those of BNF Vice President Kopano Lekoma, who unsuccessfully challenged Moupo at the party conference in July 2005. In early 2006 the BNF appeared committed to cooperating with other opposition parties to wrest control from the BDP in the 2009 balloting.

Leaders: Otsweletse MOUPO (President), Nehemiah MODUBULE (National Chair), Akanyang MAGAMA (Secretary General), Kopano LEKOMA (Vice President of the Party).

Botswana Congress Party (BCP). The BCP was formally registered in June 1998 by a group of BNF legislators interested in pursuing more centrist policies than the left-leaning parent grouping (personal animosity between BNF leader Kenneth Koma and dissident leader Michael Dingake also reportedly contributed to the rupture.) The BCP secured 12 percent of the vote in the 1999 legislative poll but only 1 seat, Dingake theorizing the party had been punished by the voters by splitting the opposition ranks. In 2002 the BCP was reportedly engaged in unity talks with the BAM (below).

The party retained one seat in the 2004 election, and in 2005 it continued talks with the BAM and the BPP about a possible electoral coalition.

While the party suffered a number of defections (factionalism cited as the main reason) in early 2006, some 45 new members joined, including 3 from the BDP.

Leaders: Gilson SALESHANDO (Party President), Mokgweetsi KGOSIPULA (Secretary General), Gilson SALESHANDO (Publicity Secretary).

Other Parties Contesting the 2004 Legislative Elections

Botswana Alliance Movement (BAM). Formed by the three parties below and the BPP for the 1999 legislative balloting, the BAM secured only 5 percent of the votes (and no seats) in that poll after having failed to convince other anti-BDP parties, most notably the BNF, to join in a single opposition electoral coalition. Lepetu SETSHWAELO of the UAP served as the BAM's presidential candidate in 1999. The BAM was reportedly involved in unity talks with the BCP (above) during 2001. Although the parties did not merge before the 2004 elections (in which BAM received 2.84 percent of the vote and no seats in the assembly), talks continued about an electoral alliance between the BAM and other opposition groups for the 2009 elections. The BPP left the BAM prior to the 2004 election (see BPP, below), but in early 2006 met with the BCP, the BNF, and the BAM for unity talks.

BPP faction, and the Botswana Freedom Party (BFP), which had been organized in 1989 by a former BNF member. The new formation won no legislative seats in 1994 on a vote share of 2.9 percent.

Leaders: Motsamai K. MPHONG (BIP), Leach TLHOMELANG (BFP).

United Action Party (UAP). The UAP, also referenced as the Bosele Action Party (BAP), was launched in September 1997 by a group of BDP dissidents.

Leader: Lepetu SETSHWAELO.

Botswana People's Party (BPP). Founded in 1960 and for some years the principal minority party, the northern-based BPP advocates social democracy and takes a pan-Africanist line. It contested the 1994 election, winning no assembly seats on a vote share of 4.6 percent. The BPP was reportedly in disarray for most of 2000–2001. President Knight MARIPE resigned in July 2000, announcing that he had “nothing to offer” to the party. According to the Africa News, ten members of the party's National Executive Council, including the former chair Kenneth MKHWA and former secretary general Matlhomola MODISE, were expelled in November for “having failed to carry out a resolution which directed the party to withdraw from the BAM.” The party left BAM prior to the 2004 legislative elections. The BPP gained only 1.91 percent of the vote and therefore no seats in the legislative balloting. After initially balking at unity terms, the BPP in October 2005 signed on to a memorandum of agreement with the BCP, BAM, and BNF to cooperate in ousting the BDP in 2009.

Leaders: Bernard BALIKANI, Cornelius GOPOLANG (Secretary General).

New Democratic Front (NDF). Formed in 2003 by dissidents from the BNF, including former BNF leader Kenneth Koma, the NDF is a center-left, social-democratic party. In the 2004 legislative elections, the NDF secured less than 1 percent of the vote. Koma stepped up in October 2005 to assist an NDF candidate in a by-election and was among those pushing for a unified opposition to unseat the BDP.

Leader: Dick BAYFORD.

Marx, Engels, Lenin, Stalin Movement of Botswana (MELS). Also reportedly referenced as the Mars Movement of Botswana, MELS presented two unsuccessful candidates in the 1999 legislative balloting, receiving only 0.1 percent of the vote. In the 2004 election, MELS again received 0.1 percent of the vote.

Leader: Themba JOINA.

Other Parties

Botswana Labour Party (BLP). Formed in September 1989 by former members of the BNF, the Labour Party espouses a program of neither “communism” nor “capitalism.” The party did not offer candidates in 1989 or 1994. It was reportedly considering an alliance with the USP and SDP for the 1999 legislative balloting, but the initiative did not come to fruition.

Leader: Lenyeletse KOMA.

Other registered parties in 2004 included the United Socialist Party (USP), led by Nehemiah MODUBULE, now of the BNF; the Social Democratic Party (SDP), led by Rodgers SEABUENG; and the Botswana Workers Front (BWF), led by Mothusi AKANYANG. The SDP fielded a single candidate in the 1999 local elections, but its candidate failed to win or to gather any significant support.

Legislature

The Parliament consists of an elective National Assembly with legislative powers and a consultative House of Chiefs.

House of Chiefs. The House of Chiefs is a largely advisory body of 15 members: the chiefs of the 8 principal tribes, 4 elected subchiefs, and 3 members selected by the other 12. Constitutional revision was being considered in early 2006 to increase the size of the upper house to 35.

Chair: Chief SEEPAPITSO IV.

National Assembly. The National Assembly, which sits for a five-year term, currently consists of 57 (raised from 40 in 2002) directly elected and 4 nominated members, in addition to the speaker and the (nonvoting) attorney general; the president serves ex officio. The most recent general election was held October 30, 2004, with the Botswana Democratic Party (BDP) winning 44 elective seats; the Botswana National Front, 12; and the Botswana Congress Party, 1.

Speaker: Patrick BALOPI.

Communications

In response to domestic and international criticism of proposed legislation on mass communications, Gaborone withdrew the bill from the legislature in early 1997 and announced that it would draft a new document after consulting with non-governmental media groups. The original bill included provisions for strict governmental control of the fledgling industry. A new draft was presented in 2001, but it also faced criticism, especially from the International Federation of Journalists (IFJ), which claimed that the proposed Press Council would be given “extensive powers to impose fines and jail terms on journalists and publishers.” In May the government allegedly decided to ban government advertising to the Botswana Guardian and the Midweek Sun after materials critical of the vice president had appeared in both papers. The papers sued the government in June, and in September the Botswana High Court ruled that the advertising ban was unconstitutional and violated the papers' freedom of expression. In an unprecedented move, the Botswana Media Workers Union was formed in 2005 to promote freedom of expression.

Press

All papers are published at Gaborone, except as noted: Botswana Daily News/Dikgang Tsa Gompiano (50,000), published by the Department of Information and Broadcasting in English and SeTswana; Kutlwano (23,000), published monthly by the Department of Information and Broadcasting in English and SeTswana; The Reporter/Mmegi (24,000), weekly; Botswana Guardian (17,000), weekly; The Gazette (16,000), weekly; Midweek Sun (13,800), weekly; Northern Advertiser (Francistown, 5,500), weekly; Botswana Advertiser, weekly; Mmegi Monitor, weekly; The Voice, bi-monthly; The Mirror, bi-monthly.

News Agency

The Botswana Press Agency (BOPA) was established at Gaborone in 1981.

Broadcasting and Computing

The government-owned Radio Botswana operates six stations broadcasting in English and SeTswana to approximately 252,000 radio receivers. A number of private stations are expected to be launched in the wake of a recent government decision to terminate its monopoly. The TV Association of Botswana operates two low-power transmitters near Gaborone that relay programs from South Africa. In July 2000 the first state-owned television channel went on the air. In 2003 there were approximately 53,000 television receivers and 75,000 personal computers serving 70,000 Internet users.

The Country

A land of arid savannas drained by the Mouhoun (Black), Nazinon (Red), and Nakambe (White) Volta rivers, Burkina Faso occupies a bufferlike position between the landlocked states of Mali and Niger on the west, north, and east, and the coastal lands of Côte d'Ivoire, Ghana, Togo, and Benin on the south. The most prominent of its numerous African population groups is the Mossi, which encompasses an estimated 50–70 percent of the population and has dominated much of the country for centuries. Other tribal groups include the Bobo, located near the western city of Bobo-Dioulasso, and the Samo. Mossi resistance to outside influence has contributed to the retention of tribal religion by a majority of the population, while 20 percent has embraced Islam and 10 percent Christianity. Women have traditionally constituted over half the labor force, producing most of the food crops, with men responsible for cash crops. Captain Compaoré's 1987 dismissal of a number of women appointed by his predecessor to politically influential posts was consistent with customary law that has been described as "unfavorable" to female property and political rights; however, subsequent cabinets have usually included several female ministers.

The former Upper Volta is one of the poorest countries in Africa, with GNP per capita estimated at $300. In addition, its illiteracy rate (more than 75 percent) is among the highest in the world. Over 80 percent of the population is engaged in subsistence agriculture; cotton, karité nuts, livestock, and peanuts are exported. (Cotton reportedly accounts for some 75 percent of exports and 30 percent of GDP, and Burkina Faso is one of Africa's largest cotton producers.) Mineral deposits, mainly manganese, remain largely unexploited due to a lack of transportation facilities. Industry, consisting primarily of the production of textiles and processed agricultural goods, makes only a small contribution to the GNP.

Since 1991 the government has adhered to a structural adjustment plan dictated by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) focusing on redirecting the economy from a "centralized to market-oriented one." In mid-2000 the IMF and the World Bank announced a $700 million debt relief package for Burkina Faso, contingent in part on further privatization and implementation of poverty-reduction policies. In November 2001 the IMF announced that the country's record on structural reforms was improving, although the fund called for refinements in the management of public finances. In the wake of additional reform by the government, the IMF endorsed debt relief of some $195 million for Burkina Faso in 2002. GDP grew by more than 6 percent annually in 1996–2005,

Political Background

Under French control since 1896, what was then known as Upper Volta gained separate identity in March 1959 when it became an autonomous state of the French Community under Maurice YAMÉOGO, leader of the Voltaic Democratic Union (Union Démocratique Voltaïque—UDV) and a political disciple of President Félix Houphouët-Boigny of Côte d'Ivoire. Under Yaméogo's leadership, Upper Volta became fully independent on August 5, 1960. Though reelected for a second term by an overwhelming majority in 1965, Yaméogo was unable to cope with mounting student and labor dissatisfaction, and he resigned in January 1966. Lt. Col. Sangoulé LAMIZANA, the army chief of staff, immediately assumed the presidency and instituted a military regime.

Faithful to his promise to restore constitutional government within four years, Lamizana submitted a new constitution for popular approval in December 1970 and sponsored a legislative election in which the UDV regained its pre-1966 majority. Gérard Kango OUÉDRAOGO was invested as prime minister by the National Assembly in February 1971, while Lamizana was retained as chief executive for a four-year transitional period, after which the president was to be popularly elected. On February 8, 1974, however, the army, under General Lamizana, again seized control to prevent the political rehabilitation of ex-president Yaméogo. Declaring that the takeover was aimed at saving the country from the threat of squabbling politicians, Lamizana suspended the 1970 constitution, dissolved the National Assembly, and dismissed the cabinet. A new government was formed on February 11, with Lamizana continuing as president and assuming the office of prime minister.

In the wake of a ministerial reorganization in January 1977, the president announced that a constitutional referendum would take place by midyear, followed by legislative and presidential elections at which he would not stand as a candidate. The referendum was held November 27,

Political Status: Became independent as the Republic of Upper Volta on August 5, 1960; under largely military rule 1966–1978; constitution of November 27, 1977, suspended upon military coup of November 25, 1980; present name adopted August 4, 1984; multiparty constitution adopted by popular referendum on June 2, 1991.

Area: 105,869 sq. mi. (274,200 sq. km.).

Population: 10,312,609 (1996C); 13,391,000 (2005E).

Major Urban Center (2005E):

OUAGADOUGOU (1,150,000).

Official Language: French.

Monetary Unit: CFA Franc (market rate July 1, 2006: 513.01 francs = $1US). (The CFA franc, previously pegged to the French franc, is now permanently pegged to the euro at 655.957 CFA francs = 1 euro.)

President: Capt. Blaise COMPAORÉ (Congress of Democracy and Progress); leader of military coup that overthrew Cdr. Thomas SANKARA, on October 15, 1987; popularly elected (as leader of the Popular Front) to a seven-year term on December 1, 1991; reelected to another seven-year term on November 15, 1998; reelected to a five-year term on November 13, 2005.

Prime Minister: Ernest Paramanga YONLI (Congress of Democracy and Progress); appointed by the president on November 7, 2000, to succeed Kadré Désiré OUÉDRAOGO (independent at time of appointment, subsequently a member of the Congress of Democracy and Progress), who had resigned the previous day; formed new government on November 12, 2000; reappointed by the president on June 6, 2002, and formed new government on June 11 following legislative balloting on May 5; reappointed by the president on January 6, 2006, and formed new government on January 7.

although growth has been dampened recently by low cotton prices and regional turmoil. Current development programs focus on the construction of rural roads and the expansion of irrigation systems.

with a reported 97.75 percent of the voters endorsing a return to democratic rule. Lamizana reversed himself, however, and announced his candidacy for the presidency in 1978. Rejecting an appeal by opponents that he abandon his military rank and campaign as a civilian, Lamizana retained his office in a runoff on May 29 after having obtained a plurality in first-round balloting on May 14. Earlier, on April 30, the regime-supportive Voltaic Democratic Union–African Democratic Assembly (Union Démocratique Voltaïque–Rassemblement Démocratique Africain—UDV–RDA) obtained a near-majority in a reconstituted National Assembly, which on July 7 designated Dr. Joseph Issoufou CONOMBO as prime minister.

Despite restrictions imposed on all but the leading political groups, Upper Volta remained only one of two multiparty democracies (the other being Senegal) in former French Africa until November 25, 1980, when the Lamizana regime was overthrown in a military coup led by former foreign minister Col. Sayé ZERBO. Officials of the ousted government, including the president and the prime minister, were placed under arrest, while a Military Committee of Recovery for National Progress (Comité Militaire de Redressement pour le Progrès National—CMRPN) suspended the constitution, dissolved the legislature, and banned political activity. A 17-member Council of Ministers headed by Colonel Zerbo as both president and prime minister was announced on December 7.

Accusing Zerbo of having “made the paramilitary forces an agent of terror,” a group of non-commissioned officers mounted a coup on November 7, 1982, that installed Maj. Jean-Baptiste OUÉDRAOGO, a former army medical officer, as head of what was termed the People’s Salvation Council (Conseil de Salut du Peuple—CSP). On August 4, 1983, Ouédraogo was in turn overthrown in a brief rebellion led by Capt. Thomas Sankara, who had been named prime minister in January, only to be arrested, along with other allegedly pro-Libyan members of the CSP, in late May. Immediately after the August coup, Sankara announced the formation of a National Revolutionary Council (Conseil National de la Révolution—

CNR) with himself as chair. A year later, following two failed counter-coup attempts, the name of the country was changed to Burkina Faso, a vernacular blend meaning “democratic and republican land of upright men.”

In the wake of a state visit by Libya’s Col. Muammar al-Qadhafi in December 1985, Cdr. Sankara declared that his country had “gone beyond the era of republics.” He proclaimed the establishment of a Libyan-style “Jamahiriya” system aimed at linking national government policy to the wishes of the population as expressed through local people’s committees.

Sankara was killed in a coup led by his second-in-command, Capt. Blaise COMPAORÉ, on October 15, 1987. Following the execution of a number of former government officials, Compaoré and his “brothers-in-arms,” Maj. Jean-Baptiste LINGANI and Capt. Henri ZONGO, charged that Sankara had been a “madman” who had planned to consolidate power under a one-party system. Faced with substantial domestic hostility, Compaoré pledged to continue the “people’s revolution,” naming himself head of a Popular Front (Front Populaire—FP) administration. In March 1988 Compaoré announced a major government reorganization (see under Constitution and government, below), and, vowing to carry on the “rectification program” begun with the October coup, he appealed to elements that Sankara had labeled “entrenched interest groups”—labor unions, tribal chieftaincies, conservative civilians, and the military elite. However, Compaoré’s efforts, hailed by some as welcome relief from Sankara’s chaotic governing style, lacked his predecessor’s wide popular appeal.

In September 1989 Lingani and Zongo, who had been named first and second deputy chair members, respectively, of the FP three months earlier, were arrested and summarily executed on charges of “betraying” the regime by attempting to blow up the plane on which Compaoré was returning from a state visit to the Far East. Three months later, another coup attempt was allegedly foiled by the president’s personal guard, with the government subsequently denying press reports that several persons had been executed for involvement in the plot.

The first FP congress was held in Ouagadougou on March 1–4, 1990, with 3,000 delegates participating. The congress, which included representatives of a variety of unions and political groups, drafted a democratic constitution, which was approved by an assembly of 2,000 provincial delegates on December 15 and adopted by popular referendum on June 2, 1991.

On June 11, 1990, Compaoré dissolved the government and announced the opening of a 24-party consultative assembly to discuss implementation of a new constitution. The following day, however, 13 opposition parties walked out of the assembly when the government rejected their demands that the body be granted sovereign status and be expanded to include trade unionists, traditional leaders, and human rights organizations. On June 16 Compaoré named a 34-member transitional government consisting of 28 ministers and 6 secretaries of state, 21 of whom were members of the FP's core formation, the Organization for People's Democracy–Labor Movement (Organisation pour la Démocratie Populaire–Mouvement Travailiste—ODP-MT). However, three opposition members withdrew prior to the first cabinet meeting, and they were followed on August 17 by three more, including Herman YAMÉOGO (son of Upper Volta's first president), who had been assigned the agriculture portfolio only three weeks earlier.

In September 1990 Compaoré, who had resigned from the military as required by the new basic law, announced his presidential candidacy. Thereafter, in the run-up to presidential balloting, clashes intensified between the FP and opposition forces. On September 25 much of the opposition, loosely joined in a Coalition of Democratic Forces (Coalition des Forces Démocratiques—CFD), threatened to boycott elections if a national conference was not held. Compaoré responded by offering to hold a referendum on Burkina's transitional institutions. However, at the urging of government supporters, the proposal was quickly withdrawn. Thus, all four opposition presidential nominees (Pierre Claver DAMBA, UNDP Regional Director for Africa; the RDA's Gérard Kango Ouédraogo; Ram OUÉDRAOGO of the Union of Greens for the Development of Burkina [Union des Verts pour le Développement du Burkina—UVDB]; and Herman Yaméogo of the Alliance for Democracy and Federation [Alliance pour la Démocratie et la Fédération—ADF]) boycotted the December 1 balloting, in which Compaoré, running unopposed, won a renewed seven-year mandate.

Prospects for a representative legislature were dampened when only a quarter of the known parties indicated a willingness to participate in the projected January 1992 legislative poll. At the core of the complaint was the government's refusal to convene a national conference endowed with plenary powers to oversee the transition to a wholly democratic system. In mid-December 1991 opposition leaders had rejected an overture by President Compaoré to participate in a less authoritative National Reconciliation Forum, and the assemblage that was ultimately convened on February 11, 1992, was suspended nine days later because of a disagreement over live radio coverage of its deliberations. Nonetheless, 27 of 62 registered parties participated in the balloting that was eventually conducted on May 24, the ruling ODP-MT winning an overwhelming majority of seats.

On June 15, 1992, Compaoré dissolved the transitional government, and the following day he named economist Youssouf OUÉDRAOGO as prime minister. The cabinet named by Ouédraogo on June 20 included representatives from seven parties, although 13 of the 22 portfolios were awarded to the ODP-MT.

Prime Minister Ouédraogo resigned on March 17, 1994, after the mid-January devaluation of the CFA franc and subsequent collapse of a wage agreement with the trade unions. Three days later President Compaoré appointed Marc Christian Roch KABORÉ, theretofore minister of state in charge of relations with institutions, as Ouédraogo's successor.

On February 6, 1996, Prime Minister Kaboré resigned to assume the vice presidency of the Congress of Democracy and Progress (Congress pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—CDP), a newly formed government grouping created by the ODP-MT and a number of other groups. Kaboré, who was also named special advisor to the president, was replaced on the same day by Kadré Désiré OUÉDRAOGO, theretofore deputy governor of the Central Bank of West African States. The cabinet named on February 9 remained largely unchanged from its predecessor, and a reshuffle on September 3 was most noteworthy for Ouédraogo's assumption of the economy and finance portfolio.

In January 1997 the assembly approved constitutional amendments that abolished provisions limiting the number of presidential terms (previously two). The opposition strongly protested the change, arguing it was designed to insure Compaoré the presidency for as long as he desired.

Subsequently, in legislative balloting on May 11, 1997, the dominance of the pro-Compaoré groupings was underlined by the CDP's capture of 97 of 111 seats, a majority that swelled to 101 in June following elections in four constituencies where earlier results had been invalidated. In addition, the presidentially allied ADF secured 2 seats. The leading opposition party, the Party for Democracy and Progress (Parti pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—PDP), won 6 seats. On June 11 the president reappointed Ouédraogo prime minister and named a cabinet that was largely unchanged, with the notable exception that the ADF's Yaméogo was not returned to his post.

In April 1998 the Compaoré government announced the establishment of an independent electoral commission and charged it with organizing the presidential polling scheduled for late 1998. The government asserted that the creation of the commission was a sign of a willingness to install transparent electoral procedures. However, that assessment was rejected by many of the leading opposition groups, which, under the banner of the February 14 Group (Groupe du 14 Février—G14), a newly created coalition (see Political Parties, below), subsequently vowed to boycott the balloting unless further reforms were implemented. In September President Compaoré met with opposition leaders in an unsuccessful effort to break the impasse; consequently, in presidential polling on November 15, the incumbent easily secured a second term, overwhelming several minor party candidates. Compaoré's 87.53 percent vote tally dwarfed the results of his nearest rival, the UVDB's Ram Ouédraogo, who secured just 6.61 percent; meanwhile, a number of observers described the relatively high voter turnout (58 percent) as a rebuke to the opposition.

Violent antigovernment protests broke out throughout the country in mid-December 1998 following the discovery of the bodies of Norbert ZONGO (a prominent independent journalist) and two colleagues in a burned vehicle outside of Ouagadougou. Zongo, a vocal critic of the administration, had reportedly been investigating the role the president's brother, François COMPAORÉ, had played in the death of one of Zongo's assistants. Subsequently, the president appointed an independent judicial commission to investigate the journalists' deaths; nevertheless, demonstrations continued through the first part of 1999.

On January 8, 1999, Prime Minister Ouédraogo and his government issued their pro forma resignations, as required by the constitution following presidential balloting. However, on January 11 Ouédraogo was reappointed by the president, and the government announced on January 15 was only slightly reshuffled.

In May 1999 the judicial commission issued a report that implicated the Presidential Guard in the Zongo killings. Subsequently, intensified antigovernment unrest erupted, and the leaders of a number of opposition groups were detained. The CDP dismissed the commission's findings as reflecting "partisan" concerns; nevertheless, President Compaoré created a 16-member Council of Elders on May 21 and asked its members (including three former heads of government) to help create an environment for "reconciliation and social peace." In August the council called for the establishment of a national unity government. Two months later, Prime Minister Ouédraogo reshuffled the cabinet, bringing into its ranks members of two theretofore opposition groups. However, members of the so-called "radical opposition" refused to participate, dismissing the government's entreaties as disingenuous and asserting that the political crisis would continue until those responsible for political killings were brought to justice.

In November 1999 Compaoré established two new bodies, the Consultative Commission on Political Reforms and the National Reconciliation Commission, which he charged with drafting “concrete proposals” for resolving the continuing imbroglio. However, opposition members refused to assume the seats set aside for them in the Consultative Commission, complaining that the president had reneged on an alleged pledge to make the commission’s findings binding.

Antigovernment demonstrations continued through the end of 1999, and in the first days of 2000 the opposition criticized the administration’s call for early legislative elections and condemned the “culture of impunity” engendered by the president. In late January CDP activists held a proreform rally, insisting that such efforts were the only way to derail the opposition’s movement toward a “democratic coup d’état.” The government subsequently announced plans for municipal elections to be held in late July, but the balloting was later delayed in view of opposition complaints about voter registration and electoral procedures.

In August 2000 three soldiers from the Presidential Guard were given prison sentences for having tortured to death one of Zongo’s assistants in 1998. Subsequently, in October, the university in Ouagadougou was shut down by the government in response to several months of protests by students, teachers, and unions. After the government agreed to most of the protesters’ demands, the university was reopened in December.

The municipal elections of September 2000 appeared to underscore the division between the moderate and radical opposition parties, as some of the latter refused to participate. On November 6, 2000, Prime Minister Ouédraogo resigned, and on November 7 the president appointed one of the ministers from the CDP, Ernest Paramanga YONLI, as the new prime minister. The CDP subsequently signed a “Protocol of Agreement” with a number of parties that consequently accepted posts in the new cabinet formed on November 12, their inclusion being seen by some analysts as evidence of a new atmosphere of compromise and easing of tensions, as well as the split structure of the opposition.

In February 2001, in a further development on the prosecution of the political killings, a warrant officer was charged with the murder of Zongo. Implying that the investigations of the political killings had produced tangible results, the government organized a “National Day of Forgiveness” in March with the hopes of reconciling with the more radical opposition parties. However, the PDP, the Social Forces Front (Front des Forces Sociales—FFS), and some other parties refused to take part in the event.

Facing increased domestic and international criticism, the government authorized several significant electoral reforms prior to the 2002 assembly balloting, including a revision of the proportional voting system that had previously favored the CDP (it had won 69 percent of the vote in the 1997 balloting but had been awarded 97 of 111 seats). The measures appeared to produce the desired effect, as the CDP majority fell to 57 seats in the May 5 elections. The leading opposition parties were the ADF/African Democratic Rally with 17 seats and the PDP/Socialist Party with 10 seats. However, unlike the November 2000 cabinet, the new cabinet named by Prime Minister Yonli on June 11 did not include members of the opposition.

Following a controversial ruling by the Constitutional Court that permitted him to seek another term (see Current issues, below), President Compaoré was reelected with 80 percent of the vote against 12 other candidates in balloting on November 13, 2005. He subsequently reappointed Prime Minister Yonli to head a new government which, as formed on January 7, 2006, was again dominated by the CDP, although several small parties that had supported Compaoré in the presidential poll were also included.

Constitution and Government

The 1977 constitution called for a president and a National Assembly to be elected separately for five-year terms on the basis of a multiparty system.

After the constitution was suspended in November 1980, a period of uncertain military rule followed, yielding, in August 1985, a revised government structure intended to promote “the Burkinabè identity.”

Under the new arrangement, President Sankara (as head of the National Revolutionary Council [CNR], the supreme political body) assumed responsibility for the proclamation of laws (zatu) in accordance with “the will of the people.” The “revolutionary executive” was placed under the supervision of a People’s Commission, acting in concert with a Ministerial Administrative Committee and a Ministerial Council. Within the villages, Revolutionary Defense Committees (Comités pour la Défense Révolutionnaire—CDR), which had taken over the function of tax collection from local chiefs in 1984, were designated as the ultimate repositories of “popular and insurrectional power.” Earlier, a judicial reorganization had been announced, under which Popular Revolutionary Tribunals (Tribunaux Populaires de la Révolution—TPR) were established under the jurisdiction of Appeals Courts in Ouagadougou and Bobo-Dioulasso.

A new government was formed on October 31, 1987, two weeks after Sankara’s overthrow. However, it was not until March 1988 that Captain Compaoré’s Popular Front (FP) announced that the CDRs had been abolished and replaced by Revolutionary Committees. Described as “mass socio-professional organizations,” the committees were mandated to meet every two years to modify FP programs, define the country’s political orientation, and oversee admission into the FP. Although mimicking Sankara’s call for extensive citizen involvement in government, the new regime ordered the banning of all political parties that did not align with the FP. Subsequently, the ban was relaxed for all but the most virulent opposition formations, and in August 1990 a commission was charged with drafting a new constitution. The multiparty document approved by popular referendum on June 2, 1991, provided for a separation of powers, a president and legislature elected by universal suffrage for seven- and five-year terms, respectively, and the establishment of an independent judiciary. The president has the right to name a prime minister, who must, however, be acceptable to the legislature. In April 2000 the Assembly of People’s Deputies passed a law reducing the president’s term from seven to five years, with a maximum of two terms. The new law did not affect the length of President Compaoré’s current term. It also did not address the issue of “retroactivity,” which led supporters of Compaoré to declare that he was eligible to run for a third term in 2005 (see Current issues, below). The country’s Supreme Court is split into four separate courts, namely, the Constitutional Court, the Court of Appeals, the Council of State, and the government audit office.

Administratively, the country is divided into provinces, which are subdivided into departments, arrondissements, and villages. (In early 2006 the government announced that local elections would be held in April for 49 “urban communes” and 309 “rural communes.”)

Foreign Relations

Upper Volta had consistently adhered to a moderately pro-French and pro-Western foreign policy, while stressing the importance of good relations with neighboring countries. However, after the 1983 coup, relations between Burkina Faso and France cooled, a result primarily of France’s unease over Commander Sankara’s vigorous attempts to rid the country of all vestiges of its colonial past (made manifest by the 1984 change in country name, the adoption of radical policies modeled on those of Ghana and Libya, and the widely publicized arrests of allegedly pro-French former government officials and trade unionists accused of plotting against the Sankara regime). Subsequent relations with francophone neighbors remained less than uniformly cordial, in part because of Sankara’s blunt style in attacking perceived government corruption throughout the region and his strong ideological opinions.

In December 1985 a 20-year-long controversy involving the so-called Agacher Strip at Burkina’s northern border with Mali yielded four days of fighting with approximately 300 dead on both sides. However, a ruling from the International Court of Justice on December 22, 1986, which awarded the two countries roughly equal portions of the disputed territory, largely terminated the unrest. Relations with another neighbor, Togo, were strained in 1987 over allegations of Burkinabè complicity (heatedly denied) in a September 1986 coup attempt against Togolese President Eyadema.

The October 1987 coup in Burkina Faso was manifestly welcomed by the region's most respected elder statesman, President Houphouët-Boigny of Côte d'Ivoire, with whom Captain Compaoré had long enjoyed close personal relations. Subsequently, in an attempt to gain recognition of his government and to repair strained ties with "Western-leaning" neighbors, Compaoré traveled to 13 countries during his first year in power. The long-standing border dispute with Mali was formally resolved in early 1988, followed by a resumption in relations with Togo and a border agreement with Ghana. Nevertheless, Compaoré also continued to maintain communist ties: in September 1988 he signed cooperation agreements with North Korea, and in September 1989 he was the first head of state to visit China following the crushing of that country's prodemocracy movement.

In September 1992 Malian president Alpha Oumar Konaré met in Ouagadougou with Compaoré to reactivate bilateral cooperation and to address Burkina's policy of allowing Tuaregs from Mali and Niger refuge in northern Burkina. On November 5 the United States recalled its ambassador to Burkina Faso, accusing the Compaoré government of continuing to supply arms to Charles Taylor's Liberian rebel forces despite Washington's earlier warnings about Ouagadougou's "destabilizing" involvement with Taylor.

On February 2, 1994, Ouagadougou reestablished relations with Taiwan after a 20-year lapse, thus precipitating China's suspension of relations one week later. Meanwhile, regional relations were dominated by the Tuareg dilemma, and in October Ouagadougou was the host site for successful negotiations between the Niger government and its Tuareg rebels. On a far less positive note, the refugee crisis along Burkina's border with Mali was exacerbated by intensified fighting between Tuaregs and Malian government forces. In January 1995 the United Nations reported that the number of Malian Tuareg refugees in Burkina Faso had risen to 50,000, up from 9,000 in 1993. In October Ouagadougou announced plans to send troops to join ECOMOG forces in Liberia, saying it had changed its policy because the peacemaking effort there appeared "more credible than previous ones."

Regional cooperation efforts topped Burkina's foreign policy agenda in 1996, Ouagadougou reaching agreement with Niger in March on the repatriation of that country's refugees. In March 1997 Burkina was the site for joint military exercises with Benin, Togo, and France, while in 1998 Compaoré hosted summits for representatives of combatants in the Eritrean and Ethiopian border conflict as well as participants in the civil war in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. Burkinabè troops also participated in the UN-sponsored peacekeeping mission in the Central African Republic from 1997 to 2000.

In November 1999 a violent land dispute erupted in Côte d'Ivoire between Ivoirians and Burkinabè, and by the end of the year approximately 12,000 of the Burkinabè had crossed back into Burkina in search of refuge. Following a coup attempt in Côte d'Ivoire in January 2001, the two countries' relations were strained even further, as some Ivoirian authorities unofficially implied that Burkina Faso may have been behind the overthrow effort. The Ivoirian government subsequently began forced deportations of Burkinabè who lived or were working in Côte d'Ivoire. Estimates were that 20,000 Burkinabè expatriates were exported by 2002. Throughout 2002 and into 2003, the Ivoirian government continued to blame its neighbor for promoting unrest, and there was another massive wave of Burkinabè refugees. The Compaoré government officially closed the border in September 2002 but reopened it a year later. By 2003, some 350,000 Burkinabè had fled Côte d'Ivoire. In 2003 Compaoré hosted a summit with his Ivoirian counterpart and representatives of the main rebel groups in Côte d'Ivoire in an effort to improve bilateral relations.

The government also banned several Ivorian rebel groups from using Burkina Faso to undertake political activities in Côte d'Ivoire.

On another front, in March 2000 the United Nations accused the Compaoré administration of illegally circumventing international sanctions against financing or arming Angola's UNITA rebels. According to a UN report, Burkina Faso was a "de facto base of operations for UNITA's external activities in Africa." Ouagadougou denied the allegations, which linked Burkina Faso to UNITA during the year Compaoré chaired the Organization of African Unity (OAU, subsequently the African Union—AU). Similar allegations were made in July by American and British officials, and in December, mainly due to international accusations, Burkina Faso announced that it would set up a mechanism to control its weapons trade.

In mid-2003 President Compaoré was instrumental in launching a major effort among less-developed cotton-exporting nations to get industrialized nations to curb their domestic cotton subsidies. In that regard, Burkina Faso joined other West African countries and Brazil in filing a successful complaint with the World Trade Organization against U.S. cotton subsidies.

Current Issues

In October 2003 the government announced that it had foiled a coup plot by the arrest of some 15 senior military officials, including members of the presidential guard. It was subsequently reported that the alleged leader of the plot, Capt. Luther QUALI, had been in contact with officials in Togo and Côte d'Ivoire in September, further straining already tense relations between the Compaoré administration and those two nations. Regional issues subsequently remained in the forefront of Burkinabè politics, some opposition leaders calling in October 2004 for an investigation into the possibility that Compaoré had provided support for antigovernment activity in places such as Côte d'Ivoire and Mauritania. Critics also alleged that Compaoré had assisted former Liberian president Charles Taylor in arming and training rebels from the Revolutionary United Front in Sierra Leone (see article on Sierra Leone for details).

In early 2005 Compaoré announced he would be a candidate for reelection despite the two-term limit implemented in 2000. (Compaoré's position was that the term limits could not be applied retroactively, meaning that, in theory, he was eligible for two more terms.) Not surprisingly, opposition leaders (already angered by the May 2004 reversal of election rules that had favored anti-CDP forces in the 2002 assembly poll [see Legislature, below, for details]) demanded that the Constitutional Court reject Compaoré's candidacy. However, the court quickly dismissed their demand, paving the way for Compaoré's landslide victory in November. Although his opponents cited numerous alleged irregularities, observers from the African Union and other organizations described the poll as generally fair. Compaoré clearly benefited from the failure of the opposition to coalesce behind a single candidate, while improved economic conditions also appeared to generate popular support for the incumbent. Attention subsequently turned to the local elections scheduled for late April 2006, which observers suggested might offer opposition parties a better chance for success. Meanwhile, another topic of discussion at that point was the possibility that Compaoré might be investigated by the UN court preparing to prosecute Taylor for his alleged war crimes in Sierra Leone.

Political Parties

Prior to the 1980 coup the governing party was the Voltaic Democratic Union—African Democratic Assembly (Union Démocratique Voltaïque—Rassemblement Démocratique Africain—UDV-RDA), an outgrowth of the Ivorian RDA. The UDV-RDA won 28 seats in the 1978 National Assembly election under the leadership of Malo TRAORÉ and Gérard Kango Ouédraogo. In opposition were the National Union for the Defense of Democracy (Union Nationale pour la Défense de la Démocratie—UNDD), organized by Herman Yaméogo and the Voltaic Progressive Front (FPV), a socialist grouping led by Joseph KI-ZERBO that contained a number of UDV-RDA dissidents. Most such individuals subsequently left the country, Ki-Zerbo having been accused of planning a coup against Thomas Sankara in May 1984.

Political party activity was suspended in the immediate wake of Sankara's overthrow in 1987, although several groups maintained a highly visible identity, most importantly the Patriotic League for Development (Ligue Patriotique pour le Développement—Lipad), a Marxist organization that had been founded in 1973. In March 1988 Captain Compaoré declared that while his recently created Popular Front (FP) should not be construed as a political party, separate parties would be permitted to operate within it. A year later an apparent attempt was made to create a single government party (Organization for People's Democracy—Labor Movement—ODP-MT, below). In a return pendulum swing, the Popular Front was described on the eve of its first congress in March 1990 as consisting of "four national unions and seven political groups," although details regarding some of the components were sparse. In addition, it was reported that a number of nonlegalized (but otherwise unidentified) opposition groups had been invited to send representatives to the congress.

The multiparty constitution drafted by the 1990 congress was approved by popular referendum in June 1991. By November, 44 parties had been recognized. References to the Popular Front appeared to have been dropped following the formation of the Congress of Democracy and Progress (CDP) in February 1996.

In early 1998 ten opposition parties reportedly coalesced under the banner of the United Front for Democracy and the Republic (Front Uni pour la Démocratie et la République—FUUR), a grouping whose one identifiable demand—establishment of an independent electoral commission—was met in April (after which the coalition appeared to cease activities). Subsequently, the opposition mantle appeared to have been assumed by the February 14 Group (Groupe du 14 Février—G14), a nine-party coalition that, under the leadership of the ADF, PAI, PDP, and FFS, attempted to organize a boycott of the November 1998 presidential elections after the Compaoré administration refused to make additional changes in the composition of the electoral commission.

In early 1999 yet another overlapping opposition coalition emerged—the Collective of Mass Democratic Organizations and Political Parties (Collectif des Organisations Démocratiques de Masse et de Partis Politiques—COD). Primarily comprised of union groups and political parties, the collective was led by a Sankarist, Thibaut Nan Halidou OUÉDRAOGO. Under the guidance of the leaders of the closely linked ADF and African Democratic Rally (RDA), the radical opposition refused to participate in any government-sponsored meeting or event. However, in late 1999 the Movement for Tolerance and Progress (MTP), which had theretofore been aligned with the G14, agreed to join the government. The COD and the G14 were further weakened when the ADF/RDA, CPS, MTP, PAI, and others signed a protocol with the CDP and were given cabinet posts in November 2000. There were additional significant shifts prior to the 2002 assembly balloting, the COD and G14 appearing to break apart and new coalitions, such as the Coalition of Democratic Forces, emerging as legislative opposition voices.

Some 15 opposition parties (including the UNIR/MS, UNDD, and PDS) launched an Alternance 2005 coalition in a planned effort to present a single candidate in the 2005 presidential campaign. However, no such agreement was reached.

Primary Government Party

Congress of Democracy and Progress (Congrès pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—CDP). The CDP was formed on February 6, 1996, as a result of an agreement between the ODP-MT and a number of other parties, including the CNPP-PSD, the Rally of Independent Social Democrats (Rassemblement des Social-Démocrates Indépendants—RSI), the Group of Revolutionary Democrats (Groupement des Démocrates Révolutionnaires—GDR), and the Movement for Socialist Democracy (Mouvement pour la Démocratie Socialiste—MDS). The Compaoré government's commitment to the new grouping was highlighted by the assignment of ODP-MT Executive Committee Chair Arsène Bongnessan Yè and Prime Minister Marc Christian Roch Kaboré to the CDP's presidency and vice presidency, respectively. (Some news reports described the CDP as a "merger" of the various parties, indicating that they might not retain autonomous identities within the Congress. Following is information on the OPD-MT and the CNPP-PSD as they existed immediately prior to the formation of the CDP. For information on the history of the RSI, GDR, MDS, and a number of other small parties reported to have joined the CDP, see the 2000–2002 Handbook.)

At a CDP congress on August 1, 1999, party delegates elected Kaboré to the newly created post of national executive secretary, a position that superseded both the party presidency and secretary generalship. Kaboré's ascendancy to the CDP's top post was described by some observers as evidence of a triumph for party moderates over hard-liners. Kaboré and the moderates appeared to extend their influence even further when he was elected as the new assembly president following the May 2002 legislative balloting. In June 2005 the CDP selected Compaoré as its candidate in the upcoming presidential balloting.

Leaders: Blaise COMPAORÉ (State President), Ernest Paramanga YONLI (Prime Minister), Marc Christian Roch KABORÉ (National Executive Secretary of the Party and President of the National Assembly), Pierre Joseph Emmanuel TAPSOBA, Salif DIALLO.

Organization for People's Democracy—Labor Movement (Organisation pour la Démocratie Populaire—Mouvement Travailiste—ODP-MT). The leftist ODP-MT was launched on April 15, 1989, as a means of unifying "all political tendencies in the country." Most prominently associated with the new formation was the Union of Burkinabè Communists (Union des Communistes Burkinabè—UCB), the demise of which was announced by its leader, Clément Oumarou OUEDRAOGO, on April 17, plus a number of dissidents from the former Union of Communist Struggles from which the UCB had earlier split.

During a congress in Ouagadougou in March 1991, the ODP-MT endorsed Compaoré's candidacy in the forthcoming presidential balloting and formally abandoned Marxism-Leninism in favor of free enterprise and a market economy. Meanwhile, in anticipation of multiparty elections, the ODP-MT moved to position itself as an independent grouping within the Popular Front, thus abandoning efforts to present the image of a nonhierarchical coalition. In July the party denounced opposition calls for a national conference, describing conference results elsewhere on the continent as equivalent to "civilian coup d'états."

In early 1996 the ODP-MT renounced its status as a "revolutionary party of the democratic masses" to become a "social democratic" party, shortly thereafter spearheading the formation of the CDP.

Leaders: Marc Christian Roch KABORÉ, Capt. Arsène Bongnessan YÈ, Naboho KANIDOUA (General Secretary).

National Convention of Progressive Patriots-Social Democratic Party (Convention Nationale des Patriotes Progressistes—Parti Social-Démocrate—CNPP-PSD). The CNPP-PSD was expelled from the Popular Front in March 1991 for criticizing ODP-MT policies and calling for a national conference. The party subsequently emerged as the opposition's most powerful force, winning 12 assembly seats as runner-up to the ODP-MT in May 1992.

Former party leader Pierre TAPSOBA's retirement from political life in May 1993 reportedly ignited a parliamentary power struggle that climaxed with the breakup of the CNPP-PSD's coalition with Joseph KI-ZERBO'S USDI (see under PDP, below).

The CNPP-PSD's decision to join its former Popular Front allies in the formation of the CDP in early 1996 was considered a major political victory for the Compaoré administration.

Leaders: Mamadou SIMPORÉ, Moussa BOLY.

Other Parliamentary Parties

Coalition of Democratic Forces (Coalition des Forces Démocratiques—CFD). Formed prior to the 2002 legislative election, the center-left CFD comprised the UVDB, the MTP, and a number of smaller parties. The CFD secured five seats in the assembly balloting. The new RDEB (see below), formed in October 2002, effectively became a member of the CFD in October 2002, when Ram Ouédraogo quit the UVDB but remained as the national coordinator of the CFD. The CFD secured five seats in the 2002 assembly balloting, and it was reported that the primary education and literacy cabinet post was awarded to a CFD member in June. However, the formal status of the CFD's relationship to the Compaoré administration remained unclear.

Leader: Ram OUÉDRAOGO (National Coordinator).

Greens of Burkina (Les Verts du Burkina). This party is a partial successor to the Union of Greens for the Development of Burkina (Union des Verts pour le Développement du Burkina—UVDB), launched in 1991. UVDB leader Ram Ouédraogo had the distinction of being the first opposition member to announce his presidential candidacy in 1991. However, prior to the December balloting, he withdrew in conjunction with the other opposition candidates.

In 1998 Ouédraogo campaigned for the presidency on a UVDB platform highlighted by a call for the elevation of water management issues to the forefront of national policymaking concerns. He finished second in the November presidential balloting, garnering just 6.61 percent of the vote. In October 1999 Ouédraogo was named a minister of state in the Kadré Ouédraogo government. He kept his position after the formation of the new government in November 2000 but was not retained in June 2002.

Following the 2002 legislative balloting, disagreements broke out over the scope of cooperation between the UVDB and other opposition parties, and Ouédraogo left the UVDB to form the RDEB (below). The rump UVDB subsequently adopted the party's current rubric.

Leader: Ali Diaby KASSAMBA (President).

Rally of the Ecologists of Burkina (Rassemblement des Ecologistes du Burkina—RDEB). A moderate green party, the RDEB was formed by former UVDB leader Ram Ouédraogo in October 2002. He finished fifth in the 2005 presidential balloting with 2.03 percent of the vote.

Leader: Ram OUÉDRAOGO (President and 2005 presidential candidate).

Movement for Tolerance and Progress (Mouvement pour la Tolérance et le Progrès—MTP). The moderate Sankarist MTP was formed as an "anti-imperialist and national-progressive" grouping in late 1990. Its leader, Emmanuel Nayabtigungu Congo Kaboré, is a former CNR general secretary of government who has called for the maintenance of good relations with the Compaoré administration. To that end, in 1999 Kaboré accepted a post in the government. He kept his position after the formation of the new government in November 2000, but, as was the case with other "opposition" ministers, he was not retained in the June 2002 cabinet. Kaboré finished last in the 2005 presidential poll with 0.31 percent of the vote.

Leader: Emmanuel Nayabtigungu Congo KABORÉ (Secretary General and 2005 presidential candidate).

African Party for Independence (Parti Africaine pour l'Indépendance—PAI). Prior to Sankara's overthrow, the PAI's leader, Soumane Touré, was reportedly targeted for execution by the UCB. Despite Touré's reported allegiance to the Compaoré regime, the PAI joined the opposition February 14 Group in early 1998. However, in August the PAI withdrew from the coalition, a schism having emerged in the party between factions led by Touré, who favored participating in the November presidential polling, and Philippe Ouédraogo, who agreed with boycott plans. At a September 13 meeting, Touré was ousted by Ouédraogo, and the group subsequently announced plans to observe the boycott. Rejecting this decision, Touré claimed that he and his followers represented the “true PAI” and continued to use the rubric. In November 2000 Touré’s wing signed a protocol with the CDP and others and was given cabinet posts. Ouédraogo’s wing stayed in opposition, however. The two factions subsequently fought over the right to use the PAI rubric.

The PAI won five seats in the 2002 assembly balloting, and it was reported that a PAI member was named to the June 2002 cabinet as minister of animal resources. However, apparently underscoring continued PAI disputes, Philippe Ouédraogo was subsequently described as the leader of a strongly anti-Compaoré faction in the assembly known as the Justice and Democracy Parliamentary Group.

Two PAI ministers were reportedly dismissed from the cabinet in September 2005 in an apparent response by Compaoré to Touré’s announcement that he intended to oppose Compaoré in the upcoming presidential election. (Touré finished eighth in that poll with 1.12 percent, while Ouédraogo ran as the candidate of the PDS [below]).

Leaders: Soumane TOURÉ (2005 presidential candidate).

Alliance for Democracy and Federation/African Democratic Rally (Alliance pour la Démocratie et la Fédération/Rassemblement Démocratique Africain—ADF/RDA). The ADF/RDA, a merger between the ADF and RDA, was launched in May 1998. The ADF had been formed in December 1990 by Herman Yaméogo, founder of the UNDD, whose previous party had been expelled from the Popular Front in July 1990, largely because of criticism from intraparty critics of Yaméogo.

In February 1991 the ADF called for an immediate amnesty for all political prisoners, the appointment of a transitional government, and “democratization” of the press. By midyear Yaméogo had emerged as the opposition’s most prominent government critic, denouncing Compaoré’s unwillingness to hold a national conference and calling for the dissolution of the ODP-MT–dominated cabinet named on June 16. On July 26 Yaméogo was himself named agriculture minister, but on August 17 he and two other ADF members resigned from the government in a dispute over electoral procedure. Subsequently, Yaméogo announced his presidential candidacy; however, he and the other opposition candidates subsequently withdrew from the December 1 balloting. Somewhat inexplicably, Yaméogo again rejoined the cabinet as a minister of state in February 1992. The party participated in the May legislative poll, capturing four seats, and in June Yaméogo was redesignated minister of state. In legislative balloting in May 1997 the ADF fielded candidates in 33 of the 45 provinces but captured only two seats. Subsequently, Yaméogo was not included in the cabinet named in June. A leading component of the February 14 Group, the ADF boycotted the 1998 presidential elections. In December Yaméogo was detained by government security forces following the outbreak of anti-Compaoré unrest.

Formed in 1946 as an outgrowth of the Ivorian RDA, the RDA was a partner in the ruling UDV-RDA grouping that was unseated by the 1980 coup. At a party congress on October 13, 1991, former prime minister Gérard Kango Ouédraogo was selected as the party’s presidential nominee, although he, like other opposition figures, subsequently withdrew his candidacy. The party captured six seats in the May 1992 balloting, and an RDA member, Clement SANOU, was included in the government named in June. Compaoré’s appointment of Sanou was greeted with suspicion however, with Africa Confidential suggesting that the president was attempting to create friction within the RDA. The RDA presented candidates in slightly more than half of the polling districts in 1997, retaining only two seats.

The Party of the Convergence of Liberties and Integration (Parti de la Convergence pour les Libertés et l'Intégration—PCLI) joined the ADF/RDA subsequent to the 1998 merger. The ADF/RDA signed a protocol with the CDP and others and was given cabinet posts in November 2000, although it returned to formal opposition status following the May 2002 legislative poll, in which it finished second to the CDP. Leadership disagreements within the ADF/RDA in 2003 led Yaméogo to quit the party and form the UNDD (below). Subsequently, the ADF/RDA supported President Compaoré in his reelection bid in 2005, and ADF/RDA leader Gilbert Ouédraogo was appointed to the new cabinet in January 2006.

Leaders: Gilbert Noël OUÉDRAOGO (President), Gérard Kango OUÉDRAOGO (Honorary President), Dabo HAMADOU (Vice President).

National Union for Democracy and Development (Union Nationale pour la Démocratie et le Développement—UNDD). The UNDD was launched in mid-2003 by Herman Yaméogo, one of the country's leading opposition figures, following a leadership squabble within the ADF/RDA. Among other things, Yaméogo had been accused by other ADF/RDA members of acting "too independently." The UNDD selected Yaméogo as its 2005 presidential candidate, but Yaméogo and the party formally withdrew the candidacy to protest the decision by the Constitutional Court to permit President Compaoré to run for another term. The UNDD called for "civil disobedience" in view of the court's ruling.

Leader: Herman YAMÉOGO (Chair), Mathieu N'DO.

Convention of Sankarist Parties (Convention des Partis Sankaristes—CPS). Also referenced as the Sankarist Panafrican Convention (Convention Panafricaine Sankariste), the CPS was formed in mid-1999 by the BSB, the United Social Democracy Party (Parti de la Démocratie Sociale Unifié—PDSU), a breakaway faction of the FFS and other small groups. The CPS signed a protocol with the CDP and others and was given cabinet posts in November 2000, a decision that reportedly caused internal CPS tensions.

Leader: Ernest Nongoma OUÉDRAOGO (President).

Burkinabè Socialist Bloc (Bloc Socialiste Burkinabè—BSB). The BSB traces its lineage to the Democratic and Popular Rally—Thomas Sankara (Rassemblement Démocratique et Populaire—Thomas Sankara—RDP-TS), a clandestine resistance movement formed by supporters of the former president following the October 1987 coup. RDP-TS members were subsequently absorbed into the Sankarist Movement (Mouvement Sankariste—MS), an anti-Compaoré group, which was formed on August 4, 1988, the "revolution's" fifth anniversary. The MS, in turn, gave rise in November 1991 to the BSB (led by Ernest Nongoma Ouédraogo), which opposes Compaoré but is not part of the prodemocracy opposition.

The BSB boycotted the May 1992 assembly election, although one of its members, the United Forces (Forces Unies—FU), broke ranks to contest the poll. In August 1995 Ouédraogo was sentenced to six months imprisonment for allegedly accusing Compaoré of fraudulently amassing a personal fortune. Because of his conviction, Ouédraogo was forbidden from participating in the 1997 legislative elections; however, in March 1998 Compaoré pardoned him.

Leader: Ernest Nongoma OUÉDRAOGO.

Party for Democracy and Progress/Socialist Party (Parti pour la Démocratie et le Progrès/Parti Socialiste—PDP/PS). The PDP was launched in May 1993 by Joseph Ki-Zerbo in the aftermath of a struggle that erupted when a parliamentary coalition between Ki-Zerbo's Union of Independent Social Democrats (Union des Sociaux-Démocrates Indépendants—USDI) and the CNPP-PSD splintered following the retirement of the latter's leader.

Ki-Zerbo had previously been linked to the Voltaic Progressive Front (Front Progressiste Voltaïque—FPV), which he and a group of UDV-RDA dissidents had formed prior to the 1980 coup. The socialist-oriented FPV was proscribed until early 1991, when its longtime leader was amnestied; he returned from eight years in exile the following September.

The PDP, operating under the umbrella of the February 14 Group, boycotted the 1998 presidential elections. In May 2001 the PDP merged with the Burkinabè Socialist Party (Parti Socialiste Burkinabè—PSB), and the present name was adopted. Led by François Ouédraogo, the PSB was a breakaway formation from the PAI.

Under the leadership of Ki-Zerbo, described as one of the fiercest critics of the Compaoré administration, the PDP boycotted the 2000 municipal elections. However, the party presented candidates in the May 2002 assembly balloting, increasing its representation from six to ten. Disaffected PDP/PS members in 2002 formed a People's Movement for Socialism/Federal Party (Mouvement du Peuple pour le Socialisme/Parti Fédéral—MPS/PF), which subsequently launched an electoral coalition with PAREN (below). Ali Lankoandé finished sixth (with 1.74 percent of the vote) as the candidate of the PDP/PS in the 2005 presidential election.

Leaders: Joseph KI-ZERBO (President), Sébastien ZABSONRE (General Secretary), François OUÉDRAOGO, Ali LANKOANDÉ (2005 presidential candidate).

Union for Rebirth/Sankarist Movement (Union pour la Renaissance/Mouvement Sankariste—UNIR/MS). Formed in 2000 under the leadership of Bénéwendé Sankara, the UNIR/MS won three seats in the 2002 assembly elections. In addition, Sankara, a lawyer and prominent human rights activist, finished second in the 2005 presidential poll with 4.95 percent of the vote.

Leader: Bénéwendé SANKARA (2005 presidential candidate).

Party for Democracy and Socialism (Parti pour la Démocratie et la Socialisme—PDS). After gaining representation in the 2002 assembly balloting, the PDS reportedly presented Philippe Ouédraogo, formerly of the PAI (above), as its 2005 presidential candidate. He finished fourth with 2.28 percent of the vote.

Leader: Félix SOUBEIGA.

A number of minor parties gained representation in the assembly in the May 2002 elections including: the Alliance for Progress and Freedom (Alliance pour le Progrès et la Liberté—APL), led by Joséphine TAMBOURA-SAMA; the National Convention of Progressive Democrats (Convention Nationale des Démocrates Progressistes—CNDP), formed in 2000 and led by Alfred KABORÉ; the Patriotic Front for Change (Front Patriotique pour le Changement—FPC), a Sankarist party led by Tahirou Ibrahim ZON; and the Union of Independent Progressive Democrats (Union des Démocrates et Progressistes Indépendants—UDPI), which was formed in 2000 by dissidents from the G14 under the leadership of Longo DONGO.

Other Parties and Groups

Party for National Renaissance (Parti pour la Renaissance Nationale—PAREN). This party was launched in 1989 by Laurent Bado, who claimed that PAREN was neither socialist nor capitalist, but rather “Africanist.” In August 2003 PAREN and the MPS/PF (above) formed an electoral coalition called the United Opposition of Burkina (Opposition Burkinabè Uni—OBU). As the PAREN/OBU candidate, Bado finished third in the 2005 presidential poll with 2.61 percent of the vote.

Leader: Laurent BADO (2005 presidential candidate).

African Convention for Democracy (Convention Africain pour la Démocratie—CAD). The CAD was reportedly admitted to the cabinet in November 2000.

Convention for Democracy and Federation (Convention pour la Démocratie et la Fédération—CDF). The CDF is a breakaway formation launched by, among others, a former ADF/RDA parliamentarian.

Refuser's Front/African Democratic Rally (Front de Refus/Rassemblement Démocratique Africain—FR/RDA). The Refuser's Front is a breakaway faction of the RDA. Its leader, Frederic Fernand Guima, finished third in the 1998 presidential balloting.

Leader: Frederic Fernand GUIMA.

Social Forces Front (Front des Forces Sociales—FFS). A purported "Sankarist" group, the FFS was launched in October 1996. In 1998 the FFS gained national attention for its vocal role in the February 14 Group. The government accused FFS leader Norbert Tiendrébéogo of being involved in a coup plot in 2003, but Tiendrébéogo was subsequently exonerated. Tiendrébéogo finished seventh in the 2005 presidential poll with 1.6 percent of the vote.

Leader: Norbert Michel TIENDRÉBÉOGO (Chair and 2005 presidential candidate).

Other major parties that participated in the 2002 elections but failed to gain representation included the National Democratic Party (Parti Démocratique National—PDN), led by Karamoko KONÉ; the Party for Progress and Social Development (Parti pour le Progrès et le Développement Social—PPDS), led by Basile COMBARY; the Unified Socialist Party (Parti Socialiste Unifié—PSU), formed in 2001 by Benoît LOMPO; and the Democrats and Patriots Group (Groupe des Démocrates et Patriotes—GDP), led by Issa TIENDRÉBÉOGO.

Legislature

The former National Assembly (Assemblée Nationale) was dissolved following the 1980 coup, and no successor body was established under the Sankara regime. The 1991 constitution provided for a 107-member Assembly of People's Deputies with a five-year mandate, balloting for which was initially scheduled for January 12, 1992, but subsequently postponed until May 24. The current basic law also provides for a second, consultative chamber (General Conference of the Nation [Conférence Générale de la Nation]), which had not been formally constituted as of early 2006.

Assembly of People's Deputies (Assemblée des Députés Populaires). In January 1997 the assembly approved a constitutional amendment increasing its seat total from 97 to 111. Election is conducted via a proportional system that was revised in advance of the 2002 balloting in order to promote greater opposition representation. Under the new changes, 90 deputies were elected in 2002 from 15 electoral districts (reduced from the previous 45 districts), and 21 deputies were elected from a national list. However, controversial legislation approved narrowly by the assembly in 2004 appeared to set the stage for a return to the old system for subsequent elections. Twenty-seven parties participated in the 1992 assembly balloting, 13 in 1997, and 30 in 2002.

The distribution of seats following the May 5, 2002, balloting was as follows: Congress of Democracy and Progress, 57; Alliance for Democracy and Federation/African Democratic Rally, 17;

Party for Democracy and Progress/Socialist Party, 10; African Party for Independence, 5; Coalition of Democratic Forces, 5; Party for National Renaissance, 4; Convention of Sankarist Parties, 3; Union for Renaissance/Sankarist Movement, 3; National Convention of Progressive Democrats, 2; Party for Democracy and Socialism, 2; Alliance for Progress and Freedom, 1; Patriotic Front for Change, 1; and Union of Independent Progressive Democrats, 1.

President: Marc Christian Roch KABORÉ.

BURUNDI

REPUBLIC OF BURUNDI

Republika y'u Burundi (Kirundi)

République du Burundi (French)

The Country

Situated in east-central Africa, bordered by Rwanda, Tanzania, and the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Burundi is a country of grassy uplands and high plateaus. It is one of the most densely populated countries in Africa, with over 400 persons per square mile. There are three main ethnic groups: the Hutu (Bahutu), who constitute 84 percent of the population; the Tutsi (Batutsi, Watutsi), who are numerically a minority (15 percent) but have long dominated the country politically, socially, and economically; and the Twa, or pygmies (1 percent). A majority of the population is nominally Christian, primarily Roman Catholic. Women account for almost half of the labor force, although they are concentrated in subsistence activities, with men predominant in paid labor. Female representation in politics and government was traditionally minimal, although the prime minister from July 1993 to February 1994 was a woman. Under the new constitution adopted in 2005 significant female representation is guaranteed in the Parliament, and there are eight women in the current cabinet.

One of the world's least-developed countries (average per capita income is less than $1 per day), Burundi remains dependent on agriculture: more than 90 percent of its inhabitants are farmers, primarily at the subsistence level, while coffee typically accounts for about 80 percent of export earnings. The small industrial sector consists for the most part of agricultural processing. At present, small quantities of cassiterite, gold, columbite-tantalite, and wolframite are extracted, while exploitation of a major deposit of nickel and potentially significant reserves of phosphate, petroleum, and uranium await construction of transport infrastructure.

Officials from the International Monetary Fund (IMF) in 1992 reported that the second phase of an economic reform program had produced "progress toward sustainable economic growth." However, the outbreak of civil conflict in 1993 and the subsequent withdrawal of international assistance yielded negative growth in 1993–1995. In mid-1996 it was estimated that fighting between Hutus and Tutsis had left over 150,000 dead in the previous three years, and, following the military coup in July, the nation's already extremely unstable security and economic conditions deteriorated even further.

The country's ongoing civil strife subsequently continued to constrain the government's ability to collect revenues, as did smuggling and a general economic downturn. GDP fell by an estimated 1 percent in 1999, partially as the result of the declining price for coffee (Burundi's main source of foreign exchange) and impaired transportation infrastructure, which significantly impeded the movement of goods. The transition government installed in late 2001 under a new power-sharing agreement (see Political background, below) immediately launched an appeal for international aid to assist reconstruction, combat what was described as an "alarming level of poverty," and facilitate the expected repatriation of hundreds of thousands of refugees from neighboring countries. Modest recovery, albeit from a very low base, subsequently ensued, GDP growing by 2.1 percent in 2002 while inflation registered approximately 4 percent. The relative political stability also permitted the deployment of regional peacekeepers and the resumption of foreign aid by the IMF, the World Bank, and others.

Upon the installation of a new government of national unity in 2005, it was estimated that 300,000 people had lost their lives in the 12-year civil war. Collaterally, GDP had declined by more than a third. Among other distressing indicators, nearly 60 percent of the country's children suffered from stunted growth due to poor nutrition, according to one relief agency.

Government and Politics

Political Background

Established in the 16th century as a feudal monarchy ruled by the Tutsi, Burundi (formerly Urundi) was incorporated into German East Africa in 1895 and came under Belgian administration as a result of World War I. From 1919 to 1962 it formed the southern half of the Belgian-administered League of Nations mandate (later The United Nations Trust Territory) of Ruanda-Urundi. Retaining its monarchical form of government under indigenous Tutsi rulers (mwami), Urundi was granted limited self-government in 1961 and achieved full independence as the Kingdom of Burundi on July 1, 1962.

Rivalry between Tutsi factions and between Tutsis and Hutus resulted in the assassination of Prime Minister Pierre NGENDANDUMWE in January 1965 and an abortive Hutu coup the following October. The uprising led to repressive action by government troops under the command of Capt. Michel MICOMBERO. Named prime minister as the result of military intervention in July 1966, Micombero suspended the constitution, dissolved the National Assembly, and on November 28 deposed King NATARE V. In addition to naming himself president of the newly proclaimed Republic of Burundi, Micombero took over the presidency of the Union and National Progress (Union et Progrés National—Uprona), the Tutsi-dominated political party that was accorded monopoly status.

Despite antigovernment plots in 1969 and 1971, the Micombero regime was generally able to contain conflict in the immediate postcoup era. In 1972, however, the mysterious death of the former king and another attempted Hutu uprising provoked renewed reprisals by Micombero's Tutsi supporters. At least 100,000 deaths (largely of Hutus) ensued, with countless thousands fleeing to neighboring countries.

On November 1, 1976, Micombero was overthrown in a bloodless coup led by Lt. Col. Jean-Baptiste BAGAZA, who suspended the constitution and announced that formal power under the "Second Republic" would be assumed by a 30-member Supreme Council of the Revolution with himself as head of state. At an Uprona congress in December 1979 the council was abolished, effective January 1980, and its functions transferred to a party Central Committee headed by the president. On October 22, 1982, elections were held for a new National Assembly and for pro forma reconfirmation of Bagaza as chief executive. Following his redesignation as party leader at the Uprona congress of July 25–27, 1984, Bagaza was nominated for a third presidential term (the first by direct election), obtaining a reported 99.6 percent of the vote in a referendum on August 31.

Bagaza's subsequent administration was marked by progressively more stringent measures against the Roman Catholic Church, which traditionally maintained strong links with the Hutu community. Many Tutsis eventually joined the condemnation of "dictatorial" anticlerical measures such as the expulsion and imprisonment of Church leaders and the proscription of weekday masses. Amid growing alienation, Bagaza was ousted in a bloodless revolt on September 3, 1987, while attending a francophone summit in Canada. The leader of the coup, Maj. Pierre BUYOYA, suspended the constitution, dissolved the National Assembly, and named a 31-member Military Committee for National Salvation (Comité Militaire pour le Salut National—CMSN) to exercise provisional authority. On September 9 the CMSN designated Buyoya as president of the "Third Republic," and on October 1 Buyoya announced the formation of a new government, pledging that the "military will not remain in power long."

On October 19, 1988, following a renewal of Tutsi-Hutu conflict, Buyoya named a 23-member cabinet that contained an unprecedented majority of Hutus, including Adrien SIBOMANA as occupant of the newly reestablished post of prime minister. However, the timetable for a return to constitutional rule remained unclear, and the CMSN, composed entirely of Tutsis, remained the dominant decision-making body until mid-1990, when it was replaced by the National Security Council (Conseil National de Sécurité—CSN), an 11-member civilian grouping of six Tutsis and five Hutus.

In furtherance of President Buyoya's campaign for ethnic reconciliation, a national charter calling for "unity, respect for human rights and freedom of expression" was endorsed by Uprona in December 1990 and adopted by popular referendum on February 5, 1991. In accordance with charter provisions calling for an end to military rule, Buyoya on March 22 empowered a 35-member constitutional commission to outline the framework of a multiparty system. The commission's report, released on September 10, served as the basis of a pluralist constitution that was approved by an overwhelming majority in a popular referendum on March 9, 1992, and promulgated four days later.

On November 17, 1992, President Buyoya appointed a national electoral commission charged with overseeing the legislative and presidential balloting scheduled for 1993. The 33-member body included two representatives from each of eight registered political parties, with the balance drawn from a broad spectrum of public and religious organizations.

At the presidential election of June 1, 1993, the Hutu opposition candidate, Melchior NDADAYE, was a better than three-to-one victor over Buyoya, and at legislative balloting on June 29 Ndayaye's Front for Democracy in Burundi (Front pour la Démocratie au Burundi—Frodebu) won 65 of 81 seats. Despite international praise for the electoral process, some 5,000 Tutsis took part in street demonstrations denouncing the "ethnic nature" of the Hutu victories, and on July 3 an abortive coup attempt by troops loyal to Buyoya was reported.

On July 10, 1993, Ndadaye reached out to the previously dominant ethnic group and included seven Uprona members in a new cabinet that was also headed by a Tutsi, Sylvie KINIGI, as prime minister. Pledging continuance of his predecessor's reconciliation program, Ndadaye in September amnestied 5,000 prisoners (earlier he had granted clemency to Bagaza, allowing the former president to return from six years in exile). In early October Ndadaye announced plans to begin the repatriation of the approximately 300,000 Burundians displaced by earlier conflicts.

Optimism engendered by the reconciliation effort was dashed on October 21, 1993, when Ndadaye, the National Assembly president, and a number of senior Hutu government officials were slain during an abortive military coup attempt spearheaded by Tutsi paratroopers. The rebellion ended within two days as senior military personnel, some of whom had been implicated in the plot, sought to disassociate themselves from an ethnic frenzy unleashed by the president's assassination. In addition to a number of senior Tutsi officers from the Burore region, the coup plotters allegedly included Bagaza; the recently appointed army chief-of-staff, Col. Jean BIKOMAGU; and François NGEZE, a former interior minister and vocal critic of the new administration, who on October 21 was named president of the rebels' short-lived National Committee of Public Salvation (an appointment he later claimed was forced on him). Denying involvement in the uprising, Bikomagu on October 24 offered to aid in reestablishing the government in exchange for an amnesty; however, the offer was rejected by Prime Minister Kinigi, who said from refuge in the French embassy that she would remain underground until the military had returned to barracks and an international protective force had been established for the government.

By October 24, 1993, most of the rebel soldiers had fled Bujumbura in fear of a massing of pro-government troops and revenge-minded Ndadaye supporters. On November 2, following the arrest of at least ten of the plotters, including Ngeze, Kinigi emerged from her embassy sanctuary to retake control of the government. Six days later she met with 15 cabinet ministers under the protection of a French special forces unit to discuss ways of ending the tribal bloodbath that had left 10,000 dead and hundreds of thousands exiled in Rwanda, Tanzania, and Zaire.

On January 13, 1994, the National Assembly elected a Hutu moderate, Agriculture Minister Cyprien NTARYAMIRE, to the presidency. However, Ntaryamire and Rwandan President Habyarimana were killed in an airplane bombing over Kigali, Rwanda, on April 6, 1994. On April 8 Sylvester NTIBANTUNGANYA, who had been elected assembly president on December 23, 1993, became Ntaryamire's acting successor.

Amid escalating violence, opposition leaders boycotted talks on the selection of a new president in June 1994. However, on July 13 a power-sharing agreement was concluded, under which Frodebu was to be awarded control of 9 provinces and 74 communes, with opposition groups being given 7 provinces and 48 communes. A follow-up "Convention on Government" was signed on September 10, under which 45 percent of cabinet posts, including the prime ministership and interior ministry, were to be allocated to the Uprona-led opposition, with the defense and justice portfolios reserved for "neutral persons." Subsequently, the convention's nomination of the acting president for a regular term was ratified by the National Assembly, with swearing-in ceremonies on October 1. Instability nonetheless continued, with the controversial election on December 3 of Frodebu's Jean MINANI as National Assembly speaker being defended by the Uprona prime minister, Anatole KANYENKIKO, who had succeeded Kinigi in February. Opposition to Minani led to his replacement by Léonce NGENDAKUMANA on January 12, 1995, while Kanyenkiko was, in turn, obliged to resign on February 15 after being expelled from Uprona for indiscipline in regard to the Minani affair. With the appointment of the Uprona-nominated Antoine NDUWAYO as Kanyenkiko's successor as prime minister on February 20, the political crisis appeared to ease, although Tanzania reported that some 25,000 refugees had crossed its border with Burundi since the first of the month.

A new cycle of fighting erupted following the murder on March 11, 1995, of a prominent Hutu leader, Ernest KABUSHEMEYE, prompting another wave of refugees into Zaire and Tanzania. Meanwhile, President Ntibantunganya rejected proposals (apparently advanced by U.S. officials) that the problems of Burundi and Rwanda be addressed by the creation of two ethnically based countries, in effect a "Hutuland" and a "Tutsiland." In July the UN announced the formation of a commission of inquiry into the October 1993 coup attempt and urged the feuding political groups to begin peace negotiations, warning that the UN could only play a minor role in ending the conflict.

Following the killing of at least 58 Tutsis at a displaced persons camp in early August 1995, Prime Minister Nduwayo claimed that former Rwandan soldiers and militiamen (both Hutu-dominated) were responsible for at least "two-thirds of the recent violence." Nduwayo's assertion worsened the already incendiary debate within the cabinet over which ethnic group was responsible for the latest round of violence, and on October 12 Ntibantunganya reshuffled the government, ousting the most vocal combatants and replacing them with less "partisan" ministers. The violence nonetheless continued, and in December three of the ten parties participating in the government withdrew.

With ethnic fighting intensifying, the United States and the European Union (EU) suspended aid payments to Burundi, citing the government's failure to end the violence. President Ntibantunganya and Prime Minister Nduwayo agreed in principle in early July 1996 to the deployment of foreign peacekeeping forces to quell ethnic violence and protect Burundi's infrastructure, borders, and political leaders. That plan was denounced by militants in both the Tutsi and Hutu camps, however, and, following the massacre by Hutu rebels of over 300 Tutsis in a camp on July 20, antigovernment demonstrations broke out in Bujumbura and other cities. After being stoned by Tutsi mourners at funeral services for the massacre victims, President Ntibantunganya sought refuge in the U.S. embassy on July 23. The next day Uprona announced it was withdrawing from the coalition government, and on July 25 the military declared that it had taken power, dismissed the government, suspended the constitution and the National Assembly, and appointed former president Buyoya head of state. (Prime Minister Nduwayo accepted his dismissal, but President Ntibantunganya subsequently insisted that he remained the nation's lawful head of state.) On July 31 Maj. Buyoya announced the appointment of Pascal Firmin NDIRIMIRA, a Hutu member of Uprona, as prime minister, and a new 25-member Uprona-based government was formed on August 2. Despite Maj. Buyoya's reputation as a "moderate" among Tutsi military leaders and the credit he had received for the orderly transfer of power three years earlier, the July 1996 coup was broadly denounced by the United Nations, Western capitals, and, most strongly, by neighboring states, who immediately imposed severe economic sanctions against Burundi. For his part, asserting that the military had taken over only to “stop the bloodshed,” Maj. Buyoya called for a three-year transitional period prior to a return to civilian government and pledged to clamp down on military abuses.

On September 12, 1996, in the face of the strong international condemnation of the coup, Buyoya declared that the assembly suspension had been lifted and that political party activity could resume. However, only 37 of 81 legislators participated in the reopening of the assembly on October 7, contributing factors including the recent murder of a number of legislators, an opposition boycott, and apathy resulting from the fact that the suspension of the constitution had left the body virtually powerless. On October 11–12 regional leaders meeting in Arusha, Tanzania, decided to maintain the economic sanctions against Bujumbura despite the regime’s announcement on October 11 that it intended to hold unconditional peace talks with the dominant rebel group—the National Council for the Defense of Democracy (Conseil National pour la Défense de Démocratie—CNDD). Moreover, in late 1996 both the UN and Amnesty International charged the regime with responsibility for the reoccurring massacres that had taken place since July.

In March 1997 the government announced that it had arrested eight people (five of whom belonged to former president Bagaza’s Party for National Recovery [Parti pour le Recouvrement National—Parena]) for their alleged roles in a coup plot against the president as well as bomb attacks in Bujumbura. Despite continued violence, in mid-April regional leaders agreed to loosen sanctions on humanitarian supplies. On June 7 former president Ntibantunganya left the U.S. embassy, declaring his intention to resume his political life and calling for the opening of peace talks. One week later Buyoya asked for international assistance in establishing a genocide tribunal to punish those responsible for the recent ethnic violence. However, the UN Security Council rejected his request, citing continued high levels of instability.

Following intense negotiations on a power-sharing agreement between Buyoya and Hutu remnants in the assembly (led by Speaker Léonce Ngendakumana), Buyoya signed a transitional constitution into law on June 6, 1998. Provisions included enlargement of the assembly, the formal recognition of established political parties, and formation of a transitional government. Consequently, Buyoya was officially sworn in as president on June 11, and the following day he appointed two vice presidents, including Frodebu leader Frederic BAMVUGINYUMVIRA, to assume responsibilities formerly held by the prime minister, whose post was abolished. On June 13 the president appointed a new cabinet, 13 of whose 22 members were Hutus, while the Transitional National Assembly was inaugurated on July 18, new members representing small parties as well as social and professional groups (see Legislature, below).

Regional leaders meeting in Tanzania in early September 1997 agreed to maintain economic sanctions against the Burundian regime, warning President Buyoya that “additional measures” would be considered unless progress was made toward restoration of civilian government. Buyoya had declined to participate in the summit’s proposed peace talks, in part, reportedly, out of conviction that Tanzania was “pro-Hutu.” (It was estimated that as many as 300,000 Hutu refugees were encamped inside the Tanzanian border.) In his defense, Buyoya appeared to be attempting to follow a difficult middle course between the militant Hutu guerrilla groups, who had been fighting since 1993 to take over the government, and predominantly Tutsi hard-liners in the government and military, who opposed negotiations of any sort with the “rebels.” At the same time, Western capitals remained concerned over the Buyoya regime’s refusal to permit the resumption of normal political party activity as well as its highly controversial “resettlement” program in which perhaps as many as 600,000 people were confined to “refugee” camps. Although the government argued that the measures were designed to protect people displaced by guerrilla activity, critics argued that Hutus were being placed in the camps so that they could not offer support to the rebels.

Perhaps in part to improve his “battered image” in the West, President Buyoya in March 1998

agreed to participate in talks with representatives of Frodebu, the CNDD, and other factions. A series of peace talks began in June under the leadership of Julius Nyerere, the former Tanzanian president representing the regional nations who had imposed economic sanctions. During the fourth round of negotiations in January 1999, the sanctions were lifted, following earlier calls for their suspension or cessation by the EU and UN Security Council. The power-sharing agreement reached six months earlier between the government and the opposition appeared to have persuaded critics of the regime that it was making progress.

Peace negotiations in Tanzania dragged on through 1999, the slow pace of the discussions reflecting not only the complexity of the issues but also the reality that divisions had shifted in part from strictly along party lines to intraparty disagreements between peacemakers and hard-liners.

Following Nyerere's death in October 1999, former South African president Nelson Mandela assumed the task of facilitating the negotiations. He announced in May 2000 that an agreement in principle had been reached, and a partial, preliminary agreement was signed on August 28. However, details remained to be settled regarding highly sensitive issues such as the length and composition of a transitional government, the specifics of the new electoral system, and the integration of the nation's security forces. Highly contentious negotiations on these matters dragged on for months, as did efforts by the government to negotiate a cease-fire with the Hutu rebel groups that had rejected the accord—the Forces for the Defense of Democracy (Forces pour la Défense de Démocratie—FDD) and the National Forces of Liberation (Forces Nationales de la Libération—FNL). Finally, following mediation by the Organization of African Unity (OAU, subsequently the African Union—AU) and further efforts by Mandela, a power-sharing agreement was accepted on July 23, 2001, during a meeting in Arusha of 19 groups (representatives from the government, Transitional National Assembly, and all members of the pro-Hutu Group of Seven and pro-Tutsi Group of Ten—see listings in Political Parties and Groups, below).

On October 28, 2001, the assembly adopted a transitional constitution to implement the Arusha accords, and the following day the assembly confirmed Buyoya as president of the new transitional government and Domitien NDAYIZEYE, secretary general of Frodebu, as vice president. Buyoya was sworn in on November 1 for an 18-month term, after which he was to be replaced, according to the agreement, by Ndayizeye for the remaining 18 months of the transition period. (A Tutsi was scheduled to replace Ndayizeye as vice president following his elevation to president, although Buyoya announced he would not be a candidate for that post.) A new cabinet, comprising 15 political parties, was also installed on November 1, while on November 27 the assembly adopted legislation providing for a new transitional legislature (see Legislature, below, for details.)

In December 2002, through mediation by South Africa and Uganda, a broad cease-fire was reached with most of the remaining major rebel groups, including the FDD, thus paving the way for the deployment of a peace-monitoring force by the AU in February 2003. Under the terms of the transitional constitution, at the end of his 18-month term Buyoya turned the presidency over to Ndayizeye, who was inaugurated on April 30, 2003. That same day, Alphonse-Marie KADEGE of Uprona was appointed vice president.

Renewed fighting in July 2003 between the government and the FNL led the UN to withdraw its nonessential personnel from the country and had, by September, left 170 dead and created some 50,000 additional internal refugees. In October, in Pretoria, South Africa, peace negotiations under the leadership of South African President Thabo Mbeki led to an agreement that granted five cabinet posts to the primary CNDD faction, now known as the CNDD-FDD. Three provincial gubernatorial posts and the vice presidency of the assembly were also accorded to the CNDD-FDD. In return, the CNDD-FDD pledged to begin disarmament. To oversee that process, the AU peacekeeping force was increased to more than 3,000 troops. On November 16 the government and the CNDD-FDD signed a comprehensive peace agreement to implement the Arusha accords, and on November 23 Ndayizeye reshuffled the cabinet to form a government of national unity that included the CNDD-FDD. In December Pierre NKURUNZIZA, the leader of the CNDD-FDD, returned to Burundi for the first time since 1993, and 6,000 CNDD-FDD fighters began demobilization. However, at least one faction of the FNL continued its armed struggle.

On October 20, 2004, Ndayizeye signed a new draft constitution that had been approved by a special joint session of the legislature. The document called for permanent power sharing between the Tutsis and Hutus through a system of proportional representation (see Constitution and government, below). National legislative elections were subsequently scheduled for July 2005, and Ndayizeye's term was extended until the new elections, at which time a new president would be chosen by the legislature. (Subsequent presidents would be popularly elected.) Ndayizeye announced that he intended to retire from politics at the end of his current term. (The constitution was approved by voters in a national referendum on February 28, 2005, by a 92 percent margin.) On November 10, 2004, Vice President Kadege resigned following continued disagreements with the president over power-sharing arrangements and Kadege's opposition to the new constitution. Kadege was replaced the following day by Frederic NGENZEBUHHORO of Uprona.

Communal elections were held on June 3, 2005, with the CNDD-FDD (now a legal party) securing more than 55 percent of votes and more than 1,780 of the 3,325 seats up for election. The CNDD-FDD also dominated the July 4 assembly balloting, and CNDD-FDD leader Nkurunziza was elected president (as the sole candidate) with 91 percent of the votes cast during a joint session of the assembly and the Senate on August 19. In keeping with constitutional requirements, Nkurunziza appointed a Tutsi from Uprona (Martin NDUWIMANA) as first vice president. Nkurunziza subsequently formed a new national unity government that included members from the CNDD-FDD, Uprona, Frodebu, Parena, and several small parties. However, Frodebu in March 2006 announced its withdrawal from the government (see Frodebu under Political Parties and Groups, below).

Constitution and Government

The constitution approved in March 1992 provided for a "semi-presidential, semi-parliamentary" government in which the president shared power with a prime minister, who appointed his ministerial colleagues. Both the president and legislature were popularly elected for five-year terms, with assignment to the latter by proportional representation. Political parties seeking legal status were required to pledge allegiance to the 1991 national unity charter and the "principles of respect for national sovereignty." Parties organized on an ethnic or regional basis were prohibited.

Following the abortive coup of October 1993, which claimed the lives of both the state and legislative presidents, the Constitutional Court declared the office of the former vacant and invoked a constitutional provision that, in such an eventuality, assigned interim power to the governmental collectivity headed by the prime minister.

The assembly's 1994 designation of Cyprien Ntaryamire as president was authorized by a constitutional amendment of January 9, while assumption of the office on an acting basis by assembly President Ntibantunganya in April was subject to a constitutional limit of three months, with a second such span subsequently authorized by the Constitutional Court. The constitution was suspended following the July 1996 coup, military leaders promising that a new institutional structure would be proposed within three years. The transitional constitution of June 6, 1998, restored a number of elements of the 1992 document, although the post of prime minister was abolished in favor of two new vice presidential positions and an expanded Transitional National Assembly was established.

Following the signing of the Arusha power-sharing accord in July 2001, the assembly adopted a "Constitution of Transition" on October 28 providing for a three-year transitional government. Power was concentrated in the presidency and vice presidency, with a Tutsi (President Buyoya) to serve as president for 18 months before being replaced for the next 18 months by a Hutu. Provision was also made for a new Transitional Parliament, to include a National Assembly and a Senate. Elections were scheduled to be held, under undetermined electoral arrangements, at the communal level by the end of the first 18 months of the transition and at the national level (for a new assembly and senate) by the end of the second 18-month period.

The new constitution approved via national referendum on February 28, 2005, was most noteworthy for its efforts to institutionalize Hutu/Tutsi power sharing. The new basic law provided for the new legislature to elect the next president, but subsequent chief executives will be popularly elected. The president is elected for a five-year term, renewable once. There are two vice presidents; if the president is a Hutu, then the first vice president must be a Tutsi, and vice versa. The first vice president must also be from a different party than the president. It was mandated that maximum cabinet membership be 60 percent for Hutus and 40 percent for Tutsis. The defense minister must be from a different ethnic group than the minister responsible for internal security, and no single ethnic group can make up more than 50 percent of military and security forces. (For details on the new Parliament, see Legislature, below).

For administrative purposes the country is divided into 17 provinces, each headed by an appointed governor. The provinces are subdivided into 129 communes as well as smaller districts, with elected communal and district councils directing local affairs.

Foreign Relations

Internal conflicts have significantly influenced Burundi's relations with its neighbors. During the turmoil of the Micombero era, relations with Rwanda (where the Hutu were dominant), as well as with Tanzania and Zaire, were strained. Under President Bagaza, however, a new spirit of regional cooperation led to the formation in 1977 of a joint Economic Community of the Great Lakes Countries (Communauté Économique des Pays des Grande Lacs—CEPGL), within which Burundi, Rwanda, and Zaire agreed to organize a development bank, exploit gas deposits under Lake Kivu, and establish a fishing industry on Lake Tanganyika.

Burundi is a member, along with Rwanda, Tanzania, and Uganda, of the Organization for the Management and Development of the Kagera River Basin. In February 1984 a revised plan for a 2,000-kilometer rail network linking the four countries was approved, thereby addressing Bujumbura's concern about Burundi's lack of access to reliable export routes; hydroelectric and communications projects by the organization also signaled greater economic cooperation, as did Burundi's entrance (along with the rest of CEPGL) into the Economic Community of Central African States.

Relations were poor between the first Buyoya government and Libya, where former president Bagaza was reported in early 1989 to have gained asylum. In April 1989 Bujumbura expelled Libyan diplomats and other Libyan nationals for alleged "destabilizing activities," reportedly in connection with a coup plot uncovered the previous month among Bagaza loyalists.

An August 1991 meeting of Burundian, Rwandan, and Ugandan representatives yielded agreement on efforts to contain ethnic destabilization movements operating near border areas; however, observers reported mounting grass-roots tensions stemming from persistent rumors of Tutsi "empire-building" ambitions. Although punctuated by crossborder rebel activities, negotiations continued in 1992 between Burundi and Rwanda on establishing cooperative security arrangements.

The October 1993 presidential assassination and coup attempt were immediately and unanimously condemned by international observers, with initial calls for economic and political isolation of the rebels giving way to plans to establish a regional peacekeeping force to bolster the government and stem the ethnic violence. However, with the Tutsi military and Uprona leadership openly hostile to intervention, UN and OAU officials resisted the Kinigi government's call for a large-scale intervention.

International efforts to contain ethnic violence were frustrated throughout 1995 by the intransigence of the combatants as well as by the Tutsi military leadership's adamant opposition to a foreign military presence. Burundi expressed wariness over Tanzanian and Ugandan mediation in the first half of 1996, suggesting that its east African neighbors were interested in expanding their territories. The July 1996 coup was broadly denounced by the UN, Western capitals, and, most strongly, by neighboring states, who immediately imposed severe economic sanctions against Burundi. Those sanctions were lifted on January 23, 1999, in conjunction with the initiation of peace talks in Arusha, Tanzania. During this period, Burundi's relations with its neighboring countries remained tense, and Burundian troops were sent into the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC, formerly Zaire) in an attempt to dislodge staging areas of the rebel FDD.

Burundi's troops reached 3,000 in the DRC prior to a withdrawal in January 2002. Meanwhile, continued fighting between the DRC government and its own rebels in the DRC prompted the flight of some 35,000 refugees to Burundi. In addition, some 324,000 refugees from fighting in Burundi reportedly continued to reside in Tanzania. Progress in the repatriation of refugees was reported in 2004–2005. Moreover, following the installation of a newly elected power-sharing government in Burundi in 2005, Burundi concluded an agreement with Uganda, Rwanda, and the DRC for establishment of a regional intelligence gathering unit.

Current Issues

The two main rebel groups (the FDD and FNL) remained adamantly opposed to the Arusha accord in late 2001 and, in fact, intensified their military activity. (Other rebel forces had accepted the Arusha provisions for their gradual integration into what would ultimately become ethnically balanced national defense and security forces.) Moreover, even within the political parties that had signed the power-sharing agreement, Tutsi and Hutu hardliners scoffed at the prospects for a permanent negotiated settlement and the potential for cohesiveness within the coalition government, which contained highly disparate elements. Nevertheless, President Buyoya and Vice President Ndayizeye pledged to “fight the ideology of genocide” and to promote national unity. Meanwhile, South Africa deployed peacekeeping troops in Burundi to protect the hundreds of thousands of Hutu refugees (including numerous prominent politicians) who had been invited to return to Burundi. The UN endorsed the South African initiative, which was soon augmented by forces from other neighboring countries; however, no official UN peacekeeping mission was authorized at that point in view of the lack of a cease-fire agreement from the rebels.

Fighting between government forces and both the FDD and FNL continued into the autumn of 2002, despite several attempts at negotiating peace settlements. However, the declaration of a cease-fire with the FDD in December and subsequent deployment of the AU peacekeeping force began to convince skeptics that a long-term settlement was possible. The UN in May 2004 authorized its own peacekeeping mission (the United Nations Operation in Burundi [Opération des Nations Unies au Burundi—ONUB]) to succeed the AU forces and supervise the disarmament of an estimated 40,000 “rebels.” In December President Ndayizeye signed legislation creating a new national army and police force incorporating the former FDD fighters. At that point, sporadic, albeit intense, fighting between government forces and the FNL still presented a serious barrier to successful conclusion of the transitional government. However, in May 2005 most elements of the FNL finally agreed to a truce.

The CNDD-FDD completed a remarkable transition in 2005 from a former rebel group to the country's dominant political force. Observers attributed the CNDD-FDD's success to appreciation within the Hutu population for the past willingness of the CNDD-FDD to have “backed up” its political stance “with guns.” In contrast, Hutu support for Frodebu had declined as the perception had apparently grown that its “engagement” with Uprona since the mid-1990s had been largely ineffective.

The three-month election cycle of mid-2005 was for the most part conducted peacefully, with only sporadic and isolated violence on the part of hold-out FNL rebels being reported. EU and UN observers described the balloting as generally free and fair, prompting optimistic observers to suggest that the national unity government installed under the leadership of the CNDD-FDD had at least a modest chance of preserving the fledgling Hutu/Tutsi peace and addressing the nation’s daunting economic and social needs. At the same time, cautious analysts cited several potential barriers to effective governmental action, including the inexperience of the new administration and concern (particularly within the Tutsi community) over the CNDD-FDD’s militant background. (New president Pierre Nkurunziza had been sentenced, in absentia, to death by a court in Burundi in 1998 for his rebel activity before being covered by the amnesty provisions of the Arusha accord.) The international community broadly welcomed Burundi’s first democratically elected government since 1993, which, among other things, was considered a significant triumph for South Africa’s recent wide-ranging diplomatic efforts throughout Central Africa.

Despite the fact that some FNL rebel activity continued in mountainous areas near Bujumbura, the UN in April 2006 announced that ONUB peacekeepers would be withdrawn gradually throughout the rest of the year. (UN officials described the mission as “by and large a success story.”) For its part, the new administration announced plans to raise the salaries of civil servants, provide greater aid to farmers (particularly in the famine-threatened north), expand health care (especially to pregnant women and mothers with young children), and modernize the coffee and sugar sectors. President Nkurunziza also pledged to implement anticorruption measures and to intensify the disarmament of former fighters and the civilian population as a whole. However, as of May, it remained unclear when (or if) a South African-style truth and reconciliation commission would be established to deal with other lingering effects of the long civil conflict, which had cost the lives of more than 300,000 people.

In early September 2006 President Nkurunziza signed a cease-fire agreement with Agathon RWASA, the leader of the FNL rebel holdouts. Although the accord was heralded by some as the end of the country’s 13-year civil war, negotiations were still required concerning the final disarmament of the FNL and its conversion into a political party.

Political Parties and Groups

Of the 24 political parties that contested Burundi’s pre-independence elections in 1961, only Uprona survived, serving as the political base of the Micombero and Bagaza regimes. On April 16, 1992, a month after the constitutional revival of pluralism, President Buyoya signed a bill guaranteeing that the next election would be conducted on a multiparty basis.

On March 10, 1993, the government forwarded a “code of conduct” for signature by all active parties to promote “understanding and dialogue” during the “democratic process.” By midyear 11 parties, including Uprona, had been legally registered. The government formed on March 1, 1995, encompassed Frodebu, Uprona, the RPB, PP, and six minor Tutsi-oriented nonparliamentarian groups that supported Uprona. In December three of the most vociferously anti-Hutu formations—Rades, Ink-inzo, and the PRP—withdraw from the government. Political party activity was suspended following the coup of July 1996 but was reactivated under the transitional constitution of June 1998. Many of the smaller parties were given seats in the 1998 Transitional National Assembly.

Two main groupings were involved in the negotiations from 1999–2001 of the Arusha accord providing for a new transitional government. Initially, Hutu-oriented parties coalesced in the Group of Six (G-6), which included Frodebu, CNDD, PP, PL, RPB, and Frolina. The G-6 subsequently became the G-7 with the addition of Palipehutu. Meanwhile, the pro-Tutsi Group of Ten (G-10) included Uprona, Parena, Inkinzo, AV-Intwari, Abasa, Anadde, Raddes, PRP, PIT, and PSD. All of the G-7 and G-10 parties were offered seats in the new Transitional National Assembly, while 15 of the parties accepted seats in the new cabinet installed on November 1, 2001. However, strong dissident factions opposed to the Arusha accord were reported within many of the parties. The national unity government of November 2003 included Uprona, Frodebu, RPB, Rad-des, Inkinzo, Anadde, Abasa, CNDD-FDD, PRP, Palipehutu, AV-Intwari, PSD, and PP.

Government Parties

National Council for the Defense of Democracy—Forces for the Defense of Democracy (Conseil National pour la Défense de Démocratie—Forces pour la Défense de Démocratie—CNDD-FDD). The CNDD-FDD is one of the successors to the CNDD that was formed in 1994 in Zaire following the assassination of President Ndaye and the flight into exile of many Hutu political figures. The CNDD was led by Leonard Nyangoma, a former member of Frodebu and former cabinet minister who was branded a “warlord” by the Ntibanunganya government. From exile in Nairobi, Kenya, Nyangoma, who charged Frodebu with being terrorized by the “mono-ethnic Tutsi army,” called in early 1995 for the deployment of a 5,000-man “international intervention force to protect the country’s democratic institutions.” If such intervention was not forthcoming, he asserted that the CNDD’s armed wing—the Forces for the Defense of Democracy (Forces pour la Défense de Démocratie—FDD)—would have “no other choice but to step up popular resistance.”

On March 25, 1996, the CNDD issued a list of conditions for a cease-fire, including the release of 5,000 Frodebu political prisoners; the return of government troops to their barracks; and the withdrawal of international arrest warrants for Nyangoma and his second-in-command, Christian SENDEGEYA. Although some observers cited the CNDD’s willingness to negotiate as cause for optimism about scheduled peace talks, within weeks the rebels had reversed their stance, vowing to keep fighting until the Tutsis gave “power back to the people.” Rebel leader Nyangoma was excluded from peace talks in Arusha, Tanzania, in June, prompting a surge in FDD military activity.

In March 1997 the regime blamed CNDD operatives for deadly bomb attacks in Bujumbura, and the following month the government asserted that the rebels were being supported by former Rwandan “Interhamwe” fighters (see separate article on Rwanda) and Zairean Hutus. Meanwhile, observers reported that the CNDD’s military efforts were focused in the south, central, and eastern regions.

In April 1997 the CNDD criticized regional leaders for easing sanctions on the regime in Burundi, and in June the rebels turned down an invitation to attend a peace conference in Geneva, Switzerland. However, the group subsequently agreed to participate in peace talks sponsored by regional leaders, earning the enmity of Palipehutu (below), with whose forces the FDD clashed repeatedly in late 1997 and early 1998. In March 1998 the CNDD began a purge that ousted at least seven leading figures, including Sendegeya. Relations between the CNDD, which attended the June 1998 peace talks, and the FDD, which was not invited (reportedly at the insistence of mediation leader Nyerere), came to a breaking point in May when CNDD leader Nyangoma sacked Jean-Bosco NDAYIKENGURUKIYE, head of the FDD, as well as Hussein Radjabu, a CNDD party official. However, CNDD spokesman Jerome Ndiho claimed that the party had, in fact, suspended Nyangoma and replaced him with Ndayikengurukiye. Nonetheless, Nyangoma attended the talks as CNDD president, and the CNDD joined the G-7. Observers in Bujumbura saw the split between the political and military wings of the rebel movement as the result of jockeying for positions of power in advance of a possible near-term settlement.

The Nyangoma faction subsequently became increasingly marginalized within the CNDD in favor of supporters of Ndayikengurukiye, who strongly criticized the finalization of the 2001 power-sharing accord with the government. Meanwhile, it was reported that Ndayikengurukiye had been ousted in September 2001 by a faction led by Pierre Nkurunziza and Radjabu. The anti-Ndayikengurukiye wing was described as “pro-Frodebu” and inclined to pursue further negotiations with the government, and it participated in a regional summit on Burundi’s future in Pretoria in October. However, with both factions still claiming legitimacy, fierce fighting was reported in FDD strongholds in the east and south between the FDD and government troops in the last two months of the year following the installation of the new transitional government.

Elements of the FDD entered into negotiations with the government in 2002, with the Ndayikengurukiye faction signing a cease-fire in December and the Nkurunziza faction in October 2003. (By that time the Nkurunziza faction was referencing itself as the CNDD-FDD.) The CNDD-FDD was given four portfolios in the November 2003 cabinet, while one ministry was accorded to the Ndayikengurukiye faction of the CNDD.

In May 2004 Ndayikengurukiye announced that his group would thenceforth be known as Kaza (Welcome)-FDD. In early 2005 the interior ministry announced the formal registration of Kaza-FDD, the CNDD-FDD, and the CNDD (still under Nyangoma’s leadership) as separate parties for the upcoming legislative elections. (See separate section on Nyangoma’s CNDD, below).

The CNDD-FDD dominated the communal elections in June 2005 as well as the National Assembly and Senate balloting in July. Nkurunziza resigned as leader of the CNDD-FDD shortly before he was elected president of the republic in August. He was succeeded in the CNDD-FDD post by Radjabu, who was in turn succeeded at a February 2006 congress by Manassé Nzobonimpa. By that time, the CNDD-FDD had apparently made significant strides toward its goal of becoming a truly “national party” by having Tutsis fill a number of leadership posts.

Leaders: Pierre NKURUNZIZA (President of the Republic), Alice NZOMUKUNDA (Second Vice President of the Republic), Gervais RUFYIKIRI (Speaker of the Senate), Immaculée NAHAYO (Speaker of the National Assembly), Hussein RADJABU, Manassé NZOBONIMPA (Secretary General).

Union for National Progress (Union pour le Progrés National—Uprona). Founded in 1958 as the Union et Progrés National, Uprona was dissolved after the 1976 coup but subsequently reemerged as the country’s only authorized party. In December 1979, at its first national congress, the party elected a Central Committee of 48 members and pledged to return the country to civilian rule under President Bagaza’s leadership. Following the 1987 coup and designation of Maj. Pierre Buyoya, previously a little-known Central Committee member, as president of the republic, all Uprona leaders were dismissed and formal party activity ceased. By early 1988 the party was again functioning, a Buyoya supporter having been selected as its new secretary general.

Thereafter, with Tutsis comprising 90 percent of Uprona’s membership, party leaders attempted to recruit more Hutus and implement additional “democratization” measures. Thus, an extraordinary party congress in December 1990 for the first time named a Hutu as secretary general and approved the unity charter that was subsequently approved by popular vote in February 1991. In addition, the March 1992 Uprona congress approved a new Central Committee with a Hutu majority.

Uprona won only 16 of 81 legislative seats at the nationwide balloting of June 29, 1993. Subsequently, on July 2 party president Nicolas MAYUGI decried Frodebu’s “antidemocratic” electoral victories, claiming they were based on “ethnic manipulation.” Although observers described Mayugi’s sentiments as pervasive in the Tutsi community, seven members of the government named on July 10, including the prime minister, were Uprona members. Similar concessions were made in the government arrangements of 1994–1995.

In 1995 and the first half of 1996, Uprona militants called for the ousting of President Ntibanunganya and repudiation of the power-sharing arrangements with Frodebu. Uprona also refused to negotiate with representatives from the CNDD, below, despite otherwise broad consensus that the latter's participation was imperative for any peace initiative. In addition, the party remained steadfastly opposed to foreign military intervention. Thus, in June 1996 Tanzanian President Nyerere labeled Uprona as one of the "main obstacles" to peace. It was therefore not surprising that Uprona was heavily represented in the new government formed following the July coup.

A split occurred in Uprona between those who supported Buyoya's efforts to reach a negotiated settlement with opposition groups in 1997–1998 and those opposed to any concessions to the "rebels." Uprona President Charles MUKASI, a member of the latter camp, was reportedly briefly detained in late 1997 for conducting a press conference in September 1997 in which he criticized the government for dealing with "genocidal" Hutu rebels. Ironically, Mukasi was one of the few high-ranking Hutus in the predominately Tutsi Uprona. The dispute over how to deal with the rebels came to a head in October 1998 when Mukasi expelled three members, including Luc Rukingama, a cabinet minister. Buyoya immediately reasserted his authority, and the Central Committee suspended Mukasi and replaced him with Rukingama as interim chairman. While divisions remained with the party, the Mukasi wing was subsequently largely marginalized.

Under the terms of the 2001 transitional constitution, Buyoya left his position as president of the republic in 2003 in favor of his Hutu vice president. New Uprona President Jean-Baptiste Manwangari opposed the constitution approved in February 2005 on the grounds that it provided insufficient guarantees for Tutsis.

Uprona won only 6.3 percent of the vote in local elections in June 2005 and 7.3 percent in assembly balloting in July, Africa Confidential subsequently describing the party as having "quietly accepted its defeat." Manwangari was defeated in his bid for reelection to the Uprona presidency at a congress in January 2006.

Leaders: Maj. Pierre BUYOYA (Former President of the Republic), Martin NDUWIMANA (First Vice President of the Republic), Aloys

Guarantor of Freedom of Speech in Burundi (Inkinzo y Ijambo Ryabarundi). Founded in 1993, Inkinzo (also referenced as the Shield of Freedom of Speech) joined the PRP and Raddes in their December 1995 withdrawal from the government. However, Inkinzo has participated in the two recent cabinets.

Leader: Dr. Alphonse RUGAMBARARA.

Movement for the Rehabilitation of the Citizen (Movement pour la Réhabilitation du Citoyen—MRC). After securing two seats in the 2005 assembly elections, the MRC (also referenced as the National Resistance Movement for the Rehabilitation of the Citizen) accepted the public service and social security portfolio in the new cabinet led by the CNDD-FDD.

Leaders: Laurent NZEYIMANA, Col. (Ret.) Epitace BAYAGANAKANDI.

Party for National Recovery (Parti pour le Recouvrement National—PRN or Parena). Launched in August 1994 by former head of state Col. Jean-Baptiste Bagaza, Parena was allegedly linked with a number of Tutsi militias. Bagaza, who had dismissed the 1993 elections as an "ethnic referendum," refused to sign the 1994 power-sharing agreement, saying there could be no solution that included Frodebu, and accused the president's party of planning a Tutsi genocide. In 1995 Bagaza reportedly concurred with calls for the establishment of a "Tutsiland" and a "Hutuland" as separate entities.

On January 18, 1997, the Buyoya regime's security forces placed Bagaza under house arrest, and on March 17 five senior party members were imprisoned for their alleged roles in a coup plot against the president. However, Bagaza was subsequently released and permitted to travel to neighboring countries to participate in discussions regarding a possible permanent solution to the instability in Burundi. The others were convicted in January 2000 of plotting to kill Buyoya, but they were released in August 2000. Parena was frequently critical of the Arusha negotiations, accusing Buyoya of selling out Tutsi interests, but it eventually signed the accord. However, it subsequently declined to ratify various implementation measures. In November 2002 the government banned Parena and placed Bagaza under house arrest. However, the ban and arrest were suspended in May 2003. In February 2005 there were reports that a new rebel group, the Justice and Liberty United Front, had been formed to support Bagaza. However, Parena accepted a ministerial position in the new coalition government installed in September 2005.

Leaders: Col. Jean-Baptiste BAGAZA, Cyrille BARANCIRA (Secretary General).

Other Parliamentary Parties

Front for Democracy in Burundi (Front pour la Démocratie au Burundi—Frodebu). Frodebu was launched in support of a “no” vote at the referendum of March 1992, arguing that the government’s failure to convene a national conference meant that there had been no opposition input to the constitutional draft. However, following the vote, the group’s leadership announced, “We are ready to play the game.”

Party leader Melchior Ndadaye won the presidency of the republic on June 1, 1993, with Frodebu securing 65 of 81 assembly seats on the basis of a 71.4 percent vote share. However, the October 21 assassination of President Ndadaye and a number of other prominent party members eviscerated Frodebu. Furthermore, a number of Frodebu leaders were tainted by their involvement in subsequent revenge attacks on Tutsis.

On December 23, 1993, Sylvestre Ntibantunganya, foreign minister and Ndadaye confidante, was elected party president and president of the National Assembly. Ntibantunganya became acting president of the republic on April 8, 1994, and president five months later.

Despite the emergence of militant anti-Tutsi emotions within Frodebu, a number of prominent leaders, including party president Jean Minani, called in 1995 for continued dialogue with their Tutsi counterparts. However, following the coup of July 1996, some Frodebu leaders urged supporters to join forces with the CNDD (below) in attempting to topple the Buyoya regime.

On February 6, 1997, Minani called on the international community to pressure the UN to send troops into Burundi and to observe the sanctions imposed on the regime in July 1996. In addition, he decried Bujumbura’s “villagization” efforts for having created “concentration camps.” The following week, party Secretary General Augustin NO-JIBWAMI was jailed for “sabotaging the government’s efforts to establish peace” after he echoed Minani’s statements. In early 1998 Frodebu leaders reaffirmed their support for all-party talks toward a negotiated settlement of the conflict in Burundi, although the party was splitting into differing factions. For example, Minani remained in exile in Tanzania and attended the peace talks as the party’s representative, while certain CNDD elements argued that they, not he, represented the genuine Frodebu leadership. In addition, in the wake of the power-sharing agreement of June 1998, Frodebu was authorized to keep the 65 legislative seats in the new Transitional National Assembly that it had obtained in 1993. However, the party had to appoint new legislators to more than 20 of the seats, the incumbents having either fled to exile or fallen victim to the recent violence. Concurrently, Nojibwami took over leadership of the Frodebu faction functioning in Burundi.

In July 1999 reports indicated that Minani had entered into an alliance with former president Bagaza and Parena (see above) in opposition to President Buyoya and Uprona, an initiative that was condemned by Nojibwami and others. This split was accommodated within the Arusha negotiations through the presence of the “internal” Nojibwami Frodebu wing in the National Assembly delegation to the talks. Minani led the main “external” Frodebu delegation. Following the installation of the new transitional government on November 1, 2001, Minani, who had recently returned to Burundi after more than five years in exile, was elected president of the new Transitional National Assembly.

After Frodebu's Domitien Ndayizeye became president of the republic in April 2003, Frodebu campaigned in support of the new constitution approved in February 2005. However, Frodebu secured only about 23 percent of the vote in the June 2005 local elections and July assembly poll. Many Frodebu supporters by that time had reportedly defected to the CNDD-FDD.

Frodebu joined the national unity government installed in September 2005, but in March 2006 Frodebu announced it was withdrawing from the coalition. When the three Frodebu ministers opted to stay in the cabinet, they were expelled from the party.

Leaders: Domitien NDAYIZEYE (Former President of the Republic), Jean MINANI (President of the Party), Jean de Dieu MUTABAZI (Secretary General), Liboire NGENDAHAYO (National Executive Secretary).

National Council for the Defense of Democracy (Conseil National pour la Défense de Démocratie—CNDD). This grouping was reorganized under the CNDD rubric in early 2005 after sustained factionalization within the original CNDD (see CNDD-FDD, above, for details). The CNDD won four seats in the 2005 assembly poll and dominated balloting in local elections in Bururi Province, home of the CNDD leader.

Leader: Leonard NYANGOMA.

Other Parties

Burundi People's Rally (Rassemblement du Peuple Burundien—RPB). A Hutu party founded in 1992, the RPB finished third in the legislative balloting of June 1993, but with less than the minimum vote share needed to secure assembly representation. Its original leader, Ernest Kabushemeye, was assassinated on March 11, 1995.

Leaders: Balthazar BIGIRIMANA (President), Philippe NZOBONARIBA.

Rally for Democracy and Economic and Social Development (Rassemblement pour la Démocratie et le Développement Economique et Social—Raddes). A virulently pro-Tutsi party, Raddes was allocated single cabinet posts in February 1994 and March 1995. However, in December 1995 Raddes joined the PRP and Inkinzo in withdrawing from the government and called for the president's ouster, charging him with responsibility for the ongoing civil strife. In January 1996 Raddes's president, Cyrille SIGEJEJE, was placed under arrest. Raddes was admitted into the Arusha peace talks in early 2000.

Leaders: Joseph NZEYIMANA (President), Astere NZISIBIRA.

National Alliance for Rights and Development (Alliance Nationale pour les Droits et le Développement—Anadde). The Tutsi-dominated Anadde was founded in 1992 and was given one ministry in March 1995. It was reportedly offered legislative representation in June 1998 but was unable to present a candidate due to party factionalization.

Leader: Patrice NSABABAWANGA.

African-Burundi Salvation Alliance (Alliance Burundaise-Africaine pour le Salut—Abasa). Abasa is a small Tutsi-dominated opposition group that in 1997 called for new national leadership, criticizing the Buyoya regime for lacking a "clear strategy."

Leaders: Terrence NSANZE (Former Permanent Representative to the UN), Serge MUKAMARAKIZA (in exile).

People's Reconciliation Party (Parti de la Réconciliation du Peuple—PRP). The promonarchist PRP was founded in September 1991 on a platform calling for a parliamentary monarchy with a prime minister and an ethnically mixed council of nobles. The group was officially recognized on July 1, 1992, and in November called it for the government to open negotiations with the opposition.

PRP candidate Pierre-Claver Sendegeya finished a distant third in the June 1, 1993, presidential balloting, and the party failed to secure representation at the subsequent legislative elections. Considered an extremist by the government, PRP leader Mathias Hitimana was arrested in August 1994, provoking a series of deadly street clashes by his followers that shut down the capital for three days.

The PRP was awarded a post in the government named in March 1995 but nine months later quit the cabinet, and in January 1996 Hitimana was again arrested. In July party militants took part in the anti-Ntibantunganya demonstrations that sought to vilify the president for agreeing to foreign intervention. Although the PRP was given a ministerial post in the transitional cabinet of November 2001, its minister left the government in July 2002. However, the party accepted a new post in 2003.

Leaders: Mathias HITIMANA (President), Pierre-Claver SENDE-GEYA (1993 presidential candidate), François MBESHERUBUSA, Jean Bosco YAMUREMYE.

Hutu People's Liberation Party (Parti Libération du Peuple Hutu—Palipehutu). Palipehutu was formed by Hutu exiles in Rwanda and Tanzania who opposed the long-standing political and economic dominance of Burundi's Tutsis. The government attributed the Hutu-Tutsi conflict of August 1988, as well as the attempted coup of November 1991, to Palipehutu activism, although there was no outside confirmation of either allegation. In 1990 Palipehutu founder Rémy GAHUTU died in a Tanzanian prison. (His successor, Etienne Karatasi, remained exiled in Denmark.)

In April 1992 Palipehutu forces, allegedly supported by Rwandan rebels, attacked military sites in northwest Burundi. In mid-July Palipehutu members were among 59 individuals convicted for their roles in the 1991 uprising; three weeks later 450 alleged Palipehutu members went on trial for their involvement in terrorist incidents.

In 1993 the party was split by the defection of its military leader, Cossan Kabura, who “declared war on the Ndadaye government.” He subsequently founded the National Forces of Liberation (FNL, see below). In early 1997 Africa Confidential reported that Palipehutu and the FNL had agreed to form a military alliance with a group from the DRC styled the National Council of Kivu Resistance (Conseil Nationale de Résistance du Kivu—CNRK). Led by Arema Bin AMISI, the ethnic

Bembe CNRK reportedly opposed the government of Laurent Kabila.

In the second half of 1997 Palipehutu leaders accused the CNDD of “collaborating” with the Buyoya regime by agreeing to join peace talks. Severe intra-Hutu fighting was subsequently reported between Palipehutu forces and the CNDD's armed wing, the FDD. In early 2000 it was reported that FNL fighters had clashed in Burundi with Rwandan Hutu guerrilla groups with which it had previously been allied. Palipehutu eventually joined the G-7 grouping at the Arusha talks and was a signatory to the August 28, 2000, accord, although the FNL did not accept the agreement. Palipehutu reportedly joined the national unity government installed in 2003. However, Palipehutu-FNL continued military action against the government (see FNL, below, for details).

Leaders: Etienne KARATASI, Antoine SEZOYA-NGABO.

National Liberation Front (Front de Libération Nationale—Frolina). A small movement composed primarily of militant Hutu refugees, Frolina (previously referenced as Umbumwé [Solidarity]) was organized in the mid-1980s. It reportedly conducted a guerrilla attack on a Burundi military installation in Mabandal on August 13, 1990. Four days later the group's leader, former Palipehutu member Joseph Karumba, was arrested in Tanzania.

In June 1992 Karumba was linked to militant refugees in Mpanda, Tanzania. In announcing their intent to arrest the group, Tanzanian officials reported that Karumba had recently sought their assistance in “liberating” Burundi. However, Karumba was subsequently granted asylum in Tanzania, from which he conducted Frolina's political affairs while Frolina fighters, referenced as the People's Armed Forces, engaged in sporadic guerrilla action in Burundi through 1998. In signing the Arusha accord of August 2000, Karumba agreed that Frolina forces would eventually be incorporated into the national forces of Burundi, although a militant Frolina wing reportedly remained opposed to that measure and other Arusha “concessions.” Frolina named four of its members to the new Transitional National Assembly in late 2001; however, no ministers in the new cabinet were identified as belonging to Frolina. Karumba was among the former rebels who were “demobilized” in mid-2005.

Other past government parties have included the Alliance of the Brave (AV-Intwari), a small grouping that joined the transitional legislature and participated in subsequent peace talks; the

Independent Workers’ Party (Parti Indépendant de Travailleurs—PIT), which is led by Nicéphore NDIRUKUNDO and Etienne NTAHONZA and which held portfolios in the cabinets of 1994, 1995, 2001, and 2003; the People’s Party (Parti Populaire—PP), a pro-Frodebu grouping that is led by Shadrack NIYONKURU and Appolinaire BUTOYI and which was allocated one cabinet ministry in 1995, 2001, and 2003; and the Social Democratic Party (Parti Social-Démocrate—PSD), a pro-Uprona Tutsi grouping (led by Vincent NDIKUMASABO and Godefroy HAKIZIMANA) that had been awarded the civil service ministry in March 1995.

Other political parties and groups include the Democratic Forum (Forum Démocratique—FODE), formed in 1999 and led by Deogratias BABURIFATO; the Liberal Alliance for Development (Alliance Libérale Pour la Développement—Imboneza), created in 2002 and led by Joseph NTIDENEREZA; the New Alliance for Democracy and the Development of Burundi (Alliance Nouvelle Pour la Démocratie et le Développement au Burundi), formed in 2002 by Jean-Paul BURAFUTA; the Party for Democracy and Reconciliation (Parti pour la Démocratie et la Réconciliation—PDR), formed in 2002 and led by Augustin NZOJIBWAMI; and the Union for Peace and Development (Union pour la Paix et le Développement—UPD), established in 2002 and led by Freddy FERUVI.

Active Rebel Group

National Forces of Liberation (Forces Nationales de la Libération—FNL). Founded in the mid-1990s by Palipehutu military leader Cossan KABURA (referenced in previous Handbooks as Kabora Kossani), the FNL (often referenced as the Palipehutu—FNL) subsequently conducted guerrilla actions against government forces, primarily in and around Bujumbura. The hard-line FNL separated from Palipehutu completely when the latter agreed in 1999 to participate in the Arusha peace talks.

In late February 2001 it was reported that Kabura had been “ejected” from the FNL by a faction led by Agathon Rwsa, said by that time to command some 90 percent of the FNL’s fighters. Rwsa and his supporters criticized Kabura for failing to convene a national congress to discuss strategy. Apparently to underscore its militancy, the Rwsa faction invaded Bujumbura in early March in an apparent takeover attempt that was eventually repulsed by government forces. Both FNL factions condemned the July power-sharing accord, and intensified FNL attacks were reported late in the year.

In December 2002 dissident members of the FNL formed the FNL-Icanzo under the leadership of Alain MUGABARABONA. Following the cease-fire between the government and the FDD, the FNL subsequently remained the only major rebel group still fighting the transitional government. The group became increasingly marginalized and lost much of its foreign support following an attack in August of 2004 on a UN refugee camp in Gatumba, Burundi. The government and several neighboring states subsequently designated the FNL a terrorist organization. FNL forces were repulsed in a December 2004 attack but managed to assassinate the governor of Bubanza Province in January 2005.

In May 2005 the government and the FNL reportedly signed a peace deal whereby both sides agreed to cease fighting. Additional agreements to allow the FNL to participate in upcoming elections or future governments remained elusive, however.

In October 2005 reports surfaced that Rwsa had been ousted as chair of “Palipehutu-FNL” in favor of a “pronegotiation” leadership including Jean-Bosco Sinadayigaya as chair. However, Rwsa’s faction continued antigovernment activity in the hills around Bujumbura into May 2006, having reportedly forged an alliance with rebels in the DRC. (See Current issues, above, for subsequent developments.)

Leaders: Agathon RWASA and Jean-Bosco SINDAYIGAYA (leaders of competing factions).

Legislature

The National Assembly (Assemblée Nationale), then a one-party, 65-member body, was suspended following the September 1987 coup. Although President Buyoya promised to revive the body within “one to two years,” the suspension remained in effect until the multiparty election of June 29, 1993, at which the Front for Democracy in Burundi (Frodebu) won 65 seats in an enlarged body of 81 and the Union for National Progress (Uprona) won 16, no other formation meeting a threshold of 5 percent of the vote.

The assembly was once again suspended following the military coup of July 25, 1996. Although that decree was formally lifted in September, the assembly subsequently remained in disarray, many of its members having died in the recent violence or fled the country.

A Transitional National Assembly was inaugurated on July 18, 1998, under provisions of the June 6 transitional constitution. The assembly was expanded to 121 members; Frodebu and Uprona kept their 1993 allocations (65 and 16, respectively), although more than 20 vacant Frodebu seats had to be filled with new members. Of the 40 new seats, 27 were filled by government-appointed representatives of social and professional organizations. The remaining seats were reserved for small political parties. The following parties were subsequently reported to have appointed legislators: the Alliance of the Brave, the Burundi People's Rally, the Guarantor of Freedom of Speech in Burundi, the Independent Workers' Party, the People's Party, the People's Reconciliation Party, the Rally for Democracy and Economic and Social Development, and the Social Democratic Party. Several other parties were apparently invited to participate but were unable to appoint legislators due to internal wrangling. Consequently, four seats were not filled upon the inauguration of the new assembly.

In late October 2001 the Transitional National Assembly adopted a new "Constitution of Transition" providing for a new bicameral Parliament as envisioned by the recent Arusha peace accord. The new National Assembly was enlarged to 170 members, approximately 60 percent Hutu and 40 percent Tutsi; Frodebu and Uprona kept their previous allocation of seats, while the above eight small parties were allocated four seats, as were each of seven other groupings (the African-Burundi Salvation Alliance, the Hutu People's Liberation Party, the Liberal Party, the National Alliance for Rights and Development, the National Council for the Defense of Democracy, the National Liberation Front, and the Party for National Recovery [Parena]). New seats were also allocated to civic, professional, and social groups. The new assembly convened (minus designees from Parena) for the first time on January 4, 2002, and elected Frodebu's Jean Minani as its president.

The new constitution approved in February 2005 codified the bicameral Parliament (Parlement) consisting of a Senate and a National Assembly elected for five-year terms.

Senate (Sénat). The upper house comprises 34 indirectly elected members (1 Hutu and 1 Tutsi from each province as selected by electoral colleges comprised of members of the local councils within each province), all former presidents (currently 4), 3 members of the Twa ethnic group, and enough women (currently 8) to make the number of female senators at least 30 percent of the total. (There are currently 49 members.) The first elections in the provincial electoral colleges took place on July 29, 2005. Of the 34 seats filled in that process, 30 were reportedly secured by the National Council for the Defense of Democracy—Forces for the Defense of Democracy, 3 by the Front for Democracy in Burundi, and 1 by the National Council for the Defense of Democracy.

Speaker: Gervais RUFYIKIRI.

National Assembly (Assemblée Nationale). The lower house comprises 100 members directly elected by party-list proportional representation, enough additional members (currently 15) to fulfill the constitutional mandates that 60 percent of the regular seats are filled by Hutus and 40 percent by Tutsis and that 30 percent of the regular seats are filled by women, and three members of the Twa ethnic group. At the first balloting of July 4, 2005, the National Council for the Defense of Democracy (CNDD-FDD) won 59 seats; the Front for Democracy in Burundi (Frodebu), 25; the Union for National Progress (Uprona), 10; the National Council for the Defense of Democracy, 4; and the Movement for the Rehabilitation of the Citizen, 2. Of the 15 additional seats subsequently allocated to meet the constitutional mandates, 5 each were given to the CNDD-FDD, Frodebu, and Uprona.

Speaker: Immaculée NAHAYO.

REPUBLIC OF CAMEROON

République du Cameroun

The Country

Situated just north of the equator on the Gulf of Guinea and rising from a coastal plain to a high interior plateau, Cameroon is the product of a merger in 1961 between the former French and British Cameroon trust territories. Its more than 100 ethnic groups speak 24 major languages and represent a diversity of Christian (53 percent), traditional African (25 percent), and Muslim (22 percent) religious beliefs. Reflecting its dual colonial heritage (the source of lingering political cleavage), Cameroon is the only country in Africa in which both French and English are official languages. In 1996 women were reported to constitute 38 percent of the official labor force.

Cameroon's economy has long been primarily rural and, despite the discovery of major oil deposits in 1973, agriculture continues to provide a large share of the country's export earnings. Coffee, cocoa, and timber are among the most important agricultural products, but bananas, cotton, rubber, and palm oil also are produced commercially. Oil production declined from a high of 9.2 million metric tons in 1985 to 7.7 million tons in 1991. Apart from agricultural processing and oil-related activity, industrial development has focused on aluminum smelting from both domestic and imported bauxite. Current initiatives are aimed at hydroelectric expansion, the resolution of long-standing transportation problems, and the development of medium-sized farms to halt the exodus of rural youth to urban areas. The economy faltered during the mid-1980s and early 1990s under the influence of depressed oil and other commodity prices, sustained capital flight, rising external debt (approaching $6 billion in early 1992), and widespread corruption and inefficiency in state-run enterprises. Initially shunning involvement with the International Monetary Fund (IMF), the government since 1988 has negotiated agreements with it and other international lenders in a context of budget austerity and a commitment to privatization.

Following the devaluation of the CFA franc in 1994, Cameroon's inflation rate rose to 25.8 percent in 1995. However, from 1996 to 1998 the country enjoyed an average real GDP growth rate of approximately 5.0 percent annually, according to the IMF, as overall world economic activity increased and inflationary pressures eased. On the other hand, analysts urged the government to continue efforts to increase transparency in the public sector, warning that corrupt official practices were endangering economic progress. To that end, in late 1999 the IMF asked the government to set up a system whereby oil revenues would be directly deposited in a monitorable state budget. In addition, the IMF counseled Yaoundé to continue its efforts to raise the “non-oil revenue-to-GDP ratio.” While the IMF and the World Bank subsequently praised the government’s efforts regarding structural reforms and anticorruption measures, concerns were raised over the pace of privatization and poverty reduction. In 2000 the World Bank granted Cameroon $2 billion in a multi-year debt reduction program; however, the program was suspended in 2004 due to perceived financial mismanagement by the government and a slowdown in the pace of reforms.

Real GDP grew by 5.3 percent, and inflation was less than 3 percent, in fiscal year 2000–2001. While oil production decreased from 164,000 barrels per day in the 1990s to just 85,000 by 2002, GDP growth nonetheless averaged 4.3 percent annually from 2001 to 2004 as the non-oil sector expanded. Inflation remained low, although there was an increase to 4.8 percent in 2002–2003 as the result of higher food costs. The overall improvement in the economy was further supported by the opening of the Chad–Cameroon pipeline in 2003. In 2005 the IMF was encouraged by the government’s efforts to generate non-oil revenue and approved several million dollars to support its poverty reduction programs. However, at the same time, heading into 2006 the World Bank cited Cameroon’s “harsh” investment climate as the reason for its dearth of foreign investors.

Political Background

A German protectorate before World War I, Cameroon was divided at the close of that conflict into French and British mandates, which became UN trust territories after World War II. French Cameroons, comprising the eastern four-fifths of the territory, achieved autonomous status within the French Community in 1957 and, under the leadership of Ahmadou Babatoura AHIDJO, became the independent Republic of Cameroon on January 1, 1960. The disposition of British Cameroons was settled in February 1961 by a UN-sponsored plebiscite in which the northern and southern sections voted to merge with Nigeria and the former French territory, respectively. On October 1, 1961, the Federal Republic of Cameroon was formed, with Ahidjo as president and John Ngu FONCHA, prime minister of the former British region, as vice president.

The federal structure was designed to meet the challenge posed by Cameroon’s racial, tribal, religious, and political diversity. It provided for separate regional governments and political organizations, joined at the federal level. A transition to unitary government began with the 1965–1966 merger of the regional political parties to form the Cameroon National Union (UNC) under the leadership of President Ahidjo and was completed on June 2, 1972, following a referendum on May 20 that indicated overwhelming support for the adoption of a new constitution. Subsequently, President Ahidjo faced no organized opposition, and on April 5, 1980, he was reelected to a fifth successive term. However, in an unanticipated move on November 4, 1982, Ahidjo announced his retirement in favor of his longtime associate, Prime Minister Paul BIYA. Immediately following his installation as president, Biya, a southerner, named a northern Muslim, Maigari Bello BOUBA, to head a new government designed to retain the somewhat tenuous regional and cultural balance that had been established by the former head of state. Boubba was dismissed in August 1983, following a coup attempt that allegedly involved Ahidjo, then resident in France. (Ahidjo died at his longtime alternative home in Senegal on November 30, 1989.)

President Biya was unopposed for reelection on January 14, 1984, and immediately following his inauguration on January 21 the National Assembly voted to abolish the post of prime minister and to abandon “United Republic of Cameroon” as the country’s official name in favor of the pre-merger “Republic of Cameroon.” The following April Biya survived another coup attempt by elements of the presidential guard. While reportedly dealing harshly with the rebels, the administration nevertheless initiated steps toward democratization. Elections for local and regional bodies within the government party, which had been renamed the Democratic Rally of the Cameroon People (RDPC), also referenced in English as the Cameroon People’s Democratic Movement (CPDM) in 1985, were held in 1986, followed by local government elections in 1987 that, for the first time, featured competitive balloting, albeit within an RDPC/CPDM framework. Alternative candidates also were presented for National Assembly balloting on April 24, 1988; however, each of the two lists was restricted to ruling party nominees, with opponents attacking the “snail’s pace” of liberalization, continued repression of dissent, and barriers to any genuine political challenge to Biya, who was unopposed in the presidential poll.

In emulation of trends elsewhere in Africa and beyond, democratization advocates intensified their pressure in late 1989 and early 1990. Initially, the government responded harshly: eleven opposition leaders were arrested in February 1990, and a massive prodemocracy demonstration in the western town of Bamenda was violently broken up by security forces, leaving at least six people dead. However, in the wake of growing domestic and international criticism, President Biya announced in June that a multiparty system would be introduced and other reforms implemented. Consequently, on December 6 the National Assembly enacted legislation restricting the government’s authority to deny legal status to opposition groups, and the formal recognition of new parties began in early 1991. On the other hand, Biya’s refusal to call a national conference (similar to those convened in other regional countries) to determine the nation’s political future provoked continued antigovernment demonstrations.

In an effort to force the government’s hand regarding a national conference, opposition parties in June 1991 launched a villes mortes (“dead cities”) campaign during which shops were closed on weekdays to undercut tax revenue. In response, the government put seven provinces under military administration and temporarily banned several of the parties responsible for the general strike. However, faced with ongoing unrest, Biya announced in October that new legislative elections would be moved up by a year to early 1992. He also convened a meeting of government and opposition leaders that in November established a ten-member committee to oversee constitutional reform. In addition, the government promised to release detainees from earlier protests in return for discontinuation of the villes mortes campaign.

In the March 1, 1992, assembly balloting the RDPC/CPDM won 88 seats, enough to ensure its continued government control in coalition with the small Movement for the Defense of the Republic (MDR). However, the results were tainted somewhat by the refusal of some groups, most importantly the anglophone Social Democratic Front (SDF) and a faction of the Cameroonian People's Union (UPC), to participate in the election. Boycott leaders insisted that a ban on coalition or independent candidates favored the government formation and that the early balloting made it impossible for fledgling opposition parties to organize effectively. On April 9 President Biya announced the appointment of Simon ACHIDI ACHU, an Anglophone, as prime minister. However, Achidi Achu's designation failed to stem ongoing ethnic and political violence, while the regime's efforts to quell the unrest were described as "repressive."

In September 1992 Biya announced that presidential elections scheduled for March 1993 would be advanced to October 11 and, following a widely criticized run-up to the poll, Biya subsequently claimed a narrow victory over SDF leader John FRU NDI and four other candidates. On October 15 the Supreme Court rejected a petition by Fru Ndi and the third-placed Maigari Bello Bouba, now leader of the National Union for Democracy and Progress (UNDP), to annul the balloting on the basis of prepoll and election day irregularities. The polling process also was denounced by international observers, who charged that inspectors were denied access to some balloting sites. On October 23 the official election results were released, confirming Biya's victory, with 39.98 percent of the vote, over Fru Ndi (35.97 percent) and Bouba (19.22 percent). Subsequently, nationwide antigovernment rioting was reported, the most serious incidents occurring at Bamenda in Fru Ndi's home province. Six days later Fru Ndi was placed under house arrest as violent street protests continued despite the declaration of a state of emergency at Bamenda.

On November 25, 1992, Achidi Achu was reappointed by Biya, and two days later a new government, including a number of opposition members, was named. Further efforts by the regime to ease post-election tensions included the release of Fru Ndi in early December, termination of the state of emergency at Bamenda on December 29, and the freeing of some 175 political prisoners in January 1993. However, renewed violence was reported in March as the opposition increased pressure on Yaoundé to hold a national conference.

In November 1994 President Biya announced that a "debate" on the constitution, in addition to scheduling of municipal elections, would be forthcoming; however, he refused to agree to a sovereign conference and gave no date for the local balloting, which had already been postponed several times. In early April 1995 Biya pledged that elections would be held by the end of the year, and on April 24, 64 new local districts were created by presidential decree. In November, buoyed by the IMF's endorsement of his administration's 1995-1996 economic and financial reform plan, the president ordered that local elections be held in January 1996.

Propelled by a candidate list nearly twice the size of its closest competitor, the RDPC/CPDM captured 57 percent of the posts at municipal balloting on January 21, 1996. The SDF followed with 27 percent, while the UNDP and Cameroonian Democratic Union (UDC) garnered the remainder. The administration's decision to place presidential appointees in 20 municipalities that the opposition claimed to have captured at the local balloting drew immediate condemnation and calls for civil disobedience from opposition leaders. In March at least five people were killed when antigovernment demonstrators clashed with security forces. Subsequent antigovernment initiatives were undermined, however, by the opposition's intraparty factionalization and their mutual distrust. On September 19 the president announced that he had appointed businessman Peter Mafany MUSONGE to replace Achidi Achu as prime minister. The new government formed the following day was generally described as being of the "technocrat" variety.

Debate between legislative candidates over such "substantive" issues as Biya's economic and political reform programs was overshadowed during the run-up to the May 17, 1997, legislative elections by the opposition's outcry over the administration's allegedly fraudulent handling of electoral preparations. Subsequently, both domestic and international observers charged that the ruling party's capture of 109 seats had been severely tarnished by blatant irregularities and the violent intimidation of opposition candidates and supporters. At second-round polling in early August the RDPC/CPDM captured all of the undecided seats (raising its total to 116), and at mid-month the Supreme Court dismissed opposition appeals for fresh elections. Meanwhile, the administration rejected widespread calls for it to establish an independent electoral commission prior to presidential balloting (scheduled for October) and refused to meet with opposition leaders, whose preelection demands also included a shortening of the presidential term from seven to five years, equal distribution of state campaign funds, and access to the state-run media. In September the leading opposition legislative parties (the SDF, UNDP, and UDC) announced that they would not take part in the presidential elections and called on voters to observe another villes mortes boycott to undermine the polling.

At balloting on October 12, 1997, Biya easily recaptured the presidency, reportedly securing 92 percent of the vote; meanwhile the nearest of the six minor party candidates to compete garnered less than 3 percent. However, administration claims that 84 percent of eligible voters had participated in the polling were disputed by the opposition, which labeled the elections a "farce" and asserted that a boycott by over 80 percent of the electorate had made them the "victors." On December 7 Biya reappointed Musonge as prime minister; three UNDP representatives, including former prime minister Bouba, were included in the reshuffled government announced the same day. Reshuffles were announced on March 18, 2000, and April 27, 2001. The most recent cabinet included members from the RDPC/CPDM, the UNDP, the UPC, and independents.

Municipal elections originally scheduled for January 2001 were postponed first to January 2002 and then to June 30. Although the government gave technical reasons for the postponements, opposition parties claimed that the government was stalling the operation of the democratic process. In any event, the RDPC/CPDM dominated the local balloting as well as the National Assembly poll conducted the same day. President Biya also was easily reelected on October 11, 2004, securing a reported 70.8 percent of the vote against 15 rivals. On December 8 Biya appointed Ephraim INONI to head a new cabinet that included members of the RDPC, UNDP, UPC, and the MDR. (The SDF and UDC reportedly declined cabinet representation.)

Constitution and Government

The 1972 constitution provided for a unitary state headed by a strong executive directly elected by universal suffrage for a five-year term. In November 1983 independents were authorized to seek the presidency upon securing the endorsement of at least 50 prominent figures from each of the country's provinces, although the incumbent presented himself as the sole, party-backed candidate in both 1984 and 1988 (the 1988 poll being advanced by one year to coincide with legislative balloting). The president is assisted by a cabinet drawn from the civil service rather than the legislature. Members may return to their former positions upon termination of their ministerial duties. Under a constitutional revision of January 1984, the president of the assembly becomes, in the event of a vacancy, chief executive, pending the outcome, within 40 days, of a presidential election at which he cannot stand as a candidate. Legislative authority is vested in a National Assembly whose normal five-year term may be lengthened or shortened at the discretion of the president. The judicial system is headed by a Supreme Court and a High Court of Justice; there also are provincial magistrates and a court of appeal.

Under a constitutional amendment of December 23, 1995, the presidential term was extended to seven years and the maximum number of terms reduced to two. In addition, provision was made for the establishment of a bicameral legislature; however, details on the formation of the second chamber, a Senate, had not, as of early 2006, been further delineated.

Cameroon is administratively divided into 10 provinces, each headed by a provincial governor appointed by the president. The provinces are subdivided into regions and local districts, the latter totaling 340 (307 rural, 22 urban, and 11 special regime districts) following the creation of 64 new jurisdictions in April 1995.

Foreign Relations

Cameroon maintains relations with a wide variety of nations. Ties with France remain especially strong, with Yaoundé becoming a full participant in francophone affairs during the May 1989 summit at Dakar, Senegal.

Dominating foreign policy concerns for many years was the civil war in neighboring Chad, which resulted in an influx of some 100,000 refugees into the country's northern provinces. Thus the Ahidjo government took part in several regional efforts to mediate the dispute prior to the ouster of the Libyan-backed Queddei regime in Chad in mid-1982; later Cameroon served as a staging ground for France's support of the Habré government.

Relations with other neighboring states have been uneven. Border incidents with Nigeria, resulting in a seven-month suspension of diplomatic relations in May 1981, continued into early 1987, with Lagos threatening "to take military reprisals" against alleged incursions by Cameroonian gendarmes into Borno State. However, relations improved thereafter.

In October 1992 the Biya regime's alleged manipulation of presidential balloting drew widespread criticism from Western observers, including the European Community, Germany, and the United States, with the latter two announcing the suspension of aid payments in mid-November. On the other hand, Paris's continued support of the regime drew outcries from Cameroonian opposition leaders.

In late 1993 conflict again erupted with Nigeria in the form of an alleged Cameroonian troop raid into Nigeria's Cross River State and the reported dispatch of some 500 Nigerian soldiers to two islands off the Bakassi peninsula that were claimed by Cameroon. Underlying the dispute was the presence of substantial oil reserves along an ill-defined border between the two countries. In early 1994 Cameroon announced that it had filed a suit at the International Court of Justice (ICJ). Subsequently, during an Organization of African Unity (OAU) summit at Tunis in June, President Biya and the Nigerian head of state, Gen. Sani Abacha, agreed to set up a joint committee under the leadership of Togolese President Gnassingbé Eyadéma. However, the conflict reignited in early September with a Nigerian attack that left 10 Cameroonian soldiers dead. In mid-October Nigeria claimed to have indisputable proof of its claim to the Bakassi region in that a 1913 agreement transferring the area to German Kameroun had never been ratified because of the outbreak of World War I. Two months later the OAU formally agreed to mediate the dispute. Amid reports of low-level skirmishes between Cameroonian and Nigerian forces, the two countries traded charges throughout 1998 that the other was attempting to influence the ICJ's decision (originally due in July but subsequently delayed when the Court was forced to defend its jurisdiction). On a more positive note, tension in the region eased palpably when more than 200 prisoners were exchanged in November.

At a summit at Yaoundé in June 1999, Biya and his Nigerian counterpart, Gen. Abdulsalam Abubakar, reportedly held "breakthrough" talks regarding the Bakassi region. However, in early 2000 the Nigerian military was placed on "maximum alert" following Lagos's discovery that France was constructing a military base near the peninsula in Cameroon. Furthermore, Nigerian officials accused Cameroonian forces of regularly firing on its forces. The ICJ urged the two to maintain the "status quo" while waiting for a final ruling. Although minor skirmishes continued in 2000 and 2001, the Nigerian Cross River state opened its Cameroonian border in June 2000.

In 2002 the ICJ ruled in favor of Cameroon in its boundary dispute with Nigeria, but Lagos initially refused to accept the decision. However, after UN-brokered mediation talks in Geneva in August 2003, the two countries agreed to settle the dispute, and a three-year demarcation project was initiated. The development of the new border was overseen by the UN-sponsored Cameroon–Nigeria Mixed Commission. By December 2003 Nigeria had withdrawn from 32 villages and turned control of them over to Cameroon, while Cameroon had turned one village over to Nigeria. In January 2004 the two countries agreed to reopen diplomatic ties and to establish joint patrols in the disputed region until final demarcation was completed. In July 2004 a second round of territorial exchange occurred. However, Nigeria failed to meet the next round of transfer requirement on September 15, 2004, leading to renewed UN efforts to finalize a settlement. The UN reported success in partial demarcation by the end of 2005.

On November 1, 1995, Cameroon was officially granted membership in the Commonwealth. Although a full participant in francophone affairs, Yaoundé had campaigned for membership as part of an effort to appease secessionist leaders in the former British Cameroons region.

Current Issues

Attention in mid-2000 centered on continued secessionist unrest in the North-West and South-West provinces (see the Southern Cameroon National Council under Regional Groups in Political Parties, below) and the controversial pipeline proposed to carry oil from southern Chad to the Cameroonian port of Kribi. In June the World Bank endorsed the $3.7 billion project, despite criticism from environmentalists and human rights activists, the latter arguing that the expected windfall from the pipeline would likely be misused by what they considered to be already a highly corrupt and mismanaged government. The pipeline was completed in 2003, with Cameroon expecting to receive $500 million from Chad for leasing the pipeline over 25 years.

Opposition parties and secessionists were angered by the visit of a delegation from the Commonwealth Secretariat in August 2000 that expressed “satisfaction” with the development of democracy in Cameroon. They also strongly criticized the creation of a National Electoral Observatory in October 2001 to oversee the upcoming municipal and national balloting, charging that the body was controlled by President Biya. Accusations of fraud and other irregularities surrounded the June 30, 2002, local and national elections in which the RDPC/CPDM was credited with resounding victories. (Reruns were ordered for some 17 assembly seats.) The SDF launched a two-month boycott of legislative activity to protest the perceived heavy-handedness of the administration, which in 2003 presented what it called reform of the electoral oversight body to meet opposition demands. However, even international observers criticized some aspects of the October 2004 presidential poll. Meanwhile, Biya’s subsequent appointment of Ephraim Inoni as the new prime minister in December was seen as an attempt to “promote national unity.” Inoni, a career civil servant who had represented Cameroon in its contentious negotiations with Nigeria (see Foreign relations, above), was expected to be popular among the English-speaking population. In addition, the expanded cabinet reportedly included some 17 Muslims.

In mid-2005 Biya loyalists were lobbying for an amendment to the constitution that would allow the president to serve a third seven-year term. Several opposition parties vehemently opposed such a move, with some suggesting it was a ploy by Biya meant only to test reaction to the idea.

Political Parties

Cameroon had only one legal party (the Cameroon National Union [UNC], later the Democratic Rally of the Cameroon People [RDPC]/Cameroon People’s Democratic Movement [CPDM], below) from 1966 until early 1991 despite the fact that the 1972 constitution guaranteed the right of political parties to organize and to participate in elections. In June 1990 President Biya announced that the government, which had theretofore refused to legalize opposition parties, would no longer stand in the way of a multi-party system. In December the National Assembly passed new legislation covering the registration of parties, and as of November 2000, nearly 170 parties had been legalized.

Prior to the 2004 presidential balloting a group of nine opposition parties (including the SDF, UDC, UPC, MDP, and MLDC, below) formed a National Coalition for Reconciliation and Reconstruction (NCRR) with the goal of coalescing behind a single candidate. However, the SDF (the leading party in the coalition) subsequently withdrew following a dispute over the selection of the NCRR standard-bearer. The NCRR candidate, Adamon Ndam Njouda of the UDC, finished third in the balloting with 4.4 percent of the vote.

Government and Government-Supportive Parties

Democratic Rally of the Cameroon People (Rassemblement Démocratique du Peuple Camerounais—RDPC). Formerly the Cameroon National Union (Union Nationale Camerounaise—UNC), the RDPC was until early 1991 the only officially recognized party. The RDPC is also referenced in English as the Cameroon People's Democratic Movement (CPDM). The UNC was formed in 1966 by merger of the Cameroon Union (Union Camerounaise); the former majority party of East (French) Cameroons; and of several former West (British) Cameroons parties, including the governing Kamerun National Democratic Party (KNDP), the Kamerun United National Congress (KUNC), and the Kamerun People's Party (KPP). The present name was adopted, over significant anglophone resistance, at a 1985 congress that also established a National Council as the party's second-highest body. The latter, at its first meeting held November 24–26, 1988, urged that Cameroon maintain its nonaligned foreign policy, called for the imposition of stiff antiembezzlement measures, and asked citizens to accept the “necessary compromise between freedom and order.”

At the party's fifth congress held June 28–30, 1990, President Biya called for a loosening of subversion laws and told party members to expect political “competition,” the way for which was cleared by the National Assembly's approval of a pluralism law in December. The RDPC/CPDM won 88 seats in the March 1992 legislative elections, subsequently forming a coalition with the MDR (below) to create a working majority in the assembly. At an extraordinary RDPC/CPDM congress on October 7, 1995, Biya secured a new five-year term as party president.

Beginning with the resignation of Ayissi NVODO in October 1996, the RDPC/CPDM and Biya were stung by the defection of three prominent party statesmen and their declarations of presidential candidacy. Following Nvodo in that regard were Albert NDZONGANG and the minister of health and Biya's personal physician, Titus EDZOA, who accused the administration of “permanent attempts to humiliate him.” Edzoa was subsequently arrested on fraud charges, and in mid-1997 Nvodo, who had been ill, died. On the other hand, the party's success at legislative balloting in May was attributable, in part, to its recruitment of prominent UNDP and SDF leaders. In addition, observers credited the party's legislative gains to the adoption of a preelection primary process and the support of Prime Minister Musonge's ethnic Sawa constituency in the South-West and Littoral provinces.

The government named in December 1997 reflected, in part, a shift of power within the RDPC/CPDM from those sympathetic to Edzoa, who had been sentenced to 15 years in prison in October, and more senior members to a youthful cadre with “technocratic” tendencies in line with the prime minister's. In April 2001 Biya reshuffled the cabinet and replaced Edouard AKAME Mfoundou, minister of state in charge of economy and finance and an influential figure within the party. The reshuffle was reportedly part of Biya's attempt to increase control over his faction-ridden party.

Leaders: Paul BIYA (President of the Republic and of the Party), Ephraim INONI (Prime Minister), Joseph-Charles DOUMBA (Secretary General), Grégoire OWONA (Deputy Secretary General).

National Union for Democracy and Progress (Union Nationale pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—UNDP). Seen primarily as a vehicle for supporters of former president Ahidjo, the UNDP was formed in 1991 under the leadership of Samuel Eboua. In early 1992, however, it was reported that Eboua had been “squeezed out” of his position by former prime minister Maigari Bello Bouba, who had recently returned from exile. After a last-minute reversal of a proposed electoral boycott, the UNDP won 68 seats in the March legislative balloting, running most strongly in the predominantly Muslim northern provinces. Bouba was subsequently described as the “strongman of the opposition.”

In the immediate aftermath of the October 1992 presidential election the UNDP leader, who had finished third, joined SDF leader Fru Ndi in petitioning the Supreme Court to annul the controversial poll. Nevertheless, in late November two party members, Hamadou MOUSTAPHA and Issa Tchiroma BAKARY, accepted cabinet ministries, and in early 1993 Fru Ndi denounced Bouba for negotiating with President Biya on the formation of a unity government.

On November 8, 1994, the UNDP announced a boycott of the National Assembly, pending the release of 30 party activists who had been arrested in July. While the walkout was abandoned four weeks later, the UNDP Central Committee confirmed in late December that Moustapha and Bakary had been expelled from the party (the latter proclaiming the formation of a rival UNDP). Although advancing the second-highest number of candidates (180) at the 1996 local elections, the UNDP finished third at the balloting. Highlighting the UNDP’s electoral showing was the victory of former president Ahidjo’s son, Mohamed AHIDJO, who had returned from exile two years earlier. Subsequently, the party was buffeted by a power struggle between Bouba and the virulently anti-Biya Mohamed Ahidjo.

Still reeling from the loss of Moustapha and Bakary in 1994, the UNDP fared poorly at legislative balloting in May 1997, its representation dropping to 13 seats. Having reached an impasse in its dialogue with the administration concerning a possible unity government, the UNDP helped spearhead a boycott of the October presidential elections, after which Bouba disputed the government’s claims to a high voter turnout. Nevertheless, in December Bouba announced that he had accepted a cabinet post, asserting that Biya was seeking to incorporate opposition leaders in his government and admitting that his appointment was part of an apparent presidential effort to isolate Fru Ndi. Bouba remained in the cabinet following the March 2000 reshuffling, although substantial criticism was reported at the UNDP congress in June over his decision to stay in the government despite what delegates charged was a distinct lack of progress regarding the political liberalization promised by the Biya administration in the 1997 compact. (The dissent to Bouba became more apparent with the resignation of UNDP Vice President Nicole OKALA in July.) The congress formally criticized the government’s human rights record and demanded broad changes in the electoral code and establishment of an independent election commission prior to the 2002 balloting.

Leader: Maigari Bello BOUBA (Party Leader), Pierre Flambeau NGAYAP (Secretary General).

Cameroon People’s Union (Union des Populations Camerounaises—UPC). The Marxist–Leninist UPC was formed in 1948 and, although outlawed in 1955, continued to operate clandestinely in Cameroon, its membership fragmenting into pro-Soviet and Maoist factions in the 1960s. Sporadic UPC guerrilla activity presented no serious challenge to the Ahidjo regime, and by 1971 most UPC adherents had been forced into exile. Headquartered at Paris, the UPC subsequently served as the most prominent of the groups opposing Cameroon’s one-party regime, claiming thousands of “militants” in both France and Cameroon.

In October 1990 UPC Secretary General Ngouo WOUNGLY-MASSAGA, having been accused by colleagues of “anti-social behavior and embezzlement,” broke with the party and returned to Cameroon, where he eventually organized the People’s Solidarity Party (Parti de la Solidarité du Peuple—PSP). Upon legalization of the UPC in 1991 most former exiles returned, including Ndeh Ntumazah, the “last surviving founder of the UPC,” who reportedly enjoyed a “larger-than-life” reputation in Cameroon despite his 20-year absence. The party subsequently split regarding the March 1992 legislative elections, Ntumazah leading a partial boycott of the balloting despite Secretary General Augustin Frederick Kodock’s decision that the UPC should participate. Presenting candidates in about half of the 180 districts, the UPC won 18 seats, thereby becoming the third-leading parliamentary party.

In May 1992 the party was a founding member of the National Convention of the Cameroonian Opposition (see under PDC, below), and in September Henri Hogbe Nlend was described as a UPC presidential candidate. However, there were no reports of his having garnered any votes or of the UPC having taken part in the elections. In February 1995 Woungly-Massaga returned to the UPC, which absorbed his PSP.

Intraparty tension mounted following the UPC’s poor showing at the January 1996 municipal elections, where it won only 3 of 336 contests, and in April the party announced a number of dismissals and reportedly sought closer ties with the RDPC/CPDM. In early May the UPC’s parliamentary leader, Charles Oma BETOW, and three other senior leaders announced the removal of Secretary General Kodock, labeling his party management “disastrous.” For his part, Kodock argued that his detractors had met illegally, thus invalidating their motion. Kodock was named minister of state for agriculture in the government announced on September 20, a UPC conference earlier in the month reportedly revealing at least four factions in the grouping.

At legislative balloting in May 1997 Kodock’s “pro-Biya” wing forwarded 35 candidates while Ntumazah and his followers supported an additional 17; subsequently, the group’s representation plummeted from 16 posts to 1 as Kodock alone secured a seat. At presidential polling in October the party once again forwarded Henri Hogbe Nlend, who secured only 2.8 percent of the vote.

In December Nlend was named minister of scientific and technical research in the new cabinet. As of mid-2001 the UPC was reportedly split into two competing factions, out of which Kodock’s became increasingly “anti-Biya,” while Nlend’s wing was representing the “pro-Biya” orientation.

In the 2002 legislative elections the national election board treated the two factions as a single party, although candidates identified themselves as UPC (N) for the Nlend supporters and UPC (K) for the Kodock supporters. Kodock accepted a cabinet post after the balloting and continued to serve in the reshuffled cabinet after the presidential elections in 2004. The UPC (N) participated in the anti-Biya presidential electoral coalition in 2004.

Leaders: Henri Hogbe NLEND (1997 presidential candidate and UPC [N] Leader), Augustin Frederick KODOCK (UPC [K] Leader).

Movement for the Defense of the Republic (Mouvement pour la Défense de la République—MDR). The northern-based MDR, supported primarily by the small Kirdi ethnic group, was organized shortly before the March 1992 legislative balloting in an apparent effort to dilute the electoral strength of the UNDP (above), the region’s dominant party. Six of the MDR’s 32 candidates won assembly seats, enough to make the party a crucial element in formation of the subsequent government. Five MDR members were appointed to the cabinet in April, including party leader Dakole Daissala, who had been placed in detention following the 1984 coup attempt. Although never formally charged or tried, Daissala had remained in jail until 1991, when he began what was viewed as an extraordinary ascent to governmental prominence.

At legislative balloting in May 1997 the MDR managed to recapture only one of its legislative posts. Subsequently, the party was not included in the government named in December. The MDR failed to gain any seats in the 2002 elections, but Daissala joined the government in 2004 as minister of transport.

Leader: Dakole DAISSALA (President).

Opposition Parties

Social Democratic Front (SDF). The SDF was launched in early 1990 in the English-speaking town of Bamenda in western Cameroon. Shortly thereafter a number of its leaders were arrested for belonging to an illegal organization, and an SDF rally in May was broken up by security forces, leaving several people dead. However, following the government's endorsement of political liberalization in June, the SDF detainees were released, and the party (legalized in 1991) became one of the most active opposition groups. Although it would probably have secured substantial representation, particularly in the anglophone western provinces, the SDF boycotted the March 1992 legislative election on grounds that there was insufficient time for opposition parties to organize effectively and that the electoral code favored the RDPC/CPDM.

Party president John Fru Ndi's strong showing in the October 1992 presidential balloting was heralded by the SDF as evidence that its appeal was not limited to the anglophone community. Hence, the party continued to distance itself from the Cameroon Anglophone Movement, the self-described "socio-cultural association" headquartered at Buea in the South-West province, which advocated a return to the 1972-style federal government system. In November the SDF rejected calls for a unity government headed by Biya, insisting that his handling of the presidential balloting and Fru Ndi's arrest proved that he could not be trusted. Instead it called for a two-year transitional program to be highlighted by the establishment of a new electoral code and the convening of a constitutional conference to draw up a new basic charter.

In May 1994 Secretary General Siga AS-SANGA was dismissed by the party's disciplinary council for making approaches to the government on possible SDF participation in a government of national unity. Five months later Fru Ndi spearheaded the launching of the Allies' Front for Change (FAC, below), prior to yielding the office under a revolving presidency system to Samuel Eboua (then of the UNDP) in January 1995.

In early 1995 the SDF experienced a deep crisis that resulted in the departure or exclusion from its executive committee of a dozen influential members. One of those excluded, party treasurer Jean DJOKOU, accused Fru Ndi of "secret management and swindling the party finances," while others complained of the lack of attention to francophones within the party, most of whom strongly supported a unitary state.

During the run-up to balloting in January 1996 the SDF suspended its membership in the FAC and issued a list of 105 candidates. At the January 21 polling the party secured victories primarily in large towns and "traditional fiefdoms." Subsequently, the party's performance at legislative balloting in May 1997 (43 seats captured) fell shy of analysts' predictions. Thereafter, SDF militants took to the streets to protest the government's alleged fraudulent administration of the polling, and on June 12 a number of party members were arrested. Nevertheless, on June 17 Fru Ndi called on the party's legislators to assume their seats. Fru Ndi's "statesman-like" decision to distance himself and the SDF from violent dissent had its roots, according to some analysts, in his ambitions for the presidential elections scheduled for October. Subsequently, Fru Ndi and other senior SDF members traveled to African and Western capitals to gain allies in their efforts to pressure the recalcitrant Biya administration into addressing the opposition's preelectoral demands. While such visits reportedly improved Fru Ndi's standing with the international community, Biya's stance remained unchanged. Consequently, on September 12 at Paris Fru Ndi announced the SDF's decision to boycott the presidential polling.

The SDF's (then) secretary general, Tazoacha Asonganyi, led the party's negotiating team at talks with the government, which opened in December 1997. For his part, Fru Ndi, who had earlier threatened to expel any member who joined the government, had reportedly adopted a "wait and see" position. The talks collapsed in early 1998, and in mid-February the SDF formed a "common front" with the UDC (below). In July the SDF suffered its most traumatic infighting since 1995, as 10 of the party's 43 legislators resigned from the party to protest Fru Ndi's leadership, which they reportedly characterized as "authoritarian." Subsequently, Fru Ndi ousted Souleimane MAHAMAD, theretofore SDF vice chair, in October after Mahamad convened an extraordinary party congress that served as an anti-Fru Ndi forum. In lopsided balloting at the SDF's annual congress in April 1999, Fru Ndi retained the party's top post.

The SDF protested that the 2002 legislative elections were flawed because of government interference, and Fru Ndi launched a boycott of the assembly and municipal councils. However, in July Fru Ndi announced an end to the boycott, prompting a group of SDF dissidents to form a new party (see AFP, below).

The SDF was instrumental in the formation of the anti-Biya electoral coalition, the NCRR, in April 2004. However, Fru Ndi withdrew the SDF from the NCRR in September after a dispute over the manner in which the coalition's presidential candidate would be chosen. Fru Ndi instead ran as the SDF's candidate and received 17.4 percent of the vote.

Rifts in the party developed in late 2005 after Asonganyi criticized party leadership for being ineffectual as a catalyst for change in Cameroon and said he would not run for party chair at the next congress in May 2006. Meanwhile, party members Paulinus Toh JUA and Ben MUNA vowed to challenge Fru Ndi at the next congress. Following Asonganyi's remarks, at a reportedly "stormy" session of party leaders, he was suspended, prompting protest by some members who walked out. Subsequently, he was replaced as secretary general by Dr. Michael NDOBEGANG. Asonganyi was dismissed from the party in early 2006 after the party found him guilty of six "charges," including questioning or criticizing party policies, ideals, and hierarchy. Shortly thereafter, Ndobegang resigned over Asonganyi's expulsion.

Leaders: John FRU NDI (President).

Cameroonian Democratic Union (Union Démocratique du Cameroun—UDC). The UDC was formed in 1991 under the leadership of Adamou Ndam Njoya, who held several senior posts in the Ahidjo administration. Although the party boycotted the March 1992 legislative election, Ndam Njoya subsequently competed in the October 1992 presidential elections, gaining 3.62 percent of the vote.

In 1997 Ndam Njoya was a leading advocate of the opposition's boycott of the October presidential polling, although the party had secured five seats in the May legislative balloting. Following the 2002 elections the UDC became the third-largest party in the assembly with five seats. Ndam Njoya helped form the anti-Biya coalition in the 2004 presidential election and was the coalition's candidate for the presidency. He placed third with 4.4 percent of the vote.

Leader: Adamou NDAM NJOYA.

Other Parties and Groups

Movement for the Liberation of Cameroonian Youth (Mouvement pour la Libération de la Jeunesse Camerounaise—MLJC). At legislative balloting in May 1997 the theretofore little-known MLJC secured one seat. It did not gain any seats in the 2002 balloting, and a subsequent leadership dispute led members of the MLJC to leave the party and establish a new political group (see MLDC below).

Leader: Dieudonné TINA.

Movement for the Liberation and Development of Cameroon (Mouvement pour la Libération et le Développement du Cameroun—MLDC). The MLDC, formed by dissident members of the MLJC, participated in the anti-Biya electoral coalition in 2004.

Leaders: Marcel YONDO, Jean PAHAI.

Alliance of Progressive Forces (Alliance des Forces Progressistes—AFP). Created in 2002, the AFP was formed by former members of the SDF who opposed Fru Ndi's leadership and willingness to compromise with President Biya.

Leader: Maidadi Saidou YAYA.

Social Movement for the New Democracy (Mouvement Social pour la Nouvelle Démocratie—MSND). The MSND, said to have support among the urban middle class, was formed in 1991 by Yondo Black, a former president of the Cameroon Bar Association who had been active in the prodemocracy movement for several years, at times in conjunction with the organizers of the SDF. Black had been arrested in February 1990 for his activities and sentenced to three years' imprisonment for "subversion," but was released in August. Black ran for the presidency in 2004 but received only 0.36 percent of the vote.

