In legislative balloting on May 17, 1998, Arema captured 63 seats. The next largest bloc of seats, 32, went to a group of independent, but predominantly propresidential, candidates. The propresidential Leader-Fanilo party followed with 16. In the end, after further defections to Arema by a number of former moderate opposition groups, propresidential legislators reportedly controlled at least 90 percent of the assembly posts (albeit, in a body whose powers had been diminished by the March constitutional amendments). On July 6 a power struggle between Prime Minister Rakotomavo and Deputy Prime Minister Rajaonarivelo culminated in the resignation from the government of the latter along with 17 other ministers. Unable to govern and constitutionally obligated to resign following assembly elections, Rakotomavo left office on July 22. The following day the president appointed Tantely René Gabrio ANDRIANARIVO, an Arema stalwart and former deputy prime minister, to replace Rakotomavo, and on July 31 a new government was named in which Arema controlled all the key portfolios. The virtually unchallenged appointment of Arema members to all critical cabinet posts in July 1998 underscored the extent to which President Ratsiraka and Arema had secured control of Malagasy political affairs by way of constitutional referendum and legislative elections. On the other hand, the administration's economic recovery program continued to falter, with its halting privatization efforts and apparent unwillingness to adhere to international reform prescriptions undermining its chances of securing much needed financial aid. In late 1998 new economic initiatives were announced, with a focus on customs and revenue collection reforms accompanying further privatization pledges.

In March 1999 opposition activists ignored the government's refusal to grant them permission to organize a protest march and demonstrated in Antananarivo. It was widely believed that the unrest in the capital was the start of an intensive campaign to unseat the president, although the opposition remained essentially disorganized into early 2001, as evidenced by the weak performance of anti-Ratsiraka groupings in the March Senate election. (Arema dominated the first Senate elections on March 18, 2001, securing 49 of the 60 elected seats.) However, a number of smaller parties subsequently endorsed the presidential candidacy of Marc RAVALOMANANA, the supermarket magnate and mayor of Antananarivo who had gained strong support among the middle class with his promises to spur economic growth.

There were six candidates in the December 16, 2001, presidential balloting, which produced highly controversial and destabilizing results. The government reported that no candidate had secured 50 percent of the votes and that a runoff was required between President Ratsiraka (officially credited with 41 percent of the first-round votes) and Ravalomanana, who had been credited with a front-running 46 percent. However, Ravalomanana, supported by the I Love Madagascar (Tiako I Madagasikara—TIM) political association, argued that he had in fact won nearly 52 percent of the first-round votes, setting the stage for massive political turmoil in early 2002. Ravalomanana's supporters poured into the streets of the capital in late January to protest the government's ruling that a second round of presidential balloting was required. This argument was bolstered by international observers who concluded that massive tampering had occurred in the initial official tabulations.

As demonstrations continued, Ravalomanana declared himself president on February 22, 2002, and began installation of his own cabinet under the leadership of Jacques SYLLA. Ratsiraka responded by declaring a state of martial law. Conditions deteriorated in March as supporters of the two parallel governments clashed violently in Antananarivo, control of which was ultimately gained by Ravalomanana's forces while Ratsiraka's forces established a rival capital in the eastern city of Toamasina. Negotiations in Senegal in April pointed toward a compromise settlement. However, on April 17 the supreme court of Madagascar declared the initial published results of the December 16 voting void and ordered a recount, which, as reported by the High Constitutional Court, showed that Ravalomanana had indeed won a first-round majority of 51.5 percent. Ravalomanana was formally inaugurated on May 6, although Ratsiraka refused to accept the legitimacy of that situation and continued to fight it. However, the United States officially recognized Ravalomanana as president of Madagascar on June 26, and similar action by France on July 3 sealed the fate of Ratsiraka, who left the country on July 5 for eventual exile in France. (In August 2003, Ratsiraka and two former officials of the Central Bank were tried and sentenced in absentia to ten years hard labor for allegedly embezzling $8.25 million from the bank during the crisis.)

Once in office, Ravalomanana dramatically reduced the size of the cabinet from 30 to 20 posts. However, in the interest of national conciliation, he included a number of members of former Ratsiraka cabinets in the new government.

Early legislative elections were held on December 15, 2002, with Ravalomanana's TIM party winning a majority in the assembly of 103 seats. Their allies, the Patriot Front, an electoral alliance that supported Ravalomanana, gained an additional 22 seats. Arema's representation declined to 3 seats. Significantly, 23 deputies were elected as independents. The elections were remarkable in that they were the first in which foreign monitors were allowed to observe the polling. Following the balloting, Sylla was reappointed prime minister on January 12, 2003.

In local elections (boycotted by Arema) held on November 9 and 23, 2003, the TIM continued its electoral dominance and won the mayoral races in 27 of the country's 45 major cities.

Constitution and Government

Under the 1992 constitution a president is directly elected for a four-year term, by runoff between the two leading contenders if such is needed to secure a majority. Cabinet leadership is assigned to a prime minister, who was initially responsible to the legislature but whose appointment (from a legislative list) and dismissal are now presidential prerogatives. The bicameral Parliament consists of a Senate of both indirectly elected and nominated members and a National Assembly of deputies directly elected by proportional representation.

In 1995 Madagascar's former six provinces were replaced by 28 regions. The former 111 prefectures (fivondronana) were replaced by 148 departments and the former 1,252 subprefectures (firaisana) by 1,400 communes, of which 45 were urban.

The constitutional amendments of 1998 effectively reversed the changes incorporated in 1995, so as to establish, under the guiding principles of "humanism and ecology," a federal system wherein each of six semi-autonomous provinces would have its own governor, legislature, and economic and social councils. The central government retains control of diplomatic, defense, and budgetary efforts. The amended document also included provisions for the establishment of regional and communal districts; however, as of mid-2006 no further progress toward their creation had been reported.

Foreign Relations

During the Tsiranana administration, Madagascar retained close economic, defense, and cultural ties with France. In 1973, however, the Ramanantsoa government renegotiated all cooperation agreements with the former colonial power, withdrew from the Franc Zone, and terminated its membership in the francophone Common African and Malagasy Organization. Over the next several years a number of agreements with the Republic of South Africa were repudiated, diplomatic relations with Communist nations were established, and pro-Arab policies were announced. In 1979 the government offered the former Israeli embassy in Antananarivo to the Palestine Liberation Organization as a base for local activity, while support was consistently offered to African liberation movements.

Subsequently, there was a drift towards the West; ambassadorial links with Washington were restored in November 1980 after a lapse of more than four years, and aid agreements were negotiated with the United States, France, Japan, and a number of Scandinavian countries. On the other hand, talks were initiated in Moscow in 1984 on improving trade with the Soviet Union, and agreements to strengthen bilateral relations with China were announced in 1986. (Although the country let Taiwan open a special delegation in Antananarivo during President Zafy's term, President Ratsiraka overturned that decision in December 2000, announcing that Madagascar recognized "only one China, represented by the People's Republic.")

In a dramatic policy reversal in mid-1990, economic and air links were established with South Africa as President Ratsiraka, heralding President De Klerk's "courageous" efforts to reverse apartheid laws, sought Pretoria's aid in developing Madagascar's mineral and tourism industries. In September 1998 Ratsiraka attended an international conference in Durban, thus becoming the first-ever Malagasy head of state to visit South Africa. Subsequent regional negotiations focused on the prospect of Madagascar joining the SADC (achieved in 2006).

Following the disputed presidential election of 2001, several countries terminated diplomatic relations with Madagascar and the country was suspended from meetings of the African Union (AU). In June 2002 the Ravalomanana government was recognized by the United States; France and Senegal recognized the government in July of the same year. The AU suspension was lifted in July 2003 after the legislative elections.

In April 2006 German President Horst Köhler visited Madagascar to promote trade relations, and on a state visit to Madagascar in July French President Jacques Chirac apologized for the actions of French troops during a 1947 revolt against French rule. Meanwhile, President Ravalomanana visited China to bolster Sino-Malagasy economic relations.

Current Issues

In June 2004 a grenade attack at an Independence Day ceremony injured 30 people and led to speculation about renewed political violence. The following month there were separate grenade attacks on the homes of politicians associated with President Ravalomanana. These attacks coincided with a rise in street protests over poverty, the slow pace of economic reforms, and worsening inflation. In addition, reservists in the armed services who participated in the 2001–2002 political crisis held a number of protests in which they demanded more compensation for their service.

Tensions continued into 2005, security forces using tear gas and grenades to disperse an opposition rally in October led by former president Zafy in pursuit of an amnesty for those arrested for their roles in the 2001–2002 conflict. Further protests planned for March 2006 were cancelled after armed riot police were deployed in the capital. Meanwhile, President Ravalomanana announced that new presidential balloting would be held on December 3. He called for a conference of pro-presidential and opposition parties to try to negotiate terms that would preclude a repeat of the instability that had followed the last presidential poll. For its part, the opposition as of mid-year was reportedly making little progress in regard to coalescing behind a single candidate to challenge Ravalomanana.

Political Parties and Groups

While Madagascar has long featured multiple parties, they were required under the 1975 constitution to function as components of a national front (see Arema, below). The requirement was rescinded under a decree that became effective on March 1, 1990. A number of new groups promptly emerged, several of which participated in the launching of a somewhat loosely structured anti-Ratsiraka coalition that resulted from church-sponsored conferences later in the year. By early 1992 two opposition tendencies were evident: a relatively moderate grouping centered on the MFM (see PMDM/MFM, below) that evidenced a gradualist approach to constitutional change, and a more intransigent Living Forces group, led by the UNDD's Albert Zafy, that only grudgingly agreed to participate in the transitional regime but went on to capture the presidency in late February 1993 and a majority of legislative seats in mid-June.

By March 1998 two large opposition coalitions claimed the services of the leading anti-Ratsiraka politicians. The Panorama Group was organized in September 1997 under the leadership of former prime minister Ravony and was described as a counterbalance to the more radical Union of Democratic Active Forces (Union des Forces Vives Démocratique—UFVD), which was formed in early 1998 by Zafy. However, they were superseded in 2001 when most anti-Ratsiraka elements informally coalesced behind the presidential candidacy of Marc Ravalomanana.

In December 2004, several opposition parties agreed to form a parliamentary coalition to promote a “third way” between the progovernment TIM and the antigovernment Arema. The resultant grouping was named the Parliamentary Solidarity for Democracy and National Union (Solidarité des Parlementaires pour la Défense de la Démocratie et de l'Unité Nationale—SPDUN). The SPDUN, which included several parties who had supported Ravalomanana in the 2002 presidential election, announced its intention to serve as the “loyal opposition” to the Sylla government. Included in the SPDUN were the AKFM-Fanavaozana, the RPSD-Nouveau, the PMDM/MFM, and the AVI. Rev. Richard Andriamanjato of the AKFM-Fanavaozana and Jean Eugène Voninahitsy of the RPSD-Nouveau were chosen as coleaders of the SPDUN.

In advance of the 2006 presidential elections, three opposition groupings formed another loose coalition called the 3 National Forces

(3 Forces Nationale—3FN), led by former president Zafy. The 3FN consisted of Zafy's CRN (below), the SPDUN, and the Rally of National Forces (Rassemblement des Forces Nationales—RFN), led by Rev. Rafimanaheja EDMOND. The 3FN led a series of protests against the government in 2005 and sought a transitional government prior to the presidential polling.

Propresidential Parties

I Love Madagascar (Tiaho I Madagasikara—TIM). A “political association,” the TIM was formed to support the presidential campaign of Marc Ravalomanana, the businessman who had been elected mayor of Antananarivo in 1999 as an independent. Ravalomanana's candidacy was also endorsed by numerous other parties, including the AVI, RPSD, PMDM/MFM, and Grad-Iloafo. The TIM became a formal party in mid-2002 and became the majority party in the assembly following the 2002 legislative elections, when it received 34.3 percent of the vote and 104 seats. The TIM also did well in local elections in November 2003, winning 27 of 45 major mayoral races.

In 2005, an internal power struggle emerged within the TIM, and Prime Minister Jacques Sylla failed to be reelected as the party's secretary general at a congress in January 2005. Reports suggested that Ravalomanana feared Sylla would challenge him in the next presidential election and therefore wanted to dismiss the prime minister in the summer of 2005. Nevertheless, the two continued to work together, as a rift between Ravalomanana and (then) assembly speaker Jean LAHINIRIAKO in 2006 moved to the forefront of party friction. Lahiniriako was ejected from the TIM and subsequently announced his intention to run for president in December.

Leaders: Marc RAVALOMANANA (President of the Republic), Jacques SYLLA (Prime Minister), Solofonantenaina RAZOARIMIHAJA (Chair).

Rally for Socialism and Democracy (Rassemblement pour le Socialisme et la Démocratie—RPSD). The RPSD is the current incarnation of the Social Democratic Party (Parti Social Démocrate—PSD) that was legalized in March 1990 as a revival of the party originally formed in 1957 by Philibert Tsiranana. (The group is still frequently referenced under the PSD rubric.) Although initially viewed as sympathetic to the Ratsiraka government, the party became increasingly critical of the rapid pace of its economic liberalization efforts and in the second half of 1990 moved into opposition. The party's prestige was bolstered by the addition of former MFM leaders Franck Ramarosoa and Evariste Marson in 1990 and 1992, respectively. The RPSD supported Albert Zafy in the second presidential round (after a bid by Marson had failed in the first) and went into opposition after the June 1993 poll. Jean-Eugène Voninahitsy, RPSD secretary general and vice president of the National Assembly, received just less than 3 percent of the vote in the first round of the 1996 presidential election.

The RPSD won 11 seats in legislative balloting in May 1998, and thereafter the group was reported to have joined Arema's legislative alliance. In late 2000, however, relations between Arema and the RPSD were strained when Voninahitsy was arrested on charges of insulting the head of the state and “putting out false information.” Earlier, he had criticized Ratsiraka for purchases made by the state. The RPSD subsequently left Arema's legislative faction by late 2000 and supported opposition candidate Marc Ravalomanana in the 2001 presidential campaign. Disaffected members of the RPSD left the party to join the Patriotic Front (FP) prior to the 2002 elections (two former RPSD members were elected as FP candidates in the balloting). The RPSD allied itself with the TIM in the election and secured 5 seats in the polling.

In 2003 dissidents led by former secretary general Jean Eugène VONINAHITSY left the party to form a new group, the New RPSD or RPSD-Nouveau, which was subsequently active in the anti-Ravalomanana protests of October 2005.

Leaders: Pierre TSIRANANA (son of the former president), Evariste MARSON, André RESAMPA.

Opposition Parties

Patriot Front (Firaisankinam-Pirenenai—FP). The FP was an electoral alliance formed by the AVI and former members of the RPSD in 2002 to support the presidency of Marc Ravalomanana. The FP allied itself with the TIM in order to help to secure a pro-presidential majority in the 2002 legislative elections, at which the FP won 22 seats. However, the AVI had moved into the opposition camp by 2006, and the FP appeared defunct.

One Should Be Judged By One's Works (Asa Vita Ifampitsanara—AVI). In May 1998 the AVI won 14 assembly seats under the leadership of former prime minister and interim president Norbert Ratsirahonana, who had theretofore positioned the grouping as a moderate opposition party aligned with the Panorama Group. Subsequently, however, the AVI joined the Arema-led pro-presidential legislative alliance.

In what was considered an important development in the 2001 presidential campaign, Ratsirahonana withdrew his candidacy in late October and endorsed Marc Ravalomanana. The AVI joined the pro-Ravalomanana FP in 2002, and AVI members secured 20 of the coalition's 22 seats in the legislative elections. However, the AVI joined the SPDUN in 2006, thereby distancing itself from the president.

Leader: Norbert RATSIRAHONANA.

Militant Party for the Development of Madagascar (Parti Militant pour le Développement de Madagascar—PMDM/MFM). The PMDM/MFM is a successor name for the Movement for Proletarian Power (Mouvement pour le Pouvoir Proletarien/Mpitolona ho'amin'ny Fanjakan'ny Madinika—MFM) formed in 1972 by student radicals who helped to overthrow President Tsiranana. The MFM initially opposed the Ratsiraka government and was not an FNDR component in the 1977 balloting. In what was called a “fitful collaboration” with the FNDR that led to internal divisiveness and “confusion,” the group won three assembly seats in 1983. Although its leaders subsequently cultivated an increasingly moderate outlook, a drive to reestablish support among student militants was reported in 1987, followed by a pronounced shift into opposition. The party obtained seven assembly seats in May 1989 after its leader, Manandafy Rakotonirina, placed second in the presidential balloting with 19 percent of the vote. After completing a “conversion to liberalism,” the MFM pressed for the establishment of a market economy and a Western-style multiparty system.

Although it continues to be referenced by its earlier Malagasy initials, the party adopted its current name at a 1990 party congress during which the National Council elected a three-member National Bureau composed of the party's president, secretary general, and treasurer.

MFM leader Rakotonirina, who stood as a first-round presidential contender in 1992, supported Albert Zafy in the second round. Following the legislative poll of June 1993, the MFM went into opposition. It supported prime minister and interim president Norbert Ratsirahonana in the 1996 presidential balloting.

Like its former Cartel HVR partner, the AVI, the PMDM/MFM reportedly swung back over to the government camp following the May 1998 legislative elections but then supported opposition candidate Marc Ravalomanana in the 2001 presidential campaign. In the 2002 elections, the MFM won two seats in National Assembly.

Leaders: Manandafy RAKOTONIRINA (President), Germain RAKOTONIRAINY (Secretary General).

Vanguard of the Malagasy Revolution (Avant-Garde de la Révolution Malgache/Antoky'ny Revolosiona Malagasy—Arema). Arema was organized by Didier Ratsiraka in 1976 and subsequently served as the nucleus of the National Front for the Defense of the Malagasy Socialist Revolution (Front National pour la Défense de la Révolution Socialiste Malgache—FNDR), which was renamed the Militant Movement for Malagasy Socialism (Mouvement Militant pour le Socialisme Malgache—MMSM) in mid-1990. The 1975 constitution provided for organization of the FNDR as the country's overarching political entity, with a variety of "revolutionary associations" participating in the presidential balloting of November 1982 and the legislative election of August 1983 as FNDR components. However, beginning in early 1987 three FNDR members (the MFM, Vonjy, and Monima) initiated joint antigovernment activity and, in what constituted the demise of the FNDR's political monopoly, contested the 1989 presidential and legislative elections as the equivalent of opposition formations.

After losing the 1992 presidential election, Ratsiraka eventually moved to Paris, France, from where he regularly criticized the Zafy administration and what he described as the "chaos" of political affairs in Madagascar. In 1993 he formed the Vanguard for Economic and Social Recovery (Avant-Garde pour le Redressement Economique et Social—ARES) as a successor to Arema; however, the Arema acronym and earlier title continued to be used by his supporters and media groups.

On November 29, 1997, at Arema's first party congress since taking power the previous January, Deputy Prime Minister Pierrot Rajaonarivelo was elected to the secretary general's post vacated by Ratsiraka when he assumed the national presidency. In addition, the party established another governing body, styled the "national college." The party also reportedly adopted the Malagasy title, Andry sy Riana Enti-Manavotra an'i Madagasikara, or Supporting Pillar and Structure for the Salvation of Madagascar; however, it was not clear if the new label was an official name, and the Arema acronym once again remained in common use.

In legislative balloting in May 1998 Arema and its allies secured an overwhelming mandate (its forces reportedly controlled approximately 90 percent of the assembly seats). Meanwhile, intraparty relations between Rajaonarivelo and Prime Minister Rakotomavo reached a nadir on July 6 when Rajaonarivelo and 17 of his ministerial allies withdrew from the cabinet, thereby paralyzing the government and effectively destroying Rakotomavo's chances for reappointment.

In 2000–2001 disagreements were reported between Arema's liberal wing, headed by Rajaonarivelo, and the "orthodox" wing represented by ministers Nivoson Jacquit Rosat SIMON and Boniface LEVELO.

After failing to receive the party's endorsement for the 2001 Senate balloting, Arema member Jean André Soja presented an "Independent List of Jean André Soja" for the election in Toliara Province, securing three "independent" seats.

Following the violence surrounding the 2001 presidential election, Arema experienced a wide-scale loss of public support. Ratsiraka and other senior Arema figures, including Secretary General Pierrot Rajaonarivelo, went into exile in France. In the legislative balloting in 2002, Arema secured only three seats, and it boycotted local elections in 2003. In 2003 Rajaonarivelo was sentenced in absentia to five years in prison on several charges involving his alleged abuse of office while deputy prime minister. Reports subsequently indicated a growing split in the party, with one faction loyal to the exiled leadership and a second group (led by Assistant Secretary General Pierre RAHARI-JOANA) eager to distance itself from the exiles. In 2006 Rajaonarivelo called upon the government to issue an amnesty to potential candidates, such as himself, for the upcoming presidential poll whose sentences would otherwise preclude them from participating. Arema was also pressuring President Ravalomanana to hold meetings with Ratsiraka prior to the elections to negotiate the return of the Arema exiles.

Leaders: Adm. Didier RATSIRAKA (Former President of the Republic, in exile), Herivelsona RAMANANTSOA, Tantely René Gabrio ANDRIANARIVO (Former Prime Minister), José ANDRIANOELISON, Pierrot Jocelyn RAJAONARIVELO (Secretary General, in exile).

Leader-Fanilo. Launched in 1993 by a group of self-styled "nonpoliticians," Leader-Fanilo opposed President Zafy in the September 1995 referendum and expelled Trade and Tourism Minister Henri RAKOTONIRAINY for accepting cabinet reappointment two months later.

Party leader Herizo Razafimahaleo finished third in the first round of the 1996 presidential balloting with 15 percent of the vote and fourth in 2001 with 4.2 percent. (Three Leader-Fanilo cabinet members resigned from the government in early October 2001 after Razafimahaleo announced his intention to campaign for the presidency.) In balloting for the National Assembly in 2002, Leader-Fanilo gained two seats.

Leader: Herizo RAZAFIMAHALEO.

Other Parties and Groups

Congress Party for Madagascar Independence-Renewal (Parti du Congrès de l'Indépendance de Madagascar-Renouveau—AKFM-Fanavaozana). The AKFM-Fanavaozana was launched in 1989 by Rev. Richard Andriamanjato, the longtime leader of the AKFM-KDRSM (below), in opposition to the government's acceptance of IMF-mandated economic reforms. Although it only won three assembly seats in 1989, the new formation received substantial urban support in subsequent local elections.

Andriamanjato supported Albert Zafy in his presidential campaign of 1993; however, the two became estranged by early 1996. Andriamanjato, who was speaker of the assembly, led the subsequent legislative campaign against Zafy and ran as a candidate himself in the 1996 presidential election, securing 6 percent of the vote in the first round of balloting.

AKFM-Fanavaozana remained neutral in the 2001 presidential campaign, despite the fact that two party members were then holding cabinet posts. It did not gain any seats in the 2002 legislative elections.

Leader: Rev. Richard ANDRIAMANJATO.

Action and Reflection Group for the Development of Madagascar (Groupe d'Action et Réflexion pour le Développement de Madagascar—Grad-Iloafo). Grad-Iloafo was formed in mid-1991 by a former member of Monima (below), who left the latter in 1983 because of an "absence of democracy" within its ranks. Grad-Iloafo won a single seat in the legislative elections in 1998. It supported Marc Ravalomanana in the 2001 presidential campaign but failed to gain representation in the 2002 legislative balloting.

Leader: Tovonanahary RABETSITONTA.

Support Group for Democracy and Development in Madagascar (Comité de Soutien à la Démocratie et au Développement de Madagascar—CSDDM). The CSDDM was organized in December 1992 by Deputy Prime Minister Francisque Ravony in support of Albert Zafy's presidential bid. Ravony was named prime minister in August 1993, but he resigned in October 1995 because of the outcome of the September 17 constitutional referendum. Ravony was a prominent member of the coalition that supported Marc Ravalomanana in the 2001 presidential campaign.

Leaders: Francisque RAVONY (Former Prime Minister), José Yvon RASERIJONA (Former Finance Minister and Secretary General of the Party).