Leader: Yondo Mandengue BLACK.

Allies' Front for Change (Front des Alliés pour le Changement—FAC). The FAC was launched in October 1994 under the guidance of SDF leader John Fru Ndi, although he and his party withdrew from the grouping to campaign independently for the 1996 municipal elections. The FAC was initially reportedly composed of 15 parties; however, only the 3 parties immediately below were subsequently identified as members.

The status of the Front was further clouded in October 1997 when the MDP's Samuel Eboua campaigned for the presidency under his party's banner (below).

Leaders: Njoh LITUMBE (President, PLD), Victorin Hameni BIELEU (UFDC), Samuel EBOUA (MDP).

Liberal Democratic Party (Parti Libéral Démocrate—PLD). The PLD was formed in 1991 under the leadership of Njoh Litumbe, who subsequently visited the United States as a spokesman for the opposition groups in Cameroon.

Leader: Njoh LITUMBE.

Union of Democratic Forces of Cameroon (Union des Forces Démocratiques du Cameroun—UFDC). The UFDC was considered one of the more important groups to boycott the March 1992 legislative election, its leader, Victorin Hameni Bieleu, having served as president of an opposition coordinating committee in 1991. On November 3, 1992, Bieleu was arrested for his involvement in antigovernment protests. Bieleu ran for the presidency in 2004 but received less than 1 percent of the vote. He was reported to be mobilizing support from his "militants" in the diaspora in early 2005 in preparation for the 2007 legislative elections.

Leader: Victorin Hameni BIELEU.

Movement for Democracy and Progress (Mouvement pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—MDP). The MDP is headed by former UNDP leader Samuel Eboua, who was elected to a FAC leadership post in February 1996. Eboua's 1997 presidential campaign yielded just 2.4 percent of the vote at October balloting.

Leader: Samuel EBOUA (1997 presidential candidate).

Cameroonian Party of Democrats (Parti des Démocrates Camerounais—PDC). The PDC is Cameroon's member of the Christian Democratic International. One of its leaders, Louis-Tobie Mbida, was instrumental in launching an antigovernment coalition, the National Convention of the Cameroonian Opposition (Convention Nationale de l'Opposition Camerounaise—CNOC), in early 1992.

Leaders: Louis-Tobie MBIDA (President), Gaston BIKELE EKAMI (Secretary General).

Action for Meritocracy and Equal Opportunity Party (AMEOP). At presidential balloting in October 1997 the anglophone AMEOP's candidate, Joachim Tabi Owono, secured less than 1 percent of the vote.

Leader: Joachim Tabi OWONO (1997 presidential candidate).

Integral Democracy of Cameroon (Démocratie Intégrale du Cameroun—DIC). The DIC's presidential candidate in 1992 and 1997 was its leader, Blazius Isaka. He received less than 1 percent of the vote in October 1997. He also received less than 1 percent of the vote in the 2004 presidential balloting.

Leader: Blazius ISAKA (1992, 1997, and 2004 presidential candidate).

In January 1994 Jean-Michel TEKAM, leader of the Social Democratic Party of Cameroon (Parti Social-Démocrate du Cameroun—PSDC), announced the launching of an opposition united front that reportedly included the Progressive Movement (Mouvement Progressif—MP), led by Jean-Jacques EKINDI, as well as the MSND and a branch of the UPC (above). The new group declared itself open to all other opposition formations, including the SDF. Included in the government named in December 1997 was Antar GASSAGAYE, theretofore identified as leader of the National Progress Party (Parti National du Progrès—PNP). However, both Tekam and Ekindi ran in the 2004 presidential elections as candidates for their respective parties (the PSDC and the MP).

Other parties that contested the 2002 legislative or the 2004 presidential elections included the Alliance for Development and Democracy (Alliance pour la Démocratie et le Développement—ADD), led by 2004 presidential candidate Garga Haman ADJI; the Justice and Development Party (JDP), which promotes the rights of English-speaking Cameroonians under the leadership of publisher Boniface FOBBIN, who was the JDP's 2004 presidential candidate; and the African Movement for New Independence and Democracy (Mouvement Africain pour la Nouvelle Indépendance et la Démocratie—MANIDEM), led by Anicet EKANE and comprised of former members of the UPC.

Regional Groups

Southern Cameroon National Council (SCNC). The leading vehicle for expression of secessionist sentiment in the former British Cameroons region, the SCNC originally served as the elected executive organ of the Southern Cameroon People's Conference (SCPC), an umbrella organization for a number of professional and trade associations, political parties, youth groups, and other grassroots bodies opposed to the domination of francophone influence in the country. The SCPC was the successor to the All Anglophone Conference (AAC), which first met in 1993 in an effort to persuade the nation's francophone leadership to return to the federal structure of the 1960s in which the anglophone region enjoyed broad autonomy. The SCPC rubric was subsequently adopted in part because the term anglophone was deemed too "colonial" and "limiting" and in part to reflect the region's shift in favor of independence based on a perceived lack of interest in dialogue regarding autonomy on the part of the Biya administration. Most observers subsequently referred to the SCNC when discussing affairs in the Southern Cameroons, prompting the SCPC, for the sake of clarity, to formally adopt the SCNC name for itself.

In August 1995 an SCNC delegation petitioned the United Nations to mediate between the secessionists and Yaoundé, warning that lack of intervention would result in "another Somalia." Two months later the Council released a proposed timetable for independence, and the Cameroonians responded by arresting a number of SCNC adherents. SCNC founding chair Sam Ekontang ELAD resigned in late 1996, ostensibly due to illness, and he was succeeded by former Cameroonian diplomat Henry Fossung.

In late March 1997 more than 200 SCNC supporters were arrested, many in connection with what the government said was an attack on the headquarters of security forces at Bamenda in which several people were reportedly killed. The crackdown apparently suppressed SCNC activity for more than a year as Fossung reportedly returned to his outlying village to maintain a low profile. In April 1998 a group led by SCNC treasurer Arnold Yongbang attempted to revive the organization, electing Esoka NDOKI MUKETE, the "charismatic" provincial chair of the SDF, as the new SCNC chair. However, that decision was challenged as "undemocratic" by Fossung and others, including the influential SCNC–North America (SCNC-NA), and the Council remained factionalized and, consequently, ineffective.

In October 1999 a military tribunal at Yaoundé sentenced nine SCNC members to prison for their roles in the alleged 1997 attack, prompting renewed turmoil in the North-West and South-West provinces (which the SCNC prefers to reference as the Northern and Southern zones). Shortly thereafter, the SCNC again petitioned the UN for recognition, and in December it was reported that SCNC militants, under the leadership of Ndoki Mukete (who had been forced to resign his SDF post because that party does not endorse independence for the anglophone region), planned to declare independence by the end of the year. However, Fossung continued to oppose such a unilateral declaration, and the Cameroonian government indicated it would react harshly to any independence announcement. Consequently, Ndoki Mukete was reported to be “traveling abroad” on December 30 when SCNC militants took over the radio station at Buea to declare the establishment of the Federal Republic of the Southern Cameroons. Ndoki Mukete was subsequently described as having left the SCNC, the effective leadership mantle falling to Frederick Ebong Alobwede, who had read the independence declaration and been arrested with a number of supporters shortly thereafter following a series of pro-independence demonstrations.

An SCNC meeting in late January 2000 again attempted to resolve the leadership dispute, Fossung continuing to describe himself as chair and disavowing the recent declaration. In February the Northern and Southern zones each elected their own executive bodies, and those groups then elected a new SCNC executive body, with Ebong as chair, thereby “president” of the newly announced republic. The Council remained formally committed to nonviolence, although that philosophy was expected to be reconsidered at a “constituent assembly” scheduled for late September in which a constitution secretly adopted in 1996 also was scheduled for review. (The constitution reportedly calls for a federal structure for the Southern Cameroons based on 13 essentially tribal-based provinces.) Meanwhile, the Biya administration maintained its hard line toward the SCNC, and no dialogue was reported between the government and the secessionists as of midyear. In October 2001 violent clashes between police and SCNC demonstrators on the 40th anniversary of unification left three dead and dozens injured. In July 2001 Ebong announced the formation of his “cabinet,” and the SCNC boycotted the 2002 legislative elections and the 2004 presidential polling.

In late 2005 several party members, including the chair of one of the factions, were arrested after illegal demonstrations. Party official Chief AYAMBA Ette Otun was released but soon rearrested for his role in launching Radio Free Southern Cameroons (see Broadcasting and computing, below), which aired programs highly critical of the administration. In early 2006 one of the detainees died, his supporters alleging his death was the result of torture.

Leaders: Henry FOSSUNG (head of faction opposed to independence declaration), Frederick EBONG Alobwede (Chair of the SCNC and President of the Federal Republic of the Southern Cameroons), Dr. Ngala NFOR (Vice Chair of the SCNC and Chair of the Northern Zone Executive Committee), Dr. Martin LUMA (Spokesman), Andrew AZONG-WARE (Secretary General).

South West Elite Association (SWELA). The reactivation of SWELA was announced in March 2000, apparently at the urging of Prime Minister Musonge in the hope of countering the secessionist movement in South-West province led by the SCNC. SWELA leaders subsequently voiced support for a “united Cameroon.”

Leader: Lyonga Efase KANGE (Secretary General).

Guerrilla Group

National Liberation Front of Cameroon (Fronte de la Libération Nationale du Cameroun—FLNC). The anti-Biya FLNC is led by Mbara Guerandi, who reportedly fled from Cameroon in 1984 following his indictment for participating in an alleged coup attempt. In late 1997 it was reported that Guerandi, now based in Burkina Faso, had reached agreement with antigovernment rebels in Chad to coordinate guerrilla activities.

Leader: Mbara GUERANDI (in exile in Burkina Faso).

Legislature

The National Assembly (Assemblée Nationale) currently consists of 180 members elected for five-year terms. At the April 1988 election voters in most districts were permitted to choose between two lists (in the case of single-member constituencies, between two candidates) presented by the Cameroon People's Democratic Movement.

Multiparty balloting was introduced at the March 1, 1992, election, which was brought forward one year in response to pressure from the nation's burgeoning prodemocracy movement. However, no independent or coalition candidates were permitted, contributing to the decision by some opposition groups to boycott the poll. The number of parties participating in legislative balloting increased from 32 in 1992 to 40 in 1997, and the number of parties securing seats rose from four to seven, respectively. Following the most recent legislative elections on June 30, 2002 (with reruns on September 15), the seat distribution in the National Assembly was as follows: the Democratic Rally of the Cameroon People, 149; the Social Democratic Front, 22; the Cameroonian Democratic Union, 5; the Cameroon People's Union, 3; and the National Union for Democracy and Progress, 1.

President: Djibril Cayavé YEGUIE.

Communications

Press

Prior censorship has long been practiced in Cameroon, and journalists have occasionally been detained for publishing "sensationalist" or "tendentious" material. Although President Biya announced in June 1990 that restrictions on the press would be loosened in consonance with the government's political liberalization program, the censorship law was retained, and several newspapers were suspended in 1991 for publishing articles criticizing the administration. The principal newspapers are Le Tribune du Cameroun/Cameroon Tribune (Yaoundé), government daily in French (66,000) and English (20,000); Cameroon Post (50,000), weekly in English; La Gazette (Douala, 35,000), twice weekly in French; Le Messenger (34,000), independent fortnightly in French; Le Combattant (21,000), independent weekly in French; Cameroon Outlook (Victoria, 20,000), thrice weekly in English; Politiks (10,000), independent daily in French; Mutations, biweekly independent; La Révélation; L'Action. In September 1992 Le Messenger was one of several publications temporarily suspended by the government; the editor of Le Messenger was imprisoned for nine months in 1998 for printing a "false story" about President Biya. In October 2001 the opposition publication La Nouvelle Expression reportedly came under scrutiny for stories on the secessionist movement. On the eve of the 2004 presidential elections, several media outlets, including Mutations and more than a dozen radio and television stations, were suspended. Speculation was that the action was taken to prevent criticism of President Biya prior to the election and suspensions were lifted after the election.

News Agencies

The former Agence Camerounaise de Presse (ACAP) was replaced in 1978 by the Société de Presse et d'Édition du Cameroun (Sopecam), which, under the Ministry of Information, is responsible for the dissemination of foreign news within Cameroon and also for publication of Le Tribune du Cameroun. The principal foreign agency is Agence France-Presse.

Broadcasting and Computing

The Office de Radiodiffusion-Télévision Camerounaise (CRTV) is a government facility operating under the control of the Ministry of Information and Culture. Programming is in French, English, and more than two dozen local languages, with 24-hour programming launched in 2005. There were approximately 580,000 television receivers and 100,000 personal computers serving 60,000 Internet users in 2003. An opposition radio station, Radio Free Southern Cameroons, began broadcasting in English an hour a week in late 2005 under the aegis of the SCNC (see Political Parties, above). Also in late 2005, a radio station operated by the Seventh-Day Adventist church began broadcasting.

CAPE VERDE

REPUBLIC OF CAPE VERDE

República de Cabo Verde

The Country

Cape Verde embraces ten islands and five islets situated in the Atlantic Ocean some 400 miles west of Senegal. The islands are divided into a northern windward group (Santo Antão, São Vicente, Santa Lúcia, São Nicolau, Sal, and Boa Vista) and a southern leeward group (Brava, Fogo, São Tiago, and Maio). About 60 percent of the population is composed of mestiços (of mixed Portuguese and African extraction), who predominate on all of the islands except São Tiago, where they are outnumbered by black Africans; Europeans constitute less than 2 percent of the total. Most Cape Verdeans are Roman Catholics and speak a Creole version of Portuguese that varies from one island to another. Partly because of religious influence, women have traditionally been counted as less than 25 percent of the labor force, despite evidence of greater participation as unpaid agricultural laborers; female representation in party and government affairs has been increasing slowly, and the current government contains six women.

The islands' economy has historically depended on São Vicente's importance as a refueling and resting stop for shipping between Europe and Latin America. The airfield on Sal has long served a similar function for aircraft, although substantial revenue losses were experienced in the late 1980s because of a denial of landing rights to South African planes as a matter of "morality and solidarity with the rest of Africa." Corn is the major subsistence crop, but persistent drought since the late 1960s has forced the importation of it and other foods. The Monteiro administration's World Bank-supported efforts to both privatize state-run enterprises and attract foreign investment were underlined in 1995 by the sale of 40 percent of the telecommunications facility to Portuguese investors. In June 1997 efforts to rehabilitate the island's infrastructure were boosted by a loan from the African Development Fund of $4.9 million for road projects.

Cape Verde in 1998 adopted a structural reform program prescribed by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) with the aim of "restoring financial stability" in the wake of a dismal economic performance in the first half of the decade. Debt reduction and private sector growth topped the government's goals. GDP grew in real terms by 8.6 percent in 1999, and 6.8 percent in 2000, in part due to increased tourism and greater export of manufactured goods. On the negative side, unemployment grew during that time period, and by 2002 some 36 percent of the population was reportedly living in poverty. The IMF, World Bank, and African Development Bank subsequently provided significant additional assistance to support the government's economic restructuring. The country's GDP growth, which for the past several years had been described by the IMF as "robust," dipped to 4.5 percent in 2004, in part because of the drought's effect on agriculture (see Current issues, below). However, the IMF predicted 6 percent growth for 2005, bolstered by construction and continued low inflation.

Political Background

Cape Verde was uninhabited when the Portuguese first occupied and began settling the islands in the mid-15th century; a Portuguese governor was appointed as early as 1462. During the 1970s several independence movements emerged, the most important being the mainland-based African Party for the Independence of Guinea-Bissau and Cape Verde (Partido Africano da Independência do Guiné-Bissau e Cabo Verde—PAIGC), which urged the union of Cape Verde and Guinea-Bissau, and the Democratic Union of Cape Verde (União Democrática de Cabo Verde—UDCV), which was led by João Baptista MONTEIRO and rejected the idea of a merger.

An agreement signed with Portuguese authorities on December 30, 1974, provided for a transitional government prior to independence on July 5, 1975. A 56-member National People's Assembly was elected on June 30, 1975, but only the PAIGC participated; the results indicated that about 92 percent of the voters favored the PAIGC proposal of ultimate union with Guinea-Bissau. Upon independence, the assembly elected Aristides PEREIRA, the secretary general of the PAIGC, as president of Cape Verde. On July 15 Maj. Pedro PIRES, who had negotiated the independence agreements for both Cape Verde and Guinea-Bissau, was named prime minister of Cape Verde. However, the question of eventual unification with Guinea-Bissau remained unresolved, both governments promising to hold referendums on the issue. In January 1977 a Unity Council composed of six members from each of the national assemblies was formed, although in December the two governments asserted that it was necessary to move cautiously, with initial emphasis to be placed on establishing "a common strategy of development." Both countries continued to be ruled through the PAIGC, President Pereira serving as its secretary general and President Luis Cabral of Guinea-Bissau as his deputy.

On September 7, 1980, the assembly adopted Cape Verde's first constitution with the expectation that a collateral document under preparation in Guinea-Bissau would be virtually identical in all key aspects. On November 14, however, the mainland government was overthrown, and on February 12, 1981, the Cape Verdean assembly voted to expunge all references to unification from the country's basic law. Although formal reconciliation between the two governments was announced in mid-1982, the parties agreed that there would be no immediate resumption of unification efforts. Meanwhile, the offshore component of the ruling party had dropped the reference to Guinea in its title.

In keeping with currents elsewhere on the continent, the National Council of the African Party for the Independence of Cape Verde (PAICV, as the PAIGC had been restyled in 1981) announced in April 1990 that the president would henceforth be popularly elected and that other parties would be permitted to advance candidates for the assembly. On July 26 Pereira stepped down as PAICV party leader, declaring that the head of state should be "above party politics."

In the country's first multiparty balloting on January 13, 1991, the recently formed Movement for Democracy (Movimento para Democracia—MPD) won 56 legislative seats on the strength of a 68 percent vote share, compared to the PAICV's 23 seats. Prime Minister Pires announced his resignation on January 15, and on January 28 he was

Political Status: Former Portuguese dependency; became independent July 5, 1975; present constitution adopted September 25, 1992.

Area: 1,557 sq. mi. (4,033 sq. km.).

Population: 434,812 (2000C); 484,000 (2005E).

Major Urban Centers (2005E): CIDADE DE PRAIA (São Tiago, 129,000), Mindelo (67,000).

Official Language: Portuguese.

Monetary Unit: Cape Verde Escudo (official rate July 1, 2006: 87.70 escudos = $1US). (The escudo has been pegged to the Portuguese escudo since 1998.)

President: Gen. (Ret.) Pedro Verona Rodrigues PIRES (African Party for the Independence of Cape Verde); elected by popular vote on February 25, 2001, and inaugurated on March 22 for a five-year term, succeeding António Mascarenhas MONTEIRO (nonparty, backed by Movement for Democracy); reelected to another five-year term on February 12, 2006, and inaugurated on March 6.

Prime Minister: José Maria Pereira NEVES (African Party for the Independence of Cape Verde); appointed by the president on February 1, 2001, and sworn in (along with the new cabinet) on the same day in succession to António Gualberto DO ROSARIO (Movement for Democracy) following legislative election of January 14; reappointed by the president and sworn in on March 8, 2006, following legislative election of January 22.

succeeded by the MPD's Carlos Alberto Wahnou de Carvalho VEIGA, who formed an MPD-dominated interim government pending the upcoming presidential poll. Continuing the PAICV's decline, President Pereira was defeated in the February 17 balloting by António Mascarenhas MONTEIRO, who had the support of the MPD, by a vote of 74 to 26 percent. Following Monteiro's inauguration on March 22, a permanent Veiga government was installed on April 4.

In legislative balloting on December 17, 1995, the MPD once again secured an absolute majority, capturing a reported 60 percent of the vote, the clear-cut legislative triumph being described by observers as validation of both the government's economic policies and Prime Minister Veiga, who had vowed to resign if faced with the political "instability" of having to form a coalition government. In addition, the PAICV's failure to increase its legislative representation reportedly convinced former prime minister Pires to shelve plans for a presidential campaign. President Monteiro was reelected unopposed in the presidential balloting of February 18, 1996.

On July 29, 2000, Prime Minister Veiga, who had become increasingly at odds with President Monteiro on several issues, including economic policy, announced he would no longer serve as prime minister in order to prepare for a campaign to succeed Monteiro (limited to two terms by the constitution) in the 2001 elections. Veiga argued that his decision meant that Deputy Prime Minister António Gualberto DO ROSARIO should be elevated to the premiership at least on an interim basis. However, the PAICV labeled the maneuvering unconstitutional, and President Monteiro also criticized the action as undermining his authority to appoint the prime minister. (Among other things, it was not clear if Veiga was officially resigning or merely "suspending" his prime ministerial responsibilities.) An institutional crisis was finally averted when Veiga subsequently submitted a formal resignation letter. On October 6 President Monteiro invited do Rosario to form a new government that, as constituted on October 9, comprised all but one of the incumbent ministers.

In legislative balloting on January 14, 2001, the PAICV won 47 percent of the vote and 40 seats. On January 26 President Monteiro invited PAICV leader José Maria Pereira NEVES to form a new government, which was sworn in on February 1. Subsequently, former prime minister Pires of the PAICV was elected after two rounds of presidential balloting on February 11 and February 25, defeating Veiga and two independent candidates (see Current issues, below). Pires again defeated Veiga in the presidential balloting of February 12, 2006, securing 50.92 percent of the vote versus Veiga's 49.02 percent, following the PAICV's winning 41 seats in legislative balloting on January 22. Neves was reappointed to head another PAICV government and was sworn in along with the new government on March 8.

Constitution and Government

The constitution of September 7, 1980, declared Cape Verde to be a "sovereign, democratic, unitary, anti-colonialist, and anti-imperialist republic" under single-party auspices. Legislative authority was vested in the National People's Assembly, which elected the president of the republic for a five-year term. The prime minister was nominated by the assembly and responsible to it. The basic law was amended in February 1981 to revoke provisions designed to facilitate union with Guinea-Bissau, thus overriding, inter alia, a 1976 judiciary protocol calling for the merger of legal procedures and personnel. The likelihood of a merger was virtually eliminated by adoption of the mainland constitution of May 1984, which emulated its Cape Verdean counterpart by lack of reference to the sister state.

On September 28, 1990, the National People's Assembly approved constitutional and electoral law revisions, forwarded in early 1990 by the PAICV National Council, which deleted references to the party as the "ruling force of society and of state," authorized balloting on the basis of direct universal suffrage, and sanctioned the participation of opposition candidates in multiparty elections that were subsequently held in January and February 1991.

A new constitution that came into force in September 1992 provided for direct presidential election to a five-year term, with provision for a run-off if no candidate secures a majority in the first round. Legislative authority is vested in a popularly elected national assembly of between 66 and 72 deputies. The assembly's normal term is also five years, although it may, in certain circumstances, be dissolved by the president. The prime minister continues to be nominated by and responsible to the assembly, though appointed by the president. On the prime minister's recommendation the president appoints the Council of Ministers, whose members must be assembly deputies. The court system features a Supreme Court of Justice, beneath which are courts of first and second resort. There also are administrative courts, courts of accounts, military courts, and tax and customs courts. In July 2004 the government announced plans to create a Constitutional Court in 2005.

At present there are 17 local government councils, which are popularly elected for five-year terms.

Foreign Relations

Cape Verde has established diplomatic relations with some 50 countries, including most members of the European Union (EU), with which it is associated under the Lomé Convention. Formally non-aligned, it rejected a 1980 Soviet overture for the use of naval facilities at the port of São Vicente as a replacement for facilities previously available at Conakry, Guinea. The Pereira government subsequently reaffirmed its opposition to any foreign military accommodation within its jurisdiction. In March 1984 Cape Verde became one of the few non-Communist countries to establish relations with the Heng Samrin government of Cambodia and, following a visit by Yasir Arafat in August 1986, it exchanged ambassadors with the Palestine Liberation Organization.

The country's closest regional links have been with Guinea-Bissau (despite a 20-month rupture following the ouster of the Cabral government in November 1980) and the other three Lusophone African states: Angola, Mozambique, and Sao Tome and Principe. Relations with Bissau were formally reestablished in July 1982 prior to a summit meeting of the five Portuguese-speaking heads of state in Praia held September 21–22, during which a joint committee was set up to promote economic and diplomatic cooperation.

Following the MPD legislative victory in January 1991, the new prime minister, Carlos Veiga, declared that no major foreign policy changes were contemplated, although he moved quickly to strengthen relations with anti-Marxist groups in Guinea-Bissau, Angola, and Mozambique.

In August 1998 international attention focused on Praia as the recently launched Community of Portuguese Speaking Countries (CPLP), under Monteiro's leadership, and the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) forged a cease-fire agreement between the combatants in Guinea-Bissau.

The government established diplomatic and trade relations with China in 2001, while in 2002 it launched a broad initiative to gain preferential trade relations with the European Union. Subsequently, a sea-border agreement with Mauritania in December 2003 offered the hope for additional oil and mineral exploitation.

Current Issues

The MPD lost control over five key municipalities in local balloting in February 2000. In addition, a degree of discord developed within the MPD in midyear as President Monteiro described the recent privatization of the national fuel company as having lacked transparency, a charge that was sharply rejected by Prime Minister Veiga. The friction intensified later in the year as the result of the controversy surrounding Veiga's relinquishing of his prime ministerial duties (see Political background, above). Also contributing to declining MPD popularity was rising unemployment, linked, in the mind of some voters, to the government's recent structural adjustment efforts and additional pro-market emphasis. Consequently, most observers were not surprised by the January 2001 legislative victory by the PAICV, led by José Neves, a symbol of the "new generation" in Cape Verdean political affairs. At the same time, the presidential campaign pitted the warhorses of the two dominant parties against one another in a poll whose closeness called to mind the 2000 balloting in the United States. The National Electoral Commission initially declared former prime minister Pires the victor in the second round by 17 votes, a margin that was reduced to 12 following Supreme Court rulings on challenges from both sides. Despite contending that the balloting had been marred by fraud, Veiga accepted the final verdict and successfully urged his supporters to remain calm in the face of the exasperating defeat. Among other things, Pires's victory precluded the need for a PAICV/MPD "cohabitation" government, which the PAICV argued would have been a severe hindrance to its economic plans. Despite its center-left orientation, the Neves government presented a development plan in early 2002 calling for intensified cooperation with the private sector, particularly in regard to promoting tourism and otherwise attracting foreign investment, goals that reportedly also influenced a March 1 cabinet expansion.

Drought contributed to famine conditions prior to heavy rains in 2003, while some 30 percent of the arable land was reportedly plagued by locusts. For its part, the government pledged to promote economic growth by constructing a new international airport, improving roads and other infrastructure, and supporting small businesses. However, it was not clear how much enthusiasm the population was retaining for the PAICV administration. In what some observers suggested could be a precursor to the national election scheduled for early 2006, the MPD won control of 9 of 17 municipal councils in the March 2004 local balloting. That proved to be of little help in maintaining any momentum for the MPD, however, as the party secured only 29 of 72 seats in the legislative election of January 22, 2006. Further, party leader Veiga again lost to rival Pires in the presidential balloting of February 2006, and though Veiga and his MPD supporters challenged the legislative results on the basis of fraud, the Supreme Court dismissed those claims. As of early 2006 the court had not ruled on similar allegations by Veiga regarding the presidential election results.

Political Parties

Although a number of parties existed prior to independence, the only party that was recognized for 15 years thereafter was the African Party for the Independence of Guinea-Bissau and Cape Verde (PAIGC). The reference to Guinea-Bissau was dropped and the party restyled the African Party for the Independence of Cape Verde (PAICV), insofar as the islands' branch was concerned, on January 20, 1981, in reaction to the mainland coup of the previous November.

Government Party

African Party for the Independence of Cape Verde (Partido Africano da Independência de Cabo Verde—PAICV). The PAICV's predecessor, the PAIGC, was formed in 1956 by Amílcar Cabral and others to resist Portuguese rule in both Cape Verde and Guinea-Bissau. Initially headquartered in Conakry, Guinea, the PAIGC began military operations in Guinea-Bissau in 1963 and was instrumental in negotiating independence for that country. Following the assassination of Cabral on January 20, 1973, his brother, Luís, and Aristides Maria Pereira assumed control of the movement, Luís Cabral serving as president of Guinea-Bissau until being overthrown in the 1980 coup.

At an extraordinary congress held February 13–17, 1990, the National Council endorsed constitutional changes that would permit the introduction of a multiparty system, and in April the council recommended that further reforms be adopted in preparation for legislative and presidential elections. In August Maj. Pedro Pires was elected PAICV secretary general, replacing Pereira, who was defeated for reelection as president of the republic on February 17, 1991, and promptly announced his retirement from politics.

At a party congress on August 29, 1993, Pires was appointed to the newly created post of party president to exercise "moral authority." Aristides Lima, the party's parliamentary leader, was subsequently elected to the vacated general secretary position. Pires won reelection to the PAICV's top post at a party congress in September 1997, staving off a challenge by newcomer José Neves.

Apparently bolstered by his party's success in local balloting in February 2000, Pires announced in March that he was stepping down from his PAICV post to prepare for presidential balloting scheduled for 2001. A June PAICV congress elected Neves to succeed Pires in a reported 204–157 vote over PAICV Vice President Felisberto Viera. In the legislative elections in January 2001, the PAICV won 47 percent of the vote, and Pires secured 46 percent of the votes in the first round of presidential voting in February and was elected in a stunningly close race in the second round with 49.43 percent of the vote. In local elections in March 2004, the PAICV suffered a major defeat by losing control of the council on Sal Island, the country's major tourist destination. In response to the losses, Neves reshuffled the cabinet in April. Pires was reelected in 2006, and the PAICV won a majority of seats in the 2006 assembly elections.

Leaders: Pedro Verona Rodrigues PIRES (President of the Republic), José Maria Pereira NEVES (Prime Minister and President of the Party), Manuel Inocencio SOUSA (Vice President of the Party), Aristides Raimundo LIMA (Secretary General and the Speaker of the National Assembly), Rui SEMEDO (National Secretary).

Opposition Parties

Movement for Democracy (Movimento para Democracia—MPD). Then a Lisbon-based opposition grouping, the MPD issued a "manifesto" in early 1990 calling for dismantling of the PAICV regime, thereby prompting the ruling party to schedule multiparty elections. In June the MPD held its first official meeting in Praia, and in September it met with the PAICV to discuss a timetable for the balloting that culminated in MPD legislative and presidential victories of January and February 1991.

The MPD retained legislative control in 1995, although its seat total dropped from 56 to 50. In addition, President António Monteiro, an independent who enjoyed the support of the MPD, was reelected unopposed to a second term as president of the republic in February 1996. However, in the wake of estrangement between Monteiro and the MPD's Carlos Veiga, prime minister from March 1991 to October 2000 (see Political background and Current issues, above, for details), the party secured only 39 percent of the vote in the January 2001 legislative poll, losing control to the PAICV. Meanwhile, Veiga finished second in the first round of presidential balloting in February with 45 percent of the vote before losing an excruciatingly close race in the second round. (He finally was credited with only 17 fewer votes [on a 49.42 percent vote share] than his PAICV opponent. The MPD did very well in local elections in March 2004, gaining control of nine municipal councils, up from six). The elections confirmed the leadership of Agostinho Lopes, who had been subject to increasing dissatisfaction after the 2001 national elections. However, in 2006 the MPD's power showed signs of decline as Veiga again lost a presidential bid and the party won only 29 seats in the legislative election (see Political background, above).

Leaders: Agostinho LOPES (President of the Party), Carlos Alberto Wahnou de Carvalho VEIGA (Former Prime Minister, Former Chair of the Party, and 2001 and 2006 presidential candidate).

Cape Verdean Independent and Democratic Union (União Caboverdeana Independente e Democrática—UCID). The UCID is a right-wing group long active among the 500,000 Cape Verdean emigrants in Portugal and elsewhere. In mid-1990 the UCID, whose local influence appeared to be limited to one or two islands, signed a cooperation agreement with the MPD.

In legislative balloting in December 1995, the UCID received 5 percent of the vote, the third-largest tally, but failed to secure representation. The UCID was one of the components, with the Democratic Convergence Party (PCD) and the Labor and Solidarity Party (PTS), in the Democratic Alliance for Change (Aliança Democrática para a Mudança—ADM), which fielded candidates in the 2001 legislative election. (The ADM won 6 percent of the vote and two assembly seats [one each for the PCD and the PTS] in 2001.) There was no reference to the ADM in the 2006 elections. In the 2006 legislative balloting, the UCID placed a distant third with 2.64 percent of the vote (two seats).

Leaders: Antonio MONTEIRO (President), Celso CELESTINO (Former President).

Other Parties

Democratic Socialist Party (Partido Socialista Democrático—PSD). Launched in 1992, the PSD was legalized on July 14, 1995. The party's platform calls for greater governmental support for development programs and the elimination of "injustices." The PSD secured less than 1 percent of the vote in the 1995, 2001, and 2006 legislative balloting.

Leader: João ALEM.

Democratic Renewal Party (Partido da Renovação Democrática—PRD). Established in July 2000, the PRD is an offshoot from the MPD. The party won 3.2 percent of the vote in the 2001 legislative balloting but failed to secure any seats. In 2003 the PRD joined with the PCD in discussions on a new coalition ahead of the 2006 legislative elections. The PRD won less than 1 percent of the vote in balloting on January 22, 2006.

Leader: Simao MONTEIRO.

Democratic Convergence Party (Partido da Convergência Democrática—PCD). The PCD was launched in 1994 by Dr. Enrico Correia Monteiro, a dissident MPD legislator, whose reelection to the assembly in 1995 was the group's sole electoral victory. In 2003 the PCD began efforts to create a new electoral coalition with the PRD to oppose the MPD and PAICV ahead of the 2006 legislative elections. There was no reference to the PCD in the 2006 elections, however.

Leader: Dr. Enrico Correia MONTEIRO (President).

Labor and Solidarity Party (Partido de Trabalho e da Solidariedade—PTS). This grouping is a "socialist-oriented" party that was launched by the mayor of São Vicente, Onesimo Silveira, in May 1998. In a confusing series of events following the formation of the ADM, Silveira announced his plans to run for president in 2001

The Country

The Central African Republic (CAR) is a landlocked, well-watered plateau country in the heart of Africa. Its inhabitants are of varied ethnic, linguistic, and religious affiliations. In addition to French and many tribal dialects, Sango is used as a lingua franca. A majority of the population is Christian, and there also are sizable animist and Muslim sectors.

About four-fifths of the inhabitants are employed in farming and animal husbandry, primarily at a subsistence level. Leading exports include diamonds, coffee, timber, and cotton. Most of the small industrial sector is engaged in food processing, while uranium resources have been developed with French and Swiss partners. Economic diversification, long impeded by a lack of adequate transportation facilities, was further constrained by the personal aggrandizement during 1976–1979 of self-styled Emperor Bokassa, a virtually empty national treasury at the time of his ouster in September 1979 being only partially mitigated by marginal increases in commodity exports in ensuing years. France remains the country's main source of imports, chief market for exports, and principal aid donor.

Recent development programs have focused on trade promotion, privatization of state-run operations, encouragement of small- and medium-sized enterprises, civil service reductions, and efforts to combat widespread tax and customs fraud. Such measures have earned Bangui the tentative support of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank, although the implementation of many of the government's proposed administrative and structural changes has been criticized as slow and ineffective. In the mid-1990s political turmoil significantly diverted attention from economic development; however, following the restoration of stability in Bangui, the republic recorded real GDP growth of 5.1 percent in 1997 and 3.0 percent in 1998, with inflation of 1.8 percent being registered in 1998. In July 2000 the IMF noted that, despite ongoing social and political problems, the government had made progress in restructuring the Political Status: Became independent August 13, 1960; one-party military regime established January 1, 1966; Central African Empire proclaimed December 4, 1976; republic reestablished September 21, 1979; military rule reimposed September 1, 1981; constitution of November 21, 1986, amended on August 30, 1992, to provide for multiparty system; present constitution adopted January 7, 1995, following acceptance in referendum of December 28, 1994; civilian government suspended following military coup on March 15, 2003; new constitution adopted by national referendum on December 5, 2004, providing for a return to civilian government via national elections that were held March–May 2005.

Area: 240,534 sq. mi. (622,984 sq. km.).

Population: 2,463,616 (1988C); 4,006,000 (2005E).

Major Urban Center (2005E): BANGUI (783,000).

Official Language: French. The national language is Sango.

Monetary Unit: CFA Franc (official rate July 1, 2006: 513.01 francs = $1US). (The CFA franc, previously pegged to the French franc, is now permanently pegged to the euro at 655.957 CFA francs = 1 euro.)

President: Gen. François BOZIZÉ Yangouvonda (nonparty); declared himself president on March 16, 2003, following the overthrow of Ange-Félix PATASSÉ (Central African People's Liberation Movement); popularly elected in two-round balloting on March 13 and May 8, 2005, and inaugurated for a five-year term on June 11.

Prime Minister: Elie DOTÉ (nonparty); appointed by the president on June 13, 2005, succeeding Célestin-Leroy GAOMBALET (nonparty).

banking system, although the proposed privatization of the petroleum sector was still lagging behind other reforms. Real GDP grew by 3.4 percent in 1999 and 4.1 percent in 2000, although aid agencies reported that two-thirds of the population continued to live in poverty and had little access to health care or basic services such as electricity, running water, or sanitation systems. (The CAR ranked among the lowest ten countries in the Human Development Report prepared by the United National Development Program.) Financial affairs were further complicated by the arrest of more than 20 government officials in 2002 on charges of embezzling some $3 million in government funds, prompting the IMF and World Bank to suspend some aid programs temporarily. International financial institutions also reacted negatively at first to the coup of March 2003, although aid was resumed in 2004 after the new administration implemented initiatives designed to fight corruption and increase government revenue.

Real GDP grew by only 1 percent in 2004 and was expected to increase by about the same amount in 2005. In view of the country's continued economic difficulties (including increasing debt), the IMF called for "urgent fiscal consolidation" to contain spending and bolster revenue. While commending the country's peaceful transition to an elected government in 2005, the IMF was highly critical in its assessment of the management of public resources and security, citing widespread corruption. However, in early 2006 the IMF's confidence in the government following successful elections was evidenced by its approval of $10.2 million in emergency assistance to help stabilize the economy.

Political Background

Formerly known as Ubangi-Shari in French Equatorial Africa, the Central African Republic achieved independence on August 13, 1960, after two years of self-government under Barthélemy BOGANDA, founder of the Social Evolution Movement of Black Africa (Mouvement de l'Évolution Sociale de l'Afrique Noir—MESAN), and his nephew David DACKO, the republic's first president. As leader of MESAN, President Dacko rapidly established a political monopoly, dissolving the principal opposition party in December 1960 and banning all others in 1962. Dacko was ousted on January 1, 1966, in a military coup led by Col. Jean-Bédél BOKASSA, who declared himself president. Bokassa abrogated the constitution, dissolved the assembly, assumed power to rule by decree, took over the leadership of MESAN, and became chief of staff and commander in chief of the armed forces.

Following his assumption of power, Bokassa survived a number of coup attempts, often relying on French military intervention. Designated president for life by MESAN in 1972, he assumed the additional office of prime minister in April 1976 but relinquished it to Ange-Félix PATASSÉ the following September, when a new Council of the Central African Revolution (Conseil de la Révolution Centrafricaine—CRC) was established. In the context of widespread government and party changes, Bokassa further enhanced his image as one of Africa's most unpredictable leaders by appointing former president Dacko to be his personal adviser.

On October 18, during a state visit by Libyan leader Muammar al-Qadhafi, Bokassa revealed that he had been converted to Islam and would henceforth be known as Salah al-Din Ahmad Bokassa. On December 4 he announced that the republic had been replaced by a parliamentary monarchy and that he had assumed the title of Emperor Bokassa I. On December 7 the emperor abolished the CRC, and the next day he abandoned his Muslim name because of its incompatibility with the imperial designation.

In the wake of a lavish coronation ceremony in Bangui on December 4, 1977, the Bokassa regime became increasingly brutal and corrupt. In mid-1979 Amnesty International reported that scores of schoolchildren had been tortured and murdered after protesting against compulsory school uniforms manufactured by the Bokassa family. In August an African judicial commission confirmed the report, the emperor responding with a series of arrests and executions of those who had testified before the commission.

On the night of September 20–21, 1979, while on a visit to Libya, the emperor was deposed, with French military assistance, by former president Dacko. While several prominent members of the Bokassa regime were arrested, the “government of national safety” that was announced on September 24 drew widespread criticism for including a number of individuals who had held high-ranking posts in the previous administration. (Bokassa lived in exile until he returned in 1987 to face trial on charges of murder, torture, and cannibalism. Following conviction on the murder charge he was imprisoned until his sentence was commuted in 1993. Prolonged ill health having precluded any subsequent extensive political activity on his part, Bokassa died in November 1996.)

In a presidential election on March 15, 1981, Dacko was credited with 50.23 percent of the votes cast, as contrasted with 38.11 percent for his closest competitor, former prime minister Patassé. Alleged balloting irregularities triggered widespread violence in the capital prior to Dacko's inauguration and the naming of Simon Narcisse BOZANGA as prime minister on April 4. In mid-July opposition parties were temporarily banned after a bomb explosion at a Bangui theater, and on July 21 the army, led by Gen. André-Dieudonné KOLINGBA, was asked to restore order. Six weeks later, on September 1, it was announced that Dacko, known to be in failing health, had resigned in favor of a Military Committee for National Recovery (Comité Militaire pour le Redressement National—CMRN), headed by General Kolingba, which suspended the constitution, proscribed political party activity, and issued a stern injunction against public disorder.

Patassé and a number of senior army officers were charged with an attempted coup against the Kolingba regime on March 3, 1982, after which the former prime minister took refuge in the French Embassy in Bangui. He was flown out of the country a month later.

Internal security merged with regional concerns in late 1984 after an opposition group led by Alphonse M'BAIKOUA, who had reportedly been involved in the alleged 1982 coup attempt, joined with Chadian codo rebels in launching border insurgency operations. The following April Bangui and N'Djamena began a joint counterinsurgency campaign that failed to curb the rebels, most of whom sought temporary refuge in Cameroon.

In keeping with promises to launch a gradual return to civilian rule, Kolingba dissolved the CMRN in September 1985 and placed himself, in the dual role of president and prime minister, at the head of a cabinet numerically dominated by civilians, although military men remained in the most powerful positions. At a referendum on November 21, 1986, a reported 91 percent of the electorate approved a new constitution, under which General Kolingba continued in office for a six-year term. The constitution also designated a Central African Democratic Rally (Rassemblement Démocratique Centrafricain—RDC) as the nucleus of a one-party state, General Kolingba having asserted that a multiparty system would invite “division and hatred as well as tribalism and regionalism.”

Balloting for a new National Assembly was held in July 1987, although voter turnout was less than 50 percent, apparently because of opposition appeals for a boycott. In May 1988, in what the government described as the final stage of its democratization program, more than 3,000 candidates, all nominated by the RDC, contested 1,085 local elective offices.

On March 15, 1991, General Kolingba divested himself of the prime ministerial office, transferring its functions to his presidential coordinator, Edouard FRANCK. In late April, pressured by international aid donors and encountering increased social unrest, Kolingba abandoned his opposition to pluralism. On May 18 the regime offered to accelerate political reform in exchange for an end to civil strife, and on June 7 a national commission was established to revise the constitution and prepare for the introduction of multipartyism. In July the government announced that political parties were free to apply for legal status. Subsequently, a broad-based committee was named to prepare for the convening of a national conference on February 19, 1992. However, during an early 1992 visit to the United States, President Kolingba referred to the projected talks as a “great national debate” that “cannot be a sovereign national conference.”

Because of its lack of plenary power, the conference that convened on August 1, 1992, was boycotted by most opposition groups and was accompanied by street demonstrations and antigovernment strikes. On August 30 the National Assembly adopted a number of conference recommendations, including party registration guidelines, and on September 7 Kolingba announced plans for presidential and legislative elections on October 25. The ensuing campaign was described as “tense and disorganized” and polling (with Kolingba apparently running next-to-last behind Dr. Abel GOUMBA Guéne of the Concertation of Democratic Forces [Concertation des Forces Démocratiques—CFD], former prime minister Patassé, and former president Dacko) was suspended by the government, which charged that “premeditated acts of sabotage” had curtailed the distribution of voting materials. On November 28, the last day of his constitutional term, President Kolingba announced that new elections would be held on February 14 and 28, 1993, and on December 4 he appointed Timothée MAL-ENDOMA of the Civic Forum (Forum Civique—FC) to succeed Franck as prime minister.

In a January 17, 1993, radio broadcast General Kolingba announced the formation of a National Provisional Political Council of the Republic (Conseil National Politique Provisoire de la République—CNPFR), headed by former president Dacko, to oversee public affairs until the installation of an elected government. However, doubts about the regime’s commitment to a democratic transfer of power persisted as the president’s mandate, which had officially ended on November 28, was extended, and the elections scheduled for February 14 and 28 were postponed until May.

On February 26, 1993, following what observers described as three months of political paralysis in Bangui, Kolingba dismissed Malendoma and his transitional government for “blocking the democratic process” and named Enoch Dérant LAKOUÉ, leader of the Social Democratic Party (Parti Social-Démocrate—PSD) as the new prime minister. In late April the president overrode an electoral commission recommendation and further postponed elections until October, prompting an outry by the CFD's Goumba, who accused Kolingba and Lakoué of conspiring to use the delay to revive their flagging presidential campaigns.

On June 11, 1993, Prime Minister Lakoué announced that elections would be brought forward to August. The policy reversal came only six days after the French minister of cooperation, Michel Roussin, reportedly told Kolingba that continued aid was directly linked to the speed of reform. At the August 22 poll eight candidates, including Africa's first female contender, Ruth ROLLAND, vied for the presidency while 496 candidates contested 85 legislative seats. Although the election was conducted in the presence of international observers, Kolingba, faced with unofficial tallies showing that he had finished in fourth place, attempted to halt release of the official results; however, he was obliged to reverse himself upon domestic and international condemnation of what Goumba described as the "last convulsion of his regime."

In second-round presidential balloting on September 19, first-round plurality winner Patassé defeated Goumba 53.49 to 46.51 percent. In concurrent rounds of legislative balloting, Patassé's Central African People's Liberation Movement (Mouvement de Libération du Peuple Centrafricaine—MLPC) won 34 seats, followed by the CFD, whose members collectively won 17. Meanwhile, on September 1 Kolingba had released thousands of convicted criminals, the most prominent of whom was former Emperor Bokassa.

On October 25, 1993, Patassé named an MLPC colleague, Jean-Luc MANDABA, as prime minister. Five days later Mandaba announced the formation of a coalition government that drew from the MLPC, the Liberal Democratic Party (Parti Liberal-Démocratique—PLD), the CFD-affiliated Alliance for Democracy and Progress (Alliance pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—ADP), supporters of former president Dacko, and members of the outgoing Kolingba administration.

Prime Minister Mandaba was forced to resign on April 11, 1995, upon the filing of a nonconfidence motion signed by a majority of National Assembly members, who charged him with corruption, maladministration, and a lack of communication between the executive and legislative branches. President Patassé promptly named as his successor Gabriel KOYAMBOUNOU, a senior civil servant who announced that combating financial irregularities would be one of his principal objectives.

In early April 1996 a newly formed opposition umbrella group, the Democratic Council of the Opposition Parties (Conseil Démocratique des Partis de l'Opposition—CODEPO), organized an anti-Patassé rally in Bangui. An even more serious challenge developed on April 18 when several hundred soldiers, angered over payment arrears, left their barracks in the Kasai suburb of Bangui and took control of important locations in the capital. The rebels went back to their barracks several days later, after French troops were deployed in support of the government, but they returned to the streets on May 18. The rebellion finally ended on May 26 after French forces, supported by helicopter gunships, engaged the mutinous soldiers in fierce street battles. Patassé, describing the nation as "shattered" by the near civil war, replaced Koyambounou on June 6 with Jean-Paul NGOUPANDÉ, a former ambassador to France. Thereafter, in a further attempt to stabilize the political situation, Patassé's MLPC and the major opposition parties signed a pact under which, among other things, the authority of the prime minister was to be extended so as to dilute presidential control. Moreover, on June 19 Ngoupande announced the formation of what was optimistically described as a "government of national unity."

On November 16, 1996, another mutiny erupted in Kasai, and by early December the rebellious soldiers, who were demanding the president's resignation, were reportedly in control of several sections of the capital. In late December, amid reports that over a third of the city's population had fled as the fighting took on a "tribal character," the government and rebels appeared to agree to a ceasefire; however, it was subsequently reported that Capt. Anicet SAULET, the leader of the mutineers, had been detained by his own forces for having signed the accord. In early January 1997 French and government troops forced the rebels from a number of their strongholds in an offensive sparked by the assassination of two French troops on January 4.

On January 25, 1997, in Bangui, Patassé and Saulet signed a peace accord that had been brokered by an inter-African mediation group comprising representatives of Burkina Faso, Chad, Gabon, and Mali. The agreement included provisions for a general amnesty for the mutinous soldiers, the reintegration of the rebels into their old units, and the deployment of a regional peacekeeping force styled the Inter-African Mission to Monitor the Bangui Accords (Mission Internationale du Suivi des Accords de Bangui—MISAB). On January 30 Patassé appointed Foreign Minister Michel GBEZERABRIA to replace Prime Minister Ngoupandé, and on February 18 a new 28-member cabinet, the Government of Action for the Defense of Democracy (Gouvernement pour l'Action et la Défense de la Démocratie—GADD), was installed. Although the MLPC retained all the key posts, the GADD included representatives from ten parties, including nine members from four “opposition” groups. On March 15 the National Assembly voted to extend amnesty to those remaining rebels who agreed to be disarmed by the peacekeepers within 15 days; however, clashes broke out later in the month when a number of the rebels resisted the peacekeeping forces.

On May 5, 1997, the nine opposition cabinet ministers announced the “suspension” of their postings and called for nationwide strikes to protest the deaths two days earlier of three alleged mutinous soldiers being held in police custody. Amid mounting tension, on May 20 the rebels’ two cabinet representatives (they had been appointed in April as part of the Bangui agreement) also quit the government. Subsequently, more than 100 people, primarily civilians, were killed in Bangui and the Kasai camp during clashes between rebel and government troops, the latter again supported by French troops, before another cease-fire was signed on July 2.

MISAB, which had the endorsement of the UN Security Council, began disarming the army mutineers in mid-July, and in late August the government released the last of more than 110 detainees connected to the “revolt.” Consequently, the nine cabinet members who had walked out in May formally rejoined the government of September 1. Tension continued at a somewhat reduced level into 1998, prompting the convening of a national conference in late February. On March 3 the conference’s participants, including the opposition parties coalesced under the banner of the influential Group of 11 (G-11), signed a reconciliation pact aimed at improving interparty relations and reducing the lawlessness gripping the country.

A new UN peacekeeping force (Mission des Nations Unies dans la République Centrafricaine—MINURCA) took over MISAB and French responsibilities on April 15, 1998, with a mandate that included assisting in preparations for legislative elections. In early August the polling was postponed amid opposition criticism of the government’s organization of the balloting, and in October MINURCA’s mandate was extended as the peacekeepers began preparations for the elections that had been rescheduled for November/December.

Approximately 30 parties forwarded candidates for the 109 seats (enlarged from 85) available at first-round legislative balloting on November 22, 1998, the MLPC emerging with a small lead after that round. However, opposition groups signed an electoral pact under the banner of the Union of Forces Supporting Peace and Change (Union des Forces Acquisées à la Paix et au Changement—UFAPC), whereby they agreed to back the leading opposition candidates in the undecided contests. As a result, following second-round balloting on December 13, the UFAPC-affiliated parties controlled 55 seats (led by the RDC with 20) and the MLPC 47. However, the small PLD (2 seats) and five independents subsequently confirmed their allegiance to the MLPC, and Patassé supporters were ultimately able to gain legislative control when, under highly controversial circumstances, a legislator-elect from the PSD defected to the MLPC. (The opposition charged the MLPC with “hijacking” the results of the election through bribery but lost its legal challenge when the Constitutional Court ruled that legislators represented their electorates and not their parties, thereby deeming the defection to have been legal.) Most opposition legislators boycotted the convening of the new assembly in early January 1999, and ten opposition cabinet members resigned from the government in protest against the MLPC's actions. On January 4 Patassé named Finance and Budget Minister Anicet Georges DOLOGUÉLÉ to replace Gbezera-Bria as prime minister. However, the UFAPC rejected Patassé's authority in the matter, arguing that it should have control over the appointment as holder of the true legislative majority.

On January 15, 1999, Prime Minister Dologuélé announced a new cabinet comprising eight ministers from the MLPC, four from the PLD, four from the opposition Movement for Democracy and Development (Mouvement pour la Démocratie et la Développement—MDD), one from the MLPC-allied National Convention (Convention National—CN), and eight independents. However, three of the MDD members resigned several days later, party leaders reiterating their support for the UFAPC.

The opposition ended its assembly boycott in early March 1999, apparently in part due to the government's agreement to let UFAPC members sit on a new election commission charged with overseeing the upcoming presidential poll. On September 19, Patassé secured another six-year term by winning 51.6 percent of the vote in the first-round balloting, defeating nine other candidates, including Kolingba, Dacko, and Goumba. Dologuélé was subsequently reappointed to head another MLPC-led government, the UFAPC having declined overtures to join the cabinet. In January 2000 the administration issued several decrees designed to restructure the armed forces so as to reduce the likelihood of a repeat of the 1996–1997 mutinies. Among other things, the size and authority of the powerful presidential guard were to be reduced. Subsequently, the MINURCA peacekeepers formally withdrew on February 15, while Paris announced an increase in aid to Bangui for military training. The Patassé/Dologuélé administration announced that its new top priority was to attract international economic assistance. However, the image-building campaign stalled in April when a series of scandals involving alleged money-laundering and other corrupt practices precipitated a cabinet reshuffle amid opposition complaints that economic reforms contained in the 1997 peace accord were being ignored.

Because of increasing economic difficulties, the government was unable to pay the salaries of the state employees and military personnel for most of 2000. The worsening situation prompted the UN Security Council to urge the government in January 2001 to defuse tensions by paying off the arrears. Although trade unions were calmed by a partial payment (completed with the help of the World Bank, France, and Libya), the government's handling of the situation cost Dologuélé his post, as he was replaced by the president in April 2001 by the MLPC's Martin Ziguélé. On April 6 Ziguélé announced a new cabinet that included the MLPC, the PLD, the CN, the African Development Party (Parti Africain du Développement—PAD), the Democratic Union for Renewal/Fini Kodro (Union Démocratique pour le Renouveau/Fini Kodro—UDR/FK), one independent, and others.

In May 2001 the government managed to suppress a coup attempt reportedly masterminded by the former president and de facto leader of the RDC, André-Dieudonné Kolingba, who nevertheless remained at large. (It was subsequently reported that Kolingba had traveled to Uganda and then, in September 2002, to France. By that time he had been sentenced in absentia to death for his role in the coup attempt. Sentences in absentia also were handed down against more than 500 other participants.) Human rights activists voiced concern over the alleged acts of retaliation against Kolingba's Yakoma ethnic group. Reportedly, more than 200 people were killed and 50,000 displaced in the fighting following the coup attempt. Some cabinet members, as well as Gen. François BOZIZÉ, the chief of staff and close associate of Patassé, were also implicated in the conspiracy. Following a reshuffle in August that replaced those ministers allegedly supportive of the coup, Patassé dismissed Bozizé in late October. Government troops subsequently fought Bozizé loyalists who offered armed resistance to an effort to arrest the general. After Bozizé fled to Chad in November, the situation got increasingly “internationalized” (see Foreign relations, below), as many neighboring countries worked to arrange negotiations among Patassé, Kolingba, and Bozizé. In what some saw as a possible sign of compromise, the Central African Republic’s courts dropped legal proceedings against Bozizé in December. However, sporadic skirmishes broke out along the Chadian border in the first half of 2002, the CAR government accusing Chad of supporting rebellious CAR soldiers. The Organization of African Unity called upon the UN to send peacekeepers to the CAR, but no such action ensued. Among other things, Western capitals objected to the continued presence in the CAR of Libyan troops and tanks, which had rushed to Patassé’s aid in May 2001. For his part, Bozizé in September 2002 announced his intentions of ousting Patassé by force.

In October 2002 government forces supported by Libyan troops turned back pro-Bozizé rebels who were advancing on Bangui. However, after the Libyan troops withdrew in January 2003 in favor of a 350-member peacekeeping force from the Central African Economic and Monetary Community (Communauté Économique et Monétaire de l’Afrique Centrale—CEMAC), Bozizé’s forces entered Bangui on March 15 while Patassé was out of the country on a diplomatic mission. (Patassé’s plane reportedly tried to return to the CAR but was forced away by gunfire.) The following day Bozizé declared himself president, suspended the constitution, and disbanded the National Assembly. On March 23 Bozizé appointed what was termed a government of national unity (comprising five major parties) under the leadership of Abel Goumba of the Patriotic Front for Progress. At the end of May, Bozizé established a 98-member National Transitional Council (Conseil National de Transition—CNT) to oversee the planned return to civilian government under a revised constitution within 18–30 months. Goumba was dismissed in favor of Célestin-Leroy GAOMBALET on December 12.

The revised constitution was approved by a reported yes vote of 90.4 percent in a national referendum on December 5, 2004. In accordance with the provisions of the new constitution, the first parliamentary and presidential elections were held in two rounds of balloting on March 13 and May 8, 2005. Bozizé lacked a majority with 43 percent of the vote in the first round, with MLPC leader Ziguélé receiving 24 percent, and the RDC-backed Kolingba, 16 percent. In the two-way runoff, Bozizé, with the support of some of the other presidential candidates who had received only a small percentage of votes, defeated Ziguélé with 64.6 percent of the vote. For his part, Ziguélé called for the election to be invalidated, claiming soldiers intimidated voters, but the constitutional court dismissed the allegations as unfounded. Meanwhile, a coalition of business groups and small political parties that had formed under the name National Convergence (Kwa na Kwa—KNK) to support Bozizé won 42 legislative seats, while the former ruling party (the MLPC) won only 11 seats, and independents won 34.

A new government, composed largely of members of the KNK, was sworn in on June 19. The cabinet was reshuffled on January 31, 2006; it included members of seven parties in addition to the dominant KNK.

Constitution and Government

The imperial constitution of December 1976 was abrogated upon Bokassa’s ouster, the country reverting to republican status. A successor constitution, approved by referendum on February 1, 1981, provided for a multiparty system and a directly elected president with authority to nominate the prime minister and cabinet. The new basic law was itself suspended on September 1, 1981, both executive and legislative functions being assumed by a Military Committee for National Recovery, which was dissolved on September 21, 1985. The constitution approved in November 1986 was a revised version of the 1981 document, one of the most important modifications being confirmation of the RDC as the country’s sole political party. The 1986 basic law also provided for a Congress consisting of an elected National Assembly and a nominated Economic and Regional Council.

In June 1991 General Kolingba appointed a national commission to draft constitutional amendments providing for political pluralism, and in July the government announced that parties could apply for legal status. Other amendments approved at the “grand national debate” of August 1992 included creation of a semipresidential regime with executive authority vested in a prime minister and stricter separation of executive, legislative, and judicial powers. The basic law that was ratified in a referendum in December 1994 retained those provisions, while expanding the permissible mandate of the head of state to two six-year terms and specifying that the prime minister will implement policies proposed by the president, who is to “embody and symbolize national unity.” In addition, the new charter (formally adopted on January 14, 1995) expanded the judicial system by adding a Constitutional Court to the existing Supreme Court and High Court of Justice and provided for an eventual substantial devolution of state power to directly elected regional assemblies.

The constitution was suspended following the coup of March 2003, although the 1995 basic law served as a model in many areas for the new constitution that was approved by national referendum on December 5, 2004, and entered into effect on December 27. The new constitution reduced the presidential term from six to five years (renewable once), while the prime minister (to be appointed by a majority within the new 105-member National Assembly) was given expanded powers.

Foreign Relations

As a member of the French Community, the country has retained close ties with France throughout its changes of name and regime. A defense pact between the two states permits French intervention in times of “invasion” or outbreaks of “anarchy,” and French troops, in the context of what was termed “Operation Barracuda,” were prominently involved in the ouster of Bokassa. By contrast, in what appeared to be a deliberate policy shift by the Mitterrand government, some 1,100

French troops remained in their barracks during General Kolingba’s assumption of power and, despite debate over alleged French involvement in the Patassé coup attempt, the French head of state declared his support for the regime in October 1982. French troops remained permanently stationed at the Bouar Military base and were instrumental in propping up the Patassé administration during the army revolt of April–May 1996.

The civil war in neighboring Chad long preoccupied the CAR leadership, partly because of the influx of refugees in the country’s northern region. In addition, trepidation about foreign intrusion not only from Chad but also from throughout Central Africa prompted Bangui in 1980 to sever diplomatic ties with Libya and the Soviet Union, both of which had been accused of fomenting internal unrest. Relations with the former, although subsequently restored, remained tenuous, with two Libyan diplomats declared persona non grata in April 1986. Formal ties were reestablished with the Soviet Union in 1988 and with Israel in January 1989, President Kolingba visiting Tel Aviv in July to ratify a development cooperation agreement. In July 1991 China severed diplomatic relations with Bangui after the Kolingba regime had reestablished links with Taiwan.

In the run-up to the August 1993 balloting, Abel Goumba emerged as France’s “consensus candidate” while his primary competitor, Ange-Felix Patassé, was reportedly viewed with trepidation by Paris because of commercial links to Washington and other Western capitals. On August 28 Paris condemned Kolingba’s efforts to stall the release of election results, suspended all aid payments, and stated that French troops and materials were no longer at the president’s disposal.

Tension with the CAR’s “new” neighbor, the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC), developed in 1997, and in February 1998 fighting was reported along their shared border. However, in May the two signed a defense pact, and thereafter CAR troops were reported to be assisting the forces of DRC President Kabila. The CAR was subsequently described as trying to maintain a neutral position in regard to the intertwined conflicts that produced what one reporter called a “ring of fire” in the region into mid-2000.

Relations between the CAR and the DRC soured, with the increasingly close ties between President Patassé and the DRC rebels, most prominently the forces loyal to Jean-Pierre Bemba (see article on the DRC). Patassé employed Bemba’s troops and Libyan military detachments to suppress the coup attempt in May 2001. The CAR’s relations with Chad also became strained in late 2001 after Gen. François Bozizé, who was accused by Patassé of having been involved with the coup attempt, fled to Chad in November. In December Patassé and Chadian President Idriss Déby met in Libreville, Gabon, for talks under the auspices of CEMAC, which deployed an ultimately ineffective peacekeeping force to the CAR after Bozizé’s successful coup in 2003. In the years following the coup, the peacekeeping forces spread out beyond the capital to the troubled northern and eastern regions as violence increased. In early 2006, CAR leaders met with the leaders of six other African countries in their continuing efforts to defuse the escalating tensions at the border of Chad and Sudan. For its part, the CAR extended its relations with Sudan by signing an agreement with the latter and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) providing for the return of the first group of 10,000 Sudanese refugees who had lived in the CAR for 16 years.

Current Issues

The March 2003 coup was initially condemned by regional powers and the broader international community. However, General Bozizé quickly muted much of the criticism by pledging a quick return to civilian government and initiating a campaign to combat the corruption that had been widely perceived as systemic in the Patassé administration. Moreover, mass demonstrations in Bangui appeared to support the coup leaders, and most political parties (including Patassé’s MLPC) soon expressed a desire to look to the future rather than dwell on the events leading up to the takeover. Also well received were the appointments of leaders from a broad spectrum of political and civic groups to the transitional national government led by “opposition” leader Abel Goumba as well as to the CNT. Not surprisingly, the new government won additional domestic support when it paid public salaries for the first time in two years and launched a series of economic reforms. Those measures also prompted a quick resumption of aid from France and the EU, assisted by Bozizé’s generally pro-Western policies and rhetoric.

In June 2003 the government launched a program to disarm and demobilize 5,700 fighters, including soldiers loyal to either Bozizé or Patassé. Meanwhile, in early 2004 the government reached a compromise with former rebels who had been blamed for numerous clashes with troops in the capital. The Chadian government provided mediators for the talks with the rebels, many of whom were former Chadians who helped bring Bozizé to power. Subsequently, heightened tension was reported in late 2004 in northern CAR, where unidentified armed fighters were said to have occupied a town close to the border with Chad.

The December 2004 constitutional referendum appeared to put a final plan in place for the return to civilian government. However, a sour note was struck, in the opinion of many observers, by Bozizé’s subsequent announcement that he would be a candidate for president. (After seizing power in 2003 the general insisted he had no political ambitions and would not seek elected office.) Despite such concerns, national elections were held successfully in March and May 2005 with high voter turnout (72.7 percent and 67.3 percent, respectively).

Despite hopes for peace following the elections, violence escalated in the northern regions, forcing thousands to flee to Chad in early 2006. The government for years had dismissed the violence by attributing it to local bandits. However, in an unexpected announcement in March 2006, Bozizé’s office for the first time blamed rebels linked to Patassé for the attacks.

In early 2006 the assembly granted Bozizé the authority to “rule by decree” for three months. The president reportedly planned to use the temporary power to deal with “contentious” economic matters, including government salary arrears. Foreign donors were described as hopeful that Bozizé would also eventually prove able to smooth over the country’s longstanding ethnic tensions.

Political Parties and Groups

The 1980 constitution called for the establishment of a multiparty system, but General Kolingba banned political parties in the wake of the 1981 coup and did not include their legalization in his promise of future civilian rule since to do so would invite “weakening and paralysis of the state and make it prey to individualistic demands.” In late 1983 the three main opposition parties (FPP, MLPC, and MCLN, below) formed a coalition styled the Central African Revolutionary Party (Parti Révolutionnaire Centrafricain—PRC), which the RPRC (see below, under Central African Movement for National Liberation) subsequently joined. In 1986 the FPP and MLPC also formed a United Front (Front Uni) that sought restoration of the 1981 constitution. No opposition grouping was accorded legal status upon formation of the regime-supportive RDC in 1986.

In September 1990 the government arrested 25 members of the opposition Coordination Committee for the Convocation of a National Conference (Comité de Coordination pour la Convocation de la Conférence Nationale—CCCCN), including its chair, Aristedes SOKAMBI. In late October, during an extraordinary congress in Berberati, the RDC voted against the introduction of a multiparty system. However, in April 1991 President Kolingba reversed the Berberati decision, declaring that “Henceforth, all kinds of thought . . . can be expressed freely within the framework of parties of their choice.” Three months later the regime officially overturned its ban on political party formations. Subsequently a number of somewhat shifting opposition coalitions emerged.

Following the formation of an MLPC-led “unity” government in June 1996, 11 opposition parties, most of whom were theretofore aligned under the banner of the Democratic Council of the Opposition Parties (Conseil Démocratique des Partis de l’Opposition—CODEPO), formed the Group of Eleven (G-11), under the leadership of former CODEPO president Dr. Abel GOUMBA Guéne. Four G-11 members (the ADP, FPP, PSD, and RDC) were awarded a total of nine cabinet posts in February 1997. On May 5, 1997, the G-11 cabinet members announced that they had “suspended” their participation in the government and called for national strikes to protest the death three days earlier of three alleged rebel soldiers. However, they returned to their portfolios in September.

Throughout most of 1998 the G-11 coordinated the activities of the main opposition groups; however, during the run-up to legislative balloting the G-11 appeared to have been superseded by the Union of Forces Committed to Peace and Change (Union des Forces Acquises à la Paix et au Changement—UFAPC), which comprised a number of parties (including the RDC, PSD, FPP, MDD, FODEM, and FC), labor unions, and human rights organizations. (See Political background, above, for details regarding the UFAPC and the legislative balloting and subsequent cabinet formation.) The UFAPC, also routinely referenced as the UFAP, proved unable to coalesce behind a single candidate for the first round of presidential balloting in September 1999, although an accord was reported if a second round had been required. Despite apparent objections from some components, the UFAPC rejected overtures from President Patassé to join the new cabinet in early November, and the grouping was subsequently described as in disarray following the withdrawal of the PSD and FPP and was reduced to limited membership as of late 1999.

Following the March 2003 coup, a government of national unity was formed with members from the FPP, RDC, FODEM, PSD, MDD, and the PUN. The MLPC and the MDI-PS were subsequently added to the cabinet.

After General Bozizé in 2004 announced his intention to seek the presidency in 2005, a coalition called the National Convergence (see below) was formed to support his candidacy, though Bozizé ran as an independent.

National Convergence (Kwa na Kwa—KNK). This coalition of business groups and small political parties was formed in 2004 to support Gen. François Bozizé's presidential bid in 2005. The KNK also entered candidates in the 2005 legislative balloting and secured by far the most seats (42).

Leader: Jean-Eudes TÉYA.

Central African Democratic Rally (Rassemblement Démocratique Centrafricain—RDC). The RDC was launched in May 1986 as the country's sole legal party, General Kolingba declaring that the formation would represent "all the various tendencies of the whole nation" but would deny representation to those who "seek to impose a totalitarian doctrine." At an extraordinary party congress on August 17, 1991, one month after the official endorsement of multipartyism, President Kolingba resigned as party president, saying he wanted to operate "above politics." Kolingba nonetheless ran as the RDC's 1993 presidential candidate, failing to make the second-round ballot because of a fourth-place finish on the first.

In mid-1995 party militants organized antigovernment demonstrations to protest the imprisonment of party leader and Le Rassemblement editor Mathias Gonevo Reapogo, who had been convicted of publishing an "insulting" article about President Patassé. Furthermore, the RDC leadership denounced the administration for its "policy of exclusion as well as arbitrary arrests." However, following the aborted army mutiny of April–May 1996, the RDC (unlike most other opposition groupings) signed the national unity agreement and was given four ministries in the government announced on June 19. The RDC cabinet members resigned in early 1999, the RDC, whose strongest support comes from the south, having finished second in the 1998 legislative poll with 20 seats. Kolingba also finished second in the 1999 presidential balloting with 19.4 percent of the vote. The party remained part of the UFAPC (above) as of late 1999. The RDC and Kolingba were reportedly involved with the failed coup attempt in May 2001. Subsequently, numerous party officials and members were arrested, although Kolingba remained at large. The RDC's activities were suspended for three months in June, with the government threatening to shut down the party permanently in late 2001. In late 2004, however, Kolingba announced his intention to return to the CAR and run for the presidency in 2005. He received 16.36 percent of the vote, while his party won 8 assembly seats. Days after the balloting, Kolingba's camp claimed that a shooting incident outside his residence between his guards and soldiers had been an assassination attempt, but the government dismissed the matter as "confusion" in communications between the two sides. Subsequently, one of Kolingba's sons was reportedly named to the new cabinet announced in early 2006.

Leaders: André-Dieudonné KOLINGBA (Former President of the Republic, de facto Leader of the Party, and 2005 presidential candidate), Louis-Pierre GAMBA (Deputy President), Honoré NZASSIWE, Mathias Gonevo REAPOGO (imprisoned), Daniel LAGANDI (Secretary General).

Movement for Democracy and Development (Mouvement pour la Démocratie et le Développement—MDD). The MDD was launched in January 1994 by former president David Dacko. MDD members were given four posts in the Dologué cabinet announced on January 15, 1999. However, party leaders, denying any interest in participating in an MLPC-led government, pressured three of the appointees to quit several days later. (The fourth member, who remained in government reportedly against the wishes of the grass roots, was not reappointed in the new cabinet formed in April 2001.) Dacko, who had won 20 percent of the presidential vote in 1993, finished third with 11.2 percent in 1999, his strength being the greatest in the capital region in the South. Dacko died in 2003.

There was no reference to the MDD in the 2005 election, although leader Auguste Boukanga reportedly ran as a presidential candidate under the banner of the Union for Renewal and Development. In 2006, one MDD member held a cabinet position.

Leaders: Auguste BOUKANGA.

Democratic Forum for Modernity (Forum Démocratique pour la Modernité—FODEM). FODEM was launched in the summer of 1997 by Agriculture Minister Charles Massi, who had recently been held hostage by rebellious soldiers and, reportedly, had been persuaded of the merits of their case. Massi was dismissed from the government in December, ostensibly because of his dealings in the diamond sector.

FODEM was officially recognized in May 1998, and in September Massi was cleared of the charges that had led to his removal from government in 1997. Massi won 1.3 percent of the vote in the 1999 presidential balloting and 3.2 percent in the 2005 presidential elections. He backed Bozizé in the 2005 runoff and was appointed a minister of state in 2006.

Leader: Charles MASSI (2005 presidential candidate).

National Unity Party (Parti de l'Unité Nationale—PUN). Led by former prime minister Jean-Paul Ngoupandé, the PUN won three seats in the late 1998 legislative balloting. Following the 1999 presidential balloting, in which Ngoupandé won 3.1 percent of the vote, a PUN member was named to the new cabinet albeit reportedly without the endorsement of the party leadership and was not reappointed in the new cabinet formed in April 2001. In the 2005 presidential balloting, Ngoupandé won 5.08 percent of the vote in the first round and backed Bozizé in the second round. Subsequently, he was appointed to the cabinet as one of the ministers of state.

Leader: Jean-Paul NGOUPANDÉ (Former Prime Minister and 2005 presidential candidate).

Central African People's Liberation Movement (Mouvement de Libération du Peuple Centrafricaine—MLPC). The MLPC was organized in Paris in mid-1979 by Ange-Félix Patassé, who had served as prime minister from September 1976 to July 1978 and was runner-up to Dacko in the presidential balloting of March 1981. At an extraordinary congress held September 14–18, 1983, Patassé was accorded a vote of no confidence and replaced with a nine-member directorate as part of a move from “nationalism” to “democratic socialism.” A communiqué released in Paris in July 1986 announced that the MLPC had joined forces with the FPP (below) to present a united front against the Kolingba government, with subsequent news stories again referring to Patassé, reportedly living in Togo, as the MLPC's leader. The party was granted legal status in September 1991.

In early 1993 Patassé, who had reportedly been running second when presidential balloting was suspended in October 1992, accepted an appointment to the CNPPR, despite allegations that Kolingba was using the Council to co-opt the most prominent opposition figures. In March, on the other hand, the party refused to enter the Lakoué government.

Patassé was elected president of the republic in 1993, while MLPC candidates secured a plurality of 34 legislative seats. The MLPC, whose strength is concentrated in the north, advanced to 47 legislative seats in 1998. Following his appointment as prime minister in January 1999, former MLPC stalwart Anicet Georges Dologuélé reportedly asserted that he wanted to be regarded as an independent. Patassé replaced him as the prime minister on April 1, 2001, with his close associate and leading party member, Martin Ziguélé, who then formed another MLPC-dominated cabinet on April 6. Following his ouster in March 2003, Patassé went into temporary exile in Togo. The MLPC subsequently endorsed General Bozizé's schedule for a return to civilian government. After Patassé's proposed candidacy was rejected by the transitional constitutional court, Ziguélé was named as the MLPC standard-bearer for the 2005 elections but he ultimately lost to Bozizé in the second round of presidential balloting.

At least one member of the MLPC was reportedly named to the cabinet in early 2006, although Patassé clearly remained at odds with the government. In April the Bozizé administration asked the new International Criminal Court to investigate alleged crimes on Patassé's part during the 2003 turmoil.

Leaders: Ange-Félix PATASSÉ (Former President of the Republic and of the Party), Martin

ZIGUÉLÉ (Former Prime Minister), Luc Apollinaire DONDON (Vice President of the Party), Francis Albert OUKANGA (Secretary General).

Alliance for Democracy and Progress (Alliance pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—ADP). A founding member of the CFD (see Political background, above), the ADP applied for legal status in late 1991. In October 1992 (then) party leader Jean-Claude CONJUGO was killed by government forces during a union-organized demonstration. However, the party was one of five groups represented in the government named on October 30, 1993, thereby breaking with the CFD. One of the party's leaders, Olivier Gabirault, ran for president in 2005, finishing last with less than 1 percent of the vote.

Leaders: Jacques MBOITEDAS, Olivier GABIRAUT, Tchapka BREDE (National Secretary).

Patriotic Front for Progress (Front Patriotique pour le Progrès—FPP). Launched initially by Abel Goumba Guéne as the Congo-based Ubangi Patriotic Front–Labor Party (Front Patriotique Oubanguien–Parti Travailleiste—FPO-PT), the FPP repudiated the Dacko government in 1981, called for the withdrawal of French troops, and forged links with the French Socialist Party and other European socialist groups. Linkage with the MLPC was announced in 1986, the two groups calling for a boycott of the 1987 legislative balloting and the creation of a multiparty system as envisioned by the 1981 constitution. Between September 1990 and March 1991 Goumba was imprisoned for his involvement with the CCCC. Leader of the core party of the opposition's Concertation of Democratic Forces (Concertation des Forces Démocratiques—CFD), Goumba was reported to be outpolling his four competitors at the abortive presidential balloting of October 1992 but fell to second place in 1993 and fourth place in 1999 (with 6.6 percent of the vote).

Goumba was appointed prime minister in the transitional government named following the March 2003 coup, but he was replaced in that post in December and named "honorary vice president." After receiving less than 3 percent of the vote in the first round of the 2005 presidential balloting, Goumba claimed widespread fraud. He was subsequently dismissed as honorary vice president on March 16. The official government explanation for his removal was that the new constitution did not provide for a vice president, but observers said his refusal to join those backing Bozizé cost him the post. However, in mid-2005, Goumba was appointed as "mediator of the republic" to improve relations between citizens and the government.

Leaders: Dr. Abel GOUMBA Guéne (President), Patrice ENDJIMOUNGOU (Secretary General).

Social Democratic Party (Parti Social-Démocrate—PSD). For the October 1992 balloting the PSD offered as a presidential candidate its leader, Enoch Dérant Lakoué, who was reportedly running in last place when the poll was aborted. In February 1993 Lakoué accepted appointment as Prime Minister Malendoma's successor.

During the first half of 1993 the PSD suffered numerous defections while Lakoué's own popularity continued to plummet. Thus, by the June 11 opening of a party congress, the PSD was, according to Africa Confidential, "run almost entirely by [Lakoué] family and friends."

At legislative balloting in 1998 the PSD captured six seats; however, one successful candidate, Dieudonné KOUDOUFARA, immediately defected to the MLPC, giving that party and its allies a disputed one-vote legislative majority. Two other PSD legislators reportedly followed Koudufara's example in March 1999. Lakoué finished seventh in the 1999 presidential balloting with only 1.3 percent of the vote. The cabinet announced in November 1999 included a PSD member, but he was not reappointed in the new cabinet formed in April 2001. In 2005, the party won four seats in the assembly.

Leader: Enoch Dérant LAKOUÉ (Former Prime Minister).

Löndö Association. (Levons-nous). This human rights group won one assembly seat in 2005 balloting.

Movement for Democracy, Independence, and Social Progress (Mouvement pour la Démocratie, l'Indépendance, et le Progrès Social—MDI-PS). Formed in 1991 in an effort to develop a national party that would avoid the regional and ethnic group influences that were dominating other groupings, the MDI-PS was one of the few remaining members of the UFAPC as of late 1999.

Leader: Daniel NDIRITIFEI BOYSEMBE (Secretary General and Former Finance Minister).

Liberal Democratic Party (Parti Liberal-Démocratique—PLD). The PLD was launched prior to the 1993 legislative balloting, at which it won seven seats. The party was given four portfolios in the January 1999 cabinet, having won two seats in the late 1998 balloting as part of the “presidential majority” supportive of the MLPC. Former leader Nestor KOMBO-NAGUEMON reportedly committed suicide in 2004.

National Convention (Convention Nationale—CN). Founded in October 1991 by David Galiambo, the CN won three seats in the 1993 National Assembly poll. It was represented in the cabinet from 1999 to 2003.

Leader: David GALIAMBO.

Civic Forum (Forum Civique—FC). Theretofore in opposition, the Civic Forum was suspended by the CFD in August 1992 for continuing its participation in the “grand national debate.” On December 4 FC leader Gen. Timothée Malendoma was appointed prime minister by President Kolingba. However, scarcely more than two months later, on February 26, 1993, he was dismissed for “blocking the democratic process.” As of late 1999 the FC was one of the few parties that remained part of the UFAPC (see above).

Leader: Gen. (Ret.) Timothée MALENDOMA (Former Prime Minister).

People's Union for the Republic (Union du Peuple pour le République—UPR). The recently formed UPR secured one seat in the 1998 legislative poll.

Democratic Movement for the Renaissance and Evolution of Central Africa (Mouvement Démocratique pour la Renaissance et l'Évolution en Centrafrique—MDREC). In mid-1992, MDREC party leader Joseph Bendounga, a pro-democracy advocate, was arrested and sentenced to six months' imprisonment for criticizing the president. The group secured one legislative seat in 1993. Bendounga, the mayor of Bangui, supported incumbent President Patassé in the 1999 presidential poll. Through 2001 the MDREC remained supportive of the MLPC and Patassé. The party named Bendounga as its candidate for the 2005 presidential election, but his name did not appear in the list of results.

Leaders: Joseph BENDOUNGA, Léon SEBOU (Secretary General).

Social Evolution Movement of Black Africa (Mouvement de l'Évolution Sociale de l'Afrique Noire—MESAN). The present MESAN is a faction-torn remnant of the group founded in 1949 and once headed by former president Dacko. The party won one assembly seat in 1993 balloting, and a MESAN member was appointed minister of communication in June 1996.

Leaders: Prosper LAVODRAMA and Joseph NGBANGADIBO (Faction Leaders).

Union of Democrats for Central African Renewal (Union des Démocrates pour le Renouveau Centrafricain—UDRC). The theretofore unknown UDRC was a founding member of CODEPO.

Central African Republican Party (Parti Républicain Centrafricain—PR). Also a former member of the CFD, the PR participated in the Malendoma government with its leader, Ruth Rolland, who had previously denounced the regime for tribalism and the misappropriation of public funds, accepting the Social and Women's Affairs portfolio. Subsequently, Rolland became the first African woman to present herself as a presidential candidate, although finishing last in 1993 with a mere 1 percent vote share. Rolland died in June 1995.

Central African Movement for National Liberation (Mouvement Centrafricaine pour la Libération Nationale—MCLN). The pro-Libyan MCLN, organized in Paris by Dr. Rodolphe Idi

Lala, a former member of the FPP, claimed responsibility for the July 1981 theater bombing in Bangui, in the wake of which it was outlawed. Idi Lala, who was condemned to death in absentia by a military court in May 1982, was challenged as leader in late 1983 by elements within the party that declared the bombing “off target”; at the time of its entry into the Central African Revolutionary Party (Parti Revolutionnaire Centrafricain—PRC), its leadership included former members of the Kolingba government who had been involved in the 1982 coup attempt. These individuals, especially Gen. Alphonse M’Baikoua, were subsequently involved in guerrilla action in the north, with the assistance of Chadian insurgents.

In late 1987 Africa Confidential reported that about 50 MCLN members were in prison in Bangui and described Gen. François Bozizé, then reportedly an MCLN leader operating from Libya, as a “constant headache” to Kolingba. In January 1988 Idi Lala was reported to have been arrested in Benin, and in October 1989 Bangui confirmed that Bozizé had been in detention in the Central African Republic since August, when Benin had agreed to “extradite” him, reportedly for a $3 million fee. In October 1991 Bozizé was acquitted of charges stemming from the 1982 coup attempt, and he was subsequently identified as leader of the Popular Rally for the Reconstruction of Central Africa (Rassemblement Populaire pour la Reconstruction de la Centrafrique—RPRC). Bozizé secured 1.5 percent of the presidential vote in 1993 as a technically independent candidate, having recently returned from nine years in exile. He was subsequently named chief of staff of the armed forces under President Patassé. Bozizé was dismissed in October 2001 by Patassé for allegedly having been involved in the attempted coup d’état in May. He left the country in November but returned to lead a successful overthrow of the Patassé government in March 2003.

The cabinet formed in April 2001 also included members from two small, previously unreferenced groups—the African Development Party (Parti Africain du Développement—PAD) and the Democratic Union for Renewal/Finis Kodro (Union Démocratique pour le Renouveau/Finis Kodro—UDR/FK).

Other Group

Patriotic Front for the Liberation of Central Africa (Front Patriotique pour La Libération du Centrafrique—FPLC). The formation of the FPLC was announced in Brazzaville, Congo, in June 1996 by exiled former CAR soldiers who had supported the army rebellion in April and May and opposed French intervention on behalf of the CAR government. The FPLC leaders promised “armed resistance” to both the Patassé administration and “French occupation.”

Leaders: Lt. Jean Bertrand BIAMBA, Maj. Leopold ADETO, Dr. Jean Paul MANDAKOUZOU.

Legislature

The 1986 constitution provided for a bicameral Congress (Congrès) encompassing a largely advisory Economic and Regional Council composed of nominated members and an elective National Assembly with a five-year mandate.

The assembly was suspended following the March 2003 coup, and self-declared President Bozizé on March 30 established a 98-member National Transitional Council (Conseil National de Transition—CNT). The members were chosen by the president to represent the military, clergy, trade unions, political parties, human rights groups, and other sectors. The December 2004 constitutional revision provided for the creation of a new 105-member National Assembly. Following two rounds of balloting on March 13 and May 8, 2005, the distribution was as follows: the pro-Bozizé National Convergence coalition, 42 seats; the Central African People’s Liberation Movement, 11; the Central African Democratic Rally, 8; the Social Democratic Party, 4; the Patriotic Front for Progress, 2; the Alliance for Democratic Progress, 2; the Löndö Association, 1; independents, 34; and undeclared, 1.

Speaker: Célestin-Leroy GAOMBALET.

In May 2000 journalists in the CAR conducted a one-day strike to protest what they perceived as the government's efforts to "gag" the press, criticizing in particular the recent arrest of several editors and reporters for publishing anti-Patassé stories. In December 2004 the CNT decriminalized a range of press offenses including “defamation” and the publication of “false material,” thereby overturning a restrictive 1998 press law that had been used in July 2004 to charge the editor of Le Citoyen with slander. In 2005 protests were voiced against a proposal by the acting communications minister to reinstitute censorship.

REPUBLIC OF CHAD

République du Tchad

The Country

Landlocked Chad, the largest in area and population among the countries of former French Equatorial Africa, extends from the borders of the equatorial forest in the south to the Sahara Desert in the north. Its unevenly distributed population is characterized by overlapping ethnic, religious, and regional cleavages; the more populous south is largely Negroid and animist, while the north is overwhelmingly Sudanic and Muslim. There is a Christian minority, estimates of which vary from 5 to 33 percent. Of the country's 12 major ethnic groups, the largest are the Saras in the south and Arabs in the center, north, and east. However, the Zakawa clan (an estimated 5 percent of the population) has dominated political affairs since the installation of the Déby regime in 1990. French is an official language, but Chadian Arabic has recognized status in the school system, and the major black tribes have their own languages. Women constitute roughly 21 percent of the official labor force and more than 65 percent of unpaid family workers. Female participation in government and politics, traditionally close to nonexistent, has increased slightly in recent years; the government has also recently introduced new legislation designed to protect certain rights of women, reportedly generating criticism from conservative elements of the population.

The economy is almost exclusively agricultural, nearly one-half of the gross national product being derived from subsistence farming, livestock-raising, and fishing. Cotton, grown primarily in the south, accounts for over 70 percent of export earnings, with cotton-ginning being the most important industry. Uranium and other mineral deposits are believed to be located in the northern Aozou Strip, long the source of a territorial dispute with Libya (see Foreign relations, below), while significant oil reserves have recently been discovered in the west and south (see below). Gold and diamonds also are mined.

Despite aid from such sources as the UN Development Programme, the World Bank, and the African Development Fund, widespread civil war through much of the 1970s, 1980s, and early 1990s precluded measurable economic development. In the mid-1990s the government began to privatize

Political Status: Independent since August 11, 1960; military regime instituted in 1975, giving way to widespread insurgency and ouster of Transitional Government of National Unity in 1982; one-party system established by presidential decree in 1984; constitution of December 10, 1989, suspended on December 3, 1990, following military coup; interim national charter announced February 28, 1991; transitional national charter adopted by Sovereign National Conference effective April 9, 1993; present constitution approved by national referendum on March 31, 1996, and revised by national referendum on June 6, 2005.

Area: 495,752 sq. mi. (1,284,000 sq. km.).

Population: 6,279,931 (1993C); 9,121,000 (2005E). The 1993 figure includes an adjustment of 1.4 percent for underenumeration.

Major Urban Center (2005E): N'DJAMENA (864,000).

Official Languages: French and Arabic. In addition, some 25 indigenous languages are spoken.

Monetary Unit: CFA Franc (official rate July 1, 2006: 513.01 francs = $1US). (The CFA franc, previously pegged to the French franc, is now permanently pegged to the euro at 655.957 CFA francs = 1 euro.)

President: Col. Idriss DÉBY (Patriotic Salvation Movement); self-appointed on December 4, 1990, following overthrow of the government of Hissène HABRÉ on December 2; confirmed by national charter adopted February 28, 1991; reconfirmed by the Sovereign National Conference on April 6, 1993; popularly elected to a five-year term in two-stage multiparty balloting on June 2 and July 3, 1996, and sworn in on August 8; reelected on May 20, 2001, and sworn in for another five-year term on August 8; reelected for another five-year term on May 3, 2006.

Prime Minister: Pascal YOADIMNADJI (Patriotic Salvation Movement); appointed by the president on February 3, 2005, to replace Moussa FAKI (Patriotic Salvation Movement).

many state-run enterprises and to adopt other measures designed to promote free-market activity, earning support from the International Monetary Fund (IMF) for its efforts. However, the IMF urged Chadian leaders to move beyond “crisis management” and “fiscal stabilization” to long-term policies designed to combat poverty.

Chad remains one of the poorest nations in the world, with a per capita annual income of less than $300. An estimated 80 percent of the population lives below the poverty level, nearly one-third of that number existing in near-starvation conditions. The illiteracy rate is estimated at 75 percent. Chad is also widely considered to be one of the world’s most corrupt nations, with a “culture of clans and warlordism” dominating much of everyday existence and contributing to insurgencies that have compromised development efforts.

Prospects for economic advancement are focused almost exclusively on exploitation of the southern oil fields, which are estimated to contain at least 900 million barrels of oil. A pipeline to carry the oil through Cameroon to the Atlantic Ocean was opened in October 2003, a consortium led by the Exxon Mobil Corporation having earmarked more than $4 billion for the extraction and piping processes. Significant financing was also provided by the World Bank, which was given control of an escrow fund containing Chad’s portion of the oil revenue. As part of the arrangements with the World Bank, the Chadian government agreed to direct two-thirds of that revenue toward improving living standards and deposit 10 percent into a special fund to be reserved for use after the oil reserves were exhausted.

GDP grew by more than 30 percent in 2004 under the influence of the oil program and significantly increased foreign investment. However, growth declined to 13 percent in 2005 as the result of internal unrest and political discord that also prompted a serious dispute between the government and the World Bank (see Current issues, below). At that point Chad was exporting approximately 160,000 barrels of oil per day.

Political Background

Brought under French control in 1900, Chad became part of French Equatorial Africa in 1910 and served as an important Allied base in World War II. It was designated an autonomous member state of the French Community in 1959, achieving full independence under the presidency of François (subsequently N'Garta) TOMBALBAYE one year later. Tombalbaye, a southerner and leader of the majority Chad Progressive Party (Parti Progressiste Tchadien—PPT), secured the elimination of other parties prior to the adoption of a new constitution in 1962.

The northern (Saharan) territories—historically focal points of resistance and virtually impossible to govern—remained under French military administration until 1965, when disagreements led Chad to request the withdrawal of French troops. Dissatisfaction with Tombalbaye's policies generated progressively more violent opposition and the formation in 1966 of the Chad National Liberation Front (Front de Libération Nationale Tchadien—Frolinat), led by Aibrahim ABATCHA until his death in 1969, and then by Dr. Abba SIDDICK. French troops returned in 1968 at the president's request, but, despite their presence and reconciliation efforts by Tombalbaye, the disturbances continued, culminating in an attempted coup by Frolinat in 1971 (allegedly with Libyan backing). In a further effort to consolidate his regime, Tombalbaye created the National Movement for Cultural and Social Revolution (Mouvement National pour la Révolution Culturelle et Sociale—MNRCS) in 1973 to replace the PPT.

On April 13, 1975, Tombalbaye was fatally wounded in an uprising by army and police units. Two days later, Brig. Gen. Félix MALLOUM, who had been in detention since 1973 for plotting against the government, was designated chair of a ruling Supreme Military Council. The new regime, which banned the MNRCS, was immediately endorsed by a number of former opposition groups, although Frolinat remained aloof.

Following a major encounter between Libyan and Frolinat forces in the Tibesti Mountains in June 1976, Frolinat military leader Hissène HABRÉ attempted to negotiate a settlement with the Malloum regime but was rebuffed. In September Habré lost control of the main wing of Frolinat to Goukhouni OUEDDEI, who elected to cooperate with the Libyans, and in early 1978 Frolinat launched a major offensive against government forces in Faya-Largeau, about 500 miles northeast of the capital. Subsequently, on February 5, the government announced that it had concluded a cease-fire agreement with a rebel group, the Armed Forces of the North (Forces Armées du Nord—FAN), loyal to Habré, and a truce also was reached with Oueddei's People's Armed Forces (Forces Armées du Peuple—FAP), the largest Frolinat faction, in late March. However, the FAP resumed military operations in April, its advance being repulsed only with major French assistance. As of midyear the northern two-thirds of the country remained in the effective control of one or the other of the competing Frolinat factions.

On August 29, 1978, President Malloum announced the appointment of Habré as prime minister under a "basic charter of national reconciliation" pending the adoption of a permanent constitution. However, a serious rift developed between Malloum and Habré later in the year, and an abortive coup on February 12, 1979, by forces loyal to the prime minister was followed by a month of bloody, but inconclusive, confrontation between the rival factions. On March 16 a four-party agreement was concluded in Kano, Nigeria, involving Malloum, Habré, Oueddei, and Aboubakar Mahamat ABDERAMAN, leader of a "Third Army"—the Popular Movement of Chadian Liberation (Mouvement Populaire de la Libération Tchadienne—MPLT). Under the Kano accord, Oueddei on March 23 became president of an eight-member Provisional State Council, which was composed of two representatives from each of the factions and was to serve until a new government could be constituted. French troops were to be withdrawn under a truce guaranteed by Cameroon, the Central African Empire, Libya, Niger, Nigeria, and Sudan. At a second Kano conference held April 3–11, however, the pact broke down, primarily because agreement could not be reached with five other rebel groups, one of which, the “New Volcano,” headed by the Revolutionary Democratic Council (Conseil Démocratique Révolutionnaire—CDR) of Ahmat ACYL, had apparently become a leading beneficiary of Libyan support in the north. Meanwhile, former Malloum supporter Lt. Col. Wadal Abdelkader KAMOUGUÉ, commander of the Chadian Armed Forces (Forces Armées Tchadiennes—FAT), had launched a secessionist uprising in the south, also with Libyan backing.

On April 29, 1979, a second provisional government was announced under Lol Mahamat CHOUA of the MPLT, with Gen. Djibril Negue DJOGO, former army commander under President Malloum, as his deputy. However, the Choua government was repudiated by the six “guarantor” states during a third meeting in Lagos, Nigeria, held May 26–27, no Chadian representatives being present. In early June fighting erupted in N’Djamena between Froinat and MPLT contingents, while other altercations occurred in the east, south, and north (where an invasion by a 2,500-man Libyan force, launched on June 26, met stiff resistance). In another effort to end the turmoil, a fourth conference convened August 20–21 in Lagos, attended by representatives of 11 Chadian groups and 9 external states (the original 6, plus Benin, Côte d’Ivoire, and Senegal). The August meeting resulted in the designation of Oueddei and Kamougué as president and vice president, respectively, of a Transitional Government of National Unity (Gouvernement d’Union Nationale de Transition—GUNT), whose full membership, announced on November 10, included 12 northerners and 10 southerners.

Although the Lagos accord had called for demilitarization of N’Djamena by February 5, 1980, fighting resumed at the capital on March 21 between Defense Minister Habré’s FAN and President Oueddei’s FAP, the latter subsequently being reinforced by Kamougué’s FAT and elements of the post-Lagos Front for Joint Action, of which Acyl was a leader. The coalescence of all other major forces against the FAN occurred primarily because of the perception that Habré, contrary to the intent of the Lagos agreement, had sought to expand his sphere of influence. While the FAN, clearly the best-organized of the military units, continued to maintain control of at least half the city, the Organization of African Unity (OAU, subsequently the African Union—AU) and such regional leaders as Togo’s President Eyadéma arranged several short-lived cease-fires in late March and April.

Moving into a vacuum created by the removal of the last French military contingent on May 17, 1980, Libya on June 15 concluded a military defense treaty with the Oueddei government. By early November, 3,000–4,000 Libyan troops had moved into northern Chad and also had established a staging area within 40 miles of N’Djamena. Habré’s position in the capital came under attack by Libyan aircraft, and fighting in the countryside spread as the government attempted to sever the FAN’s link to its main base at Abéché, near the Sudanese border. An assault against FAN-controlled sectors of the capital was launched by government and Libyan forces on December 6, after Habré had rejected an OAU-sponsored cease-fire. Five days later the FAN withdrew from the city, some elements retreating toward Abéché and others crossing into Cameroon.

On January 6, 1981, the governments of Chad and Libya announced a decision to achieve “full unity” between their two countries. The action prompted OAU Chair Siaka Stevens of Sierra Leone to convene an extraordinary meeting of the OAU’s Ad Hoc Committee on Chad in the Togolese capital of Lomé, where, on January 14, representatives of 12 governments repudiated the proposed merger, reaffirmed the validity of the 1979 Lagos accord, called on Libya to withdraw, and authorized the formation of an OAU peacekeeping force. Subsequently, it was reported that President Oueddei had been opposed to unification and had signed the agreement in Tripoli under duress, the Libyans expressing their disenchantment with his lack of “Islamic fervor” and calling for his replacement by Acyl. Both Vice President Kamougué and Froinat’s Dr. Siddick vehemently opposed the plan, the former terming it an “impossible marriage” and the latter fleeing to Sudan in April after resigning as health minister.

In late May 1981 the transitional government announced that several faction leaders had agreed to disarm and join in the formation of a “national integrated army” in anticipation of a Libyan withdrawal. Nonetheless, factional conflict continued, while at midyear a revitalized FAN mounted an offensive against Libyan and Libyan-backed government troops in the east. In mid-September, during a two-day meeting in Paris with Oueddei, French authorities agreed to provide logistical support to an OAU force to supplant the Libyans, and in November most of the latter were withdrawn after Benin, Gabon, Nigeria, Senegal, Togo, and Zaire had undertaken to form a 5,000-man contingent to maintain order, supervise elections, and assist in establishing a unified Chadian army.

During early 1982 FAN forces regained control of most of the eastern region and began advancing on N’Djamena, which fell on June 7, GUNT President Oueddei fleeing to Cameroon before establishing himself at the northern settlement of Bardai on the border of the Libyan-controlled Aozou Strip. Upon entering the capital, the Council of the Commander in Chief of the FAN (Conseil du Commandement en Chef des FAN—CCFAN) assumed political control, and on June 19 it named Habré to head a 30-member Council of State. Earlier, on June 11, OAU Chair Daniel arap Moi had ordered the withdrawal of the OAU force, which, at maximum strength, had scarcely exceeded 3,000 men, two-thirds from Nigeria. During the ensuing months, the FAN, with assistance from FAT units, succeeded in gaining control of the south. On September 29 the CCFAN promulgated a Fundamental Act (Acte Fondamental), based on the August 1978 charter (which had been effectively abrogated in 1979), to “govern Chad until the adoption of a new constitution.” In accordance with the new act, Habré was sworn in as president of the republic on October 21. Following his investiture, the new chief executive dissolved the Council of State in favor of a 31-member government that included Dr. Siddick; DJIDINGAR Dono Ngardoum, who had served briefly as prime minister under Oued-dei in May; and Capt. Routouane YOMA, a former aide of Colonel Kamougué. As stipulated in the Fundamental Act, Habré also announced the formation of a 30-member National Consultative Council (Conseil National Consultatif—CNC) to serve as the state’s “highest advisory organ.” Two months later N’Djamena announced that the FAN and FAT would be consolidated as the Chadian National Armed Forces (Forces Armées Nationales Tchadiennes—FANT).

After the declaration in Algiers in October 1982 of a “National Peace Government” by 8 of the 11 signatories of the 1979 Lagos accord, Oueddei forces regrouped in Bardai with renewed support from Tripoli. By May 1983 GUNT units were advancing south, and, with the aid of 2,000 troops and several MIG fighters supplied by Libya, they captured the “northern capital” of Faya-Largeau on June 24. Habré immediately called for international assistance and received aid from Egypt, Sudan, and the United States, with France avoiding direct involvement despite a 1976 defense agreement (see Foreign relations, below). FANT troops recaptured Faya-Largeau on June 30, only to lose it again on August 10, while France, under mounting pressure from the United States and a number of francophone African countries, began deploying troops along a defensive “red line” just north of Abéché on August 14. The French—who eventually numbered some 3,000, in addition to 2,000 Zairean troops—imposed a tenuous cease-fire for the remainder of the year, while calling for a negotiated solution between the two factions. In November the OAU announced that it would sponsor “reconciliation talks” in Addis Ababa and issued invitations to all participants in the Lagos conference, but protocol demands by Habré led to their eventual cancellation. While Habré continued to urge France to aid him in a full-scale offensive against Oueddei, the Mitterrand government refused, at one point urging “a federation of Chad” as a means of ending the conflict. Meanwhile, in the wake of renewed fighting, the “red line” was moved 60 miles north.

In April 1984 Libyan leader Muammar al-Qadhafi proposed a mutual withdrawal of “Libyan support elements” and French forces, with talks thereupon initiated between France and Libya that yielded an accord on September 17. The French pullout was completed by the end of the year; Libya, however, was reported to have withdrawn less than half of its forces from the north, and the political-military stalemate continued. Meanwhile, the Habré regime had attempted to consolidate its power with the June formation of the National Union for Independence and Revolution (Union Nationale pour l'Indépendance et la Révolution—UNIR), the first legally recognized political party in Chad since the 1975 banning of the MNRCS.

In a statement issued in Tripoli on October 15, 1985, Oueddei was declared dismissed as FAP leader. The GUNT president repudiated the action and on November 5 announced the release of Acheikh ibn OUMAR, leader of the GUNT-affiliated CDR, who reportedly had been arrested a year earlier. On November 11 the Habré administration responded by concluding a “reconciliation agreement” with a breakaway faction of the CDR, the Committee for Action and Concord (Comité d'Action et de Concord—CAC).

In February 1986 GUNT forces mounted an offensive against FANT troops at the center of the “red line,” but by early March they had been repulsed, reportedly with heavy losses. On June 19 FAT leader Kamougué announced from Paris his resignation as the GUNT vice president, while in August Oumar declared that the CDR had “suspended collaboration” with the GUNT but would “maintain solidarity with all anti-Habré factions.” Clashes between CDR and GUNT units followed, the latter offering to open peace talks with N’Djamena; however, the Habré government insisted that the GUNT would first have to repudiate the Libyan intervention. Subsequently, during a meeting of GUNT factions in Cotonou, Benin, in mid-November, Oueddei was “expelled” from the grouping, with Oumar being named its president. In late December, as FANT forces were reported to be moving north, fighting broke out between FAP units loyal to Oueddei and what Libyan sources characterized as Oumar’s “legitimate” GUNT.

On March 22, 1987, in what was seen as a major turning point in the lengthy Chadian conflict, FANT troops captured the Libyan air facility in Ouadi Doum, 100 miles northeast of Faya-Largeau. Deprived of air cover, the Libyans withdrew from Faya-Largeau, their most important military base in northern Chad, abandoning an estimated $1 billion worth of sophisticated weaponry. On August 8 Chadian government troops captured the town of Aozou, administrative capital of the northern strip; however, it was retaken by Libyan forces three weeks later. Chad thereupon entered southern Libya in an unsuccessful effort to deprive it of air support in the continued struggle for the disputed territory. Subsequent international and regional criticism of the Chadian “invasion” led Habré to accept a September 11 cease-fire negotiated by OAU chair Kenneth Kaunda of Zambia; however, by late November the government reported FANT clashes with Libyan troops crossing into eastern Chad from Sudan.

In early 1988 Habré charged that Libya was still violating Chadian air space and backing antigovernment rebels despite Qadhafi’s pledge of support for OAU peace-treaty negotiations. Nonetheless, Chad and Libya agreed in mid-October to restore diplomatic relations and “resolve peacefully their territorial dispute” by presenting their respective Aozou strip claims to a special OAU committee (see Foreign relations, below, for subsequent developments).

In April 1989 Habré survived a coup attempt that allegedly involved a number of senior government officials, including former FANT commander Idriss DÉBY, who subsequently mounted a series of cross-border attacks from sanctuary in Sudan. Eight months later, Chadian voters approved a constitution to replace the Fundamental Act. One of its provisions extended Habré’s incumbency for another seven years; others formalized the UNIR’s supremacy and authorized an elected National Assembly, balloting for which was conducted in June 1990.

In November 1990 a variety of antigovernmental forces, allied under Déby’s leadership in the Patriotic Salvation Movement (Mouvement Patriotique du Salut—MPS), mounted a decisive offensive against FANT troops in eastern Chad. The rebels captured Abéché on November 30, reportedly prompting large-scale desertion by government troops. With France having announced that it would not intervene in what was characterized as an “internal Chadian power struggle,” the MPS was left with a virtually unimpeded path to N’Djamena; consequently, Habré and other government leaders fled to Cameroon. (Habré was indicted in February 2000 in Senegal and charged with torture during his term in power. In June, however, the court ruled that Senegal did not have jurisdiction over the case, a decision that was heavily criticized as being politically motivated; human rights groups, which had filed the initial complaint against Habré, appealed to a higher Senegalese court. In March 2001 the appeals court upheld the lower court’s ruling, President Wade of Senegal stating that he was prepared to send Habré to a third country to face trial. As of mid-2006 Habré remained in Senegal, although there had been attempts to extradite him to Belgium by victims of the regime who were Belgian citizens. In January 2006 the AU heads of state had voted not to order the extradition of Habré to Belgium [Senegal had asked for the vote].)

On December 3, 1990, one day after having occupied the capital, Déby suspended the constitution and dissolved the assembly; on December 4 he announced that a provisional Council of State had assumed power with himself as president and a fellow commander, Maldoum BADA ABBAS, as vice president. On February 28 an interim National Charter was adopted, and on March 5 the Council of State was dissolved in favor of a new Council of Ministers and an appointed Provisional Council of the Republic. The vice presidency was abandoned upon formation of the new government, Bada Abbas being named minister of state for the interior and former National Assembly president Jean ALINGUÉ BAWOYEU being appointed to the revived post of prime minister.

The overthrow of the Habré regime generated minimal international concern or domestic protest, in part because of reports that the deposed government had engaged in widespread human rights abuses. For his part, President Déby pledged to work toward implementation of a multiparty democracy in which “fundamental rights” would be guaranteed. However, the new regime also insisted that “security issues” took precedence over political liberalization.

In response to opposition demands for the convening of a Sovereign National Conference (Conférence Nationale Souveraine—CNS) to chart the nation’s political future, Déby tentatively scheduled such a body for May 1992. Meanwhile, the Council of Ministers adopted guidelines for registering parties.

In mid-October 1991 fighting broke out in N’Djamena, the government subsequently announcing that it had thwarted an attempted coup. Among those arrested and charged with complicity in the overthrow effort was Bada Abbas, although the government later appeared to acknowledge that the allegations against him were unfounded.

The regime faced an even more serious challenge in late 1991 when Habré loyalists, organized as the Movement for Development and Democracy (Mouvement pour le Développement et la Démocratie—MDD), launched an invasion from the Lake Chad border region. The campaign enjoyed some initial success, and, as the rebels advanced on N’Djamena in early January 1992, French paratroopers reinforced the brigade of 1,110 French soldiers permanently stationed near the capital. In addition to its symbolic significance, the French reinforcement permitted the release of additional Chadian troops to confront the rebels, and within days the government reported that the MDD forces were in full retreat. In the wake of the insurgency, security forces arrested a number of prominent opposition leaders and launched what was perceived as a reprisal campaign against suspected MDD supporters, former officials in the Habré administration, and members of the fledgling Rally for Democracy and Progress (Rassemblement pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—RDP). Shortly thereafter, in response to pressure from Paris, the government announced an amnesty for those recently detained as well as those implicated in the October coup attempt, including Bada Abbas, who upon his release from prison was named to the Provisional Council of the Republic. Reaffirming its commitment to democratization, the regime began legalizing opposition parties, including the RDP, in March. However, the CNS opening scheduled for May was postponed indefinitely because of ongoing security concerns, the government having reported another coup attempt in April.

On May 19, 1992, the National Charter was modified to strengthen the authority of the prime minister, and the following day Alingué Bawoyeu was replaced by Joseph YODEYMAN. On May 22 a new Council of Ministers was announced that included representatives of newly organized parties, although a number of them subsequently resigned from the “coalition” government as the result of policy disputes. Following a minor reshuffle in October, the government announced that the CNS would convene on January 15, 1993, with a mandate to appoint a new prime minister, select a “transitional” legislature, and draw up constitutional revisions that would lead, following a national referendum on the proposals, to multiparty presidential and legislative balloting. Significantly, the CNS was not empowered to replace Déby, who was viewed as having the best chance to maintain a semblance of stability in an increasingly divided society. Thus, Déby remained as president and commander in chief of the armed forces under the transitional national charter adopted at the conclusion of the CNS on April 6, 1993. Quasi-legislative authority was extended to a Higher Transitional Council (Conseil Supérieur de Transition—CST), whose members were elected by the CNS. In addition, broad responsibility for economic and social policies was conferred on the prime minister, Dr. Fidèle MOUNGAR, a southerner named by the CNS to form the first transitional government. The CNS, supported by some 40 political parties (recognized and unrecognized), several rebel movements, and numerous trade and professional associations, approved a transitional period of up to 12 months pending the drafting of a permanent constitution and the holding of national elections. However, the CST was authorized to extend the charter’s authority for an additional year, if necessary.

Despite the prime minister’s expression of confidence that he and the president could work together, friction between the two leaders quickly surfaced, Déby being particularly critical of the new government’s “amateurish” economic program. The dispute culminated with the CST forcing Dr. Moungar’s resignation via a nonconfidence motion on October 28. After three rounds of voting, the CST on November 6 elected Delwa Kassiré KOUMAKOYÉ, the outgoing justice minister, to succeed Dr. Moungar. A new cabinet was named one week later, followed by a minor reshuffle in January 1994 in which MPS dominance was maintained despite the continued presence of ministers from anti-Déby parties. Subsequently, on April 4, the CST voted to extend the transitional period for 12 more months in view of the nation’s seeming inability to reverse political fragmentation, with a major cabinet reshuffle following on May 17.

In November 1994 President Déby pledged that the constitutional referendum would be held in early 1995 and would be followed soon thereafter by presidential and legislative elections. In preparation for those events, he announced a general amnesty on December 1 for all political detainees and exiles (with the notable exception of former President Habré); he also reshuffled the cabinet on December 13.

The CST approved a new electoral code and a draft constitution in January 1995; however, the subsequent registration of voters was strongly criticized by opposition leaders, who claimed the process was skewed in favor of the MPS. Acknowledging that the validity of the new voter lists was questionable, the CST postponed the constitutional referendum indefinitely and in early April extended the transitional period for another 12 months. Collaterally, the CST dismissed Prime Minister Koumakoyé on April 8 for failing to “create the proper conditions” for elections, replacing him with Djimasta KOIBLA, who suspended his activity within the Union for Democracy and the Republic (Union pour la Démocratie et la République—UDR) upon assuming national office.

The extension of the nation’s transitional political status was controversial, opponents noting that a National Reconciliation Committee appointed in 1994 had negotiated peace accords with several rebel groups and thereby reduced security concerns. Consequently, with the Déby regime reportedly facing international pressure to proceed with democratization, the constitutional referendum was finally conducted on March 31, 1996. The new basic law (see Constitution and government, below) was approved by 63.5 percent of the voters in what officials reported to be a 69 percent turnout. (Not surprisingly, the “no” vote was heaviest in the south, where sentiment had long preferred federal status that would accord substantial autonomy to the region.) As approved by the referendum, Déby remained in office pending new presidential balloting, while the CST continued to operate until the election of a new legislature. In addition, although the cabinet submitted an essentially pro forma resignation on April 18, Déby reappointed Koibla the next day to head an interim government that included all but one of the incumbent ministers.

Fifteen candidates contested the first round of presidential balloting on June 2, 1996, Déby being credited with 43.9 percent of the votes. His closest rival was former southern military leader and GUNT vice president Kamougué, running under the banner of the Union for Renewal and Democracy (Union pour le Renouveau et la Démocratie—UDR), who secured 12.4 percent of the votes. Other contenders included Saleh KEBZABO of the National Union for Development and Renewal (Union National pour le Développement et le Renouveau—UNDR), 8.6 percent; former prime minister Alingué Bawoyeu of the UDR, 8.3 percent; and the RDP’s Choua, 5.9 percent. Déby was subsequently elected to a five-year term on July 3 in the second-round balloting, defeating Kamougué 69.1 percent to 30.9 percent. Following his inauguration on August 8, Déby again named Prime Minister Koibla to head the significantly revamped government announced on August 12.

Although opposition parties charged that “massive fraud” had occurred in the first round of the presidential election in June 1996, international observers reportedly expressed satisfaction with the conduct of the balloting. The vote shares garnered by President Déby and Colonel Kamougué appeared to reflect the long-standing cultural, religious, and ethnic divide between southern Chad and the rest of the country. Meanwhile, Western capitals (most importantly Paris) signaled their support for President Déby as Chad’s best hope for ongoing stability, despite concern over his administration’s human rights record and its ties with Sudan and collateral support for the Islamic fundamentalist movement.

Elections to the new National Assembly were held on January 5 and February 23, 1997, with MPS candidates ultimately securing 65 of 125 seats following a redistribution ordered by the national electoral commission upon appeal by the governing party (which was initially credited with only 55 seats). Election monitors described the balloting as “relatively free and fair.” On the other hand, there was widespread domestic and international condemnation of the allegedly progovernment bias of the national electoral commission, especially regarding alleged irregularities in the initial tallies. However, Western leaders appeared willing to overlook such heavy-handed tactics, perhaps out of appreciation for the relative stability of the Déby regime in a region of recent intense political and military turbulence. For its part, the government continued to pursue cease-fire agreements with various rebel groups, as observers warned that tribal influences remained the most serious threat to the regime and the fledgling democratic process.

On May 16, 1997, President Déby appointed Nassour OUAÏDOU Guelendouksia to succeed Koibla as prime minister, a number of incumbents retaining their posts in the new cabinet announced on May 21. Ouaidou also headed the reshuffled cabinet appointed on January 1, 1998. However, on December 13, 1999, in the wake of economic turbulence, President Déby appointed a “technocrat,” Negoum YAMASSOUM, as prime minister. Yamassoum’s new cabinet, announced December 14, included ministers from the MPS, UNDR, and URD. Déby was reelected to another term in controversial balloting (the opposition objected to de facto control by the MPS over the electoral commission) on May 20, 2001, and, following his inauguration on August 8, he reappointed Yamassoum as prime minister.

The MPS maintained its dominance in the April 21, 2002, National Assembly balloting (postponed from 2001 on the grounds that the government lacked sufficient funds to conduct the poll). On June 11 President Déby appointed Haroun KABADI as prime minister, but he was succeeded by Moussa FAKI on June 24, 2003, and Pascal YOADIM-NADJI on February 3, 2005.

A national referendum was held on June 6, 2005, on constitutional changes proposed by the assembly, the most contentious being elimination of the two-term presidential limit, which thereby permitted Déby to seek another term. Most opposition parties, many of which had served in Déby governments, strongly condemned the revisions and urged a boycott of the referendum. However, the government announced that 58 percent of voters participated in the referendum and that the changes were approved by a 66 percent yes vote. Subsequently, Déby reshuffled the cabinet on August 7; the most significant change involved his consolidation of control of the armed forces through the transfer of the defense ministry to the office of the president.

Following the outbreak of renewed rebel activity (some on the part of military deserters incensed over the constitutional changes) in late 2005, the assembly in January 2006 voted 129–0 (with opposition legislators boycotting the vote) to postpone the assembly elections scheduled for April 2006 until April 2007, citing security and budget concerns. In controversial balloting on May 3, Déby was re-elected to another five-year presidential term, officially securing 77.5 percent of the votes against only four other candidates. Nearly all opposition parties called for a boycott of the election in view of the recent failed rebel takeover attempt (see Current issues, below, for additional information).

Constitution and Government

The 1962 constitution was abrogated in April 1975 by the Malloum government, which issued a provisional replacement in August 1978. A successor document, derived from the Malloum charter, was promulgated by the CCFAN in September 1982. A new constitution, commissioned by President Habré in 1988 and adopted by popular referendum in December 1989, provided for a strong presidency and a directly elected National Assembly, nonpartisan balloting for which was conducted on July 8, 1990. The 1989 basic law and its institutions were suspended indefinitely by the Déby regime on December 3, 1990.

Following approval by the Sovereign National Conference, a new transitional government structure, headed by President Déby and a Higher Transitional Council (CST), was formally launched on April 9, 1993. Initially scheduled to remain in place for 12 months, its mandate was twice extended for terms of like duration in April 1994 and April 1995.

A 17-member Constitutional Committee, established in December 1993, drafted a new basic law in 1994 calling for establishment of a bicameral legislature and a strong presidential system based on the French model. The changes were endorsed by the CST in January 1995, but the national referendum was postponed until March 31, 1996, when the proposed constitution was endorsed by 63.5 percent of the voters.

The new basic law provided for direct popular election (in two-round balloting, if necessary) of the president for a maximum of two five-year terms. The prime minister is appointed by the president, although he is also held “responsible” to the legislature. The members of the National Assembly serve four-year terms. The constitution also authorized the creation of a Constitutional Council and a Supreme Court, both of which were installed in April 1999.

Although the 1996 constitution provided for a new Senate, that body was never constituted, and a constitutional revision approved by national referendum on June 6, 2005, eliminated references to the Senate in favor of an advisory body called the Economic, Social, and Cultural Council, whose members were to be appointed by the president, subject to approval by the assembly. However, no appointments had been made as of May 2006. In a more controversial area (see Current issues, below), the amendments also permitted President Déby to seek a third term and removed an age restriction of 70 for the president.

In early 2000 the government doubled the number of prefectures (previously 14) and sub-prefectures, which are administered by government appointees. The cited reason was to promote decentralization of government functions. However, critics claimed that the reforms also had the effect of further cementing the ruling party's hold on power.

Foreign Relations

Chad's internal unrest was exacerbated for a long time by conflict with Libya over delineation of their common border. The dispute was intensified in 1975 by Libya's annexation of an area of some 27,000 square miles in northern Chad (the Aozou Strip) that was said to contain substantial iron ore and uranium deposits. Beginning in 1977 Libyan representatives consistently identified the territory in question as part of "southern Libya," largely on the basis of a 1935 agreement between France and Italy that the latter had failed to ratify. In August 1989 Chad and Libya concluded a pact providing for mutual withdrawal from the disputed territory, an exchange of prisoners of war, agreement not to support one another's opponents, and the cessation of media "attacks" upon each other. However, subsequent negotiations failed to produce a permanent settlement to the dispute, with Chad accusing Libya of supporting rebels operating out of Sudan and Libya charging Chad with foot-dragging on the prisoner release. As a result of the impasse, the case was referred to the International Court of Justice (ICJ) in September 1990. Even though relations between the two countries improved significantly following the year-end victory by the MPS, whose fighters had reportedly been supplied with Libyan arms, the Aozou dispute remained in the hands of the ICJ, which in February 1994 ruled in favor of Chad by a vote of 16-1. After initially appearing to hesitate in the matter, Libya formally accepted the ICJ ruling in April, and the withdrawal of Libyan troops from the territory was completed by the end of May. Shortly thereafter President Déby met with Libya's Colonel Qadhafi in Tripoli to sign a treaty of friendship and co-operation. In February 2006 the two countries signed a declaration calling for full normalization of relations.

Relations with France have been complicated since the mid-1970s, when French involvement in the civil war was intensified by rebel kidnapping of a French national. In March 1976 a new co-operation pact was concluded, France agreeing to come to Chad's defense in the event of external, but not domestic, attack. Despite this assertion, French forces aided government troops throughout the late 1970s in stemming rebel, most notably Frolinat, offensives. By contrast, a French decision not to intervene in the fighting that broke out in November 1990 was considered critical to the success of the MPS campaign. Not surprisingly, the new Chadian president in early 1991 invited the approximately 1,100 French troops to remain in the country for security purposes, and their presence was considered a psychological factor in the Déby regime's ability to withstand several subsequent overthrow attempts.

Chadian affairs also were of particular interest to a number of other Western nations in the 1980s, especially in relation to the Habré government's dispute with Libya. Thus, U.S. surveillance photographs and anti-aircraft weapons were allegedly used by Habré forces during the 1987 struggle in southern Libya. However, concern over developments in Chad subsequently waned, the United States' protest over the events of late 1990 being relatively moderate, despite apparent Libyan support for the victorious rebel forces.

In September 1998 Chad sent more than 2,000 troops to support the Kabila regime in the civil war in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC). In April 1999 the Déby administration announced that the force (some 200 of which had been killed) would be withdrawn soon, as regional mediators attempted to broker a settlement to that intractable dispute, which had drawn in some half-dozen of the DRC's neighbors (see article on the DRC for details). Meanwhile, troops from Nigeria and Niger continued to assist in flushing out Chadian rebels in the Lake Chad region. (Fighting had broken out between Nigerian and Chadian troops in April 1998 over possession of an island in the lake; however, the conflict had settled down quickly, the two countries agreeing to leave formal demarcation of the boundary to the Lake Chad Basin Commission.) Chad's relations with Sudan and Libya also continued to improve, some observers suggesting that the Déby regime was hoping to dilute the country's long-standing dependence on French support or at least increase its negotiating leverage with Paris.

In early 2000 the French ambassador was expelled by the government in a sign of further cooling of Franco-Chadian relations. However, diplomatic relations were subsequently restored, and in 2002 French President Chirac became the first French head of state to visit Chad.

Tension intensified with the Central African Republic (CAR) in 2001 when Chad provided refuge for Gen. François Bozizé, one of the main protagonists in the CAR's infighting (see article on the CAR for details). However, relations improved when Bozizé assumed control in the CAR, and Chad sent troops to help maintain order in the CAR following the takeover. (There are currently an estimated 15,000–20,000 refugees from the lawless northern provinces of the CAR in southern Chad.)

In 2002 Chad joined Algeria, Mauritania, and Niger in signing the "Pan Sahel Initiative" with the United States whereby U.S. forces were to be deployed to the region to help combat terrorism, drug trafficking, and arms smuggling. As part of that project, Chadian and U.S. troops reportedly broke up an Algerian rebel operation in Chad in 2004.

The intense fighting that broke out in the Darfur region of Sudan in early 2003 had major repercussions for Chad. Some 200,000 refugees from the non-Arab population of Darfur fled across the border into Chad, populated by many of the same ethnic groups as those in Darfur (including President Déby's Zakawa group). Sudan subsequently accused Chad of permitting Sudanese rebels to operate out of Chad, while Chad made similar accusations about Chadian rebels in Sudan. President Déby was prominent in efforts to mediate a settlement to the Darfur violence in 2005 (see Current issues, below, for subsequent developments).

Current Issues

In the presidential poll of May 20, 2001, President Déby faced six main challengers, all of whom protested alleged bias in the voter registration process and the administration of the election. Déby secured 68 percent of the vote in the first round, thereby avoiding a runoff. However, the opposition candidates declared the results fraudulent and launched a campaign of civil disobedience that resulted in their arrest and brief detention. The European Union "regretted" the many shortcomings in the organization of the poll and expressed concerns about the restriction of political liberties by the government. The opposition also charged that the 2002 assembly balloting was fraudulent.

Criticism of President Déby's "increasingly autocratic rule" intensified in May 2004 when the assembly proposed an amendment to the constitution to permit him to run for a third term. The opposition parties called for a boycott of the June constitutional referendum on the matter and described the government's official results of the voting as "imaginary." More threatening to the regime was the desertion of members of the presidential guard and other military forces in October and the collateral organization of well-armed rebel groups along both sides of the Sudanese border. In addition, the government reported that it had thwarted an attempted coup in November on the part of soldiers at two bases, which prompted a "sweeping purge" of the military by Déby, who formed a new security force under his direct command. In other manifestations of popular discontent, protest demonstrations broke out in the city of Pala in December and government workers went on strike in the capital, demanding payment of four months of salary arrears. All in all, the "increasingly isolated" Déby faced what one journalist characterized as "enormous dissent," not only because of the third-term issue but also because of the widespread perception that two years of windfall oil revenues had been mismanaged.

In late December 2005 the assembly approved new legislation permitting the administration to allocate additional oil revenue toward the general budget, which critics argued Déby would use almost exclusively to purchase armaments. The World Bank, which had been charged with allocating the oil revenues, decried the change as a violation of a prior agreement (see The Country, above, for details) and in January 2006 suspended the disbursement of $125 million in accumulated revenues. The Bank also halted its own lending program to Chad. The Déby administration responded with a threat to halt oil production altogether if the Bank did not reverse its course, sending a shiver through the world's oil markets.

Opposition parties strongly criticized the assembly's decision in January 2006 to postpone the upcoming April elections for a year, arguing that the government was simply trying to maintain its control of the legislature prior to the presidential balloting scheduled for May. Further mass military defections to the newly formed United Front for Change (Front Uni pour le Changement—FUC) were reported in February, and more than 100 soldiers were arrested in March in relation to an alleged attempt to shoot down Déby's plane. The unrest culminated in a rapid incursion by FUC forces from the Sudanese border that reached the outskirts of N'Djamena on April 13 before encountering significant resistance. The rebels were finally repulsed at the steps of the assembly building; more than 300 people were killed in the fighting, which also severely damaged eastern portions of N'Djamena. Déby accused the Sudanese government of backing the FUC, announcing that a "state of hostility" existed between Chad and Sudan. (Most analysts agreed with Déby's assertions, suggesting that Sudan, which had supported Déby's takeover in 1990, was now convinced that the Chadian government was providing assistance to the largely Zakawa rebel groups fighting the Janjaweed militias in Darfur [see article on Sudan for details].)

Significantly, France sent an additional 150 troops to its garrison in Chad during the April 2006 rebel incursion, and a French jet fired warning shots over the rebel forces in an apparent indication that France would not tolerate any attacks on French citizens. Although the French forces did not assist government troops in repulsing the rebels, their presence underscored the widespread perception that France preferred that Déby remain in power. Other Western countries also appeared to consider Déby the most likely leader to prevent Chad from descending further into ethnic/regional/political fragmentation that might threaten oil flows or lead to installation of a "pro-Sudan" administration. Consequently, western criticism was moderate concerning the May presidential election, which Chadian opposition parties characterized as Déby simply "installing himself for life." (Déby's only opponents were "three cronies" and one candidate from a minor opposition party.) Realpolitik also appeared to play a role in the World Bank's decision to resume lending to Chad in May and to agree to begin releasing oil revenue gradually upon the anticipated adoption of more transparent accounting practices by the Chadian administration. The accord also permitted the government to close the fund that had been established for the "post-oil" years and, apparently, to direct additional resources to security matters.

Political Parties and Groups

Prior to the collapse of the Habré regime and the suspension of the constitution on December 3, 1990, by Idriss Déby, single-party government control had been exercised by the National Union for Independence and Revolution (Union Nationale pour l'Indépendance et la Révolution—UNIR). President Déby, governing in the name of the Patriotic Salvation Movement (MPS, below), declared himself to be a supporter of multipartyism, and on October 1, 1991, the Council of Ministers authorized the legalization of parties provided they "shun intolerance, tribalism, regionalism, religious discrimination, and recourse to violence." The first parties were recognized in March 1992.

In 2004 some 20–30 opposition parties (including the URD, AND, RDP, and others formerly aligned with the MPS) formed the Coordination of Parties for the Defense of the Constitution (Coordination des Parties pour la Défense de la Constitution—CPDC) to protest, among other things, the MPS plan to revise the constitution to permit another presidential term for Déby. The CPDC also demanded revision of the electoral code, appointment of a truly independent election commission, and the use of international election observers at future balloting. Having failed to affect the plans of the MPS, the CPDC (whose components were considered to be in agreement on the constitutional issues “but little else”) called for a boycott of the 2005 national referendum and the 2006 presidential election. Following the rebel attack on N’Djamena in April 2006, CPDC spokesman Ibni Oumar Mahamat Saleh said the CPDC was neither prorebel nor progovernment, although it opposed violent overthrow of the administration.

Legislative Parties

Patriotic Salvation Movement (Mouvement Patriotique du Salut—MPS). The MPS was formed in Libya in March 1990 by a number of groups opposed to the regime of President Hissne Habré. The movement was headed by Idriss Déby, a former Chadian military leader and presidential advisor, who had participated in an April 1989 coup attempt. In addition to Déby’s April 1 Action (Action du 1 Avril), the MPS included the southern-based Movement for Chadian National Salvation (Mouvement pour le Salut National du Tchad—Mosanat), which was reported to have clashed with government troops in March 1989; and remnants of the Chadian Armed Forces (Forces Armées Tchadiennes—FAT), another southern grouping with extensive involvement in Chadian affairs (see Political background, above).

The MPS endorsed a prodemocracy platform, while “preaching neither capitalism nor socialism.” After having ousted the Habré government in late 1990, it gained the allegiance of a number of other groups, including the Chadian People’s Revolution (Révolution du Peuple Tchadienne—RPT), formed in Libya in January 1990 by several hundred Chadians of “various political tendencies” under the leadership of Adoum TOGOI.

After proclaiming himself president, Déby governed in the name of the MPS, remaining as president of the republic and commander-in-chief of the armed forces under the transitional charter approved by the Sovereign National Conference in April 1993. An extraordinary MPS congress held April 10–11, 1996, “unanimously” selected Déby as the party’s presidential nominee, the MPS leader subsequently receiving the endorsement of a number of minor parties grouped as the Republican Front during his successful campaign. The MPS initially was credited with winning 55 seats in the assembly elections of early 1997 but was subsequently given additional seats following a controversial review by the national electoral commission. Its final total was placed at 65, which gave the MPS a working majority in the 125-member legislature.

In early 1999 the Liberal Party for Unity and Solidarity (Parti Libéral pour l’Unité et la Solidarité—PLUS), led by Braham AHMAT, merged with the MPS.

Leaders: Idriss DÉBY (President of the Republic and Chair of the Party), Mahamet HISSENE (Secretary General), Pascal YOADIM-NADJI (Prime Minister of the Republic).

Union for Renewal and Democracy (Union pour le Renouveau et la Démocratie—URD). The URD was legalized in May 1992 under the leadership of Lt. Col. Wadal Abdelkader Kamougué, a former commander of FAT forces in southern Chad who had served as a GUNT vice president (see Political background, above) and was subsequently a member of the Provisional Council of the Republic. In April 1993 Kamougué was named minister of civil service and labor in the Moungar government, retaining the post until May 1994.

Kamougué was the runner-up to President Déby in the first round of the June 1996 presidential election, earning a reported 12.4 percent of the votes. Although the URD leader alleged major irregularities had occurred in that balloting, he ultimately agreed to stand against Déby in the second round, in which he was credited with 30.9 percent of the votes. Kamougué's strong performance in the 1996 race established him and the URD as the nation's leading opposition force, particularly in view of its strong southern support. The URD finished second to the MPS in the 1997 legislative balloting with 29 seats. Kamougué was elected president of the new assembly, and the URD subsequently participated in MPS-led cabinets. In the 2001 presidential election Kamougué received 6 percent of the vote. The URD, which won 3 seats in the 2002 assembly poll, subsequently moved into the opposition camp to protest various constitutional changes engineered by the MPS.

Leaders: Lt. Col. Wadal Abdelkader KAM-OUGUÉ (1996 and 2001 presidential candidate and Former President of the National Assembly), Sangde NGARNOUDJIBE (Secretary General).

National Union for Development and Renewal (Union Nationale pour le Développement et le Renouveau—UNDR). The UNDR is led by Saleh Kebzabo, who was a minister of public works and transportation in the Moungar government and ran third in the first round of the June 1996 presidential election with 8.6 percent of the vote. He subsequently announced the UNDR's alliance with the MPS and threw his support to President Déby for the second round, thereby earning appointment to the cabinet formed in August. The party won 15 seats in the 1997 legislative poll, reportedly participating in an electoral alliance with the MPS. News reports surrounding recent political activity described the UNDR as primarily representing the interests of Muslims in the southwest of Chad.

Kebzabo was named minister of mines, energy, and oil in January 1998, but he and two UNDR secretaries of state left the government four months later. However, Kebzabo and four UNDR colleagues were named ministers in the December 1999 cabinet reshuffle. Kebzabo ran for president in 2001 but received only 7 percent of the vote. The UNDR won six seats in the 2000 assembly poll and was subsequently referenced as being firmly in the opposition camp.

Leader: Saleh KEBZABO (President and 2001 presidential candidate).

National Alliance for Development (Alliance Nationale pour le Développement—AND). Nabia NDALI, a member of the AND, was named minister of civil service and labor in the May 1992 cabinet. However, he resigned two months later following a dispute between AND leaders and Prime Minister Yodeyman, who was initially described as "close" to the AND but was subsequently reported to have been formally expelled from the group.

The AND was initially reported to have won no seats in the 1997 assembly balloting but, following a review by the national electoral commission, it was subsequently awarded two. AND President Salibou Garba was a member of the cabinet from May 1994 to April 2002, although he was subsequently referenced as a leader of the opposition's CPDC.

Leader: Salibou GARBA (President).

Rally for Democracy and Progress (Rassemblement pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—RDP). The RDP held its organizational congress in December 1991, its leadership including the mayor of N'Djamena, Lol Mahamat Choua, who had been proposed as president of an eventually aborted provisional national government in 1979. A number of RDP members were reportedly among those killed or arrested by Chadian security forces during the crackdown that followed the coup attempt of January 1992. (It was believed that the RDP was subjected to reprisal because of the support it enjoyed among the Kanem ethnic group, centered in the Lake Chad area, where the rebels had apparently received popular assistance.) Nevertheless, the RDP in early March was one of the first political parties to be legalized and was considered one of the leading components of the opposition coalition prior to the designation of Choua as chair of the Higher Transitional Council (CST) in April 1993.

In October 1994 Choua was replaced as CST chair, the RDP leader subsequently accusing the Déby regime of human rights violations, including the harassment of many RDP members. Choua was credited with 5.9 percent of the vote in the first round of the 1996 presidential election. In a surprise development, Choua supported President Déby in the 2001 presidential election.

The RDP secured 14 seats in the 2002 assembly balloting and subsequently supported the Déby administration and served in the cabinet until November 2003, when it withdrew from the government to protest Déby's announced plans to seek a third term. Choua subsequently served as a prominent figure in the anti-Déby CPDC.

Leaders: Lol Mahamat CHOUA (Former Chair of the Higher Transitional Council), Chetti Ali ABBAS.

Front of Action Forces for the Republic (Front des Forces d'Action pour la République—FFAR). Described as a “separatist” grouping, the FFAR won one seat in the 1997 legislative balloting. Its legislator, Ngarledjy Yorongar, subsequently became a prominent critic of government policy regarding the development of oil fields in southern Chad. He received a surprising 14 percent of the vote while finishing second in the 2001 presidential election. Although Yorongar called for a boycott of the 2005 constitutional referendum and the 2006 presidential poll, he and the FFAR did not participate in the CPDC.

Leaders: Yorongar LEMOHIBAN, Ngarledjy YORONGAR (2001 presidential candidate).

National Assembly for Democracy and Progress (Rassemblement National pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—RNDP). Formed in the spring of 1992, the RNDP (also regularly referenced as VIVA-RNDP) was subsequently described as a prominent exponent of the formation of opposition coalitions; its leader, Delwa Kassiré Koumakoyé, served as spokesman for a number of such groups. Koumakoyé was named justice minister in the reshuffled transitional government announced in June 1993 and was elected prime minister in November. Following his dismissal in April 1995, Koumakoyé charged that he had been made a scapegoat by President Déby and the Higher Transitional Council, whom he described as bearing true responsibility for the delay in national elections.

In March 1996 Koumakoyé was sentenced to three months in prison for the illegal possession of weapons, the RNDP leader accusing the Déby regime of manufacturing the charge in order to thwart his presidential ambitions. The following September it was announced that Koumakoyé had been named spokesperson for a new opposition alliance called the Democratic Opposition Convention, which claimed the allegiance of more than 20 parties. The RNDP was initially credited with having secured four seats in the 1997 legislative poll, but all were given to other parties following the review by the national electoral commission. Koumakoyé won 2 percent of the votes in the 2001 presidential poll.

The RNDP has served in all cabinets since the 2002 assembly balloting, at which it won five seats. Koumakoyé, now considered to be aligned with Déby, was one of five candidates in the 2006 presidential election; he finished second with 8.8 percent of the vote.

Leader: Delwa Kassiré KOUMAKOYÉ (Former Prime Minister, President of the Party, and 2001 and 2006 presidential candidate).

National Union (Union National—UN). The UN was established in early 1992 by Abdoulaye Lamana, a former Chadian ambassador to Belgium. Its members reportedly included a number of former Frolinat adherents, notably Mahamat Djarma, former deputy to Frolinat leader Goukhouni Oueddei. An April 1996 party congress selected Lamana as its presidential nominee, the UN chair finishing well down the list among the 15 candidates in the first round of balloting. According to initial reports, the party won two seats in the 1997 legislative balloting, but they were taken away following the postelection review by the national electoral commission. Lamana was named minister of mines, energy, and oil in May 1998 but was not included in the reshuffled cabinet announced in December 1999. In 2005 Lamana was reportedly serving as chair of the government-appointed committee established to oversee the allocation of oil revenues.

Leaders: Abdoulaye LAMANA (Chair), Mahamat DJARMA.

Other minor parties that gained a single seat in the National Assembly in the 2002 election included Action for the Renewal of Chad (Action pour le Renouveau du Tchad—ART), led by Oumar BOUCHAR; the Chadian Social Democratic Party (Parti Social-Démocrate du Tchad—PSDT), a southern grouping led by businessman Niabe ROMAIN; the Convention for Democracy and Federalism (Convention pour la Démocratie et le Fédéralisme—CDF), led by Ali GOLHOR; the National Rally for Democracy in Chad—Le Réveil (Rassemblement National pour la Démocratie au Tchad—Le Réveil—RNDT—Le Réveil), whose leader, Albert Pahimi PADACKET, was appointed agriculture minister in 2005 and was a presidential candidate in 2006; the Party for Democracy and Integral Independence (Parti pour la Démocratie et l'Indépendance Intégrale—PDI); the People's Movement for Democracy in Chad (Mouvement Populaire pour la Démocratie au Tchad—MPDT) whose leader, Mahamat ABDOULAYE, was appointed to the cabinet in 2005 and was a presidential candidate in 2006; and the Rally for the Republic—LINGUA (Rassemblement pour la République—LINGUA—RPR—LINGUA), led by Mersile Atti MAHAMAT.

Other Parties

Action for Unity and Socialism (Action pour l'Unité et le Socialisme—Actus). Actus is a former GUNT tendency that in March 1990 announced it was regrouping with the Revolutionary Movement of the Chadian People (Mouvement Révolutionnaire du Peuple Tchadien—MRPT), another GUNT faction led by Bire TITINAN, to form a joint Rally for Democratic Action and Progress (Rassemblement pour l'Action Démocratique et le Progrès—RADP). However, Actus leader Dr.

Fidèle Moungar was appointed to the May 1992 cabinet under his own formation's rubric, not that of the RADP. Dr. Moungar was subsequently named to form a transitional government in April 1993, although he was forced to resign as prime minister in October following passage of a nonconfidence motion by the Higher Transitional Council. The Actus leader was disqualified from running for president in 1996 by the Chadian Court of Appeal on the ground that he did not meet the nation's residency requirements. Actus was at first reported to have won four seats in the 1997 legislative poll, but that number was ultimately halved by the national electoral commission. There has subsequently been little reference to Actus in news reports.

Leader: Dr. Fidèle MOUNGAR (Former Prime Minister).

Union for Democracy and the Republic (Union pour la Démocratie et la République—UDR). The UDR was launched by Jean Alingué Bawoyeu in March 1992 and formally recognized a month later. Although Alingué Bawoyeu was replaced as prime minister in May, the new cabinet included Djimasta KOIBLA, another UDR member. However, after being named prime minister in April 1995, Koibla was subsequently described as having taken a leave of absence from the party. Meanwhile, the UDR moved into a position as one of the main opposition parties, Alingué Bawoyeu receiving 8.3 percent of the vote in the first round of the 1996 presidential election. He also was one of the main critics of the government's involvement in the Democratic Republic of the Congo in 1998 and 1999. Alingué Bawoyeu ran for president in 2001, receiving only 2 percent of the ballots cast. The UDR boycotted the 2002 legislative elections, and Alingué Bawoyeu subsequently remained a vocal critic of the government and proponent of formation of opposition coalitions.

Leader: Dr. Jean ALINGUÉ BAWOYEU (President of the Party and 2001 presidential candidate).

Party for Freedom and Development (Parti pour la Liberté et le Développement—PLD). Formed in late 1993 to promote the "rehabilitation" of Chad, the PLD captured three seats in the 1997 legislative elections. The PLD's candidate, Ibni Oumar Mahamat Saleh, secured 3 percent of the vote in the 2001 presidential election. The PLD boycotted the 2002 legislative elections. Saleh subsequently served as a spokesman for the CPDC.

Leaders: Ibni Oumar Mahamat SALEH (2001 presidential candidate), Paul SARADORI.

National Convention for Social Democracy (Convention Nationale pour la Démocratie Sociale—CNDS). The leader of the CNDS, former Habré minister Adoum Moussa Seif, won 4.9 percent of the vote in the first round of the 1996 presidential election, and the party won one seat in the 1997 legislative balloting. In 1998, however, Seif was described in news reports as heading a rebel group in the Lake Chad region, the Armed Resistance Against Anti-Democratic Forces. The rump CNDS, under the leadership of Adoum Daye ZERE, supported President Déby in his 2001 reelection campaign and has not been regularly referenced in subsequent news reports.

National Salvation Council for Peace and Democracy (Conseil de Salut National pour la Paix et la Démocratie—CSNPD). The southern-based CSNPD was founded in mid-1992 by ex-soldiers who had recently defected from the nation's northern-dominated military. An estimated 200 CSNPD supporters were reportedly killed by government troops in early 1993, and sporadic fighting continued into 1994. In mid-1994 the CSNPD and the government concluded a peace agreement providing for a cease-fire and the integration of CSNPD officers into the national army. Collaterally, the CSNPD was declared to be a legal party. One member, Baihon Maloum ELOI, was minister of mines, energy, and petroleum from December 1994 to April 1995, while CSNPD leader Col. Moïse Nodji KETTE also served in the cabinet from April 1995 to April 1996.

Union of Democratic Forces (Union des Forces Démocratiques—UFD). The UFD also was one of the minor parties represented in the May 1992 coalition government, although its subsequent relationship with the government was unclear. News reports suggested a connection between the UFD and the kidnapping of four French nationals in Chad in 1998.

Leader: Ngawara NAHOR.

National Alliance for Democracy and Renewal (Alliance Nationale pour la Démocratie et le Renouveau—ANDR). The ANDR was founded in early 1993 by Prime Minister Yodeyman in the wake of his estrangement from the AND.

Leader: Joseph YODEYMAN (Former Prime Minister).

Rally of the Chadian People (Rassemblement du Peuple Tchadien—RPT). The RPT was legalized in April 1992, and one of its members, Jeremie BEADE TOIRIA, was appointed minister of commerce and industry in the coalition cabinet announced in May. However, at the urging of his party, Beade Toiria resigned the post in October to protest the government's temporary ban on trade union activities.

Leader: Dangbe LAOBELE DAMAYE.

Convention of Chadian Social Democrats (Convention des Social-Démocrates Tchadiens—CSDT). The CSDT was established in April 1992 to promote establishment of a "new Chad" in which national unity would provide "peace and security in a country beset by internal wars for far too long." Several former Habré cabinet ministers were reportedly among its members. The CSDT supported President Déby in the 2001 election.

Leader: Younous IBEDOU.

Alliance for Chadian Democracy (Alliance pour la Démocratie du Tchad—Adet). Based in Paris, Adet was established in April 1992 by Tidjani Thiam, described as a petroleum trader with links to several regional states, including Libya. In late 1993 the organization, also referenced as the Democratic Alliance (Alliance Démocratique—AD), announced it had formed a coalition with two other expatriate groupings—the Democratic National Union (Union Nationale Démocratique—UND), led by Facho BALAAM; and the Democratic Revolutionary Council—Rejection Front (Conseil Démocratique Révolutionnaire—Front du Rejet—CDR-FR), led by Gailéth Bourkou MAN-DAH.

Leader: Tidjani THIAM.

Also active have been the African Party for Progress and Social Justice (Parti Africain pour le Progrès et la Justice Sociale—PAPJS), led by Neatobei Didier VALENTIN; the Chadian Democratic Rally (Rassemblement Démocratique du Tchad—RDT); the Democratic Revolutionary Council (Conseil Démocratique Révolutionnaire—CDR), led by Aboubakar Adzalo BARAKA and former foreign minister Acheikh ibn OUMAR; the Democratic Union for Chadian Progress (Union Démocratique pour le Progrès Tchadien—UDPT), led by Elie ROMBA, who was among the also-rans in the 1996 presidential election; the National Alliance for Progress and Development (Alliance Nationale pour le Progrès et le Développement—ANPD); the National Alliance for Solidarity and Democracy (Alliance Nationale pour la Solidarité et la Démocratie—ANSD), formed in 1997 under the leadership of Mang Igri TAIDA; the National Movement of Chadian Renovators (Mouvement National des Rénovateurs Tchadiens—MNRT), led by Ali Muhammad DIALLO; the New African Socialist (Socialiste Africain Rénové—SAR), which fielded a candidate, Ibrahim KOULAMALLAH, in the 2006 presidential election; the People's Action for Unity and Development (Action du Peuple pour l'Unité et le Développement—APUD), which was registered in March 1996 under the leadership of Beshir Disco HAMAT; the Rally for Development and Progress (Rassemblement pour le Développement et le Progrès), led by Mamadou BISSO; the Rally for Progress and Social Justice (Rassemblement pour le Progrès et la Justice Sociale—RPJS), registered in January 1996 and the first Chadian party to be led by a woman (Leopoldine Adoun NDARADOUNRY); the Rally of Chadian Nationalists (Rassemblement des Nationalistes Tchadiennes—RNT); the Revolutionary Council of the Chadian People (Conseil Révolutionnaire du Peuple Tchadien—CRPT), led by Harmed JACOB; the Socialist Movement for Democracy in Chad (Mouvement Socialiste pour la Démocratie au Tchad—MSDT), led by Albert Mbainaido DJOMIA; and the Union of Democratic Forces—Republican Party (Union des Forces Démocratiques—Parti Républicain—UFD-PR), led by Gali Gatta NGOTHE.

Other Groups

United Front for Change (Front Uni pour le Changement—FUC). The FUC was formed in December 2005 by the Rally for Democracy and Liberties (Rassemblement pour la Démocratie et les Libertés—RDL) and a number of other groups, some of which comprised deserters from the Chadian army as well as Chadian exiles in Sudan opposed to the recent constitutional changes and the “dictatorial rule” of President Déby. The RDL had been formed earlier in the year in the Darfur region of Sudan and had launched an unsuccessful attack on the Chadian city of Adré near the Sudanese border on December 18. RDL leader Mahamat Nour, who had branched out of the ANR (below), was instrumental in the organization of the FUC, which demanded the convening of a national forum to address the country's political future, the installation of a transitional government, and new elections. (Nour is a member of the Tama ethnic group, which reportedly led to leadership tension within the FUC, a predominantly Zakawa grouping.) The FUC, also referenced as the United Front for Democratic Change, attempted a military takeover of the government in April 2006, the Déby government alleging that the Sudanese government was supporting the FUC (see Current issues, above, for additional information).

Leaders: Mahamat NOUR, Col. Regis BECHIR.

Platform for Change, National Unity, and Democracy (Socle pour le Changement, l'Unité, et la Démocratie—SCUD). The SCUD was formed in October 2005 by a group of some 300 deserters from the Presidential Guard and other government forces. It reportedly attracted members of Déby's Zakawa clan, including members of his family such as Tom Erdimi (Déby's nephew and a former cabinet minister), who no longer supported the president. SCUD forces reportedly subsequently engaged government troops in eastern Chad, but the SCUD did not participate in the failed April 2006 attack on N'Djamena led by the FUC.

Leaders: Tom ERDIMI, Timan ERDIMI, Yaya Dilla DJEROU.

Movement for Democracy and Justice in Chad (Mouvement pour la Démocratie et la Justice en Tchad—MDJT). Led then by Youssef TOGOIMI, a former minister in the Déby administration, the MDJT launched guerrilla activity against government troops in late 1998 in northern Chad and by April 1999 was claiming control of substantial territory. It was still active in mid-2001, although there was little independently verifiable information on the breadth and scope of its activities. The government was sufficiently concerned about the MDJT to periodically issue communiqués minimizing the extent of the rebellion. The grouping reportedly draws its support from the Toubou ethnic group, described as a “traditional warrior community” in the Tibesti mountain region along the border with Niger. President Déby met with Togoimi in Libya in early 2001, but no agreement resulted. In 2002 Togoimi was killed by a land mine, and one faction of the MDJT left the group to participate in the formation of the FUDP (below). The government subsequently was reported to have negotiated a cease-fire with a number of local MDJT commanders, and a broader accord was brokered in January 2003, many MDJT elements reportedly accepting amnesty for an end to attacks. In August 2005 the government signed a final agreement with the MDJT that provided for the eventual integration of remaining MDJT fighters into the national army.

Leader: Col. Hassan Abdallah MARDIGUE.

United Front for Democracy and Peace (Front Uni pour la Démocratie et la Paix—FUDP). Formed in 2005 by dissidents from the MDJT as well as members of rebel groups based in Benin seeking a negotiated peace settlement, the FUDP subsequently was joined by a number of other parties and rebel groups, including the MDD.

Movement for Development and Democracy (Mouvement pour le Développement et la Démocratie—MDD). The MDD was formed in 1991 as the political arm of pro-Habré rebel forces, which in late December launched an attempted overthrow of the Déby regime from the western border, where they had been camped since Habré's ouster a year earlier. Although the government at first estimated the MDD strength at more than 3,000, it was subsequently reported that only about 500 had participated in the attempted coup. Following the rebel defeat in January 1992, MDD leaders alleged that some of its members had been “kidnapped” from Nigeria by Chadian troops and executed in N'Djamena. Although a spokesman initially claimed that MDD leader Goukhouni Guët had been among those killed, the Chadian government subsequently reported that he was alive but imprisoned.

Despite the highly publicized announcement of several peace agreements during the rest of 1992, fighting continued between government troops and MDD followers, who sometimes referred to themselves as the Western Armed Forces (Forces Armées Occidentales—FAO). In early 1993 the MDD was reportedly split into a pro-Habré faction known as the National Armed Forces of Chad (Forces Armées Nationales Tchadiennes—FANT), led by Mahamat Saleh FADIL, and an anti-Habré faction loyal to Guët, about whom no further information was forthcoming. Members of the latter faction were reportedly invited to the Sovereign National Conference that began in January, but the FANT, described by Africa Confidential as “much feared in N'Djamena by both government and opposition,” remained outside the national reconciliation process.

In January 1994 the MDD announced an alliance with another guerrilla group, the National Union for Democracy and Socialism (Union National pour la Démocratie et le Socialisme—UNDS), and called upon other anti-Déby rebels to join them in united military activity. A year later, however, the MDD was described as still split into two factions “fighting each other, not Déby.” Meanwhile, Habré remained in exile in Senegal, the general amnesty of December 1994 having specifically excluded him.

The apparent reunification of the MDD factions was reported in April 1995, and an extraordinary congress in August elected a new 16-member executive bureau headed by Mahamat Seïd Moussa Medella. Subsequently, in November, an agreement was announced between the government and the MDD calling for the cessation of hostilities, exchange of prisoners, and the integration of some MDD guerrillas into the national army. Some MDD fighters subsequently remained in conflict with government forces, however, and factionalization on that issue surfaced within the grouping again in 1998. The MDD joined the FUDP in 2003. By that time there were two main factions of the MDD: one led by Ibrahim Malla Mahamet, the other led by Issa Faki Mahamet.

Leaders: Goukhouni GUËT (in detention), Aboubarkaye HAROUN (Representative in Paris), Ibrahim Malla MAHAMET (Chair of the Executive Bureau).

Chad National Liberation Front (Front de Libération National Tchadien—Frolinat). Frolinat was established in 1966 by northerners opposed to the administration of President Tombalbaye, a southerner. The organization eventually suffered such severe factionalization that Frolinat became little more than a generic name for various groups originally based in the north, including splinters loyal to subsequent Chadian presidents Goukhouni Oueddei and Hissène Habré.

Following Habré’s capture of N’Djamena in 1982, most of the factions opposed to his Frolinat/FAN coalesced under a reconstituted GUNT. During 1983 and 1984, dissent among GUNT factions over the extent of Libyan involvement led to reported dissolution of the coalition, although pronouncements continued to be issued in its name. During a meeting in Sebha, Libya, on August 7, 1984, most of the pro-Libyan military components of GUNT joined in forming the National Council of Liberation (Conseil National de la Libération—CNL), which was succeeded by a more inclusive Supreme Revolutionary Council (Conseil Suprême de la Révolution—CSR) a year later. By 1986, however, anti-Libyan sentiment appeared to have gained the ascendancy, with Oueddei being removed as CSR chair (and president of GUNT) in November. Thereafter, the CSR declined in importance, many of its component groups having announced their dissolution and acceptance of integration into UNIR. Although Oueddei announced a cabinet reshuffle in May 1988 in an attempt to consolidate his position among remaining GUNT factions, he was described in mid-1990 as “essentially marginalized” as an antigovernment influence.

Continuing to position himself as the leader of Frolinat, Oueddei made a highly publicized return from exile to meet with President Déby in May 1991 and suggested that cooperation with the new regime was possible if opposition political parties were permitted. Subsequently, however, Oueddei returned to Algiers and, following the abortive October coup, was reportedly informed that he was again not welcome in his homeland. During an interview in mid-1992 Oueddei described Frolinat as “still an armed liberation movement” but one that was “currently not fighting” and dedicated, for the time being, to “resolving problems through dialogue.” Oueddei, described as remaining widely respected by the public and considered a potential mediator among Chad’s many ethnic and political adversaries, participated in the Sovereign National Conference in early 1993. Although he was reported in 1995 to be still harboring presidential ambitions, there was little evidence of his influence in the nation’s 1996 democratization process. In December 1998 Oueddei issued a statement in Algiers calling for an “uprising” against the Déby government, and in early 1999 Frolinat announced its support for the Toubou rebels in northern Chad.

Leaders: Goukhouni OUEDDEI (Former President of the Republic), Mahmoud Ali MAHMOUD.

Armed Forces for a Federal Republic (Forces Armées pour une République Fédérale—FARF). A guerrilla movement based in oil-rich southern Chad, the FARF signed a peace accord with the government in April 1997, but fighting broke out again the following October, triggering what some observers described as a violent crackdown by the government against civilians in that region. A new peace agreement was reached in May 1998, under which FARF forces were to be integrated into the national army. In addition, the FARF was scheduled to transform itself into a political party called the Forum of Alliances for the Federal Republic (Forum des Alliances pour la République Fédérale—also FARF). However, it was announced in December that the FARF had in fact joined the MPS; that decision was reported by Dienambaye BARDÉ, brother of the popular FARF leader Lookein BARDÉ, who was believed to have died in the early 1998 fighting.

Chadian National Front (Front National du Tchad—FNT). A rebel force operating in central and eastern Chad, the FNT signed a peace agreement with the government in October 1992 under which its members were to be integrated into official civilian and military positions and the group was to be considered for formal party status. However, some of the rebels rejected the integration scheme, and renewed fighting was reported between them and government forces in late 1993 and much of 1994. Another peace accord was announced in late 1994, under which the FNT was to be integrated in the Chadian army. Once again, however, some FNT elements challenged the authority of those who had signed the agreement on behalf of the Front. In 2003 dissident members of the FNT joined the United Front for Democracy and Peace (see above).

Leader: Alarit BACHAR (Secretary General).

National Council for Chadian Recovery (Conseil National de Redressement du Tchad—CNRT). The CNRT was established under the leadership of Col. Abbas KOTY, a former member of the Déby cabinet who fled the country in mid-1992 after the regime charged him with plotting a government takeover. The CNRT subsequently initiated guerrilla operations in southern Chad, but Colonel Koty returned to the country in August 1993 for reconciliation talks. An agreement was announced in mid-October whereby the rebellion was to be terminated and the CNRT converted to a legal party. However, several days later Colonel Koty was killed by security forces trying to arrest him for allegedly planning a coup attempt. The CNRT subsequently strongly denied the charges, but his successors, including his brother Hisséne Koty, ordered the resumption of military activity in the wake of the government's "murder" of their leader.

Leaders: Hisséne KOTY (President), Idriss Agar BICHARA.

National Alliance of Resistance (Alliance Nationale de la Résistance—ANR). Formed in the mid-1990s by five rebel groups, the ANR grew to include eight antigovernment groups operating in the eastern part of the country. The ANR signed a peace agreement with the government in January 2003 with a long-term plan to transition to a formal political party, and Col. Mahamat GARFA (an ANR founder) joined the MPS-led cabinet later in the year. However, one faction of the ANR refused to accept the cease-fire and continued fighting under the leadership of Mahamat Nour (see FUC, above).

Legislature

As provided for in the constitution approved by national referendum in December 1989, a 123-member unicameral National Assembly (Assemblée Nationale) was elected by direct universal suffrage for a five-year term on July 8, 1990. However, the assembly was dissolved on December 3 upon the overthrow of the Habré regime. Subsequently, President Déby appointed a Provisional Council of the Republic (Conseil Provisoire de la République) to serve as an interim consultative body, which in turn was replaced by a 57-member Higher Transitional Council (Conseil Supérieur de Transition—CST) elected by the CNS in April 1993. The national constitutional referendum in March 1996 authorized the CST to continue to function pending the installation of the new

Communications

The Ministry of Information controls most media.

Press

The following are published in N’Djamena: Info-Tchad, daily bulletin of the official news agency, ATP; Al-Watan, government weekly; N’Djamena-Hebdo (10,000), independent weekly;

L’Observateur (10,000), independent weekly; Le Temps, independent weekly. Journalists from L’Observateur and Le Temps were arrested in the first half of 2005 for articles critical of the administration, prompting strong protest from domestic and international journalism organizations.

News Agencies

The domestic agency is Agence Tchadienne de Presse (ATP). Agence France-Presse and Reuters also maintain offices in N’Djamena.

Broadcasting and Computing

Radiodiffusion Nationale Tchadienne (RNT) broadcasts in French, Arabic, and local languages, while an independent radio station, Radio Liberté, began operations in June 2000. However, in October 2002 the station was suspended following critical reports about the president; it resumed broadcasting in December 2003. In April 2006, the government announced that private media companies could provide broadcasts of election coverage, subject to monitoring by the High Commission for Communication. Télé-Chad transmits from N’Djamena to some 12,850 TV sets. As of 2003, some 14,000 personal computers served 15,000 Internet users.