National Reconciliation Committee (Comité pour la Réconciliation Nationale—CRN). The CRN was launched in 2002 by former president Albert Zafy and other prominent former officials in an attempt to foster a solution to the "post-election crisis" pitting the supporters of former president Ratsiraka against the supporters of President Ravalomanana. Zafy had previously served as the leader of the National Union for Development and Democracy (Union Nationale pour le Développement et la Démocratie—UNDD), a revival of a party originally organized in 1955. The UNDD was particularly strident in its denunciation of "corruption" under the Ratsiraka regime. Zafy, its founder, was foreign minister under President Ramanantsoa. In 1991 Zafy was named to head the High State Authority under the Provisional Government. In May 1993, following his election as president of the republic, he resigned as UNDD president, being accorded the title of honorary party president. Though it participated in the 1993 legislative poll as a Forces Vives member, the UNDD won seven seats in its own right. UNDD members dominated the November 1995 and May 1996 cabinets, but that was not the case in the September 1996 interim government. Zafy won 5.35 percent in the first round of presidential balloting in December 2001.

Zafy had also recently been affiliated with the Living Forces Rasalama Coalition (Cartel Hery Velona Rasalama—Cartel HVR), which had been launched in 1990 as the Committee of Living Forces (Comité des Forces Vives), an alliance of some 16 anti-Ratsiraka opposition parties, trade unions, and religious groups. The Cartel HVR rubric was assumed in 1993, although the grouping was also often subsequently referenced as Forces Vives Rasalama (Rasalama being the name of a 19th-century Christian martyr).

The only solid common bond among the components of the Living Forces appeared to be their opposition to the Ratsiraka regime, and cohesiveness subsequently deteriorated. Prior to presidential balloting in 1996 a number of parties disavowed their alliance membership.

In legislative balloting in May 1998 what remained of the pro-Zafy grouping competed under the banner of the recently established Action, Truth, Development, and Harmony (Asa Fahamarianana Fampandrosoana Arinda—AFFA). Six AFFA candidates, including Zafy, were elected. The AFFA supported Zafy in the 2001 presidential election, but failed to gain any seats for itself in the 2002 legislative balloting.

The CRN never formally recognized the legitimacy of the presidency of Marc Ravalomanana and continued in 2005 and the first half of 2006 to call for a “transitional regime” to govern before new elections are held, lest the problems of 2001–2002 be repeated.

Leaders: Dr. Albert ZAFY (Former President of the Republic), Emmanuel RAKOTOVAHINY (Former Prime Minister).

Popular Impulse for National Unity (Elan Populaire pour l'Unité Nationale/Vonjy Iray Tsy Mivaky—VITM or Vonjy). A centrist, Catholic-oriented group formed in 1973 by followers of former president Tsiranana, Vonjy lost one of its seven seats at the 1983 election despite speculation that it might be runner-up to Arema. Subsequently, it split into pro- and anti-Arema factions, a division that was seemingly resolved at an extraordinary congress held in February 1987 that adopted a solid posture of opposition. The party elected four members of the assembly in May 1989 after its leader placed third in the March presidential poll with a 15 percent vote share. Subsequently, the party was depleted by defections, primarily to the PSD, amid claims that its leadership was politically and financially corrupt. In December 1990 two Vonjy members, Joma ERNEST and Jean-Jacques RAFALIMANANA, were given prison sentences for their alleged involvement in the May coup attempt. The party captured one assembly seat in 1993. Vonjy supported President Ratsiraka in his 2001 reelection bid. The VITM won only .12 percent of the vote in the 2002 legislative elections.

Leader: Dr. Jérôme Marojàma RAZANABAHINY.

Congress Party for Madagascar Independence (Parti du Congrès de l'Indépendance de Madagascar/Antokon'ny Kongresy Ho An'ny Fahaleovantenan'i Madagasikara-Komity Demokratika Manohana ny Republika Socialista Malagasy—AKFM-KDRSM). The AKFM-KDRSM was founded as a left-wing alliance of radical and middle- and upper-class nationalist movements in which communist influence, largely of a pro-Soviet orientation, played a significant role. The party won 16 seats in the 1977 legislative election, 7 of which were lost in 1983. The Central Committee endorsed President Ratsiraka for reelection in early 1989, overruling party cofounder Richard Andriamanjato. Andriamanjato responded by forming the splinter AKFM-Renewal party. The AKFM rump won 2 seats in the 1989 election, but none in 1993 or 1998. In 2002, the AKFM-KDRSM received only .42 percent of the vote in the legislative elections.

Leaders: Rakotovaio ANDRIANTIANA (Chair), Giselle RABESAHALA.

National Movement for the Independence of Madagascar/Madagascar for the Malagasy Party (Mouvement National pour l'Indépendance de Madagascar/Madagasikara Otronin'ny Malagasy—Monima). A left-wing nationalist party

based in the south, Monima (also called Monima Ka Miviombio—Monima K) withdrew from the National Front after the local elections of March 1977, charging it had been the victim of electoral fraud. As a result, it was awarded no places on the National Front's list for the June legislative election. Its longtime leader, Monja JAONA, was under house arrest from November 1980 to March 1982, at which time he agreed to bring the group back into the FNDR and was appointed a member of the Supreme Revolutionary Council (SCR). He subsequently joined the 1982 presidential election as Commander Ratsiraka's only competitor, winning 20 percent of the vote. In December it was reported that he had been stripped of his membership on the SCR and again placed under house arrest for activities "likely to bring about the fall of the country." He was released in mid-August 1983, after undertaking a hunger strike, and returned to the legislature following the August 28 election as one of Monima's two representatives. The party's poor showing (less than 4 percent of valid votes cast) in 1983 was partly attributed to uncertainty, prior to Jaona's release, as to whether it would participate. Jaona secured only a 3 percent vote share in the 1989 presidential balloting and was the only assemblyman elected by the party in May. The aging leader was subsequently named chair of the SCR, having rejected calls from other opposition figures to join them in maintaining a solid anti-government front. Monima's deputy general secretary, René RANAIVOSOA resigned from the party in June 1990 following a dispute with Jaona, and established the Democratic Party for Madagascar Development (Parti Démocratique pour le Développement de Madagascar—PDDM/ADFM).

In early 1992 Joana was named a special advisor to the president, and on March 31 he was seriously wounded during a pro-Ratsiraka demonstration that included a clash with soldiers guarding the concluding session of the National Forum. Monima's influence has declined since Jaona's death, although the party pledged in 2000 to be more visible and reportedly endorsed President Ratsiraka in his subsequent reelection bid. In the 2002 legislative balloting, Monima won less than 1 percent of the vote.

Leader: Monja ROIDERO (Chair).

Socialist Monima (Parti Socialiste Monima/Vondrona Sosialista Monima—VSM). The VSM was organized in late 1977 by a pro-Beijing group that had withdrawn from Monima. Subsequently unrepresented in the assembly, it supported MFM candidate Manandafy Rakotonirina for the presidency in 1989. The VSM did not participate in the 2002 legislative balloting.

Leaders: Tsihozony MAHARANGA (President), Romance RABETSITONTA, André RAZAFINDRABE (National Secretary).

Malagasy Christian Democratic Union (Union Démocratique Chrétien Malgache—Udecma). The tiny Udecma is a progressive Christian Democratic group formerly known as the Rassemblement National Malgache (RNM). It won two legislative seats in 1977, both of which were lost in 1983 and not recovered in 1989. The party took no official position in the 1989 presidential campaign.

Leader: Solo Norbert ANDRIAMORASATA.

Militant Malagasy Movement (Mouvement Militant Malgache/ Malagasy Mivondrona Mitolona—MMM). The MMM is led by a Udecma dissident, who had earlier been a pro-Ratsiraka activist within Arema.

Leader: Zaka Soa Max Halvanie RANDRIAMBAOMAHOVA.

Christian Democratic Movement of Madagascar (Mouvement des Démocrates Chrétiens de Malgaches—MDCM). Formed in 1990, the MDCM is a right-wing group whose platform calls for reentry into the Franc Zone and the establishment of relations with Israel and South Africa. Its leader was once a former minister under Tsiranana.

Leader: Jean-Jacques RAKOTONIAINA.

Christian Democratic Party of Madagascar (Parti Démocrate Chrétien de Madagascar—PDCM). One of the parties formed in the wake of the March 1990 decree, the PDCM has vied with Udecma and the MDCM for acceptance as

Cabinet

As of June 1, 2006

Prime Minister

Jacques Sylla

Ministers

Agriculture, Livestock, and Fisheries	Harison Edmond Randriarimanana
Civil Service, Labor, and Social Laws	Jean Theodore Ranjivason
Culture and Tourism	Jean Jacques Rabenirina
Decentralization and Development of Autonomous Provinces	Angelin Randrianarison
Economy, Finance, and Budget	Andriamparany Radavidson
Education and Scientific Research	Haja Nirina Razafinjatovo
Energy and Mines	Jaquis H. Rabarison
Environment, Water, and Forests	Gen. Charles Sylvain Rabotoarison
Foreign Affairs	Gen. Marcel Ranjeva
Health and Family Planning	Jean-Louis Robinson Richard
Industrialization, Commerce, and Development of the Private Sector	Roger-Marie Rafanomezantsoa
Interior and Administrative Reform	Lt. Gen. Charles Rabemananjara
Justice and Keeper of the Seals	Lala Henriette Ratsiharovala [f]
National Defense	Maj.-Gen. Petera Behajaina
Population, Social Protection, and Leisure	Andriamatoa Zafilaza
Posts, Telecommunications, and Communication	Clermont Gervais Mahazaka
Transport, Public Works, and Local Government	Roland Randriamampionona
Youth and Sports	Tombo Ramandimbisoa

Secretaries of State

Decentralization and Development of Autonomous Provinces Public Security

Eniavisoa
Gen. Lucien Victor Razakanirina

[f] = female

Madagascar's internationally recognized Christian Democratic formation.

Leader: Alexis BEZAKA.

Rally for Madagascar's Muslim Democrats (Rassemblement pour les Démocrates des Musulmans de Madagascar—RDMM). The RDMM was officially recognized on September 30, 1997.

Leader: Jean-Louis RAZANABOHITRA.

Other parties include the Malagasy Federalist Party, a formerly pro-Ratsiraka grouping led by Henri LECACHEUR that reportedly endorsed Marc Ravalomanana in the 2001 presidential campaign, and the pro-Arema party, the Toamasina

Tonga Saina (TTS). Roland RATSIRAKA (the nephew of the former president, the mayor of Toamasina, and a member of the TTS) in 2006 announced his candidacy for the upcoming presidential election.

Legislature

The 1992 constitution provides for a bicameral Parliament (Parlement) consisting of a Senate and a National Assembly.

Senate (Sénat). The upper house has 90 members, 60 of which (10 from each province) are indirectly elected by electoral colleges comprised of the provincial councillors and mayors. The remaining 30 senators are appointed by the president in consultation with legal, economic, social, and cultural groups. The term of office is six years.

The first electoral college elections at the provincial level were held on March 18, 2001, resulting in the following seat distribution: Vanguard of the Malagasy Revolution, 49; Leader-Fanilo, 5; One Should Be Judged By One's Works, 2; Action, Truth, Development, and Harmony, 1; and independents (from the "Independent List of Jean André Soja" in Toliara Province), 3. The presidential appointments followed on April 17. President Ravalomanana appointed 30 members in July 2002, most of whom were reportedly members of his new I Love Madagascar party.

Speaker: Guy Rajemison RAKOTOMANORO.

National Assembly (Assemblée Nationale). The lower house encompasses 160 (formerly 138) members directly elected by proportional representation for five-year terms. At the most recent election of December 15, 2002, the I Love Madagascar party won 103 seats; the Patriotic Front, 22; the Rally for Socialism and Democracy, 5; the Vanguard of the Malagasy Revolution, 3; Leader-Fanilo, 2; the Militant Party for the Development of Madagascar, 2; and independents, 23. (The next election is due in December 2007.)

Speaker: Mahafaritsy Samuel RAZAKANIRINA.

Communications

Press

Media censorship in Madagascar was formally lifted in March 1989. A communication bill approved in December 1990 provided further liberalization, including the limitation of a requirement that journalists reveal their sources to state security personnel. The following are dailies published in Antananarivo in Malagasy, unless otherwise noted: Midi-Madagasikara (25,500), in French; Madagascar Tribune (formerly Madagascar-Matin, 12,000), government organ in French and Malagasy; Imongo Vaovao (10,000), AKFM organ; Maresaka (5,000), independent; Sahy (9,000), weekly; and Maresaka (5,000). In early 1995 two new papers were launched: L'Express de Madagascar, a bilingual independent daily, and the pro-Ravony Valeurs-L'Hebdomadaire de Madagascar.

News Agencies

In June 1977 the government replaced the existing Agence Madagascar-Presse with the Agence Nationale d'Information "Taratra" (Anta), which is responsible to the Ministry of Information and Ideological Orientation. A number of foreign bureaus maintain offices in the capital.

Broadcasting and Computing

In 1999 Radio Nationale Malagasy, a government-owned, commercial network, in addition to a number of private facilities, serviced some 3.3 million receivers, while Télévision Nationale Malagasy offered programming for approximately 424,000 receivers in 2003. There were some 80,000 personal computers serving 70,500 Internet users in 2003.

Intergovernmental Representation

Ambassador to the U.S.

Narisoa RAJAONARIVONY

U.S. Ambassador to Madagascar

James D. McGEE

Permanent Representative to the UN

Zina ANDRIANARIVELO-RAZAFY

IGO Memberships (Non-UN)

AfDB, AU, BADEA, Comesa, Interpol, IOC, IOM, IOR-ARC, NAM, OIF, SADC, WCO, WTO

MALAWI

REPUBLIC OF MALAWI

---

The Country

Malawi, the former British protectorate of Nyasaland, is a landlocked southeastern African nation bordering the western side of 360-mile-long Lake Malawi (formerly Lake Nyasa). The country's name is a contemporary spelling of "Maravi," which historically referenced the interrelated Bantu peoples who inhabit the area. The main tribal groups are the Chewas, the Nyanja, and the Tumbuka. It is estimated that 75 percent of the population is Christian and 13 percent Muslim, with the remainder, except for a very small Hindu population, adhering to traditional African beliefs. A small non-African component includes Europeans and Asians. Three-quarters of adult females are subsistence agricultural workers, while the number of households headed by women has increased in recent years as men have relocated to pursue cash-crop labor.

About 85 percent of the population is engaged in agriculture, the most important cash crops being tobacco, tea, peanuts, sugar, and cotton. Development efforts have focused on integrated rural production, diversification in light industry (particularly agriprocessing and import substitution), and improved transportation facilities.

Although credited by the mid-1980s with being one of the few African states with a grain surplus, Malawi continued to suffer high rates of malnutrition, infant mortality, and poverty—a paradox widely attributed to an agricultural system favoring large estate owners. The economy was further stressed by chronic unemployment, trade imbalances, persistent inflation, and external debt presures, prompting the government in the early 1990s to adopt adjustment measures sponsored by the International Monetary Fund (IMF), including the privatization of state enterprises. The reforms contributed to an economic resurgence in the mid-1990s. However, a downturn subsequently ensued, in part, according to the IMF, due to a slackening in the pace of reform as well as a slowdown in agricultural demand. Real GDP growth fell to 1.7 percent in 2000, with inflation steady at 45 percent. In 2001 GDP declined by 4.1 percent, before posting a small recovery in 2002 and growing by 4.4 percent in 2003. In addition, inflation was brought down to 10 percent in 2003.

In 2000 Malawi was approved for $1 billion in debt reduction under the World Bank's Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) initiative, and the IMF provided a $65 million loan for poverty reduction. However, excessive government spending, corruption, and the slow pace of economic reforms led international donors, including the World Bank, IMF, United States, and European Union (EU), to suspend some economic aid during 2001–2002, although humanitarian assistance continued in light of Malawi's worsening food crisis (caused by drought in some areas and severe flooding in others). Poor harvests in 2004 left some 5 million Malawians dependent on food aid, although agricultural production improved significantly in 2005. Meanwhile, the EU resumed full economic and development aid, including support for ports, hydroelectric facilities, and direct financial contributions to limit the government's deficit. In April 2006 the IMF reported that the new government had made progress in regard to economic reforms and approved a three-year aid program (contingent on continued reform and the meeting of certain economic benchmarks). The World Bank also approved aid to develop rural infrastructure.

Government and Politics

Political Background

Under British rule since 1891, the Nyasaland protectorate was joined with Northern and Southern Rhodesia in 1953 to form the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. Internal opposition to the federation proved so vigorous that a state of emergency was declared, with nationalist leaders H. B. M. CHIPEMBERE, Kanyama CHIUME, and Hastings Kamuzu BANDA being imprisoned. They were released upon the attainment of internal self-government on February 1, 1963, and dissolution of the federation at the end of that year. Nyasaland became a fully independent member of the Commonwealth under the name of Malawi on July 6, 1964, and a republic two years later, with Prime Minister Banda being installed as the country's president.

The early years of the Banda presidency were marked by conservative policies, including the retention of white civil service personnel and the maintenance of good relations with South Africa. Younger, more radical leaders soon became disenchanted, and in 1965 a minor insurrection was led by Chipembere, while a second, led by Yatuta CHISIZA, took place in 1967. Both were easily contained, however, and Banda became entrenched as the nation's political leader.

In March 1983, Dr. Attati MPAKATI of the Socialist League of Malawi (one of the two principal exile groups) was assassinated in Zimbabwe. In May, Orton CHIRWA, the former leader of the other main exile organization (the Malawi Freedom Movement—Mafremo) was found guilty of treason and was sentenced to death. (Chirwa had been jailed, along with his wife and son, since December 1981.) Subsequent appeals in December 1983 and February 1984 were denied, and Chirwa, who claimed that he and his family had been abducted from Zambia to permit their arrest, became an object of international human rights attention. Bowing to the pressure, Banda commuted the sentences to life imprisonment in June 1984. (Chirwa died in 1992 under unclear circumstances.)

In an apparent response to pressure from international aid donors, President Banda instructed the National Assembly in December 1991 to "make a final decision" on unipartyism, albeit prefacing his call for debate by commending the "successes" of his Malawi Congress Party (MCP), which had voted for a continuation of the existing system only three months before. Thus, despite the country's first mass protests against MCP rule in May 1992, no opposition groups were permitted to present candidates in legislative balloting on June 26–27. Somewhat unexpectedly, given another MCP vote against pluralism on October 2, President Banda on October 18 announced plans for a national referendum to decide Malawi's future political structure. On June 15, 1993, 63.5 percent of those participating voted in favor of a multiparty system.

On October 13, 1993, 11 days after Banda underwent emergency brain surgery, the office of the president announced the formation of a

Political Status: Independent member of the Commonwealth since 1964; republic under one-party presidential rule established July 6, 1966; constitution amended on June 22, 1993, to provide for multiparty activity following national referendum of June 15; new constitution enacted provisionally as of May 16, 1994, and adopted permanently (as amended) on May 18, 1995.

Area: 45,747 sq. mi. (118,484 sq. km.).

Population: 9,933,868 (1998C); 12,587,000 (2005E).

Major Urban Centers (2005E): LILONGWE (676,000), Blantyre (715,000), Mzuzu (107,000).

Official Language: English. (Chichewa is classified as a national language.)

Monetary Unit: Kwacha (official rate July 1, 2006: 138.99 kwacha = $1US).

President: Bingu wa MUTHARIKA (Democratic Progressive Party); popularly elected (as a member of the United Democratic Front) on May 20, 2004, and inaugurated for a five-year term on May 24, succeeding Bakili MULUZI (United Democratic Front).

First Vice President: Cassim CHILUMPHA (United Democratic Front); popularly elected on May 20, 2004, and inaugurated for a five-year term on May 24, succeeding Justin C. MALEWEZI (United Democratic Front).

Second Vice President: Vacant following the resignation of Chakufwa CHIHANA (Alliance for Democracy) on February 24, 2004.

three-member Presidential Council, thus rejecting the opposition's call for a "neutral" president to rule in Banda's absence. The council was comprised of the MCP's recently appointed secretary general, Stephen Gwandanguluwe CHAKUAMBA Phiri, as well as MCP stalwarts John TEMBO and Robson CHIRWA. Nevertheless, preparations for the May 1994 multiparty balloting continued, with the assembly approving constitutional amendments reforming the electoral process and presidency (see Constitution and government, below) and authorizing the formation of two transitional bodies:

the National Consultative Council (NCC) and the National Executive Council (NEC), charged with electoral preparation and oversight.

In early December 1993 the Presidential Council ordered the disarmament of the Malawi Young Pioneers (MYP), an MCP-affiliated paramilitary group whose recent killing of two regular army soldiers had exacerbated tensions between the two armed forces. The ensuing crackdown, resulting in 32 deaths and the reported flight of 1,000 pioneers to Mozambique, was denounced by the NCC, which accused the Presidential Council of having "lost control." Consequently, on December 7 a still visibly ailing Banda dissolved the Presidential Council and reassumed presidential powers. Shortly thereafter, Banda appointed a new defense minister, Maj. Gen. Wilfred John MPONERA, who, on January 7, 1994, announced the completion of MYP disarmament.

In the country's first multiparty election on May 17, 1994, voters decisively rejected bids by Banda and two other presidential candidates in favor of Bakili MULUZI of the United Democratic Front (UDF). In simultaneous legislative balloting, the UDF also led the field, although it fell short of a majority by five seats. Four days after his inauguration on May 21, President Muluzi announced a coalition government in which two minor parties—the Malawi National Democratic Party (MNDP) and the United Front for Multiparty Democracy (UFMD)—were allocated one portfolio each.

On July 21, 1994, the MCP and the Alliance for Democracy (Aford) announced the formation of a shadow government that included Banda's former second in command, John Tembo, as finance minister. However, the MCP-Aford pact was effectively terminated when Aford president Chakufwa CHIHANA accepted an appointment by Muluzi as second vice president designate and three other Aford members joined an expanded cabinet on September 24. Constitutional revision was required to accommodate Chihana's appointment (see Constitution and government, below).

In response to domestic and international criticism of the size of his cabinet, Muluzi reshuffled it and reduced its size from 35 to 32 members on July 16, 1995. A more significant change occurred on July 27, when the UDF and Aford announced that they had signed an agreement to form a coalition government. However, in December relations between the two groups cooled when Aford leader Chihana accused the government of “lacking transparency” and failing to combat corruption.

On December 23, 1995, former president Banda and his five codefendants were acquitted of all charges relating to the murder of “reformist” politicians in 1983 (see MCP in Political Parties and Groups, below). Shortly thereafter, Banda apologized for the “pain and suffering” that had occurred while he was in office. However, he continued to deny personal responsibility, instead blaming “selfish individuals” in his government. Meanwhile, the new UDF-led government continued to press inquiries into a wide range of abuses that were alleged to have taken place under Banda’s rule. Ultimately, although official scrutiny remained leveled at some of Banda’s former confidants, investigative fervor in general dissipated substantially upon Banda’s death on November 25.

On May 2, 1996, Chihana resigned from the government, saying that he wanted to concentrate on his party responsibilities. Six Aford cabinet ministers refused to comply with Chihana’s demand that they resign from the government as well, and they declared themselves “independents.” In response, Aford and the MCP suspended their participation in the assembly, accusing the UDF of attempting to secure a legislative majority by “poaching” their representatives as cabinet ministers. Assembly activity subsequently remained blocked (the UDF proving unable to muster a quorum) until April 1997, when Aford and the MCP ended their boycott after President Muluzi agreed to pursue constitutional amendments that would “prevent political horsetrading and chicanery.” However, the matter was not resolved on July 24, when Muluzi appointed a new cabinet that still included Aford representatives against the wishes of Aford leaders.

On June 15, 1999, President Muluzi was re-elected to a second five-year term with 51.37 percent of the vote, compared to 44.3 percent for runner-up Chakuamba, the joint MCP/Aford candidate. (Aford’s Chihana had served as Chakuamba’s vice presidential running mate.) In concurrent legislative polling the UDF secured a plurality of 93 of 193 seats. The opposition accused the government of numerous irregularities, including manipulation of the media and the voter registration process as well as vote rigging. The losing candidates also argued that a runoff should have been held because Muluzi’s vote total had not surpassed the level of 50 percent of the registered voters. Although the international community generally accepted the balloting as free and fair and the courts in Malawi upheld the results, Chakufwa Chihana of Aford, the MCP/Aford vice presidential candidate, called for a campaign of civil disobedience to protest the government’s actions. Muluzi’s critics also challenged the cabinet he appointed on July 1 for containing too many ministers (21 of 36) from the southern part of the country, the UDF stronghold.

Corruption charges prompted the appointment of new cabinets in March and November 2000, although many incumbents were simply given new portfolios. Meanwhile, severe intraparty infighting continued to hamper both the MCP and Aford, as evidenced by their poor showing in the November 2000 local elections, which were dominated by the UDF, albeit in the context of a low voter turnout. Muluzi’s second term was marked by a bitter dispute over proposed constitutional changes to allow a president to seek a third term. The initial proposal failed to gain the needed two-thirds majority in the assembly in 2002, and a second effort in the legislature was rebuffed in 2003. The UDF attempted to have the measure brought to the public in a national referendum. However, it became clear that the constitutional amendment would fail because of widespread opposition, and the referendum request was withdrawn. Muluzi subsequently announced that he would not seek a third term. Instead he handpicked his successor, economist Bingu wa MUTHARIKA, who had run as a presidential candidate in 1999 for the defunct United Party (UP).

Presidential polling in 2004 was delayed by two days as a result of complaints by opposition parties that some 1 million voters, including many of their supporters, had been purged from the list of eligible voters. However, the High Court accepted the government's explanation that only double registrations and ineligible voters had been eliminated from the rolls.

In January 2004 a coalition of seven small parties, calling itself Mgwirizano (Unity), was launched to present Chakuamba as a joint presidential candidate. However, President Mutharika was reelected in balloting on May 20 with 35.9 percent of the vote, compared to 27.1 percent for Tembo (the MCP candidate) and 25.7 percent for Chakuamba. In concurrent legislative balloting, the MCP secured 60 seats, followed by the UDF with 60. Opposition parties and candidates challenged the legitimacy of the polling. However, Chakuamba withdrew his objections and accepted the post of minister of agriculture in the new Mutharika government, which also included the UDF, the National Democratic Alliance, the Mgwirizano coalition, and independents. Many independent legislators agreed to support the UDF in the assembly, some 23 of them subsequently joining the UDF. Additional realignments occurred after a dispute within the UDF prompted Mutharika to form a new party (see Current issues, below).

Constitution and Government

The republican constitution of July 6, 1966, established a one-party system under which the MCP was accorded a political monopoly and its leader extensive powers as head of state, head of government, and commander in chief. Originally elected to a five-year presidential term by the National Assembly in 1966, Hastings Banda was designated president for life in 1971.

Following approval of a multiparty system in a national referendum on June 15, 1993, the assembly on June 22 amended the basic law to permit the registration of parties beyond the MCP. In November further revision abolished the life presidency and repealed the requirement that presidential candidates be MCP members. Following the return of ailing President Banda to active status in early December, an additional amendment was enacted to provide for an acting president in case of the president's incapacitation.

A new constitution (proposed by a National Constitutional Conference) was approved by the assembly on May 16, 1994, and entered into effect provisionally for one year on May 18. The new basic law incorporated the 1993 amendments while also providing for a new Constitutional Committee and a Human Rights Commission. It also authorized the eventual creation of a second legislative body (the Senate) no sooner than 1999. However, in January 2001, much to the consternation of opposition parties and some civic organizations, the assembly revised the basic law to eliminate reference to the proposed Senate. The government argued that the creation of the Senate would have burdened the country's fragile economy, but opponents claimed that the administration was in reality primarily concerned that the new body would have had the power to impeach the president. Following review and refinement by the Constitutional Conference, the new constitution was once again approved by the assembly and promulgated as a permanent document on May 18, 1995. One of the amendments approved by the assembly in November 1994 provided for a presidentially appointed second vice president. The first vice president is elected as a running mate to the president and assumes the presidency if that office becomes vacant. The president is not required to designate a second vice president, but any such appointment must be made outside the president's political party.

The 1995 constitution provided for a Western-style judicial system, including a Supreme Court of Appeal, a High Court, and Magistrates' courts. No mention is made of the so-called traditional courts (headed by local chiefs), which had been restored in 1970. For administrative purposes Malawi is divided into 3 regions, 24 districts, and 3 sub-districts, which are headed by regional ministers, district commissioners, and assistant district commissioners, respectively.

Foreign Relations

Malawi under President Banda's leadership sought to combine African nationalism with multiracialism at home and a strongly pro-Western and anti-Communist position in world affairs. Citing economic necessity, Malawi was one of the few black African states to maintain uninterrupted relations with white-ruled South Africa. A consequence of the linkage was a September 1986 meeting in Blantyre, during which the leaders of Mozambique, Zambia, and Zimbabwe reportedly warned Banda to change his policies, particularly concerning alleged Malawian support for Renamo rebels in Mozambique. Banda, while denying the allegations, nevertheless quickly concluded a joint defense and security pact with Mozambique. The government also reaffirmed its commitment to an effort by the Southern African Development Coordination Conference (SADCC, subsequently the Southern African Development Community—SADC) to reduce dependence on South African trade routes. To that end, Malawi in 1987 agreed to increase shipments through Tanzania, with which it had established diplomatic ties in 1985 despite long-standing complaints of Tanzanian aid to Banda's opponents. Relations with Zambia had also been strained by Malawi's claim to Zambian territory in the vicinity of their common border.

In 1994 the new Muluzi administration moved quickly to strengthen regional ties, the president traveling to Zimbabwe, Zambia, and Botswana. In addition, Malawi and Mozambique created a joint commission to locate and repatriate former rebels located in the opposite state. Malawi also endeavored to improve relations and security ties with the United States. In June 2003 five suspected al-Qaida terrorists were turned over to U.S. custody.

President Mutharika's anticorruption campaign won international praise from European states, the United States, and international organizations such as the IMF and the World Bank. As a result, donors increased aid and assistance to the government in 2004 and 2005.

Current Issues

Political affairs were chaotic in 2001 and 2002, with UDF hard-liners working to prevent defections to the new National Democratic Alliance (NDA, see Political Parties and Groups, below). Many of the administration's initiatives in that regard were overturned by the courts, leading to marked friction between the executive and legislative branches. Following the 2004 presidential and legislative elections, a leadership struggle within the UDF led to defections from the party.

Following the 2004 elections, new president Mutharika launched a broad anticorruption campaign that earned praise (and additional aid) from donors such as the EU and the United States. However, the initiative generated a rift between Mutharika and former president Muluzi, some of whose close allies (including several UDF leaders) were arrested on corruption charges. (Critics of Mutharika accused him of using the new anticorruption bureau as a personal political tool.) Consequently, supporters in the assembly of Muluzi (who remained leader of the UDF after leaving the presidency) began to block legislation presented by the Mutharika administration. The conflict culminated in the president's decision in February 2005 to quit the UDF and form a new Democratic Progressive Party (DPP), which attracted a number of Mutharika's supporters within the UDF and other parties and prompted significant legislative realignment.

In March 2005 the UDF and MCP attempted without success to impeach Mutharika for inappropriate use of government funds. At the same time, it was reported that the government was contemplating an investigation of former president Muluzi's alleged acquisition of millions of dollars during his presidential tenure. Relations between the executive and legislative branches deteriorated further when Mutharika moved his offices into the new assembly building, forcing the assembly to return to its old headquarters. Opposition parties (led by the UDF) again attempted to start impeachment proceedings against the president in June, and, in apparent retaliation, Mutharika removed the UDF's Cassim Chilumpha from his cabinet post, although Chilumpha remained vice president. Collaterally, Mutharika announced a cabinet reshuffle that raised the number of ministers from 27 to 33 so that he could include some of his independent supporters.

The assembly formally approved the start of impeachment proceedings in mid-October 2005, but the High Court ordered them stopped after pro-Mutharika demonstrations had deteriorated into “riots” in which opposition legislators were reportedly attacked. In any event, it had been widely expected that the impeachment motion would not have garnered the two-thirds assembly vote required for success. In addition, analysts suggested that much of the population considered the impeachment initiative a waste of time and resources, particularly in view of the nation’s severe food crisis. Among other things, the assembly’s blockage of the administration’s proposed budget compromised the distribution of emergency food supplies. (The budget had also called for a pay raise of more than 350 percent for the president.)

The government conducted another string of arrests in November 2005 as part of its anticorruption campaign. Among those charged were two legislators who had led the recent impeachment drive and Vice President Chilumpha. However, the High Court ruled that Chilumpha could not be brought up on criminal charges while serving as vice president. In February 2006 Mutharika attempted to dismiss Chilumpha for “undermining the government,” but the High Court declared the president lacked the constitutional authority for such a move. At the end of April Chilumpha and some 12 others (including senior members of the UDF) were arrested on treason charges, the administration accusing them of having plotted the assassination of Mutharika. The charges against most of those arrested were quickly dropped, but Chilumpha remained under house arrest as of July awaiting trial with two codefendants.

Political Parties and Groups

For nearly three decades prior to the 1993 national referendum, the Malawi Congress Party (MCP) was the only authorized political group, and it exercised complete control of the government. On June 29, 1993, the constitution was amended to allow for multiparty activity, and on August 17 the government announced that the first groups had been authorized to function as legal parties.

The Mgwirizano (Unity) coalition was formed in January 2004 by seven small parties opposed to the UDF and the rule of President Muluzi. The coalition included the Republican Party, the People’s Progressive Movement, the Movement for Democratic Change, the People’s Transformation Party, the Malawi Democratic Party, the National Unity Party, and the Malawi Forum for Unity and Development. It fielded a slate of candidates for the legislative election and chose Gwanda Chakuamba as the coalition leader and main presidential candidate. (John Malewezi also ran as a candidate for the People’s Progressive Movement.) Following the legislative elections, some member parties decided to support newly elected President Mutharika after he reached out and incorporated party members in a coalition government. However, the coalition dissolved in February 2005 with the resignation of Chakuamba and the formation of the Democratic Progressive Party (see below).

In February 2006 it was reported that the MCP, Aford, and the NRP had agreed to form a “grand coalition” for subsequent elections.

Legislative Parties

Democratic Progressive Party (DPP). The DPP was launched in February 2005 by President Bingu wa Mutharika and other UDF dissidents who opposed UDF president Muluzi. Disaffected members of other parties and a number of independents also joined the UDF, which as of mid-2006 was credited with controlling some 74 assembly seats. DPP Vice President Gwanda Chakuamba was dismissed from the cabinet and expelled from the DPP in September 2005 after he strongly criticized President Mutharika.

Leaders: Bingu wa MUTHARIKA (President of the Republic and Party President), Uladi MUSSA (Party Vice President).

United Democratic Front (UDF). The UDF was founded in April 1992 by former MCP officials who operated clandestinely until October, when they announced their intention to campaign for a multiparty democracy. A party congress on December 30, 1993, chose UDF chair Bakili Muluzi to be the UDF's presidential candidate. Meanwhile, the UDF leaders were embarrassed by allegations, attributed to the MCP, that they had engaged in anti-opposition activities while MCP members.

Muluzi defeated incumbent president Banda and two other candidates in March 1994 with a 47.3 percent plurality of the vote. In the legislative balloting the UDF won a plurality of 84 of 177 seats. Muluzi was reelected with 51.37 percent of the vote in 1999, while the UDF increased its legislative plurality to 93 out of 193 seats in 1999.

Beginning in 2000, the party suffered serious internal divisions, leading to the formation of the anti-Muluzi NDA (above). In 2003, dissident members of the UDF left the party to form a new entity, the People's Progressive Movement (PPM), led by former UDF party vice president Aleke Banda. In the 2004 legislative elections the UDF lost its plurality and became the second-largest party (49 seats) in the assembly behind the MCP.

Following the 2004 presidential election, a leadership struggle emerged between Muluzi, who remained party president, and his hand-picked successor as Malawi's president, Bingu wa Mutharika. Among other things, Muluzi's supporters objected to elements of the broad anticorruption efforts by Mutharika, who in February 2005 left the UDF to form the DPP (above).

The UDF led the subsequent effort to impeach President Mutharika, although its legislative representation had reportedly fallen to 30 by mid-2006 due to defections to the DPP. In addition, many UDF leaders faced corruption charges pressed by the Mutharika administration (see Current issues, above).

Leaders: Bakili MULUZI (President of the Party and Former President of the Republic), Kennedy MAKWANGWALA (Secretary General).

Malawi Congress Party (MCP). The MCP is a continuation of the Nyasaland African Congress

(NAC), which was formed in 1959 under the leadership of President H. Kamuzu Banda. Overtly pro-Western and dedicated to multiracialism and internal development, the party was frequently criticized for being excessively conservative. It held all legislative seats prior to the multiparty poll of May 1994, when it ran second in both the presidential and legislative races.

On August 25, 1994, Banda retired from politics although he retained the title of MCP president for life. The 1994 vice presidential candidate, Stephen Chakuamba, assumed leadership of the party. Thereafter, in early 1995, the party was shaken by the arrests of Banda, John Tembo (long-time Banda associate and MCP leader), and others for alleged involvement in the killing 12 years earlier of Dick MATENJE and several other MCP cabinet ministers. At the time of his death, Matenje had headed an increasingly popular reform wing within the party that had clashed with Tembo and his supporters. Banda, Tembo, and their codefendants in the murder trial were acquitted on all charges in December. Related charges against Cecilia KADZAMIRA, Banda's longtime companion who had been the country's "official hostess" during the latter part of the Banda regime, had been dismissed prior to trial on technical grounds. However, the government continued to press the case by appealing the verdict to the High Court, which ultimately upheld the acquittal. Meanwhile, Tembo and Kadzamira were arrested in September 1996 on charges of conspiracy to commit murder in connection with an alleged plot to assassinate cabinet members in 1995. They were quickly released on bail, and it was subsequently unclear if the case would be pursued. Similar ambiguity existed regarding fraud charges against Tembo and Kadzamira stemming from alleged malfeasance during the accumulation of the vast Banda "economic empire." Banda himself had been the focus of a corruption investigation in early 1997, but the case was dropped later in the year when it became apparent that the former president had little time to live.

Conflict between Banda's supporters and MCP "reformists" continued through 1997, with the latter clearly gaining the ascendancy at the party convention in July. In a surprisingly decisive vote of 406–109, Tembo was defeated in the race for MCP president by Chakuamba, who immediately declared his intention to run for president of the republic in 1999, insisting that the MCP should merge with Aford (below) to present the strongest possible challenge to the UDF. However, the proposed merger was shelved in the wake of objections from MCP veterans, including Tembo, who had been elected unopposed as MCP vice president.

In intraparty polling in January 1999, Chakuamba defeated Tembo in a contest to decide who would be the MCP's standard-bearer in midyear presidential balloting. Subsequently, Chakuamba rejected suggestions that he choose Tembo as his running mate and named Aford's Chakufwa Chihana to his campaign ticket. On February 8 an electoral alliance for the presidential race between the two parties was officially inaugurated. Meanwhile, pro-Tembo activists staged demonstrations to protest what they (and reportedly Tembo) considered an affront. The MCP/Aford ticket finished second (with 44.3 percent of the vote) in the June presidential ballot, while the MCP secured 66 seats (on 33.82 percent of the vote) in the legislative poll. Meanwhile, tension between Chakuamba and Tembo continued, and in late May Tembo called upon Chakuamba to step down as party leader. In early June, Chakuamba called for an MCP boycott of the opening session of parliament, but his request was ignored and he was given a one-year suspension from the house (later voided by the High Court). On June 24 Speaker Sam Mpasu endorsed Tembo as new leader of the opposition in parliament, a decision that was subsequently challenged by Chakuamba.

The MCP infighting continued unabated into 2000, and the rival factions held separate conventions in August at which Chakuamba and Tembo were each declared party chair. However, the following summer the High Court nullified the parallel conventions. Meanwhile, the Chakuamba faction, which announced it had expelled Tembo and his supporters from the party, pursued ties with the NDA, the newly formed antigovernment grouping, while the Tembo faction was perceived as cooperating more and more with the administration. Chakuamba subsequently joined the Republican Party (below) in December 2003. The MCP became the largest party in the assembly after the 2004 elections, but Tembo lost his presidential bid. MCP Secretary General Kate KAINGA-KALULUMA joined the new Mutharika government and subsequently left the MCP to join the DPP. Subsequently, the MCP cooperated with the UDF's attempt to impeach President Mutharika, although internal MCP dissension was reported regarding that and other issues. (A dissident faction led by Respicious DZANJALIMODZI was reportedly challenging Tembo's supporters for party supremacy.)

Leaders: John TEMBO (Party Leader and 2004 presidential candidate), Louis CHIMANGO (Speaker of the National Assembly), Nicolas DOSUI.

Alliance for Democracy (Aford). Aford was launched in Lilongwe on September 21, 1992, by trade union leader and prodemocracy advocate Chakufwa Chihana, who at the time of the group's founding was awaiting trial on sedition charges. The grouping was led by a 13-member interim committee that included civil servants, academics, and businesspeople. Although Aford described itself as "not a party but a pressure group," the government on November 7 declared membership in the group illegal. In late December many of its members were arrested during demonstrations ignited by the sentencing of Chihana to three years imprisonment.

In March 1993 a spokesperson for the Zimbabwean-based Malawi Freedom Movement (Mafremo) announced that the group had dissolved and had merged with Aford. (Mafremo, in the wake of the 1981 arrest and imprisonment of its leader, Orton CHIRWA, had been relatively inactive until an early 1987 attack on a police station near the Tanzanian border that was attributed to the group's military wing, the Malawi National Liberation Army. Although initially based in Dar es Salaam, Mafremo had subsequently been reported to have secured Zimbabwean support through the efforts of a new leader, Dr. Edward YAPWANTHA, who was expelled from Zimbabwe in mid-1990, apparently as a result of improved Malawian-Zimbabwean relations.)

In mid-1994, Chihana, who had been granted a sentence reduction and released two days before the multiparty referendum, pressed President Banda to resign in favor of an MCP-UDF-Aford transitional government. In August Aford turned back a merger bid from another opposition party—the Congress for the Second Republic (CSR)—asserting an interest in the CSR’s (then) exiled leader, Kanyama CHUIME, but not the party.

Following its third-place showing in the 1994 assembly balloting, Aford declined an invitation to participate in a government coalition with the UDF, which was five seats short of a legislative majority. On June 20 Aford signed a memorandum of understanding with the MCP, in which the two groups committed themselves to preservation of “the endangered national unity and security of the country.” However, in September Chihana joined the Muluzi government as second vice president designate, while three other Aford members accepted cabinet posts. Although Chihana rejected reports that the party was defecting to the UDF, in January 1995 Aford announced the dissolution of its alliance with the MCP.

Relations between the UDF and Aford deteriorated over the next year, and on May 2, 1996, Chihana, who had criticized the UDF on several points in December 1995, resigned from the second vice presidency, ostensibly to devote more time to party affairs. In June it was reported that an Aford national congress had voted to withdraw from the government coalition and had ordered its members in the cabinet to resign their posts. However, most of the ministers refused to leave the government, and it was reported that at least six members of the Aford executive council rejected the decision to separate from the coalition with the UDF. In response, Chihana called for the ouster of the “renegade” members, who, according to some reports, were by then referring to themselves as “independents.” The issue remained clouded throughout 1997 as the new cabinet announced in July included not only the previous Aford ministers but also several other Aford members. Meanwhile, at the party’s annual congress in December, Aford delegates voted against a merger with the MCP that had been advocated by many within the Chihana camp.

In June 1998 two Aford legislators, Joseph MSEKAWANTHU and Edward MUSYANI, declared their independence from the party, charging that the party’s “dictatorial” leadership policies had marginalized them. In October Aford officially acknowledged having decided to compete for the presidency on a joint ticket with the MCP, and in February 1999 Chihana agreed to campaign for the vice presidency on a ticket led by MCP leader Chakuamba. Aford was credited with 10.52 percent of the vote and 29 seats in the June 1999 assembly balloting.

Intraparty fighting continued in 2000–2001 in regard to issues such as the future of the alliance with the MCP and whether the party should cooperate with the government. While the faction around Chihana was reportedly in favor of continuing an antigovernment stance, another wing pressed to discontinue the alliance with the MCP and form a national unity government with the UDF. Aford won only 6 seats in the 2004 elections and supported the subsequent Mutharika government after Chihana was appointed minister of agriculture and food security, a post he left in February 2005. Four of Aford’s legislators reportedly defected to the DPP in 2005.

Leaders: Chakufwa CHIHANA (President of the Party and Former Second Vice President of the Republic), Chipimpha MUGHOGHO (Chair).

Congress for National Unity (CONU). The CONU is led by a cleric who received .51 percent of the vote in the 1999 presidential poll. The CONU also participated unsuccessfully in the 1999 legislative balloting. In the 2004 elections CONU gained one seat in the assembly.

Leaders: Bishop Daniel NKHUMBWE (1999 presidential candidate), Silvester White CHABUKA (1999 vice presidential candidate).

Republican Party (RP). The RP was formed in 2004 by Gwanda Chakuamba and Stanley Masauli and other opponents of John Tembo from the MCP. Using the RP as the nucleus of the anti-Muluzi coalition Mgwirizano, Chakuamba placed third in the 2004 presidential balloting with 25.7 percent of the vote. He subsequently joined the government as minister of agriculture and food security. In the legislative elections, the RP became the third largest party with 15 seats.

In March 2005 Chakuamba resigned from the RP, along with a number of RP members, to join the new DPP. Chakuamba initially announced the dissolution of the RP, but the RP's executive council rejected the proposed "merger" with the DPP. The executive committee agreed that the RP would remain in the government.

Following his dismissal from the government and the DPP in September 2005, Chakuamba attempted to reassert control over the RP. However, he was formally expelled from the RP in October, and he subsequently announced the formation of the New Republican Party (NRP).

Leader: Stanley MASAULI (Interim Leader).

People's Progressive Movement (PPM). Formed in 2003 by former UDF vice president Aleke Banda and other members of the UDF opposed to the Muluzi faction of the UDF, the PPM joined the Mgwirizano coalition for the 2004 elections, gaining six seats in the assembly. Party member and former vice president of the republic John MALEWEZI ran as a presidential candidate for the PPM in 2004, placing fifth with just 2.5 percent of the vote. In 2005 a number of PPM members joined the DPP, although the PPM retained its status as an independent party.

Leader: Aleke BANDA (Party Leader), Mark KATSONGA.

Movement for Genuine Democratic Change (MGODE). The MGODE, created in 2003 by former members of Aford, joined the Mgwirizano coalition prior to the 2004 presidential and legislative elections, gaining three seats in the assembly balloting. In 2005 it was reported that the MGODE had been absorbed into the DPP.

Leaders: Sam Kandodo BANDA (Party President), Greene MWAMONDWE (Chair), Rodger NKWAZI (Secretary General).

National Democratic Alliance (NDA). The NDA was originally launched in early 2001 as a "pressure group" designed to promote "good governance" and to combat potential revision of the constitution that would permit President Muluzi to run for a third term. The new grouping also criticized the government's economic policies and urged installation of a "unity government" that would include the MCP. The NDA was founded by several dissident UDF members, the most prominent being Brown Mpinganjira, a longtime Muluzi loyalist who had been dismissed from the cabinet in November and had been arrested on corruption charges in late December. Mpinganjira, who had once been considered a possible successor to Muluzi, accused the government of trumping up the charges against him because of his outspoken opposition to a third term for Muluzi. The charges were subsequently dropped for lack of evidence.

At the inception of the NDA, Mpinganjira and the other UDF "rebels" insisted that they were still UDF members and that they were not trying to establish a new party. However, the UDF quickly expelled Mpinganjira and three other UDF legislators from the party for their NDA association. In late February 2001 another prominent UDF member, James Makhumula, also left the party in favor of association with the NDA, of which he eventually was named national chair. (Makhumula, a prominent and wealthy businessman, had been regarded as the "chief financier" of the UDF.)

Apparently in response to growing support for the NDA, the assembly in June 2001 passed an "antidefection law" that stated that legislators leaving the party under whose banner they were elected thereby forfeited their seats. In November the assembly voted to expel Mpinganjira and six others for violation of the new law. However, the High Court ordered the legislators reinstated. Subsequently, the NDA was granted legal party status in preparation for the 2004 elections. Mpinganjira placed fourth in the 2004 presidential election with

Cabinet

As of September 1, 2006

President	Bingu wa Mutharika (DPP)
Vice President	Cassim Chilumpha (UDF)
Second Vice President	(Vacant)

Ministers

Agriculture and Food Security	Uladi Mussa (DPP)
Defense	Davis Katsonga (DPP)
Economic Planning and Development	David Faiti (RP)
Education and Vocational Training	Anna Kackiko [f]
Finance and Economic Planning	Goodall Gondwe (DPP)
Foreign Affairs and International Cooperation	Joyce Banda (DPP) [f]
Health	Marjorie Ngaunje [f]
Home Affairs and Internal Security	Bob Khamisa (UDF)
Industry, Trade, and Private Sector Development	Ken Lipenga (DPP)
Information and Tourism	Patricia Kaliati [f]
Justice and Constitutional Affairs	Bazuka Mhango (RP)
Labor and Social Development	Khumbo Chirwa (RP)
Lands, Housing, and Surveys	Henry Phoya (UDF)
Local Government and Rural Development	George Chaponda (UDF)
Natural Resources, Mines, and Energy	Henry Chimunthu Banda (DPP)
Public Services	Bingu wa Mutharika (DPP)
Social Development and Persons with Disabilities	Clement Khembo
Transport and Public Works	Henry Mussa (DPP)
Water Development and Irrigation	Sidik Mia
Women and Child Development	Kate Kainja Kaluluma (DPP) [f]
Youth, Sports, and Culture	Jaffalie Mussa (UDF)

[f] = female

8.7 percent of the vote, while the NDA gained eight seats in the assembly balloting.