COMORO ISLANDS

UNION OF THE COMOROS

Union des Comores (French)

The Country

Located in the Indian Ocean between Madagascar and the eastern coast of Africa, the Union of the Comoros consists of three main islands: Ngazidja (Grande Comore), site of the capital, Moroni; Nzwani (Anjouan); and Mwali (Mohéli). A fourth component of the archipelago, Mahoré (Mayotte), is claimed as national territory but remains under French administration. The indigenous inhabitants in the Comoros derive from a mixture of Arab, Malagasy, and African strains; Islam is the state religion.

Volcanic in origin, the islands are mountainous, with a climate that is tropical during the rainy season and more temperate during the dry season. There are no significant mineral resources, and soil conditions vary, being comparatively rich on Mayotte and substantially poorer on the more populous islands of Nzwani and Ngazidja. Economically, the islands have long suffered from an overemphasis on the production of export crops, such as vanilla, cloves, olives, and perfume essences—the latter shipped primarily to France—and an insufficient cultivation of foods, particularly rice, needed for local consumption. Only a small percentage of the population is engaged in salaried work, and the government remains highly dependent on foreign assistance to cover administrative and developmental expenses as well as trade deficits. Development has been severely hampered since independence in 1975 by some 20 coups or coup attempts, sustained interisland conflict, and widespread corruption.

Per-capita annual income (about $380) declined in the 1990s, while real GDP growth was marginal throughout most of the decade before falling by 1.1 percent in 2000 in the wake of severe political uncertainty following a bloodless military coup in April 1999. The turmoil also depressed tourism, impeded government economic plans, and precipitated a sharp decline in donor support. However, the international community pledged substantial aid in 2002 in response to negotiations that had led to the establishment of the Union of the Comoros (see Political background, below), which proponents hoped would, among other things, resolve separatist pressures on Nzwani. The World Bank and the European Union (EU) coordinated

Political Status: Former French dependency; proclaimed independent July 6, 1975; Federal Islamic Republic of the Comoros proclaimed in constitution approved by national referendum on October 1, 1978; constitution of October 20, 1996, suspended following military coup of April 30, 1999; new constitution providing for the Union of the Comoros adopted by national referendum on December 23, 2001.

Area: 718 sq. mi. (1,860 sq. km.), excluding the island of Mahoré (Mayotte), which was retained as a “Territorial Collectivity” by France in 1976 and redesignated a French “Departmental Collectivity” in 2001.

Population: 446,817 (1991C), excluding an estimated 50,740 residents of Mahoré; 840,000 (2005E), excluding Mahoré.

Major Urban Centers (2005E): MORONI (Ngazidja [Grande Comore], 43,000), Mutsamudu (Nzwani [Anjouan], 24,000), Fomboni (Mwali [Mohéli], 13,000).

Official Languages: Arabic, French (a majority speaks Comorian, a mixture of Arabic and Swahili).

Monetary Unit: Comoros Franc (official rate July 1, 2006: 384.76 francs = $1US). (Previously pegged to the French franc, the Comoros franc is now permanently pegged to the euro at 491.968 francs = 1 euro.)

President of the Union: Ahmed Abdallah Mohamed SAMBI (National Front for Justice); elected in Union-wide runoff election on May 14, 2006, and inaugurated for a four-year term on May 26 in succession to Col. Assoumani AZALI.

Vice Presidents of the Union: Ikililou DHOININE (Mwali) and Idi NADHOIM (Ngazidja); elected on May 14, 2006, and inaugurated on May 26 for term concurrent with that of the president, succeeding Rachid Ben MASSOUNDI (Mwali) and Mohamed Caabi El YACHROUTU (Nzwani).

President of Mwali (Mohéli): Mohamed Saïd FAZUL; elected in runoff balloting on the island of Mwali on April 7, 2002, and inaugurated for a five-year term on May 19.

President of Ngazidja (Grande Comore): Abdou Soule ELBAK; elected in runoff balloting on the island of Ngazidja on May 19, 2002, and inaugurated for a five-year term on May 29.

President of Nzwani (Anjouan): Col. Mohamed BACAR; elected in first-round balloting on the island of Nzwani on March 31, 2002, and subsequently inaugurated for a five-year term.

the “Friends of Comoros” to support the transition. However, the International Monetary Fund (IMF) rejected a request from the Comoros for additional assistance, citing continued power-sharing contention between the island governments and the Union government. GDP grew by only 2.1 percent in 2003 and 1.9 percent in 2004, in part due to declining vanilla prices, while inflation rose to 4.5 percent in 2004.

In 2005 the IMF began a one-year monitoring program to see if the Union government could qualify for badly needed debt reduction through an announced plan of privatization, tax reform, and cessation of government control of commodity prices. The monitoring program was subsequently extended until June 2006, international donors (led by France) having pledged an additional $280 million in aid pending the IMF’s review of a proposed Comoran poverty-reduction program.

Political Background

Ruled for centuries by Arab sultans and first visited by Europeans in the 16th century, the Comoro archipelago came under French rule in the 19th century: Mayotte became a French protectorate in 1843; Anjouan, Grande Comore, and Mohéli were added in 1886. In 1912 the islands were joined administratively with Madagascar, from where they were governed until after World War II. Because of the lengthy period of indirect rule, the Comoros suffered comparative neglect, as contrasted with the nearby island of Réunion, which became an overseas French department in 1946.

In the wake of a 1968 student strike that was suppressed by French police and troops, France agreed to permit the formation of legal political parties in the archipelago. In December 1972, 34 of the 39 seats in the Comoran Chamber of Deputies were claimed by a coalition of proindependence parties: the Democratic Rally of the Comoran People, led by Prince Saïd Mohamed JAFFAR; the Party for the Evolution of the Comoros, which was linked to the Tanzania-based National Liberation Movement of the Comoros; and the Democratic Union of the Comoros, led by Ahmed ABDALLAH Abderemane. The other five seats were won by the anti-independence Popular Movement of Mahoré, headed by Marcel HENRY. As a result of the election, the chamber named Abdallah president of the government, succeeding Prince Saïd IBRAHIM, co-leader, with Ali SOILIH, of the People's Party (Umma-Mranda), which had campaigned for a more gradual movement toward independence. The new government immediately began negotiations with Paris, and an agreement was reached in July 1973 providing for a five-year transition period during which France would retain responsibility for defense, foreign affairs, and currency. The only unresolved issue was the status of Mayotte, whose inhabitants remained strongly opposed to separation from France.

In a Comoran referendum held December 22, 1974, 95 percent of participating voters favored independence, despite a negative vote from Mayotte, where 25 percent of the registered electorate abstained. On July 6, 1975, a unilateral declaration of independence was voted by the territorial Chamber of Deputies, which designated Abdallah as head of state and prime minister. The action was timed to preempt the passage of legislation by the French National Assembly calling for an island-by-island referendum on a Comoran constitution—a procedure designed to allow Mayotte to remain under French jurisdiction. Having announced his intention to sever economic as well as political ties with France, the increasingly dictatorial Abdallah (who was visiting Anjouan at the time) was ousted on August 3 in a coup led by Ali Soilih and supported by a National United Front of several parties. On August 10 governmental power was vested in a 12-member National Executive Council headed by Prince Jaffar, who was appointed president and prime minister. In September, following an armed invasion of Anjouan by forces under Soilih, Abdallah surrendered and was subsequently exiled. At a joint meeting of the National Executive Council and the National Council of the Revolution on January 2, 1976, Soilih was named to replace Jaffar as head of state, and the National Council of the Revolution was redesignated as the National Institutional Council. The presidency was also divorced from the premiership, and on January 6 Abdellahi MOHAMED was named to the latter post.

As president, Soilih encountered substantial resistance in attempting to mount a Chinese-style program designed to “abolish feudalism.” During a month-long “Période Noire” in 1977, civil servants were dismissed, the regular governmental machinery temporarily dismantled, and the “people’s power” vested in a 16-member National People’s Committee of recent secondary-school graduates. The “revolution” also included establishment of people’s committees at island, district, and local levels, despite numerous skirmishes between people’s militia forces and Islamic traditionalists. Between April 1976 and January 1978, at least three unsuccessful countercoups against the regime were mounted.

During the night of May 12–13, 1978, President Soilih was ousted by a group of about 50 mercenaries under the command of Col. Bob DENARD (the alias of Gilbert BOURGEAUD), a Frenchman previously involved in rebellions elsewhere in Africa and southern Arabia. The successful coup resulted in the return of Ahmed Abdallah, who joined Mohamed AHMED as co-president of a Political-Military Directorate that also included Denard. It was subsequently reported that Soilih had been killed on May 29 in an attempt to escape from house arrest. An exclusively “political directorate” was announced on July 22 in view of the “calm” that had resulted from a decision to return to traditional Islamic principles.

Co-president Ahmed resigned on October 3, 1978, following the approval by referendum two days earlier of a new constitution that had proclaimed the establishment of the Federal Islamic Republic of the Comoros. Abdallah was thus enabled to stand as the sole candidate in balloting held October 22. Following a legislative election that concluded on December 15, Salim Ben ALI was designated prime minister, a post he continued to hold until he was dismissed by the president on January 25, 1982. His successor, Foreign Minister Ali MROUDJAE, was appointed on February 8, with the rest of the cabinet being named a week later. President Abdallah was unopposed in his bid for reelection to a second six-year term on September 30, 1984.

Amid evidence of serious dissent within the government, Abdallah, following his reelection, secured a number of constitutional amendments that abolished the position of prime minister and reduced the powers of the Federal Assembly. These actions precipitated a coup attempt by junior members of the presidential guard on March 8, 1985, while the chief executive was on a private visit to Paris. Subsequently, the Democratic Front, a Paris-based opposition group, was charged with complicity in the revolt, many of its domestic supporters being sentenced to life imprisonment in early November, although some were granted presidential amnesty at the end of the year.

At legislative balloting on March 22, 1987 (denounced as manifestly fraudulent by regime opponents), the entire slate of 42 candidates presented by President Abdallah was declared elected. Ostensibly open to any citizen wishing to compete as an independent, polls on two of the islands (Anjouan and Mohéli) involved only presidential nominees. By contrast, opposition candidates were advanced in 20 constituencies on Grande Comore.

In July 1987 the president announced that civil servants who had been dismissed for political reasons would be rehired; however, a "clarification" issued in August indicated that the policy would apply only to those suspected of complicity in the 1985 coup attempt—not to those supporting opposition candidates at the 1987 balloting. In November, the president survived another coup attempt with the assistance of Colonel Denard who, although officially retired, had remained in control of the country's small security force.

On November 4, 1989, an ostensible 92 percent of the participants in a national referendum approved a constitutional amendment permitting Abdallah to seek a third term. Little more than three weeks later, on November 27, he was assassinated in a reported clash between the Presidential Guard and forces loyal to a former army commander, Ahmed MOHAMED. Subsequent evidence suggested, however, that Abdallah had been killed by his own troops on order of Colonel Denard. Abdallah was succeeded, on an interim basis, by the president of the Supreme Court, Saïd Mohamed DJOHAR, who was elected to a regular six-year term on March 4 and 11, 1990, in the country's first contested presidential balloting since independence. Three months earlier, Denard, who denied complicity in the Abdallah assassination, was deported (in the company of some 30 other mercenaries) to South Africa, with the Presidential Guard being supplanted by a contingent of French paratroopers. The latter were credited with thwarting a coup attempt by four mercenaries allegedly linked to Mohamed TAKI Abdoukarim, the runner-up at the March presidential poll, on the weekend of August 18–19.

On August 3, 1991, the new president of the Supreme Court, Ibrahim Ahmed HALIDI, failed in an attempt to oust Djohar by judicial impeachment and was arrested, along with a number of colleagues (they were ultimately released on December 2). Ten days later, amid mounting social unrest, public demonstrations were banned, and on August 27 a major cabinet shakeup was announced, from which the president's own party, the Comoran Union for Progress (Union Comorienne pour le Progrès—UCP/Udzima), dissociated itself.

In October 1991 five domestic participants in an Opposition Union accepted an invitation from the exiled Mohamed Taki to meet in Paris to discuss the formation of an interim government of national union and the scheduling of a National Conference. Subsequently, Taki and his associates met with Djohar in Paris, and on November 25 Taki and Djohar returned together to Moroni. On December 17 the president announced his willingness to enter into a pact of reconciliation with his opponents, on condition that they not challenge the legitimacy of his incumbency or attempt to destabilize the regime.

On December 31, upon endorsement of the pact by all of the then-recognized parties, Djohar dissolved the existing government, and on January 6, 1992, he appointed a broadly based nine-member successor, with Taki described somewhat vaguely as “coordinator of government action.”

The long-sought National Conference, encompassing nearly two dozen parties, met from January 24 to April 8, 1992, and approved the draft of a new constitution, which was endorsed by a 74 percent majority in a referendum of June 7. Meanwhile, on May 8 President Djohar announced the formation of a new cabinet headed by Taki that was supposed to serve until the next election. However, following Taki’s designation of a former mercenary as the country’s international investment adviser, the president dismissed the government on July 4 and named a new transitional administration with no ministerial head.

On September 26, 1992, while President Djohar was visiting Paris, a group of some 30 Defense Forces officers mounted a coup attempt, which was put down the following day. Additional clashes occurred on October 13 and 21, with the president, at opposition insistence, announcing a third postponement of the legislative poll to November 8. At first-round balloting that was further deferred until November 22, only 4 of 42 seats were filled outright. A second round on November 29 was scarcely more conclusive, none of the 22 participating groups winning a majority of seats.

The vacant post of prime minister was filled on January 1, 1993, with the appointment of Ibrahim Abderemane HALIDI (not related to Ibrahim Ahmed Halidi), who announced the appointment of a 12-member cabinet five days later. A period of extreme instability ensued. On February 25 the president ordered an extensive cabinet reshuffle, and on May 19 Prime Minister Halidi was himself ousted by a parliamentary vote of no confidence for his “manifest inability to rally support” and the “inability of the government to cope with social problems.” On May 25 the president called upon Saïd Ali MOHAMED to form a new government, which, however, drew support from only 13 of the 42 MPs; thus, to forestall another no-confidence vote, the president on June 18 dissolved the assembly. Despite a declaration of support for Mohamed at the time of dissolution, Djohar dismissed him the following day, naming a former adviser, Ahmed Ben Cheikh ATTOUMANE, as his successor.

Although the constitution called for legislative balloting within 40 days of dissolution, a series of postponements delayed the poll until mid-December 1993. In the wake of the first cancellation, the president issued a decree ousting Electoral Commission members deemed hostile to the administration; a second decree established new constituency boundaries and revoked a requirement that ministers resign before standing for election. Both were branded as unconstitutional, and in early November, Djohar, in a concession to the opposition, removed the incumbent chair of the Electoral Commission.

Despite the blatant gerrymandering and other irregularities, all four individuals elected at first-round legislative balloting on December 12, 1993, were from the opposition, with the second round on December 20 characterized in one report as a “veritable masquerade.” Thus, after the opposition had appeared to have swept the entire island of Anjouan, the voting was declared “null and void.” The interior ministry then pronounced that government candidates had triumphed, while on Mohéli the secretary general of the presidency, whose candidacy had been formally invalidated in the first round, was permitted to contest the second. Understandably, the opposition called for cancellation of the second-round results, failing which it announced that it would participate in no further electoral activity and would take up no seats in the Federal Assembly.

On January 2, 1994, President Djohar named Mohamed Abdou MADI, secretary general of the recently launched Rally for Democracy and Renewal (Rassemblement pour la Démocratie et le Renouveau—RDR), to head a new government of regime supporters. In the wake of a scandal following attempted privatization of the national air carrier, Air Comores, coupled with a prolonged strike by schoolteachers and hospital workers, Prime Minister Madi was dismissed on October 13 and replaced by a relatively obscure education official, Halifa HOUMADI. In the ninth government change in 40 months, Houmadi was himself replaced on April 29, 1995, by former finance minister Mohamed Caabi El YACHROUTU.

The last four months of 1995 were marked by a degree of instability that was remarkable, even by Comoran standards. On the night of September 27–28 Colonel Denard reappeared as the leader of 30-odd mercenaries who, with local support, seized President Djohar and established a “military committee of transition” headed by a little-known army captain, Ayouba COMBO. Meanwhile, Prime Minister Yachroutu, who had sought refuge in the French embassy, called on France to intervene. On October 3 Combo announced that he was withdrawing in favor of Mohamed Taki Abdoukarim and Prince Saïd Ali KEMAL as civilian joint presidents. The next day 900 French troops landed and quickly rounded up the mercenaries. They did not, however, reinstate the 80-year-old Djohar, who was flown to the nearby French island of Réunion, with Yachroutu proclaiming himself “interim president in accordance with the constitution.” Yachroutu thereupon named a new Government of National Unity, which Djohar repudiated from Réunion by announcing a rival government headed by former prime minister Saïd Ali Mohamed.

On December 3, 1995, a somewhat diverse group of Comoran political leaders assembled in Paris in an effort to persuade Yachroutu to cancel a snap presidential election that he had scheduled for January 21. Yachroutu responded by calling for two-stage balloting on January 28 and February 7, arguing that although the dates fell within the month-long Muslim feast of Ramadan, postponement would mean loss of Comoran consideration in the current cycle of World Bank/IMF structural-adjustment programming. Subsequently, however, he relented and postponed the voting to March 6 and 16. He also agreed to send representatives to a conference, sponsored by the Organization of African Unity (OAU, subsequently the African Union—AU) in Antananarivo, Madagascar, concerning Djohar’s possible return, although insisting that planning for the presidential poll would make it impossible for him (Yachroutu) to attend in person.

The Madagascar gathering yielded agreement on January 23, 1996, that Djohar would return to Moroni as president but would cease to have any executive authority forthwith and would accept a new electoral code that effectively barred him from seeking reelection by specifying an obligatory 40–70 age range for a presidential candidate (he was over 80). With some 50 French troops remaining on station to guarantee order, presidential balloting accordingly went ahead on March 6 and 16, with 15 candidates contesting the first round. Of these, Mohamed Taki Abdoukarim of the National Union for Democracy in the Comoros (Union Nationale pour la Démocratie aux Comores—UNDC) headed the poll with 21.3 percent and went on to secure a 64.3 percent second-round victory over Abbas DJOUSSOUF, leader of the Movement for Democracy and Progress, standing as candidate of the Forum for National Recovery (Forum pour le Redressement National—FRN).

Sworn in on March 25, 1996, President Taki assigned the premiership to Tadjidine Ben Saïd MASSONDE (Udzima), who named a government on March 28 that included several of the presidential candidates eliminated in the recent first round. On April 11 President Taki dissolved the assembly and announced that new balloting would take place on October 6 (notwithstanding a constitutional requirement of elections within 40 days of dissolution), adding that a referendum on a new constitution would be held before the end of June (later rescheduled to October). In August, Taki formally proposed the establishment of a single “presidential” party, with opposition forces grouped into two parties. Among the critics of the proposal were two government parties, both of whom subsequently lost their cabinet postings. On October 6 the pro-presidential National Rally for Development (Rassemblement National pour le Développement—RND) was formed, Taki confidante Ali Bazi SELIM being named to head the group.

On October 20, 1996, a new constitution that increased presidential powers and restricted political party formations was approved by 85 percent of those voting in a popular referendum. The new charter had been championed by Taki and the RND, but its controversial amendments had elicited opposition condemnation and calls for a boycott of the referendum. Thereafter, relations between the administration and opposition continued to deteriorate, and on November 10, 1996, the opposition announced that it would boycott the upcoming legislative elections after the government refused to establish an independent electoral commission. Consequently, at balloting on December 1 and 8, RND candidates faced little competition, capturing an overwhelming majority of the assembly seats contested, with the remaining seats being secured by the Islamic National Front for Justice (Front National pour la Justice—FNJ) and an independent candidate. On December 27 Ahmed ABDU, a former assistant to ex-president Abdallah, was named prime minister, replacing Massonde, who had resigned on December 11.

Antigovernment strikes and violent demonstrations erupted in early 1997, sparked by the Taki administration's failure to fulfill an earlier pledge to pay civil-servant salary arrears. On Nzwani, where the government's increasing inability to provide basic services had already fueled simmering secessionist emotions, the unrest quickly gained intensity, and in mid-March deadly clashes erupted between strikers and government security forces following the arrest of Abdou ZAKARIA, the leader of the Democratic Front Party (Parti du Front Démocratique—PFD). Subsequently, amid reports that the demonstrators were in open rebellion, the government dismissed the Anjouan governor.

Following the arrest of secessionist leader Abdallah IBRAHIM and the banning of antigovernment parties in late July 1997, full-scale rioting broke out in the Anjouan capital of Mutsamudu. Thereafter, separatist militants affiliated with the Anjouan People's Movement (Mouvement du Peuple d'Anjouan—MPA) gained control over key island facilities, and on August 3 the MPA declared independence from the Comoros government and announced its intention to petition France for a return to overseas territory status. On August 5 the MPA named Ibrahim, who had been released from detention, president of the breakaway state and head of a 12-member cabinet. Meanwhile, separatists on Mwali also declared their independence. For its part, France rebuffed the entreaties from the secessionists and urged them to respect Comoros' "territorial integrity." Subsequently, under pressure from the OAU, which had also refused to recognize the declaration of independence, the MPA agreed to participate in reconciliation talks with the Taki administration in Ethiopia in September.

On September 3, 1997, seaborne government forces attempting to regain control of Anjouan suffered heavy casualties before being repelled by separatist fighters, who also took dozens of the "invaders" captive. The government's ill-fated offensive, which it had at first declared a success, drew sharp OAU criticism, and reconciliation talks were indefinitely postponed. On September 8 Ibrahim announced the creation of the "State of Anjouan" and declared that he would rule by decree. Meanwhile, amid rumors in Moroni of an impending military coup, President Taki dissolved the Abdou government and assumed absolute power on September 9. On September 13 Taki formed a State Transition Committee, an advisory body that included three representatives from Nzwani and two from Mwali.

On October 26, 1997, secessionist officials in Nzwani organized a referendum on independence that reportedly received a 99 percent affirmative vote. Two days later Ibrahim was formally appointed head of the provisional government of Nzwani (the island's traditional name having been readopted by the secessionists) and was charged with drafting a constitution and preparing for elections. Such efforts were delayed, however, when in mid-November Ibrahim's provisional government again succumbed to OAU pressure and agreed to attend talks with the Taki administration in Ethiopia in December. On December 7 Taki appointed Nouridine BOURHANE, a former cabinet official with ties to Nzwani, to head a government that included a number of members of the State Transition Committee.

From December 10 to 14, 1997, representatives of the Taki government and secessionist representatives from Nzwani and Mwali met in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, for OAU-sponsored "reconciliation" talks, which failed to yield any major breakthroughs, although both sides agreed to reconvene in 1998. In mid-February 1998 fighting erupted in Nzwani between Ibrahim's forces and a dissident faction led by Mohamed Abdou MADI, who, Ibrahim claimed, had the backing of the OAU. Unable to dislodge Ibrahim, Madi was forced to flee, and a number of his fighters were arrested.

At a constitutional referendum on February 25, 1998, voters in Nzwani reportedly approved a basic document that called for the revocation of all Comoran laws. Thereafter, despite OAU calls for the secessionists to delay further provocations, Ibrahim named CHAMASSI Ben Saïd Omar as prime minister of Nzwani in March. However, Ibrahim and his new prime minister subsequently clashed, and in July Chamassi and his supporters reportedly attempted to oust Ibrahim. Fighting between the various factions on Nzwani, including Mahdi's reorganized militants, continued through the end of 1998.

Following violent antigovernment rioting by civil servants in Moroni in mid-May 1998, Taki dismissed the Bourhane government on May 29, and on May 30 he named a cabinet that did not include a prime minister. On November 5 Taki died of a heart attack. The following day former prime minister Tadjidine Ben Saïd Massonde assumed the presidency as constitutionally mandated because of his position as president of the High Council of the Republic (the country's Constitutional Court). On November 22 Massonde named the FRN's Abbas Djoussouf to head an interim government. Djoussouf's appointment and subsequent formation of an FRN-dominated (with six seats) cabinet was denounced by the RND, whose governmental representation had fallen to four seats. Meanwhile, Massonde called for a loosening of economic sanctions against the secessionists on Nzwani and appealed to their leaders to participate in an internationally sponsored, interisland conference. However, plans for the meeting were derailed by the outbreak of fierce fighting on Nzwani in December 1998. Subsequently, Massonde announced that presidential elections would be postponed until the secessionist crisis was resolved, and in February 1999 the High Court approved the extension of his mandate.

At an OAU-mediated conference held in Antananarivo, Madagascar, April 19–25, 1999, representatives from Ngazidja, Nzwani, and Mwali reached agreement on a pact that granted the latter two increased autonomy within the republic (to be restyled the Union of Comoran Islands) and charged the Massonde administration with preparing for general elections in April 2000. The delegation from Nzwani departed, however, without signing the accord, and violent demonstrations subsequently erupted on Ngazidja, where protesters reportedly chanted anti-Nzwani slogans and attacked people who had been born on Nzwani. On April 30, Armed Forces Chief of Staff Col. Assoumani AZALI announced that, in an effort to stem the unrest, the military had assumed control of the country, ousted the president and government, and suspended the constitution, legislature, and judiciary.

Among Colonel Azali's first acts upon seizing power was to announce his intention to honor the Madagascar accord, including its provisions for presidential and legislative elections in 2000. Nevertheless, the coup was widely condemned by the international community, with the criticisms from the OAU and France being among the more strident.

Facing continued international isolation, on December 7, 1999, President Azali announced the formation of a new government headed by Bianrifi TARMIDI as prime minister, which he hoped would be viewed more positively because of the inclusion of several political parties. Meanwhile, events continued to percolate on Nzwani, where a referendum on January 23, 2000, endorsed independence by a reported vote of 95 percent. In response, the OAU on February 1 imposed economic sanctions on the separatists.

In April 2000 several demonstrations protested the passing without action of the one-year deadline for Azali's promised withdrawal from power. Among other things, Hachim Saïd HACHIM resigned his post as chair of the National Salvation Coordination (Coordination de Salut National—CSN), a grouping of former party figures and civic leaders that had been formed to support Azali, to protest the delay. For his part, the president claimed he had been unable to act as expected due to the intransigence of the leaders of Nzwani. However, in August, Azali and Lt. Col. Saïd ABEID Abdéréman reached agreement on a preliminary plan for a new federal entity that would provide each island with substantially expanded autonomy. Although the OAU lambasted the accord as contrary to the guidelines established in Madagascar in April 1999, the agreement appeared to represent the best hope for a negotiated settlement to date, despite the at times violent opposition of hard-line separatists on Nzwani.

On May 6, 2000, Colonel Azali was sworn in as president, and he appointed a cabinet-like state council with six ministers from Ngazidja, four from Mwali, and two from Nzwani, promising to turn over the reigns of authority to a civilian government within one year. He also introduced a new “constitutional charter” authorizing himself, as president, prime minister, and minister of defense, to rule by decree (in conjunction with a “state committee”) while negotiations continued toward the adoption of a new constitution. Meanwhile, Abeid, the former French officer who had “elbowed out” Ibrahim for dominance on Nzwani, announced the formation of a government on that island and indicated that Nzwani would not adhere to the Madagascar agreement, prompting the OAU to threaten sanctions and even military intervention.

On November 29, 2000, the president named Hamada Madi “BOLERO,” one of his chief negotiators with Nzwani, to replace Prime Minister Tamadi. Bolero formed a new government on December 10, although he was unable to persuade opposition parties to join.

On February 17, 2001, a potentially landmark agreement was reached in Fomboni, the capital of Mwali, by members of the military junta, the former separatists on Nzwani led by Colonel Abeid, delegates from Mwali, and representatives from political parties and civic organizations. Based on that accord, a national referendum on a new constitution establishing a Union of the Comoros was held on December 23, voters responding with a reported 76 percent “yes” vote. Meanwhile, on Nzwani, Colonel Abeid had been overthrown in a bloodless coup in August that had left control in the hands of Maj. Mohamed BACAR, who had quickly signaled his support for the proposed new federal system.

On January 17, 2002, President Azali nominated Prime Minister “Bolero” to head a new transitional government (installed on January 20) to prepare for presidential elections for the Union as well as for each island. For his part, Azali on January 21 resigned as president, as he was constitutionally required to do in order to compete in the upcoming balloting for the presidency of the Union. The primary was held March 17 on Ngazidja, with Azali finishing first with 39.8 percent of the vote, followed by Mahamoud MRADABI with 15.7 percent. Also on March 17, voters on Mwali and Nzwani approved the requisite new local constitutions. However, the constitutional referendum on Ngazidja failed, prompting a rerun (this time successful) on April 9.

Although the top three finishers in the March 17, 2002, primary on Ngazidja were authorized to compete in the Union-wide balloting for president of the Union on April 14, Azali ultimately ran unopposed because the other two candidates boycotted the poll to protest what they considered to be “anomalies” in the first round and ongoing questions about the integrity of electoral rolls. The national election commission ruled the results of April 14 to be void in view of the boycott, but the commission was dissolved for “incompetence” on April 23 by the follow-up committee charged with overseeing implementation of the 2001 Fomboni Agreement. A special commission was subsequently established to review the matter, and Azali’s victory was confirmed on May 8. Azali was sworn in as president of the Union on May 26, and on June 5 he announced his Union cabinet, which comprised his two vice presidents and only three other members. Meanwhile, separate presidential balloting on each of the islands had resulted in Bacar’s election as president of Nzwani, the selection of a then Azali supporter—Mohamed Saïd FAZUL—on Mwali, and a victory on Ngazidja for Abdou Soule ELBAK, an outspoken critic of Azali.

Elections for the proposed island and Union assemblies were postponed indefinitely in March 2003 in the wake of ongoing conflict over power-sharing issues and an apparent coup plot against Azali emanating from Ngazidja. However, at a meeting sponsored by the AU in Pretoria, South Africa, in August, representatives of the island and Union governments appeared to settle several contentious issues, including how tax revenues would be shared. The accord also provided for each island to have its own police force, while the army would remain under Union control. Azali and the three island presidents ratified the agreement on December 20 and established a national committee to oversee its implementation.

Balloting for the three island assemblies was held on March 14 and 21, 2004. The Azali, pro-Union camp fared poorly in the face of coordinated opposition efforts. (Pro-Bacar candidates won 20 of 25 seats on Nzwani, pro-Elbak candidates won 14 of 20 seats on Ngazidja, and pro-Fazul candidates won 9 of 10 seats on Mwali.) The opposition (now formally coalesced as the Camp of the Autonomous Islands [Camp des Îles Autonomes—CdIA] also dominated the April 18 and 25 balloting for the Assembly of the Union, securing 12 directly elected seats compared to 6 for the pro-Azali Convention for the Renewal of the Comoros (Convention pour le Renouveau des Comores—CRC). Because of its control of the island assemblies, the CdIA also gained all 15 of the indirectly elected seats in the Assembly of the Union.

On July 13, 2004, President Azali formed a new Union cabinet in which CRC members held a majority of the portfolios. However, the “opposition” was given three seats—one from Nzwani, one from Mwali, and one from the Islands Fraternity and Unity Party. Elbak declined an invitation to appoint a cabinet member from Ngazidja, citing Azali’s perceived foot-dragging in devolving power to the islands. Azali announced another cabinet reshuffle in early July 2005.

In primary balloting on Nzwani for the president of the Union on April 16, 2006, moderate Islamist leader Ahmed Abdallah Mohamed SAMBI of the National Front for Justice (Front National pour la Justice—FNJ) led 13 candidates with 23.7 percent of the vote, followed by two “secular” rivals—Mohamed DJAANFARI (a retired French air force officer) with 13.10 percent and former prime minister Ibrahim Halidi (who had Azali’s endorsement) with 10.37 percent. In the nationwide runoff balloting among the three on May 14, Sambu was declared the winner with 58 percent of the vote. He formed a new cabinet on May 27.

Constitution and Government

The 1992 constitution provided for the popular election of a president, by runoff balloting if necessary to secure a majority, for a once-renewable five-year term. It also provided for a legislature consisting of a Senate of 15 members (5 per island, chosen by regional councillors for six-year terms) and a Federal Assembly, popularly elected (subject to dissolution) for four years by a single-vote, two-round ballot. Of the assembly’s 42 members, 20 represented Ngazidja, 17 Nzwani, and 5 Mwali. A prime minister, named by the president, was drawn from the party holding or commanding a majority in the assembly.

The constitution approved by popular referendum on October 20, 1996, superseded the 1992 charter and included provisions for an enhanced presidency, wherein the chief executive was elected by popular mandate for a six-year term and given the exclusive rights to initiate any future constitutional changes and to appoint the prime minister and island governors. The 1996 constitution also abolished the Senate and enlarged the popularly elected Federal Assembly by 1 seat to a total of 43. Members of the assembly served four-year terms (subject to dissolution) and the seats were distributed geographically as follows: Ngazidja, 20; Nzwani, 17; and Mwali, 6. The document forbade independent candidates from vying for elected office and further stipulated that political parties needed to secure 2 assembly seats on each island to maintain legal status.

The 1996 constitution was suspended by the military junta that assumed power on April 30, 1999, and all state institutions were dissolved. On May 6, 1999, Col. Assoumani Azali, the leader of the junta, proclaimed a new “constitutional charter” with himself as president and head of a State Committee empowered to govern pending the return to civilian government. A progovernment “national congress” in Moroni on August 7, 2000, adopted a “national charter” that extended the authority of the president (as chosen by the military) even further. Among other things, the new document called for the president to appoint a prime minister and envisioned the eventual establishment of a vaguely defined “legislative council.”

Following extensive and difficult negotiations among government officials, opposition parties, and representatives of Mwali and Nzwani, a national referendum on December 23, 2001, approved a new federal structure for the renamed Union of the Comoros. (The complete official name of the country had previously been the Federal Islamic Republic of the Comoros.) Autonomy was granted to the three island components of the Union to a much greater degree than in previous constitutions, especially in regard to finances. Meanwhile, the Union government was given responsibility for religion, currency, external relations, defense, nationality issues, and national symbols. New constitutions were also subsequently adopted by referenda on each island, although the division of authority between the island governments and the Union government was insufficiently delineated to prevent the immediate outbreak of confusion, especially on Ngazidja (see Current issues below).

The president of the Union serves a four-year term, with the office rotating among the islands each term. Two vice presidents, one from each of the islands not holding the presidency, also serve. The president and vice presidents constitute a Council of the Union. A primary election is held on the island scheduled to assume the presidency (Ngazidja was chosen as first in the rotation, to be followed in order by Nzwani and Mwali). The top three vote-getters in the primary earn a place on the ballot in subsequent Union-wide balloting. Each presidential candidate must select two vice-presidential running mates, one from each of the islands that the presidential candidate does not represent, prior to the Union-wide poll. The president is authorized to appoint a prime minister and cabinet, although the new basic law requires that all the islands be represented in the federal government. Legislative power was vested in an elected Assembly of the Union (see Legislature, below, for details). The new constitutions for the islands also provided for direct election of their presidents and island assemblies.

The Union’s other prominent institution is the High Council, which serves as a constitutional court and is responsible for validating election results as well as ruling on questions regarding the division of authority between the federal and island governments. Members of the High Council are appointed (for six-year terms) by the president and vice presidents of the Union, the president of the Assembly of the Union, and the presidents of the island governments. The judiciary is headed by a Supreme Court.

Foreign Relations

Comoran foreign relations have long been dominated by the Mayotte (Mahoré) issue. On November 21, 1975, French military personnel resisted an “invasion” by Ali Soilih and an unarmed contingent that attempted to counter the Mahori “secession.” At the end of the year, France recognized the sovereignty of the other three islands, but referenda held on Mayotte in February and April 1976 demonstrated a clear preference for designation as a French department. On December 16 the French Senate ratified a measure according the island special standing as a collectivité territoriale, with that status being extended on December 6, 1979, for another five years. In October 1981 President Abdallah pressed for French withdrawal during a Paris meeting with President Mitterrand, who, he noted, had in 1975 opposed detachment of the island from the rest of the archipelago. He repeated the argument during a visit to France in June 1984, the French government responding that a further referendum on the issue would be deferred because the inhabitants of Mayotte were not sufficiently “well informed” on the options open to them. The decision was endorsed by the French National Assembly in a bill approved on December 19, and no subsequent referendum has been held.

On January 20, 1995, a mass demonstration was mounted outside the French embassy in Moroni to protest a decision by French prime minister Edouard Balladur to reimpose a requirement that Comoros citizens obtain entry visas for travel to Mayotte. Thereafter, Mohamed Taki contested the March 1996 presidential election on a public platform of Islamic traditionalism and moderate nationalism, depicting his main rival as the candidate preferred by the French government. However, once in office Taki confirmed that the existing defense agreement with France would not only be maintained but also expanded to cover the external defense of the Comoros and to allow a French military presence on the islands.

In early 1997 French financial aid was suspended pending Moroni's restarting discussions with the IMF and World Bank on the establishment of a structural adjustment program. In 1998 international attention focused on the crisis on Nzwani. In March, France rejected the secessionists' call for the reestablishment of links as "unrealistic"; meanwhile, the OAU, whose mediation efforts were rebuffed by the separatists, adopted an increasingly hard-line stance against the breakaway movement. (In early December the OAU urged its members to comply with Moroni's call for military intervention to end the violence.)

The OAU and most of the rest of the international community strongly criticized the coup of April 1999, while the OAU continued to pressure the separatists on Nzwani into early 2001 (see Political background for further information). However, most capitals ultimately endorsed, as did the OAU, the political settlement subsequently reached regarding the new constitutional structure for the Comoros. France restored full ties with the Comoros in September 2002 and signed several economic agreements in 2005.

Current Issues

Not surprisingly, considering the chaos of recent years, the balloting for president of the Union of the Comoros in the spring of 2002 was highly controversial and, in the opinion of major opposition parties, a "fiasco" that undercut the legitimacy of President Azali's victory. Following Azali's appointment of his new cabinet in June, it also quickly became clear that the Union was facing a potentially fatal institutional crisis involving the failure of the union and island constitutions to fully delineate the separation of power between the federal and island authorities. (The Indian Ocean Newsletter described the problem as "Four presidents for three islands.") Conflict was most apparent on Ngazidja, where that island's president, Abdou Soule Elbak, attempted to make appointments and even occupy office space that Azali considered within the purview of the federal administration.

The contentious island and Union legislative elections in 2004 did little to settle the simmering power-sharing issues, particularly with the anti-Azali, "anti-Union" CdIA controlling all of the legislatures. Tension also intensified when the pro-Azali camp introduced legislation that would have permitted Azali to run for president of the Union again in 2006. (According to the rotating mechanism codified in the constitution, the next Union president was scheduled to be elected from Nzwani.) Although the proposed revision was withdrawn in the face of public protests, political uncertainty continued to pose a threat to the April 2006 primary election on Nzwani, prompting the AU to send a contingent of peacekeepers and police officers to help ensure peaceful balloting. (Local forces were confined to their barracks.) Surprising those analysts who predicted that the Comoros was not yet ready for a peaceful transfer of power, the April primary and May nationwide balloting proceeded in a generally orderly fashion, the AU characterizing the voting as "free, transparent, and credible." New president Sambu presented himself as a political newcomer devoted to combating corruption, by, among other things, developing an independent judiciary and investigating the perceived widespread "embezzlement" of government funds in recent years. Some observers suggested that Sambu, a Muslim theologian educated in Iran, might promote the installation of an Islamic regime, but he declared that Comorans were currently opposed to such a change and that he would accept public opinion on the matter. A successful businessman, Sambi pledged that his administration's activities would involve "more economics and less politics."

Political Parties

In 1979 the Federal Assembly effectively voided an endorsement of pluralism in the 1978 constitution by calling for the establishment of a single-party system, which prevailed until the resanctioning of multiparty activity in December 1989. Under the Djohar presidency, Comoran parties were mostly aligned into progovernment and opposition camps. The latter presented joint lists at the December 1993 election and in January 1994 launched the ten-party Forum for National Recovery.

The October 1996 constitution included a number of regulations for political party activity that the Taki administration had been advocating since assuming power the previous March, including requiring political parties to control two legislative seats on each of the islands in order to maintain legal status, allowing the formation of only two opposition parties, and forbidding independent candidates from vying for elected office. Thus, as of late 1998 the RND was the Comoro Islands' only legal party, although both the National Front for Justice and a successful independent candidate had reportedly assumed their legislative seats following the December 1996 balloting. The December 2001 constitution permitted parties to operate without hindrance, provided they respect "national sovereignty, democracy, and territorial integrity."

Presidential Party

National Front for Justice (Front National pour la Justice—FNJ). The FNJ is a moderate Islamic party led by Ahmed Abdallah Mohamed Sambi (nicknamed "Ayatollah" because of his theological training in Iran). At December 1996 legislative balloting the FNJ captured its first-ever seats, including one by Sambi.

FNJ members were not immediately linked to the unrest on Anjouan in 1997, and at midyear the group issued a statement saying that it was not a separatist body. However, the FNJ expressed sympathy for critics of government "negligence" and called for establishment of a "proper federal state."

The FNJ eventually joined the government following the coup of April 1999 but withdrew in October 2001 to protest the decision to remove "Islamic" from the name of the country in the constitution being readied for a national referendum in December.

Sambi, a prominent businessman in addition to being a popular cleric, was elected president of the Union in 2006.

Leaders: Ahmed Abdallah Mohamed SAMBI (President of the Union), Ahmed ABOUBACAR, Soidiki M'BAPANOZA, Ahmed RACHID.

Other Parties and Groups

Convention for the Renewal of the Comoros (Convention pour le Renouveau des Comores—CRC). The CRC was launched in September 2002 by members of the Movement for Socialism and Democracy (Mouvement pour le Socialisme et la Démocratie—MSD), which had been formed in July 2000 by Abdou Soefou after he and his supporters were expelled from the FDC (below) for supporting President Azali following the April 1999 coup. The CRC was described as an extension of the National Salvation Coordination that had been formed following the coup. The CRC was established to provide Azali with a party prior to the elections for island and Union assemblies.

Although Azali captured the Union presidency in 2002, the CRC was overshadowed by anti-Azali parties in the 2004 balloting for the Assembly of the Union. Subsequently, the CRC fractionalized in its efforts to present a candidate for the 2006 Union presidential elections. One group, led by former prime minister Mohamed Abdou Madi (who had sought the CRC nomination), reportedly backed Union Vice President Mohamed Caabi El Yachroutu, while Soefou and Azali supported Ibrahim Halidi of the MPC (below). El Yachroutu secured 9.56 percent of the vote in the presidential primary.

Leaders: Col. Assoumani AZALI (Former President of the Union of the Comoros), Abdou SOEFOU (Secretary General).

Movement for the Comoros (Movement pour les Comores—MPC). Formed in 1997 by Saïd Hilali, an advisor to President Mohamed Taki Abdoukarim, the MPC stressed “national unity” under a federal government. Ibrahim Halidi, the MPC’s secretary general, finished third in the April 2006 primary, having secured the endorsement of President Azali’s faction of the CRC as well as the Chuma and Djawabu parties (below). Among other things, Halidi, who had served briefly as prime minister in 1993, promised greater “friendship” with France if elected.

Leaders: Ibrahim Abderemane HALIDI (Secretary General and 2006 candidate for president of the Union), Saïd HILALI.

Rally for a Development Initiative with Enlightened Youth (Rassemblement pour une Initiative de Développement avec une Jeunesse Avertie—RIDJA). Launched in April 2005 by Saïd Larifou, a prominent lawyer who had led antigovernment protests in 2003, the RIDJA was a vocal opponent of efforts to rewrite the constitution to permit President Azali to run for another term. The RIDJA candidate for the presidency of the Union in 2006, Chadhouli Abdou, finished seventh with 3.12 percent of the vote in the primary.

Leaders: Saïd LARIFOU, Chadhouli ABDOU (2006 candidate for president of the Union).

Djawabu Party. This party’s candidate, Yousouf Saïd SOILHI, won 6.7 percent of the vote in the 2002 primary election for president of the Union. In 2006 the party supported Ibrahim Halidi of the MPC in his campaign for president of the Union.

Camp of the Autonomous Islands (Camp des Îles Autonomes—CdIA). Launched by the five parties below and other smaller groups, the CdIA campaigned for the island and assembly elections in 2004 on a platform calling for greater autonomy for the islands and support for the three island presidents. On the island of Ngazidja, the coalition is commonly referenced as Autonomy (Mdjidjengo).

The CdIA dominated the 2004 balloting for the Assembly of the Union, capturing 12 of the 18 directly elected seats and all of the 15 indirectly elected seats. However, references to the CdIA subsequently declined significantly, suggesting that its mission had been purely electoral. Components of the CdIA endorsed various candidates in the April 2006 primary election for president of the Union, although the three island presidents endorsed Ahmed Abdallah Mohamed Sambi in the May final balloting.

Leaders: Mohamed Saïd FAZUL (President of Mwali), Abdou Soule ELBAK (President of Ngazidja), and Col. Mohamed BACAR (President of Nzwani).

Movement for Democracy and Progress (Mouvement pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—MDP). The MDP, also styled the Popular Democratic Movement (Mouvement Démocratique Populaire), is a Moroni-based formation that was awarded the production and industry portfolio in the cabinet of May 1992 and campaigned in favor of the 1992 constitution. It later became the leading element of an anti-Djohar alliance called the Forum for National Recovery (Forum pour le Redressement National—FRN), of which MDP leader Abbas Djoussouf was the principal spokesman.

The FRN was originally launched in January 1994 by opposition parties that had presented joint lists at the December 1993 elections. President Djohar’s eventual agreement to a transfer of power served to relax FRN discipline, in that a majority of its components put up candidates for the March 1996 presidential contest in their own right. Following the 1996 election, parties that had supported the failed candidacy of Djoussouf reorganized under the FRN rubric. In October the group was bolstered by the addition of the Chuma and the Forces for Republican Action (Forces pour l’Action Républicaine—FAR), which had rejected President Taki’s call for the establishment of a single presidential party. Subsequently, the FRN organized boycotts of both the October 20 constitutional referendum and the December legislative balloting.

On January 18, 1997, Djoussouf and Mustapha Saïd CHEIKH were detained and questioned about their roles in the unrest that had erupted at the beginning of the year. On March 1 senior French government officials met with FRN leaders in an effort to persuade them to establish a dialogue with the Taki administration. However, the opposition's relations with the government subsequently worsened when security officials accused the FRN of financing student disturbances in Moroni. Ironically, observers cited the FRN's financial difficulties as the main reason the group failed to secure a more prominent negotiating role in the late 1997 reconciliation talks.

Djoussouf was appointed prime minister in November 1998, and he subsequently formed an FRN-dominated cabinet. Not surprisingly, he strongly protested the April 1999 coup, announcing the withdrawal of the MDP from the FRN when it appeared that some FRN components had acquiesced to the government of self-proclaimed President Azali. Djoussouf subsequently became the dominant figure in the opposition camp as it participated in negotiations on the creation of a new federal structure; he signed the Fomboni Agreement of February 2001 in that capacity and urged his supporters to vote "yes" in the December constitutional referendum. Djoussouf finished fourth in the primary election for president of the Union in 2002 by securing 7.9 percent of the vote, analysts suggesting he probably would have made the top three and thereby qualified for the runoff if the FRN had been preserved.

Leaders: Abbas DJOUSSOUF (1996 and 2002 presidential candidate), Fouad Mohamed AHMED.

was formerly an exile group led, within the Comoros, by its secretary general, Mustapha Saïd Cheikh, who was imprisoned for complicity in the 1985 coup attempt until President Abdallah's assassination. It was one of the opposition groups invited to participate in the Djohar administration of August 1990. Subsequently, it campaigned in favor of the 1992 constitution and was a leading component of the FRN.

Some FDC members supported the government of President Azali following the April 1999 coup and were expelled from the party.

Cheikh won 3.4 percent of the vote in the primary election for president of the Union in 2002 and subsequently served as a major founding member of the CdIA.

Leaders: Mustapha Saïd CHEIKH, Ahmed Saïd ALI, Abdou MHOUMADI (2002 candidate for president of Grande Comore), Abdallah HALIFA (Secretary General).

Islands' Fraternity and Unity Party (Chama cha Upvamodja na Mugnagna wa Massiwa—Chuma). Chuma resulted from a "patriotic alliance to fight the antidemocratic regime of Ahmed Abdallah" that had been formed in the 1980s by the Paris-based National Committee for Public Salvation (Comité National de Salut Public—CNSP), an exile group led by Prince Saïd Ali Kemal, and two other exile groups, the Comoran National United Front (Front National Uni des Komores—FNUK) and the Union of Comorans (Union des Komoriens—Unikom). Kemal headed the economy and trade ministry in the first Djohar administration.

Chuma did not immediately adhere to the FRN, since Kemal was abroad at the time of the FRN's creation. Having stood unsuccessfully in the March 1996 presidential election, Kemal was appointed to the first post-Djohar government, but he was dismissed in August for opposing President Taki's proposal for a merger of government parties. Subsequently, Chuma announced that it was aligning with the FRN.

Kemal urged his supporters to vote “no” in the constitutional referendum of December 2001, arguing that the proposed federal structure would lead to the “Balkanization” of the Comoros. Kemal finished third in the primary election on Grande Comore for president of the Union in March 2002 with 10.8 percent of the vote; he called for a boycott of the runoff in April. Chuma supported Ibrahim Halidi of the MPC in the 2006 balloting for president of the Union, Kemal serving as one of Halidi’s vice-presidential running mates.

Leaders: Prince Saïd Ali KEMAL (1996 and 2002 presidential candidate).

National Rally for Development (Rassemblement National pour le Développement—RND). The RND was officially launched on October 6, 1996, as a formal merger of the National Union for Democracy in the Comoros (Union National pour la Démocratie aux Comores—UNDC) and a number of former FRN parties under the leadership of a confidante of Mohamed Taki, Ali Bazi Selim. The formation of a single “presidential” party was first proposed by (then) newly elected President Taki in August 1996 on the grounds that almost all of the eliminated first-round candidates had supported his candidacy in the runoff balloting.

Subsequent intraparty competition for the RND’s 26 elected Central Committee seats was described as “fierce,” and the results—14 seats for Selim’s supporters and 12 for a “youth wing” led by Abdoul Hamid Affretane—underlined reports of deep divisions in the fledgling grouping. Additional seats were set aside for the general secretaries of the parties joining the RND as well as for what was described as the Comoran “diaspora.” Thereafter, despite the RND’s electoral success at December 1996 legislative balloting, observers reported that its members’ support for Taki remained their only commonality.

In November 1998 the RND denounced the appointment of the FRN’s Djoussouf to the top government post. Subsequently, the RND’s cabinet representation fell to four seats, and in early 1999 two former RND members were appointed to the government (see Maecha Bora Party, below).

One faction of the RND reportedly backed the new administration of President Azali after the coup of 1999, while another, led by Omar Tamou, lobbied for the reinstatement of former interim president Massonde. Mtara MAECHA, the former foreign minister who secured 7.86 percent of the vote in the primary election on Ngazidja for president of the Union, was identified as the candidate of the RND’s “revival wing.” Maecha reportedly supported Ahmed Abdallah Mohamed Sambi in the May 2006 balloting for president of the Union.

Leaders: Ali Bazi SELIM (President of the Party), Abdoul Hamid AFFRETANE (Secretary General, “Revival Wing”), Mouni MADI, Mouazoir ABDALLAH.

Comoran Party for Democracy and Progress (Parti Comorien pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—PCDP). The PCDP is led by Ali Mroudjae, who was an Udzima leader prior to President Abdallah’s assassination and subsequently held the production and industry portfolio under Djohar. The party joined Udzima in moving into opposition in November 1991. Mroudjae secured 4.2 percent of the vote in the primary election of president of the Union in 2002. Abdou Soule Elbak, the President of Ngazidja, is a former deputy in the PCDP and is still referenced regularly as a member of the party. Meanwhile, several members of the PCDP serve in Elbak’s cabinet on Ngazidja. Adinane was the candidate of the PCDP in the 2006 primary for Union president, but he received less than 3 percent of the vote and did not qualify for the general election.

Leaders: Loufti ADINANE (Chair), Ali MROUDJAE (Secretary General).

Maecha Bora Party. Maecha Bora is led by two RND dissidents, Issoufi Saïd Ali and 1996 presidential candidate Ali Ben Ali, who were named to the Djoussouf government in early 1999.

Leaders: Issoufi Saïd ALI, Ali Ben ALI (1996 presidential candidate).

Comoran Popular Front (Front Populaire Comorien—FPC). Also known as the Front Populaire Mohélien (FPM), the FPC was awarded the education portfolio in the government of May 1992 and campaigned for the new constitution; it later joined the FRN.

Mohamed Hassanali, leader of the FPC, was the leading vote-getter in the first round of balloting for president of Mwali in 2002 with 26.2 percent of the vote; however, he was defeated in the runoff.

Leaders: Mohamed HASSANALI, Abdou MOUSTAKIM (Secretary General).

Comoran Union for Progress (Union Comorienne pour le Progrès—UCP/Udzima). Launched as a regime-supportive group in 1982 by President Abdallah, Udzima was the sole legal party until 1989. Udzima presented Saïd Mohamed Djohar, interim president following Abdallah's assassination in November 1989, as its official candidate in the presidential balloting of March 1990. However, Udzima withdrew its support from Djohar in November 1991 and moved into opposition in protest over the formation of a coalition administration three months earlier. It did not participate in the 1992 balloting after its principal leaders had been either imprisoned or driven into hiding because of alleged complicity in the September coup attempt.

A member of the opposition FRN from January 1994, Udzima experienced internal divisions after President Djohar had agreed to a transfer of power, with the result that two candidates (Omar Tamou and Mtara Maecha) from Udzima stood in the March 1996 presidential election. Although both were eliminated in the first round, the Udzima leader, Tadjidine Ben Saïd Massonde, was appointed prime minister by the successful UNDC candidate. Massonde resigned as prime minister in December 1996, but he was named, due to his position as president of the High Council of the Republic, as interim president of the Republic following President Taki's death in November 1998. Confusion subsequently surrounded Udzima's membership, as news reports referenced Massonde, Tamou, and Maecha as being members of the RND in 1999. In early 2002, Tamou, former Udzima secretary general, returned to the Comoros after two years in France.

Republican Party of the Comoros (Parti Républicain des Comores—PRC). The PRC was formed in the second half of the 1990s by Mohamed Saïd Abdallah Mchangama, then president of the Federal Assembly, and Hamada Madi "Bolero," who served as PRC secretary general until rallying to the cause of President Azali following the coup of April 1999. Mchangama, the son-in-law of former president Djohar, had been instrumental in the launching of the Rally for Democracy and Renewal (Rassemblement pour la Démocratie et le Renouveau—RDR) in December 1993 by merger of the Dialogue Proposition Action (Mwangaza), led by Mchangama, and dissidents from other parties. Personal rivalries had resulted in three prominent RDR members, including Mchangama, contesting the March 1996 presidential election, all being eliminated in the first round.

Mchangama called for dialogue with the Azali administration following the coup of April 1999, but the PRC was described as a member of the opposition in early 2001.

Leader: Mohamed Saïd Abdallah MCHANGAMA.

Other parties include the Rally for Change (Rassemblement pour le Changement), led by Mohamed ZEINA, described as being close to the center-right Rally for the Republic in France; Shawiri, based in Moroni and led by Col. Mahamoud MRADABI; and Shawiri-Unafasiya (SU), formed in 2003 by former members of Shawiri and led by Hadji Ben SAID.

Separatist and Other Groups

Anjouan People's Movement (Mouvement du Peuple d'Anjouan—MPA). The MPA emerged as the most prominent of the secessionist groups in Anjouan after the arrest of its leader, Abdallah IBRAHIM (a prominent businessman), on July 22, 1997, served as a rallying cry for antipresidential and separatist militants. Ibrahim was released days later, and on August 5 he was named president of the “State of Anjouan” (later changed to Nzwani). The MPA lobbied against the Union constitution of December 2001. In February 2002 it named Col. Mohamed Bacar, then the military ruler of Nzwani, as MPA honorary chair. Following Bacar’s election to the presidency of Nzwani in March, some elements of the MPA joined the island government, and two MPA members were appointed to the nine-member Nzwani cabinet. Bacar emerged as the most vocal proponent of autonomy for the islands. However, other members of the MPA remained staunch secessionists and denounced Bacar for even his limited cooperation with the Union government. Abdallah Mohamed emerged as the leader of the hard-line secessionist wing of the party. In 2005 Mohamed and other members of the MPA were arrested for antigovernment activity.

Leaders: Abdullah MOHAMED (Leader of Separatist Faction).

Organization for the Independence of Anjouan (Organization pour l’Indépendance d’Anjouan—OPIA). Theretofore a propresidential grouping, the OPIA in late 1996 grew critical of the Taki administration and was subsequently linked to the growing number of antigovernment demonstrations in Anjouan. In mid-1997 leadership of the OPIA reportedly shifted from former armed forces chief of staff Col. Ahmed Mohamed HAZI to Mohamed Ahmed Abdou. Critics of Abdou, who has also been identified as a spokesman for the Coordination Committee of Anjouan, accused him of placing his personal ambitions ahead of the movement’s. The OPIA steadfastly maintained its separatist stance into mid-2002, although subsequent references to OPIA activity have been very limited.

Leader: Mohamed Ahmed ABDOU.

Legislature

The 1992 constitution provided for a bicameral legislature. However, the Senate, which was to have 15 members (5 from each island) indirectly elected to six-year terms, was never named and was abolished by the 1996 basic charter. Prior to the April 1999 coup, legislative authority was vested in a Federal Assembly (Assemblée Fédérale), which comprised 43 members directly elected for four-year terms (subject to dissolution).

Under the December 2001 constitution, an Assembly of the Union was established as well as assemblies for each of the three islands that comprise the Union.

Assembly of the Union (Assemblée de l'Union). The assembly comprises 33 members—18 directly elected (9 from Ngazidja, 7 from Nzwani, and 2 from Mwali) and 15 indirectly elected by the 3 island assemblies (5 each). In the direct balloting on April 18 and 25, 2004, the Camp of the Autonomous Islands (CdIA) secured 12 seats, and the propresidential Convention for the Renewal of the Comoros, 6. All 15 indirectly elected seats were filled by the CdIA, anti-Azali coalitions having earlier won heavy majorities in all three island assemblies.

Speaker: Saïd Dhoifir BOUNOU.

Communications

Press

The nation's print media includes two weeklies, the state-owned Al Watwan (1,500) and the independent L'Archipel. A new daily, Le Matin, was introduced in March 2002. There is also a monthly, La Tribune de Moroni. The editor of L'Archipel was detained by the government for three days in March 2006 following the publication of an article critical of security officials. The arrest prompted an outcry from international media watchdogs.

News Agency

The domestic facility is the Agence Comores-Presse (ACP), located in Moroni.

Broadcasting and Computing

The government-operated Radio-Comores served some 96,000 receivers in 1999. The country's first independent radio station, Radio Tropiques FM, was closed down after one week of transmission in April 1991 and again in July 1993, at which time its director was arrested for "disturbing the peace." The one remaining independent outlet, Udzima's Voix des Îles, was silenced in February 1994, although news bulletins from Radio France Internationale began transmitting via satellite in March, and a number of new independent stations were subsequently launched. However, the Union and island governments continued to censor private stations, one station being suspended in 2005 after broadcasting programs critical of the government. In 1989 the French government provided 5 million francs for construction of the islands' first television station, which in 2003 served some 3,000 households. There were approximately 5,000 personal computers serving an equal number of Internet users in 2003.

DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF THE CONGO

République Démocratique du Congo

Note: In the first round of presidential balloting on July 30, 2006, President Joseph Kabila, running as an independent but supported by the People's Party for Reconstruction and Democracy and some 30 other parties in the Alliance for a Presidential Majority (Alliance pour la Majorité Présidentielle—AMP), was credited with 45 percent of the vote. Second place (20 percent of the vote) went to Vice President Jean-Pierre Bemba, the candidate of the Movement for the Liberation of the Congo and some 23 other parties aligned in the Rally of Congolese Nationalists (Regroupement des Nationalistes Congolais—RENACO). The runoff was scheduled for October 29, although the announcement of the first-round results (characterized as fraudulent by Bemba and other candidates) triggered violent demonstrations in Kinshasa. Meanwhile, preliminary results from the July 30 voting for the 500-seat National Assembly indicated that the AMP had secured approximately 224 seats, followed by RENACO, approximately 100 seats; the Unified Lumumbist Party, approximately 34 seats; the Coalition of Congolese Democrats, approximately 30 seats; and the Congolese Rally for Democracy, approximately 15 seats.

The Country

Known prior to independence as the Belgian Congo and variously thereafter as the Federal Republic of the Congo, the Democratic Republic of the Congo (for the first time), Congo-Kinshasa, and Zaire, the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC) is situated largely within the hydrographic unit of the Congo River basin, in west-central Africa. The second-largest of the sub-Saharan states, the equatorial country is an ethnic mosaic of some 200 different groups. Bantu tribes (Bakongo, Baluba, and others) represent the largest element in the population, about half of which is Christian. Among the rural population, women are responsible for most subsistence agriculture, with men the primary cash-crop producers; in urban areas women constitute more than a third of wage earners, most of whom also engage in petty trade on the black market to supplement family income.

The DRC has major economic potential based on its great natural wealth in mineral resources, agricultural productivity sufficient for both local consumption and export, and a system of inland waterways that provides access to the interior and is the foundation for almost half of the total hydroelectric potential of Africa. Mineral extraction dominates the economy: cobalt and copper, diamonds, tin, manganese, zinc, silver, cadmium, gold, and tungsten are among the commercially exploited reserves. Offshore oil began flowing in late 1975, while important agricultural products include coffee, rubber, palm oil, cocoa, and tea. Despite these assets, per capita income is one of the lowest in Africa, and the economy has for some years hovered on the brink of disaster. Consequently, infant mortality is high, and primary and secondary education is poor. In addition, universities, once among the continent's finest, are currently neglected, while the country (nearly the size of Western Europe) remains largely devoid of roads outside the major cities.

The International Monetary Fund (IMF) and World Bank provided assistance in the early 1990s in response to government austerity measures and liberalization of the investment code. However, in June 1994 the IMF suspended Zaire's voting rights and called on the Mobutu administration to take steps to eliminate its debt arrears. Corruption charges against regime members and a counterfeiting scandal overshadowed Zaire's economic adjustment efforts in the second half of 1994, and on December 31 the government announced that its foreign reserves had dwindled to two thousand dollars and "a few Swiss francs." At the time of the rebel takeover of Kinshasa in May 1997 the economy was in collapse, and the new government immediately announced its intention to focus on rebuilding and expanding the country's infrastructure. Despite barriers such as the DRC's $14 billion external debt, Western investors reportedly expressed eagerness to participate in development, the administration having proclaimed its intention to incorporate free-market practices in its economic system despite President Laurent Kabila's former Marxist orientation. However, in early 1998 the IMF suspended its loan program after Kabila reneged on a pledge to resume debt payments. Subsequently, economic issues were relegated to the background when civil war broke out in August (see Political background, below). Real GDP fell by 5.6 percent in 1997, 1.6 percent in 1998, 10.4 percent in 1999, and 4.3 percent in 2000. Real annual per capita GDP had declined to $85 by the end of 2000 from $224 in 1990. The alarming situation was also marked by hyperinflation (107 percent in 1998, 70 percent in 1999, and 554 percent in 2000), an estimated 2 million internally displaced persons, and some 350,000 refugees from other countries.

Increased mineral (primarily diamonds) and oil exports helped foster GDP growth of 3 percent in 2002 and 5 percent in 2003. The IMF and World Bank approved a reduction of some 80 percent of the DRC's external debt in 2003, and continued economic improvement was expected in the wake of the partial conclusion of the five-year civil war in 2003 and the installation of a transitional national unity government. However, overall international economic and humanitarian aid remained minimal as the world diverted its attention from what the UN called one of the globe's "worst human crises." (An estimated 3–4 million people had died as the result of the recent civil war, mostly from conflict-related disease and starvation. In addition, one-fifth of the country's children were dying by the age of five, contributing to "1,200 unnecessary deaths per day," while 1.6 million people remained internally displaced, mostly in the "lawless" east.)

GDP grew by nearly 7 percent in 2004, and additional debt relief was subsequently promised by the government's commercial creditors. The IMF and World Bank also pledged an additional $2.4 billion in aid, provided the administration combats corruption in the state-owned oil company and systemic graft throughout other sectors. The IMF also chided the government for spending too much on "security concerns" and too little on poverty-reducing programs.

Political Background

The priority given to economic rather than political development during Belgium's 75-year rule of the Congo contributed to an explosive power vacuum when independence was abruptly granted in June 1960. UN intervention, nominally at the request of the central government headed by President Joseph KASAVUBU, helped check the Political Status: Independent republic established June 30, 1960; one-party constitution of February 1978 modified in June 1990 to accommodate multiparty system; all government institutions dissolved on May 17, 1997, following rebel takeover of the capital, and executive, legislative, and judicial authority assumed the same day by a self-appointed president backed by the military; interim constitution providing for a transitional national government approved April 2, 2003, by various groups participating in the Inter-Congolese National Dialogue; new constitution endorsed by national referendum on December 18, 2005, and promulgated on February 18, 2006, providing for new national elections later in the year.

Area: 905,562 sq. mi. (2,345,409 sq. km.).

Population: 29,916,800 (1984C); 56,057,000 (2005E).

Major Urban Centers (2005E): KINSHASA (7,000,000), Mbuji-Mayi (1,300,000), Lubumbashi (1,275,000).

Official Languages: French. Kikongo, Lingala, Swahili, and Tshiluba are classified as “national languages.”

Monetary Unit: Congolese Franc (market rate July 1, 2006: 440.50 francs = $1US).

President: Joseph KABILA; appointed by the Legislative and Constituent Assembly–Transitional Parliament on January 24, 2001, and inaugurated on January 26 to succeed his father, Laurent Désiré KABILA (Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo-Zaire), who had died on January 18 of injuries suffered in an assassination attempt two days earlier; inaugurated as interim president on April 7, 2003, in accordance with peace agreement signed on April 2. [Note: New presidential elections, postponed several times in 2005 and the first half of 2006, were held on July 30, 2006. See headnote.]

Vice Presidents: Jean-Pierre BEMBA (Movement for the Liberation of the Congo), Abdoulaye YERODIA Ndombasi (People’s Party for Reconstruction and Democracy), Arthur Z’ahidi NGOMA (Forces of the Future), and Azarias RUBERWA Manywa (Congolese Rally for Democracy); inaugurated on July 17, 2003, in accordance with peace settlement signed in April.

centrifugal effects of factionalism and tribalism and preserve the territorial integrity of the country during the troubled early years, which witnessed the removal and death of its first prime minister, Patrice LUMUMBA, and the gradual collapse of separatist regimes established by Albert KALONJI in Kasai, Moïse TSHOMBE in Katanga (now Shaba Region), and Antoine GIZENGA in Stanleyville (now Kisangani). The withdrawal of UN peacekeeping forces in 1964 did not mark the end of political struggle, however, with Tshombe, who was appointed interim prime minister in July, and Kasavubu subsequently vying for power of what became (for the first time) the Democratic Republic of the Congo in August. On November 24, 1965, the commander of the army, Maj. Gen. Joseph D. MOBUTU, who had previously held control of the government from September 1960 to February 1961, dissolved the civilian regime and proclaimed himself president of the “Second Republic.”

During 1966 and 1967 Mobutu put down two major challenges to his authority by white mercenaries and Katangan troops associated with the separatist activities of former prime minister Tshombe. Pierre MULÉLÉ and Gaston N’GALO, leaders of the rebellion against the central government in 1963 and 1964, were executed in 1968 and 1969, respectively; Tshombe died in captivity in Algeria in June 1969. Other plots were reported in 1971, one of them involving former associates of Mobutu, who in 1970 had been directly elected (albeit as sole candidate) to the presidency following establishment of the Popular Movement of the Revolution (Mouvement Populaire de la Révolution—MPR). Shortly thereafter, in an effort to reduce tension and solidify national unity, Mobutu embarked upon a policy of “authenticity,” which included the general adoption of African names, and the country was officially redesignated the Republic of Zaire in October.

The country's Shaba Region was the scene of attempted invasions in March 1977 and May 1978 by rebel forces of the Congolese National Liberation Front (Front de la Libération Nationale Congolaise—FLNC) directed by a former Katanga police commander, Nathaniel MBUMBA. The first attack, repulsed with the aid of some 1,500 Moroccan troops airlifted to Zaire by France, was said to have failed because of Mbumba's inability to enlist the aid of other groups opposed to the Mobutu regime, particularly the Popular Revolutionary Party (Parti de la Révolution Populaire—PRP) of eastern Zaire, led by Laurent Désiré KABILA. In 1978, government forces were initially assisted by French and Belgian paratroopers, whose presence was defended as necessary to ensure the orderly evacuation of Europeans, and subsequently by a seven-nation African security force that was not withdrawn until July–August 1979.

The 1977 Shaba invasion was followed by a series of government reforms that included the naming in July of MPINGA Kasenda to the newly created post of first state commissioner (equivalent to prime minister) and the holding of direct elections in October to urban councils, to the National Legislative Council (Conseil Législatif National—CLN), and for 18 seats on the MPR Political Bureau. Having been reconfirmed by referendum as MPR president, Mobutu was invested for a second seven-year term as head of state on December 5.

In March 1979 the National Executive Council (cabinet) was reorganized, with André BOBOLIKO Lok'onga being named to replace Mpinga, who became permanent secretary of the MPR. Jean NGUZA Karl-I-Bond was designated first state commissioner on August 27, and Boboliko assumed the new position of party executive secretary. In April 1981 Nguza resigned while on a trip to Belgium, declaring that he would have been imprisoned had the announcement been made prior to his scheduled departure; N'SINGA Udjuu Ongwakebi Untube was named as his successor. N'singa was in turn replaced by Joseph Léon KENGO wa Dondo in a major government reorganization on November 5, 1982, following a single-party (but multiple-candidate) election to the CLN September 18–19.

Again presenting himself as the sole candidate, President Mobutu was reelected for a third seven-year term on July 27, 1984. Fifteen months later, on October 31, 1986, he announced that the post of first state commissioner had been abolished, Kengo wa Dondo being redesignated as foreign minister; however, the office was restored in the course of a major ministerial reshuffling in January 1987, with former finance minister MABI Mulumba being designated its incumbent. Mabi was in turn succeeded on March 7, 1988, by SAMBWA Pida Nbagui. In the fourth cabinet reshuffling of the year, Sambwa was removed on November 26 and Kengo returned to the post he had held 1982–1986.

On April 24, 1990, bowing to rising demands for social and political change, Mobutu announced an end to Zaire's one-party system: during the ensuing year the constitution would be revised to permit the formation of trade unions and at least two additional parties. One day later he named the incumbent secretary general of the Economic Community of Central African States, Vincent de Paul LUNDA Bululu, to succeed Kengo wa Dondo as head of a substantially restructured "transitional" government that was installed on May 4.

The euphoria generated by the prospect of a liberalized "Third Republic" quickly dissipated with continued repression of opposition activity and a presidential declaration that the launching of a limited multiparty system would not take place for at least two years. The result was a bloody confrontation at the University of Lubumbashi on May 11, 1990, during which more than 50 student protesters were reported to have been killed. The legislature responded in late June by altering the constitution to accommodate the regime's April promises and reduce Mobutu's powers. Domestic and international impatience with the government's economic and human rights policies nonetheless continued, and in late November the basic law was further amended in favor of "full" multiparty democracy. On December 31 the president pledged that both presidential and legislative elections, in addition to a referendum on yet another new constitution, would be held in 1991.

On March 3, 1991, most of the more than five dozen political parties issued a demand that the government call a National Conference to consider more extensive constitutional revision. A month later, President Mobutu set April 29 as the date for such a meeting, although the three leading opposition groups indicated that they would not participate. On May 2 the National Conference was postponed following the massacre of 42 opposition supporters by security forces; it was subsequently rescheduled, initially for July 10 and then for July 30. Meanwhile, on July 22 the regime announced that Étienne TSHISEKEDI wa Malumba, leader of the opposition Sacred Union (Union Sacrée) coalition, had agreed to become prime minister, and on July 25 MULUMBA Lukoji, who had been named on March 15 to succeed Lunda, was dismissed. However, under pressure from Sacred Union members, Tshisekedi denied that he had accepted the government's offer, and on July 27 Mulumba was returned to office.

The National Conference finally convened on August 7, 1991, but was suspended a week later after opposition delegates had walked out, protesting that they had been harassed by the police and that the meeting had been illegally packed with regime supporters. The conference reconvened on September 16 after Mobutu had agreed to grant it sovereign powers but was again suspended after a near-riotous first day. On September 29 Mobutu agreed to a reduction of presidential powers and formation of a cabinet dominated by the opposition. The next day Tshisekedi was elected prime minister, triggering a power struggle between the heads of state and government that prevented a scheduled resumption of the National Conference on October 2. On October 14 Tshisekedi secured acceptance of his cabinet nominees, but seven days later he was dismissed by Mobutu. Tshisekedi immediately challenged the legality of the action, and the Sacred Union refused the president's invitation to nominate a successor. Mobutu responded on October 23 by naming Bernadin MUNGUL Diaka, the leader of a small Sacred Union affiliate, to head a new government. Encountering an increasingly violence-prone public, the president on November 22 agreed to a Senegalese-mediated accord with the Sacred Union that stipulated that the next prime minister would be a mutual choice that would "of necessity, come from the ranks of the opposition." Thereupon, former prime minister Jean Nguza Karl-I-Bond, nominally an opposition leader but an opponent of Tshisekedi, presented himself as a candidate for the position and was immediately expelled from the Sacred Union. Apparently hoping to exploit the opposition's disarray, Mobutu disregarded the accord of three days before and designated Nguza as prime minister on November 25.

Mobutu's third seven-year term as president expired on December 4, 1991, but he refused to step down, insisting that he would remain in office until elections could be scheduled. On December 11 the National Conference reconvened, naming Laurent MONSENGWO Pasinya, the archbishop of Kisangani and an outspoken critic of Mobutu, as its president the following day.

On January 14, 1992, Prime Minister Nguza ordered suspension of the National Conference on the grounds that some of its decisions were "provoking a political crisis," and in early February he called for the convening of a smaller "national round table" to draft a new constitution and set a timetable for elections. On April 6 the conference resumed, and 11 days later it disregarded a government order by asserting its sovereign status. On June 21 President Mobutu again suspended the conference after it had begun debate on the choice of a new prime minister, insisting that such an appointment was a presidential prerogative. That objection notwithstanding, a "global comprehensive policy on transition" was reached on July 30, whereby Mobutu would remain in office for the duration of the interregnum, with former prime minister Tshisekedi being redesignated as head of government.

On August 29, 1992, Tshisekedi named a 21-member cabinet, which, unlike his previous short-lived administration, included no Mobutu associates or MPR members. On September 4 the ban on political demonstrations was lifted, and on September 19 the National Conference revealed details of a draft multiparty, parliamentary-style constitution that it promised to present for a referendum prior to general elections. Meanwhile, Mobutu announced that the MPR would "take no part in the government of national union" and that he too would be presenting a draft constitution. On October 5 Mobutu ignored the National Conference's August dissolution of the CLN, and, supported by the 20,000-strong Special Presidential Division (Division Spéciale Présidentielle—DSP), he reconvened the CLN for constitutional debate. However, with both Tshisekedi and National Conference president Monsengwo urging a boycott of the “rebellious” legislature, the proceedings were poorly attended and quickly halted.

On December 1, 1992, Mobutu ordered the dissolution of the Tshisekedi government and the National Conference. Thereafter, faced with the prime minister's refusal to step aside, the president ordered DSP troops deployed throughout the capital and released new 5-million zaïre notes, which he insisted were necessary to pay the army. Meanwhile, on December 6, the National Conference concluded its sitting, electing Monsengwo as head of a transitional legislature (the High Council of the Republic [Haut Conseil de la République—HCR]) and demanding that Mobutu abandon his efforts to dissolve the transitional government.

On January 7, 1993, Mobutu declared that he would ignore the HCR's “ultimatum” that he recognize the Tshisekedi government, describing the HCR as having been established “according to antidemocratic procedures.” Consequently, the HCR authorized the government to seek foreign intervention to force Mobutu to comply with its dictates and, after accusing Mobutu of “high treason” for “blocking the functioning of the country's institutions at every level,” declared its intent to begin impeachment proceedings. On January 20 Tshisekedi announced that he would include MPR members in a “reconciliation” cabinet, and the Sacred Union, announcing a unilateral truce, suspended its demonstrations in support of Mobutu's ouster. However, a new crisis erupted on January 28, when DSP troops attacked anti-Mobutu forces in the capital. On January 29 Belgium and France dispatched troops to protect their citizens, and within days more than 45 people were reported killed, including the French ambassador. On February 3 Belgium, France, and the United States issued a joint statement blaming Mobutu for the breakdown in public order and threatened to isolate the president unless he transferred his executive powers to the prime minister. Mobutu responded two days later by announcing the dismissal of Tshisekedi because of his “inability” to form a national unity government and initiated legal proceedings against him for offenses against state security. On February 9 the HCR, while reportedly chastising Tshisekedi for failing to form a government more acceptable to the president, rejected the dismissal order.

The HCR's efforts to initiate a dialogue between Mobutu and Tshisekedi collapsed on February 24, 1993, when soldiers surrounded the HCR building and demanded that the council recognize the new zaïre note. The siege ended on February 26 following Western diplomatic intervention, and on March 5 Mobutu met with Monsengwo. Although the two failed to reach agreement, Mobutu on March 9 inaugurated a “conclave of the last chance,” which, he claimed, had HCR support. On March 17 the conclave, which was boycotted by the HCR, named former Sacred Union spokesman Faustin BIRINDWA as prime minister. Birindwa, who had been expelled from the Sacred Union on March 1 for “political truancy,” was confirmed by Mobutu on March 29 at the opening of an extraordinary session of the CLN, which had been charged by the president to adopt a “Harmonized Constitutional Text” drafted by the mid-March conference.

On April 2, 1993, Mobutu, in an effort to bolster both his and the CLN's legitimacy, promulgated constitutional amendments establishing the CLN as a transitional institution equal in status to the HCR and confirming the president's right to appoint the prime minister. Concurrently, Birindwa announced a government highlighted by the appointment of Nguza as deputy prime minister for defense. On April 5 Sacred Union activists organized a general strike to protest Birindwa's action, and on April 9 Tshisekedi, who had rejected Birindwa's right to name a cabinet, presented his own reshuffled government, which was approved by the HCR on April 13. On May 7 the Birindwa government released an election timetable calling for a constitutional referendum on July 30 to be followed three months later by elections to choose among the competing governmental institutions. The HCR promptly disputed Birindwa's legal right to call a referendum and urged the opposition to boycott any such proceedings.

In mid-July 1993 the Mobutu regime announced that it had dispatched presidential guardsmen to Kasia, Kivu, and Shaba provinces to help quell ethnic violence that had reportedly claimed more than 3,000 lives. By August the number of casualties had reportedly doubled, eliciting charges by foreign observers that the president's forces were exacerbating the situation in an effort to slow the democratization process. Thereafter, negotiations in September between the regime-supportive Political Forces of the Conclave (Forces Politiques du Conclave—FPC) and the Sacred Union of Radical Opposition (Union Sacrée de l'Opposition Radicale—USOR), a successor to the Sacred Union, yielded a draft Constitutional Act of the Transition. However, efforts to finalize the accord remained stalled through the remainder of the year as the FPC continued to reject the USOR's demand that Tshisekedi's prime ministerial status be recognized, arguing that the National Conference's authority had been superseded by the HCR. Meanwhile, at a December 14 rally attended by former prime minister Nguza, Shaba governor Gabriel KUNGUA Kumwanza, in an action that evoked memories of the 1960 secession, declared the province's "total autonomy" from Zaire and reversion to its former name of Katanga.

On January 4, 1994, Mobutu issued an ultimatum to the deadlocked FPC and USOR leaderships, ordering them to implement the September 1993 agreement by January 12. Consequently, the two sides agreed on January 11 to the formation of a national unity government that included members from both Birindwa's and Tshisekedi's cabinets, thus precipitating Mobutu's January 14 dismissal of Birindwa and dissolution of the CLN and HCR. In addition, Mobutu directed the newly organized High Council of the Republic—Parliament of Transition (Haut Conseil de la République—Parlement de Transition—HCR-PT) to deliberate on the prime ministerial candidacies of Tshisekedi and Mulumba Lukoji, who was backed by moderate opposition parties. However, on January 17 Tshisekedi rejected Mobutu's right to dissolve the original HCR and called for a "dead city" general strike on January 19 (the date the new legislature was scheduled to convene).

On January 23, 1994, the HCR-PT held its inaugural meeting, and two days later it appointed Monsengwo as its president. Thereafter, on April 8 the HCR-PT endorsed a second transitional constitution act, inaugurating a 15-month transitional period to culminate in general elections. Although the new document was immediately endorsed by USOR "moderates," Tshisekedi and his supporters denounced it, declaring that a provision calling for the declaration of prime ministerial candidacies implied that the post was vacant; nonetheless, on April 19 Tshisekedi reportedly accepted the accord's terms. Following the HCR-PT's acceptance of the credentials of seven prime ministerial candidates (including Tshisekedi) on May 2, Tshisekedi's followers announced their intention to boycott the proceedings and rebuked their USOR coalition partners for nominating candidates to compete against Tshisekedi. Two weeks later, the split within the USOR was formalized when the Tshisekedi faction ousted a number of parties aligned with former prime minister Kengo wa Dondo's Union for the Republic and Democracy (Union pour la République et la Démocratie—URD). On May 13 the HCR-PT appointed a commission to "quickly" define the criteria for choosing a prime minister, and on June 11 it ratified a list of seven individuals that did not include Tshisekedi because "he had not made a proper application to be a candidate." On June 14 the HCR-PT restored Kengo wa Dondo as prime minister, and on July 6 Kengo wa Dondo named a new government. For his part, Tshisekedi insisted that he remained Zaire's legitimate prime minister.

In August 1994 Kengo wa Dondo announced the formation of two electoral preparation commissions and pledged to adhere to a transitional schedule calling for prompt elections. Two months later the USOR rejoined the HCR-PT, and on November 16 Kengo wa Dondo reshuffled his cabinet to allow USOR members to assume posts that had been set aside for them in July. Subsequently, already strained relations between Kengo wa Dondo and Mobutu further deteriorated when Mobutu refused to endorse Kengo wa Dondo's nominee to head the Central Bank of Zaire. Meanwhile, Kengo wa Dondo announced in mid-December that long overdue presidential and parliamentary elections, as well as a constitutional referendum, would be held in July 1995; however, in May 1995 the balloting was again postponed.

Subsequently, FPC interim president Mandungu BULA Nyati orchestrated a legislative alliance between his party and the USOR that on June 30, 1995, provided overwhelming support for a two-year extension of the political transition period and, on July 2, successfully forwarded a motion calling for the resignation of HCR-PT president Monsengwo. Thereafter, amid reports that the alliance was planning to force his ouster, Prime Minister Kengo wa Dondo invited the "whole spectrum of the political class" to hold a dialogue and reportedly sought opposition participation in the reshuffled government he named on July 23. However, his entreaties were rebuffed by the USOR, which described the new cabinet as "illegal."

In February 1996 Kengo wa Dondo ousted 23 cabinet ministers, including all remaining opposition sympathizers, and filled their slots with his supporters, thereby rejecting the FPC's call for a new division of cabinet portfolios. Underscoring the level of factionalization in Kinshasa, the prime minister's allies boycotted the inauguration of the National Elections Commission (Commission des Élections Nationales—CEN) on April 3, claiming that they had been excluded from leadership positions. Meanwhile, the CEN was charged with preparing for a constitutional referendum in December 1996, presidential and legislative elections in May 1997, and local balloting in June and July 1997.

In May 1996 fighting broke out between Banyamulenge Tutsis and Rwandan Hutu refugees in the eastern region of South Kivu. Tension had been escalating there since an estimated 700,000–1,000,000 Hutus had fled Rwanda to Zaire in 1994 following the takeover of Kigali by Tutsi military forces. Among the refugees were members of Interahamwe, the Hutu militia that had been implicated in the massacre of hundreds of thousands of Tutsis and Hutu "collaborators" in Rwanda in April 1994 (see article on Rwanda). The Hutu militants subsequently gained control of the camps in Zaire, providing a degree of security for the Hutu refugees, who feared reprisals from Tutsis on both sides of the border for the recent "genocide" in Rwanda. Conflict quickly developed between the refugees and the Banyamulenge Tutsis who numbered an estimated 400,000 in eastern Zaire, where their ancestors had migrated 200 years earlier and where they had achieved a high level of unofficial governmental autonomy. For their parts, the Rwandan government accused the Interahamwe of cross-border attacks in western Rwanda while the Zairean government claimed that Banyamulenge militants were being armed and trained in Rwanda.

On October 8, 1996, amid escalating hostilities in the region, the deputy governor of Kivu, citing a 1981 law stripping the Tutsis of their Zairean citizenship, ordered them to leave the country within a week or risk annihilation. Although the governor was immediately suspended for his comments, thousands of Tutsis fled the area. At the same time, the Banyamulenge fighters, now reportedly numbering 3,000, launched an offensive that resulted in the quick rout of the Hutu fighters from the refugee camps and the retreat of the Zairean troops.

On October 29, 1996, Kinshasa declared a state of emergency in North and South Kivu as theretofore sporadic firefights between Rwandan and Zairean regular forces escalated into intense cross-border shelling. Collaterally, Kinshasa accused the Rwandan and Ugandan governments of attempting to take advantage of the absence of President Mobutu, who continued to convalesce in France from the effects of cancer surgery in August. Meanwhile, the Tutsi rebels, now widely identified as associated with the Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo-Zaire (Alliance des Forces Démocratiques pour la Libération du Congo-Zaire—AFDL) and led by longtime anti-Mobutu guerrilla Laurent Kabila, continued to gain territory along Zaire's eastern border. Their numbers growing with the addition of militants from dissident ethnic groups, AFDL fighters reportedly faced little resistance from fleeing Hutus and Zairean troops (many of whom were accused of pillaging the towns they were assigned to protect).

Earlier, in Kinshasa on October 6, 1996, the HCR-PT had adopted a draft constitution that it pledged to present for a referendum in December. The proposed charter was immediately denounced by the USOR's Tshisekedi, who argued that the constitution produced by the 1991–1992 National Conference should be presented unaltered for referendum.

Thereafter, faced with continued AFDL advances, the HCR-PT on November 1 called for the expulsion of all Tutsis from Zaire. On November 2 the AFDL captured Goma, and on November 4 Kabila announced a unilateral cease-fire to allow international aid groups to facilitate the repatriation of the refugees, the bulk of whom (700,000) were reportedly massed near Mugunga. Amid international cries for the deployment of a military intervention force to stave off a humanitarian disaster, the AFDL on November 11 agreed to open a corridor for aid to reach the refugees and subsequently drove off the remaining Hutu militiamen in the area. Consequently, from November 15 to 19 more than 400,000 Hutu refugees, apparently convinced that it was now safer in Rwanda than in Zaire, flowed across the border, thus effectively dampening international support for the UN's military deployment plans (see Foreign relations, below).

On November 21, 1996, the AFDL declared an end to its cease-fire, and over the following several days it announced the appointment of its own officials to administrative positions in the Kivu regions. By early December the rebels had encircled Kisangani, Zaire's fifth-largest city, and reportedly controlled five large towns and a wide swath of territory. On December 17 a visibly ailing Mobutu returned to Kinshasa, and the following day he appointed a new chief of staff, Gen. Mahele Lioko BOKUNGU, and charged him with ending the rebellion. Mobutu met with a broad spectrum of political leaders on December 19 in an attempt to establish a government of national unity to confront the AFDL advance. However, Tshisekedi and his Union for Democracy and Social Progress (Union pour la Démocratie et le Progrès Social—UDPS) boycotted the meeting, effectively dooming its chances for success. Consequently, following a week of reportedly intense debate within the presidential circle, Mobutu on December 24 reappointed Kengo wa Dondo as prime minister.

The AFDL drive across Zaire proceeded quickly in early 1997, forcing a tide of Hutu refugees ahead of it, as demoralized Zairean troops offered little effective resistance to the rebels, who were substantially supported by Rwandan forces. (France, the last nation to drop a strong pro-Mobutu stance, described the AFDL as an “invading army.”) On March 23 Prime Minister Kengo wa Dondo resigned, although he accepted caretaker status pending establishment of a new government. In what appeared to be a desperate final effort at a political settlement that would preclude a humiliating surrender, Mobutu on April 2 appointed longtime foe Tshisekedi as prime minister, and a new cabinet was announced the following day, which included six spots reserved for the AFDL. Conflict between security forces and UDPS supporters subsequently broke out in Kinshasa, and Mobutu abruptly dismissed Tshisekedi on April 9, replacing him with Gen. Likulia BOLONGO, former defense minister, who named a cabinet dominated by the military on April 11.

With the international community calling for a negotiated settlement and establishment of a transitional government to avoid widespread bloodletting as the AFDL neared Kinshasa, Mobutu agreed to meet with Kabila and South African president Nelson Mandela on a boat moored off the Zairean coast on May 4. However, although Mobutu reportedly expressed a willingness to relinquish power to a transitional government, final arrangements for his departure were never settled. Mobutu ultimately fled Kinshasa for Togo (and eventually Morocco, where he died on September 7) at the last moment on May 16. Following a brief but murderous rampage by Mobutu loyalists against “traitors” in Kinshasa, AFDL forces entered the capital on May 17. Kabila, still located in the east, immediately declared himself president of the renamed Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC) and ordered all governmental institutions dissolved.

Kabila arrived in Kinshasa on May 20, 1997, and, after conferring with leaders of various political groupings, made the first appointments to his new cabinet on May 22. However, to the great dismay of long-standing Mobutu opponents, the new regime announced there would be no role for Tshisekedi, whose supporters immediately organized a protest demonstration. In view of the unrest, Kabila on May 26 ordered the suspension of all political party activity and banned mass gatherings of any sort. Surrounded by the presidents of Angola, Burundi, Rwanda, Uganda, and Zambia, Kabila took the presidential oath of office on May 29, having promised a referendum on a new constitution by the end of 1998 and new legislative and presidential elections by April 1999.

After 32 years of Mobutu's dictatorial rule, the populace initially appeared, for the most part, to welcome the AFDL forces as "liberators" in May 1997. Regional leaders also strongly endorsed the regime of President Kabila, reflecting their long-standing complaint that Mobutu had permitted their opponents to conduct rebel activity against them from Zaire. The support from Western capitals was somewhat more cautious, particularly as reports surfaced of the alleged massacre of Hutus by the AFDL during its march across the country. Concern on that front deepened throughout the year and into early 1998 as the administration appeared to stonewall a UN investigation. In addition, widespread domestic disenchantment was reported by early 1998, particularly in regard to the stifling of political party activity and the dismissive treatment accorded to the UDPS and former prime minister Tshisekedi, described as the most popular political figure in the country. Ethnic tensions also continued to simmer, as evidenced by anti-AFDL rebel activity in several regions and reported growing concern over the heavy Tutsi influence at all levels of the AFDL administration. For his part, Kabila argued that "outsiders" did not appreciate the difficulties facing the DRC and that it was appropriate for his government to concentrate on reconstruction and the restoration of order while proceeding at a moderate pace toward general elections in 1999.

In April 1998 the UN withdrew its investigators, asserting that the Kabila government had purposely blocked their inquiry. Meanwhile, relations deteriorated between the president and the Rwandan-backed Banyamulenge Tutsis who had guided him to power; furthermore, increasing ethnic unrest was reported in the provinces bordering Rwanda and Uganda. In late July, Kabila demanded that Rwanda withdraw all of its remaining forces (he had reportedly become convinced that Kigali was preparing to overthrow his government). On August 2 government soldiers stationed in the east were attacked by Banyamulenge rebel forces supported by Rwandan troops. Within days the rebels had opened a second front within striking distance of Kinshasa, and, at a mid-August summit in Goma, the anti-Kabila forces—now bolstered by the addition of "Mobutists" and other former Kabila supporters—formed the Congolese Rally for Democracy (Rassemblement Congolais pour la Démocratie—RCD). Meanwhile, the rebel forces continued to capture large swaths of territory and appeared prepared to launch a full-scale attack on Kinshasa; however, in late August Zimbabwean and Angolan troops fighting on behalf of Kabila launched a counteroffensive against the RCD, and soon thereafter Kabila's defenders (now including Namibia and Chad) had fought the rebels to a standstill.

Fierce clashes were reported throughout the end of 1998 and in early 1999, and concern grew among regional and international observers that the fighting would spread beyond the DRC's borders. Peacemaking efforts were stymied, however, by Kabila's refusal to negotiate with the RCD, which he had described as a front for Rwandan and Ugandan invasion forces.

A cease-fire agreement was signed in July 1999 at a meeting in Lusaka, Zambia, of the six countries then involved in the fighting in the DRC (Angola, Namibia, and Zimbabwe on the government side; and Rwanda and Uganda in support of differing RCD factions and increasingly in conflict with one another) as well as Jean-Pierre BEMBA, the “Mobutist” leader of an increasingly important rebel force backed by Uganda, called the Movement for the Liberation of the Congo (Mouvement pour la Libération du Congo—MLC). The Lusaka accord envisioned the withdrawal of all foreign troops from the DRC, the disarming of local militias under the supervision of a Joint Military Commission, and the eventual deployment of UN peacekeepers. The ruptured RCD (see Political Parties and Groups, below) signed the agreement in August, but renewed fighting quickly broke out between the RCD factions, both of which had repudiated the agreement by the end of the year. (Among other things, the RCD infighting served as a surrogate for the conflict between the forces from Uganda and Rwanda, each of whom was viewed in many quarters as participating in the exploitation of the DRC’s mineral wealth.) Nevertheless, in November the UN Security Council authorized the creation of the UN Organizational Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (Mission de l’Organisation des Nations Unies en République Démocratique du Congo—MONUC) to assist in monitoring any eventual peace settlement. (In February 2001 the Security Council authorized up to 5,000 personnel for MONUC.)

President Kabila was shot by one of his bodyguards on January 16, 2001, and was declared dead from the wounds two days later. (The motive for the attack and any possible related conspiracy remained unclear, the assailant having been shot to death immediately after the attack.) On January 24 Kabila’s son, Maj. Gen. Joseph KABILA, theretofore his father’s chief of staff, was selected by the transitional legislature (installed by Laurent Kabila in August 2000 [see Legislature, below]) to succeed his father. Joseph Kabila immediately called for an intensification of talks toward national reconciliation, and in February another tentative UN-brokered accord was reached. The following month the first MONUC forces arrived in the DRC, but the proposed withdrawal of other foreign troops was delayed, in large part due to Rwanda’s insistence that the Hutu militias be disarmed as a precondition to withdrawal. In April, Kabila appointed a new cabinet from which antinegotiation ministers were purged. Fighting, often intense, among RCD factions and between government forces and the rebels continued throughout 2001 and into early 2002 as peace talks inched toward a settlement.

In July 2002 the DRC and Rwanda finally reached a conclusive agreement providing for the withdrawal of the 20,000 Rwandan troops in the DRC starting in mid-September. Two months later a similar accord was struck with Uganda, setting the stage for intensification of talks (known as the Inter-Congolese National Dialogue) involving the government, domestic opposition parties, and rebel groups regarding a permanent resolution of the civil war. Under the weight of heavy international pressure, a potentially historic accord was signed in mid-December in Pretoria, South Africa, by Kabila, the RCD factions, the MLC, and representatives of opposition parties and civil society. The accord provided for a cease-fire and installation of a transitional government pending new national elections within 30 months. Power in the interim government was to be shared, with Kabila, as president, being assisted by four vice presidents and a transitional legislature, whose members would be selected, on a carefully allocated basis, by the signatories.

The warring factions approved a new interim constitution providing for the installation of Kabila’s national unity government in April 2003. Integral to the composition of the cabinet was the inclusion of the four vice presidents (see Vice Presidents, above). More than half of the cabinet members represented either opposition or rebel groups. In late June most of the former combatants agreed in principle to their integration into a unified national army in which power sharing was to be carefully delineated. The integration began in August, with Kabila appointing several former rebel commanders to prominent positions. Rebel groups, civil organizations, and opposition parties were also represented prominently in Kabila’s appointments in May 2004 to new provisional governments for the country’s ten regions and capital district.

On May 5, 2005, the transitional legislature approved the draft of a new constitution (see below for details) for consideration via national referendum, which on December 18 endorsed the new basic law with an 84 percent yes vote. President Kabila signed the new constitution into effect on February 18, 2006, and new national elections were planned for later in the year.

Constitution and Government

A constitution drafted under President Mobutu's direction and approved by popular referendum in 1967 established a strong presidential system, certain features of which were drastically modified by amendments enacted in August 1974. Decisions of the MPR's Political Bureau were made binding upon both executive and legislative branches, thus making the Political Bureau the supreme state organ, while the MPR chair was designated president of the republic. The trend toward synthesis of government and party institutions was further exemplified by the creation of a National Executive Council (whose members were restyled state commissioners), in effect a fusion of the former cabinet with the Executive Council of the MPR. These changes were affirmed in a new constitution promulgated on February 15, 1978, in which the party was characterized as "the Zairean Nation organized politically" with an ideological commitment to "Mobutism." Beginning in 1977 members of the CLN were elected every five years from a list of candidates approved by the MPR.

In April 1990 the president ordered a transition to a tripartite polity, which he hoped could be introduced without a return to the "tribal factionalism" that had prevailed during the 1960s. In late June the CLN approved constitutional amendments that provided for separation of the responsibilities of the head of state and government (including removal from the former of foreign-policy powers), the formation of trade unions, and the organization of two additional political parties. However, the three-party system was condemned by the opposition, and on November 23, amid growing unrest, the basic law was further amended to allow for the unlimited organization of political parties.

On September 19, 1992, the National Conference adopted a draft multiparty constitution that included provisions for the creation of a bicameral parliamentary system, the replacement of the zaïre with the franc, the disenfranchisement of the military, and the designation of four indigenous languages (Kikongo, Lingala, Swahili, and Tshiluba) as official languages.

After President Mobutu's attempts in October to revive the CLN for debate on an alternative draft constitution had proved futile, a "political conclave" of pro-Mobutu parties met in Kinshasa March 9–19, 1993, to draft a so-called Harmonized Constitutional Text, which was approved by the reconvened CLN on March 31 and promulgated by the president on April 2. It purported to override the mid-1992 dissolution of the CLN, establishing it as a transitional body on par with the presidency and the HCR. Furthermore, the Mobutu charter reconfirmed the president's right to appoint the prime minister while redirecting the government's accountability from the HCR to the president and CLN.

On May 7, 1993, the Birindwa government introduced an electoral timetable that included plans for a constitutional referendum on July 30. One week later, in response to confusion over which constitution would be voted on—the Harmonized Constitutional Text or the National Conference charter—the government announced that a special commission would be convened to draft a single text. On May 25 HCR chair Monsengwo denounced the referendum plans as "irregular and illegal." Subsequently, the referendum was rescheduled for October.

Negotiations between presidential and opposition party leaders in September 1993 resulted in the adoption of a draft Constitutional Act of the Transition (Acte Constitutionnel de la Transition). The act delineated a transitional governance system that included a diminished presidency, the absorption of the current memberships of the HCR and CLN into a restyled, 500-member High Council of the Republic–Parliament of Transition (see HCR-PT, under Legislature, below), and a cabinet empowered with central bank and military oversight. However, the act remained unratified until January 14, 1994. Subsequently, it was superseded by a second transitional charter drafted by the HCR-PT and signed by President Mobutu on April 8, 1994. The new document called for a 15-month transitional period that was to include a referendum on the new constitution and conclude, prior to the May 1995 postponement, with general elections.

On October 6, 1996, the HCR-PT adopted yet another draft charter that it pledged to present for referendum. The document included provisions for a federal state (styled the Federal Republic of Zaire), a two-chamber parliament, a popularly elected president, and an expansion of the number of regions from 10 to 26. However, no action was taken regarding the proposed charter in view of the government takeover of May 1997. President Laurent Kabila appointed a constitutional commission in September 1997 to produce a new draft basic law by the end of March 1998. The commission was expected to endorse a strong presidential system based on the U.S. model. On March 30, 1998, the commission reportedly adopted a draft basic charter that included provisions for the creation of an elective vice-presidential post, the establishment of an enhanced judiciary system topped by a Supreme Court, and the dissolution of the prime minister's post. Subsequently, President Kabila issued a decree authorizing the formation of a 300-member Legislative and Constituent Assembly, which upon inauguration was to be charged with preparing for a constitutional referendum and legislative elections. Although the assembly was inaugurated in August 2000, no action was taken on the proposed constitution prior to Kabila's death in January 2001, after which the nature of the country's next constitutional arrangements were a primary focus of discussions between the government and rebel forces regarding a permanent peace settlement.

An interim constitution providing for a transitional government was adopted in April 2004 by most of the participants in the Inter-Congolese National Dialogue. The bicameral transitional legislature established by that accord (see Legislature, below, for details) subsequently (in May 2005) approved a draft of a new permanent constitution that was endorsed by national referendum in December. The new basic law provides for a "semipresidential" system in which the prime minister will have greater authority than in the past. The president's term was set at five years, renewable once. The minimum age for presidential candidates was reduced to 30, a measure clearly inserted to permit current President Joseph Kabila (34) to run for the office. Presidential balloting was to be conducted by direct vote under a two-round (if necessary) majoritarian system. The president was mandated to appoint the prime ministerial candidate selected by the majority party (or coalition of parties needed to make a majority) in the National Assembly, the lower house of the new Parliament (see Legislature, below, for details on the Parliament).

The new constitution permitted the current transitional government to remain in place until new national elections were held. Other important aspects included provisions to protect freedom of religion, expression, and political pluralism and to strengthen the judiciary. Citizenship was extended to members of all ethnic groups that were residing in the country at the time of independence.

The new constitution also called for significant devolution of governmental authority to the provinces, the number of which were to be extended from 10 to 26 (including the capital "province" of Kinshasa). Provincial authority was to be shared by presidentially appointed governors and directly elected provincial assemblies. Provinces will be further subdivided into communes and cities. Judicial authority at the national level was invested in a Constitutional Court, a Court of Cassation, and a High Military Court.

Foreign Relations

The DRC has generally pursued a moderate line in foreign policy while avoiding involvement in non-African issues. Relations with Belgium, its former colonial ruler, were periodically strained following independence, partly because vocal anti-Mobutu factions were based in Brussels. However,

Belgium remained a major aid donor. Development efforts following independence led to enhanced economic ties with Japan, the United States, and Western European countries, especially France, which Kinshasa in 1986 called its new European “fountainhead.”

Relations with former French territories in central Africa have fluctuated. The Union of Central African States was formed with Chad in 1968, and more than 3,000 Zairean troops were sent to Chad in support of President Habré in 1983. In addition, Burundi and Rwanda joined Zaire in establishing the Economic Community of the Great Lakes Countries, the object being an eventual common market. Relations with Zambia have remained cordial despite a Zairean claim (resolved in 1987) to part of that country’s northern Kaputa and Lake Mweru districts. In the west, border incidents involving the Republic of the Congo have periodically erupted, while in the east Zairean troops were given permission by Kampala in July 1987 to cross into Ugandan territory to engage rebels associated with the Congolese National Movement (see Political Parties, below).

A lengthy cold war between Zaire and Angola was formally terminated as the result of a visit by Angolan President Neto to Zaire in August 1978 and a reciprocal visit by President Mobutu to Angola the following October. The latter concluded with the signing of a cooperation agreement between the two governments and a mutual pledge to proceed with the establishment of a commission under the Organization of African Unity (OAU, subsequently the African Union—AU) to guard against rebel violations from either side of the 1,250-mile common border. By 1987, however, it had become apparent that the United States was deeply involved in covert activities in the vicinity of the Belgian-built air base at Kamina in southern Zaire, with plans to remodel the facility for delivery of supplies to the Angolan rebel forces led by Jonas Savimbi. Such collusion notwithstanding, President Mobutu joined in April with the heads of state of Angola, Mozambique, and Zambia in concluding, in Luanda, a declaration of intent to reopen the Benguela railroad, which had effectively been closed by Angolan guerrilla operations since 1976.

In May 1982 Kinshasa announced that it was resuming diplomatic relations with Israel, reversing a rupture that had prevailed since the 1973 Arab–Israeli war. Earlier, President Mobutu had stated that the suspension was originally intended as a gesture of support for Egypt but was no longer justified in view of the return of the last of the occupied Egyptian territories in April, as provided by the 1979 peace treaty. In response, a number of Arab governments severed relations with Zaire, while regional leaders expressed concern at the Israeli “reentry” into Africa. In November, Israel’s defense minister, Ariel Sharon, flew to Zaire to conclude arrangements for the supply of arms and the training of Zairean forces, particularly a “presidential battalion” under Mobutu’s direct command. Further military-aid commitments were secured by Mobutu during a May 1985 visit to Israel, the regional backlash being tempered in 1986 by Zaire’s resumption of participation in the OAU after a two-year hiatus occasioned by the OAU’s admission of the Saharan Arab Democratic Republic.

In January 1989 President Mobutu, who had been strongly criticized in the Belgian press for financial aggrandizement, announced that he was abrogating agreements defining his country’s post-colonial relations with Belgium; in addition, Zaire would halt payments on its more than $1 billion Belgian debt and explore alternatives to shipping its minerals to Belgium for refining. However, the dispute was settled and relations normalized at midyear.

In May 1990 Mobutu, labeling Brussels the “capital of subversion,” rejected Belgian and European Community (EC, subsequently the European Union—EU) appeals for an international inquiry into the slayings at Lubumbashi University. Consequently, on May 24 Belgium halted aid payments, and, following Kinshasa’s decision to sever diplomatic links on June 22, Belgium withdrew a debt-cancellation pledge. In August the U.S. Lawyers’ Commission for Human Rights released a report describing Zaire’s human rights record as a “systematic pattern of abuses.” Subsequently, on November 5 the U.S. Congress voted to suspend military aid and redirect humanitarian aid through nongovernmental agencies.

On September 24, 1991, France and Belgium ordered their troops to Zaire to protect foreign nationals threatened by widespread rioting and looting. One month later France and Belgium announced their disengagement from Kinshasa and called for regional intervention. Mobutu responded by vowing to stay in power and accusing international forces of "wanting my head at any price." In November, U.S. officials described Mobutu as having "lost the legitimacy to govern" and called for the regime to begin sharing power with the opposition.

In June 1992 the government announced that it was seizing the assets of all foreign oil companies as a means of alleviating chronic fuel shortages. While officials insisted that the measure was only temporary and promised reimbursement, the companies argued that the action was equivalent to confiscation, given Zaire's lack of currency reserves.

The appointment of the Tshisekedi government in August 1992 paved the way for an end in October to a ten-month-old aid embargo by the EC, although the EC stated its intention to continue to withhold funding until it received guarantees that it would be channeled to the appropriate recipients. Subsequently, in early December 1992 Prime Minister Tshisekedi's Western supporters criticized President Mobutu's attempts to dissolve the government, with Belgium reportedly preparing for a possible military role; the likelihood of such intervention increased dramatically in mid-January 1993 after the HCR had granted the government authorization to seek foreign assistance in ousting the president. Thereafter, following the outbreak of widespread military rioting in Kinshasa, Belgian and French troops were deployed at Kinshasa to protect their citizens.

On February 3, 1993, Belgium, France, and the United States issued a joint statement that described Mobutu as the architect of Zaire's ruin, called for the president's resignation, and threatened "total political and economic isolation" of his regime if he refused to capitulate. In late February, Western diplomats continued to pressure Mobutu, warning him that he would be held personally responsible for the lives of the HCR members then being held captive in Kinshasa. The siege ended the following day.

Following the establishment of the Birindwa government in early April 1993, Mobutu's relations with Zaire's three largest donors deteriorated further. On April 7 the EC, which followed the lead of several of its members in repudiating the legal status of the new regime, reaffirmed its support for the Tshisekedi government, announced an embargo on arms sales to Zaire, and imposed visa restrictions on Mobutu and his allies. The Birindwa government responded by denouncing the "interference" in its internal affairs, expelling two Belgian diplomats, and, while rebuffing a CLN call to sever ties with the Europeans, warning against further Western action.

In September 1993 the Mobutu administration characterized as "tendentious" Amnesty International's release of a report critical of its human rights record. In February 1994 the international rights monitor accused the regime of continued complicity in human rights violations, charging the Mobutu-controlled military with responsibility for "indiscriminate executions." Moreover, international observers reporting on the plight of Rwandan refugees encamped along the Zairean border in mid-1994 accused Zairean troops of attacking refugees and confiscating their property. However, the Mobutu regime's support for French peacekeeping efforts in Rwanda was allegedly rewarded with an easing of international pressure on its domestic policies, and in mid-1994 France, Belgium, and the United States recognized the Kengo wa Dondo government.

On September 1, 1994, Zaire announced that the approximately 1.2 million Rwandan refugees in Zaire would have to leave by the end of the month. Although observers described the demand as unrealistic, it provoked renewed dialogue on the refugees' plight, and on October 24, Rwanda, Zaire, and the United Nations High Commission for Refugees (UNHCR) signed an agreement designed to facilitate their repatriation. However, during the first half of 1995 no further diplomatic progress was reported and conditions in the approximately 40 camps continued to deteriorate. On August 18, 1995, Zaire again ordered the expulsion of the refugees, citing rumors that both Rwanda and Burundi were preparing to attack the camps to suppress rebel groups. Within five days, 15,000 people were forcibly repatriated, while more than 100,000 others fled into the countryside. Pressured by the international community to end the expulsions, Kinshasa halted the program on September 7 and signed an accord with the UNHCR that, echoing the events of 1994, provided for the repatriation of the refugees by December.

Subsequently, in February 1996, Zairean troops, under UNHCR supervision, began sealing off the camps (in an effort to isolate them from the local communities) and urging the refugees to return home. The program was quickly abandoned, however, when the troops, demanding payment of salary arrears, left their posts.

Reportedly concerned about who would actually benefit from a militarily backed humanitarian aid program, as well as fearing involvement in a Somalia-like imbroglio, a number of regional and international capitals, including Washington, reacted warily toward a French- and Spanish-led call for foreign intervention in eastern Zaire in 1996. However, faced with the onset of what aid agencies predicted would ultimately be mass starvation, Canada, South Africa, and the United Kingdom had agreed to participate by November 11. Further bolstered by a U.S. commitment of 1,000 troops on November 13, the UN-sponsored, Canadian-led multinational force of 15,000 troops began deployment preparations on November 14. The efforts were suspended, however, following the subsequent mass repatriation of hundreds of thousands of refugees to Rwanda between November 15 and 19. Consequently, despite continued French lobbying for the dispatch of a military force, wide support for the plan dissipated, and at a meeting of the representatives of 29 countries and 6 aid agencies in Stuttgart, Germany, the operation was officially abandoned on November 22.

The DRC's foreign relations from 1998 to 2001 turned on the roles its neighbors played on both sides of the civil war that erupted in August 1998. Officially supporting the Kabila government with troops were Zimbabwe, Angola, Namibia, and Chad. In addition, Equatorial Guinea, Eritrea, Gabon, and Sudan expressed their sympathies with the DRC government but adopted far smaller roles in the dispute than did the aforementioned. On the side of the rebels, Rwanda and Uganda provided such a large amount of personnel and supplies that the Kabila administration accused them of invading DRC territory. To a lesser extent the insurgents were aided by Angolan rebels and supporters in Burundi. Noting the number of countries directly involved in the fighting, a Western official in late 1998 warned that the region was on the brink of the first "African world war."

Uganda had withdrawn its forces from the DRC by May 2003, and the two countries in 2004 agreed to cooperate in suppressing rebel groups on both sides of their border. However, relations with Rwanda remained strained, the DRC charging that Rwanda was still "stoking discontent" as of 2005.

In December 2005 the International Court of Justice (ICJ) ruled in favor of the DRC in regard to the case the DRC had filed charging Uganda with an "illegal incursion" into the DRC during the 1998–2003 conflict and the "plunder" of the DRC's natural resources. Uganda was ordered by the ICJ to pay reparations to the DRC, although a final amount was not determined. (The DRC was reportedly seeking $6–10 billion.) A similar DRC case against Rwanda remained under ICJ review as of early 2006.

Current Issues

An estimated 3–4 million people may have died in the 1998–2003 civil war, which had also destabilized the entire region. As of early 2005 the UN reported that sporadic but intense fighting in resource-rich areas of the country was still leading to the deaths of thousands of people per month. Although most major rebel groups had been integrated into the national army, small ethnic militias (often under the direction of local warlords) continued to terrorize the population. Meanwhile, the MONUC forces (whose mandate was extended to help train new police and security forces) suffered blistering criticism themselves for allegedly committing rapes while also failing to protect women from mass assaults by militiamen.

For his part, President Kabila was described in 2005 as “lurching from crisis to crisis,” having reportedly survived several coup attempts in 2004. In January 2005 the government announced that the new national elections tentatively scheduled for June 2005 would not be held until June 2006, prompting massive public protests (led in large part by the UDPS). The government defended its decision on the grounds that all militias needed to be disarmed before voting could take place. Difficulties in registering some 26 million prospective voters and implementing electoral procedures were also cited in the delay.

Despite charges of widespread corruption, continued conflict in the east, and ongoing miserable conditions for the average citizen, the transitional government survived for the rest of 2005, buoyed in part by the constitutional referendum in December. Government officials reported a turnout of 60 percent for the referendum vote, which EU observers described as free and fair. Few analysts challenged the official tally of an 84 percent yes vote, most major parties and factions (with the notable exception of the UDPS) having supported the new basic law as representing at least a chance for the country to put its seemingly interminable chaos behind it. Thirty-three presidential candidates were registered for the first round of presidential elections (most recently rescheduled for July 30, 2006), despite a controversial $50,000 registration fee. In addition, candidates from more than 200 parties registered for the assembly balloting, whose first round was also scheduled for July 30. However, serious concerns remained over the boycott by the UDPS of the polls and the apparent intention of rebel militias in the resource-rich east to disrupt the balloting. The force strength of MONUC (already the largest and most expensive such UN deployment) was increased to more than 17,000 peacekeepers and military police to help try to preserve order during the elections. The EU also promised to send 1,500 troops of its own to assist in oversight. The West was generally perceived as supportive of a potential presidential victory by Kabila, who held massive leads in public opinion polls, particularly when it became clear that Étienne Tshisekedi of the UDPS would not be a candidate. However, underscoring the fragility of the situation, the government announced in May that it had uncovered another coup plot. Meanwhile, the UN appealed for massive additional aid to deal with a humanitarian crisis the UN characterized, in a reference to the Indian Ocean death toll in late 2004, as a “tsunami every six months.”

Political Parties and Groups

All existing parties were outlawed in 1965. For the greater part of the next quarter century the only legal grouping was the Popular Movement of the Revolution (Mouvement Populaire de la Révolution—MPR). Established under General Mobutu’s auspices in April 1967, the MPR progressively integrated itself with the governmental infrastructure. The formation in 1980 by a number of parliamentarians of the opposition Union for Democracy and Social Progress (UDPS) was countered by the MPR, which effectively co-opted most of the UDPS domestic leadership and severely repressed the remainder.

In April 1990 the president announced that the MPR, the UDPS, and one other party would be granted legal status during a “transitional period” culminating in a multiparty election in December 1991. Thereupon, more than 60 groups presented themselves for the remaining legal party position. However, in the face of manifest dissatisfaction with the pace and breadth of his reform program, Mobutu reversed himself in October and lifted the numeric restriction; as a result, 28 parties were registered by January 31, 1991, the applications of 94 others having been rejected as “incomplete.”

An additional 38 parties were registered by mid-February, a majority of which were reportedly sympathetic to the MPR, and by March 30 a total of 58 parties had accepted the government's terms for the National Conference scheduled to convene on April 29. Meanwhile, however, leaders of the Sacred Union (Union Sacrée), an opposition coalition that included the influential UDPS, Union of Federalists and Independent Republicans (UFERI), and Democratic and Social Christian Party (PDSC), announced plans to boycott the conference, refused to recognize the recently named transitional government, and called for President Mobutu's resignation. Thereafter, while the 159 parties registered for the May 3–19 National Conference preparatory committee were described as largely proregime, Mobutu's continued reluctance to enact reforms had begun to alienate many groups, and by midyear the Sacred Union was credited with a membership of approximately 150 parties. The Sacred Union adopted the rubric of the Sacred Union of the Radical Opposition (Union Sacrée de l'Opposition Radicale—USOR) in 1993. (For an extensive history of the USOR, defunct as of 1998, see the 1999 Handbook.)

Governmental authority was taken over in May 1997 by Alliance of Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Congo-Zaire (Alliance des Forces Démocratiques pour la Libération du Congo-Zaire—AFDL), a predominantly Tutsi grouping of three rebel factions and the ADP (see RCD, below) that had been formed in November 1996 under the leadership of Laurent Kabila, a non-Tutsi “Lumumbist” who had been linked to anti-Mobutu militant groups since the 1960s. (For more information on the AFDL, which was dissolved by Kabila in 1999, see the 2005–2006 Handbook.) The AFDL immediately suspended all political party activity indefinitely, but President Kabila in late January 1999 lifted the ban on the formation of new political parties without, however, addressing the status of the previously existing parties. Moreover, the requirements for registering new parties demanded organizational and financial resources beyond most prospective groupings, while restrictions (such as a ban on any parties with connections to international organizations) also served to preclude participation.

Joseph Kabila ordered the barriers to party activity lifted in May 2001, and more than 150 parties had reportedly registered by the end of the year. However, in many cases, it was impossible to determine if the new parties were in fact positioned to genuinely affect domestic affairs.

In March 2004 Kabila signed a new law designed to grant parties access to media and provide them with state grants. The law also barred parties from involvement in fighting or military actions against the government. By 2005 more than 400 parties had reportedly registered with the Central Election Commission, with some 213 reportedly presenting candidates for the legislative balloting scheduled for 2006.

During the negotiations for the Pretoria Accord of 2002, 15 of the largest opposition political parties formed an alliance called the Opposition General Assembly (OGA) to coordinate strategy and priorities. As a result of the discussions, one of the four vice-presidential posts was designated for Arthur Z'ahidi NGOMA (Forces of the Future), the president of the OGA. Ngoma's appointment was opposed by some opposition parties, while other groups later became dissatisfied with his performance and called for his resignation. The result was a fracturing of the OGA.

Proresidential Party

People's Party for Reconstruction and Democracy (Parti du Peuple pour la Reconstruction et la Démocratie—PPRD). Formed in March 2002, the PPRD, composed mainly of former regime supporters and members of the government, was seen primarily as a political vehicle for President Joseph Kabila. Kabila initially asserted that he was not formally a member of the party, and, even though press reports routinely referenced him as the PPRD presidential candidate in 2006, Kabila announced that he would officially run as an independent in order to be the candidate of “all the Congolese people.”

Leader: Vital KAMERHE (Secretary General).

Other Parties and Groups

Union for Democracy and Social Progress

(Union pour la Démocratie et le Progrès Social—UDPS). The UDPS was the outgrowth of an effort in late 1980 to establish an opposition party within Zaire dedicated to the end of President Mobutu's "arbitrary rule." Subsequently, the government arrested, sentenced, and eventually amnestied a number of its members. The leadership was thrown into disarray in late 1987 when UDPS President Frédéric KIBASSA Maliba and several other prominent party members joined the Central Committee of the MPR (below) following a meeting with President Mobutu in which an agreement was reportedly reached to permit the UDPS to operate as a "tendency" within the governing formation. However, other leaders, including Secretary General Etienne Tshisekedi wa Malumba, vowed to remain in opposition and press for creation of a multiparty system, accusing government security forces of continuing to imprison and torture UDPS adherents.

During a visit to the United States in November 1990, Tshisekedi declared, "The people of Zaire are demanding that he [Mobutu] must go," and, following the party's official registration on January 16, 1991, he announced his presidential candidacy. Thereafter, the party stated that it would boycott any national conference not granted sovereign status and would refuse to join in a transitional government as long as Mobutu remained president.

On September 30, 1991, Tshisekedi agreed to be named prime minister, but two weeks later, following a struggle with Mobutu for executive authority, he was dismissed. Refusing to accept the validity of the president's action, Tshisekedi on November 1 chaired the first meeting of a parallel cabinet. On August 14, 1992, the National Conference voted to return Tshisekedi to the post of prime minister, which he retained until his controversial ouster on December 1.

Tshisekedi served as prime minister for one week in April 1997 as Mobutu desperately attempted to find a political solution to his impending ouster by the AFDL. The UDPS supporters were subsequently described as welcoming to the AFDL and new president Laurent Kabila; however, the relationship deteriorated quickly when Kabila declined to name Tshisekedi to his new government. The UDPS leader was detained in June 1997, and in February 1998 he was placed under house arrest for violating the ban on party activity and sent to his home village. In July, Tshisekedi was returned to Kinshasa and released. In early 1999 the UDPS leader and his opposition allies in Kinshasa reportedly refused the Kabila administration's invitation to participate in a national conference.

Following Kabila's death in early 2001, Tshisekedi proved to be one of the few old-time party leaders able to retain significant influence. Among other things, he participated in peace and reconciliation negotiations in conjunction with rebel groups and other opposition figures. Nonetheless, the UDPS refused to participate in the 2003 transitional government, and in 2005 it organized a series of demonstrations and rallies to protest the postponement of elections.

Under Tshisekedi's direction (called "dictatorial" by some party dissidents), the UDPS called for a boycott of the December 2005 constitutional referendum. Although Tshisekedi in early 2006 appeared ready to rejoin the political process in preparation for a presidential bid, he ultimately called for a boycott of the presidential and legislative balloting to protest the government's refusal to conduct new voter registration. (Some UDPS dissidents registered for the assembly poll, prompting their expulsion from the party.) Tshisekedi had been considered President Kabila's potentially most serious rival, while the UDPS, which claims support of some 30 percent of the electorate, had been expected to perform well (and perhaps lead) the legislative election.

Leaders: Etienne TSHISEKEDI wa Malumba (President of the Party), Rémy MASSAMBA Makiesse (Secretary General).

Congolese Rally for Democracy (Rassemblement Congolais pour la Démocratie—RCD). The RCD was formed in mid-August 1998 in Goma by the leaders of the predominantly Banyamulenge Tutsi rebels who had launched a military offensive against the government of Laurent Kabila on August 2. Ernest WAMBA dia Wamba, a theretofore largely unknown academic, emerged from the Goma meeting as the leader of the anti-Kabila forces. In addition, the RCD's leadership committee included Arthur Z'ahidi Ngoma, the prominent founder of the anti-Mobutu and subsequently anti-Kabila Forces of the Future, as well as two former Kabila government ministers, Bizima KARABA and Déogratias BUGERA. Bugera had been the leader and founder of the People's Democratic Alliance (Alliance Démocratique des Peuples—ADP), a military grouping of Tutsis that had been described as the dominant component of the AFDL as it marched across Zaire to seize the capital in May 1997 but had been ordered out of Kinshasa by the president in late July 1998.

In early 1999 RCD dissidents led by Bugera broke away from the group and formed the Reformers' Movement (Mouvement des Réformateurs—MR), and in February Ngoma formed the Union of Congolese for Peace, which he asserted would seek a peaceful solution to the country's crisis. Further intraparty friction was reported in March between Wamba dia Wamba, who allegedly sought a "political" end to the civil war, and a promilitary faction led by Alexis Tambwe and former prime minister Vincent de Paul Lunda Bululu. Meanwhile, a hard-liner, Emile ILUNGA, assumed command of the RCD's military operations amid reports that Wamba dia Wamba was losing control of the group. In May, Ilunga replaced Wamba dia Wamba as president of the RCD, and the group split into two warring factions, Ilunga's being backed by Rwanda, and Wamba dia Wamba's by Uganda. In October the latter faction adopted the rubric RCD—Liberation Movement (RCD—Mouvement de la Libération—RCD-LM). Ilunga was succeeded as president of the main RCD faction (now referenced as RCD-Goma) in October 2000 by Adolphe Onusumba Yemba. Meanwhile, yet another faction (RCD—National [RCD-N]) had broken off in June 2000 under the leadership of Roger Lumbala Tshitenge. In May 2001 Antipas NYAMWISI

Mbusa forcefully took control of the RCD-LM from Wamba dia Wamba.

The RCD groups participated in the Inter-Congolese National Dialogue and were signatories to the Pretoria Accord. Under the terms of the agreement, RCD-Goma secretary general Azarias Ruberwa Manywa was appointed one of four vice presidents of the republic in July 2003. The RCD factions agreed to disarm and a portion of their troops were integrated into the national security forces. In addition, the RCD factions received seats in both the Senate and National Assembly and posts in the transitional cabinet. The RCD-Goma briefly suspended participation in the transitional government in 2004 to protest the massacre of Tutsis in neighboring Burundi and what it viewed as the failure of the DRC government to take stronger action to protect refugees.

For the 2006 presidential election Ruberwa was listed as the official candidate of the RCD, although press reports continued to reference him as the candidate of RCD-Goma, while Lumbala ran as a candidate of the RCD-N and Nyamwisi as the candidate of the Forces of Renewal (Forces du Renouveau—FR).

Leaders: Antipas NYAMWISI Mbusa (RCD-LM), Adolphe ONUSUMBA Yemba (RCD-Goma), Roger LUMBALA Tshitenge (RCD-N), Azarias RUBERWA Manywa (Vice President of the Republic and Secretary General of RCD-Goma).

Movement for the Liberation of the Congo (Mouvement pour la Libération du Congo—MLC). The MLC was launched in Equateur Province in November 1998 by Jean-Pierre Bemba, a "Mobutist" who was allegedly funded by Ugandan sources. Subsequently, bolstered by a series of military successes against government forces, the MLC agreed to coordinate its actions with the RCD, which was backed by Rwanda. That alliance proved short-lived, however, in view of the conflict that soon developed between Uganda and Rwanda.

Like the other major rebel groups, the MLC participated in the Inter-Congolese National Dialogue and signed the Pretoria Accord. MLC fighters were subsequently integrated into the national security forces, and the party became a member of the transitional government. MLC leader Bemba was sworn in as one of four vice presidents for the DRC on July 17, 2003, and the MLC was given equal representation with the RCD-Goma and the opposition alliance in the cabinet and the transitional legislature.

Leaders: Jean-Pierre BEMBA (2006 presidential candidate).

Alliance for the Renaissance of Congo (Alliance pour la Renaissance du Congo—ARC). The ARC was formed in April 2006 by National Assembly President Olivier Kamitatu, who had recently left the MLC along with a number of others opposed to MLC leader Jean-Pierre Bemba. The ARC indicated it would present some 200 candidates in the upcoming assembly poll, while supporting Antipas Nyamwasi Mbusa for president.

Leader: Olivier KAMITATU (President of the National Assembly).

Federalist Christian Democracy. This party is led by Pierre Pay-Pay wa Syakassighe, a former central bank governor who, as the candidate of the 18-party Coalition of Congolese Democrats (Coalition des Démocrates Congolais—CODECO), was considered one of President Kabila's leading rivals in the 2006 presidential race.

Leader: Pierre Pay-Pay wa SYAKASSIGHE.

Unified Lumumbist Party (Parti Lumumbiste Unifiée—PALU). Another party claiming adherence to its namesake's teachings, the PALU is headed by Antoine Gizenga, the former leader of one of the three separatist regimes that emerged in Zaire following Belgium's withdrawal in 1960. On July 29, 1995, at least ten party members were killed during a clash with government security forces outside the parliamentary building.

Leader: Antoine GIZENGA (2006 presidential candidate).

Popular Movement for Renewal (Mouvement Populaire Renouveau—MPR). Founded in 1967 as the principal vehicle of the Mobutu regime and known until August 1990 as the Popular Movement of the Revolution (Mouvement Populaire de la Révolution), the MPR was long committed to a program of indigenous nationalism, or "authenticity." Prior to political liberalization in 1990 each Zairean was legally assumed to be a member of the party at birth.

The 1988 MPR Congress reaffirmed support for the country's single-party system. However, in May 1990 President Mobutu, after signaling the introduction of a multiparty system, stepped down as MPR chair, stating that he would henceforth serve "above parties"; he resumed the post in April 1991. During Mobutu's absence the party split into factions led by N'SINGA Udjuu Ongwakebei (the new chair) and Felix Vunduawe te Pemako, who termed the restructured entity "illegitimate" and presented himself as leader of a "group to renew the People's Revolution."

Faced with vigorous Western opposition to Mobutu's continuance in office, the party at an April 1993 general meeting called on the Birindwa government to sever diplomatic relations with Belgium, France, and the United States, all of which were accused of "stirring up hatred, division, and destruction" and engaging in "neo-colonialism, imperialism . . . and terrorism against Zaire."

Mobutu died of prostate cancer in September 1997, only months after his ouster from Kinshasa by the AFDL. Subsequently, the MPR (with the term "Revolution" once again being used routinely in its references, rather than "Renewal") split into two factions, one led by Vunduawe and a second led by Catherine Nzuzi wa Mbombo. Nzuzi was subsequently jailed for 20 months before being released by Joseph Kabila. She was appointed minister for solidarity and humanitarian affairs in the 2003 transitional government.

Leaders: Felix VUNDUAWWE, Catherine NZUZI wa Mbombo (2006 presidential candidate).

Innovating Forces of the Sacred Union (Forces Innovatrices de la Union Sacrée—FONUS). FONUS is led by Joseph Olenghankoy, a hard-line USOR member who was arrested in 1994 for declaring the government guilty of "unconstitutional" behavior and in 1998 for engaging in illegal party activity. Olenghankoy was appointed minister of transport and communication in the 2003 transitional government.

Leader: Joseph OLENGHANKOY (2006 presidential candidate).

Democratic and Social Christian Party (Parti Démocrate et Social Chrétien—PDSC). A member of the Christian Democratic International, the PDSC applied for legal status in mid-1990 in a bid to secure what was then expected to be the third and final party slot. The party was ultimately recognized in early 1991, and by midyear it had emerged as one of the most influential groups in the Sacred Union.

The PDSC was one of the “moderate” USOR parties that, aligned under the banner of the Union for the Republic and Democracy (Union pour la République et la Démocratie—URD), had advocated better relations with the Mobutu regime and a more democratic process within the USOR. (Other groups in the URD included the UDI, below; the Nationalist Common Front [Front Commun Nationaliste—FCN], led by Gerard KAMANDA wa Kamanda [a former minister in the Mobutu and Tshisekedi governments and the FCN presidential candidate in 2006] and MANDUNGU-BULA Nyati; and the Planters’ Solidarity Party [Parti du Solidarité du Planteurs—PSP], led by Pierre LUMBI Okongo, a former external relations minister.) The URD was expelled from the USOR in May 1994 after, in the climax of a long-running feud, it nominated three candidates for the prime minister’s post despite the USOR’s official designation of Etienne Tshisekedi as the sole USOR candidate. There has been little reference to PDSC activity since 2002.

Leaders: André BO-BOLIKO Lok’onga, Tuyaba LEWULA (Secretary General).

Union of Independent Democrats (Union des Démocrates Indépendants—UDI). Led initially by former planning minister Alexis TAMBWE, the UDI was a party of businessmen and technocrats. In June 1994 Prime Minister Kengo wa Dondo was described as the group’s “spiritual father.” Following his dismissal as prime minister in April 1997, Kengo wa Dondo fled the country in advance of the AFDL takeover of Kinshasa in May. In February 1998 he was named prime minister of a “government-in-exile” announced in Brussels, Belgium. He returned to the DRC in 2003 to resume political activity, although it was not clear if the UDI continued to function.

Leaders: Joseph Léon KENGO wa Dondo.

Union of Federalists and Independent Republicans (Union des Fédéralistes et Républicains Indépendants—UFERI). UFERI was created by the August 6, 1990, merger of the National Federation of Committed Democrats (Fédération Nationale des Démocrates Commettres—Fenadec) and the Independent Republicans’ Party (Parti des Républicains Indépendants—PRI), which had been launched in April by state commissioner of foreign affairs Jean Nguza Karl-I-Bond. At the time of the merger, Nguza described the new grouping, which he was subsequently named to head, as a “serious adversary to the MPR.” The party was officially registered on January 16, 1991, and soon thereafter was described as one of the most prominent groups in the Sacred Union coalition. In September UFERI asserted that it would only join in a government formed by a sovereign national conference, and in October UFERI agreed to support the Sacred Union’s efforts to reinstate Etienne Tshisekedi as prime minister; nevertheless, on November 21 Nguza, dismissing coalition criticism, agreed to assume the prime minister’s post, from which he was ultimately obliged to resign on August 17, 1992.

Subsequently, Nguza warned that UFERI’s Katangan supporters would not accept Tshisekedi’s appointment, and violent clashes between the two groups were reported. Furthermore, the “ethnic cleansing” of Kasais from Shaba (formerly Katanga) Province, which by mid-1993 had reportedly resulted in thousands of deaths and dislocations, was allegedly sanctioned by Mobutu and executed by Nguza’s supporters. In April 1993 Nguza was named deputy prime minister for defense in the Birindwa government. In mid-1996 UFERI leaders denounced the Kengo wa Dondo government for its “anti-democratic behavior” after the party was banned from organizing political activities in Katanga. Nguza died of a heart attack in July 2003, and there has subsequently been little reference to UFERI activity.

Leader: Gabriel KYUNGU wa Kumwanza.

Congolese National Movement (Mouvement National Congolais—MNC). From the 1970s to the 1990s, the MNC was an exile group with at least two discernible current factions, the Congolese National Movement–Lumumba (Mouvement National Congolais–Lumumba—MNC-L), whose military wing operated as the Lumumba Patriotic Army (Armée Patriotique Lumumba—APL), and the Reformed Congolese National Movement (Mouvement National Congolais Rénové—MNCR). The MNC became visible in 1978 when its president was detained by Belgian authorities and expelled to France, with similar action taken against its secretary general in 1984 after the group claimed responsibility for a series of March bombings in Kinshasa. In 1985 the MNC emerged as the most active of the external groups: in April it issued a statement calling Mobutu “an element of instability in central Africa” and listing those allegedly killed by government troops during disturbances in eastern provinces in late 1984. In September 1985 leaders of both the MNC-L and the MNCR joined with the Swiss-based Congolese Democratic and Socialist Party (Parti Démocratique et Socialiste Congolaise), led by Allah FIOR Muyinda, in inviting other opposition groups to participate in a joint working commission to oversee “activities [to be launched] over the whole country in coming days.” MNCR leader Paul-Roger Mokede was named president of the exile provisional government at a meeting in Switzerland in September 1987 but rejected the designation on the grounds that Zaire could not “afford the luxury” of a parallel regime.

In September 1994 a group identifying itself as the MNC-L was reportedly “formed” in Kinshasa by “nationalists” and Lumumbists under the leadership of Pascal TABU, Mbalu MEKA, and Otoko OKITASOMBO. The older, or original, MNC faction became known as the MNC–Lumumba Originel or Original Lumumba (MNC-LO).

In early 1998 François Lumumba, eldest son of the former prime minister, charged that the regime of Laurent Kabila was denying freedom of expression to him and other family members. Lumumba emerged as leader of the MNC-L. He was briefly detained by the government in 2000.

Leaders: François Tolenga LUMUMBA (MNC-L).

Mai-Mai Ingilima. The Mai-Mai was an ethnic Bahunde militia whose members were described as “armed mystics” for their belief, among others, that the grass headgear they wear in battle possesses the power to turn their enemies’ bullets into water (mai-mai is the Swahili word for water). Credited with disarming Hutu fighters and Zairean soldiers at the start of the 1996 rebellion, the Mai-Mai forces were expected to coordinate their actions with the AFDL as the fighting moved into northern Zaire; however, in December 1996 Mai-Mai militiamen were accused of attempting to assassinate AFDL commander Kissasse, who allegedly wanted them to disarm and report for training. In early 1997 further clashes between the rebel groups were reported, and later in the year the Mai-Mai grouping was described as fully confrontational with the national army of the new Kabila regime in pursuit of regional autonomy for South Kivu. Thereafter, beginning in August 1998, the Mai-Mai was described as alternately cooperating with and clashing with elements of the RCD, in addition to continuing its antigovernment military activities. However, by 2002 the Mai-Mai militias were widely considered to be supportive of the government of Joseph Kabila. The Mai-Mai became formally allied with the Kabila government during the Inter-Congolese National Dialogue that culminated in the Pretoria Accord, and Mai-Mai were subsequently given cabinet posts and seats in the transitional government. However, some Mai-Mai forces subsequently turned hostile to the government under the leadership of a warlord identified as GÉDÉON and assumed control of regions of Katanga. After his forces were accused of attacks on civilians, Gédéon surrendered to MONUC in April 2006.

Union of Congolese Patriots (Union des Patriotes Congolais—UPC). The UPC was formed as an antigovernment militia by members of the Hema ethnic group in the Ituri region. Although the UPC was reportedly subsequently registered as a political party, its leader, Thomas LUBANGA, was turned over to the new International Criminal Court (ICC) in March 2006 to face charges of war crimes and human rights abuses. By that time, some remnants of the UPC had reportedly helped launch the MRC (below).

Congolese Revolutionary Movement (Mouvement Révolutionnaire Congolais—MRC). The MRC was reportedly formed in Uganda in the second half of 2005 by Congolese rebels who had not accepted the peace process and integration into the proposed national army. MRC participants reportedly included remnants of the UPC (above), the Patriotic Resistance Front of Ituri (Front de Résistance Patriotique en Ituri—FRPI), the Front for National Integration, the People's Army of Congo, and the RCD. Government forces launched an offensive against the MRC in eastern DRC in March 2006.

Other parties presenting presidential candidates in 2006 included Christian Democracy (Démocratie Chrétienne—DC, Eugene Ndongala DIOMI); the Socialist Liberal Union (Union Socialiste Libérale—USL, Bernard Emmanuel SUILA); the Rally of Social and Federalist Forces (Rassemblement des Forces Sociales et Fédéralistes—RFSE, Vincent de Paul LUNDA Bululu [former prime minister]); the Convention for the Republic and Democracy (Convention pour la République et la Démocratie—CRD, Christophe N'KODIA Pwango Mbozo); the Rally for a New Society (Rassemblement pour une Nouvelle Société—RNS, Alafuele KALALA Mbuyi); the Union of Mobutist Democrats (Union des Démocrates Mobutistes—UDEMO, François Joseph Nzanga Ngbangawe MOBUTU [a son of former president Mobutu who had returned from exile in 2003]); the Movement of Democrats (Mouvement des Démocrates—MD, Justine Kasa-Vubu M'POYO); the Alliance of Congolese Democrats (Alliance des Démocrates Congolais—ADECO, Jonas Kadiata Nzemba MUKAMBA); Renewal for Development and Democracy (Renouveau pour le Développement et la Démocratie—RDD, Osee Ndjoko MUYIMA); the Political Coalition of Christians (Coalition Politique des Chrétiens—CPC, Jacob Souga NIEMBA); the Party for Peace in the Congo (Parti pour la Paix au Congo, Marie Thérèse Mpolo Nene NLANDU); the Union for the Defense of the Republic (Union pour la Défense de la République—UDR, Wivine Kavidí N'LANDU); and the African Congress of Democrats (Congrès Africain des Démocrates—CAD, Harsan Uba THASSINDA).

Other groups include the Congolese People's Movement for the Republic (Mouvement Populaire Congolais pour le République—MPCR), led by Jean-Claude VUEMBA; the Congolese Socialist Party, led by Christian BADIBANGI; the Forces of the Future (Forces du Futur—FDF), led by Arthur Z'ahidi NGOMA, who had been jailed from November 1997 to June 1998 and subsequently became an RCD leader before going into exile in France (see RCD, above) and then returning to serve as vice president of the republic from 2003 to 2006 (Ngoma ran for president in 2006 as the candidate of a party called Camp of the Fatherland [Camp de la Patrie]); the Liberal Democratic Christian Party (Parti Libéral Démocrate Chrétien—PLDC), led by Ramond TSHIBANDA; the Movement for Solidarity, Democracy, and Development (Mouvement pour la Solidarité, la Démocratie, et le Développement—MSDD), whose leader, Christophe LUTUNDULA Apala, chaired the legislative committee that recently investigated alleged corruption in the issuance of government contracts during the 1998–2003 civil war; the National Alliance of Democrats for Reconstruction (Alliance Nationale des Démocrates pour la Reconstruction—Anader), formed in 2001 under the leadership of Raphaël Kumba ki LUTETE; the National Convention for Political Action; the People's Party for Reconstruction and Development (Parti du Peuple pour la Reconstruction et la Démocratie—PPRD), a social-democratic party formed in 2003 and led by Jean-Baptiste NKOY; and the Union of the Congolese Left (Union de la Gauche Congolaise—UGC), formed in 2000 and led by Delphin BANZA. In addition, a coalition of small left-wing parties, the Coordination of Lumumbist Mulelist Kabilist Revolutionary Nationalist Forces (Coordination des Nationalistes Révolutionnaires Lumumbistes Mulelistes Kabilistes—LMK), was formed in 2002. Another alliance, the United Front of Congolese Nationalists (Front Uni des Nationalistes Congolais—FUNC), was formed in 2004 as a coalition of left and center-left parties.

Other rebel groups include the Nationalist and Integrationist Front (Front Nationaliste Intégrationiste—FNI), an ethnic Lendu separatist group active in Ituri and suspected of being responsible for attacks against MONUC forces and whose military leader, Etiene LONA, surrendered to the UN in March 2005; the Congolese Patriots Union—Kisembo (UPC-Kisembo), a break-away faction of the UPC, led by Floribert Kisembo BAHEMUKA; the Forces of Patriotic Resistance, a group linked to the FNI; and the Front for the Liberation of Eastern Congo, a rebel group composed of former members of the RCD. In addition, the Rwanda Democratic Liberation Front, a Rwandan Hutu rebel group, remains active in South Kivu and has conducted raids into Rwanda and attacks on DRC government installations and security forces.

Legislature

In September 1992 the 210-member unicameral National Legislative Council (Conseil Législatif National—CLN), elected in 1987 from a list of MPR-approved candidates, was dissolved by the National Conference. On October 5 President Mobutu recalled the CLN; however, with both Prime Minister Tshisekedi and National Conference president Laurent Monsengwo Pasinya urging a boycott, the sessions were poorly attended and quickly abandoned. On December 6 the National Conference elected a 453-member High Council of the Republic (Haut Conseil de la République—HCR) to function as a transitional legislature.

On March 29, 1993, Mobutu, who refused to accept the legislative authority of the HCR, again reconvened the CLN, with members unable or unwilling to attend the session reportedly being replaced by pro-Mobutu soldiers. Two days later the CLN approved constitutional amendments, drafted by a “conclave” of pro-Mobutu parties March 9–19 that, following presidential promulgation on April 2, established the body as a transitional institution equal in status to the president and the HCR.

On January 14, 1994, Mobutu announced the dissolution of both the CLN and HCR, asserting that the two bodies would be reconstituted as a single body styled the High Council of the Republic—Parliament of Transition (Haut Conseil de la République—Parlement de Transition—HCR-PT). Despite opposition claims that the president had no right to dissolve the HCR, the new body, with more than 500 members, was inaugurated on January 23, and on January 25 it appointed former HCR president Monsengwo Pasinya as its leader.

On January 28, 1996, Monsengwo resigned as HCR-PT speaker—five months after an alliance of pro-Mobutu and opposition parliamentarians had passed a motion demanding his resignation. Subsequently, control of the HCR-PT passed to its two vice presidents, André Bo-Boliko Lok'onga and Anzuluni BEMBE Isinyonyi. The HCR-PT was ordered dissolved in May 1997 following the overthrow of the Mobutu regime.

On August 21, 2000, a new Legislative and Constituent Assembly—Transitional Parliament was inaugurated. President Laurent Kabila directly appointed 60 of the 300 members, while the remaining members were selected in consultation with a presidentially appointed commission.

The December 2002 Pretoria Accord provided for the establishment of a bicameral legislature through an interim constitution. The representatives from both chambers were appointed from the major political parties, civic groups, and rebel factions. Both chambers of the Parliament were inaugurated on August 23, 2003.

The constitution promulgated in February 2006 provided for a new bicameral parliament comprising a Senate and a National Assembly. That new Senate was slated to include members indirectly elected for five-year terms by provincial councils as well as all former presidents of the republic. The National Assembly was slated to comprise members directly elected for five-year terms from 169 constituencies (some with only 1 seat). New assembly elections were most recently scheduled for July 30, 2006. Provincial elections (required for the indirect election of the Senate) were planned for later in the year.

Senate (Sénat). The interim Senate consists of 120 members appointed through negotiations following the Pretoria Accords. Each of the five major political groups received 22 positions, including propresidential parties (led by the People's Party for Reconstruction and Democracy); the opposition alliance; the Congolese Rally for Democracy (RCD-Goma); the Movement for the Liberation of Congo; and civic groups. In addition, the Mai-Mai received 4 seats; the RCD-Liberation Movement, 4; and the RCD-National, 2. (See headnote.)

President: Pierre Marini BODHO.

National Assembly (Assemblée Nationale). The interim National Assembly comprises 500 deputies appointed from the major political groups in the DRC. The five main groups each received 94 seats, including propresidential parties (led by the People's Party for Reconstruction and Democracy); the opposition alliance; the Congolese Rally for Democracy (RCD-Goma); the Movement for the Liberation of Congo; and civic groups. The RCD-Liberation Movement was given 15 seats; the Mai-Mai, 10; and the RCD-National, 5.

President: Olivier KAMITATU.

Communications

Newspapers were increasingly subject to government control under the Mobutu regime, and a "restructuring" of the press reduced the number of papers being issued. Strict control was also reported under the administration of Laurent Désiré Kabila. Opposition parties have accused state media of favoring the PPRD over other parties, and journalists have been arrested for reporting on demonstrations. In addition, the state media regulatory agency has suspended licenses of broadcast media for "biased reporting" of antigovernment activities. In late 2005 journalism watchdog organizations reported that press freedom was "deteriorating."

Press

The following are dailies published in Kinshasa, unless otherwise noted: Mjumbe (Lubumbashi); Boyoma (Kisangani); Le Potentiel (8,000); L'Avenir; Le Phare (4,000), close to the UDPS; La Référence; Le Forum; Courier d'Afrique (15,000); La Depeche (Lubumbashi, 20,000); Salongo; Le Journal (three times per week); L'Alerte, independent.

News Agencies

The domestic facility is the Congolese Press Agency (Agence Congolaise de Presse—ACP); Agence France-Presse, Xinhua, and Pan-African News Agency also maintain bureaus in Kinshasa.

Broadcasting and Computing

Radio broadcasting is provided by the government over the national station, La Voix du Congo, and regional stations. Commercial television is provided by the government-operated, commercial Television Congolaise. There are also several private radio and television stations broadcasting from Kinshasa. MONUC temporarily sponsors a radio station called Radio Okapi. However, television and radio broadcasts from Kinshasa do not reach some parts of the country, including the volatile eastern region. There were approximately 5.2 million radio and 208,000 television receivers in 1999, unsettled conditions precluding more recent assessments, save for a report of 50,000 Internet users in 2002.

REPUBLIC OF THE CONGO

République du Congo

The Country

The Republic of the Congo is a narrow 800-mile-long strip of heavily forested territory extending inland from the Atlantic along the Congo and Ubangi rivers. It is bordered on the west by Gabon, on the north by Cameroon and the Central African Republic, and on the east and south by the Democratic Republic of the Congo (formerly Zaire). The members of the country's multitribal society belong mainly to the Bakongo, Matéké, Mbochi, and Vili tribal groups and include numerous pygmies, who are thought to be among the first inhabitants of the area. Linguistically, the tribes speak related Bantu languages; French, although the official language, is not in widespread use. There is, however, a lingua franca, Mouman Koutouba, which is widely employed in commerce. In recent decades there has been substantial rural-to-urban migration, with close to 50 percent of the population now living in or near Brazzaville or Pointe Noir. Partly because of its level of urbanization, the Republic of the Congo has a literacy rate estimated at 70–85 percent, one of the highest in black Africa. About half of the population adheres to traditional religious beliefs, while Roman Catholics, Protestants, and Muslims comprise the remainder.

Although the country possesses exploitable deposits of manganese, copper, lead-zinc, and gold, its leading resources are oil and timber, with the first accounting for more than 88 percent of export earnings in 2003. The economy was severely compromised following the five-month civil war of mid-1997, which, among other things, heavily damaged the capital and reduced GDP growth from about 6.3 percent in 1996 to a negative rate in 1997.

The International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank suspended aid to the Republic of the Congo in 2000 because of the perceived failure of the government to enact economic reforms. Partial aid was restored in 2004, although the government by that time faced heavy international criticism on an important regional issue—diamond exporting (see Current issues, below). Meanwhile, the Republic of the Congo remained one of the poorest countries in the world (annual per capita income of approximately $700), although increased revenue from high oil prices had at least permitted the government to pay off arrears in civil-servant salaries.

High oil prices, along with increased stability since the end of the civil war, helped bolster the economy in 2005, when real GDP growth of 6.5 percent was recorded. It was expected to be about the same in 2006. In another positive development, in early 2006 the World Bank and the IMF approved the Republic of the Congo for debt relief under the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries Initiative (HICP). The country was to receive some $5 billion in aid but was still required to address concerns over transparency in government and finances.

Government and Politics

Political Background

Occupied by France in the 1880s, the former colony of Middle Congo became the autonomous Republic of the Congo in 1958 and attained full independence within the French Community on August 15, 1960. The country's first president, Fulbert YOULOU, established a strong centralized administration but resigned in 1963 in the face of numerous strikes and labor demonstrations. His successor, Alphonse MASSAMBA-DÉBAT, was installed by the military and subsequently reelected for a five-year term. Under Massamba-Débat the regime embraced a Marxist-type doctrine of "scientific socialism," and the political system was reorganized on a one-party basis. In 1968, however, Massamba-Débat was stripped of authority as a result of differences with both left-wing and military elements. A military coup led by Capt. Marien NGOUABI on August 3 was followed by the establishment of a National Council of the Revolution to direct the government.

Formally designated as head of state in January 1969, Ngouabi proclaimed a "people's republic" the following December, while a constitution adopted in January 1970 legitimized a single political party, the Congolese Labor Party (Parti Congolais du Travail—PCT). Three years later, a new basic law established the post of prime minister and created a National Assembly to replace the one dissolved in 1968.

President Ngouabi was assassinated on March 18, 1977, and the PCT immediately transferred its powers to an 11-member Military Committee headed by Col. Jacques-Joachim YHOMBI-OPANGO, which reinstated rule by decree. Former president Massamba-Débat, who was accused of having plotted the assassination, was executed on March 25. On April 3 it was announced that Maj. Denis SASSOU-NGUESSO had been named first vice president of the Military Committee and that Maj. Louis-Sylvain GOMA, who retained his post as prime minister, had been named second vice president.

Responding to pressure from the Central Committee of the PCT after having made disparaging remarks about the condition of the country's economy, General Yhombi-Opango, as well as the Military Committee, resigned on February 5, 1979. The Central Committee thereupon established a ruling Provisional Committee and named Sassou-Nguesso as interim president. At an extraordinary congress March 26–31, the party confirmed Sassou-Nguesso as president, while on July 8 the voters approved a new constitution and elected a People's National Assembly in addition to district, regional, and local councils. On July 30, 1984, the president was elected for a second term, and on August 11, as part of a reshuffling aimed at "strengthening the revolutionary process," he named Ange-Edouard POUNGUI to succeed Goma as prime minister.

In July 1987, 20 military officers linked to a group of Paris-based exiles were arrested on charges of plotting a coup. Thereafter, an alleged co-conspirator, Lt. Pierre ANGA, who charged that Sassou-Nguesso had participated in the murder of former president Ngouabi, led a rebellion in the north. Reports of attacks by rebel forces continued until July 4, 1988, when the killing of Anga by government troops ended the uprising.

On July 30, 1989, Sassou-Nguesso was reelected for a third term at the fourth PCT party congress. However, continued debate over the foundering economy led to an extraordinary congress on August 5 and 6 at which a moderate technocrat, Alphonse POATY-SOUCHLATY, was named to succeed Pougui as prime minister.

During the ensuing year, pressure mounted for abandonment of the PCT's claim to political

President: Gen. Denis SASSOU-NGUESSO (Congolese Labor Party); sworn in on October 25, 1997, following the military overthrow of the government of Pascal LISSOUBA (Pan-African Union for Social Democracy) on October 23; elected for a seven-year term on March 10, 2002, and inaugurated on August 10.

Prime Minister: Isidore MVOUBA (Congolese Labor Party); appointed by the president on January 7, 2005. (The position of prime minister is not mandated in the current constitution, and the last person to serve in the post was Bernard KOLELAS [Congolese Movement for Democracy and Integral Development], who lost the premiership when the position was "abolished" by President Sassou-Nguesso on November 3, 1997.)

exclusivity, and in October 1990, confronted with a general strike that had brought the country to a standstill, and acting on a party decision reached three months earlier, General Sassou-Nguesso announced that a multiparty system would be introduced on January 1, 1991, followed by the convening of an all-party National Conference to chart the nation's political future. On January 14 he appointed a "transitional" government headed by former prime minister Goma, Poaty-Souchlaty having resigned on December 3 in protest over the president's call for the introduction of pluralism.

The National Conference, which encompassed representatives of 30 parties and 141 associations, convened for a three-month sitting on February 25, 1991, eventually approving the draft of a new democratic constitution, dropping "People's" from the country's name, transferring most presidential powers to the prime minister, scheduling a constitutional referendum for November, and calling for multiparty local, legislative, and presidential elections during the first half of 1992. On June 8, two days before its conclusion, the conference elected André MILONGO prime minister. Four days later, Milongo named a 25-member cabinet, which on September 15 was reduced to 15 ministers amid charges that members of the opposition coalition Forces of Change (Forces de Changement—FDC) were overrepresented.

After a series of postponements, the March 15, 1992, referendum on the new basic law was credited with securing 96 percent approval. Meanwhile, the Milongo government had barely survived a January 19 army mutiny triggered by allegations that transfers of senior officers had been politically motivated. Municipal elections, originally scheduled for March, were eventually held on May 3, while two-stage legislative balloting that was to have been held in April and May was also delayed, with numerous complaints of irregularities at the first stage on June 24.

At second-stage assembly balloting on July 24, 1992, the Pan-African Union for Social Democracy (Union PanAfricaine pour la Démocratie Sociale—UPADS) emerged as the clear winner, as it did in a Senate poll two days later, albeit without securing a majority in either body. At first-round presidential balloting on August 2, the UPADS nominee, Pascal LISSOUBA, led a field of 17 candidates but secured only 35.9 percent of the vote, thus necessitating a second round against Bernard KOLELAS of the Congolese Movement for Democracy and Integral Development (Mouvement Congolais pour la Démocratie et le Développement Intégral—MCDDI), who had garnered 22.9 percent. Among those eliminated in the first round were Sassou-Nguesso and Milongo, with vote shares of 16 and 10 percent, respectively. On August 11 the UPADS and PCT announced a coalition, with the outgoing president urging his followers to support the UPADS leader. Thus reinforced, Lissouba outdistanced Kolelas at the second round on August 16 by a margin of 61.3 to 38.7 percent. In the wake of his victory Lissouba promised a broadly representative government and indicated that he would petition the National Assembly to pardon Sassou-Nguesso and other top officials for crimes committed while in office. On September 1 Lissouba named Maurice-Stéphane BONGHO-NOUARRA of the National Alliance for Democracy (Alliance Nationale pour la Démocratie—AND) as prime minister. Six days later Bongho-Nouarra announced a cabinet that included a number of opposition leaders, although Kolelas declined to join them.

In late September 1992 the UPADS-PCT pact dissolved over the choice of a National Assembly president. Shortly thereafter, the PCT concluded an Opposition Coalition (Coalition de l'Opposition—CO) with Kolelas's recently formed Union for Democratic Renewal (Union pour le Nouveau Démocratique—URD), itself a seven-party antigovernment alliance that included the MCDDI. The CO moved quickly to assert itself and on October 31 successfully moved a no-confidence vote against the government. On November 11 the coalition called for a campaign of civil disobedience and strikes in an effort to force Lissouba to name a CO member as prime minister. On November 14 Bongho-Nouarra resigned, praising President Lissouba for attempting to "pull Congo out of the abyss." Subsequent negotiations between Lissouba and Kolelas led to an impasse, and on November 17 the president, accusing the coalition of "despicable and premeditated acts," dissolved the National Assembly and scheduled a new election for December 30. A wave of civil unrest promptly paralyzed the capital's commercial sector, and by the end of November opposition legislators and security forces were described as in "open confrontation." On December 2 the military occupied Brazzaville, dispersed demonstrators, ordered the government and opposition to form a unity government headed by a compromise prime minister, and suspended election preparations. Four days later, Lissouba appointed Claude-Antoine DACOSTA, an agronomist and former World Bank representative, as prime minister. The government named by Dacosta on December 25 included 12 members from the CO and 9 with links to the president.

At rescheduled assembly balloting on May 2 and June 6, 1993, President Lissouba's 60-party Presidential Tendency (Tendance Présidentielle) was credited with winning 69 of 125 seats. However, insisting that the first round had been "tarnished by monstrous irregularities," the opposition demanded a rerun in 12 constituencies and boycotted the second-round balloting. Furthermore, on June 8 Kolelas called for a campaign of civil disobedience to force new elections, thus igniting widespread violence. Subsequent negotiations to stem the unrest failed, as the Opposition Coalition rejected Lissouba's offer to rerun the second round. On June 22 the CO boycotted the National Assembly's inauguration, and the following day, concurrent with Lissouba's appointment of Yhombi-Opango as prime minister, it named Jean-Pierre THYSTERE-TCHICAYE of the Rally for Democracy and Social Progress (Rassemblement pour la Démocratie et le Progrès Social—RDPS) to head a parallel "national salvation" government.

On July 7, 1993, amid what Lissouba now labeled an "armed rebellion," a curfew was imposed in Brazzaville. Negotiations remained at an impasse until late July, when Gabonese and UN mediators brokered an unofficial disarmament pact, and on August 4 government and opposition negotiators in Libreville, Gabon, signed an agreement calling for an internationally supervised rerun of the second round of assembly elections and the establishment of a seven-member, international arbitration committee to rule on first-round disputes. On August 16, with the violence abating, a month-old state of emergency in Brazzaville was rescinded, and on September 17 the curfew was lifted. Meanwhile, the Senate agreed to a rerun of the June voting, although it rejected establishment of the arbitration committee on the grounds that the August accord had been a “private deal among political parties.”

At the second-round rerun in October 1993 the Opposition Coalition won 7 of the 11 contests, increasing its representation to 56 seats, while the Presidential Tendency’s majority fell to 65. However, in early November the cease-fire collapsed, with dozens of people reported killed in the capital when government forces responded to the kidnapping of two government officials and a sniper attack with a fierce assault on opposition strongholds. The coalition immediately cited artillery attacks on the Bacongo District of Brazzaville as a means of creating a violent “smoke screen” behind which the government was attempting to impose its will. Despite bilateral calls in late November for a cease-fire and disarmament, fighting continued into 1994, with a government blockade of Bacongo in January, renewed clashes in Brazzaville in July, and student demonstrations in the capital in November.

On January 23, 1995, CO unity was shattered by URD agreement to participate in a restructured Yhombi-Opango government, a move that was flatly rejected by the PCT. Another Coalition member, the National Union for Democracy and Progress (Union Nationale pour la Démocratie et Progrès—UNDP), echoed the PCT’s sentiments, declaring that it would take no part in the government’s “chaotic management of the country” and accusing President Lissouba of being “a past master in juggling and manipulation as a divide-and-rule strategy.”