Leaders: Brown MPINGANJIRA (President and 2004 presidential candidate), James MAKHUMULA (Chair).

Other Parties That Contested the 2004 Legislative Election

Malawi Democratic Party (MDP). The MDP was legalized shortly after its formation in mid-1993, its leader running a distant fourth in the presidential balloting of May 17, 1994. Although having won no legislative seats, the MDP held the economic planning portfolio during the first four months of the Muluzi government and was given the housing portfolio in August 1995.

The MDP leadership reportedly called for the government's resignation in July 1995 after the party lost its sole post in a cabinet reshuffling. Two months later, the MDP's president and vice president, Kampelo Kalua and Unandi Banda, were arrested on intimidation charges; however, the two were subsequently acquitted.

Kalua received only 1.43 percent of the vote in the 1999 presidential vote, while no MDP legislative candidates were successful in either the 1999 or 2004 election.

Leaders: Kampelo KALUA (President and 1994 and 1999 presidential candidate), Unandi BANDA (Vice President), Lyson MILANZI (1999 vice presidential candidate).

Other parties that contested the May 2004 legislative elections included the People's Transformation Party (Petra), which gained one seat in the balloting; the Malawi Forum for Unity and Development (MAFUNDE), formed in 2002 under the leadership of George MNESA to fight corruption and end food shortages; the National Unity Party (NUP); the New Congress for Democracy (NCD), launched in 2004 by former MCP members and led by Hetherwick NTABA, who joined the Mutharika government as minister of health after the election (it was subsequently reported that Ntaba had joined the DPP and that the NCD had been dissolved); and the Pamodzi Freedom Party (PFP), established in 2002 and led by Rainsford NDIWO.

Legislature

Members of the unicameral National Assembly normally sit for five-year terms. From 1978 through 1992 candidates had to be approved by the MCP. The first multiparty balloting was held on May 17, 1994, for an enlarged body of 177 members. The number of legislators was increased to 193 for the balloting of July 15, 1999. In legislative balloting on May 20, 2004, the Malawi Congress Party secured 60 seats; the United Democratic Front, 49; the Mgwirizano coalition, 25 (the Republican Party, 15; the People's Progressive Movement, 6; the Movement for Genuine Democratic Change, 3; and the People's Transformation Party, 1); the National Democratic Alliance, 8; the Alliance for Democracy, 6; the Congress for National Unity, 1; and independents, 38. The six other seats were filled in subsequent by-elections. All were won by the newly formed, propresidential Democratic Progressive Party, which as of mid-2006 was reported to control more than 70 assembly seats in the wake of substantial party defections and the inclusion in its ranks of many former independents.

Speaker: Louis CHIMANGO.

Communications

Press

Most newspapers are privately owned and operated. There is no formal censorship, but the government's refusal to tolerate any form of criticism was reflected in a 1973 decree that journalists who printed material "damaging to the nation's reputation" were liable to life imprisonment. In 1992 the press law was amended, reducing sentences for such crimes to five years; in addition, previously stringent restrictions on foreign journalists appeared to have been relaxed. In March 1993, on the other hand, opposition newspapers launched by Aford and the UDF were reported to have been banned. However, subsequent constitutional amendments eased press restrictions, and by November 1993 there were reportedly 12 newly licensed opposition newspapers. Censorship remains a problem; two journalists were arrested after publishing a story in which they suggested that the president was afraid of ghosts and had moved out of the presidential mansion because he believed it to be haunted. On March 15, 2005, the journalists were charged with publishing false stories and "causing ridicule" to the president.

The following are published in Blantyre, unless otherwise noted: Boma Lathu (100,000), Department of Information monthly in Chichewa; Moni (39,000), monthly in English and Chichewa; Malawi News (30,000), opposition weekly in English and Chichewa; The Daily Times (22,000), opposition daily in English; Odini (Lilongwe, 12,000), Catholic fortnightly in English and Chichewa; The Independent (10,000), independent weekly; Malawi Democrat, Aford publication; Michiru Sun, independent daily; The New Express, independent weekly; Nation, progovernment daily; Mirror, weekly; Chronicle, independent weekly; and The Dispatch, independent daily.

News Agency

The domestic facility is the Malawi News Agency (Mana).

Broadcasting and Computing

Radio service in English and Chichewa is provided by the statutory and semicommercial Malawi Broadcasting Corporation (MBC) and the privately owned Capital Radio Company. In July 1995 the government signed an agreement with TV3 of Malaysia to establish a television service by March 1996; however, Lilongwe canceled the deal in May 1996, citing the slow pace of implementation and poor equipment quality. Subsequent efforts to begin broadcasting were slowed by financial problems, although Television Malawi formally came into existence in 1999. There were some 35,000 television receivers and 14,000 personal computers serving 30,000 Internet users in 2003.

Intergovernmental Representation*Ambassador to the U.S.

Bernardo SANDE

U.S. Ambassador to Malawi

Alan W. EASTHAM Jr.

Permanent Representative to the UN

Brown Beswick CHIMPHAMBA

IGO Memberships (Non-UN)

AfDB, AU, BADEA, Comesa, CWTH, Interpol, NAM, SADC, WCO, WTO

MALI

REPUBLIC OF MALI

République du Mali

---

The Country

Of predominantly desert and semidesert terrain, landlocked Mali stretches northward into the Sahara from the upper basin of the Niger and Senegal rivers. The country's lifeline is the Niger River, which flows northeastward past Bamako, Ségou, and Timbuktu in Mali and then southeastward through Niger and Nigeria to the Gulf of Guinea. Mali's overwhelmingly Muslim population falls into several distinct ethnic groups, including the Bambara and other southern peoples, who are mostly sedentary farmers, while the Peul, or Fulani, as well as the warlike Tuareg pursue a nomadic and pastoral existence on the fringes of the Sahara. Women constitute 46 percent of the work force; female involvement in politics has traditionally been minimal.

Nearly 90 percent of the economically active population is dependent on agriculture, with cotton, peanuts, and livestock being the leading sources of foreign exchange. Although the country was once dubbed the potential "breadbasket of Africa," Mali's food output in recent decades has been severely depressed by periodic droughts, locust infestations, and land mismanagement. However, a return to agricultural self-sufficiency became a top priority for the Traoré government, which in its later years tried to boost production by loosening price and marketing controls. Industrial activity is concentrated in agriprocessing, some enterprises having recently been privatized as part of an overall retreat from state dominance of the economy. Extraction of minerals such as uranium, bauxite, ferronickel, phosphates, and gold, while drawing the interest of international investors, has been hindered by inadequate transport and power facilities. Some progress toward economic reconstruction has been registered with assistance from a variety of foreign sources, although Mali remains one of the world's dozen poorest countries.

In September 1993 the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and World Bank agreed to provide Mali with a four-year aid plan, but within two months the IMF had suspended the program, blaming continued budget overruns on fraud, extrabudgetary spending, and wage increases. In March 1994 the IMF reversed itself and approved an immediate disbursement of funds to help dampen economic and social turmoil generated by devaluation of the CFA franc two months earlier. Annual GDP growth averaged about 5.7 percent from 1995 to 2000, with inflation falling into negative figures in 1999–2000. Among other things, the IMF urged an increased pace of privatization, harmonization of investment regulations and business laws, and greater efficiency in collection of tax revenues, which could permit increased social spending. In August 1999 the IMF approved a three-year loan to assist the government in its economic reform program, and additional aid was approved in 2000 and 2001.

In 2003 Mali completed a series of economic reforms and restructuring under the IMF's Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) initiative, and, as a result, the country was granted $417 million in debt relief. In 2004 Mali received an IMF grant of $6.3 million to support continuing economic reforms through 2007.

Record gold and agricultural production in the early 2000s helped maintain strong economic growth, which averaged 5 percent annually in 2000–2004. Inflation remained low, at less than 1 percent in 2003, but the government's deficit rose as spending on infrastructure, including roads, increased significantly. Rising fuel prices and falling cotton prices constrained growth in 2005. However, gold production continued to increase. In 2006 the World Bank approved additional debt relief for Mali and provided other credits to support agriculture as well as poverty-reduction efforts.

Government and Politics

Political Background

Mali, the former French colony of Soudan, takes its name from a medieval African kingdom whose capital was located near the present capital city of Bamako. As a part of French West Africa, Soudan took part in the general process of post-World War II decolonization and became a self-governing member state of the French Community in 1958. Full independence within the community was achieved on June 20, 1960, in association with Senegal, with which Soudan had joined in January 1959 to form a union known as the Federation of Mali. However, Senegal seceded from the federation on August 20, 1960, and on September 22 Mali proclaimed itself an independent republic and withdrew from the French Community.

Mali's government, led by President Modibo KEITA of the Soudanese Union/African Democratic Rally (Union Soudanaise/ Rassemblement Démocratique Africain—US/RDA), gradually developed into a leftist, one-party dictatorship with a strongly collectivist policy at home and close ties to the Soviet bloc and the People's Republic of China. In late 1968 the Keita regime was ousted in a bloodless coup d'état led by Lt. Moussa TRAORÉ and Capt. Yoro DIAKITÉ under the auspices of a Military Committee of National Liberation (Comité Militaire de Libération Nationale—CMLN).

Reversing the economic policies of the Keita government, the military regime pledged that civil and political rights would soon be restored. However, further centralization of the military command took place in 1972 following the trial and imprisonment of Captain Diakité and two associates for allegedly plotting another coup. Subsequent coup attempts were reported in 1976 and 1978, the latter involving a reputed pro-Soviet faction of the CMLN that opposed a projected return to civilian rule under a constitution approved in 1974.

After a five-year period of transitional rule by the CMLN, civilian government was formally restored on June 19, 1979, when General Traoré was elected, unopposed, to a five-year term as president and prime minister. Earlier, in March, the Malian People's Democratic Union (Union Démocratique du Peuple Malien—UDPM) had been formally constituted as the country's sole political party. In 1982 the presidential term was increased to six years, resulting in the reelection of Traoré coincident with pro forma legislative balloting on June 9, 1985. Three days earlier the president had carried out a cabinet reshuffle that included the designation of Dr. Mamadou DEMBELE as prime minister. The latter office was abolished in the course of a further cabinet shakeup, on June 6, 1988, that preceded assembly renewal on June 26.

Widespread opposition to harsh conditions under the Traoré regime erupted into rioting in Political Status: Independent republic proclaimed September 22, 1960; military regime established November 19, 1968; civilian rule reestablished under constitution approved in 1974 and promulgated June 19, 1979; 1974 constitution suspended on March 26, 1991, and replaced by interim Fundamental Act on March 31; multiparty constitution drafted by National Conference in July–August 1991, approved by popular referendum on January 12, and formally proclaimed on February 14, 1992.

Area: 478,764 sq. mi. (1,240,000 sq. km.).

Population: 9,790,492 (1998C); 13,810,000 (2005E).

Major Urban Center (2005E): BAMAKO (1,995,000).

Official Language: French. Bambara is spoken by the majority of the population.

Monetary Unit: CFA Franc (market rate July 1, 2006: 513.01 francs = $1US). (The CFA franc, previously pegged to the French franc, is now permanently pegged to the euro at 655.957 CFA francs = 1 euro.)

President: Amadou Toumani TOURÉ (nonparty); popularly elected in second-round balloting on May 12, 2002, and inaugurated for a five-year term on June 8 to succeed Alpha Oumar KONARÉ (Alliance for Democracy in Mali).

Prime Minister: Ousmane Issoufi MAIGA (nonparty); appointed by the president on April 29, 2004, to succeed Mohamed Ag AMANI (nonparty), who had announced his resignation on April 28.

for the Salvation of the People (Comité de Transition pour le Salut du Peuple—CTSP), comprised of 10 military and 15 civilian members. On April 2 the CTSP announced the appointment of Soumana SACKO, a highly respected senior official of the UN Development Program, as prime minister. The cabinet that was announced two days later consisted largely of “unknown” technocrats, with military officers being awarded a number of key portfolios.

On April 5, 1991, the CTSP authorized the formation of political parties and declared its intention to rule for a nine-month period ending with a constitutional referendum and multiparty elections. Traoré supporters were subsequently purged from the government and military, and, following a failed attempt to liberate the imprisoned former president in June, a coup attempt by the (then) territorial administration minister, Maj. Lamine DIA-BIRA, failed in mid-July.

At a National Conference on July 29–August 14, 1991, charged by the CTSP with the founding of a “third republic” based on “legality and freedom,” 1,000 delegates from 42 parties and 100 associations drafted a new constitution, which the government pledged to put to a referendum on December 1 in anticipation of multiparty elections in early 1992. However, in November the government extended the transition period to March 26, 1992, citing difficulties in establishing an electoral system and its inability to guarantee safe polling sites for voters in the north, where Tuareg insurgents had long been active.

On January 12, 1992, the new basic law was approved by 98.35 percent of referendum participants. One week later the Alliance for Democracy in Mali (Alliance pour la Démocratie au Mali—Adema) won a majority of seats in municipal balloting. Both polls, as well as legislative balloting in February–March, were marred by low voter turnout, coupled with allegations of electoral fraud and inappropriate CTSP support for Adema. In addition, a number of parties protested a reported CTSP decision to assign Tuareg groups uncontested legislative seats as an outgrowth of a National Peace Pact concluded with the rebels on March 25. Nonetheless, after a one-month

Bamako and other towns during January 1991 and continued into February and March amid mounting demands for the introduction of a multiparty system. On March 26 Traoré was ousted by an army group under the leadership of Lt. Col. Amadou Toumani TOURÉ, who formed a 17-member Council of National Reconciliation (Conseil de la Réconciliation Nationale—CRN). On March 30 the CRN joined with anti-Traoré political leaders in establishing a Transitional Committee postponement, Adema leader Alpha Oumar KONARÉ led eight competitors in first-round presidential balloting on April 12 and went on to defeat Tréoulé Mamadou KONATÉ by a 40 percent margin two weeks later. On June 8 Younoussi TOURÉ, a former Central Bank president, was named to succeed Sacko as prime minister.

On May 18, 1993, the Supreme Court upheld death sentences that had been passed on former president Traoré and three associates for causing the “premeditated murder” of 106 persons during prodemocracy riots in the capital in March 1991. Meanwhile, an escalation of student riots, which had commenced seven months earlier, yielded arson attacks on a number of public installations, including the National Assembly building. On April 9, in response to the unrest, President Konaré announced the resignation of the Touré government and the appointment of its defense minister, Abdoulaye Sekou SOW, to head a new administration.

On November 7, 1993, citing austerity concerns, Prime Minister Sow downsized his fledgling cabinet; however, Adema membership in the reshuffled, technocratic government grew as its members replaced three nonparty ministers. On December 9 the government confirmed reports that an imprisoned former Traoré aide, Lt. Col. Oumar DIALLO, and five others had been charged with plotting to “topple democratic institutions” and “dispose” of anyone opposed to Diallo’s release.

On February 2, 1994, Sow became the second consecutive prime minister to resign amid student protests over government spending decisions. Collaterally, Sow echoed his predecessor’s complaint that Adema members had worked to undermine his premiership. Two days later President Konaré named an Adema member, Ibrahim Boubacar KEITA, as the new prime minister. On February 6 the cabinet was thrown into disarray when ministers from the National Congress for Democratic Initiative (Congrès National d’Initiative Démocratique—CNID) and the Rally for Democracy and Progress (Rassemblement pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—RDP) resigned, with CNID leader Mountaga TALL accusing the administration of having “marginalized” non-Adema ministers. Subsequently, the government named by Keita on February 7 included only 16 members, 11 from Adema and 5 from minor parties.

The military conflict between the government and Tuaregs unofficially ended in June 1995 when the last active rebel group, the Arab Islamic Front of the Azawad, “unilaterally” halted its guerrilla campaign and announced its interest in peace negotiations. In November the government announced that approximately 20,000 Tuareg refugees had returned from exile in Mauritania. By February 1996 over 3,000 former rebels had reportedly been integrated into the armed forces.

On March 4, 1997, President Konaré dissolved the assembly in anticipation of assembly elections in April. The first of two rounds of balloting was held on April 13; however, the polling was marred by reported gross irregularities, including a shortage of balloting papers. Consequently, on April 25 the Constitutional Court annulled the first-round results and indefinitely postponed the second round. At the same time, the court ordered that preparations for presidential polling continue, thus ignoring opposition threats to boycott such balloting if it preceded the assembly balloting.

In presidential elections on May 11, 1997, Konaré garnered 95.9 percent of the vote, overwhelming his sole opponent, Mamadou Maribatourou DIABY of the small Unity, Development, and Progress Party (Parti pour l’Unité, le Développement, et le Progrès—PUDP). (Eight other opposition candidates boycotted the polling, which was marked by a low voter turnout and antigovernment demonstrations.) Subsequently, in two rounds of legislative balloting on July 20 and August 3, Adema candidates also easily dominated an electoral field depleted by an opposition boycott. On September 13 Konaré reappointed Prime Minister Keita, who rejected opposition calls for a “unity” government and named a cabinet on September 16 that was dominated by pro-presidential parties and moderate opposition groups.

President Konaré made a number of conciliatory gestures to his opponents in the second half of 1997, including releasing opposition members arrested during the violent unrest that surrounded the May–August polling and reducing the death sentences of former President Traoré and his associates to life imprisonment. The president’s pledge to convene an all-inclusive national forum gained momentum in mid-April 1998, when a broad range of opposition groups responded positively to a conciliatory proposal brokered by former U.S. president Jimmy Carter. However, on April 20 hard-line opposition groups in the Collective of Opposition Political Parties (Coordination des Partis Politiques de l’Opposition—COPPO) refused to attend a government-sponsored summit, asserting that the government representatives lacked legitimacy and vowing to boycott the upcoming local elections and launch a civil disobedience campaign.

In balloting on June 21, 1998, Adema candidates captured an overwhelming number of mayoral and local council posts. In August the government announced that further local polling, then tentatively scheduled for November, would be postponed in the hopes of avoiding an opposition boycott. The Konaré administration reportedly remained intent on convincing opposition hard-liners to participate in future polling, since their previous boycotts had undermined the credibility of Mali’s democratization and decentralization efforts. In January 1999 the government convened an internationally monitored national forum with the stated aim of allowing Malian political leaders input into the electoral process. However, only four of the parties aligned with the so-called radical opposition attended, and COPPO again urged its supporters not to vote in the May 2 and June 5, 1999, balloting, in which Adema secured about 60 percent of the seats on local councils.

Prime Minister Keita resigned on February 14, 2000, and was succeeded the following day by Mandé SIDIBE, one of President Konaré’s economic advisors. The cabinet announced on February 21 included 15 new ministers.

Prime Minister Sidibe resigned on March 18, 2002, to contest the upcoming presidential election. He was succeeded by former president Modibo Keita. In the first round of presidential balloting on April 28, former military leader Amadou Toumani Touré, backed by a number of parties, finished first among over 20 candidates. He was elected president on May 12 by securing about 64 percent of the vote in a runoff against Soumaïla CISSÉ of Adema. Touré appointed Mohamed Ag AMANI (nonparty) as the new prime minister on June 9; on June 15 a new “national unity” cabinet was named that included members of a number of parties as well as independents.

In controversial assembly balloting on July 14 and 28, 2002, Hope 2002 (an alliance of parties upset over the conduct of the first round of the presidential poll) won 66 seats, followed by the Alliance for the Republic and Democracy (a coalition that included Adema and others) with 51 seats and Alternation and Change (a coalition of parties that had supported Touré in the presidential balloting) with 10.

In by-elections on October 20, 2002, Adema won all eight seats being contested and became the largest single party in the assembly with 53 seats. Hope 2002, with 66 seats, combined with 19 presidential-supportive deputies, including independents, to create a stable presidential majority within the legislature.

Local elections on May 30, 2003, were relatively free of the problems that had surrounded the 2002 presidential and assembly elections. Turnout was high (prompted by the government’s campaign to encourage voting), and more than 20 parties won seats. Hope 2002 reportedly secured a majority of the mayoral posts.

Prime Minister Ag Amani resigned on April 28, 2004, and was replaced by former transport minister Ousmane Issoufi MAIGA (nonparty). Maiga formed a new cabinet on May 2.

Constitution and Government

The constitution adopted at independence was abrogated by the military in November 1968. A new constitution was approved by referendum on June 2, 1974, but did not enter into force until June 19, 1979. The constitution drafted by the National Conference of July 29–August 14, 1991, and approved by referendum on January 12, 1992, replaced the interim Acte Fondamental that the CTSP had promulgated in April 1991 following abrogation of the 1974 document. The current basic law includes an extensive bill of individual rights, a charter for political parties, guarantees of trade union and press freedoms, and separation of executive, legislative, and judicial powers. A directly elected president, who may serve no more than two five-year terms, appoints a prime minister and other cabinet members, who are, however, responsible to a popularly elected unicameral National Assembly. The judicial system is headed by a Supreme Court, which is divided into judicial, administrative, and fiscal sections. There is also a nine-member Constitutional Court, while a High Court of Justice is empowered to hear cases of treason.

Mali is administratively divided into eight regions, the eighth being created in May 1991 by the halving of a northern region as a concession to Tuareg separatists. The regions, headed by appointed governors, are subdivided into 46 districts (cercles) and 282 counties (arrondissements), also administered by appointed officials. Most municipalities have elected councils, which have been given increased authority in connection with the government's recent decentralization program.

Foreign Relations

Reflecting a commitment to "dynamic nonalignment," Mali improved its relations with France, Britain, the United States, and other Western nations under General Traoré. It also cultivated links to China and the former Soviet Union.

For two decades Mali was locked in a dispute with Burkina Faso (formerly Upper Volta) over ownership of the 100-mile long, 12-mile wide Agacher strip between the two countries. The controversy, which triggered a number of military encounters (including a four-day battle in December 1985), was finally settled by a ruling in late 1986 from the International Court of Justice that divided the disputed territory into roughly equal parts, with the border being defined in accordance with traditional patterns of nomadic passage. Similar clashes involving Mauritania were followed by a border demarcation agreement in May 1988.

Relations with Libya cooled perceptibly as a result of the latter's involvement in the Chadian civil war. In early 1981 a number of Libyan embassy personnel in Bamako were expelled in response to an effort to convert the mission into a "people's bureau"; relations were further exacerbated by the expulsion of some 2,500 Malian workers from Libya in 1985 as part of a drive by the Qadhafi regime to reduce its dependence on foreign labor. Subsequently, Mali charged Libya with supporting Tuareg insurgents in northern Mali.

In January 1991 the Algerian government mediated a truce between the Malian government and moderate Tuareg party leaders, which was hailed as paving the way toward more definitive resolution of the conflict 14 months later. In September 1992 President Konaré met with Burkinabé President Blaise Compaoré in Ouagadougou to discuss efforts to reactivate bilateral cooperation and resolve the status of Tuareg refugees in northern Burkina Faso. In October Mali announced that France had pledged to finance the integration of Tuareg forces into the Malian army and to equip "mixed" Tuareg-regular army patrols (provided for in the National Pact) to contain unassimilated rebel groups. Subsequently, international diplomatic efforts were credited with generating tripartite agreements among Algeria, Mali, and Niger, which resulted in the repatriation of thousands of Tuaregs from Algeria in August 1993 and the creation in January 1994 of accommodation centers in Algeria for exiles fleeing the adjacent two countries' drought and civil unrest. Negotiations between Mali and Algeria in February 1995 yielded an accord on border security issues.

Relations with France were strained in the late 1990s following France's expulsions of thousands of Malian illegal immigrants. In 1998, the two countries created a joint commission to repatriate Malians living illegally in France, and the French government agreed to fund programs to help the returning Malians reintegrate into society.

Mali, Mauritania, and Senegal agreed in 1999 to conduct joint patrols to combat "banditry" in border areas, which had also experienced sporadic conflict among ethnic groups. Meanwhile, reports surfaced of tension in the north between Tuaregs and the national army. Relations with Côte d'Ivoire were strained following a coup attempt in that country in January 2001, Ivorian authorities reportedly unofficially implying that Mali and Burkina Faso had backed the overthrow effort.