Regional divisions remained at the fore in 1995 as the Lissouba administration sought to end the northerners’ dominance of the 25,000-member military as well as to disarm and integrate the numerous militias that were organized during the 1993 civil unrest and continued to cause widespread instability. In August, Lissouba declared that the military would be restructured to reflect a “tribal and regional equilibrium”; however, the military leadership and opposition strenuously objected to the plan, particularly efforts to integrate Lissouba loyalists. On September 1–6 government troops attempting to disarm militia-men loyal to Sassou-Nguesso met fierce resistance in Brazzaville. Consequently, on November 3 Lissouba proposed assimilating all militia-men into the armed forces. Nevertheless, two days later, National Defense Minister (and former prime minister) Maurice-Stéphane Bongho-Nouarra rejected an administration attempt to absorb 250 militia-men with alleged presidential loyalties, saying that he wanted to depoliticize the recruitment process.

On December 24, 1995, the leaders of the Congo’s major pro-presidential and opposition tendencies signed a peace pact that included provisions for the disarmament and subsequent integration of the former combatants into the national army. However, efforts to implement the accord were dealt a setback on February 14, 1996, when more than 100 recently integrated former militia-men with ties to the UPADS led a violent mutiny in M’Pila that left 5 people dead and 40 others injured. The rebellion ended on February 19 after negotiations between the government and rebellious troops yielded another integration agreement favoring the latter. Consequently, the opposition United Democratic Forces (Forces Démocratiques Unies—FDU) boycotted the peace process for a month, denouncing the government’s willingness to “reward” the mutineers and calling for equal representation in the armed forces.

On August 23, 1996, Prime Minister Yhombi-Opango resigned. His replacement, David Charles GANAO, leader of the Union of Democratic Forces (Union des Forces Démocratiques—UFD), on September 2 organized a new government that was nearly evenly split between old and new ministers. A partial Senate election in October did not change the balance of power.

Preparations for presidential elections (scheduled for July 27, 1997) had begun in earnest on May 4, 1996, when the National Census Commission (Commission Nationale pour le Recensement—CNR) was inaugurated. However, the CNR was immediately immersed in controversy when the opposition sharply criticized the appointment of President Lissouba as the commission’s chair, arguing that it undermined the government’s pledge to “ensure transparency” during the electoral run-up. Lissouba subsequently resigned from the CNR chairmanship; however, the appointment of Prime Minister Yhombi-Opango as his successor proved equally unsatisfying to the opposition, which called for establishment of an independent commission. Thereafter, in July, MCDDI leader Kolelas announced his presidential candidacy, joining a field that already included Lissouba and Gen. Jean-Marie Michel MOKOKO of the Movement for Congolese Reconciliation (Mouvement pour la Réconciliation Congolaise—MRC).

Tensions between supporters of Sassou-Nguesso and Lissouba, the two leading presidential candidates, increased as the election approached. In May 1997 Sassou-Nguesso survived an assassination attempt while campaigning, and on June 5 the army surrounded his home, claiming it was part of an effort to disarm private militias. The showdown quickly escalated into civil war, and by mid-July about 4,000 were dead. President Lissouba successfully petitioned the Constitutional Court to postpone the election and extend the expiration date of his mandate, as of July 22. The action only enraged Sassou-Nguesso’s forces, and fighting spread north despite mediation efforts by the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity (OAU).

Lissouba appointed Kolelas, then mayor of Brazzaville, as prime minister on September 9, 1997, replacing Ganao, who had resigned on the same day. Kolelas formed a new unity government on September 13, but allies of Sassou-Nguesso declined the posts reserved for them. Kolelas was backed by a 40-party movement, the Republican Space for the Defense of Democracy and National Unity (Espace Républicain pour la Défense de la Démocratie et Unité Nationale—ERDDUN), though apparently it was identified too closely with Lissouba forces to have credibility with the rebels.

With the participation of a variety of mercenaries and regular troops from neighboring countries, the civil war continued into mid-October, with Sassou-Nguesso triumphantly entering the destroyed capital on October 23 and being sworn in as president two days later. On November 3 Sassou-

Nguesso named a new, broadly representative transitional government but abolished the position of prime minister and initially reserved the defense portfolio for himself.

On January 5–14, 1998, the government hosted the National Forum for Reconciliation, Unity, Democracy, and the Reconstruction of the Congo that was attended by more than 1,400 participants, most of them, however, from within parties or other organizations identified with the FDU. The forum endorsed a “flexible” three-year transition to democracy during which a new constitution would be drafted and a national constitutional referendum held. New presidential and legislative elections would follow. The forum elected a 75-member National Transition Council to oversee the process, but it also accused the ousted president, Lissouba, and his allies of a planned “genocide” and urged that they be brought before the appropriate judicial venue. Meanwhile, Lissouba and Kolelas proclaimed a government in exile, with the former prime minister calling for a campaign of civil disobedience in opposition to the Sassou-Nguesso regime.

Throughout 1998, militias loyal to Lissouba and Kolelas—the so-called Cocoyes (in the south) and Ninjas (in the central Pool region), respectively—continued to battle the Cobra militias, which supported Sassou-Nguesso, forcing tens of thousands of civilians to flee and causing thousands of deaths. In December a major battle for control of Brazzaville erupted, and it wasn’t until mid-1999 that victories by the army and Cobra forces made the eventual outcome a near-certainty. In August, Sassou-Nguesso offered amnesty to opposition militiamen who surrendered their arms, and on November 16 a peace plan, including the amnesty and a cessation of hostilities, was accepted by most of the opposition forces. Lissouba and Kolelas, still abroad, rejected the agreement. In late December, President Omar Bongo of Gabon, who had assumed the role of mediator between the interim government and the opposition militias, oversaw the signing of a second peace agreement, and by early 2000 the conflict appeared to have reached a conclusion. The 1990s had witnessed an estimated 20,000 deaths due to civil strife, with some 800,000 made homeless. On May 4, 2000, Kolelas and his nephew, former minister of the interior Col. Philippe BIKINKITA, having been tried in absentia, were sentenced to death for crimes committed against prisoners in 1997.

Although some areas of the country remained under militia control, in January 2001 the government announced that a “non-exclusive national dialogue” on a draft constitution, the peace plan, and national reconstruction would be held. Local sessions were conducted throughout the country in March and were followed by a convention in Brazzaville April 11–14. Although some representatives of former governments participated, Lissouba and Kolelas continued their opposition. The convention concluded by adopting the constitutional draft, which was approved in final form by the National Transition Council in September. The new basic law, which retained a strong presidency and a bicameral parliament, was endorsed by 84 percent of the voters at a public referendum on January 20, 2002, although much of the opposition leadership urged a boycott. A month earlier, Lissouba had been convicted in absentia of treason and misappropriation of funds and sentenced to 30 years in prison.

Sassou-Nguesso, facing no significant opponent following the withdrawal of former prime minister Milongo from the race, was elected to a seven-year term in presidential balloting on March 10, 2002. Having received 89.4 percent of the vote, Sassou-Nguesso was sworn in on August 14. In two-stage balloting for the new 137-seat National Assembly on May 26 and June 20, the president’s PCT and the allied FDU won 83 seats, while indirect elections for the 66-seat Senate on July 11 produced an even greater majority for the government.

The PCT and FDU reportedly secured more than two-thirds of the seats in local balloting on June 30, 2002, a number of opposition parties having boycotted those elections to protest perceived mismanagement in the recent presidential poll. Consequently, the new Council of Ministers appointed on August 18 did not include any members of the opposition.

On January 7, 2005, President Sassou-Nguesso appointed Isidore MVOUBA of the PCT to what the president called the “honorary” post of prime minister and reshuffled the cabinet. In a partial Senate election on October 2, 2005, the PCT won 23 of 30 contested seats, with 6 of the remaining seats reportedly going to members of government coalition parties, and 1 to an independent.

Constitution and Government

The 1979 constitution established the Congolese Labor Party (PCT) as the sole legal party, with the chair of its Central Committee serving as president of the republic. Under a constitutional revision adopted at the third PCT congress in July 1984, the president was named chief of government as well as head of state, with authority to name the prime minister and members of the Council of Ministers.

The 1979 document was abrogated and a number of existing national institutions dissolved by the National Conference in May 1991. President Sassou-Nguesso remained in office pending the election of a successor, while a 153-member Higher Council of the Republic (Conseil Supérieur de la République—CSR) was appointed to oversee the implementation of conference decisions.

The constitution endorsed by the CSR on December 22, 1991, and approved by popular referendum on May 3, 1992, provided for a president elected for a once-renewable five-year term. The head of state, authorized to rule by decree in social and economic matters, appointed a prime minister capable of commanding a legislative majority. The bicameral parliament consisted of an indirectly elected Senate sitting for a six-year term and a directly elected National Assembly with a five-year mandate, subject to dissolution. A Supreme Court headed the judicial system, with a High Court of Justice empowered to rule on crimes and misdemeanors, with which the president, members of Parliament, and other government officials could be charged. A Constitutional Court interpreted the constitutionality of laws, treaties, and international agreements.

The 1992 constitution was suspended by the new Sassou-Nguesso regime following its military takeover in October 1997. During the subsequent transitional period, the republic was governed by Sassou-Nguesso as self-appointed president with the assistance of a National Transitional Council (see Legislature, below). In November 1998 the regime established a 26-member committee to rewrite the constitution, and in November 2000 the government approved a draft document that was then discussed in March and April 2001 as a key element in a “non-exclusive national dialogue.” With the participation of many opposition groups (but not those closest to Bernard Kolelas and Pascal Lissouba), the draft was approved on April 14, and a final version was endorsed by referendum on January 20, 2002.

The current constitution retains a bicameral parliament and provides for a directly elected president, serving a once-renewable seven-year term, who functions as both head of state and head of government. The president has sole power to appoint and dismiss government ministers, but he does not have the power to dismiss parliament. Nor does the legislature have the power to remove the president. Members of parliament forfeit their seats if they switch parties during the legislative term.

The judicial branch is headed by a Supreme Court. There are also Courts of Appeal, a Court of Accounts and Budgetary Discipline, and a Constitutional Court. Local administration is based on ten regions (subdivided into 76 districts and 5 municipalities) and the capital district, each with an elected Regional Council.

Foreign Relations

The People’s Republic of the Congo withdrew from the French Community in November 1973 but remained economically linked to Paris. In June 1977 it was announced that diplomatic ties with the United States would be resumed after a 12-year lapse, although the U.S. embassy was not reopened until November 1978, and ambassadors were not exchanged until May 1979.

For many years Brazzaville maintained close relations with Communist nations, including the People’s Republic of China, Cuba, and the Soviet Union, signing a 20-year Treaty of Friendship with the USSR in May 1981. While the Congo remained on relatively good terms with its other neighbors, recurrent border incidents strained relations with Zaire (now the Democratic Republic of the Congo) despite the conclusion of a number of cooperation agreements, the most notable being the economic and social “twinning” of the countries’ capital cities in February 1988. Subsequent reports of mutual deportations and a mass exodus of Zaireans from the Congo were downplayed by Brazzaville and Kinshasa as an exaggeration of the international press.

As an active member of the OAU, the Republic of the Congo hosted a number of meetings aimed at resolving the civil war in Chad, although it tacitly endorsed the claims of Chadian leader Hissein Habré by serving as a staging area in 1983 for Habré-supportive French troops. In 1986 President Sassou-Nguesso was selected the OAU’s chief mediator in the Chadian negotiations. In early 1987 he embarked on a nine-nation European tour to emphasize the gravity of the economic situation facing sub-Saharan Africa and the need for effective sanctions against South Africa. Further enhancing the country’s image as regional mediator was the choice of Brazzaville for international peace talks on the Angola-Namibia issue in 1988 and 1989. Because of his key role in the Namibian negotiations Sassou-Nguesso in mid-February 1990 was the first African leader to be welcomed to Washington, by U.S. president George H. W. Bush.

In early 1989 Brazzaville became the first francophone African capital to negotiate a debt swap, trading shares in agriculture, timber, and transport industries to a U.S.-based lender in return for debt reductions. Another financial “first” for the government was the signing of a comprehensive investment agreement with the United Kingdom in May 1989. Later Sassou-Nguesso met with Cameroon’s Paul Biya and Gabon’s Omar Bongo as part of an ongoing effort by the three to create a joint bargaining unit to negotiate with external creditors.

The 1997 overthrow of the Lissouba government reportedly involved a number of foreign powers. President Lissouba claimed that the Sassou-Nguesso forces included a coalition of Rwandan Hutu militiamen and elements of the defeated army of Zaire's Mobutu Sese Seko, though Lissouba's own fighters also were reported to include former Mobutu forces. The participation of the former Zairean elements on the rebel side was apparently enough to induce the new neighboring Kabila regime of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, whose capital of Kinshasa had been shelled from Brazzaville, to send troops in support of Lissouba, even though he had been one of Africa's last supporters of Mobutu. Meanwhile, the apparent entry into the fray by Angola on the side of the insurgents helped turn the tide with tanks and air power. Lissouba had reportedly hired mercenaries from the National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA), the rebel group whose participation gave Angola another reason to support Sassou-Nguesso. The Angolans were also keen to eliminate the separatist movement in Cabinda, an oil-rich Angolan province bordering the Republic of the Congo, where the separatists were suspected of having bases.

The insurrection of 1997, starting just three weeks after the Kabila victory in the neighboring Democratic Republic of the Congo, disturbed Western diplomats and African democrats, who suggested that both conflicts, ostensibly civil wars, were actually regional wars in which African armies crossed their borders to enforce political change in a neighboring country. In October the U.S. State Department protested Angola's involvement in the Republic of the Congo and threatened to cut off aid.

Following the outbreak of a rebellion in the Pool region of the Republic of the Congo in 2002 (see Current issues, below), Angola sent troops to assist the Congolese forces in dealing with the insurrection. (Angola, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and the Republic of the Congo had signed an agreement in 1999 to cooperate regarding border and refugee issues.) Although observers noted problems regarding the fairness and transparency of the 2002 elections under the new constitution, the balloting lent a degree of credibility to Sassou-Nguesso and his government, particularly within Africa.

In early 2006, the Republic of the Congo was chosen over Sudan to head the African Union (AU) as a result of opposition to the situation in Darfur, where the AU had peacekeepers.

Current Issues

As was expected, the exiled opposition questioned—with some justification—the legitimacy of Sassou-Nguesso's overwhelming election victory in March 2002. Nevertheless, even if the president could not fairly claim nearly 90 percent support nationwide, the Congolese voters were presented with no realistic alternative to his continued presidency. Since returning to power in 1997 Sassou-Nguesso had effectively marginalized his two principal opponents, Lissouba and Kolelas, whose refusals to participate in any of the recent government-sponsored reconciliation initiatives, had injured their standing among the internal opposition. Moreover, neither the former president nor the former prime minister, facing arrest if they returned from exile, could meet the constitutional requirement of a two-year residency before seeking the presidency. Prior to the May–June 2002 National Assembly election, the leaders of the principal domestic opposition parties formed the latest in a series of multiparty coalitions, the Convention for Democracy and Salvation (Convention pour la Démocratie et le Salut—Codesa), but their inability to present a unified electoral option left Sassou-Nguesso's political forces in full control of the national government.

The complexity of recent Congolese politics and attendant wide-spread unrest largely derive from historic tribal fault lines that tended to be obscured during the lengthy period of authoritarian rule. Thus, on the eve of the 1997 civil war, the three leading political groups represented quite different regional constituencies: Sassou-Nguesso's previously ruling PCT was strongest in the Cuvette region of the north; President Lissouba's UPADS was rooted in the largely rural Niari, Bouenza, and Lekoumo (“Nibolek”) regions of the south; and Kolelas’s URD dominated in the central Pool region, which includes the capital, and in the coastal oil city of Pointe-Noire.

Reconciling long-standing differences within the country’s diverse population remained Sassou-Nguesso’s principal challenge following his reelection in March 2002. Despite incentives for the country’s many militia groups to surrender their weapons, some remained heavily armed and capable of offering resistance. The most serious violence occurred in the Pool region, where National Assembly elections in May and local balloting in June were postponed. Leading the rebellion was the National Resistance Council (Conseil National de Résistance—CNR), which called for greater autonomy for the region. (See CNR under Rebel Group, below, for additional information.) An estimated 10,000 people were displaced by the fighting. Following the signing of a cease-fire agreement in March 2003, the EU pledged financial aid in support of demobilization of the CNR’s so-called Ninjas, and some 2,300 rebels subsequently were reported to have laid down their arms. However, the region had not been completely pacified as of late 2005. The government also reported in April 2005 that it had thwarted a coup plot among a group of soldiers.

In July 2004 the Republic of the Congo was excluded from the UN-sponsored Kimberley process, under which an international commission was authorized to certify that diamond sales in the region were not funding armed conflict. The oversight group alleged that the Republic of the Congo was being used to smuggle diamonds out of the Democratic Republic of the Congo. (It was estimated that diamond exports from the Republic of the Congo exceeded actual production in the country by as much as 100 times.)

In early October 2005, some opposition parties boycotted the partial senate elections (see Political background, above) based on what they claimed was the government’s pretense of a democratic system. Later that month, Kolelas was allowed to return to Brazzaville to bury his wife, prompting renewed clashes between Ninja rebels loyal to Kolelas and government troops in the city’s southern districts. Subsequently, Sassou-Nguesso, backed by a unanimous vote in the National Assembly, granted Kolelas amnesty.

In December 2005, Kolelas apologized to the Congolese people for his role in the civil war and indicated his interest in reconciliation, leading some observers to speculate that his leaning toward supporting Sassou-Nguesso might cost him his party leadership. Problems plagued the country in late 2005, as floods displaced thousands in Brazzaville, and the head of the state oil company was implicated in corruption (despite government promises of reform). In addition, several generals, among others, were acquitted of killing hundreds of refugees who went missing in 1999, prompting outcry from human rights observers.

Political Parties

The Republic of the Congo became a one-party state in 1963 when the National Revolutionary Movement (Mouvement National Révolutionnaire—MNR) supplanted the two parties that had been politically dominant under the preceding administration: the Democratic Union for the Defense of African Interests (Union Démocratique pour la Défense des Intérêts Africains—UDDIA) and the African Socialist Movement (Mouvement Socialiste Africain—MSA). The MNR was in turn replaced by the Congolese Labor Party (PCT) in 1969, coincident with the declaration of the People’s Republic. On July 4, 1990, the PCT agreed to abandon its monopoly of power, and nearly two dozen opposition groupings were formally legalized as of January 1, 1991. Thereafter, estimates of the number of parties ranged to upward of 100.

Following Denis Sassou-Nguesso’s return to power in 1997, an already complex political party system, in which personal, tribal, and regional loyalties typically overpowered ideology, became further entangled. (See the 1999 Political Handbook for more detailed information about the period preceding the 1999 civil conflict.) In 2002 a reported 141 parties and alliances presented candidates for at least one of the 137 National Assembly seats. At that time the principal formations were Sassou-Nguesso's PCT and the allied United Democratic Forces; the opposition Convention for Democracy and Salvation (Codesa), a new multiparty alliance led by former prime minister André Milongo of the Union for Democracy and the Republic (UDR); the Pan-African Union for Social Democracy (UPADS), led from exile by former president Pascal Lissouba; and the Congolese Movement for Democracy and Integral Development (MCDDI), led from exile by former prime minister Bernard Kolelas.

Government Coalition

Congolese Labor Party (Parti Congolais du Travail—PCT). The PCT monopolized Congolese political life from its launching in 1969 until its agreement in 1990 to allow the formation of opposition groups. In mid-1992 the PCT finished third in the National Assembly election (19 seats) and fifth in the Senate poll (5 seats). On August 2 the party's fall from power was seemingly completed by Sassou-Nguesso's inability to proceed beyond the first round of presidential balloting; however, it allied itself with the UPADS for the second round and was included in the government named on September 1. The alliance broke down shortly thereafter, with the PCT entering into a new coalition with Bernard Kolelas's Union for Democratic Renewal (Union pour la Renouveau Démocratique—URD), a seven-party alliance that included the MCDDI and the RDPS (below).

Although generally listed as a member of the FDU, the PCT ran in its own right at the May–June 2002 National Assembly election, winning 53 seats. PCT candidates won 15 lower-house seats in 1993. In the October 2, 2005 partial Senate elections, the PCT won most of the 30 contested seats, with 21 going to the party's "new direction" wing and 2 to an unidentified dissident faction.

Leaders: Gen. Denis SASSOU-NGUESSO (President of the Republic), Ambroise NOUMAZALAYE (President of the Senate and Secretary General of the Party).

United Democratic Forces (Forces Démocratiques Unies—FDU). The FDU was launched in September 1994 as a six-party coalition of the PCT; the Convention for the Democratic Alternative (Convention pour l'Alternatif Démocratique—CAD), led by Alfred OPIMBA; the Liberal Republican Party (Parti Libéral et Républicain—PLR), led by Nicéphore FYLA; the National Union for Democracy and Progress (Union Nationale pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—UNDP), led by Pierre N'ZE; the Patriotic Union for National Reconstruction (Union Patriotique pour la Reconstruction Nationale—UPRN), led by Auguste-Célestin GONGARAD-NKOUA; and the Union for National Renewal (Union pour le Renouveau National—URN), led by Gabriel BOKILO.

The FDU's leaders came mainly from the northern Congo, in contrast to the central and southern linkages of the URD, the FDU's Opposition Coalition (Coalition de l'Opposition—CO) ally prior to the entry of the Kolelas grouping into the government in January 1995. In June 1997 the FDU assumed the name Democratic and Patriotic Forces (Forces Démocratiques et Patriotiques—FDP) and during the ensuing civil war was closely linked to the Cobra militias, which supported Sassou-Nguesso. The FDP then served as the backbone of the new Sassou-Nguesso government, before returning to the FDU designation in 1998.

By 2002 it was reported that the FDU comprised nearly 30 parties, including the recently formed Club 2000, led by Wilfrid NGUESSO. At the 2002 National Assembly election the FDU won 30 seats, thereby guaranteeing President Sassou-Nguesso a large majority in the lower house.

Leader: Lekoundzou Itihi OSSETOUMBA (President).

Principal Government-Supportive Parties

Rally for Democracy and Social Progress (Rassemblement pour la Démocratie et le Progrès Social—RDPS). Despite dissident withdrawals, the RDPS secured both upper- and lower-house representation in the 1992 legislative balloting.

The party's leader, Jean-Pierre Thystere-Tchicaye, a former PCT member, was eliminated from presidential contention by capturing only 5.8 percent of the first-round vote. At legislative balloting in 1993 the RDPS secured ten seats. Thystere-Tchicaye was named prime minister of a short-lived parallel government named by the Opposition Coalition, and then in mid-1994 was elected mayor of the country's second-largest city, Pointe-Noire.

In late 1996, in anticipation of the scheduled 1997 presidential election, the RDPS joined the Union for the Republic (Union pour la République—UR) of Benjamin BOUNKOULOU and the Movement for Democracy and Solidarity (Mouvement pour la Démocratie et la Solidarité—MDS) of Paul KAYA in forming a coalition called the Movement for Unity and Reconstruction (Mouvement pour l'Unité et la Reconstruction—MUR). After the civil war of 1997 the party was reportedly divided over the extent to which it should cooperate with the government. In 2002 the party's cofounder and former secretary general, Jean-Félix Demba TELO, ran for president as an independent, finishing fourth, with 1.7 percent of the vote.

In 2001 the RDPS had concluded a cooperation agreement with the PCT. In August 2002 Thystere-Tchicaye was selected to serve as speaker of the new lower house.

Leader: Jean-Pierre THYSTERE-TCHICAYE (President of the Party and Speaker of the National Assembly).

Union of Democratic Forces (Union des Forces Démocratiques—UFD). Although close to President Lissouba, the UFD's leader, David Charles Ganao, was reportedly backed by the opposition to succeed André Milongo as National Assembly president because of his reputation for nonpartisanship. Ganao was replaced as prime minister in September 1997 when President Lissouba appointed the MCDDI's Bernard Kolelas to succeed him in an effort to settle the civil war. In January 1998 the UFD broke with the opposition, urging its members to support the reconciliation and reconstruction efforts of the Sassou-Nguesso government, and in February Sebastien EBAO was elected chair. At the time, Ganao was in exile, but by November 2001 he had resumed control of the party and, in a turnaround, concluded an electoral pact with Sassou-Nguesso's PCT.

Leader: David Charles GANA O (Chair).

Opposition Parties and Alliances

Congolese Movement for Democracy and Integral Development (Mouvement Congolais pour la Démocratie et le Développement Intégral—MCDDI). A right-of-center group and former member of the Forces of Change (Forces de Changement—FDC) coalition, the MCDDI was formed in 1989 by Bernard Kolelas, who had served as an adviser to former prime minister Milongo. In 1990 Kolelas was a leader of the opposition movement that successfully campaigned for multipartyism. In the first local and municipal elections in 1992 the party ran second, while Kolelas was runner-up in the subsequent presidential poll, with 38.7 percent of the vote. The MCDDI and the RDPS (above) were the principal members of the Union for Democratic Renewal (Union pour la Renouveau Démocratique—URD) alliance that was launched in mid-1992, and shortly thereafter formed the Opposition Coalition with the PCT.

At legislative balloting in 1993 the MCDDI secured 28 seats, half of the opposition's total. Meanwhile, Kolelas's leadership role in what the Lissouba administration labeled an "armed rebellion," made him a target for progovernment forces, and in October his residence in Brazzaville was hit by artillery fire. In a demonstration of antigovernment sentiment, Kolelas was elected mayor of Brazzaville in July 1994.

Kolelas maintained an opposition stance against the Lissouba government as well as a complex relationship with Sassou-Nguesso, ostensibly an ally but also a rival when the two were 1997 presidential candidates. However, during the four-month insurrection of 1997, Kolelas attempted to mediate between the Lissouba government and the Sassou-Nguesso rebels, before joining the government as prime minister in September. He fled the country when the government fell in October, and the party effectively split into two wings, one remaining loyal to Kolelas and the other, headed by Michel Mampouya, supporting the new interim regime. Mampouya himself accepted a cabinet post and assumed party leadership. In the 2002 legislative election, Kolelas called for a boycott, but Mampouya, despite contending that “there is only one MCDDI,” headed a slate of unsuccessful candidates.

Kolelas was pardoned by the government in late 2005 following his return from exile to bury his wife in Brazzaville.

Leaders: Bernard KOLELAS (in exile), Michel MAMPOUYA, Jacques MAHOUKA.

Pan-African Union for Social Democracy (Union PanAfricaine pour la Démocratie Sociale—UPADS). Previously a member of the National Alliance for Democracy (Alliance Nationale pour la Démocratie—AND), a coalition of 40-plus parties that objected to the 1991 Milongo government, the UPADS ran alone in the 1992 municipal, legislative, and presidential elections. The party’s pre-electoral prospects were bolstered by attracting numerous dissidents from the RDPS (above) and the UNDP, which had been a leading component of the prodemocracy movement (and which later helped form the FDU). In legislative polling at midyear the UPADS secured a plurality of seats in both houses. Following the first presidential round in August, the party concluded a pact with the PCT that ensured the second-round victory of the UPADS candidate, Pascal Lissouba. The alliance, upon which a legislative majority had been forged, was dissolved soon after Lissouba’s inauguration.

The UPADS was the key player in the Presidential Tendency (Tendance Présidentielle), formed prior to the National Assembly balloting of June 1993 by a large number of pro-Lissouba parties (including many that would establish Codesa in 2002). The formation controlled a majority of seats following the second-round repolling in October. The UPADS retained its legislative plurality in 1993 but was weakened on January 27, 1995, by the withdrawal of 12 of its MPs, who complained of being marginalized and subsequently formed a new grouping, the Union for the Republic (UR).

At a UPADS congress on December 30, 1995, Lissouba was reelected to the party’s top post. In addition, a 220-member National Council was formed in an apparent attempt by party leaders to appease its largest internal tendency, the “Reforming Democrats Group,” which complained of the lack of party-wide deliberations. In the midst of the 1997 civil war the UPADS was a principal member of the 40-party self-described peace movement called the Republican Space for the Defense of Democracy and National Unity (Espace Républicain pour la Défense de la Démocratie et de l’Unité Nationale—ERDDUN).

Following the overthrow of President Lissouba, the UPADS split into two wings, one headed by Lissouba from abroad and the other led by Martin Mberi, a member of the National Council who became a minister in the new government of Sassou-Nguesso. In 2001 Mberi left and formed the CNRS (below), but the UPADS remained divided over strategy. It presented a slate of candidates for the 2002 National Assembly election and won three seats, although Lissouba had urged his supporters to boycott the balloting. In March the UPADS presidential candidate, Kignoumbi Kia MBOUN-GOU, had finished second, with 2.8 percent of the vote.

Leaders: Pascal LISSOUBA (in exile), AlphONSE Ongagou DATCHOU (Acting Leader).

Convention for Democracy and Salvation (Convention pour la Démocratie et le Salut—Codesa). Formation of Codesa was announced in late March 2002 by a dozen parties, including those discussed below. An anti-PCT/FDU coalition, Codesa is the latest in a series of unwieldy opposition formations in which individual parties have historically failed to coalesce, thereby diminishing their effectiveness as an electoral force. The UDR won six seats in the 2002 assembly balloting, while the rest of Codesa was credited with two seats. Codesa was factionalized over the question of whether to participate in subsequent local and regional elections. Most of the major Codesa components, including the UDR (below), ultimately boycotted that balloting.

The party's deputy president was initially an independent candidate for president in 2002 but withdrew from the race before the balloting. The party boycotted the partial Senate elections of 2005.

Leaders: André MILONGO (President); Anselme MACKOUMB-OU-NKOUKA and Saturnin OKABE (Vice Presidents); Hervé Ambroise MALONGA.

Union for Democracy and the Republic

(Union pour la Démocratie et la République—UDR). Launched following a split in the MCDDI (above) and subsequently characterized as “close to the Presidential Tendency,” the UDR secured six assembly seats in the first two rounds of balloting in May and June 1993; however, as a result of the second-round rerun in October, its representation dropped to two seats. Its leader, André Milongo, had run for president in 1992 but was eliminated in the first round upon securing only 10.2 percent of the vote. In July 1993 Milongo's selection as assembly president drew sharp criticism from the Opposition Coalition.

In 2002 Milongo withdrew from the presidential election shortly before the March balloting, which he characterized as a “masquerade.” At the subsequent National Assembly election the UDR won six seats to lead the opposition.

Leader: André MILONGO.

Union for Democracy and Social Progress

(Union pour la Démocratie et le Progrès Social—UDPS). The UDPS was formed in 1994 by merger of the Union for Development and Social Progress (Union pour le Développement et le Progrès Social—UDPS), led by Jean-Michel Boukamba-Yangouma, and the People's Party for Social Democracy and Defense of the Republic (Parti Populaire pour la Démocratie Sociale et la Défense de la République—PPDSR), led by Stanislas BATHEAS-MOLLOMB. A breakaway faction of the Union for Social Progress and Democracy

(Union pour le Progrès Social et la Démocratie—UPSD) of former prime minister Ange-Edouard Pougui, the original UDPS had secured one assembly seat in 1993.

In December 2001 the UDPS leader headed formation of a “joint platform,” encompassing some 40 parties and other groups, that had as its initial purpose ensuring a fair and open electoral process for the 2002 elections.

Leader: Jean-Michel BOUKAMBA-YANGOUMA.

Rally for Democracy and Development

(Rassemblement pour la Démocratie et le Développement—RDD). Founded in 1990, the RDD was subsequently a core component of the Forces for Change, the anti-PCT coalition. The RDD won six assembly seats in 1993, with its leader, former president Yhombi-Opango, being named prime minister on June 23. He resigned in August 1996 to run the presidential campaign of President Lissouba.

Leaders: Brig. Gen. Jacques-Joachim YHOMBI-OPANGO (Former President of the Republic), Saturnin OKABE (President).

National Convention for the Republic and Solidarity

(Convention Nationale pour la République et la Solidarité—CNRS). The CNRS was organized in late 2001 by Martin Mberi, who had served as leader of the UPADS following President Lissouba's flight into exile. An advocate of cooperation with the Sassou-Nguesso regime, he had served as minister of reconstruction and urban development until resigning in May 2001, at least in part because of objections to the extent of presidential powers in the proposed constitution. Initially a candidate for president in 2002, he pulled out of the race shortly before the balloting.

Leader: Martin MBERI.

Congolese Renewal Party (Parti Congolais du Renouveau—PCR). The PCR was formed in late 1992 by a group of PCT dissidents who rejected the PCT's alliance with Bernard Kolelas's URD in favor of continued contacts with the recently elected President Lissouba and his UPADS. During the 1997 civil war the party's president was frequently described as a spokesman for Lissouba. In October 2001 the party's secretary general, Wilson Abel Ndessabeka, resigned and went on to help organize the ADP coalition (below).

Leader: Gregoire LEFOUABA.

Republican Convention (Convention pour la République—CR). The CR is led by Hervé Ambroise Malonga, a lawyer and former member of the Constitutional Council who was detained by the government from November 1998 until October 1999. On various occasions he has served as an opposition spokesman.

Leader: Hervé Ambroise MALONGA.

Alliance for Democracy and Progress (Alliance pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—ADP). The ADP, which dates from 2001, reportedly included up to 14 opposition parties, although the establishment of Codesa in March 2002 apparently reduced its ranks to half a dozen parties. Following the May Assembly balloting, some reports indicated that the ADP had joined Codesa.

Leader: Wilson NDESSABEKA.

Patriotic Front for Dialogue and National Reconciliation (Front Patriotique pour le Dialogue et la Réconciliation Nationale—FPDRN). The Paris-based FPDRN is an umbrella grouping of various exiled political leaders close to former president Lissouba. Although it boycotted the initial round of the national dialogue on reconciliation in March 2001, a number of its leaders returned to the Congo for the concluding April session.

Leader: Augustin POIGNET (President); Jean-Michel BOUKA-MBA-YANGOUMA and André MILONGO (Deputy Presidents).

The leaders of four small parties ran for the presidency of the republic in 2002. Angèle BANDO, a nun who first sought the presidency in 1992 and who ran as the nominee of the Party of the Poor (Parti des Pauvres—PAP), finished third, with 2.3 percent of the vote. Luc Adamo MATELA, leader of the Convention for Democracy and the Republic (Convention pour la Démocratie et la République—CDR), garnered 1.6 percent of the vote. Côme MANCKASSA, a journalist by profession and leader of the Congolese Union of Republicans (Union Congolaise des Républicains—UCR), won 1.3 percent. Bonaventure MIZIDY, head of the Republican Liberal Convention (Convention Républicaine des Libéraux—CRL), finished last, with 1.0 percent of the vote.

There are more than 100 additional small parties, many of which have participated since the early 1990s in various alliances of shifting membership. Those parties and coalitions mentioned in the next paragraph are among the most recently reported organizations.

Formation of a Party for the Reconstruction, Reconciliation, and Revival of the Congo (Parti pour la Reconstruction, la Réconciliation, et la Renaissance du Congo—PRRRC), headed by Georges LOUMBABOU, was reported in April 2000. In August 2001 creation of an Alliance for the Congo (Alliance pour le Congo) was announced by Justine KOMBA. In December 2001 Ivan Norbert GAMBE announced formation of a National Center (Centre National) alliance consisting of the National Party (Parti National), the National Convention for Democracy and Development (Convention Nationale pour la Démocratie et le Développement—CNDD), the Republican Convention for Democracy and Progress (Convention Républicaine pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—CRDP), and the Party for National Conscience (Parti pour la Conscience Nationale—PCN). Gambe, who described the Center as devoted to pluralistic democracy and economic progress, stated that the new grouping neither supported the government nor belonged to the opposition. In January 2002 Michel Mboussi NGOUARI, who had been associated with the rebel National Resistance Council (see below), indicated that the National Movement for the Liberation of the Congo (Mouvement Nationale pour la Libération du Congo—MNLC) had been established as a political party; the MNLC had been one

Rebel Group

National Resistance Council (Conseil National de Résistance—CNR). Having emerged from militia groups loyal to former president Lissouba, the CNR's "combat wing" (known as "Ninjas") was led by Frederic Bitsangou (alias Pastor Ntoumi). By 2002 the CNR had reportedly broken with Lissouba in pursuit of greater autonomy for the Pool region. Although some factions (including the MNLC, above) broke from the CNR to form legal parties, the Ninjas launched attacks on government and security sites that forced the postponement of Assembly balloting in Pool in 2002. The CNR and the government signed a cease-fire in March 2003 that called for the exchange of prisoners, demobilization of CNR fighters and their integration into national security forces, and a general amnesty. Nevertheless, some Ninja groups continued to conduct operations against government forces and international aid workers. Bitsangou subsequently called for CNR's inclusion in a proposed new government of national unity, but President Sassou-Nguesso refused that request. In mid-2005 the CNR announced that it hoped to participate as a political party in future elections in Pool.

Leaders: Frederic BITSANGOU, Ane Philippe BIBI.

Legislature

The former 133-member People's National Assembly (Assemblée Nationale Populaire) was dissolved by the 1991 National Conference, with assignment of its functions to an appointed but broadly representative Higher Council of the Republic (Conseil Supérieur de la République—CSR), a 153-member body charged with implementing National Conference decisions.

The constitution endorsed by the CSR in December 1991 and approved by popular referendum in May 1992 provided for a bicameral Parliament (Parlement) composed of a Senate and National Assembly. Following the civil war of mid-1997, the parliament was replaced by the National Transitional Council (Conseil National de la Transition—CNT), whose 75 members were elected in mid-January 1998 at a reconciliation forum attended by more than 1,400 delegates. The CNT candidate lists were put forward by political and legal commissions as well as the government. The forum recommended that the CNT exercise quasi-legislative authority pending the proposed election of a new bicameral assembly following a constitutional referendum. The constitution approved by referendum in January 2002 restored a bicameral system, with the Parliament comprising a Senate and a National Assembly.

Senate (Sénat). The upper house is a 66-member body—6 senators from each region and from the capital—indirectly elected by local and regional councils for a six-year term. Initial balloting was held on July 11, 2002, in all regions except Pool, where violence had forced postponement of voting. (Balloting in Pool had not been held as of October 2005.) In the future, one-third of the membership is to be renewed every two years. Of the 60 seats filled on July 11, 2002, the Congolese Labor Party reportedly won 44 seats; the United Democratic Forces, 12; the Convention for Democracy and Salvation, 1; others (civic organizations and independents), 3. In partial elections held on October 2, 2005, for 30 seats, the PCT won 23, with 6 going to government coalition parties and 1 independent.

President: Ambroise NOUMAZALAYE.

National Assembly (Assemblée Nationale). The lower house has 137 members, directly elected for five-year terms. Balloting is conducted in two rounds, with a majority needed for election. Of the 129 seats filled at the initial election of May 26 and June 23, 2002, the Congolese Labor Party reportedly won 53 seats, the United Democratic Forces, 30; the Union for Democratic Renewal, 6; the Pan-African Union for Social Democracy, 3; the Convention for Democracy and Salvation, 2; other parties, 16; independents, 19. Balloting for the eight seats in the Pool area was postponed because of militia activity and had not been held by mid-2005.

Speaker: Jean-Pierre THYSTERE-TCHICAYE.

Communications

Legislation passed in 2000 outlawed censorship and assured freedom of information, although libeling senior authorities or inciting ethnic conflict are among those offenses punishable by fines. In September 2005 Radio Moka, a community station based in Impfondo, was suspended indefinitely by the government on allegations of “lack of impartiality” in news coverage.

Press

Mweti (7,000) is a French-language daily published in Brazzaville. Other dailies include Aujourd'hui; L'Eveil de Pointe-Noire; and the Journal de Brazzaville.

News Agencies

The official news agency is Agence Congolaise d'Information (ACI); the Agence d'Information d'Afrique Centrale (ADIAC) is also located in the capital. Resident foreign bureaus include Agence France-Presse, the Pan-African News Agency, and Reuters.

Broadcasting and Computing

Broadcasting is dominated by the state-owned Radiodiffusion-Télévision Nationale Congolaise (RTNC), which offers programming in French, English, Portuguese, and a variety of indigenous languages. In April 1997 the government established a new official radio station, Radio Brazzaville. Television service is limited; approximately 62,000 television receivers were reportedly in use in 2003, while 15,000 personal computers served an equal number of Internet users.

CÔTE D'IVOIRE

République de Côte d'Ivoire

---

Note: In November 1985 the United Nations responded affirmatively to a request from the Ivorian government that Côte d'Ivoire be recognized as the sole official version of what had previously been rendered in English as Ivory Coast and in Spanish as Costa de Marfil.

The Country

A land of forests and savannas, with a hot, humid climate, Côte d'Ivoire is the richest and potentially the most nearly self-sufficient state of former French West Africa. Indigenous peoples fall into five principal ethnic groups: Ashanti-Agni-Baoule, Kru, Malinké, Mandé, and Lagoon dwellers. A substantial percentage of the population consists of migrant workers, mostly from Burkina Faso, Ghana, and Mali. There has traditionally also been a sizable non-African expatriate community consisting primarily of Lebanese and French. A majority of the population is either Muslim (40 percent) or Christian (30 percent), with the balance adhering to traditional religious practices. Women constitute approximately 33 percent of the adult labor force, primarily in agriculture; female representation in government is minimal, although there have been several women in recent cabinets.

The economy experienced rapid growth following completion in 1950 of the Vridi Canal, which transformed Abidjan into a deepwater port. An impressive average real growth rate of 7.5 percent was reported for 1960–1980, but a variety of factors led to a severe five-year recession thereafter. Although agriculture now accounts for only one-fourth of total GDP, Côte d'Ivoire is one of the world's leading producers of cocoa and Africa's primary exporter of coffee, bananas, and tropical woods.

The country's image as a model African economy was tarnished in the 1980s by debts attributed to extensive government borrowing in the 1970s. In the first half of the 1990s, sagging cocoa and coffee prices, the decimation of lumber-producing forests, and the government's inability to make debt payments prompted economic reform and diversification efforts. Such measures enabled Côte d'Ivoire to rebound quickly from the inflationary effects of the 1994 CFA franc devaluation, and between 1995 and 1998 the country experienced an average real GDP annual growth rate of more than 6 percent. However, Côte d'Ivoire's fiscal situation remained fragile. The International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank cited poor economic management and a multitude of perceived governance problems as contributing to the country's difficulties. (The IMF temporarily suspended aid in 1999 because of perceived corruption within the administration.) In light of the political uncertainty that followed a military coup in December 1999, the economy shrunk by 2.5 percent in 2000 and 1.5 percent in 2001.

The resumption of civil war in 2002 (see Political background and Current issues, below) strained the economy even further, GDP declining by 3.8 percent in 2003. The IMF and World Bank suspended some aid and debt-reduction programs because of the strife, which also compromised major trade routes through the north of the country to neighboring states and prompted a sharp decline in foreign investment. GDP fell by 2.3 percent in 2004, but a UN-sponsored peace initiative in 2005 offered hope for economic recovery. Also encouraging was the opening of new oil fields in the Baobab region in 2005. The country's oil production reached 80,000 barrels per day, and the transitional government signed additional exploration agreements with several foreign companies. It was also announced in April 2006 that Côte d'Ivoire had qualified for IMF and World Bank debt relief.

Political Background

Established as a French protectorate in 1842, Côte d'Ivoire became part of the Federation of French West Africa in 1904, an autonomous republic within the French Community in 1958, and a fully independent member of the Community in August 1960, although its membership was abandoned with the adoption of its present constitution two months later. Its dominant political figure since the 1940s was Félix HOUPHOUËT-BOIGNY, who in 1944 organized the Syndicat Agricole Africain, an African farmers union, and was one of the founders of the African Democratic Rally (Rassemblement Démocratique Africain—RDA), an international political party with branches in numerous French African territories. As leader of the RDA's Ivorian branch, the Democratic Party of the Ivory Coast (Parti Démocratique de la Côte d'Ivoire—PDCI), Houphouët-Boigny served in the French National Assembly from 1946 to 1959, became prime minister of the autonomous republic in 1959, and served as president from 1960 until his death in 1993.

The postcolonial era was relatively stable by African standards. Most vocal opposition to the regime came from students, and there were periodic demonstrations and university closings. Another source of tension was the presence of many foreign workers, with whom indigenous Ivoirians sporadically clashed in competition for jobs. An alleged antigovernment conspiracy in 1963 resulted in the arrest and imprisonment of numerous party and government officials; however, subsequent evidence indicated that the plot was not a serious threat, and a majority of the prisoners were released. Additional attempts at subversion were suppressed in 1970 and 1973.

The election of an enlarged National Assembly on November 9 and 23, 1980, marked the first time since independence that nominees were not confined to a single PDCI list. Although all 649 office seekers were party members, incumbents captured only 26 of 147 seats, while a similar infusion of new representatives occurred at municipal balloting later in the month.

On May 30, 1990, the government was compelled by increasingly strident protests to authorize opposition party activity. On October 28 Houphouët-Boigny won a seventh term in office, capturing a reported 82 percent of the vote, while Laurent GBAGBO, leader of the opposition Ivorian Popular Front (Front Populaire Ivoirien—FPI), was credited with the remainder. On November 7, one day after the National Assembly approved creation of the post, the highly regarded governor of the Central Bank of West African States (Banque Centrale des États de l'Afrique de l'Ouest—BCEAO), Alassane OUATTARA, was appointed prime minister.

On December 7, 1993, Houphouët-Boigny died in his Yamoussoukro palace of complications

Political Status: Independent since August 7, 1960; present constitution adopted October 31, 1960; under de facto one-party regime prior to legalization of opposition parties on May 30, 1990; constitution suspended and governmental authority assumed by the military following a bloodless coup on December 24, 1999; new constitution providing for a return to civilian government approved by national referendum on June 23–24, 2000.

Area: 124,503 sq. mi. (322,463 sq. km.).

Population: 15,366,672 (1998C); 17,176,000 (2005E).

Major Urban Center (2005E): Abidjan (4,100,000). In March 1983 the interior city of YAMO USSOUKRO (484,000, 2005E) was designated as the nation's capital. However, as of late 2005 many government offices remained in Abidjan (the former capital), and most foreign governments were also still maintaining their embassies there.

Official Language: French.

Monetary Unit: CFA Franc (official rate July 1, 2006: 513.01 francs = $1US). (The CFA franc, previously pegged to the French franc, is now permanently pegged to the euro at 655.957 CFA francs = 1 euro.)

President: Laurent GBAGBO (Ivorian Popular Front); elected on October 20, 2000, and inaugurated for a five-year term on October 27 to succeed Gen. Robert GUEÏ, who had come to power via a coup on December 24, 1999; term extended for one year following UN Resolution 1633, which endorsed the postponement of elections scheduled for October 2005.

Prime Minister: Charles Konan BANNY (nonparty); appointed by the president on December 5, 2005, and sworn in on December 7 to succeed Seydou DIARRA (nonparty); formed new multiparty government on December 28, 2005.

stemming from an operation earlier in the year. On the same day, Prime Minister Ouattara held a cabinet meeting in the presidential offices; however, that evening National Assembly president Henri Konan BÉDIÉ announced that he had assumed presidential power in accord with a 1990 constitutional amendment. Two days later Ouattara resigned, apparently unwilling to cooperate with Bédié, his (then) PDCI rival. On December 9 the Supreme Court confirmed Bédié's succession, and the following day the president appointed Daniel Kablan DUNCAN prime minister. On December 15 Duncan, a former economy minister described as a "technocrat," named a 24-member interim cabinet. Underscoring his professed dedication to economic reform, the prime minister retained the economy and finance ministry for himself.

In preparation for presidential and legislative elections scheduled for late 1995, the PDCI-dominated National Assembly voted overwhelmingly on December 8, 1994, to adopt a new electoral code that the opposition had strongly criticized as biased in favor of the government. The run-up to the 1995 poll was marked by violent protests against the code, its new provisions (requiring parents and grandparents of presidential candidates to have been of Ivorian birth) having thwarted the aspirations of Ouattara, Bédié's main challenger and the consensus leader of the opposition Republican Front (Front Républicain—FR). Moreover, the government refused to appoint an independent electoral commission, and in September it banned all demonstrations for three months. However, the FR continued its antigovernment marches, and on October 2 at least five people were killed when government forces attempted to disperse protestors. Meanwhile, the field of presidential contestants (which had numbered 11) continued to dwindle as candidates announced their intention to observe the FR's call for an electoral boycott. Consequently, at presidential balloting on October 22, President Bédié easily won reelection, capturing 96.25 percent of the tally while his sole adversary, Francis WODIÉ of the Ivorian Workers' Party (Parti Ivoirien des Travailleurs—PIT), secured a meager 3.75 percent. Although the government claimed a 62 percent voter participation rate, the opposition reported much lower figures.

Following a meeting with Bédié in early November 1995, the FR announced its intention to participate in legislative balloting. However, the FR proved unable to agree on a joint list of candidates; consequently, at assembly balloting on November 26 the PDCI retained all 148 of its seats while the FPI and the Rally of Republicans (Rassemblement des Républicains—RDR) managed only small gains.

Prime Minister Duncan submitted his pro forma resignation on January 24, 1996, although he was immediately reappointed by the president. The “continuity government” announced on January 26 largely mirrored the previous one, although a new ministry was created for Yamoussoukro, the titular national capital.

In May 1996 the government confirmed rumors that a coup attempt led by senior military officers had been thwarted prior to the 1995 assembly balloting. (The administration had previously maintained that the clashes were between government security forces and opposition militants.) On August 10 the administration removed Minister of Sports Gen. Robert GUEÏ, who was the army chief of staff in 1995 and had subsequently been linked by junior military officials to the “conception and preparation” of the coup plot (a charge he denied). Moreover, between November 1996 and January 1997 the government dismissed eight senior officers, including Gueï, from the armed forces and penalized at least four others for their alleged roles in the 1995 coup attempt.

On June 30, 1998, the PDCI-dominated assembly approved constitutional amendments that dramatically increased the scope of the chief executive's powers and, two years after it was first proposed, provided for the establishment of an upper legislative body, or Senate (see Constitution and government, below). Opposition legislators boycotted the assembly vote, asserting that the PDCI had ignored their legislative recommendations, including a call for the amendments to be submitted to a national referendum. Subsequently, antigovernment demonstrations erupted in Abidjan in September; however, the ruling party and the FPI began discussions that yielded a “good governance,” prodemocracy pact on December 24. Four days later the National Assembly took action on a key element of the agreement, adopting a draft law that authorized the government to grant amnesty to opposition activists jailed during the 1995 unrest. Electoral reform was the focus of the accord's other major directives, most notably the financing of presidential election campaigns and the establishment of a national electoral commission. Meanwhile, although the agreement elicited nearly universal acclaim from Ivorian political leaders, the praise was tempered somewhat by opposition demands that the government begin negotiations with all of the major parties. Subsequently, in March 1999, the PDCI launched talks with the RDR on establishing the conditions necessary for elections in 2000 and the drafting of a “consensus constitution.” However, the discussions quickly stalled, and attention in Abidjan turned toward the potential for an electoral confrontation between Bédié and Alassane Ouattara, the latter having reportedly announced his intention to relinquish his position as IMF deputy secretary general to mount a presidential campaign as the RDR's standard-bearer.

Growing dissatisfaction over Bédié's autocratic rule contributed to his overthrow in a bloodless military coup on December 24, 1999. General Gueï, the dominant figure in the junta, assumed the presidency of a transitional National Committee of Public Salvation (Comité National de Salut Public—CNSP), promising he would cede power within a year to a democratically elected president. In January 2000 membership on the CNSP was expanded to include the PDCI, FPI, and RDR, although ultimate control remained in the hands of the military. Gueï subsequently appeared to be maneuvering to consolidate his power in anticipation of a possible run for the presidency, despite his previous pledge that he would not be a candidate. The question of candidate eligibility was significant in the preparation of the new draft constitution, which originally required that a person needed only one parent of Ivorian nationality to be a legal candidate, a provision that would have permitted Ouattara to run. However, at Gueï's insistence, the draft basic law was redrawn to require that both parents of a presidential candidate had to be Ivorian citizens. In early October, the Supreme Court, headed by Gueï's former legal adviser, confirmed that Ouattara's candidacy was invalid, as was that of Emile Constant BOMBET, the potential candidate of the RDR.

The new constitution was approved in a national referendum July 23–24, 2000 (see Constitution and government, below, for details). Due to administrative and logistical problems, presidential balloting was subsequently postponed until October 22. Gueï and the FPI's Laurent Gbagbo were the primary contenders, a boycott by the PDCI and RDR having reduced the rest of the field to several candidates from minor parties. Voter turnout was low, only 35 percent, in large part due to the RDR boycott. When initial results suggested a Gbagbo victory, Gueï attempted to dismiss the Independent Electoral Commission and declare himself victor. However, massive street demonstrations erupted to protest Gueï's actions, and he was forced to abdicate power and accept the legitimacy of the victory by Gbagbo, who was sworn in as president on October 27. One day later Gbagbo named Pascal Affi N'GUESSAN of the FPI to head a new cabinet dominated by the FPI but also including members of the PDCI and PIT.

New assembly balloting was held on December 10, 2000, the RDR boycotting the poll because Ouattara was again declared ineligible to be a candidate. The FPI scored considerable gains, securing 96 seats to 77 for the PDCI. (Elections were not held for 28 northern seats due to violence related to the RDR boycott.)

The PDCI significantly improved its legislative standing in the January 14, 2001, balloting for 26 of the 28 seats that had not been filled the previous December, winning 17 of the contests. However, the FPI subsequently established a more comfortable plurality by negotiating a cooperation agreement with independent legislators who in February formed the new, pro-Gueï Union for Democracy and Peace in Côte d'Ivoire (Union pour la Démocratie et la Paix de la Côte d'Ivoire—UDPCI). On January 24 a new cabinet, again led by N'Guessan, was appointed, with the FPI, PDCI, and PIT accepting portfolios. Municipal elections in March 2001 were most noteworthy for the success of the RDR, which, among other things, shed some of its reputation as a "one man" or "one region" party by gaining control of local councils throughout the country.

Under heavy international pressure, President Gbagbo convened a Forum for National Reconciliation in October 2001, which upon its conclusion in January 2002 had heard from Gbagbo, Bédié, Gueï, and Ouattara. The "big four" attended negotiations together in late January to review the forum's proposals, which, among other things, called for Ouattara to be issued a nationality certificate. Based on the success of those talks, the RDR joined the new government named on August 5.

In the wake of efforts to resolve a bitter civil war that broke out in September 2002, Gbagbo in January 2003 appointed Seydou DIARRA, a well-respected independent, to lead an ultimately star-crossed national unity cabinet. Following the postponement of national elections scheduled for October 2005, independent Charles KONAN BANNY was named to head a new transitional government that was installed on December 28 (see Current issues, below, for information on the Diarra and Banny governments).

Constitution and Government

The 1960 constitution provided the framework for a one-party presidential system based on the preeminent position of President Houphouët-Boigny and the PDCI. Although other parties were not proscribed, no challenge to the PDCI was permitted until May 1990 when the government authorized the registration of opposition groups. The president, elected by universal suffrage for a seven-year term (extended from five in 1998), had wide authority, which was enhanced in November 1990 to include the designation of a prime minister. The cabinet (selected from outside the legislature) was responsible only to the chief executive. In September 1997 President Bédié established the National Strategy and Prospects Council, an advisory body whose members were to serve three-year terms. In 1998 the National Assembly approved constitutional amendments that, in addition to lengthening the president's mandate, removed presidential term limits and authorized the chief executive to postpone elections (and the release of polling results) and appoint some members of a proposed new Senate. Furthermore, the amendments delineated new eligibility requirements for the nation's top post, including ten years of residency immediately predating presidential polling and proof of Ivorian ancestry for both of the aspirant's parents.

The membership of the unicameral National Assembly was increased from 147 to 175 in 1985. By virtue of a 1990 change in the basic law, the president of the assembly, who was theretofore designated to head an interim government upon the death, resignation, or incapacity of the chief executive, was authorized to complete the remainder of the mandate. In October 1996, officials of the ruling PDCI proposed the establishment of a legislative upper house, or Senate. The new body was created by constitutional amendment in 1998; however, as of mid-1999 there had been no further reports of efforts to organize the Senate (one-third of whose members were to be presidential appointees).

The military junta that assumed power in a bloodless coup on December 24, 1999, immediately suspended the constitution. However, a new basic law was presented for a national referendum July 23–24, 2000, with 87 percent of the voters, according to official reports, approving the document. Much of the language in the 1960 constitution was retained in the 2000 version. A strong presidential system was confirmed; among other things the president retained the authority to appoint the prime minister and, in consultation with the prime minister, the Council of Ministers. The president's term was reduced to five years, renewable once. The post is selected through direct universal suffrage in two-round (if necessary) majoritarian balloting. Restrictions were also placed on presidential candidates regarding their parentage and formal nationality, again prompting substantial controversy (see Political background, above). (The National Assembly in December 2004 passed legislation to allow citizens with only one Ivorian parent to run for office, although President Gbagbo insisted a national referendum would be required for the change to be implemented.) The National Assembly remained the sole legislative body, the Senate, which had never been established, being formally abolished. For the first time, the new constitution included detailed protection for human rights. Other noteworthy provisions included one granting civil and penal immunity for people involved in the 1999 coup.

The judiciary is headed by a Constitutional Council comprising three members appointed by the president and three appointed by the president of the assembly. There are also a High Court of Justice (whose members are elected by the assembly), a Court of Cassation, and local appeals courts. The new constitution also created the post of a presidentially appointed mediator of the republic to serve as a national ombudsman.

The country is divided for administrative purposes into 58 departments, each headed by a prefect appointed by the central government, but with an elected council. Municipalities (numbering nearly 200) have elected councillors and mayors.

Foreign Relations

In line with its generally pro-French orientation, Côte d'Ivoire has adhered to a moderate policy in African affairs and a broadly pro-Western posture. In the 1980s, relations with neighboring states were periodically strained, particularly in the wake of growing xenophobic sentiment in Côte d'Ivoire, especially among the mainly Christian population in the south. Although ties with neighboring Burkina Faso had previously been weakened because of its links with Libya and Ghana, Burkinabe leader Capt. Blaise Compaoré, who led the 1987 overthrow of Col. Thomas Sankara's government, long enjoyed close personal relations with Houphouët-Boigny. Relations with the Central African Republic, cool upon the provision of sanctuary to former emperor Bokassa, improved once the ex-sovereign departed for Paris in late 1983. Relations with Israel, which had been broken off in 1973, were reestablished in December 1985, an Arab League threat in late 1986 to break ties with Côte d'Ivoire resulting in transfer of the Ivorian embassy from Jerusalem to the less controversial location of Tel Aviv.

In the early 1990s, France, the country's leading financial donor and cultural influence, appeared to lose interest in maintaining a high profile in its former protectorate. In 1990 France stunned Côte d'Ivoire by refusing Houphouët-Boigny's request for troops to help quell an uprising of military conscripts, and in 1991 the number of French nationals employed in Côte d'Ivoire fell to its lowest level in several decades. In April 1992 Abidjan responded to French immigration restrictions with a requirement that French nationals apply for Ivorian visas; it reacted in a similar manner to the imposition of visa requirements for Ivorians by Denmark, Italy, Germany, Norway, and the United Kingdom in early 1995.

Burdened by the presence of 200,000 refugees along its western border, Côte d'Ivoire's diplomatic efforts to resolve the Liberian crisis continued through 1992. In September 1994, 15,000 refugees from renewed fighting in Liberia were reported to have crossed into Côte d'Ivoire in the largest such influx since 1992.

Cross-border violence continued to mar Côte d'Ivoire's relations with its neighbors in 1996. Consequently, in September, Abidjan, citing the need to stem attacks on its nationals as well as foreign refugees, established a military "operational zone" along its border with Liberia. Meanwhile, relations with Guinea were strained after its troops occupied an Ivorian border village in March. In April 1997 the Bédié government and the United Nations Office of the High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) reached agreement on a plan to repatriate the approximately 200,000 Liberians still living in Côte d'Ivoire.

The Organization of African Unity (OAU, subsequently the African Union—AU) and the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) did not agree with General Gueï's successful efforts to bar the presidential candidacy of Alassane Ouattara in the summer of 2000, and they subsequently exerted considerable diplomatic pressure to undermine Gueï's legitimacy. The international community, particularly the European Union (EU), also strongly urged all of the key political figures in Côte d'Ivoire to participate fully in the reconciliation process so as to permit resumption of aid.

Current Issues

More than 300 people died in violence that erupted following the October 2000 presidential election, much of it centered on conflict between the RDR and security forces as well as between the predominantly Muslim northern supporters of the RDR and the predominantly Christian southern supporters of the FPI. Continued political tension and unrest in the military were reflected in an unsuccessful military coup attempt in early January 2001. Fighting was also reported in the west between Ivorians and migrant workers from Burkina Faso who generally supported the RDR.

Hope was widespread in August 2002 that a return to stability was in the offing in view of the RDR's decision to join the cabinet. However, in mid-September a group of soldiers about to be demobilized launched antigovernment attacks that soon left more than half of the country in the hands of the new Patriotic Movement of Côte d'Ivoire (Mouvement Patriotique de la Côte d'Ivoire—MPCI). France sent additional troops to augment its 500-member permanent garrison in case a quick evacuation was required but declined to assist the government militarily, calling the conflict a domestic issue. For its part, the Gbagbo administration blamed the insurrection on supporters of General Gueï, who was killed under murky circumstances in a seemingly nonmilitary situation on the first day of fighting.

With the predominantly Muslim MPCI holding significant portions of the northern and central regions, the government in late September 2002 reportedly instituted harsh countermeasures that led the RDR to withdraw its support for the administration. Meanwhile, two new rebel groups (the Movement for Justice and Peace [Mouvement pour la Justice et la Paix—MJP] and the Ivorian Popular Movement for the Greater West [Mouvement Populaire Ivoirien du Grand Ouest—MPIGO]) had emerged in the west. With the conflict having developed into a full-blown civil war, France deployed some 2,500 troops to try to maintain order in Côte d'Ivoire, while regional leaders initiated mediation efforts. In January 2003 an agreement was reached under the auspices of ECOWAS under which Gbagbo was to remain president while allowing security authority to be assumed by a new prime minister. For their part, the rebel groups agreed to end hostilities, with both sides being guaranteed amnesty for any human rights violations. ECOWAS peacekeepers joined French forces in an effort to patrol the cease-fire line.

The appointment of Seydou Diarra as prime minister in January 2003 appeared to be a promising development, since he was widely respected by opposition groups as well as the international community. (Diarra's subsequent willingness to negotiate with the rebels reportedly contributed to friction between him and President Gbagbo.) After intense negotiations, it was announced that a new cabinet would be formed comprising ten members from the FPI, eight from the PDCI, seven from the RDR, seven from the MPCI, one from the MJP, one from the MPIGO, and additional ministers from small established parties. However, the unity cabinet essentially collapsed before it began work when antigovernment protests (asserting that Gbagbo had reneged on his pledge regarding the prime minister's authority) were met with violent suppression. Fighting resumed in several areas, and even international observers were unable to pinpoint which side was to blame.

In June 2003 the UN Security Council authorized the creation of UN peacekeeping for Côte d'Ivoire, but fighting continued, the three rebel groups coalescing in August under the banner of the New Forces (Forces Nouvelles—FN). Meanwhile, progovernment demonstrations for the most part appeared to be conducted by the Coordination of Young Patriots (Coordination des Jeunes Patriotes—CJP), which was strongly criticized for alleged responsibility for a campaign of violence against opposition leaders and foreigners. The CJP was banned in September, but its hallmark attacks continued. For his part, Guillaume SORO, the leader of the FN, announced his forces would not lay down their arms until Gbagbo surrendered his security power. In response, the UN imposed an arms embargo on the country in November 2004. However, subsequent reports indicated that the government and rebel groups were able to violate the embargo easily.

By the end of 2004 some 250,000 Ivoirians had fled the civil war to neighboring countries, and 600,000 people had been displaced internally. In addition, tensions had grown between the government and French peacekeepers, French forces having "destroyed" the Ivorian air force after a government attack on a rebel base had accidentally left nine French soldiers dead.

President Gbagbo and FN leader Soro met at a summit in April 2005 sponsored by South African President Mbeki and reached yet another tentative peace agreement. As stipulated in the May accord, the rebels began to disarm in late June, while rebel and government forces started to withdraw from conflict zones. The cease-fire continued throughout the summer, despite ethnic clashes in cocoa-producing areas that left more than 100 dead in June. (Gbagbo deployed special police and security forces in Abidjan in the wake of that turmoil.)

In July 2005 the assembly endorsed legislation required by the recent peace agreement that provided for public financing of political campaigns, a new voter registration campaign, reform of citizenship laws, and establishment of a new election commission in preparation for the presidential and legislative elections scheduled for October. However, the FN temporarily withdrew from the peace process in September, claiming that South African officials were exhibiting a bias toward the Gbagbo administration. Consequently, upon the recommendation of UN Secretary General Kofi Annan that the elections be postponed, the UN Security Council on October 21 endorsed the extension of Gbagbo's presidential mandate for up to 12 months. The UN also called upon Gbagbo to appoint a new prime minister with enhanced powers to lead a new transitional government.

The AU and ECOWAS endorsed the UN's decision, but the FN rejected the action and demanded that Soro be named as the nation's new prime minister. Collaterally, FN forces "remobilized," and Gbagbo created new elite security forces to deal with the potential resumption of fighting. However, in November the FN returned to negotiations that, after 16 other candidates were rejected, led to the appointment of Charles Banny, a governor of the Bank of West African States, to the premiership. His government comprised representatives of the FPI, FN, PDCI, MPCI, PIT, RDR, and UDPCI and was seen as maintaining the necessary balance among the main factions.

Prime Minister Banny, an independent described as "pro-French," soon clashed with President Gbagbo over the extent of Banny's authority. Consequently, the UN established an International Working Group (IWG) to assist the new transitional government. In one of its first decisions, the IWG in January 2006 announced that it would not endorse the proposed extension of the mandate of the current assembly (a primary source of support for Gbagbo). The president's supporters (many of them youths commonly referred to as the "young patriots") subsequently launched a series of protests that included the occupation of UN headquarters in Abidjan and attacks on foreign businesses. In response, the UN threatened to impose travel restrictions and financial sanctions on any Ivorian leaders perceived as encouraging the unrest, and general calm returned. On January 27 Gbagbo announced that the mandate of the assembly had in fact been extended for up to one year; the IWG described the extension as a violation of the spirit of the peace agreements but took no formal action. A number of parties boycotted the subsequent assembly activity.

Another round of peace talks was held by the main factions in February 2006, with tentative agreement being reached for new national elections in October. Collaterally, the UN bolstered its peacekeeping mission by transferring troops to it from the successful UN initiative in Liberia. Voter registration began in May, along with an intensified campaign to disarm former rebel groups and pro-government militias. However, as of early September it appeared that the elections might be postponed once again.

Political Parties

On May 30, 1990, Côte d'Ivoire ceased to be a one-party state with the legalization of nine opposition groups; at first-round legislative balloting on November 25 their number exceeded two dozen, while in May 1991 the government recognized 14 more, some of which were alleged to be PDCI fronts created to dilute opposition cohesiveness. By July 1993 40 of the reported 82 active political parties had been recognized. The July 2002 constitution provided for unrestricted party activity "within the law."

In advance of presidential elections scheduled for October 2005, opposition groups formed a loose electoral coalition known (in homage to former president Houphouët-Boigny) as the Rally of Houphouëtistas for Democracy and Peace (Rassemblement des Houphouëtistas pour la Démocratie et la Paix—RHDP). The group subsequently became commonly known as the G7 after the FN agreed to work with the coalition. (G7 referred to the fact that it contained seven groups—the FN, PDCI, RDR, UDPCI, MFA, and two minor parties.) In July 2005 the RDR's Alassane Ouattara and the PDCI's Henri Bédié held discussions in Paris aimed at agreement on a single opposition candidate to challenge Gbagbo in the planned presidential elections. Alphonse Djedjé Mady (the secretary general of the PDCI) was appointed as the nominal leader and spokesperson for the G7. After the presidential elections were postponed, the G7 organized mass protests against Gbagbo in Abidjan in November 2005. The G7 supported the proposed appointment of the FN's Guillaume Soro as prime minister in December 2005 but endorsed Charles Banny after his appointment. The G7 also organized mass protests and a boycott of the assembly after it was announced that the mandate of the assembly would be extended. The parties and groups within the G7 continue to operate as independent entities and use the coalition only as a coordinating body.

Government Parties

Ivorian Popular Front (Front Populaire Ivoirien—FPI). The FPI was founded by history professor Laurent Gbagbo, who was granted a state pardon for dissident activity upon his return to Côte d'Ivoire in September 1988. At its founding congress on November 19–20, 1989, the FPI adopted a platform calling for a mixed economy with a private sector emphasis. Legalized on May 30, 1990, and becoming thereafter the unofficial leader of a coalition that included the PIT and USD, the party called for President Houphouët-Boigny's resignation, the appointment of a transitional government, and freedom of association. It endorsed Gbagbo's bid to succeed the incumbent chief executive at its first legal congress on September 16, 1990. Angered at apparent electoral irregularities and claiming fraudulent tallying, FPI supporters clashed with government forces during and after the October 28 presidential balloting, with 120 reportedly being arrested. Thereafter, in mid-1991 the FPI refused to join in an opposition call for a national conference, insisting instead that Houphouët-Boigny's government resign.

Reportedly believing that the FPI would be offered the premiership in a transitional government, Gbagbo publicly backed Henri Konan Bédié of the PDCI in the months prior to Houphouët-Boigny's death in December 1993. However, when it became apparent that Bédié would not extend such an offer, Gbagbo broke off negotiations with the ruling party.

In February 1994 Gbagbo called for repeal of the constitutional amendment detailing presidential succession procedures, the establishment of a transitional government, the creation of a West African currency, and the holding of "clean" elections. In July 1995 Gbagbo called the government's electoral code "legalized fraud," and he subsequently withdrew from the presidential campaign.

In July 1998 the FPI boycotted an assembly vote on constitutional amendments that increased the chief executive's powers. (An FPI call for the amendments to be subjected to a national referendum had been rejected by the PDCI.) Subsequently, the party reportedly played a leading role in organizing antigovernment demonstrations in Abidjan. On a more conciliatory note, the FPI and the government agreed in October to hold discussions on the country's "political future," and in December the two signed an accord that was described as starting them on the "road to achieving a new national consensus."

In the wake of the December 1999 coup, the FPI joined the cabinet in January 2000 after having successfully lobbied for greater representation than originally offered by General Gueï. Following Gbagbo's election as president of the republic in October 2000, he appointed the FPI's Pascal Affi N'Guessan to head a new FPI-dominated cabinet. N'Guessan, who had managed Gbagbo's presidential campaign, succeeded Gbagbo as FPI leader in mid-2001.

Following the renewed civil war in 2002, a number of propresidential groups affiliated with the FPI emerged. Foremost among them was the CJP (see Current issues), led by a close Gbagbo ally, Charles Blé GOUDE. The CJP organized a number of demonstrations in support of the president, but it was banned in September 2003 for the alleged use of violence and intimidation.

Following the extension of President Gbagbo's term in October 2005, the FPI filled seven seats (the most of any party) in the new transitional government installed in December. Subsequently, there were reports in early 2006 that Gbagbo was forming a new political organization to support his upcoming bid for reelection, apparently in an effort to broaden his base of appeal.

Leaders: Laurent GBAGBO (President of the Republic), Pascal Affi N'GUESSAN (Former Prime Minister and President of the Party), Sylvain Miaka OURETA (Secretary General).

Democratic Party of Côte d'Ivoire (Parti Démocratique de la Côte d'Ivoire—PDCI). Established in 1946 as a section of the African Democratic Rally (Rassemblement Démocratique Africain—RDA), the PDCI (often referenced as the PDCI-RDA) was the country's only authorized party for the ensuing 44 years, although other parties were never formally banned. The PDCI held its ninth congress in October 1990, five months after the decision to allow political competition. Although reportedly divided into fractious "old and new guards" in response to the country's mounting socioeconomic problems, the congress endorsed President Houphouët-Boigny's bid for a seventh term, proposed the naming of a prime minister, and revived the office of party secretary general.

Divisions within the party were underscored in mid-1992 when Djény KOBINA, a spokesman for the party's so-called progressive wing, called for the release of opposition leaders detained in February. Thereafter, despite the PDCI's denial of intraparty conflict, Prime Minister Alassane Ouattara announced in early 1993 that he would seek the party's 1995 presidential nomination, thus highlighting the widening gulf between his northern, Muslim followers and the southern, predominantly Catholic supporters of the National Assembly president and presidential "heir apparent," Henri Konan Bédié. In the wake of Houphouët-Boigny's death and Bédié's subsequent succession, there were reports that Ouattara was planning to launch his own party and that the old-line "barons of houphouëtisme" had aligned with him and were demanding an extraordinary PDCI congress to reconsider succession policy. Nonetheless, Bédié was unanimously elected party chair in April 1994.

In June 1994 Kobina's wing, including a number of senior party officials, broke from the party to form the RDR (below), with a loss to the PDCI of nine assembly seats. Subsequently, Ouattara, who had accepted an IMF post in May, disavowed his PDCI membership. (He joined the RDR in 1995.)

Discouraged by the party's primary system, a number of PDCI legislative aspirants reportedly opted to compete as independents in the general elections in 1995; however, there was no indication of their having secured seats. Intraparty dissension continued to plague the PDCI through early 1996; nevertheless, the group was victorious in 158 of the 196 municipal electoral contests held on February 11.

At the PDCI's tenth congress, held October 28–31, 1996, party delegates reportedly approved the establishment of a "high leadership," which included an executive branch and five commissions (political, economic, human resources, security, and environmental affairs). Furthermore, a 400-member deliberative body that had been created in 1990 was expanded into a 1,500-member parliament led by a "council of old ones" and charged with aiding the party president in charting "major political directions." In addition, Bédié and Laurent Dona-Fologo were reelected as party president and general secretary, respectively.

Following the overthrow of the PDCI government by the coup of December 1999, Bédié fled to Paris, from where he attempted to retain control of the party. Although disagreement existed regarding the extent to which the PDCI should cooperate with the coup leaders, several party members joined the transitional government of Gen. Robert Gueï, who subsequently tried to secure the PDCI nomination for president of the republic. However, the party rejected Gueï's plan, nominating instead former interior minister Emile Constant BOMBET, whose candidacy was ultimately ruled invalid by the Supreme Court. The PDCI accepted three posts in the new cabinet appointed in October 2000 and has participated in all subsequent cabinets.

Bédié returned from France in October 2001 and was reelected as PDCI president at the April 2002 party congress. In 2003 the PDCI temporarily suspended participation in the government along with other parties. However, its ministers rejoined the cabinet in August 2004.

Bédié returned in September 2005 from one year of self-imposed exile in order to participate in the presidential election then scheduled for October. After those elections were postponed, Bédié was active in negotiations regarding the installation of a new transitional cabinet in which the PDCI was accorded four seats. In March 2006 a PDCI congress selected Bédié as the party's candidate in the presidential poll scheduled for October.

Leaders: Henri Konan BÉDIÉ (President of the Party and Former President of the Republic), Laurent DONA-FOLOGO (Former Secretary General), Alphonse Djedjé MADY (Secretary General).

Ivorian Workers' Party (Parti Ivoirien des Travailleurs—PIT). The PIT was formally recognized in May 1990, although a PIT rally three months later was dispersed by government forces. The party captured one seat in the November legislative balloting. Three PIT leaders were among those given prison terms in March 1992 for involvement in the February rioting.

In view of President Houphouët-Boigny's manifestly poor health upon his return to Côte d'Ivoire on November 19, 1993, the PIT and other opposition parties called for the establishment of a transitional government, declaring that "there is a political vacancy in the presidency and a political, institutional, economic, and social stalemate."

At presidential balloting in 1995 PIT leader Francis Wodié captured less than 4 percent of the vote. Wodié's candidacy had been sharply criticized by his opposition colleagues, who cited the PIT leader's own advocacy of a boycott in 1990. In August 1998 Wodié was appointed to the Bédié government, while party members also held posts in 2000 in the transitional governments of Gen. Gueï. Wodié secured 5.7 percent of the vote in the October 2000 presidential balloting, and the PIT participated in all of the subsequent FPI-led cabinets, including the 2005 transitional government.

Leader: Francis WODIÉ (General Secretary and 2000 presidential candidate).

Rally of Republicans (Rassemblement des Républicains—RDR). The essentially centrist RDR was launched in June 1994 by ex-PDCI members, led by Djény Kobina and a number of ministers from the government of former prime minister Alassane Ouattara who had operated within the parent formation for the previous three years as a "reform" wing loyal to Ouattara. On October 5, at the RDR's first official press conference, Kobina announced that the new grouping controlled 30 National Assembly seats and had a membership of 1.5 million. Initially, the RDR could claim only to have "excellent relations" with Ouattara, whose willingness to campaign under the RDR's banner was considered necessary to the party's electoral viability. However, in January 1995 Kobina announced that Ouattara had joined the party.

In July 1995 the RDR officially endorsed Ouattara as its presidential candidate; however, the government refused to rescind the electoral code, and on August 2 Ouattara, who was ineligible under the new provisions, abandoned his campaign plans, citing his respect for Ivorian laws, even those he considered "aberrant." Thereafter, on November 22 the constitutional court rejected Kobina's appeal of the nullification of his legislative candidacy, both of his parents reportedly being Ghanaian.

Meanwhile, the RDR had earlier helped to launch the Republican Front (Front Républicain—FR), an electoral alliance that also included the FPI and the UFD (see ADS, below). In April 1995 the FR initiated a series of public meetings aimed at pressuring the government to withdraw the controversial electoral code. FR-organized protest rallies continued throughout 1995, and in October the front spearheaded an "active boycott" of the presidential elections. Subsequently, after a meeting with President Bédié in early November, the coalition agreed to participate in legislative elections. However, staggered by its leaders' legal problems and unable to agree on a joint candidate list, coalition members fared poorly at assembly balloting. Flagging coalition cohesiveness was underscored by the decision by the RDR and the FPI to forward competing candidates in more than 100 municipal electoral races in February 1996.

Djény Kobina died in October 1998, and he was succeeded as RDR secretary general by Henriette Dagbi Diabaté, who reportedly became the first woman to hold such a powerful post in an Ivorian political party. Thereafter, in the wake of the signing of the government-FPI accord, the RDR urged the Bédié administration to begin separate negotiations with each of the prominent opposition parties.

In early 1999 Ouattara confirmed that he would be the RDR's standard-bearer at the 2000 presidential elections. A number of party leaders were detained late in the year, prompting violent antigovernment demonstrations in RDR strongholds.

The RDR initially welcomed the December 1999 coup, since General Gueï was widely viewed as supportive of Ouattara, who returned from exile on December 29. A number of RDR members were appointed to Gueï's transitional cabinet, but relations between the RDR and military leaders subsequently deteriorated as Gueï began to retreat from his pledge not to run for president. Several RDR officials were detained in the wake of an aborted coup in early July 2000, while Ouattara's subsequent exclusion from the presidential campaign (see Political background, above) signalled a final rupture with Gueï. Following Gueï's failed attempt to manipulate the presidential balloting in October, RDR supporters fought with security forces as well as partisans of the FPI. The RDR's "outside" status continued into December, Ouattara being ruled ineligible to compete in the legislative balloting, which the RDR boycotted. However, some RDR members ignored the boycott and campaigned for assembly seats under the rubric of the RDR–Movement of Moderate Activists and Candidates (RDR–Mouvement des Militants et Candidates Modérés—RDR-MMCM).

Secretary General Diabaté was briefly detained by the government following the unsuccessful coup attempt in January 2001, and a number of RDR members remained imprisoned throughout the summer in connection with the violence that had erupted in late 2000. Despite the government pressure, the RDR performed very well in the March 2001 local elections, securing victories in the south, west, and center of the country as well as the traditional RDR strongholds among the northern Muslim population.

Following the outbreak of civil war in 2002, Ouattara went into exile, from where he reportedly became the opposition's leading presidential candidate. However, President Gbagbo continued to consider Ouattara ineligible to run due to his failure to meet residency and citizenship requirements, despite a National Assembly ruling to the contrary in December 2004. In December 2005 Gbagbo issued a decree allowing Ouattara to campaign in future presidential elections, and Ouattara returned from exile in January 2006. Meanwhile, the RDR had received five seats in the December 2005 transitional government.

Leaders: Alassane Dramane OUATTARA (Former Prime Minister), Amadou Gon COULIBALY (Deputy Secretary General), Henriette Dagbi DIABATÉ (Secretary General).

New Forces (Forces Nouvelles—FN). The FN was launched in August 2003 by the three main rebel groups opposing the Gbagbo government, including the Patriotic Movement of the Côte d'Ivoire (Mouvement Patriotique de la Côte d'Ivoire—MPCI), the predominately Muslim northern grouping that had initiated the 2002 civil war. The other FN components were the Movement for Justice and Peace (Mouvement pour la Justice et la Paix—MJP) and the Ivorian Popular Movement for the Greater West (Mouvement Populaire Ivoirien du Grand Ouest—MPIGO), both based in western regions of the country and formed after the 2002 strife had commenced. In April 2003 the leader of the MPIGO, Félix DOH, was killed by government forces.

Under the Marcoussis Accords of January 2003, the three FN components were allocated posts in the cabinet of March 2003. However, the FN representatives did not take their seats until August 2004.

In 2005 friction was reported within MPIGO over the apparent efforts by Roger BANCHI (one of MPIGO's leaders and a cabinet minister) to forge closer relations with President Gbagbo. (Banchi left the cabinet in July, officially for personal reasons.) After the FN's efforts to have Guillaume Soro (the FN secretary general) named prime minister failed in October, the FN was given six posts (including Soro as minister of state for reconstruction and reintegration) in the new transitional cabinet installed in December. However, the status of the MJP and MPIGO within the FN at that point was unclear, some reports indicating that the MJP and MPIGO had left the ranks of the umbrella organization.

Leader: Guillaume SORO (Secretary General).

Union for Democracy and Peace in Côte d'Ivoire (Union pour la Démocratie et la Paix de la Côte d'Ivoire—UDPCI). The UDPCI was launched in February 2001 by former members of the PDCI who had left that party to support Gen. Robert Gueï in the 2000 presidential campaign. (As many as 14 of the successful “independent” candidates in the December 2000 assembly balloting were subsequently identified as belonging to the PDCI dissident group; most were believed to have participated in the formation of the UDPCI.) General Gueï was elected president of the UDPCI in May 2002. On September 19, 2002, Gueï was killed when fighting erupted between government forces and rebels. The UDPCI joined the national unity government in 2002 and participated in the 2005 transitional government.

Leaders: Paul Akoto YAO, Alassane SALIF N'DIAYE (Secretary General).

Democratic Citizen's Union (Union Démocratique Citoyenne—UDCY). Launched in January 2000, the UDCY criticized the PDCI for failing to make the “necessary changes” to promote national “reconciliation and reconstruction.” UDCY Chair Theodore Mel Eg, mayor of the Cocody District in Abidjan, was credited with 1.5 percent of the vote in the October 2000 presidential balloting, while the party secured one seat in the December legislative poll. The UDCY was given one cabinet post in 2003, and Eg was appointed minister of culture and Francophone affairs in the 2005 transitional government.

Leader: Theodore MEL EG (Chair).

Movement of Forces for the Future (Mouvement des Forces pour l'Avenir—MFA). The MFA, formed in 1995, was credited with one seat in the December 2000 legislative balloting, although little other information concerning the grouping was available. In 2003 the MFA joined the national unity government, and it remained in the 2005 transitional government.

Leader: Kobenan ANAKY (Secretary General).

Other Parties and Groups

Alliance for Democracy and Socialism (Alliance pour la Démocratie et le Socialisme—ADS). The launching of the left-wing ADS was announced in mid-2000 by the PPS, Renaissance, Party for the Protection of the Environment (Parti pour la Protection de l'Environnement—PPE), and the Party for National Reconstruction and Democracy (Parti pour la Reconstruction Nationale et la Démocratie—PRND). However, there were few subsequent reports of ADS activity.

Party for Social Progress (Parti pour le Progrès Social—PPS). The predominantly ethnic Djoula PPS is led by Bamba Morifère, reportedly one of the wealthiest opposition politicians. During the run-up to legislative balloting in November 1995 Morifère was jailed for alleged financial fraud and subsequently given a four-month suspended sentence, a verdict the FPI's Gbagbo decried as “shameful.”

The PPS had been one of the members of the Union of Democratic Forces (Union des Forces Démocratiques—UFD), an opposition grouping launched in December 1992. Other UFD members had included the PIT, the UND, the Social Democratic Movement (Mouvement Démocratique et Social—MDS), and the African Party for the Ivorian Renaissance (Parti Africain pour la Renaissance Ivoirienne—PARI). PPS leader Morifère had served as president of the UFD. His proposed candidacy (presumably under the ADS rubric) for the 2000 presidential election was rejected by the Supreme Court.

Leader: Bamba MORIFÈRE.

Renaissance. Initially known as FPI-Renaissance, this grouping was formed on September 27, 1996, under the leadership of Don Mello Ahoua, who claimed that his faction would remain within the FPI but would work independently to promote “democracy” within the larger body. However, in July 1997, following an alleged shooting attack on Ahoua's car and threats to faction members, the group withdrew from the FPI.

Leader: Don Mello AHOUA (Coordinator).

Union of Social Democrats (Union des Sociaux-Démocrates—USD). The USD describes itself as a “compromise between capitalism and socialism.” Longtime leader Bernard ZADI-ZAOUROU resigned as USD general secretary in July 2000. The presidential candidacy of his successor, Jerome Climanlo Coulibaly, was subsequently rejected by the Supreme Court. Following the outbreak of civil war in 2002, Coulibaly emerged as a major opposition figure to the Gbagbo regime.

Leader: Jerome Climanlo COULIBALY (General Secretary).

Republican Party of Côte d'Ivoire (Parti Républicain de la Côte d'Ivoire—PRCI). The PRCI is a right-wing grouping organized in 1987. In September 1995 party leader Robert Gbai-Tagro withdrew from the presidential race, citing electoral code shortcomings as his reason. In January 2000 Gbai-Tagro announced his support for General Gueï, leader of the recent coup.

Leader: Robert GBAI-TAGRO.

National Union for Democracy (Union Nationale pour la Démocratie—UND). In December 1994 the UND was credited with one assembly seat.

Leader: Amadou KONE.

Other recently formed groups and parties include the New Democratic Alliance of Côte d'Ivoire for Justice, Development, and Peace, formed in October 2005 by Charles Ble Ble, who had been a ranking member of the FPI and the mayor of Saioua; and the Coalition of Republican Forces of Côte d'Ivoire (Coalition des Forces Républicaines de Côte d'Ivoire—COFREPCI), formed in 2005 by former Army chief of staff Mathias DOUÉ as an opposition group to Gbagbo's regime. (For a list of small parties from the 1990s, some of which may still be active, see the 1999 and 2000–2002 Handbooks.)

Legislature

The National Assembly (Assemblée Nationale) is a unicameral body with 225 members (raised in 2000 from 175) serving five-year terms. The assembly was suspended following the December 1999 coup, but balloting for a new legislature was held on December 10, 2000, with the Ivorian Popular Front winning 96 seats; the Democratic Party of Côte d'Ivoire (PDCI), 77; the Ivorian Workers' Party, 4; the Rally of Republicans/Movement of Moderate Activists and Candidates (RDR-MMCM), 1; the Democratic Union of Côte d'Ivoire, 1; the Movement of Forces of the Future, 1; and independents, 17. Balloting was not held at that time for 28 seats in northern constituencies because of unrest affiliated with an election boycott by the main faction of the RDR. Balloting for 26 of the outstanding seats was conducted on January 14, 2002, with the PDCI winning 17 to increase its total to 94, the RDR-MMCM winning 4 to increase its total to 5, and independents winning 5 to increase the total number of independents to 22. The mandate of the current assembly was extended for up to one year by a controversial presidential decree in late January 2006 (see Current issues).

President: Mamadou KOULIBALY.

REPUBLIC OF DJIBOUTI

République de Djibouti (French)

Jumhuriyah Djibouti (Arabic)

The Country

Formerly known as French Somaliland and subsequently as the French Territory of the Afars and the Issas, the Republic of Djibouti is strategically located in East Africa just south of the Bab el Mandeb, a narrow strait that links the Gulf of Aden to the Red Sea. Djibouti, the capital, was declared a free port by the French in 1949 and has long been an important communications link between Africa, the Arabian peninsula, and the Far East. The largest single population group (40 percent) is the ethnically Somalian Issa tribe, which is concentrated in the vicinity of the capital, while the Afar tribe (35 percent) is essentially nomadic and ethnically linked to the Ethiopians. The remaining 25 percent consists largely of Yemeni Arabs and Somalis.

Serviced by a number of international airlines and heavily dependent on commerce, Djibouti also provides Ethiopia with its only railroad link to the sea. The country is largely barren, with less than 1 percent of its land under cultivation, few known natural resources, and little industry; consequently, the government relies extensively on aid from France and other Western donors, several Arab countries, and various multilateral organizations. Real GDP declined by around 3 percent a year in the first half of the 1990s, before stabilizing in 1996, as structural adjustment measures negotiated with the International Monetary Fund (IMF) in April began to bring a measure of credibility to government finances. Meanwhile, it was estimated that about 40 percent of the potential work force was unemployed. In 1998 and early 1999

Djibouti's economic agenda was dominated by continued negotiations with the IMF and France, the latter's decision to reduce its military presence having sparked concern in Djibouti about potential financial repercussions. In October the IMF approved a new three-year loan to support the government's reform program, encouraging privatization of state-run enterprises, market liberalization, and change in labor regulations. The IMF, while urging the government to maintain fiscal austerity, also called for greater attention to poverty-reducing efforts and other social programs. IMF disbursements were suspended for six months in 2000–2001, the fund demanding that greater attention be

Political Status: Former French dependency; proclaimed independent June 27, 1977; new constitution with provisions for limited multiparty elections in effect as of September 1992; limit on the number of parties lifted in September 2002.

Area: 8,958 sq. mi. (23,200 sq. km.).

Population: 755,000 (2005E), including nonnationals. There has been no census since 1960–1961.

Major Urban Center (2005E): DJIBOUTI (599,000).

Official Languages: French and Arabic.

Monetary Unit: Djibouti Franc (official rate July 1, 2006: 174.70 francs = $1US).

President: Ismail Omar GUELLEH (Popular Rally for Progress); elected on April 9, 1999, and inaugurated for a six-year term on May 8 in succession to Hassan GOULED Aptidon (Popular Rally for Progress); reelected (as the sole candidate) to another six-year term on April 8, 2005.

Prime Minister: Dileita Mohamed DILEITA (Popular Rally for Progress); appointed by the president on March 4, 2001, and sworn in on March 7 to succeed Barkat GOURAD Hamadou (Popular Rally for Progress), who had announced his resignation on February 6; reappointed on May 21, 2005.

paid to the “inefficiency of public expenditures” and a lack of transparency in government finances. Real GDP growth of only 1 percent and inflation of 2.4 percent were reported for 2000. Subsequently, the administration was forced to grapple with social unrest triggered by two oil price increases, budgetary pressures associated with Djibouti’s hosting of the Somalia National Peace Conference and the need to demobilize the bulk of the soldiers who had been recruited to deal with hostilities in northern Afar regions in the 1990s but were no longer needed in view of the recent formal peace accord.

Pervasive poverty and high unemployment remained priorities addressed by a 2004 review. The government pledged to improve revenue collection, adopt free-trade-zone legislation, and promote development of the port of Doreleh. In late 2005 the economy was bolstered by a funding agreement with the World Bank for $17 million to support the education and energy sectors. In accordance with the country’s first self-monitored program with the IMF, plans were under way for reforms in taxes, banking, and public administration. Real GDP growth for 2005 was projected to be about 4.5 percent, up from 3 percent the previous year, with inflation contained to about 3 percent.

Political Background

The area known as French Somaliland was formally demarcated by agreement with Emperor Menelik II of Ethiopia in 1897 following a half-century of French penetration that included a series of treaties with indigenous chiefs between 1862 and 1885. Internal autonomy was granted in 1956, and in 1958 the voters of Somaliland elected to enter the French Community as an Overseas Territory. Pro-independence demonstrations during a visit by President de Gaulle in August 1966 led to a referendum on March 19, 1967, in which a majority of the predominantly Afar voters opted for continued association with France. Somali protest riots were severely repressed, and the name of the dependency was changed to Territory of the Afars and the Issas to eliminate exclusive identification with the Somali ethnic group.

On December 31, 1975, a UN General Assembly resolution called on France to withdraw from the territory, and during 1976 extensive discussions were held in Paris between leading tribal representatives and the French government. In the course of the talks, France tacitly agreed that the Afar president of the local Government Council, Ali AREF Bourhan of the National Union for Independence, no longer represented a majority of the population; consequently, Paris approved a new nationality law governing eligibility for a second referendum on independence. Aref subsequently resigned, and on July 29 a new ten-member council, composed of six Issas and four Afars, was formed.

On May 8, 1977, 98.8 percent of the electorate voted for independence, while simultaneously approving a single list of 65 candidates for a Chamber of Deputies. Following the passage of relevant legislation by the French Parliament, the territory became independent as the Republic of Djibouti on June 27. Three days earlier, Issa leader Hassan GOULED Aptidon of the African People's League for Independence had been unanimously elected president of the Republic by the chamber. On July 12 President Gouled named Afar leader Ahmed DINI Ahmed to head a 15-member Council of Ministers.

On December 17, 1977, Dini and four other Afar cabinet members resigned amid charges of "tribal repression," the duties of prime minister being assumed by the president until the designation of a new government headed by Abdallah MOHAMED Kamil on February 5, 1978. Mohamed Kamil was in turn succeeded by Barkat GOURAD Hamadou on September 30, 1978. Gourad, an Afar advocate of "detrribalization," formed subsequent governments on July 7, 1981 (following the reelection of President Gouled on June 12), on June 5, 1982 (after a legislative election on May 21), and on November 23, 1987 (after balloting on April 24).

Although all of the cabinets formed since independence had ostensibly been designed to strike a careful balance in tribal representation and all three prime ministers named by President Gouled had been Afars, charges of Issa domination persisted, and most members of the opposition Djibouti People's Party (Parti Populaire Djiboutien—PPD) formed in August 1981 were from the ethnic minority. The regime's immediate response was to arrest PPD leader Moussa Ahmed IDRIS and the party's entire 12-member executive committee. However, all were released by early January 1982, after the enactment of legislation establishing Gouled's Popular Rally for Progress (Rassemblement Populaire pour le Progrès—RPP) as the sole authorized party.

Despite a constitutional limit of presidential tenure to two terms, Gouled was permitted to run again in 1987 on the ground that he had initially been appointed by the Chamber of Deputies rather than having been popularly elected. As sole candidate, the incumbent was reported to have secured 90 percent of the vote in the April 24 poll.

In 1990 the regime's reported backing of the rebels in Somalia sparked internal conflicts between the Issa majority and Afar/Gadabursi kinsmen of Somalian leader Siad Barre; as a consequence, the government on January 9, 1991, arrested 68 people for alleged involvement in a "vast plot" to incite "civil war" between the Afar and Issa communities. While most were soon released, the detention of seven "ringleaders," including former chief minister Ali Aref Bourhan, was confirmed by the interior ministry on January 17; three days later it was announced that "about 20" individuals had been formally charged with attempting to overthrow the government. At midyear, ethnic clashes were reported between Issas and Oromos, and in October Afar rebel forces, having coalesced as the Front for the Restoration of Unity and Democracy (Front pour la Restauration de l'Unité et de la Démocratie—FRUD), launched attacks on government installations.

In response to the fighting, France urged Djibouti to institute "rapid" liberalization of its political system, and on November 27, 1990, the government revealed plans for a referendum "to consult" the population "on changes to be made in the political domain." On December 19 it announced that the referendum would be held in May 1992, but only if rebel activity had ceased. Eleven days later an RPP spokesman reported that legislative elections to be held immediately after the referendum would be open to candidates from "several parties." Meanwhile, the slaying by government forces of 40 Afars and the wounding of 50 others in a Djibouti slum severely eroded what support remained for the regime. Thereafter, 14 parliamentarians led by Mohamed AHMED Issa ("Cheiko") formed a parliamentary opposition group, and in mid-January 1992 the health and public service ministers resigned, with the former decrying the regime's "war logic." Concurrently, a French spokesman insisted that the escalating civil war was an "internal matter" not covered by a defense agreement concluded between the two countries in 1977. Nonetheless, a French military contingent was deployed in late February to implement a cease-fire between government and FRUD units. Subsequently, a committee formed by President Gouled presented a preliminary draft of a new constitution, which was not, however, acceptable to the rebels, since it would retain a strong presidency.

On June 20–24, 1992, representatives of most of the leading opposition groups (under the banner of the United Opposition Front of Djibouti [Front Uni de l'Opposition Djiboutienne—FUOD] under Political Parties and Groups, below) met in Paris to forge a common front against the Gouled regime. The session concluded with a demand for a “transitional government led by a prime minister from the ranks of the opposition,” who would be charged with initiating a democratic transitional process that would include the drafting of a multiparty constitution.

In a national referendum on September 4, 1992, a reported 97 percent of the voters approved the draft constitution presented by the administration, providing for, among other things, multiparty activity, although a separate vote also endorsed a proposal to limit the number of legal parties to four. Subsequently, FRUD and other opposition members of FUOD boycotted the legislative balloting of December 18 (at which the RPP was awarded all of the seats) as well as the presidential election of May 7, 1993, at which President Gouled defeated four other candidates by a wide margin in securing reelection to a fourth term.

In mid-1994 a split developed within FRUD between supporters of its newly designated president Ali MOHAMED Daoud, who favored peace talks with the government, and his recently ousted predecessor, former prime minister Dini, who, along with most of the FUOD leadership, supported continued resistance. The peace talks, which reportedly had commenced as secret negotiations between Prime Minister Gourad and the “New FRUD” secretary general, Ougoureh KIFLE Ahmed, continued intermittently for several months, eventually yielding a reconciliation agreement on December 26 that in a cabinet reshuffle of June 8, 1995, provided the Kifle faction with two ministerial portfolios.

The December 1994 accord yielded greatly reduced hostilities in 1995, although by early 1996 dissension within the government had become intense, with the justice minister and RPP secretary general, Moumin BAHDON Farah, leading those who contended that the agreement had not brought real peace and stability to Djibouti. The dominance of the pro-accord camp was demonstrated on March 27 when Bahdon was dismissed from the government, together with Ahmed BOULALEH Barre, the defense minister. Bahdon and his allies subsequently launched a new opposition group, Group for the Democracy of the Republic. Collaterally, the episode showed that in the bitter contest between possible successors to an increasingly infirm Gouled, ascendancy had been gained by the president’s nephew and chef de cabinet, Ismail Omar GUELLEH.

In assembly elections on December 19, 1997, the RPP—“New FRUD” electoral coalition captured all 65 seats (54 by the RPP and 11 by “New FRUD”), garnering a reported 78.55 percent of the vote tally compared to 19.19 percent for the Party of Democratic Renewal and 2.25 percent for the National Democratic Party. On December 28 President Aptidon reappointed Gourad as head of a reshuffled government.

In February 1999 President Gouled announced that he would not seek reelection at balloting scheduled for the following April, and the RPP promptly chose Guelleh as its presidential candidate. Guelleh captured 74.09 percent of the vote on April 9, 1999, easily outdistancing his sole competitor, Moussa Ahmed Idriss. Despite gaining the endorsement of the newly formed Unified Djiboutian Opposition (see Political Parties, below), Idriss garnered just 25.78 percent of the vote. Prime Minister Gourad was reappointed on May 10, and a reshuffled cabinet was formed two days later.

After 22 years in office, Prime Minister Gourad announced his resignation in February 2001; he was succeeded on May 7 by Dileita Mohamed DILEITA, a former chief of the presidential staff. In the wake of a comprehensive agreement between the administration and FRUD, several FRUD members were included in the new cabinet installed on July 4. In addition, in September 2002 President Guelleh announced the establishment of a full multiparty system. The ruling Union for a Presidential Majority still won all 65 seats in balloting for the Chamber of Deputies on January 10, 2003. Also undercutting the administration's stated goal of broader governmental participation, Guelleh was the only candidate in the April 8, 2005, presidential balloting. He appointed a new government on May 22.

In regional and communal elections on March 10 and 31, 2006, the RPP won overwhelming victories, further solidifying the president's power down to the local level.

Constitution and Government

The Chamber of Deputies established under the 1977 independence referendum was empowered to act as a constituent assembly pending adoption of a formal constitution. In that capacity it approved a number of measures in 1981 dealing with the presidency and the legislature. On February 10 it decreed that candidates for the former could be nominated only by parties holding at least 25 chamber seats, with balloting by universal suffrage and election for a six-year term that could be renewed only once. Following the presidential election of June 12 (at which the incumbent was the only candidate), the opposition PPD was organized, but it was denied legal status on the basis of a "National Mobilization" law approved on October 19 that established a one-party system. As a result, all of the candidates at the parliamentary elections of 1982 and 1987 were presented by the government-supportive RPP. A new constitution providing for a qualified multiparty system (with a maximum, for at least ten years, of four parties being permitted) became effective in September 1992. The president, who appoints the prime minister and otherwise exercises broad authority, is limited to two six-year terms. In September 2002 the government eliminated all restrictions on party registration.

The colonial judicial structure, based on both French and local law, was technically abolished at independence, although a successor system based on Muslim precepts remains imperfectly formulated. For administrative purposes the republic is divided into five districts, one of which encompasses the capital. Local elections to regional assemblies, envisioned under recent decentralization plans negotiated by the government with groups such as FRUD, were held in March 2006.

Foreign Relations

Djibouti's small size and its mixed population of Ethiopian-oriented Afars and Somali-oriented Isas make it highly vulnerable in a context of historic friction between its two neighbors. Despite bilateral accords in 1986 and 1987, Somalia has long regarded Djibouti as a "land to be redeemed," while the nearly 500-mile railroad between the port of Djibouti and Addis Ababa was viewed by Ethiopia as vital to its export-import trade during the lengthy revolt in its Red Sea province of Eritrea. The country's security depends in part on a French garrison, which was of crucial importance during the prolonged Soviet military presence in Ethiopia and South Yemen.

In January 1986 President Gouled hosted a six-nation conference to set up an Intergovernmental Authority on Drought and Development in East Africa (IGADD, subsequently the Intergovernmental Authority on Development—IGAD), which marked the first meeting between the Ethiopian head of state, Lt. Col. Haile-Mariam, and President Siad Barre of Somalia since the two countries went to war in 1977. The other states participating in the conference as IGADD members were Kenya, Sudan, and Uganda. Subsequently, peace talks between the 1977 combatants, mediated by Djibouti, were held in Addis Ababa in May, with Gouled reaffirming his country's role in the peace negotiations during a state visit to Ethiopia in September. A second IGADD summit was held in March 1988, with the Djibouti president being elected to a second term as the authority's chair.

The repatriation of some 50,000 Ethiopians who had fled to Djibouti during the Ogadan conflict began in 1983 but was subsequently halted because of the drought; it was resumed in December 1986 amid charges that the “voluntary” program would in fact expose the refugees to potential mistreatment. By 1987 it was estimated that fewer than 20,000 expatriates remained, with Djibouti insisting that they too would have to leave since resources were lacking for their assimilation.

The early 1990 intensification of the Somalian civil war, coupled with Djibouti’s continued tacit support of the Somalian National Movement (SNM), an Issa rebel group, resulted in a deterioration of relations between Djibouti and Mogadishu and mutual border militarization. Midyear diplomatic efforts, including a heads of state meeting in May, were inconclusive, and in October Somalian claims of military intrusion yielded closure of the maritime border, while igniting ethnic hostilities in Djibouti. Meanwhile, observers described Djibouti’s dependence on French security forces and aid (renewed for ten years in July) as motivation for publicly siding with allied forces in the Gulf crisis, despite a number of Djibouti-Baghdad military and economic agreements.

The outbreak of ethnic violence in 1991 severely strained Djiboutian-French relations. In October Paris, which had deployed troops in March to disarm Ethiopian soldiers fleeing into Djibouti, dismissed the government’s claims that Ethiopian Afars were seeking to establish a “greater Afaria” and ordered its troops to remain in their barracks. Concurrently, France pressed the Gouled regime to accelerate political liberalization and enter into cease-fire negotiations with the rebels. In November France rejected Djibouti’s request for supplies and labeled the regime’s international efforts to solicit weapons as “intolerable.” Following the government’s violent suppression of Afar slum dwellers in Djibouti in December, Paris warned Djibouti that it would suspend economic aid unless there was immediate “democratization,” and in February 1992 France intervened to enforce a standoff between government and rebel forces that continued for the remainder of the year. Relations with Paris improved in the wake of the December 1994 peace accord that the government signed with a FRUD faction, with French defense minister Charles Dillon confirming, during a visit to Djibouti in January 1996, that France would maintain its military presence in the republic. On the other hand, as French economic aid continued its precipitous decline (from $77 million in 1977 to $21 million in 1996) a number of Djiboutian economic planners rallied behind efforts to broaden ties with other countries in the region.

An unresolved territorial dispute flared in mid-April 1996 when Djiboutian and Eritrean forces clashed in a northern border area claimed by Eritrea on the strength of a 1935 colonial-era map. In June the Organization of African Unity (OAU, subsequently the African Union—AU) authorized Djibouti, Burkina Faso, and Zimbabwe to mediate the border dispute; however, in November Eritrea severed relations with Djibouti, accusing the Gouled administration of supporting Ethiopia’s military campaign. (In early 1999 the OAU named a new negotiating team after the delegates from Burkina Faso and Zimbabwe refused to enter Eritrea without their banned Djiboutian colleagues [see separate articles on Eritrea and Ethiopia for more details].) Normal relations were reestablished with Eritrea following the conclusion of the conflict, in part assisted by the two countries’ similar stances regarding events in Somalia.

In late 2001 and early 2002 Djibouti was frequently referenced as having achieved a higher international profile due to its potentially strategic geographic location in regard to the West’s war on terrorism. Among other things, President Guelleh agreed to allow the United States to establish a military base in Djibouti, while also endorsing an ongoing French military presence. At the same time, the Guelleh regime, cognizant of the status of Islam as the nation’s majority religion, evinced a strongly pro-Arab and pro-Palestinian posture in regard to the turmoil in the Middle East. In September 2003 Djibouti expelled some 80,000 illegal immigrants, mostly Ethiopians and Somalis. It was subsequently reported that U.S. concerns over possible attacks on Western interests had led the government of Djibouti to detain several hundred suspects.

Current Issues

The first months of President Guelleh’s administration were marked by the same heavy-handed tactics for which its successor was noted. Domestic and international critics charged the new government with the illegal detention and abuse of “New-FRUD” sympathizers and other human rights abuses, while a crackdown on the opposition press (see News Media, below) and seemingly unnecessarily harsh treatment of Moussa Ahmed Idriss of the PPD (see introduction to Political Parties and Groups, below) were also condemned. However, the government’s image shed some of its tarnish in February 2000 when a cease-fire was signed with FRUD militants on May 12 (see FRUD, below, for details).

In early December 2000 it was reported that a group of police officers had taken over several government buildings as part of a coup attempt after their commander had been demoted by the president. However, the mini-revolt was put down within eight hours and was not considered an influence in the subsequent resignation of longtime Prime Minister Gourad, whose health reportedly had recently declined significantly. New Prime Minister Dileita, an Afar (in the power-sharing tradition that has held since independence), did not name a new cabinet immediately as negotiations continued with FRUD on a permanent political settlement. Under the accord, the government pledged to help rebuild areas damaged by the earlier insurgency and agreed to intensify decentralization efforts. Although some FRUD demands (such as greater Afar representation in the civil service and establishment of an independent judiciary) were not fully addressed, the Front was sufficiently satisfied to agree to join the new “national unity” government and to start preparing for formal party status. Despite the lifting of the restrictions on the number of parties in 2002, the opposition alleged fraud and other irregularities in the January 2003 legislative elections. (Opposition leader Ahmed Dini Ahmed bitterly criticized the electoral structure, which denied antigovernment parties any seats though they had won 37 percent of the vote.) On a more positive note, new electoral rules not only permitted but required female candidates for the first time. In fact, ten seats in the Chamber of Deputies were set aside for women.

The opposition parties boycotted the April 2005 presidential balloting, citing what they perceived as a continued lack of transparency in the electoral process. President Guelleh nevertheless ran an “active campaign” in order to boost voter turnout.

In late 2005 clashes were reported between Afar rebels and government troops, precluding a full reconciliation in the wake of Guelleh’s election. Following regional and communal balloting in March 2006, the FRUD’s hopes for decentralization were shattered after the party’s losses to Guelleh’s RPP in every area.

Drought was a major concern in early 2006 in the Horn of Africa, prompting U.S. president George W. Bush to pledge some $92 million to the countries facing starvation, including Djibouti. The UN appealed for $426 million for the same relief effort.

Political Parties and Groups

Negotiations with the French that culminated in the referendum of May 8, 1977, were conducted by a United Patriotic Front representing five of the territory’s major political groups. In preparing a list of candidates for the assembly election that accompanied the referendum, the Front acted under the name of the Popular Independence Rally (Rassemblement Populaire pour l’Indépendance—RPI). Its successor, the Popular Rally for Progress (RPP), was the only participant in the presidential election of June 1981 and continued as the country’s only legal political party until the legislative balloting of December 1992.

In July 1997 former justice minister Moumin Bahdon Farah announced in Paris that the Group for the Democracy of the Republic (GDR) had formed a coalition with the United Opposition Front of Djibouti (FUOD) and a faction of the Party of Democratic Renewal (PRD) led by Kaïreh ALLALEH Hared to campaign, according to the Indian Ocean Newsletter, for “the installation of a democratic legal framework” in anticipation of legislative elections in late 1997. However, a strong opposition challenge failed to materialize as, in addition to the PRD, both the Front for the Restoration of Unity and Democracy (FRUD) and the National Democratic Party (PND) suffered from factionalization.

In anticipation of upcoming presidential elections, by early 1999 a number of opposition leaders had declared their intention to campaign for the chief executive's post, including: Abbate Ebo Adou of the Action for Revision of Order in Djibouti (ARDD), the PND's Aden Robleh Awaleh, and the PRD's Abidillahi Hamareiteh. However, in February the aforementioned withdrew from the race as their parties, under the reported direction of the GDR's Bahdon, formed an electoral alliance, subsequently styled the Unified Djiboutian Opposition (Opposition Djiboutienne Unifiée—ODU), which then chose Moussa Ahmed IDRISSE, a former independence fighter who had only recently resigned from the RPP, as its standard-bearer. Following his defeat in the 1999 presidential polling, Idriss was arrested in September for "attacking the morale of the armed forces" by publishing an article critical of the government in Le Temps. Idriss, along with 19 of his supporters, were found guilty and sentenced to four months imprisonment; however, Idriss was released in December after being given amnesty at the beginning of Ramadan, and he was subsequently invited to resume his role as a member of the Chamber of Deputies.

According to a separate measure approved in connection with the September 1992 constitutional referendum, a maximum of only four legal parties was established for a ten-year period. However, on September 4, 2002, President Guelleh announced the introduction of a full multiparty system. Some eight parties participated in the 2003 legislative elections, four each in progovernment and opposition electoral blocs.

Government-Supportive Parties

Union for a Presidential Majority (Union pour la Majorité Présidentielle—UMP). Formed as an electoral bloc prior to the 2003 legislative elections by the following four groups, the UMP secured all 65 seats in that balloting with a reported 62 percent of the vote. The four groups also backed Guelleh in the 2005 presidential election.

Leaders: Ismail Omar GUELLEH (RPP), Ali Mohamed DAOUD (FRUD), Aden ROBLEH Awaleh (PND), Moumin BAHDON Farah (PPSD).

Popular Rally for Progress (Rassemblement Populaire pour le Progrès—RPP). The RPP was launched on March 4, 1979, its leading component being the socialist African People's League for Independence (Ligue Populaire Africaine pour l'Indépendance—LPAI). Long the principal spokesman for the Issa majority, the LPAI was not represented in the Afar-dominated pre-independence Chamber of Deputies, although two of its members held ministerial posts.

The RPP was the first political group to be legalized under the "pluralist" constitution of 1992 and was credited with a clean sweep of chamber seats in December. In February 1994 it was reported that President Gouled would step down as RPP chair at a party congress scheduled for early March; however, in an apparent effort to avoid a conflict between potential successors, he accepted reelection at the congress that finally convened on May 26. Thereafter, in September 1996, Gouled announced his intention to serve out his presidential term (despite his failing health) and also to retain the party leadership until 1999.

In September 1996 the party announced the composition of its reshuffled Executive Committee, highlighted by the appointment as third deputy chair of Ismail Omar Guelleh, the apparent front-runner in the party's bitter contest to succeed the increasingly infirm Gouled. At a party congress on March 19–20, 1997, Gouled was reelected chair, while party delegates also elected a 125-member Central Committee and adopted a resolution confirming its alliance with the "New FRUD." Guelleh, who had succeeded Gouled as president of the republic in 1999, was also elected as the new RPP chair in March 2000, Gouled having retired from party activity.

The party won a majority in all five regional and three communal area elections in March 2006.

Leaders: Ismail Omar GUELLEH (President of the Republic and President of the Party), Hassan GOULED Aptidon (Former President of the Republic and Former Chair), Dileita Mohamed DILEITA (Prime Minister and Vice President of the Party), Idriss ARNAOUD Ali (Secretary General of the Party and Speaker of the Chamber of Deputies).

Front for the Restoration of Unity and Democracy (Front pour la Restauration de l'Unité et de la Démocratie—FRUD). The Afar-dominated FRUD was organized in Balho in northern Djibouti in August 1991 by nominal merger of the three groups below on a platform calling for the overthrow of President Gouled's "tribal dictatorship" and the installation of a democratic multiparty system. Responsibilities for political and military operations were assigned to a 17-member executive committee.

In September 1991 leaders of FRUD and the MNDID (see under PND, below) met in Ethiopia, and one month later their combined forces clashed with government troops in Djibouti's southern Yokobi region. Front officials denied government claims that their forces were Ethiopian Afars, although admitting that they had been trained across the border. Meanwhile, a second rebel summit, this time including the Democratic Union for Djiboutian Justice and Equality, was held in Somaliland.

The FRUD representative in the capital, Abbate Ebo Adou of the AROD, was arrested in December 1991, but he was released following French intervention in February 1992. Two months later a small armed Gadabursi movement, the Front of Democratic Forces (Front des Forces Démocratiques—FFD), led by Mahmoud ABAR Derane and Omar CHARDIE Bouni, was reported to have linked up with FRUD. The following August, during a congress in an area "liberated" by FRUD, the incumbent president, Mohamed ADOYTA Yusuf, was named first vice president, while former Prime Minister Ahmed DINI Ahmed, theretofore resident in Yemen, was named FRUD president.

Meanwhile, FRUD had been instrumental in the June 1992 formation in Paris of the United Opposition Front of Djibouti (Front Uni de l'Opposition Djiboutienne—FUOD), an alliance of Afar and antiregime Issa groups. (See 2000–2002 Handbook for additional information on FUOD.)

ary 22 it was reported that Dini had been ousted and a new executive committee appointed with Ougoureh Kifle Ahmed as its secretary general. Subsequently, Kifle was said to have been engaged in a series of peace talks with the government that were opposed by supporters of Dini. At a "reconciliation" meeting of FRUD factions on June 21–25, Ali Mohamed Daoud (a.k.a. Jean Marie) was formally designated as the successor to Dini, who, from residence in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, continued to reject the posture of political conciliation displayed by the current leadership. By late July the latter itself appeared to back away from continued peace talks by issuing a series of demands calling for ethnic balance in the government and armed forces. Meanwhile, FUOD had refused to recognize the new FRUD leadership, continuing to support the FRUD-Dini group, which, during a September congress "in the northern part of the country," named a rival seven-member executive committee sworn "to pursue the armed struggle against the Gouled regime."

In December 1994 the "New FRUD" leadership concluded an agreement with the government (from which the group's deputy secretary general, Ibrahim Chehem Daoud, dissociated himself) that called for an end to armed resistance and integration of FRUD units into the regular military, an alliance with the RPP that would include cabinet portfolios for two FRUD faction members, and the reform of electoral lists prior to the next election. In accordance with the agreement, the legalization of FRUD as the fourth political party permitted under Djibouti's constitution was announced by the interior minister on March 9, 1996, although the split between the legalized "New FRUD" and the FRUD-Dini faction remained unresolved at that stage.

Ending over 19 years in exile, FRUD-Dini Vice President Adoyta Yusuf returned to Djibouti in November 1996, along with some 15 supporters. Their return was facilitated by high-level negotiations between the Djiboutian prime minister and his Ethiopian counterpart and sparked speculation that Adoyta would join the Gouled cabinet. In March 1997 the FRUD's longtime European representative, Ismael Ibrahim Houmed, also returned from exile.

The "New FRUD" held its first congress on April 15–16, 1997, officials revealing that they had signed a secret political platform with the ruling party in December 1994 that included provisions for both higher profile joint governmental activities and the preparation of a shared list of candidates for the legislative balloting scheduled for December 1997. Furthermore, party delegates elected a multi-ethnic, 21-member Executive Committee and a 153-member National Committee. The former's composition underlined the party's pledge to include non-Afars in leadership positions.

Meanwhile, the "New FRUD's" tightened alliance with the government widened the chasm between it and the FRUD-Dini faction, which, according to the Indian Ocean Newsletter, continued to enjoy support from the grassroots groups that viewed the "New FRUD" with "little esteem." Underscoring the reportedly widespread antipathy felt toward the "New FRUD," demonstrators on May 1, 1997, disrupted the group's attempt to open an office in a predominantly Afar neighborhood in the capital. Following the FRUD-Dini's alleged attack on government forces in September, the Gouled administration authorized a military offensive against the rebel militants and urged its allies abroad to deny asylum to the FRUD-Dini's exiled leadership. Consequently, a number of FRUD-Dini faction leaders were extradited to Djibouti, while others were reported to have been forced to leave their safe havens. On November 10–12 the FRUD-Dini organized a congress within Djibouti's borders where delegates reelected Dini chair and elected a 13-member political bureau. Furthermore, the faction asserted that, while it was committed to further warfare, it remained open to establishing a dialogue with the government.

On November 26, 1997, FUOD president Ahmed Issa died. He was succeeded by Mahdi

Ibrahim Ahmed, who in November 1998 called for an interim government including the main opposition parties prior to the 1999 presidential balloting. However, there were few subsequent reports of FUOD activity, attention focusing on government negotiations with the remaining FRUD antigovernment forces.

In March 1998 FRUD-Dini and PRD delegates appealed to IGAD ministers meeting in Djibouti to intervene in the strife, claiming that foreign mercenaries were assisting government forces in the latest outbreak of fighting. The militants' entreaties were shelved by IGAD, and skirmishes were reported throughout the year and into 1999.

In November 1999 Dini suggested a Ramadan cease-fire and negotiations toward a peace settlement, and, following a series of secret meetings in France, an accord was signed on February 7, 2000, in Paris providing for an immediate cessation of hostilities, reciprocal prisoner releases, the eventual reintegration of the militants into their former jobs, and further discussions regarding the proposed devolution of political authority to the regions (primarily in the north of the country) involved in the rebel activity. Dini returned to Djibouti in late March from his long exile in France, and a FRUD-Dini congress on April 5–6 endorsed the Paris accord and reaffirmed its confidence in Dini's leadership, although the faction's fighters were to remain armed pending negotiation of a comprehensive peace settlement. Meanwhile, it was unclear how the recent agreement would ultimately affect the seven-year FRUD factionalization.

A final agreement was reached in May 2001 for, among other things, the demobilization of FRUD forces, which subsequently proceeded smoothly, facilitated by a September amnesty bill. FRUD also contributed several ministers to the July 2001 "postwar cabinet." However, friction continued within FRUD, particularly when Dini announced plans to launch a party called FRUD-National, which would seek countrywide membership that would include a significant non-Afar segment. Reports indicated that some FRUD continued to object to Dini's perceived efforts to place his personal imprint on the movement, while the so-called "Armed-FRUD" still remained skeptical of the peace process in general.

FRUD formalized its relationship with the RPP with the launching of the UMP prior to the 2003 legislative poll, while Dini established his own opposition party (see ARD, below). By that time there did not appear to be an armed FRUD rump of any consequence, though in late 2005 battles between Afar rebels and government troops were reported in the northern area of the country.

Leaders: Ali Mohamed DAOUD (President), Ougoureh KIFLE Ahmed (Secretary General).

Action for Revision of Order in Djibouti (Action pour la Révision de l'Ordre à Djibouti—AROD). The most prominent of the FRUD partners, AROD was launched on March 11, 1991, by Abbate Ebo Adou and Mohamed Adoyta Yusuf, theretofore leader of the Union of Democratic Movements (Union des Mouvements Démocratiques—UMD). The UMD had been organized in Belgium in February 1990 by the merger of the MNDID (see under PND, below) and Adoyta's Democratic Front for the Liberation of Djibouti (Front Démocratique pour la Libération de Djibouti—FDLD), itself a product of the June 1979 consolidation of two Afar groups—the National Union for Independence (Union Nationale pour l'Indépendance—UNI) and the Ethiopian-based Popular Movement for the Liberation of Djibouti (Mouvement Populaire pour la Libération de Djibouti—MPLD).

Relations with an intellectual faction, the Alliance of Forces for Democracy (Alliance des Forces pour la Démocratie—AFD), which joined AROD soon after the AFD's launching by Ali MOHAMED Ali ("Coubba") in Djibouti in 1989, were reportedly subsequently strained by AFD disagreements with the FRUD leadership.

In July 1998 Ebo Adou reportedly began efforts to position himself for a presidential campaign as a joint FRUD/PRD candidate. However, Ebo's alleged self-promotion reportedly angered a number of prominent FRUD leaders, and he was expelled from the coalition in December.

Leaders: Mohamed ADOYTA Yusuf (President), Abbate EBO Adou, Iwad HAS-SAN (Spokesman).

Front for the Restoration of Right and Equality (Front pour la Restauration du Droit et de l'Égalité—FRDE). The FRDE was created on April 29, 1991, by Mohamed Aramisse Souleh and other former MPLD and FDL members, on a platform urging the violent removal of the Issa regime.

Leader: Mohamed ARAMISSE Souleh.

Djibouti Patriotic Resistance Front (Front de la Résistance Patriotique de Djibouti—FRPD). The FRPD is a small group with links to Ali Aref Bourhan, the former chief minister who was arrested on January 17, 1991, for his alleged involvement in a "vast plot" to incite ethnic war.

Leader: Ali MAKI.

National Democratic Party (Parti National Démocratique—PND). The PND was reported to have been launched in Paris in late 1992 by Aden Robleh Awaleh, theretofore leader of the Djiboutian National Movement for the Installation of Democracy (Mouvement National Djiboutien pour l'Instauration de la Démocratie—MNDID). A former Gouled cabinet member and vice president of the RPP, Robleh had formed the MNDID in early 1986 after fleeing Djibouti in the face of government allegations that he had been a "silent partner" in a bombing. He accused the government of harassing him out of fear that he might become a presidential contender and called on other antigovernment exiles to join the MNDID and create unified opposition to the "tyranny" of President Gouled.

The party's initial communiqué called for promulgation of a constitution that would terminate the single-party system and usher in a "true liberal democracy." Robleh, who traveled widely during 1986–1987 in search of support for the MNDID, established his headquarters in Paris, with a reported branch in Addis Ababa. Some "personal rivalries" were reported within the MNDID in 1989, hindering efforts to form a common anti-Gouled front with other opposition groups. Subsequently, although the MNDID was not officially linked to FRUD, the two groups held a September summit in Ethiopia, and one month later MNDID forces were identified as part of the FRUD-led rebel unit that clashed with government troops.

In September 1993 Robleh met in Paris with the PRD's Djame, the two leaders subsequently reiterating the opposition's 1992 appeal for a transitional government of national unity. Nonetheless, Robleh joined his PRD counterpart in endorsing the December 1994 accord between "New FRUD" and the government.

In April 1996 a Paris judge issued an international arrest warrant against Robleh and his wife in connection with a French inquiry into a September 1990 grenade attack on a cafe in Djibouti in which a six-year-old French child had been killed and 15 people (mostly French nationals) injured. Suspected by French investigators of having been the brains behind the attack, the PND leader had reportedly fled Paris to seek refuge in Morocco.

In May 1997 Robleh's decision to suspend party spokesperson Farah ALI Wabert exacerbated an already growing chasm between the chair and his opponents on both the Political Bureau and National Council. Subsequently, all of the Political Bureau members, with the exception of Mahdi AHMED Abdillahi, who was also wanted for the 1990 attack, endorsed a letter urging Robleh to resign by August 31, 1997. According to the Indian Ocean Newsletter, Robleh's detractors were critical of his unwillingness to cooperate with other opposition groupings and claimed that the legal travails that have dogged him since 1996 hampered his ability to run the party. A Paris court sentenced five defendants in absentia to life imprisonment for the 1990 attack. However, the case against Robleh was deferred, and he was briefly considered as the potential PND candidate for president in 1999 until the party joined the ODU. A number of PND were reportedly arrested in late 1999 for what the government termed an illegal street demonstration. In April 2001 Robleh was given a six-year suspended sentence after being convicted of complicity in the 1990 attack.

Leaders: Aden ROBLEH Awaleh (1993 presidential candidate), Moussa HUSSEIN, Abdallah DABALEH.

People's Social Democratic Party (Parti Populaire Social Démocrate—PPSD). The PSD was launched in 2002 under the leadership of Moumin Bahdon Farah, who had been dismissed as justice minister in March 1996 and had subsequently helped to establish the Group for the Democracy of the Republic (Groupement pour la Démocratie de la République—GDR) to oppose President Gouled. (For additional information on the GDR, see the 2000–2002 Handbook.)

Leader: Moumin BAHDON Farah.

Other Parties

Union for a Democratic Alternative (Union pour l'Alternance Démocratique—UAD). Formed prior to the 2003 legislative elections, the UAD won 37 percent of the vote, but no seats, prompting UAD leaders to appeal (unsuccessfully) for cancellation of the results based on allegations of fraud. The UAD boycotted the April 2005 presidential election, arguing that the electoral process lacked transparency and that the opposition was being denied fair access to the media.

Leaders: Ahmad Youssouf HAMED (ARD), Souleiman Farah LODON (MRDD), Mohamed Daoud CHEHEM (PDD), Ismael Guedi HARED (formerly head of UDJ).

Republican Alliance for Democracy (Aliance Republicaine pour la Démocratie—ARD). The ARD was registered in 2002 under the leadership of former FRUD leader Dini, who subsequently became the most prominent spokesman for the UAD. Dini's death in September 2004 reportedly left both the ARD and the URD at sea in regard to leadership.

Leader: Ahmad Youssouf HAMED.

Movement for Democratic Renewal and Development (Mouvement pour le Renouveau Démocratique et le Développement—MRDD). Legalized in 1992, the MRDD is an offshoot of the Party of Democratic Renewal (PRD), which had been formed in 1992 and served as a leading opposition grouping. (See 2000–2002 Handbook for additional information on the PRD.) MRDD leader Daher Ahmed FARAH is editor of the opposition weekly Le Renouveau, which has been the object of repeated closures by the government.

Leaders: Daher Ahmed FAHER, Souleiman Farah LODON.

Djibouti Development Party (Parti Djiboutien pour le Développement—PDD). The PDD served as a founding component of the UAD, but PDD leader Mohamed Daoud Chehem angered the other UAD parties in early 2005 by flirting with a possible presidential candidacy (subsequently abandoned).

Leaders: Mohamed Daoud CHEHEM, Bouha Daoud AHMED (Secretary General).

Union for Democracy and Justice (Union pour la Démocratie et la Justice—UDJ). The UDJ was established in 2002 under the leadership of Ismael Guedi Hared, a former cabinet director for President Gouled. UDJ Secretary General Farah Ali WABERI reportedly resigned from his post in March 2005 to protest the UAD's decision to boycott the upcoming presidential election.

Leader: Ismael Guedi HARED.

Union of Reformed Partisans (Union des Partisans Reformés—UPR). The launching of the UPR was announced in early 2005 under the leadership of Ibrahim Chehem Daoud, a former FRUD leader. The UPR endorsed President Guelleh in the 2005 presidential balloting.

Leaders: Ibrahim CHEHEM Daoud, Adou Ali ADOU (Secretary General).

Legislature

The Chamber of Deputies (Chambre des Députés) is a unicameral body of 65 members elected for five-year terms. Prior to 1992 there was no alternative to a single list presented by the Popular Rally for Progress (RPP). Under the system of limited pluralism approved in September 1992 a total of four parties was permitted to compete for chamber seats. However, the limit on the number of parties was eliminated in 2002. At the most recent balloting on January 10, 2003, the Union for a Presidential Majority captured all 65 seats.

President: Idriss ARNAOUD Ali.

Communications

Press

The pro-government La Nation de Djibouti (4,000) twice a month in Arabic and French, while Carrefour Africain (500), a Roman Catholic publication, is also issued twice monthly. Le Temps, an opposition monthly associated with 1999 UMO presidential candidate Moussa Ahmed Idriss, was banned in September 1999, and one of its editors was sentenced to six months in prison for “disseminating false news.” Shortly thereafter two French journalists were expelled for articles deemed by the government to have “tarnished” the country’s “image.” Another opposition weekly, Le Renouveau, also closed down temporarily in October when its editor was jailed.

News Agencies

The domestic facility is Agence Djiboutienne d'Information. In addition, Agence France-Presse maintains an office in Djibouti.

Broadcasting and Computing

Radiodiffusion-Télévision de Djibouti transmitted in French, Afar, Somali, and Arabic to approximately 72,000 television receivers, while 15,000 personal computers served 6,500 Internet users in 2003.

ARAB REPUBLIC OF EGYPT

Jumhuriyat Misr al-Arabiyyah

The Country

Situated in the northeast corner of Africa at its juncture with Asia, Egypt occupies a quadrangle of desert made habitable only by the waters of the Nile, which bisects the country from south to north. Although the greater part of the national territory has traditionally been regarded as wasteland, Egypt is the most populous country in the Arab world: 90 percent of the people are concentrated in 4 percent of the land area, with population densities in parts of the Nile Valley reaching 6,000 per square mile. (An ambitious project was inaugurated in 1997 whereby the government plans to build a 150-mile canal northwest into the desert from Lake Nasser [formed by the Aswan High Dam] in the south. It is hoped that the $2 billion irrigation project will permit significant agricultural expansion and population relocation. Another massive irrigation canal is under construction eastward from the Nile along the northern coast into the Sinai Peninsula.) Arabic is universally spoken, and more than 80 percent of the ethnically homogeneous people adhere to the Sunni sect of Islam, much of the remainder being Coptic Christian. Women were listed as 29 percent of the paid labor force in 1996, with the majority of rural women engaged in unpaid agricultural labor; urban employed women tend to be concentrated in lower levels of health care and education.

Completion of the Aswan High Dam in 1971 permitted the expansion of tillable acreage and of multiple cropping, while the use of fertilizers and mechanization also increased production of such crops as cotton, wheat, rice, sugarcane, and corn, although Egypt still imports more than 50 percent of its food. Much of the population continues to live near the subsistence level, high rural-to-urban migration having increased the number of urban unemployed. A growing industrial sector, which employs 30 percent of the labor force, has been centered on textiles and agriprocessing, although the return by Israel of Sinai oil fields in 1975 permitted Egypt to become a net exporter of petroleum. Other natural resources include gas, iron ore, phosphates, manganese, zinc, gypsum, and talc.

The reopening of the Suez Canal (closed from the 1967 war until 1975) helped stimulate the gross domestic product, which displayed average annual real growth of 9 percent from mid-1979 to mid-1983. By 1985 economic conditions had sharply

Political Status: Nominally independent in 1922; republic established in 1953; joined with Syria as the United Arab Republic in 1958 and retained the name after Syria withdrew in 1961; present name adopted September 2, 1971; under limited multiparty system formally adopted by constitutional amendment approved in referendum of May 22, 1980.

Area: 386,659 sq. mi. (1,001,449 sq. km.).

Population: 61,452,382 (1996C); 73,855,000 (2005E), including Egyptian nationals living abroad.

Official Language: Arabic.

Monetary Unit: Egyptian Pound (market rate July 1, 2006: 5.76 pounds = $1US).

President: Muhammad Husni MUBARAK (National Democratic Party); appointed vice president on April 15, 1975; succeeded to the presidency upon the assassination of Muhammad Ahmad Anwar al-SADAT on October 6, 1981; confirmed by national referendum of October 13 and sworn in for a six-year term on October 14; served additionally as prime minister from October 14, 1981, to January 2, 1982; sworn in for a second presidential term on October 13, 1987, for a third term on October 13, 1993, and for a fourth term on October 5, 1999, following unanimous nomination by the People's Assembly on June 2 and confirmation in national referendum of September 26; elected to a fifth six-year term in limited multicandidate balloting on September 7, 2005, and inaugurated on September 27.

Prime Minister: Ahmed NAZIF; asked by the president on December 27, 2005, to form a new government, which was installed on December 31.

deteriorated as the decline in world oil prices not only depressed export income but severely curtailed remittances from Egyptians employed in other oil-producing states; in addition, tourism, another important source of revenue, declined because of regional terrorism and domestic insecurity. Currently compounding the difficulties are rapid population growth (an increase of approximately one million every nine months), an illiteracy rate estimated at nearly 50 percent, a high external debt, and an inefficient, bloated, and often corrupt bureaucracy of some six million civil servants.

In the early 1990s the government pledged to privatize state-run enterprises, reduce tariffs and price subsidies, devalue the Egyptian pound, and pursue further economic liberalization. Progress has been slow, despite the appointment of Prime Minister Ahmed NAZIF, a younger and more technologically savvy presence in the government. While the International Monetary Fund in 2005 noted Egypt's progress in structural reforms, it cited the need for privatization and debt reduction. Meanwhile, the populace has repeatedly demonstrated its frustration over the slow pace of significant change. Real GDP growth of 4.8 percent was reported in mid-2004–2005 and was projected to be 5 percent in 2006, with inflation hovering around 8 percent. Privatization, especially of banks, has been slow, but the government indicated it was responding to IMF recommendations to make monetary policies its highest priority. Tourism remained a top source of revenue, accounting for 12 percent of GDP in 2005.

Political Background

The modern phase of Egypt's long history began in 1882 with the occupation of what was then an Ottoman province by a British military force, only token authority being retained by the local ruler (khedive). After establishing a protectorate in 1914, the United Kingdom granted formal independence to the government of King FUAD in 1922 but continued to exercise gradually dwindling control, which ended with its evacuation of the Suez Canal Zone in 1956. The rule of Fuad's successor,

King FAROUK (FARUK), was abruptly terminated as the result of a military coup on July 23, 1952. A group of young officers (the "Free Officers"), nominally headed by Maj. Gen. Muhammad NAGIB, secured Farouk's abdication on June 18, 1953, and went on to establish a republic under Nagib's presidency. Col. Gamal Abdel NASSER (Jamal Abd al-NASIR), who had largely guided these events, replaced Nagib as prime minister and head of state in 1954, becoming president on June 23, 1956.

The institution of military rule signaled the commencement of an internal social and economic revolution, growing pressure for the termination of British and other external influences, and a drive toward greater Arab unity against Israel under Egyptian leadership. Failing to secure Western arms on satisfactory terms, Egypt accepted Soviet military assistance in 1955. In July 1956, following the withdrawal of a Western offer to help finance the High Dam at Aswan, Egypt nationalized the Suez Canal Company and took possession of its properties. Foreign retaliation resulted in the "Suez War" of October–November 1956, in which Israeli, British, and French forces invaded Egyptian territory but subsequently withdrew under pressure from the United States, the Soviet Union, and the United Nations.

On February 1, 1958, Egypt joined with Syria to form the United Arab Republic under Nasser's presidency. Although Syria reasserted its independence in September 1961, Egypt retained the UAR designation until 1971, when it adopted the name Arab Republic of Egypt. (A less formal linkage with North Yemen, the United Arab States, was also established in 1958 but dissolved in 1961.)

Egypt incurred heavy losses in the six-day Arab-Israeli War of June 1967, which resulted in the closing of the Suez Canal, the occupation by Israel of the Sinai Peninsula, and an increase in Egypt's military and economic dependence on the USSR. Popular discontent resulting from the defeat was instrumental in bringing about a subsequent overhaul of the state machinery and a far-reaching reconstruction of the Arab Socialist Union (ASU), then the nation's only authorized political party.

A major turning point in Egypt's modern history occurred with the death of President Nasser on September 28, 1970, power subsequently being transferred to Vice President Anwar al-SADAT. The new president weathered a government crisis in 1971 that included the dismissal of Vice President Ali SABRI and other political figures accused of plotting his overthrow. A thorough shake-up of the party and government followed, with Sadat's control being affirmed at a July ASU congress and, two months later, by voter approval of a new national constitution as well as a constitution for a projected Federation of Arab Republics involving Egypt, Libya, and Syria. At the same time, the pro-Soviet leanings of some of those involved in the Sabri plot, combined with Moscow's increasing reluctance to comply with Egyptian demands for armaments, generated increasing tension in Soviet-Egyptian relations. These factors, coupled with Sadat's desire to acquire U.S. support in effecting a return of Israeli-held territory, culminated in the expulsion of some 17,000 Soviet personnel in mid-1972.

The apparent unwillingness of U.S. President Nixon in 1972 to engage in diplomatic initiatives during an election year forced Sadat to return to the Soviet fold to prepare for another war with Israel, which broke out in October 1973. After 18 days of fighting a cease-fire was concluded under UN auspices, with U.S. Secretary of State Henry Kissinger ultimately arranging for peace talks that resulted in the disengagement of Egyptian and Israeli forces east of the Suez Canal. Under an agreement signed on September 4, 1975, Israel withdrew to the Gidi and Mitla passes in the western Sinai and returned the Ras Sudar oil field to Egypt after securing political commitments from Egypt and a pledge of major economic and military support from the United States.

Although he had intimated earlier that he might step down from the presidency in 1976, Sadat accepted designation to a second six-year term on September 16. On October 26, in the first relatively free balloting since the early 1950s, the nation elected a new People's Assembly from candidates presented by three groups within the ASU. Two weeks later, the president declared that the new groups could be termed political parties but indicated that they would remain under the overall supervision of the ASU. The role of the ASU was further reduced in June 1977 by promulgation of a law that permitted the formation of additional parties under carefully circumscribed circumstances, while its vestigial status as an “umbrella” organization was terminated a year later.

On October 2, 1978, Sadat named Mustafa KHALIL to head a new “peace” cabinet that on March 15, 1979, unanimously approved a draft peace treaty with Israel. The People’s Assembly ratified the document on April 10 by a 328–15 vote, while in a referendum held nine days later a reported 99.95 percent of those casting ballots voiced approval. At the same time, a series of political and constitutional reforms received overwhelming support from voters. As a result, President Sadat dissolved the assembly two years ahead of schedule and called for a two-stage legislative election on June 7 and 14. Sadat’s National Democratic Party (NDP) easily won the multiparty contest—the first such election since the overthrow of the monarchy in 1953—and on June 21 Prime Minister Khalil and a substantially unchanged cabinet were sworn in. On May 12, 1980, however, Khalil resigned, with President Sadat assuming the prime ministership two days later.

By 1981 Egypt was increasingly dependent on the United States for military and foreign policy support, while growing domestic unrest threatened the fragile political liberalization initiated in 1980. In an unprecedented move in early September, the government imprisoned more than a thousand opposition leaders, ranging from Islamic fundamentalists to journalists and Nasserites.

On October 6, 1981, while attending a military review in Cairo, President Sadat was assassinated by a group of Muslim militants affiliated with al-Jihad (“Holy War”). The assembly’s nomination of Vice President Muhammad Husni MUBARAK as his successor was confirmed by a national referendum on October 13, the new president naming a cabinet headed by himself as prime minister two days later. On January 2, 1982, Mubarak yielded the latter office to First Deputy Prime Minister Ahmad Fuad MUHI al-DIN.

The NDP retained overwhelming control of the assembly at the March 1984 election, the right-wing New Wafd Party being the only other group to surpass the 8 percent vote share needed to gain direct representation. However, popular discontent erupted later in the year over measures to combat economic deterioration and numerous opposition leaders, accused of “fomenting unrest” were arrested. Meanwhile, Islamic fundamentalists continued a campaign for the institution of full sharia law that provoked a new wave of arrests in mid-1985.

At his death in June 1984 Muhi al-Din was succeeded as prime minister by Gen. Kamal Hasan ALI. Ali was replaced in September 1985 by Dr. Ali Mahmud LUTFI, who, in turn, yielded office on November 12, 1986, to Dr. Atif Muhammad SIDQI, a lawyer and economist whose appointment appeared to signal a willingness to institute drastic reform measures sought by the IMF and World Bank. Anticipating a resurgence of opposition and facing court challenges to the legality of an assembly that excluded independent members, the president confounded his critics by mounting a referendum in February 1987 on the question of legislative dissolution. The subsequent election of April 6 reconfirmed the NDP’s control, and on October 5 Mubarak received public endorsement for a second term.

President Mubarak’s swift response to the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait in August 1990 received widespread domestic support, and, at balloting on November 29 to replenish the assembly (whose 1987 election had been declared illegal in May 1990), the ruling NDP won an increased majority. The landslide victory was tarnished, however, by low voter turnout and an election boycott by three leading opposition parties and the proscribed, but prominent, Muslim Brotherhood. On December 13 Dr. Ahmad Fathi SURUR was elected assembly president, assuming the responsibilities left vacant by the assassination of the previous speaker, Dr. Rifaat al-MAHGOUB, on October 12.

Following a May 1991 cabinet reshuffle, Mubarak indicated that measures would be considered to reduce the NDP stranglehold on government activity. However, the state of emergency in effect since 1981 was extended for three more years, Mubarak citing ongoing "subversion" by fundamentalist militants as justification. Subsequently, international human rights organizations charged that the administration was continuing to torture and otherwise abuse its opponents, particularly the fundamentalists, with whom a state of "all-out war" was said to exist by 1992. For their part, the militants, vowing to topple the "corrupt" Mubarak government and establish an Islamic state, intensified their guerrilla campaign against police, soldiers, government officials, and tourists.

On July 21, 1993, the assembly nominated Mubarak for a third term by a vote of 439–7, and the president received a reported 95 percent "yes" vote in the national referendum of October 4, opposition leaders strongly questioning the accuracy of the tally. Although President Mubarak had promised an infusion of "new blood" into his administration, many of the previous cabinet members were reappointed in the reshuffle announced on October 14 by Prime Minister Sidqi.

On June 26, 1995, Mubarak narrowly escaped assassination when a group of alleged fundamentalists opened fire on his motorcade after his arrival in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, for a summit of the Organization of African Unity (OAU). It was the third attempt on his life in 22 months. In September 1996, three defendants were sentenced to death by an Ethiopian court for their role in the 1995 attack, which President Mubarak blamed on the militant Islamic Group (see Illegal Groups under Political Parties, below).

Despite the regime's rhetorical commitment to broadening the governmental role of lesser parties, the NDP again completely dominated the legislative elections of late 1995, opposition leaders claiming they had been hamstrung by new press restrictions and the ongoing ban (under the long-standing state of emergency) on political demonstrations. On the other hand, the appointment of Dr. Kamal Ahmed al-GANZOURI as prime minister on January 3, 1996, launched what was widely perceived as significant economic liberalization.

The level of violence between the government and fundamentalist militants peaked in 1995 when more than 400 were killed from a combination of terrorist attacks and government reprisals against militant strongholds. International human rights organizations criticized the mass detention of political prisoners and "grossly unfair" trials leading, in many cases, to executions.

Sporadic incidents occurred throughout 1996 and into early 1997. In view of continued conflict with fundamentalist militants, the state of emergency in early 1997 was extended (and remained in effect as of mid-2006), permitting the government to continue to detain "terrorists" without formal charges for lengthy periods and to try defendants in special courts. Meanwhile, local elections in April again failed to reveal any hint of a political challenge to NDP control, nearly half of the ruling party's candidates running unopposed.

In mid-1997 imprisoned fundamentalist leaders reportedly called for a "cease-fire," and Egypt's vital tourist industry continued to revive. However, the government, apparently unconvinced that a truce had been achieved, proceeded with several mass trials and imposed harsh sentences on a number of defendants. Subsequently, militants massacred some 70 tourists at an ancient temple at Luxor in November, again bringing the conflict to the forefront of world attention. By that time, most observers agreed that a split had developed in the militant camp and that the faction committed to violence comprised possibly only several hundred guerrillas. It was also widely believed that there was little popular support for the militants, and only a few serious incidents were reported in 1998. By early 1999 the government had released an estimated 5,000 of the 20,000 people detained since the crackdown had begun, and in March the Islamic Group renounced violent methods.

All political parties having been distinctly "marginalized," President Mubarak faced no challenge to his nomination in June 1999 by the People's Assembly for a fourth term, duly confirmed by an official "yes" vote of 94 percent in a national referendum on September 26. Upon his inauguration, Mubarak announced the appointment of Atef Muhammad OBEID as the new prime minister. Subsequently, the NDP ultimately again won unchallenged control of the assembly in 2002. Some 70 percent of the NDP candidates also ran unopposed in the April 2002 municipal elections.

In June 2004, for the first time in Egypt's history, a member of the opposition leftist National Progressive Unionist Party—NPUP (al-Hizb al-Watani) won a seat in the Shura Council, and in October 2004, a third political party was allowed to form (see Constitution and government, below). Prime Minister Obeid resigned in 2004 and was succeeded by Ahmed Nazif, former minister of communications and information technology, who at age 52 was considerably younger than other government leaders.

President Mubarak was elected in controversial multicandidate balloting in September 2005 with 88 percent of the vote, most notably defeating Ayman NUR, formerly jailed leader of the leftist Tomorrow Party (al-Ghad), and then-leader of the New Wafd Party—NWP Hizb (al-Wafd al-Gadid), Numan GOMAA (see Political Parties and Groups, below). Seven other candidates each received less than 1 percent of the vote. Mubarak asked Prime Minister Nazif to form a new cabinet, which was sworn in at year's end.

Legislative elections in November and December 2005 resulted in the NDP retaining an overwhelming majority, but significant inroads were made by independents affiliated with the outlawed Muslim Brotherhood, whose representation increased more than five-fold to 88 seats. Runoffs for 12 undecided seats had not been held as of early 2006 (see Legislature, below).

Constitution and Government

Under the 1971 constitution, executive power is vested in the president, who is nominated by the People's Assembly and elected for a six-year term by popular referendum. The president may appoint vice presidents in addition to government ministers and may rule by decree when granted emergency powers by the 454-member assembly, which functions primarily as a policy-approving rather than a policy-initiating body. (Since assuming the presidency in 1981, Mubarak has chosen to rule without a vice president.) In May 1990 the Supreme Constitutional Court invalidated the 1987 assembly elections, claiming the electoral system discriminated against opposition and independent contenders. Consequently, the government abolished electoral laws limiting the number of independent candidates, rejected the "party list" balloting system, and enlarged the number of constituencies.

For only the third time since forming in 1977, Egypt's Political Parties Committee allowed the creation of a new political party, Tomorrow (al-Ghad), in February 2004. On June 9, 2005, the assembly approved a draft law to elect the president by direct, secret balloting, replacing the referendum system. This followed adoption of a constitutional amendment in May 2005 to allow Egypt's first multicandidate presidential election. The amendment was approved in a public referendum, albeit marked by huge public demonstrations over what is still perceived as too much government control over potential candidates.

A Consultative Council (Majlis al-Shura), formerly the Central Committee of the ASU, is composed of 140 elected and 70 appointed members. It serves in an advisory capacity as an "upper house" of the assembly. In addition to the Supreme Constitutional Court, the judicial system includes the Court of Cassation, geographically organized Courts of Appeal, Tribunals of First Instance, and District Tribunals. A Supreme Judicial Council is designed to guarantee the independence of the judiciary. Emergency laws, in effect since 1981, provide the government with broad arrest and detention powers. In addition, special military courts were established in late 1992 for the prosecution of those charged with "terrorist acts" in connection with the conflict between the government and militant Islamic fundamentalists.

For administrative purposes Egypt is divided into 26 governorates, each with a governor appointed by the president, while most functions are shared with regional, town, and village officials. In April 1994 the People's Assembly approved legislation whereby previously elected village mayors would thenceforth be appointed by the Interior Ministry.

Constitutional amendments passed by the assembly on April 30, 1980, and approved by referendum on May 22 included the following: designation of the country as "socialist democratic," rather than "democratic socialist," and designation of the Islamic legal code (sharia) as "the" rather than "a" principal source of law.

Foreign Relations

As the most populous and most highly industrialized of the Arab states, Egypt has consistently aspired to a leading role in Arab, Islamic, Middle Eastern, African, and world affairs and has been an active participant in the UN, the Arab League, and the Organization of African Unity. For a number of years, its claim to a position of primacy in the Arab world made for somewhat unstable relations with other Arab governments, particularly the conservative regimes of Jordan and Saudi Arabia, although relations with those governments improved as a result of the 1967 and 1973 wars with Israel. Relations with the more radical regimes of Libya and Syria subsequently became strained, largely because of their displeasure with the terms of the U.S.-brokered disengagement. Thus a January 1972 agreement by the three states to establish a loose Federation of Arab Republics was never implemented.

Formally nonaligned, Egypt has gone through a number of distinct phases, including the Western orientation of the colonial period and the monarchy, the anti-Western and increasingly pro-Soviet period initiated in 1955, a period of flexibility dating from the expulsion of Soviet personnel in 1972, and a renewed reliance on the West—particularly the United States—following widespread condemnation of Egyptian-Israeli rapprochement by most Communist and Arab governments.

On November 19, 1977, President Sadat began a precedent-shattering three-day trip to Jerusalem, the highlight of which was an address to the Israeli Knesset. While he offered no significant concessions in regard to the occupied territories, was unequivocal in his support of a Palestinian state, and declared that he did not intend to conclude a separate peace with Israel, the trip was hailed as a "historic breakthrough" in Arab-Israeli relations and was followed by an invitation to the principals in the Middle Eastern dispute and their great-power patrons to a December meeting in Egypt to prepare for a resumption of the Geneva peace conference. Israeli Prime Minister Begin responded affirmatively, but all of the Arab invitees declined. Consequently, on December 5 Egypt broke relations with five of its more radical neighbors (Algeria, Iraq, Libya, Syria, and South Yemen).

A dramatic ten-day "summit" convened by U.S. President Carter at Camp David, Maryland, in September 1978 yielded two documents—a "Framework for Peace in the Middle East" and a "Framework for a Peace Treaty between Israel and Egypt"—that were signed by President Sadat and Prime Minister Begin at the White House on September 17. By mid-November details of a peace treaty and three annexes had been agreed upon by Egyptian and Israeli representatives. Signing, however, was deferred beyond the target date of December 17 primarily because of Egyptian insistence on a specific timetable for Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank and Gaza, in addition to last-minute reservations regarding Article 6, which gave the document precedence over treaty commitments to other states. Thus, on March 8, President Carter flew to the Middle East for talks with leaders of both countries, and within six days compromise proposals had been accepted. The completed treaty was signed by Begin and Sadat in Washington on March 26, and on April 25 the 31-year state of war between Egypt and Israel officially came to an end. On May 25 the first Israeli troops withdrew from the Sinai under the terms of the treaty and negotiations on autonomy for the West Bank and Gaza opened in Beersheba, Israel.

The Arab League responded to the Egyptian-Israeli rapprochement by calling for the diplomatic and economic isolation of Egypt. By midyear all league members but Oman, Somalia, and Sudan had severed relations with the Sadat regime, and Cairo's membership had been suspended from a number of Arab groupings, including the league, the Arab Monetary Fund, and the Organization of Arab Petroleum Exporting Countries. Egypt succeeded in weathering the hard-line Arab reaction largely because of increased economic aid from Western countries, including France, West Germany, Japan, and the United States, which alone committed itself to more aid on a real per capita basis than had been extended to Europe under the post-World War II Marshall Plan.

Although Egypt and Israel formally exchanged ambassadors on February 26, 1980, a month after opening their border at El Arish in the Sinai to land traffic, negotiations on the question of Palestinian autonomy were subsequently impeded by continued Jewish settlement on the West Bank, the Israeli annexation of East Jerusalem in July 1980, and the invasion of Lebanon in June 1982. Following the massacre of Palestinian refugees at Sabra and Chatila in September 1982, Cairo recalled its ambassador from Tel Aviv. (Relations at the ambassadorial level were ultimately reestablished in September 1986, despite tension over Israel's bombing of the PLO headquarters in Tunis in October 1985.)

The Soviet intervention in Afghanistan in December 1979 generated concern in Egypt, with the government ordering Moscow in February 1980 to reduce its diplomatic staff in Cairo to seven, while offering military assistance to the Afghan rebels. In 1981, accusing the remaining Soviet embassy staff of aiding Islamic fundamentalist unrest, Cairo broke diplomatic relations and expelled the Soviet ambassador. Relations were resumed in September 1984, as the Mubarak government departed from the aggressively pro-U.S. policy of the later Sadat years, while a three-year trade accord was signed by the two governments in late 1987.

Relations with most of the Arab world also changed during President Mubarak's first term, Egypt's stature among moderate neighbors being enhanced by a virtual freeze in dealings with Israel after the 1982 Lebanon invasion. Although relations with radical Arab states, particularly Libya, remained strained, Egypt's reemergence from the status of Arab pariah allowed it to act as a "silent partner" in negotiations between Jordan and the PLO that generated a 1985 peace plan. However, the subsequent collapse of the plan left the Mubarak administration in an uncomfortable middle position between its "good friend" King Hussein and the PLO, whose Cairo offices were closed in May 1987 after the passage of an "anti-Egyptian" resolution by the Palestine National Council.

During an Arab League summit in Amman, Jordan, in November 1987, the prohibition against diplomatic ties with Egypt was officially lifted, although the suspension of league membership remained in effect. It was widely believed that the threat of Iranian hegemony in the Gulf was the principal factor in Cairo's rehabilitation. Egypt, which had severed relations with Iran in May 1987 upon discovery of a fundamentalist Muslim network allegedly financed by Tehran, possessed the largest and best-equipped armed force in the region. Following the Amman summit, Egypt authorized reopening of the PLO facility, instituted joint military maneuvers with Jordan, increased the number of military advisers sent to Iraq, and arranged for military cooperation with Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, and the United Arab Emirates.

By January 1989 only three Arab League countries—Libya, Lebanon, and Syria—had not renewed diplomatic relations with Cairo, and Egypt returned to full participation in the organization during its Casablanca, Morocco, summit in May. Meanwhile, a dispute that had marred relations with Israel since the latter's 1982 withdrawal from the bulk of the Sinai was resolved on February 26, when the two countries agreed to reaffirm Egyptian sovereignty over Taba, a beach resort on the northern tip of the Gulf of Aqaba.

Lebanon and Syria restored diplomatic relations with Cairo in 1989, and relations with Libya also improved as President Mubarak journeyed to Libya in October to meet with Col. Muammar al-Qadhafi, the first such visit by an Egyptian president since 1972. Meanwhile, Cairo increased pressure on Jerusalem to begin negotiations with the Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, forwarding a ten-point plan to speed the onset of elections and lobbying the United States to exercise its diplomatic influence over Israel.

Egyptian-Iraqi relations were rocked in June 1989 by Baghdad's imposition of remittance restrictions on foreign workers, leading to the repatriation of 1 million Egyptians, many of whom complained about Iraqi mistreatment. In what was clearly his boldest foreign relations move, President Mubarak spearheaded the Arab response to Iraq's incursion into Kuwait in August 1990. At an Arab League summit in Cairo on August 10 the Egyptian leader successfully argued for a declaration condemning the invasion and approving Saudi Arabia's request for non-Arab troops to help it defend its borders. Subsequent Egyptian efforts to facilitate an Iraqi withdrawal were rebuffed by Baghdad. Overall, more than 45,000 Egyptian troops were deployed to Saudi Arabia, elements of which played a conspicuous role in the liberation of Kuwait.

In the wake of Iraq's defeat in 1991, policy differences arose between Egypt and its allies. Cairo had long urged that postwar regional security be entrusted to an all-Arab force. By contrast, Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) members indicated that they looked with favor on a continued U.S. presence in the area. Particularly irksome was a Saudi statement that the monarchy did not welcome the permanent stationing of Egyptian forces on its soil, Cairo subsequently withdrawing all its troops by the end of August. A corollary to the dispute over military policy was increased uncertainty as to the level of economic aid that Egypt could expect from its oil-rich neighbors. For their part, Western creditors quickly rewarded Cairo for its support during the Desert Shield and Desert Storm campaigns. Shortly after the defeat of Iraqi forces, the United States and Gulf Arab states forgave about $14 billion of Egypt's $50 billion external debt, and Paris Club members subsequently agreed to gradually write off another $11 billion. Globally, its prestige was enhanced by the selection of its leading diplomat, former deputy prime minister Boutros BOUTROS-GHALI, as the secretary general of the United Nations effective January 1, 1992.

Egyptian officials reportedly played an important advisory role in the secret talks that led up to the accord between Israel and the PLO in September 1993. In addition, Egypt won the backing of other North African governments for its hard-line antifundamentalist posture. Cairo's relations with Amman improved after a three-year rift caused by Jordan's pro-Iraqi stand during the Gulf crisis. In early February 1995 President Mubarak hosted Jordan's King Hussein, Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, and PLO Chair Yasir Arafat in a regional summit designed to revitalize prospects for implementation of the Israel/PLO peace accord. The summit also reportedly addressed growing tension between Egypt and Israel regarding nuclear weapons.

By mid-1995 tension with Egypt's southern neighbor, Sudan, had intensified because of an intimation by Mubarak that Sudanese officials had played a role in the June 26 assassination attempt in Ethiopia. In June Sudan accused Egypt of provoking a clash in the disputed border region of Halaib, with Mubarak declaring his support for exiled opponents of the fundamentalist Khartoum regime. In 2004, Egypt reluctantly agreed to send military officers as observers to Sudan, but stopped short of getting involved in attempting to resolve the Sudanese civil war.

On March 13, 1996, Egypt hosted the so-called "terrorism summit" of some 27 heads of state and government in the wake of suicide bomb attacks in Israel earlier in the month that appeared to threaten the Middle East peace process. Following the election of Benjamin Netanyahu as Israel's new prime minister in May, President Mubarak became more critical of him over the next six months in the face of what he described as Netanyahu's "lack of action" in implementing the Israeli/PLO peace accord. The Egyptian president intensified his attacks on Netanyahu's policies in 1997, particularly in regard to the expansion of Jewish settlements in the West Bank. In early 1998 Mubarak strongly objected to U.S. plans to take military action against Iraq after Baghdad blocked the activities of UN weapons inspectors. Meanwhile, by that time significant improvement had been registered in relations between Egypt and Sudan, the two countries having apparently agreed to address each other's "security" concerns, i.e., Sudanese support for fundamentalist militants in Egypt and Egyptian support for antiregime activity in Sudan, particularly on the part of southern rebels. Full diplomatic relations were restored between Sudan and Egypt in December 1999, following a visit by Sudan's President Bashir to Cairo. Relations with Iran were also reported to have improved later in 1998, but in 2005 they were again strained after a security court convicted an Egyptian of plotting to assassinate the president and of spying for Iran.