In July 2003 reports emerged that a group of European tourists who had been taken hostage by Islamic militants in Algeria were being held in a remote region of Mali. They were released on August 8 following negotiations led by former Tuareg rebels. Mali subsequently agreed to increase border security with Algeria and to increase antiterrorism cooperation with Algeria, Chad, and Niger.

The growing presence of foreign Islamic extremists, mainly from Pakistan and Afghanistan, prompted the government in 2004 to seek international counterterrorism aid. U.S. military advisors subsequently arrived in Mali to initiate an antiterrorism training program for the Malian armed forces. This followed several U.S.-sponsored military training exercises in Mali and several years of U.S. security assistance in the form of equipment and financial aid. The government also gave permission for U.S. special operations units to undertake antiterrorism missions in the north of the country, where Algerian militants had reportedly established a presence. The United States subsequently announced it would use its Malian base as a headquarters for regional antiterrorism efforts.

Mali signed a broad economic agreement with China in early 2006. In return for increased exports of cotton from Mali to China, China agreed to expand investment in Mali's agriculture, tourism, and telecommunications sectors.

Current Issues

In January 1999 former president Traoré again faced a death sentence, this time following conviction on embezzlement charges. Traoré's wife, Mariam CISSOKO, was also similarly sentenced. However, in September President Konaré commuted the sentences to life imprisonment with hard labor. Subsequently, in January 2000, Konaré granted a full pardon to former army chief of staff Col. Ousman COULIBALY, who was facing a death sentence for his role in the suppression of the demonstrations in 1991. The resignation of Prime Minister Keita in February 2000 was seen in some quarters as designed to permit him to concentrate on what was expected to be a campaign to succeed Konaré in the 2002 presidential balloting (the president having previously announced he would not attempt to circumvent the two-term limit despite being encouraged in that regard by his supporters). However, analysts also pointed out that Keita had faced increasing criticism over economic policy, the area of expertise for new Prime Minister Sidibe. It was also reported that former president Amadou Touré was gearing up for a presidential run, while at midyear COPPO leaders announced plans to present a coalition opposition candidate in the campaign. Indeed, Touré resigned from his army post in September 2001 as required by law to be able to run for the presidency in 2002.

Some 40 parties signed a "pact of good conduct" in January 2001 in preparation for the 2002 presidential and legislative balloting, domestic and international consensus having been reached that a repeat of the 1997 electoral dysfunction would seriously tarnish the image of one of the continent's most prominent democratic experiments. However, late in the year President Konaré suspended plans for a referendum on new electoral laws approved by the assembly in mid-2000 based on recommendations from the 1999 national forum. Konaré argued that public support for the referendum was minimal and that certain provisions of the new legislation could be constitutionally challenged. Among other things, the proposed changes called for adoption of proportional balloting for some assembly seats, a longtime objective of the opposition.

In February 2002 the assembly adopted new electoral legislation that did not require a referendum, thereby paving the way for first-round presidential balloting in late April and legislative elections in July. Most parties agreed to participate in the polls, although observers noted that the successful presidential candidate and legislative parties would face daunting challenges, including economic malaise resulting from depressed export prices and ongoing inadequacies in the health and education sectors. Among other things, such problems had contributed to the increased societal influence of “hard-line” Islamic activists, who accused the government and Malian “elites” of having siphoned off most Western aid for their personal benefit.

Following his victory in 2002, one of President Touré’s first acts was to pardon former president Traoré in an attempt to promote national unity and reconciliation. However, sectional violence continued in the east, and violent crime also subsequently increased dramatically.

In September 2004 renewed fighting between Islamic groups in eastern Mali left 13 people dead. The fighting followed another incident of violence in western Mali in which 10 people were killed. Analysts suggested that a rise in Islamic “extremism” was creating a serious challenge to government efforts to maintain stability.

Attention in 2005–2006 turned to preparations for the presidential and assembly elections scheduled for 2007. Among other things, opposition parties hoped to capitalize on the apparent public perception that economic and political reforms were progressing more slowly than anticipated. Meanwhile, the “Tuareg issue” heated up again, as Tuareg fighters launched attacks on several cities and military bases in the north in May 2006. In July an accord was announced under which the rebels agreed to stop their militancy in return for intensified government investment in the region.

Political Parties

The only authorized party prior to the March 1991 coup was the Malian People’s Democratic Union (Union Démocratique du Peuple Malien—UDPM), which had been launched by General Traoré in 1979. The UDPM was dissolved in the wake of Traoré’s ouster.

The public demonstrations that preceded the 1991 coup were orchestrated by a number of groups (including Adema), which were linked by a Coordination Committee of Democratic Associations and Organizations, which joined the CRN in forming the CTSP on March 30, after which both it and the CRN were dissolved. On April 5 the CTSP authorized the formation of political parties, and by late 1991 approximately 50 formations, many with links to pre-1968 political personalities or groups, had applied for legal status. However, only 27 parties presented legislative candidates in 1992.

On May 11, 1992, representatives of 13 parties, including the US/RDA–Tréoule Konaté Tendency, Union for Democracy and Development (Union pour la Démocratie et le Développement—UDD), Sudanese Progress Party (Parti Soudanais du Progrès—PSP), RDP, and Union of Democratic Forces for Progress (Union des Forces Démocratiques pour le Progrès—UFD), announced the formation of a Front to Safeguard Democracy (Front Sauvegarde de la Démocratie—FSD) under the reported leadership of Konaté and the RDP’s Almamy SYLLA to conduct “a resolute and determined, but still democratic and constructive, opposition” to Adema. In August 1995 a number of senior leaders left the group following a dispute with Konaté. In October 1996 Adema initiated the formation of a progovernment alliance, the National Convention for Democracy and Progress (Convention Nationale pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—CNDP), which also included the Democratic and Social Convention (Convention Démocratique Sociale—CDS), the Party for National Renaissance (Parti pour la Renaissance Nationale—Parena), the Malian Rally for Labor (Rassemblement Malien pour le Travail—RAMAT), and others. The formation of another opposition alliance, the Rally for Patriotic Forces (Rassemblement pour les Forces Patriotiques—RFP), was reported by Africa Confidential in November. In July 1997 the following opposition parties boycotted legislative balloting after the president refused to reschedule presidential elections (held on May 11) until after assembly polling: the CNID, Popular Movement for Development (Mouvement Populaire pour le Développement—MPD), RDP, Rally for Democracy and Labor (Rassemblement pour la Démocratie et le Travail—RDT), UFDP, and the US/RDA.

In 1998 observers reported a widening of the differences between the aforementioned parties (the so-called radical or hard-line opposition) and those opposition groups (moderates) pursuing a dialogue with the Konaré administration. Loosely coalesced under the banner of the Collective of Opposition Political Parties (Coordination des Partis Politiques de l'Opposition—COPPO), the former rejected the administration's plans for an all-inclusive national forum and demanded both a reform of the electoral system and direct talks with the president. On April 16 a number of opposition parties, including COPPO members, tentatively agreed to a proposal brokered by former U.S. president Jimmy Carter that called on the Konaré government to reformulate the electoral commission, reschedule municipal elections to June, and revise the electoral list in exchange for the opposition's agreement to recognize the results of the 1997 elections. However, on April 20 the radical groups refused to attend a government-sponsored meeting on the accord, and thereafter they boycotted the June polling. In January 1999 representatives from the Soudanese Progress Party (PSP) and three other COPPO-affiliated groups attended the national forum in defiance of the Collective's leadership. Subsequently, COPPO suspended the PSP, whose leader, Oumar Hammadoun DICKO, then announced his party's plans to participate in midyear polling.

Meanwhile, in late January 1999 three centrist groups, the COPP, PDP, and UDD, formed a Convention for the Republic and Democracy (Convention pour la République et la Démocratie—CRD), under the leadership of Mamadou GAKOU. In 2000 and 2001 a significant thaw was noted between the government and most opposition parties. As of June 2000 almost all of the parties that had boycotted the 1997 polling had decided to contest the presidential and legislative elections scheduled for 2002. Prior to the 2002 presidential and legislative elections, three main electoral coalitions emerged—the ACC, ARD, and Hope 2002 (below).

Legislative Parties

Alliance for Alternation and Change (Alliance pour L'Alternance et le Changement—ACC). Formed prior to the 2002 legislative elections with the goal of providing President Touré with a political base in the assembly, the ACC consisted of some 28 parties, including those listed below.

Leader: Ibrahim Boubacar BAH (President).

Party for National Renaissance (Parti pour la Renaissance Nationale—Parena). Active since March 1995, Parena was officially launched on September 18 after its founders, CNID dissidents Capt. Yoro Diakité and Tiéblé Dramé, lost their five-month legal battle for control of that party. A number of Parena leaders were former or current Konaré government ministers, a status reflected in the signing of the Parena-Adema cooperation pact in February 1996. Parena participated in the cabinet announced in 1997 but declined to accept any posts in the February 2000 government. Meanwhile, Diakité was reported to have formed a new party (see BARA, below).

In 2001 Parena distanced itself from Adema, and Dramé became the party's presidential candidate in 2002, finishing fourth in the first round of balloting with 3.99 percent of the vote. Parena reportedly won one of the ACC seats in the 2002 legislative poll.

Leaders: Tiéblé DRAMÉ (President), Amidou DIABATÉ (Secretary General).

Soudanese Union/African Democratic Rally (Union Soudanaise/Rassemblement Démocratique Africain—US/RDA). The Malian wing of the RDA was formed in the aftermath of an RDA convention in Bamako in 1946. Supported by a rural constituency, the group came to power with the formation of Modibo Keita's postindependence government in 1960 but went underground following his ouster in 1968.

At a special congress in January 1992, the US/RDA split over the selection of a presidential candidate. Tréoulé Mamadou KONATÉ, the son of an RDA founder and an advocate of purging “Stalinism” from the party, was selected initially, but the party leadership ultimately repudiated the action, nominating instead former UN official Baba Hakib HAIDARA. Subsequently, both stood as candidates, with Konaté outpolling his rival in the first round but securing only 30 percent of the second-round vote in a contest with Alpha Oumar Konaré. In October 1995 Konaté was killed in a car crash, and in January 1996 the party ousted Secretary General Mamadou Bachir Gologo in favor of Mamadou Bamou TOURÉ.

In mid-May 1998, 29 senior US/RDA members led by political secretary Daba DIAWARA issued a statement allying themselves with party leader Seydou Badian KOUATÉ, who, in defiance of the US/RDA’s official stance, had declared that the group should recognize the government and participate in the local elections scheduled for June. Subsequently, Touré attempted to suspend the 29 members, who, in turn, rejected the legitimacy of his leadership, asserting that his earlier unwillingness to implement reconciliation initiatives approved by the party’s governing organs had undermined his authority. The moderate tendency of the US/RDA participated in the 1999 local elections.

The US/RDA supported former Amadou Touré’s presidential campaign in 2002. It reportedly won three seats as part of the ACC in the 2002 legislative balloting. In August 2003, Mamadou Bamou Touré resigned as secretary general of the party.

Leader: Mamadou Bachir GOLOGO (President).

Union of Democratic Forces for Progress (Union des Forces Démocratiques pour le Progrès—UFDP). The UFDP was launched in 1991 under the leadership of Demqo DIALLO, a prominent human rights advocate and champion of efforts to oust Moussa Traoré. A pro-Konaré grouping, the UFDP joined the CNDP in 1997 and criticized antigovernment protesters. Diallo died in June 2001, and a July national congress of the party (now also sometimes referred to as the Union of Forces of Progress) elected Shaka Diarra as the new chair.

Leaders: Shaka DIARRA (Chair), Youssouf TRAORE (Secretary General).

Other minor parties in the ACC include: the Democratic Bloc for African Integration (Bloc Démocratique pour l’Intégration Africaine—BDIA), a liberal party formed in 1993 under the leadership of Youssouf TRAORÉ that won three seats in the 2002 assembly elections; the Movement for African Independence, Renewal, and Integration (Mouvement pour l’Indépendance, la Renaissance, et l’Intégration Africaine—MIRIA), established by dissident members of Adema, including Mohamed Lamine TRAORÉ; the Malian Rally for Labor (Rassemblement Malien pour le Travail—RAMAT), which won two seats in the 2002 legislative elections under the leadership of Abdoulaye MAKO; and the Party for Democracy and Renewal (Parti pour la Démocratie et le Renouveau—PDR), which won one seat in the 2002 assembly balloting under the leadership of Adama KONE.

Alliance for the Republic and Democracy (Alliance pour la République et la Démocratie—ARD). The ARD was formed by several groups, including those below, in advance of the 2002 elections. Adema and the UDD each presented their own candidates in the first round of the presidential poll but then cooperated in the presidential runoff and the legislative balloting.

Leader: Moussa Balla COULIBALY.

Alliance for Democracy in Mali/Pan African Party for Liberty, Solidarity, and Justice (Alliance pour la Démocratie au Mali/Parti Pan-Africain pour la Solidarité et la Justice—Adema/PASJ). A principal organizer of anti-Traoré demonstrations and subsequently among those groups represented in the CTSP, Adema registered for legal status in April 1991. Adema candidates won substantial majorities in all three 1992 elections, securing 214 municipal council seats and 76 National Assembly seats. Adema also captured the presidency on April 26 with a 70 percent second-round vote share.

At the party's first congress on July 8–14, 1993, dissident members released a manifesto calling for the “appointment to positions of responsibility [within the party] . . . of competent men and women of integrity” and the “destruction of the old state apparatus.” Moreover, former prime ministers Touré and Sow both cited subversive activities by “radical” elements within Adema as among their reasons for resigning from the party. Observers attributed the intraparty friction to a conflict between members identifying with the former prime ministers and favoring integration of non-Adema political groups into the government and a smaller faction advocating Adema's unilateral rule.

At a party congress on September 25–27, 1994, founding member and Chair Mohamed Lamine Traoré lost his post in an action spearheaded by Prime Minister Ibrahim Boubacar Keita, who had hinted at dramatic party changes at his investiture. Subsequently, Traoré, Secretary General Mohamedoun DICKO, and a number of other senior members resigned from the party; two months later the dissidents launched MIRIA (above).

In February 1996 Adema signed a cooperation agreement with Parena, a newly founded group led by former Konaré ministers and dissidents from the CNID, which called for the establishment of a committee to implement a joint government program and electoral alliance pact.

At an Adema congress on December 5–6, 1997, the agenda was dominated by debate on how to reintegrate disenfranchised opposition groups into the political process. In 1998 relations between Adema and the majority of its hard-line opponents grew more distant. On the other hand, at a much heralded summit in May, Adema and representatives of the MPR (below) discussed adopting cooperative tactics to avert further violence.

In February 1999 Adema held its fifth national congress amid reports that it was riven by intraparty squabbling. Although Konaré reportedly emerged from the congress heralding the health of his party, continued factionalization was subsequently reported between Keita's supporters and his critics, led by Secretary General Ali Nouhoun DIALLO. Despite such opposition, Keita was reelected as party chair in October. He resigned from all his party duties, however, in October 2000 in reaction to the advances registered by the “reformist” wing. Keita then launched his own formation, the RPM (below). Observers noted that Keita's exit did not calm the tensions in the party, especially with regard to the 2002 presidential nomination. In March 2002, in a bitterly contested party election, Adema chose Soumaïla Cissé over former prime minister Mandé Sidibe to be the party's presidential candidate. However, Cissé was defeated in the second round of the presidential poll. Subsequently, Adema's parliamentary majority was reduced from 128 seats to 53 in legislative balloting, although the party remained the largest single group in the assembly.

The electoral decline led to infighting within the party, and Cissé led a group of dissident Adema members in the formation of a new rival party, the URD (below).

In 2006 former defense minister Soumaylou Boubèye MAIGA announced he intended to seek Adema's nomination for the 2007 presidential election.

Leaders: Alpha Oumar KONARÉ (Former President of the Republic), Dioncounda TRAORÉ (Party President), Marimata DIARRA, Mandé SIDIBE (Former Prime Minister).

Union for Democracy and Development (Union pour la Démocratie et le Développement—UDD). Running on a platform calling for “security, good citizenship, and clean streets,” the UDD, whose founder, Moussa Balla Coulibaly, was an official in the Traoré government, won 62 seats in the 1992 municipal elections.

In 1999 it was reported that the Socialist Party for Progress and Development had merged into the UDD. In late 2001 Coulibaly was nominated as the UDD's presidential candidate in the 2002 polling. Coulibaly was eliminated in the first round, and the UDD supported Soumaïla Cissé of Adema in the second round.

Leader: Moussa Balla COULIBALY (Chair and 2002 presidential candidate).

Hope 2002 (Espoir 2002). Hope 2002 was formed by some 15 parties, including those below, following the first round of the 2002 presidential balloting, which Hope 2002 described as “rigged” in favor of Adema. Hope 2002 supported Amadou Touré in the second round. In the legislative elections, Hope 2002 gained 66 seats and became the largest single group within the assembly.

Leader: Mountaga TALL (Spokesperson).

National Congress for Democratic Initiative (Congr s National d’Initiative D mocratique—CNID). Launched in 1990 as the National Committee for Democratic Initiative (Comit  National d’Initiative D mocratique), the CNID was included in the April 1991 formation of the CTSP in recognition of its role in the overthrow of the Traor  regime. In 1992 the party, supported by a predominantly youthful constituency, secured 96 municipal and 9 National Assembly seats. On April 12 Mountaga Tall, the party’s 35-year-old presidential candidate, finished third in the first presidential round, with 11.41 percent of the vote.

On March 26, 1995, on the eve of the party’s first conference, a group of dissidents reacted to the expulsion of ten governing committee members by holding a rival conference of the “true” CNID (see Parena, above).

In 1998 the CNID emerged as one of the most prominent of the radical opposition groups, organizing boycotts of the June polling and allegedly attempting to interfere with polling. The group’s stance toward the government reportedly softened in 2000 and 2001, and the CNID announced that it would participate in presidential and legislative polling in 2002.

Tall finished fifth as the CNID’s candidate in the first round of presidential balloting in 2002 with 3.75 percent of the vote. The CNID subsequently joined Hope 2002 for the legislative poll, reportedly securing 13 of Hope 2002’s seats.

Leader: Mountaga TALL (Chair).

Rally for Mali (Rassemblement pour le Mali—RPM). Launched initially in February 2001 as “Alternative 2000,” the RPM was a breakaway faction from Adema supportive of former prime minister Ibrahim K ita, who had left Adema in October 2000. K ita placed third in the first round with 21.03 percent of the vote. The RPM gained 46 seats in the 2002 legislative balloting as part of Hope 2002. In September Keita was elected speaker of the assembly. In 2006 Keita announced plans to run for president again in 2007.

Leaders: Ibrahim Boubacar KEITA (2002 presidential candidate and Speaker of the Assembly), Bocary TRET  (Secretary General).

Patriotic Movement for Renewal (Mouvement Patriotique pour le Renouveau—MPR). The MPR, which describes itself as a descendant of the UDPM, was legalized in January 1995. Because of its ties to former President Traor , the party was reportedly widely denigrated until 1997, when it assumed a prominent role in the opposition camp. In May 1998 at a highly publicized meeting with Adema, MPR representatives reportedly agreed to cooperate in efforts to control political violence. Collaterally, the MPR pressed the government to expedite the trials of the former president and his associates. Subsequently, following the splintering of the US/RDA in mid-1998, one observer described the MPR as the most “stable” of the moderate opposition groups. Nevertheless, in January 1999 MPR activists clashed with security forces when the former attempted to march from their own meeting to the site of the national forum.

The MPR was described by Africa Confidential in 1999 as being “openly aligned” with the imprisoned Traoré but committed to the pursuit of “national reconciliation.” Indeed, in 2000 the group decided to participate in presidential and legislative elections in 2002, nominating Choguel MAIGA for president. Maiga received 2.71 percent of the vote, and the MPR joined Hope 2002 for the subsequent legislative balloting.

Leader: Choguel MAIGA (President and 2002 presidential candidate).

Rally for Democracy and Progress (Rassemblement pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—RDP). The RDP was one of the first groups reported to have formed in April 1991. It won 64 seats in the February 1992 municipal balloting. The RDP’s Almamy Sylla gained less than 1 percent of the vote in the first round of presidential balloting in 2002.

Leaders: Almamy SYLLA, Abdul Wahab BERTHE.

Other minor parties in Hope 2002 include the Party for Independence, Democracy, and Solidarity (Parti pour l’Indépendance, la Démocratie, et la Solidarité—PIDS), formed by dissenters from the US/RDA in September 2001 and led by Daba DIAWARA; and the Rally for Democracy and Labor (Rassemblement pour la Démocratie et le Travail—RDT), formed in 1991 and led by Amadou Ali NIANGADOU.

African Solidarity for Democracy and Independence (Solidarité Africaine pour la Démocratie et l’Indépendance—SADI). Established in 2002 prior to the presidential elections, the SADI presented Oumar MARIKO as its presidential candidate. He received less than 1 percent of the vote in the first-round balloting. In the subsequent legislative elections, the SADI won six seats.

Leader: Cheick Oumar SISSOKO.

Union for the Republic and Democracy (Union pour la République et la Démocratie—URD). Launched in 2003 by former members of Adema who supported former presidential candidate Soumaïla Cissé, the URD is a centrist party that supports secularism and economic reforms.

Leaders: Soumaïla CISSÉ (former presidential candidate), Younoussi TOURÉ (Interim Party President).

Other Groups

Democratic and Social Convention (Convention Démocratique Sociale—CDS). The self-styled “centrist” CDS was launched by Mamadou Bakary Sangaré Kabakoro in 1996. Unlike its moderate opposition party peers, the CDS chose not to participate in the government named in September 1997, although it participated in the 1999 local elections. Sangaré received 2.21 percent of the vote in the first round of presidential balloting in 2002.

Leader: Mamadou Bakary SANGARÉ.

Party for Democracy and Progress (Parti pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—PDP). On February 8, 1994, the PDP leadership agreed to abandon its cabinet posting, reversing an earlier decision to ignore CNID and RDP calls for an opposition boycott. However, Boubacar Karamoko COULIBALY, the youth and sports minister, refused to resign, saying he would remain as an independent. In April 1994 dissidents led by Karim TRAORÉ broke from the PDP to form the Malian Alliance for Democracy and Progress-Dambe (Alliance Malienne pour la Démocratie et le Progrès-Dambe—AMDP-Dambe).

Leader: Mady KONATÉ.

Block of Alternatives for African Renewal (Bloc des Alternatives pour le Renouveau Africain—BARA). Formed in 1999 under the direction of Capt. Yoro Diakité, a former leader of Parena, the BARA pledged to pursue “unity” and “African integration.” In 2001 BARA was reportedly working together with the UDD and the CND to support the presidential bid of UDD chair Moussa Balla Coulibaly. In 2005 BARA rejected proposed cooperation with the Touré administration.

Leaders: Capt. Yoro DIAKITÉ (Chair), Inza COULIBALY (Secretary General).

Cabinet

As of June 1, 2006

Prime Minister

Ousmane Issoufi Maiga

Ministers

African Integration and Malians Abroad	Oumar Hamadoun Dicko
Agriculture	Seydou Traoré
Armed Forces and Veterans	Mamadou Clapie Cissouma
Communications and Information Technology	Gaoussou Drabo
Culture	Sheik Oumar Sissoko
Economy and Finance	Abou-Bacar Traoré
Education	Mamadou Lamine Traoré
Employment and Professional Training	Diallo M'Bodjissene
Environment and Sanitation	Nancouma Keita
Equipment and Transport	Abdoulaye Koita
Foreign Affairs and International Cooperation	Bien Moctar Ouane
Health	Maïga Zeinab Mint Youba [f]
Industry and Commerce	Choguel Kokala Maïga
Investment, Small and Medium-Sized Business	Ousmane Thiam
Justice and Keeper of the Seals	Me Fanta Sylla [f]
Livestock and Fishing	Oumar Ibrahima Touré
Mines, Energy, and Hydraulics	Hamed Diane Semega
Promotion of Women, Children, and the Family	Berthe Aissata Bengaly [f]
Rural Development and Planning	Marimatia Diarra
Security and Civil Protection	Col. Sadie Gassama
Social Development, Solidarity	Djibril Tangara
State Properties, Land, and Housing	Soumare Aminata Sidibe [f]
Territorial Administration and Local Communities	Gen. Kafougouna Kone
Tourism and Cottage Industry	Bah N'diaye
Urban Development and Housing	Modibo Sylla
Youth and Sports	Moussa Balla Diakite

[f] = female

Mamadou Maribatourou Diaby, the incumbent's sole challenger in the 1997 presidential balloting, is a member of the Unity, Development, and Progress Party (Parti pour l'Unité, le Développement, et le Progrès—PUDP). Diaby also ran unsuccessfully for the presidency in 2002. Other minor parties include the Civic Society (Société Civique—SC); the Movement for Democracy and Development (Mouvement pour la Démocratie et le Développement—MPDD); the Party for Unity and Progress (Parti pour l'Unité et le Progrès—PUP), led by former UDPM official Nock Ag ATTIA; the Popular Movement for Development (Mouvement Populaire pour le Développement—MPD); the Soudanese Progress Party (Parti Soudanais du Progrès—PSP), which is led by African Development Bank consultant Oumar Hammadoun Dicko and which was awarded two assembly seats in 1992 by the Supreme Court after successfully suing Adema for electoral fraud.

On March 20, 1996, the rebel Azwad Liberation Front (Front pour la Libération de l'Azaouad—FLA), originally launched in Algeria in December 1991 as the Unified Movements and Fronts of Azawad (Mouvements et Fronts Unifiés de l'Azaouad—MFUA), was formally dissolved after its component groups (see 1995–1996 Handbook, p. 598) had announced their “unflinching attachment to the constitution of the Republic of Mali, to national unity, and to the territorial integrity of the country.”

In August 1998 members of the Barefooted Ones (Pied Nus), a Muslim sect led by Cheikh Ibrahim Khalil KANOUTE, reportedly killed a judge in Dioila for imprisoning one of their colleagues and then clashed with local security officials. The group reportedly rejects all forms of Western and modern influences and has protested against the government’s adherence to internationally prescribed economic structural adjustment programs.

In November 2001 the former leader of the PDP, Idrissa TRAORE, formed the Party for Democracy and Self-Sufficiency (Parti pour la Démocratie et l’Autosuffisance—PDA). Other active parties include the National Democratic Convention (Convention Nationale Démocrate—CND); the Convention for Progress and the People (Convention pour le Progrès et le Peuple—COPP), led by Mamadou Gakou; and the Citizens’ Party for Renewal (Parti Citoyen pour le Renouveau—PCR), formed in July 2005, reportedly to provide President Touré with a political base for the 2007 elections.

Legislature

Following the March 1991 coup, the UDPM-dominated legislature was dissolved, with its powers assigned to the CTSP. The current National Assembly (Assemblée Nationale) contains 147 members serving (subject to dissolution) five-year terms. (In addition, Malians living abroad are represented by 13 legislators whom they select in separate polling.) In balloting on July 14 and 28, 2002, and after by-elections on October 20, Hope 2002 held 66 seats; the Alliance for the Republic and Democracy, 59 seats; the Alliance for Alternation and Change, 10; African Solidarity for Democracy and Independence, 6; and independents, 6.

President: Ibrahim Boubakar KEITA.

Communications

Press

The impact of the press has long been limited because of widespread illiteracy (80–90 percent) and, until the 1990s, little opportunity to publish dissenting or adversarial material. The following are published in Bamako: L’Essor-La Voix du Peuple (3,500), government daily; Le Républicain, independent daily; Le Soudanais; Nouvel Horizon and Le Soir de Bamako, independent dailies; Liberté, weekly; L’observateur; L’Aurore, biweekly; Info-Matin, pro-opposition daily; and Le Continent, weekly. Les Echos (25,000), initially a pro-government bimonthly, subsequently a daily, was launched in March 1989.

News Agencies

The National Information Agency of Mali (ANIM) and the Malian Publicity Agency (AMP) were merged in 1977 to form the official Agence Malienne de Presse (Amap); Agence France-Presse and a number of other foreign agencies maintain bureaus in Bamako.

Broadcasting and Computing

Radiodiffusion-Télévision Malienne (RTM) broadcasts news bulletins and programs in French, English, and the principal local languages; there are also more than a dozen private radio outlets. RTM transmissions were received by more than 160,000 television sets in 2003, while some 16,000 personal computers served approximately 32,000 Internet users. The staff of a private radio station were arrested in October 2003 and charged with “slander and incitement to violence” by the government. The arrests were criticized by press groups and opposition parties.

Intergovernmental Representation

Ambassador to the U.S.

Abdoulaye DIOP

U.S. Ambassador to Mali

Terrence P. McCULLEY

Permanent Representative to the UN

Sheikh Sidi DIARRA

IGO Memberships (Non-UN)

AfDB, AU, BADEA, BOAD, CILSS, ECOWAS, IDB, Interpol, IOM, NAM, OIC, OIF, UEMOA, WCO, WTO

MAURITANIA

ISLAMIC REPUBLIC OF MAURITANIA

al-Jumhuriyah al-Islamiyah al-Muritaniyah

---

The Country

Situated on the western bulge of Africa, Mauritania is a sparsely populated, predominantly desert country, overwhelmingly Islamic and, except in the south, Arabic in language. The dominant Beydane (Arabic for “white”) Moors, descendants of northern Arabs and Berbers, have been estimated as constituting one-third of the population, with an equal number of Haratines (mixed-race descendants of black slaves) having adopted Berber customs. Black Africans, the most important tribal groups of which are the Toucouleur, the Fulani, the Sarakole, and the Wolof, are concentrated in the rich alluvial farming lands of the Senegal River valley. They have recently claimed to account for a much larger population share than is officially acknowledged, their case being supported by the government’s refusal to release pertinent portions of the last two censuses. Racial tension, exacerbated by government “arabization” efforts, has contributed to internal unrest and conflict with several neighboring nations. Further complicating matters has been the de facto continuation of slavery, officially banned in 1980 but still reportedly encompassing an estimated 100,000–400,000 Haratines and blacks in servitude to Arab masters.

Before 1970 nearly all of the northern population was engaged in nomadic cattle raising, but the proportion had shrunk to less than one-quarter by 1986. Prolonged droughts, desertification, the loss of herds, and more recently, a devastating locust attack in 2004, which wiped out about half of the country’s crops, have driven more Mauritians to urban areas, where many depend on foreign relief aid. Many Mauritians seek their livelihood in other countries.

The country’s first deep water port, financed by China, opened near Nouakchott in 1986. Mauritania’s coastal waters are among the richest fishing grounds in the world and generate more than half of foreign income, although the region is also routinely fished by foreign trawlers. In 2003 exploratory tests indicated the presence of offshore oil fields, prompting investments from international oil companies. The country’s first offshore oil field, Chinguetti, went into production in February 2006. A second, larger field, Tiof, may go into production in 2009. The two fields are projected to produce as much as 165,000 barrels per day, netting approximately $300 million a year.

To secure aid from international donors, the government initiated numerous economic reforms, the latter including privatization of state-owned enterprises, promotion of free market activity, and currency devaluation. The government also endorsed political liberalization, although genuine progress in that regard has been minimal, while international lenders called for measures to address the unequal distribution of wealth. (More than 50 percent of the population lives in poverty, and the social services sector is considered grossly inadequate.)

In 2002 the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank announced that Mauritania had fulfilled its requirements for the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) initiative, resulting in debt relief of $1.1 billion. Real GDP growth of 3.3 percent and 5.4 percent was reported in 2002 and 2003, respectively, and inflation was relatively low. By 2004 real GDP grew about 7 percent, though inflation had soared to double digits, and GDP growth of 5 percent was projected for 2005. The IMF commended authorities for their plans to curtail government spending and to budget anticipated oil revenue for antipoverty programs. In May 2006 the IMF mission to Nouakchott noted that the transitional government was making progress on transparency and restoring economic stability since the coup in August 2005.

Government and Politics

Political Background

Under nominal French administration from the turn of the century, Mauritania became a French colony in 1920, but de facto control was not established until 1934. It became an autonomous republic within the French Community in 1958 and an independent “Islamic Republic” on November 28, 1960. President Moktar OULD DADDAH (died October 14, 2003), who led the country to independence, established a one-party regime with predominantly Moorish backing and endorsed a policy of moderate socialism at home combined with nonalignment abroad. Opposition to his 18-year presidency was periodically voiced by northern groups seeking union with Morocco, by inhabitants of the predominantly black south who feared Arab domination, and by leftist elements in both student and trade union organizations.

Under an agreement concluded in November 1975 by Mauritania, Morocco, and Spain, the Ould Daddah regime assumed control of the southern third of Western (Spanish) Sahara on February 28, 1976, coincident with the withdrawal of Spanish forces and Morocco’s occupation of the northern two-thirds (see discussion under entry for Morocco). However, an inability to contain Algerian-supported insurgents in the annexed territory contributed to the president’s ouster in a bloodless coup on July 10, 1978, and the installation of Lt. Col. Mustapha OULD SALEK as head of state by a newly formed Military Committee for National Recovery (Comité Militaire de Recouvrement National—CMRN). Ould Salek, arguing that the struggle against the insurgents had “nearly destroyed” the Mauritanian economy, indicated that his government would be willing to withdraw from Tiris El-Gharbia (the Mauritanian sector of Western Sahara) if a settlement acceptable to Morocco, Algeria, Mauritania, and the insurgents could be found. However, the overture was rejected by Morocco, and in October the Algerian-backed Popular Front for the Liberation of Saguia el Hamra and Rio de Oro (Polisario) announced that the insurgency would cease only if Mauritania were to withdraw from the sector and recognize Polisario’s government in exile, the Saharan Arab Democratic Republic (SADR).

In March 1979 Salek reiterated his government’s desire to extricate itself from the conflict but dismissed several CMRN members known to favor direct talks with Polisario. Subsequently, on April 6, he dissolved the CMRN itself in favor of a new Military Committee for National Salvation (Comité Militaire de Salut National—CMSN) and relinquished the office of prime minister to Lt. Col. Ahmed OULD BOUCEIF, who was immediately hailed as effective leader of the Nouakchott regime. On May 27, however, Ould Bouceif was killed in Political Status: Independent republic since November 28, 1960; 1961 constitution suspended by the Military Committee for National Recovery on July 20, 1978; present constitution, providing for multiparty civilian government, approved by referendum July 12, 1991.

Area: 397,953 sq. mi. (1,030,700 sq. km.).

Population: 2,548,157 (2000C); 3,166,859 (2005E), excluding an estimated 170,000–240,000 former residents of Senegal who fled or were expelled to Mauritania following a 1989 border dispute.

Major Urban Center (2005E): NOUAKCHOTT (644,000). In recent years the population of Nouakchott has grown rapidly, many former nomads having taken up permanent residence in the capital since the 1970s.

Official Language: Arabic. (Three languages of the Black African community—Poular, Soninke, and Wolof—are constitutionally designated as national languages. French, an official language until 1991, is still widely spoken, particularly in the commercial sector. In addition, in 1999 the government designated French as the “language for science and technical subjects” in Mauritanian schools.)

Monetary Unit: Ouguiya (official rate July 1, 2006: 271.30 ouguiyas = $1US).

Head of State: Col. Ely Ould Mohamed VALL; assumed office as president of the Military Council for Justice and Democracy following coup of August 3, 2005, that ousted President Maaouya Ould Sidahmed TAYA (Democratic and Social Republican Party).

Prime Minister: Sidi Mohamed Ould BOUBACAR; appointed by the head of state on August 7, 2005, to succeed Sghair Ould MBARECK (Democratic and Social Republican Party).

an airplane crash and was succeeded (following the interim incumbency of Lt. Col. Ahmed Salem OULD SIDI) by Lt. Col. Mohamed Khouna OULD HAIDALLA on May 31.

President Ould Salek was forced to resign on June 3, the CMSN naming Lt. Col. Mohamed Mahmoud Ould Ahmed LOULY as his replacement. Colonel Louly immediately declared his commitment to a cessation of hostilities and on August 5, after three days of talks in Algiers, concluded a peace agreement with Polisario representatives. While the pact did not entail recognition of the SADR, Mauritania formally renounced all claims to Tiris El-Gharbia and subsequently withdrew its troops from the territory, which was thereupon occupied by Moroccan forces and renamed Oued Eddahab (the Arabic form of the province’s original name, Rio de Oro).

On January 4, 1980, President Louly was replaced by Col. Ould Haidalla, who also continued to serve as chief of government. The following December Ould Haidalla announced that, as a first step toward restoration of democratic institutions, his largely military administration would be replaced by a civilian government headed by Sid Ahmad OULD BNEIJARA. Only one army officer was named to the cabinet announced on December 15, while the CMSN published a draft constitution four days later that proposed establishment of a multiparty system.

The move toward civilianization was abruptly halted on March 16, 1981, as the result of an attempted coup by a group of officers (who were allegedly backed by Morocco), Prime Minister Ould Bnejara being replaced on April 26 by the army chief of staff, Col. Maaouya Ould Sidahmed TAYA. A further coup attempt, involving an effort to abduct President Ould Haidalla at Nouakchott airport on February 6, 1982, resulted in the arrest of Ould Bnejara and former president Ould Salek, both of whom were sentenced to ten-year prison terms by a special tribunal on March 5.

On March 8, 1984, in a major leadership reshuffle, Taya returned to his former military post, and the president reclaimed the prime ministry, to which was added the defense portfolio. The following December Ould Haidalla was ousted in a bloodless coup led by Colonel Taya, who assumed the titles of president, prime minister, and chair of the CMSN.

Amid increasingly vocal black opposition to Moorish domination, Colonel Taya announced plans in mid-1986 for a gradual return to democratic rule (see Constitution and government, below), and local councils were elected in the country's regional capitals in December. However, north-south friction persisted, with three Toucouleur officers being executed and some 40 others imprisoned for involvement in an alleged coup attempt in October 1987.

Although the Taya regime was subsequently charged with systematic repression of opponents, particularly southerners, elections were held for councils in the principal townships and rural districts in January 1988 and 1989, respectively. New elections to all the municipal councils, originally planned for late 1989 but postponed because of a violent dispute with Senegal (see Foreign relations, below), were held in December 1990. Meanwhile, racial tension remained high because of reports that security forces had imprisoned thousands of black army officers and government officials, several hundred of whom had allegedly been executed or tortured to death. Although the government claimed that the arrests had been made in connection with a coup plot, opponents charged that the regime was merely intensifying an already virulent anti-black campaign.

On April 15, 1991, Colonel Taya surprised observers by announcing that a referendum would be held soon on a new constitution, followed by multiparty presidential and legislative elections. The draft constitution was released on June 10 by the CMSN, approved with a reported "yes" vote of nearly 98 percent in a national referendum on July 12, and formally entered into effect on July 21. Four days later, the CMSN adopted legislation on the legalization of political parties, six of which (including the regime-supportive Democratic and Social Republican Party [Parti Républicain Démocratique et Social—PRDS]) were quickly recognized. On June 29 Colonel Taya, expanding a partial program announced in March and April, declared a general amnesty for detainees held on state security charges, thereby somewhat mollifying black hostility.

In presidential balloting on January 24, 1992, Colonel Taya, as the PRDS nominee, was credited with winning 63 percent of the vote; his principal challenger, Ahmed OULD DADDAH, received 33 percent. Ould Daddah, the previously exiled brother of former president Moktar Ould Daddah, was supported by a number of the new political parties, including the influential Union of Democratic Forces (Union des Forces Démocratiques—UFD), which challenged the accuracy of the official election results.

On February 10, 1992, five opposition parties requested postponement of National Assembly elections scheduled for March 6 and 13 to avoid a repetition of what they claimed had been massive fraud at the presidential poll. Their appeal rejected, 6 of the 14 opposition groups, including the UFD, boycotted the balloting, in which the PRDS won an overwhelming majority of seats on a turnout of little more than a third of the electorate.

In indirect senatorial balloting on April 3 and 10, 1992, the participants were further reduced to the PRDS and the small Avante-Guard Party (Parti Avant-Garde—PAG), which received none of the available seats, as contrasted with 36 for the PRDS and 17 for independents. On April 18, following Colonel Taya's inauguration as president, Taya yielded the office of prime minister to a young "technocrat," Sidi Mohamed OULD BOUBACAR, who announced the formation of a new government on April 20.

Only the UFD and the recently formed Union for Democracy and Progress (Union pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—UDP) challenged the PRDS in municipal balloting on January 28 and February 4, 1994. The government party won control of 172 of the 208 municipal councils (as compared to 19 for independents and 17 for the UFD), prompting opposition charges of extensive electoral fraud. The opposition also questioned the results of the April Senate replenishment, in which the PRDS won 16 of 17 seats. In September it was reported that President Taya had dropped his military title in pursuit of a more civilian image. At the same time, the government launched a crackdown on Islamic "agitators," fundamentalists having reportedly gained converts by providing much-needed social services in urban areas.

Taya dismissed Ould Boubacar on January 2, 1996, replacing him with Cheikh el Avia Ould Mohamed KHOUNA. The December 12, 1997, elections won President Taya another six-year term, with an official 90 percent of the vote. The UFD and several other opposition parties boycotted the balloting in objection to the regime's failure to establish an independent electoral commission, among other things.

Despite growing opposition, President Taya's PRDS party maintained a firm grip on power, winning a majority of seats in the 1996 and 2001 National Assembly elections.

The Mauritanian cabinet underwent more than a dozen reshufflings between June 1997 and May 2003, prompting concerns about the stability of the government. On June 7, 2003, those concerns were validated when rebels stormed the presidential palace in a coup attempt that led to two days of fighting in the capital. After regaining power on June 9, President Taya began a crackdown on the Muslim extremists he blamed for the uprising. On July 7, 2003, Taya appointed Sighair Ould Mbareck as prime minister, replacing Khouna. Ould Mbareck is the first former slave to hold the position.

Four months later Taya was elected to his third term. His principal challenger, former president Ould Haidalla, who had assembled a coalition of prominent Islamists, Arab nationals, and reformers, won 18.7 percent of the vote. Ould Haidalla and several of his supporters were arrested and detained on the day before the election, then released, only to be arrested and released again the next day. International observers were not permitted to observe the elections, which were labeled fraudulent by Taya's opponents. In February 2005 Ould Haidalla was acquitted on charges relating to the 2003 and 2004 attempted coups. Four soldiers were found guilty and sentenced to life in prison.

In August and September 2004 government officials announced discovery of two more coup attempts, allegedly organized by former army officers Saleh Ould Hanenna and Mohamed Cheikhna.

Officials accused Libya and Burkina Faso of arming and financing the coup, charges the two countries denied.

However, the insurgency seemed to be on the rise. On June 16, 2005, gunmen ambushed a remote military outpost in northern Mauritania, killing 15 soldiers. An Algerian group called the Salafist Group for Call and Combat, which is affiliated with al-Qaida, claimed responsibility for the attack. The group said that the ambush was meant to avenge the imprisonment of Islamists in Mauritania.

A bloodless coup was staged on August 3, 2005, when Taya was in Saudi Arabia attending the funeral of King Fahd. A group of 16 security and army officers led by Col. Ely Ould Mohamed VALL established themselves as the ruling Military Council for Justice and Democracy (MCJD) with Vall as head of state. On August 5, the parliament was dissolved. Mbareck resigned as prime minister on August 7 and was immediately replaced by Ould Boubacar, ambassador to France, who resigned from the former ruling PRDS party on August 9. A new cabinet, described as consisting primarily of technocrats, was announced on August 10. The transitional government pledged to hold elections within two years (see Current issues, below). Most political parties, including the PRDS, ultimately gave their approval to the junta.

Constitution and Government

The constitution of May 23, 1961, which had replaced Mauritania's former parliamentary-type government with a one-party presidential system, was formally suspended by the CMRN on July 20, 1978. A Constitutional Charter issued by the Military Committee confirmed the dissolution of the National Assembly and the Mauritanian People's Party (Parti du Peuple Mauritanien—PPM) and authorized the installation of the committee's chair as head of state until such time as "new democratic institutions are established."

In December 1980 the CMSN published a constitutional proposal that was to have been submitted to a referendum in 1981. However, no balloting was held prior to the coup of December 1984. Subsequently, Colonel Taya indicated that the military would prepare for a return to democracy through a program called the Structure for the Education of the Masses that would involve the election of councilors at the local level to advise the government on measures to improve literacy, social integration, and labor productivity. In the series of municipal elections conducted in 1986–1990, voters chose from multiple lists of candidates approved by the government, although no formal political party activity was permitted.

The 1991 constitution declared Mauritania to be an “Islamic Arab and African republic,” guaranteed “freedom of association, thought, and expression,” and conferred strong executive powers on the president, including the authority to appoint the prime minister. Directly elected by universal suffrage in two-round voting, the president may serve an unlimited number of six-year terms. The new basic law also established a bicameral legislature (comprising a directly elected National Assembly and an indirectly elected Senate), as well as constitutional, economic and social, and Islamic councils.

The legal system traditionally reflected a combination of French and Islamic codes, with the judiciary encompassing a Supreme Court; a High Court of Justice; courts of first instance; and civil, labor, and military courts. In June 1978 a commission was appointed to revise the system according to Islamic precepts, and in March 1980, a month after the replacement of “modern” codes by Islamic law (sharia), the CMSN established an Islamic Court consisting of a Muslim magistrate, two councilors, and two ulemas (interpreters of the Koran). Earlier, in October 1978, a special Court of State Security had been created. The 1991 constitution provided for an independent judiciary with Islam serving as the “single source of law.”

For administrative purposes the country is divided into 12 regions, plus the capital district of Nouakchott, and 32 departments; in addition, 208 urban and rural districts (areas populated by at least 500 inhabitants) were created in October 1988.

The Military Council for Justice and Democracy (MCJD) formed by the leaders of the August 2005 coup, maintained the 1991 constitution, supplementing it with a military council “charter” that stipulated the MCJD held power over the executive and legislative branches, dissolved the parliament, and gave the MCJD advisory power over the Constitutional Council. Constitutional amendments proposed by the transitional government were overwhelmingly approved by voters (97 percent) in a June 25, 2006, referendum to limit a president to two terms of five years each and set a maximum age limit of 75 for a president.

Foreign Relations

Mauritania has combined nonalignment in world affairs with membership in such groupings as the Arab League (since 1973) and, as of 1989, the Arab Maghreb Union (AMU). Following independence, economic and cultural cooperation with France continued on the basis of agreements first negotiated in 1961 and renegotiated in 1973 to exclude special arrangements in monetary and military affairs. As a consequence, French military advisers were recalled and Mauritania withdrew from the Franc Zone, establishing its own currency. In late 1979 a limited number of French troops and military instructors returned to ensure Mauritania’s territorial integrity following Nouakchott’s withdrawal from Western Sahara and the annexation of its sector by Morocco.

Mauritania’s settlement with the Polisario Front was followed by restoration of diplomatic relations with Algeria, which had been severed upon Algiers’ recognition of the Saharan Arab Democratic Republic (SADR) in 1976. During 1980–1982 Nouakchott maintained formal neutrality in Polisario’s continuing confrontation with Morocco, withholding formal recognition of the SADR but criticizing Rabat’s military efforts to retain control of the entire Western Sahara. In 1983 Colonel Ould Haidalla concluded a Maghreb Fraternity and Cooperation Treaty with Algeria and Tunisia that was implicitly directed against Rabat and Tripoli. On the other hand, declaring that the conflict in the Western Sahara had “poisoned the atmosphere,” Colonel Taya subsequently attempted to return Mauritania to its traditional posture of regional neutralism. While still maintaining its “moral support” for the SADR, which it officially recognized in 1984, the Taya regime normalized relations with Morocco and Libya, thereby balancing growing ties with Algeria that included the signing of a border demarcation agreement in April 1986.

Relations with Senegal have been tense since an April 1989 incident when violence erupted between villagers along the border with Senegal, provoking race riots in both nations’ capitals that reportedly caused the death of nearly 500 people and injury to more than 1,000. During the ensuing months an estimated 170,000–240,000 Mauritanian expatriates fled Senegal, while Mauritania reportedly expelled 70,000 Senegalese and 40,000 of its own black residents. Mauritania and Senegal severed diplomatic relations in August, with each country accusing the other of instigating further violence. Although the countries restored ties in April 1992 and the border was partially reopened the following November, tension continued as black Mauritanians charged they were being prevented from returning to Mauritania and Senegal attributed widespread “banditry” along the border to the refugee situation. Despite several flare-ups, relations between the two countries improved after Senegal’s President Wade expressed his support for the Taya regime, following the 2003 coup attempt in Mauritania, and extradited a suspected coup plotter to Mauritania.