President Mubarak welcomed the election of Ehud Barak as prime minister of Israel in May 1999 as a "hopeful sign" regarding a peace settlement between Israel and the Palestinians, and Egypt was a prominent mediator in negotiations through mid-2000. However, Egypt recalled its ambassador to Israel in November 2000 in response to the Israeli bombing of the Gaza Strip. Egyptian/Israeli relations cooled even further following the election of hard-liner Ariel Sharon as prime minister of Israel in February 2001. By 2004, however, after Sharon had unveiled his unilateral disengagement plan for the Gaza Strip, in consultation with Egypt and the United States, relations between Egypt and Israel had begun to thaw. Egypt's role in security arrangements in Gaza were vital to the process and widely seen as enhancing Egypt's role as a power broker in the region. In December 2004, Egypt and Israel conducted their first prisoner exchange, marking a shift in relations and paving the way for a December 12 pact between the two countries on exports. In February 2005, Mubarak again helped mediate between Israel and the Palestinians, adopting a high-profile diplomatic role.

Current Issues

Under increasing pressure from prodemocracy activists, as well as from the United States, President Mubarak in February 2005 called for a constitutional amendment to allow multicandidate elections. Unprecedented public demonstrations and calls for Mubarak to step down preceded his historic announcement. The amendment was approved in a referendum in May 2005, but the government still faced vehement criticism for the restrictive conditions it placed on potential candidates; for example, leaders of the recognized parties can run, but independent candidates must get the backing of 250 members of the assembly and local councils. Four opposition parties immediately announced a boycott of the presidential elections scheduled for September 2005. Egyptian authorities had attempted to ban referendum-day protests, but large demonstrations took place nonetheless. The government also arrested members of the opposition Muslim Brotherhood. The ongoing crackdown against Islamists and other opposition groups sparked bold, massive protests, leading to further arrests. The leftist Tomorrow, the one new party granted a permit, saw its leader Ayman NUR jailed for six weeks on charges of forging signatures on his political party application. His June 2005 trial was postponed until after presidential elections, in which he ran a distant second to Mubarak. Subsequently, Nur was sentenced on December 24 to five years in prison. The European Union joined Washington in condemning Nur's conviction, which was reportedly jeopardizing a free trade agreement with the United States in early 2006.

Even with obvious moves toward reform, the emergency law decreed in 1981 remains in effect, and human rights organizations have continued to report ongoing abuse and torture by security services around the country. Amid growing opposition and calls for reform, Mubarak said in early 2006 he planned to replace the emergency law, set to expire in May 2006, with anti-terror legislation.

While the presidential election in 2005 was trumpeted as a move toward democratization, most observers considered the election to be a very limited step toward reform. Some 19 candidates were disqualified, the government refused to allow international monitors, turnout was extremely low, and laws severely restricting political activity remained in place. Assembly elections a few months later were marked by violence, with at least nine people allegedly killed by government security forces who reportedly blocked some polling stations in opposition strongholds. Hundreds of supporters of Muslim Brotherhood-backed candidates were arrested during the three-stage elections. While the NDP again dominated in the results, candidates allied with the Muslim Brotherhood increased their representation fivefold, thus consolidating the group's position as the strongest opposition force. In what was regarded as a move to preserve the NDP's power, the government postponed local elections (scheduled for April 2006) for two years. However, officials said the delay was to give the assembly more time to adopt laws that would increase the role of local governments.

Terrorist attacks plagued Egyptian tourist areas in 2005 and 2006. After three bomb explosions in the southern Sinai resort of Dahab on April 24, 2006, killed at least 24 people, Israel closed its border with Egypt for security reasons. Within days, Egyptian authorities arrested 10 people, linking some of them to previous attacks.

Political Parties and Groups

Egypt's old political parties were swept away with the destruction of the monarchy in 1953. Efforts by the Nasser regime centered on the creation of a single mass organization to support the government and its policies. Following unsuccessful experiments with two such organizations, the National Liberation Rally and the National Union, the Arab Socialist Union—ASU (al-Ittihad al-Ishtiraki al-Arabi) was established as the country's sole political party in December 1962.

Prior to the legislative election of October 1976 President Sadat authorized the establishment of three "groups" within the ASU—the leftist National Progressive Unionist Assembly (NPUA), the centrist Egyptian Arab Socialist Organization (EASO), and the rightist Free Socialist Organization (FSO)—which presented separate lists of assembly candidates. Following the election, Sadat indicated that it would be appropriate to refer to the groups as distinct parties, though the ASU would "stand above" the new organizations. A law adopted on June 27, 1977, authorized the establishment of additional parties under three conditions: (1) that they be sanctioned by the ASU; (2) that, except for those established in 1976, they include at least 20 members of the People's Assembly; and (3) that they not have been in existence prior to 1953.

On February 4, 1978, the ASU Central Committee modified the impact of the 1977 legislation by permitting the Wafd, the majority party under the monarchy, to reenter politics as the New Wafd Party (NWP). Less than four months later, however, representatives of the NWP voted unanimously to disband the party to protest the passage of a sweeping internal security law on June 1. Subsequently, President Sadat announced the formal abolition of the ASU, the conversion of its Central Committee into a Consultative Council (Majlis al-Shura) to meet annually on the anniversary of the 1952 revolution, and the establishment of a new centrist group that, on August 15, was named the National Democratic Party (NDP). In an April 1979 political referendum, the voters overwhelmingly approved removal of the first two conditions of the 1977 law, thus clearing the way for the formation of additional parties. In May 1980 a constitutional amendment, also approved by referendum, removed reference to the defunct ASU as the sole source of political activity, thus formally legitimizing the limited multiparty system. In July 1983 the assembly approved a requirement that parties obtain 8 percent of the vote to gain parliamentary representation. One month later, the NWP announced that it was "resuming public activity," a government attempt to force the group to reregister as a new party being overturned by the State Administrative Court the following October.

At the 1984 election only the NDP and the NWP won elective seats, the former outdistancing the latter by a near 6–1 margin. In 1987 the NDP obtained a slightly reduced majority of 77.2 percent, the remaining seats being captured by the NWP and a coalition composed of the Socialist Labor Party (SLP), the Liberal Socialist Party (LSP), and “Islamists” representing the Muslim Brotherhood (see below). Following a Supreme Court decision in May 1990 that overturned the results of the 1987 balloting, the government enacted a number of electoral changes, including reversal of the 8 percent requirement.

In 2002 the administration introduced controversial new regulations that precluded political activity on the part of any group receiving money from overseas that had not been approved by and channeled through the government. Opponents of the regime decried the measure as an attempt to throttle parties who might be funded by foreign prodemocracy organizations. In 2005, ten parties formed an alliance to promote reforms (see Other Legislative Parties, below). Still other parties are summarily banned.

Government Party

National Democratic Party—NDP (al-Hizb al-Watani al-Dimuqrati). The NDP was organized by President Sadat in July 1978 as the principal government party, its name being derived from that of the historic National Party formed at the turn of the century by Mustapha Kamel. In late August it was reported that 275 deputies in the People’s Assembly had joined the new group, all but 11 having been members of the Egyptian Arab Socialist Party—EASP (Hizb Misr al-Arabi al-Ishtiraki), which, as an outgrowth of the EASO, had inherited many of the political functions earlier performed by the ASU. The EASP formally merged with the NDP in October 1978. President Mubarak, who had served as deputy chair under President Sadat, was named NDP chair at a party congress on January 26, 1982.

Two months after his pro forma reelection in October 1993, President Mubarak announced the composition of the new NDP political bureau, most leadership posts being retained by incumbents despite the president’s campaign pledge to revitalize both the NDP and the national administration. In November 1998 the NDP nominated Mubarak as its candidate for the 1999 presidential election. Official NDP candidates reportedly won only 27 percent of the seats in the 2000 assembly balloting, although many successful independent candidates joined (or rejoined) the party to give it 388 out of 442 elected seats. Analysts attributed the poor performance of the official NDP candidates to public perception that the party lacked an ideological foundation and existed only to rubber-stamp the administration’s agenda.

President Mubarak was reelected as chair of the NDP at the September 2002 congress, while his son, Gamal MUBARAK, who has been mentioned as a possible successor to his father, was elevated to a new post of head of the NDP’s policy board.

In 2005, the NDP won the two-thirds majority (variously reported as 320 to 324 seats) needed to amend the constitution, which will determine how Mubarak’s successor will be chosen.

Leaders: Muhammad Husni MUBARAK (President of the Republic and Chair of the Party), Muhammad Safwat al-SHERIF (General Secretary), Kamal al-SHAZLY (Assistant General Secretary).

Other Legislative Parties

Prior to the assembly elections of 2005, opposition leaders announced on October 8 they had formed a coalition of ten parties and movements seeking greater representation in the legislative body. Independent candidates allied themselves with movements or groups not officially recognized by the government. The National Front for Political and Constitutional Change, led by former prime minister Sidqi, was an apparent partial successor to the Consensus of National Forces for Reform (Tawafuq al-Qiwa al-Wataniyah lil-Islah), a group of eight opposition parties formed in 2004. Notably excluded from the 2005 coalition was the Tomorrow Party (al-Ghad), reportedly because of dissension within that party. Among those included were Arab Dignity (Karama al-Arabiya), established by disenchanting Nasserists and led by Hamdin SABAHI; Enough (Kifaya), also referenced as the Egyptian Movement for Change, which includes leftists, liberals and Islamists, co-founded in 2004 by George ISHAQ and Amin ESKANDAR; the Labor Party; the Center (Hizb al-Wasat), an offshoot of the Muslim Brotherhood, led by Abdul-Ela MADI; and three parties already represented in the assembly.

New Wafd Party—NWP (Hizb al-Wafd al-Gadid). Formed in February 1978 as a revival of the most powerful party in Egypt prior to 1952, the NWP formally disbanded the following June but reformed in August. In 1980 a “new generation of Wafd activists” instigated demonstrations in several cities, prompting the detention of its leader, Fuad SERAGEDDIN, until November 1981. In alliance with a number of Islamic groups, most importantly the proscribed Muslim Brotherhood (below), the NWP won 15 percent of the vote in May 1984, thus becoming the only opposition party with parliamentary representation. In 1987 the NWP won 35 seats (23 less than in 1984), the Brotherhood having entered into a de facto coalition with the SLP and the LSP (below). The NWP boycotted the Shura poll in 1989, complaining that electoral procedures remained exclusionary; it also boycotted the 1990 assembly elections, although party members running as independents retained at least 14 seats.

Following the 1995 national balloting, NWP leaders charged that electoral fraud had been the “worst in history.” The NWP also boycotted the April 1997 local elections. However, although the NWP had urged a boycott of the 1993 presidential poll, it urged a “yes” vote for President Mubarak in 1999. Serageddin died in August 2000 and was succeeded as party leader by Numan GOMAA, who was a distant third in 2005 presidential balloting. The party won six seats in the 2005 assembly elections.

Following internal strife in early 2006, Gomaa refused to give up control, and in April he was arrested after a highly publicized incident at party headquarters between rival factions that resulted in the death of one member. The assembly’s Political Parties Committee subsequently ruled that Mustapha Al Tawil was the legitimate leader of the party.

Leaders: Mustapha AL TAWIL, El Sayed BADAWI (Secretary General), Yaseen Tag al-DIN (Deputy Secretary General).

Liberal Socialist Party—LSP (Hizb al-Ahrar al-Ishiraki). The Liberal Socialist Party, which was formed in 1976 from the right wing of the ASU, focuses on securing a greater role for private enterprise within the Egyptian economy while protecting the rights of workers and farmers. The party’s assembly representation fell from 12 to 3 seats in June 1979 and was eliminated entirely at the 1984 balloting, on the basis of a vote share of less than 1 percent. It obtained three elective seats in 1987 as a member of a Socialist Labor Party–led coalition. It subsequently discontinued its alliance with the SLP and Muslim Brotherhood. It boycotted the November 1990 poll, although one of its members reportedly won a seat as an independent. The party won one seat in the 2000 and 2005 assembly elections and supported Mubarak in the 2005 presidential election.

Leader: Hilmi SALIM.

National Progressive Unionist Party—NPUP (Hizb al-Tajammu al-Watani al-Taqaddumi al-Wahdawi). Although it received formal endorsement as the party of the left in 1976, the NPUP temporarily ceased activity in 1978 following the enactment of restrictive internal security legislation. It contested the June 1979 assembly election on a platform that, alone among those of the four sanctioned parties, opposed the Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty, and it failed to retain its two parliamentary seats. In both 1979 and 1984 the party leadership charged the government with fraud and harassment, although on the latter occasion, President Mubarak included a NPUP member among his assembly nominees. In November 1990 the NPUP resisted opposition appeals for an electoral boycott and captured six assembly seats; meanwhile, the party led opposition criticism against U.S. military involvement in the Gulf. The NPUP urged a no vote against Mubarak in the 1993 presidential referendum and called for a boycott of the 1999 poll. The party won one seat in the 2005 assembly elections.

Leaders: Rifaat al-SAID, Abu al-Izz al-HARIRI (Deputy Chair).

Tomorrow Party (al-Ghad). Officially recognized by the government in October 2004, this leftist party became only the third new party allowed since 1977. Tomorrow seeks constitutional reform to reduce the power of the presidency and an end to the country's emergency law. Espousing a commitment to social justice, the party is made up largely of dissidents from the NWP. Former leader Ayman Nur, jailed for six weeks in 2005 (see Current issues, above), came in a distant second to Mubarak in the September 2005 presidential election. A rift over leadership occurred after the election between Nur's supporters and those led by Musa Mustafa Musa. His splinter group elected him the new party leader on October 1, 2005, though Nur insisted he was still party president. Nur was sentenced to five years in prison in December 2005 following his conviction on charges that he forged documents used to register his party. On December 30, however, the party's general assembly elected Naji al-Ghatrifi to be its new leader, named Nur its honorary leader, and sacked four dissident members. The party won one seat in the 2005 assembly elections.

Leader: Naji al-GHATRIFI (Chair).

Other Parties That Participated in Recent Elections

Nasserist Arab Democratic Party —NADP. Also referenced simply as the Nasserist Party, the NADP, formed in 1992, won one seat in the 1995 assembly balloting, three in the 2000 poll, and none in the 2005 elections. Its platform called for the government to retain a dominant role in directing the economy and to increase the provision of social services.

Leader: Diaeddin DAOUD.

National Party (Hizb al-Umma). A small Muslim organization, the National Party has ties to the supporters of Dr. Sadiq al-MAHDI, former prime minister of Sudan. It participated unsuccessfully in the 2000 assembly balloting on a platform that called for the strengthening of the "democratic process."

Leader: Ahmad al-SABAHI Awadallah (Chair and 2005 presidential candidate).

Green Party (Hizb al-Khudr). The Green Party, recognized by the Political Parties Tribunal in April 1990, was reported to have emerged in response to a 1986 newspaper column by (then) Vice President Abdel Salam DAOUD that criticized his countrymen's lack of interest in environmental issues. The formation claimed 3,000 members and, while professing no interest in gaining political power, participated unsuccessfully in the 1990 legislative campaign. The party supported President Mubarak in the 2005 presidential campaign.

Leader: Abdul Moneim al-AASAR (Chair).

Other parties that participated in the 2005 elections were the Democratic Unionist Party, led by Ibrahim TURK; the Egyptian Arab Socialist Party, led by Wahid al-UQSURI; the Generation Party (al-Gayl), led by Naji al-SHAHABI; the National Accord Party, led by Al-Sayyid Rifaat al-AGRUDI; Solidarity (al-Takaful), a socialist grouping led by Usama Mohammad SHALTOUT; the Egypt 2000 Party (Misr), led by Fawsi Khalil Mohammad GHAZAL; the Social Constitutional Party, led by Mamduh Mohammad QINAWI; and the National Rally for Democratic Change, whose leader, former Prime Minister Sidqi, was coordinator of the ten-party National Front coalition.

Other Parties and Groups

Muslim Brotherhood (al-Ikhwan al-Muslimin). Established in 1928 to promote creation of a pan-Arab Islamic state, the Brotherhood was declared an illegal organization in 1954 when the government accused its leaders, many of whom were executed or imprisoned, of plotting a coup attempt. However, for many years the Mubarak government tolerated some activity on the part of the Brotherhood since it claimed to eschew violence, as a means of undercutting the militant fundamentalist movement. With much of its support coming from the northern middle class, the Brotherhood retains the largest following and greatest financial resources among Egypt's Islamic organizations despite the emergence of more radical groups. It dominates many Egyptian professional associations, collaterally providing a wide range of charitable services in sharp contrast to inefficient government programs.

The Brotherhood secured indirect assembly representation in 1984 and 1987. Although the Brotherhood boycotted the 1990 assembly balloting, joint SLP/Brotherhood candidates contested a number of seats in November 1992 municipal elections. Many Brotherhood adherents were removed from local and national appointive positions in 1992–1993 as a side effect of the government's antifundamentalist campaign. Friction with the government intensified further in early 1995 when a group of Brotherhood members were charged with having links to the militant Islamic Group (below). The government arrested more than 50 members of the group in July on charges of belonging to an illegal organization. Sentences of up to five years in prison were handed down against most of the defendants in early November, essentially precluding effective Brotherhood participation in the legislative balloting later that month. (It was subsequently reported that only one successful assembly candidate could be identified as a Brotherhood adherent.) The Brotherhood urged a boycott of the April 1997 local elections, claiming that many of its supporters and preferred candidates had been subjected to government "intimidation."

In January 1996 a number of former Brotherhood members reportedly launched a Center Party (Hizb al-Wasat) along with representatives of the Coptic community in an avowed effort to "heal the breaches" within the Egyptian populace. However, the government denied the party's request for recognition and arrested some 13 of its founders with purported Brotherhood ties. In August seven of the defendants were convicted of antigovernment activity by a military court and sentenced to three years in prison. Al-Wasat was again denied legal status in May 1998, the government describing it as insufficiently different from other parties to warrant recognition. (See Other Legislative Parties, above.)

A number of the officially independent candidates in the 2000 assembly balloting were clearly identifiable as belonging to the Brotherhood, and 17 of them were elected, permitting the return of the Brotherhood to the assembly after a ten-year absence. Though Brotherhood leaders subsequently again denied any connection to militant groups, a number of Brotherhood members were arrested in the government crackdown on Islamists in late 2001 and early 2002.

The death of 83-year-old leader Mamoun al-HODAIBI on January 9, 2004, was seen as an opportunity to attract the younger generation, but on January 14 the party selected an "old guard" successor: Muhammad Mahdi Akef, 74. He maintained that the Brotherhood would not change its approach. Akef had been convicted in 1954 of the attempted assassination of President Nasser and served 20 years in prison.

While Akef called for dialogue with the government, in May 2004 security forces arrested 54 members of the Brotherhood and for the first time targeted the organization's funding sources, closing various businesses and the group's website. In March 2005, some 84 members were arrested in police raids in the midst of massive demonstrations, said to be the largest in Cairo's history. The Brotherhood ran 120 candidates as independents in the November–December 2005 assembly elections, securing 88 seats in balloting marked by violence, including the death of one Brotherhood supporter. It was widely reported that government security forces blocked some polls and detained scores of group members. Brotherhood leaders said they would use the gains made in representation to push for the abolition of laws that restrict political activity.

Leaders: Muhammad Mahdi AKEF, Mohamed HABIB, Mahmoud EZZAT (Secretary General), Mohamed HILAL.

Another group, referenced as the Social Justice Party, was formed in 1993 and led by Mohammad Abdul AALA. It was suspended in 2003.

Illegal Groups

Holy War (al-Jihad). A secret organization of militant Muslims who had reportedly split from the Muslim Brotherhood in the second half of the 1970s because of the latter's objection to the use of violence, al-Jihad was blamed for attacks against Copts in 1979 and the assassination of President Sadat in 1981. In the first half of the 1980s it appeared to be linked to the Islamic Group (below), but the two organizations emerged with more distinct identities during the mid-1980s. Although some observers described al-Jihad as continuing to seek recruits, particularly in the military, its influence appeared to have diminished in the late 1980s as the result of government infiltration of its ranks and growing support for the Islamic Group. However, security officials charged that a revival of the group was attempted in the first half of the 1990s in conjunction with the increasingly violent fundamentalist/government conflict. A number of reported al-Jihad supporters were imprisoned in mid-1993 on charges of plotting the overthrow of the government, while, according to authorities, about 30 members were arrested in an April 1994 security sweep. Meanwhile, members of an apparent splinter, variously referenced as New Jihad or the Vanguards of Conquest (Talai al-Fath), were subsequently given death sentences for complicity in assassination plots against top government officials. Some reports linked that activity to Ayman al-ZAWAHIRI, a former Cairo surgeon who had been imprisoned (and reportedly subjected to extreme torture) for three years following the assassination of President Sadat. Zawahiri was also reportedly linked to the bombing of the Egyptian embassy in Pakistan in 1995.

In 1998, in the wake of the Luxor attack of 1997, Zawahiri and his brother, Mohammad al-ZAWAHIRI, were described as attempting to "reorganize" al-Jihad from Afghanistan, where they had reportedly established ties with the al-Qaida network of Osama bin Laden. (Ayman al-Zawahiri had not been seen in Egypt since 1986.) Among other things, Ayman al-Zawahiri endorsed bin Laden's 1998 call for attacks on "Jews and Crusaders" (the latter a reference to Americans and their allies). At that point it appeared that a portion of al-Jihad, having been effectively suppressed in Egypt, had shifted away from a goal of overthrowing the Egyptian government to a global anti-Western campaign in concert with al-Qaida. However, some members of al-Jihad reportedly objected to that new focus and split from Zawahiri.

A number of alleged al-Jihad adherents received long prison terms in early 1999, while nine were sentenced to death in absentia, including Ayman al-Zawahiri and Yasser al-SIRRI, a London-based leader. Zawahiri was also indicted in absentia in 1999 in the United States for his alleged role in the planning of the bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Pakistan in 1998. Following the attacks on the United States in September 2001 that were quickly attributed to al-Qaida, Zawahiri, noted for his organizational skills, was described as the number two leader, after bin Laden, in that network. Some reports linked Zawahiri to the July 2005 bombings in Sharm El-Sheikh, Egypt, that killed at least 64 people. As of mid-2006, he continued to elude U.S. authorities.

Islamic Group (Gamaat i-Islami). The Islamic Group surfaced in the late 1970s as the student wing of the Muslim Brotherhood, subsequently breaking from that organization and aligning (until the mid-1980s) with al-Jihad in seeking overthrow of the government. Having gained adherents among the poor in the Cairo slums and the villages in southern Egypt, it served as a loosely knit, but highly militant, umbrella organization for as many as three dozen smaller organizations. The government accused the Group of spearheading attacks on security forces, government officials, and tourists beginning in 1992, and hanged a number of its members who had been convicted of terrorist activity.

Egyptian authorities in the mid-1990s asked the United States to extradite Sheikh Omar ABDEL RAHMAN, the blind theologian who is reputed to be the spiritual leader of the Islamic Group and had been in self-imposed exile in the New York City area since 1990. In April 1994 Sheikh Abdel Rahman was sentenced in absentia by an Egyptian security court to seven years in prison for inciting his followers to violence in 1989. In addition, 25 codefendants received jail terms of various lengths. In January 1996 Sheikh Abdel Rahman was sentenced to life in prison in the United States following his conviction on charges of conspiring to commit a series of bombings in the New York City area. Eight codefendants were given prison terms of 25 years to life. Meanwhile, Safwat Abd al-Ghani, viewed as the political leader of the Group, was confined to prison in Egypt on a charge of illegal weapons possession. Ghani and other Islamic Group defendants had initially been charged with murder in the 1990 assassination of Assembly President Rifat al-Mahgoub; however, the charges were dismissed in 1993 following a court ruling that confessions had been extracted from them by torture.

Talaat Yassin HAMMAN, described by Egyptian authorities as the “military commander” of the Islamic Group, was killed by security forces in April 1994. His “intended successor,” Ahmad Hassan Abd al-GALIL, also died in a shoot-out with police the following November. It was subsequently reported that Group military activities were being conducted under the leadership of Mustapha HAMZA and Rifai TAHA, apparently based in Afghanistan.

Two members of the Group were executed in February 1995 after being convicted of a bombing in which a German tourist was killed, while two others were executed in late March for the attempted killing of Nobel laureate Naguib MAHFOUZ in October 1994. The Egyptian government also accused the Group (and Hamza in particular) of being behind a June 1995 attempt on the life of President Mubarak in Ethiopia.

In mid-1996 reports surfaced that a faction of the Islamic Group had signaled an interest in negotiations with the government. However, that possibility was apparently rejected by the Mubarak administration. Factionalization within the Group was also apparent in 1997, particularly in regard to a “cease-fire” ordered by its imprisoned leaders at midyear. Although the militants responsible for the attack at Luxor in November appeared linked to the Group, long-standing Group leaders disavowed responsibility, suggesting they were no longer in control of at least some “rogue” guerrilla cells. Subsequently, spokesmen for the Group emphasized that it had reached “political maturity” and had renounced violence in favor of attempting to establish an Islamic state in Egypt through the political process. Sheikh Abdel Rahman appeared to endorse that shift in late 1998 when he called on his followers to pursue “peaceful means,” and the Islamic Group announced in March 1999 that a unilateral cease-fire was in effect. That cease-fire remained in effect through mid-2005. Islamic Group members still committed to violence reportedly subsequently joined the al-Qaida network of Osama bin Laden. In April 2006, it was reported that Egyptian authorities had released 950 members of the organization, though officials denied having released that number and said those who were released posed no risk to national security.

Islamic Liberation Party (Hizb al-Tahrir al-Islami). This radical political movement wants to create an Islamic society in Egypt and is on the United States’ list of foreign terrorist organizations.

In September 2002 some 51 defendants were given jail sentences in connection with the alleged activity of a clandestine organization known as al-Waad (The Pledge). First arrested on charges of belonging to an illegal organization, the defendants were also subsequently accused of planning violent acts in pursuit of the establishment of an Islamic state in Egypt. In early 2005 an Egyptian court upheld a five-year sentence for Mohammed Abdel Fattah, convicted along with 24 others the previous year, but Fattah managed to escape. He and the others were accused of trying to reorganize the party, which has been banned since 1974.

Also subject to government crackdowns have been the Islamic fundamentalist Survivors from Hell (al-Najoun Min al-Nar), charged in 1988 with the attempted murder of two anti-Muslim former government ministers, and Denouncement and Holy Flight (Takfir wa al-Hijra). (Some 245 members of the latter were reportedly arrested in April 1996.) An obscure Islamic group, Islamic Pride Brigades of the Land of the Nile, claimed responsibility for a bombing in the heart of Cairo in April 2005.

Clandestine left-wing formations against which the government has moved energetically in the past included, most prominently, the Egyptian Communist Party (al-Hizb al-Shuyui al-Misri). Founded in 1921, the party subsequently experienced numerous cleavages that yielded, among others, the Egyptian Communist Labor Party and the Maoist Revolutionary Current. In 1990 another splinter, the People's Socialist Party, was launched under the leadership of veteran Communist Michel KAMEL, who later died in exile in France.

Two Islamist groupings—the Reform (Islah) Party, formed in 1997 under the leadership of Gamal SULTAN; and the Islamic Law (Sharia) Party—sought permission to participate in the 2000 assembly elections, but their applications were emphatically rejected by the government.

Legislature

The People's Assembly (Majlis al-Shaab) is a unicameral legislature elected in two-round balloting for a five-year term. As sanctioned by a popular referendum, President Sadat dissolved the existing assembly (which had two years remaining in its term) on April 21, 1979, and announced expansion of the body from 350 to 392 members, in part to accommodate representatives from the Sinai. Prior to the election of May 27, 1984, the assembly was further expanded to 458 members, including 10 appointed by the president.

On May 19, 1990, the Supreme Constitutional Court voided the results of an assembly poll of April 6, 1987, because of improper restrictions on opposition and independent candidates, and an October 11 referendum approved formal dissolution of the body. A new election, boycotted by most of the leading opposition formations, was held November 29 and December 6, 1990, the assembly having been reduced to 454 members, including the 10 presidential appointees.

Elections to the current assembly were held in November–December 2005. First-round balloting was conducted for three groups of districts on three days (November 9 and 20 and December 1); second-round balloting was held six days after each first round. The government reported that some 5,000 candidates competed for 444 seats. The results for 12 seats were annulled. The government reported the seat distribution for the remaining 432 seats as follows: the National Democratic Party (NDP), 265; the New Wafd Party (NWP), 6; the National Progressive Unionist Party (NPUP), 1; the Liberal Socialist Party, 1; the Tomorrow Party, 1; independents 157; and vacant, 1. However, it was widely agreed that 88 of the independent candidates were clearly identified as allied with the Muslim Brotherhood, while many of the remaining independents were considered allied with the NDP. (Most news reports credited the NDP with having secured 320–324 seats.) Ten parties and groups fielded candidates under a coalition referenced as the National Front for Change.

President: Dr. Ahmad Fathi SURUR.

Communications

The Supreme Press Council, established under a constitutional amendment in May 1980, oversees newspaper and magazine activity while government boards also direct the state information service, radio, and television. The government retains 51 percent ownership (exercised through the Shura) of many major newspapers and consequently exercises substantial editorial control. Although the development of an active and often highly critical opposition press was permitted in the 1980s, significant censorship has been imposed in recent years in conjunction with the conflict between the government and Islamic fundamentalist militants. A new press law was adopted in May 1995 providing for prison sentences and heavy fines for, among other things, “insulting” public officials or state institutions. However, in June 1996 some of the harshest elements of the new code were rescinded after the government was strongly criticized by domestic and international journalists for attempting to “muzzle” the press.

In February 2005, the president announced an end to imprisonment for various publication offenses, yet three months later, three journalists from an independent daily were found guilty of libeling the housing minister and sentenced to a year in jail. In July 2005 the government reshuffled the leadership of the press, appointing new heads to all the major government dailies.

REPUBLIC OF EQUATORIAL GUINEA

República de Guinea Ecuatorial

---

Note: Prime Minister Borico and the entire cabinet resigned on August 10, 2006, after having been criticized for poor performance by President Obiang. The president subsequently appointed Ricardo Mangué Obama Nfube of the Democratic Party of Equatorial Guinea to head a new cabinet that was appointed on August 16.

The Country

The least populous and the only Spanish-speaking black African nation, Equatorial Guinea consists of two sharply differing regions: the mainland territory of Río Muni, including Corisco, Elobey Grande, and Elobey Chico islands as well as adjacent islets; and the island of Bioko (known prior to 1973 as Fernando Póo and from 1973 to 1979 as Macías Nguema Biyogo), including Pagalu (known prior to 1973 as Annobón) and adjacent islets in the Gulf of Guinea. Río Muni, whose area is 10,045 square miles (26,017 sq. km.), accounts for more than nine-tenths of the country's territory and about three-quarters of its total population; Bata is the principal urban center. Bioko's area covers 785 square miles (2,034 sq. km.); Malabo is the chief town and the capital of the republic.

The two basic ethnic groups, both Bantu sub-groupings, are the Fang, who reportedly account for the majority of the population, and the Bubi, primarily located in Bioko. (Bubi/Fang friction remains an important issue on Bioko, while resentment has also reportedly surfaced among the rest of Fang over the dominance within that group of President Obiang's Mongomo sub-clan.) Other elements include the Kombe and various coastal tribes in Río Muni, and Fernandinos (persons of mixed racial descent) in Bioko. Roman Catholicism is the religion of approximately 80 percent of the population.

Until the discovery of oil in the mid-1990s, the economy was dominated by agriculture, the principal exports being cocoa, coffee, and timber. Industry consisted primarily of small-scale agriprocessing operations, while a small fishing sector also operated. Following the August 1979 coup, substantial aid was tendered by Spain, France, and other international donors to help Equatorial Guinea recover from the economic devastation of the Macie era, during which most skilled workers were killed or fled the country, cocoa production and per capita GNP plummeted, and such essential urban services as power and water were disrupted. In contrast to the Eastern-bloc affiliation of its predecessor, the post-Macie government adopted generally pro-Western, free-market policies. However, economic recovery was initially slow, the adverse effects of high budget and trade deficits, inflation, and a burdensome external debt being only partially offset by improvements resulting from Equatorial Guinea's admission to the franc zone in 1985. Cocoa and timber prices also declined in the late 1980s, further complicating the situation.

Equatorial Guinea's economic prospects surged dramatically in the mid-1990s when significant oil and gas reserves were discovered off the north coast of Bioko. Pumping began in 1996 and had reached more than 100,000 barrels per day by early 1999; concurrently, GDP grew by nearly 100 percent in both 1997 and 1998. However, there was broad concern over the distribution of the oil wealth, reports indicating that it had been concentrated in the hands of only 5 percent of the population. Members of President Obiang's sub-clan were believed to have benefited most extensively, and international donors restricted aid over the lack of transparency in the oil sector and perceived widespread corruption in government and business. Meanwhile, it has been estimated that as much as 75 percent of the population remained impoverished, the World Bank and International Monetary Fund (IMF) insisting that income from oil exploitation be redirected toward social services and infrastructure development.

By the end of 2001, the country's long-term economic prospects had been buoyed by additional discoveries of oil and potentially lucrative gas deposits. After peaking at nearly 50 percent in 2001 (earning Equatorial Guinea the reputation of having the world's fastest-growing economy), GDP growth slowed to 10 percent in 2005. Naturally, the ongoing oil boom underpinned the expansion as production rose to 356,000 barrels per day; however, the non-oil sector also grew by an average of 5.13 percent in 2005. The increased revenue provided the government with regular budget surpluses, although critics continued to cite perceived corruption and inefficiency, and widespread poverty persisted. The IMF urged interim strategies in 2005 to help the country meet its poverty reduction objectives.

Political Background

The former territory of Spanish Guinea, with Spanish sovereignty dating from 1778, was granted provincial status in 1959 and internal autonomy in 1964, achieving full independence under the name of Equatorial Guinea on October 12, 1968. The pre-independence negotiations with Spain had been complicated by differences between the mainland Fang, whose representatives sought the severance of all links with Spain, and the island Bubi, whose spokesmen advocated retention of some ties with Spain and semiautonomous status within a federal system. A compromise constitution and electoral law, submitted for popular approval in a UN-supervised referendum on August 11, 1968, was accepted by 63 percent of the people, the substantial adverse vote reflecting Bubi fears of mainland domination as well as Fang objections to the degree of self-rule accorded the islanders. In presidential balloting a month later, MACÍAS Nguema Biyogo, a mainland Fang associated with the Popular Idea of Equatorial Guinea (Idea Popular de Guinea Ecuatorial—IPGE), defeated the head of the pre-independence autonomous government, Bonifacio ONDO Edu of the Movement for the National Unity of Equatorial Guinea (Movimiento de Union Nacional de Guinea Ecuatorial—MUNGE).

In 1969 President Macías seized emergency powers during a major international crisis involving tribal rivalries, personality conflicts, allegations of continued Spanish colonialism, and conflicting foreign economic interests. Following an unsuccessful coup d'état led by Foreign Minister Atanasio N'DONGO Miyone of the National Movement for the Liberation of Equatorial Guinea (Movimiento Nacional de Liberación de la Guinea Ecuatorial—Monalige), the president arrested some 200

Area: 10,830 sq. mi. (28,051 sq. km.).

Major Urban Centers (2005E): MALABO (Bioko, 90,000), Bata (Río Muni, 70,000).
Official Language: Spanish. (French was adopted as a “commercial” language in September 1997 during a period of friction between Malabo and Madrid. In addition various African dialects are spoken, and pidgin English serves as a commercial lingua franca.)
Monetary Unit: CFA franc (official rate July 1, 2006: 513.01 CFA francs = $1US). (The CFA franc, previously pegged to the French franc, is now permanently pegged to the euro at 655.957 CFA francs = 1 euro.)
President: Gen. Teodoro OBIANG Nguema Mbasogo (Democratic Party of Equatorial Guinea), assumed power as president of a Supreme Military Council following the ouster of MACIE (formerly Francisco Macías) Nguema Biyogo Ñegue Ndong on August 3, 1979; inaugurated October 12, 1982, following confirmation for a seven-year term by constitutional referendum on August 15; reelected for seven-year terms on June 25, 1989, February 25, 1996, and, in early elections, on December 15, 2002.
Prime Minister: (See headnote.) Miguel Abia Biteo BORICO (Democratic Party of Equatorial Guinea); named by the president on June 14, 2004, to replace Cándido Muatetema RIVAS, who had resigned on June 11; formed new government on June 16, 2004.

individuals, most of whom (including N’Dongo) were executed. An accompanying panic, aggravated by the extralegal activities of Macías’s youth militia, provoked the flight of the country’s Spanish population. Subsequently, a highly centralized, single-party state was instituted, Macías’s control being formalized by his assuming the presidency for life in July 1972. Along with other Equatorial Guineans, Macías dropped his Christian name (Francisco) on September 26, 1975; in 1976 he also changed his surname from Macías to Macie.

The 11-year rule of Macías/Macie (during which the country became widely known as the “Auschwitz of Africa”) was terminated on August 3, 1979, in a coup led by the president’s nephew, Lt. Col. Teodoro OBIANG Nguema Mbasogo, who assumed the presidency of a Supreme Military Council that later in the month named Capt. Florencio MAYÉ Elá and Capt. Salvador ELÁ Nseng as first and second vice presidents, respectively. In February 1980 Elá Nseng was succeeded by Capt. Eulogio OYO Riquesa, presiding officer of the military tribunal that had ordered Macie’s execution on September 29, 1979, for crimes that included genocide, treason, and embezzlement. The government was further reshuffled in early December 1981, the first vice presidency becoming vacant in the wake of Mayé Elá’s assignment to the United Nations and Capt. Cristino SERICHE Bioko succeeding Oyo Riquesa as second vice president.

Concurrent with the adoption, by referendum, of a new constitution on August 15, 1982, Colonel Obiang was confirmed as president for a seven-year term. Subsequently, Captain Seriche was named prime minister, the two vice-presidential roles being eliminated. The first National Assembly election mandated by the new constitution was held on August 28, 1983.

An attempted coup of unclear origin (the third since 1981) failed to unseat Colonel Obiang in July 1986 while he was in France attending Bastille Day celebrations. At first, the government denied a revolt had occurred; a month later, however, Eugenio ABESO Mondu, a former diplomat and a member of the National Assembly, was executed for his alleged involvement, with 12 others, including prominent cabinet members and military officers, being sentenced to jail terms.

In late 1987 President Obiang launched a government formation, the Democratic Party of Equatorial Guinea (Partido Democrático de Guinea Ecuatorial—PDGE), as a precursor to political liberalization. However, there was little immediate movement in that direction: as in 1983 a July 1988 legislative poll was strictly pro forma, and Obiang was the only candidate at presidential balloting in June 1989. Although Obiang hailed his reelection as the launching of a democratization process and invited political exiles to return, he rejected suggestions that a multiparty system be introduced, arguing that “political pluralism would send convulsions through the population.” However, in 1990 failure to implement political reforms severely constricted foreign aid and investment. As a result, an extraordinary PDGE congress in August endorsed the adoption of a democratic constitution, which was overwhelmingly approved in a referendum of November 17, 1991. On January 23, 1992, the president appointed a new administration, headed by Silvestre SIALE Bileka as prime minister, to serve “as a prelude to the introduction of multiparty politics,” and in late May the government legalized the first two of six parties.

Meanwhile, tensions between Obiang and the opposition continued to mount, with the latter accusing the government of killing an opposition activist, Feliciano MOTO, and attempting to intimidate prodemocracy advocates. The regime denied involvement in Moto’s death, but in September 1992 the president’s brother, National Security Director Armando NGOR Nguema, was linked to the violent breakup of a meeting of the newly formed Joint Opposition Platform (Plataforma de la Oposición Conjunta—POC).

Political discord continued into 1993, with Washington in mid-January accusing the Obiang regime of engaging in torture, intimidation, and unlawful imprisonment of its opponents. On March 3 the U.S. ambassador was called home for “consultations” after allegedly being targeted by a government-inspired death threat. A week later the UN Commission for Human Rights (UNCHR) announced that it would appoint a special rapporteur to monitor conditions in Equatorial Guinea.

At poorly attended legislative balloting on November 21, 1993, the PDGE, aided by the POC’s boycott, dominated the eight-party field, capturing 68 of the 80 seats. Both Spain and the United States denounced the proceedings, while the POC termed the low voter turnout a “slap in the face to the dictatorship” and insisted that absentee voters should be considered its supporters. Undeterred, the government on December 6 imposed a ban on unauthorized opposition demonstrations. Furthermore, the cabinet named two weeks later, again headed by Prime Minister Siale Bileka, included no opposition members.

International and domestic dissatisfaction with the Obiang regime continued to mount in 1994. In January Spain suspended aid payments to Malabo, protesting the president’s apparent attempts to derail the democratization process, and in February Amnesty International condemned the government’s human rights record. In April the administration urged opposition members to participate in a voter registration drive organized to prepare for municipal elections (then) scheduled for November. However, in August negotiations were suspended with a prominent opposition party, the Progress Party of Equatorial Guinea (Partido del Progreso de Guinea Ecuatorial—PPGE), after its leader, Severo MOTO Nsa, had criticized the government, and on October 5 two people were killed in a clash between government troops and demonstrators in Malabo. Subsequently, the government suffered a major setback when House speaker Felipe Ondo OBIANG Alogo and his deputy, Antonio Pascual Oko EBOBO, both prominent PDGE members, resigned on October 25, because of the “very poor management” that had led Equatorial Guinea into a “disastrous social and economic situation.”

The nation’s first multiparty municipal elections were held on September 17, 1995, the PDGE being credited with victories in 18 of the 27 localities. However, domestic and international observers challenged the government’s voting tally, the POC arguing that the opposition had really garnered about 80 percent of the votes.

In yet another questionable tactic, Obiang decreed on January 12, 1996, that presidential elections would be held on February 25, three months before his term was set to expire. Opposition leaders immediately denounced the president’s actions as unconstitutional and designed to preclude effective organization on their part. By late January a number of opposition candidates had emerged, including the PPGE’s Moto and three from the POC. However, the subsequent run-up was reportedly marked by gross malfeasance, including harassment of opposition activists and replacement of a UN-compiled electoral list with a government list that excluded voters in regions that had supported the opposition in previous polling. Consequently, most opposition candidates ultimately withdrew and called on their supporters to boycott the election.

At the February 25, 1996, polling President Obiang was credited with 97.85 percent of the votes. However, citing the prepolling malpractice, apparent election day irregularities, and the dearth of impartial international election monitors, most observers dismissed the election as a sham. On March 29 Obiang appointed Angel Serafin Seriche DOUGAN to succeed Prime Minister Siale Bileka. Several parliamentary parties joined the expanded cabinet announced on April 9, although, not surprisingly, the major opposition groupings declined Obiang's invitation to join in a government of national unity. On January 15, 1998, Dougan and his cabinet resigned in accordance with a presidential mandate that required the prime minister to submit his government for review after two years in office. Two days later, Obiang reappointed Dougan head of a reshuffled government. In mid-January 1998 Prime Minister Dougan's claim to having preserved "national unity" during his first term was challenged in Bioko Island, where ethnic Bubi separatists reportedly attacked government offices. (The Bubi were the dominant group on the island until independence but since then have been surpassed in numbers by the Fang.) Denying a role in the violence, leaders of the Movement for the Self-Determination of the Island of Bioko—MAIB (see Political Parties, below) charged the government with a "veritable genocide" and reaffirmed their desire for self-rule. In March the Obiang administration denied charges by Amnesty International that it was torturing separatist prisoners. Thereafter, a military court sentenced 15 of the separatists to death in June for their alleged roles in the uprising, although the president commuted the death sentences in September following the prison death of a dissident who had reportedly been beaten by security forces. (The president's acts of clemency came amid speculation that his international economic sponsors were reconsidering their support.) Meanwhile, the government had reportedly arrested dozens of opposition activists in an apparent attempt to disrupt their preparations for legislative balloting (then scheduled for late 1998, but subsequently postponed until early 1999). At balloting on March 7, 1999, the PDGE increased its legislative dominance, capturing 75 of the 80 posts in polling that was reportedly again marked by widespread irregularities. On July 9 Obiang reappointed Dougan prime minister, and on July 22 Dougan announced a streamlined and reshuffled cabinet.

The PDGE reportedly won 230 of 244 seats and control of all 30 municipal councils in the local elections of May 28, 2000. Observers described the balloting as generally free and fair, although its significance was greatly undercut by the fact that three leading independent parties boycotted what they described as just the most recent "electoral farce." Some analysts suggested that Western capitals were ignoring the lack of democratic progress (to say nothing of continued human rights violations) in view of the dramatic surge of oil production.

In light of continued corruption allegations against various government officials, President Obiang reportedly asked Prime Minister Dougan to resign as early as October 2000, although it wasn't until February 23, 2001, that Dougan acquiesced to the pressure. Incoming prime minister Cándido Muatetema RIVAS, a former deputy secretary general of the PDGE, pledged the new government, which included members of several small parties in junior positions, would protect the "economic" and "social" rights of all citizens while maintaining the "stability" that the country has enjoyed for more than two decades. For its part, the "frail" opposition charged that oil proceeds were being diverted to promote a "clan dictatorship," a reference to reports of maneuvering within the president's ethnic group to ensure long-term retention of power.

Amid continuing political turmoil and continued government suppression of the opposition, President Obiang moved the next presidential balloting up from February 2003 to December 15, 2002. Most opposition parties ultimately boycotted the election, and Obiang was reelected with 97.1 percent of the vote. Although Obiang had promised to appoint a government of national unity, he reappointed Rivas to head a reshuffled cabinet that was again dominated by the PDGE and included two of Obiang's sons.

The PDGE and its allies (the newly formed Democratic Opposition Coalition) won 98 of 100 seats in the April 25, 2004, balloting for the House of People's Representatives. They also secured nearly all of the seats in concurrent municipal elections. Prime Minister Rivas resigned on June 11 and was succeeded three days later by Miguel Abia Biteo BORICO.

Constitution and Government

The 1982 constitution provided for an elected president serving a seven-year term and for a Council of State, one of whose functions was to screen candidates for presidential nomination. A National Council for Economic and Social Development was linked to the administration in a consultative capacity, while legislative functions were assigned to a unicameral National Assembly, whose members were elected for five-year terms.

The basic law of November 1991 called for a separation of functions between the president and prime minister, while authorizing competing parties. At the same time, it severely limited opposition activity by banning from presidential or parliamentary eligibility all individuals who had not been continuously resident in the country for the preceding two years. In addition, it stipulated that the head of state could "not be impeached, or called as a witness before, during and after his term of office." Subsequent legislation on the formation of political parties specified that no such group could be organized on a tribal, regional, or provincial basis.

In late 1980 the country was divided into 6 provinces (4 mainland and 2 insular) as part of a process of administrative reform, while there are currently 30 elected municipal governments.

Foreign Relations

While officially nonaligned, the Macie regime tended to follow the lead of the more radical African states. Diplomatic relations were established with—and aid received from—several Communist regimes, including the Soviet Union, the People's Republic of China, Cuba, and North Korea. Relations with Gabon and Cameroon were strained as a result of territorial disputes, while by 1976 the mistreatment of Nigerian contract workers had led Lagos to repatriate some 25,000 people, most of them cocoa plantation laborers. By contrast, the Obiang regime has striven for regional cooperation, with a Nigerian consulate opening in Bata in 1982 and a joint defense pact being concluded during a three-day official visit to Lagos by President Obiang in January 1987. Economic agreements were signed with Cameroon and the Central African Republic in 1983, and Obiang was active in the formation of the Central African Economic Community, announced in October 1983. Two months later, Equatorial Guinea became the first non-French-speaking member of the Central African Customs and Economic Union (UDEAC). As the only African country with Spanish as its official language, Equatorial Guinea was also anxious to develop links with Latin America and was accorded permanent observer status with the Organization of American States (OAS).

At the time of Macie's ouster, France was the only Western power maintaining an embassy in Malabo, although Spain had long been purchasing export commodities at above-market prices. Madrid made its first overture to the new regime in December 1979 with a state visit by King Juan Carlos, in the wake of which economic and military assistance was tendered; in 1983, it played a leading role in renegotiating the country's $45 million foreign debt. Nevertheless, following Equatorial Guinea's admission to the franc zone in 1985, Malabo emphasized rapidly expanding ties with France and francophone West African countries.

Frayed by Spain's criticism of Equatorial Guinea's political and human rights practices, ties between the two countries weakened steadily during 1993. In August the government of Equatorial Guinea charged Madrid with inciting antigovernment violence at Annobon Island. In late November Spain formally refused to underwrite the legislative balloting, saying it failed to meet “minimum requirements,” and following the expulsion of its consul general in Bata, Madrid recalled its ambassador. Among other Western observers, only France openly supported the electoral process, with the United States and the United Nations refusing to provide poll watchers.

In September 1997 Equatorial Guinea temporarily suspended diplomatic relations with Spain after Madrid refused to repeal the refugee status of PPGE leader Severo Moto Nsa. (For further details about the Moto case, see the PPGE below and the 1998 edition of the Handbook.)

In mid-1999 Equatorial Guinea filed a complaint against Cameroon with the International Court of Justice (ICJ) after it was revealed that Yaoundé had made territorial claims to a section of the Gulf of Guinea that included Bioko Island. Fueling the Malabo-Yaoundé dispute, as well as an ongoing border disagreement between Equatorial Guinea and Nigeria, were the recent discoveries of offshore oil deposits. In an effort to reduce tensions and increase cooperation in the Gulf region, a Gulf of Guinea Commission was established in November by Equatorial Guinea, Angola, Congo, Gabon, Nigeria, and São Tomé e Príncipe. Subsequently, in September 2000, Equatorial Guinea and Nigeria settled their border dispute, each country gaining sovereignty over one of the two major disputed oil fields.

Full economic ties with Spain were restored by 2001, and Madrid in 2003 forgave some $65 million of Equatorial Guinea’s external debt. In addition, Spain offered diplomatic support to Equatorial Guinea when Gabonese troops occupied the disputed island of Mbagne. Gabon subsequently offered to withdraw its troops in exchange for an oil-sharing agreement that would cover the island and its surrounding waters, but President Obiang rejected that proposal. In January 2004 Gabon and Equatorial Guinea agreed to abide by the decision of a UN mediator appointed to investigate the dispute. However, by early 2006 the dispute had yet to be resolved.

The United States reopened its embassy in Equatorial Guinea in 2003 as U.S. companies continued to dominate oil exploration and production in Equatorial Guinea.

Current Issues

The already strained relations between the regime and the opposition deteriorated even further when the government in March 2002 initiated a major crackdown that included the arrest of numerous party leaders. The government claimed it was responding to an alleged coup conspiracy, although the opposition and some members of the international community accused Obiang of merely trying to clear the way for his reelection.

In the aftermath of Obiang’s victory in the December 2002 presidential elections, a new cabinet was formed that included the president’s son Teodoro Nguema OBIANG Mangué as minister of agriculture, fisheries and animal husbandry. Speculation continued that Obiang’s son was being prepared as his successor. Meanwhile, international observers widely agreed with Obiang’s domestic critics that the presidential poll and the legislative elections of April 2004 were deeply flawed—or even fraudulent and invalid.

In December 2003 a number of senior military officers were arrested on suspicion of plotting a coup, and most were given secret trials beginning in February 2004. Meanwhile, in March 2004, 19 others were arrested in a separate alleged coup plot. Finally, in a bizarre series of events that attracted substantial worldwide attention, Zimbabwe detained 70 suspected mercenaries en route to Equatorial Guinea. Simon MANN, a former British special forces officer, was charged with masterminding the plot. The group went on trial in Zimbabwe in July 2004, and many pleaded guilty to minor offenses, including illegal possession of weapons and immigration violations, and received minor sentences. On August 25, 2004, Mark THATCHER, son of former British prime minister Margaret THATCHER, was arrested in South Africa and charged with providing $275,000 to support the coup. On January 19, 2005, he pleaded guilty in exchange for a large fine ($506,000), a suspended jail sentence, and the opportunity to leave South Africa for the United States. A condition of his release was that Thatcher answer questions about his role for Equatorial Guinean prosecutors. Later that year Malabo lost its claim for civil damages in the case in a British court.

Obiang accused a variety of foreign governments, including Spain and the United Kingdom, of being involved in the coup attempt and ordered the forced deportation of several hundred foreign nationals. Obiang also ordered the arrest of a number of opposition figures, and accused exiled members of the opposition of involvement in the attempted overthrow. Most of the mercenaries were released from prison in Zimbabwe in May 2005.

Early in 2006, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice drew criticism for meeting with President Obiang in Washington in the wake of State Department accusations of torture and other human rights violations, particularly regarding prisoners. One day earlier Obiang had signed a U.S. aid agreement.

Political Parties

Political parties were banned in the wake of the 1979 coup. In late 1987 President Obiang announced the formation of a government party (the Democratic Party of Equatorial Guinea—PDGE), as part of what he called a democratization process that might eventually lead to the legalization of other groups. In late 1991 and early 1992 the Obiang regime approved legislation that (albeit with restrictive provisions, including a requirement that applicant groups pay a deposit of approximately $110,000) provided a legal framework for the formation of political parties. In May 1992 two parties, the Liberal Democratic Convention (CLD) and the Popular Union (UP), were registered, and by the end of the year four more had been legalized.

During February 10–March 18, 1993, the government sponsored an assembly of the PDGE and the (then) ten legal opposition parties to discuss ways to improve the “democratization process,” including lessened restrictions on party activities and increased access to state funds and media. Nevertheless, charging a lack of government action, most opposition parties declared that they would boycott elections then scheduled for August. Ultimately, eight parties, including the PDGE, took part in the November balloting; however, the three leading members of the Joint Opposition Platform (POC) refused to participate. After suffering from what they perceived as government electoral abuses in the September 1995 municipal elections, many opposition parties boycotted the February 1996 presidential poll.

For its part, the POC was unable to agree upon a single candidate in the chaotic run-up to the 1996 presidential election and was subsequently reported to have “collapsed in acrimony” over the issue. Two parties previously associated with the POC (the CLD and the Social Democratic Union [UDS, below]) accepted cabinet posts in April 1996.

In October 1997 the two most prominent former POC members, the Progress Party of Equatorial Guinea (PPGE) and the UP, joined with the Union for Democracy and Social Development (UDDS) and the Republican Democratic Force (FDR) to form a new coalition, the National Liberation Council. The Council’s platform was highlighted by a pledge to “bring a change of government . . . at all costs.” In December the legislature passed a law forbidding the formation of coalitions prior to legislative balloting (then scheduled for mid-1998, but subsequently postponed until March 1999).

In early 2000 Victorino BOLEKIA Bonay, the leader of the opposition Democratic and Progressive Alliance (Alianza Democrática y Progresiva—ADP) and former mayor of Malabo, announced that the opposition, including the Convergence for Social Democracy (CPDS) and the UP, would boycott municipal balloting scheduled for May. According to Bolekia, the opposition would only participate if the government agreed to conduct a fair electoral census, invited international observers to oversee the polling, and, in addition to a number of other demands, allowed opposition activists freedom of expression and movement.

Various, and at times overlapping, opposition alliances were formed in 2000 and 2001, the most prominent of which was the Democratic Opposition Front (Frente de la Oposición Democrática—FOD) that included the UP, the Progressive Democratic Alliance (ADP), the CPDS, the PPGE, and the Social Democratic Party (PSD). The FOD was launched in November 2000. In December the Equatorial Guinea National Resistance (Resistencia Nacional Guinea Ecuatorial—RENAGE) was launched in Barcelona, Spain; it included the UP, the UDDS, the FDR, the MAIB, and the Union of Independent Socialists (UDI). In March 2001 a new opposition alliance was reportedly formed by the UP, the CPDS, the PPGE, the FDR, the UDI, the MAIB, the National Alliance for the Restoration of Democracy (ANRD), the UDDS, the Party of the Democratic Coalition, and the Forum for Democracy in Equatorial Guinea (see below). Although instrumental in the formation of all of the above opposition alliances, the Popular Union (UP) accepted a junior cabinet post in March 2001. However, the UP campaigned against the dominant PDGE in the 2004 elections.

Government and Government-Supportive Parties

Democratic Party of Equatorial Guinea (Partido Democrático de Guinea Ecuatorial—PDGE). The PDGE was launched in October 1987 by President Obiang, who said it would be used to address the country's development problems while promoting national unity and "respect for the constitution and freedoms." Shortly thereafter, the House of Representatives approved a law requiring all public officials and salaried employees to contribute 3 percent of their salaries to the new formation.

During an extraordinary party congress in Bata on August 4–6, 1991, party delegates urged the government to establish short-, medium-, and long-term plans to lead to the legalization of other political groups. The party also adopted resolutions calling for the adoption of a multicandidature presidential system and the drafting of a law on press rights.

At the PDGE's second national congress on March 20–26, 1995, President Obiang reaffirmed the party's preeminent role in the implementation of public policy and the PDGE has since remained the dominant government party. In legislative elections in 2004 the PDGE and its allies in the Democratic Opposition (see below) received 87.9 percent of the vote and 98 of the 100 seats in the legislature. In local elections, the PDGE and its allies won 237 of 244 posts.

Leaders: Brig. Gen. Teodoro OBIANG Nguema Mbasogo (President of the Republic), Miguel Abia Biteo BORICO (Prime Minister), Filiberto Ntutum NGUEMA (Secretary General), Santiago NGUA Mfumu (Deputy Secretary General), Alberto Sima NGUEMA (Vice President), Cristina Djombe DJAGANI (Vice President).

Democratic Opposition (Electoral Coalition). Formed in 2004, this coalition of eight pro-presidential parties campaigned with the support of the PDGE in both legislative and local elections. The coalition gained 30 seats in the legislature, and legislators from two of the parties—the Liberal Democratic Convention and the Social Democratic Union—were appointed to posts in the government. The Democratic Opposition also campaigned with the PDGE in the concurrent municipal elections, winning, with the PDGE, 237 of 244 posts.

Leaders: Alfonse MOKUY (CLD), Carmelo MODU Akune (UDS).

Liberal Democratic Convention (Convención Liberal Democrática—CLD). Also identified as the Liberal Party (Partido Liberal—PL), the CLD was legally recognized in May 1992. In November Santos Pascual BIKOMO Nanguande, who had previously been linked to the People's Alliance (Alianza del Pueblo—AP), was named to serve as CLD chair until the party's first congress. An attempt to hold such a congress in January 1994 was blocked by the government after Bikomo had charged it with election irregularities.

The CLD was credited with winning one legislative seat in November 1993. Although an original member of the POC, the CLD supported President Obiang in the February 1996 presidential balloting, and Bikomo was named information minister in the new April government. Although Bikomo left his post in 1997, the CLD remained a government-supportive party and held junior ministries following the 1999 and 2004 elections.

Leader: Alfonse MOKUY (President).

Social Democratic Union (Unión Democrática Social—UDS). Formerly a Gabon-based grouping affiliated with the ADP and the Democratic Social Union (Unión Social Democrática—USD), the UDS was officially recognized in October 1992 under the leadership of Carmelo Modu Akune. In November it was reported that the UDS leadership had expelled Akune for pursuing “ideals which ran counter to the principles” of the party, and had named Angel Miko Alo Nchama as interim chair. However, Modu was subsequently again described as the leader of the UDS, which won five legislative seats in November 1993. After supporting President Obiang for reelection, Modu was named minister of state for labor and social security in the April 1996 cabinet and has subsequently held several government posts.

Leaders: Carmelo MODU Akune, Angel Miko Alo NCHAMA.

Social Democratic and Popular Convention (Convención Social Demócrata y Popular—CSDP). The CSDP is reportedly split into two factions. The first, led by Rafael Obiang, apparently remains aligned with the POC, having boycotted the 1993 parliamentary elections and the 1996 presidential balloting. The second, led by Secundio Oyono Avong, participated in the 1993 legislative campaign, winning six seats. The latter also forwarded Oyono Avong as a presidential contender in 1996, several reports describing him as the only opposition candidate not to withdraw from the campaign prior to balloting. On May 9, 2002, party Secretary General Placido Mico Abogo was arrested on charges of conspiracy to assassinate the president. He was pardoned in August 2003.

Leaders: Rafael OBIANG, Secundio OYONO AVONG (1996 presidential candidate), Placido Mico ABOGO (Secretary General).

Social Democratic Coalition Party (Partido de Coalición Social Demócrata—PCSD). The PCSD was officially registered in 1993. In early 1996 party leader Buenaventura Mezui Masumu announced his presidential candidacy; however, he withdrew from the campaign in February to protest the government’s allegedly fraudulent preelection activities. In the 2004 legislative and municipal elections, the PCSD garnered less than 1 percent of the votes.

Leader: Buenaventura Mezui MASUMU.

Social Democratic Party (Partido Social Demócrata—PSD). Formed by Marcellino Mangue MBA and recognized as a party in 1992, the PSD was formerly affiliated with the anti-Obiang group, the Party of the Democratic Coalition (see below). However, it joined the pro-presidential coalition in 2004.

Leader: Benjamín BALINGA (President).

Other members of the Democratic Opposition include the Progressive Democratic Alliance (Alianza Democrática Progresista—ADP), led by Victorino BOLEKIA; the Democratic National Union of Equatorial Guinea (Unión Democrática Nacional—UDENA), led by José MECHEBA; and the Liberal Party (Partido Liberal—PL).

Other Parties and Groups

Popular Union (Unión Popular—UP). The UP was legally recognized in May 1992. However, in October party members were detained and beaten by government security forces, and in March 1993 the group reportedly concluded a merger agreement with the PPGE (although there was no confirmation of the accord).

In August 1993 the government announced that a UP activist, Pedro MOTU Mamiaka, had committed suicide while in detention. However, Amnesty International accused security forces of torturing him to death, and the UP described the killing as another demonstration of the government's persecution of dissenters.

The UP presented Andrés Moisés Mba Ada as a candidate in the 1996 presidential campaign, reportedly angering more senior politicians in the POC. In April 1998 the UP claimed that the government had detained 200 of its activists during a nationwide crackdown on opposition members. Furthermore, in August the group charged the government with expelling its members from electoral oversight committees.

The UP won four seats in the 1999 legislative balloting, but party leaders ordered the UP legislators to refuse to take their seats as a protest against perceived electoral fraud on the part of the government. However, two of the legislators reportedly disobeyed the orders of the UP leaders, producing a split in the party between those members who support a degree of cooperation with the PDGE and those who insist on substantial reform of the political process prior to such compromise. The former faction seemed to have captured the party's higher positions with the election of Jeremias ONDO Ngomo to replace Mba as the president in October 2000. The UP then reversed its previous decision to boycott the assembly, and Ondo accepted a junior post in the new government formed in March 2001. The UP Secretary General, Fabián Nsue Nguema, was subsequently arrested for treason but was pardoned in November 2002. The UP reportedly remained active in various opposition alliances, and it joined the boycott of the 2004 legislative election.

Leaders: Jeremias ONDO Ngomo (President), Andrés Moisés MBA Ada (Former President), Fabián Nsue NGUEMA (Secretary General).

Socialist Party of Equatorial Guinea (Partido Socialista de Guinea Ecuatorial—PSGE). Citing legislative constraints on party activity, the PSGE in January 1992 described President Obiang's multiparty advocacy as an attempt to "deceive" international observers. Subsequently, party leader Tomas Mecheba Fernández called for foreign intervention, "military if necessary," to force the regime to cease its human rights violations. The PSGE later supported cooperation with the PDGE, and Fernández accepted a junior post in the cabinet in 2001. However, the party did not gain seats in the 2004 legislative election and did not participate in the subsequent cabinet.

Leader: Tomas Mecheba FERNANDEZ (President).

Convergence for Social Democracy (Convergencia para la Democracia Social—CPDS). The CPDS was launched in Paris in May 1984 by the two groups below, which set as their goal talks with President Obiang designed "to democratically transform all the state institutions, to guarantee fundamental liberties, and to promote a policy of cooperation with neighboring countries and the Western world." The party was legally recognized in February 1993; however, on September 19, two days after he was convicted of murder in a summary military trial, CPDS activist Romualdo Rafael NSOGO was executed. Subsequently, CPDS leaders denounced the regime, accusing it of killing Nsogo in an attempt to intimidate the opposition.

In early 1996 the CPDS presented Anuncio NZE Angue as its presidential candidate, although he withdrew from the campaign to protest, along with the other POC candidates, the government's tactics prior to the balloting. Nze was reportedly arrested in March for possessing CPDS documents referring to the Obiang administration as "an unreconstructed family dictatorship." At that time Africa Confidential referred to the CPDS as the "most radical" opposition group and the least likely to participate in national unity talks with the government.

In early 1998 a CPDS spokesman reportedly accused the West of refusing to put pressure on the Obiang administration to enact political and social reforms because of Western "economic interests" in the country. In April the group claimed that nearly 50 of its members had been arrested by government security forces.

The CPDS won one seat at legislative polling in March 1999 but its representative subsequently refused to assume the post as a protest over the government's alleged electoral malfeasance. The CPDS won two seats in the 2004 legislative balloting, but denounced the results because of alleged voting problems. At a party congress in January 2005, Santiago Obama Ndong was elected party president.

In May 2005, the party's newspaper, The Truth (La Verdad), allegedly was shut down by the government, a month after several CPDS activists were arrested following clashes with security forces. The government denied any crackdown on the group.

Leaders: Santiago Obama NDONG (President), Celestino Bonifacio BACALE (2002 presidential candidate).

Democratic Movement for the Liberation of Equatorial Guinea (Reunión Democrática para la Liberación de Guinea Ecuatorial—RDLGE). Formed in 1981, the Paris-based RDLGE announced a provisional government-in-exile in March 1983 following the failure of reconciliation talks between its leader and Colonel Obiang in late 1982. The RDLGE is considered a relatively moderate opposition group, the formation of the CPDS apparently representing its response to the creation by more strident groups of the Junta Coordinadora (below).

Leader: Manuel Rubén NDONGO.

African Socialist Party of Equatorial Guinea (Partido Socialista Africano de Guinea Ecuatorial—PSAGE). Based in Oviedo, Spain, the PSAGE was little known prior to its CPDS alliance with the RDLGE.

Progress Party of Equatorial Guinea (Partido del Progreso de Guinea Ecuatorial—PPGE). Also referenced as the People's Party of Equatorial Guinea, the PPGE was formed in Madrid in early 1983 by Severo Moto Nsa, a former secretary of state for information and tourism. Moto and other PPGE leaders returned to Malabo in mid-1988, apparently believing that the government had adopted a conciliatory attitude toward its opponents.

However, a PPGE petition for recognition as a legal party was denied, and Moto returned to exile. In September several PPGE members, including Secretary General José Luis Jones, were jailed in connection with an alleged coup plot. Given a lengthy prison sentence shortly after his arrest, Jones received a presidential pardon in January 1989; also departing the country, he condemned the June presidential poll as "clearly not valid."

In August 1991 Moto planned a second termination of exile to campaign for a multiparty system and the holding of free elections, but the government refused to renew his passport until May 1992, when he returned to Malabo. In early September PPGE members were among those detained in another government crackdown on dissident activity. Nonetheless, the party was legalized in October.

In July 1994 the government severed relations with the PPGE after Moto allegedly "defamed" the Obiang regime, and in November the PPGE leader accused Obiang of involvement in the death of his brother, Vincente MOTO. Subsequently, in March 1995, Moto was sentenced to 18 months in prison for allegedly bribing a government official and defaming the head of state. A far more severe sentence of 28 years was imposed on Moto in April by a military tribunal investigating an alleged coup plot. The sentences were condemned by a number of Western governments, and, following the intercession of French President Jacques Chirac, President Obiang amnestied Moto on August 3.

Moto announced his candidacy for president in early 1996; however, like most other opposition candidates, he withdrew immediately prior to the balloting and urged PPGE supporters to boycott the election. Nevertheless, at midyear Moto was reported to have indicated the willingness of the PPGE and some of the other remaining POC component groups to reopen discussions with the Obiang government.

In June 1997 the government banned the PPGE after it was revealed that Moto had allegedly been planning to overthrow the Obiang government. The following month the party ousted Moto after he restated his willingness to use violence to topple the government. On August 18 Moto was convicted, in absentia, of high treason and sentenced to at least 30 years in jail. Concurrently, the government ordered the PPGE to dissolve.

In October 1997 Moto, who was still being identified by observers as the PPGE's leader, surfaced in Kinshasa, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, as the organizer of a new antigovernment coalition. Subsequently, the PPGE suffered another blow when its first and second deputy leaders reportedly defected to the PDGE in early 1998.

In early 1999 Moto filed suit in Spain against the Obiang government, charging it with engaging in "state terrorism and genocide." Furthermore, Moto announced that his party would boycott legislative polling in March. For its part, Malabo called on Madrid to expel Moto, who had reportedly been residing there for two years. The PPGE also boycotted the 2004 elections, joining with other exile groups to form a government-in-exile in Spain with Moto as its leader.

In late 2005, Spain revoked political asylum for Moto but refused to return him to Equatorial Guinea or any other country that would not guarantee his safety.

Leaders: Severo MOTO Nsa (President), Armengol ENGONGA (Vice President), José Luis JONES (Secretary General).

Republican Democratic Force (Fuerza Democrática Republicana—FDR). In October 1997 this grouping was reported among the founders of the National Liberation Council. Subsequently, its cofounders, Felipe Ondo Obiang and Guillermo Nguema Ela, were described by party members as having been "abducted"; however, the government then admitted holding the two, and in mid-November they were released without explanation. In March 1998 the two were rearrested and charged with making defamatory comments about the president. They were released in March 2000, at which time they vowed to continue their campaign against the administration. In 2003, Amnesty International reported that Ondo was being held by the government and tortured. The government denied reports that security forces had killed Ondo, saying that he had been transferred from one prison to another.

Leaders: Felipe ONDO Obiang, Guillermo NGUEMA Ela, Bonifacio NGUEMA.

Union for Democracy and Social Development (Unión para la Democracia y el Desarrollo Social—UDDS). The UDDS was the core component of the Opposition Coordination of Equatorial Guinea (Coordinación Oposición de Guinea Ecuatorial—COGE), launched in March 1992 by several groups, including the PR, the Zaire-based Movement for the National Unification of Equatorial Guinea (Movimiento para la Unificación Nacional de Guinea Ecuatorial—MUNGE); the Republican Party of Equatorial Guinea (Partido Republicano de Guinea Ecuatorial—PRGE); the National Movement for the Reliberation of Equatorial Guinea (Movimiento Nacional para la Reliberación de Guinea Ecuatorial—Monarge); and the PSGE, which subsequently joined the POC.

Led by vociferous regime critic Antonio Sibacha Bueicheku, the UDDS in early 1993 called on the Guinean clergy to publicly denounce the Obiang administration's human rights record and urged the EC and France to impose sanctions to stem the "perpetual violations." On May 31 five UDDS members were detained when security forces raided a party meeting. Consequently, in early June the party exhorted opposition members to fight the "last dictatorship." In early 1994 the party applauded Spain's decision to suspend aid to Equatorial Guinea and urged other donors to follow suit. In 2004 the UDDS renewed its request for intervention by the UN, the United States, France, and Spain to help bring about political change.

It was unclear what effect the UDDS's membership in the National Liberation Council coalition in 1997 had on the COGE.

Leader: Antonio SIBACHA Bueicheku, Aquilino Nguema Ona NCHEMA (Secretary General).

National Alliance for the Restoration of Democracy (Alianza Nacional de Restauración Democrática—ANRD). Founded in 1974, the Swiss-based ANRD announced in August 1979 that it would regard the ouster of Macie as nothing more than a "palace revolution" unless a number of conditions were met, including the trial of all individuals for atrocities under the former dictator and the establishment of a firm date for termination of military rule.

In April 1983 the ANRD was instrumental in the launching of the Coordinating Board of Opposition Democratic Forces (Junta Coordinadora de las Fuerzas de Oposición Democrática), formed by a group of Spanish-based exile formations, then including the PPGE, to present a united front against President Obiang, whom it accused of failing to live up to the people's expectations and exhibiting a lack of respect for the law. The Junta denounced the August 1983 legislative balloting as a "sham" and called for an economic embargo of the Obiang regime by regional governments. Other participants in the Junta included the Movement for the Liberation and Future of Equatorial Guinea (Movimiento de Liberación y Futuro de Guinea Ecuatorial—Molifuge), the Liberation Front of Equatorial Guinea (Frente de Liberación de Guinea Ecuatorial—Frelige), and the Democratic Reform (Reforma Democrática). The ANRD boycotted the 2004 legislative elections.

Leader: Luis Ondo AYANG (Secretary General).

Union of Independent Democrats (Unión Democrática Independiente—UDI). Formation of the Revolutionary Command Council of Socialist Guinean Patriots was announced in September 1981 by Daniel Oyonoh, a former secretary of state for economy and finance, as a union of three internal groups—the Union of Independent Democrats (Unión de Demócratas Independientes—UDI), the Revolutionary Movement, and the Socialist Front. In addition to political liberalization, the new formation called for the withdrawal of foreign troops from Equatorial Guinea, a reference to the Moroccan and Spanish troops in the presidential guard. The extent of the council's subsequent activity has been unclear, although in mid-1999 it was reported that the council and Bubi nationalists had agreed to coordinate their activities. The UDI rubric was routinely referenced in news reports in the early 2000s.

Leader: Daniel OYONOH (UDI).

Four other anti-Obiang groups are the Party of the Democratic Coalition, led by Francisco

JONES; the People's Alliance of Equatorial Guinea, led by Miguel ESONO; the Forum for Democracy in Equatorial Guinea; and the National Movement for the Liberation of Equatorial Guinea (Movimiento Nacional de Liberación de la Guinea Ecuatorial—Monalige), a continuation of an historic group (see Political background).

In April 2005 it was reported that former prime minister Christino Seriche Malabo BOKO had joined exiled opposition activists in Spain and founded the Vanguard for the Defense of Citizens' Rights (VDDC) in December 2004 "to promote the establishment of a 'real' democratic state" in Equatorial Guinea.

Separatist Groups

April 1 Bubi Nationalist Group. The Bubi Nationalist coalition was launched in Madrid in April 1983 by a number of groups advocating independence for the island of Bioko (formerly Fernando Póo) where the Bubi people then constituted a majority. The Bubi organizations had been excluded from the Junta Coordinadora because of their opposition to its goal of promoting a "national identity." The new Bubi formation subsequently issued a number of manifestos calling for an end to alleged human rights abuses against the islanders.

Leader: Bwalalele BOKOKO Itogi (Secretary General).

Movement for the Self-Determination of the Island of Bioko (Movimiento par la Autodeterminación de la Isla de Bioko—MAIB). The Movement's role in the Bubi nationalist movement came under increased scrutiny following the arrest of a number of its members in July 1995. In late January 1998 the Movement denied government charges that it had organized deadly attacks on Bioko Island, countering that, following the incidents earlier in the month, the island's residents had been subjected to killing and torture by government forces and that 800 people had been arrested.

In June 1998, 15 Movement members were sentenced to death for their alleged roles in the January uprising. In addition, one of the group's leaders, Martin PUYE, was given a 20-year prison term; however, Puye, who, along with a number of the

Legislature

The present constitution provides for a unicameral House of People's Representatives (Cámara de Representantes del Pueblo) to meet for a five-year term. The PDGE-dominated, 41-member legislature elected in July 1988 was dissolved by the president in early July 1993. At balloting on March 7, 1999, for the 80-member House (enlarged to its current size in 1993), the Democratic Party of Equatorial Guinea (PDGE) won 75 seats; the Popular Union (UP), 4; and the Convergence for Social Democracy (CPDS), 1. As of mid-2000 the legislators from the UP and the CPDS had refused to fill their seats as a protest against the government's conduct of the election. However, the UP later reversed its decision. In 2003, the legislature was enlarged to 100 seats in preparation for the 2004 elections. On April 25, 2004, the PDGE won 68 seats; the Democratic Opposition, 30; and the CPDS, 2.

Communications

Press

The following are published irregularly in Malabo: Ebano (1,000), in Spanish; Poto Poto (Bata), in Spanish and Fang; Unidad de la Guinea Ecuatorial. In January 1994 the weekly El Sol became the first private newspaper to be recognized by the government. Two new independent papers, Tiempo and La Nation, were reportedly granted operating licenses in 2000. Other publications include La Opinion (an independent weekly) and an opposition magazine called La Verdad.

News Agency

The only facility currently operating in Malabo is Spain's Agencia EFE.

Broadcasting and Computing

Radio Nacional de Guinea Ecuatorial (RNGE) broadcasts over two stations in Malabo and one in Bata in Spanish and vernacular languages. There are also English-language stations, Radio Africa and Radio Earl Africa, which offer music and religious programming from Malabo. The government's Television Nacional, owned by President Obiang's son, transmits over one channel in Malabo. There were approximately 4,200 television receivers and 5,000 personal computers serving 2,000 Internet users in 2003.

ERITREA

STATE OF ERITREA

The Country

With a coastline stretching some 750 miles along the African border of the Red Sea, Eritrea is bordered on the northwest by Sudan, on the south by Ethiopia, and on the southeast by Djibouti. Home to many ethnic groups (including the Afar, Bilen, Hadareb, Kunama, Nara, Rashida, Saho, Tigray, and Tigrigna), its people are almost equally divided as Christians and Muslims.

The leading agricultural products are cereals, citrus fruits, cotton, and livestock (including camels and goats); fish are plentiful in the vicinity of islands off the Red Sea port of Massawa, while mineral resources include copper, gold, iron ore, and potash. The region's economic infrastructure was severely crippled by a long (1962–1991) war of independence from Ethiopia, the output of most industries being reduced during the conflict to a fraction of capacity. Conditions improved following the end of that war, and, although GNP per capita ($115) remained one of the world's lowest, agricultural production had increased four-fold by May 1993. With the installation of a famine early warning system and infrastructural improvements, a return to agricultural self-sufficiency was reported by late 1994. Subsequently, Eritrea's real GDP growth averaged 6.0 percent annually for 1994–1998, while annual inflation averaged 8.2 percent for the same period. However, that rapid progress came to a halt with the outbreak of a border war with Ethiopia (Eritrea's main export market) in May 1998. By the time hostilities ended (at least temporarily) in 2000, it was estimated that GDP had fallen by 9 percent.

The government launched a five-year, $249 million economic recovery program in 2000, concentrating on agriculture, infrastructure, and support for the private sector. However, the economy subsequently continued to languish, particularly as a final resolution of the conflict with Ethiopia proved elusive and the expense of an army of 350,000 soldiers siphoned resources away from development programs. GDP grew by only 1.8 percent in 2004, while remittances from abroad declined substantially. As of early 2006 it was estimated that two-thirds of the population remained dependent on food aid.

Political Status: Former Italian colony; became part of UN-sponsored Ethiopian–Eritrean Federation in September 1952; annexed as a province of Ethiopia in November 1962; declared independent on May 24, 1993, following secessionist referendum of April 23–25; new constitution approved by the Constitutional Assembly on May 23, 1997, but largely unimplemented as of mid-2006.

Area: 46,774 sq. mi. (121,144 sq. km.).

Population: 2,748,304 (1984C); 4,445,000 (2005E), including nonresidents.

Major Urban Centers (2005E): ASMARA (554,000), Keren (89,000).

Principal Languages: Tigrigna and Arabic.

Monetary Unit: A new currency—the nakfa—was introduced on July 15, 1997. For a transitional period the government agreed to exchange the nakfa on a one-to-one basis with the Ethiopian birr, previously the most commonly circulated currency. The introduction of the new currency was considered a factor in the outbreak of hostilities between Eritrea and Ethiopia in 1998 because it unsettled financial conditions at the border and complicated government-to-government transactions (see Political background, below). Consequently, the future of the nakfa appeared uncertain throughout the war, which concluded in late 2000. As of July 1, 2006, the government rate of exchange was 13.50 nakfa = $1US.

State President and Chair of the Executive Council of the People's Front for Democracy and Justice: ISAIAS Afwerki; named secretary general of the Eritrean People's Liberation Front in 1987; named head of Provisional Government of Eritrea following defeat of Ethiopia's Mengistu regime in May 1991; named state president on May 22, 1993; named chair of the People's Front for Democracy and Justice Executive Council on February 16, 1994.

Political Background

After several centuries of intermittent Ethiopian and Ottoman control, the coastal area of what became known as Eritrea was occupied in the 1880s by Italy, which in 1890 proclaimed it a colony and in 1935–1936 used it as a staging area for its conquest of Ethiopia. Administered by Britain in the immediate post–World War II era, it was declared by the United Nations in 1952 to be an autonomous component of an Ethiopian federation. Ten years later it was annexed by Ethiopia, with Eritreans who opposed the action mounting a guerrilla campaign that lasted until the downfall of the Mengistu regime in May 1991 (see article on Ethiopia for additional information).

On June 15, 1992, the Eritrean People's Liberation Front (EPLF) announced the formation of a Provisional Government of Eritrea (PGE), headed by its secretary general, ISAIAS Afwerki. In a referendum on April 23–25, 1993, 99.8 of those participating voted for independence, which was accepted by Ethiopia on May 3 and became effective on May 24, with Isaias assuming the title of president. The EPLF was succeeded by the People's Front for Democracy and Justice (PFDJ) in February 1994.

At independence Eritrea's overriding concern was recovery from decades of economic neglect and military devastation. Although the country before World War II had, by African standards, been measurably industrialized, the subsequent damage to its infrastructure was estimated at more than $2 billion. In addition, the port of Massawa had been all but destroyed by enemy bombardment. The divorce from Ethiopia was nonetheless described by Africa Confidential as “pragmatic,” with no reparations being sought from Addis Ababa and no indication that a return of Ethiopian assets was being considered. By 1994 a “Greening of Eritrea Campaign” that involved an emphasis on small-scale peasant agriculture, coupled with the assignment of army units to rural rehabilitation projects, had yielded surprising results, including praise from foreign aid donors.

The new Eritrean state subsequently exhibited a decided assertiveness on territorial issues, as evidenced by strained relations with Yemen, Djibouti, and Sudan (see Foreign relations, below). Nevertheless, many international observers expressed surprise in May 1998 when a crisis erupted between Eritrea and Ethiopia over a disputed territory within their ill-defined border region. On May 13 Ethiopia accused Eritrea of having forcibly occupied the Badme Triangle region in “northwest Ethiopia.” On the following day, Eritrea claimed that Ethiopian troops had in fact initiated the skirmish on “sovereign Eritrean territory.” Subsequently, with both sides claiming to possess colonial Italian maps as evidence of their sovereignty claims, open warfare erupted in the region in late May. Meanwhile, in an attempt to explain the outbreak of fighting, analysts suggested that relations between the two countries had been deteriorating since Eritrea introduced its own currency, the nakfa, in 1997. That decision had been followed by Ethiopia’s insistence that all trade between the two must be in hard currency—a move that adversely affected the Eritrean economy and set off a series of tit-for-tat exchanges that increased tension between the two and, arguably, set the stage for the 1998 conflict.

Amid reports of continued fighting, the Organization of African Unity (OAU, subsequently the African Union—AU) and the United Nations spearheaded diplomatic attempts to settle the dispute in the second half of 1998; however, Eritrea rejected cease-fire proposals in both June and November, asserting that they favored Ethiopia. On November 18 Djibouti broke off relations with Eritrea after the latter accused Djibouti of backing Ethiopia throughout the mediation process. Meanwhile, independent sources confirmed reports that both Eritrea and Ethiopia were expelling each other’s citizens in great numbers.

In late January 1999 Eritrea rejected a UN-backed OAU troop withdrawal plan, and within a week full-scale warfare had recommenced, with Ethiopia reported to have launched massive offensives on the Badme front and against the Eritrean port city of Assab. In late February Eritrea acknowledged having lost the Badme territory and agreed to abide by the OAU proposal. Nevertheless, fierce fighting continued through March.

The July 1999 Algiers Summit of the OAU formally endorsed a peace plan that would have returned both sides to their prewar positions and would have established a border demarcation mechanism. However, the proposed deal collapsed in September, in part due to Ethiopian concerns over technical aspects of the plan, particularly regarding the proposed Eritrean withdrawal. The subsequent months saw relatively little fighting, but Ethiopia launched a major offensive in May 2000 that concluded in a June truce after Ethiopian forces had reclaimed all the land previously lost and had advanced deep into Eritrea. In addition to a cease-fire, the combatants also agreed to eventual deployment of international peacekeepers. A final peace accord was signed by Isaias and President Meles of Ethiopia in Algiers, Algeria, on December 12. In April 2001 an independent boundary commission (the Eritrea-Ethiopia Boundary Commission—EEBC) established a 15-mile-wide buffer zone comprised exclusively of territory that belonged to Eritrea prior to the conflict. A UN Mission for Ethiopia and Eritrea (UNMEE)—comprised of some 4,200 peacekeepers from about 40 nations—was charged with monitoring the buffer zone. In March 2003, the border commission clarified its ruling, awarding the disputed town of Badme to Eritrea (see Current issues section for subsequent developments).

Constitution and Government

On May 22, 1992, the Provisional Government of Ethiopia issued a proclamation on Eritrea’s transitional government structure. It stated that, prior to the adoption of a permanent constitution, the EPLF Central Committee would serve as the country’s legislative body. Executive authority was invested in a 28-member Advisory Council (subsequently a 24-member State Council), chaired by the EPLF secretary general. In addition, a judiciary was authorized to function independently of the EPLF Central Committee, the Advisory/State Council, and the secretary general. The new basic law provided for the country's ten provinces to be headed by governors, each of whom was also authorized to serve on the Advisory/State Council.

On May 22, 1993, Secretary General Isaias was proclaimed president of Eritrea. Concurrently, a transitional National Assembly was established. (By a resolution of the PFDJ congress a year later, the assembly became a 150-member body encompassing the 75 members of the PFDJ's Central Committee, plus a number of indirectly elected members.) In March 1994 the National Assembly approved a resolution to establish a 50-member Constitutional Commission to prepare a draft basic law for the country. The commission issued its recommendations in 1996, and a special 527-member Constitutional Assembly was subsequently elected in direct balloting and charged with preparing a final document. As unanimously approved by the Constitutional Assembly (which subsequently dissolved) on May 23, 1997, the new constitution provides for a directly elected National Assembly, which is authorized to select a president, who is granted strong executive authority. The presidential term was set at five years, renewable once. A multiparty system was envisioned, although its final structure was left to the current National Assembly as were details regarding other electoral matters. No precise timetable was established for the final implementation of the new constitution. Among other things, the 1998–2000 border war with Ethiopia served as an obstacle to implementation, while critics of President Isaias continued as of mid-2006 to accuse him of dragging his feet on the issue and lacking enthusiasm for establishment of genuine multiparty activity.

In May 1995 the National Assembly approved legislation dividing the country into six provinces, each of which would be further divided into regions, subregions, and villages. In early November the legislators decided that 30 percent of the provincial council seats would be reserved for women and gave the provinces nonethnic names (Southern Red Sea Region, Northern Red Sea Region, Anseba Region, Gash Barka Region, South Region, and Central Region).

Regional elections were held on May 20, 2004, but National Assembly elections were repeatedly postponed and remained unscheduled as of mid-2006.

Foreign Relations

A number of countries, including the United States, recognized Eritrea on April 27, 1993. All-important recognition by Ethiopia on May 3 paved the way for the proclamation of independence three weeks later. On October 10 Eritrea and Ethiopia concluded an agreement on freedom of cross-border transit for citizens of the two countries. By the end of the year Eritrea had been admitted to the United Nations and most of its affiliated bodies.

In late 1993 Eritrea complained of an attack by an armed Islamic group that had infiltrated from Sudan. A similar outbreak in November 1994 yielded a rupture in diplomatic relations with Khartoum, which the Asmara leadership had privately charged with "Islamic and imperialistic ambitions." Subsequent peace talks in Sana, Yemen, broke down in late December after Sudan had refused to condemn infiltrators that Eritrea had accused of destabilizing activities. Eight months earlier, at the conclusion of a defense treaty with Ethiopia, a foreign ministry spokesman had declared that "Eritrea, in collaboration with Ethiopia if necessary, will make a short shrift of militant Islam."

On November 11, 1995, a simmering dispute between Eritrea and Yemen over claims to three small islands in the Red Sea erupted into armed confrontation. The three islands, Greater Hanish (Hanish Al Kubra), Lesser Hanish (Hanish Al Suhrah), and Zukar (Jabel Zukar) had been retained by Britain when it withdrew from Aden in 1967 but were handed over to South Yemen three years later. Subsequently, the archipelago came under Yemeni development as a center for tourists, particularly French scuba enthusiasts. The November firefright, occasioned by the presence of Yemeni troops on Greater Hanish, was followed by a more bloody encounter on December 15–17. Thereafter, the two sides agreed to a cease-fire monitored by a four-member committee composed of one representative each from Eritrea and Yemen, plus diplomats from the U.S. embassies in Eritrea and Yemen.

Mediated by the UN and France, subsequent talks yielded signature of an accord in Paris on May 21, 1996, under which Eritrea and Yemen renounced the use of force and agreed to submit the dispute to binding arbitration by a panel of five judges, with Eritrea and Yemen appointing two each and these four naming the fifth. Nevertheless, the dispute flared up again in early August, when Eritrean troops occupied Lesser Hanish, withdrawing at the end of the month only on the express order of the UN Security Council. (In October 1998 the International Court of Justice [ICJ] ruled largely in Yemen's favor in the dispute, granting it sovereignty of the so-called Zukar-Hanish island groups while ceding Eritrea control over a smaller island grouping. Moreover, the ICJ asserted that traditional fishing patterns—both Eritrean and Yemeni—should be protected. Both countries promptly agreed to comply with the decision.)

The relationship between Eritrea and Sudan continued to deteriorate in 1996–1997 as the former joined forces with Ethiopia and Uganda to form a regional front to contain militant Islamic fundamentalism (see article on Ethiopia). In late July 1996 Khartoum claimed that its troops had repulsed an incursion by Eritrean forces as tensions mounted along their shared border. Subsequent UN-directed efforts to repatriate Eritrean refugees from Sudan ground to a halt in May 1997 after Eritrea expelled the UN workers for allegedly engaging “in activities incompatible with their mission”; however, some observers asserted that Eritrea was trying to slow the repatriation process because many of the refugees were Muslim and loyal to the opposition. Sudanese-Eritrean relations plummeted further in June when Eritrean officials announced that they had uncovered an alleged Sudanese-backed plot to assassinate President Isaias. Following the tentative conclusion of the Eritrean/Ethiopian war in late 2000, Eritrea concluded a border security agreement with Sudan in July 2001, though it was widely reported that Sudan subsequently continued to support anti-government movements in Eritrea (see Political Groups section).

Relations with the United States, European Union, and the UN remained tenuous in mid-2006 due to what was perceived in the West as President Isaias's “confrontational approach” to UN-MEE (see Current issues). Meanwhile, Eritrea reportedly by that time had significantly increased its ties with Pakistan in regard to oil exploration and other “entrepreneurial” activity. Eritrea also continued to provide aid to numerous Ethiopian opposition groups as an expression of its anger over the impasse in final border demarcation.

Current Issues

The ferocity of the 1998–2000 border war with Ethiopia was very difficult for the international community to comprehend, since the narrow strip of land in question held few natural resources and was generally considered a poor candidate for development. The estimates of the number of Eritrean deaths in the conflict ranged from 20,000 to 50,000, while some 60,000 people were displaced. In addition, the government reportedly spent $1 billion on armaments to conduct the campaign against its former Ethiopian allies, thereby dealing a severe blow to an economy already in desperate need of investment. Some analysts attributed Eritrea's intensity in the dispute to a “sense of indomitability” arising from the long war of independence and to a degree of hubris on the part of President Isaias. Although Isaias and his administration continued to maintain that Eritrea had been waging a defensive war and declared “victory” in the final settlement, most observers concluded that Ethiopia had, in fact, achieved military superiority prior to the cease-fire.

President Isaias appeared to retain broad popular support throughout the war, although what one journalist called “quiet questions” were raised over the possibility that the president may have misjudged Eritrean capabilities. Following the war, criticism intensified noticeably, beginning with the issuance in late 2000 of the so-called “Berlin Manifesto” on the part of PFDJ supporters outside the country who argued that constitutional implementation was being unnecessarily delayed and that power remained inordinately concentrated in the president's hands. Subsequently, in May 2001, a number of influential government and party officials also broke ranks with Isaias (see PFDJ under Political Groups, below). Disconcerting many international donors, Isaias responded with a crack-down in September, arresting a number of government and party officials for "disloyalty." He also clamped down on the independent press.

Meanwhile, final border demarcation was left to the EEBC, whose ruling in April 2002 allocated sufficient territory to each side to permit each to claim satisfaction, although overall the decision appeared to favor Ethiopia. In March 2003, the border commission officially awarded the disputed town of Badme to Eritrea, but the Ethiopian government did not announce it accepted the ruling "in principle" until November 2004. Despite the demarcation, border skirmishes continued to flare up, land mines were periodically detonated, and the UN expressed concerns over Eritrea's lack of cooperation with the peacekeeping force patrolling the border. Although his external reputation continued to decline, Isaias still clung to his hard line, and opposition groups continued to coalesce and regroup (see Political Groups, below), some of them backed by the governments of Sudan, Yemen, and Ethiopia.

In October 2005 the Eritrean government banned UNMEE helicopter flights and other activity in the disputed border area to protest Ethiopia's unwillingness to accept the proposed final demarcation and to return Badme to Eritrean control. Although the Security Council threatened to impose sanctions on Eritrea for its unilateral action, Isaias continued to maintain that sanctions would be more appropriate if leveled at Ethiopia. (Isaias claimed that Eritrea was the "law-abiding party" in the dispute and that Ethiopia was receiving preferential treatment from the west because of President Meles's assistance in the U.S.-led "war on terror.") The two countries were described as once again "on the brink" in November in view of continued troop and tank buildups and an Eritrean demand (reluctantly accepted by the Security Council) that all western troops be withdrawn from UNMEE.

Complicating matters for Eritrea was a report in mid-December by an independent claims commission at the Permanent Court of Arbitration that adjudged that Eritrea had initiated the 1998 war by invading Badme. (The commission collaterally held both sides liable for property damage and abuse of civilians during the conflict.)

Clearly annoyed by Isaias's "belligerence" regarding UNMEE, UN Secretary General Kofi Annan in January 2006 argued that the peacekeeping mission be downgraded or even converted into a "defensive force" on the Ethiopian side of the temporary security zone. Subsequently, with tensions at the border having receded, the Security Council in late May decided to cut the UNMEE force by 1,000 soldiers and to extend the mission's mandate by only four months, instead of the normal six-month extension. The council also insisted that Ethiopia abide by the EEBC's border ruling and that Eritrea lift the ban on UNMEE flights. Meanwhile, as of midyear new assembly elections remained unscheduled and little other movement toward genuine democratic activity appeared in the offing. Among other things, Isaias's critics accused him of focusing on the "false issue" of sovereignty at the expense of attention to the nation's many economic and political problems.

Political Groups

In late 2000 the National Assembly approved statutes providing for eventual formation of political parties, although critics argued that accompanying restrictions might present an effective barrier to genuine multiparty activity. While describing party activity as "acceptable" in theory, the assembly in early 2002 upheld a ban on the legalization of parties, and the PFDJ remained the sole legal party as of mid-2006.

Opposition to the EPLF/PFDJ has primarily involved shifting, often overlapping, and mostly ineffective coalitions, usually led by the ELF (below). In November 1996 it was reported that the ELF had initiated formation of an Eritrean National Alliance (ENA), together with the ELF-NC and a faction of the EIJM. Reportedly established with the assistance of Sudan, the ENA, whose components were described as having “fundamentalist tendencies,” called for the ousting of the Isaias government and the installation of a multiparty system. ENA Chair Abdella Idriss of the ELF also called for investigation of alleged human rights violations on the part of the administration. Significantly, the ELF-RC declined to join the ENA because of the inclusion of the EIJM faction in the alliance.

In March 1999 the ENA appeared to be superseded by a broader coalition of opposition groups styled the Alliance of Eritrean National Forces (AENF) that included the ELF, ELF-NC, ELF-RC, the EISM (see EIJM, below), and a number of small Marxist formations. Despite enjoying the support of Ethiopia, the AENF was described as maintaining a low profile during the Eritrean-Ethiopian war, supporting the 2000 truce while continuing to call for the ouster of the Isaias government.

In late 2002 reports once again began to reference the ENA, described now as comprising some 13 parties and groups under the leadership of the ELF’s Idriss as president and HIRUY Tedla Bairu of the small, recently formed Eritrean Cooperative Party (ECP) as secretary general. Although the revitalized ENA reportedly initially indicated it would not use military force to try to overthrow the government, it was reported in May 2003 that an ENA military wing had been established. By that time, it appeared that the ENA was receiving financial aid from Ethiopia, Sudan, and Yemen. Once again undermining effective opposition cohesion, the ELF-RC refused to participate in the alliance, arguing that Hiruy was under “foreign influence.”

In early 2004 four ENA members (the ELF-NC, the People’s Democratic Front for the Liberation of Eritrea [PDFLE], RSADO, and the DMLEK) joined the EPM in forming an opposition alliance called the Four Plus One. In October, additional small parties joined the grouping, which described itself as a means of strengthening the ENA rather than replacing it.

New ENA leaders were reportedly elected in January 2005, Hiruy replacing Idriss as president and Husayn KHALIFA succeeding Hiruy as secretary general. However, the ENA was again apparently superseded in February by the formation of the Eritrean Democratic Alliance (EDA), which included the ELF, ELF-RC, EDP, EPM, the members of Four Plus One, the small Eritrean Federal Democratic Movement, the “newly emerging” National Salvation Front, and, apparently, the Eritrean Islamic Islah Movement (EIIM). The role of the EIIM was controversial, since it supported the use of violence against government forces (EIIM fighters killed a number of Eritrean soldiers in early 2005) while other EDA components (notably the EDP and EPM) opposed the use of such force. Meanwhile, Hiruy and his EPC remained outside the EDA, with Khalifa being referenced as the EDA leader and Abdallah Aden of the EPM as his deputy. Hiruy subsequently criticized the EDA for “monopolizing” financial aid from Ethiopia, Sudan, and Yemen designed to support opposition activity in Eritrea. The EDA was described in early 2006 as “virtually paralyzed” by a lack of effective coordination.

Government Party

People’s Front for Democracy and Justice (PFDJ). The PFDJ’s predecessor—the Eritrean People’s Liberation Front (EPLF)—was launched in 1970 as a breakaway faction of the Marxist-oriented Eritrean Liberation Front (ELF, below). The EPLF was an avowedly nonsectarian, left-wing formation supported by both Christians and Muslims in its pursuit of Eritrean independence. With an estimated 100,000 men and women under arms, the EPLF for much of its preindependence existence controlled large areas of the Eritrean countryside, establishing schools, hospitals, a taxation system, and other government services.

After the EPLF revised its ideology to accommodate multipartyism and a “regulated” market economy, in May 1991 the United States for the first time supported the EPLF’s call for a self-determination referendum. Immediately after the subsequent Ethiopian defeat, Isaias Afwerki, who had been named secretary general of the EPLF at its 1987 congress, announced that the group was establishing a provisional government in Eritrea until a UN-supervised independence vote could be conducted. At independence on May 24, 1993, Isaias was installed as Eritrean president. At its 1994 congress, the EPLF adopted its present name and elected a 75-member Central Council and a 19-member Executive Council chaired by Isaias.

In the wake of the disastrous 1998–2000 war with Ethiopia, which, among other things, directed attention away from proposed political reform, a group of 15 prominent PFDJ leaders (including members of the Executive Council) published a letter in May 2001 criticizing Isaias's "autocratic" rule and demanding a "legal and democratic transition to a truly constitutional government." Isaias reacted harshly to the challenge, and some of the so-called G-15 were among those arrested in a government crackdown in September 2001. Subsequently, PFDJ dissidents who had escaped arrest by fleeing the country announced the formation of an EPLF-Democratic Party in exile (see EDP, below).

Leaders: ISAIAS Afwerki (President of Eritrea and Chair of PFDJ Executive Council); Yemane GEBREAB, Hagos GEBHREHIWET, Yemane GEBREMESKAL, and Zemeheret YOHANNES (PFDJ Department Heads); Ahmad al-Amin Mohammed SAÏD (Secretary General).

Opposition Groups

Eritrean Liberation Front (ELF). The predominantly Muslim ELF initiated anti-Ethiopian guerrilla activity in 1961 in pursuit of Eritrean autonomy. Its influence plummeted following the formation of the EPLF, and numerous splinter groups subsequently surfaced. By 1992 the ELF was considered to have become virtually nonexistent within Eritrea. However, in November 1996 it helped to launch the first of several opposition alliances (see above for subsequent developments).

Leader: Abdella IDRIS.

Eritrean Liberation Front–Revolutionary Congress (ELF-RC). The ELF-RC is a predominantly Muslim but nonfundamentalist and nonmilitary group that also includes some Christians.

Leaders: Ahmed NASSER, Gebrezgabiker TEWELDE (in Canada).

Eritrean Liberation Front–National Congress (ELF–NC). This group formed when the ELF–RC split into two groups in 2004.

Leader: Dr. BEYENE (Kidane).

Eritrean Islamic–Jihad Movement (EIJM—Jihad Islammiya). An Islamic fundamentalist group, the EIJM is largely based in Sudan and is devoted to armed operations within Eritrea. The Eritrean government claims that the EIJM is financed by the Sudanese government.

In August 1993 the military wing of the EIJM announced from Saudi Arabia that it had dismissed its Political Bureau, headed by Sheikh Mohammed ARAFA, for having established contact with the Eritrean government. For his part, Arafa continued to claim leadership of the group. The factions each operated under the EIJM label until 1998 when it was reported that the military wing had restyled itself the Eritrean People's Congress (EPC), while Arafa's followers had reorganized under the banner of the Eritrean Islamic Salvation Movement (EISM—Harahat al Khalas al Islamiya). Despite their differences, both groups agreed to join the AENF in early 1999. In 2003 the U.S. State Department reportedly listed EIJM as an alleged member of al-Qaida.

Eritrean Democratic Party (EDP). The EDP is a successor to the EPLF-Democratic Party that was formed in exile by PFDJ dissidents after the government crackdown of 2001. The founding EDP congress was held in Germany in early 2004, the party committing itself to nonviolent opposition to the Isaias government.

Leaders: Mesfin HAGOS, Mohammad Nur AHMED.

Red Sea Afar Democratic Organization (RSADO). The RSADO joined the ENA in 2002 to advocate for the rights of the Afar, an ethnic group in the southern Red Sea region. In 2004 its chair, Ibrahim HAROUN, survived an assassination attempt, which some critics alleged may have been plotted by the ruling PFDJ.

Democratic Movement for the Liberation of Eritrean Kunama (DMLEK). This group was a Leader: Kerneleos UTHMAN.

Eritrean People's Movement (EPM). The EPM was founded in May 2004 to bypass the ELF/EPLF divide. It reportedly had the support of Sudan, Ethiopia, Australia, Europe, and the United States.

Leaders: Adhanom GEBREMARIAN (Former Ambassador to Nigeria), Abdallah ADEN (Former Ambassador to Sudan), and Mohammed IBRAHIM.

In 2003 the Afar Revolutionary Democratic United Front (ARDUF), led by Mohamouda Gaaz, allegedly formed with the goal of establishing an Afar state within Ethiopia. In December 2004, Gaaz, the Ethiopian Secretary of State for Youth and Sport, started to support a new Eritrean opposition organization, the Afar Federal Alliance (AFA), started by his cousin, Ahmed Saled Gaaz, a veteran of the EFF. The AFA wants to set up a regional state for Afars in Eritrea, similar to the Afar state in Ethiopia. Another ELF veteran now living in Djibouti, Mohamed Moumin Gaaz, also was reportedly involved in the creation of AFA. Gaaz reportedly was planning to run in the next national legislative elections in the Afar Regional State of Ethiopia.

Legislature

The proclamation by the Provisional Government of Eritrea on May 22, 1992, called for legislative authority to be exercised by the Eritrean People's Liberation Front's Central Committee, which was subsequently augmented by representatives of provincial assemblies to form a transitional National Assembly (Hagerawi Baito). A resolution by the People's Front for Democracy and Justice (PFDJ) on May 1994 provided for the establishment of a successor body encompassing the 75 members of the PFDJ Central Council, 3 members from each provincial council (currently a total of 18 members following the establishment of six provinces in 1995), and 45 representatives of professional groups, women's organizations, and other social bodies. (The latter were selected by the State Council from lists recommended by the organizations involved.) The 1997 constitution provided for a unicameral legislature of directly elected members. However, elections were subsequently delayed for several reasons, notably the 1998–2000 war with Ethiopia and ongoing failure to finalize border arrangements (see Current issues). In early 2000 the assembly endorsed a new electoral law, declaring, among other things, that 30 percent of the seats in the next assembly election would be reserved for women. As of September 2006, new assembly elections had not been scheduled.

Chair: ISAIAS Afwerki.

Communications

Press

The principal press organ is Hadas Eritrea (New Eritrea, 25,000), published five times a week in Tigrigna and Arabic. There is also an English-language government-owned weekly, Eritrea Profile. In September 2001 the government closed down all 12 of the nation's privately owned newspapers and arrested a number of journalists because of the Eritrean/Ethiopian war and growing dissent over the authoritarian rule of the Isaias administration. The crackdown elicited an international outcry, but the government has not eased its hard-line position as of mid-2005. Opposition groups and others have started several online newspapers.

News Agency

The Eritrean news agency is ERINA, which provides a daily news update.

Broadcasting and Computing

The Eritrean national radio service is Voice of the Masses (Dimtsi Hafash), broadcasting in Afar, Amharic, Arab, Kunama, Tigre, and Tigrigna. Eri-TV, broadcasting from Asmara and Assab, can be received in about 90 percent of the country. There were approximately 4,000 television receivers and 12,000 personal computers serving 9,500 Internet users in 2003. The EDA opposition alliance reportedly started broadcasting as the Voice of Democratic Alliance in April 2005.

FEDERAL DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF ETHIOPIA

The Country

One of the oldest countries in the world, Ethiopia exhibits an ethnic, linguistic, and cultural diversity that has impaired its political unity and stability in spite of the preponderant position long occupied by the Christian, Amharic- and Tigrinya-speaking inhabitants of the central highlands. Among the more than 70 different ethnic groups, the Amhara and the largely Muslim Oromo (Galla) account for approximately 40 percent of the population each. Amharic, the working language, is spoken by about 60 percent of the people; Galla, Tigrinya, Arabic, Somali, and Tigray are also prominent among the country's 70 languages and over 200 dialects, while English, Italian, and French have traditionally been employed within the educated elite. The Ethiopian Orthodox (Coptic) Church embraces about 40 percent of the population, as does Islam. In 1994 women accounted for 37 percent of the labor force, the vast majority as unpaid agricultural workers. Although females have traditionally influenced decision making among the Amhara and Tigrayan peoples, their representation in the Mengistu government was minimal. There are 116 women in the current House of Peoples' Representatives, up from 42 in the previous membership, while there are 2 women in the cabinet.

One of the world's poorest countries in terms of per capita GNP (estimated at $130 in 1994), Ethiopia remains dependent on agriculture, with over 85 percent of its rapidly expanding population (among the largest in Africa) engaged in farming and livestock-raising. (Despite free-market reforms initiated in the second half of the 1990s, most land remains owned by the government.) Coffee, the principal crop, accounts for more than 40 percent of export earnings; cotton and sugar are also widely harvested. Agricultural success waxes and wanes in response to variable rainfall, and drought and famine have routinely "stalked the land," often generating massive, albeit not always sufficient, international aid shipments. Industrial development, primarily concentrated in non-durable consumer goods, was severely hampered by the 1962–1991 civil war in Eritrea and guerrilla activity in other regions. In 1992 the government launched an ambitious "agricultural-led industrialization" program. Gold and marble are mined commercially, and deposits of copper, potash, and natural gas are awaiting exploitation. Oil exploration rights have been granted recently, although they reportedly remain highly speculative.

Political Status: Former monarchy; provisional military government formally established September 12, 1974; Marxist-Leninist one-party system instituted September 6, 1984; Communist constitution approved by referendum of February 1, 1987, resulting in redesignation of the country as the People's Democratic Republic of Ethiopia; "state responsibility" assumed by rebel coalition upon surrender of the former regime's military commander and acting president in Addis Ababa on May 27, 1991; national charter and transitional government approved by multiparty National Conference that met on July 1–5, 1991; present constitution promulgated December 8, 1994; Federal Democratic Republic proclaimed August 22, 1995.

Area: 436,349 sq. mi. (1,130,138 sq. km.).

Population: 53,477,265 (1994C); 73,090,000 (2005E).

Major Urban Centers (2005E): ADDIS ABABA (2,890,000), Dire Dawa (270,000), Nazret

(218,000), Gondar (186,000), Dese (161,000), Jimma (151,000), Harer (117,000).

Working Language: Amharic (all Ethiopian languages enjoy equal state recognition).

Monetary Unit: Birr (official rate July 1, 2006: 8.74 birr = $1US).

President: GIRMA Wolde Giorgis (nonparty); nominated by the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front and elected by the Parliament on October 8, 2001, to a six-year term, succeeding NEGASO Gidada (Oromo Peoples' Democratic Organization).

Prime Minister: MELES Zenawi (Tigray People's Liberation Front); elected by the House of Peoples' Representatives on August 23, 1995, succeeding TAMIRAT Layne (Amhara National Democratic Movement); reelected to another five-year term on October 10, 2000; reelected to a third five-year term on October 10, 2005.

In January 1996 the World Bank announced that it had helped negotiate forgiveness of some $250 million of Ethiopia's commercial debt, although nearly $4 billion of additional external debt continued to constrain economic advancement. In October the International Monetary Fund (IMF) approved a three-year loan totalling $127 million to support the government's medium-term economic reform program for 1996–1999. However, the IMF suspended the aid in October 1997 and requested that additional reforms be implemented. Subsequently, Addis Ababa began to "pursue prudent macroeconomic policies and implement important structural reforms," according to the IMF, and in October 1998 the fund approved the release of the second of three scheduled annual payments. In 1995–1997 Ethiopia's GDP grew in real terms by an annual average of 8.0 percent. Although Ethiopia was considered as of early 1998 to be positioned for sustained economic improvement, the 1998–2000 border war with Ethiopia (see Political background and Current issues, below) severely eroded the confidence of investors and redirected national funds desperately needed for social services toward the military. The conflict also slowed down the government's privatization campaign and plans to strengthen the financial sector.

GDP grew by 7.7 percent in 2000–2001 and 1.6 percent in 2001–2002 but fell by 3.9 percent in 2002–2003, mostly due to collapsing coffee prices and drought. Agricultural recovery in 2003–2004 produced much better growth (11.6 percent), although Ethiopia continued to rank 170 out of 177 countries in the UN's Human Development Index and 45 percent of the population was considered to be living in poverty. The World Bank, the IMF, and Russia offered debt relief in 2004, Ethiopia remaining as one of the world's biggest per capita recipients of emergency assistance (it was estimated that 11 million people depended on humanitarian aid). The economy grew by 8.8 percent in 2004–2005, according to the IMF, with inflation for that fiscal year registering 6.8 percent, although a significant increase in inflation was subsequently reported. The IMF called upon the government to reinvigorate the privatization program, accelerate structural reform, strengthen the nation's legal and regulatory framework, and devote more of its budget toward poverty reduction. The IMF announced additional debt relief for Ethiopia in late 2005 and called for increased donor assistance. However, that question had become problematic by that time because of severe political discord in Ethiopia (see Current issues, below).

Political Background

After centuries of medieval isolation, Ethiopia began its history as a modern state with the reign of Emperor MENELIK II (1889–1913), who established a strong central authority and successfully resisted attempts at colonization by Italy and other powers. Emperor HAILE SELASSIE I (Ras TAFARI Makonnen) succeeded to the throne in 1930 on the death of his cousin, the Empress ZAUDITU. Confronted with a full-scale invasion by Fascist Italy in 1935, Haile Selassie appealed in vain for assistance from the League of Nations and remained abroad until Ethiopia's liberation by the British and the liquidation of Italy's East African Empire in 1941. In accordance with a decision of the UN General Assembly, the former Italian colony of Eritrea was joined to Ethiopia in 1952 as an autonomous unit in an Ethiopian-Eritrean federation. Abandonment of the federal structure by formal incorporation of Eritrea into Ethiopia in 1962 fanned widespread separatist sentiment in Eritrea.

Although the post–World War II period witnessed a movement away from absolute monarchy, the pace of liberalization did not meet popular expectations, and in early 1974 an uprising among troops of Ethiopia's Second Army Division gradually escalated into a political revolt. As a result, Prime Minister Tshafe Tezaz AKLILU Habte-Wold resigned on February 28 and was replaced by ENDALKACHEW Makonnen, who also was unable to contain discontent among military, labor, and student groups. By late spring many aristocrats and former government officials had been imprisoned, and on July 22 Endalkachew was forced to resign in favor of Mikael IMRU.

On September 12, 1974, the military announced that the emperor had been deposed and that a Provisional Military Government (PMG) had been formed under Lt. Gen. AMAN Mikael Andom. Initially, the military presented a united front, but rival factions soon emerged. On November 24 approximately 60 officials, including two former prime ministers and Aman Andom, were executed, apparently on the initiative of (then) Maj. MENGISTU Haile-Mariam, strongman of the little-publicized Armed Forces Coordinating Committee, or Dergue, as it was popularly known. After November 28 the Dergue acted through a Provisional Military Administrative Council (PMAC), whose chair, Brig. Gen. TEFERI Banti, served concurrently as acting head of state and government.

Former emperor Haile Selassie, in detention since his deposition, died in August 1975. Earlier, on March 21, the PMAC had decreed formal abolition of the monarchy while declaring its intention to organize a new national political movement “guided by the aims of Ethiopian socialism.”

On February 3, 1977, following reports of a power struggle within the Dergue, General Teferi and six associates were killed in an armed encounter in the Grand Palace in Addis Ababa. Eight days later, Mengistu and Lt. Col. ATNAFU Abate were named chair and vice chair, respectively, of the PMAC in a proclamation that also modified the Dergue structure. However, Colonel Atnafu was executed on November 11 for alleged “counter-revolutionary crimes.” Collaterally, antigovernment violence, dubbed the “white terror,” flared in Addis Ababa amid indications of growing coordination between several opposition groups, including the Marxist Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Party (EPRP) and the more conservative Ethiopian Democratic Union (EDU). The Mengistu regime responded by mounting an indiscriminate “red terror” in December 1977–February 1978 based in part on the arming of civilians in urban dweller associations (kebeles).

The struggle for control in Addis Ababa was accompanied by military challenges on three major fronts. By March 1977 virtually all of northern Eritrea was under rebel administration, while government forces were being subjected to increased pressure by EDU guerrillas in the northwest. Moreover, in late July the government conceded that the greater part of the eastern region of Ogaden had fallen to insurgents of the Western Somalia Liberation Front (WSLF), who were supported by Somali regular forces. On September 7 Addis Ababa severed relations with Mogadishu because of the "full-scale war" that existed between the two countries. By mid-December, however, a massive influx of Cuban personnel and Soviet equipment had shifted the military balance in Ethiopia's favor, and most of the region was recovered prior to formal Somali withdrawal in March 1978. A renewed offensive was then mounted in Eritrea, and in late November government forces recaptured the last two major cities held by the rebels, the strategically important Red Sea port of Massawa and Keren, some 70 miles northwest of the provincial capital, Asmara.

Despite the success of the 1978 anti-insurgent campaigns, a major offensive in mid-1979 to wipe out remaining resistance in Eritrea proved ineffectual, with government control remaining limited to the principal towns and connecting corridors. Similar conditions prevailed in the Ogaden, where the WSLF and its ally, the Somali Abo Liberation Front (SALF), persisted in launching guerrilla attacks. In response, Ethiopia was reported to have initiated a "scorched-earth" policy—poisoning water supplies, killing herds of livestock, strafing settled areas—that further aggravated what the UN Office of High Commissioner for Refugees had earlier described as the world's worst refugee problem.

Following a number of unsuccessful attempts to unite existing Marxist parties, a Commission for Organizing the Party of the Working People of Ethiopia (COPWE) was formed in December 1979 to pave the way for a Soviet-style system of government. On September 10, 1984, COPWE's work was declared to have been completed, with Colonel Mengistu being designated secretary general of a new Workers' Party of Ethiopia (WPE); however, the PMAC remained in effective control, pending completion of a civilian governing structure.

A commission appointed and chaired by Colonel Mengistu presented the draft of a new constitution in early 1987. A reported 81 percent of voters approved the document at a referendum on February 1, the government announcing three weeks later that the country would thenceforth be styled the People's Democratic Republic of Ethiopia (PDRE).

A unicameral national legislature (Shengo), elected June 14, 1987, convened September 9, and on the following day it selected Colonel Mengistu as the country's first president. The Shengo also named Lt. Col. FISSEHA Desta, theretofore deputy secretary general of the PMAC Standing Committee, as PDRE vice president and elected a 24-member State Council, headed by Mengistu and Fisseha as president and vice president, respectively. The former deputy chair of the PMAC Council of Ministers, Capt. FIKRE-SELASSIE Wogderes, was designated prime minister of an administration whose composition, announced on September 20, was largely unchanged from that of its predecessor.

The new government was greeted by vigorous rebel offensives: the Eritrean People's Liberation Front (EPLF) claimed a succession of victories over government troops beginning in September 1987, while in March 1988 the Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF) took advantage of Addis Ababa's setbacks in Eritrea to launch a renewed offensive in their 13-year struggle for autonomy. In April Mengistu, buffeted by military reversals and deteriorating troop morale, signed a cease-fire accord with Somali President Siad Barre, thus freeing troops for redeployment to Eritrea, most of which, despite the recapture of some rebel-held villages, remained under EPLF control.

Conditions worsened substantially for the central government during 1989. A failed military coup in mid-May, during which the defense and industry ministers were killed, provoked a purge of senior officers that yielded the loss of most seasoned commanders. Three months earlier the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF), a base-broadening coalition recently established by the TPLF, had launched another offensive that dealt the government a series of major setbacks. In August Colonel Mengistu felt obliged to augment his army (already black Africa's largest at more than 300,000 men) by mass mobilization and conscription. A month later Mengistu accepted an overture by former U.S. president Jimmy Carter to open peace talks with the EPLF, subsequently accepting Carter and former Tanzanian president Julius Nyerere as cochairmen of the discussions. Meanwhile, preliminary negotiations with the EPRDF were launched in Rome in October, although they were linked by the Tigrayans to "the irrevocable fall of the current regime." In November, with EPRDF forces moving toward the capital, Prime Minister Fikre-Selassie was dismissed for "health reasons" and replaced, on an acting basis, by Deputy Prime Minister HAILU Yimamu. Shortly thereafter, fighting also broke out in the east between government troops and rebel forces of the Oromo Liberation Front (OLF). Faced with continued military adversity, diminished Soviet support, and renewed projections of widespread famine, President Mengistu in March 1990 formally terminated his commitment to Marxism. However, the regime remained on the brink of collapse as EPRDF troops advanced to within 150 miles of Addis Ababa and EPLF forces gained control of all of Eritrea except for several major cities.

In January 1991 the EPRDF and the EPLF, which had been coordinating military operations for two years, devised a "final" battle plan after the TPLF reportedly agreed to a self-determination referendum in Eritrea following the anticipated rebel victory. With the OLF also a participant, the anti-Mengistu alliance launched a decisive offensive in February.

In what was seen as a last-ditch effort to salvage his regime, President Mengistu on April 26, 1991, announced the appointment of former Foreign Minister TESFAYE Dinka, a moderate with ties to the United States and Western Europe, to the vacant position of prime minister and named Lt. Gen. TESFAYE Gebre-Kidan as vice president.

However, on May 21, as EPRDF troops encircled Addis Ababa, Colonel Mengistu, under pressure from U.S. officials to prevent further bloodshed, resigned as head of state and fled to Zimbabwe, Vice President Tesfaye becoming acting president. Three days later the EPLF sealed its control of Eritrea by capturing the towns of Asmara and Keren, and, with EPRDF fighters poised to attack the capital, General Tesfaye "effectively surrendered" on May 27. Under an agreement reached at a U.S.-brokered conference in London, the EPRDF took control of Addis Ababa on May 28 with only minimal resistance from hold-out government troops. On the same day TPLF leader MELES Zenawi announced the impending formation of an interim government that would assume responsibility for "the whole country" until Ethiopia's political future could be further defined. Concurrently, however, EPLF leader Isaias Afwerki announced the establishment of a separate provisional government for Eritrea. Although some friction was subsequently reported between the two groups, a multiparty National Conference was launched on July 1 to chart the country's political future. On July 3 the EPRDF and the EPLF (technically attending as an observer) announced an agreement whereby the former would support a referendum in 1993 on Eritrean independence in return for access to the Red Sea port of Assab. At the conclusion of the Conference two days later, a National Charter was adopted that offered guarantees of basic human rights, freedom of association, access to mass media, judicial independence, and substantial autonomy for the country's numerous ethnic groups. In addition, an 87-member Council of Representatives was named that on July 21 formalized Meles Zenawi's status as head of state. Subsequently, on July 29, the acting chief of government, TAMIRAT Layne, was confirmed as prime minister, with a 16-member cabinet being announced on August 10.

At the long awaited referendum in Eritrea of April 23–25, 1993, 99.8 percent of those participating voted for independence, and on May 3 Addis Ababa endorsed the action, which was formalized on May 24. Subsequently, balloting for a 547-member Ethiopian Constituent Assembly was held on June 5, 1994, with the EPRDF winning an overwhelming majority in reporting districts (polling in Dire Dawa and elsewhere in the east and southeast being postponed until August 28 because of unsettled conditions in the largely Somali-dominated region).

While most of the major non-EPRDF groups participated in the Constituent Assembly poll, all but the largely progovernment Ethiopian National Democratic Party (ENDP) objected to the constitution adopted on December 8, 1994, and declared their intention to boycott the federal and state elections of May 7, 1995. Despite two bilateral negotiating sessions between government and opposition delegates in Washington in February and Addis Ababa in March, no resolution of the impasse was found. Representatives of the opposition Council of Alternative Forces for Peace and Democracy in Ethiopia (CAFPDE), led by BEYENE Petros, complained of a "stranglehold" by the EPRDF on the police and armed forces, the detention of numerous regime opponents, and a ban on many party activities. For its part, the government, through its chief negotiator, DAWIT Yohannes, called for acceptance of Ethiopia's existing state bodies and denied that it held political prisoners, insisting that those incarcerated encompassed only "warmongers." As a result of the stalemate, the EPRDF and its constituent groups swept the May balloting.

On August 21, 1995, the recently elected House of Peoples' Representatives convened to accept a transfer of power from its military-backed predecessor, and on August 22, after formal proclamation of the Federal Democratic Republic of Ethiopia, the House elected NEGASO Gidada to the essentially titular office of federal president. On August 23 the legislators elected former interim president Meles Zenawi to the far more powerful office of prime minister.

The cabinet named by Prime Minister Meles Zenawi in 1995 did not represent a cross-section of Ethiopian politics; it was, however, carefully balanced along ethnic lines, containing four Amharas, four Oromos, two Gurage, and one representative each from the Afar, Hadiya, Harari, Kembata, Somali, Tigray, and Welayita communities. By mid-1996 the government was reported to be under heavy external pressure to bring nonsecessionist opposition groups into the federal administration. However, the EPRDF resisted the appeals, apparently concentrating instead on what the Indian Ocean Newsletter described as efforts "to prove that all its opponents are apprentice terrorists."

In October 1995, after four months of deliberation, the High Court in Addis Ababa ruled that, as a signatory of the international convention on genocide, Ethiopia was competent to try members of the former regime on charges of crimes against humanity. Accordingly, it was announced that a trial would proceed for more than 70 defendants, including, all in absentia, former president Mengistu Haile-Mariam, former prime minister Fikre-Selassie Wogderes, and former vice president Fisseha Desta. The trial, which the New York Times called possibly the most extensive of its kind since Nuremberg, proceeded slowly in 1996, however. In addition to the current defendants, more than 1700 former soldiers, police, and "mid-level" administrators were also awaiting trial. On February 13, 1997, special prosecutors in Addis Ababa brought additional charges against Mengistu and more than 5,000 officials of the Dergue regime (3,000 of them in absentia). The trials were expected to last at least three years.

During March 1997 social discontent surfaced in segments of the Amhara population, resulting from the government's "land reform" projects, which were seen by opponents as a policy to serve the peasants close to the ruling EPRDF. Attention throughout the rest of the year focused on efforts by the EPRDF to negotiate agreements with Oromo, Somali, and Afar groups that would permit implementation of the delayed regional autonomy plan (see various sections below for further information).

With a swiftness that stunned observers, a border dispute between Ethiopia and Eritrea escalated in mid-1998 from what was initially depicted as a minor skirmish in early May into full-scale fighting by June. Among the many casualties of the war was their joint effort, along with Uganda, to contain Sudan's regional influence, in particular Khartoum's effort to spread militant Islamic fundamentalism. Indeed, in its quest for regional allies, Addis Ababa reportedly toned down its anti-Sudanese rhetoric and opened a dialogue with Khartoum.

The war with Eritrea dominated Ethiopian affairs for the remainder of 1998 through 2000. (See Political background in article on Eritrea for an extensive history of the conflict.) Nearly every segment of Ethiopian society, including the opposition parties, appeared to support the military campaign, and the EPRDF dominated the balloting that began in May 2000 for the House of Peoples' Representatives (see Legislature, below, for details), while Meles was reelected to a second five-year term as prime minister on October 10, 2000, by acclamation in the House of Peoples' Representatives. On October 8, 2001, GIRMA Wolde Giorgis was selected to succeed President Negaso, who had become embroiled in a dispute with Meles and his supporters over the outcome of the war (see Current issues, below).

New balloting for the House of Peoples' Representatives was held on May 15, 2005, initial results indicating a strong challenge to the EPRDF from two new opposition alliances—the Coalition for Unity and Democracy (CUD) and the United Ethiopian Democratic Forces (UEDF). Both opposition groups charged the government with widespread fraud in the conduct of the poll and the tallying of the votes, and reballoting was ordered by the National Election Board in a number of constituencies. However, the EPRDF was credited with winning all of the seats subject to reballoting, and the final results (released in September) accorded the EPRDF and its allies an even greater majority than originally projected, prompting severe domestic turmoil (see Current issues, below). Meles was reelected by a show of hands in the legislature in a session on October 10 that was boycotted by more than 100 opposition members. The new cabinet that was appointed the following day was widely reshuffled, although portfolios remained primarily in the hands of EPRDF components.

Constitution and Government

An imperial constitution, adopted in 1955, was abrogated when the military assumed power in 1974. The 1987 constitution provided for a Communist system of government based on "democratic centralism." In July 1991, two months after the overthrow of the Mengistu regime, a National Conference was convened that approved a transitional government charter providing for an 87-member quasi-legislative body, the Council of Representatives, drawn from the various national freedom units. The council, intended to serve for a 24-month period, was empowered to designate a chair who would serve as head of a transitional government. Subject to council approval, the chair would appoint a prime minister and other cabinet members. The council was directed to oversee the drafting of a constitution that would ensure the realization of "a completely democratic system" and to prepare the country for elections to a National Assembly under the new basic law.

The document promulgated in December 1994 provided for a new House of Peoples' Representatives as "the highest organ of State authority." Its members are directly elected for five-year terms from single member districts, with special representation of at least 20 seats for minority nationalities. In addition, representatives of Ethiopia's "nations, nationalities, and peoples" constitute a senate-like House of the Federation, whose functions include that of constitutional interpretation. The president of the republic is nominated by the House of Peoples' Representatives and elected for a once-renewable six-year term by a two-thirds vote of the two houses in joint session. A prime minister, who serves as chair of the Council of Ministers and commander in chief of the armed forces, is elected by the House of Peoples' Representatives from among those sitting as members of the majority party or coalition for a term normally coincident with the legislative mandate. The judiciary includes both Federal and State Supreme Courts, appointed by their respective legislative councils; there is also a Court of Constitutional Inquiry, whose principal activity is to review disputes for submission to the House of the Federation.

Ethiopia was traditionally divided into 15 provinces, exclusive of the capital. However, in late 1987 legislation was enacted to redraw the internal boundaries in favor of 24 administrative regions, plus (in an apparent effort to placate separatists) five “autonomous regions,” four of which (Assab, Dire Dawa, Tigray, and Ogaden) would be coterminous with administrative regions, while Eritrea would contain three. The present republic encompasses the following nine states: Afar; Amhara; Beneshangul-Gumuz; Gambela Peoples; Harari People; Oromia; Somalia; Southern Nations, Nationalities, and Peoples; and Tigray. The federal capital, Addis Ababa, is a separate entity, although it also serves as the capital of Oromia. In addition, there is a separate Dire Dawa Administrative Council. (Both cities enjoy the same autonomy as the states; for example, each elects its own representatives to the national legislature.) New states may be created following majority approval by a nationality group and endorsement by a two-thirds vote of the relevant state council. A somewhat unusual guarantee of self-determination includes a right of secession if requested by a two-thirds majority of the group’s legislative body, endorsed by a similar state council majority, and approved by a majority vote in a referendum called by the federal government.

Foreign Relations

A founding member of both the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity (OAU, subsequently the African Union—AU), Ethiopia under Emperor Haile Selassie was long a leading advocate of regional cooperation and peaceful settlement in Africa. Addis Ababa was the site of the first African summit conference in 1963 and remains the seat of the OAU Secretariat and the UN Economic Commission for Africa.

As a result of the emperor’s overthrow in 1974, Ethiopia shifted dramatically from a generally pro-Western posture to one of near-exclusive dependence on the Soviet bloc. Moscow guided Addis Ababa in the formation of a Soviet-style ruling party and provided weapons and other assistance to military units (including some 11,000 Cuban troops) during the Ogaden war in 1977–1978; while initially maintaining a low profile in regard to the Eritrean secessionist movements (the two most important of which were Marxist-inspired), it gradually increased its support of counterinsurgency efforts. In 1988 the Soviets provided the government with 250,000 tons of grain for relief purposes, thus avoiding repetition of criticism it had received for failing to provide assistance during the 1984 famine. Meanwhile, despite the continued presence of 1,400 Soviet military advisors, Moscow’s interest in supporting the Mengistu government’s war against the rebels appeared to be waning and, in September 1989, Cuba announced plans to withdraw all its troops.

Because of ethnic links to Somalia and the presence of virtually equal numbers of Muslims and Christians in Eritrea, most Arab governments (with the exception of Marxist South Yemen) remained neutral or provided material support to the guerrilla movements. Most black African governments, on the other hand, tended to support Addis Ababa, despite an OAU posture of formal neutrality.

During the 1980s relations with neighboring countries were strained by refugees fleeing Ethiopia because of famine or opposition to the Mengistu regime’s resettlement policies. Tensions with Somalia, including sporadic border skirmishes in 1987, centered on the Ogaden region, with Addis Ababa accusing Mogadishu of backing the secession efforts of the Somalian-speaking population. However, in April 1988 Mengistu and Somalia President Siad Barre signed a treaty calling for mutual troop withdrawal, an exchange of POWs, and an end to Somalian funding of the rebels.

Relations with Sudan also fluctuated after the Sudanese coup of April 1985. In mid-1986 Khartoum announced that it had ordered the cessation of Eritrean rebel activity in eastern Sudan, apparently expecting that Addis Ababa would reciprocate by reducing its aid to the Sudanese People’s Liberation Army (SPLA). Subsequently, Khartoum denounced continued Ethiopian support of the SPLA as “aggression.” In 1988 the continued SPLA insurgency forced more than 300,000 southern Sudanese refugees across Ethiopia’s border, many starving to death en route.

Although Ethiopia remained strongly linked to the Soviet Union, anti-American rhetoric became manifestly subdued during an influx of U.S. food aid, valued at more than $430 million, from 1984 through 1986. Following the government’s March 1988 expulsion of international aid donors from rebel-held areas, Washington reportedly began channeling food supplies to northern Ethiopian drought areas through Sudanese and rebel organizations. The U.S. policy of limiting its support to humanitarian aid continued into 1989, despite the decision of international creditors to fund Addis Ababa’s agricultural reform program. In April 1989 the Mengistu regime indicated a desire to resume full diplomatic relations with Washington (reduced to the chargé level in 1980) but withdrew the overture in the face of a cool U.S. response. Washington reportedly exerted considerable pressure on Colonel Mengistu to resign in May 1991, named an ambassador to the new government in June, and was one of a dozen foreign governments to send a team of observers to the National Conference in July.

The attempted assassination of Egyptian President Mubarak on June 26, 1995 (see Egypt article), initially led to friction between Cairo and Addis Ababa because of intimations from Egyptian intelligence sources that the attack might have been aided by members of Ethiopia’s security forces. After an Egyptian investigation team had complained of their treatment to U.S. embassy officials, they were ordered to leave the country. Subsequently, Ethiopian-Sudanese relations again plummeted in the wake of charges by Addis Ababa that Khartoum was sheltering several people implicated in the Mubarak affair. In September 1996 an Ethiopian court sentenced three men to death in connection with the assassination attempt, which by then was being attributed to the Islamic Group (see Illegal Groups under Political Parties in article on Egypt). Ethiopian prosecutors charged that the defendants had received military training in “terrorist” camps in Sudan. Egyptian officials praised the verdict and finally commended the Ethiopian authorities for their handling of the case.

According to many observers the Ethiopian, Eritrean, and Ugandan governments tried to coordinate efforts in 1996–1997 to control the spread of Islamic fundamentalism in the Horn of Africa, a policy that was also promoted by the United States. The campaign was mainly directed toward isolating Sudan’s NIF government (see article on Sudan), the Ethiopian government providing support to the Sudanese opposition, mainly the SPLA. It also endorsed the Sodere agreement signed in January 1997 by 26 Somalian factions, which was intended to sideline Somalia’s self-declared “president” and United Somali Congress—SNA leader, Hussein Mohamed FARAH AIDID (see article on Somalia). In addition, Ethiopia reportedly convinced those factions to assist in the fight with the Islamic Union guerrillas that operate along the border of Ethiopia and Somalia.

Diplomatic tension between Kenya and Ethiopia flared up in March 1997 when some 40 people were killed in Kenya by tribesmen reportedly infiltrating from the Ethiopian border. The two governments subsequently agreed to cooperate to control their borders. Meanwhile, Britain temporarily suspended its aid program to the country after AS-SEFA Maru, a member of the Ethiopian Teachers Association, was killed by policemen in May 1997. On November 24, 1997, Italian President Oscar Luigi Scalfaro, during a trip to Addis Ababa, formally apologized for the Italian invasion and occupation of Ethiopia between 1936–1941.

Current Issues

In describing the 1998–2000 border war with Eritrea, the New York Times said it was “hard to think of a more pointless and wasteful international conflict.” As many as 60,000 Ethiopians lost their lives in the fighting, which, while sporadic, was described at its most intense moments as the biggest war in the world, although international attention was minimal. Despite the costs, the Ethiopian populace embraced the cause with enthusiasm and wildly celebrated the country's military success and the government's proclamation of "victory." However, the terms of the peace accord (see Current issues in article on Eritrea for details) subsequently proved highly controversial in Ethiopia. Critics both within and outside the EPRDF accused Prime Minister Meles of having "caved in" by accepting a settlement that did not appropriately reflect the Ethiopian military dominance. Among other things, Meles's opponents decried the failure of the government to gain guaranteed access in the agreement to the Eritrean ports of Assab and Massawa. (Ethiopia had become landlocked by Eritrea's independence, and its economy had been severely constrained by the lack of port access since the outbreak of hostilities.) Tension over the matter culminated in an attempt by TPLF hard-liners to remove Meles from his party post in early 2001. Although Meles survived, the rebellion had spread to other components of the EPRDF, and Meles's position remained fragile. Student protests in April contributed to the sense of instability, and the government subsequently launched an extensive crackdown on its opponents, against many of whom it leveled corruption charges. Meanwhile, President Negaso sided with the critics, sealing his political fate in view of Meles's successful counterattack. Girma Wolde Giorgis, Negaso's successor, was not widely known, even though he was a member of the House of Peoples' Representatives. Significantly, however, Girma was a member of the Oromo ethnic group (as was Negaso), his selection apparently reflecting the TPLF's intensifying concern over the growing unease in Oromia and other southern regions regarding TPLF dominance at the national level. Meanwhile, battles were reported in 2002 between Ethiopian forces and fighters from the Oromo Liberation Front, Ogaden National Liberation Front, and other smaller secessionist and/or anti-EPRDF groups.

Severe food shortages were reported in early 2003, while additional complications for the government arose from renewed tension along the border with Eritrea in late 2003 and widespread ethnic clashes in the state of Gambela in mid-2004. By November 2004 it was clear that final peace talks between Eritrea and Ethiopia had broken down, Meles, under heavy domestic pressure, having refused to accept the UN's proposed demarcation of the border, particularly the decision that the town of Badme would be Eritrean. Despite the presence of 4,200 UN peacekeepers, Ethiopia deployed its own troops to control Badme. At the same time, Meles continued to be perceived as an important ally of the West, particularly in regard to Washington's "war on terrorism."

All in all, the turmoil was expected to give the newly reorganized opposition parties an opportunity to present a genuine challenge to the EPRDF in the legislative balloting of May 15, 2005. For the first time, opposition candidates were allowed to "campaign openly" and were granted some access to state-run media. The election was also keenly observed by the west, which hoped the poll would represent an important step in the maturation of Ethiopia's fledgling democratic process and solidify Meles's credentials as one of the new breed of reformist African leaders. However, the election and its aftermath had just the opposite effect. The CUD and UEDF immediately challenged the preliminary results as fraudulent, claiming that they should have been credited with a majority of the seats and that the vote had been rigged. Although at least token reballoting was ordered in some constituencies, Meles quickly signaled a hard-line attitude toward protesters by banning all demonstrations in Addis Ababa and placing the capital police under his direct control. Student demonstrators clashed with police in several cities in June, leaving some 40 people dead, and the antigovernment outcry intensified in September when the government's official final results gave the EPRDF and its allies more than 68 percent of the seats. For their part, EU observers concluded that the election had failed to meet international standards.

Unrest culminated in another deadly conflict between protesters and government forces on November 1, 2005, during an AU summit in Addis Ababa. The government blamed "stone-throwers" for initiating the battle, while the opposition blamed unnecessarily harsh reactions by security forces to a peaceful demonstration. Nearly 50 people died in the clashes, to which the government responded by detaining thousands of protesters and arresting nearly all of the CUD leadership, prominent members of other opposition parties, and a number of journalists and human rights activists. Those arrested were charged with treason, promoting violence, and attempting to overthrow the government. (Meles indicated his belief that the opposition forces were attempting to topple his regime by emulating the mass demonstrations that had proven effective in countries such as Georgia, Kyrgyzstan, and Ukraine.)

Human rights groups expressed outrage over the crackdown, and the World Bank, EU, and UK suspended aid to Ethiopia in an effort to pressure Meles to adopt a more conciliatory stance. However, the trials of the detainees opened in May 2006, with Meles dismissing accusations regarding his “dictatorial rule.” By that time, the prime minister was also facing growing international pressure regarding Ethiopia’s continued refusal to accept the final decisions of the commission established to demarcate the border with Eritrea (see Current issues in article on Eritrea for details.)

Political Parties and Groups

Political parties were not permitted under the monarchy, while legal party activity during the period of rule by the Provisional Military Administrative Council did not emerge until the formation of the regime-supportive Workers’ Party of Ethiopia (WPE) in 1984. The 1987 constitution reaffirmed the WPE’s position as the country’s only authorized party, describing it as the “leading force of the state and society” and granting it wide authority, including the right to approve all candidates for the National Assembly. As the Mengistu regime faced accelerating rebel activity and declining Soviet support, the WPE in March 1990 abandoned its Marxist-Leninist ideology, changed its name to the Ethiopian Democratic Unity Party (EDUP), and opened its ranks to former members of opposition groups in an unsuccessful effort to broaden its base of public support. Following the overthrow of the Mengistu government in May 1991, leaders of the interim government announced that the EDUP had been dissolved. As of 2006 it was reported that some 78 parties had been recognized, although a majority of them were operating only at the regional level.

Government Parties

Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF). The EPRDF was launched in May 1988 by the TPLF in an effort to expand its influence beyond Tigray Province, over which it had recently achieved military dominance. Although the TPLF had long subscribed to Marxist-Leninist ideology, an EPRDF congress in early 1991 called for development of a “small-scale” economy in which farmers would lease land from the government and control the sale of their products. While the new platform called for tight government control of foreign trade, it also endorsed an expanded role for private investment in the economy. In another significant policy shift, the congress, while displaying a clear preference for a united Ethiopia, accepted Eritrea’s right to self-determination.

Joined in a loose military alliance with the Eritrean People’s Liberation Front (see article on Eritrea) and the OLF (below), the EPRDF led the march on Addis Ababa that ousted the Mengistu regime in May 1991. Assuming power in the name of the EPRDF, Meles Zenawi was confirmed as head of state by the National Conference pending the outcome, under a new constitution, of multi-party elections originally scheduled for 1993, but not held until May 1995. The EPRDF won over 90 percent of the seats in that balloting, and Meles was elected prime minister by the House of Peoples’ Representatives in August, the office of president (which he had previously held) having been reduced to figurehead status. The EPRDF dominated the 2000 legislative balloting and unanimously reelected Meles as EPRDF chair at a congress on September 1, 2001, the prime minister having survived serious dissension within the TPLF and other EPRDF component groups (see below). The congress also selected a new 140-member council, a 38-member Executive Committee, and an 8-member “Control Commission.”

Leader: MELES Zenawi (Prime Minister of the Republic and Chair of the EPRDF), ADDISU Legesse (Deputy Chair).

Tigray People’s Liberation Front (TPLF).

Formed in 1975 by former students who had been strongly influenced by Marxism-Leninism, the TPLF initially pursued independence or at least substantial autonomy for Tigray Province. However, its subsequent goal became the overthrow of the Mengistu regime and establishment of a new central government involving all ethnic groups. Established in 1985, a pro-Albanian Marxist-Leninist League of Tigray (MLLT) gained ideological ascendancy within the TPLF, and MLLT leader Meles Zenawi was elected TPLF chair at a 1989 congress. By that time the TPLF had become one of the country’s most active antigovernment groups, its fighters having gained control of Tigray and pushed south toward Addis Ababa. The TPLF subsequently began to shed its ideological rigidity, reflecting both the growing worldwide disillusionment with communism and a need to broaden the front’s philosophical base in preparation for a possible government takeover. Consequently, by the time TPLF soldiers captured Addis Ababa in the name of the EPRDF in May 1991, the front’s leaders were describing themselves as supporters of Western-style multiparty democracy and limited private enterprise. However, disagreement was subsequently reported within the TPLF regarding the proposed privatization of state-run enterprises.

Following the tentative conclusion of the border war with Eritrea in 2000, hard-liners in the TPLF reportedly came close to ousting Meles in March 2001. Among other things, the dissidents, who included TEWOLDE Wolde-Mariam, then vice chair of the TPLF, strongly objected to the perceived lack of results in the peace accord as well as the imposition of economic austerity measures requested by the IMF and World Bank. Meles and his “reformist” supporters subsequently launched a purge of many of the critics.

Leader: MELES Zenawi (Prime Minister of the Republic and Chair of the TPLF).

Amhara National Democratic Movement

(ANDM). The ANDM was initially established in 1980 as the Ethiopian People’s Democratic Movement (EPDM) by former members of the EPRP (below) under the guidance of the TPLF. In 1986 a number of pitched battles were reported in Wollo Province between EPDM forces and government troops. Subsequent ideological controversy generated the creation of an Ethiopian Marxist-Leninist Force (EMLF) to serve the same function in the EPDM as the MLLT was serving in the TPLF. The EPDM joined the TPLF in the 1988 formation of the EPRDF and adopted its present name at its third congress in January 1994.

In October 1996 it was reported that former prime minister Tamirat Layne had been dismissed as ANDM secretary general during an emergency meeting of the Central Committee for “acting contrary to the principles for which the ANDM has stood during the last 16 years.” Tamirat was also subsequently fired from his posts of deputy prime minister and minister of national defense as part of what was widely viewed as an anticorruption campaign. He was sentenced in 1999 to 18 years in prison on corruption charges.

Divisions were reported within the ANDM in 2005–2006, as some members objected to what they perceived as growing anti-Amhara rhetoric on the part of members of the TPLF and OPDO.

Leader: ADDISU Legesse (Chair and Deputy Prime Minister of the Republic), TEFERA Walwa, BEREKET Simeon, HILAWÉ Yosef.

Oromo Peoples’ Democratic Organization

(OPDO). The OPDO was formed in April 1990 under the direction of the TPLF, its membership reportedly comprising Oromo prisoners of war captured by the TPLF in sporadic clashes with the OLF (below). The OLF immediately challenged the creation of the OPDO as an “unfriendly and hostile gesture,” and the OPDO’s existence remained a source of friction between the TPLF and the OLF. During 1992 the OPDO was reported to have been weakened by the desertion of a number of its followers to the OLF.

The OPDO, as expected, dominated the May 2000 elections in the state of Oromia, securing 173 of 178 seats in the House of Peoples’ Representatives and 535 of 537 seats on the State Council. As with the TPLF and SEPDF, the OPDO was subsequently riven by dissension generated by hard-liners unhappy with Prime Minister Meles, particularly in regard to the conclusion of the border war with Eritrea. Among the consequences of the fractionalization was the dismissal of Negaso Gidada, then president of the republic, from the OPDO central committee and his eventual departure from the party. The OPDO declined to 110 seats in the 2005 balloting for the House of Peoples’ Representatives.

Leader: Abdullah GEMEDA (President), Junedi SADO (President of the State of Oromia).

Southern Ethiopia Peoples’ Democratic Front (SEPDF). The SEPDF comprises many small, mostly ethnically based parties. It secured 112 of 123 seats from the state of Southern Nations, Nationalities, and Peoples in the 2000 balloting for the House of Peoples’ Representatives. (For a list of component parties that gained representation, see Legislature in article on Ethiopia in the 2005–2006 Handbook.) A number of members of the SEPDF’s Central Committee were dismissed in 2002 in the wake of friction attributed to ethnic disputes as well as disagreement reflective of similar problems in the OPDO and TPLF over the policies of Prime Minister Meles.

Leaders: HAILEMARIAM Desalegn (Chair), KASSU Illala.

Somali Peoples’ Democratic Party (SPDP). The SPDP was launched in Jijiga in Ethiopia’s state of Somalia in June 1998 by the Ethiopian Somali Democratic League (ESDL) and a progovernment faction of the ONLF (below) that had split from its parent grouping regarding the question of independence. (The ESDL and the ONLF faction had formed a victorious coalition in the 1995 elections in the region.)

The ESDL had been formed in February 1994 by the following progovernment eastern region groups: the Eastern Ethiopian Somali League (EESL), the Eastern Gabdoye Democratic Organization (EGDO), the Ethiopian Somali Democratic Movement (ESDM), the Gurgura Liberation Front (GLF), the Rer Barreh Party, the Horyal Democratic Front (HDF), the Isa and Gurgura Liberation Front (IGLF), the Shekicho Peoples’ Democratic Movement (SPDM), the Social Alliance Democratic Organization (SADO), the Somali Abo Democratic Union (SADU), and the Somali Democratic Union Party (SDUP).

ESDL leader Abdul Mejid Hussein, who had been the target in July 1996 of an assassination attempt that the government blamed on separatist rebels, was named leader of the SPDP at its formation. He was succeeded in 2000 by Mohammad Drir, who had already taken over Hussein’s cabinet post.

A pro-EPRDF formation, the SPDP won 19 of the 23 seats from the state of Somalia in the House of Peoples’ Representatives and 148 of the 168 Somali State Council seats. Severe fractionalization was reported within the party in 2002, although the SPDP won all 23 seats from the state of Somalia in the 2005 poll.

Leaders: Mohammad DRIR (Chair), Abdulrashid Dulene RAFLE (Vice Chair), Sultan Ibrahim (Secretary General).

Other Legislative Parties

Coalition for Unity and Democracy (CUD). Launched in 2004 as an electoral coalition in advance of the 2005 legislative balloting by the following four groups, the CUD called for constitutional changes to reduce the authority of the executive branch and to promote democratization and human rights. Other campaign promises included intensified land privatization and a switch to proportional legislative balloting. Supported primarily by urban Amaharas, the CUD also called for a more highly centralized government in which the ethnically based states would be replaced by a return to the former provincial structure. Under the CUD proposals, the constitution would also no longer include provisions for legal regional secession.

The CUD was the leading opposition force in the May 2005 national elections, dominating the balloting in Addis Ababa and other cities. The government ultimately credited the CUD with winning 109 seats, although the coalition strongly challenged the accuracy of the final results and a number of its successful candidates refused to take their seats in the House of Peoples' Representatives. The question of whether or not to boycott the legislature apparently caused significant dissension within the coalition, and undercut efforts by CUD Chair Hailu Shawel to merge the CUD components into a single party. In September the AEUP, RE:MDSJ, and EDL reportedly announced support for the merger and creation of the Coalition for Unity and Democracy Party (CDUP). However, the UEDP-Medhin resisted that initiative, prompting the national election board to refuse recognition of the CDUP on the grounds that the CDUP required full participation of all of its electoral components.

Many of the CUD leaders (including Hailu) were arrested in the government crackdown of November 2005.

Leaders: HAILU Shawel (Chair), BIRTUKAN Mideksa (First Vice Chair), Lidetu AYALEW (Vice Chair), Berhanu NEGA, MULENEH Eyuel (Secretary General).

All Ethiopian Unity Party (AEUP). This party is an outgrowth of factionalization within the All-Amhara People's Organization (AAPO), which initially supported the EPRDF but went into opposition over the issues of ethnic regionalization. The AAPO's president, Dr. ASRAT Woldeyes, was one of several AAPO leaders sentenced to prison in June 1994 for inciting armed opposition to the government. Asrat remained incarcerated until late 1998. Upon his release the ailing former physician for Emperor Selassie left the country for medical treatment.

After winning only one seat in the 2000 balloting for the House of Peoples' Representatives, the AAPO suffered internal division. Hailu Shawel, the vice president of AAPO, lost a bid for the AAPO presidency, and he formed his own grouping under the AEUP rubric in consonance with its stated goal of downplaying its Amharic orientation in favor of outreach to "all Ethiopians." By that time a number of former AAPO members reportedly had joined the new EDP (see UEDP-Medhin, below). Hailu subsequently became prominent in the formation of the CDU in 2005.

Leaders: HAILU Shawel (President), Makonnen BISHAW (Secretary General).

United Ethiopian Democratic Party—Medhin (UEDP-Medhin). The formation of the UEDP was announced in 2003 by several groups, including the Ethiopian Democratic Party (EDP) and the Ethiopian Democratic Action Group. The EDP, a moderate grouping espousing "unity and peace," was launched in December 1999 and secured two seats from Addis Ababa in 2000 in the House of Peoples' Representatives. The EDP was subsequently reported to be opposed to the conditions of the peace accord accepted by the Meles government with Eritrea. Founding members of the EDP included Lidetu Ayelaw, a former head of the AAPO youth wing. The relationship of the UEDP with another group with a similar name—the Ethiopian Democratic Union Party (EDUP)—was unclear, although it was reported that the UEDP—Medhin rubric had been adopted prior to the 2005 national balloting as a result of several formal mergers of former single parties.

Lidetu (who had been serving as the group's acting leader) was reportedly elected chair of the UEDP—Medhin in late 2005 after he broke with CUD components on the issue of participation in the legislature. (Lidetu supported the decision by most of the successful UEDP–Medhin candidates to take their seats.) Among other things, Lidetu accused CUD leader Hailu of trying to form a single party of the CUD components that would be dominated by the AEUP. There was also uncertainty within the UEDP–Medhin regarding accepting the seats it had won in the Addis Ababa Council and whether to fill the seats under the rubric of the CUD or UEDP–Medhin.

Leaders: LIDETU Ayelaw (Chair), Admasso GEBEYHU.

Rainbow Ethiopia: Movement for Democracy and Social Justice (RE:MDSJ). Launched by prominent human rights activists in November 2004, the RE:MDSJ called upon the country's myriad opposition parties to coalesce in advance of the May 2005 legislative elections.

Leaders: Berhanu NEGA, Mesfin Wolde MARIAM.

Ethiopian Democratic League (EDL). The EDL was launched in 2002 by opponents of the Meles administration. The new party described itself as open to all Ethiopians, regardless of ethnicity or regionality. Founding members reportedly included Berhanu Nega (a prominent economist) and Mesfin Wolde Mariam (a human rights activist). Both men were arrested in 2002 on charges of having incited disturbances at the University of Addis Ababa the previous year, but they were subsequently released, in part due to heavy international pressure. They were also arrested in the November 2005 government crackdown, Nega and Mariam then being referenced as the leaders of the newly formed RE:MDSJ.

Leaders: Chekol GETAHUN, MULENEH Eyuel.

United Ethiopian Democratic Forces (UEDF). Launched in mid-2003 by the following groups and other parties (both within Ethiopia and in the diaspora) opposed to the EPRDF government, the UEDF (comprising mostly southern parties and dominated by Oromos) called for peaceful regime change, land reform, privatization of state-run enterprises, greater press freedom, and greater free-market influence in the economy. With the primary goal of defeating the EPRDF, the UEDF cooperated informally with CUD for the May 2005 elections, the two groups pledging to forge a coalition government if successful in the balloting. However, opposition to the EPRDF regime appeared to be the only genuine shared position between the UEDF and the CUD, as UEDF officials made it clear they strongly opposed the CUD's plan to redraw regional boundaries and establish a more highly centralized government. Many UEDF supporters also criticized the CUD's proposed land privatization proposal as a pretext for "Amhara land grabs" in the south.

The UEDF was credited with winning 52 seats in the House of Peoples' Representatives in 2005, all but one of the successful candidates reportedly taking their seats despite a CUD call for a boycott of the legislature. UEDF President Beyene Petros and Vice President Merera Gudina supported the decision to participate in the legislature and called for a national dialogue with the EPRDF and other parties toward installation of a national unity government. As a result, hard-line UEDF dissidents meeting in October announced that Beyene and Merera had been relieved of their UEDF leadership posts in favor of the EPRP's Fasika BELETE and Ayalsew DERSIE and that "underground" antigovernment was being considered. However, Beyene rejected the validity of the dissident action and continued to serve as UEDF spokesman, initialling a memorandum of understanding with the EPRDF and the OFDM providing for ongoing negotiations to resolve the nation's political problems in a peaceful manner and with respect for constitutional structures.

Leaders: BEYENE Petros, MERERA Gudina, DEREJE Kebede (Secretary General).

Council of Alternative Forces for Peace and Democracy in Ethiopia (CAFPDE). An umbrella organization for a number of opposition groupings, the CAFPE was formed under the leadership of Beyene Petros, also the leader of the SEPDC, the core component of the CAFPDE. In 1994 Beyene described the constitutional revision then underway as “undemocratic” and inappropriately dominated by the TPLF. The CAFPDE declined to participate fully in the 1995 elections on the grounds that insufficient arrangements had been made for foreign observation of the polls.

The CAFPDE participated with other leading groups to form the Coalition of Ethiopian Opposition Political Organizations (CEOPO) in Paris in September 1998. However, Beyene subsequently withdrew the CAFPDE from CEOPO and declared the CAFPDE’s intention to contest the 2000 legislative elections on its own. As a result, hard-liners within the CAFPDE announced that Beyene had been replaced as chair by KIFLE Tigneh Abate. However, the National Electoral Board ordered Beyene reinstated in January 2000.

The CAFPDE was credited with winning four seats in the House of Peoples’ Representatives in the 2000 balloting, while the SEPDC secured two and the Hadiya National Democratic Organization (HNDO), a small grouping also led by Beyene, won three. Following the balloting, Beyene strongly criticized the EPRDF for the perceived “intimidation” of members of the CAFPDE and other opposition parties.

In 2006 Beyene announced that the CAFPDE had been renamed the Ethiopian Social Democratic Party (ESDP) in an effort to merge the CAFPDE components into a single party. By that time, with the ONC having been factionalized (see below), Beyene and others also described the ESDP as the dominant component of the UEDF.

Leader: BEYENE Petros (Chair).

Southern Ethiopia Peoples’ Democratic Coalition (SEPDC). The SEPDC was launched in 1992 by a number of small parties representing some 34 different tribal groups and holding 16 seats in the 87-member Council of Representatives. (Participating groups included the Burji People’s Democratic Organization [BPDO], the Gedo People’s Democratic Organization [GPDO], the Gedo People’s Unity Democratic Movement [GPUDM], the Gurage People’s Democratic Front [GPDF], the HNDO [see above], the Kefa People’s Democratic Union [KPDU], the Kembata People’s Congress [KPC], the Omo People’s Democratic Front [OPDF], the Sidama Liberation Movement [SLM], the Walayta People’s Democratic Front [WPDF], and the Yem People’s Democratic Movement [YPDM].)

In March 1993 the SEPDC organizations participated in a “Peace for Ethiopia” conference in Paris that included the OLF and COEDF. In a statement issued at the conclusion of the conference, participants strongly condemned the current regime in Addis Ababa for its alleged repressive tendencies, while calling on it to permit nonviolent opposition activity. The Council of Representatives reacted by calling on SEPDC members to repudiate the conference resolutions. Five (the BPDO, GPDF, KPDU, KPC, and WFDF) agreed to do so while five that refused (the GPDO, HNDO, OPDF, SLM, and YPDM) were suspended from council participation.

Beyene Petros, the leader of the SEPDC and HNDO, left his post as a vice minister in the transitional government as a result of the events of 1993. He subsequently became chair of the CAFPDE. After having agreed to participate in the 2000 legislative elections, the CAFPDE and the SEPDC boycotted local elections in December 2001 in the state of Southern Nations, Nationalities, and Peoples.

Oromo National Congress (ONC). Formed in 1998 by political science professor Merera Gudina, the ONC pledged to support the rights of the Oromo people, including preservation of the right to self-determination. Although the ONC won only 1 seat in the 2000 elections in the House of Peoples’ Representatives, it reportedly secured some 39 of the UEDF’s 52 seats in the 2005 poll, dominating balloting in several southern areas. Most of the successful ONC candidates, including Merera, subsequently took their legislative seats, although debate was reported within the ONC on the question. The party was subsequently severely split as dissidents announced in September that they had expelled Merera from the ONC and had withdrawn the ONC from the UEDF. However, Merera dismissed those measures as invalid actions on the part of only a few disgruntled ONC members. The status of the party remained unclear as of early 2006, although the national election board indicated that it believed the dissident faction had the strongest legal claim to the ONC rubric.

Leaders: MERERA Gudina; TOLOSSA Tesfaye, TEFERA Legesse, DEYASA Leta (Leaders of Dissident Faction).

Oromo Federalist Democratic Movement (OFDM). After winning 11 seats in the May 2005 balloting for the House of Peoples' Representatives, the recently organized OFDM, which had resisted preelection overtures from the CUD and UEDF, called for a "national dialogue" between the opposition parties and the EPRDF. Among other things, the OFDM urged that no changes be made in the powers or boundaries of the nation's states.

Leader: Balcha DEMESKA.

Beneshangul-Gumuz Peoples' Democratic Party (BGPDP). Described as a pro-EPRDF party, the BGPDP secured six of the nine seats from the state of Beneshangul-Gumuz in the 2000 balloting for the House of Representatives and 71 of 80 State Council seats.

Leader: Mulualem BESSE.

Afar National Democratic Party (ANDP). The ANDP was formed in August 1999 by the merger of five groups in the state of Afar: the Afar Peoples' Democratic Organization (APDO), the Afar Revolutionary Democratic Union Front (ARDUF), the Afar National Democratic Movement (ANDM), the Afar National Liberation Front (ANLF), and the Afar Liberation Front Party (ALFP).

The APDO, established originally as the Afar Democratic Union, had adopted the APDO rubric in 1992. Having benefited from dissension within the ALF (see below), the APDO was subsequently described as exercising dominant political authority, in alignment with the EPRDF, in the Afar region under the leadership of Ismail ALISERIO.

The ARDUF was formed in 1991 to "liberate Afar territories" of the former autonomous region of Assab from Eritrean domination. The ARDUF subsequently became an anti-EPRDF secessionist movement under the leadership of former WPE first secretary and Assab governor Mohamoda Ahmed GAAS. Sporadic fighting was reported in 1996 between the ARDUF's armed wing, Ugugumo (Revolution), and TPLF forces. During 1997, however, the government initiated a policy of dialogue with the ARDUF to reach a reconciliation over the future of the Afar National Regional State. The discussions brought about a division within the ranks of the ARDUF between pro- and anti-agreement factions. Meanwhile, hard-liners led by Gaas apparently reached an agreement with the ONLF to coordinate the opposition to the current regime.

The ANDM, a pro-EPRDF formation, was launched in February 1995 by Ahmed Mohamed AHAW, a son of the influential Sultan of Biru in the northwestern Danakil region.

The ANDP secured all of the eight seats from the state of Afar in the 2000 balloting for the House of Peoples' Representatives and all but three of the Afar State Council seats, the grouping being widely perceived as a pro-EPRDF, pro-Meles party.

Gambela Peoples' Democratic Movement (GPDM). The GPDM was formed in 2003 following the dissolution of the Gambela Peoples' Democratic Front (GPDF), which had secured all three of the seats from the state of Gambela in the House of Peoples' Representatives in the 2000 balloting and most of the Gambela State Council seats. Although the GPDF had presented its candidates in 2000 without declaring a cooperative stance with any other parties, it was later described as supportive of the pro-Meles faction of the TPLF and EPRDF.

The GPDF resulted from a merger of the Gambela People's Liberation Party (GPLP), a party representing the Anyuak ethnic group that, allied with the EPRDF, had won the 1995 elections in Gambela; and the Gambela People's Democratic Unity Party (GPDUP), a Nuer party. However, the GPDF was reportedly later dissolved following the collapse of power-sharing arrangements and the outbreak of sporadic deadly fighting between the Anyuak and the Nuer.

The GPDM secured 3 seats in the 2005 voting for the House of Peoples' Representatives and nearly all of the Gambela State Council seats. It subsequently concluded a cooperation agreement with the EPRDF.

Leader: Ket TUACH.

Other parties securing seats in the 2005 balloting for the House of Peoples' Representatives included: the Argoba National Democratic Organization; the Harari National League (HNL), a pro-EPRDF formation that also won a majority in the Harari State Council in 2005; and the Shecko Mejenger People's Democratic Unity Organization.

Other Parties and Groups

Afar Liberation Front (ALF). Long considered the most important of the Afar groups, the ALF was organized in 1975. Although its leadership was then based in Jeddah, Saudi Arabia, the ALF also operated in Ethiopia's Hararge and Wollo Provinces, where it was supported by followers of Ahmed ALI Mirah, the sultan of Awsa. In July 1991 the sultan returned from 17 years in exile and nominally endorsed Eritrea's right to self-determination, although his nomadic subjects occupy a lengthy portion of the Red Sea coast and had long had as their principal objective an Afar state within an Ethiopian federation. In April 1995 the sultan suspended his son, Hanfareh ALI Mirah, as ALF chair in response to preelectoral dissension within the Front; however, the AFL Executive Committee refused to endorse the action. The leadership of the ALF subsequently remained unclear as some reports suggested that the sultan and at least one of his sons had expressed support for the new Afar party (see ANDP, above), while other sons (including Umar ALI Mirah, Habib ALI Mirah, and Ousman ALI Mirah) continued to oppose the EPRDF. Renewed fighting between ALF hard-liners and Ethiopian forces was reported in mid-2002.

Oromo Liberation Front (OLF). Initially centered in the eastern and mid-country regions, the OLF in the late 1980s expanded its activities to the west and south. Although it represented the largest ethnic group in Ethiopia, the OLF was the least powerful militarily of the rebel units that toppled the Mengistu government. Previously committed to the creation of a new country of "Oromia" in what is currently southern Ethiopia, OLF leaders said in June 1991 that they would consider remaining part of a Ethiopian federation that provided for substantial regional autonomy. In mid-July the OLF concluded a "unity" pact with four other Oromo groups: the Islamic Front for the Liberation of Oromia (IFLO), the Oromo Aba Liberation Front (OALF), the United Oromo People's Liberation Front (UOPLF), and the OPDO (above). Earlier the OLF had occasionally allied itself with the EPLF (see under Eritrea entry) in skirmishes with the EPRDF, and it withdrew from the EPRDF-led coalition in June 1992 because of alleged electoral fraud, harassment of its members, and inadequate tribal representation. Two of its leaders, IBSSA Gutema and LENCHO Leta, were among opposition figures arrested in December 1993, the OLF Central Committee subsequently announcing that Lencho had been dismissed as the front's deputy secretary general. Both men were released in January 1994. Three months later the OLF and IFLO were reported to have agreed to offer coordinated opposition to the forthcoming draft constitution. In early 1995 a number of skirmishes took place between government troops and OLF militants, and it was subsequently reported that several hundred OLF supporters had been imprisoned as a result of the front's low-level guerrilla campaign.

In mid-1996 the OLF announced that it had signed a cooperation pact with the hard-line faction of the ONLF (below). The two groups pledged, according to the Indian Ocean Newsletter, to coordinate their diplomatic, political, and military activity to secure self-determination referendums for their respective regions. Minor skirmishes between security forces and OLF militants continued throughout 1997 as the front reportedly remained divided between pro- and antialogue factions. The party engaged in reportedly fruitless discussions with the government in 1997, and at an extraordinary OLF congress in early 1998 the antialogue faction appeared to have won control of the group's policy-making Executive Committee. The OLF was subsequently described as "reinvigorated," partly as the result of aid from Eritrea, and OLF antigovernment military activity in pursuit of independence was reported in mid-2002, although severe fractionalization was reported between OLF militants, led by Daoud Ibsa, and moderates inclined to negotiate with the government. The OLF remained "at war with the regime" in early 2005, although Galasa Dilbo, the OLF chair who had been under house arrest, had been permitted to leave for Nairobi, Kenya, in late 2004.

Prime Minister Meles reportedly offered in late 2005 to negotiate with the OLF toward a possible peace settlement, but the OLF continued to support "mobilization" against the EPRDF regime. Meanwhile, the front reportedly remained split between supporters of Gelasa and supporters of Ibsa.

Leaders: GELASA Dilbo (Former Chair, in exile), Daoud IBSA, (Chair), Harsan HUSSEIN (resident in Washington, D.C.), Shigat GELETA (resident in Berlin, Germany).

Oromo People's Liberation Front (OPLF). Characterizing the EPRDF as an "occupying enemy," the OPLF was launched in London in 1992 with the issuance of a program calling for the formation of an independent state of Oromia. The position was reiterated in December 1994 at a meeting in Nairobi, Kenya, with representatives of the UOPLF (under OLF, above) and the Oromo People's Liberation Organization (OPLO). However, during a congress in Harar in May 1995 a new central committee was appointed that excluded exiled members of its predecessor and adopted a conciliatory attitude toward the EPRDF in view of a "climate of peace and development" that had allegedly been attained in eastern Ethiopia. Cooperation with the OLF and other Oromo groups was launched in 2000.

Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF). The secessionist ONLF was organized in January 1986, reportedly by militant WSLF members opposed to Ethiopian-Somali talks on the future of the Ogaden that did not involve participation by regional representatives. In April 1988 the ONLF criticized Somalia's cessation of aid to the Ogaden rebels as little more than an endorsement of Ethiopian troop redeployment to the north. In September 1996 the Ethiopian army conducted cross-border operations inside Somaliland against ONLF guerrillas.

In June 1998 an ONLF faction that had reportedly been cooperating with the progovernment ESDL since 1995 formed a separate grouping—the SPDP. For their part, ONLF secessionists continued to clash with government troops.

In April 2006 the ONLF claimed responsibility for several attacks on government troops. Approximately 1,000 ONLF fighters were reportedly training in Eritrea at that point.

Leaders: Mohamed Omar OSMAN, Mohamed Ismail Omar, Shimber Abdel KADIR, Mohamed HUSSEIN.

Western Somalia Liberation Front (WSLF). The WSLF, established in 1975, long advocated the incorporation of the Somali-speaking Ogaden region into a "Greater Somalia." During late 1977 the WSLF gained control of the greater part of the area with support from Somali regular forces, but following the latter's withdrawal in March 1978 was forced to operate primarily from bases inside Somalia. At a congress in February 1981 the Front elected a Central Committee that committed itself to the establishment of a "free state of Western Somalia" independent of both Ethiopia and Somalia. WSLF activity declined in 1986, some of its leaders apparently having shifted their allegiance to the newly formed ONLF (below). WSLF antigovernment activity was most recently reported in 1999.

Ethiopian Democratic Union Party (EDUP).

The conservative Ethiopian Democratic Union (EDU) fought government troops in the northwest in the late 1970s before collapsing as the result of a leadership crisis. With the reported support of conservative Arab governments, the EDU later resurfaced, albeit with minimal impact. Although a participant in the 1991 National Conference, the EDU was also a member of COEDF (below). It adopted the EDUP rubric prior to the 1995 elections. An opponent of the recent peace accord with Eritrea, the EDUP has complained of government harassment of its members. Cooperation with the EDP was under consideration in mid-2002.

Leader: Mengesha SEYOUM.

Coalition of Ethiopian Democratic Forces (COEDF). The COEDF was launched in April 1991 in Washington, D.C., by a number of groups (including the EDU, above) whose “common denominator” appeared to be concern over the implications of a government takeover by the EPRDF. Continued friction between the EPRDF and the COEDF subsequently hindered the latter’s efforts to play a substantial role in national negotiations on Ethiopia’s political future.

The four COEDF leaders listed below were among those arrested upon their arrival in Addis Ababa for the dissident peace conference of December 1993. In July 1996 the COEDF initiated the formation of an opposition alliance, the Ethiopian Unity Front (EUF), which brought together the COEDF, the Beneshangul Peoples’ Democratic Movement (BPDM), and a majority faction within the Kefagn Patriotic Front (KPF).

The COEDF was reported to be seriously fragmented as of mid-1999; some members were promoting the CEOPO (see CAFPDE, above), while others were in negotiations with the government. The disintegration of the coalition was further highlighted by a report that even its core component, the EPRP, was reluctant to describe itself as operating under the COEDF banner.

Leaders: ABERA Yemaneab (in prison), GENENEW Assefa, GUENET Giram, MESFIN Tefer, Merera GUDINA (ONC).

Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Party (EPRP).

The EPRP initiated an unsuccessful antigovernment guerrilla campaign in north-central Ethiopia in 1977. Its forces also battled with the TPLF in Tigray Province, its defeat there in 1978 precipitating a sharp split within the party. One faction served as the formative core of the EPDM in alliance with the TPLF while a rump group was relatively quiescent until a series of kidnappings and other guerrilla acts in Gojam Province in early 1987. Although the EPRP was committed to the overthrow of the Mengistu regime, its relations with the EPRDF and the EPLF were strained. Following the rebel victory in May 1991, the EPRP, with an estimated 5,000 fighters controlling parts of Gojam and Gondar Provinces, was described as the “only really organized opposition” to the TPLF-dominated interim government. Like the country’s other previously Marxist formations, the EPRP now supports multiparty democracy.

In 2001 the EPRP called for renewed action against the “racist” TPLF-led regime, and there were several reports in 2002 of fighting between the EPRP and government forces. Some reports described the EPRP as a participant in the UEDF in 2005, although the government continued to describe the EPRP as an illegal organization.

Leader: Col. TADERSE Muleneh, Iyassu ALEMAYEHU (in exile).

Ethiopian People’s Democratic Alliance (EPDA).

Founded in 1982, the EPDA was an attempt by right-wing opponents of the PMAC to regroup elements of the EDU. The EPDA subsequently comprised an “internal” wing, headquartered in Sudan, and an “external” wing operating in Britain and the United States. Its strongly anticommunist posture reportedly generated $500,000 in annual support from Washington in the late 1980s, but the financing

Other groups reportedly participating in the COEDF included the All-Ethiopian Socialist Movement (Meison) and the Tigray People's Democratic Movement (TPDM). (TPDM fighters reportedly have conducted guerrilla activity recently in concert with other armed groups, including a faction of the EPRP.) The Oromo National Congress (ONC), which was formed in 1998 by political science professor Merera Gudina and won one seat in the 2000 legislative balloting, was subsequently referenced as a member as the COEDF, with Gudina reportedly later becoming a prominent leader of the CUD.

Islamic Union (al-Itahad al-Islami). Operating along the southern part of the border between Ethiopia and Somalia, the Islamic Union conducted guerrilla activity in the early 1990s in support of the establishment of an "Ethiopian Ogaden State." The grouping was accused by the government of several bomb attacks, prompting military countermeasures in the second half of 1996. On July 8, 1996, minister of transport and communication and the chair of the ESDL, Abdulmejid HUSSEIN, was shot and wounded by Al-Itahad members. Government forces subsequently conducted territorial and extra-territorial military operations against Al-Itahad, the organization losing its last major bases to an Ethiopian assault in July 1997. (See article on Somalia for information on al-Itahad activity in that country.)

Tigrayan Alliance for National Democracy (TAND). TAND surfaced in Washington, D.C., in February 1995 as an exile grouping that reportedly included the Multi-National Congress Party of Ethiopia (MNCPE), and the TPDPM, as well as former members of the TPLF and EDC.

Other parties winning single seats in the 2000 balloting for the House of Peoples' Representatives were the Gambela Peoples' Democratic Congress (GPDC), an anti-EPRDF formation with support within the Nuer ethnic group; the Sidama Hadicko Peoples' Democratic Organization; and the Siltie Peoples' Democratic Party.

Small formations include the Tigray Democratic Union (TDU), an anti-TPLF grouping that launched an armed struggle in 2000 under the leadership of AREGAWE Bereh, one of the founders of the TPLF; the Sidama Liberation Movement (SLM), led by Yilma CHAMOLA; the Oromo National Liberation Party (ONLP), launched in October 2000 under the leadership of ESAYAS Shegaw to "liberate Oromia from poverty and suffering."

Groups formed in advance of the 2005 legislative poll included the Afar Liberation Party; the All Ethiopian Democratic Party, launched by former members of the EDUP; the Dal-Webi Democratic Movement, which operates in the state of Somalia; and the Ethiopian Pan-Africanist Party, led by Abd al-Fatah HULDAR.

Legislature

The constitution of December 1994 provides for an Ethiopian Parliament encompassing a House of the Federation selected by the states and a popularly elected House of Peoples' Representatives. Both bodies have five-year mandates.

House of the Federation (Yefedershein Mekir Bete). The upper House currently consists of 108 members (serving five-year terms) who represent Ethiopia's "nations and nationalities," each of which is entitled to at least one member, with an additional representative for each one million of its population (The regional distribution of seats is as follows: Southern Nations, Nationalities, and Peoples, 54; Amhara, 17; Oromia, 16; Tigray, 6; Somalia, 4; Beneshangul-Gumuz, 4; Gambela Peoples, 4; Afar, 2; Harari People, 1.) Members are designated by state councils, which may elect them directly or provide for their popular election. The House of the Federation was most recently replenished in October 2005 following the State Council elections of May–August.

Speaker: DEGEFE Bula.

House of Peoples' Representatives (Yehizb Tewokayoch Mekir Bete). The House of Peoples' Representatives consists of no more than 550 members (minority nationalities being accorded at least 20 seats) directly elected for a five-year term from single-member districts by a plurality of votes cast. The most recent balloting in eight states and the administrative regions of Addis Ababa and Dire Dawa was held on May 15, 2005. (The balloting in the state of Somalia was deferred due to security concerns and administrative difficulties in providing electoral access to the nomadic population.) However, the preliminary election results were strongly challenged by opposition parties, and reballoting was held in 31 constituencies on August 21. The elections in Somalia were held the same day.

The government released final results in September 2005 for a total of 546 contested seats. However, some opposition legislators (mostly from the Coalition for Unity and Democracy) declined to take their seats when the house convened in October in a protest over what they perceived as government malfeasance during the balloting. Most opposition parties continued to argue that they had been defrauded out of a number of seats. Following is the distribution of 526 seats as reported by the government, which announced that those elected for the remaining 20 seats had declined to be seated: Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front, 327 (Oromo Peoples' Democratic Organization, 110; Southern Ethiopian Peoples' Democratic Movement, 92; Amhara National Democratic Movement, 87; Tigray People's Liberation Front, 38); Coalition for Unity and Democracy, 89 (All Ethiopian Unity Party, 43; United Ethiopian Democratic Party—Medhin, 36; Rainbow Ethiopia: Movement for Democracy and Social Justice, 8; Ethiopian Democratic League, 2); United Ethiopian Democratic Forces, 52; Somali Peoples' Democratic Party, 24; Oromo Federalist Democratic Movement, 11; Benshangul-Gumuz Peoples' Democratic Unity Front, 8; Afar National Democratic Party, 8; Gambela Peoples' Democratic Movement, 3; Argoba National Democratic Organization, 1; Harari National League, 1; Shecko Mejenger Peoples' Democratic Unity Organization, 1; independent, 1.

Speaker: TESHOME Toga Chanaka.

Communications

Communications media were strictly controlled by the Mengistu government and presented the official version of international and domestic events to a small circle of governmental officials, teachers, army officers, and other members of the educated elite. Increased press freedom was promised in the wake of Mengistu's ouster, although the successor regime's actual policy subsequently remained less than tolerant, Ethiopian journalists accusing the EPRDF of a campaign of "harassment and intimidation" that included arrests of reporters and closure of a number of newspapers. The government proposed a controversial new press law in late 2003 that would have limited the number of newspapers, but protests prevented its official adoption. However, in April 2005 it was reported that many of the measures perceived to be repressive were "discreetly" introduced, apparently forcing some journalists into exile. In addition, more than 20 journalists were among those arrested in the government crackdown of late 2005.

Press

Except as noted, the following are dailies published in Addis Ababa: Addis Zemen (41,000), in Amharic; Ethiopian Herald (37,000), government-controlled, in English; the Daily Monitor (6,000), in English; Yezareitu Itiopia (30,000), government weekly in Amharic and English; Mebrek, independent weekly; the Addis Tribune (6,000), weekly in English; Moged, independent weekly; Tomas, weekly; Fortune, independent; The Capital, Iftin, biweekly in Amharic.

News Agencies

The domestic facility is the Ethiopian News Agency (Itiopia Zena Agelgilot—Izea); a number of foreign bureaus maintain offices in Addis Ababa.

Broadcasting and Computing

Radio Ethiopia broadcasts locally and internationally in Amharic, English, Arabic, and a number of other languages. There are also several; autonomous stations, two of which (including the Voice of the Revolution of Tigray) oppose the government. The EPRDF also controls its own station—Radio Fana. Licenses for two FM stations were recently issued by the Ethiopian Broadcasting Agency. Ethiopian Television (Itiopia Television) has been broadcasting under government auspices since 1964. There were approximately 421,000 television receivers and 150,000 personal computers serving 75,000 Internet users in 2003.

The Country

A tropical, heavily forested country on the west coast of Central Africa, Gabon is inhabited by a sparse population whose largest components, among more than 40 distinct ethnic groups, are the Fang and Eshira tribes. A sizable European (predominantly French) community also is resident. Indigenous Gabonese speak a variety of Bantu languages, with Fang predominating in the north. About 60 percent of the population is Christian (largely Roman Catholic), with most of the rest adhering to traditional beliefs; there also is a small Muslim minority. Women constitute over half of salaried workers in the health and trading sectors, although female representation in party and government bodies is minimal.

Abundant natural resources that include oil, high-grade iron ore, manganese, uranium, and timber provided Gabon with a per capita GNP of over $4,200 in the early 1980s. Oil output accounted for about three-fourths of Gabon's export earnings until 1986. By 1988 the economic impact of recession in the oil industry was dramatically underscored by a drop in per capita GNP to $2,620 (still one of the highest among black African states), with subsequent recovery to about $4,950 in 1993.

Real GDP growth averaged 3.3 percent annually in 1996–1998 before a severe recession hit in 1999, triggered by an 11 percent decline in oil production, a trend analysts predicted would decline for the foreseeable future based on Gabon's known reserves. GDP fell 9.6 percent in 1999, and the government inaugurated a structural adjustment program sponsored by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) in an effort to reduce public spending, diversify the economy, promote good governance, and address the severe external debt problem.

Since 2003 the economy has rebounded, aided by higher oil prices and external debt rescheduling. This in turn has contributed to a sharp improvement in fiscal accounts, aided by better tax administration and expenditure discipline. GDP growth was 1.5 percent in 2004, while inflation declined to 0.5 percent, reflecting wage moderation and the monetary discipline imposed by the fixed exchange regime. The overall budget surplus was maintained at 7.5 percent. In 2004 the IMF approved $47 million in assistance to Gabon's economic program. Government corruption reportedly continued to increase, however, and in 2004 Transparency International cited Gabon as among the most corrupt African nations.

Although GDP growth in 2005 was only 2 percent, the IMF noted fiscal progress over the past three years, including structural reforms in non-oil sectors. The IMF also cited the country's poverty reduction strategy initiative, adopted in early 2006. Declining oil reserves over the next decade continued to be the major economic challenge, according to the IMF and the World Bank.

Government and Politics

Political Background

Colonized by France in the latter half of the 19th century and subsequently administered as a part of French Equatorial Africa, Gabon achieved full independence within the French Community on August 17, 1960. Its longtime political leader, President Léon MBA, ruled in a conservative yet pragmatic style and supported close political and economic relations with France. However, Mba's attempts to establish a one-party state based on his Gabon Democratic Bloc (Bloc Démocratique Gabonais—BDG) were resisted for several years by the Gabonese Democratic and Social Union (Union Démocratique et Sociale Gabonais—UDSG), led by Jean-Hilaire AUBAME. Only after an attempted coup by Aubame's army supporters had been thwarted by French military intervention in February 1964 and Mba's party had gained a majority in legislative elections two months later was the UDSG formally outlawed.

Mba was reelected to a seven-year presidential term in March 1967, but he died the following November and was succeeded by Vice President Albert-Bernard (subsequently El Hadj Omar) BONGO Ondimba. Officially declaring Gabon a one-party state in March 1968, Bongo announced a "renovation" policy that included conversion of the former ruling party into a new, nationwide political grouping, the Gabonese Democratic Party (Parti Démocratique Gabonais—PDG). The incumbent was the sole candidate for reelection to a fourth term on November 9, 1986, having survived a coup attempt by military officers in 1985.

Pressured by a deteriorating economy and mounting protests against his regime, President Bongo announced in early March 1990 that a national conference would be called to discuss the launching of an inclusive political organization that would pave the way for eventual adoption of a multiparty system. However, the conference ended its month-long deliberations on April 21 with a call for the immediate introduction of democratic pluralism. The president responded by granting legal status to all of the participating organizations. Moreover, on April 29 he announced that longtime Prime Minister Léon MEBIAME would be succeeded by Casimir OYE MBA as head of a government that would include a number of opposition leaders.

First-round legislative balloting was held on September 23, 1990, the results of which were annulled in 32 of 120 constituencies because of alleged improprieties. At the conclusion of second-round balloting on October 21 and 28, 62 seats were declared to have been won by the PDG (including 3 seats by pro-PDG independents). Subsequently, the PDG tally was augmented by 4 seats, with 7 opposition parties being credited with a total of 54.

In May 1991 six of the seven opposition parties with legislative representation announced a boycott of parliamentary proceedings, called for a dissolution of the government, and demanded that the Bongo regime comply with the dictates of the 1990 national conference and the constitution adopted on March 14 (see Constitution and government, below). Subsequently, on June 7, two days after an opposition-led general strike, President Bongo announced the resignation of Oye Mba's government and called on the opposition, now united in the Coordination of Democratic Opposition (Coordination de l'Opposition Démocratique—COD), to join a "government of national consensus." On June 15 the opposition rejected his offer; three days later Oye Mba was reappointed, and a new government was named that included a limited number of opposition figures.

In July 1992 the PDG-dominated National Assembly rejected an unprecedented no-confidence motion by a vote of 72 to 45. The motion, filed by the opposition to protest the government’s rescheduling of local elections, closely followed assembly approval of a new electoral code, which opposition leaders described as “antidemocratic.” Despite their drawing together in mid-1993 to form a Committee for Free and Democratic Elections, opposition groups failed to unite behind a single slate, and at balloting on December 5 President Bongo was credited with winning reelection over 13 competitors by a narrow 51.18 percent majority. The result was immediately challenged by runner-up Paul MBA-ABESOLE of the National Rally of Woodcutters (Rassemblement National des Bucherons—RNB), who accused Bongo of “high treason against the nation by an electoral coup d’etat,” declared himself president, and announced the formation of a parallel “government of combat” headed by his party’s secretary general, Pierre-André KOMBILA Koumba. On December 12 Mba-Abessole announced the formation of the High Council of the Republic (Haut Conseil de la République—HCR), which included a majority of the opposition presidential candidates, to serve as an advisory body for his parallel government. On December 14 Bongo, promising a multiparty government of “broad consensus,” termed the formation of the alternative body an “anticonstitutional act,” and postelectoral unrest quickly subsided as the regime deployed heavily armed regular and paramilitary forces. Meanwhile, legislative balloting originally scheduled for December 26 was postponed until March 1994.

Political Status: Independent since August 17, 1960; present constitution, providing for “semi-presidential” regime, adopted March 14, 1991.

Based on recent UN estimates, the 2005 total should be approximately 1,376,000.

In late January 1994 consumer prices skyrocketed, and widespread disturbances were reported after France halved the value of the CFA franc. On February 15 Mba-Abessole urged his supporters to “disobey all government directives” and threatened to expel party members who took part in Bongo’s proposed unity government. One week later, nine people were killed when government troops supported by tanks destroyed the RNB’s radio station and attacked Mba-Abessole’s residence as a “punitive measure” for having incited “hatred, violence, and intolerance.” In addition, elections were rescheduled for August 1994.

On March 11, 1994, Prime Minister Oye Mba resigned, stating that the country had entered a “new political phase”; however, Bongo reappointed him two days later, and on March 25 Oye Mba named a new government, which included no opposition members. On April 8 Libreville lifted the state of alert and curfew that had been imposed almost without interruption since December 9, 1993.

On September 27, 1994, following three weeks of internationally supervised negotiations in Paris, government and opposition representatives signed an agreement calling for the establishment of a transitional coalition government and an independent electoral commission empowered to oversee an electoral timetable providing for local and legislative elections in 12 and 18 months, respectively. Consequently, on October 11 Oye Mba again resigned, and two days later the president named a PDG confidant, Paulin OBAME-NGUEMA, as interim prime minister. Although Obame-Nguema's appointment was generally well received, the RNB continued to urge its members to refuse to participate in a Bongo-affiliated government and denounced the 27-member cabinet named by Obame-Nguema, which included six opposition members, for failing to reflect the opposition's legislative strength.

On February 3, 1995, the Constitutional Court, acting at the opposition's urging, ruled that the mandate of the current assembly could continue for the duration of the transition period defined by the 1994 accord. Three days later, opposition deputies ended their legislative boycott, and on April 21 President Bongo agreed to submit a package of constitutional reforms to voters, who provided an overwhelmingly positive response at balloting on June 25. The Bongo administration, however, proved reluctant to implement the Paris Accord, and in February 1996 the opposition called on France to pressure the government to adhere to the transitional schedule. Thereafter, in May, Bongo agreed to organize an electoral commission to schedule and oversee local and, subsequently, national legislative elections.

Local polling, originally scheduled for July 1996, was delayed until October 20 by organizational problems that remained largely unresolved as of election day. Consequently, there were widespread reports of incomplete electoral lists and ballot box shortages, as well as a voter turnout rate as low as 10–15 percent in some areas. Such problems were so severe in Libreville that balloting there was suspended and completed in late November. Opposition leaders claimed that the disorganization was part of a “deliberate” government attempt to undermine the electoral system. Meanwhile, opposition candidates, led by the RNB, captured a clear majority of the contests.

The opposition fared far less well at National Assembly elections conducted on December 15 and 29, 1996, and January 12, 1997, as the governing PDG scored a decisive victory, securing 82 of the 120 assembly seats. At subsequent balloting on January 26 and February 9, 1997, to fill the Senate for the first time, the governing party again secured a substantial majority. Meanwhile, on January 27 President Bongo reappointed Obame-Nguema, who announced a cabinet the following day.

On March 20, 1997, the National Assembly approved draft constitutional amendments, which included provisions for the creation of a vice presidential post and lengthening of the presidential term to seven years (following the next election). Following Senate approval of the amendments in April, the president named Didjob DIVUNGUI DINNINGE, leader of the Democratic and Republican Alliance, as his vice president on May 28.

In mid-April 1998 the government announced the formation of the National Democracy Council (Conseil pour la Démocratie Nationale—CND), a consultative body comprising the former and current leaders of a broad spectrum of governmental and opposition groups, and charged it with assisting in the organization of presidential elections then tentatively scheduled for late 1998. In October the government announced that the first round of balloting would be held on December 6, with a second round, if necessary, on December 20. The Bongo administration rebuffed subsequent opposition requests for additional preparation time, and in early November the HCR and other leading opposition groups withdrew from the national electoral commission to protest what they described as a perfunctory revision of an already suspect voter registration list. Meanwhile, intraparty factionalization undermined the ability of prominent opposition groups to coalesce behind a competitive challenger to the incumbent.

On December 6, 1998, President Bongo won a seven-year term at polling that his opponents charged was tainted by “massive fraud.” Bongo’s 66.6 percent vote share dwarfed the returns of six other presidential aspirants, with his nearest competitors, the HCR’s Pierre MAMBOUNDOU and the RNB’s Paul Mba-Abessole, capturing 16.6 and 13.4 percent, respectively. On January 24, 1999, Bongo named Jean-François NTOUTOUME EMANE to succeed Obame-Nguema, who had resigned two days earlier, and on January 25 a new government was named.

The PDG retained its legislative stranglehold in assembly balloting in December 2001 (see Legislature, below). On January 27, 2002, President Bongo reappointed Prime Minister Ntoutoume Emame; notably, however, the new cabinet announced the same day included three members of the RNB (including Mba-Abessole) and the leader of another opposition grouping, the Social Democratic Party (Parti Social-Démocratique—PSD).

In local elections in 2002, the PDG achieved an overwhelming victory, albeit with voter participation estimated at less than 20 percent in some areas. In Senate elections held in 2003, the PDG won 60 of the chamber’s 91 seats, followed by the RPG, which took 8 seats.

On November 27, 2005, President Bongo won another seven-year term at balloting that was again challenged as fraudulent by his opponents. Bongo garnered 79 percent of the vote, easily defeating four challengers, most notably Pierre Mamboundou, whose affiliation was listed as the Union of Gabonese People (Union du Peuple Gabonais—UPG), 13.6 percent; and Zacharie MYBOTO, an independent affiliated with the newly formed Gabonese Union for Democracy and Development (Union Gabonaise de la Démocratie et du Développement—UGDD), 6.6 percent. Two other candidates each received less than 1 percent of the vote: Augustin Moussavou KING of the Gabonese Socialist Party (Parti Socialiste Gabonaise—PSG) and Christian-Serge MAROGA of the Rally of the Democrats (RDD). Turnout was recorded at 63.6 percent, with security forces voting on November 25 in a move decreed by Bongo to maintain order at civilian polling on November 27. Bongo was sworn in on January 19, 2006, retaining Vice President Divungui Di Ndinge and appointing a new prime minister, Jean Eyéghe Ndong, on January 20. A new government was installed on January 21.

Constitution and Government

Until 1991, when a qualified multiparty system was introduced, popular election was pro forma because of a requirement that all candidates be approved by the PDG. Constitutional amendments approved by the legislature on April 18, 1997, provided for a lengthening of the presidential term from five to seven years; in addition, the amended basic charter empowered the president to name both a vice president (appointees to the newly created post are not eligible to succeed the chief executive) and a prime minister, who must enjoy the confidence of the legislature. The head of the government is the prime minister, who is appointed by the president. The prime minister, in consultation with the president, appoints the Council of Ministers. In 2003 the National Assembly voted to revoke the constitutional limit on the number of terms to which the president may be reelected. This effectively guaranteed Bongo the presidency for life.

Members of the bicameral legislature, which comprises a Senate (created in March 1994 and filled in April 1997) and a National Assembly, are directly elected for five-year terms. There is an appointed Economic and Social Council, whose advice on relevant policy issues must be given legislative consideration. The judiciary includes a Supreme Court (divided into judicial, administrative, and accounting chambers) and Courts of Appeal, as well as a Constitutional Court and an extraordinary High Court of Justice to hear impeachment cases.

For administrative purposes Gabon is divided into 9 provinces and subdivided into 37 departments, all headed by presidentially appointed executives. Libreville and Port-Gentil are governed by elected mayors and Municipal Councils, while 4 smaller municipalities have partly elected and partly appointed administrations.

Foreign Relations

Following his accession to power in 1967, President Bongo sought to lessen the country's traditional dependence on France by cultivating more diversified international support. Regionally, Gabon withdrew in 1976 from membership in the Common African and Mauritian Organization, while diplomatic relations with Benin, broken in 1978 after Gabon's alleged involvement in a mercenary attack in Cotonou in 1977 and the expulsion in 1978 of 6,000 Beninese workers, were restored in February 1989. Relations with neighboring Equatorial Guinea suffered until the overthrow of the Macie regime in August 1979, by which time as many as 80,000 Equatorial Guinean refugees had fled to Gabon. Relations with Cameroon deteriorated in May 1981 with the expulsion of nearly 10,000 Cameroonians in the wake of violent demonstrations in Libreville and Port-Gentil. Subsequently, an overt campaign against immigrant workers further strained ties between Gabon and its neighbors. Libreville nonetheless continued to participate in the Economic Community of Central African States, hosting its third summit meeting in August 1987. During the same month, a presidential visit to the United States served to strengthen relations between the two countries, with Bongo pledging to protect American investments of more than $200 million and Washington agreeing to debt restructuring of some $8 million owed by Gabon for military purchases. Earlier, following a meeting with the Palestine Liberation Organization's Yasir Arafat in Tunisia, the regime reiterated its opposition to "apartheid, Zionism, and neocolonialism."

In 1988, despite President Bongo's stated intent, Gabon continued to be heavily dependent on French support, with annual aid hovering at $360 million. In February the government granted the European Economic Community fishing rights to Gabonese territorial waters; thereafter, cooperation agreements were negotiated with the Congo in June and Morocco in October. Meanwhile, the regime's battle with Libreville's large illegal population continued: in July 3,500 foreigners were arrested following Bongo's warning that tougher measures would be used to stop "clandestine immigration."

In late 1992, following two years of negotiations, Gabon and South Africa, which had long been trading partners, established full diplomatic relations. Meanwhile, Libreville's crackdown on illegal immigrants was underscored by the deportation of 7,000 Nigerians.

Angered at Paris's "silence" over French press reports critical of President Bongo, Libreville recalled its ambassador on April 21, 1995. However, relations were quickly restored as Paris reasserted its support for Bongo who, in turn, called for an end to anti-French demonstrations in Libreville.

In the late 1990s President Bongo returned to the role of regional mediator, assuming a prominent position in efforts to reduce tensions in the Republic of the Congo and Côte d'Ivoire. In November 1999 Libreville hosted a summit of the heads of state and foreign ministers of seven Gulf of Guinea nations (Angola, Cameroon, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Republic of the Congo, Equatorial Guinea, Nigeria, and Sao Tome and Principe) that yielded agreement to form a cooperative commission.

In 2003 relations with Equatorial Guinea became tense following Gabon's occupation of the uninhabited islands of Mbagne, Cocotiers, and Congas in the potentially oil-rich Corisco Bay, north of Libreville. Both countries agreed to negotiations under the auspices of the UN, with the aim of resolving the dispute by the end of 2006.

French support declined in 2005 along with Gabon's oil supply, leaving Bongo to look increasingly to China, which previously had agreed to import large quantities of Gabonese oil and had funded and built Gabon's parliamentary complex.

Current Issues

Decrying President Bongo's reelection on December 6, 1998, as an "electoral coup," the HCR's leader and presidential candidate, Pierre Mamboundou, called for an annulment of the balloting. Furthermore, in an increasingly tense Libreville, Mamboundou declared that his organization of a “dead city” operation would be only the first in a series of antigovernment protests aimed at forcing new elections. Unrest was reported in the capital in early 1999; however, observers described PDG infighting as a more immediate problem for the Bongo administration.

A number of opposition parties boycotted the first-round of assembly elections on December 3, 2001, accusing the administration of having “inflated” electoral rolls in favor of the PDG and its allies. The voting also was marred by sporadic violence and a repeat of the widespread irregularities that had been routinely noted in previous elections. Consequently, other opposition parties urged a boycott of the second-round on December 23, which was conducted peacefully thanks to heavy security measures but suffered from low turnout (as little as 20 percent in urban areas). The subsequent inclusion of the RNB and PSD in the new cabinet was billed by President Bongo as the inaugural of an “open government,” with observers noting that the PDG’s hegemony had become a significant concern for international donors.

Bongo is Africa’s longest-serving president. Although the Paris Accord of 1994 required him to share power with the opposition, he has managed to neutralize his opponents with cabinet positions and state largesse. Many nominal political opponents allegedly are financially supported by Bongo. While the president has a stronghold on the country, the people reportedly are happy not to have ethnic conflict. The 2005 presidential election, while free of violence, saw 9 of 13 candidates disqualified by the elections commission. Another candidate, Pastor Ernest TOMO, withdrew a month prior to balloting and threw his support to Bongo, to whom he is related through marriage. The only international monitors allowed during polling were “some avowedly pro-Bongo French senators,” according to Africa Confidential. Opponents’ claims of vote-rigging were dismissed by a constitutional court in January 2006. Large-scale looting was reported in Libreville in the months following the election, with the opposition claiming five people were killed. The government said one person had died.

In early 2006, Bongo’s name arose during the scandal involving U.S. lobbyist Jack Abramoff. It was alleged that Bongo paid $9 million in 2003 to several people, including Abramoff, to secure a meeting with U.S. President George W. Bush. Both Bongo and Bush denied any financial arrangement prior to their May 2004 meeting.

Political Parties

Officially declared a one-party state in March 1968, Gabon in practice had been under one-party government since the banning of the former opposition group, the Gabonese Democratic and Social Union (Union Démocratique et Sociale Gabonais—UDSG), in 1964. Twenty-six years later, in February 1990, President Bongo announced that the ruling Gabonese Democratic Party (PDG) would be dissolved in favor of a Gabonese Social Democratic Rally (Rassemblement Social-Démocrate Gabonais—RSDG), which would pave the way for a multiparty system. In early March he retreated somewhat by announcing that the PDG would continue as a unit within the RSDG. However, delegates to a national political conference in late April rejected the RSDG as a vehicle for phasing in pluralism over a three- to five-year period; Bongo responded by granting legal status (initially for one year) to all of the 13 opposition groups participating in the conference, 7 of which obtained parliamentary representation late in the year. In May 1991, 6 of the 7 parties announced a boycott of parliamentary proceedings and called for dissolution of the coalition government. Meanwhile, an effectively short-lived Coordination of Democratic Opposition (Coordination de l’Opposition Démocratique—COD) had been launched by 9 opposition groups, 3 of which merged in early 1992 to form the African Forum for Reconstruction (FAR).

On June 30, 1993, members of Gabon’s major opposition parties, meeting in the United States, agreed to form a Committee for Free and Democratic Elections dedicated to establishing a “democratic state.” Following presidential balloting on December 5, the committee was supplanted by the High Council of the Republic (Haut Conseil du Republic—HCR), which had been organized by Fr. Paul Mba-Abessole, leader of the National Rally of Woodcutters (RNB) and runner-up in the controversial elections, to function as an advisory body for his “administration.” The HCR, which reportedly included a majority of the opposition presidential candidates and parties, named Mba-Abessole and PGP leader Pierre-Louis AGONDJO-OKAWE president and vice president, respectively. On January 27, 1994, the HCR was restyled the High Council of Resistance (Haut Conseil de Résistance—HCR) and announced that it would no longer refer to Mba-Abessole as the president of the republic, although vowing to continue to resist the Bongo regime.

At an HCR meeting in December 1997 party delegates elected a new executive bureau headed by Pierre Mamboundou of the Union of Gabonese People (UPG). Furthermore, four HCR members (the FAR, the Movement for People’s Social Emancipation [MESPE], the RNB, and the UPG) signed a new cooperation accord on which they reportedly expected to base their 1998 presidential campaign. In May 1998 the HCR chose Mamboundou as its standard-bearer for the presidential elections due in December; however, in subsequent months the viability of the movement was cast in doubt by reports that it had been reduced to only four or five parties, including the RNB, which had decided to field its own presidential candidate. In November the HCR withdrew from the national electoral commission, declaring that the commission’s “hasty” revision of the electoral list had set the stage for “massive fraud” at the presidential balloting.

Of Gabon’s 35 registered political parties, 29 belong to the presidential majority in what Bongo euphemistically calls “convivial democracy.” Bongo and his family have a strong grip on the military, and he enjoys the support of the French.

Government and Government-Supportive Parties

Gabonese Democratic Party (Parti Démocratique Gabonais—PDG). Officially established by President Bongo in 1968, the PDG succeeded the earlier Gabon Democratic Bloc (Bloc Démocratique Gabonais—BDG) of President Mba. The PDG’s most powerful body is its Political Bureau, although the party congress is technically the highest organ. There also is an advisory Central Committee, which oversees a variety of lesser bodies. In September 1986 the Third PDG Congress expanded the Central Committee from 253 to 297 members and the Political Bureau from 27 to 44 members to give “young militants” more access to leadership roles. In 1988 party membership was approximately 300,000. On May 17, 1990, amid increasing political turmoil and criticism of the regime’s reform efforts, Bongo resigned as party chair, citing a desire to serve above “partisan pre-occupations.”

In early 1993 (then) National Assembly President Jules BOURDES-OGOULIGUENDE joined Alexandre Sambat in resigning from the PDG to run as an independent presidential candidate. On October 19 President Bongo officially declared his candidacy for reelection, and on November 4 the PDG organized a “New Alliance for Democracy and Change” electoral pact that included the Association for Socialism in Gabon (Association pour le Socialisme au Gabon—APSG) and the People’s Unity Party (Parti de l’Unité du Peuple—PUP), led by Louis-Gaston MAYILA, both of which had gained legislative representation in 1990, as well as the previously FAR-affiliated Gabonese Socialist Union (Union Socialiste Gabonais—USG). The PUP won 1 seat in the assembly balloting of 2001.

Leaders: Jacques ADIAHENOT, Ali Ben BONGO, Simplicie Guedet MANZELA (Secretary General).

Rally for Democracy and Progress (Rassemblement pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—RPG). The RPG controlled a single seat in the Senate as of mid-2001.

Leader: Pierre EMBONI.

Democratic and Republican Alliance (Alliance Démocratique et Républicaine—ADERE). At balloting in 1996 and early 1997 the ADERE won a number of town council and Senate seats after reportedly forming alliances with local PDG chapters. Furthermore, in May 1997 President Bongo named a senior ADERE leader, Didjob Divungui Di Ndinge, vice president of the republic.

Leader: Didjob DIVUNGUI DINDINGE (Vice President of the Republic).

Movement of Friends of Bongo (Movement des Amis de Bongo—MAB). A self-described “apolitical grouping” founded by President Bongo’s associates in November 1994, the MAB is not a “PDG offshoot” according to its leaders, who claimed that the group was launched to combat “tribalism, nepotism, disinformation, incrimination, and all forms of corruption.” Party leader Georges RAWIRI, who was president of the Senate, died in 2006.

National Union of Blacksmiths. This group was formed in early 1999 by Thierry A’Agendieu KOMBILA, who had been vice president of the pro-Bongo Union for Development and Liberty (Union pour le Développement et la Liberté—UDL) until it disintegrated in December 1998.

National Rally of Woodcutters/Rally for Gabon (Rassemblement National des Bouchers/Rassemblement pour le Gabon—RNB/RPG). Formerly the National Rectification Movement—Woodcutters (Mouvement de Redressement National—Bouchers/Morena—Bouchers), the party adopted the RNB rubric in February 1991 in an effort to more clearly distinguish itself from its parent.

A southern grouping whose claimed membership of over 3,000 (mostly from the Fang ethnic group) supported nonviolent change, the Woodcutters on June 22–24, 1990, mounted the first opposition congress since the multiparty system was legalized. At the 1990–1991 legislative balloting the group became the leading opposition party, securing more than twice as many seats as Morena-Originels. Despite its success, the formation accused the government of electoral fraud and intimated that it would refuse to participate in assembly proceedings. In 1991 the Woodcutters joined an opposition call for dissolution of the National Assembly and the mounting of internationally supervised elections.

In mid-1992 West Africa reported that strained relations between the RNB and the Gabonese Progress Party (PGP, below) threatened the COD coalition. The enmity reportedly stemmed from the PGP’s charge that the RNB’s boycott of the later rounds of the 1990 election caused the opposition’s defeat, as well as PGP bitterness at the RNB’s failure to consult other parties prior to calling a general strike in February 1992. Meanwhile, Fr. Paul Mba-Abessole, the RNB’s leader, labeled PGP President Pierre-Louis Agondjo-Okawe a “dangerous Marxist.” (Mba-Abessole, who was dismissed by Morena in 1990, returned to Libreville that year at Bongo’s invitation, after 13 years in exile.)

In June 1993 the party’s secretary general, Pierre-André Kombila Koumba, was named chair of the opposition Committee for Free and Democratic Elections. Five months later, during the run-up to presidential balloting, the Woodcutters and the National Convention for Change (Convention Nationale pour le Change—CNC) issued a joint statement accusing the Bongo regime of electoral fraud.

In February 1994 RNB members and the party’s radio station, Radio Liberté, were attacked by government forces deployed to quell antigovernment unrest in Libreville, with RNB leaders subsequently claiming that a number of its members had been detained. The attack on the RNB facilities coincided with the launching of a union-led general strike, which the RNB had publicly supported. Thereafter, the RNB was the most prominent of the opposition parties opposed to any cooperation with the Bongo regime.

At local balloting in October–November 1996, the RNB reportedly secured 62 of 98 contested posts; however, the party fared poorly at subsequent assembly balloting, falling 8 seats short of its 1990 totals. On January 19, 1997, the RNB-dominated Libreville municipal council elected Mba-Abessole as mayor.

In January 1998 the RNB newspaper, Le Bouchers, was suspended by the government for two separate three-month periods for publishing articles “insulting” to the president. In addition, Kombila Koumba, the paper’s editor, was fined and given a suspended sentence. In June Mba-Abessole announced that Kombila Koumba had been removed from his party post because of alleged “indiscipline”; however, Kombila Koumba rejected Mba-Abessole’s authority to oust him and, at a mid-July congress of his supporters, Kombila Koumba was pronounced RNB president. Subsequently, both Mba-Abessole and Kombila Koumba announced their intention to campaign for the presidency under the splintered RNB banner. Furthermore, in October the Constitutional Court approved the campaign application of another RNB stalwart, Alain ENGOUNG-NZE, thus leaving the party with three presidential contenders. At balloting in December Mba-Abessole finished a distant third with 13 percent of the vote while Kombila Koumba and Engoung-Nze finished near the bottom of the seven-candidate field.

In October 2000 the party reportedly adopted a new name (the Rally for Gabon [RPG]), but subsequent news stories referenced the grouping as the RNB/RPG. Several months earlier, the RNB also had reportedly announced the formation of a Front of Parties for Change (Front des Parties pour le Changement—FPC) with three smaller parties—the Congress for Democracy and Justice, the Rally of Republican Democrats, and the Republican Union for Democracy and Progress.

Following the December 2001 legislative balloting, Mba-Abessole, who had recently adopted a stance favoring “convivial democracy,” accepted an invitation from President Bongo for the RNB/RPG to participate in an “opening up” of the government, although some party members remained hostile to the initiative. Mba-Abessole and two other RNB/RPG members were included in the new cabinet installed in January 2002. Mba-Abessole, a deputy prime minister, supported Bongo in the 2005 presidential election, although a year earlier he had accused the government of being the leading violator of human rights in the country.

Leaders: Fr. Paul MBA-ABESSOLE (1993 and 1998 presidential candidate and Mayor of Libreville), Pierre-André KOMBILA Koumba (leader of dissident faction and 1998 presidential candidate), Vincent Moulengui BOUKOSSO.

Social Democratic Party (Parti Social-Démocrate—PSD). The PSD became a member of the COD following its formation in 1991. During its first congress in Libreville, on April 21, 1992, party president Pierre Claver Maganga-Moussavou was chosen as its 1993 standard-bearer, but he secured a vote share of under 4 percent.

In October 1996 Maganga-Moussavou was ousted from the Obame-Nguema cabinet after he led a vociferous protest against the government’s rescheduling of elections. Subsequently, the party reportedly dismissed another PSD leader, Saturel Ngoma MANDOUNGOU, when he assumed Maganga-Moussavou’s vacant post.

In November 1998 the PSD withdrew from the national electoral commission to protest its administration of the voter registration lists. Subsequently, at polling in December, Maganga-Moussavou once again secured less than 4 percent of the vote. The PSD leader joined the PDG-led cabinet of January 2002 as the minister of state for agriculture, livestock, and rural development. In June 2004 the group joined the parties making up the ruling coalition, and Maganga-Moussavou was named to the cabinet in September 2004.

Leader: Pierre-Claver MAGANGA-MOUSSAVOU (President of the Party and 1993 and 1998 presidential candidate).

Gabonese Party of Independent Centrists (PGCI). The PGCI is led by Jean-Pierre Lemboumba, one of President Bongo’s closest advisers.

Leader: Jean-Pierre LEMBOUMBA, Jérôme OKINDA.

Other Parties and Groups

Gabonese Union for Democracy and Development (Union Gabonaise de la Démocratie et du Développement—UGDD). Formed in France on April 30, 2005, by Zacharie Myboto, the party had not been legalized by the November presidential election, forcing Myboto to run as an independent. A defector from the PDG, he formerly was a minister of public works and an administrative secretary of the party. In September 2005 President Bongo said he would seize his opponents' passports to prevent them from "insulting" him abroad. However, observers commented that Bongo wouldn't arrest Myboto, who is popular in Gabon, for fear of "annoying" international donors.

Leader: Zacharie MYBOTO (2005 presidential candidate).

African Forum for Reconstruction (Forum Africain pour la Réconstruction—FAR). Also referred to as the Action Forum for Renewal (Forum d'Action pour le Renouveau), FAR was launched in early 1992 by merger of the National Rectification Movement—Originals (Mouvement de Redressement National—Morena-Originels), which had secured 7 legislative seats in 1990–1991, and two smaller formations, the Gabonese Socialist Union (Union Socialiste Gabonais—USG), which had secured 3 seats, and the extralegislativ Gabonese Socialist Party (Parti Socialiste Gabonais—PSG). The party's platform advocates the establishment of a "state of law and social justice" and a market economy, tempered by the "interests of the State."

Organized in 1981, Morena operated clandestinely within Gabon for the ensuing nine years, during which time, with support from the French Socialist Party, it formed a self-proclaimed government-in-exile in Paris. In 1981–1982 its domestic leaders were repeatedly arrested for distributing leaflets calling for a multiparty system. Many were sentenced to long prison terms, but by 1986 all had been released under a general amnesty that had been urged by French President Mitterrand. By early 1990 the party had given rise to a number of dissident factions, the most important of which was Morena—Bucherons, above, as distinguished from the essentially northern, ethnic Fang parent group led by Noël Ngwa-Nguema. At a Morena party congress on August 30, 1991, Executive Secretary Jean-Pierre Zongue-Nguema called for a revival of the COD and denounced the "duplicity" of opposition colleagues who had joined the Bongo government.

At presidential balloting in December 1993, party leader León Mbou-Yembi captured a bare 1.83 percent of the vote while Adrien NGUEMA Ondo, running under the National Rectification Movement—Unionist (Mouvement de Redressement National—Morena-Unioniste) banner, secured less than 1 percent.

In August 1998 the Forum's Morena wing reportedly split into two camps, which subsequently held separate congresses in Libreville and Lambaré under the leadership of Jean Clement BOUTAMBA and Felix Martin Ze MEMINI, respectively.

In the 2005 presidential election, Augustin Moussavou King ran as a candidate affiliated with the PSG, coming in a distant fourth.

Leaders: León MBOU-YEMBIT, Pierre ZONGUE-NGUEMA (COD Chair and Former Morena-Originel Leader), Noël NGWA-NGUEMA (Former Morena-Originel Executive Secretary), Vincent ESSOLOMONGEU (Secretary General).

Gabonese Progress Party (Parti Gabonais du Progrès—PGP). The president of the recently organized PGP, Pierre-Louis Agondjo-Okawe, called in April 1990 for dissolution of the transitional government on the grounds that it was inadequately representative of the Gabonese people. In May the death of party secretary general Joseph Rendjambe was a catalyst for renewed unrest throughout the country. Second runner-up in the 1990 legislative poll, the PGP is composed primarily of members of the Myéné ethnic group.

In July 1998 the party announced that Benoit Mouity-Nzamba would be its standard-bearer at presidential balloting in December; however, there were no further reports regarding his candidacy.

In February 2000 the PGP reportedly accused the government of "organizing electoral fraud" and called on the president to convene talks on electoral and "institutional" reforms. The party won three seats in the 2001 assembly elections. Party leader Agondjo-Okawe died on August 27, 2005.

Leaders: Anselme NZOGHE (Secretary General), Benoit MOUITY-NZAMBA.

Union of the Gabonese People (Union du Peuple Gabonais—UPG). In July 1989 the UPG, which is supported largely by the southern Bapounou ethnic group, was reported to have circulated leaflets critical of President Bongo in Paris; the following October, three of its members were arrested in Gabon for alleged involvement in a coup plot. In February 1990 party founder Pierre Mamboundou was expelled from France to Senegal, despite his denial of complicity in the attempted coup.

On July 14, 1992, UPG activists demonstrated in Libreville, calling for Mamboundou's amnesty. On November 2, 1993, the UPG leader was allowed to return from Senegal; however, his bid to stand as a presidential candidate in the December elections was rejected. Subsequently, on November 8–9 UPG demonstrators rioted in Libreville in a futile attempt to force the government to overturn the ban.

Mamboundou's preeminent role within the UPG was diminished on September 25, 1995, when party members elected his former coleader and recent nemesis, Sebastien Mamboundou MOUYAMA, chair. In August 1996 it was reported that Mouyama had launched a new political party called the Alternative Movement (Mouvement Alternatif—MA). However, Mamboundou ran as the UPG and HCR's presidential candidate in 1998, and he was routinely referenced as the UPG leader in the 2001 legislative campaign, calling for a boycott of the second round of balloting in view of what he termed the "indescribable disorder" of the first round. The legal status of the new group and its relationship with the UPG was not immediately clear.

Leaders: Pierre MAMBOUNDOU (2005 presidential candidate), David BADINGA.

Rally of the Democrats (RDD). Founded in 1993 by Christian-Serge Maroga, who defected from UPG, the party was legalized in 1997.

Leader: Christian-Serge MAROGA (2005 presidential candidate).

Alliance of Republicans for Development. (Alliance des Républicains pour le Développement—ARD). The formation of the ARD was announced in January 2001 under the leadership of the former mayor of Port-Gentil, who had reportedly been recently expelled from the PGP.

Leader: Marie-Augustine Houangni AMBOUROUE.

Circle of Liberal Reformers (Cercle des Libéraux Réformateurs—CLR). The CLR was formed in late 1992 by former minister of security Jean-Boniface Assele, the brother of President Bongo's former wife, who was expelled from the PDG along with two other founders of the new group. The party won representation in the assembly in 2001.

Leader: Jean-Boniface ASSELE.

Rally of Gauls (Rassemblement des Gaulois—RG). The RG was founded in February 1994 by a former Morena leader, Max-Anicet Koumba-Mbadinga, who had returned from exile in France. The Gauls, whose name is traceable to its founder's belief that Gabon's "history does not begin with Gabon, but with our Gallic origins," forwarded a platform advocating a return to "pre-independence origins" with an emphasis on close ties to France. The RG also called for a renaming of the country, arguing that "Gabon" is derived from the name of a Portuguese wine.

In January 1998 the RG gained legal recognition (three years after it first applied).

Leader: Max-Anicet KOU MBA-MBADINGA.

Independent Republicans' Party (Parti Des Républicains Indépendants—PRI). The PRI was launched in early 1995 by Anaclet Bissielo, who castigated fellow opposition leaders for their "repeated failures" in opposing the Bongo regime.

Leader: Anaclet BISSIELO.

Democratic and Social Union (Union Démocratique et Sociale—UDS). In April 1996 the newly legalized UDS organized a debate that focused on the June 1995 referendum and the proposed upcoming elections. The UDS argued that, contrary to the dictates of the 1994 Paris Accords, "nothing had been done" to prepare for the balloting.

Leader: Herve ASSAMANET.

Minor parties include the Circle for Renovation and Progress (Cercle pour le Renouveau et le Progrès—CRP); the Congress for Democracy and Justice (Congrès pour la Démocratie et la Justice—CDJ), which won a seat in the 2001 assembly elections, led by Jules Bourdes-Ogouliguende and Marc Saturnin Nan NGUEMA, a Fang who was formerly a secretary-general of OPEC and arrested in December 2004 on trumped-up weapons charges; the Federation of Gabonese Ecologists (Fédération des Ecologistes Gabonaises—FEG), an environmental group led by Alain DICKSON that has been highly critical of the dearth of environmentalists in the government; Gabon of the Future (Gabon Avenir), which was launched in 1999 under the leadership of Sylvestre OYOUOMI; the Mebiame Group (Groupe Mébiame—GM); the Movement for People's Social Emancipation (Mouvement pour l'Emancipation Sociale du Peuple—MESP); the National Front (Front National—FN), led by Martin EFAYONG; Renaissance of the Gabonese Democratic Bloc, led by Antoine Meyo MENDOUTOUME; the Union for Democracy and Social Integration, led by Nzebi Herve Patrick OPIANGAH, who was jailed in early 2005 after participating in a demonstration demanding legalization of the party the African movement of Development (MAD) and the National Rally of Woodcutters–Kombila (RNB-kombila), both of which won 1 seat in the 2001 assembly balloting.

In early 2006 it was reported that a group calling itself Bongo Must Go (Bongo Doit Partir—BDP), based in the United States, had joined with a group called Mamba, which claimed to have carried out “sabotage” attacks in Libreville in December 2005. The leaders of the BDP were Daniel MENGARA, a Fang, and Serge BESAC.

Legislature

In March 1994 the (then) unicameral National Assembly adopted a draft constitutional reform bill that provided for a Senate, or upper legislative house. Elections to fill the body were held for the first time in January–February 1997 (see below).

Senate (Sénat). Created by a constitutional amendment in 1994, the Senate is a 91-member body elected for a six-year term by members of municipal councils and departmental assemblies. First-ever balloting to fill the body was held on January 26 and February 9, 1997. After the most recent elections on February 9, 2003, the seats were distributed as follows: the Gabonese Democratic Party, 60; the National Rally of Woodcutters, 8; the Gabonese Progress Party, 4; the Democratic and Republican Alliance, 3; the Rally for Democracy and Progress and the Circle of Liberal Reformers, 1 each; and independents and others, 14.

President: René RADEMBINO-CONIQUET.

National Assembly (Assemblée Nationale). The sole legislative organ prior to 1997, the National Assembly is a 120-seat body whose members are elected for five-year terms. Following the most recent balloting on December 9 and 23, 2001, the allocation of seats was as follows: the Gabonese Democratic Party, 88; the National Rally of Woodcutters/Rally for Gabon, 8; the Democratic and Republican Alliance, 3; the Gabonese Progress Party, 3; the Circle of Liberal Reformers, 2; the Congress for Democracy and Justice, 1; African Movement of Development, 1; the Social Democratic Party, 1; the People's Unity Party, 1; the National Rally of Woodcutters/Kombila, 1; independents, 12; and 1 vacant seat. The election in one department was postponed until May 26, 2002, but the results were unknown.

President: Guy NDZOUBA-NDAMA.

Communications

Most news media are owned and operated by the government. In late 1999 four private radio and television stations were suspended by the National Council of Communication for broadcasting illegally.

GAMBIA

REPUBLIC OF THE GAMBIA

---

Note: In presidential balloting of September 22, 2006, President Yahya Jammeh (Alliance for Patriotic Reorientation and Construction) was reelected for another five-year term with 67.3 percent of the vote, defeating Ousainu Darboe (United Democratic Party), who received 26.7 percent, and Halifah Sallah (People's Democratic Organization for Independence and Socialism), who received nearly 6 percent.

The Country

Situated on the bulge of West Africa and surrounded on three sides by Senegal, Gambia is a narrow strip of territory (varying from 6 to 10 miles wide) that borders the Gambia River to a point about 200 miles from the Atlantic. The population is overwhelmingly African, the main ethnic groups being Mandingo (40 percent), Fula (13 percent), Wolof (12 percent), and Jola and Serahuli (7 percent each); in addition, there are small groups of Europeans, Lebanese, Syrians, and Mauritians. Tribal languages are widely spoken, although English is the official and commercial language. Islam is the religion of 80 percent of the people.

The economy has traditionally been based on peanuts, which are cultivated on almost all suitable land and which, including derivatives, typically account for upward of 80 percent of export earnings. Industry is largely limited to peanut-oil refining and handicrafts; unofficially, smuggling into Senegal has long been important. In the early 1990s the government implemented an economic recovery program sponsored by the International Monetary Fund (IMF), which emphasized agricultural development, reductions in external borrowing, promotion of the private sector, and government austerity; those measures were credited with stimulating an improvement in GDP and a decline in inflation. Nonetheless, a slump in the agriculture sector yielded virtually no real economic growth in 1993–1994. Western aid was severely curtailed following the military coup of 1994, the Jammeh regime turning to new donors such as Libya and Taiwan to finance an ambitious infrastructure program. Thereafter, the government adopted another IMF-prescribed structural adjustment program with an emphasis on economic and financial reform. Such efforts were rewarded in 1998 with a real GDP growth rate of over 5 percent and single-digit inflation (3.8 percent according to the IMF). Meanwhile, the fund urged the government to continue to increase its support for the private sector. In early 2000 Banjul called on the international Political Status: Became independent member of the Commonwealth on February 18, 1965; republican regime instituted April 24, 1970; Gambian-Senegalese Confederation of Senegambia, formed with effect from February 1, 1982, dissolved as of September 30, 1989; most recent constitution approved by national referendum on August 8, 1996.

Area: 4,361 sq. mi. (11,295 sq. km.).

Population: 1,364,507 (2003C); 1,442,000 (2005E).

Major Urban Center (2005E): BANJUL (metropolitan area, 568,000).

Official Language: English.

Monetary Unit: Dalasi (market rate July 1, 2006: 28.00 dalasis = $1US).

President: (See headnote.) Yahya JAMMEH (Alliance for Patriotic Reorientation and Construction); installed as chair of the Armed Forces Provisional Ruling Council following military coup that overthrew the government of Alhaji Sir Dawda Kairaba JAWARA Sanyang (People's Progressive Party) on July 22, 1994; elected to a five-year presidential term on September 26, 1996; reelected on October 18, 2001, and sworn in for a second five-year term on December 21.

Vice President: Aisatou NJIE-SAIDY (Alliance for Patriotic Reorientation and Construction); appointed by the president on March 21, 1997, to fill previously vacant post; reappointed December 21, 2001.

investment community to assist African countries in their privatization efforts, asserting that state assets were being treated as “scrap” and sold off at extremely low prices.

Gambia experienced a severe economic downturn in 2002, partly due to a collapse in the peanut harvest. As a result, GDP declined by 3.2 percent, inflation rose to 13 percent, and the government's deficit ballooned to 8.1 percent of GDP. In addition, the currency lost 60 percent of its value against the euro and 45 percent of its value against the dollar. Meanwhile, unemployment approached 50 percent. Adding to the crisis was the rise in world oil prices and one of the world's fastest growing populations. In response to these economic shocks, the government created the National Emergency Fiscal Committee and implemented programs designed to spur growth. Real GDP growth declined to 5 percent in 2004 (from 7 percent the previous year), but on a more positive note, inflation plummeted 10 percent to single digits by early 2005, and fund managers were encouraged by the country's efforts to initiate reforms promoting transparency. However, economic recovery was jeopardized by the “near-disastrous effect” of a quasi-public entity charged with marketing and processing peanuts, according to the IMF. The company reportedly was unable to raise the money needed to buy what was to have been a bumper crop of nuts, which the IMF estimated would result in a substantial loss in exports.

Another setback to economic stability occurred in January 2006 when the president spontaneously announced a 10 percent salary increase for all government workers, an expenditure that was not accounted for in the recently approved budget.

Political Background

Under British influence since 1588, Gambia was not definitively established as a separate colony until 1888. It acquired the typical features of British colonial rule, achieved internal self-government in 1963, and became fully independent within the Commonwealth on February 18, 1965. Initially a parliamentary regime (with the British monarch serving as head of state), Gambia changed to a republican form of government following a referendum in 1970.

For nearly three decades after independence leadership was exercised by the People's Progressive Party (PPP), headed by President Dawda K. JAWARA, although opposition candidates secured approximately 30 percent of the popular vote in the elections of 1972, 1977, and 1982. At the May 1979 PPP Congress—the first in 16 years—President Jawara rebuffed demands by some delegates that a one-party system be instituted, commenting that such a change could occur only through the ballot box. However, on November 1, 1980, amid allegations of a widespread antigovernment conspiracy, two opposition movements described by the president as "terrorist organizations" were banned, despite protests from the legal opposition parties.

A more serious threat to the Jawara regime developed in July 1981 when the capital was taken over by elements of Gambia's paramilitary Field Force and the Socialist and Revolutionary Labor Party, a Marxist-Leninist group led by Kukoi Samba SANYANG. The uprising was quelled with the aid of Senegalese troops dispatched under the terms of a 1965 mutual defense and security treaty. Subsequently, President Jawara and Senegalese President Diouf announced plans for a partial merger of their respective states in the form of a Senegambian Confederation, which came into effect on February 1, 1982.

The confederation, which critics branded as the equivalent of annexation by Senegal, was a major issue in the May 1982 presidential election, the first to be conducted by direct vote. However, with the government branding several members of the demonstrably divided opposition as participants in the 1981 coup attempt, Jawara secured a 73 percent majority. The president subsequently appeared to defuse the confederation issue by resisting immediate monetary union with Senegal, a proposal viewed with skepticism by many Gambians.

While President Jawara was returned to office at the general election of March 11, 1987, with a reduced majority of 59 percent, the PPP increased its representation in the 36-member House of Representatives from 28 to 31, most observers attributing the latter success to an economic upturn. Subsequently, amid widespread concern about Gambia becoming "Senegal's eleventh region," the administration evinced little interest in pursuing genuine Senegambian integration, and the confederation was dissolved with the consent of both countries as of September 30, 1989.

After declaring his intention to retire at a PPP congress in December 1991, Jawara reversed himself and stood for a fifth consecutive five-year term in April 1992, reportedly to avoid further electoral slippage that might result in defeat for the ruling party. The outcome was a marginal decline of 5 elected House seats on a vote share virtually identical to that of 1985.

The Jawara government was overthrown on July 22, 1994, in a bloodless coup by junior army officers, who installed Lt. Yahya JAMMEH as chair of a five-member Armed Forces Provisional Ruling Council (AFPRC). Three days later the council named a 15-member government composed almost equally of military and civilian members. Antagonism toward the Jammeh government subsequently emerged from several quarters. In mid-August tension between the AFPRC and older military officials, who complained of being shunted aside, was underscored by the arrest of two high-ranking officers. Collaterally, friction continued between the AFPRC and members of Jawara's former government. Finally, on October 10, the European Union (EU) and the United Kingdom suspended economic and military assistance following Jammeh's dismissal of Finance Minister Bakary Bunja DARBO, the sole holdover from the previous administration.

In an attempt to mollify his critics, Jammeh in late 1994 announced a four-year transitional timetable that included plans for the drafting of a new constitution, an investigation into government corruption, a crackdown on crime, and a presidential election in November 1998. However, the four-year time frame drew widespread criticism, and in early February 1995 the AFPRC reduced it to two. Meanwhile, as the result of alleged participation in a coup attempt on January 27, two close associates of Jammeh on the AFPRC, Vice Chair Sana SABALLY and Interior Minister Sadibu HYDARA, were arrested and replaced by Capt. Edward SINGHATEY and Capt. Lamin BAJO, respectively. (In late December it was reported that Sabally had been given a nine-year sentence and that Hydara had died in prison.)

On April 10, 1995, the regime named a constitutional commission and charged it with drafting a document that would provide a legal framework for the holding of multiparty elections. However, in October the defection of AFPRC spokesman Capt. Ebou JALLOW, amid charges that he had attempted to overthrow the regime, underscored the internal turmoil that had plagued the AFPRC and Jammeh's cabinet throughout 1995.

The draft constitution was released by the AFPRC in March 1996 and approved (according to government figures) by 70.4 percent of the voters in a national referendum on August 8, 1996, despite opposition charges that the new basic law had been carefully written to ensure that the Jammeh regime would continue in power. Jammeh subsequently announced that presidential elections would be held in September (months earlier than anticipated), with national legislative balloting to follow before the end of the year.

In voting on September 26, 1996, Jammeh was elected to a five-year presidential term as the candidate of the newly formed Alliance for Patriotic Reorientation and Construction (APRC). Official results credited him with 55.76 percent of the votes, his closest pursuer among the three other candidates being Ousainu DARBOE of the United Democratic Party (UDP) with 35.34 percent.

On November 8, 1996, the government announced that legislative elections, due on December 11, would be postponed until January 1997. The decision came after weeks of UDP-orchestrated antigovernment demonstrations. Subsequently, at balloting on January 2, 1997, President Jammeh's APRC captured 33 of the 45 contested seats (the president is empowered to name 4 additional legislators), giving the party the two-thirds majority necessary to pass legislation and make constitutional changes unimpeded. With 7 seats, Darboe's UDP finished a distant second.

Rebuffed in his attempt to name Edward Singhatey as vice president (the 27-year-old Singhatey failed a constitutional requirement that the deputy chief executive be at least 30 years old), Jammeh appointed a new 13-member cabinet on March 7, 1997, which did not include a vice president but placed Singhatey in the powerful post of minister to the president. However, following opposition criticism that the constitution mandated the appointment of a vice president, the president named Aisatou NJIE-SAIDY (his minister of health, social welfare, and women's affairs) to the post on March 21. Njie-Saidy thereby became the first female vice president in western Africa. The transformation from military to civilian rule was completed on April 17 when Jammeh replaced the last four military governors with civilians.

President Jammeh was reelected to a second term with 53 percent of the vote on October 18, 2001, the UDP's Darboe again proven to be his nearest competitor among four opposition candidates. The APRC dominated the January 2002 assembly balloting in light of a boycott by the major opposition grouping and subsequently dominated local and regional elections in April because of the continuing boycott (see Current issues, below).

In assembly by-elections on September 29, 2005, to replace 4 ousted members, 3 seats went to a newly formed opposition coalition, the National Alliance for Democracy and Development (NADD), and 1 seat was secured by the APRC (see Political Parties, below). A new assembly speaker, Belinda BIDWELL, was sworn in on April 19, 2006, to replace Sherif Mustapha DIBBA, who was arrested in connection with a March 21 coup attempt.

Constitution and Government

During the 12 years following adoption of a republican constitution in 1970, Gambia was led by a president who was indirectly elected by the legislature for a five-year term and was assisted by a vice president of his choice. The procedure was changed in 1982 to one involving direct election of the chief executive, who retained the authority to designate his deputy. Prior to the 1994 coup, the unicameral House of Representatives contained 50 members, of whom 36 were directly elected for five-year terms (save for presidential dissolution following a vote of nonconfidence); 5 seats were held by chiefs elected by the Assembly of Chiefs, while the remainder were held by 8 non-voting nominated members and the attorney general. Subsequently, the 1996 constitution provided for a directly elected president with broad powers (including the authority to appoint the cabinet) and a National Assembly of elected legislators and presidential appointees. The assembly may order the resignation of the head of state or cabinet ministers by a two-thirds vote. The judicial system is headed by a Supreme Court and includes a Court of Appeal, magistrates' courts, customary tribunals, and Muslim courts.

At the local level the country is divided into districts administered by chiefs in association with village headmen and advisers. The districts are grouped into seven regions, which are governed by centrally appointed commissioners and area councils thus far containing a majority of elected members, with district chiefs serving ex officio. Banjul has heretofore been provided with an elected City Council.

Foreign Relations

While adhering to a formal policy of nonalignment, Gambia has long maintained close relations with the United Kingdom, its principal aid donor, and the African Commonwealth states. By far the most important foreign policy question, however, has turned on relations with Senegal. In 1967 the two countries signed a treaty of association providing for a joint ministerial committee and secretariat, while other agreements provided for cooperation in such areas as defense, foreign affairs, and development of the Gambia River basin. In early 1976 a number of new accords were concluded that, coupled with the need for Senegalese military assistance in 1980 and 1981, paved the way for establishment of the Confederation of Senegambia in February 1982. However, few of its goals had been seriously addressed at the time of the confederation's dissolution in 1989.

Relations deteriorated in the wake of the breakup with Senegal in 1989, with Banjul accusing Dakar of economic harassment (largely in connection with Senegalese attempts to limit the clandestine flow of reexport goods). However, a meeting between Presidents Jawara and Diouf in December 1989 proved beneficial, the Jawara administration reportedly attempting to stabilize relations so as not to jeopardize Gambia's recent economic improvement. Ties were further strengthened by the conclusion of a treaty of friendship and cooperation on January 8, 1991, that provided for annual political summits and the establishment of joint commissions to help implement summit agreements.

In September 1993 Senegal closed its borders with Gambia, voicing renewed frustration with illegal commerce. In November the two countries agreed to the establishment of a technical committee charged with creating a mechanism to alleviate the problem, which had plagued the former confederates since their 1989 split.

Regional relations were at the forefront of Gambia's foreign policy agenda in late 1999 and early 2000. In December 1999 President Jammeh played a leading role in facilitating the signing of a cease-fire pact by the Senegalese government and Casamance rebels, and in April 2000 Gambia and four other west African nations agreed to share a common currency by the end of 2002. However, the deadline was later advanced to the end of 2009. (The other prospective participants are Ghana, Guinea, Nigeria, and Sierra Leone.) Gambia also participated in the regional peacekeeping mission in Liberia by contributing 150 troops. These forces subsequently became part of the UN mission in Liberia.

In November 2000 a Commonwealth Ministerial Action Group visited Gambia, signaling a relative easing of relations that had reportedly been lukewarm since 1995, although Gambia continued to be criticized for its human rights record.

Relations between Gambia and Senegal remained tense in the early 2000s amid repeated claims that the Jammeh government provided aid to anti-government forces in Senegal. Subsequently, a 100 percent increase in duties on vehicles traveling through Gambia and a doubling of the cost of ferries between northern and southern Senegal temporarily led to the closing of the border between the two countries. Negotiations brokered by a Nigerian mediator in late 2005 led to "substantial progress" toward a resolution, with Senegal reportedly agreeing to remove its border blockade.

Current Issues

In September 1999 the Gambian Daily Observer reported that an assassination attempt had targeted President Jammeh, who had recently moved his government to his hometown (ostensibly because of renovation work being performed in Banjul). The government dismissed the story, and an Observer editor and reporter were arrested. However, following reports of violent clashes between rival groups of presidential guardsmen in Banjul in January 2000, Jammeh claimed that forces loyal to him had killed one guardsman and wounded a second who were facing arrest for allegedly plotting a coup. (Among the alleged targets of the dissidents were Jammeh and his government as well as all army officers above the rank of lieutenant.) In April the already tense capital was rocked by antigovernment demonstrations and rioting that erupted after security forces killed a student. At least 12 people died during the unrest. A commission of inquiry subsequently resulted in amnesties for both security forces involved in the shootings and the leaders of student groups.

The 2001 presidential campaign was marred by several violent incidents, but the balloting proceeded smoothly. Although international observers generally accepted the poll as free and fair, albeit with several significant criticisms, the UDP accused the government of electoral fraud. In late December the UDP and several of its coalition partners announced they would boycott the legislative election scheduled for January 17, 2002, on the grounds that the electoral commission was favoring the Jammeh administration by, among other things, permitting cross-district voting. The major opposition parties also boycotted the municipal and regional elections of April 2002, thereby again ensuring APRC dominance, as the APRC won 99 of 113 constituencies. Four assembly members were expelled in mid-2005 following their launch of the opposition coalition NADD. (The constitution states that elected representatives lose their seats if they change to a party other than the one they were affiliated with when elected.)

The administration continued to draw strong criticism for its repressive measures against the media, with one international group of journalists adding Jammeh to its list of “press freedom predators” in 2006. A former army chief was arrested after a coup attempt in March 2006, and one month later, thousands staged a pro-democracy, anti-coup demonstration. For his part, Jammeh warned the protesters against “external aggression” in matters of national concern.

On a brighter note, potentially significant oil deposits were reportedly discovered offshore, raising the possibility of dramatic revenue enhancement in five to ten years.

Political Parties

Prior to the 1994 coup, Gambia was one of the few African states to have consistently sanctioned a multiparty system, despite the predominant position held since independence by the ruling People’s Progressive Party (PPP). Following the coup, all party activity was proscribed until August 14, 1996, when, in the wake of the recent approval of a new constitution, the government announced that the ban had been lifted. However, the regime’s opponents described the new “preconditions” for party registration as “onerous” and accused President Jammeh of lacking commitment to genuine democratization. Such fears appeared justified when Jammeh announced shortly thereafter that the three main parties from the pre-coup era (the PPP, NCP, and GPP) had been banned. Under intense regional and other international pressure, Jammeh lifted the ban in July 2001 to permit full-party participation in the upcoming presidential election.

Five opposition parties formed a coalition on January 17, 2005, in Banjul to present a candidate to challenge Jammeh in the next presidential election at the end of 2006. The parties comprising the National Alliance for Democracy (NADD) were the National Democratic Action Movement (NDAM), the National Reconciliation Party (NRP), the People’s Democratic Organization for Independence and Socialism (PDOIS), the PPP, and the UDP. The original coordinator of the NADD, which was officially registered a few months after its inception, was assembly minority leader Halifa SALLAH of the PDOIS. By March 2006, the UDP and the NRP had dropped out, and a new chair, Jallow SONKO, was elected. The group subsequently named Sallah its presidential candidate for the upcoming election.

Government and Government-Supportive Parties

Alliance for Patriotic Reorientation and Construction (APRC). Founded on August 26, 1996, as a vehicle for Col. Yahya Jammeh's presidential campaign, the APRC was a successor to the July 22 Movement (named in reference to the date of Jammeh's takeover in 1994), which had been launched in mid-1995. (Among other things, its leaders had committed the movement to "national unity," apparently in the hope of bridging the nation's ethnic divisions. The bulk of the support for the Jammeh regime at that point was described as emanating from the Jola ethnic group, which constitutes less than 10 percent of the population.) APRC founders announced they would pursue economic development based on free-market principles and cooperation with neighboring countries. Jammeh resigned his military position (as required by the constitution) shortly before the September 1996 presidential balloting.

In late 1999 Phoday MAKALO, theretofore the APRC's general secretary, reportedly fled the country amid allegations that he had embezzled party funds.

Leaders: Yahya JAMMEH (President of the Republic), Aisatou NJIE-SAIDY (Vice President of the Republic), Musa BITTAYE.

National Convention Party (NCP). The NCP was organized in late 1975 by Sherif Mustapha Dibba, former vice president of the Republic and cofounder of the PPP. Although jailed in August 1981 on charges of involvement in the July coup attempt, Dibba challenged Jawara for the presidency in 1982, securing 28 percent of the vote. The 5 legislative seats won by the NCP in 1977 were reduced to 3 in 1982. A month after the election, Dibba was released from confinement, the charges against him having been vacated by a Banjul court. The party won 5 House seats in 1987 and 6 in 1992, Dibba running second to Jawara in the presidential balloting on both occasions. The NCP was banned from participating in 1996 elections but was reinstated to legal status in July 2001. Dibba won 3.7 percent of the vote in the October presidential poll. Despite his previous criticism of President Jammeh and the APRC, Dibba announced an "alliance" between the NCP and the APRC prior to the legislative balloting of January 2002. Dibba was subsequently nominated by the president to the assembly, of which he was then elected speaker, thereby eliciting criticism from a number of other NCP stalwarts who wished to remain in strict opposition to the APRC.

Leader: Sherif Mustapha DIBBA (Former Speaker of the National Assembly).

Other Parties and Groups

United Democratic Party (UDP). Launched in August 1996 after the snap presidential election was announced, the UDP was described as having the support of the three parties (the PPP, NCP, and GPP) that had been banned by the Jammeh regime. UDP presidential candidate Ousainu Darbo, a prominent lawyer, ran second to Jammeh in the September 26 balloting, securing a reported 35.34 percent of the votes.

In May 1998 nine UDP members, including (then) party leader Lamin Waa JAWARA, were detained by government security forces. Another leader, Ousainu Darboe, and a group of UDP members were reportedly arrested in June 2000 in connection with an alleged confrontation with APRC militiamen. Darboe was subsequently released on bail and served as the presidential candidate of a UDP/PPP/GPP coalition, securing 32.7 percent of the vote in the October 2001 election. (The criminal case against Darboe and the other UDP members was in adjournment as of mid-2002 and later dismissed.)

The UDP/PPP/GPP coalition ultimately boycotted the January 2002 assembly elections. In November 2002 Jawara accused Darboe of misappropriating funds and was subsequently expelled from the UDP. Jawara then formed a new political party, the National Democratic Action Movement (below).

Leaders: Ousainu DARBOE (Secretary General, 1996 and 2001 presidential candidate), Yaya JALLOW (Deputy Secretary General), Momodou Shyngle NYASSI (Youth Wing Leader).

National Democratic Action Movement (NDAM). Formed by Lamin Waa JAWARA after he was expelled from the UDP in 2002, the NDAM has emerged as one of the leading opposition parties in spite of its short existence. Jawara was arrested in 2004 on charges of sedition and served six months in prison. The sentence reportedly increased his popularity among the opposition.

Leader: Lamin Waa JAWARA, Ousainu MBENGA (Deputy Secretary General).

People's Progressive Party (PPP). The moderately socialist PPP, which merged with the Congress Party (CP) in 1967, governed the country from independence until the 1994 coup. It sponsored adoption of the republican constitution in 1970 and long favored increased economic and cultural links with Senegal as well as maintenance of the Commonwealth association.

PPP Secretary General Dawda Jawara was re-elected president of the republic in 1992, defeating four principal rivals with a 58.4 percent vote share. Following the July 1994 coup Jawara was granted political asylum by Senegal.

In November 1994 a number of PPP members were arrested for their alleged involvement in a failed coup plot, including a former cabinet minister, Mamadou Cadi CHAM, and the parliamentary vice president, Dembo JATTA. In June 1995 President Jammeh granted amnesty to the alleged conspirators; however, six months later at least 35 PPP activists were jailed and similarly charged. In addition, in January 1996 the AFPRC formally charged Jawara with embezzlement, and in March his assets were seized.

In mid-1996 Jawara, in an announcement issued in London, strongly criticized the new constitution drafted by the Jammeh regime, describing the document as "tailor-made" to elect Jammeh and designed to "confuse" matters in regard to basic individual rights. As with the NCP and the GPP, the PPP was banned from participating in the 1996 elections by the Jammeh government. After the ban was lifted in July 2001, the PPP teamed with the GPP and the UDP in launching an opposition coalition, which supported the UDP's Ousainu Darboe in the October 2001 presidential election. Jawara returned to Gambia in mid-2002 in response to the government's offer of amnesty. He resigned as leader of the PPP in December 2002 and was replaced by Omar Jallow. In 2006, the PPP reportedly was seeking an alliance with the UDP and the NRP.

Leaders: Yaya CEESAY (President), Omar JALLOW (Secretary General).

Gambia People's Party (GPP). The GPP was launched in early 1985 by former vice president Hassan Musa Camara and a number of other defectors from the PPP to oppose President Jawara at the 1987 general election. As the balloting approached, it was felt by many that the GPP had overtaken the NCP as the principal opposition grouping; however, Camara obtained only 13 percent of the presidential vote, with the GPP securing no legislative representation. Camara again finished third in 1992, while the GPP returned to the House of Representatives with 2 seats. Banned from participating in the 1996 elections (together with the PPP and the NCP), the GPP supported the UDP's candidate in the December 2001 presidential balloting.

Leaders: Hassan Musa CAMARA (Former Vice President of the Republic).

People's Democratic Organization for Independence and Socialism (PDOIS or DOY). The leftist PDOIS was formed at a congress that met from July 31 to August 19, 1986, to approve a lengthy manifesto that accused the PPP of compromising the country's sovereignty by agreeing to Party leader Sidia Jatta, who also had contested the 1992 election, secured a reported 2.87 percent of the vote in the 1996 presidential balloting and 3.2 percent in the 2001 presidential elections. The PDOIS was one of two opposition parties to participate in the 2002 legislative elections, winning two seats.

National Reconciliation Party (NRP). Formed quickly in August 1996, the NRP presented Hamat Bah as its candidate in the September 1996 presidential election, the well-known hotel owner garnering 5.52 percent of the votes according to official results. Bah ran again in 2001, securing 7.7 percent of the vote. The NRP won 1 seat in the 2002 assembly elections.

In March 2006, at least 2,500 NRP members reportedly defected to the APRC at a massive rally in Sankuba.

Leader: Hamat BAH (1996 and 2001 presidential candidate).

Gambia Party for Democracy and Progress (GPDP). The GPDP is a new opposition party formed by Henry GOMEZ. However, in April 2006 Gomez was quoted as endorsing Jammeh’s plans for the country and praising his accomplishments.

Legislature

Prior to its dissolution following the 1994 coup the unicameral House of Representatives contained 50 members, 36 of whom were directly elected by universal adult suffrage, plus 5 indirectly elected chiefs, 8 nominated members, and the attorney general (ex officio). The 1996 constitution provided for a 49-member National Assembly, 45 elected by popular vote in single-member constituencies and 4 appointed by the president. (The size of the assembly was increased to 53 [48 elected, 5 appointed] for the January 17, 2002, election in view of the recent population increase.) The term of the assembly is five years, unless it is dissolved earlier by the president.

All three parties represented in the legislature elected in 1992 (the People's Progressive Party, the National Convention Party, and the Gambia People's Party) were banned from participating in the January 2, 1997, balloting. Following the 1997 elections, the seat distribution was as follows: the Alliance for Patriotic Reorientation and Construction (APRC), 33; the United Democratic Party (UDP), 7; the National Reconciliation Party (NRP), 2; the People's Democratic Organization for Independence and Socialism (PDOIS), 1; and independents, 2.

New elections were held on January 17, 2002, although they were boycotted by the main opposition party—the UDP—and several smaller groupings. The governing APRC was declared the winner of 33 seats because no opposition candidates were presented for them. The APRC also won 12 of the 15 seats for which voting was held, giving it a total of 45 of the 48 elected seats. Of the remaining 3 elected seats, 2 were won by the PDOIS and 1 by the NRP. All of the 5 members subsequently appointed by the president were members of the APRC or APRC-supportive parties.

Speaker: Belinda BIDWELL.

Communications

The news media operated freely prior to the July 1994 coup, although the principal newspaper and national radio station were government owned. However, the Jammeh regime has applied constraints on the press in general and strongly attacked specific antigovernment reporting. Opponents of the administration also contend that the new Gambian constitution was written to permit “muzzling” of the media, and in November 1999 Reporters Without Frontiers described Gambia as one of a number of Commonwealth countries “flouting” press freedom.

In 2003 a state-run media agency, the National Media Commission, was created and given wide powers, including the power to arrest journalists and sentence them for up to six months. Additional press laws in 2004 and 2005 also were widely condemned as repressive.

Press

The following are English-language publications issued in Banjul: The Gambia Daily, state-owned; The Gambia Weekly (500), published by the Government Information Office; The Gambia Times (1,500), PPP fortnightly; The Nation, fortnightly; The Daily Observer, registered in 1992; The Point (4,000), twice-weekly; The Worker, thrice-weekly organ of the Gambia Labour Congress; The Gambia Onward, thrice-weekly; Foroyaa (Freedom), weekly; and the Newswatch. Newsmouth, an independent weekly, commenced publication in April 1993. A new daily introduced in 1999, The Independent, has accused the government of systematic harassment.

News Agency

The domestic facility is the Gambia News Agency (Gamna).

Broadcasting and Computing

Radio broadcasting is provided by the government-owned Radio Gambia, which relays BBC news and carries programs in English and local languages; Radio 1, a private FM outlet; and Radio Syd, a commercial station. The nation's first television station began broadcasting in January 1996, service having previously been available only via transmissions from Senegal. As of 2003 there were approximately 4,100 television receivers and 20,000 personal computers serving 30,000 Internet users.

REPUBLIC OF GHANA

The Country

Located on the west coast of Africa just north of the equator, Ghana's terrain includes a tropical rain forest running north about 170 miles from the Gulf of Guinea and a grassy savanna belt that is drained by the Volta River. While the official language of the country is English, the inhabitants are divided among more than 50 linguistic and ethnic groups, the most important being the Akans (including Fanti), Ashanti, Ga, Ewe, and Mossi-Dagomba. About 40 percent of the population is Christian, and 12 percent Muslim, with most of the rest following traditional religions. Over 40 percent of households are headed by women, who dominate the trading sector and comprise nearly 50 percent of agricultural labor; a smaller proportion of salaried women is concentrated in the service sector.

Agriculture employs nearly 60 percent of the population and accounts for about 20 percent of GDP, down from twice that level as late as the mid-1990s. Cocoa is responsible for 37 percent of exports; other important export commodities include gold, timber, and coffee. Manufacturing centers on food processing and the production of vehicles and textiles. Mining accounts for more than one-half of foreign exchange; in addition to gold, there are important deposits of diamonds, bauxite, and manganese.

According to the World Bank, per capita GNP declined by an average of 2 percent annually from 1980 to 1987. A subsequent return to modest economic growth largely resulted from the government's enactment of IMF-sponsored reform programs, including privatization of a number of government-controlled enterprises. However, the economy flagged in the mid-1990s, weighed down by rising debt payments. Although annual economic growth of over 4 percent was achieved from 1996 to 1999, per capita annual income remained at less than $500.

In early 2000 the World Bank refused to forward an anticipated loan, insisting that Accra's financial practices were not sufficiently transparent. The decision underscored widespread international and domestic concern over apparently pervasive corruption despite Ghana's image as a model for free-market orientation and democratization in Africa. Battered by tumbling cocoa and gold prices, the economy grew by only 1 percent in 2000, with inflation running at more than 30 percent annually.

By 2005 inflation had dropped to 6 percent, and GDP growth of 5.2 percent was recorded, while the IMF noted progress in structural reforms and private-sector investment. However, poverty was unabated, particularly in the north. In early 2006 the IMF, the World Bank, and the African Development Bank canceled billions of dollars of debt owed by 13 of Africa's poorest countries, including Ghana, to allow resources to be funneled to poverty-reduction efforts. Also in 2006, the World Bank approved a $75 million loan for what was described as a model gold-producing project, predicted to generate between $300 million and $700 million for the country over the next 20 years.

Political Background

The first West African territory to achieve independence in the postwar era, Ghana was established on March 6, 1957, through consolidation of the former British colony of the Gold Coast and the former UN Trust Territory of British Togoland. The drive to independence was associated primarily with the names of J. B. DANQUAH and Kwame N. NKRUMAH. The latter became prime minister of the Gold Coast in 1952, prime minister of independent Ghana in 1957, and the country's first elected president when republican status within the Commonwealth was proclaimed on July 1, 1960. Subsequently, Nkrumah consolidated his own power and that of his Convention People's Party (CPP), establishing a one-party dictatorship that neighboring states increasingly viewed with apprehension.

In 1966 the military ousted Nkrumah in response to increasing resentment of his repressive policies and financial mismanagement, which had decimated the country's reserves and generated an intolerably large national debt. An eight-man National Liberation Council (NLC) headed by Lt. Gen. Joseph A. ANKRAH ran the government. Promising an eventual return to civilian rule, the NLC carried out a far-reaching purge of Nkrumah adherents and sponsored the drafting of a new constitution. The NLC era was marked, however, by a series of alleged plots and corruption charges, with Ankrah resigning as head of state in April 1969 after admitting to solicitation of funds from foreign companies for campaign purposes. He was replaced by Brig. Akwasi Amankwa AFRIFA, who implemented plans for a return to civilian government.

Partial civilian control returned following a National Assembly election in August 1969 that designated Kofi A. BUSIA as prime minister. A three-man presidential commission, made up of members of the NLC, exercised presidential power until August 31, 1970, when Edward AKUFO-ADDO was inaugurated as head of state. The Busia administration was unable to deal with economic problems generated by a large external debt and a drastic currency devaluation, and in January 1972 the military, under (then) Col. Ignatius Kutu ACHEAMPONG, again seized control. The National Redemption Council (NRC), which was formed to head the government, immediately suspended the constitution, banned political parties, abolished the Supreme Court, and dissolved the National Assembly. In 1975 the NRC was superseded by the Supreme Military Council (SMC).

In the wake of accusations that "governmental activity had become a one-man show," General Acheampong was forced to resign as head of state on July 5, 1978, and he was immediately succeeded by his deputy, (then) Lt. Gen. Frederick W. K. AKUFFO. Promising a return to civilian rule by mid-1979, Akuffo quickly reconstituted a Constitution Drafting Commission, which subsequently presented its recommendations to an appointed, but broadly representative, Constituent Assembly that convened in mid-December.

In the wake of badly received efforts to secure constitutional immunity from future prosecution for existing government officials, Akuffo was ousted on June 4, 1979, by a group of junior military officers. The next day, an Armed Forces Revolutionary Council (AFRC) was established under Flt. Lt. Jerry John RAWLINGS, who had been undergoing court-martial for leading an unsuccessful coup on May 15. Having dissolved the SMC and the Constituent Assembly, the AFRC launched a "house cleaning" campaign, during which former presidents Acheampong, Afrifa, and Akuffo, in addition to a number of other high-ranking military and civilian officials, were executed on grounds of corruption. Although the AFRC postponed promulgation of a new constitution until autumn, it did not interfere with scheduled presidential and legislative balloting on June 18. In a runoff presidential poll on July 9, Dr. Hilla LIMANN of the People's National Party, which had won a bare majority in the new National Assembly, defeated Victor OWUSU of the Popular Front Party; Limann was inaugurated on September 24.

The Limann government proved unable to halt further deterioration of the nation's economy and, in the wake of renewed allegations of widespread corruption, was overthrown on December 31, 1981, by army and air force supporters of Lieutenant Rawlings, who was returned to power as head of a Provisional National Defense Council (PNDC). Three weeks later a 17-member cabinet was appointed that included a number of prominent individuals known for their "spotless integrity." Despite a number of subsequent coup attempts (two in 1985 alone), a combination of firmness toward opponents and radical state policy changes, including reorganization of the judicial and administrative structures, enabled the flight lieutenant to become Ghana's longest post-independence ruler, while district elections in late 1988 and early 1989 were viewed as heralding a return to civilian government.

In January 1991 President Rawlings instructed the National Commission for Democracy (NCD), which had recently sponsored a series of debates on the creation of regional and national assemblies, to draw on its findings, together with the content of past constitutions, in assembling a new national charter. Four months later the regime officially endorsed the NCD's plans for installation of a multiparty system and authorized a nine-member, ad hoc Committee of Experts to draft a constitution. On August 26 the document was submitted to a 258-member consultative assembly, Rawlings announcing that a referendum on the new basic law would be followed by presidential and legislative elections on November 3 and December 8, respectively.

On April 28, 1992, the new constitution was approved by 90 percent of the voters, and on May 17 the ban on political parties was lifted. Nevertheless, nine days later the High Court upheld the decision by the Interim National Electoral Commission (INEC) to continue a political parties law proscribing 21 parties outlawed in 1981 (see Political Parties, below). On September 14 Rawlings resigned from the air force to campaign for the presidency as a candidate for the National Democratic Congress (NDC), the political party successor to the PNDC.

At presidential balloting on November 3, 1992, Rawlings led the five-candidate field with 58.3 percent of the vote. Although international observers described the polling as "fair," attributing irregularities to deficient “organization and training,” the four opposition contenders alleged widespread fraud, including NDC ballot stuffing. On November 13 the opposition announced it would boycott parliamentary balloting until a new electoral register was created (a demand rejected by the administration). Consequently, only 29 percent of eligible voters took part in the legislative poll of December 29, when pro-Rawlings candidates secured all but 2 of the 200 seats.

In February 1995 the government imposed a value-added tax that provoked widespread protests. Three months later the government offered to lower the tax rate, but the demonstrations continued, and in early June the measure was rescinded in favor of a reinstated sales tax. On July 21 Dr. Kwesi BOTCHWEY, who had championed Ghana’s adoption of an IMF-prescribed economic reform program as well as the discarded tax, resigned as finance minister. Meanwhile, the withdrawal of Vice President Kow Nkensen ARKAAH’s National Convention Party (NCP) from the presidential coalition in May reflected ruptured relations between Arkaah and Rawlings.

At presidential balloting on December 7, 1996, Rawlings and his vice presidential running mate, John Evans ATTA MILLS, defeated by a vote of 57.2–39.8 percent their main rivals, a Great Alliance ticket headed by the New Patriotic Party’s (NPP) John KUFUOR, with Arkaah in the vice presidential slot. At concurrent legislative balloting the NDC retained a nearly 2 to 1 legislative majority, capturing 133 seats to the Great Alliance’s 65. Subsequently, in January 1997 the Great Alliance disbanded acrimoniously.

President Rawlings’s efforts to name a new government in early 1997 were complicated by difficulties in satisfying the various factions within the NDC as well as by the opposition’s insistence that all prospective cabinet members, even incumbents, were subject to assembly approval. As a result, the full cabinet was not completed until midyear, after the opposition had apparently relented on the approval question.

Rawlings being constitutionally prevented from seeking a third term, the NPP’s Kufuor led seven candidates in the first round of presidential balloting on December 7, 2000, with 48 percent of the vote and defeated the NDC’s Atta Mills by 6 percent in the second round 3 weeks later. Meanwhile, the NPP had also secured a legislative majority in assembly balloting on December 7, setting the stage for installation of an NPP-led cabinet early in 2001.

In 2004 only four parties put forth presidential candidates. President Kufuor defeated NDC candidate Atta Mills 52.5 percent to 44.6 percent. (The NDC became the main opposition party.) The remaining two candidates had a combined vote of less than 3 percent. Edward MAHAMA of the Grand Coalition, which combined the People’s National Convention (PNC), Every Ghanian Living Elsewhere (EGLE), and the Great Consolidated Popular Party (GCPP), received 1.9 percent. The final 1 percent went to George AGGUDEY of the CPP. The NPP also fared well in the 2005 assembly elections (see Legislature, below). A new government was sworn in on February 1, 2005; the cabinet was reshuffled on April 28, 2006.

Constitution and Government

On August 26, 1991, a consultative assembly of 258 members (117 drawn from district assemblies, 119 representing “identifiable” groups, and 22 governmentally appointed) began deliberations on a new constitution, a draft of which had been published by the government two weeks earlier. The document, which drew from Ghana’s previous four constitutions as well as French basic law, was a multiparty instrument featuring a directly elected president; a presidentially appointed vice president; a military-civilian Security Council chaired by the president; a nonpartisan Council of State; a unicameral, directly elected legislative body; and a special committee on human rights and administrative justice.

The new constitution was approved by referendum on April 28, 1992, and on June 10 the PNDC was disbanded, although its ministerial personnel remained in office until March 22, 1993, despite the formal proclamation of Ghana’s Fourth Republic on January 7.

Foreign Relations

External relations since independence have been pragmatic rather than ideological, the government unilaterally renouncing certain portions of the foreign debt and further disturbing creditor nations by taking partial control of selected foreign enterprises.

Relations with neighboring Togo have been strained since the incorporation of British Togoland into Ghana at the time of independence. In 1977 Ghana accused Togo of smuggling operations aimed at "sabotaging" the Ghanaian economy, while Togo vehemently denied accusations that it was training Ghanaian nationals to carry out acts of subversion in the former British territory. The border between the two countries was periodically closed, Accra repeatedly charging Togolese officials with spreading "vicious lies" about the Rawlings regime and "providing a sanctuary" for its opponents. In a February 1988 effort to interdict commodity smuggling (Togo, without mining, was being credited with multimillion-dollar gold export earnings), Rawlings declared a state of emergency in a number of Ghanaian towns along the Togolese border. The estrangement was substantially alleviated by an October 1991 treaty that resulted in the reopening of border crossings. However, in March 1993 Togolese President Eyadéma accused Ghana of involvement in an attack on his compound and in early January 1994 the two countries were reportedly "close to war" after Lomé charged Accra with supporting, at least tacitly, a second attack in Togo. On January 7 the Rawlings administration claimed it had no interest in "getting involved in Togo's internal affairs" and urged the Eyadéma government to stop blaming Ghana "whenever there is an armed attack or political crisis." The tension heightened on January 12 when Togolese troops killed 12 Ghanaians at a border post and Togolese naval officers imprisoned 7 Ghanaian fishermen.

In April 1994 Lomé blamed Accra for the "presence of bombs in Togo," thus igniting yet another round of acrimonious exchanges. On a more positive note, Accra appointed an ambassador to Togo in November, and on December 26 the border between the two countries was reopened. In July 1995 Rawlings and Eyadéma signed a cooperation agreement after which Togo appointed an ambassador to Ghana for the first time in over a decade.

Relations with other regional states have been mixed since the 1981 Ghanaian coup. The PNDC moved quickly to reestablish links with Libya (severed by President Limann in November 1980 because of the Qadhafi regime's presumed support of Rawlings), thereby clearing the way for shipments of badly needed Libyan oil. In April 1987 an agreement was signed with Iran for the delivery of 10,000 barrels of crude per day. Concurrently, a number of joint ventures were proposed in agriculture and shipping.

The 1987 overthrow of Burkina Faso's Thomas Sankara by Blaise Compaoré dealt a political and personal blow to Rawlings, who had hoped to form a political union with his northern neighbor by the end of the decade; instead, he encountered in the new Burkinabe president an ally of the Côte d'Ivoire's Houphouët-Boigny, with whom relations were strained. In April 1988, on the other hand, Rawlings and Nigeria's (then) president Gen. Ibrahim Babangida sought to ease tensions stemming from Nigeria's expulsion of Ghanaian workers in 1983 and 1985. In January 1989 the rapprochement yielded a trade agreement that removed all trade and travel barriers between the two countries.

Relations with Côte d'Ivoire worsened further in November 1993, when Ivoirians seeking revenge for a murderous attack on supporters of their soccer team in Ghana killed 23 Ghanaian nationals and injured more than 100 others in Abidjan. Although Ivorian authorities established security areas for the Ghanaians, over 9,000 had reportedly fled the country by mid-month. In early 1997, on the other hand, Ivorian president Henri Konan Bédié made the first official visit to Ghana by an Ivorian head of state in nearly four decades. During his stay Bédié proposed broader economic and social ties between the two nations. Tensions heightened somewhat in 2005 after Ghanaian arms smugglers were arrested in the Ivorian town of Tantama, and President Kufuor attended the swearing in of Togo's illegal new leader, while other African countries denounced the coup. Meanwhile, Ghana indicated enhanced relations with Senegal by opening a new embassy in Dakar.

Current Issues

U.S. President Bill Clinton launched his tour of Africa from Ghana in March 1998, thus focusing international attention (generally favorable) on the democracy efforts of the Rawlings administration. However, Rawlings's subsequent announcement of his intention to support Vice President Atta Mills in the 2000 presidential race provoked sharp criticism from the NDC's reform faction, which, along with opposition observers, argued that the president was thereby seeking to retain unofficial political control following the end of his term. In early 1999 the reformers broke with the NDC, and in June launched the National Reform Party (NRP).

The administration's economic policies were also intensely scrutinized throughout 1999, with NDC opponents citing incidents of mismanagement and corruption as evidence of the ruling party's "inefficiency." In a rare display of unanimity, five of the most prominent opposition parties—the NPP, the People's Convention Party (PCP), the National Convention Party (NCP), the United Ghana Movement (UGM), and the new Reform Party—organized a nationwide demonstration in November against public sector layoffs and increased hospital and university fees. However, that protest was countered by the massive turnout at a pro-NDC rally in Accra in December.

The economy continued to decline in 2000, further eroding support for the NDC and contributing to what one observer described as classic "fin de régime" mismanagement on the part of the Rawlings administration. Most analysts attributed the presidential and legislative victories of the NPP in December largely to a general feeling among the population that it was simply "time for a change," since there were few significant policy differences between the two leading parties. In addition, it was widely acknowledged that candidate Atta Mills lacked the charisma that had carried the previous NDC standard-bearer to electoral success in the 1990s. For his part, Rawlings left office with relative equanimity, calming fears that a peaceful transfer of power from one party to another via free elections, a rare occurrence in the region, might be jeopardized. Meanwhile, John Kufuor's return to office in December 2004 marked the first time an erstwhile opposition party was reelected in the postcolonial period of almost 50 years. He pledged to intensify free-market economic policies while combating corruption. At the same time, he warned of the need for fiscal austerity, suggesting that various government subsidies, widely popular with the public, might need to be cut back. He also called for "unification," seemingly a reference to the country's potentially unstable ethnic, political, and religious mixes. In that regard, Kufuor established a truth and reconciliation commission to investigate, among other things, the bloodletting that followed the 1979 and 1981 coups. However, that initiative resulted not in harmony but rather severe NPP/NDC friction as the NDC refused to cooperate with the investigation, claiming it was being "demonized" by the NPP.

Human rights abuses and corruption were the focus of the newly launched African Peer Review Mechanism (APRM) in 2005, with Ghana among the first countries to be reviewed. The initial draft report was "unexpectedly critical," according to Africa Confidential, and proposed more funding for government oversight efforts. Accra reportedly planned a $2.8 billion program to address the concerns.

Tribal conflict flared up in 2005 between the Abudu and the Andani in the northern Dagbon Kingdom, despite a 1974 order that the rivals alternate control of the area. The feud reportedly remained unresolved. The greater cause for concern in 2006, however, was a new Representation of the People Amendment (ROPA), signed into law by President Kufuor on February 24. Five minority parties—the NDC, the NRP, the PNC, the GCPP, and the EGLE—unified in opposition, staging two demonstrations in which 9 members were arrested and 20 people injured. The law grants some 3 million Ghanaians living abroad the opportunity to vote, clearly benefiting the NPP, according to observers. Since those abroad account for the second-highest source of foreign revenue after cocoa, they should have a voice in how the country is run, supporters said. Opponents contended overseas voting without proper monitoring could easily be used to rig elections.

Political Parties

Political parties, traditionally based more on tribal affiliation than on ideology, were banned in 1972. The proscription was lifted in early 1979, with six groups formally contesting the June election. Following the coup of December 31, 1982, parties were again outlawed until May 17, 1992, when the ban was rescinded in accordance with the multiparty constitution approved on April 28. The new dispensation did not, however, reverse an earlier ruling banning 21 opposition parties, including the All People's Party (APP), Convention People's Party (CPP), National Alliance Party (NAP), Popular Front Party (PFP), Progress Party (PP), and Unity Party (UP). Future parties were also prohibited from using any of the symbols, names, or slogans of the proscribed parties. The Coordinating Committee of Democratic Forces of Ghana (CCDFG), an 11-party, mainly "Nkrumahist" coalition formed in August 1991, strongly objected to the new party provisions and asked the High Court to overturn them. However, the court sided with the ruling Provisional National Defense Council (PNDC).

Four new opposition parties (the New Patriotic Party [NPP], National Independence Party [NIP], People's Heritage Party [PHP], and People's National Convention [PNC]) presented candidates in the November 1992 presidential election. However, the opposition parties boycotted the December legislative elections, charging electoral fraud in presidential balloting on behalf of the National Democratic Congress (NDC), which had been formed to support the presidential campaign of PNDC Chair Jerry Rawlings.

In January 1993 the CCDFG was effectively superseded as the major opposition grouping by the new Inter-Party Coordinating Committee (ICC), which agreed to accept the "present institutional arrangements" but rejected the recent election results, calling for a new round of voting. However, the ICC was weakened somewhat the following August when the NPP (one of the strongest of the new groupings) decided to recognize the disputed election tallies.

Coordinated opposition activity next surfaced in early 1995, under the banner of the Alliance for Change. The NPP-dominated Alliance subsequently organized antigovernment demonstrations that forced the Rawlings administration to rescind the recently imposed value-added tax, the coalition's success encouraging it to announce its intention to present an electoral front in 1996. After drawn-out negotiations, which prompted the withdrawal of some components of the Alliance for Change, a new Great Alliance was announced in August 1996 by the NPP and the PCP. Despite being roiled by debate over the choice of legislative candidates until just prior to election day, Alliance-affiliated candidates captured over 60 legislative seats in December balloting. Nevertheless, the coalition subsequently collapsed as the NPP and PCP blamed each other for the opposition's failure to secure greater gains.

Government Parties

New Patriotic Party (NPP). The center-right NPP was launched in June 1992, its founders including former members of the old Progress Party, which had governed Ghana from 1969 to 1972 under Prime Minister Kofi Busia. The NPP's platform advocated the protection of human rights, the strengthening of democratic principles, and the holding of "free and fair elections." At the same time, the new grouping was widely viewed as devoted to the interests of the business class.

In 1994 the NPP sought to forge ties with other opposition groups, agreeing in November to back a single candidate in the next presidential election. Collaterally, it broke off negotiations with the NDC, stating that the government was uninterested in maintaining a dialogue. Meanwhile, the party experienced contentious internal debate over its own presidential candidates. At midyear the decision was postponed until 1995 as party leaders sought to placate its influential Young Executives Forum wing, which had funded Albert Abu BOAHEN's candidacy in 1992 but reportedly sought a new standard-bearer.

At the NPP congress on April 20, 1996, delegates chose John Kufuor as the party's presidential candidate. Kufuor declared his intent to forge a coalition with the PCP (see CPP, below), which was achieved in August with the establishment of the Great Alliance. As endorsed by an extraordinary NPP congress on August 31, the new Alliance selected Kufuor as its common presidential candidate and thereby the main threat to the Rawlings campaign.

After a number of postponements that NPP officials attributed to poor regional organization, the party convened its fourth congress in 1998. At balloting for leadership posts, Secretary General Agyenim BOATENG was ousted in favor of 39-year-old Dan BOTWE, whose victory highlighted what observers described as a youth movement within the party. At further intraparty balloting in October, Kufuor outpolled five other NPP would-be presidential candidates and secured the party's backing for another national campaign in 2000. In part, the NPP's success in the 2000 legislative balloting (100 seats versus 60 in 1996) was attributed to its "clean sweep" in areas dominated by the Ashanti ethnic group. Meanwhile, Kufuor secured 48.17 percent of the vote in the first round of the presidential election before winning the post with a 56.9 percent tally in the second round.

President Kufuor was reelected in 2004 with 52.6 percent of the vote in a race that saw a huge turnout and brought praise to Ghana as a stable if struggling democratic nation, especially in light of the civil unrest in neighboring Togo and Côte d'Ivoire.

In 2005 a rift developed over claims of financial irregularities by party chair Haruna ESSEKU, who withdrew just before the party's national congress in December. He was replaced by Peter Mac Manu, with a new secretary general and first vice chair also elected.

Leaders: John Agyekum KUFUOR (President of the Republic), Alhaji Aliu MAHAMA (Vice President of the Republic), Peter Mac MANU (Chair), Hawa YAKUBU (First Vice Chair), Nana Ohene NTOW (Secretary General).

Convention People's Party (CPP). The CPP considers itself the legitimate successor to the party of the same name formed by former president Nkrumah during the independence campaign. The revived grouping was launched in 1999 under the name Convention Party (due to a legal dispute over the use of the original rubric) as a result of a merger agreement between the People's Convention Party (PCP) and the National Convention Party (NCP).

The PCP had been formed in December 1993 as an apparent successor to the Nkrumahist ICC by the National Independence Party (NIP), the People's Heritage Party (PHP), and the People's Party for Democracy and Development (PPDD). (For further information on the NIP, PHP, and PPDD, see the 1999 Handbook.) A faction of the PNC also participated in the launching. (Organizers had reportedly rejected a demand from PNC leader Dr. Hilla Limann that he be named the new party's leader; consequently, only dissident PNC members joined the PCP.)

In early 1996 somewhat confusing reports indicated that the CPP rubric had been revived following a "merger" of the PCP and the NCP, the latter having split from the ruling Progressive Alliance the previous year. However, subsequent news stories routinely still referenced the PCP, and at least a portion of the NCP appeared to remain independent.

In the wake of its disappointing performance (five seats) at December 1996 balloting, the PCP blamed the NPP for the opposition's failure to secure greater representation; meanwhile, the PCP's claim to the Nkrumahist mantle in the Central, Western, and Brong Ahafo regions was undermined by its electoral defeats there.

The NCP had been the first group to be recognized following the lifting of the party ban in 1992.

However, it quickly was eclipsed in influence by the NDC, which had convinced PNDC Chair Rawlings to be its presidential candidate. Consequently, prior to the December 1992 legislative balloting, the NCP joined the NDC-dominated Progressive Alliance.

Although the NCP in November 1994 defended its ongoing alliance with the NDC as necessary for ensuring “national peace and stability,” relations continued to deteriorate, particularly in regard to the relationship between the NCP’s leader and vice president of the republic, Kow Nkensen Arkaah, and Rawlings. The vice president criticized governmental policy at a rally in May 1995, and shortly thereafter the NCP’s executive board reportedly voted to withdraw from the Progressive Alliance.

In January 1996 Arkaah participated in the announcement of the “merger” of the NCP and the PCP in a revived CPP. However, other NCP leaders subsequently denounced that coalition, arguing that Arkaah was no longer the leader of their party nor its presidential candidate. Some influential party members later also criticized the Great Alliance formed in August by the NPP and the PCP.

Ending an eight-year legal battle on the issue, the CP was officially permitted to resume use of the CPP rubric in mid-2000. It campaigned for the December elections on a center-left platform that called for increased social spending and deceleration of the pace of economic reform. CPP candidate George HAGAN secured 1.78 percent of the vote in the first round of presidential balloting, the party throwing its support behind the NPP’s John Kufuor in the second. The CPP accepted a cabinet post in January 2001, although the party subsequently emphasized that it disagreed with the NPP on many important issues.

In mid-2005 the party reportedly was engaged in unity discussions with the PNC in a move toward gaining political dominance, particularly as more youthful members defected to the CPP from the NPP and the NCD. Three CPP assembly members were dismissed by the party late in the year because they supported the ROPA (see Current issues, above), contrary to the party’s position.

Leaders: Dr. Edmund DELLE (Chair), George AGGUDEY (2004 presidential candidate), Nii Noi DOWUONA (Secretary General).

Opposition Parties

Progressive Alliance (PA). The formation of the PA was announced in early December 1992 by the NDC (under whose banner PNDC Chair Jerry Rawlings had just been elected president of the republic), the NCP, and the EGLE Party. In part due to the fact that legislative elections were only weeks away, the three parties agreed that they would present competing candidates in some constituencies, with the PA components together winning 198 of the 200 seats.

In May 1995 the NCP, complaining of having been marginalized, withdrew from the PA while the small Democratic People’s Party (DPP, below) joined the Alliance in September 1996. All three PA groups endorsed Rawlings as their 1996 presidential candidate and Atta Mills as their 2000 candidate. Although the PA appeared to remain technically in existence for the 2000 legislative balloting, only the NDC was credited with winning seats (as had been the case in 1996), and the role of the minor groupings remained negligible. In 2005 the PA was no longer listed as a political party.

National Democratic Congress (NDC). The NDC was formed on June 10, 1992, in Accra as a coalition of pro-Rawlings and pro-PNDC political and social clubs, including the New Nation Club and the Development Union. A number of factions emerged within the NDC from 1995 to 1996, including the December 31 Women’s Movement (led by the president’s wife, Nana Konadu RAWLINGS), which advocated sponsoring female candidates in 30 percent of the constituencies in the upcoming legislative elections. Despite concern over how the party would be able to accommodate its various strains, Jerry Rawlings was selected by acclamation as the NDC presidential nominee at the party’s third annual national conference on September 6, 1996. Rawlings, who had been involved in a widely publicized conflict with Vice President Kow Nkensen Arkaah, subsequently selected little-known law professor John Evans Atta Mills as his 1996 running mate.

At the NDC's fourth congress in December 1998, party delegates approved reforms to the NDC charter, which included the designation of the Consultative Committee as the party's premier decision-making body. In addition, Rawlings was named NDC "Leader for Life" and, consequently, the Consultative Committee's president. Rawlings's ascension to the supreme party post was denounced by members of the NDC Reform Group, who had become increasingly combative following Rawlings's selection of Atta Mills as his would-be successor. In March 1999 the Reform Group announced it intended to form a separate party to compete in the 2000 elections (see National Reform Party, below).

A rift between those loyal to Rawlings and those who supported Chair Obed Yao ASAMOAH surfaced in late 2005, with the latter resigning in January 2006 as a consequence. In the fight for control of the party, Rawlings blamed Asamoah for the NDC losing in the 2004 election, and Asamoah's attempts at reconciliation were spurned. Subsequently, Asamoah declared he was forming a new party (see Democratic Freedom Party, below). The party elected pro-Rawlings candidate Kwabena Adjei to the chairmanship at its December 2005 congress.

Leaders: Kwabena ADJEI (Chair), John Evans ATTA MILLS (Former Vice President of the Republic and 2004 presidential candidate), Alhaji MUMUNI (2004 vice presidential candidate), Johnson Asiedu NKETIA (General Secretary).

Every Ghanaian Living Everywhere Party (EGLE). The (then) Eagle Club was formed in 1991, allegedly as a political affiliate of the PNDC. However, in mid-1992 the renamed EGLE Party declined to offer a blanket endorsement for all PNDC-NDC legislative candidates, positioning itself only as a pro-Rawlings grouping. EGLE did not put forth its own presidential candidate for the 2004 election, and instead joined in a Grand Coalition with the PNC and the GCPP to support Edward Mahama. In 2006 the party reportedly had decided to rejoin the NDC to contest future elections.

Leaders: Nana Yaa OFORI-ATTA (Chair), Alhaji Rahman JAMATUTU (Vice Chair), Sam Pee YALLEY (General Secretary).

Democratic People's Party (DPP). The DPP joined the Progressive Alliance in September 1996 and quickly endorsed the presidential campaign of the NDC's Jerry Rawlings. However, in 2000 D. N. Ward-Brew, one of the DPP founders, accused the NDC of "marginalizing" the DPP and announced he was withdrawing the party from the PA. At the same time, Daniel Martin, claiming, with the apparent endorsement of the government, the chairmanship of the DPP, announced that the party would in fact remain in the PA and endorse the NDC presidential and vice presidential candidates. The DPP, by now considered a minor party, did not field a presidential candidate in 2004.

Leaders: D. N. WARD-BREW (Chair), Daniel D. K. MARTIN (General Secretary).

People's National Convention (PNC). The PNC was launched on May 30, 1992, by former president Dr. Hilla Limann, who finished third in the November presidential balloting. In late 1993 it was divided by Limann's initial antipathy toward opposition party unity talks and subsequently by his reported insistence that he be named the leader of any group that emerged therefrom. In October West Africa reported that among the PNC members opposing Limann was his close aide, Dr. Ivan ADDAE-MENSAH, who accused the former president of unconstitutional party activities, and by November a number of the PNC's constituent parties had reportedly broken off to join the PCP. In December Limann announced that despite the party schism he would continue to fend off merger efforts and "serve as a watchdog of the constitution."

Criticizing Rawlings's performance as leaving "much to be desired," Limann asserted in April 1994 that he "could prove equal to the task of leading Ghana again." However, at a party congress in Accra in early September 1996 Limann agreed to step aside to allow delegates "to inject fresh blood into the party." Subsequently, Dr. Edward Mahama was named the PNC's 1996 presidential candidate by acclamation, the PNC deciding to "go it alone" rather than participate in the Great Alliance formed by the NPP and the PCP. At balloting on December 7, Mahama secured just 3 percent of the presidential tally and the party won 1 legislative seat.

On January 23, 1998, former president Limann died. In September, at the PNC's third congress, Mahama was elected chair and chosen to represent the party at 2000 presidential polling, at which he secured 2.92 percent of the vote in the first round. (The PNC supported the NPP's John Kufuor in the second round.) During the 2000 presidential and legislative campaigns, the PNC claimed to be the legitimate successor to Kwame Nkrumah's original CPP, although it had lost a legal battle to use the CPP's rubric. The PNC's platform was described as "populist," albeit with a noticeable capitalistic bent. In 2004, Mahama again ran for the presidency as the PNC's candidate, but received only 1.9 percent of the vote. In mid-2005 the party reportedly was engaged in unity discussions with the CPP.

In 2006, First Vice Chair John NDEBUGRE was suspended because of his support for ROPA (see Current issues, above), in opposition to the party's position on the new law. Ndebugre subsequently resigned and was replaced by Alhaji Ahmed Ramadan.

Leaders: Dr. Edward MAHAMA (Chair and 1996, 2000, and 2004 presidential candidate), John EDWIN (President), Alhaji Ahmed RAMADAN (First Vice Chair), Gabriel PWAMANG (General Secretary).

Other Parties and Groups

United Ghana Movement (UGM). The UGM was launched in Accra in mid-1996 under the interim chairmanship of Dr. Charles Wereko-Brobby, a former Rawlings cabinet minister and prominent leader of the NPP who had expressed concern that an effective anti-Rawlings front would not be established by the NPP and CPP. After those two groups did in fact agree to a coalition in August, speculation arose that the UGM might be dismantled. However, it was subsequently reported that the Movement had proceeded with its request for formal recognition. Earlier, Wereko-Brobby, a leader of the "professional, middle-class" component of the Alliance for Change, had announced his intention to support the proposed (eventually aborted) presidential candidacy of Kwame PIANIM.

The UGM was granted formal recognition in January 1997, and Wereko-Brobby subsequently vowed to organize supporters in each of Ghana's voting districts to contest the presidential and legislative elections in 2000. However, Wereko-Brobby won only 0.34 percent of the vote in the first round of the presidential poll. In 2006 the party was listed as "in hibernation."

Leaders: Dr. Charles WEREKO-BROBBY (Chair and 2000 and 2004 presidential candidate), Eric K. DYTENYA (General Secretary).

National Reform Party (NRP). Originally organized to function as a reform-minded faction within the NDC, the NRP formally registered as an independent party in June 1999 with the intent of forwarding a candidate at the 2000 presidential elections. The Reform faction's decision to break with the NDC was reportedly precipitated by alleged attempts by the Rawlings camp to "undemocratically" control the party, in particular the president's pledge to back the presidential candidacy of Vice President Atta Mills.

Augustus Tanoh, a lawyer and businessman and former Rawlings ally, secured 1.21 percent of the vote in the first round of presidential balloting in December 2000. The NRP subsequently supported the NPP's John Kufuor in the second round, although party leaders resisted overtures to join the new cabinet, denying that Cecilia BANNERMAN, the new minister for manpower development and employment, was an official member of the NRP as claimed by the administration.

Leaders: Peter KPORDUGBE (Chair), Augustus Obuadum "Goosie" TANOH (2000 and 2004 presidential candidate), Kyeretwie OPOKU (General Secretary).

Great Consolidated Popular Party (GCPP). Formed in 1996, the GCPP, having lost its bid to be designated as the legitimate successor to the

Legislature

The unicameral National Assembly elected in June 1979 was dissolved following the coup of December 31, 1981. In March 1992 Lieutenant Rawlings announced that balloting for a new assembly would be held on December 8. However, opposition candidates, angered by the administration's handling of the presidential elections ten days earlier, withdrew on November 13 from the campaign for the unicameral body's 200 seats, leaving 38 of the new constituencies with single candidates. Consequently, the government rescheduled the balloting twice as part of an only partially successful effort (23 candidates ran unopposed) to attract new candidates.

Following polling on September 18, 2005, the seats were distributed as follows: the New Patriotic Party (NPP), 128; the National Democratic Congress, 94; the People's National Convention, 4; the Convention People's Party, 3; and independents, 1.

Speaker: Ebenezer Begyina Sekhi HUGHES.

Communications

Under the 1979 constitution, state-owned media were required to "afford equal opportunities and facilities for the representation of opposing or differing views," and the Ghanaian press was one of the freest and most outspoken in Western Africa. However, since the 1981 coup, not only radio and television but also the leading newspapers have become little more than propaganda organs of the government.

Broadcasting and Computing

In 1995 and 1996, the government ended the monopoly of the statutory Ghana Broadcasting Corporation by issuing radio and television licenses to more than three dozen private firms. There were some 2.8 million TV receivers and 90,000 personal computers serving 200,000 Internet users in 2003. The increase in the number of talk radio programs played a helpful role in disseminating information during the 2004 presidential elections.

REPUBLIC OF GUINEA

République de Guinée

The Country

Facing the Atlantic on the western bulge of Africa, Guinea presents a highly diversified terrain that ranges from coastal flatlands to the mountainous Foutah Djallon region where the Niger, Gambia, and Senegal rivers originate. The predominantly Muslim population includes over 2 million Fulani (Fulah); over 1.25 million Malinké (Mandingo, who have long been the dominant tribe); over 500,000 Soussou; 350,000 Kissi; and 250,000 Kpelle. While women are responsible for an estimated 48 percent of food production, female participation in government is minimal.

The majority of the population is dependent upon subsistence agriculture. Bananas, coffee, peanuts, palm kernels, and citrus fruits are important cash crops, although much foreign exchange is derived from mining. Guinea is one of the world's largest producers of bauxite, its reserves being exploited largely with the assistance of foreign companies. There are also valuable deposits of iron ore, gold, diamonds, uranium, and oil, in addition to substantial hydroelectric capability. Despite these resources, the GNP per capita was only $480 in 1990, reflecting an economy weakened by a quarter of a century of Marxist-inspired management. In the two years before his death, limited private enterprise was encouraged by Sékou Touré. Following its takeover, the CMRN announced a free-market economic policy and a series of economic liberalization measures involving banking and foreign investment. Development aid has since been obtained from a number of regional and European sources, notably France and Belgium. Structural adjustment efforts have focused on improving infrastructure as a necessary precondition to rejuvenating the agriculture sector, which in 1990 reportedly utilized less than 10 percent of available land.

By 1994 GNP per capita had risen marginally to $510, although real growth since 1985 had averaged only 1.3 percent. In late 1996 Guinea launched an economic reform program with the goals of restructuring the banking system, strengthening financial policies, and reducing corruption. In 1997 the International Monetary Fund (IMF) approved a three-year-loan package to support the country's efforts. Subsequently, the IMF reported that increased activity in the agriculture, construction, and trade sectors had spurred real GDP growth to an annual average of 4.7 percent in 1997–1998; meanwhile, inflation was 1.9 percent in 1997 and 5.1 percent in 1998. In late 1999 Conakry asserted that it had made a “determined” effort to promote private sector development and had implemented strict expenditure controls and monitoring procedures as part of a “rigorous” financial management plan. Furthermore, the government projected a real GDP growth rate of over 5 percent in 2000 despite the continued effects of high petroleum prices. At the same time, the administration continued to call for international aid to help it cope with its large refugee population, made up of Sierra Leoneans and Liberians displaced by fighting in their respective countries. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) reported that as of early 2001 Guinea was home to approximately 390,000 refugees and described the situation as “the most dramatic faced by the agency anywhere in the world.”

In May 2001 the IMF approved a three-year arrangement for Guinea to “foster macroeconomic stability, promote growth, improve social services and reduce poverty.” The country underwent a dramatic economic slowdown in 2003, with GDP growth declining to 1.2 percent. In addition, inflation rose to 14.8 percent. The economic contraction was the result of a range of factors, including poor harvests and a slump in manufacturing caused by significant problems with public utilities. The most significant negative consequence was a major rise in unemployment, with some estimates placing it as high as 70 percent. Meanwhile, food and fuel prices doubled.

Government reform of its tariff and auditing systems, along with other reforms, have led to promises of $800 million in debt relief and up to $82 million in economic aid as part of its arrangement with the IMF. However, delays in addressing structural problems, such as privatizing key industries, led some sources to withhold aid.

The economic forecast for 2005 was not much improved, with inflation expected to remain high and real GDP growth of only 3 percent. In an effort to improve structural reforms, reduce poverty, and bolster economic stability, the IMF approved a staff-monitored program for Guinea in 2005–2006, and noted that initial benchmarks had been met. Still, fund advisers cited the need for better monetary control, reform of public utilities, and a flexible exchange rate.

Government and Politics

Political Background

Historically part of the regional kingdom of Ghana, Songhai, and Mali, Guinea was incorporated into the French colonial empire in the late nineteenth century. Post–World War II colonial policy led to increasing political activity by indigenous groups, and in 1947 the Democratic Party of Guinea (PDG) was founded. Under the leadership of Ahmed Sékou TOURÉ, the PDG pushed for independence, and, following rejection of membership in the French Community in a referendum held September 28, 1958, Guinea became the first of France’s African colonies to achieve complete independence. Since the PDG already held 58 of the 60 seats in the Territorial Assembly, Sékou Touré automatically became president upon establishment of the republic on October 2, 1958. Although the Soviet Union came to Guinea’s aid following the abrupt withdrawal of French technical personnel and a collateral crippling of the new nation’s fragile economy, Soviet nationals were expelled in 1961 after being charged with involvement in a teachers’ strike.

Plots and alleged plots have dominated Guinea’s history; at one time or another the United States, Britain, France, West Germany, the Soviet Union, and other countries have been accused of conspiring against the regime. The most dramatic incident occurred in November 1970 when Guinea was invaded by a force composed of Guinean dissidents and elements of the Portuguese army. The action was strongly condemned by the United Nations and resulted in a wave of arrests and executions. In July 1976 Diallo TELLI, the minister of justice and former secretary general of the Organization of African Unity (OAU, subsequently the African Union—AU), was arrested on charges of Political Status: Independent republic since October 2, 1958; under one-party presidential regime until military coup of April 3, 1984; multiparty constitution approved by referendum of December 23, 1990, providing for five-year transition to civilian government.

Area: 94,925 sq. mi. (245,857 sq. km.).

Population: 7,156,406 (1996C); 8,603,000 (2005E). Both figures include refugees from Liberia and Sierra Leone, estimated at 640,000 in 1996.

Major Urban Center (2005E): CONAKRY (1,478,000).

Official Language: French, pending adoption of Soussou or Malinké. (Six other tribal languages are also spoken.)

Monetary Unit: Guinea Franc (market rate July 1, 2006: 5007 francs = $1US).

President of the Republic: Gen. Lansana CONTÉ (Party of Unity and Progress); named president by the Military Committee for National Recovery (CMRN) on April 5, 1984, following the deposition on April 3 of Lansana BEAVOGUI, who had been named acting president upon the death of Ahmed Sékou TOURÉ on March 26; popularly elected for a five-year term on December 19, 1993, and inaugurated on January 29, 1994; reelected to a second five-year term on December 14, 1998; reelected to a third term of seven years on December 21, 2003.

Prime Minister: Vacant, following the president's dismissal of Cellou Dalein DIALLO on April 5, 2006.

organizing an "anti-Guinean front" supported financially by France, the Côte d'Ivoire, Senegal, and the United States. Observers viewed Telli's possible complicity in a conspiracy, coupled with evidence of discontent within the people's militia, as indicative of a potentially serious threat to the Touré regime (the severity of which reportedly prompted the flight of nearly one-quarter of Guinea's population to neighboring countries). Subsequently, French sources reported that Telli had been assassinated in prison while awaiting trial.

President Touré was sworn in for the fifth time on May 14, 1982, after an election five days earlier in which he was credited with close to 100 percent of the votes cast. However, on March 26, 1984, Africa's longest-serving chief executive died while undergoing heart surgery in the United States. Prime Minister Lansana BEAVOGUI immediately assumed office as acting president, but on April 5 a group of junior military officers seized power in a bloodless coup and announced the appointments of Col. Lansana CONTÉ as president of the Republic and Col. Diarra TRAORÉ as prime minister. Despite Touré's legendary status, the military found themselves in control of what had been described as a police state, with widespread corruption permeating both governmental and party bureaucracies and an economy in shambles. While immediate action was taken by the postcoup administration to reduce political repression, the malfunctioning state-controlled economy presented a more intractable challenge.

Following the April 1984 takeover, power struggles were reported between President Conté and the internationally visible Traoré, the former consolidating his power by abolishing the prime minister's post and demoting Traoré to education minister in a December cabinet reshuffle. Subsequently, on July 4, 1985, while President Conté was out of the country, army elements led by Traoré declared the dissolution of the "corrupt" Conté administration and occupied sections of Conakry. The coup attempt was quelled by loyalist forces prior to the president's return on July 5, most of those involved being arrested, pending trial by military courts. Traoré and his co-conspirators were executed in jail shortly after their imprisonment, although there was no official confirmation of their deaths until 1987.

In late 1988 Conté himself criticized the corruption and "transitory" nature of the first four years of his regime. In an effort to counter domestic opposition to his stringent economic programs and inspire the return of Guinean expatriates, he called on men and women "without regard to their abode" to join in the drafting of a bipartisan constitution, which was approved by referendum on December 23, 1990.

On January 9, 1992, in keeping with the spirit of the new basic law, which called for a separation of powers between executive and legislative organs of government, General Conté relinquished the presidency of the quasi-legislative Transitional Committee for National Recovery (CTRN, under Constitution and government, below), while remaining president of the republic. Despite widespread popular protests during the remainder of 1992, the regime rejected appeals for a national conference and countered objections to the pace and breadth of reform by adopting draft laws increasing penalties for the organization of violent demonstrations and banning unauthorized public meetings.

In April 1993 the administration announced plans to hold presidential and legislative elections in the last quarter of the year; however, unrest continued as General Conté rebuffed the opposition's call for an independent electoral commission and all-party talks. In September the government, ignoring the opposition's demand for simultaneous polling, scheduled presidential elections for December 5, with legislative balloting to follow 60 days later. Furthermore, in the wake of violent clashes September 28 and 29 in Conakry, Conté banned all opposition demonstrations until after the elections.

On December 19, 1993, Lansana Conté retained the presidency, leading an 8-candidate field with 51 percent of the vote in polling marred by at least 12 deaths and charges of widespread irregularities. On December 23 the Supreme Court annulled voting results in two opposition districts where second-place finisher Alpha CONDÉ of the Rally of the Guinean People (RPG) had reportedly secured 90 percent of the vote, and on January 4, 1994, the court confirmed the incumbent's victory, ignoring opposition calls for a second round of balloting.

After three postponements, a National Assembly poll was held on June 11, 1995, with 21 of 46 legalized parties participating. Conté's Party of Unity and Progress (PUP) was credited with an absolute majority of 71 of 114 seats and the runner-up RPG with 19, the remainder being distributed across eight other contestants. Most opposition groups challenged the results, although foreign observers indicated that irregularities had been relatively isolated.

On July 5, 1995, the RPG, the Party for Renewal and Progress (PRP), and the Union for the New Republic (UNR), who among them controlled 37 seats, announced their intention to boycott the assembly and joined with nine other opposition parties to form the Coordination of Democratic Opposition (Codem). The new formation was denounced by the government, and Conté refused its entreaties to engage in extraparliamentary negotiations. Subsequently, Codem abandoned the boycott, and the inaugural session of the first democratically elected Guinean Assembly opened on October 5, 1995.

On February 2 and 3, 1996, 50 people were killed and more than 100 others wounded when approximately 2,000 soldiers demonstrating for higher wages and better working conditions rampaged through Conakry, ultimately attacking the presidential palace and taking the president hostage. During his brief captivity Conté reached agreement with the soldiers on amnesty for the mutineers, salary increases, and reform of the armed services; however, following the retreat of the rebellious troops, Conté dismissed reports that their attack on his government had occurred spontaneously and accused opposition activists of helping to organize the failed "coup" attempt. Thereafter, despite warnings from the insurgents that the "entire army" would retaliate if any of their comrades were arrested, by June at least 52 people had been detained for their roles in the incident, including Lt. Lamine DIARRA, one of the two alleged masterminds of the rebellion, his alleged co-conspirator, Cmdr. Gbago ZOUMANIGUI, having reportedly fled to Libya. (In August some 40 of the detainees were released after the state prosecutor ruled there was insufficient evidence against them.)

On July 9, 1996, Conté named an economist, Sidya TOURÉ, as Guinea's first prime minister since 1984. Touré's appointment was followed on July 17 by a major cabinet reshuffling that included the departure of interior minister Alseny René GOMEZ, theretofore considered the president's second-in-command. On November 3 Conté, in an apparent attempt to reestablish control of military and security forces, appointed himself to head a newly created national defense ministry. The decision came only one day after government forces allegedly orchestrated an attack against Alpha Condé and his RPG supporters that left over 50 people injured. In early 1997, the president proclaimed executive authority over the national bank.

In February 1998 the newly created State Security Council convened the trial of the military personnel allegedly responsible for the February 1996 uprising. However, in March the court proceedings were overshadowed by deadly clashes between opposition activists and government security forces in Conakry that left at least nine dead and a number of opposition figures imprisoned. In response to the government's subsequent refusal to release the jailed militants, opposition legislators affiliated with Codem boycotted the National Assembly. In September relations between the opposition and government deteriorated further when the government dismissed the opposition's call for the establishment of an independent electoral commission and created an electoral affairs committee, which it charged with preparing for presidential elections in December. In October tensions between the Conté administration and National Assembly President El Hadj Boubacar Biro DIALLO reached a nadir as the latter was suspended from the ruling party for criticizing the government's treatment of the alleged February 1996 insurgents (most of whom had been convicted and sentenced to prison in late September).

At presidential elections on December 14, 1998, President Conté won reelection, capturing 56.12 percent of the vote and easily outdistancing his four competitors. As anticipated, the polling results were immediately challenged by the opposition, whose top two contenders, Mamadou Boye BA of the Union for Progress and Renewal (UPR) and Alpha Condé, had officially secured 24.63 and 16.58 percent, respectively. On March 8, 1999, the president appointed Lamine SIDIMÉ (theretofore head of the Supreme Court) as prime minister, with no official explanation given for the change; on March 12 Conté named a moderately reshuffled government, which was sworn in on April 10.

Twice-postponed municipal elections were held on June 25, 2000, with the PUP winning more than three-quarters of the seats. Subsequently, on November 11, 2001, 98 percent of those voting in a national referendum endorsed a controversial constitutional amendment permitting President Conté to run for a third term in 2003, with the term of office being extended from five to seven years.

The PUP dominated the June 30, 2002, legislative balloting, securing 85 seats; the UPR finished second with 20 seats. Amid severe controversy over electoral procedures and government control of the media, the major opposition parties boycotted the presidential election of December 21, 2003, at which Conté was reelected with an official 95.6 percent of the vote.

In late February 2004, President Conté dismissed Prime Minister Sidimé without explanation, and François Lonseny FALL was appointed on March 1 to head a reshuffled cabinet with a broad mandate to improve economic conditions. However, following a severe breakdown in relations with Conté, Fall resigned on April 29 and went into exile in the United States. A new prime minister was not appointed until December 9, when Cellou Dalein DIALLO was named to the post.

The PUP swept the postponed municipal elections on December 18, 2005, securing more than three-quarters of the seats. On April 5, 2006, the president ordered a cabinet reshuffle that granted more control to Diallo, but hours later, after a surprise rescinding of the cabinet changes, the prime minister was dismissed for alleged gross misconduct.

Constitution and Government

The 1982 constitution was suspended and the Democratic Party of Guinea dissolved by the Military Committee for National Recovery (Comité Militaire de Redressement National—CMRN) in the wake of the April 1984 coup. Subsequently, Guinea was ruled by a president and Council of Ministers named by the CMRN, although the committee itself was dissolved on January 16, 1991, in favor of a Transitional Committee for National Recovery (Comité Transitoire de Redressement National—CTRN). The new body, which was to govern the country until the election of an all-civilian administration, included equal numbers of military and civilian personnel.

In a decree issued in May 1984, President Conté ordered that the name “People’s Revolutionary Republic of Guinea,” adopted in 1978, be dropped in favor of the country’s original name, the Republic of Guinea. Subsequently, he announced the formation of a “truly independent judiciary” and revival of the theretofore outlawed legal profession. In August 1985 a Court of State Security was established, encompassing a supreme court judge, two military officers, and two attorneys, to try “crimes against the state.”

A 50-member committee, led by Foreign Affairs Minister Maj. Jean TRAORÉ, was appointed in October 1988 to draft a new constitution, which was reportedly approved by 99 percent of the participants in a referendum on December 23, 1990. The new loi fondamentale validated replacement of the CMRN by the CTRN, which in turn yielded authority in 1995 to a civilian regime encompassing a president and unicameral legislature, both popularly elected under two-party (subsequently multiparty) auspices, and an independent judiciary. A presidential decree on June 19, 1997, established a consultative Economic and Social Council whose 45 members are appointed by the president upon the recommendation of various civic institutions.

The country is administratively organized into four main geographic divisions—Maritime, Middle, Upper, and Forest Guinea—which are subdivided into eight regions—Boké, Faranah, Kankan, Kindia, Labé, Mamou, N’Zérékoré, and Conakry. The Conakry region is subdivided into five “urban communes,” while the remaining seven regions are subdivided into a total of 33 prefectures.

Foreign Relations

President Touré’s brand of militant nationalism and his frequent allegations of externally provoked conspiracy led to strained international relations, including diplomatic ruptures with France (1965–1975), Britain (1967–1968), and Ghana (1966–1973). By January 1978, however, Conakry had moved to ease long-standing tensions with its immediate neighbors. Shortly thereafter, during a meeting in Monrovia, Liberia, attended by the presidents of Gambia, Guinea, the Côte d’Ivoire, Liberia, Senegal, and Togo, diplomatic relations with Senegal and the Côte d’Ivoire were restored, the participants pledging bilateral and multilateral cooperation in both political and economic spheres. In October 1980 Guinea acceded to the Mano River Union (MRU), formed seven years earlier to promote economic cooperation between Liberia and Sierra Leone, while in March 1982 Touré called for the unification of Guinea and Mali, arguing that economically the two countries were “two lungs in a single body.” In subsequent years Conakry also increased its visibility in the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS).

In December 1978 French President Giscard d’Estaing visited Guinea, the first Western leader to do so in over two decades. The extremely warm reception he received was viewed as part of a broad effort to scale down assistance from Soviet and other Eastern Bloc countries in favor of Western aid and investment. In keeping with the policy shift, President Touré made a number of trips to the United States, Canada, and Western Europe from 1979 to 1983. However, distrust of the “father of African socialism” and an overvalued local currency discouraged large-scale Western involvement. By contrast, in the wake of the 1984 coup Prime Minister Traoré negotiated a broad aid package with France, while French and other foreign investment increased significantly upon the adoption of monetary and fiscal reforms recommended by the IMF.

Despite Guinean fears of a new “colonialism,” raised by the influx of foreign merchants and military advisers into the capital, Conakry continued to pursue external assistance in developing its infrastructure and mineral resources, while concluding resource-development agreements with Morocco, Guinea-Bissau, and Liberia in 1989.

In early 1990 an influx of refugees fleeing the Liberian civil war quickly exhausted the reserves of Guinea's southern border region, and in May President Conté called for international aid to support refugees claimed to number 200,000. In August Conakry deployed troops to seal its southern border after a rebel incursion in alleged reprisal for Guinea's participation in ECOWAS activity in Liberia.

In September 1992, after a three-month cease-fire aimed at inducing Liberian and Sierra Leonean rebels to disarm and accept a full amnesty, Guinean and Sierra Leonean troops resumed their joint efforts to repel rebels in eastern and southern Sierra Leone. Meanwhile, the publication of a report claiming that Guinea had trained a Liberian paramilitary force assigned to interim Liberian president Amos Sawyer led to the detainment of its author. In August 1994, 35,000 Liberians were reported to have fled into Guinea, raising the five-year total to approximately 500,000.

In April 1996 Mali recalled its ambassador and criticized the Conté administration after Guinean troops stormed into the Malian embassy in Conakry in search of a leader of the February military uprising. Clashes between Malian and Guinean residents were subsequently reported in April and October near the border.

In April 1997 Belgium closed its consular offices after Conakry refused to release three Belgian nationals it had arrested in March for allegedly plotting to overthrow the government. Meanwhile, observers reported that Guinean security forces had arrested and then released 75 Liberian refugees on similar charges. Increasing incidents of "banditry" and violence along the Guinean-Liberian border were among the topics discussed by President Conté and Liberian President Charles Taylor during a summit in late 1997.

Amid reports that rebels from Sierra Leone had attacked a town in southern Guinea, in early December 1998 Conakry announced that it was closing its borders until after the presidential polling scheduled for December 14. Further Sierra Leonean cross-border activity was reported in early 1999, and in April Liberian troops threatened to enter Guinean territory in pursuit of Liberian antigovernment rebels, whom Monrovia accused Conakry of at least tacitly supporting. In August at least two dozen people died when militants, allegedly operating from a base in Liberia, attacked a town in southern Guinea, and in mid-September Charles Taylor claimed that Guinean forces had killed several hundred Liberians during raids in April and August. Conté subsequently called his Liberian counterpart a "warmonger," although at the same time insisting that no problems existed between the two countries' peoples.

In March 2000 Guinea, Liberia, and Sierra Leone reportedly agreed to the immediate reactivation of the MRU secretariat. (Due to civil wars the body had been dormant since 1990.) However, Guinea and Liberia were subsequently described as still "trading destabilization accusations." (See Current issues, below, and article on Liberia for additional information.)

Economic relations between France and Guinea continued to remain strong through the early years of the 2000s, but Conakry also began to develop stronger security ties with the United States. The United States has provided military training and equipment for Guinea, including radio and vehicles, in a program to improve Conakry's military capabilities for regional peacekeeping missions. The appointment of Prime Minister Fall, an English-speaker and widely seen as pro-American, as opposed to pro-French, was perceived as a sign of Conté's desire to improve relations with the United States. One manifestation of the increased ties between the two countries was a decrease in Guinean support for Liberian rebel groups, as a result of diplomatic pressure from the United States, and broad support from Conakry for the United Nations peacekeeping mission in Liberia after the departure of Taylor from that country. By mid-2006, a marked decrease in violence at the border with Liberia was reported.

Current Issues

Legislative elections, originally due in June 2000, were initially rescheduled for the following

November. However, they were again delayed (with the approval of the opposition parties) in the wake of heavy fighting along the borders with Sierra Leone and Liberia. The conflict involved disputed control of diamond-producing areas in all three countries. President Conté charged that the Liberian government was supporting Guinean rebel groups (see Political Parties and Groups, below), much like Liberia was accused of supporting rebels in Sierra Leone to exercise de facto control of diamond mines. The conflict primarily pitted the Guinean and Sierra Leonean armies and Liberian rebels on one side and the Liberian military and Guinean and Sierra Leonean rebels on the other. Among other things, burgeoning regional war exacerbated the refugee crisis in Guinea, Conakry alleging that refugees in Guinea from Sierra Leone were harboring antigovernment rebels.

ECOWAS deployed troops in Guinean border areas in December 2000, and the completion of a peace accord in Sierra Leone in May 2001 (see article on Sierra Leone) appeared to offer the opportunity for resumption of normal political activity in Guinea. However, the opposition parties strongly objected to the November referendum that permitted a third, extended term for President Conté, calling the initiative a “constitutional coup d’état” designed to make Conté “president for life.” (Although the government reported a turnout of 87 percent for the referendum, the opposition, which had called for a boycott, described that figure as outlandishly inflated.) When the opposition announced plans to boycott the new legislative elections scheduled for late December, the administration once again postponed the balloting indefinitely. The legislative poll finally took place on June 30, 2002, although most opposition parties boycotted the balloting.

Under heavy international pressure, the government established an interparty commission in 2003 in an effort to convince the opposition to return to full political participation. However, negotiations collapsed in September as the government reportedly refused to relinquish its tight control of the state media. Consequently, another opposition boycott was called for the December presidential election, at which Conté was challenged by only one minor candidate after six others were rejected because of “technical errors” in their candidacy papers. Not surprisingly, international observers described the balloting as neither free nor fair.

The appointment of reformist Prime Minister Fall, described as “pro-American,” in March 2004 was seen as part of ongoing efforts to improve relations with the United States. (Under U.S. pressure, Conakry had earlier decreased its support for Liberian rebel groups and endorsed the UN peacekeeping mission in Liberia.) However, Fall left office in less than two months to protest what he perceived as continued political repression and the unwillingness of Conté to pursue economic reform. From exile in the United States, Fall called upon the Guinean opposition parties to coalesce in order to challenge the Conté regime.

A number of public protests broke out in September 2004, and, following his appointment in December, reformist Prime Minister Diallo attempted to relaunch a dialogue with the opposition. In early 2005 he moved to lift a ban on private radio stations, but little progress ensued in his attempts to win over the opposition. Meanwhile, attention focused on the frail health of President Conté, for whom there appeared to be no obvious successor. The government reported an assassination attempt against Conté in January 2005, and reports surfaced about fears of a potential military coup if the president failed to live out his term. Despite calls late in the year by the Republican Front for Democratic Change (Front de L’Alternance Démocratique—FRAD) for the president to step down in favor of a government of national unity, observers pointed to ethnic and other differences among the opposition that could render such an alternative unlikely. The government was bolstered by an overwhelming PUP victory in December’s municipal elections, postponed from 2004 because of allegations of widespread fraud, which were repeated after the 2005 balloting.

The president’s deteriorating health (he was taken to Switzerland in March 2006, reportedly for emergency medical attention) prompted rising concern about the country’s uncertain political future. In Conté’s absence, a strike to protest low wages shut down the country for five days. As a result, the government reached an accord with unions that provided a 30 percent wage increase for civil service workers and a 10 percent tax cut on state employees' salaries. Further, an unprecedented National Consultation of opposition groups, unions, women's and youth groups, and civil societies resulted in unanimity on the need for a government of national unity to "rescue" the country. However, disarray followed a state radio broadcast on April 5, 2006, announcing extensive cabinet changes that bolstered the influence of Prime Minister Diallo. Within hours it was announced that the changes were rescinded and that Diallo had been dismissed because of alleged serious misconduct. Observers attributed the move to internal power struggles, raising questions about who was really in charge and who might assume control after Conté's death. For his part, Diallo denied claims that he was under house arrest and reiterated his support for Conté.

On a more positive note, the European Union in 2006 granted some $27 million in aid to help rebuild areas in Guinea's southeastern Forest Region, which was destroyed during conflicts in the late 1990s and early 2000s.

Political Parties and Groups

Prior to the 1984 coup, Guinea was a typical one-party state, according a monopoly position to the Democratic Party of Guinea (Parti Démocratique de Guinée—PDG) in all aspects of public life. The CMRN's initial promise of an introduction of "democracy" was reaffirmed in 1989 by President Conté, and the constitution approved in December 1990 included provisions for two parties, with numerous others being recognized in 1991 and 1992.

During 1993 a number of somewhat transitory opposition coalitions emerged, including Democratic Change (Changement Démocratique—CD), a 30-party grouping under whose banner activists clashed with police in Conakry in September. The principal opposition alliances in the run-up to the December presidential balloting were AGUNA (below) and the BPG, while nine of the nearly four dozen recognized parties were reportedly members of a "Presidential Tendency" headed by the PUP, below.

In August 1995 the "Presidential Tendency" splintered because of the failure of the PUP and a number of its erstwhile allies to reach agreement on a new assembly president; subsequently, the defecting parties formed the Alliance of Democratic Forces (Alliance pour les Forces Démocratiques—AFD), under the leadership of Oumar CAMARA. (Excluded from recent electoral preparations, the AFD has described the upcoming balloting as "useless" and asserted that the electorate felt "broad contempt" for both the Presidential Tendency and the Codem.)

Two somewhat overlapping opposition alliances were formed in 2001 to attempt to stop Conté from running for a third term. In July the UFR, the UFDG, and others formed the Democratic Change in 2003 (Alternance Démocratique en 2003) to oppose the upcoming referendum on amending the constitution. Subsequently, opposition activity focused on the Movement against the Referendum and for Democratic Change (Mouvement Contre le Referendum et pour l'Alternance Démocratique—Morad), formed by the Codem, UFR, PGP, and four other parties.

Presidential Group

Party of Unity and Progress (Parti de l'Unité et du Progrès—PUP). The PUP nominated Gen. Lansana Conté as its presidential candidate in August 1993, subsequently becoming the core component of an informal regime-supportive coalition that included the Democratic Rally for Development (Rassemblement Démocratique pour le Développement—RDD), led by Georges Koly GUILAVOGUI.

At the PUP's first national congress held April 4–7, 1997, Conté was named as the party's candidate for upcoming presidential elections, and Aboubacar Somparé's theretofore interim appointment as PUP secretary general was made permanent.

In January 1998 members of the PUP's youth wing launched the Movement for Lansana Conté's Reelection (Mouvement pour la Réélection de Lansana Conté—MORELAC). In June the presidential supporters formed the Association of Movements Affiliated to the Party of Unity and Progress, a coalition of some 200 parties and groups chaired by Karim KANE. The groups were successful in the 2001 referendum to allow Conté to stand for a third term. In early 2005 feuding between Conté loyalists and those supporting the president's unofficial heir apparent, Youth Minister Fode Soumah, was reported. Late in the year, the party made a strong showing in both rural and urban areas in municipal elections.

Leaders: Gen. Lansana CONTÉ (President of the Republic), Sékou KONATE (Secretary General).

Democratic Party of Guinea–African Democratic Rally (Parti Démocratique de Guinée–Rassemblement Démocratique Africain—PDG-RDA). The leader of the PDG-RDA (a revival of former President Touré's party) secured less than 1 percent of the vote in the 1993 presidential balloting. In the wake of its poor showing the party splintered, with dissident members forming the Democratic Party of Guinea–Renewed (Parti Démocratique de Guinée–Renouvellement—PDG-R). In December 1994 the party suffered yet another mass defection when members claiming continued allegiance to former president Touré withdrew to launch the Democratic Party of Guinea–Ahmed Sekou Touré (Parti Démocratique de Guinée–Ahmed Sekou Touré—PDG-AST). In the 2002 legislative elections, the PDG-RDA won three seats.

Leader: Ismael Mohammed Gassim GUSHEIN.

Union for National Progress–Party of Unity and Development (Union pour le Progrès National–Parti pour L'Unité et le Développement—UPN-PUD). The PUD was one of seven parties that formed a coalition, Guinean Alliance for National Unity (Alliance Guinéenne pour L'Unité Nationale—AGUNA), to support the presidential candidacy of Faciné TOURÉ. The PUD later merged with the pro-Conté UPN under the leadership of Mamadou Bhoie Barry. The UPN-PUD won one seat in the 2002 legislative elections (the seat was won by Barry). Barry was the sole challenger to Conté in the 2003 presidential election.

Leader: Mamadou Bhoie BARRY.

Other Parties and Groups

Republican Front for Democratic Change (Front de L'Alternance Démocratique—FRAD). The FRAD was originally formed by a coalition of four parties in 2002 and then grew to include seven of the main opposition parties. FRAD emerged from previous anti-Conté groupings, principally the Coordination of the Democratic Opposition (Coordination de l'Opposition Démocratique—Codem). The Codem was formed by the RPG, PRP, UNR, and a number of other smaller parties to mount a legislative boycott in response to alleged ballot fraud at the June 1995 poll. In early February 1996 the group supported President Conté's handling of the military unrest in Conakry; however, after the president alleged that opposition activists had been involved in the uprising, Codem parliamentarians boycotted the assembly. Thereafter, intracoalition conflict was reported between the PRP's Siradiou Diallo, who advocated establishing a dialogue with the administration, and the RPG's Alpha Condé, who accused the regime of harassment and the illegal detention of opposition activists.

In late 1996 the Codem announced that it was forming a "resistance militia" in response to violent attacks against its members and to fend off security forces attempting to arrest its supporters. Thereafter, the coalition criticized the Conté administration for reducing the prime minister's powers. Underscoring its increasing hostility toward Conté's policies, the Codem in early 1998 established an Executive Secretariat to coordinate "acts of resistance" against the government. In March a number of opposition leaders, including the UNR's Mamadou Ba, were arrested after violent clashes erupted in Conakry between opposition protesters and government forces. Subsequently, the Codem boycotted legislative proceedings in an effort to persuade the government to release its imprisoned members. (In June Ba was given a “lenient verdict” and released.)

Codem boycotted the 2001 presidential referendum and announced that it would also boycott the upcoming legislative elections. In 2002 a split emerged in Codem over participation in the presidential elections, leading to the break-up of Codem and the creation of the FRAD by parties that planned to boycott the elections. The main difference between Codem and the FRAD was the absence of the Union for Progress and Renewal (see below). Nonetheless, many of the most prestigious and well-respected opposition figures, including Condé, Ba, Touré, and Boubacar Biro Diallo (then president of the assembly), joined the coalition. The FRAD led the opposition to the presidential election in 2003 and organized a succession of protests and demonstrations against the regime. In response, most of the FRAD’s leadership figures, including Condé, Ba, and Touré, have been arrested for brief periods. In 2005 FRAD leaders called on the president to resign to allow for transition to a government of national unity.

Leaders: Mamadou BA (President), Alpha CONDÉ (RPG), Sidya TOURÉ (UFR), Jean-Marie DORÉ (UPG).

Rally of the Guinean People (Rassemblement Populaire Guinéen—RPG). In early 1991 Alpha Condé received an enthusiastic welcome from RPG members upon his return from exile. Subsequently, on May 19 government troops violently disrupted the party’s attempt to hold an inaugural meeting.

In February 1993 the RPG and the UNR, below, were accused of inciting antigovernment violence in rural communities, and Condé subsequently appealed unsuccessfully for a joint opposition candidate in the December presidential poll, at which he was runner-up with a 19.55 vote share.

In 1994 the RPG adopted a new platform urging “peace, justice, and solidarity,” and in April Condé reiterated the party’s desire “to prepare for parliamentary elections in a transparent manner.” Nonetheless, RPG activists subsequently accused the government of attempting to assassinate their leader, and in September 1995 at least one person was killed when RPG militants clashed with government security forces in Nzerekore.

On November 2, 1996, already-confrontational relations between the RPG and the government reached their nadir when government security forces allegedly organized an attack on a motorcade carrying Condé, and an RPG building was attacked by arsonists. Furthermore, on November 19 two prominent RPG leaders, Saliou CISSÉ and Keita BENTOUBA, were arrested. RPG leaders derided the arrests, reportedly describing them as a “dangerous, resounding slip-up,” and in late December Codem officials cited the November incidents as catalysts for their decision to launch a militia.

The Codem’s legislative boycott in early 1998 was prompted in part by the ransacking of the RPG’s headquarters and the arrest of two RPG parliamentarians. Thereafter, in early December, Alpha Condé returned from self-imposed exile to campaign for the presidency. Despite the large turnouts that greeted his public appearances, the RPG candidate finished a distant third at the polling. Furthermore, on December 15 Condé was arrested as he prepared to enter Côte d’Ivoire, and a number of RPG activists were jailed for their alleged participation in the violent unrest that followed the release of the polling results. Having garnered substantial regional and global interest, the trial of Condé and more than 40 codefendants concluded in September 2000 with Condé being found guilty of sedition. His prison sentence was cut short by a presidential pardon in May 2001. Condé returned to Conakry in 2005 after two years of self-imposed exile in Paris to help organize the party ahead of the December municipal elections (in which the RPG won only a handful of seats.)

Leaders: Alpha CONDÉ (Secretary General and 1998 presidential candidate), Ahmed CISSÉ.

Union for the Progress of Guinea (Union pour le Progrès de Guinée—UPG). At the December 1993 balloting UPG secretary general Jean-Marie Doré secured less than 1 percent of the vote; nevertheless, Doré emerged as a prominent Codem spokesperson after the UPG secured 2 seats at the 1995 assembly balloting.