Mauritania has also had strained relations with Mali, whose black-dominated Traoré regime accused Nouakchott in the late 1980s of supporting antigovernment activity among its ethnically Berber Tuareg population. Following the resolution of the Tuareg situation in the mid-1990s, relations with Mali have warmed.

Mauritania attracted an unusual amount of international attention for its support for Iraq in the 1990–1991 Gulf crisis, causing Western aid donors to sharply curtail their aid to Nouakchott. However, assistance was subsequently restored, apparently reflecting Western support for the Taya regime’s strong antifundamentalist posture. The government has distanced itself from Iraq recently, expelling Baghdad’s ambassador in October 1995 amid reports of a coup plot among “pro-Baathist” elements. Among other things, the policy shift has contributed to improved relations with Gulf Arab states.

In November 1995 Nouakchott announced plans to open an “interest” office in Tel Aviv as part of what was expected to be eventual restoration of full relations with Israel. The action was condemned by some hard-line Arab states, including Libya, which recalled its ambassador and discontinued all aid to Mauritania. However, Tunisian mediation in early 1997 helped restore relations between Mauritania and Tripoli.

In late 1999 the Taya government completed the foreign policy reversal started in mid-decade by severing relations with Iraq and becoming only the third Arab state (after Egypt and Jordan) to establish full diplomatic relations with Israel.

French officials have been critical of Mauritania’s human rights record, but relations between the two countries improved after France offered support to the Taya regime following the 2003 coup attempt.

The government has cooperated with the United States in several counterterrorism training programs beginning in 2003. Such programs target al-Qaida–affiliated groups operating in Mauritania and several neighboring countries. In a major decision, Mauritania announced in December that it was withdrawing from the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS); analysts suggested that Nouakchott had grown increasingly concerned over the possibility that the non-Francophone countries in ECOWAS would adopt a common currency to the detriment of the ouguiya. Subsequently, the Taya administration declared that it would focus on affairs in northern Africa, particularly through the proposed rejuvenation of the Arab Maghreb Union, rather than on its relations with its southern neighbors. (As an outgrowth of that orientation, Nouakchott was described in 2000 as having informally accepted the premise that the Western Sahara would remain a province of Morocco.)

Regional tensions increased in August and September 2004 after President Taya accused Libya and Burkina Faso of arming renegade soldiers allegedly preparing to topple the Taya regime in two separate coup attempts. Both countries denied the accusations.

Following the August 2005 coup, Colonel Vall pledged to maintain Mauritania's relations with Israel. The African Union (AU) suspended Mauritania's membership a day after the coup but subsequently indicated the country would regain its seat after elections if a democracy were established.

Current Issues

Several human rights activists were arrested in 1998 after they participated in a French television documentary on slavery. Antislavery demonstrations ensued in Nouakchott, prompting further arrests and leaving some 20 people injured. Although President Taya pardoned the activists in March, his regime subsequently faced domestic and international criticism for its failure to enforce antislavery statutes. (The president's power base includes wealthy and extremely influential clan leaders, who are generally reported to be slave "owners.")

The municipal elections of early 1999 did little to enhance the country's democratic credentials as the PRDS and its allies won control of every council in the wake of a boycott by the UFD-led opposition, which also refused to participate in the Senate replenishment of April 2000. The government subsequently announced that the next local elections would be moved up to October 2001 to coincide with the scheduled National Assembly poll, with a degree of proportional representation to be introduced into both as a means of promoting inclusion of non-PRDS parties in the legislative process.

A series of large pro-Palestinian street demonstrations occurred in late 2000 following the breakdown of Israeli-Palestinian negotiations. However, the government quashed the protests and, despite heavy pressure from many Arab states, refused in early 2001 to revoke its recently established diplomatic ties with Israel. President Taya maintained his new strongly pro-United States stance which, among other things, had underpinned substantial Western aid. In 2002 the government continued its crackdown on Islamists, Baathists, and suspected insurgents, arresting and detaining, among others, three "prisoners of conscience" from the opposition group Popular Front, according to Amnesty International. Following the June 2003 coup, almost 200 suspected insurgents were arrested and charged. None was sentenced to death; however, according to the defense, many were tortured in detention.

President Taya's 2003 victory came amid widespread allegations of fraud, but his critics declined to pursue the matter through legal channels. French observers were not invited to monitor the elections, as they had done in 2001, and several opposition members, including Taya's main opponent, were arrested in the days leading up to the vote, prompting a warning from Human Rights Watch of a climate of "harassment of opposition members."

The crackdown on Islamists and other Taya opponents subsequently intensified; in the spring of 2005, the government arrested 30 alleged terrorists accused of attempting to destabilize the country. The government claimed to have linked many of the prisoners to a group affiliated with al-Qaida; however, opponents and some human rights groups charged that Taya was using Western fears of terrorism as an opportunity to silence his opponents. Training and financing for the crackdown came partly from the United States as part of its own counterterrorism efforts. Human rights groups cautioned that increasing tensions between Taya and Islamic groups, fueled by the impending infusion of oil money, could further destabilize the country.

Taya had become "despotic" since taking power and was "deeply unpopular," according to Middle East International, not only for his imprisonment of dissidents (Islamists, in particular), but also because of his perceived discrimination against Mauritania's poorer Arab population. Thus, the coup staged by a group of military officials on August 3, 2005, when Taya was out of the country, had domestic support—marked by exuberant street celebrations—and, ultimately, international acceptance, including financial support for promised elections. Col. Ely Ould Mohamed Vall, who, as president of the Military Council for Justice and Democracy became head of state after the MCJD's takeover, immediately announced broad-ranging plans for democratic reform. He offered assurances that the transitional government would be in place for no longer than two years, and that neither he nor anyone in the MCJD would participate in elections scheduled in 2006 (local and parliamentary) and 2007 (presidential). In addition, he announced a general amnesty for political prisoners; implemented a constitutional referendum (see Constitution and government, above); and allowed Taya—in exile in Qatar—to return to Mauritania if he chose, though barring him from the 2007 presidential elections. While the coup initially met with international condemnation, attitudes soon softened, and in early 2006 the European Union offered some $7 million to support the transition, with other contributions reportedly coming from France, Spain, and Egypt. The United States was also reported to be working with the junta to organize multiparty elections as soon as possible. As of April, according to a Mauritanian census, nearly 1 million voters had been registered. Perhaps the most significant change under Colonel Vall's initial tenure was the amending of the constitution to set term limits for a president, eliminating the power of a "president-for-life," and possibly bringing the country closer to civilian rule with the introduction of multiparty elections.

Meanwhile in early 2006, Mauritania was reportedly becoming the latest point of departure for Africans trying to enter Europe illegally. Prime Minister Boubacar called for Western assistance after hundreds of migrants died, including 18 in the ocean off Mauritania, as thousands of others came through the country on their way to Europe.

Political Parties

Mauritania became a one-party state in 1964, when the Mauritanian People's Party (Parti du Peuple Mauritanien—PPM/Hizb al-Shah al-Muritani) was assigned legal supremacy over all governmental organs. The PPM was dissolved following the coup of July 1978. Although partisan activity was not permitted, some candidates in municipal elections in 1986–1990 were linked to informal groups such as the National Democratic Union (Union National Démocratique—UND) and the Union for Progress and Fraternity (Union des Progrès et Fraternité—UPF). In addition, unofficial opposition activity was conducted by several formations, including the National Democratic Movement (Mouvement National Démocratique—MND) and the United Democratic Front of Forces for Change (Front Démocratique Uni des Forces du Changement—FDUFC).

The constitution approved in July 1991 guaranteed "freedom of association," and subsequent legislation established regulations for the legalization of political parties. Groups based on race or region were proscribed, while Islamic organizations were declared ineligible for registration on the ground that Islam belonged to "all the people" and could not be "claimed" by electoral bodies.

In view of the near-total dominance of the Democratic and Social Republican Party (PRDS) in recent national and municipal elections, legislation was adopted in late 2000 providing for a degree of proportional representation in the 2001 assembly balloting and concurrent local polls. It was also announced that all parties securing at least 1 percent of the votes in the municipal elections would receive government financing (based on their total vote) and that "equal access" to the state-controlled media would be provided to opposition parties.

Following the coup of August 3, 2005, most political parties and groups backed the transitional junta. Though the PRDS initially denounced the coup, within little more than a month it appeared willing to support the junta, and in September abolished the post of party chair that had been held for 15 years by former president Taya. Various other parties began forming alliances in advance of scheduled parliamentary and presidential elections in 2006 and 2007, respectively.

Parties

Democratic and Social Republican Party (Parti Républicain Démocratique et Social—PRDS). The PRDS was launched in support of President Taya by a longtime associate, Cheikh Sid Ahmed Ould Baba, who resigned from the cabinet and military in mid-1991 to concentrate on party politics. As the PRDS nominee, Taya won the January 1992 presidential poll by a substantial margin, and the PRDS assumed essentially unchallenged political control by winning large majorities in the subsequent National Assembly and Senate elections, which were boycotted by most opposition groups. The party also dominated the municipal and Senate balloting of early 1994.

In March 1995 the PRDS absorbed the Movement of Independent Democrats (Mouvement des Démocrates Indépendants—MDI), led by Bechir el-HASSEN, which had left the UFD (below) in June 1994.

The party won 70 of 79 seats in the 1996 legislative balloting on its own right and was also considered to enjoy the support of the seven independent legislators (some of whom were former PRDS members) and the RDU representative in the assembly. Taya was reelected as party leader at the second national congress held in November 1999. The PRDS won 64 of 81 seats in the assembly in the 2001 balloting and 15 out of 18 open seats in the April 2004 partial Senate elections. In 2003 President Taya won his third term in office.

Following the August 3, 2005, coup, Colonel Vall named PRDS member Sidi Mohamed Ould Boubacar as prime minister, and Boubacar quit the party on August 9. The PRDS initially objected to the junta, calling on its members to support the former regime. A few days later, however, it reportedly reversed itself and gave approval to the ruling MCJD (which reportedly did detain or interrogate members of Taya's government after the coup). Support for Taya, widely reported to be a repressive leader who imprisoned dissidents, particularly Islamists, had waned over the years, and his policy of engagement with Israel angered Arab nationalists, observers said. On September 19 the party took the further step of abolishing the chairmanship that Taya had held for 15 years. In October the party held an extraordinary congress and reportedly changed its name to the Republican Democratic Party for Renovation (PRDR). However, the actions of the congress were canceled in November by a Mauritanian court, which also ordered the party's assets seized pending the outcome of a dispute within the party over whether an audit should have been conducted during the congress. Further turmoil was evidenced when the party's Islamist wing, led by Abdou MAHAM, severed its ties the same month, reportedly to join the Rally for Democracy and Unity (Rassemblement pour la Démocratie et l'Unité—RDU). On November 25 the PRDS elected Ethmane Ould Cheikh Abou Ali Maali, Mauritania's ambassador to Kuwait, as president.

Leaders: Ethmane Ould Cheikh Abou Ali MAALI (President), Cheikh El Avia Ould Mohamed KHOUNA (Former Prime Minister), Rachid Ould SALEH (Speaker of the National Assembly), Bela Ould MAKIYA (Secretary General).

Rally for Democracy and Unity (Rassemblement pour la Démocratie et l'Unité—RDU). Led by the mayor of Atar, who had served as a cabinet minister under Mauritania's first president, the center-right RDU was the first party (in August 1991) to be recognized by the present regime. It supported President Taya in the January 1992 presidential campaign but, after winning one seat in the first round of the March National Assembly election, broke with the government and boycotted the second round, as well as the subsequent Senate race. However, as of the 1996 legislative elections, in which it retained its seat, the RDU was once again described as allied with the PRDS, and the RDU leader was named an adviser to the president in the government announced in December 1998. In the 2004 Senate elections, the RDU won one seat.

Leader: Ahmed Moktar Sidi BABA.

Union for Democracy and Progress (Union pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—UDP). The UDP was legalized in June 1993, its ranks including prominent ex-UFD members, some of whom had also served in the administration of Mauritania's first president, Moktar Ould Daddah. UDP leaders pledged to work toward “restoration of national unity,” which, in contrast to government policy, appeared to be aimed at conciliation with black Mauritians. However, despite its professed multiracial stance, the UDP has recently been described as continuing, for the most part, to represent conservative Moorish interests.

The UDP participated in the 1994 municipal balloting, although it did not gain control of any of the 19 local boards for which it offered candidates, party leaders reportedly having encouraged supporters to vote for whichever opposition candidate had the best chance of defeating the PRDS candidate. Reportedly suffering from internal dissension, the UDP won no seats in the 1996 legislative poll. When UDP leader Hamdi OULD MOUKNASS was appointed as a presidential adviser in December 1997, the UDP moved into a position as a government-supportive party. At the same time, some party members had reportedly aligned with the FPO (see AC, below), the recently organized leading opposition coalition.

Hamdi Ould Mouknass died in September 1999 and was succeeded as UDP president in May 2000 by his daughter, Naha Mint Mouknass, who thereby became one of the few female party leaders in the Arab world. She was also named a presidential adviser, reaffirming the rump UDP’s ties to the government. The party made five nominations to the 2004 Senate elections but won none.

Leaders: Naha Mint MOUKNASS (President), Sheikh Saad Bouh CAMARA, Ahmed OULD MENAYA (Secretary General).

Action for Change (Action pour le Changement—AC). The AC by default became the “leading” opposition party when it won the only legislative seat in 1996 that did not go to the PRDS or PRDS supporters. Formed as the result of a split within the UFD (below), the AC was described as comprising the “most militant elements” of Haratine and black groupings. It appeared to be an outgrowth of El-Hor, formed in 1974 to promote Haratine interests and a component of the UFD until mid-1994. The group is led by Massoud Ould Boulkheir, a minister of rural development under former president Ould Haidalla. African Confidential several years ago described El-Hor as the “most likely effective opposition” to President Ould Taya and the PRDS because of the country’s large Haratine population.

Before the 1996 balloting the AC called for a national census to be conducted to create complete and accurate voting lists. The AC legislator, Kebe Abdoulaye, was elected secretary of the National Assembly as part of what some observers described as a public relations exercise designed to illustrate the Taya regime’s “inclusiveness.” However, three members of the AC were among those arrested during the antislavery demonstration at the capital in February 1998.

In February 1997 the AC was a founding member (along with the Popular Progressive Alliance [APP], the UFD, PAG, and dissidents from the UDP [who referenced themselves as the UDP-2]) of the Front of Opposition Parties (Front des Partis d’Opposition—FPO), which described itself as committed to pluralism, a mixed economy, and the eradication of slavery. Although organized, among other things, to present joint opposition candidates, the Front boycotted the December 1997 presidential balloting because the regime denied its demand for creation of an independent electoral commission. The FPO components also boycotted the January 1999 municipal elections, while little reference to the FPO was made during the run-up to the 2001 balloting.

In late 2000 it was reported that Boulkheir and Abdoulaye were among the founding members of a new group, the Alliance for Justice and Democracy (Alliance pour la Justice et la Démocratie—AJD), which was officially recognized in 2001. (Subsequent leaders were Cisse Amadou CHEIKHOU and Alpha DIALLO [Secretary General].)

The AC became the leading opposition party when it won four seats in the 2001 legislative balloting. However, the government announced that it was withdrawing the AC’s legal status, a decision that Boulkheir attributed to the administration’s opposition to the AC’s insistence on discussing the slavery issue.

The AC was permitted to keep its assembly seats despite a February 2002 Supreme Court decision upholding the group's dissolution. In August Boulkheir's application to register a new party, Convention for Change, was denied on the grounds that it was simply a new guise for the AC.

In October the AC was one of three groups to form the United Opposition Framework. The following March 2003 officials again denied the application for a new party, the Alliance for Democracy in Mauritania, citing its association with the AC, which the new group denied. In August 2004 Boulkheir was elected president of the APP (see below).

Leaders: Massoud Ould BOULKHEIR, Kebe ABDOULAYE, Mohamed Hafed Ould ISMAEL (Secretary General).

Rally of Democratic Forces (Rassemblement des Forces Démocratiques—RFD). The RFD was formed in 2001 by former members of the Union of Democratic Forces (Union des Forces Démocratiques—UFD), which had been legalized in October 1991 under the leadership of Hadrami Ould Khattry (former president of the FDUFC) and had originally encompassed a number of diverse opposition groups whose desire to oust the Taya regime appeared to be their only common bond. Widely viewed as the strongest opposition formation, the UFD supported Ahmed Ould Daddah, half-brother of former Mauritanian president Moktar Ould Daddah, in the January 1992 presidential election, while spearheading the subsequent legislative boycotts. In May 1992 it was announced that the supporters of Ahmed Ould Daddah had been incorporated into the union, which was reported thereupon to have adopted the name of Union of Democratic Forces—New Era (Union des Forces Démocratiques—Ère Nouvelle—UFD-EN). However, news reports often continued to use the original name when referencing the group.

The party remained highly critical of the government; Ahmed Ould Daddah, who was elected UFD president in June 1992, charged that official harassment was impeding “normal” party activity. After Ould Daddah was reconfirmed as leader in early 1993, several prominent members left the party and formed the UDP (see above). More serious were the announced defections in June 1994 of two of the union's most important components, El-Hor, which formed the AC (above) and the MDI, which joined the PRDS.

The UFD was one of only two opposition parties (the UDP being the other) to contest the municipal elections in early 1994, gaining a majority in 17 of the country's 208 local councils. It boycotted the 1992 legislative poll but obtained one Senate seat in 1994. The UFD competed unsuccessfully in the first round of 1996 legislative balloting but boycotted the second round, charging that the government had “tampered” with voting lists to excise supporters of the opposition. Although the UFD-EN boycotted the January 1999 municipal balloting, a “Bedredine” tendency of the UFD was reported to have participated in the poll.

In October 2000 the government banned the UFD-EN, accusing the party of inciting violence in connection with pro-Palestinian street demonstrations. Supporters subsequently launched the RFD, which won three assembly seats in the 2001 legislative balloting as well as control of four districts in municipal polls. Ahmed Ould Daddah was unanimously elected as president of the RFD in January 2002.

In April 2002 RFD won one seat in partial Senate elections, the first of Taya's radical opposition ever to do so. A year later, in May 2003, a senior RFD member was arrested in the wake of the U.S.-led attack on Iraq and subsequent crackdown on Mauritanian Islamic groups. That same month the government appointed a close associate of Ahmed Ould Daddah, Abdellahi Ould Souleimana Ould Cheikh Sidya, to a cabinet position in an apparent attempt to gain some RFD support.

In 2004, Ahmed Ould Daddah was charged with helping to finance the opposition Knights of Change (see below), a movement in exile that reportedly advocated the armed overthrow of the Taya government. Daddah was later acquitted.

Leader: Ahmed Ould DADDAH (President and 1992 and 2003 presidential candidate).

Union of Progressive Forces (Union des Forces Progressives—UFP). Formed by former members of the UFD, the UFP, whose leadership includes former Marxists, called for dialogue with the PRDS in order to “improve the political atmosphere.” The new party won three seats in the 2001 assembly balloting. In 2003 the UFP supported Haidalla for president and joined other opposition groups in complaining of fraud following the Taya victory. The party considered boycotting the 2004 Senate elections but ultimately participated with two nominees. Both lost, one by a narrow margin, to PRDS candidates. In 2005 the party demanded the return of Mauritanian exiles and an end to slavery in the country, precepts it pushed for in the transitional program following the August coup.

Leader: Mohammed Ould MAALOU.

Popular and Democratic Front (Front Populaire et Démocratique—FPD). The FPD, also recently referenced simply as the Popular Front, is led by former minister Mohamed Lemine Chbih Ould Cheikh Malainine, who finished second (with 7 percent of the vote) as an independent candidate in the December 1997 presidential polling. Malainine, a Muslim spiritual leader, was elected chair of the Front at its first congress in April 1998.

The formal relationship between the FPD and the FPO was unclear, but in early 2001 Malainine announced that the FPD would participate in the October legislative balloting, eliciting criticism from the UFD-EN. Despite Malainine’s apparently conciliatory gesture toward the government, he was arrested in April on charges of conspiring with Libya to commit acts of terrorism and sentenced to five years in prison. Amnesty International described Malainine as a “prisoner of conscience” and charged that his arrest was merely an attempt to “stifle” the opposition. The sentence was also strongly condemned by other opposition parties. In October 2002 the FPD formed, with the Cavaliers for Change and RFD, the United Opposition Framework (UOF), which sought dialogue on democratic reform between the government and opposition groups.

Leaders: Mohamed Lemine Chbih Ould Cheikh MALAININE (President), Mohamed Fadel SIDIYA (Political Secretary).

El Sawab (“The Correct,” “The Right Track”). El Sawab, formed in May 2004 by politicians close to former head of state Mohamed Khouna Ould Haidalla, says it has an “original” society program.

Leader: Cheikh Sidi Ould HANENNA, Mohamed Ould GUELMA.

Popular Progressive Alliance (Alliance Populaire et Progressive—APP). A number of APP members were arrested in early 1997 on “conspiracy” charges emanating from the group’s allegedly “pro-Libyan” tendencies. The APP boycotted the 2001 elections. On August 1, 2004, Massaoud Ould Boulkheir, the former leader of the dissolved Action for Change, was elected president of the APP, replacing Mohamed El-Hafedh Ould Ismail. That same month the party won two seats in Nouakchott in the partial Senate elections.

Leader: Massaoud Ould BOULKHEIR (2003 presidential candidate).

Party for Democratic Convergence (PCD). Many Mauritians refer to the PCD as “Haidalla’s friends,” but the Arabic initials of Ould Haidalla’s party, formed in May 2004, reveal another allegiance: they spell El Hamd, literally, “praise to God.” The PCD is composed of a wide range of groups who have been persecuted under the Taya regime, including many Black Mauritians, Islamic radicals, and those who supported the 2003 coup attempt. The vice president of the group is former Nouakchott mayor Mohamed Jemil Ould Mansour, an accused Islamic radical who was arrested in 2003 but escaped from prison during the coup attempt and fled to Belgium. There Mansour helped found the Mauritanian Forum for Reform and Democracy, along with other political exiles from the 2003 coup. Upon returning to Mauritania, Mansour was arrested again and then released. In 2005 the ruling junta refused to recognize the party because it contended the party advocated the monopoly of Islam in politics.

Leader: Mohamed Khouna Ould HAIDALLA.

Avant-Garde Party (Parti Avant-Garde—PAG). The Baathist PAG was one of the minor parties legalized prior to the 1992 elections; however, it won no seats in the National Assembly poll and was equally unsuccessful in the Senate balloting, for which it was the only party other than the PRDS to present candidates. Apparently as a “reward” for participating, PAG leader Kattry Ould Taleb Jiddou was named secretary of state for literacy and traditional education in the cabinet announced in April; however, he was dismissed from the position in a January 1994 reshuffle. Jiddou and former PAG secretary general Abdoulaye Ould HAMED were among those arrested in November 1995 for allegedly forming a “secret organization” in support of Iraqi interests; all were acquitted in January 1996.

The PAG, also referenced as the National Vanguard Party (al-Talia al-Watania), was banned in late 1999 after Mauritania severed ties with Iraq. The Mauritanian government alleged that Iraq had “infiltrated” the party with plans to foment unrest within Mauritania.

Leaders: Kattry Ould Taleb JIDDOU, Mohamed ENAHOU (Secretary General).

National Union for Democracy and Development (Union Nationale pour la Démocratie et le Développement—UNDD). Formed by Senator Tidjane Koita after he left the AC in 1997, the UNDD has been described as the “moderate opposition” and a proponent of dialogue between the PRDS and the more strident antiregime groups. None of the UNDD’s candidates were successful in the 2001 assembly balloting.

Leader: Tidjane KOITA.

Mauritanian Renewal Party (Parti Mauritanien pour le Renouveau—PMR). Shortly after legalization of the PMR, also referenced as the Party for Renewal and Concord, in mid-September 1991, its leaders charged that inappropriate links had been formed between the PRDS and long-standing national and municipal leaders, placing other groups at a disadvantage in forthcoming elections. The PMR leader finished third in the 1997 presidential balloting with less than 1 percent of the vote. (In April 2001 the government announced the recognition of a new party also known as the Mauritanian Renewal Party, led by Atiq OULD ATTIA.)

Leader: Moulaye al-Hassan OULD JEYDID (1997 and 2003 presidential candidate).

Socialist and Democratic Popular Union (Union Populaire Socialiste et Démocratique—UPSD). A conservative Moorish group recognized in late September 1991, the UPSD is also identified as the Social and Popular Democratic Union (Union Démocratique Sociale et Populaire—UDSP). It is led by Mohamed Mahmoud Ould Mah, a former mayor of Nouakchott, who at the time of his election to that post in 1986 was a member of the UND. Ould Mah was accorded a presidential vote share of 1.36 percent in January 1992 and 0.7 percent in December 1997.