At presidential balloting in December 1998 Doré secured just 1.73 percent of the vote. The UPG left Codem in May 1996. Although the UPG took part in the 2002 legislative elections and won three seats, it boycotted the 2003 presidential elections. Doré is one of the main spokespersons for the FRAD.

Leader: Jean-Marie DORÉ (Secretary General and 1998 presidential candidate).

Union of Democratic Forces of Guinea (Union des Forces Démocratiques de Guinée—UFDG). The UFDG was one of the first parties applying for legal status in 1991. Its leader, Amadou Bâ Oury, was arrested on October 27, 1992, for alleged involvement in an attempted assassination of President Conté 11 days earlier, but he was released shortly thereafter in apparent acknowledgement by authorities that false testimony had been given against him.

In May 1996 the Union resurfaced as the leading opponent to the National Assembly's adoption of a law that rehabilitated former president Sékou Touré, calling it a "trivialization" of Touré's crimes. After he left the UPR, Mamadou Ba joined the UFDG and was elected president in October 2002. In 2005, Ba distanced himself from some FRAD members and expressed support for Prime Minister Diallo.

Leader: Mamadou BA.

Union of Republican Forces (Union des Forces Républicains—UFR). A small grouping formed in 1992, the UFR elected former prime minister Sidya Touré as its president in May 2000. The UFR subsequently was reported to have filed a suit against the government for having prevented its candidates from contesting the June municipal balloting. In 2004 Touré was cleared of charges accusing him of plotting to overthrow the government.

Leader: Sidya TOURÉ (President), Bakary ZOUMANIGUI (Secretary General).

The FRAD also includes three minor parties: the African Democratic Party (Parti Démocratique Africain—PDA), led by Marcel CROS; the Djama Party (Parti Djama), a moderate Islamist party led by Mohamed Mansour KABA; and the Union of Democratic Forces (Union des Forces Démocratiques—UFD), led by Alpha Ibrahim SOW.

Union for Progress and Renewal (Union pour le Progrès et le Renouveau—UPR). The UPR was launched in September 1998 as a merger of the Party of Renewal and Progress (Parti pour le Renouveau et le Progrès—PRP) and the Union for the New Republic (Union pour la Nouvelle République—UNR). While leadership of the new grouping was assumed by Siradiou Diallo, the PRP's secretary general and 1993 presidential candidate, the UNR's Mamadou Boye Ba was named the UPR's presidential candidate. Ba, who had been detained from March to June for his alleged role in the violent clashes in Conakry, finished second at the December balloting with 22 percent of the vote.

The UPR factionalized in 2002, with members who advocated dialogue with Conté and participation in elections remaining in the UPR under Diallo. Those UPR members who supported boycotting the upcoming legislative elections joined the Union of Democratic Forces of Guinea, of which Ba became president. Diallo died on March 14, 2004, of a heart attack, and the UPR elected Ousmane Bah as leader of the party. The UPR reportedly withdrew from the assembly in protest following municipal elections of December 2005, which the party claimed were "nothing short of electoral robbery."

Leader: Ousmane BAH (President).

National Alliance for Progress (Alliance Nationale pour le Progrès—ANP). The ANP formed prior to the 1995 legislative elections but remained a minor party for most of its history. However, it was one of the few opposition parties not to boycott the 2002 legislative elections, and it won two seats in the assembly.

Leader: Sagno MOUSSA.

People's Party of Guinea (Parti Guinéen du Peuple—PGP). The PGP is an anti-Conté socialist party. At presidential balloting in December 1998 the PGP's candidate, Charles Pascal Tolno, received less than 1 percent of the vote. In 2003 Tolno was rejected as a presidential candidate by the Supreme Court. Jean-Marie Doré, now of the UPG, formerly was affiliated with the PGP.

Leader: Charles Pascal TOLNO (1998 presidential candidate).

Other registered parties include the Democratic Union of Guinea (Union Démocratique de Guinée—UDG), led by Sekou SYLLA; the National Democratic Alliance (Alliance Démocratique Nationale—ADN), led by Antoine SOROMO; the Guinean Labor Party (Parti Guinéen du Travail—PGT); the Ecological Party of Guinea—the Greens (Parti Écologiste de Guinée—Les Verts—PEG—Les Verts), led by Oumar SYLLA; and the Rally for Peace and Development (Rassemblement pour la Paix et le Développement—RPD).

Rebel Groups

In September 2000 the Guinea Liberation Movement (Mouvement pour la Libération de Guinée—MLG), suspected of working closely with Sierra Leone's Revolutionary United Front (RUF, see under Sierra Leone), reportedly infiltrated Guinean territory and engaged in fighting with the government forces. Another rebel group, the Rally for Democratic Forces of Guinea (Rassemblement des Forces Démocratiques de Guinée—RFDG), claimed responsibility for an attack on a town on the Liberian border.

In August 2001, Nfaly KABA, the leader of the Union of the Forces for a New Guinea (Union des Forces pour une Nouvelle Guinée—UFNG), vowed war on Guinea if President Conté did not step down. The UFNG's armed wing was reportedly led by former Major Gbago ZOUMANIGUI. In September a new exile opposition movement was formed in Bamako, Mali, under the leadership of Sheikh Mohamed KABA. The movement reportedly adopted the rubric of the National Alliance of Democratic Patriots (Alliance Nationale des Patriotes Démocratiques—ANPD).

Legislature

The 210-member People's National Assembly (Assemblée Nationale Populaire), elected from a single PDG list for a seven-year term on January 27, 1980, was dissolved in April 1984. Balloting for a successor body, originally scheduled for November 1992, was rescheduled in April 1993 for the last quarter of the year, but did not in fact occur until June 11, 1995.

National Assembly (Assemblée Nationale). The current assembly is a 114-member body with a five-year mandate. One-third of its deputies are elected by majority vote in single-member districts, two-thirds on a national list vote with proportional representation.

At legislative balloting on June 30, 2002, the Party of Unity and Progress won 85 seats; the Union for Progress and Renewal, 20; Union for the Progress of Guinea, 3; the Democratic Party of Guinea—African Democratic Rally, 3; the National Alliance for Progress, 2; and the Union for National Progress—Party of Unity and Development, 1. Most major opposition parties boycotted the elections.

President: Aboubacar SOMPARÉ.

Communications

All mass media are owned or controlled by the government. The government in 1992 introduced a National Communication Council (Conseil Nationale de la Communication—CNC) as a presidentially appointed regulatory body with the stated aim of “protecting the media from government and special interest encroachment and manipulation.” However, the council was subsequently heavily criticized by human rights and media organizations for acting as a government tool to control and censor the media. Since the early 1990s numerous publications have been shut down permanently or temporarily, and journalists have been arrested and incarcerated.

Press

The press is subject to rigorous government censorship. The following have previously been published in Conakry: Fonike, government-owned daily; Horoya (Liberty, 20,000), weekly, in French and local languages; Journal Officiel de Guinée, fortnightly government organ; Le Travailleur de Guinée, monthly organ of the National Confederation of Guinean Workers. However, in late 1999 a Guinean media observer reported that of 40 independent newspapers once in publication only the following were still available: L'Indépendant, independent weekly; L'Indépendant Plus, weekly; Le Lynx, satirical weekly; L'Oeil, weekly; La Lance; Le Globe; and Le Nouvel Observateur.

News Agencies

The official news agency is Agence Guinéenne de Presse (AGP), which became operational in July 1986 as part of the UNESCO-supported West African News Agencies Development (WANAD) project. Xinhua, APN, and ITAR-TASS are represented in Conakry.

Broadcasting and Computing

The government-operated Radiodiffusion Télévision Guinéenne operates eight radio transmitting stations, with broadcasts in French, English, Portuguese, Arabic, and local languages. Television broadcasting, introduced in 1977, reaches some 376,000 TV sets, while 43,000 personal computers serviced 49,000 Internet users in 2003.

GUINEA-BISSAU

REPUBLIC OF GUINEA-BISSAU

República da Guiné-Bissau

The Country

Situated on the west coast of Africa between Senegal on the north and Guinea on the south, the Republic of Guinea-Bissau also includes the Bijagós Archipelago and the island of Bolama. The population is primarily of African descent (principal tribes include the Balante, Fulani, Mandyako, and Malinké), but there are smaller groups of mulattoes, Portuguese, and Lebanese. The majority continues to follow traditional religious beliefs; however, there is a significant Muslim population and a small Christian minority.

Agriculture employs the vast majority of the population, with peanuts typically producing two-thirds of export earnings. Other important exports are palm products, fish, and cattle, while such crops as cotton, sugar, and tobacco have been introduced in an effort to diversify the country's output; industry is dominated by state enterprises and mixed ventures. The chief mineral resource may be petroleum (the extent of on- and offshore reserves is uncertain, although a number of Western oil companies have signed exploration contracts with the government). Economic development has been hindered by insufficient capital, skilled labor, and transport facilities. Consequently, the country remains one of the poorest in the world.

On May 2, 1997, Guinea-Bissau, citing its desire to "improve its regional trade position," joined the West African Monetary Union (Union Monétaire Ouest-Africaine—UMOA), thus abandoning the Guinea Peso in favor of the CFA franc. In addition, the government launched comprehensive tax and civil service reform programs. After three years of steady annual increases (1995–1997), GDP declined in real terms by 21 percent in 1998 under the influence of civil war. Positive GDP growth (nearly 8 percent) returned in 1999 while annual inflation dropped to 2.1 compared to 8 percent in 1998. The International Monetary Fund (IMF) approved an emergency post-conflict assistance loan in January 2000 and a three-year debt reduction arrangement the following December. However, real GDP growth of only 0.2 percent was registered in 2001, and the IMF and other economic observers criticized the government for its handling of the economy.

In 2001 the IMF suspended debt relief to Guinea-Bissau because of the government's

Political Status: Achieved independence from Portugal on September 10, 1974; under rule of Revolutionary Council following coup of November 14, 1980; new constitution of May 16, 1984, amended on May 4, 1991; military control imposed following coup of May 8, 1999; present constitution promulgated July 7, 1999, under direction of military junta.

Area: 13,948 sq. mi. (36,125 sq. km.).

Population: 983,367 (1991C); 1,583,000 (2005E).

Major Urban Center (2005E): BISSAU (247,000).

Official Language: Portuguese (several local languages are also spoken).

Monetary Unit: CFA Franc (official rate July 1, 2006: 513.01 francs = $1US). (The CFA franc, previously pegged to the French franc, is now permanently pegged to the euro at 655.957 CFA francs = 1 euro.)

President: João Bernardo VIEIRA (independent); elected to a five-year term after second-round balloting on July 24, 2005, and sworn in on October 1, succeeding Henrique ROSA (nonparty), who had been installed as interim president following the military overthrow of Kumba YALA (Social Renewal Party) in 2003.

Prime Minister: Aristides GOMES (Pro-Vieira faction of the African Party for the Independence of Guinea and Cape Verde); appointed by the president and sworn in on November 2, 2005, to succeed Carlos GOMES (African Party for the Independence of Guinea and Cape Verde).

unwillingness to enact agreed-upon reforms. Conflict within the country led to a GDP decline of 7 percent in 2002; there was no measurable GDP growth in 2003. That year, donor states suspended aid after the government failed to demobilize ex-soldiers and continue economic restructuring. Following the coup of September 2003 and subsequent legislative elections, donors announced a limited resumption of aid in 2004, including $13 million from the World Bank.

Real GDP growth of about 2 percent was recorded for 2004 and 2005, though inflation remained at less than 1 percent. The country's economic situation remained "very difficult" following years of political instability and little new investment, according to the IMF, despite modest progress in tax reform and managing expenditures. The IMF in 2005 underscored the need to avoid domestic arrears as well as the need for more donor assistance.

Political Background

First discovered by the Portuguese mariner Nuno Tristão in 1446, the territory long known as Portuguese Guinea did not receive a final delimitation of its borders until 1905. Initially, the country was plundered by slave traders, and consequent hostility among the indigenous peoples resulted in uprisings in the early twentieth century. The area was eventually pacified by military means, and in 1952 it was formally designated as an Overseas Province of Portugal.

In 1956 a group of dissatisfied Cape Verdeans under the joint leadership of Amílcar CABRAL, Luís de Almeida CABRAL, Aristides PEREIRA, and Rafael BARBOSA formed the African Party for the Independence of Guinea and Cape Verde (Partido Africano da Independência da Guiné e Cabo Verde—PAIGC). Failing to win concessions from the Portuguese, the PAIGC, with assistance from Warsaw Pact nations, initiated an armed struggle in 1963, and by the early 1970s the PAIGC claimed to control two-thirds of the mainland territory. On January 20, 1973, Amílcar Cabral was assassinated in Conakry, Guinea, allegedly by PAIGC dissidents but with the apparent complicity of the Portuguese military. Six months later, Aristides Pereira and Cabral's brother, Luís, were confirmed as party leaders by a PAIGC congress.

A government was formally organized and independence declared on September 23 and 24, 1973. The Portuguese authorities claimed the move was a "propaganda stunt," but the coup in Portugal in April 1974 led to an informal cease-fire and negotiations with the rebel leaders. Although the talks failed to resolve the status of the Cape Verde Islands, an agreement signed August 26, 1974, provided for the independence of Guinea-Bissau as of September 10, 1974, and the removal of all Portuguese troops by October 31.

In the first balloting since independence, 15 regional councils were elected during December 1976 and January 1977, the councils in turn selecting delegates to a second National People's Assembly, which convened in March 1977; Cabral was reelected president of the republic and of the 15-member Council of State, while (then) Maj. João Bernardo VIEIRA was designated vice president of the republic and reconfirmed as president of the assembly. Vieira became principal commissioner (prime minister) on September 28, 1978, succeeding Maj. Francisco MENDES, who died on July 7.

The principal political issue of the late 1970s was a projected unification of Cape Verde with Guinea-Bissau, many mainland leaders—including President Cabral and other high officials of the binational PAIGC—being Cape Verdean mestiços. On November 10, 1980, an extraordinary session of the National People's Assembly adopted a new constitution that many black Guineans construed as institutionalizing domination by islanders; four days later a coup led by Vieira, a native Guinean, deposed the president. On November 19 the Council of State and the assembly were formally dissolved by a Revolutionary Council that designated Vieira as head of state, and, on the following day, the council announced a provisional cabinet, all but one of whose members had served in the previous administration. Shortly thereafter, President Vieira identified the basic reasons for Cabral's ouster as the country's social and economic difficulties, including severe food shortages; "progressive abandonment of the principle of democratic centralism"; and "corruption of the meaning of unity between Guinea-Bissau and Cape Verde."

At a PAIGC conference in November 1981 it was announced that presidential and legislative elections under a new constitution would be held in early 1982 and that the party would retain its existing name, despite the fact that in the wake of the coup its Cape Verdean wing had formally repudiated the goal of unification with the mainland. In May 1982 President Vieira instituted a purge of reputed left-wingers within the government and the PAIGC. Furthermore, he named Vítor SAÚDE Maria as prime minister, a post that had been vacant since the 1980 takeover. Continued instability persisted for the next two years, culminating in the ouster of Saúde Maria on March 8, 1984, for alleged antistate activity. The return to constitutional rule followed on March 31 with the election of eight regional councils, which, in turn, chose 150 deputies to a new National People's Assembly. The assembly convened on May 14 and two days later approved a new basic law that combined the offices of head of state and chief of government into the presidency of a revived Council of State, to which Vieira was unanimously elected.

A further attempt to overthrow the Vieira regime was reported on November 7, 1985, when security forces arrested some 50 individuals, including the first vice president, Col. Paulo CORREIA, and a number of other prominent military and civilian officials, who were apparently opposed to economic austerity moves and upset by a military anti-corruption drive. Despite international appeals for clemency, Correia and five of his associates were executed in July 1986.

A new National Assembly was designated on June 15, 1989, by and from the regional councils, for which direct single-party balloting had been conducted on June 1. On June 19 General Vieira was reelected to a second term as president of the Council of State, which two days later named its former vice president, Col. Iafai CAMARA, as first vice president and its former secretary, Dr. Vasco CABRAL, as second vice president. Both of the vice presidencies were abandoned in a government restructuring of December 27, 1991, that marked another restoration of the post of prime minister, to which former agriculture minister Carlos CORREIA was appointed.

In July 1992 the PAIGC agreed to the formation of a national commission with responsibility for facilitating the country's first multiparty balloting. However, the elections, originally scheduled for November and December, were rescheduled in October for March 1993, at which time they were again postponed. In July the Council of State set March 27, 1994, as the new date for simultaneous presidential and legislative balloting, with a further postponement in February 1994 to late May. At the poll that was finally held on July 3, Vieira, who had resigned his commission to qualify as a candidate under a 1991 constitutional revision, was credited with winning 46 percent of valid presidential votes, as contrasted with 21.9 percent for runner-up Kumba YALA of the opposition Social Renewal Party (Partido para a Renovação Social—PRS); concurrently, the ruling PAIGC was awarded 64 of 100 parliamentary seats. Vieira went on to secure reelection by defeating Yala, who had been accorded unanimous opposition endorsement, in a runoff on August 7.

On October 25, 1994, Vieira named a senior PAIGC official, Manuel Saturnino da COSTA, to succeed Correia as prime minister. Observers attributed the delay between the election and Costa's appointment to a deep division in the ruling party between its founding members, including Costa, and their younger colleagues, who desired more "pragmatic" economic policy-making. On November 11 Costa named a new government, which included members of both PAIGC tendencies.

On May 27, 1997, President Vieira dismissed Costa in the midst of what the president described as a "serious political crisis." Costa's ouster came as government troops were deployed to quell riots sparked by state workers who were angered at poor working conditions and the government's failure to pay salary arrears. On June 5 Vieira reappointed Carlos Correia as prime minister, and Correia formed a new government the following day. However, Correia's appointment was immediately contested by opposition legislators, who asserted that the president was constitutionally required to consult with the assembly prior to naming a prime minister. Subsequently, a virtual legislative deadlock ensued as opposition legislators refused to consider the government's initiatives while their legal challenge was being considered by the courts. On October 7 the Supreme Court ruled that the administration had erred, and on October 11 the president dismissed Correia; however, following negotiations with legislative leaders, on October 13 Vieira reappointed Correia.

In January 1998 President Vieira dismissed his military chief of staff, Gen. Ansumane MANE, charging him with "dereliction of duty" for allegedly failing to stem the illegal transfer of arms from Guinea-Bissau to Senegalese rebels. Subsequently, in early June, troops directed by General Mane overran the national airport and an army base in Bra as part of a declared effort to remove Vieira from power. Facing minimal resistance from a small contingent of pro-presidential forces, the rebels quickly secured control of a majority of the country. However, bolstered by Senegalese and Guinean troops, Vieira's loyalists fought the rebels to a standstill in Bissau. On August 26 regional mediators in Cape Verde brokered a cease-fire agreement that held until October, when fierce fighting was once again reported. In November the two sides signed a second cease-fire accord in Abuja, Nigeria. The accord included provisions for presidential and legislative balloting in March 1999, as well as the formation of a unity government comprising representatives selected by the president as well as the rebels. In addition, the agreement called for the replacement of the Senegalese and Guinean troops with a regional peacekeeping force supplied by the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS). On December 3 Vieira, under strong pressure from the military rebels, named Francisco FADUL, General Mane's aide-de-camp, to replace Correia as prime minister.

In early January 1999 the national balloting envisioned for March was indefinitely postponed as contentious debate continued in Bissau over implementation of the Abuja accord. Fierce fighting was reported in the capital in early February; however, a new cease-fire agreement (based on the Abuja document) was reached on February 4, and ECOWAS troops began arriving en masse soon thereafter. On February 20 Fadul and his nine-member cabinet were sworn in.

Amid reports that troops loyal to the president were seeking to rearm, fresh fighting erupted on May 6, 1999, and the following day General Mane claimed that his forces had overthrown Vieira, who agreed to the unconditional surrender of the government on May 10. (Vieira left the country in June.) On May 14 Mane named the president of the assembly, Malam Bacai SANHA, interim president; furthermore, Mane announced that election preparations could continue as scheduled and that he would not be a presidential candidate. In early July the military junta promulgated a new constitution (see Constitution and government, below).

In the first round of presidential balloting on November 28–29, 1999, the PRS's Kumba Yala led a field of 11 presidential aspirants with 34.81 percent of the vote, while interim president Sanha finished second with 23.34 percent. Meanwhile, at concurrent legislative polling the PRS led a crowded field with 38 seats while the PAIGC's representation fell to 24, which was 4 less than the second-place Guinea-Bissau Resistance–Bah Fatah Movement (Resistência da Guiné-Bissau—Movimento Bah-Fatah—RGB-MB).

Having failed to garner the vote share necessary to stave off a second round of balloting, Yala faced off against Sanha on January 16, 2000. Yala won easily, capturing 72 percent of the vote, and on January 24 he named a PRS leader, Caetano NTCHAMA, prime minister. On February 19 Ntchama was sworn in as the head of a government that included representatives from four political parties and a number of independents, but no members of the PAIGC. However, Ntchama was buffeted by tensions between the PRS and the RGB-MB; in September the RGB-MB ministers were dismissed but they were reinstated shortly thereafter. In the meantime, conflict between President Yala and the former head of the junta, Ansumane Mane, resurfaced. In November, uneasy with some recent military appointments, Mane announced that he had “reinstated” himself as the chief of staff, and clashes were reported between a few troops following Mane and the majority of the army, which remained loyal to the Yala. Some opposition figures, most prominently from the PAIGC, the Union for Change (União para a Mudança—UM), and the Democratic Alliance (Aliança Democrática—AD), were arrested for allegedly supporting Mane. On November 30, Mane was killed by government troops surrounding his enclave in Quinhamel, north of Bissau.

In January 2001 the RGB-MB left the governing coalition in reaction to an earlier reshuffle the party claimed unfairly favored the PRS. In March Yala dismissed Ntchama, who was reportedly having medical problems, and named an independent, Faustino Fadut IMBALI, as the new prime minister. Imbali had run in the 1999 presidential elections and had supported Yala in the second round in January 2000. He had also served in Ntchama's government as the deputy prime minister. Imbali formed a government including the PRS, the RGB-MB, the PAIGC, the Guinean Civic Forum (Foro Civico da Guiné—FCG), the Social Democratic Party (Partido Social Democrata—PSD), the Democratic Convergence Party (Partido da Convergência Democrática—PCD), and independents. The PAIGC and the RGB-MB, however, reportedly continued their critical stance toward Yala's presidency and some of Imbali's policies. Yala dismissed Imbali on December 7, 2001, and appointed Alamara NHASSE of the PRS as the new prime minister the following day. Nhasse's new government, formed on December 12, included members from the PRS and the PCD as well as independents.

In the wake of increasing tension between President Yala and Prime Minister Nhasse concerning ministerial and judicial appointments, Yala dismissed Nhasse on November 15, 2002. On November 16 Yala appointed Mario PIRES of the RPS to head a temporary caretaker government. Yala also dissolved the assembly and announced that new legislative elections would be held in early 2003. However, that balloting was postponed several times as the government was perceived as becoming increasingly authoritarian (see Current issues, below).

The military deposed President Yala on September 14, 2003, in a takeover that appeared to have broad domestic support. The army's chief of staff, Gen. Verissimo Correia SEABRA, proclaimed himself interim president and named a military council to conduct governmental affairs pending the appointment of a new civilian government. (Yala was permitted to "resign" as of September 17.) On September 28, Henrique ROSA, a prominent businessman with no formal political ties, was appointed interim president, while Antonio Artur SANHA of the PRS was designated head of a caretaker cabinet.

Negotiations between the major political groups and the military subsequently yielded an agreement providing for legislative elections within six months and presidential balloting within 18 months. Concurrently, a 56-member civilian Transitional National Council was appointed to advise the government pending the new elections. The PAIGC secured a plurality of 45 seats in the March 28 and 30, 2004, assembly poll, followed by the PRS with 35 seats. Carlos GOMES, the president of the PAIGC, was appointed prime minister on May 12 to head a cabinet comprising the PAIGC and independents.

In the first round of presidential balloting on June 19, 2005, the PAIGC's Sanha received 35.45 percent of the vote, followed by Vieira (running as an independent) with 28.87 percent, and Yala of the PRS with 25 percent. Ten other candidates, representing 6 other parties and independents, each won less than 3 percent of the vote. Since Sanha failed to gain a clear majority, he faced Vieira in a runoff on July 24. Several weeks later, Vieira was declared the winner with 52.35 percent of the vote. In August, the Supreme Court rejected Sanha's request to annul the election, and the PAIGC government finally conceded defeat on September 27. Amid continuing friction with Prime Minister Carlos Gomes, Vieira was sworn in on October 1, and on October 30 he dismissed the prime minister in favor of PAIGC dissident Aristides GOMES (see PAIGC under Political Parties, below). On November 9 Vieira appointed a five-party coalition government comprising the PAIGC (split into pro-Vieira and pro-Carlos Gomes factions), the PRS, the PCD, the United Social Democratic Party (Partido Unido Social Democrata—PUSD), and the Electoral Union (União Eleitoral—UE). In early 2006, court rulings upheld the appointment of Aristides Gomes, striking down the PAIGC's argument that it was unconstitutional since Gomes had been suspended from the party (for his support of Vieira) and that the president was obligated to appoint a majority-party member to head the government.

Constitution and Government

The constitution of May 1984 gave the PAIGC the right to define "the bases of state policy in all fields"; for legislative purposes it reestablished the National People's Assembly, members of which were to be designated by eight regional councils. The assembly was, in turn, empowered to elect a 15-member Council of State, whose president was to serve as head of state and commander in chief of the armed forces.

In early 1989 a six-member National Commission, headed by Fidélis Cabral D'ALMADA, was established by the PAIGC Central Committee to revise the constitution in accordance with recent economic reform and structural adjustment policies. Thereafter, in April 1990, President Vieira promised "freer and more democratic elections," and in August he characterized the democracy movement as "irreversible." On January 9, 1991, he formally committed himself to political pluralism in a speech that was promptly endorsed by the PAIGC. On May 4 the assembly approved a constitutional amendment voiding the republic's "revolutionary" character and stripping the PAIGC of its status as the "leading force in society." Both president and legislators were henceforth to be popularly elected for five-year terms. Four days later a framework law on political parties won legislative approval, with numerous opposition groups subsequently being recognized in preparation for the country's first contested elections (originally scheduled for late 1992, but not held until mid-1994).

In July 1999 the military junta led by Gen. Ansumane Mane discarded the 1991 basic law in favor of a new constitution that included provisions for presidential term limits (two five-year terms), the abolition of the death penalty, and the establishment of strict residency requirements for government officeholders. In November the junta drafted a new document, a so-called Magna Carta, reportedly styled after the basic law imposed in Portugal following its 1974 military coup; however, General Mane withdrew the controversial draft law (which provided for ten years of military rule) following an outcry from Bissau's political leaders. Furthermore, the junta amended the article of the July document that excluded would-be presidential candidates whose parents were foreign-born. In October 2000 President Yala named a State Council to "advise him on decisions such as declaration of war and state of emergency." Some observers suggested that the establishment of the council substantively finalized the transition to civilian rule. (For details of governmental arrangements following the September 2003 coup, see Political background, above.)

Foreign Relations

During the struggle for independence, Guinea-Bissau received economic and military assistance from many Communist countries, including the Soviet Union, Cuba, and China. A subsequent deterioration in relations with the USSR because of alleged encroachment upon the country's fishing grounds appeared to have been reversed in early 1978 with a promise of Soviet assistance in modernizing the country's fishing industry. In May 1982, on the other hand, President Vieira replaced two strongly pro-Soviet cabinet ministers with Western-trained "technocrats" and appealed for development aid from non-Communist sources.

In November 1980 Guinea was the first country to recognize Guinea-Bissau's Revolutionary Council; earlier disputes over offshore oil exploration rights had been defused by former Guinean President Sékou Touré's announcement that Guinea would cooperate with other African states in developing on- and offshore resources. Similar controversy with Senegal erupted in early 1984, involving questions about the legality of offshore borders drawn by the French and Portuguese governments before independence. In February 1985 the International Court of Justice (ICJ) offered a settlement of the Bissau-Conakry border question that was accepted by both governments, while in March a meeting between Vieira and Senegalese President Diouf resulted in assignment of the latter dispute to an ad hoc international tribunal. A decision by the tribunal on July 31, 1989, in favor of Senegal, was immediately rejected by Bissau in an appeal to the ICJ.

A further border clash with Senegal occurred in April and May 1990, leaving 17 dead and drawing charges by Dakar that Bissau was harboring Casamance separatist guerrillas (see article on Senegal). Tensions eased however in the wake of a meeting in the border town of São Domingos on May 29 at which the two countries agreed to a mutual troop withdrawal and termination of aid to each other's insurgent movements. In April 1991 Vieira called for the Casamance rebels to lay down their arms and take advantage of Senegal's multiparty system. Subsequently, in May Guinea-Bissau was the site of cease-fire talks between Dakar and Casamance representatives. However, in early February 1995 relations between Bissau and Dakar were again strained when Senegal bombed a Guinea-Bissau border village in retaliation for Bissau's alleged support of two recent Casamance rebel attacks against Senegalese military sites. Relations again eased on June 12, when a visit by Senegalese President Abdou Diouf produced a declaration to abandon border hostility and an agreement to share equally in offshore mineral and energy resources.

A meeting with President Pereira of Cape Verde in Mozambique on June 17–18, 1982, yielded an announcement that diplomatic relations would be restored. Despite "reconciliation," the unification sought by Cabral became more and more distant as island influence was purged from the mainland party, with no reference to eventual merger being mentioned in the 1984 Guinea-Bissau constitution.

The last vestige of the PAIGC alliances, a joint shipping line, was liquidated on February 29, 1988; both countries cited the nonviolent action as a sign of their "political maturation."

In early 1996 the Vieira administration agreed to ratify a 1993 maritime joint exploration pact with Senegal, ignoring its domestic critics' charges that the agreement unfairly favored the neighboring state, and in June Bissau and Dakar signed a security collaboration accord. (On the basis of such accords Senegal and Guinea dispatched troops to Guinea-Bissau in 1998 in an effort to quell the military uprising.)

In February 1999 the leaders of rebel forces in Guinea-Bissau claimed that French battleships had fired on their positions. Paris denied the charges. Following the military coup in May, ECOWAS peacekeeping forces departed, with both the junta and its regional sponsors agreeing that they were "redundant." On the other hand, a UN contingent arrived in Bissau in June in accordance with provisions in the February cease-fire. The UN officials were charged with organizing elections, and in March 2000 their mandate was extended. Among the myriad problems confronting international mediators was the need to smooth relations between Bissau and the Senegalese and Guinean governments, both of whom had sent troops in an ultimately futile attempt to reinforce the Vieira administration. Guinea-Bissau's relations with Senegal were further strained in April following an attack by Casamance rebels, who had (according to Senegal) infiltrated from Guinea-Bissau's territory. In March 2002, the leader of one of the main rebel factions was arrested and deported to Senegal. The situation subsequently improved and in September the border was reopened and a joint security commission was formed.

Although the international community initially condemned the overthrow of Yala, Guinea-Bissau's external relations were quickly repaired. Once Rosa assumed office, he made diplomatic visits to a number of neighboring states, and Portugal as well. International aid was resumed soon after the March 2004 elections and included pledges to provide the funds needed to pay the military and civil service until after the June 2005 presidential elections. In addition, the small UN mission charged with monitoring the border between Senegal and Guinea-Bissau had its mandate extended for one year. Conflict at the border reignited in early 2006 (see Current issues, below), with the Casamance rebel leader reportedly refusing to participate in peace talks.

Current Issues

Conflict broke out between President Yala and the judiciary in late 2001 when Yala appointed three supreme court judges who had been dismissed in 1993. After criticism by coalition members RGB-MB and the PAIGC, the assembly in October approved a motion of no confidence against the president, who then threatened to suspend the legislature. A large demonstration in the capital in late November demanded that Yala resign. The appointment of Alamara Nhasse, theretofore minister of the interior and a "PRS strongman," as new prime minister did little to calm the waters, opposition parties denouncing the dismissal of Prime Minister Imbali despite Yala's assertion that Imbali's government should have been held accountable for the country's economic problems.

Political instability continued into mid-2002, Yala claiming he had survived a coup attempt in May that he attributed to "Gambian influence." President Yala's dismissal of Nhasse and dissolution of the assembly in November initiated a period of intensified repression of dissent that included the arrest of a number of prominent opposition figures and the closure of private radio stations that had criticized the administration. Tensions intensified in 2003 when soldiers threatened to mutiny over payment arrears and schools were closed because teachers had not been paid. Consequently, the September 2003 coup elicited little criticism within the populace, particularly after it had become clear that the military intended a quick return to civilian government through new elections.

The Rosa administration reopened schools after the World Bank loaned money for teacher salaries, and most international aid was restored after the May 2004 legislative elections were deemed free and fair by international observers. However, the new Gomes government faced severe problems, including rivalry among heavily armed ethnic groups, reported continued discontent within some sections of the military, and depressed economic conditions. Complicating matters in March 2005 was Yala's announcement that he planned to run as the PRS candidate in the June presidential balloting, despite the fact that he had been "banned" from politics for five years after the 2003 coup. (In May 2005 Yala and Vieira were declared eligible to run after both had initially been barred.) Subsequently, "serious tension" was reported after Yala insisted on May 15 he was still president, based on a court ruling that his forced resignation after the coup was invalid. A few days later, Yala briefly occupied presidential headquarters before being removed by government troops. A huge demonstration in support of Yala took place before the June first-round balloting, followed by violent protests in the capital days after his defeat in which three people were killed and five injured in clashes with police. Hundreds of Yala's backers accused the government of vote-rigging and reportedly tried to overrun the National Electoral Commission. Ultimately, Yala supported Vieira in the two-way runoff in July, which was conducted fairly, according to international observers.

Vieira dismissed Carlos Gomes as prime minister on October 30, replacing him with PAIGC dissident Aristides Gomes. The new coalition government was sworn in on November 10, though controversy continued to surround Vieira's choice of a prime minister (see PAIGC under Political Parties, below). In April 2006, the PUSD, one of ten parties that backed Vieira in his presidential bid, reportedly withdrew from the government, though it was unclear whether a formal action was taken.

Also in 2006, the army resumed its offensive against the Casamance rebels, resulting in some 12,000 civilians fleeing the border region and prompting calls for a cease-fire by the UN. By mid-May, the UN appealed for $3.6 million to help those most vulnerable in northern Guinea-Bissau who were cut off from the rest of the country by landmines, leaving farmers unable to get to the cashew fields in time for the harvest.

Political Parties

On May 8, 1991, the National People's Assembly approved the formation of opposition parties, thereby formalizing events set in motion in April 1990. The principal requirements for registration are that each group present to the Supreme Tribunal of Justice a petition signed by 1,000 eligible voters, at least 50 of whom must reside in each of the country's regions and the district of Bissau. By early 1993 more than two dozen parties had been formed, most of which had been legalized.

Government and Government-Supportive Parties

African Party for the Independence of Guinea and Cape Verde (Partido Africano da Independência da Guiné e Cabo Verde—PAIGC). Formed in 1956 by Amílcar Cabral and others, the PAIGC established external offices in Conakry, Guinea, in 1960 and began armed struggle against the Portuguese authorities in 1963. During its 28 years as the country's only lawful party, the PAIGC was formally committed to the principle of "democratic centralism." Its policy-making and administrative organs include a Central Committee (the Supreme Council of the Struggle), a National Council, a Permanent Committee, and a Secretariat.

Until the coup of November 1980 the party leadership was binational, with Aristides Pereira, president of Cape Verde, serving as secretary general and President Luis Cabral of Guinea-Bissau as deputy secretary. On January 19, 1981, the Cape Verdean branch decided to break with the mainland organization, proclaiming, on the following day, an autonomous African Party for the Independence of Cape Verde (PAICV).

In May 1990 General Vieira instructed the party to begin preparations for the introduction of political pluralism. Accordingly, the Central Committee in July proposed the adoption of “integral multipartism,” and in September it announced a schedule for implementation of the new system, which was formally approved at an extraordinary party congress held January 21–25, 1991. At its fifth ordinary congress in November 1991 the PAIGC voted to widen intraparty democracy and restructure its executive apparatus by dropping the post of secretary general in favor of a party president and national secretary.

At the party’s sixth ordinary congress in May 1998 delegates reelected Vieira to the PAIGC presidency and approved the appointment of Paulo Medina to the newly created post of permanent secretary. Despite Vieira’s positive account of the meeting, observers asserted that the PAIGC emerged from the congress further factionalized. Thereafter, it was unclear what effect the military uprising of June 1998 would have on the PAIGC, although the vehemently anti-Vieira stance of Francisco Fadul, a longtime party member who was sworn in as prime minister in February 1999, appeared to portend further cleavage.

In the wake of Vieira’s removal from office, Manuel Saturnino da Costa was chosen on May 12, 1999, to assume the PAIGC party presidency, and Flavio Provenca was named interim secretary. The party held an extraordinary congress in Bissau September 3–9, with the stated goal of preparing for presidential and legislative polling. Delegates voted to expel Vieira, Carlos CORREIA, and a number of former ministers affiliated with Vieira, and the (then) defense minister and ally of the Mane junta, Francis Benante, was elected as the new PAIGC president.

The PAIGC won 24 seats in the 1999 legislative elections, and its candidate, interim president of the republic Malam Bacai SANHA, won 23.34 percent of the votes in the first round in November 1999 presidential elections. He lost in the second round in January 2000 with 28 percent of the vote.

The PAIGC assumed an opposition stance to the PRS-led government formed in February 2000. The party reportedly came under intense scrutiny after allegedly supporting Ansumane Mane’s failed bid to reinstate himself as the chief of staff in November. Benante was subsequently arrested and then released for alleged possession of arms, as were other opposition figures. The PAIGC accepted a post in the cabinet announced in March 2001 but remained highly critical of some of the administration’s policies. In May the PAIGC voted in the legislature to approve the government’s program, but only after amnesty was granted to prisoners from the events of the previous November. The new government appointed in December reportedly did not include any PAIGC members. In 2004 the PAIGC became the largest party in the assembly, receiving 33.88 percent of the vote and 45 seats. Party leader Carlos Gomes became prime minister on May 12, 2004, and subsequently formed a government of PAIGC members and independents. Gomes declared that he would not seek the presidency in 2005 and would instead concentrate on his role as prime minister. Following the election of Vieira in July, friction intensified within the party between those who supported Vieira, including party vice president Aristides Gomes, and those who remained loyal to Carlos Gomes. In September, Aristides Gomes and several other dissident members were suspended, and a month later 14 of the party’s 45 legislators resigned, declaring themselves independents. Aristides Gomes joined with some of those dissidents and others from various opposition groups to form the Forum for the Convergence of Development (FCD), reportedly in an attempt to create a new majority in the assembly. The continued dissension between Vieira and the Carlos Gomes supporters in the PAIGC resulted in a delay in Vieira’s inauguration until October because the pro-Gomes faction refused to recognize his authority. The rift culminated in Vieira’s dismissal of the prime minister on October 30, and his appointment on November 2 of Aristides Gomes as the new prime minister. For its part, the PAIGC postponed indefinitely its extraordinary congress scheduled for October and in November named a new chair, Martin Ndafo Kabi. Meanwhile, Carlos Gomes’ faction of the party continued to contest the appointment of Aristides Gomes, claiming it was unconstitutional, but court rulings in 2006 upheld Vieira’s action. The final status of Aristides

Gomes and his supporters in the PAIGC remained unclear as of April 2006.

Leaders: Martin Ndafo KABI (Chair), Carlos GOMES, Malam Bacai SANHA (2005 presidential candidate), Manuel Saturnino da COSTA, Paulo MEDINA.

Social Renewal Party (Partido para a Renovação Social—PRS). The PRS was formed in January 1992 by seven defectors from the FDS (below) led by Kumba Yala, who accused the parent group of secretly collaborating with the PAIGC. Yala was runner-up to Vieira in the 1994 presidential balloting, with the party winning 12 of 100 assembly seats. In November Yala rejected an offer to join the Costa government. Meanwhile, the PRS reportedly teamed with the Union for Change (UM, below) and the Front of Struggle for the Liberation of Guinea (FLING, below) to form a voting bloc in the assembly.

On November 10, 1995, Yala told a Portuguese daily, Jornal de Notícias, that the PAIGC was bereft of both “international credibility” and the “confidence of the people.” Calling for early elections, Yala warned that while the PRS was opposed to a civil war, its wide support within the military would allow it to take power in “five or ten minutes.”

In January 1998 Yala announced that he would form a parallel government if elections (then scheduled for midyear) were postponed. Thereafter, the PRS joined with other opposition groups demanding Vieira’s resignation in early 1999. The PRS won 38 seats in the 1999 legislative elections, and Yala won the presidency in January 2000 with 72 percent of the vote in the second round. In 2003 the party was rife with conflict between those who supported Yala and those who did not. This divide led party president Alamara Nhasse to resign his post and lead a group of defectors to form a new group, the National Reconciliation Party (see below).

In the March 2004 elections, the PRS came in second with 24.76 percent of the vote and 35 seats. After Yala’s defeat in the June 2005 presidential election, at least three people were killed during a protest by his supporters and Sanha was briefly detained by police.

Leaders: Alberto NAMBEIA (Interim Chair), Kumba YALA (Former President of the Republic and 2005 presidential candidate), Ibrahima Sori DJALO, Caetano NTCHAMA (Former Prime Minister), Antonio Artur SANHA (Former Prime Minister and Secretary General).

United Social Democratic Party (Partido Unido Social Democrata—PUSD). The PUSD was led by former prime minister Vítor Saúde Maria, who left the PAIGC in 1984 and was a member of the FDS before launching the present formation in June 1991.

In March 1993 Saúde Maria denounced PRD leader da Costa’s detainment for alleged involvement in a coup attempt, accusing the government of launching an unprovoked opposition crackdown. Saúde Maria died in October 1999. His replacement as party president, Francisco José Fadul, was chosen at a party congress in late 2000. In the 2004 elections, the PUSD became the third-largest parliamentary party with 16.1 percent of the vote and 17 seats. (On April 5, 2006, it was reported that the PUSD had withdrawn from the government in a dispute regarding the justice minister, although it was unclear what the status of the party was thereafter.)

Leader: Francisco José FADUL (Party President, Former Prime Minister, and 2005 presidential candidate).

United Platform (Plataforma Unida—PLATAF). This electoral coalition, led by Helder VAZ and Victor MANDINGA, was formed to contest the 2004 legislative elections. Two members of the coalition, the Democratic Front and the Democratic Convergence Party, were also linked in a separate coalition as the Democratic Alliance (see Democratic Convergence Party, below). In 2004, the former leader of the PLATAF, Francisca VAZ Turpin, filed papers to form a new party, the Union of Guinea-Bissau Patriots (UPG).

Democratic Convergence Party (Partido da Convergência Democrática—PCD). The PCD first surfaced in the early 1990s under the leadership of a former PAIGC member, Victor Mandinga. The PCD apparently served as the core component of the Democratic Alliance (Aliança Democrática—AD) coalition that was credited with winning four seats (including one by Mandinga) in the 1999 legislative balloting. Mandinga supported Ansumane Mane in the events of late 2000, and he was briefly detained by security forces. Mandinga, routinely referenced as leader of the AD, subsequently remained a highly vocal and visible critic of President Yala. Meanwhile, several cabinet ministers installed in March 2001 and December 2001 were referenced as PCD members. In 2005, Mandinga was named minister of finance.

Leader: Victor MANDINGA.

Democratic and Social Front (Frente Democrática e Social—FDS). The FDS was launched in early 1990 by former PAIGC president Rafael Barbosa to fight against the “dictatorship” of the existing system. A cofounder of the PAIGC, Barbosa had been accused of collaboration with the Portuguese during the liberation struggle, convicted of treason in 1974, and imprisoned. He was released briefly upon Vieira’s seizure of power in 1980, but was again imprisoned after calling for the expulsion of Cape Verdeans from Guinea-Bissau. He was formally amnestied in 1987.

Following a contentious FDS leadership meeting on January 15, 1992, the two-year-old group suffered its third split as seven members left to form the PRS. The FDS won a single seat in the legislature in 1999. In advance of the 2004 assembly election, the FDS formed a coalition with the PUSD, the PRD, and the LGBPE.

Leader: Rafael BARBOSA.

Front of Struggle for the Liberation of Guinea (Frente da Luta para a Libertação da Guiné—FLING). Formerly known as the Front for the Liberation and Independence of Guinea-Bissau (Frente para a Libertação e Independência da Guiné-Bissau, FLING claimed to have been organized in 1954 and, as a group opposed to the unification of Cape Verde and the mainland, to have initiated the armed struggle against Portugal. In March 1981 it was announced that it had been dissolved, with its militants accepted into the PAIGC, although remnants of the organization continued to be active, primarily as exiles. It assumed its present name, while retaining the original acronym, in 1991. Its leader, François Mendy Kankoila, returned in 1992 after 40 years in exile. The group applied for legalization in 1992 and won a single seat in 1994.

In June 1996 President Vieira sued Kankoila and suspended him from the National Assembly after Kankoila accused Vieira of orchestrating the disappearance of a FLING member.

Leaders: François Mendy KANKOILA, Catengul MENDES (1999 presidential candidate).

Other minor parties in the PLATAF include the Group of Independent Democrats (Grupo de Democratas Independentes—GDI), which was formed by Helder Vaz and dissidents from the RGB-MB; and the Democratic Front (Frente Democrática—FD), led by Canjura IN-JAI.

Electoral Union (União Eleitoral—UE). The UE was formed in 2002 to contest legislative elections by a group of small leftist and center-left parties. In the 2004 elections, the UE gained two seats in the assembly.

Leader: Joaquim BALDE.

Guinea-Bissau League for the Protection of the Ecology (Liga da Guiné-Bissau para a Protecção da Ecologia—LGBPE). The LGBPE applied for legalization in July 1993. The league’s president, Bubacar Rachid Djalo, ran in the first round of the presidential elections in November 1999 and backed the PRS’s Kumba Yala in the second round in January 2000. Djalo was given a junior cabinet post in the PRS-led government in February but was not reappointed in the new government formed in March 2001.

Leader: Bubacar Rachid DJALO (President and 1999 presidential candidate).

Social Democratic Party (Partido Social Democrata—PSD). Founded by dissident Guinea-Bissau Resistance–Bah Fatah Movement (RGB-MB) members, the PSD was legalized on August 21, 1995. It won three seats in the legislative elections in 1999 and backed the PRS’s Kumba Yala in the second round of the presidential elections in January 2000. Although some PSD members had previously taken part in PRS-led coalition governments, the cabinet installed in December 2001 reportedly did not include any PSD members. Party leader Joaquim Balde was the spokesman for the National Transition Council following the coup in 2003.

Leaders: Joaquim BALDE (1999 presidential candidate), Gaspar FERNANDES (Secretary General), João Seco MANE.

Other minor parties in the UE include the Guinean Socialist Party (Partido Socialista Guineense—PSG), led by Cirilo VIEIRA; and the Party of Renovation and Progress (Partido da Renovação e Progresso—PRP), led by Mamadu DJALO.

Other Legislative Parties

United Popular Alliance (Aliança Popular Unida—APU). The APU was formed prior to the 2004 legislative elections as an electoral coalition between the ASG and the small Guinean Popular Party (Partido Popular Guineense—PPG), led by Joao Tatis SA. It won one seat in the 2004 assembly election. In May 2004 the APU signed an agreement with the PAIGC and the UE to “ensure stability.” Sa ran last in the field of 13 first-round presidential candidates in 2005.

Socialist Alliance of Guinea-Bissau (Aliança Socialista da Guiné-Bissau—ASG). The ASG was launched in May 2000 under the leadership of Fernando Gomes, a human rights advocate. Gomes had run as an independent candidate in the first round of presidential elections in November 1999, receiving 7 percent of the vote. He backed Kumba Yala in the second round. Gomes and the ASG, however, were subsequently among the fiercest critics of the government, especially on the issues of human rights and freedom of the press. Gomes was briefly detained in late May 1999 for having released a communiqué strongly critical of the government.

Leader: Fernando GOMES.

Other Parties and Groups

Guinea-Bissau Resistance–Bah Fatah Movement (Resistência da Guiné-Bissau–Movimento Bah-Fatah—RGB-MB). Launched in Lisbon, Portugal, in 1986, the RGB-MB was technically precluded from using Bafata in its official title because of a legal prohibition of the use of an ethnic, regional, or (in this case) town name for political parties. As a result it substituted “Bah-Fatah” for “Bafata” prior to registration in December 1991. RGB-MB founder Domingos Fernandes Gomes returned after six years in exile on May 18, 1992. The party was runner-up to the PAIGC in the 1994 legislative poll, winning 19 seats. In November Fernandes refused an invitation to join the Costa government.

In late 1998 the RGB-MB announced that it would not participate in reconciliation talks with President Vieira and called for his resignation. The party had been a vocal critic of Vieira throughout the military uprising, which it had allegedly described as an internecine struggle within the PAIGC.

In the 1999 legislative elections, the RGB-MB won 28 seats and became the second-largest party in the legislature. In the first round of presidential balloting in November 1999 the RGB-MB’s candidate was Helder VAZ Lopes, who had become the party chair in September. In the second round in January 2000 Vaz Lopes told his supporters to vote for a candidate of their choice.

The RGB-MB was included in the PRS-led government formed in February 2000. In September all the ministers from the party were dismissed, but they were reinstated shortly thereafter. In January 2001, however, the RGB-MB left the government in reaction to an earlier reshuffle the party claimed unfairly favored their senior partner, the PRS. In March the party was given representation in Faustino Imbali's new government, although it reportedly remained highly critical of Kumba Yala's presidency and of some of Imbali's policies. The government appointed in December reportedly did not include any RGB-MB members. In the 2004 legislative elections, the RGB-MB only received 1.85 percent of the vote and consequently no seats in the assembly. Party leader Domingos Fernandes Gomes announced he would run in the 2005 presidential election, but his name did not appear on the list of candidates. Party leader Salvador Tchongo dropped out the 2005 presidential race, citing financial difficulties and a lack of confidence in the process.

Leaders: Domingos FERNANDES Gomes (1994 presidential candidate), Salvador TCHONGO (President), Mario Ujssumane BALDE (Secretary General).

Union for Change (União para a Mudança—UM). The UM was originally organized prior to the 1994 election as a six-party electoral coalition that included the left-of-center Democratic Front (Frente Democrática—FD), led by Marcelino BAPTISTA; the United Democratic Movement (Movimento para a Unidade e a Democracia—Mude), led by Felintro Vaz MARTINS; the Democratic Party of Progress (Partido Democrático do Progresso—PDP); and the Party of Renovation and Development (Partido da Renovação e Desenvolvimento—PRD), a grouping of PAIGC dissidents led by João da Costa; as well as the FDS and LGBPE (above), which did not join their partners in a formal merger in November 1995. The Union secured six seats in 1994 and three in 1999. The party reportedly came under scrutiny after Ansumane Mane's failed bid to reinstate himself as the chief of staff in November 2000. The group's secretary general, Agnello Regala, was arrested for allegedly supporting Mane. He was released in December. In the 2004 election, the UM received only 2 percent of the vote and therefore no seats in the assembly.

Leaders: Manuel Rambout BARCELOS, Amine Michel SAAD (PDP), Agnello REGALA (Secretary General).

Guinean Civic Forum (Foro Civico da Guiné—FCG). The FCG's Antonieta Rosa Gomes competed in the 1999 presidential election, and in 2000 she was appointed to the Ntchama government. However, she was dismissed in November 2001. The new government appointed in December 2001 reportedly did not include any FCG members. The FCG received less than 1 percent of the vote in the 2004 elections. Gomes ran for president in 2005 on the FCG ticket in affiliation with the Social Democracy (SD) group.

Leader: Antonieta Rosa GOMES (1999 and 2005 presidential candidate).

National Union for Democracy and Progress (União Nacional para a Democracia e o Progresso—UNDP). The UNDP was formed in December 1997 by Aboubacar Balde, a former PAIGC official, who was reportedly angered at the ruling party's failure to organize a congress in mid-1997. The party was officially recognized in April 1998, and won one legislative seat in 1999. The UNDP reportedly came under scrutiny after Ansumane Mane's failed bid to reinstall himself as the chief of staff in November 2000. In the 2004 elections, the UNDP received 1.1 percent of the vote. Balde dropped out as a 2005 presidential candidate for financial reasons.

Leader: Aboubacar BALDE (1999 presidential candidate).

National Reconciliation Party (Partido Nacional do Reconciliation—PRN). Formed in October 2004 by former PRS leader Alamara Nhasse, the PRN drew a large number of senior PRS figures away from the PRS, including a former defense minister and the former mayor of Bissau.

Leader: Alamara NHASSE (Former Prime Minister).

Other minor parties that contested the 2004 legislative elections include the Guinean Democratic Party (Partido Democrático Guineense—PDG), led by Manuel CA; the Manifest Party

Legislature

The current National People's Assembly (Assembleia Nacional Popular) is a directly elected body of 102 members elected for five-year terms. At the most recent balloting of March 28 and 30, 2004, the African Party for the Independence of Guinea and Cape Verde secured 45 seats; the Social Renewal Party, 35; the United Social Democratic Party, 17; the Electoral Union, 2; the United Popular Alliance, 1.

President: Francisco BENANTE.

Communications

In October 1991 the National People's Assembly adopted a 55-article law providing for substantially greater freedom of the press than in a previous measure of December 1989. However, in 2002 and 2003 the government closed several private radio stations and fired reporters from the Guinea News Agency because of critical reports on the government. Following the 2003 coup, press restrictions were lifted.

Two independent stations were launched in 1995 and 1996. Television commenced on an experimental basis in 1989, but it still reaches a quite limited number of receivers. There were 19,000 Internet users in 2003.

REPUBLIC OF KENYA

Jamhuri ya Kenya

The Country

An equatorial country on the African east coast, Kenya has long been celebrated for its wildlife and such scenic attractions as the Rift Valley. The northern part of the country is virtually waterless, and 85 percent of the population and most economic enterprises are concentrated in the southern highlands bordering on Tanzania and Lake Victoria. The African population, mainly engaged in agriculture and stock-raising, embraces four main ethnic groups: Bantu (Kikuyu, Kamba, Luhya), Nilotic (Luo), Nilo-Hamitic (Masai), and Hamitic (Somali). Non-African minorities include Europeans, Asians (mainly Indians and Pakistanis), and Arabs. In addition to Kiswahili and English, the most important languages are Kikuyu, Luo, and Luhya. A majority of the population is nominally Christian (approximately 38 percent is Protestant, and 28 percent is Catholic), but approximately 35 percent adheres to traditional religious beliefs; there is also a growing Muslim minority currently comprising 10 to 20 percent of the population.

Although the services sector now accounts for approximately 65 percent of Kenya's Gross Domestic Product (GDP), Kenya's economy continues to depend heavily on agriculture. Agricultural production continues to decline and accounts for less than 16 percent of the GDP (compared to 33.9 percent in 1984). This trend is particularly troubling because the vast majority of Kenyans rely upon subsistence farming. (Women produce more than men in the sector.) The main cash crops are coffee, tea, sisal, pyrethrum, and sugar. The coffee and tea sectors, once export leaders, are in steady decline; coffee has gone from being the first to the fourth major source of foreign exchange earnings since the late 1980s. Coffee production has fallen steadily due to high production costs, inefficient methods of cultivation, and corruption in the government-controlled cooperatives. In 2005 an acute drought struck much of the northern and eastern parts of Kenya and deviated agricultural production in these areas. Approximately, 2.5 million people (10 percent of the population) faced the risk of starvation, and the crisis required an international relief effort to contain.

The manufacturing sector has been growing, and now represents about 19 percent of GDP; important industries include food processing, the production

Political Status: Independent member of the Commonwealth since December 12, 1963; republic established in 1964; de facto one-party system, established in 1969, recognized as de jure by constitutional amendment on June 9, 1982; multiparty system approved by constitutional amendment on December 20, 1991.

Area: 224,960 sq. mi. (582,646 sq. km.).

Population: 28,686,607 (1999C); 34,467,000 (2005E).

Major Urban Centers (2005E): NAIROBI (urban area, 2,725,000); Mombasa (798,000).

Official Language: English (Kiswahili is the national language).

Monetary Unit: Kenya Shilling (principal rate July 1, 2006: 73.85 shillings = $1US).

President: Emilio Mwai KIBAKI (National Rainbow Coalition—NARC; National Rainbow Coalition of Kenya—NARC-Kenya) elected by popular vote on December 27, 2002, and inaugurated on December 30, 2002, for a five-year term, succeeding Daniel Teroitich arap MOI (Kenya African National Union—KANU), who had served as president since 1978.

Vice President: Arthur Moody AWORI (National Rainbow Coalition of Kenya—NARC-Kenya) appointed by the President on September 25, 2003, to succeed Michael Kijana WAMALWA (National Rainbow Coalition—NARC; Forum for Restoration of Democracy—Kenya—FORD-K), who died August 23, 2003.

of textiles and clothing, and oil refining (almost entirely of imported crude). Tourism represents about 13 percent of GDP and is the second largest source of foreign exchange. In 2005, the Kenyan government reported that tourism rose nearly 16 percent above 2004 levels, an indication that the industry might have recovered from the adverse effects of the 2003 terrorist attacks in Mombassa, which led to a 1.5 percent decline in the country's GDP. These gains, coupled with general improvements in the tertiary sector have fueled relatively steady growth; the GDP has steadily expanded from 1.3 percent in 2003 to approximately 4 percent in 2005.

Although Kenya's economy was long considered one of the continent's healthiest, it has been subject since the mid-1980s to numerous pressures, including fluctuating fuel and commodity prices, an external debt of about $5 billion, high rates of natural population increase (currently estimated at 2.56 percent annually), escalating inflation (11 percent in 2005), and large foreign exchange losses (the current account deficit as a percentage of GDP rose to almost 27 percent in 2005) attributed to irregular banking activity. Kenya is still considered the banking and business center of East Africa, but the banking sector and the country's infrastructure suffered greatly from the corruption and neglect under the Moi regime. Health and educational services also deteriorated significantly, while unemployment rose steadily. (The government's official estimate places unemployment at 15 percent, while others estimate the rate at close to 40 percent.) Kenya has one of the highest infant mortality rates in the world, and more than half the population lives on less than $1 a day.

Kenya's relations with foreign donors have been strained since the early 1990s. Unsatisfied with the Moi regime's response to their economic conditions (austerity) and political prescriptions (instituting party pluralism and eradicating corruption), donors suspended aid payments in November 1991. The World Bank released some $350 million in frozen aid funds in April 1993, but only after a tumultuous period when President Moi agreed to a strict economic liberalization program and then reneged before finally acquiescing. Relations with both the IMF and the World Bank remained uncertain during the remainder of the decade (for more details, see Political Handbook of the World 2000–2002).

The IMF greeted the December 2002 election of President Kibaki with the hope that it might lift a 2001 loan freeze if the new government made progress in addressing the deficit, corruption, and privatization of state enterprises. But, the government's elimination of fees for public schools, its increase in salaries and perks for senior civil servants, and the pay raises the National Assembly gave its members increased the public deficit. (The overall balance of tax revenue and public spending fell from 0.1 percent in 1995 to -2.9 percent in 2006.) By November 2003 the IMF approved a $253 million loan despite the government's difficulty in controlling the budget deficit and its delays in privatizing state-run enterprises. In November 2004 the World Bank agreed to assist the government in an audit of bank projects (most of which were administered during the Moi regime) in which corruption was suspected. The "Goldenberg" and "Anglo Leasing" scandals and the government's heavy-handed treatment of the press (see Current issues and Communications below) in 2006 caused the IMF and the World Bank to delay indefinitely the disbursement of a three-year, $327-million loan.

Political Background

Kenya came under British control in the late nineteenth century and was organized in 1920 as a colony (inland) and a protectorate (along the coast). Political development after World War II was impeded by the Mau Mau uprising of 1952-1956, which was inspired primarily by Kikuyu resentment of the fact that much of the country's best land was controlled by Europeans. Further difficulties arose in the early 1960s because of tribal and political rivalries, which delayed agreement on a constitution and postponed the date of formal independence within the Commonwealth until December 12, 1963. An election held in May 1963 had already established the predominant position of the Kenya African National Union (KANU), led by Jomo KENYATTA of the Kikuyu tribe, who had previously been imprisoned and exiled on suspicion of leading the Mau Mau insurgency. Kenyatta accordingly became the country's first prime minister and subsequently, upon the adoption of a republican form of government on December 12, 1964, its first president. The principal opposition party, the Kenya African Democratic Union (KADU), dissolved itself and merged with KANU in 1964.

However, a new opposition party, the Kenya People's Union (KPU), emerged in 1966 under the leadership of the leftist Jaramogi Oginga Ajuma ODINGA, whose forced resignation as vice president in April 1966 caused a minor split in the ruling party and led to a special election in which the new group won limited parliamentary representation.

Both President Kenyatta and Vice President Daniel Teroitich arap MOI, a member of the small Kalenjin ethnic group, were unopposed for reelection in September 1974. Kenyatta died on August 22, 1978, and was immediately succeeded, on an interim basis, by Moi, who, as the sole KANU candidate, was declared president on October 10 to fill the remainder of Kenyatta's five-year term.

A veneer of apparent stability was shattered by an attempted coup by members of the Kenyan Air Force on August 1, 1982. The rebellion was quickly crushed by loyal military and paramilitary units, and the government announced the disbanding of the existing air force. President Moi dissolved the National Assembly on July 22, 1983, and called for a premature general election. The balloting was conducted on September 26, although Moi on August 29 was guaranteed a return to the assembly as an unopposed candidate and reelected to another presidential term as KANU's sole candidate for the office. Thereafter, he dealt harshly with rebel leaders, twelve of whom were executed in 1985.

In early 1986 the government launched a crackdown on dissidents, especially pamphleteering supporters of the Mwakenya movement, and dealt forcefully with unrest within the university community in late 1987. Internal and external critics continued to charge the government with human rights abuses. Some anti-Moi foment was attributed to resentment by Kikuyu tribesmen of the political ascendancy of Moi's numerically inferior Kalenjin group, amid evidence that members of the political elite had amassed large fortunes despite deepening national poverty.

Notwithstanding such controversies, the government experienced little real electoral challenge in early 1988. As the only candidate presented by KANU on February 27, Moi was declared reelected, again without the formality of a public vote, while party preselection eliminated most dissenters from assembly balloting on March 21. Several days later, Moi replaced his longtime vice president, Mwai KIBAKI, with the relatively unknown Dr. Josephat KARANJA. However, in April 1989 the assembly, apparently with the tacit support of the president, declared its nonconfidence in Karanja, who resigned on May 1. Moi immediately appointed George SAITOTI to the position, noting that his new deputy, who had earned praise for his handling of economic affairs, would retain the finance portfolio.

In February 1990 Foreign Minister Robert OUKO, whose popularity was viewed by many as having eclipsed that of the president, was assassinated before he could complete a highly publicized investigation of government and KANU corruption. Although domestic unrest intensified following the incident, in May Moi once again rejected calls for introduction of a multiparty system, insisting that such a change would exacerbate tribal cleavage. A KANU conference in December 1990 reendorsed the one-party system, while in February 1991 the government refused to recognize a National Democratic Party (NDP) organized by former vice president Odinga. However, multiparty advocates regrouped in midyear as the Forum for the Restoration of Democracy (FORD, under Political Parties, below), which, with widening popular support, continued the struggle for liberalization despite harassment by the authorities.

The administration's image was further tarnished on November 19, 1991, when Nicholas Kiprono BIWOTT, one of the president's closest political allies, was dismissed from the cabinet after an outside investigator had described him as a "prime suspect" in the Ouko murder. Shortly thereafter, international lenders and Western capitals informed Nairobi that economic assistance would be frozen until political and economic reforms were implemented. In response, Moi reluctantly reversed his position on multiparty pluralism, and following constitutional revision effective December 20, several new parties were legalized, prompting a number of cabinet and KANU officials to resign and join the opposition.

On October 28, 1992, Moi dissolved the National Assembly in preparation for the as yet unscheduled elections. Describing the action as his "secret weapon," Moi apparently sought to capitalize on the recent splintering of FORD into two factions, FORD-Kenya (FORD-K) and FORD-Asili (FORD-A), over the choice of a presidential candidate. At presidential balloting on December 29 Moi was challenged by two former vice presidents, Kibaki, founder of the Democratic Party (DP), and Odinga, leader of FORD-K, as well as FORD-A leader Kenneth MATIBA and four other candidates. Although winning only 36 percent of the vote, Moi easily outpolled his three top challengers. Meanwhile, at simultaneous legislative balloting KANU secured 100 assembly seats, well ahead of FORD-K and FORD-A, which won 31 seats each. Domestic and international observers criticized the polling as tainted by KANU intimidation tactics, electoral fraud, and vote rigging. Subsequently, on January 4, 1993, the two FORD groups and the DP, the latter controlling 23 assembly seats, announced the formation of an opposition coalition to "nonviolently" force the holding of new elections. However, only the DP honored a pledge not to sponsor candidates against other opposition parties. As a result, the coalition was in disarray at a by-election on June 27, 1994, that gave KANU three of seven seats. More importantly, an increasing number of disillusioned opposition MPs were crossing over to KANU, with the latter edging toward the two-thirds majority needed for constitutional revision.

The government's violent crackdown on dissidents in late 1996 signaled both an intensification of Moi's desire to suppress the proreform movement as well as the apparent ascendancy of hardliners within KANU. In early February 1997 the administration, citing "emergency" drought conditions, imposed the Preservation of National Security Act, which granted the government broad emergency powers, including the right to curtail political party activity. Thereafter, widespread antigovernment demonstrations were reported in late February 1997, and in April the ambassadors of 14 countries issued a joint statement condemning the government for using excessive force to suppress the continuing unrest and calling on the administration to remove restrictions on the opposition's freedoms of speech and assembly.

In mid-April 1997 the constitutional reform movement appeared to gain new focus when a number of prominent opposition leaders took part in a meeting of the National Convention Assembly (NCA), a proreform movement theretofore led by activist religious groups. For their part, KANU leaders rejected an invitation to attend the conclave and dismissed the NCA as a grouping of "tribalists"; moreover, the NCA's attempt to convene a meeting of its executive wing was banned in late May.

Under pressure from both domestic and international observers, President Moi on June 1, 1997, pledged to review the colonial-era laws that allowed security personnel to use force against illegal demonstrations; nevertheless, reports of government-initiated violence continued. Consequently, on July 17 the opposition announced its intention to launch a campaign of protest demonstrations culminating in a general strike in August. In response, the administration announced that it would establish a bipartisan parliamentary commission to review the constitution and expunge those laws designed to suppress the opposition. Real progress remained elusive, however, as the government rejected demands that NCA representatives be included on the commission.

On August 28, 1997, President Moi organized a meeting of over 120 KANU and opposition parliamentarians at which the two sides launched the Inter-Party Parliamentary Group (IPPG) to serve as a vehicle for drafting electoral reform measures. Subsequently, IPPG negotiators forged a series of draft constitutional amendments, which were approved by the legislature in late October and early November and signed into law by Moi on November 7. Meanwhile, the government approved the registration of twelve new parties, including, after some delay, Safina, a grouping launched in early 1995 by Paul MUIITE (an opposition MP) and the noted paleontologist Dr. Richard LEAKEY (see Political Parties, below). On November 10 Moi dissolved the assembly, and the following day the government announced that presidential and legislative elections would be held in late December.

At the presidential balloting held December 29–30, 1997, President Moi won another five-year term by outdistancing a field of 14 candidates. The incumbent secured approximately 40 percent of the vote, while his nearest competitor, the DP's Kibaki, captured 31.1 percent. Meanwhile, at simultaneous legislative elections, KANU narrowly retained its majority, securing 113 seats. The DP finished second, with 41 seats overall, while a total of ten parties gained representation. Deriding the polling as fraudulent, a number of opposition officials immediately called for new elections, and Kibaki filed suit to have the results overturned. Dismissing criticism of the electoral process, on January 8, 1998, Moi named a new government, which did not, however, include a vice president.

The terrorist bombing of the U.S. embassy in Nairobi on August 7, 1998, and the resulting death of 247 Kenyans and 11 U.S. citizens caught the Moi government off guard. Security concerns surfaced again in early 1999 when it was revealed that a Kurdish militant, Abdullah Öcalan, had entered Kenya without going through proper immigration procedures, only to be captured and transported out of the country by Turkish security agents acting without Nairobi's consent. On February 18 Moi dismissed three top security officials and reshuffled his government in an apparent response to the incident.

Among those affected by the cabinet changes was finance minister Simeon NYACHAE, the government's most prominent anticorruption campaigner, who resigned from the government rather than accept a lesser post. Nyachae's demotion reportedly surprised observers, as it appeared to undermine the government's claims of greater economic accountability on the eve of fresh negotiations with the IMF. On April 3 Moi reappointed George Saitoti as vice president. (Saitoti had held the post until December 1997, after which Moi had left the post vacant, prompting speculation that his next deputy would be his hand-chosen successor.)

President Moi pulled a political rabbit out of his hat in June 1999 when he enticed Dr. Richard LEAKEY (a prominent member of the Safina opposition party) to join the administration as cabinet secretary and head of the civil service. Leakey and his economic reform team were subsequently given high marks for probity and enthusiasm, although it remained unclear whether progress would be sufficient for the IMF and World Bank (who were demanding improved fiscal discipline, privatization, and anticorruption measures) to resume aid. That question became moot in April 2001 when Leakey resigned; allegedly powerful groups within the government had blocked his anticorruption efforts.

On June 12, 2001, Moi appointed Raila ODINGA and other members of the National Democratic Party (NDP) to his cabinet, thereby forming a “coalition” government. (In March 2002 KANU and the NDP formally merged.)

Moi in July 2002 selected Uhuru KENYATTA, the son of independence leader Jomo Kenyatta, as his preferred successor. However, public sentiment subsequently appeared to be turning solidly against KANU, which was expected to face a serious electoral challenge in December from a united opposition. On August 30, 2002, Moi dismissed Saitoti, who had earlier opposed Moi’s selection of Kenyatta as his presidential successor. (The post remained vacant until November 4, when Moi appointed Wycliffe Musalia MUDAVIDI from KANU as the new vice president.) In the meantime four cabinet ministers, including Odinga, resigned from the cabinet over Moi’s selection of Kenyatta, and, with Saitoti, joined the opposition (see Political Parties, below). Moi dissolved the assembly on October 26, 2002, prior to the elections and before it had an opportunity to review proposed changes to the constitution drafted by the constitutional review commission. Moi dissolved the constitutional commission the following day, and on October 28 barred delegates from convening.

The results of the presidential and legislative balloting on December 27, 2002, swept KANU out of power in a decisive victory for the “Super Alliance” of the National Rainbow Coalition (NARC). The NARC presidential candidate, Mwai Kibaki, secured 62.3 percent of the vote, while Moi’s hand-picked successor, Uhuru Kenyatta, captured only 31.2 percent. The remaining three presidential candidates won less than 6.4 percent of the vote. In the legislative elections, the constituent parties of NARC captured a majority of 125 of the 210 elected seats. KANU finished second with 64 seats. Five other parties secured seats in the National Assembly (see Legislature, below).

President Kibaki was inaugurated on December 30, 2002, and had a cabinet in place by January 6, 2003. His labor minister, Ahmed KHALIF, was killed in an airplane crash before the end of January (three other members of the cabinet were also seriously injured in the crash). Vice President Michael Kijana WAMALWA died of a serious illness on August 23, 2003. Kibaki named Arthur Moody AWORI the new vice president on September 25, 2003.

In a bid to shore up support for his government in the face of bitter factional infighting among the major parties within NARC, President Kibaki reshuffled the cabinet on June 30, 2004, and formed a “government of national unity” by including key opposition party leaders, including members of KANU and FORD-People (see Political Parties, below). Kibaki reshuffled the cabinet again on February 14, 2005, transferring some cabinet ministers and announcing a number of changes in the civil service, in reaction to charges of corruption against members of the government (see Current issues, below).

On November 23, 2005, Kibaki dismissed his entire cabinet in the wake of the no-vote for the constitutional referendum; seven of the 28 cabinet ministers campaigned against the proposed constitution (see Constitution and government, below). Political turmoil ensued as Kibaki announced the names of his new cabinet on national television only to have many of the newly appointed officials refuse to serve. Additionally, Kibaki refused to recall the National Assembly until March 22, 2006, out of fear that the parliament would pass a vote of no confidence. Lastly, Kibaki indicated that he would run for reelection in 2007, possibly under the banner of a new party, NARC-Kenya (see Political Parties, below). The formation of a new splinter party calls into question the viability of President Kibaki's NARC coalitional government.

In response to additional corruption charges stemming from two separate scandals, three additional members of the cabinet were dismissed in February and March 2006 (see Current issues, below). Five members of parliament died in an airplane crash in April 2006.

Constitution and Government

The 1963 constitution has been amended several times, mainly in the direction of increased centralization and the abrogation of checks and balances that were originally introduced at the insistence of the tribal and party opposition. Originally designated by the assembly, the chief executive is now popularly elected for a five-year term. In case of a presidential vacancy, the vice president (a presidential appointee) serves pending a new election, which must be held within 90 days. The National Assembly, initially bicameral in form, was reduced to a single chamber in 1967 by merger of the earlier Senate and House of Representatives. The president can dissolve the body and call a new election; a nonconfidence vote also results in dissolution, with both presidential and legislative balloting mandated within 90 days. All candidates for election to the assembly were required to be members of KANU prior to the December 1991 amendment, which authorized multiparty balloting. The judicial system is headed by the Kenya Court of Appeal and includes the High Court of Kenya, provincial and district magistrates' courts, and Muslim courts at the district level. Under controversial amendments approved in 1988 the president, who had been accorded the right in 1986 to replace the auditor and attorney generals, was further empowered to dismiss court of appeal and high court judges; concurrently, police were authorized to hold uncharged detainees for up to 14 days. An amendment passed in August 1992 required that successful presidential candidates secure 25 percent of the vote in at least five of the eight provinces. Defended by the government as a means to avoid election of a solely regional candidate, the law was criticized by the opposition for unduly favoring the incumbent, whose support was drawn from a number of small, geographically widespread tribes. Amendments in 1997 permitted the formation of a coalition government, mandated a broad review of the constitution, and expanded the number of directly elected seats in the assembly from 188 to 210.

A constitutional review commission continued work in 2002 on a new draft constitution, projected to propose the establishment of a bicameral legislature and creation of the post of prime minister. President Moi dissolved parliament for the 2002 elections before any action was taken.

A popular plank of the NARC government electoral platform promised to deliver a new constitution that would reduce the powers of the president within six months, with a deadline of June 2003. The mistrust between the NAK and LDP party factions of NARC (see Political Parties, below), however, led to a stalemate over the formula for the diminution of executive power. Raila Odinga of the LDP rallied support for the creation of a robust prime minister in a constitutional arrangement similar to that of France. President Kibaki and his closest advisors in the NAK wing of NARC lost their enthusiasm for specific arrangements that would force the executive to substantively share power with another single figure, and for other reforms that might weaken NARC's ability to maintain its electoral advantage. A constitutional review conference opened on April 30, 2003, in the Bomas of Kenya, comprised of all the members of the National Assembly plus 406 delegates, but the divisions over a new power-sharing formula only sharpened during the proceedings. The promised deadline passed without approval of a new constitution, and popular agitation over the stalemate presented the NARC with a serious crisis, as a majority of Kenyans expected concrete reforms to prevent future abuses of executive power associated with the graft, corruption, and oppression of the previous regime. The situation became more polarized with the suspicious murder in September 2003 of Crispin M'Bayi, a key figure in the negotiations over executive power-sharing at the Bomas conference and a close associate of Odinga.

The stalemate continued into 2004 as the “Mt. Kenya” faction of the NAK wing of NARC sought assembly review and amendment of the Bomas draft, which supported the Odinga/LDP view of executive power-sharing and was approved in March by most of the 629 delegates to the review conference. The LDP wing countered that the draft could only be passed or defeated in toto, a position also favored by a majority of the delegates who attended the review conference. The government withdrew from the conference and sought passage of legislation that would permit the assembly to amend the Bomas draft. On June 28, 2004, President Kibaki announced that the 2004 revised date for a new constitution would also be missed. Riots broke out at pro-Bomas constitutional rallies in Nairobi and Kisumu as riot police moved to enforce a ban on antigovernment protests.

In 2005 the debate continued to rage in the assembly where a Parliamentary Select Committee on Constitutional Review (PSC) was formed to consider the status of changes to the Bomas draft. The LDP pulled out of the PSC after six of its party members were removed from the committee. Eventually, the NAK wing of NARC prevailed as the assembly amended the Bomas draft to weaken the prime minister, retain a powerful presidency, and maintain a unicameral legislature. The changes also altered the basis for the administration of Kenya’s provinces; previous arrangements would be changed to create elective district administration with accountability to the central government. On July 22, 2005, the National Assembly approved the key terms of the revised constitution bill. A national referendum on the new constitution, required by a ruling of the High Court before a new constitution could have effect, was held on November 21, 2005.

The proposed constitution’s key elements included provisions for land reform, women’s rights, and the further establishment of regional religious courts. (Christian and other religious courts would be created to work in tandem with the Kadhi, or Muslim, courts, which apply religious law to issues such as personal status, marriage, and divorce.) Absent from the proposed constitution, generally referred to as the Wako Draft, were provisions to establish a prime minister and to return to a bicameral legislature.

The referendum, which became known as the Banana and Orange Referendum (because the many illiterate voters were asked to choose from a symbol of a banana if they approved of the new constitution and an orange if they opposed it), was hotly contested. Both sides held a series of political rallies that were marred by violence; at least eight people were killed. The referendum ballot on November 21, 2005, drew a 53 percent voter turnout. The Wako draft constitution was soundly defeated, with approximately 58 percent voting against and only 42 percent favoring its passage. The failure dealt a blow to Kibaki’s leadership and threatened the viability of his government (see Current issues, below).

Administratively, Kenya is divided into 40 rural districts grouped into seven provinces, exclusive of the Nairobi Extra Provincial District, which comprises the Nairobi urban area.

Foreign Relations

Generally avoiding involvement in “big power” politics, Kenya devoted its primary attention following independence to regional and continental affairs, supporting African unity and liberation movements in southern Africa. Regionally, it signed the Treaty for East African Cooperation at Kampala, Uganda, on June 6, 1967, providing for the formal launching of the East African Community (EAC) on December 1. The grouping (initially perceived as a model for multinational economic integration) was designed to preserve and expand arrangements established under British colonial rule in areas such as transportation and communications. Supporters also envisioned eventual creation of a common market, and the East African Development Bank (EADB) was established as a related institution (see article on EADB under Regional Development Banks). However, the EAC achieved little success, in part due to ideological differences between Kenya and socialist Tanzania and a variety of disputes between Kenya and Uganda. The EAC was terminated in mid-1977 amid significant acrimony over distribution of its assets and collateral developments, including Tanzania's decision to close its border with Kenya. In November 1983 final agreement was reached regarding the EAC assets, and the Kenyan-Tanzanian border was reopened; relations with Dar es Salaam were further stabilized by the reestablishment of diplomatic relations in December. Relations with Uganda also improved in the immediate wake of the November agreement, although new tensions subsequently arose, with each country accusing the other of harboring insurgents and Nairobi exhibiting what some observers described as an "obsession" with perceived Ugandan hostility.

In 1994 the three former EAC members established a Tripartite Commission for East African Cooperation with the hope of reviving integrationist sentiment, and in 1996 Francis MUTHAURA, Kenya's former ambassador to the United Nations, was named executive secretary of the commission's new secretariat, headquartered in Arusha, Tanzania. Kenya was subsequently viewed as the leading proponent of cooperation, and a treaty for the formal reactivation of the EAC had been drafted by the spring of 1999. The proposed accord called for the gradual reduction of tariffs between members and establishment of a common external tariff as initial steps toward a possible monetary union and even, in the minds of the most ardent integrationists, eventual political federation. The presidents of the three countries involved were scheduled to meet to approve the new treaty by the end of 1999. However, considerable negotiation reportedly was necessary on details of the plan; Tanzania expressed concern that it would be overwhelmed by Kenya's much larger economy and continental leaders wondered how a revived EAC would interact with other groupings, such as the Common Market for Eastern and Southern Africa (Comesa) and the Southern African Development Community (SADC), which were promoting larger free-trade blocs. Meanwhile, Rwanda and Burundi were said to be eager for membership should the EAC be relaunched successfully. (For details on the subsequent formal reestablishment of the EAC, see separate article on the EAC in the Intergovernmental Organization section.)

Kenyan-Somali relations have been frequently strained by the activities of nomadic Somali tribesmen (shifitas) in Kenya's northeastern provinces and by long-standing Somalian irredentist claims. They reached a nadir in mid-1977 with the outbreak of hostilities between Somalia and Ethiopia in the latter's Ogaden region, when a Kenyan spokesman declared that an Ethiopian victory would be "a victory for Kenya." It was not until July 1984 that President Moi paid his first state visit to Mogadishu, in the course of which an agreement was concluded on border claims and trade cooperation, with Moi offering to help Somalian President Siad Barre "find a peaceful solution" to the dispute with Addis Ababa. The following September, several hundred ethnic Somali members of an exile group, the Northern Frontier District Liberation Front (NFDLF), responded to a government amnesty and returned to Kenya, declaring that the organization's headquarters in Mogadishu, Somalia, had been closed. Subsequently, in early December, Kenyan and Somalian representatives concluded a border security agreement, while other top shifita leaders responded to a second general amnesty in July 1985, declaring an end to the years of "banditry." Border incidents nonetheless continued, including the killing of four Kenyan policemen in September 1989 by Somali forces claiming to be in pursuit of antigovernment rebels.

In early 1992 Nairobi, seeking to repair strained regional relations, signed cooperation agreements with Ethiopia and Sudan. Furthermore, on May 8 Nairobi established formal relations with Pretoria, and in June Moi became the first African head of state to visit South Africa in 21 years. Meanwhile, the encampment of approximately 300,000 Somalian, 70,000 Ethiopian, and 30,000 Sudanese refugees along Kenya's borders was described by the regime as an economic burden and source of insecurity. In August the United Nations High Commission for Refugees (UNHCR) criticized Kenya for detaining thousands of refugees in squalid conditions in Nairobi and Mombasa. Thereafter, in January 1993, amid rumors that it was considering an involuntary repatriation and describing the refugee situation as increasingly untenable, Kenya urged the UNHCR to hasten their departure.

In October 1998 approximately 200 people were killed when Ethiopian forces crossed into Kenyan territory in pursuit of antigovernment rebels and their alleged Kenyan supporters. In late November regional peace talks opened; however, the security situation in northwestern Kenya remained extremely volatile. On the other hand, in April 2000 President Moi ordered the reopening of the border with Somalia, which had been closed since the previous August.

On November 28, 2002, terrorists bombed an Israeli-owned hotel in Mombasa, killing 11 Kenyans and three Israeli tourists. On the same day a shoulder-launched missile was fired at an Israeli airliner but missed its target. In December al-Qaida claimed responsibility for the attacks as it had for the 1998 bombing of the U.S. Embassy in Nairobi.

President Kibaki's new government faced renewed pressure from the United States and the United Kingdom in 2003 to crack down on terrorist activity in Kenya with new internal security measures and reforms in the Kenyan security services. The United States threatened cuts in foreign aid to Kenya to encourage the new government, which reorganized the key security units responsible for antiterrorist intelligence. Both the United States and the United Kingdom announced in late May 2003 heightened security alerts for travel to Kenya, and British Airways suspended flights. (The Israeli airline El Al suspended flights as well; the UK ban was lifted in late June for Nairobi, but not for Mombasa.) The travel alerts, warning of increased risk of a terrorist attack, were a blow to the Kenyan tourist industry already reeling from the November 2002 bombing and missile attacks. The alerts and threats of aid reduction may have prompted the government to submit a controversial Suppression of Terrorism Act in July 2003, which when introduced in the assembly was greeted with alarm by many government and opposition members and prompted hundreds of protesters in Nairobi. The bill, which proposed to strengthen the government's powers of detention of persons and permit searches without court authorization, was of particular concern to Muslim community leaders from the Coast and Mombasa and to human rights organizations. Due to widespread opposition from government and opposition MPs, the bill was blocked by an assembly committee. By January 2004 President Kibaki attempted to revive the bill with assurances to Muslim leaders that any measures that might lead to the targeting of Kenyan Muslims would be removed from the bill.

Nairobi advanced its regional security objectives in East Africa in 2003 by signing in March a Strategy and Plan of Action for implementing a security agreement reached with Tanzania and Uganda in 2001. In May 2003 two Kenyan army battalions were deployed on the border with Somalia to guard against infiltration by potential terrorists, and in June the government responded to the heightened terror alerts by suspending flights to Somalia. Police also arrested 36 suspects from a neighborhood of Somali refugees in Nairobi. In September Nairobi agreed to meet with Sudan to address cattle rustling and the illegal weapons trade. The Kenyan security forces continue to maintain a heightened presence on the Somali border. As the violence escalated in Mogadishu and southern Somalia in early 2006, these forces increasingly faced large numbers of refugees attempting to enter Kenya.

In March 2006, Kenyan police arrested two suspected terrorists in Nairobi with 55 pounds of ammonium nitrate and bomb-making material. The capital was placed on red alert; there was concern that the suspects were cooperating with terrorists from other countries.

Current Issues

The NARC government's first major policy initiative in January 2003 was to deliver on its campaign promise to eliminate the fees for the country's public primary schools and make school compulsory. The response to the new policy overwhelmed a school system unprepared for the return of so many children to classrooms. The cost of the program ballooned the public deficit at a time when Nairobi was anxious to resume the flow of IMF and World Bank loans (see The Country, above) and forced the government to seek financial support for the program from foreign donors.

NARC's campaign pledges for economic revival proved more difficult to realize. The Moi regime had left the Kenyan economy in bad shape, by some estimates at least 20 years behind in overall economic development progress. The economic infrastructure, once one of the best in all of Africa, was in disrepair, especially the transportation infrastructure and the once-strong banking and financial services sector. State-owned enterprises were notoriously corrupt and mismanaged. International pressure to eliminate corruption in the public and private sectors and to privatize state enterprises (especially in energy, telecommunications, transportation, and ports), resisted by Moi for years, now gained significant traction as the new government needed foreign aid and loans to deliver on its promises to revive the economy. President Kibaki had promised to create 500,000 new jobs every year, a pledge that was impossible to achieve even with external assistance and proved even more challenging given the blows to the tourism (terrorism) and agriculture (severe drought) sectors. Moreover, the Kibaki government made slow progress in the privatization of government-controlled enterprises, given the entrenched interests within some of the governing coalition's factions attempting to keep control of these sectors as sources of patronage and graft.

NARC also pledged to crack down on corruption with a zero-tolerance platform. In 2003 President Kibaki was under popular and international pressure to put an end to public sector corruption and prosecute some of the worst abusers of the Moi regime. Kibaki moved quickly to dismantle entrenched political patronage networks as he purged some tainted members of the senior civil service and security forces in early February 2003, while others were reassigned or were left untouched. (Critics within the NARC government had hoped for a more comprehensive purge.) Soon thereafter, he dismissed the chief executives of three state enterprises. Kibaki opened the new session of the National Assembly on February 18, 2003, with the remarkably frank admission that "[c]orruption has undermined our economy, our politics, and our national psyche" and pledged to address the issue by introducing legislation. (A new law and code of ethics were later adopted requiring senior government officials to declare their assets upon entering and exiting office.) Within days of the speech before the assembly Kibaki suspended the chief justice of the High Court pending an investigation into allegations of corruption and torture of prisoners. Kibaki also named a high-profile anti-graft crusader, John GITHONGO (former head of Transparency International in Kenya), as his anti-corruption chief.

In March 2003 the government opened a public inquiry, closely followed by the news media and the Kenyan people, into the infamous Goldenberg International corruption scandal that first surfaced in the 1990s. The inquiry addressed a scheme whereby nearly $600 million (the equivalent of approximately 10 percent of the country's annual GDP) was siphoned from the public coffers of the central bank to the Goldenberg firm (and, by implication, to a string of former and present government officials) in the form of export credits and state subsidies for gold and jewelry exports, exports that most likely never existed.

In October 2003 the government, in the wake of a report issued by a special commission investigating the conduct of the Kenyan judiciary, suspended 6 of the 9 judges in the court of appeals, 17 out of the 36 high court judges, and 82 of the 254 magistrates on grounds of "corruption, unethical conduct, and other forms of misbehavior."

By December 2003, however, problems with the government's anticorruption record emerged in new press accounts of irregularities in government procurement. By May 2004 new allegations surfaced over irregularities surrounding procurement contracts for police telecommunications equipment, forensic laboratories, and a new passport system (dubbed the Anglo-Leasing scandal). In July, British High Commissioner Sir Edward Clay publicly criticized the Kibaki government about a renewed tolerance within the NARC coalition for the corrupt practices of the past and an appetite among senior government officials for the trappings of office. The British, United States, and European Union governments immediately stepped up diplomatic pressure on Nairobi to investigate and prosecute any wrongdoing; the IMF and World Bank joined the chorus of donors calling for action, a renewed commitment to zero tolerance, and an end to the excessive salary increases and vehicle allowances for senior government officials.

On February 7, 2005, John Githongo resigned from his post as anticorruption chief, citing pressure from within the NARC cabinet to close his investigations of the procurement irregularities. The United States immediately suspended $2.5 million in anticorruption aid to Kenya. President Kibaki reshuffled the cabinet on February 14, 2005, in response to the mounting pressure from foreign governments, and on February 16, 2005, government prosecutors filed charges against six former government officials implicated in the procurement scandals.

Another matter of concern to the government was the escalation of long-standing tensions between the Masai and Kikuyu tribal communities over land, cattle, and water. Masai protests over the right to reclaim land leased for long periods under colonial era treaties, and access to water on these lands for Masai cattle herds, turned violent in August 2004 and January 2005. The government has linked the land reform issue to progress in constitutional reform, and President Kibaki pledged to establish order in the affected provinces. The land reform initiatives were defeated, however, in the no-vote on constitutional reform in November 2005.

In 2006 more details of the Goldenberg and Anglo-Leasing corruption scandals surfaced and threatened to bring down Kibaki's government, after John Githongo, now living in exile in the United Kingdom, alleged in a public letter to President Kibaki that the Kenyan government had issued phony contracts in 2002 to a nonexistent British firm to upgrade its passport system and forensic science laboratories. The Githongo Report alleged that up to 30 members of the government had participated in the scheme, including Vice President Moody Awori, who denied any wrongdoing. George Saitoti (education minister), Kiraitu MURUNGI (energy minister), and David MWIRARIA (finance minister) resigned their cabinet positions in the wake of the allegations. Githongo also claimed that the money raised by graft was intended to fund the government's forthcoming election campaign.

Kenya is suffering one of the worst droughts in decades. The seasonal rains failed to appear in late 2005 or in early 2006; in the eastern and northern regions of the country up to 80 percent of the livestock have died, and approximately 3 million people face starvation. International organizations, such as the World Food Program, have issued urgent appeals for international assistance.

Political Parties

Before its unprecedented defeat in the face of a united opposition in the 2002 national elections, the ruling Kenya African National Union (KANU) had dominated the government structure and political life of Kenya since independence. KANU's one-time principal rival, the Kenya People's Union (KPU), was proscribed in 1969, although a one-party system was not formally mandated until June 1982. Under mounting domestic and external pressure, KANU endorsed pluralism in December 1991, and a number of other parties were legalized in the ensuing months.

On August 5, 1992, prospects for an opposition upset of the incumbents in presidential and legislative elections later that year were severely undermined when Masinde MULIRO, a prominent Forum for the Restoration of Democracy (FORD) leader who advocated opposition unity, died. One month later, torn by debate over the nomination of a presidential candidate, FORD broke into two competing factions (see below).

On November 30, 1995, members of FORD-K, FORD-A, the DP, and Safina launched an Opposition Alliance with its stated objectives being the political defeat of KANU, an end to tribalism and corruption, and the formation of a government of national reconciliation and reconstruction. Intra-party disputes plagued the opposition in 1996 and 1997. In March 1997 an Opposition Solidarity was formed by former FORD-K leader Raila Odinga in concert with the FORD-A's Kenneth MATIBA and Ngengi MUIGAI, a DP faction leader. Meanwhile, the Opposition Alliance claimed to have drafted FORD-K and DP faction leaders Michael Kijana Wamalwa and Mwai Kibaki, respectively, as well as FORD-A's Joseph Martin SHIKUKU. However, the fledgling Alliance–Solidarity rivalry was almost immediately overshadowed by the emergence of the National Convention Assembly (NCA), a proreform grouping. At the NCA's inaugural national convention in April Kivutha KIBWANA was appointed chair, and the group's executive committee drafted a number of well-known opposition figures, including Kibaki, Richard Leakey, Koigi Wa WAMWERE, and Islamic Party of Kenya (IPK) leader Sheikh Khalid Salim Ahmed BALALA.

In late August 1997 President Moi denounced the NCA as the instigator of the violent unrest gripping the country. Moreover, despite the NCA's subsequent decision to suspend protest activities to allow the government to fulfill its pledge to introduce reforms, the group was banned from holding meetings. In the face of violent dispersal of its meetings by government security forces, the NCA announced its intention to boycott presidential and legislative balloting. On the other hand, the Opposition Alliance had reportedly “folded up its umbrella,” to distance itself from the ongoing violence and in response to the government's reform promises. The NCA subsequently continued to be an important stakeholder and government critic in the reform process by articulating alternate plans to those proposed by KANU.

A number of opposition alliances were formed in 2002 in preparation for the December presidential and legislative balloting. In February several groups (including the DP, FORD-K, NCA [also now referenced as the National Convention Executive Council—NCEC], UDM, and a faction of FORD-A) launched a National Alliance for Change (NAC), which was later restyled as the National Alliance of Kenya (NAK) under the party registration for the National Party of Kenya (NPK). Concurrently, FORD-People, Safina, KENDA, the NLP, and others established the People's Coalition of Kenya (PCK), also sometimes referenced as the “Third Force for Change.” In mid-October the NAK and PCK joined the newly formed LDP and its so-called “Rainbow Alliance” of former KANU and NDP faction leaders in an even larger opposition alliance called the National Rainbow Coalition (NARC), also referred to as the “Super Alliance.” However, the selection of Kibaki as the NARC's presidential candidate caused problems with FORD-People leader Simeon Nyachae, who withdrew his party from the alliance and launched his own presidential campaign.

These 15 opposition parties in the “Super Alliance” were held together by a Memorandum of Understanding (MoU) signed before the December 2002 elections by the leadership of the constituent parties of the NAK and the LDP. In the MoU NAK and LDP agreed, if victorious, to divide cabinet positions equally in consultation among the party leaders and to name Raila Odinga prime minister once a new constitution was adopted.

After the election, President Kibaki unilaterally named NAK and LDP ministers to his NARC cabinet in early 2003 without regard to the equal division formula specified in the MoU. Moreover, the NARC eight-member Summit of NAK and LDP politicians did not convene, and within the first three months some members of the new government were questioning the Summit's utility. By late spring of 2003 heated disputes erupted between Kikuyu “Mt. Kenya” elements of NAK and Luo LDP leader Odinga, in league with the Luhya NARC politicians (who together constituted a “Western Alliance”), over the diminution of executive power in the new draft constitution, which the Mt. Kenya faction sought to derail. By August Kibaki publicly opposed the creation of a premiership, stating before a NARC parliamentary meeting, “there can never be two governments.” The bitter ethnic and factional infighting jeopardized the long-anticipated constitutional reform process and threatened to bring down the government due to the size of the LDP voting bloc in the assembly (59 elected seats).

President Kibaki attempted to quell the party infighting by decreeing in December 2003 that all the parties in the coalition were “dissolved” and called for new party elections to transform NARC into a single party. The LDP and FORD-K ignored the demand and boycotted a February 2004 meeting convened to reach a new consensus on power sharing and to plan the dissolution of the constituent parties (see below). By March, FORD-K leader Musikari KOMBO asked Kibaki to halt the recruitment drive begun by Charity NGILU to avoid irreparable harm and avoid violent clashes between party activists. Subsequently, none of the NARC member parties unilaterally disbanded their organizations, although Kibaki distanced himself from official status as leader of the DP.

The opposition KANU and FORD-People in the meantime allied in a Coalition for National Unity (CNU), which presented the factions within the NARC with opportunities to selectively seek the opposition’s support on issues that divided the government. Odinga and the LDP exploited this opportunity by garnering KANU’s support for the Bomas conference constitutional draft that endorsed curbing the power of the presidency, devolving power to district authorities, and creating a prime minister. President Kibaki also exploited this opportunity on June 30, 2004, when he announced a cabinet reshuffle that produced a “government of national unity” by bringing in ministers from the opposition parties and demoting or removing key LDP cabinet members. By the end of 2004 many LDP MPs had crossed over to sit with the opposition parties in the assembly.

By mid-2005 the parliamentary groups of NARC were in disarray as members of the government and opposition camps crossed party lines to forge temporary and unstable alliances, and groups of MPs openly contemplated the formation of new political parties and party alliances in anticipation of the 2007 elections. The run-up to the constitutional referendum in November intensified this instability and maneuvering for political advantage.

Opposition to the November 2005 constitutional referendum united under the banner of the “Orange Team”; the “no vote” was symbolized by an orange. Building upon the defeat of the proposed constitution, the LDP and KANU leadership, the power brokers behind the “Orange Team,” took steps to form a coalition, the Orange Democratic Movement (ODM). Although ODM is still in its infancy and is subject to factional infighting, supporters are positioning the ODM to unite the disparate oppositional parties in a bid to win control of the government in the 2007 elections. Neither the institutional structure nor the party leadership has been finalized, but it appears ODM hopes to model itself after the successful NARC coalition—new members would maintain their original party memberships.

In response to members of his own cabinet defecting to ODM, President Kibaki announced in March 2006 that he no longer considered NARC a viable party and that he identified with the newly formed NARC-Kenya party. Kibaki’s announcement is widely seen as an indication that he plans to seek reelection in 2007, even though the 2002 MoU stipulated that he would step down after completing his first term. ODM, KANU, and other opposition parties have responded to the president’s statement, and his subsequent support for a NARC-Kenya candidate in the July 2006 by-election by challenging the legitimacy of his government and calling for a vote of no confidence in parliament. The coalition that elected the president has since unraveled.

The July 24, 2006, by-elections for five assembly seats (to replace the five MPs who died in the April airplane crash) were hotly contested by the new NARC-Kenya party and the KANU and LDP wings of ODM given the close margins on votes of no confidence in parliament. NARC-Kenya candidates prevailed in three of the five constituencies; KANU candidates won the other two. The balloting was marred by charges of vote buying (with money and food stores), violence, and allegations that government aircraft were used to transport NARC-Kenya politicians while campaigning and that government vehicles were used to ferry voters to the polls. LDP and KANU party leaders called on the Electoral Commission of Kenya (ECK) to nullify the results, and ECK officials complained of “the wanton violation of electoral rules by the Government.”

Government Party

National Rainbow Coalition (NARC). The NARC was fashioned out of the October 2002 “Super Alliance” between the 14-party National Alliance for Kenya (NAK)—a restyled version of the National Alliance for Change—and the newly formed Liberal Democratic Party (LDP) and its “Rainbow Alliance” of KANU/NDP dissidents. From the beginning this grouping of politicians, ethnic interests, and wide-ranging political ideologies was one of political expedience more than enduring ties or shared policy goals. Africa Confidential framed NARC’s inherent challenge: “[I]t isn’t a party, it’s a loose alliance of individuals and 15 parties. Its members range from leftists and trade unionists to ‘tribal rights’ ethnic chauvinists who have found common political cause.”

Uniting the opposition to defeat the ruling KANU necessitated constructing a “big tent.” NAK and LDP achieved this with the 2002 pre-election MoU that equally divided job responsibilities and cabinet positions should NARC prevail. The NARC platform promised to revive the economy and create hundreds of thousands of jobs, crack down on official corruption (and get foreign aid flowing again), ratify a new constitution that limited presidential power within six months, and institute free universal primary education.

After the NARC electoral victory the underlying tensions within the coalition began to appear almost immediately. President Kibaki never convened the NARC Summit, the top party organ made up of the constituent major party leaders, after the election, and the LDP neglected to designate one of its leaders as its summit representative, perhaps due to the difficulty of choosing faction leaders. From the very beginning the ethnic rivalries, dissension over broken MoU promises, and the division of power undermined the cohesion of NARC in government.

President Kibaki’s efforts throughout 2004 and 2005 to fashion a more cohesive NARC by dissolving the constituent parties and opening NARC to an individual rather than a corporate basis for membership had the opposite effect. His move to invite opposition members into the government and demote several LDP cabinet members exacerbated the tensions and drove some LDP assembly members to sit with the opposition parties. The February 5, 2004, NARC party meeting in Nanyuki, convened to plan the dissolution of the constituent parties and broker a new consensus on power sharing, failed when only a fraction of the invited delegates attended. At a second Nanyuki meeting in April, members of the NARC committee for corporate membership voted down the plan to dissolve the member parties in favor of individual membership. The LDP, FORD-K, UDM, and IPK representatives voted in favor of retaining corporate membership, the FORD-A and SPARK delegates took a middle position, the DP representative remained neutral, and only the SDP and PPF leaders supported dissolution of parties and individual membership.

Calls for NARC party elections slated to begin February 26–27, 2005, at local levels, March 1 at the constituency level, and ending on March 11 were eventually scuttled. Opposition from three NARC factional leaders—Charity Ngilu (NPK), Raila Odinga (LDP), and Musikari Kombo (FORD-K)—led to a court battle over the NARC constitution.

In January 2005, 73 members of the assembly from the NAK wing of NARC formed a new lobby called National Reform Initiative (NARI) in response to their dissatisfaction with the pace and tenor of the government’s economic, land, constitutional, and social service reforms. With the LDP wing of the coalition already in open rebellion, this left the future parliamentary cohesion of NARC in jeopardy. By mid-2005 assembly members from the Coast Province were openly meeting to discuss the formation of a regional party, further undermining NARC’s cohesion.

The major party organs of NARC are the Summit, created by the MoU, the Party Council, and the Parliamentary Group. In theory the NARC Summit achieved some measure of party and ethnic balance among the coalition partners. The Summit consisted of the DP's Kibaki (Kikuyu), LDP's Odinga (Luo), Moody Awori (Luhya), and Najib Balala (Coast and Muslims), UDM's Kipruto KIRWA (Kalenjin), and the NPK's Charity Ngilu (Kamba). All of these organs have fallen away due to factional tensions. In practice NARC had two de facto secretariats, one unofficial group loyal to Kibaki and another official group under the leadership of Ngilu.

The movement of the LDP into opposition and the formation of NARC-Kenya in 2006 further divided NARC and undermined its viability. President Kibaki has declared NARC "dead," and Ngilu has retorted that the newly formed NARC-Kenya is little more than the DP with a different name and should not be confused with the NARC, which is still the ruling government party. At least 80 MPs have left the coalition, including Mutua Katuku and Alex KIBAKI (President Kibaki's son), as well as many cabinet ministers.

Leaders of the NPK, DP, and FORD-K met in June 2006, after the formal launch of NARC-Kenya, to discuss reinvigorating the NARC party organs now that Kibaki had distanced himself politically from the coalition. They also opened a dialogue with ODM leaders, fearing that no party or coalition would win enough seats in 2007 to control the government.

Leaders: Charity NGILU (Chair), Fidelis NGULI (Secretary-General), Bartha MBUVI (Vice Chair), Noah WEKESA (Council and Coordinating Committee Chair), Mutua KATUKU (National Recruitment Executive Committee Chair), Alex MUREITHI, Wanjala WELIME (Elections Board Chairs).

National Alliance Party of Kenya (NAK)/ National Party of Kenya (NPK). The NPK was launched in June 2001 under the leadership of Charity K. Ngilu, who had been the SDP presidential candidate in 1997. The NPK announced that it would work toward "gender equality" and "good governance" while "fighting poverty, ignorance and disease."

By 2002 Ngilu had moved the NPK into the NAC grouping to help launch the restyled NAK, turning over to the opposition alliance the party registration for the NPK to avoid delays or obstruction in party certification from the Moi government.

The NAK brought together 14 parties under one tent (with the NAK as one of the two pillars of NARC, the other being the LDP). Before the LDP joined forces with the NAK to form NARC, Ngilu was in line to receive the prime minister's post under the anticipated new constitution. Once LDP's "Rainbow Alliance" entered the scene, the premiership was promised to Raila Odinga of the LDP. Ngilu was named a cabinet minister by President Kibaki, however, was made chair of NARC, and was selected to sit on the NARC Summit.

In the party dissolution crisis that followed in 2004 (see above), Ngilu initially supported Kibaki on the question of individual or corporate membership in NARC, but by early 2005 she and other NPK party leaders had reversed course and registered the NPK independently again. The NPK joined the LDP and FORD-K in asking the courts to block the March 2005 NARC effort to dissolve the constituent parties and hold direct NARC party elections. The High Court, however, ruled against the injunction and cleared the way for NARC to hold grassroots elections. The ruling is widely seen as damaging to NPK's ability to organize and register voters for the 2007 elections. It is possible that the move toward grassroots elections might lead to the decertification of NPK.

NPK was not consulted during the creation of the NARC-Kenya party, and Ngilu has challenged the legitimacy of the new party by suggesting that NARC-Kenya is little more than the DP in a different form. Although she has not clearly defined NPK's relationship with ODM, Ngilu does appear to be positioning herself to run for the 2007 presidency.

Leaders: Titus MBATHI (Chair), Fidelis NGULI (Secretary General), Charity K. NGILU (1997 presidential candidate), Cecily MBARIRE.

Democratic Party (DP). The DP, which draws support largely from the sizeable Kikuyu ethnic group, was formed in January 1992 by a number of former government officials, including Mwai Kibaki, a long-standing ally of President Moi who had recently resigned from the government and KANU to protest the administration's failure to address widespread official corruption. Kibaki challenged the Moi government on a number of economic issues, especially its continued allocation of funds to inefficient government-owned operations.

At the DP's annual meeting in November 1992 Kibaki's presidential candidacy was unanimously supported; at balloting in late December the DP standard-bearer finished third while party legislative candidates won 23 seats. In early January 1993 the DP agreed to form an electoral coalition with FORD-A and FORD-K, which displayed little effective cohesion at a by-election five months later.

Confronted with the DP's dire financial condition, its main factions agreed to shelve their differences and reelected Kibaki chair at a congress in March 1997. However, a number of party members subsequently signaled their interest in campaigning as the group's standard-bearer in the forthcoming presidential elections. The most noteworthy bid came from Charity K. Ngilu, a prominent assemblywoman, who joined the SDP (and later formed the NPK) after Kibaki received the group's nomination.

In early 1998 the DP accused propresidential militants of orchestrating the outbreak of ethnic violence in the Rift Valley, alleging that supporters of Kibaki's presidential bid were being targeted. (On January 23 the party had filed suit to have the balloting nullified.) Thereafter, the DP sought to form a multiparty, opposition government-in-waiting; however, subsequent negotiations among opposition leaders quickly fell apart, and in April the DP named a shadow cabinet composed of its own members. In October the DP overwhelmingly supported a nonconfidence motion against the government; however, as many as three of its legislators were alleged to have broken with the party on the issue. Kibaki subsequently continued to reject the assembly's constitutional review process, believing that it unfairly represented the interests of KANU and President Moi.

By 2002, the DP, under Kibaki's direction, played a key role in stitching together the NAC, NAK, and subsequently victorious NARC opposition party alliances to defeat KANU. Kibaki's election as president left him in the dual position of DP chair and NARC party boss. By December 2003 President Kibaki chose to distance himself publicly from any official role in the DP as he battled to dissolve the various parties within NARC in favor of direct NARC membership (see above). The DP, however, did not disband and continues to maintain a formal organization chaired by Kibaki, despite his public statements that the party ceased to exist after the formation of the NAK and despite his calls for DP members to support NARC.

At a June 2005 DP meeting in Nairobi, which was called to revitalize the party, 40 party leaders, who were members of the assembly, failed to attend, including President Kibaki, David Mwiraria, Chris MURUNGARU, Martha KARUA, Peter NDWIGA, and Kiraitu MURUNGI. The delegates who attended pledged to strengthen the party and avoid its personalization; however, by March 2006 it appeared that their efforts had failed. After announcing the formation of NARC-Kenya, President Kibaki declared that DP "had ceased to exist." The DP's national governing council unanimously voted to remove President Kibaki as its leader and endorsed Rose Waruhiu to act as chair until the National Delegates Council in July 2006. Waruhiu maintains that the party will not be dissolved and that it will field candidates in the 2007 general election either independently or with other political parties. Meanwhile, the party will support Kibaki, NARC, and the Government of National Unity.

Forum for Restoration of Democracy—Kenya (FORD-K). The Luo-dominated FORD-K is the most direct outgrowth of the Forum for Restoration of Democracy (FORD), which was characterized by its multiparty founders in August 1991 as a “discussion group” in deference to the ban on political parties other than KANU. Despite seeming widespread support, FORD experienced problems in formulating a comprehensive platform and establishing a permanent party structure, following its legalization in December 1992. Leadership disputes contributed to the difficulties, one faction supported the presidential ambitions of Martin Shikuku while another aligned itself with Jaramogi Oginga Ajuma Odinga, the aging former vice president of the republic, who succeeded in being named interim chair, with Shikuku as interim secretary general. However, the picture clouded further in May 1992 when Kenneth Matiba, a Kenyan businessman recently returned from London, announced his presidential candidacy.

At FORD’s inaugural congress on September 4, 1992, Odinga was selected as the party’s presidential candidate. However, Shikuku and Matiba supporters boycotted the congress and subsequently broke off to form FORD-Asili (FORD-A, below). In early April 1993, despite a declaration of support by 51 opposition legislators for Odinga’s assumption of the opposition leadership, the assembly speaker recognized FORD-A’s Matiba. At the same time, intraparty opposition to Odinga’s continued stewardship surfaced, with Kikuyu followers of (then) Deputy Chair Paul MUIITE, an Odinga critic and de facto leader of the FORD-K’s “young turks,” reportedly defecting to the FORD-A and DP, below. (Muite subsequently became a founder of Safina, below.)

In late June 1993 Odinga became leader of the opposition after a FORD-A legislator defected to KANU, and on July 15 he named a shadow cabinet. However, his subsequent efforts to improve relations with the Moi administration split the party, as supporters, led by his son, Raila Odinga, accused the anti-Moi faction aligned with Muite and (then) Secretary General Gitobu IMANYARA of seeking to gain control of the party. On September 18 the FORD-K national executive council stripped Imanyara of his post and named Muniyua WAIYAKI as his replacement. The following day Muite resigned as deputy chair, and on September 21 Imanyara quit the party, announcing plans to launch a “new democratic opposition movement.”

Following Odinga’s death on January 20, 1994, (then) Deputy Chair Michael Kijana Wamalwa, a favorite of the late leader’s sons, Raila and Oburu ODINGA, was named party chair. In June 1995 Secretary General Waiyaki resigned to help form the United Patriotic Party (UPP, below). Subsequently, a schism developed because of a leadership contest between Wamalwa and Raila Odinga. In December Odinga disregarded a court ruling banning internal party elections by having himself proclaimed chair at meetings in Kisumu and Nairobi (but not in Mombasa, where the police intervened). Wamalwa reacted by announcing that his faction would sponsor grassroots balloting in May and June. Relations between Wamalwa and Odinga sunk to a new low in early April 1996 when an extraordinary party congress, convened specifically to settle their leadership dispute, disintegrated into a riot after a party mediator, citing Wamalwa and Odinga’s intransigence on procedural disagreements, declared their intraparty electoral contest “null and void” and resigned. Subsequently, on April 15 Wamalwa’s supporters dismissed Odinga’s claim that he had captured the party leadership. Friction continued throughout the year, culminating in Odinga's announcement in December that he was resigning from the party and joining the NDP. (On March 12 FORD-K officials openly supported a KANU candidate in a by-election contest with Odinga for the seat the latter had vacated when he left the party.)

At a FORD-K national delegates' conference on January 26, 1997, Wamalwa, James ORENGO, and Rachid MZEE were reelected chair, first vice chair, and second vice chair, respectively. Wamalwa was one of four prominent opposition leaders put under house arrest in May for their alleged roles in organizing antigovernment demonstrations. Subsequently, however, Wamalwa's opposition colleagues sharply criticized him after he met with President Moi to declare his intention to establish a dialogue with KANU.

Wamalwa's relations with KANU improved dramatically in 1998, and in October FORD-K legislators helped vote down a nonconfidence motion against the government. On the other hand, the October vote highlighted a split in the party between Wamalwa and a faction led by Orengo, who had tabled the motion. Wamalwa's ambivalent attitude toward KANU and what was considered by many his lackluster leadership style continued to cause dissension within the party, and Orengo attracted considerable publicity. Meanwhile, another anti-Wamalwa figure in the party, George KAPTEN, died under mysterious circumstances in 1999.

FORD-K was heavily involved in 2002 in the formation of a large anti-KANU opposition front, first NAK then the NARC "Super Alliance," but Orengo launched his own presidential bid through the SDP (below). Wamalwa was named vice president by President Kibaki in January 2003 but died in August. Musikari Kombo, a Luhya like Wamalwa, became acting chair of the party until he was elected at a subsequent party conference.

After forestalling a challenge to his leadership of the party from Mukhisa Kituyi in December 2005, Kombo took steps in 2006 to broaden the national appeal of the FORD-K party. In March he opened a party office in the Thika district to build support in the central province. More significantly, Kombo has initiated talks with party members to "synergize the FORD family" for the purpose of campaigns and electoral support. Talks with Simeon Nyachae and the FORD-People yielded encouraging results while negotiations with FORD-A were stymied by FORD-A's own internal divisions (see below). Kombo has also entered a dialogue with DP and NPK leaders to reinvigorate the NARC party organs in the wake of the formal launch of NARC-Kenya and the exodus of cabinet ministers and MPs from NARC. The struggle with Kituyi for the FORD-K party leadership remains, however, and is likely to be settled later in 2006 either by Kombo conceding to holding party elections to generate a fresh mandate or, absent polls, by a court judgment expected in September.

Leaders: Musikari N. KOMBO (Chair), John MUNYES (Secretary General), Otieno K'OPIYO (Deputy Secretary General) Noah WEKESA (Director of Elections), Jael MBOGO (Organizing Secretary), Mukhisa KITUYI, Peter SHITANDA.

United Democratic Movement (UDM). The UDM was formed in 1998 under the leadership of Kipruto arap Kirwa, whose organization of an anti-Moi faction within KANU had cost him his post of assistant minister of agriculture in May. In early 1999 the group released a leadership roster, which reportedly included legislators thought to be KANU supporters. (Consequently, President Moi presented a motion that would forbid sitting assembly members to launching new groups.) The Moi administration suppressed UDM's formal registration.

UDM leaders took part in the 2002 negotiations to create the NAK and NARC (see above), and in return Kirwa was named agriculture minister in the NARC administration following the 2002 election. Kirwa formally registered UDM in March 2003. The current impetus for the UDM is to provide a party to champion the interests of the Kalenjin ethnic group, according to party Secretary General Stephen Tanis.

In the 2004–2005 NARC party dissolution battles, UDM leaders supported maintaining corporate membership for the parties within NARC. By 2006 the future of UDM was unclear. Kipruto Rono arap Kirwa (party leader and minister of agriculture) is embroiled in an alleged corruption scandal, and the party's influence at the national level appears diminished. Moreover, Kirwa and Stephen Tanis allied themselves with NARC-Kenya, calling into question the continued organizational independence of the UDM heading into the 2007 elections.

Leaders: Kipruto Rono arap KIRWA (Chair), Stephen TANIS (Secretary General).

Forum for Restoration of Democracy–Asili (FORD-A). The Kikuyu-dominated FORD-Asili (Kiswahili for “Original”) was formally launched on October 13, 1992, by Kenneth Matiba and Martin Shikuku, a popular Luhya politician and former FORD interim secretary general. Matiba, who had suffered a stroke while under detention in 1990, returned from recuperation in London in May 1992 to a “hero’s welcome.” Immediately thereafter he announced his interest in becoming FORD’s presidential candidate, thus aggravating an already contentious leadership struggle. In early September Matiba and Shikuku boycotted FORD’s inaugural congress, at which Jaramogi Odinga, as expected, was selected the party’s presidential candidate, and one month later FORD-A was founded.

On November 17, 1992, Matiba outpolled Shikuku for the group’s nomination, and at nationwide presidential balloting in December he finished second with 26 percent of the vote. At simultaneous legislative balloting the party won 31 seats, tying FORD-K. On January 4, 1993, the party joined in a coalition with FORD-K and the DP to contest KANU’s electoral victories and “coordinate activities.” On April 8 the party was declared the official opposition party by the assembly speaker, and in early May Matiba, as minority leader, named a shadow government with Shikuku in the vice presidential slot. However, in June FORD-A lost the assembly leadership when a party legislator defected to KANU. During 1994 the party leadership fell into disarray, with the still ailing Matiba openly sparring with Shikuku (whom some accused of being a KANU “mole”) and with several MPs deserting to the government formation.

In March 1996 it was reported that Shikuku had lost his position as FORD-A secretary general to Kimani WANYOIKE while George NTHENGE had also been defeated (by Stephen Musila) in his bid to retain the party chairmanship.

Amid reports that Matiba and Shikuku had established separate headquarters, Matiba’s faction held its own intraparty elections in May 1997. Subsequently, however, the polling was challenged in court by Shikuku and nullified. In June Matiba announced that he no longer recognized the legitimacy of the Moi government and resigned from the parliament. Thereafter, Matiba’s alliance with the Opposition Solidarity and Shikuku’s ties with the Opposition Alliance appeared to have superceded their allegiance to what Africa Confidential described as the “catastrophically split” FORD-A. In October Matiba formed the FORD-People (below). Shikuku announced his desire to run for the presidency in 2002 but was not one of the candidates on the December ballot.

In the 2002 elections some FORD-A leaders joined the NARC coalition under the NAK wing (John Michuki was subsequently appointed to the cabinet). The party also ran candidates for the National Assembly under the FORD-A party banner, independent of NARC, and secured two seats.

In 2005 party officials publicly asked Martin Shikuku to revamp the party as divisions both within the party and with FORD-People threatened to make FORD-A irrelevant in the upcoming 2007 elections. Julius Masiva (a Uasin Gishu branch official) charged that “Shikuku risks losing political credibility if he is going to leave the party to die. He should implement the views of the members.” There is concern that the party will lose its official status as a registered party for failing to give returns as required by the Ministry of Justice and Constitutional Affairs.

Leaders: Martin SHIKUKU (Chair, 1997 presidential candidate), John MICHUKI, Ivuti MWANGU, Francis KAGWIMA, Wanguhu NGANGA.

Social Democratic Party (SDP). Subsequently registered as a legal party, the SDP was formed in early 1992 by National Assembly member Johnstone Makau, who called for the release of all political prisoners and the elimination of other human rights abuses.

In March 1997 the SDP added two former FORD-K leaders, Peter Anyang’ Nyong’o and Joe Ager. Thereafter, in July, the party was thrust into the national spotlight when Charity K. Ngilu, an outspoken assembly member, launched her presidential campaign under the SDP banner. As was the case with a number of parties, the SDP was subsequently riven by factionalism, Ngilu’s high profile reportedly rankling other SDP leaders. Indeed, she left the party in June 2001 to form her own grouping, the NPK (see above).

Although FORD-K’s James Orenge in September 2002 declared his presidency under the SDP rubric, Nyong’o and others challenged that announcement. Orenge subsequently failed to win half of 1 percent of the national vote as an SDP candidate.

Peter Anyang’ Nyong’o steered SDP into the NAK and NARC fold and joined the Kibaki cabinet. SDP was one of the few constituent parties to support individual membership as the basis for NARC during the 2004–2005 party dissolution dispute. In 2005 the party became embroiled in a leadership dispute that ended in litigation with the High Court elevating Peter Anyang’ Nyong’o to the position of party chair.

Leaders: Peter ANYANG’ NYONG’O (Chair), Mboro GATHUU (Secretary General), James Aggrey ORENKO (2002 presidential candidate), Johnstone MAKAU, Joe AGER.

Social Party for the Advancement of Reforms Kenya (SPARK). SPARK joined the NAK and then NARC groupings before the 2002 election. In the NARC dissolution disputes SPARK’s representative on the April 2004 Nanyuki committee, William OKOTH, took a middle position by asserting that NAK partners had discussed merging into one party under the right circumstances.

Leaders: Joseph Owuor NYONG’O (Chair), Jackson MASIKA (Secretary), Benson WAIGURU (Treasurer), William OKOTH.

Progressive People’s Forum (PPF). The little-known PPF is part of the NAK grouping under NARC. PPF’s Mboya voted in support of individual membership (as opposed to corporate membership) in the NARC disputes over the basis for party membership at the April 2004 Nanyuki committee meeting.

Leaders: Lucas MBOYA

Party of Independent Candidates of Kenya (PICK). One of the earliest fringe parties after the advent of party pluralism, PICK was founded by a Nairobi businessman, John Harun MWAU, who styled himself as PICK party boss.

Leaders: G. N. MUSIMI (Chair), F. OLIEWO (Vice Chair), F. NGUGI (Secretary).

United Agricultural Party of Kenya (UAPK). The UAPK was established to “fight for rural development” and led by George KINYUA and Simon KITOBIO.

Liberal Party of Kenya. This party’s 1997 presidential candidate was Wangari MAATHAI. Maathai formed a new environmental party in 2003 (see below).

Government-Supportive Parties

National Rainbow Coalition of Kenya (NARC-Kenya or NARC-K). NARC-K claims to be a “political vehicle” that will enable the current Kenyan leadership a “fresh start” to achieve “true Kenyan independence.” Composed primarily of former members of NARC and DP who remain loyal to President Kibaki, NARC-Kenya seeks to free itself from the political corruption that plagued the country under President Moi and the scandals and factional infighting that have marred the Kibaki presidency. Although billed as a multiethnic party, the leadership derives most of its support from the Kikuyu ethnic group, and skeptics have charged that the formation of NARC-Kenya is little more than a political maneuver designed to bring the DP into power under a different name. (Kibaki is the founder of DP, see above.) At very least, the formation of NARC-Kenya appears to be an attempt to reconstitute the DP with the objective of attracting wider support within the Mt. Kenya region. Complicating matters further is Kibaki's relationship with NARC-Kenya. Kibaki has stated that he identifies with NARC-Kenya, and Vice President Awori (a Kibaki ally) has declared that President Kibaki was "behind the inspiration of leaders knitting together the values, policies and vision of the party." However, Kibaki was noticeably absent from NARC-Kenya's first public meeting, and he has yet to register as a member of the party.

Leaders: Kivutha KIBWANA (Chair), Stephen TARUS, Arthur Moody AWORI (Vice President of the Republic), Mutua KATUKU, Gideon KONCHELLAH, Raphael TUJU, Alex Muriithi KIBAKI, Njeru NDWIGA.

Forum for the Restoration of Democracy for the People (FORD-People). FORD-People was launched by Kenneth Matiba in October 1997, thus ending his battle with Martin Shikuku for control of FORD-A. Reportedly the most "distinguishing salient feature" of the FORD-People's charter (in comparison to the FORD-A's) is an intraparty electoral system wherein its candidates' nominations "will be under direct primary elections."

Upon Matiba's retirement in December 1998, his son Raymond MATIBA allegedly assumed control over the party; however, it was not immediately clear in what capacity the younger Matiba would function.

In December 2001 FORD-People invited former KANU minister Simeon Nyachae to join the party and serve as its presidential candidate. FORD-

People subsequently participated in the formation of the PICK and NARC. Nyachae pulled out of NARC almost immediately, however, after NARC refused to institute a primary to nominate a single candidate for the presidency. Nyachae ultimately ended up pursuing his own candidacy in the December 2002 election, a decision that reportedly caused serious rifts within FORD-People.

Nyachae and the other elected FORD-People ministers sat in opposition within the National Assembly, pledging to vote with NARC when it made good decisions. Nyachae was eventually brought into the cabinet by President Kibaki when he formed the government of national unification in June 2004.

At a December 2004 party conference Kipkalya KONES, Reuben Oyondi, and Farah Maalim were elected chair, vice chair, and secretary general, respectively.

In preparation for the 2007 presidential elections, FORD-People has met with FORD-Kenya with the aim of reviving the original FORD party. The talks were aimed at reaching an agreement on the process of determining a joint presidential nominee. Farah Maalim proclaimed that the "differences between party members have been ironed out and all were now united." The parties intend to play down the importance of reaching an agreement on a new constitution and instead have made economic development, energy resources, and drought recovery the primary issues for FORD-People. Simeon Nyachae announced in June 2006 that he plans to leave politics and not stand for election in 2007.

Leaders: Kipkalya KONES (Chair), Reuben OYONDI (Vice Chair), Farah MAALIM (Secretary General), Simeon NYACHAE (2002 presidential candidate), Henry OBWOCHA (Deputy Secretary General, Party Whip), Francis Munyialo OPAR (Party Organizing Secretary), D. S. MUTHUURI (Treasurer), Kimani WANYOIKE (Former Secretary General and 1997 presidential candidate).

Safina. Safina was launched in May 1995 by an opposition group that included Dr. Richard Leakey, a former director of the Kenya Wildlife Service. The group, which applied for registration on June 20, said that it would work with others to establish a viable alternative to KANU. However, a ruling party MP filed a suit in late July to block legalization of the formation on the grounds that its name (translated as “Noah’s Arc”) was “repugnant to good religious values.” The emergence of Leakey (a second-generation White Kenyan) as head of an opposition group reportedly appeared to “unnerve both President Moi and KANU leaders.” Among other things, Leakey had been successful in attracting foreign backing for his scientific activities and had served to heighten international awareness of Kenya’s domestic turmoil. For its part, the government declared it had no intention of conferring legitimacy on a party “backed by foreigners.”

Following his release from prison in December 1996, opposition activist Koigi Wa Wamwere joined Safina and called on the government to recognize the grouping. Official opposition to Safina remained strong, however, and in February 1997 security forces violently thwarted an attempt by party members to convene a meeting. Thereafter, Safina militants were reportedly deeply involved in the organization of antigovernment demonstrations, and at midyear Leakey, Paul Muite, and other party officials joined the NCA’s executive wing.

In October 1997 Safina’s bid for legalization was again rejected by the government; however, under pressure from moderate opposition leaders, the Moi administration reversed itself, and in November Safina was registered. Although legalized too late to forward a presidential candidate, Safina participated in the December 1997 legislative balloting, capturing three seats.

At Safina’s first national convention on September 5, 1998, party delegates elected Farah Maalim interim chair and Mwandawiro MGHANGA secretary general. In addition, the party subsequently chose Josephine Odira SINYO to assume the parliamentary post vacated by Leakey, who had been restored to directorship of the wildlife service. Safina’s cohesion subsequently suffered from Leakey’s decision to join the KANU administration (see Current issues, above) and from a scandal involving alleged corruption on the part of key leaders.

Safina took part in the PCK negotiations to join forces with the NAK and LDP to form the NARC “Super Alliance,” but Paul Muite, like Simeon Nyachae of FORD-People (see above), pulled out of NARC almost immediately after NARC refused to institute an electoral college to nominate a single candidate for the presidency. However, Muite has positioned Safina in support of President Kibaki’s government by denouncing cabinet members who campaigned against the November 2005 constitutional referendum and by taking the unusually aggressive stance of publicly defending the Kibaki government’s raid on The Standard newspaper (see Communications, below). Muite described the IMF and World Bank threats to withhold funds as “senseless and uncalled for fodder for the donors to fight the government.”

Leaders: Paul MUTE (Chair), Peter MUNYA (Secretary General).

Sisi Kwa Sisi (SKS). Sisi Kwa Sisi purports to transcend religious barriers by uniting supporters of Islamic Party-Kenya and the Mungiki sect. The party won two seats in the 2002 legislative balloting and pledged to work with the NARC coalition to secure political and economic reforms.

Leaders: John Rukenya KABUGUA (Chair), Moffat Muia MAITHA, William Gitau KAA-BOGO.

Shirikisho Party of Kenya (SPK). Shirikisho was a little-known regional group that claimed one seat in the 1997 legislative balloting and retained the one seat in the 2002 election. The party draws its support from the Coast Province.

In 2005 allegations of misappropriation of funds granted from the Center for Multiparty Democracy surfaced from former party treasurer Mwakio NDAU. SPK party leader Harry Kombe met in Nairobi with a small number of LDP and KANU assembly members who expressed interest in joining SPK. At the same time, party leaders spurned a plan by the Third Progressive Force to form a new Coast Province party, and entertained talks of forming a coalition before the 2007 elections with the LDP and FORD-K representatives.

Leaders: Mashengu wa MWACHOFI (Chair), Abubakar YUSUF (Secretary General), Harry KOMBE.

Opposition Parties

The Orange Democratic Movement (ODM). Originally known as the Orange Team, ODM began as a coalition of disparate actors unified in their opposition to the November 2005 constitutional referendum (see above). ODM is an unsteady partnership between KANU and the LDP, allied by their common desire to defeat President Kibaki in the 2007 election. As a consequence, the party lacks a common ideology or political philosophy and is best understood as a pure opposition coalition. The party has no institutional structure and suffers from infighting among the leaders, which suggests that this is no more than a temporary coalition. Thus far, there are several prominent members seeking the ODM nomination for president, including William Ruto, Najib BALALA, Raila Odinga, Uhuru Kenyatta, Kalonzo MUSYOKA, and Musalia Mudavadi.

Leaders: William RUTO (Secretary-General), Joseph KAMOTHO, Uhuru KENYATTA, Raila ODINGA, Omingo MAGARA, Peter ODOYO.

Kenya African National Union (KANU). Originally drawing most of its support from Kenya's large Kikuyu and Luo tribes, KANU was formed in 1960, established its leading position at the election of May 1963, and subsequently broadened its constituency through absorption of the Kenya African Democratic Union (KADU) and the African People's Party (APP), both supported by smaller tribes. KANU principles include "African Socialism," centralized government, racial harmony, and "positive nonalignment."

Following President Moi's lead, KANU in December 1990 voted to retain the one-party system; however, on December 3, 1991, a special congress endorsed the president's about-face on the issue. A number of KANU adherents, including eleven National Assembly members, subsequently switched allegiance to new opposition parties, primarily FORD (below).

During the run-up to presidential and legislative balloting in late 1992 the party attempted to portray itself as a "stable alternative" to what it described as an internally divided, tribal opposition. On the other hand, it continued to suffer from a steady flow of defections as well as accusations that it was supporting Kalenjin tribesmen who were considered responsible for initiating ethnic clashes in the Rift Valley. Faring poorly in Nairobi, Nyanza, and Central Province, the party lost over half of its seats at assembly elections on December 29. Nevertheless, KANU retained an assembly majority, securing 100 seats, not including the 12 seats designated for presidential appointment.

In 1996 KANU was bolstered by the addition of a number of former opposition members as well as three legislative by-election victories. However, several factions subsequently emerged, notably KANU-A, ostensibly more open to political reform and internal party democracy; and KANU-B, which tended to reflect more centralized and traditionalist perspectives. With Moi's renomination for another (and possibly final) presidential term a foregone conclusion, the main issue within KANU in late 1996 was the selection of his vice presidential running mate for the 1997 campaign. Although George Saitoti retained a degree of support for continuing in office, it was reported that he and his supporters in the KANU-B faction (including Nicholas BIWOTT and party secretary general Joseph KAMOTHO) were being challenged by Simeon Nyachae, a cabinet minister, and his KANU-A colleagues.

At an October 1996 meeting the internecine competition reached a head as the two camps clashed over internal election policies, with the KANU-A wing seeking the introduction of a nationwide internal balloting system (apparently with the anticipation of snaring the secretary generalship) while KANU-B demanded continuation of the local branch elections (from which victors are chosen for top posts). For his part, President Moi came down firmly behind the KANU-B faction, either demoting or ousting KANU-A ministers in a sweeping government reshuffling in January 1997.

In early 1998 Moi called on the party to rally behind constitutional reform efforts and pledged to expand KANU's dialogue with FORD-K and the National Development Party (NDP), a previously minor grouping that had been pushed into the limelight when former FORD-K leader Raila Odinga had joined it in December 1996. Meanwhile, a third faction (KANU-C) emerged within the party under the leadership of Kipruto arap Kirwa and other "youth-oriented" activists. Angered at the organizational efforts of the Kirwa faction, Moi called on KANU dissidents to quit the party in June; subsequently, Kirwa and his associates withdrew from the constitutional review process. (In January 1999 they formally broke with the party and formed the UDM [see above]).

The supremacy of the KANU-B faction within the party and government was reinforced by the February 1999 cabinet reshuffling, which included the demotion of Nyachae (who then left the government and, ultimately, the party [see FORD-People, above]). However, a number of prominent KANU-B leaders were subsequently accused of corruption in a report published by the assembly in May 2000.

Growing cooperation between KANU and the NDP led to the inclusion of several NDP members (including Odinga) in the cabinet in June 2001. Subsequently, in March 2002, the NDP decided to merge into KANU, with Odinga becoming KANU's secretary general. However, severe internal problems arose in July when President Moi selected Uhuru Kenyatta as his preferred successor. Odinga subsequently helped form the so-called "Rainbow Alliance" within KANU in conjunction with several other disaffected former leaders, including Saitoti, who had been ousted as vice president of the republic in August.

President Moi's selection of Uhuru Kenyatta (Kenyatta was formally nominated at a party congress in October) was designed to put a Kikuyu candidate on the party ballot, and maintain Moi's control over the party after he exited the presidency. The ploy split KANU and drove out the Rainbow dissidents. The Alliance formally left KANU in October to form the LDP (see above). NARC's nomination of Mwai Kibaki in October pitted two Kikuyu candidates as the presidential frontrunners, a fact that magnified the importance of the votes brokered by the other ethnic leaders in the LDP.

More KANU old guard resigned after the party's defeat in the December 2002 elections, throwing the party into turmoil. By April 2003, Moi announced that he would step down as party chair later in the year. Stepping into the role of official opposition party leader in the assembly, Kenyatta named a shadow KANU cabinet in June. At the September KANU executive meeting, Moi kept his pledge and resigned as chair without naming a successor. Kenyatta was subsequently named acting chair in April 2004.

KANU's party elections were held at a party congress in early 2005. Kenyatta took the chair in a landslide victory over rival faction leader Nicholas Biwott; Biwott disputed the outcome and moved to set up a rival KANU faction dubbed the New KANU Alliance Party.

As the principal opposition party uniting the Orange Team against the November 2005 constitutional referendum, KANU played a dominant role in shaping the ODM. Although KANU has not fully settled internal struggles over its level of commitment to the long-term development of ODM the party has signaled its willingness to work with their ODM partners to nominate a single opposition candidate and to work with ODM partners in the July 2006 by-elections. (In mid 2006 Kenyatta and Moi claimed KANU would go it alone while William Ruto, the party secretary general, pledged to continue to support ODM.)

In parliament KANU MPs aggressively challenged President Kibaki's paper-thin majority. For instance, in March 2006 six KANU members resigned their seats in the powerful House Business Committee after complaining that the government was underrepresenting KANU in committee assignments.

Who will emerge as the leading KANU presidential candidate for the 2007 election is unclear. Uhuru Kenyatta and William Ruto are considered the favorites. Kenyatta, backed by former President Moi, tried to disentangle KANU from the ODM before the July 2006 by-elections and has stepped up the verbal attacks on Odinga and other prominent LDP political rivals. Ruto openly supports the ODM alliance and leads a faction of KANU parliamentarians who actively cooperate and coordinate with ODM partners. Although Kenyatta will benefit from greater KANU institutional support, Ruto has won the endorsement of Kipkalya Kones (FORD-People Chair) and has openly courted the approval of Kalenjin elders, Moi being the exception. Former president Moi has signaled an intent to play a significant role in the final candidate selection.

Leaders: Uhuru KENYATTA (Chair and 2002 presidential candidate), Henry KOSGEY (Vice Chair), Chris Okemo (Vice Chair), William RUTO (Secretary General), Joseph NKAISERRY (Deputy Secretary General), Gideon NDAMBUKI (National Organizing Secretary), Billow KERROW (Treasurer), Wycliffe Musalia MUDAVADI (Vice President of the Republic and Vice Chair of the Party), Julius ole SUNKULI (Secretary General), Noah Katala NGALA (Assistant Secretary General), Justin MUTURI (Chief Whip), Kipyator Nicholas BIWOTT, Daniel T. arap MOI (Former president of the Republic and of the Party).

[Note: Although a constituent party of NARC in 2002–2003, the LDP was in virtual opposition during 2004–2005, and moved to the opposition side in 2006.]

Liberal Democratic Party (LDP). The LDP was launched in October 2002 by politicians who had formed the “Rainbow Alliance” faction within KANU and had left the party mainly in protest over President Moi’s selection of Uhuru Kenyatta as his preferred successor for the presidency. The disaffected included former vice president George Saitoti, and former cabinet ministers Raila Odinga, Kalonzo Musyoka, William ole NTIMAMA, and Awiti ADHU. Nearly simultaneously the LDP leaders opened negotiations with the leadership of the NAK to form the “Super Alliance” National Rainbow Coalition (NARC) to defeat the ruling KANU party in the presidential and legislative elections. The LDP’s base of support came from the western provinces, which when combined with the NAK’s base in central Kenya and the Rift Valley gave the NARC a chance to win pluralities in enough provinces to secure the success of a NARC presidential candidate. The LDP and NAK signed the MoU in late October 2002 to cement the alliance before the December balloting. In the MoU they reached agreement on a broad platform of issues, including having a new constitution in place by June 2003 and a post-election formula for the division of jobs and power sharing.

President Kibaki, however, ignored the MoU’s equality formula when he appointed the new cabinet, and with all the jockeying for power by the notables in the LDP, the LDP did not select one among equals to spearhead the NARC Summit, the supreme NARC party organ. Disputes within the NARC over the division of executive power between the president and a premier in the draft constitution further convinced Odinga and other LDP leaders that the LDP was being systematically undercut by a “Mt. Kenya” faction of Kikuyu and NAK power brokers close to Kibaki.

The LDP openly defied President Kibaki’s attempts in 2004 and 2005 to dissolve the constituent parties of NARC in favor of creating a single party with individual membership. When Kibaki brought members of the opposition KANU and FORD-People into the cabinet (at the expense of LDP leaders, some of whom were demoted), in June 2003, LDP MPs crossed over to sit with the opposition in the National Assembly, declaring that the LDP was leaving the government. None of the LDP cabinet ministers, however, resigned from the government at that time.

In early 2005 the LDP actively sought alliances with other parties and groups in anticipation of the 2007 elections. The rivalries and presidential aspirations among LDP notables, however, made it difficult to schedule party elections. By June the party's National Executive Council postponed scheduled party elections indefinitely pending a revision of nomination and elections rules.

Also in June 2005, LDP MPs announced that they would once again sit with the other NARC MPs in the National Assembly. In March 2006, LDP officially broke from NARC when LDP MPs crossed over to the opposition's benches and signaled their support for ODM. (Only Mutinda Mutiso and former Education Minister George Saitoti remained on the Government side.)

LDP named Paddy Ahenda as party nominee for the 2007 presidential elections. The nomination elections were marked by corruption and apathy. By mid-2006, other LDP notables (e.g., Odinga, Balala, Musyoka, Mudavadi) were actively preparing bids for the ODM nomination for president, undercutting the importance of the LDP nomination process.

Leaders: David MUSILA (Chair), Joseph KAMOTHO (Secretary General), Joseph KHAMISI (Vice Chair), Andrew LIGALE (Deputy Secretary General), Paddy AHENDA (the party's 2007 presidential nominee), Raila ODINGA, Stephen Kalonzo MUSYOKA, Wycliffe Musalia MUDAVADI (Former Vice President), Najib BALALA, William ole NTIMAMA, Ochilo Mbogo AYACKO, Otieno KAJWANG'.

Labour Party of Kenya (LPK). The LPK joined the Orange Team in opposing the constitutional referendum and has allied itself with the LDP/KANU elements in the Orange Democratic Movement in anticipation of the 2007 national elections. Although a founding member of NARC, the LPK controls no seats in the assembly.

Leaders: Julia OJIAMBO (Chair).

Other Parties and Groups

Kenya National Congress (KNC). The KNC was launched on September 30, 1992, by Charles RUBIA, a former FORD-K member who claimed that he was seeking to reconcile the two FORD factions. The party captured one parliamentary seat in December 1992. In February 1994 Rubia, along with Chair Titus MBAATHI, Secretary General Kimani WANYOIKE, and five other leaders left the party to join FORD-A.

George Katana MKANGI, a long-time KNC politician, advocate of federalism, and 1997 presidential candidate, died in March 2004.

Leaders: S. Kathini Maloba CAINES (Vice Chair), Onesmus Musyoka MBALI (Secretary General), Chibule wa TSUMA (1992 presidential candidate).

Kenya Social Congress (KSC). Launched in June 1992, the KSC was led by George ANYONA, a former member of the National Assembly who was jailed from 1990 to 1992 on a sedition charge, and Onesmus Musyoka Mbali, a prominent businessman. The party was legally registered on October 27, 1992.

Anyona died in a car accident in November 2003. KSC held a national executive council meeting to elect new party leaders in Nairobi during July 2004.

Leaders: Mathius Ondeyo NYARIBARI (Chair), Andrew NYANGARESI (Vice Chair), Japheth OTUKE (Secretary General), Josiah NYAWACHI (Assistant Secretary General).

Kenya National Democratic Alliance (KENDA). Like the SDP, KENDA's initial policy statements concerned human rights issues, the party calling for, among other things, an end to detention without trial and political imprisonment. Legalized in early 1992, KENDA secured no assembly representation in December 1992, and its presidential candidate, Mukara NG'AND'A, captured only .11 percent of the vote.

In 1997 Koigi wa Wamwere campaigned for the presidency under the KENDA banner when his party, Safina, was unable to forward a candidate.

Leader: Joram Gaine KARIUKI (Chair), Patrick Ouma ONYANGO (Secretary), Winston Kimathi KANG'ETHE (Treasurer), Koigi wa WAMWERE (1997 presidential candidate).

National Labor Party (NLP), led by Joseph Kennedy KILIKU and Daniel Mogaka RAGUSU. In 2005 Kiliku had open discussion with the LDP's Kalonzo Musyoka about the latter using the party as a vehicle for Musyoka's run for the presidency in 2007. Kiliku also sought to broker his party, without success, as a platform for a revitalized Third Progressive Force (TPF).

United Patriotic Party (UPP). Included among the UPP's founders in June 1995 was Dr. Munyua Waiyaki, theretofore secretary general of FORD-Kenya, who indicated dissatisfaction with the administration of his former party.

Leader: Njuguna KUNGU (Chair), Dr. Munyua WAIYAKI (1997 presidential candidate).

Islamic Party of Kenya (IPK). Formed in January 1992 but denied legal status by the Moi government, the IPK announced in June that it would urge Muslims to boycott any future elections unless recognition was forthcoming. The administration responded on July 20 by formally banning the group, which had declared "total war" on the government, from participation in the forthcoming elections. One day later, party leader Khalid Salim Ahmed Balala was detained for the second time in as many months for allegedly urging Moi's assassination. In April and May 1993 Balala was alternately detained, released, and detained again as relations between the Muslims and KANU deteriorated.

On July 2, 1993, amid clashes in Mombasa between the IPK and the UMA (below), Balala accused the government of bombing his residence; subsequently, however, the IPK leader refused a Nairobi offer to investigate the incident. Thereafter, violent skirmishes between the IPK and UMA continued through the end of the year, with the latter claiming to be fighting on behalf of African Muslims against the IPK's "Arab" Muslims. Meanwhile, on October 9 Balala resigned from the IPK because of differences with Omar MWINGI, the group's interim chair.

In March 1995, John Garang, leader of the rebel Sudanese People's Liberation Army (SPLA), claimed that the IPK was engaged in subversive activities against the Kenyan government from a Khartoum-controlled region within Sudan.

As part of its effort to quell opposition unrest, the Moi government authorized Balala's return from a two-year forced exile in Germany in early July 1997. (In 1995 Balala's visa had been revoked while he was abroad, the government charging him with provoking unrest in Mombasa.) Upon his return in mid-July Balala announced that he had joined the NCA. On July 21 he dismissed the government's entreaties to the opposition as thinly veiled attempts to "emasculate" the proreform movement.

In 2004 Sheikh Mohammed Khalifa, the IPK party chair, announced that the party would seek formal registration with the government in order to protect the rights of Muslims and put forward a presidential candidate in 2007. Although the party remained unregistered in February 2006, IPK has endorsed the nomination of Najib Balala for president.

IPK also played an instrumental role in rallying coastal Muslims against the November 2005 constitutional referendum and to reject President Kibaki's newly created constitutional "review team."

Leaders: Mohammed KHALIFA (Chair), Ahmed AWADH (Secretary General), Khalid Salim Ahmed BALALA.

United Muslims of Africa (UMA). Described as a pro-KANU "rampart" against the IPK, with whom it engaged in street fighting in 1993 in Mombasa, the UMA is allegedly directed by a KANU parliamentarian, Rashid SAJJAD.

Leaders: Emmanuel MAITHA, Omar MA-SUMBUKO.

Mazingira Green Party of Kenya. In April of 2003 the noted environmental and human rights activist and assistant cabinet minister for environment Wangari MAATHAI formed the Green Party in the mold of Green parties in Europe. In 2004 Dr. Maathai was awarded the 2004 Nobel Peace Prize.

Leader: Wangari MAATHAI.

The following parties took part in the 1997 and 2002 presidential and legislative balloting: the Umma Patriotic Party of Kenya, led by Mbutia THAIRU; the Democratic Assistance Party, led by Nyerere MANONDA; the Green Africa Party, led by Geoffrey Kibiria M'MWIRERIA.

Minor groups who put forward candidates or who were referenced in the 2002 election campaign included Chama Cha Uma Party (CCU), led by David Ngethe WAWERU (2002 presidential candidate); Chama Cha Majimbo Na Mwangaza (CCM), led by Leslie MWACHIRO; the Mass Party of Kenya (MPK), led by Georgr MWAURA; the Economic Independence Party (EIP), led by Stephen Wilfred Omondi OLUDHE; the Federal Party of Kenya (FPK), led by Winston Ogola ADHIAMBO; the Kenya Patriotic Trust Party (KPTP), led by Joseph KARANI; the Kenya Republican Reformation Party (KRRP), led by Lihanda SAVAI; The People's Solidarity Union of Kenya (PSUK), led by Fanuel LIYAI; the Mau Mau War Veterans' Association, led by King'ori MBOGO; the National Progress Party (NPP), led by Hussein ISMAEL; the People's Party of Kenya (PPK), launched to pursue "radical social democracy" and led by Harun WAWERU; the United Democrats of Peace and Integrity in Kenya (UD-PIK), led by Ken NJIRU; the Republican Party of Kenya (RPK); Kenyan African Democratic Development Union (KADDU), led by Aluda ESSENDI; the National Progressive Party (NPP); and the Kenya Citizens Congress (KCC).

Other recently emerging groups include the Alliance for Democracy (Muungano wa Ukombozi); the Kenya National Patriotic Party (KNPP), led by Salim MWIROTHO; Kenya Voice of Young People (KVYP), a pro-Moi party; Labour Party Democracy, led by Mohamed Ibrahim NOOR; the

Patriotic Pastoralist Alliance of Kenya (PPAK), founded in mid-1997 by Khalif ABDULLAHI, Ibrahim WOCHÉ, and Jackson LAISAGER; the People's Union of Justice and Order (PUJO), founded by former KANU member Wilson OWILI; the Rural National Democratic Party (RNDP), organized by Sebastian MUNENE to protect the rights of peasants and fishermen; the Wakulima Party, registered in October 2004; Youth Associated with the Restoration of Democracy (YARD), which under the leadership of Eliud Ambani MULAMA urges that the voting age be reduced to 18; and the United Party (UP), which was officially registered in early 1999.

(For information on pre-2002 Clandestine and Exile Groups, see the 2000–2002 Handbook.)

Legislature

The unicameral National Assembly currently consists of 210 members elected by universal suffrage in single-seat constituencies for five-year terms, plus 12 members appointed by the president and two ex officio members (the speaker of the National Assembly and the attorney-general), for a total of 224 members of parliament. Prior to the expansion of the assembly in 1997, there were 188 elected members and 12 appointed. From 1966 to the relegalization of political pluralism in December 1991, only KANU had been permitted to offer legislative candidates. Despite the 1991 law, the assembly in March 1992 vacated the seats of 11 parliamentarians who had defected from KANU.

On December 29, 1992, in the first multiparty balloting since 1969, the ruling Kenya African National Union secured 100 assembly seats, while six opposition parties shared the remaining 88 seats. The new assembly convened for the first time on January 26, 1993, but was suspended by President Moi the following day after clashes in and outside of the assembly building. The legislature reconvened on March 23, 1993, with 84 of the opposition legislators boycotting the session.

Following balloting for the expanded assembly held December 29–30, 1997, the ruling Kenya

The December 27, 2002, election witnessed the end of KANU control of the assembly. Following the balloting the 210 elected seats were distributed as follows (appointed seats appear in parentheses): National Rainbow Coalition, 125 (7)*; Kenya African National Union, 64 (4), the Forum for the Restoration of Democracy–People, 14 (1); the Forum for the Restoration of Democracy–Asili, 2; Safina, 2; Sisi Kwa Sisi, 2; Shirikisho Party of Kenya, 1. Speaker: Francis Xavier ole KAPARO (ex officio).

Communications

Following the 2002 election, Kenya made significant strides in advancing free speech and developing a free press. The press grew noticeably bolder, publishing news articles and analysis critical of the government as a matter of routine and without the fear of intimidation or reprisals that were ever present under the Moi regime. Broadcasting was also a government monopoly until recently (see below).

The government introduced a bill in July 2004 that would have prevented ownership by the same media company of electronic and print versions of the same publications under the banner of avoiding media monopolies. Kenya's two largest news dailies also have electronic versions and are parts of larger media companies with television and/or radio divisions. In the face of opposition from the trade association for the media companies, the bill was dropped. In January 2004 the government arrested 15 news vendors on charges of selling publications that did not print the name and address of the publisher on the first or last pages—a violation of laws governing the publication of newspapers.

A government raid of The Standard newspaper and its sister television station KTN in March 2006, however, led many observers to question President Kibaki's commitment to free speech. The raids appeared to have been prompted by an article in The Standard claiming that a senior opposition figure had secret talks with President Kibaki. John Michuki, the minister for internal security, defended the attack by warning journalists working in Kenya that "if you rattle a snake, you must be prepared to be bit by it!" Rumors persist that the raid was led by government hired mercenaries.

Press

Newspapers are privately owned. Although newspapers evince a range of opinions, many are financially controlled by Europeans or by individuals who are close to political elites. The National Rainbow Coalition (NARC) attempted to launch a daily newspaper in 2004, but the venture, which would have been titled The Dawn, failed to raise the necessary funds to finance the start-up costs.

The following are English-language dailies published in Nairobi, unless otherwise noted: Nation (170,000 daily, 170,000 Sunday), independent; Taifa Weekly (70,000), weekly, in Kiswahili; The Standard (70,000 daily, 90,000 Sunday), moderate; The People (40,000); Taifa Leo (57,000), in Kiswahili; Taifa Jumapili (56,000), weekly, in Kiswahili; Kenya Times (52,000), KANU organ; Kenya Leo (6,000), KANU organ in Kiswahili.

News Agencies

The domestic facility is the Kenya News Agency (KNA); a number of foreign agencies also maintain bureaus in Nairobi.

Broadcasting and Computing

The Kenya Broadcasting Corporation (KBC) was formed in 1989 as a state agency to succeed the Voice of Kenya and the Voice of Kenya Television; it operates over an area extending from Nairobi to Kisumu, as well as from the coastal city of Mombasa. Kenya Times Media Trust (KTMT), a joint venture of KANU, U.S.-based CNN, and Australian Rupert Murdoch, set up channel 62, a 24-hour commercial subscription service in 1989. Citizen TV, a commercial station, operates in Nairobi and surrounding areas. Nation TV was founded in 1999; it is a commercial station owned by Nation Media Group. Stellagraphics TV (STV) was formed in 1998 as a commercial station operating in Nairobi. Kenya Television Network (KTN-TV), formed in 1990, is a commercial station operating in Nairobi and Mombasa. A number of FM commercial radio stations broadcast from Nairobi. There were 794,000 television receivers in 1999 and 500,000 Internet users in 2005.

LESOTHO

KINGDOM OF LESOTHO

The Country

Lesotho, the former British High Commission territory of Basutoland, is a hilly, landlocked enclave within the territory of South Africa. The Basotho people, whose vernacular language is Sesotho, constitute more than 99 percent of the population, which includes small European and Asian minorities. About 80 percent of the population is nominally Christian. The economy is largely based on agriculture and stock raising; diamond mining, which in the late 1970s accounted for more than half of export earnings, was discontinued in 1982. Lesotho is highly dependent on South Africa, its main trading partner, which employs 80 percent of the country's wage earners and is the principal supplier of energy. Because of the unusual employment pattern, women are primarily responsible for subsistence activities, although they are unable by custom to control household wealth.

Economic growth was stagnant in the early and mid-1980s, partly because of prolonged droughts that depressed agricultural output and compounded problems of unemployment, landlessness, and inflation. However, real GDP growth averaged 6 percent annually from 1987 to 1997, under the influence of the expansion of the manufacturing sector (and a collateral growth in exports) as well as the economic effect of investment in the massive Lesotho Highlands Water Project (LHWP, see Foreign relations, below). Severe political disruption in 1997 and 1998 (see Political background, below) contributed to a 3.6 percent decline in real GDP in fiscal year April 1998–March 1999. In December 1999 the government, in conjunction with the International Monetary Fund (IMF), announced a new economic-recovery program designed to attract foreign investment, diversify the manufacturing base, enhance tourism, privatize state-run enterprises and otherwise promote the private sector, reform tax policy, and overhaul the financial sector. In early 2001 the IMF described the program as off to a “good start” and approved a new three-year assistance package. However, the fund warned that the country continued to face a serious HIV/AIDS problem as well as widespread unemployment and poverty, while other observers cited rampant corruption in the government and civil service as a barrier to effective economic and political reform.

The economy was severely compromised in 2001 and 2002 as the result of massive food shortages resulting from drought and soil degradation. Agricultural production subsequently increased,

Political Status: Traditional monarchy, independent within the Commonwealth since October 4, 1966.

Area: 11,720 sq. mi. (30,355 sq. km.).

Population: 1,862,275 (1996C); 2,473,000 (2005E), excluding expatriate workers in South Africa (approximately 150,000 in 1999).

Major Urban Center (2005E): MASERU (185,000).

Official Languages: English, Sesotho.

Monetary Unit: Loti (principal rate July 1, 2006: 7.13 maloti = $1US). The loti is at par with the South African rand, although under a Tripartite Monetary Area agreement concluded between Lesotho, Swaziland, and South Africa on July 1, 1986, the rand has ceased to be legal tender in Lesotho.

Sovereign: King LETSIE III; became king upon the dethronement of his father, King MOSHOESHOE II on November 6, 1990; voluntarily abdicated upon his father's return to the throne on January 25, 1995; became king again on February 7, 1996, following the death of his father on January 15; took coronation oath on October 31, 1997.

Prime Minister: Bethuel Pakalitha MOSISILI (Lesotho Congress for Democracy); sworn in on May 29, 1998, following intraparty caucus election, replacing Ntsu MOKHEHLE (Lesotho Congress for Democracy); formed new government on June 3, 1998; formed new government on June 11, 2002, following legislative balloting of May 25.

although food shortfalls continued into 2005 and rising food prices contributed to high inflation and burgeoning governmental budget deficits. On the other hand, the growth of the textile industry was the country's main bright spot, with several large Taiwanese firms relocating to Lesotho (and generating an estimated 40,000 new jobs within a population suffering more than 30 percent unemployment) to take advantage of new U.S. laws eliminating or reducing quotas and tariffs on developing African states. (As of 2004 some 60 percent of Lesotho's exports were going to the United States.) Real GDP growth declined slightly to 2 percent in 2005 (down from 3 percent the previous two years), attributed mainly to a continuing drought that affected agriculture and a manufacturing slowdown. Though inflation dropped to 3.7 percent (from 7.7 percent in 2003), the unemployment rate was estimated at 30 percent, according to the IMF. Fund managers urged authorities to expand the tax base, keep better track of public expenditures, and increase spending to reduce widespread poverty. On a more positive note, the fund commended Lesotho for continuing to pursue and strengthen regional trade and investment, particularly with South Africa.

Political Background

United under MOSHOESHOE I in the mid-19th century, Basutoland came under British protection in 1868 and was governed from 1884 by a British high commissioner. A local consultative body, the Basutoland Council, was established as early as 1903, but the decisive move toward nationhood began in the mid-1950s and culminated in the attainment of full independence within the Commonwealth as the Kingdom of Lesotho in 1966. MOSHOESHOE II, the country's paramount chief, became king of the new state, and Chief Leabua JONATHAN, whose Basutoland National Party (BNP) had won a legislative majority in the preindependence election, became prime minister.

A trial of strength between the king and prime minister erupted in 1966 when the former's attempt to gain personal control over both foreign and domestic policy led to rioting by opposition parties; after being briefly confined to his palace, the king agreed to abide by the constitution. Further internal conflict followed the 1970 election, at which the opposition Basotho Congress Party (BCP) appeared to have outpolled the BNP. Voting irregularities were cited to justify the declaration of a state of emergency, a consequent suspension of the constitution, and the jailing of opposition leaders. Subsequently, the detainees were released, and the king, who had gone into exile, returned. The state of emergency was ultimately lifted in July 1973, but, in the wake of a coup attempt in January 1974 against his increasingly unpopular regime, the prime minister introduced new internal security measures (patterned after similar measures in South Africa) that proscribed the transmittal of outside funds to political groups within the country and authorized the jailing of individuals for 60 days without legal assistance. Between 1979 and 1982 numerous armed clashes were reported with the Lesotho Liberation Army (LLA), a guerrilla group affiliated with the outlawed “external” wing of the BCP under Ntsu MOKHEHLE, who claimed from exile that he was Lesotho’s true leader on the basis of the election results invalidated in 1970.

In late 1984 the prime minister was mandated by an extraordinary general meeting of the BNP to call for a legislative election, and, with effect from December 31, the king dissolved an interim assembly that had been appointed after the abortive 1970 balloting. Following refusal by the five leading opposition parties to participate in the voting scheduled for September 17 and 18, 1985, Chief Jonathan announced that a formal poll would be unnecessary and declared all the BNP nominees elected unopposed.

On January 20, 1986, the Jonathan regime was toppled in a relatively bloodless coup led by Maj. Gen. Justin M. LEKHANYA, commander in chief of the Lesotho Paramilitary Force (LPF). Among the factors reportedly contributing to the coup were an economic blockade by South Africa (see Foreign relations, below) and power struggles within the BNP and the LPF. A decree issued on the day of the coup conferred executive and legislative powers on the king, who was to act in conjunction with a six-member Military Council and the Council of Ministers. On January 24 the king swore in Lekhanya as chair of the Military Council, with a largely civilian Council of Ministers being installed three days later. In February the king declared an amnesty for political offenders, and in March he banned all political activity pending the establishment of a new constitution. The new government quickly concluded a security pact with Pretoria and began to retreat from the Communist-bloc relations established by Chief Jonathan in the last years of his rule.

A new crisis erupted in early 1990 following the dismissal and arrest on February 19 of three Military Council members, two of whom were cousins of the king. Moshoeshe refused to approve the appointment of replacement members and in a publicized letter to Lekhanya demanded an explanation for the arrests. The general responded two days later by declaring that supreme authority would “for the time being” be vested in himself and other members of the council, though the king would remain head of state. On February 22 he announced a major cabinet reshuffle that involved the dismissal of 9 of 18 ministers, including the king’s brother, Chief Mathealira SEEISO, from his post as interior minister. On March 5 the council formally validated the action against the monarch, who left the country on March 10 for a “brief sabbatical” in the United Kingdom. The king was dethroned on November 6, and his son, Letsie David SEEISO, was sworn in as King Letsie III on November 12 after his accession had been approved by an assembly of 22 traditional chiefs.

On April 30, 1991, General Lekhanya was overthrown in a bloodless coup and replaced as chair of the Military Council by Col. Elias Phisoana RAMAEMA. Thereafter, an unsuccessful attempt to depose Ramaema on June 17 led to the arrest of 18 senior military officers, and, in an unrelated action, Lekhanya was placed under house arrest from August 2 to September 17 for allegedly plotting a return to power.

In April 1992 the former king announced that he would be returning to Lesotho in late May, apparently against the wishes of the Military Council. Complicating the situation was a report that King Letsie III was prepared to abdicate in favor of his father. During talks brokered by the Commonwealth secretariat in London in June, it was agreed that Moshoeshe could return as head of the royal family, but not as monarch, and on July 20 he was accorded a warm reception in Maseru after a two-year absence.

After several postponements, a general election was held on March 27, 1993, at which the previously outlawed BCP swept all the 65 National Assembly contests, both General Lekhanya and BNP leader Evaristus SEKHONYANA being among the defeated. Although the results were disputed by the BNP, which subsequently rejected an offer of two nominated Senate seats, Ntsu Mokhehle was installed as head of a BCP government on April 2.

In mid-November 1993 coup rumors were sparked when the government's attempts to fulfill its promise to integrate former LLA soldiers into the Royal Lesotho Defense Force (RLDF) resulted in a confrontation between the latter's senior and junior officers. Furthermore, the RLDF's unwillingness to acquiesce to the new administration was, at least nominally, the catalyst for clashes between rival factions of the RLDF in January 1994. On April 14 dissident soldiers assassinated Deputy Prime Minister Selometsi BAHOLO and seized four other cabinet ministers for four hours in apparent response to government plans to investigate the January violence.

On August 17, 1994, King Letsie announced that he had removed the government of Prime Minister Mokhehle and that the country would be run by an appointed provisional council prior to the scheduling of new elections. The action was immediately challenged by thousands of rock-throwing protesters in a march on the royal palace, while a four-nation summit involving the leaders of Botswana, Zimbabwe, and South Africa was convened in Pretoria late in the month in an effort to resolve the crisis. On September 14 a meeting between the king and Mokhehle yielded an agreement that reinstated the latter and called for the abdication of the former in favor of his deposed father. A bill that provided for the monarchical transfer was approved on November 17, with Moshoeshoe II returning to the throne on January 25, 1995.

While the reaccession of King Moshoeshoe came about as a result of the tripartite intervention of late August 1994, the more important outcome was his son's agreement to restore democracy, lacking which South Africa had threatened an economic blockade of the landlocked enclave.

Subsequently, South Africa's deputy foreign secretary termed the Lesotho settlement "the first success of the Organization of African Unity's regional approach to conflict resolution."

On January 15, 1996, King Moshoeshoe was killed in an automobile accident while returning from a late-night visit to his cattle herds in the royal village of Matsieng, and on February 7 Crown Prince Letsie David ascended the throne for the second time as King Letsie III. The 32-year-old Letsie promised to "abstain from involving the monarchy in any way in politics or with any political parties or groups."

In late 1996 and early 1997 Lesotho's political landscape was dominated by a highly publicized struggle between Prime Minister Mokhehle and Molapo QHOBELA, the leader of the BCP's "modernizing" wing and deputy chief of the party's National Executive Commission (NEC). At a meeting held February 28–March 2, 1997, the NEC denounced Mokhehle's governance and voted to strip Mokhehle of his party leadership posts as the first step in an apparent effort to gain control of the government; however, in mid-April the High Court reinstated Mokhehle on an interim basis and ordered him to hold intraparty elections by the end of July. On June 7 Mokhehle and 37 BCP legislators defected from the BCP and announced the formation of the Lesotho Congress for Democracy (LCD). Furthermore, Mokhehle asserted that he would continue as prime minister, citing the LCD's control of a majority of the assembly seats. Consequently, on June 11 the BCP suspended its participation in the assembly, asserting that Mokhehle's "coup" was a blatant attempt to avoid the proposed intraparty balloting. In October Mokhehle's deputy, Bethuel Pakalitha MOSISILI, met with Botswanan, South African, and Zimbabwean leaders who had been charged by the Southern African Development Community (SADC) with mediating in the political stalemate. Thereafter, dismissing the BCP's continued attacks on its legitimacy, the LCD hosted the official coronation of King Letsie III on October 31.

In early 1998 Prime Minister Mokhehle announced that he would not run for reelection in balloting scheduled for May, citing declining health, and on February 27 the legislature was dissolved in anticipation of the polling. In elections on May 23 approximately 400 candidates from 12 parties vied for posts in the enlarged 80-seat assembly. Although the polling was initially described as “free and fair” by the SADC and Lesotho’s Independent Electoral Commission (IEC), the LCD’s capture of 78 seats (the BNP being credited with 1, and 1 remaining vacant) was immediately denounced as fraudulent by the opposition, whose subsequent demand for a recount was rejected by the IEC. On May 28 Mosisili was elected prime minister by an LCD intraparty caucus, and on June 4 a new government was sworn in. Nevertheless, opposition calls for an annulment of the elections continued. In late July the Court of Appeals ruled that only the king could annul elections.

On August 4, 1998, opposition demonstrators occupied the grounds outside the royal palace. On August 11 the SADC named a South African judge, Pius LANGA, to head an international team (referred to thereafter as the Langa Commission) charged with investigating the charges of electoral fraud. Meanwhile, tensions continued to mount at the royal palace, where several people were killed during clashes between the opposition and security forces and progovernment activists. On August 26 the Langa Commission released an interim report in which it accused the IEC of mishandling the vote tallying, and, under pressure from South Africa, the government agreed to a vote recount. However, on September 11, mutinous soldiers arrested more than 20 senior military officials after the dismissal of a military leader with alleged sympathies for the antigovernment demonstrators. Furthermore, the commander of the military, Lt. Gen. Makhula MOSAKENG, was forced to resign at gunpoint. On September 22, South Africa and Botswana, acting under the auspices of the SADC, deployed approximately 800 troops to Maseru at the request of Prime Minister Mosisili, who reportedly feared a coup attempt by the rampaging soldiers. The SADC forces were greeted by stiff resistance from the mutinous soldiers as well as opposition militants and were unable to gain control of Maseru until September 29, by which time dozens of people had been killed and the city severely damaged by looting and burning.

By early October 1998 a majority of the RDLF had returned to the barracks, and between October 2 and 14 the SADC organized government and opposition negotiations that yielded an agreement to create a transitional executive committee that would operate parallel to the government and assist in organizing new elections in 15 to 18 months. The negotiators also agreed to restructure the IEC, draft a new code of conduct for political parties, and create guidelines for equitable access to media outlets for all political groups. Furthermore, it was concluded that Prime Minister Mosisili would remain in office during the transitional phase and that SADC forces would remain for an indefinite period. On December 9 a 24-member Interim Political Authority (IPA) was sworn in, and the following day two opposition party members were elected cochairs of the new body.

SADC peacekeeping forces completed their withdrawal in mid-May 1999, supporters describing the military intervention of the previous year as an “outstanding success.” At the same time, the IPA expressed confidence that it would meet its deadline of organizing national elections by mid-2000, when the original IPA mandate was due to expire. Under pressure from international mediators concerned over potential delays, the IPA and the government in December 1999 reached an agreement to hold elections sometime in 2000, with the IPA mandate to be extended indefinitely until balloting was conducted. However, a planned election date in May 2000 was quickly scrapped as the IPA and the government argued over proposed restructuring of the parliament. The IPA and the government subsequently charged each other with attempting to delay the elections, although neutral observers suggested that it was the government that appeared to have the most to gain from such tactics. Plans to conduct the balloting in early 2001 also proved unrealistic in view of disagreement over voter registration and the addition of legislators selected via proportional representation to the assembly.

In legislative balloting on May 25, 2002, the LCD won a new term in office, and on June 11 Mosisili formed an all-LCD cabinet. Four more ministers were announced on July 11.

On April 30, 2005, the nation's first local elections were held, with a government stipulation that one-third of the elected seats be filled by women. Seven opposition parties tried to have the elections postponed, claiming irregularities, which some observers said may have affected voter turnout (reported to be about 30 percent). Though an official breakdown of results was not released, electoral officials announced May 9 that the LCD won "by a large margin," followed by independents, the opposition Basotho National Party (BNP) and the Lesotho People's Congress (LPC), and unspecified smaller parties. Failed elections were reported in 15 districts, attributed to the death of candidates, and new elections were to be scheduled to replace them.

Constitution and Government

Under the 1966 constitution, which was suspended in January 1970, Lesotho was declared to be an independent monarchy with the king functioning as head of state and executive authority being vested in a prime minister and cabinet responsible to the lower house of a bicameral parliament. In April 1973 an interim unicameral body was established, encompassing 22 chiefs and 71 nominated members. A return to bicameralism was voted in 1983, but the bill was never implemented and was voided after the 1986 coup by the Military Council, which announced the vesting of "all executive and legislative powers in HM the King"; the latter action was reversed by the council prior to the exile of Moshoeshe in March 1990, the new monarch appearing to possess only ceremonial authority.

On July 4, 1991, a National Constituent Assembly approved the draft of a new constitution, which was promulgated following the legislative election of March 1993. The revised basic law restored the bicameral system and returned executive authority to a cabinet headed by a prime minister, without conclusively resolving the issue of the monarch's role. The judicial system consists of a High Court, a Court of Appeal, and subordinate courts (district, judicial commissioners, central, and local). Judges of the High Court and the Court of Appeal are appointed on the advice of the government and its Judicial Service Commission. Local government is based on nine districts, each of which is administered by a commissioner appointed by the central government. In April 1997 the assembly approved a constitutional amendment that established an Independent Electoral Commission (IEC).

Foreign Relations

Lesotho's foreign policy was long determined less by its membership in the United Nations, the Commonwealth, and the Organization of African Unity (OAU, subsequently the African Union—AU) than by its position as a black enclave within the white-ruled Republic of South Africa. While rejecting the South African doctrine of apartheid and insisting on the maintenance of national sovereignty, the Jonathan government for some years cultivated good relations with Pretoria. Subsequent events, however, led to a noticeable stiffening in Maseru's posture. Following South Africa's establishment of the adjacent Republic of Transkei in October 1976, Lesotho requested a special UN Security Council meeting on the matter, complaining that its border had been effectively closed in an "act of aggression" designed to force recognition of Transkei. Subsequently, South African prime minister Pieter Botha accused Maseru of harboring militants from the African National Congress (ANC) among the approximately 11,000 South African refugees living in Lesotho. Friction over Chief Jonathan's refusal to expel the ANC supporters culminated in South Africa's institution of a crippling economic blockade, ostensibly to block cross-border rebel activity, on January 1, 1986. Pretoria denied charges of complicity in the subsequent overthrow of Chief Jonathan but lifted the border controls one week later when the new military regime flew 60 ANC members to Zimbabwe. The new relationship with South Africa was further demonstrated by the signature in October of a treaty authorizing commencement of the $2 billion Lesotho Highlands Water Project (LHWP), which had been under consideration for more than two decades. The three-phase project, expected to take 25 to 30 years to complete, will divert vast quantities of water to South Africa's arid Transvaal region in return for the payment of substantial royalties. (The project has been the attention of intense scrutiny recently in light of bribery charges against foreign contractors. In May 2002 a former chief executive of the LHWP was sentenced to a lengthy prison term for fraud and accepting bribes, while Canadian, French, and German companies were fined for paying bribes.)

In an attempt to broaden its international support both regionally and abroad, Lesotho has been an active member of the Southern African Development Coordination Conference (SADCC, subsequently the SADC), a body created in 1980 to lessen members' economic dependence on the then white-ruled regime. However, in view of its vulnerability to South African influence, Maseru, unlike other SADCC governments, did not seek sanctions against Pretoria for its apartheid policies. Rather, on May 21, 1992, the two governments formally established diplomatic relations.

In January 1994 the interwoven nature of relations between Lesotho and South Africa was evidenced by Pretoria's immediate and forceful response to the unrest in Maseru. Although the Commonwealth was subsequently credited with brokering an accord between the combatants, observers cited pressure from a task force created by South African president F. W. de Klerk and other southern African leaders as the reason for the speedy resolution of the dispute. Thereafter, speculation about the possible merger of the two countries continued, with the Christian Science Monitor quoting local observers as saying that, if not for the monarchy, Lesotho would be "swallowed up" by South Africa. In early 2001 it was reported that relations between the South African government and Lesotho's royal family were strained because of the former's failure to "come clean" on a "massacre" allegedly committed by its paratroopers during the SADC's intervention in 1998. However, relations subsequently improved (apparently influenced by the successful 2002 legislative elections in Lesotho), culminating in a new cooperation protocol through which South Africa agreed to provide economic aid and technical assistance. In 2005 troops from Lesotho were being trained for use in future UN and SADC missions. Late that year, Prime Minister Mosisili visited China amid pledges by both countries for political and economic cooperation.

Current Issues

Although tension between the government and the opposition was reported in advance of the May 2002 legislative poll, the balloting was deemed generally free and fair by international observers, the new mixed system (which included 40 members elected on a proportional basis) having succeeded in providing minority parties with a significant legislative voice. Nevertheless, the government continued to face severe pressures from food shortages (accompanied by high prices that triggered street protests in November 2003) and the HIV/AIDS crisis (an estimated 31 percent of the population was infected). In November 2005 the government announced a plan to offer free HIV/AIDS testing to the entire population.

Meanwhile, the issue of accession continued to gain attention after the birth of a second daughter to the royal family in November 2005. While only male heirs to the throne are allowed, a government secretary in 2006 raised the issue of female inheritance as part of the ongoing speculation. In January, Foreign Affairs Minister Monyane Moleleki was wounded by gunfire near his home shortly after he had attended a national conference of the LCD, during which tensions reportedly heated up over the accession issue and hints that Moleleki might seek an unprecedented third term in the 2007 elections.

Political Parties

Political party activity was banned in March 1986 following the January coup that ended nearly 20 years of dominance by the Basotho National Party (BNP). Subsequently, the BNP joined four former opponents (the BCP, UDP, BDA, and CPL) in an informal “Big Five” alliance to demand that the ban be lifted in preparation for a return to civilian government. Ten days after the coup of April 30, 1991, the Military Council announced that party activity could resume as long as it did not degenerate into “divisive politics.” However, it was not until nearly two years thereafter that a general election was authorized.

The 11 parties that had competed individually in the 1998 legislative balloting (the LCD, BCP, BNP, MFP, SDU, NPP, NIP, KBP, LEP, PFD, and CDP) were accorded two seats each on the Interim Political Authority (IPA) that was established in late 1998. The UDP and the LLP, which had contested the 1998 election as an alliance, each received one seat on the 24-member IPA.

In May 1999 a number of small parties (the PFD, NPP, NIP, KBP, CDP, CPL, and SDP) announced formation of an anti-LCD grouping called the Khokanyana-Phiri Democratic Alliance. In August another antigovernment grouping, the Setlamo Democratic Alliance, was formalized by the BNP, BCP, MFP, UDP, LLP, and LEP, which had been operating together informally since the beginning of the year.

Government Party

Lesotho Congress for Democracy (LCD). The LCD was launched by Prime Minister Ntso Mosheko, the (then) BCP interim president, on June 7, 1997, one month before the BCP was scheduled to hold intraparty elections for his post and just two days after a BCP spokesman had labeled him “permanently incapacitated.” Subsequently, Mokhehle cited the LCD’s control of a majority of the legislative posts (38 seats) as the basis for his continued control of the government. In early 1998 Bethuel Pakalitha Mosisili, theretofore deputy party leader, was elected to succeed Mokhehle as party leader, the latter declining to run for reelection due to poor health. (Mokhehle died in January 1999.)

Party fighting was reported in 2000, culminating in violence between rival factions in October that precipitated police intervention. Some observers suggested the friction underscored a split between the youthful, possibly more progressive, supporters of Mosisili and a conservative faction led by Shakhane MOKHEHLE, brother of the LCD founder and current chair of the LCD. Subsequently, Mosisili was elected for another five-year term as party leader but Mokhehle was defeated 717–710 in his reelection bid by Sephiri Motanyane, described as a close associate of Mosisili’s. Prominent LCD leaders, including Deputy Prime Minister Kelebone Maope and several other cabinet members, charged that the elections had been “rigged” and vowed to take the matter to court. Maope’s faction left the party in September 2001 to form the Lesotho People’s Congress (below). In April 2005 it was reported that the LCD had won the country’s first locally-held elections.

Leaders: Bethuel Pakalitha MOSISILI (Prime Minister and Party Leader), Enoch Sephiri MOTANYANE (Secretary General), Motiohi MOENO (Deputy Secretary General).

Opposition Parties

Basotho Congress Party (BCP). Strongly anti-apartheid and pan-Africanist in outlook, the BCP (formerly the Basutoland Congress Party) was split, following the abortive 1970 election, by the defection of (then) deputy leader Gerard P. Ramoreboli and several other members, who defied party policy and accepted nominated opposition seats in the interim National Assembly.

Banned in 1970, the main branch of the BCP continued to oppose the Jonathan government, claiming responsibility in the late 1970s for numerous armed attacks on police and BNP-supportive politicians. Concurrently, a Lesotho Liberation Army (LLA) of 500–1,000 operated, under external BCP direction and allegedly with South African support, in the country’s northern mountains and from across the border. Despite overtures from the new regime in early 1986, the LLA called for revival of the 1966 constitution as a condition of abandoning antigovernment activity. However, in early 1989 external leader Ntsu Mokhehle returned to Lesotho, along with about 200 BCP supporters, presumably because of Pretoria's satisfaction with the current military government. Meanwhile, although the BCP remained committed to the establishment of a constitutional democracy, the LLA, apparently of no further use to South Africa, was reported to have been reduced to a few "rag-tag" dissidents.

Mokhehle and other party members attended the opening of the constituent assembly in June 1990, despite their earlier support of a boycott. Subsequently, the party was rumored to be interested in Lesotho's incorporation into South Africa. Formerly a socialist party, the BCP in its 1993 election manifesto declared its commitment to a mixed economy.

Controversy rocked the BCP in 1996 as the rift between the party's conservative elders, or majela-thoki ("those who want to be isolated"), and the younger, so-called modernizers widened. At a party congress March 9–10, delegates elected a new 12-member National Executive Commission (NEC). In addition, "conservative" Deputy Prime Minister Bethuel Pakalitha Mosisili, a potential Mokhehle successor, secured the party vice presidency, outpolling the incumbent, modernizer Molapo Qhobela. However, Qhobela and his supporters promptly filed suit to have the balloting overturned, alleging that the majela-thoki had rigged the elections. Subsequently, in May four prominent modernizer cabinet ministers, including Qhobela and Tseliso Makhakhe, were ousted from the government. One week later two other ministers aligned with them quit the cabinet.

In November 1996 the High Court ruled in favor of the Qhobela faction, annulling the March NEC polling and charging the members of the previous NEC with preparing new elections. At fresh balloting for the NEC on January 24, 1997, the modernizers retained their seats, reflecting their reportedly overwhelming numerical dominance within the party. On February 16 the remaining links between the two factions were fractured when the Mokhehle government ignored Qhobela's attempts to mediate an end to a police mutiny and violently squashed the rebellion. The progressives' dismay with Mokhehle was further compounded by testimony being made at South Africa's Truth and Reconciliation Commission (see separate article on South Africa) that, according to Africa Confidential, appeared to substantiate long-held rumors that Mokhehle and his LLA forces had cooperated with the apartheid-era regime's "death squads." At a BPC meeting on February 28 party delegates voted to remove Mokhehle from the party presidency; however, on April 18 the High Court reversed Mokhehle's ouster, declaring that it violated the BCP's charter and directing Mokhehle to serve as interim president (his term having expired in January) until new partywide elections could be held.

On June 7, 1997, Mokhehle announced that he and 37 other BCP legislators were leaving the party to form the LCD. On July 27 party delegates elected Qhobela as the BCP's new leader. Subsequently, on December 1 the Khauta KHASU-led Democratic Movement for Reconstruction (DMR) announced that it was disbanding so that its members could rejoin the BCP (Khasu, former BCP deputy leader G. P. RAMOREBOLI, and Phoka CHAOLANE had been expelled from the BCP in 1992).

In December 1998 Khauhelo RALITOPOLE, leader of the BCP's Women's League, was named cochair of the IPA. It was reported in early 2001 that two different executive committees—one led by Molapo Qhobela, former minister of foreign affairs and heretofore president of the BCP, and the other by Tseliso Makhakhe, former minister of education—were claiming legitimate control of the party. Following a court's decision to accord the pro-Makhakhe faction the legitimate use of the BCP rubric, the pro-Qhobela faction broke away in early 2002 to form the Basutoland African Congress (below).

Leader: Tseliso MAKHAKHE.

Basutoland African Congress (BAC). The BAC was launched in early 2002 by a breakaway faction of the BCP.

Leaders: Molapo QHOBELA, Maholela MANDORO (Secretary General).

Basotho National Party (BNP). Organized in 1959 as the Basutoland National Party, the BNP has counted many Christians and chiefs among its members. It traditionally favored free enterprise and cooperation with South Africa while opposing apartheid. In the mid-1970s, however, it began co-opting policies originally advanced by the BCP, including the establishment of relations with Communist states and support for the ANC campaign against Pretoria. Growing internal division was reported in 1985 over who would succeed the aging chief Jonathan as prime minister. One faction was dominated by the paramilitary Youth League, armed and trained by North Korea, which reportedly planned a government takeover. The Youth League was disarmed and officially disbanded in a confrontation with the Lesotho Paramilitary Force on January 15, 1986, prior to the LPF-led coup of January 20. Although the BNP's national chair was named finance minister in the post-Jonathan administration, supporters of Chief Jonathan were barred from political activity. Chief Jonathan was detained briefly after the coup, released, and then placed under house arrest in August along with six BNP supporters for activities allegedly threatening national stability. They were released in September by order of the High Court with an admonition to refrain from political activity. The former prime minister died in April 1987.

On October 18, 1995, BNP leader Evaristus Retelisitsoe SEKHONYANA was sentenced to two years' imprisonment or a heavy fine after being convicted of sedition for having urged armed resistance to military units during the August unrest. Sekhonyana assumed a leading role in the inter-party negotiations that were held in the aftermath of the September 1998 uprising; however, he died on November 18. At a BNP congress in March 1999, former military leader Justin Metsing Lekhanya was elected as the new party leader. At the 2002 legislative elections the BNP became the second-largest party in the assembly (21 seats) and the main opposition grouping. In 2005 the government rejected a proposal from the BNP to form a government of national unity.

Leaders: Justin Metsing LEKHANYA (Party Leader), Leseteli MALEFANE (Secretary General).

Lesotho People's Congress (LPC). The LPC was established in October 2001 by an LCD break-away group led by former deputy prime minister Kelebone Maope.

Leaders: Kelebone MAOPE (Party Leader), Shakhane MOKHEHLE (Secretary General).

Marematlou Freedom Party (MFP). A royalist party, the MFP has long been committed to enlarging the king's authority. In other respects, its position has been somewhere between the BCP and the BNP. An offshoot Marematlou Party (MP), formed in 1965 and led by S. S. Matete, remerged with the MFP in 1969. One of its members, Patrick Lehloenya, accepted a cabinet post as minister to the prime minister in late 1975, subsequently becoming minister of health and social welfare. The party's (then) president, Bennett Makalo KHAKETLA, was appointed minister of justice and prisons in the cabinet formed after the 1986 coup.

Leaders: Vincent Moeketse MALEBO, Tsitso LEANYA.

Sefate Democratic Union (SDU). Founded by BCP dissidents, the SDU controlled the sole non-BCP legislative seat prior to the formation of the LCD in 1997.

Leader: Bofihla NKUEBE.

National Progressive Party (NPP). The NPP was launched on October 22, 1995, by Chief Peete Nkoebe Peete, who had previously been a deputy leader of the BNP but had had a falling-out with Chief Sekhonyana. Peete declared that the new group would function in the tradition of the BNP's founder, Chief Leabua Jonathan.

Leader: Chief Peete Nkoebe PEETE.

United Democratic Party (UDP). The UDP was formed in 1967 by two progovernment members of the BCP. However, in a 1982 manifesto the party called for the establishment of full diplomatic relations with Pretoria, the expulsion from Lesotho of all South African political refugees, and opposition to trade sanctions against the Botha regime. In early 1985 UDP leader Charles Mofeli branded the projected legislative balloting as a “farce” and accused Prime Minister Jonathan of attempting to create a one-party state. Mofeli was also one of the most vocal critics of the successor military regime, being detained briefly in 1987 for condemning its “abuse of power.” The UDP contested the 1998 legislative balloting in an alliance with the LLP (below).

Leaders: Charles D. MOFELI (President), Molomo NKUEBE (Secretary General), Mthuthuzeli PATRICK.

National Independence Party (NIP). The NIP was formed in late 1984 by a former cabinet member who resigned from the Jonathan government in 1972. In an election manifesto issued in March 1985, the NIP called for the establishment of diplomatic relations with South Africa and the severance of links with Communist countries. In mid-1992 it criticized the government for scheduling elections “prematurely” and announced that it would boycott the balloting then scheduled for November. The party failed to win seats in the 2002 assembly elections.

Leader: Anthony C. MANYELI.

Communist Party of Lesotho (CPL). The small Communist Party, founded in the early 1960s and declared illegal in 1970, long drew its major support from Basotho workers employed in South Africa. The ban on its activities within Lesotho was reported to have been “partially lifted” by the Jonathan government in 1984. Since 1986, muted activity by CPL leaders has reportedly been tolerated, despite the party ban, although the CPL congress in early 1987 was held “in utmost secrecy.” The congress called for the revitalization of trade union activities, particularly in the mineworkers’ union, which is led by the CPL secretary general.

In mid-1992 the party announced that it would boycott the forthcoming legislative elections, criticizing their hasty scheduling. There were no recent references to the CPL.

Leaders: R. MATAJI (Chair), Nimrod SIJAKE, Jacob Mokhafisi KENA (Secretary General).

Kopanang Basotho Party (KBP). Lesotho’s first feminist party, Kopanang Basotho (Basotho Unite) was launched in mid-1992 to protest what it termed “repressive and discriminatory” laws against women. By the end of the year it was reported to have a membership of some 30,000.

Leader: Limakatso NTAKATSANE.

United Party (UP). In late February 1996 United Party leader Makara Azael Sekautu and two soldiers were arrested for their roles in a botched coup attempt that government officials alleged had been planned since September 1995. Sekautu was released in 1998 and reportedly ran for a legislative seat as part of a UDP/LLP/UP electoral alliance. However, official government election results referenced the coalition as including only the UDP and LLP, and the UP did not secure representation on the IPA. The UP contested the 2002 assembly balloting without success.

Leader: Makara Azael SEKAUTU.

Lesotho Workers’ Party (LWP). The LWP was formed in August 2001 by left-wing trade unionists and other labor leaders.

Leader: Billy MACAEFA.

Other parties participating in the IPA were the Christian Democratic Party (CDP), led by Thuso LITSOANE and Ntja THOOLA; the Lesotho Educational Party (LEP), led by Thabo S. PITSO; the Lesotho Labour Party (LLP), led by Patrick SALIE and Charles MOFELI; and the Popular Front for Democracy (PFD), led by Rakali KHIT-SAM and Lekhetho RAKUNE. Other parties include the Social Democratic Party (SDP), described upon its formation in 1998 as a “youth” party under the leadership of Masitise SELESO; and the New Lesotho Freedom Party, led by Manapo Majara P. KHOABANE.

Legislature

The bicameral parliament established under the 1966 constitution was dissolved in the wake of alleged irregularities at the election of January 27, 1970. An interim assembly of 22 chiefs and 71 nominated members, named on April 27, 1973, was dissolved as of December 31, 1984. Subsequent arrangements called for a Senate of 22 chiefs and an assembly of 60 elected and up to 20 nominated members. Since none of the opposition parties nominated candidates for balloting to have been conducted on September 17–18, 1985, Chief Jonathan canceled the poll and declared the BNP candidates elected unopposed. The 1983 Parliament Act, on which the action was based, was voided following the 1986 coup.

At present the Parliament is a bicameral body consisting of a nonelective Senate and an elective National Assembly.

Senate. The Senate contains 22 chiefs and 11 nominated members. A restructuring of the Senate (to make the body more “democratic” and “representative”) was proposed for consideration by the Interim Political Authority (IPA), established in late 1998. However, little further information on proposed changes had surfaced as of 2005.

President: Chief Sempe LEJAHA.

National Assembly. At the election of May 23, 1998, approximately 400 candidates competed for 80 lower-house seats (an increase of 15 since the 1993 polling). The Lesotho Congress for Democracy (LCD) won 78 seats, the Basotho National Party (BNP) secured a sole position, and 1 seat was left vacant. The next election initially was not scheduled until 2003; however, early elections were envisioned as part of the late-1998 agreement negotiated between the government and the opposition following the military intervention of the SADC. After several postponements, it was announced in March 2001 that balloting would be conducted in 2002 for a new assembly, whose 80 members elected on a “first-post-the-post” system would be complemented by 40 members selected by proportional vote. In balloting on May 25, 2002, the LCD won 77 seats, followed by the BNP, with 21 seats; the Lesotho People’s Congress, 5; the National Independence Party, 5; the Basotho Congress Party, 3; the Basutoland African Congress, 3; the Popular Front for Democracy, 1; the National Progressive Party, 1; the Marematlou Freedom Party, 1; and the Lesotho Workers’ Party, 1. Two seats were left vacant.

Speaker: Nthohi MOTSAMAI.

REPUBLIC OF LIBERIA

The Country

Facing the Atlantic along the western bulge of Africa, Liberia is a country of tropical rain forests and broken plateaus. Established as a haven for freed American slaves, it became an independent republic more than a century before its neighbors. Prior to the escalation of domestic violence in 1990, a small “Americo-Liberian” elite (between 3 and 5 percent of the population), which traced its descent to the settlers of 1820–1840, was gradually being assimilated, with most of the other inhabitants, divided into 16 principal tribes and speaking 28 native languages and dialects, adhering to traditional customs and practicing indigenous religions. About 10 percent is Christian and 10–20 percent Muslim. Women comprise approximately 40 percent of the labor force, mainly in agriculture; female participation in government, traditionally minimal, increased marginally during the 1980s.

The Liberian economy is dependent on exports of iron ore, rubber, and timber, plus smaller quantities of diamonds and coffee. In 1989 iron ore accounted for more than half of export revenue, although the industry employed only 2 percent of the labor force. Industrial development also included diverse smaller enterprises centering on commodities such as processed agricultural goods, cement, plastic explosives, beverages, and refined petroleum. In addition, Liberia provided a “flag of convenience” for about 2,450 ships, or approximately one-fifth of the world’s maritime tonnage.

During the decade preceding the collapse of the Doe regime in 1990, a decline in world commodity prices, combined with mismanagement of state enterprises, produced a severe fiscal crisis. In response, the government attempted to privatize national industries, mounted an anticorruption campaign, and promoted an agriculture-based “green revolution.” Aggravating the situation was the suspension of aid in 1986 by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) because of Monrovia’s failure to make scheduled payments on its external debt, which exceeded $1.7 billion by mid-1990. Of far greater consequence was the subsequent carnage caused by civil war and the interim government’s lack of fiscal resources because of rebel activity. The government installed in mid-1997 pledged to focus its economic rehabilitation efforts on advancement of the private sector and reduction of the high unemployment rate. Real GDP grew by 20 percent in 1999, although per capita income reportedly remained at only one-third of prewar levels and unemployment was widespread.

Subsequently, the Liberian economy suffered from the country's increasing international isolation resulting from the government's perceived role in the burgeoning subregional conflict (see Foreign relations and Current issues, below). Among other things, the unrest led to a UN embargo on diamond sales (integrally related to arms traffic), a halt to many donor-financed development projects, and delays in the government's proposed fiscal reforms.

Intensified fighting in 2002 led to a dramatic decline in GDP in 2003 and created severe food and energy shortages and substantial internal and external displacement of large segments of the population. In March 2003 the IMF suspended Liberia because of the Taylor administration's failure to pay its dues and repay loans. The negotiation of a cease-fire and installation of a national transitional government in the second half of 2003 prompted international donors in February 2004 to pledge $520 million in humanitarian and economic assistance. Growth of 2.4 percent and 5.3 percent was achieved in 2004 and 2005, respectively.

In August 2005, Mittal Steel, the largest steel corporation in the world, announced that it would invest $900 million over a 25-year period in iron mines in northeastern Nimba County. The company would retain 70 percent of the revenues of the mines, with the government getting the rest. However, sanctions continued to constrain economic growth. In December 2005, the UN extended sanctions on timber and diamonds for an additional six months. (The timber sanctions were lifted in June 2006, although the UN left the diamond sanctions in place for at least six more months pending adoption of a program that would verify the origins of the diamonds.)

Following the 2005 elections, the IMF estimated that the country's fragile economic recovery would continue. GDP growth for 2006 was expected to rise to 7.7 percent, most of the expansion being tied to additional foreign aid, including resumed assistance from the IMF. The World Bank announced $55 million in aid for road repairs, improvements in the delivery of water, and other reconstruction. Meanwhile, China and other creditor nations wrote off some of Liberia's external debt.

In order to repair the country's reputation for financial mismanagement, the new administration launched a series of reforms in early 2006 designed, among other things, to increase the collection of unpaid taxes, improve auditing processes, and computerize the banking system. In exchange for the renewal of foreign aid, donor organizations and states, led by the United States, the European Union (EU), the United Nations (UN), the African Union (AU), and the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS), created the Governance and Economic Management Assistance Program (GEMAP), a three-year initiative under which international experts will assist members of the new Liberian government. (GEMAP officials are required to countersign all major government expenditures, a condition that has created significant resentment among Liberians.)

In April 2006 the IMF announced that Liberia was one of 11 countries that had qualified for debt relief under the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) initiative. (Liberia's foreign debt stood at about $3.2 billion.) As evidence of the daunting task facing the new government, it was estimated that 50 percent of the population survived on less than $1 per day. In addition, some estimates placed unemployment as high as 80 percent.

Political Background

Liberia's political origins stem from a charter granted by the U.S. Congress to the American Colonization Society in 1816 to establish a settlement for freed slaves on the west coast of Africa. The first settlers arrived in 1822 with the financial assistance of U.S. President James Monroe, and in 1847 Liberia declared itself an independent republic under an American-style constitution. During the late 19th and early 20th centuries, such European powers as Britain, France, and Germany became involved in the country's domestic affairs and laid claim to portions of Liberian territory. After World War I, however, American political and economic influence was reestablished, with Firestone assuming operation in 1926 of the world's largest rubber plantation in Harbel.

Relative stability characterized internal politics under the guidance of the True Whig Party (TWP), which ruled continuously for more than a century after coming to power in 1878. Political authority was strongly centralized under the successive administrations of President William V.S. TUBMAN, who served as chief executive from 1944 until his death in 1971. Tubman was elected on a platform calling for unification of the country by integrating the Americo-Liberian and tribal groups and the promotion of foreign economic investment. Although these policies were maintained by Tubman's successor, William Richard TOLBERT Jr., limited economic imagination, insensitivity to popular feeling among indigenous Liberians, and allegations of maladministration and corruption contributed, in the late 1970s, to growing domestic opposition, including a wave of illegal strikes and widespread rioting in Monrovia in April 1979 over a proposed increase in the price of rice. Emergency powers were quickly granted to President Tolbert by the Congress, while later in the year municipal elections were postponed and tough labor laws enacted to end the stoppages.

Despite legalization in January 1980 of the People's Progressive Party (PPP), the country's first formal opposition in more than two decades, President Tolbert responded to a call for a general strike by PPP leader Gabriel Baccus MATTHEWS in March by asserting that the party had planned "an armed insurrection." Matthews and other PPP leaders were arrested, but on April 12, two days before their trial was to begin, a coup led by junior officers overthrew the government, President Tolbert and more than two dozen others being killed. A People's Redemption Council (PRC), chaired by Master Sgt. Samuel Kanyon DOE, was established, and on April 13 the PRC announced a civilian-military cabinet that included Matthews as foreign minister. On April 22, following a series of military trials, 13 former government and TWP officials—including the Tolbert administration's ministers of foreign affairs, justice, finance, economic planning, agriculture, and trade; the chief justice of the Supreme Court; and the presiding officers of the Congress—were publicly executed by firing squad. Three days later, the PRC suspended the constitution and instituted martial law.

In April 1981 the PRC appointed a 25-member commission to draft a new constitution, in keeping with Doe's promise of a return to civilian rule by April 1985. After a number of postponements for the avowed purpose of registering and educating voters, a constitutional referendum was held on July 3, 1984. On July 20 Doe announced that the document had been accepted, and on the following day he abolished the PRC and merged its membership with 57 hand-picked civilians to form an Interim National Assembly. Although the new assembly immediately elected him as its president, Doe characterized the status as temporary and announced that he would present himself as a candidate at a national election to be held in October 1985.

Because of restrictions imposed by the government-appointed electoral commission, neither Matthews nor the chair of the constitutional commission, Dr. Amos SAWYER, was allowed to campaign for the presidency, with their parties also being disqualified from presenting legislative candidates. As a result, three substantially weaker groups challenged Doe's recently launched National Democratic Party of Liberia (NDPL). Amid widespread allegations of electoral fraud and military intimidation, Doe claimed victory at the October 15, 1985, balloting on the basis of a 50.9 percent presidential vote share, while the NDPL was awarded 73 of the 90 assembly seats.

In June 1987, as part of an apparent effort to consolidate his power, President Doe dismissed four Supreme Court justices, thereby drawing criticism that he had exceeded his constitutional authority. Three months later the government reported that it had thwarted a coup attempt masterminded by former foreign minister Matthews.

During 1988 the regime continued to crack down on real or imagined opponents. In March, William Gabriel KPOLLEH, president of the Liberian Unification Party (LUP), was charged with leading a coup attempt, and in July, Doe's former PRC deputy, J. Nicholas PODIER, was slain in the wake of another alleged overthrow effort (reportedly the ninth since 1980).

In early 1990 what began as a seemingly minor insurrection in the northeastern border region of Nimba County gradually expanded to pose a major threat to the Doe regime. In late 1989 a number of villages had been overrun by a group of about 150 rebels led by Charles Chankay TAYLOR, who five years earlier had escaped from custody in the United States after being charged with the theft of Liberian government funds. In January 1990 the fighting assumed a tribal character, with the rebels (styling themselves the National Patriotic Front of Liberia [NPFL]) attacking members of the president's Krahn ethnic group, and government forces retaliating against Nimba's principal tribe, the Gio. By early June, after steady progress in a series of engagements with Liberian army units, rebel troops were advancing on Monrovia, and by mid-July a "reign of terror" was reported in the capital, with both sides engaging in atrocities against ethnic opponents and unarmed civilians. Meanwhile, an Independent NPFL (INPFL), which had broken with the Taylor group in February under the leadership of Prince Yormic Johnson, emerged as a major "third force" that succeeded in gaining control of central Monrovia on July 23.

With neither the United Nations nor the Organization of African Unity (OAU, subsequently the AU) taking action to ameliorate the conflict, ECOWAS organized a 4,000-man peacekeeping force styled the ECOWAS Monitoring Group (Ecomog), which arrived in Monrovia on August 25, 1990. The intervention was welcomed by Johnson but was bitterly denounced by Taylor, who insisted that the force had been assembled to avert defeat of the Doe regime by the NPFL.

On September 11, 1990, President Doe was killed by members of the Johnson group as the apparent result of an argument that had broken out during a meeting arranged by Ecomog. Government forces nonetheless continued their defense of the heavily fortified executive mansion under the presidential guard commander, Brig. Gen. David NIMLEY. During the next several days four individuals (Johnson, Taylor, Nimley, and the former constitutional commission chair, Amos Sawyer, who headed an Interim Government of National Unity [IGNU] from exile in Banjul, Gambia) proclaimed themselves president, with the last being recognized, on an interim basis, by ECOWAS on November 22. Six days later the three warring factions within Liberia concluded a cease-fire agreement in Bamako, Mali, and declared their intention to participate in a national conference to establish an interim government. Although Taylor was reported to have signed the accord only because of pressure from his two principal backers, Libya and Burkina Faso, the suspension of hostilities generally held into 1991, with the three faction leaders (including Gen. Hezekiah BOWEN, who had succeeded Nimley as head of the Armed Forces of Liberia [AFL]), agreeing to meet in Lomé, Togo, on March 15 to pave the way for a transitional regime. At the last moment, however, Taylor refused to attend without the participation of elected representatives from Liberia's 13 counties, all but one of which his forces claimed to control. A compromise structure was eventually agreed upon, providing for a president and two vice presidents (representing the IGNU, NPFL, and INPFL, respectively). However, there was little immediate progress toward implementation of the plan, and Ecomog experienced mounting pressure to move militarily against the obdurate Taylor. On June 30 the stalemate appeared to have been broken in the course of a meeting attended by Taylor, Sawyer, and five West African heads of government in Yamoussoukro, Côte d'Ivoire, that yielded agreement on the establishment of a commission to organize a national election.

Although the fighting subsided in July–August 1991, Taylor took no action to disarm his forces as mandated by the Yamoussoukro accord, while Johnson on August 6 announced that the INPFL was withdrawing from the tripartite regime. Faced with Taylor's hostility toward the composition of the Ecomog force, Côte d'Ivoire offered to seek Ecomog's replacement by a UN contingent, but the idea was rejected by Sawyer on August 19. Renewed hostilities thereupon broke out in the form of clashes between NPFL units, which had entered Sierra Leone in support of local dissidents, and Sierra Leonean troops, accompanied by a group from former president Doe's Krahn tribe that had styled itself the United Liberation Movement of Liberia for Democracy (Ulimo). Nonetheless, peace talks resumed in Yamoussoukro on September 16 and 17, yielding a new stand-down commitment by the Liberian factions in return for an Ecomog restructuring (primarily in response to NPFL charges that it was Nigerian-dominated).

A fourth summit in Yamoussoukro on October 29–31, 1991, drew a pledge by the NPFL to withdraw from Sierra Leone, disarm its forces, and relinquish Liberian territory under its control to Ecomog. It was also agreed that a buffer zone would be established between Liberia and Sierra Leone and that the Liberian election would be held within six months. On November 8 Johnson's INPFL announced that it would rejoin the interim government, although Ulimo leader Raleigh SEEKIE repudiated the peace agreement. While additional disagreements surfaced by early 1992, including a refusal by both the NPFL and INPFL to honor new banknotes issued by the Sawyer administration, a 13-member interim election commission was sworn in on January 13 with instructions to prepare for legislative and presidential balloting in August. A week later, in his annual message to Monrovia's Interim Assembly, President Sawyer offered NPLF leader Taylor the vacant post of vice president in the interim government on the condition that Taylor join in effective implementation of the most recent Yamoussoukro accord. However, no response was reported.

On April 7 and 8, 1992, ECOWAS representatives met in Geneva, Switzerland, with Sawyer, Taylor, the presidents of Burkina Faso, Côte d'Ivoire, and Senegal, and the vice president of Nigeria. The group reaffirmed its support of Yamoussoukro IV, including establishment of the Ecomog buffer zone. On April 14 Taylor renounced the agreement, calling it “unbalanced and unsatisfactory,” but on April 29 he again reversed himself. On April 30 Ecomog began deployment in border areas theretofore controlled by the NPFL.

In August 1992 heavy fighting broke out between NPFL and Ulimo forces, and in September the NPFL accused Ecomog of supporting the NPFL’s ostensibly Sierra Leone-based opponents. Fighting also erupted in October in Monrovia between NPFL and Ecomog units and persisted for the remainder of the year. By early 1993 the ECOWAS contingent appeared to have gained the upper hand, and in March the NPFL was driven (briefly as it turned out) from its stronghold of Gbanga, with its control of the hinterland having been reduced from more than 90 to less than 40 percent. In early April Ecomog troops drove Taylor’s forces from the strategic port city of Buchanan, and in May the southeastern port of Greenville also fell, confining the NPFL’s maritime access to the small town of Harper near the Côte d’Ivoire border.

On July 25, 1993, in Cotonou, Benin, Liberia’s leading combatants (the NPFL, Ulimo, and Ecomog) signed an OAU/UN-brokered peace accord, and on August 1 the lengthy conflict appeared to end, Taylor advising his followers (somewhat prematurely) “to return to your towns and village and begin to rebuild your lives. The war is over.” On August 16 the three factions reached agreement on a transitional Council of State to consist of Bismark KUYON and David KPOMAKPOR (IGNU), Dorothy MUSULENG-COOPER (NPFL), and Dr. Mohamed SHERIFF and Thomas ZIAH (Ulimo). The new council proceeded to elect Kuyon, Musuleng-Cooper, and Sheriff as chair and first and second deputy chairs, respectively. However, a scheduled takeover from the Sawyer government on August 24 was postponed by Kuyon, pending the deployment of a peacekeeping force from throughout Africa to oversee disarmament. One week later Nigeria withdrew its personnel from Ecomog (approximately three-quarters of the force total), and on September 22 the UN Security Council voted to establish the UN Observer Mission in Liberia (UNOMIL) to ensure implementation of the Cotonou accord. Subsequently, the IGNU designated Philip A. Z. BANKS to succeed Kuyon, while the NPFL named Gen. Isaac MUSA to replace Musuleng-Cooper.

By late 1993 agreement had been reached on the structure of a unified interim assembly and on the allocation of most portfolios in a transitional government. However, it was not until March 7, 1994, that a restructured Council of State with Kpomakpor as chair was formally installed. Following intense bargaining over the distribution of portfolios, the formation was announced of a full Liberian National Transitional Government (LNTG), which first met on May 16. The transitional period was officially dated from the launching of the Council of State, with a six-month mandate to expire on September 7.

On August 4, 1994, NPFL leader Taylor declared that the transitional administration would have no “legal tenure” after September 7, when multiparty elections had been scheduled to take place. He also demanded a cabinet reshuffle, claiming that several key ministers no longer represented the NPFL, having recently been expelled from the organization for criticizing his leadership.

On September 7, 1994, Taylor joined AFL leader Bowen and Lt. Gen. Alhaji G. V. KROMAH, the leader of Ulimo’s Mandingo-based Muslim faction (Ulimo-M), in a meeting on Lake Volta near Akosombo with Ghana president Jerry Rawlings and representatives of Ecomog, the OAU, and the UN secretary general. Five days later, an agreement was signed calling for an immediate end to hostilities; continuance until October 10, 1995, of the transitional government, headed by a new five-member Council of State; and the holding of presidential and legislative elections within a year. During the Akosombo meeting, however, the NPFL dissenters, led by Woewiyu, overran the NPFL headquarters in Gbarnga, forcing Taylor to seek refuge in Côte d’Ivoire.

On September 15, 1994, a rogue AFL group led by Charles JULUE, a former army general under President Doe, launched a predawn raid on the executive mansion in Monrovia. However, the attempted coup was of short duration, Ecomog forces recovering the complex within 24 hours and rescuing Julue from a pummeling by enraged civilians as he attempted to flee the capital.

In October 1994 both UNOMIL and Ecomog forces were substantially reduced as prospects for an end to the lengthy Liberian conflict receded, and on November 6 the Ghanaian and Nigerian governments (the largest contributors to Ecomog) convened a “last ditch” meeting in Accra that included, in addition to the signatories of the Akosombo accord, Gen. Roosevelt JOHNSON, leader of Ulimo’s Christian-oriented Krahn faction (Ulimo-K); Dr. George E. S. BOLEY, head of the Krahn-based Liberian Peace Council (LPC); François MAS-SAQUOI, commander of the Lofa Defense Force (LDF); and Woewiyu, representing the NPFL dissidents. However, the meeting adjourned on November 29 with no agreement on the membership of a reconstituted Council of State.

Despite the failure of the November 1994 talks, follow-up discussions were launched in Accra in December, with the major warring groups (the NPFL, Ulimo-K, Ulimo-M, AFL, LNC, LDF, and the Woewiyu dissidents [now styled the Central Revolutionary Council–NPFL]) participating. On December 22 agreement was reached on a cessation of hostilities as of December 28 and on a Council of State to include one representative each from the NPFL, Ulimo, the AFL, and the LNC, with a fifth member to be selected by the NPFL and Ulimo from traditional chiefs. It was further agreed that the Council of State would give way to an elected government on January 1, 1996, after multiparty elections on November 1, 1995.

On January 25, 1995, the warring groups agreed to expand the Council of State from five to six members, but they continued to disagree as to its composition and adjourned the talks indefinitely on January 31. Subsequently, on February 6, Ghanaian mediators rejected a Taylor proposal for another five-man council to be chaired by an elderly traditional chief, Tamba TAYLOR (no relation to the NPFL leader), with Charles Taylor as first vice chair, Ulimo-M’s Kromah as second vice chair, and the AFL’s Bowen as third vice chair. It was not until August 19 that agreement on the makeup of the new council was reached and a seemingly conclusive cease-fire declared. The six members inaugurated in Monrovia on September 1 included Charles Taylor, G. V. Kromah, and Dr. George E. S. Boley, in addition to three civilians: Chief Tamba Taylor, Oscar QUIAH, and Wilton S. SANKAWULO, a former university professor and newspaper columnist, who was named council chair.

On September 3, 1995, the Council of State announced the formation of a new Transitional Government. Twelve days later the UN Security Council voted unanimously to extend UNOMIL’s mandate to January 31, 1996, and in October Ecomog responded positively to an appeal from its chair, President Rawlings of Ghana, for a fourfold increase in its troop level to oversee disarmament and demobilization of the various warring factions.

On April 6, 1996, renewed fighting broke out throughout Monrovia, sparked by the attempted arrest of Ulimo-K leader Johnson by NPFL and Ulimo-M fighters. Although Johnson’s headquarters were easily taken, he escaped capture, and his forces and Krahn defectors from other factions took up arms throughout the city. By April 9 Johnson and his fighters, with several hundred hostages in tow, had been forced to retreat to their Monrovia barracks; however, “systematic” looting continued amid anarchic conditions in the capital.

On April 10, 1996, with extremely intense fighting reported around the U.S. embassy (where thousands of Liberian civilians and foreigners were reported to have sought refuge), the United States ordered the deployment of a warship to the Liberian coast to support an evacuation effort begun the previous day. On the same day the warring faction leaders agreed to a cease-fire; however, it was immediately abandoned after Johnson refused to surrender to Ecomog forces. On April 16, 1996, anti-Johnson militiamen laid siege to his base. Three days later a second cease-fire was announced, and on April 21 the Ulimo-K released the majority of its hostages. Furthermore, Ecomog commanders reported that they had secured the perimeter of Monrovia in an effort to stanch the flow of arms and fighters. Nevertheless, intense fighting reportedly continued.

An ECOWAS summit scheduled for May 8, 1996, in Ghana was canceled after a number of member states and faction leaders refused to attend; for his part, Charles Taylor claimed he and his “government” troops were needed in Monrovia to maintain order. Citing frustration with the “intransigence” of the warring faction leaders, Ghanaian President Rawlings threatened to withdraw Ecomog troops if peace negotiations were not promptly launched.

At ECOWAS’s annual summit on July 27–28, 1996, its members pledged to organize Liberian elections within nine months. With fighting reported to have subsided, ECOWAS representatives and all of the faction leaders met in mid-August in Abuja, Nigeria, where they agreed to a revised version of the 1995 Abuja accord. The faction leaders also unanimously elected Ruth PERRY, a senator during the Doe era, to replace Sankawulo as Council of State chair. The cease-fire agreement was highlighted by a schedule for disarmament and demobilization (from November 22, 1996, to January 31, 1997), dissolution of the factions (January 31, 1997), presidential and legislative elections (May 31, 1997), and the inauguration of a new government (on June 15). On August 31 the UNOMIL mandate was extended, and on September 3 Perry was inaugurated, thus becoming the first-ever female African head of state.

Adding muscle to the August 1996 accord, ECOWAS threatened to impose sanctions on “any person or group obstructing the implementation” of the cease-fire agreement. Meanwhile, the United States pledged to finance the anticipated expansion of Ecomog troop strength. Subsequently, amid reports of mass starvation in those areas already cleared of fighters, Ecomog troops began deploying weeks ahead of the scheduled November start of the disarmament process. An assassination attempt against Charles Taylor at the presidential palace on October 31 resulted in suspension of Council of State activities and underscored the fragility of the cease-fire. Nevertheless, registration of political parties continued through the end of the year in preparation for the general elections scheduled for May 1997.

In mid-January 1997 the Council of State reconvened for the first time since the attempt on Taylor’s life. Meanwhile, Ecomog’s Nigerian leadership increased pressure on the former combatants to turn in their arms. Consequently, the disarmament campaign, which had theretofore elicited only a trickle of returns, accelerated to near conclusion by the end of the month, and, in accordance with the peace accord, on February 1 all the armed factions were declared officially dissolved. In mid-February presidential and legislative balloting was scheduled for May 30, and a seven-member electoral commission was established. Two weeks later, Taylor, Kromah, and Boley resigned from the Council of State to begin preparations for the presidential election. In early March, Perry appointed former information minister Henry ANDREWS as president of the electoral commission, and on April 2 the commission was officially sworn in. Meanwhile, former UN official and international banker Ellen JOHNSON-SIRLEAF emerged as Taylor’s primary competition for the presidency in the wake of the splintering of an anti-Taylor coalition, the Alliance of Seven Parties (see Political Parties and Groups, below). In addition, 11 others registered as presidential candidates, and at least 13 parties announced their intention to compete for legislative posts. In mid-May the balloting was postponed to July.

In presidential and legislative balloting on July 19, 1997, Taylor and the restyled National Patriotic Party (NPP) overwhelmed their opponents, with Taylor and his vice presidential running mate, Enoch DOGOLEA, capturing approximately 70 percent of the votes and the NPP securing majorities in both the House of Representatives and the Senate. Although some analysts had forecast a tight race between Taylor and Johnson-Sirleaf, Taylor’s well-financed campaign, his veiled threats to recommence fighting if he were to lose the elections, and his election-eve apology for his role in the civil war proved too much for Johnson-Sirleaf. She received just 9 percent of the vote, and the UP was also a distant second at legislative polling. International observers described the balloting as generally fair. However, a number of domestic critics characterized the balloting as irreparably tainted by irregularities. On August 2 Taylor and Doglea were inaugurated, and by mid-month Taylor had finished appointing a predominantly NPP cabinet.

Fighting intensified in 2002 between government forces and the Liberians United for Reconciliation and Democracy (LURD) and the Movement for Democracy in Liberia (MODEL). As the rebels reached Monrovia in June 2003, peace negotiations between the warring factions were launched in Accra, Ghana. On June 17 the Accra Accord was signed, calling for withdrawal of the rebels to the north of Monrovia, deployment of an international peacekeeping force, and the resignation of Taylor in favor of a transitional government. Within days, however, Taylor reneged on his pledge to resign, and the rebels again advanced on Monrovia.

Near the end of July 2003 ECOWAS authorized the deployment of peacekeeping forces under the banner of the ECOWAS Mission in Liberia (ECOMIL). Some 3,250 ECOMIL troops (mainly from Nigeria) were dispatched to Monrovia in early August. Under intense international pressure, Taylor finally resigned on August 11 and left Liberia for Nigeria. Vice President Moses Zeh BLAH assumed presidential authority on an acting basis, and he quickly negotiated (on August 18) a new cease-fire and a so-called Comprehensive Peace Agreement with the rebels. In accordance with the peace plan, a national transitional government was installed on October 14, with Charles Gyude BRYANT of the Liberia Action Party (LAP) as chair. His cabinet comprised members of the pro-Taylor Government of Liberia (GOL), the LURD, the MODEL, and representatives of civic organizations. At the same time, a 76-member National Transitional Legislative Assembly (NTLA) was installed for a two-year period pending new legislative and presidential elections.

In the first round of presidential balloting on October 11, 2005, George WEAH (a former soccer star) of the Congress for Democratic Change (CDC) led 22 candidates with 28.3 percent of the vote. Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf of the Unity Party (UP) finished second with 19.8 percent. However,

Johnson-Sirleaf handily won the runoff balloting on November 8 with 59.4 percent of the vote. Meanwhile, in the October 11 balloting for the House of Representatives, the CDC led all parties with 15 seats. Since her party did not command a legislative majority, Johnson-Sirleaf (the first democratically elected female leader of a national government in Africa) formed a cabinet that included independents and members of several small parties.

Constitution and Government

The former Liberian constitution, adopted July 26, 1847, was modeled, save in the matter of federalism, after that of the United States. Executive authority was vested in the president, who was limited by a 1975 amendment to a single eight-year term, excluding time spent completing the unexpired term of a predecessor. The bicameral Congress consisted of an 18-member Senate and a 65-member House of Representatives.

The constitution approved in July 1984, with effect from President Doe's inaugural in January 1986, did not differ significantly from its predecessor. Rather than being elected for eight years, the president was restricted to a maximum of two six-year terms, while the legislature was styled the National Assembly. The Senate was increased to 26 members and the house reduced to 64. Suffrage was extended to all adults. The 1984 law also provided for relatively simple registration of political parties, with prohibitions against those considered dangerous to "the free and democratic society of Liberia." Administratively, the country was divided into 9 counties and 5 territories, with lesser units encompassing 30 cities and 145 townships. The number of counties has subsequently increased to 15.

Some of the provisions of the 1984 constitution were superseded by the Comprehensive Peace Agreement of 2003 and the Electoral Reform Act of 2004, which, among other things, established guidelines for elections to a new Senate and House of Representatives (see Legislature, below) and for new presidential/vice presidential balloting.

Foreign Relations

Many of the guiding principles of the OAU originated with President Tubman, who held a prominent position among moderate African leaders dedicated to peaceful change and non-interference in the internal affairs of other countries. President Tolbert was similarly respected in international forums, with the result that the April 1980 coup and his assassination were widely condemned.

Liberia's traditional friendship with the United States was reflected both in the extent of U.S. private investment and in the existence of a bilateral defense agreement. Despite initial U.S. criticism of the PRC takeover in 1980, neither proved to be seriously threatened. The Doe government's essentially pro-Western posture was reflected in its cool treatment of the Libyan and Soviet ambassadors (the latter being expelled in October 1983 for alleged involvement in an antigovernment conspiracy), while in July 1985 relations with Moscow were severed for "gross interference" stemming from links between student activists and the Soviet embassy in Monrovia. In May 1987, on the other hand, the embassy was permitted to reopen in the context of an overture to the eastern bloc, while in mid-1989 Doe renewed ties with former close confidant Muammar Qadhafi of Libya.

The core group of rebels led by Charles Taylor in early 1990 was reported to have been given commando training in Burkina Faso and Libya, while the initial point of entry into Nimba appeared to have been from neighboring Côte d'Ivoire. Although the United States maintained formal neutrality in the conflict, it appeared somewhat embarrassed by its support of the Doe regime and suspended trade concessions to Liberia in early May. Concurrently, the United States dispatched a naval flotilla to the region to evacuate American citizens wishing to leave. In March 1991, despite a continued display of reluctance to become involved in Liberian internal affairs, the United States was reported to have worked behind the scenes to persuade the NPFL's Taylor to participate in the roundtable discussions that yielded the abortive cease-fire of May 1991 and the equally abortive peace agreement of the following October.

In mid-1998 Liberia accused Guinea of attempting to destabilize Liberia through its role in Ecomog. Monrovia's diplomatic offensive against Guinean officials (who denied the charges) coincided with a heightening of tension between the Taylor administration and the Ghanaian and Nigerian governments over Monrovia's alleged support of rebels who were fighting the ECOWAS-backed government of Sierra Leone. In early 1999 the United States declared that it had uncovered evidence of Liberia's support for the rebels, and shortly thereafter Nigeria withdrew its remaining troops from Liberia, asserting that it could no longer maintain a mission there while Monrovia supported attacks against Nigerian troops in Freetown.

An armed incursion from Guinea into northwestern Liberia was reported in April 1999, prompting a state of emergency in Lofa County. Under ECOWAS mediation, a tripartite commission was formed to attempt to reduce friction in the diamond-rich areas at the conjunction of the borders of Liberia, Guinea, and Sierra Leone. Consequently, a degree of stability ensued, permitting the final Ecomog contingents to leave Liberia in October and the borders to be reopened with Sierra Leone (in October) and Guinea (in February 2000). However, major fighting erupted in mid-2000 along the border with Guinea, the Liberian government accusing the Guinean government of supporting anti-Taylor elements that had loosely coalesced as the LURD. Skirmishes continued into 2001, exacerbating already extensive refugee problems. Among other things, Liberian refugees in Guinea claimed they were being mistreated by the Guinean military, which in turn argued that the refugees were helping Guinean rebels (see article on Guinea for additional information). Meanwhile, President Taylor faced growing international pressure for his apparent continued support of the Revolutionary United Front (RUF) in Sierra Leone. The complicated subregional conflict pitted the militaries of Guinea and Sierra Leone, Liberian rebels, and certain tribal groups (notably the Kamajors) from Sierra Leone on one side against the Liberian army and rebel groups from Guinea and Sierra Leone on the other. Much of the fighting involved control of rich mining areas, diamond production permitting various factions to buy armaments for their military campaigns.

In May 2001 the United Nations imposed an embargo on Liberian trade in diamonds and arms and barred senior Liberian officials from international travel as a means of encouraging Taylor's disengagement from the civil war in Sierra Leone. Combined with other pressure (including the suspension of EU development aid), the UN initiative appeared to have the desired effect in contributing to a tentative resolution of the situation in Sierra Leone (see article on Sierra Leone for details). However, fighting between the LURD and Liberian government continued into 2002, relations between Guinea and Liberia remaining tense until a somewhat surprising meeting in late February of the presidents of Liberia, Guinea, and Sierra Leone at which agreement was reached on enhanced border security, repatriation of refugees, and reactivation of the Mano River Union.

The intensification of the civil war in Liberia in late 2002 and early 2003 exacerbated tensions with regional powers as well as with the broader international community. Ghana, Nigeria, and Sierra Leone attempted to mediate a cease-fire as rebel forces moved on Monrovia. For their part many Western capitals urged President Taylor to resign. (Relations with the United States had deteriorated in late 2002 when evidence allegedly emerged that al-Qaida financiers may have been profiting from the Liberian diamond-smuggling trade.)

The UN endorsed the ECOWAS peacekeeping force in early August 2003, but by September ECOMIL had been superseded by a new UN force of 11,500 called the UN Mission in Liberia (UNMIL). Meanwhile, the United States pressed Nigeria to turn Taylor over to the UN for possible prosecution on charges related to his alleged activities in Sierra Leone.

In September 2005 Charles Bryant, the chair of Liberia's transitional government, attended a UN summit in New York where he deposited some 103 international treaties and agreements, part of a "backlog" that had accumulated over the past decade while Liberia had been a dysfunctional state.

The United States supported the continuing efforts to demobilize the militia groups in Liberia in 2005–2006, pledging some $200 million for the effort and providing American military advisors to help train a new security force. President Johnson-Sirleaf continued to press for expanded U.S. aid in 2006, meeting with President George W. Bush in March.

In November 2005, the UN expanded the mandate of UNMIL to include the capture of Charles Taylor and his transfer to the UN Special Court for Sierra Leone. In December 2005 the UN renewed sanctions that prohibited travel for some 60 Liberians who were suspected of involvement in the conflict in Sierra Leone.

After a lengthy campaign by a range of international bodies, on March 25, 2006, the Nigerian government announced that it would honor a request to extradite Taylor to stand trial before the UN Special Court for Sierra Leone. Taylor briefly escaped on March 28, but he was recaptured the following day. He was transferred to Monrovia, and then to the Special Court in Freetown, Sierra Leone. Johnson-Sirleaf subsequently requested that Taylor be transferred to The Hague to stand trial so that his presence in Sierra Leone did not destabilize the region.

Current Issues

In 1998 President Taylor wielded an increasingly heavy hand in response to domestic criticism, shutting down opposition media outlets, purging dissenters from the government, and, according to critics, covertly supporting violent attacks on opposition foes. In mid-September dozens of people were reportedly killed in Monrovia when presidential forces attempted to arrest Gen. Roosevelt Johnson, who had refused to release his grip on a section of the capital and was suspected of plotting to overthrow the government. During the fighting, Johnson and his entourage fled to the U.S. embassy, where they were allowed to enter only after Taylor's forces attacked and killed two of Johnson's associates and wounded two U.S. personnel. The following day, Johnson, Lt. Gen. Alhaji KROMAH of the All-Liberia Coalition Party (ALCOP), and approximately 20 others were charged with treason. Subsequently, Johnson and Kromah escaped from the country (the former by U.S. helicopter), and neither of the two men, nor half of their codefendants, appeared at the opening of their trial in November. (In April 1999, 13 of the "coup plotters" were sentenced to ten years in prison.)

At a July 1999 weapons-destruction ceremony, President Taylor declared the end of a "dark chapter" in Liberian history. (More than 200,000 people had died in the civil war.) It soon became clear, however, that many of Taylor's opponents had not given up their fight, as evidenced by LURD guerrilla activity in the northwest (see Foreign relations, above, and Political Parties and Groups, below). In August 2000 the administration charged a number of opposition figures (many in exile) with treason in connection with ongoing "dissident" activities. However, facing heavy international pressure for both his domestic policies and his involvement in regional conflicts, Taylor amnestied many of his opponents and urged them to return to Liberia to assume a role in the political process. Although the fragile peace in Sierra Leone offered some respite for Taylor and other participants in the interlocking regional disputes, the LURD offensive continued into early 2002. Opposition leaders also accused the administration in the first half of 2002 of increasingly repressive (and sometimes violent) measures against dissident voices in the media and elsewhere. In addition, international human rights activists charged Liberian security forces with numerous violations that were seen as contributing to a deteriorating political climate. Meanwhile, in May the UN extended its embargo on the purchase of diamonds from Liberia for 12 months in light of the intensified LURD/government fighting.

In January 2003 the government announced that new presidential and legislative elections would be held in October. However, rebel fighters launched an offensive in February that neared Monrovia in April, causing a mass exodus from the capital and making it clear that normal political activity was an impossibility without a cease-fire. Complicating matters for President Taylor was an indictment from the UN-sponsored court in Sierra Leone charging him with 17 counts of crimes against humanity in connection with his alleged role in that nation's recently resolved conflict. A warrant for Taylor's arrest on those charges remained outstanding even after he resigned the presidency in August and went into exile in Nigeria as part of the comprehensive cease-fire and agreement for installation of a new transitional government. For his part, Charles Gyude Bryant, the chair of the transitional government, dedicated his administration to the task of bringing Liberia "back from the brink of self-destruction." Priorities included the disarmament (with help from the UNMIL) of the former warring factions and assistance for some 300,000 internal or external refugees (as of November 2004). Sporadic clashes between Muslims and Christians in several areas of the country also contributed to the government's difficulties.

In April 2005 the transitional government signed a secretive deal with the West African Mining Corporation (Wamco). The agreement granted Wamco an exclusive contract to purchase all minerals in the western regions of Liberia, except in cases where prior contracts existed. In exchange, Wamco pledged to provide $2 million over two years to create local cooperatives and to pay the government $1 million directly. The agreement was heavily criticized by the UN and international financial organizations. For many in Liberia, the emergence of the details of the deal, combined with revelations of other alleged financial improprieties, tainted the tenure of the transitional government.

More than 20 candidates contested the first round of presidential balloting in October 2005. The subsequent runoff pitted George Weah, a former soccer star who ran a populist campaign and enjoyed the support of some elements of the former Taylor regime, against Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf, a long-standing member of the anti-Taylor opposition and a former World Bank official who was championed as the candidate who could best restore Liberia's international ties and garner much-needed foreign reconstruction aid. Weah initially alleged fraud surrounding his loss in the second round, although EU and ECOWAS observers described the balloting as generally free and fair and the national election commission dismissed Weah's complaints. Liberian security forces and UN peacekeepers used tear gas and riot batons to disperse protest demonstrations by Weah's supporters shortly after the balloting. Even more violent demonstrations broke out in December after Weah delivered a speech that was highly critical of the elections and Johnson-Sirleaf. However, in order to defuse the situation, Weah later in the month announced he had accepted his defeat and urged his supporters to do likewise.

On January 16, 2006, Edwin Melvin SNOWE was elected speaker of the house, defeating UP candidate Dusty WOLOKOLLIE on a vote of 48 to 13. Snowe, a son-in-law of former president Taylor, was under a UN travel ban and was widely associated with the previous regime.

Despite ongoing political tension throughout the country and the diversity of the new legislature, lawmakers in early 2006 appeared ready to work with the Johnson-Sirleaf administration. All of the new president's cabinet appointments were approved by March, as were most of her initial legislative proposals. The international community also responded positively to the completion of the elections (see The Country, above). Meanwhile, in late June former president Taylor was transferred to The Hague, Netherlands, to face trial by a temporarily moved session of the UN Special Court for Sierre Leone on charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity.

Political Parties and Groups

For more than a century prior to the 1980 coup, an Americo-Liberian elite had dominated Liberia's politics through the True Whig Party (TWP), most of whose leaders were subsequently assassinated or executed.

Upon the PRC's assumption of power in 1980, political party activity was suspended, a ban that was extended in December 1982 to any individual or group "caught making unfavorable speeches and pronouncements against the government."

The ban was repealed in July 1984, although only the National Democratic Party of Liberia (NDPL), Liberia Liberal Party (LLP), Liberia Action Party (LAP), and Liberia Unification Party (LUP) were permitted to contest the election of October 15, 1985.

In anticipation of presidential and legislative elections, the Alliance of Seven Parties was formed in February 1997 by the LAP, LUP, NDPL, TWP, the Liberian People's Party (LPP), the Unity Party (UP), and the United People's Party (UPP). On March 24 the alliance held intraparty primary elections to choose a presidential candidate for the upcoming elections; however, the victory of the LAP's Cletus Wotorson was immediately challenged, and both the UPP and LPP withdrew from the coalition, claiming that the LAP had engaged in fraud and "vote buying." With the alliance in disarray, the LPP, LUP, and TWP announced in June that they had switched their allegiance to UP presidential candidate Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf (although the LPP ultimately fielded its own candidate). Likewise, a coalition of the three most prominent Krahn parties—the Liberia Peace Council (LPC), the NDPL, and the Krahn faction of the United Liberation Movement of Liberia for Democracy (Ulimo)—proved unable to reach agreement on campaign tactics and splintered.

One manifestation of efforts to forge an anti-Taylor alliance was the Collaborating Political Parties (CPP), whose members included the All-Liberian Coalition Party, the Free Democratic Party, the LAP, the Liberian National Union, the LPP, the NDPL, the People's Democratic Party of Liberia, the Progressive People's Party, the Reformation Alliance Party, the TWP, UP, and UPP.

Prior to the October 2005 elections, 22 parties and groupings registered to contest the legislative and presidential elections.

Legislative Parties

Congress for Democratic Change (CDC). Formed in 2005 and led by former soccer star George Weah, the CDC is a populist party with broad appeal among Liberia's poor. Following the 2005 legislative balloting, the CDC became the largest party in the house with 15 seats. It gained 3 seats in the Senate. The party splintered in March 2006 when Samuel TWEAH Jr., the chair of the American branch of the party, resigned along with other leading CDC figures, citing financial irregularities and a dispute over whom the party should have supported for speaker of the house.

Leaders: George WEAH (Party President and 2005 presidential candidate), Lenn Eugene NAGBE (Secretary General), Acarous GRAY (Assistant Secretary General).

Liberty Party (LP). Formed in 2005, the LP is led by Charles Brumskine, who placed third in the October presidential polling with 13.9 percent of the vote. The LP secured 9 seats in the 2005 house elections, making it the second largest party in the chamber. It gained 3 seats in the Senate. At a party congress in February 2006, Brumskine announced that he would not stand as the party's presidential candidate in the 2011 elections, and a new slate of party leaders was elected, including a new national chair, Israel Akinsanya.

Leaders: Charles BRUMSKINE (Party President and 2005 presidential candidate), Israel AKINSANYA (Chair).

Coalition for the Transformation of Liberia (COTOL). Formed in July 2005 as an electoral coalition by the four parties below in preparation for the October presidential and legislative balloting, the COTOL chose the LAP's Varney G. Sherman as its presidential candidate. The COTOL became the largest Senate grouping with 7 seats and also won 8 seats in the house. Sherman placed fifth in the presidential election with 7.8 percent of the vote. Most of the COTOL components supported George Weah in the presidential runoff.

Leaders: Isaac F. MANNEH (Chair), Napoleon TOQUE (Vice Chair), Varney G. SHERMAN (2005 presidential candidate).

Liberia Action Party (LAP). The LAP was organized by Tuan WREH, a former supporter and political confidant of General Doe, who was subsequently joined by a number of Tolbert-era officials, including ex-finance minister Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf. In 1985 the LAP emerged as the NDPL's primary challenger following disqualification of the UPP (below), winning two Senate and eight house seats. It decided, however, to boycott legislative proceedings because of the detention of Johnson-Sirleaf and other party leaders for their alleged role in the 1985 coup attempt. In early 1986 Wreh and another LAP member were expelled from the party for agreeing to take their seats in defiance of the boycott. Johnson-Sirleaf, though pardoned in May 1986, fled to the United States claiming her life was in danger after her rearrest in July.

The subsequent naming of an LAP member, David FARHAT, to Doe's cabinet failed to abate the party's antigovernment criticism. The group derided the arrival of U.S. financial experts in early 1988 as a "disgrace to Africa, and Liberia in particular" and in September joined with the Unity Party (UP, above) in condemning the government's banning of student politics. In mid-1989 the leaders of the LAP, UP, and United People's Party (UPP, below) issued a joint communiqué calling on Doe to enact economic and political reforms and return to the tenets of the 1984 constitution. The government responded by dismissing Farhat from his position as finance minister, despite his being credited with increasing budgetary restraint and the repayment of U.S. loans. The LAP's Jackson F. DOE (no relation to the former chief executive) was widely believed to have been the actual winner of the 1985 presidential contest; he was reported in 1990 to have been executed by order of rebel leader Charles Taylor.

At a meeting of the Alliance of Seven Parties in March 1997, the LAP's presidential candidate, Cletus Wotorson, was chosen as the coalition's standard-bearer. However, charges that the primary had been rigged in his favor led to the splintering of the Alliance and prompted the LAP's most prominent member, Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf, to defect to the UP.

In 2003 LAP Chair Charles Gyude BRYANT was chosen as chair of the new transitional government, although he subsequently suspended his party activity to avoid the appearance of favoritism.

Leaders: Varney G. SHERMAN (Chair), Cletus WOTORSON (1997 presidential candidate).

Liberia Unification Party (LUP). Organized in 1984 by William Gabriel KPOLLEH, former president of the Monrovia Public School Teachers' Association, the LUP was initially viewed as a potential "Trojan horse" by the NDPL. Kpolleh surprised many observers by backing the LAP-led legislative boycott, with all four of the party's assembly members refusing to take their seats. In March 1988 the party's leader and deputy leader were arrested on charges of plotting to overthrow the government and were given ten-year prison sentences the following October. Kpolleh was released in 1991 and was later assassinated, although the LUP remained active.

Leaders: Isaac F. MANNEH (Chair).

True Whig Party (TWP). Founded in 1868 and Liberia's ruling party until banned in the wake of the 1980 coup, the TWP was revived in 1991. Many members of the TWP defected to either the CDC or the UP prior to the 2005 elections.

Leaders: Peter VUKU (Chair), Othello R. MASON (Secretary General).

People's Democratic Party of Liberia (PDPL). The PDPL was represented by George Toe WASHINGTON in the 1997 presidential balloting. The PDPL broke with the other parties in COTOL and supported Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf in the 2005 presidential runoff.

Leaders: Napoleon TOQUE (Chair), G. Narison TOULEE (Secretary General).

Unity Party (UP). The UP was formed by Dr. Edward B. Kesselly, who had served as local government minister in the Tolbert administration and subsequently chaired the PRC's Constituent Advisory Assembly. The party elected one senator and two representatives in the 1985 balloting. In November 1988 Kesselly claimed that the government was attempting to "frame" him in an effort to squench his anticorruption protests. (Kesselly died in 1993.)

In April 1997 former finance minister and UN official Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf defected from the LAP, below, and joined the UP to campaign for the presidency. The addition of Johnson-Sirleaf gave the UP newfound prominence and, subsequently, the backing of the TWP, LUP, and a number of LPP members. Despite early polling showing her with a higher popularity rating than Taylor, Johnson-Sirleaf and the UP's poorly financed efforts were ultimately no match for the NPP.

In late 1998 the UP pledged to continue participating in the electoral process if the government would guarantee the security of its candidates. In August 2000 the government issued an arrest warrant for Johnson-Sirleaf for her alleged role in the dissident activities in Lofa County. However, she was granted amnesty in July 2001 and returned to Monrovia in September.

Johnson-Sirleaf was one of the candidates to lead the NTLA in 2003 but failed to gain sufficient support. After she was chosen as the UP's 2005 presidential candidate, a number of prominent members of other parties reportedly defected to the UP in solidarity with her. In July, the newly-formed Liberia First Group signed an accord with the UP to support the UP and Johnson-Sirleaf in the elections. Johnson-Sirleaf won the presidency in the second round of balloting in November 2005, while the UP gained eight seats in the house and four in the Senate in the legislative elections.

Leaders: Charles CLARKE (Chair), Ellen JOHNSON-SIRLEAF (President of the Republic), Joseph BOAKAI (Vice President of the Republic), Walter WISNER (Secretary General).

Alliance for Peace and Democracy (APD). Formed as a coalition in advance of the October 2005 elections by the two parties below, the APD chose the LPP's Togba-Nah Tipoteh as its presidential candidate. He placed ninth in the first round of balloting with 2.3 percent of the vote. The APD secured five seats in the house and three seats in the Senate.

Leader: Marcus DAHN (Chair).

Liberian People's Party (LPP). The LPP was organized by former members of the Movement for Justice in Africa (Moja), whose leader, Togba-Nah Tipoteh, had been dismissed from the cabinet for alleged complicity in a counter-coup attempt in August 1981. Moja was a Left-nationalist, Pan-Africanist formation organized in 1973 and banned in 1981, at which time Tipoteh went into exile. LPP leader Amos SAWYER, former chair of the PRC's national constitutional commission, was also charged with plotting against the regime in August 1984, although the allegation was widely interpreted as an attempt by General Doe to discredit a leading rival for the presidency in 1985. Reportedly in retaliation for his subsequent unwillingness to accept an offer to campaign as General Doe's running mate, an audit was initiated in early 1985 of Sawyer's finances as constitutional commission chair, thus permitting the electoral commission to deny registration to the LPP. In 1988 Sawyer testified against the Doe regime before a U.S. congressional committee considering revocation of Liberia's preferential trade status. In November 1990 he was named to head the ECOWAS-supported caretaker government, thereby reportedly earning the disapproval of some LPP stalwarts. Meanwhile, Tipoteh, an avowed supporter of Prince Johnson, returned to Monrovia in mid-1991 to preside over Moja's re-launching as a paramilitary formation styled the Black Berets/Moja, which was later disbanded.

The LPP was significantly fractionalized in regard to the 1997 presidential elections, partly due to the competing presidential ambitions of Sawyer, Tipoteh, and George Klay KIEH, Jr., another LPP founder. The party initially intended to back a joint opposition candidate forwarded by the Alliance of Seven Parties (see above). However, following the Alliance's nomination of Cletus Wotorson, Tipoteh declared that the Alliance's primary had been fraudulent and announced the withdrawal of the LPP from the grouping. Tipoteh then served as the LPP standard-bearer in the presidential balloting, although Sawyer, former LPP chair Dusty Wolokollie, and other prominent LPP members supported various other candidates. Sawyer, Wolokollie, and others were subsequently expelled from the LPP. Meanwhile, Edwin Dennis-Weah, a prominent attorney, was selected by the LPP's national committee to succeed James Logan as secretary general, Logan reportedly having become disillusioned with the political infighting. For his part, Kieh resigned from the LPP and subsequently formed a New Deal Movement (below) that included a number of other disgruntled former LPP members.

Tipoteh has served as the primary spokesman within Liberia since 1997 for the LPP (which also has an active branch in the United States), and as of mid-2002 was the only announced candidate for the LPP presidential nomination for 2003. Among other things, he objected to the government's imposition of a state of emergency in February 2002 and subsequent ban on certain public gatherings, arguing that the measures could mask inappropriate harassment by the administration of legitimate opposition voices. Tipoteh also denounced the national electoral commission as partisan in favor of the NPP, earning a growing reputation as one of the nation's leading anti-Taylor voices. Meanwhile, some LPP leaders (including Dennis-Weah and Chair John Karweaye) remained outside Liberia as of mid-2002, as did numerous leaders from other opposition parties concerned over what they perceived as a deteriorating security situation in Liberia and increasingly heavy-handed behavior by the administration and security forces.

Leaders: Togba-Nah TIPOTEH (1997 and 2005 presidential candidate), Richard S. PANTON.

United People's Party (UPP). A centrist outgrowth of the pre-coup People's Progressive Party and viewed as the most serious threat to the NDPL, the UPP was organized by former PPP leader Gabriel Baccus Matthews, who had been dismissed as foreign minister in November 1981 because of opposition to a pro-U.S. posture by the Doe regime and had left the government again in April 1983 after serving for a year as secretary general of the cabinet. Although meeting legal requirements for registration, the UPP was not permitted to participate in the 1985 balloting because of its leader's "socialist leanings" and unofficially supported Jackson Doe of the LAP in the presidential race. A number of leading officials quit the party because of the exiled Matthews's unwillingness to join an opposition coalition in March 1986, which induced the government to permit his return from the United States and rescind its proscription of the formation in late September. Although labeled a "loyal opposition," in May 1989 the party was accused of printing "propagandist statements" in its newsletter, UPP Times. As of September 2001 the UPP was active in efforts to form a loose anti-Taylor opposition alliance.

The UPP's Wesley Johnson was chosen as vice chair of the transitional government in 2003.

Leaders: Marcus DAHN (Chair), Wesley JOHNSON.

National Patriotic Party (NPP). Restyled the National Patriotic Party in 1997, the small rebel group launched by Charles Taylor in Liberia's northeastern region in 1989 was originally called the National Patriotic Front of Liberia (NPFL). The NPFL dissidents reportedly included a number of former Liberian soldiers who had fled abroad after the 1985 coup attempt. By April 1990 the rebels were posing a serious threat to the Doe regime and three months later were in control of much of Liberia's hinterland as well as of large sections of Monrovia. The NPFL was precluded from consolidating its control of the country by opposition from Prince Yormic Johnson's breakaway INPFL and the intervention of an ECOWAS force (Ecomog) in August. The NPFL succeeded in gaining control of most of Liberia, except for the capital, by mid-1992, although experiencing reverses thereafter.

Charles Taylor received an enthusiastic reception upon his arrival in Monrovia to take a seat on the Council of State in September 1995. However, it was Taylor's attempt to arrest Ulimo-K leader Roosevelt Johnson on murder charges that ignited the violence that exploded in the capital on April 6, 1996, and in May, Taylor's announced plans to boycott an ECOWAS peace summit led, in part, to its cancellation. On the other hand, in July, Taylor publicly apologized for his role in the outbreak of fighting, asserting that he had underestimated the risk of his actions. Furthermore, on September 30 Taylor pledged to comply with the disarmament provisions of the August peace accord and cooperate with international peacekeepers. Subsequently, on October 7 the NPFL leader announced the establishment of a presidential campaign vehicle, the National Committee for the Promotion of Charles Ghankay Taylor.

On October 31, 1996, Taylor reportedly narrowly escaped an assassination attempt at the presidential mansion that claimed the lives of three of his bodyguards. Taylor accused the leaders of the LPC and Ulimo-K of planning the attack, but both denied involvement.

In accordance with the 1996 peace pact, on January 31, 1997, the NPFL's military wing was officially dissolved. On February 1 the interim National Patriotic Association of Liberia (NAPAL) was formed and charged with overseeing the transformation of the NPFL's political wing, the National Patriotic Party, into a legal political party, and in April the NPP was officially registered. Charles Taylor and the NPP scored easy electoral victories in July 1997, and, following his inauguration in August, the new president named a government dominated by NPP stalwarts.

The NPP provided the main base of support for Taylor in the subsequent civil war, and Taylor's actions appeared to undercut popular support for the NPP. Following Taylor's departure from Liberia in August 2003, many NPP members reportedly continued to support him, and he reportedly remained in contact with them as of mid-2005. However, other NPP stalwarts disassociated themselves from Taylor and joined other parties. In the first round of the 2005 presidential balloting, the NPP's Roland Massaquoi placed sixth with 4.1 percent of the vote.

In the legislative elections, the NPP won four seats in the house and three seats in the Senate. Taylor's wife, Jewel HOWARD-TAYLOR, was elected to the Senate.

Taylor was extradited from Nigeria in March 2006 and placed in the custody of the UN's Special Court for Sierra Leone.

Leaders: Charles Chankay (Ghankay/Gankay) TAYLOR (Former President of the Republic, under UN arrest), Lawrence GEORGE (Acting Chair), Roland MASSAQUOI (2005 presidential candidate), John WHITFIELD (Secretary General).

New Deal Movement (NDM). The NDM was launched in 1999 by a number of former LPP members, including George Klay Kieh Jr., a professor who had found his goal of running for president of the republic blocked by senior LPP leaders. The NDM achieved formal party status in mid-2002. Kieh received 0.5 percent of the vote in the first round of presidential balloting in 2005. The NDM gained three seats in the 2005 house elections, but did not secure any Senate seats.

Leaders: George Klay KIEH Jr. (2005 presidential candidate).

All-Liberia Coalition Party (ALCOP). The ALCOP was formed in November 1996 by Ulimo-M leader Lt. Gen. Alhaji G. V. Kromah, who said that the new party would serve as a vehicle for ethnic Krahn and Mandingos. Although Kromah claimed to have completely disarmed his militants by the end of January 1997, a raid on his headquarters in February unearthed an arms cache, and he was briefly detained. Underlining reports that his coalition-building efforts had failed, Kromah and ALCOP legislative candidates fared poorly at balloting in July. Subsequently, Kromah called for new elections, claiming that the July polling had been severely marred by irregularities.

In September 1998 Kromah was indicted for allegedly plotting a coup against Charles Taylor. Subsequently, Kromah fled the country and ignored a summons to appear in court in November. In April 1999 former Ulimo-M members clashed with government forces in northern Liberia; however, the government's allegations that Kromah was behind the incursion from Guinea remained unconfirmed.

In August members of the hitherto unknown Joint Forces for the Liberation of Liberia (JFLL), a group reportedly formed by former Ulimo-M members, clashed with security forces and briefly kidnapped foreign aid workers. Kromah received 7.8 percent of the vote in the first round of the 2005 presidential polling. In the legislative elections, ALCOP secured two seats in the house and one in the Senate.

Leaders: David KORTIE (Chair), Lt. Gen. Alhaji G. V. KROMAH (1997 and 2005 presidential candidate).

National Democratic Party of Liberia (NDPL). Essentially a Krahn-based party, the NDPL was formed in August 1984 to support the policies and projected presidential candidacy of General Doe. Amid widespread opposition charges of fraud at the 1985 election, the NDPL, in addition to electing Doe, was awarded an overwhelming majority of seats in both houses of the National Assembly. President Doe was killed on September 11, 1990.

In early 1997 the NDPL, LPC, and Ulimo-K participated in the Alliance of Seven Parties under the NDPL's banner; however, following the Alliance's splintering, the Krahn ties also unraveled. Subsequently, former vice president Harry Moniba was the party's standard-bearer at presidential polling in July. Meanwhile, Moniba was also linked to a theretofore unknown formation, the Liberian National Union (LINU).

NDPL candidate Winston Tubman came in fourth in the first round of the 2005 presidential balloting with 9.2 percent of the vote. The NDPL secured one seat in the house and two seats in the Senate. Two posts in the subsequent Johnson-Sirleaf administration were given to members of the NDPL.

Leaders: Nyandeh SIGH (Chair), Harry MONIBA (1997 presidential candidate), Winston TUBMAN (2005 presidential candidate).

National Reformation Party (NRP). The NRP was formed by Martin Sheriff in 1996. In the 2005 presidential balloting, Bishop Alfred Reeves was the party's candidate and Sheriff was the vice presidential candidate. Reeves, a Christian prelate, and Sheriff, a leading Muslim, campaigned on a platform of religious harmony and a return to morality. Reeves received 0.3 percent of the vote in the first round of balloting, last among the 22 candidates. In the legislative elections, the NRP secured one seat in the house and one in the Senate. The NRP supported George Weah in the presidential runoff.

Leaders: Bishop Alfred REEVES (2005 presidential candidate), Martin SHERIFF (2005 vice presidential candidate and 1997 presidential candidate).

United Democratic Alliance (UDA). Formed prior to the 2005 elections as a coalition of the three small parties below, the UDA put forth John Morlu as its presidential candidate. Morlu ran a populist campaign that emphasized nonviolence and pledged to end corruption and improve social services. Morlu received 1.2 percent of the vote in the first round. The UDA won one seat in the 2005 legislative elections. The LINU and LEDP supported George Weah in the second round of the presidential poll.

Leaders: Aaron WESSEH (Chair), John MORLU (2005 presidential candidate).

Liberia National Union (LINU). The LINU was formed by former vice president of the republic and NDPL executive, Harry MONIBA, in 1996 as a party for the Lofan and Gbandi peoples. Moniba unsuccessfully contested the 1997 presidential elections as the LINU candidate. Moniba died in 2004. In May 2005, at a party congress, John Morlu was elected as the party's leader and candidate for the 2005 presidential elections. Morlu subsequently endeavored to broaden the appeal of the party outside of its traditional base.

Leader: John MORLU (Party Leader and 2005 presidential candidate), Aaron WESSEH (Chair), and Jerome GEORGE (Secretary General).

Liberia Education and Development Party (LEDP). The LEDP was formed in 2004 under the leadership of Rev. Hananiah Zoe. It is a Christian party that was initially created as a vehicle for Zoe's presidential bid in 2005. However, Zoe subsequently agreed to join the UDA and support John Morlu for the 2005 presidential election.

Leaders: Rev. Hananiah ZOE (2005 presidential candidate), and Benedict MATADI (Chair).

Reformation Alliance Party (RAP). Formed in 1996, the RAP unsuccessfully contested the 1997 presidential elections. In July 2005 Dr. H. Boima Fahnbulleh Jr., the RAP 1997 presidential candidate (and a former foreign minister) resigned from the party. The RAP split with the other UDA parties and endorsed Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf in the 2005 presidential runoff.

Leader: Losine N. SARYON.

Other Parties That Participated in the 2005 Elections

Liberia Equal Rights Party (LERP). At a party convention in August 2005, delegates elected Joseph Korto as the LERP candidate for the 2005 presidential election. Korto won 3.3 percent of the vote (seventh place) in the first round of balloting. The LERP supported Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf in the November presidential runoff.

Leader: Joseph KORTO (2005 presidential candidate).

Reformed United Liberia Party (RULP). The RULP was formed in 2005 by William "Shad" Tubman, the son of former president William Tubman. The younger Tubman received 1.6 percent of the vote in the first round of the subsequent presidential poll; the RULP failed to secure any seats in the legislative elections. The RULP supported Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf in the 2005 runoff election but subsequently charged that the UP failed to honor a pre-runoff agreement that would have provided a cabinet position for the RULP.

Leaders: William "Shad" TUBMAN (2005 presidential candidate), Peter S. MENYOU.

Progressive Democratic Party (Prodem). Formed in 2004, Prodem was initially composed mainly of former LURD members, including former LURD leader Sekou Conneh, who was chosen as the party's presidential candidate. Conneh received only 0.6 percent of the vote in the first round of the presidential election, and the party did not gain any seats in the legislative elections. Following the November presidential runoff, Conneh was prominent in efforts to convince George Weah's supporters to accept the decision of the election commission to declare Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf the victor.

Leaders: Sekou CONNEH (2005 presidential candidate), Amara KROMAK (Chair), Jackie C. DEVINE (Secretary General).

National Party of Liberia (NPL). Formed in 2005 by former senator Armah Jallah, the NPL appealed mainly to Liberians from the Lofa region. Jallah claimed that God had asked him to seek the presidency; he received 0.4 percent of the vote. Richard SAMKA (an NPL executive) and other members of the party defected to the UP just prior to the October 2005 elections. The NPL endorsed George Weah in the 2005 presidential runoff.

Leader: Armah JALLAH (Party Founder and 2005 presidential candidate).

Union of Liberian Democrats (ULD). Formed in 2005 by Dr. Robert Kpoto, the ULD is a mainly Lofan grouping. In September 2005 senior members of the ULD broke away to form a new party—the Progressive Independent Movement of the ULD (PIMULD). The PIMULD supported the COTOL and Varney Sherman in the October 2005 elections, and both the ULD and the PIMULD endorsed George Weah in the November runoff. (Kpoto had received just 0.4 percent of the vote in the first round of the presidential poll.)

Leaders: Dr. Robert KPOTO (Party Founder and 2005 presidential candidate), George J. TARN (Chair).

Other parties and groups that participated in the 2005 elections include the Free Democratic Party (FDP), formed in 1996 and led by Ciapha GBOLLIE, George BORWAH, and David FARHAT (2005 presidential candidate); the Freedom Alliance Party of Liberia (FAPL), led by Margaret THOMPSON (2005 presidential candidate); the Labor Party of Liberia (LPL) led by Joseph WOAHTEE (2005 presidential candidate); the Liberia Destiny Party (LDP), led by Nathaniel BARNES (2005 presidential candidate); the Liberia First Group (LFG), formed in 2005 and led by former LPP chair Dusty WOLOKOLLIE and LPP figure Commany WESSEH (the LFG supported the UP and Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf in the 2005 elections); and the National Vision Party (NATVIPOL), led by George M. KAIIDII, who was also the party's 2005 presidential candidate.

The Liberia National Alliance (LNA) consists of the Progressive People's Party (PPP) and the Independent Democratic Party (IDP). The LNA chose PPP leader Chea CHEAPOO as its 2005 presidential candidate.

Other Parties and Groupings

Liberians United for Reconciliation and Democracy (LURD). The LURD claimed responsibility for antigovernment guerrilla activity launched in northwestern Liberia in mid-1999. A number of former Ulimo fighters reportedly participated in the organization of the LURD, and, as had been the case with Ulimo, Krahn-Mandingo infighting was subsequently reported within the new grouping. The Liberian government accused the Guinean government of supplying arms to the LURD, which appeared to include several anti-Taylor factions left over from the Liberian civil war as well as anti-Taylor elements from the complicated conflict in Sierra Leone. The LURD subsequently became the largest anti-Taylor group in Liberia, its fighters ultimately pressuring Taylor to leave the country in August 2003 (see Political background, above, for details).

In January 2004, Aisha CONNEH (the daughter of the president of Guinea and the wife of Sekou Damate Conneh, who had been named chair of the LURD in 1999) reportedly attempted unsuccessfully to gain control of the LURD in cooperation with Chayee DOE (the younger brother of former Liberian president Samuel Doe). Chayee Doe was subsequently killed, while Sekou Conneh was reportedly suspended from the party. The LURD disbanded in late 2004, and many of its members reportedly joined the new Progressive Democratic Party, which chose Sekou Conneh as its 2005 presidential candidate.

Leaders: Lt. Gen. Charles JULU, Prince SEO, Sekou CONNEH, Gen. Joe WYLIE.

Liberia Peace Council (LPC). Organized in 1993, the LPC is a largely Krahn group that has engaged in numerous clashes with the NPFL in southeastern Liberia. In January 1996 the LPC was cited by observers as the only faction to have complied with the disarmament provisions of the August 1995 peace accord. However, such claims were subsequently undermined by reports of LPC–NPFL clashes, and in October LPC militants were accused of attempting to assassinate Charles Taylor.

In early 1997 the LPC participated in the Alliance of Seven Parties under the NDPL's banner. However, following the factionalization of the Alliance and breakup of the informal Krahn coalition, the LPC forwarded its chair, Dr. George BOLEY, as its presidential candidate. In early 1999 it was reported that Boley had fled the country in fear of attack by Taylor's security forces. The LPC subsequently disbanded, and many of its members, including Boley, reportedly joined the NDPL.

Movement for Democracy in Liberia (MODEL). Supported primarily by members of the Krahn ethnic group who had previously been core constituents of former president Samuel Doe, the MODEL was launched in 2001 and quickly emerged as a major anti-Taylor rebel force during the 2002–2003 civil war. MODEL leader Thomas Yaya NIMELY was named foreign minister under the peace agreement of August 2003. The MODEL disbanded in late 2004 under an agreement that also involved the LURD and pro-Taylor groups. Nimely chose not to form a political party, urging his supporters to join existing parties.

United Liberation Movement of Liberia for Democracy (Ulimo). Ulimo was initially a formation drawn primarily from the Krahn tribe of former president Doe. As such, it opposed the granting of concessions to the rebels by ECOWAS and Sawyer's interim government. By 1994 it had split into two factions: a Krahn-based Christian group, Ulimo-K, led by Gen. Roosevelt Johnson, and a Mandingo-based Muslim group, Ulimo-M, led by Lt. Gen. Alhaji G. V. Kromah. (The former is sometimes referenced as Ulimo-J and the latter confusingly [and incorrectly] as Ulimo-K.)

In early 1996 forces aligned with Johnson fought with Ecomog troops in Tubmanburg after the former refused to comply with the disarmament provisions of the 1995 peace accord. Subsequently, on March 11, 1996, the Ulimo-K's Executive Council and military commanders issued a joint statement announcing the dismissal of Johnson as party chair in favor of Brigadier Gen. William Karyee, citing Johnson's inability to forward the peace process as the reason for his ouster.

Krahn fighters from the AFL and LPC reportedly defected to the Ulimo-K during the fighting that ensued after militiamen loyal to the NPFL and Ulimo-M attempted to arrest Johnson on April 6, 1996. Thereafter, amid intense fighting in the capital, Johnson, who continued to be recognized as the faction's de facto leader, was flown to Ghana on May 3 by U.S. helicopters to attend an ECOWAS peace summit then scheduled for May 8.

Under pressure from international observers, on June 11, 1996, the Ulimo-K agreed to disarm, and in August a faction spokesman claimed that the group's militiamen had turned over their weapons to Ecomog troops. Moreover, in late September the two Ulimo factions reportedly agreed to a cessation of their mutual hostilities. However, in early October Ulimo-K fighters agreed to end their armed blockade of the highways leading to Tubmanburg and Cape Mount (where thousands of starving citizens were subsequently discovered) only under pressure from the Council of State and ECOWAS. Meanwhile, Ulimo-M leader Kromah announced his intention to compete in the May 1997 presidential elections as the candidate of the new ALCOP (below).

Johnson's efforts to form an electoral coalition with the LPC and NDPL failed in early 1997; subsequently, Ulimo-K candidates performed poorly at balloting in July. In August, Johnson was appointed minister of rural development; however, Johnson continued to criticize the Taylor administration, accusing the president in early 1998 of filling the military with former NPFL militiamen. In March, Johnson was the target of what he described as the third recent attempt on his life; concurrently, it was reported that Taylor had removed Johnson from the cabinet with the goal of naming him to an overseas post (ambassador to India). Thereafter, clashes between Ulimo-K militants and presidential forces were reported in neighborhoods controlled by Johnson, and in September an all-out attack by Taylor's troops forced Johnson and his family and close associates to seek refuge in the U.S. embassy, from where they were subsequently airlifted out of the country.

Many members of Ulimo were reportedly involved in the formation of the LURD in 1999. Subsequently, in 2004, Johnson died in exile in Nigeria. Most reports suggested that both Ulimo factions were defunct as of 2005.

Legislature

The National Assembly established by the 1984 constitution was a bicameral body consisting of a Senate and a House of Representatives, both elected by universal adult suffrage. Following the collapse of the Doe administration, the assembly was nominally superseded by interim bodies established by the Sawyer and Taylor regimes. Subsequently, in accordance with the 1993 Cotonou agreement, a 35-member Transitional Legislative Assembly (TLA) composed of representatives of the principal warring factions was inaugurated on March 7, 1994. On July 17, 1997, the TLA approved legislation that limited legislative terms to four years.

Balloting for the Senate and the House of Representatives was held on July 19, 1997, although those bodies ceased to function as a result of the civil war in the early 2000s. Under the terms of a recently completed peace agreement, an appointed 76-member National Transitional Legislative Assembly was established on October 14, 2003. Twelve seats were accorded to the pro-Taylor Government of Liberia (GOL), 12 to the Liberians United for Reconciliation and Democracy, 12 to the Movement for Democracy in Liberia, 18 to established political parties, 7 to representatives of civic organizations, and 15 to the nation's counties (1 for each of the 15 counties).

Under the terms of the 2003 peace agreement and the Electoral Reform Law of 2004, new elections were held for the House of Representatives and the Senate on October 11, 2005.

Senate: The Senate comprises 30 members (2 from each of the 15 counties) directly elected in a single round of voting. (The top two vote-getters in each county are declared the victors.) According to the guidelines adopted for the 2005 balloting, the first-place finishers in each county were elected for nine-year terms, the second-place finishers for six-year terms. All subsequent elections will be for nine-year terms. Following the initial election on October 11, 2005, the Coalition for the Transformation of Liberia won 7 seats; the Unity Party, 4; the National Patriotic Party, 3; the Congress for Democratic Change, 3; the Alliance for Peace and Democracy, 3; the Liberty Party, 3; the National Democratic Party of Liberia, 2; the All Liberia Coalition Party, 1; the National Reformation Party, 1; and independents, 3.

President (pro tempore): Isaac W. NYENABO.

House of Representatives: The lower house comprises 64 members directly elected from single-member constituencies in single-round plurality voting for six-year terms. In the balloting on October 11, 2005, the Congress for Democratic Change secured 15 seats; the Liberty Party, 9; the Unity Party, 8; the Coalition for the Transformation of Liberia, 8; the Alliance for Peace and Democracy, 5; the National Patriotic Party, 4; the New Deal Movement, 3; the All Liberia Coalition Party, 2; the National Democratic Party of Liberia, 1; the National Reformation Party, 1; the United Democratic Alliance, 1; and independents, 7.

Communications

Press

The Doe regime did not impose formal press censorship, although the Daily Observer was repeatedly closed subsequent to its founding in February 1981 and was the object of an arson attack in March 1986, whereas Footprints Today and the Sun Times were shut down from April 1988 to March 1990. The following are issued in Monrovia: Daily Observer (30,000), independent; The Herald (3,000), Catholic weekly; The New Liberian (2,000), published daily by the Ministry of Information; Footprints Today, founded 1984; Sun Times, founded 1985. By early 1991 a number of new papers had been launched, including The Inquirer (independent), the New Times, The Torchlight, and The Patriot, a pro-Taylor organ. In addition the INPFL had commenced publication of Scorpion. Among other newspapers are the Monrovia News, the New Democrat (independent), the Analyst (independent), and the Daily News. Reporters of the latter newspaper were arrested and charged with "espionage" in February 2001 after an article critical of some government expenditures were published. In August 2000 the government had ordered formal censorship of news reporting on the fighting in Lofa County. Human rights and media organizations reported heavy pressure on the press that was critical of the government from 1999 to mid-2002.

News Agency

The official facility is the Liberian News Agency (Lina); Agence France-Presse, Deutsche Presse Agentur, Reuters, and UPI are represented in Monrovia.

Broadcasting

The government-controlled Liberian Broadcasting Corporation (LBS) operates one commercial radio station (ELBC) and one commercial television station (ELTV), while the government-operated Liberia Rural Communications Network (LRCN) transmits from three radio outlets (ELRG, ELRV, and ELRZ). Additional radio programming is offered by the Liberian-American-Swedish Minerals Company (Lamco) station ELNR, the Sudan Interior Mission's religious station ELWA, the ECOWAS Monitoring Group's Radio Liberty Monrovia (RLM), and a Voice of America transmitter in Monrovia. The government's heavy hand on the print media was extended to radio and television in 2000 when the private Star radio station and the Catholic-oriented Radio Veritas were shut down in March for broadcasts critical of the regime. Also, in August a British Channel Four TV crew was charged with "spying" while preparing a documentary linking the president to diamond smuggling and gunrunning in Sierra Leone. Following an international outcry, the crew was freed. There were approximately 964,000 radio and 95,000 television receivers in 1999.

The Country

Extending for 910 miles along Africa's northern coast, Libya embraces the former Turkish and Italian provinces of Tripolitania, Cyrenaica, and Fezzan. Some 95 percent of its territory is desert and barren rockland, and cultivation and settlement are largely confined to a narrow coastal strip. Tribal influences remain strong within a population that is predominantly Arab (with a Berber minority) and almost wholly Sunni Muslim in religion. Arabic is the official language, but Italian, English, and French are also spoken. The government has made efforts in recent years to increase the education of females (about 50 percent of whom are reportedly illiterate), and women comprised 21 percent of the official labor force in 1996, up from less than 9 percent in the 1980s. Female representation in government continues to be minimal.

Libya's reputation as a country largely devoid of natural resources was rendered obsolete by the discovery of oil in the late 1950s; the ensuing development of export capacity resulted in its achieving the highest per capita GNP in Africa (more than $8,600 in 1980). However, world market conditions subsequently reduced the country's oil revenue from a high of $22 billion in 1980 to $5 billion in 1988, with per capita GNP declining to less than $5,500 through the same period. Oil production (about 1.6 million barrels per day) accounts for more than 95 percent of export income, the primary market being Western Europe. Other industry has been limited by the weakness of the domestic market, uneven distribution of the population, and a shortage of skilled manpower. Recent large-scale development has focused on building chemical and steel complexes, in addition to the controversial Great Man-Made River Project, a $30 billion plan to pipe water from aquifers deep below the Sahara Desert to coastal areas. The government hopes that the project, the first phase of which was inaugurated in mid-1991 and the second in 1996, will eventually permit dramatic agricultural expansion as well as provide bountiful drinking water to major cities.

Due to limited rainfall and an insufficient labor pool resulting from migration to the cities, agriculture currently contributes only minimally to domestic output. Barley, wheat, tomatoes, olives, citrus, and dates are the primary crops.

After decades of rigid state control of the economy, liberalization measures, including the promotion of limited private enterprise, were introduced in 1988. Results were initially viewed as encouraging, but domestic opposition was kindled by concurrent government efforts to eliminate food subsidies, reduce state employment, and trim financing for medical, educational, and other social programs. Consequently, about 70 percent of the economy remains under government control, and much of the populace still relies heavily on various subsidies. Falling oil prices in 1998 contributed to a devaluation of the dinar in November and cutbacks in the proposed 1999 budget before economic pressures were eased by the return of high oil prices in the second half of 1999 and 2000. Early in the 21st century, leader Muammar al-Qadhafi's perceived resistance to even modest free-market reforms constrained foreign investment, despite significant interest on the part of Western companies in tapping into the Libyan consumer market as well as participating in the potentially lucrative upgrading of the oil field infrastructure.

Economic affairs, particularly in regard to the West, changed dramatically in September 2004 when the United States lifted most of its long-standing unilateral sanctions against Libya. (UN sanctions, imposed in 1992, had been suspended in 2000 and formally lifted in September 2003.) Western companies immediately began to negotiate substantial oil contracts with Tripoli in conjunction with pledges from the Qadhafi regime to enact broad economic policy changes (see Foreign relations and Current issues, below). Real GDP dipped to 3.5 percent in 2005 (from 4.5 percent in 2004), with economic growth mainly in the non-oil sector, particularly construction, transportation, hotels, and trade. The International Monetary Fund (IMF) in 2005 urged Libya to ease trade restrictions and move toward a market economy, among other economic reforms.

Political Background

Successively ruled by the Phoenicians, Greeks, Romans, Arabs, Spaniards, and others, Libya was under Ottoman Turkish control from the middle of the 16th century to the beginning of the 20th century. It was conquered by Italy in 1911 and 1912 and was ruled as an Italian colony until its occupation by British and French military forces during World War II. In conformity with British wartime pledges and a 1949 decision of the UN General Assembly, Libya became an independent monarchy under Emir Muhammad IDRIS al-Sanussi (King IDRIS I) on December 24, 1951. A constitution promulgated two months earlier prescribed a federal form of government with autonomous rule in the three historic provinces, but provincial autonomy was wiped out and a centralized regime instituted under a constitutional amendment adopted in 1963.

The 1960s witnessed a growing independence in foreign affairs resulting from the financial autonomy generated by rapidly increasing petroleum revenues. This period marked the beginnings of Libyan radicalism in Third World politics and in its posture regarding Arab-Israeli relations. Increasingly, anti-Western sentiments were voiced, especially in regard to externally controlled petroleum companies and the presence of foreign military bases on Libyan soil. The period following the June 1967 Arab-Israeli conflict saw a succession of prime ministers, including the progressive Abd al-Hamid al-BAKKUSH, who took office in October 1967. His reforms alienated conservative leaders, however, and he was replaced in September 1968 by Wanis al-QADHAFI. The following September, while the king was in Turkey for medical treatment, a group of military officers led by Col. Muammar al-QADHAFI seized control of the government and established a revolutionary regime under a military-controlled Revolutionary Command Council (RCC).

After consolidating his control of the RCC, Colonel Qadhafi moved to implement the goals of Political Status: Independent state since December 24, 1951; revolutionary republic declared September 1, 1969; name changed from Libyan Arab Republic to Libyan Arab People's Republic in 1976; present name adopted March 2, 1977.

Area: 679,358 sq. mi. (1,759,540 sq. km.).

Population: 5,678,484 (2003C, provisional); 5,769,000 (2005E). Both figures include nonnationals.

Major Urban Centers (2003C): TARABULUS (TRIPOLI, 1,197,000), Benghazi (Benghazi, 680,000), Misratah (Misurata, 351,000), Surt (Sirte, 162,000). (Many secretariats have reportedly been relocated recently to Sirte—about 400 miles east of Tarabulus—and other cities.)

Official Language: Arabic.

Monetary Unit: Dinar (official rate July 1, 2006: 1.30 dinar = $1US).

Revolutionary Leader (De Facto Head of State): Col. Muammar Abu Minyar al-QADHAFI (Col.

Moammar GADDAFY); assumed power as Chair of Revolutionary Command Council (RCC) following coup d'état of September 1, 1969; became prime minister in January 1970, relinquishing the office in July 1972; designated General Secretary of General People's Congress concurrent with abolition of the RCC on March 2, 1977, relinquishing the position March 1–2, 1979.

Secretary General of General People's Congress: Zanati Muhammad al-ZANATI; appointed by the General People's Congress on November 18, 1992, to succeed Abd al-Raziq al-SAWSA; most recently reappointed on March 1, 2000.

Secretary General of General People's Committee (Prime Minister): Al-Baghdadi Ali al-MAHMUDI; appointed by the General People's Congress on March 5, 2006, to succeed Shukri Muhammad GHANIM.

his regime, which reflected a blend of Islamic behavioral codes, socialism, and radical Arab nationalism. By June 1970 both the British and U.S. military installations had been evacuated, and in July the Italian and Jewish communities were dispossessed and their members forced from the country. In June 1971 an official party, the Arab Socialist Union (ASU), was organized, and in September the Federation of Arab Republics (a union of Egypt, Libya, and Syria) was approved by separate referenda in each country. The federation, while formally constituted at the legislative level in March 1972, became moribund shortly thereafter. Meanwhile, the regime had begun acquiring shares in the country's petroleum industry, resorting to outright nationalization of foreign interests in numerous cases; by March 1976 the government controlled about two-thirds of oil production.

Periodically threatening to resign because of conflicts within the RCC, Colonel Qadhafi turned over his prime-ministerial duties to Maj. Abd al-Salam JALLUD in July 1972 and was in seclusion during the greater part of 1974. In August 1975

Qadhafi's rule was seriously threatened by a coup attempt involving army officers—some two dozen of whom were ultimately executed; a number of drastic antsubversion laws were promptly enacted. In November a quasi-legislative General National Congress (renamed the General People's Congress a year later) was created, while in March 1977 the RCC and the cabinet were abolished in accordance with "the installation of the people's power" under a new structure of government headed by Colonel Qadhafi and the four remaining members of the RCC. The political changes were accompanied by a series of sweeping economic measures, including limitations on savings and consolidation of private shops ("nests of exploitation") into large state supermarkets, which generated middle-class discontent and fueled exile-based opposition activity. The government was further reorganized at a meeting of the General People's Congress in March 1979, Colonel Qadhafi resigning as secretary general (but retaining his designation as revolutionary leader and supreme commander of the armed forces) in favor of Abd al-Ati UBAYDI, who was in turn replaced as secretary general of the General People's Committee (prime minister) by Jadallah Azzuz al-TALHI.

At a congress session in January 1981, Secretary General Ubaydi was succeeded by Muhammad al-Zarruq RAJAB, who, in February 1984, was replaced by Miftah al-Usta UMAR and named to succeed Talhi as secretary general of the General People's Committee. Talhi was returned to the position of nominal head of government in a major ministerial reshuffle announced on March 3, 1986; in a further reshuffle on March 1, 1987, Talhi was replaced by Umar Mustafa al-MUNTASIR.

In October 1990 a government shakeup was undertaken that included the appointment of Abd al-Raziq al-SAWSA to succeed Umar as secretary general of the General People's Congress and Abu Zaid Umar DURDA to succeed Muntasir as head of the General People's Committee. Durda was reappointed in November 1992 while Sawsa was replaced by Zanati Muhammad al-ZANATI. The 1992 reorganization was otherwise most noteworthy for the designation of Muntasir, a moderate who had earlier cultivated a good working relationship with the West, as the equivalent of foreign secretary.

The sanctions imposed by the United Nations in 1992 (see Foreign relations, below) subsequently contributed to what was widely believed to be growing domestic discontent with the regime. Internal difficulties were most sharply illustrated by an apparent coup attempt in early October 1993, reportedly involving thousands of troops at several military locations. Although loyalist forces quashed the revolt in about three days, the government was described as "severely shaken" by the events.

In a cabinet reshuffle on January 29, 1994, Abd al-Majid al-QAUD was named to succeed Durda as secretary general of the General People's Committee. Qaud was succeeded on December 29, 1997, by Muhammad Ahmad al-MANQUSH, who was reappointed, along with most other senior ministers, in a cabinet reshuffle on December 15, 1998. On March 1, 2000, Manqush was succeeded by Mubarak Abdullah al-SHAMIKH, Colonel Qadhafi concurrently ordering a sharp reduction in the number of ministries in the name of further devolution of power to local "people's" bodies. SHAMIKH remained in his post during a reshuffle on October 1, 2000, but was replaced in a subsequent reorganization on June 13, 2003, by Shukri Muhammad GHANIM, theretofore the secretary for economy and trade. The secretary for public security, Nasr al-Mabruk ABDALLAH, was suspended on February 18, 2006, after a violent protest a day earlier at the Italian embassy in Benghazi. Six new secretaries were added to the cabinet in a reorganization on March 5, 2006, when the former assistant secretary general of the General People's Committee, Al-Baghdadi Ali al-MAHMUDI, was appointed to succeed Ghanim.

Constitution and Government

Guided by the ideology of Colonel Qadhafi's Green Book, which combines elements of nationalism, Islamic theology, socialism, and populism, Libya was restyled the Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya in March 1977. The Jamahiriyah is conceived as a system of direct government through popular organs interspersed throughout Libyan society. A General People's Congress is assisted by a General Secretariat, whose secretary general serves as titular head of state, although effective power has remained in Colonel Qadhafi's hands since the 1969 coup. Executive functions are assigned to a cabinet-like General People's Committee, whose secretary general serves as the equivalent of prime minister. The judicial system includes a Supreme Court, courts of appeal, courts of the first instance, and summary courts. In 1988 the government also established a People's Court and a People's Prosecution Bureau to replace the unofficial but powerful "revolutionary courts" that had reportedly assumed responsibility for nearly 90 percent of prosecutions. In what was seen as an effort to placate the expanding Islamic fundamentalist movement, Colonel Qadhafi in April 1993 called for more widespread implementation of sharia (Islamic religious law), and in February 1994 the General People's Congress granted new powers to the country's religious leaders, including (for the first time under Colonel Qadhafi) the right to issue religious decrees (fatwas).

Libya's three provinces are subdivided into ten governorates, with administration based on "Direct People's Authority" as represented in local People's Congresses, People's Committees, Trade Unions, and Vocational Syndicates.

Foreign Relations

Under the monarchy, Libya tended to adhere to a generally pro-Western posture. Since the 1969 coup its foreign policy has been characterized by the advocacy of total war against Israel, a willingness to use petroleum as a political weapon, and (until 1998—see Current issues, below) a strong commitment to Arab unity that has given rise to numerous failed merger attempts with sister states (Libya, Egypt, Sudan, and Syria in 1969; Libya, Egypt, and Syria in 1971; Libya and Egypt in 1972; Libya and Tunisia in 1974; Libya and Syria in 1980; Libya and Chad in 1981; Libya and Morocco in 1984).

Libya's position within the Arab world has been marked by an improbable combination of ideological extremism and pragmatic compromise. Following the 1978 Camp David accords, relations were severed with Egypt, both sides fortifying their common border. Thereafter, Tripoli strove to block Cairo's reentry into the Arab fold (extending its condemnation to Jordan following the warming of ties between Jordan and Egypt) and provided support to Syrian-based elements of the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) opposed to Yasir Arafat. Relations with the Mubarak government began to warm, however, during an Arab League meeting in Casablanca, Morocco, in May 1989 and, stimulated by a "reconciliation" summit in Mersa Metruh, Egypt, in October, continued to improve with a series of cooperation agreements in 1990 and the opening of the border between the two countries in 1991. By mid-decade, Egypt had become what one correspondent described as Libya's most important potential "bridge to the West," Cairo's supportive stance reflecting the importance of Libya as a provider of jobs for Egyptian workers and the value attached by the Mubarak regime to Colonel Qadhafi's pronounced antifundamentalist posture.

Relations with conservative Morocco, broken following Tripoli's 1980 recognition of the Polisario-backed government-in-exile of the Western Sahara, resumed in 1981. Ties with neighboring Tunisia, severely strained during much of the 1980s, advanced dramatically in 1988, the opening of the border between the two countries precipitating a flood of option-starved Libyan consumers to Tunis. Regional relations stabilized even further with the February 1989 formation of the Arab Maghreb Union (AMU), although Colonel Qadhafi remained a source of controversy within the ineffective and largely inactive grouping.

A widespread expression of international concern in the 1980s and 1990s centered on Libyan involvement in Chad. Libya's annexation of the Aozou Strip in the mid-1970s was followed by active participation in the Chadian civil war, largely in opposition to the forces of Hissein Habré, who in 1982 emerged as president of the strife-torn country. By 1983 Libya's active support of the "National Peace Government" loyal to former Chadian president Goukhouni Oueddei (based in the northern Tibesti region) included the deployment of between 3,000 and 5,000 Libyan troops and the provision of air support for Oueddei's attacks on the northern capital of Faya-Largeau. Although consistently denying direct involvement and condemning the use of French troops in 1983 and 1984 as "unjustified intervention," Qadhafi agreed in September 1984 to recall "Libyan support elements" in exchange for a French troop withdrawal. The agreement was hailed as a diplomatic breakthrough for Paris but was greeted with dismay by Habré and ultimately proved to be an embarrassment to the Mitterrand government because of the limited number of Libyan troops actually withdrawn. Two and a half years later, in March 1987, the militarily superior Qadhafi regime suffered the unexpected humiliation of being decisively defeated by Chadian government forces, which, after capturing the air facility at Quadi Doum, 100 miles northeast of Faya-Largeau, forced the Libyans to withdraw from all but the Aozou Strip, leaving behind an estimated $1 billion worth of sophisticated weaponry.

In early August 1987, Chadian forces, in a surprise move, captured Aozou, administrative capital of the contested border area, although the town was subsequently retaken by Libya. Despite a September cease-fire, skirmishes continued as the Islamic Legion, comprised largely of Lebanese mercenaries, attacked Chadian posts from bases inside Sudan, with Libyan jets supporting counteroffensives in the Aozou Strip. A year later, the warring neighbors had resumed intermittent peace negotiations, Libya having reportedly lost 10 percent of its military capability, although retaining most of the disputed territory.

In July 1989 the Organization of African Unity (OAU, subsequently the African Union—AU) sponsored negotiations between President Habré and Colonel Qadhafi, which set the stage for the signing of a peace treaty by the countries' foreign ministers on August 31. The treaty called for immediate troop withdrawal from the disputed territory, exchange of prisoners of war, mutual "noninterference," and continued efforts to reach a permanent settlement. Relations subsequently deteriorated, however, with Habré accusing Libya of supporting Chadian rebels operating from Sudan. A year of talks having achieved little progress, the dispute was referred to the International Court of Justice (ICJ) several months before the ouster of the Habré regime in December 1990.

New Chadian president Idriss Déby announced in early 1991 that a "new era" had begun in relations between Chad and Libya, the belief being widespread that Libya had supplied arms and logistical support (but not personnel) to the victorious Chadian rebels. However, Déby subsequently described the Aozou issue as still a "bone of contention" requiring resolution by the ICJ. Consequently, hearings in the case began in June 1993 at The Hague, Netherlands, and in February 1994 the ICJ ruled by a vote of 16–1 that Libya had no rightful claim to the Aozou Strip or any other territory beyond the boundary established in a 1955 treaty between Libya and France. On May 30 the lengthy dispute ended with Libya's withdrawal and a symbolic raising of the Chadian flag. Shortly thereafter, Colonel Qadhafi received President Déby in Tripoli for the signing of a friendship and cooperation treaty, which, among other things, provided for a Libyan–Chadian Higher Joint Committee to discuss mutual concerns. Following the inaugural meeting of the Committee in July, (then) Chadian prime minister Kassiré Koumakoyé reportedly described the Aozou issue as "settled for good," while announcing his country's support for Libyan efforts to have UN economic sanctions lifted.

Relations with the West have been problematic since the 1969 coup and the expulsion, a year later, of British and U.S. military forces. Libya's subsequent involvement in negotiations between Malta and the United Kingdom over British naval facilities on the Mediterranean island contributed to a further strain in relations with London. In December 1979 the United States closed its embassy in Tripoli after portions of the building were stormed and set afire by pro-Iranian demonstrators, while in May 1981 the Reagan administration ordered Tripoli to shut down its Washington "people's bureau" in response to what it considered escalating international terrorism sponsored by Colonel Qadhafi. Subsequent U.S.–Libyan relations were characterized as "mutual paranoia," with each side accusing the other of assassination plots amid hostility generated by U.S. naval maneuvers in the Gulf of Sirte, which Libya has claimed as an internal sea since 1973.

Simultaneous attacks by Palestinian gunmen on the Rome and Vienna airports on December 27, 1985, brought U.S. accusations of Libyan involvement, which Colonel Qadhafi vehemently denied. In January 1986 President Reagan announced the freezing of all Libyan government assets in U.S. banks, urged Americans working in Libya to depart, banned all U.S. trade with Libya, and ordered a new series of air and sea maneuvers in the Gulf of Sirte. (U.S. officials charged that Libya was harboring members of the Revolutionary Council of Fatah, the radical Palestinian grouping led by Abu Nidal and allegedly behind the 1985 attacks.) Three months later, during the night of April 14, eighteen F-111 bombers based in Britain, assisted by carrier-based attack fighters, struck Libyan military targets in Tripoli and Benghazi. The action was prompted by what Washington termed “conclusive evidence,” in the form of intercepted cables, that Libya had ordered the bombing of a Berlin discotheque nine days before, in the course of which an off-duty U.S. soldier had been killed. The U.S. administration also claimed to have aborted a planned grenade and machine-gun attack on the American visa office in Paris, for which French authorities ordered the expulsion of two Libyan diplomats.

Tripoli’s adoption of a more conciliatory posture during 1988 did not yield relaxation of tension with Washington, which mounted a diplomatic campaign against European chemical companies that were reported to be supplying materials for a chemical weapons plant in Libya. Despite Libyan denial of the charges, reports of U.S. readiness to attack the site were believed to be the catalyst for a military encounter between two U.S. F-14s and two Libyan MiG-23 jets over the Mediterranean Sea on January 4, 1989, which resulted in downing of the Libyan planes. Concern subsequently continued in some Western capitals over the alleged chemical plant (the site of a much-publicized fire in March 1990), as well as Libya’s ongoing efforts to develop nuclear weapons. Suspicion also arose over possible Libyan involvement in the bombing of Pan Am Flight 103, which blew up over Lockerbie, Scotland, in December 1988, and the crash of a French DC-10 in Niger near the Chad border in September 1989.

Colonel Qadhafi was described as maintaining an “uncharacteristically low profile” following the August 1990 Iraqi invasion of Kuwait (which he publicly criticized) and the U.S.-led Desert Storm campaign against Iraqi forces in early 1991. However, the respite from the international spotlight proved short-lived as the investigations into the Lockerbie and Niger plane explosions once again focused Western condemnation on Libya.

In October 1991 the French government issued warrants for six Libyans (one of them a brother-in-law of Colonel Qadhafi) in connection with the Niger crash, while American and British authorities announced in mid-November that they had filed charges against two Libyan nationals in connection with the Pan Am bombing. In early December the Arab League Council expressed its “solidarity” with Libya in the Lockerbie matter and called for an inquiry by a joint Arab League–UN committee. Two days later a Libyan judge declared that the two suspects were under house arrest and that Tripoli would be willing to send judicial representatives to Washington, London, and Paris to discuss the alleged acts of terrorism.

On January 21, 1992, the UN Security Council unanimously demanded extradition of the Lockerbie detainees to either Britain or the United States and insisted that Libya aid the French investigation into the Niger crash. Although Libya announced its willingness to cooperate with the latter demand, which involved no extradition request, it refused to turn over the Lockerbie suspects, declaring it would try the men itself. Consequently, the Security Council ordered the imposition of selective sanctions, including restrictions on air traffic and an embargo of shipments of military equipment as of April 15.

On May 14, 1992, in partial compliance with the Security Council, Libya announced that it would sever all links with organizations involved in “international terrorism,” admit UN representatives to verify that there were no terrorist training facilities on its soil, and take action to preclude the use of its territory or citizens for terrorist acts. In addition, a special session of the General People’s Congress in June agreed that the Lockerbie suspects could be tried in a “fair and just” court in a neutral country as suggested by the Arab League. However, the Security Council reiterated its demand for extradition to the United States or United Kingdom, ordered that the sanctions be continued, and warned that stiffer measures were being considered. After mediation efforts by UN Secretary General Boutros Boutros-Ghali failed to resolve the impasse, the Security Council voted on November 11, 1993, to expand the sanctions by freezing Libya’s overseas assets and banning the sales to Libya of certain oil-refining and pipeline equipment. The sanctions were subsequently regularly extended, although the Security Council rejected a U.S. proposal for a total oil embargo.

Libya continued to face heavy pressure from the United States in 1996. In April, U.S. defense secretary William Perry warned that force would be used if necessary to prevent Libya from completing an alleged underground chemical weapons plant.

Attention in 1998 and 1999 remained focused on efforts to negotiate a resolution of the Lockerbie impasse, the Libyan government having previously argued (with the support of the OAU and the Arab League) that the suspects should be tried in a neutral country. Finally, Libya agreed in late March 1999 to send the two men (Abd al-Basset al-MEGRAHI and Lamin Khalifah FHIMAH) to the Netherlands in early April to face a trial under Scottish law before three Scottish judges. Colonel Qadhafi's acceptance of the plan apparently was predicated on assurances that the trial would not be used to attempt to "undermine" his regime. For their part, Washington and London appeared to compromise on the issue of the trial's location, in part at least, out of recognition that international support for continued sanctions was diminishing. The Security Council announced that the UN sanctions had been suspended as soon as the suspects arrived in the Netherlands on April 5. However, unilateral U.S. sanctions remained in place as long as Libya stayed on Washington's official list of countries perceived to be "state sponsors of terrorism."

An antiterrorism court in Paris convicted, in absentia, six suspects in the Niger plane crash case, including Abdallah SENOUSSE, Qadhafi's brother-in-law, in March 1999 and issued warrants for their arrest, which could be enforced only if they left Libya. Meanwhile, Colonel Qadhafi had also permitted German investigators to question Libyan intelligence officers concerning the 1986 Berlin disco bombing, although prosecution of the case had been thrown into disarray in 1997 when the main witness apparently recanted his previously incriminating testimony against alleged Libyan operatives. (Four defendants were convicted of the Berlin bombing in October 2001, the court also accepting the prosecution's argument that the Libyan secret service had been involved in planning the attack.)

In July 1999 full diplomatic relations were reestablished with the United Kingdom, which had severed ties after a British policewoman was killed during an anti-Qadhafi demonstration outside the Libyan mission in London. (It had been argued that the policewoman was killed by gunfire directed from the mission at the demonstrators.) Resolution of the dispute included Libya's agreement to cooperate in the investigation and to pay compensation to the victim's family.

The Lockerbie trial opened in May 2000, and on January 31, 2001, Megrahi was convicted of murder in connection with the bombing, the judges having accepted the admittedly circumstantial evidence that he had been at the airport when the bomb was allegedly planted and was working for Libyan intelligence at the time. Megrahi was sentenced to life in prison, but Fhimah returned to Libya after the judges did not convict him of any charges. (For subsequent developments see Current issues, below.)

Current Issues

Colonel Qadhafi announced in the late 1990s that he was turning his focus away from pan-Arabism and toward pan-Africanism, having described most other Arab states as "defeatist" in dealing with the West and Israel. The quixotic Libyan leader attended his first OAU summit in 20 years in July 1999 to promote his new vision and hosted a special summit in September to address proposed changes in the charter that would permit creation of OAU peacekeeping forces. Subsequently, Qadhafi participated prominently in efforts to resolve the conflicts in Sudan and Democratic Republic of the Congo and served as a mediator in the war between Eritrea and Ethiopia. However, Libya's image as a potential continental unifier suffered a severe blow in late September 2000 when scores of black African workers died in a series of attacks by Libyans on nonnational workers in a suburb of Tripoli. (Underscoring the continued deterioration of the African initiative, in 2003 Libya recalled its troops from the Central African Republic, a trade agreement with Zimbabwe collapsed, and Qadhafi abolished the ministry for African unity.)

In early 2001 Colonel Qadhafi criticized the conviction of one of the defendants in the Lockerbie trial (see Foreign relations, above) as politically motivated. However, by that time it was widely accepted that the Libyan government had not supported any terrorist activities or groups in several years and was genuinely interested in reintegration into the global community. Qadhafi had also improved his international image by cooperating extensively with the U.S.-led "war on terrorism," by freeing a number of political prisoners and by indicating a willingness to discuss the proposed payment of compensation to the families of the victims of the Lockerbie bombing.

Qadhafi subsequently continued his drive to improve Libya's international standing, and the initiative appeared to reach critical mass with an August 2003 announcement of final resolution of the Lockerbie affair. Under the carefully crafted language of the settlement, Libya accepted "responsibility for the actions of its officials" and agreed to pay an estimated $10 million (in three installments) to each of the families of the 270 killed in the attack. The UN Security Council formally lifted UN sanctions against Libya in September, permitting payment of the Lockerbie settlements to begin. In January 2004 Libya also agreed to pay a total of $170 million to the families of those killed in the 1989 Niger plane crash. The final piece of the puzzle appeared to be put in place in September 2004 when Libya agreed to pay $35 million to the non-U.S. victims of the 1986 bombing in Berlin.

Meanwhile, dramatic progress was also achieved regarding the other long-standing area of intense Western concern, that is, Libya's perceived pursuit of weapons of mass destruction (WMD). In December 2003 the United States and UK announced that after nine months of secret negotiations Qadhafi had agreed to abandon all WMD programs and to permit international inspectors to verify compliance. (Some analysts suggested that the process had been accelerated by the aggressive stance taken by the U.S. Bush administration against Iraq.) Washington announced in February 2004 that it would permit flights to Libya and allow U.S. oil companies to launch talks with Tripoli aimed at further exploitation of oil fields. Many U.S. commercial sanctions were lifted the following April, and in October the EU removed its embargo on arms sales to Libya, and other economic sanctions. Underscoring the dramatic transformation of the West's perception of Qadhafi, he was visited in 2004 by the British, French, and German heads of state, and a number of U.S. companies were awarded permits in 2005 for oil exploration. Collaterally, the Libyan regime, which celebrated its 35th year in power in 2004, pledged sweeping economic reforms to broaden trade and expand investment opportunities. Libya officially remained on the U.S. list of terrorist-sponsoring states, possibly in part to permit investigation of charges by Saudi Arabia that then-Crown Prince Abdallah (now king) had been the target of an assassination plot, but Libya and Saudi Arabia reestablished diplomatic relations in late 2005.

In a diplomatic move that observers said was also meant to send a message to Iran and North Korea (both developing nuclear capabilities), the United States restored full relations with Libya on May 15, 2006. The United States also removed Libya from its list of state sponsors of terrorism (the latter requiring congressional approval within 45 days). Some of the families of Lockerbie bombing victims were angered, however, that they had not been notified first and demanded that the U.S. Congress ensure Libya fulfilled its financial commitment to them. (Libya halted its final payment to the families until it was removed from the list of states sponsoring terrorism.) With diplomatic ties restored, further restrictions on American oil companies were lifted, allowing for increased exploration. For its part, Libya opened bidding on its oil reserves to international companies in an effort to boost production over the next ten years and bring in a projected $7 billion.

Political Parties

Under the monarchy, all political parties were banned. In 1971 an official government party, the Arab Socialist Union (ASU), was founded with the Egyptian ASU as its model. The formation was designed primarily to serve as a “transmission belt,” helping implement government decisions at local levels and serving to channel local concerns upward to the central government; however, there was no public reference to it after 1975. At present all parties are proscribed, Colonel Qadhafi arguing that their legalization would only lead to disorder.

Opposition Groups

National Front for the Salvation of Libya (NFSL). Formation of the NFSL was announced in Khartoum, Sudan, on October 7, 1981, under the banner “Finding the democratic alternative.” In September 1986 the Front published a list of 76 regime opponents that it claimed had been assassinated in exile, and in January 1987 it joined with a number of other exile formations in establishing a joint working group during a meeting in Cairo, Egypt. The NFSL also participated in the formation of the LNLA (below), which, however, announced its independent status in early 1994.

Operating out of Egypt and the United States, the NFSL was in the forefront of efforts to coordinate anti-Qadhafi activity in the first half of the 1990s, including a conference in Washington in late 1993 attended by most of the regime’s leading opponents. However, a “statement of principles” of a proposed front was not negotiated.

In early 1994 it was reported that the NFSL had begun to transmit its antiregime radio program, the Voice of the Libyan People, via European Satellite. The program had previously been intermittently broadcast by shortwave radio from neighboring countries. In 1997 the NFSL issued a report alleging that more than 300 Qadhafi opponents had been killed by government operatives abroad or by domestic security forces between 1977 and 1994. In mid-2004 NFSL leaders warned Western leaders that the Qadhafi regime continued to hold political prisoners despite the country’s improved international reputation.

Leaders: Ibrahim SAHAD, Mahmud DAKHIL, Muhammad Fayiz JIBRIL, Muhammad MAGARIAF (Secretary General). (Jabal MATAR, described as leader of the NFSL’s “military wing,” has been missing since 1990.)

Libyan National Liberation Army (LNLA). The LNLA, a paramilitary unit organized with covert U.S. backing to destabilize the Libyan government, was formed in Chad in 1988. The existence of the army, comprising an estimated 600–700 Libyan soldiers taken prisoner by Chadian forces and subsequently molded into an anti-Qadhafi force, became known following the overthrow of the Habré regime in late 1990. Washington quickly airlifted the Libyan “contras” out of Chad after the fall of Ndjamena, U.S. embarrassment over the affair increasing as the LNLA participants entered a “floating exile.” About 250 eventually returned to Libya, the rest reportedly finding temporary asylum in Zaire and, subsequently, Kenya. In late 1991 some of the guerrillas were reported to have been moved to a Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) training base in the United States, and in April 1992 LNLA members participated in an NFSL congress in Dallas, Texas. Two years later, as the apparent result of a policy dispute, the LNLA severed its links to the NFSL. There has been little subsequent information regarding any LNLA activity.

Leaders: Col. Khalifa HIFTER, Braek SWESSI.

The Libyan Alliance, an anti-Qadhafi front, was announced in the late 1980s. Although Middle East International reported in late 1993 that most of its constituent groups had “drifted away,” Mansur KIKHIA, a former Libyan foreign minister and UN representative, remained the group’s titular secretary general. Kikhia, a human rights activist and one of Libya’s most prominent dissidents, disappeared during a visit to Cairo in December 1993, his supporters subsequently charging he had been kidnapped by Qadhafi agents. In June 1994 the Libyan leader announced that Kikhia was alive, but he insisted that Tripoli had nothing to do with his disappearance and had no knowledge as to his whereabouts. In 1997 U.S. intelligence reports indicated that Kikhia had apparently been executed in Libya in early 1994. In 1998 an Egyptian court ordered the Egyptian government to pay Kikhia's wife $30,000 as the result of the apparent involvement of its security agents in turning Kikhia over to Libya.

Another anti-Qadhafi umbrella organization, the Cooperation Bureau for Democratic and National Forces, has been chaired by former foreign minister Abd al-Munim al-HUNI, who has been an exile in Egypt since breaking with the regime in the mid-1980s. (Other prominent members of the Bureau have included Izzidin GHADANSI, Bashir RABTI, and Abdullah SHARAFFEDIN.) Huni, who reportedly declined an invitation from Colonel Qadhafi in mid-1992 to return to Libya, subsequently participated in meetings with the NFSL and Libyan Alliance representatives to develop a common program. Like-minded overtures were reportedly made to former Libyan prime minister Abd al-Hamid al-BAKKUSH, who founded the Cairo-based Libyan Liberation Organization in 1982. (As of early 1999 there was little evidence that the alliance, the bureau, or the organization remained active.)

In May 1996 a number of opposition groups reportedly issued a statement condemning the "despotic practices" of the Qadhafi regime, according to the Africa Research Bulletin, which said signatories included the Libyan Constitutional Union, the Libyan Nationalist Organization, and the Libyan Democratic Nationalist Grouping. Also listed were a Movement for Change and Reform (a nationalist grouping) and the Libyan Islamic Group, an underground but nonviolent organization that has been compared to groups such as the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt. A number of supporters of the Libyan Islamic Group (including professors and other professionals) were reportedly arrested in Benghazi and other northeastern cities in mid-1998. Libyan security forces also reportedly clashed at that time with members of the Libyan Islamic Fighting Group (LIFG, also referenced as the Libyan Militant Islamic Group—LMIG), an Islamic fundamentalist grouping that had earlier been linked to the antigovernment disturbances in northeastern Libya in March 1996 and had claimed that it had planned an assassination of Colonel Qadhafi. The Libyan leader subsequently criticized the United Kingdom for permitting the group to maintain operations in London in view of its avowed goal of overthrowing the Libyan government. In 1998 leaders of the LIFG denied that UK intelligence forces had been involved in the earlier assassination plot, which was aborted when Qadhafi changed travel plans suddenly. (A "rogue" UK agent had reportedly alleged that the LIFG had been given money to assist in the plot, a charge that London vehemently denied.) The LIFG has been accused of having connections to the al-Qaida terrorist network, and in 2001 it was included on the U.S. list of terrorist organizations whose assets were to be frozen. Meanwhile, a number of LIFG members remained in prison in Libya in 2002. The United States and the UK reportedly helped Libya in 2006 in a crackdown on group members to prevent militants from plotting attacks against Qadhafi and against U.S. forces in Iraq.

Another group reportedly involved in recent clashes with security forces is the Islamic Martyrs Movement, whose reputed leader Muhammad al-HAMI, was believed to have been killed by government security forces in July 1996. (Abdullah AHMAD has subsequently been identified as a spokesman for the movement.) The grouping, described as operating out of the mountains near Benghazi, claimed that it had wounded Qadhafi in an attack on his motorcade on the night of May 31–June 1, 1998. (The government denied that such an attack had taken place.) Meanwhile, the formation of the Libyan Patriots Movement had been announced in London in January 1997, founders calling for the ouster of Colonel Qadhafi and creation of a "free Libya" based on free-market economic principles. In April 1998 the movement reportedly staged an attack on security forces in Benghazi.

In August 2000 the formation of a new external opposition grouping—the National Reform Congress—was reported as a vehicle for promoting a multiparty system in Libya.

Legislature

The Senate and House of Representatives were dissolved as a result of the 1969 coup, Colonel Qadhafi asserting that all such institutions are basically undemocratic, “as democracy means the authority of the people and not the authority of a body acting on the people's behalf.”

A government decree of November 13, 1975, provided for the establishment of a 618-member General National Congress of the ASU to consist of the members of the Revolutionary Command Council and leaders of existing “people's congresses,” trade unions, and professional groups. Subsequent to its first session held January 5–18, 1976, the body was identified as the General People's Congress (GPC).

Secretary General: Zanati Muhammad al-ZANATI.

Communications

Press

In October 1973 all private newspapers were nationalized, and censorship remains heavy. The country's major daily, al-Fajr al-Jadid (The New Dawn, 40,000), is published in Tripoli in Arabic, by JANA. Also published daily in Arabic in Tripoli is the “ideological journal” Al-Zahfal-Akhdar (The Green March).

News Agencies

The official facility is the Jamahiriya News Agency (JANA). Italy’s ANSA and Russia’s ITAR-TASS maintain offices in Tripoli.

Broadcasting and Computing

Radio and television transmission in both Arabic and English is under the administration of the Great Socialist People’s Libyan Arab Jamahiriya Broadcasting Corporation. There were approximately 988,000 television receivers and 140,000 personal computers serving 160,000 Internet users in 2003.

Intergovernmental Representation

There were no diplomatic relations between Libya and the United States until June 2004, when, in the wake of perceived progress toward the resolution of several long-standing areas of severe contention (see Foreign relations and Current issues, above), Washington announced it would open a liaison office in Tripoli.

MADAGASCAR

REPUBLIC OF MADAGASCAR

Repoblikan'i Madagasikara (Malagasy)

République de Madagascar (French)

The Country

The Republic of Madagascar, consisting of the large island of Madagascar and five small island dependencies, is situated in the Indian Ocean off the southeast coast of Africa. Although the population includes some 18 distinct ethnic groups, the main division is between the light-skinned Mérima people of the central plateau and the more Negroid peoples of the coastal regions (côtiens). The Malagasy language is of Malayo-Polynesian origin, yet reflects African, Arabic, and European influences. The population is about 36 percent Christian (predominantly Roman Catholic in the coastal regions, Protestant on the plateau) and about 9 percent Muslim, while the remaining 55 percent adhere to traditional beliefs. The nonindigenous population includes some 30,000 Comorans and smaller groups of French, Indians, Pakistanis, and Chinese. Women constitute more than 45 percent of the labor force, performing the bulk of subsistence activity. However, due largely to matriarchal elements in pre-colonial Malagasy culture, females are significantly better represented in government and urban managerial occupations than their mainland counterparts.

Agriculture, forestry, and fishing account for about two-fifths of Madagascar's gross domestic product but employ over four-fifths of the labor force, the majority at a subsistence level. Leading export crops are coffee, cloves, and vanilla, while industry is concentrated in food processing (notably seafood) and textiles. Mineral resources include deposits of graphite, chromium, and gem-stones (particularly sapphires), in addition to undeveloped reserves of oil, bauxite, iron, nickel, and titanium.

Beginning in the early 1970s a large portion of the country's economic base, formerly dominated by foreign businesses, was nationalized by a strongly socialist regime. However, in the face of mounting difficulties with the external debt and worsening trade deficits, the administration in 1980 started to reverse its policies, introducing budget austerity, currency devaluations, and measures to reduce food imports by boosting agricultural production. Although such actions were applauded

Political Status: Established as the Malagasy Republic within the French Community in 1958; became independent with present system June 30, 1960; military regime established May 18, 1972; name of Democratic Republic of Madagascar and single-party system adopted in new constitution and Socialist Revolutionary Charter approved by national referendum on December 21, 1975; present name adopted in the new constitution of the Third Republic (codifying multiparty activity first authorized by presidential decree of March 1990) that was approved by national referendum on August 19, 1992, but was subsequently the subject of extensive political conflict (see Political background and Constitution and government, below); federal system established by constitutional amendments approved by national referendum on March 15, 1998, and promulgated on April 8.

Area: 226,657 sq. mi. (587,041 sq. km.).

Population: 12,092,157 (1993C); 16,908,000 (2005E).

Major Urban Center (2005E): ANTANANARIVO (1,581,000).

Official Languages: Malagasy, French.

Monetary Unit: New currency “ariary” introduced in July 2003 (official rate July 1, 2006: 2,165 ariarys = $1US).

President: Marc RAVALOMANANA (I Love Madagascar); proclaimed himself president on February 22, 2002, following a disputed first-round presidential election on December 16, 2001; inaugurated for a five-year term on May 6, 2002, to succeed Adm. Didier RATSIRAKA (Vanguard of the Malagasy Revolution), following a ruling by the High Constitutional Court confirming Ravalomanana’s victory in the December 2001 election.

Prime Minister: Jacques SYLLA (I Love Madagascar); appointed by self-proclaimed President Ravalomanana on February 26, 2002; reappointed by the president on May 9, 2002, following the president’s inauguration, to succeed Tantely René Gabrio ANDRIANARIVO (Vanguard of the Malagasy Revolution); reappointed by the president on June 16, 2002, following cabinet dissolution earlier that day; formed “government of national reconciliation” on June 18, 2002; reappointed on January 12, 2003, following legislative elections of December 15, 2002; formed new government on January 16, 2003.

by foreign creditors, no measurable economic progress was subsequently achieved.

In 1992 the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank temporarily suspended their aid to Madagascar, calling for implementation of austerity measures and widespread economic reform. The government adopted (nominally at least) an adjustment strategy in 1994 focusing on the privatization of state-run enterprises, deregulation of various sectors, and liberalization of restrictions on foreign investment, although there was significant discord within the Zafy administration over implementation (see Political background, below). The IMF criticized the deceleration of the pace of reform following the installation of another Ratsiraka administration in early 1997. Following a period of sustained growth in the late 1990s, the country suffered a series of economic shocks. By the start of the new millennium it was reported that an estimated 75 percent of the population lived in poverty and that the health and education infrastructures were dilapidated. The lingering effects of three cyclones in early 2000 as well as of weak export prices propelled the economy as a key issue in the controversial 2001 presidential campaign (see Political background, below). In 2002, the GDP declined by 12.7 percent as a result of violence and uncertainty associated with the contested presidential election. There was also a spike in inflation, which rose to 15.4 percent. By 2003, the economy began to recover, with GDP growing by 9.6 percent and inflation declining to 2.7 percent with the introduction of a new currency, the ariary. The IMF dispersed a $100 million credit for economic restructuring and arranged several multimillion dollar grants for economic reforms in 2002. Arrangements for substantial debt relief were concluded with the IMF and World Bank in 2004.

In part because of the effects of a devastating cyclone in 2004, GDP growth fell from 9.8 percent in 2003 to 5.3 percent in 2004. However, as of 2006 analysts were predicting significantly positive economic developments for Madagascar, based on expanded foreign investment (notably in pursuit of the exploitation of chromium, titanium, and offshore oil) and the country's accession in May to the Southern African Development Community (SADC), which was expected to expand regional trade opportunities. Meanwhile, aid from the World Bank and the European Union (EU) was earmarked for infrastructure projects (mostly the construction of roads) and programs designed to reduce poverty.

Political Background

During the 18th century and most of the 19th century, Madagascar was dominated by the Mérima people of the plateau. However, after a brief period of British influence, the French gained control and by 1896 had destroyed the Mérima monarchy. Renamed the Malagasy Republic, it became an autonomous state within the French Community in 1958 and gained full independence on June 26, 1960, under the presidency of Philibert TSIRANANA, who governed with the support of the Social Democratic Party (Parti Social Démocrate—PSD).

Tsiranana's coastal-dominated government ultimately proved unable to deal with a variety of problems, including ethnic conflict stemming from Mérima opposition to the government's pro-French policies. In addition, economic reverses led to a revolt in 1971 by peasants in Tulear Province, while students, dissatisfied with their job prospects in a stagnating economy, mounted a rebellion in early 1972. In May having acknowledged his growing inability to rule, Tsiranana turned over his duties as head of state and chief of government to Maj. Gen. Gabriel RAMANANTSOA, who was confirmed for a five-year term by a referendum held October 8.

An attempted coup by dissident côtier officers led to Ramanantsoa's resignation on February 5, 1975; his successor, Col. Richard RATSI-MANDRAVA, was assassinated six days later, with Brig. Gen. Gilles ANDRIAMAHAZO assuming the leadership of a Military Directorate. Andriamahazo was in turn succeeded on June 15 by Cdr. Didier RATSIRAKA, who as foreign minister since May 1972 had been instrumental in reversing Tsiranana's pro-Western policies in favor of a more Soviet-oriented and vigorously pro-Arab agenda. Subsequently, on December 21, 1975, voters approved a Socialist Revolutionary Charter and a new constitution that called for the establishment of a National Front for the Defense of the Malagasy Socialist Revolution (Front National pour la Défense de la Révolution Socialiste Malgache—FNDR) as an overarching political formation. The voters also designated Ratsiraka for a seven-year term as president of the newly styled Democratic Republic of Madagascar; thereby he continued his role as chair of a Supreme Revolutionary Council (Conseil Suprême de la Révolution—CSR) that had been established in 1972.

The new Ratsiraka government formed on January 11, 1976, was designed to reflect a regional balance of both military and civilian elements. It was reconstituted on August 20 following the accidental death of Prime Minister Joël RAKOTOMALALA on July 30 and his replacement by Justin RAKOTONIAINA on August 12. Local elections, the first since the constitutional revision, began in March 1977 and were dominated by the Vanguard of the Malagasy Revolution (Antoky'ny Revolusiona Malagasy—Arema), established by Ratsiraka a year earlier as the main FNDR component. Arema members also filled 112 of the 137 positions on the FNDR's single list of National Assembly candidates, which was approved by a reported 90 percent of voters on June 30. Ratsiraka subsequently appointed a new cabinet, headed by Prime Minister Lt. Col. Désiré RAKOTOARIJAONA.

President Ratsiraka was popularly reelected to a seven-year term on November 7, 1982, by a four-to-one margin over Monja JAONA of the National Movement for the Independence of Madagascar (Mouvement National pour l'Indépendance de Madagascar—Monima), who had campaigned on a platform attempting to capitalize on growing domestic insecurity. Assembly elections scheduled for 1982 were postponed until August 23, 1983, at which time over 500 candidates from FNDR-affiliated groups were allowed on the ballot. Arema secured 117 seats on the basis of a 65 percent vote share.

In August 1985 an army raid in Antananarivo killed 19 leaders of the country's 10,000-member kung fu sect, which was reported to be plotting a revolution. However, this hard-line approach failed to deter burgeoning opposition to administration policies among students, civil servants, and some FNDR members.

On February 12, 1988, Lt. Col. Victor RAMAHATRA (theretofore minister of public works) was named to succeed Colonel Rakotoarijaona as prime minister. While the latter's resignation was officially attributed to "health reasons," observers noted he had recently given the impression of distancing himself from the president.

With the FNDR increasingly unable to maintain control of its constituent groups, the scheduled 1988 assembly elections were postponed, ostensibly to permit their being held simultaneously with presidential balloting in November 1989. However, under powers granted by a constitutional amendment approved by the assembly in December 1988, Ratsiraka moved the presidential election up to March 12, 1989. Aided by disunity within the opposition, which fielded three candidates, Ratsiraka was reelected to another term, albeit with a reduced majority (63 percent) and with waning support in Antananarivo and other urban areas. The opposition remained in disarray after it announced a boycott of the election but then decided at the last minute to participate without having reached agreement on common candidates. Arema had little trouble maintaining its large majority in assembly balloting on May 28.

After the government thwarted a coup attempt in Antananarivo in July 1989, party leaders became increasingly critical of the administration's policies, and in early 1990 President Ratsiraka issued a decree that abolished mandatory participation in the FNDR as of March 1. A number of new parties immediately emerged, six of which joined with the Christian Council of Churches of Madagascar (Fikambanan'ny Fiangonana Kristiana Malagasy—FFKM) in sponsoring a National Meeting for a New Constitution on May 23. Ten days earlier, three people had been killed and some two dozen injured in a coup attempt by the Republican Committee for Public Safety (Comité Républicain pour le Salut Publique), whose 15 members reportedly included individuals involved in the 1989 coup attempt. Thereafter, highly publicized FFKM-opposition party conferences held August 16–19 and December 5–9 demanded abolition of the CSR, the formation of an all-party transitional government, and the convening of a constituent assembly to define the institutions of a Third Republic. Ratsiraka responded in January 1991 by announcing that he had asked the government to present a series of proposals to the assembly to bring the constitution into closer conformity with the "national and international context."

On July 28, 1991, following seven weeks of strikes and demonstrations by an opposition Active Forces (Forces Vives/Hery Velona) group, which in late June had announced the formation of an alternative "provisional" administration, Ratsiraka dissolved the government and announced that he would call for constitutional reform by the end of the year. On August 8 he appointed as prime minister the mayor of Antananarivo, Guy Willy RAZANAMASY, who, after being granted widespread executive powers, proclaimed a desire to lead his country "down the tortuous and difficult road to democracy." However, an interim government announced by Razanamasy on August 26 included no representatives of Hery Velona, the sizeable but moderate Movement for Proletarian Power (Mpitolona ho'amin'ny Fanjakan'ny Madinika—MFM), or the FFKM. As a result, the opposition launched a general strike and organized a protest rally in the capital of some 300,000 persons.

In the wake of continued unrest, Ratsiraka and Razanamasy agreed on October 29, 1991, to the formation of a new unity government that would include representatives of opposition formations, religious groups, and the armed forces. In addition, both the CSR and the assembly would be dissolved, with their functions transferred to a transitional High State Authority (Haute Autorité d'État—HAE) and a Committee for Economic and Social Recovery (Comité pour le Redressement Économique et Social—CRES). Finally, a new constitution would be drafted for submission to a popular referendum by the end of the year. Hery Velona leader Dr. Albert ZAFY was named HAE president on November 23. The result was a quadripartite distribution of power involving the prime minister, the HAE president, the CRES chair, and the increasingly marginalized president of the republic. On December 19 the cabinet was again reorganized to accommodate a more equitable distribution of opposition representatives. Thereafter, a 1,400-member National Forum met March 22–29, 1992, to draw up the new constitution, which was approved by referendum on August 19.

Zafy received 45.2 percent of the vote against seven other candidates in first-round presidential balloting on November 25, 1992. In a runoff against Ratsiraka on February 10, 1993, Zafy defeated the incumbent president by a two-to-one margin. Subsequent legislative balloting on June 16, 1993, gave Zafy supporters a majority of 75 of 138 seats on a 55 percent vote share, with the new assembly approving Francisque RAVONY as prime minister on August 9.

By mid-1995 the president and prime minister were at loggerheads, with Zafy accusing Ravony of a variety of shortcomings, including having impoverished the country through maladministration of its structural adjustment program. However, Zafy was unable to mount sufficient legislative support to secure Ravony's removal from office. As a result of the impasse, the two leaders arrived at an unusual compromise whereby Ravony would receive long-sought authorization to name a new cabinet (implemented on August 18, with the exclusion of Zafy supporters), while a constitutional referendum would be held to give the president opportunity to appoint the new prime minister.

Despite complaints of a return to authoritarianism, Zafy won a 63 percent "yes" vote at the referendum of September 17, 1995, and on October 30 he appointed Emmanuel RAKOTOVAHINY to succeed Ravony, who had resigned on October 13. Rakotovahiny's cabinet, appointed on November 10, was dominated by members of Zafy's National Union for Development and Democracy (Union Nationale pour le Développement et la Démocratie—UNDD), although the ongoing dispute regarding economic policy was underscored by the fact that the sentiments of the new finance minister, Jean-Claude RAHERIMANJATO, echoed those of former prime minister Ravony, not Zafy. That controversy came to a head in early May 1996 when IMF Director Michel Camdessus, during a visit to Antananarivo, announced that the government as constituted was not suitable to negotiate new agreements with the IMF and World Bank. Consequently, on May 17, the assembly passed a motion of nonconfidence in the government by a vote of 109–15. Although Rakotovahiny challenged the constitutionality of the vote, he submitted his resignation on May 20, and on May 28 Zafy appointed Norbert RATSIRAHONANA, chief judge of the High Constitutional Court, as the new prime minister. The cabinet announced by Ratsirahonana on June 5 was again comprised primarily of UNDD members, and many legislators boycotted Ratsirahonana's subsequent policy address to the assembly to protest the government's failure to alter its economic approach.

The executive/legislative conflict culminated on July 26, 1996, in a 99–39 assembly vote to remove Zafy from office on grounds that he had violated his oath of office by taking numerous actions contrary to the constitution and the "interests of the entire Malagasy people." Zafy challenged the legality of the decision, charging that the assembly was attempting a "constitutional coup." However, on September 5 the High Constitutional Court upheld the assembly's action and appointed Prime Minister Ratsirahonana to serve as interim president until new elections were held (within 90 days at the most). (Zafy, arguing he had "done nothing wrong to my country," nevertheless announced his resignation upon the issuance of the court's decision, in part, apparently, to become a candidate in the new presidential poll.) Ratsirahonana appointed an interim government (including representatives from a number of factions and parties) on September 13. Later in the month he presented the government's revised framework for economic policy to IMF officials, who indicated that at least theoretical progress was being made.

Fifteen candidates contested the first round of the special presidential balloting on November 3, 1996. The front-runner was former president Ratsiraka (who had returned in late September from 18 months of self-imposed exile in Paris), with 36.6 percent of the vote. He was followed by Zafy, 23.4 percent; Herizo RAZAFIMAHALEO (head of the "non-politician" Leader-Fanilo party), 15 percent; Ratsirahonana, 10 percent; and National Assembly Speaker Rev. Richard ANDRIAMANJATO, 5 percent. Runoff balloting between Ratsiraka and Zafy took place on December 29, Razafinahaleo having thrown his support to the former while Ratsirahonana endorsed the latter. Preliminary results showed Ratsiraka ahead by about 30,000 votes. However, final publication of the official results was suspended in early January after Zafy alleged that fraud had occurred within the interior ministry during vote tabulation.

On January 30, 1997, Ratsiraka was proclaimed president by virtue of a 51 percent share of the second-round polling. On February 21 Ratsiraka named Pascal RAKOTOMAVO, a business executive and Arema official, as prime minister. One week later Rakotomavo formed a new multiparty government.

On July 15, 1997, the High Constitutional Court approved the government's proposal to push back the next legislative elections (originally scheduled for mid-1997) to May 1998. Consequently, the term of the National Assembly (then set to expire in August) was extended to mid-1998. For its part, the opposition rejected the government's claim that the additional time was necessary to properly prepare for the balloting, calling the delays "illegal." Relations between the president and his opponents plummeted when he announced plans to organize a constitutional referendum based on his proposal to return Madagascar to its pre-1995 provincial system. On February 4, 1998, opposition legislators failed in their effort to impeach Ratsiraka over the matter, and on March 15 the referendum was approved by a narrow margin (50.96 percent). The constitution of the Third Republic entered into force on April 8, providing for a federal system comprising six provincial governments. At the same time, changes in the structure of the central government led opponents of Ratsiraka to accuse him of attempting to consolidate power in a "presidential regime."