Leader: Mohamed Mahmoud OULD MAH (1992 and 1997 presidential candidate).

National Pact (Pacte National—PN). Organized in mid-1992, the PN is led by a former PRDS member.

Leader: Mohamed Abdallah OULD KHARCY.

Democratic Center Party (Parti du Centre Démocratique—PCD). The PCD, also referenced as the Mauritanian Party of the Democratic Center (PCDM), supported Ahmed Ould Daddah in the January 1992 presidential balloting after its own leader withdrew from the race.

Leader: Benba Ould Sidi BADI.

Democratic Justice Party (Parti pour la Justice Démocratique—PJD). Legalized in late September 1991, the PJD supported Ahmed Ould Daddah in the 1992 presidential election.

Leader: Mohamed Abdallahi Ould EI BANE.

Additional minor parties include the Democratic and Social Union (Union Démocratique et Sociale—UDS); the National Party for Unity and Democracy (Parti National pour l’Unité et la Démocratie—PNUD); and the Party for Liberty, Equality, and Justice (Parti pour la Liberté, l’Égalité, et la Justice). Several new parties were recognized in April 2001, including the Mauritanian Liberal Democrats, led by Mustapha

OULD LEMBRABET; the Third Generation, led by Lebat OULD JEH; the Mauritanian Labor Party, led by Mohamed Hafid OULD DENNA; and the Democratic Alliance, led by Mohamed Ould Taleb OTHMAN. The National Renaissance Party (Parti de la Renaissance Nationale—PRN) was established in mid-2001 under the leadership of Mohamed Ould Abdellaki Ould EYYE.

Other Groups

Patriotic Alliance (aka Democratic Alliance). Several Mauritanian political groups created the Patriotic Alliance on July 10, 2004. It is allegedly affiliated with Haidalla and those responsible for the failed 2003 coup.

The Salafi Group for Call and Combat (GSPC). This group, also referenced as the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, has Algerian roots but has been active in Mauritania, most notably in the attacks on a military outpost in June 2005. The GPSC is linked to al-Qaida according to the U.S. State Department.

Leader: Mokhtar BELMOKHTAR.

Umma. An Islamic fundamentalist organization, Umma (Nation) was formed in 1991 but was denied legal party status because of the constitutional prohibition against parties based on religion. However, it remained an important political grouping, particularly in light of its reported ties to the Islamic Salvation Front of neighboring Algeria, which achieved startling electoral success in late 1991. Umma's leader Cheikh Ould Sidi Yayia was among some 60 people detained briefly by security forces in September 1994 during a crackdown on “clandestine” Islamic organizations.

Leader: Cheikh Ould Sidi YAYIA.

Rally for the Rebirth of Black Africans (Rassemblement pour la Renaissance des Nègres-Africains de la Mauritanie—RENAM). RENAM was established in 1989 in response to the ethnic violence along the border with Senegal, which the Mauritanian government was accused of using as an excuse to oppress black inhabitants. The membership of RENAM reportedly included exiles in Europe as well as secession-minded guerrillas in southern Mauritania.

Leader: Abdoulaye SOUMARE.

United Front for Armed Resistance in Mauritania (Front Uni pour la Résistance Armée en Mauritanie—FURAM). Also a black resistance group, FURAM was launched in Dakar in May 1990. In April 1991 its leaders described the political liberalization measures proposed by President Taya as a last-ditch effort by a “racist” regime to save itself and called for a transitional government pending “true national renewal.”

African Liberation Forces of Mauritania (Forces de Libération Africaine de Mauritanie—FLAM). Organized in 1983 in opposition to what were perceived as repressive policies toward blacks, FLAM was believed responsible for an “Oppressed Black” manifesto that in 1986 was widely distributed within Mauritania and at the nonaligned summit in Zimbabwe. Based partly in Dakar, Senegal, the group also condemned reprisals against blacks by the Taya regime following an alleged coup attempt in 1987. Many FLAM supporters were reported to be among those who fled or were expelled to Senegal in 1989. Subsequently engaged in guerrilla activity, FLAM leaders announced in July 1991 that they were suspending “armed struggle” in response to the government’s general amnesty and promulgation of a new Mauritanian constitution. FLAM endorsed Ahmed Ould Daddah in the January 1992 presidential election, after which it renewed its antigovernment military campaign near the Senegalese border. Leaders of the group stated in early 1995 that they were neither secessionists nor terrorists, reiterating their support for the establishment of a federal system that would ensure an appropriate level of black representation in government while protecting the rights of blacks throughout Mauritanian society. In a statement issued from Senegal, the FLAM in 1997 criticized a visit by French president Chirac to Mauritania on the ground that the trip was showing support for a “racist regime.” In early 2001 the FLAM called upon the international community to exert pressure on the Mauritanian government to address the issue of black refugees remaining in Senegal and Mali as the result of the 1989 exodus. The group called for the boycott of elections scheduled by the transitional government for 2006 and 2007.

Leader: Saba THIAM (President).

Rally of Democratic Patriots (Rassemblement des Patriotes Démocratiques—RPD). Launched in Dakar, Senegal, in August 2000 by former members of the FLAM and the UFD, the RPD called for the return of black Mauritians from Senegal to an “equal, united Mauritania.”

Knights of Change. In 2006 the military organization known as the Knights of Change became a political party, referenced as the Mauritanian Party for Unity and Change (Umat). The Knights had staged several failed coup attempts against President Taya, and one of the leaders of the military wing, Maj. Saleh Ould Hanena, received a life sentence in February 2005 but was released by the new junta in September 2005.

Leader: Maj. Saleh Ould HANENA.

In May 1984 an Organization of Mauritanian Nationalists (Organisation des Nationalistes Mauritaniens—ONM) was formed in Dakar, Senegal, by Khadri OULD DIE, a former military officer, while another antiregime formation, the multiracial Resistance Front for Unity, Independence, and Democracy in Mauritania (Front Résistance de l'Unité, Indépendance et Démocratie en Mauritanie—Fruidem), was proclaimed in Paris in September 1989.

In 1994 security forces accused a number of previously unknown fundamentalist organizations, including Call to Islam and the Mauritanian Islamic Movement (Hasim) of conspiring to overthrow the government. The regime's crackdown on Islamic militants also included the dissolution of the Cultural and Islamic Association of Mauritania, which had wielded significant influence in government circles since its establishment in 1980. The government alleged that the association had been involved in the formation of Hasim.

In 2005, legal status was denied the Democratic Forum Party, led by Cheikh Ould Horma Ould BEBANA, after the party reportedly claimed to be the country's Islamic authority. Also in 2005, Mohamed Salek Ould DIDAH announced the formation of a new party referenced as the Social Democratic Party (SDP), and El Moustapha Ould OBEIDRAHMANE, who held several ministerial posts in the Taya regime, announced a new, as yet unnamed, party in August.

Legislature

The 1991 constitution provides for a bicameral legislature consisting of an indirectly chosen Senate and a popularly elected National Assembly. The parliament was dissolved by the Military Council for Justice and Democracy following the August 3, 2005, coup.

Senate (Majlis al-Shuyukh). The Senate is renewed by thirds every two years for six-year terms, with 53 of its 56 members selected by the country's mayors and municipal councilors and three by Mauritians abroad. In the inaugural domestic balloting of April 3 and 10, 1992, the Democratic and Social Republican Party (PRDS) reportedly obtained 36 seats, whereas 17 were won by independents. The PRDS has maintained its large Senate majority, with a small handful of seats going to other groups. In the balloting of April 11, 2002, the PRDS won 16 of the 18 seats up for election, and the Rally of Democratic Forces won 1; the final seat required a runoff. After contesting the results of the 2003 elections, some opposition groups were wary of participating in the partial Senate elections of April 9 and 16, 2004, and considered a boycott. However, ultimately nine parties decided to participate. The PRDS won 15 seats, with 2 going to the Progressive Alliance (APP) and 1 to the Rally for Democracy and Unity (RDU).

President: Dieng Boubou FARBA.

National Assembly (Majlis al-Watani). The 81 deputies to the lower house are elected by direct universal suffrage, nominally for five-year terms. Theretofore, all deputies were elected on a

Cabinet

As of June 1, 2006

Prime Minister

Sidi Mohamed Ould Boubacar

Ministers

Civil Service and Labor	Mohamed Ould Ahmed Ould Jakkou
Communication	Cheikh Ould Ebbe
Culture, Youth, and Sport	Mehla Mint Ahmed [f]
Economic Affairs and Development	Hammada Ould Abed
Equipment and Transportation	Ba Ibrahim Demba
Finance	Abdellahi Ould Cheikh Sidiya
Fisheries and Maritime Affairs	Sidi Mohamed Ould Sidina
Foreign Affairs and Cooperation	Ahmed Ould Sid Ahmed
Health and Social Affairs	Qsaadna Ould Bahaida
Higher Education and Scientific Research	Naji Ould Mohamed Mahmoud
Interior, Post, and Telecommunications	Mohamed Ahmed Ould Mohamed Lemine
Justice	Maafoudh Ould Bettah
Literacy, Islamic Orientation, and Original Education	Yahya Ould Sid El Moustaph
Mines and Industry	Mohamed Ould Ismail Ould Abidna
Petroleum and Energy	Mohamed Ali Ould Sidi Mohamed
Primary and Secondary Education	Cheikh Ould Sid Ahmed
Rural Development and Environment	Gandega Silly
Trade, Handicrafts, and Tourism	Ba Abderrahmane
Water	Ali Ould Ahmadou

Secretaries of State

Civil Registry	Abdi Ould Horma
Maghreb Arab Union	Bissimillah Elih Ould Ahmed
New Technologies (Prime Minister's Office)	Manyana Sow Deina [f]
Secretary General of the Government	Ba Saidou Moussa
Women's Affairs	Nebghouha Mint Tlamid [f]

[f] = female

majoritarian basis. However, some proportional voting was introduced for the 2001 elections. In the most recent balloting of October 19 and 26, 2001, the Democratic and Social Republican Party won 64 seats; Action for Change, 4; the Rally for Democracy and Unity, 3; the Union for Democracy and Progress, 3; the Rally of Democratic Forces, 3; the Union of the Progressive Forces, 3; and the Popular and Democratic Front, 1.

Speaker: Rachid Ould SALEH.

Communications

All news media were owned and operated by the government until mid-1991 when legislation recognizing the principle of freedom of the press was passed in conjunction with the country's new constitution. However, the new law precluded the news media from "encouraging intolerance between tribes or races," and the government reportedly banned the September 1991 issue of the Mauritanie Demain because the monthly magazine had reported on the alleged torture of black political detainees. In the weeks leading up to the 2003 presidential elections, authorities shut down four weekly newspapers. In March 2005 a freelance journalist was charged with “damaging the public image” of Mauritania and imprisoned after he interviewed a woman said to be a runaway slave, prompting protests from international organizations devoted to protecting the rights of journalists.

Press

The following are published in Nouakchott: Ach Chaab, government daily in Arabic and French; Mauritanie Nouvelle, independent in French; La Calame, independent weekly in French; La Tribune, independent weekly in French; Eveil-Hebdo, independent weekly in French; and Journal Officiel, government semimonthly in French.

News Agencies

The government facility is Agence Mauritanienne de l'Information (AMI); Agence France-Presse also maintains an office in Nouakchott.

Broadcasting and Computing

The state-owned Office de Radiodiffusion et Télévision de Mauritanie (ORTM) broadcasts to radio receivers in Arabic, French, and indigenous tribal languages, as well as to about 323,000 television sets in Arabic and French. There were some 30,000 personal computers serving 120,000 Internet users in 2003.

Intergovernmental Representation

Ambassador to the U.S.

Tijani Ould KERIM

U.S. Ambassador to Mauritania

Joseph LeBARON

Permanent Representative to the UN

Mohamed Ould TOLBA

IGO Memberships (Non-United Nations)

AfDB, AU, AFESD, AMF, AMU, BADEA, CAEU, CILSS, IDB, Interpol, IOM, LAS, NAM, OIC, OIF, WCO, WTO

MAURITIUS

REPUBLIC OF MAURITIUS

---

The Country

The island of Mauritius, once known as Ile de France, is situated 500 miles east of Madagascar, in the southwestern Indian Ocean; Rodrigues Island, the Agalega Islands, and the Cardagos Carajos Shoals (St. Brandon Islands) also are national territory. (Mauritius also claims Diego Garcia and other islands in the Chagos Archipelago, currently controlled by the United Kingdom as part of the British Indian Ocean Territory (see Foreign relations, below, for details). The diversity of contemporary Mauritian society is a reflection of its history as a colonial sugar plantation. African slave laborers were imported initially, and they were followed by the migration of Indians (who now constitute two-thirds of the population), Chinese, French, and English. Religious affiliations include Hinduism, to which 52 percent of the population adheres; Christianity (predominantly Roman Catholicism), 28 percent; and Islam, 17 percent. Women are significantly engaged in subsistence agriculture, although they comprise only 32 percent of the paid labor force. Four women served in the National Assembly and two in the cabinet as of early 2005.

Sugar production, to which over 90 percent of the arable land was devoted in the 1960s, traditionally accounted for an overwhelming proportion of the country's export earnings. However, rapidly falling prices after 1975 created severe economic difficulties that were partly overcome by expanded activity in the country's export processing zone (EPZ), by means of which investors were given tax and other incentives to set up ventures aimed at production for export. Excellent sugar harvests in the 1980s, expanded tourist activity, and increased exports of manufactured goods, coupled in 1989 with the opening of a local stock exchange and the authorization of offshore banking activity, subsequently yielded substantial economic growth. Most sales in sugar and other commodities are to the European Union (EU) under trade provisions of the Lomé Convention. However, South Africa has recently begun to vie with France as the leading supplier of goods to Mauritius, and economic ties have been expanded with a number of other southern African nations.

The overall strong economic performance in the 1990s led some experts to reference a "Mauritian miracle" and to describe the country as a "case study" in the successful management of a developing country that pursued “investor-friendly” policies. GDP growth averaged 5.7 annually from 1996–1999, although it measured only about 3 percent in 1999 because of the effects of a severe drought on agricultural production. Government initiatives focused on promoting offshore banking, information technology, garment manufacturing, and tourism (about 500,000 visitors annually). Job creation programs received top priority because unemployment grew from a negligible 1.5 percent in 1995 to a disturbing 8 percent in early 2001. The job situation may have contributed to the unrest at Port Louis in February 1999 (see Current issues, below); skeptics claimed that the wealthiest segment of the population had benefited disproportionately from recent growth and that significant tension continued to exist between the underprivileged Creole population and the Hindu majority.

Success in the sugar and tourism industries led to economic growth of 4.5 percent in 2003–2004. In its 2004 report the International Monetary Fund (IMF) described the country’s social and economic achievements since independence as “impressive.” However, unemployment reached 10.2 percent, and ongoing budget deficits contributed to debt. Moreover, threats to the sugar and textile industries (see Current issues, below) reportedly troubled voters at the July 2005 legislative balloting.

Government and Politics

Political Background

Because of its location, Mauritius had strategic importance during the age of European exploration and expansion, and the Dutch, French, and English successively occupied the island. France ruled Mauritius from 1710 to 1810, when Britain assumed control to protect its shipping during the Napoleonic wars. Political evolution began as early as 1831 under a constitution that provided for a Council of Government, but the franchise was largely restricted until after World War II. The postwar era also witnessed the introduction of political parties and increased participation in local government.

An election under a system of internal parliamentary democracy initiated in 1967 revealed a majority preference for full independence, which was granted by Britain on March 12, 1968, with Sir Seewoosagur RAMGOOLAM of the Independence Party (IP) as prime minister. A state of emergency, occasioned by an outbreak of severe communal strife between Muslims and Creoles, was lifted in 1970, although new disorder brought its reimposition from December 1971 to March 1978.

Under constitutional arrangements agreed upon in 1969, the mandate of the existing Legislative Assembly was extended by four years. At the election of December 20, 1976, the radical Mauritian Militant Movement (Mouvement Militant Mauricien—MMM), led by Anerood JUGNAUTH and Paul BÉRENGER, won a plurality of legislative seats, but the IP and the Mauritian Social Democratic Party (Parti Mauricien Social-Démocrate—PMSD) formed a coalition that retained Prime Minister Ramgoolam in office with a slim majority. At the country’s second postindependence balloting on June 11, 1982, the incumbent parties lost all of their directly elective seats, Jugnauth proceeding to form an MMM-dominated government on June 15.

In the wake of a government crisis in March 1983, which yielded the resignation of 12 ministers, including Bérenger, and the repudiation of the prime minister by his own party, Jugnauth and his supporters regrouped as the Mauritian Socialist Movement (Mouvement Socialiste Mauricien—MSM) and, in alliance with Ramgoolam’s Mauritius Labour Party (MLP) wing of the IP and the PMSD, won a decisive legislative majority in a new election held August 21.

In February 1984 Ramgoolam’s successor as MLP leader, Sir Satcam BOOLELL, was relieved of his post as minister of economic planning, whereupon the MLP voted to terminate its support of the MSM. However, 11 Labour deputies, under the leadership of Beergoonath GHURBURREN, Political Status: Constitutional monarchy under multiparty parliamentary system established upon independence within the Commonwealth on March 12, 1968; became a republic on March 12, 1992.

Area: 790 sq. mi. (2,045 sq. km.).

Population: 1,179,137 (2000C); 1,241,000 (2005E).

Major Urban Centers (2005E): PORT LOUIS (151,000), Beau Bassin/Rose Hill (109,000), Vacoas-Phoenix (107,000), Curepipe (84,000), Quatre Bornes (81,000).

Official Language: English (French is also used, while Creole is the lingua franca, and Hindi the most widely spoken).

Monetary Unit: Mauritian Rupee (official rate July 1, 2006: 30.81 rupees = $1US).

President: Sir Anerood JUGNAUTH (Mauritian Socialist Movement—MSM); elected by the National Assembly on October 7, 2003, to complete the five-year term (which began on February 25, 2002) of Karl Auguste OFFMANN (Mauritian Socialist Movement), who had resigned on September 30, 2003, apparently as part of the power-sharing agreement negotiated in 2002 by the MSM and the Mauritian Militant Movement (MMM). (Vice President Raouf Bundhun served as acting president between Offmann's resignation and Jugnauth's inauguration.)

Vice President: Raouf BUNDHUN (nonparty); elected by the National Assembly on February 25, 2002, for a term concurrent with that of the president.

Prime Minister: Navin RAMGOOLAM (Mauritian Labor Party); named prime minister on July 5, 2005, in succession to Paul Raymond BÉRENGER (Mauritian Militant Movement) following legislative election of July 3.

refused to follow Boolell into opposition and remained in the government alliance (initially as the Mauritian Workers' Movement—MWM and later as the Mauritian Labour Rally—RTM).

At municipal council balloting on December 8, 1985, the opposition MMM won 57.2 percent of the vote, decisively defeating the coalition parties, who captured only 36.8 percent, while the MLP was a distant third with 5.4 percent. Although insisting that the MMM victory represented a rejection of Jugnauth's policies, Bérenger did not immediately call for the government to resign. However, such an appeal was made in the wake of a major scandal at the end of the month, which stemmed from the arrest on drug charges of four coalition members at Amsterdam's Schipol Airport. Subsequently, the MLP agreed to reconcile with the MSM, and Boolell was awarded three portfolios and the post of second deputy prime minister in a cabinet reorganization August 8, 1986.

At an early election on August 30, 1987, called largely because of favorable economic conditions, a reconstituted Jugnauth coalition consisting of the MSM, the MLP, the RTM (subsequently absorbed by the MSM), the PMSD, and the Rodriguan People's Organization (Organisation du Peuple Rodriguais—OPR) retained power by capturing 41 of 62 elective legislative seats. In August 1988, however, the PMSD, whose leader, Sir Gaëtan DUVAL, had frequently been at odds with the coalition mainstream in domestic and foreign policy, withdrew from the government, forcing Jugnauth to form a new cabinet whose Assembly support had fallen to a majority of 10. Two months later the largely urban-based coalition suspended participation in municipal balloting to avoid the embarrassment of a major defeat, with the MMM (allied with several small parties) winning all of the seats in a two-way contest with the PMSD.

In an effort to strengthen his parliamentary position, Jugnauth in July 1990 concluded an electoral pact with the opposition MMM. However, the move angered a number of his fellow MSM ministers, as well as MLP leader Boolell. In August, after the government narrowly failed to secure the 75 percent approval necessary to make the country a republic within the Commonwealth, Jugnauth dismissed the dissident ministers and announced that he would continue as head of a minority administration with the parliamentary support of the MMM. A month later the MMM formally joined the government, with its president, Dr. Prem NABABSINGH, named deputy prime minister.

At an early election on September 15, 1991, the governing alliance won 59 of 62 legislative seats, far in excess of the 75 percent required to implement a change to republican status, which was approved by the Legislative Assembly on December 10, with effect from March 12, 1992. By agreement between the coalition's leading parties, Sir Veerasamy RINGADOO, who had been appointed governor general in January 1986, was designated nonexecutive president of the new republic for three months; he was succeeded on June 30 by the MMM's Cassam UTEEM.

In a cabinet reshuffle on August 18, 1993, Bérenger, who had been openly critical of government policies, was ousted as foreign minister. Two months later he was removed as MMM secretary general by the party's Political Bureau, which named Jean-Claude DE L'ESTRAC as his successor. However, the action was reversed on October 23 by the MMM Central Committee, which proceeded to name a new, pro-Bérenger party leadership. On November 16 Bérenger crossed the aisle to sit with the opposition, although he formally rejected the opposition leadership on the ground that he had no electoral mandate for such a role. A year later Bérenger and De L'Estrac resigned as MPs; only the former regained his seat at by-elections in January 1995.

After the MLP had in January 1995 rebuffed Prime Minister Jugnauth's offer of power sharing, the PMSD agreed in early February to join the coalition, which then encompassed the MSM, MTD, OPR, and the Mauritian Militant Renaissance, despite opposition from a number of leading PMSD members, with a cabinet realignment following on February 13. An early election was then called after Jugnauth had failed to secure passage of a constitutional amendment to introduce Asian languages (Hindi, Urdu, Tamil, Marathi, Telegu, Chinese, and Arabic) into the educational curriculum. The Creole opposition strongly opposed the amendment, which also provoked the withdrawal not only of the recently appointed PMSD members but also of the OPR representative, thus effectively shrinking the government coalition.

In an outcome not dissimilar to Prime Minister Jugnauth's 1982 electoral victory, an opposition MLP-MMM alliance swept the legislative balloting of December 20, 1995, with the MLP's Dr. Navin RAMGOOLAM, son of former prime minister Sir Seewoosagur Ramgoolam, forming a new government on December 31. It consisted of 13 MLP ministers, 9 MMM ministers (including Bérenger as deputy prime minister and foreign minister), and 1 OPR representative at the junior ministerial level. However, Bérenger was dismissed from the cabinet on June 20, 1997, and most of the other MMM ministers resigned their posts in protest. After reportedly failing to convince the PMSD to participate in the government, Ramgoolam on July 2 formed a new cabinet, which included only MLP ministers except for 1 OPR member and 1 independent (Dr. Ahmed Rashid BEEBEEJAUN, who had recently left the MMM rather than give up his portfolio for land transport, shipping, and public safety). Meanwhile, President Uteem was reappointed to another term, although his relationship with the MMM (which had promoted his initial appointment) remained unclear. Ramgoolam reshuffled his cabinet on October 25, 1998, reportedly to enhance the role of young MLP legislators in the government after an alliance formed between Bérenger's MMM and Jugnauth's MSM. The prime minister also attempted to shore up his control by including the recently formed Xavier Duval Mauritian Party (PMXD) in a cabinet reshuffle on September 26, 1999. However, in the legislative balloting on September 11, 2000, the MSM-MMM electoral coalition soundly trounced the MLP-PMXD alliance, securing 54 of the 62 elected seats. Consequently, Jugnauth returned as prime minister on September 17 to lead with Bérenger a MSM-MMM coalition government which required Jugnauth to resign after three years and Bérenger to assume the premiership.

On February 15, 2002, President Uteem resigned after he refused to approve an antiterrorism law recently passed by the National Assembly.

(Uteem argued that the new legislation could undermine national sovereignty in the name of US security concerns.) He was replaced by Vice President Andigi Verriah Chettiar, who resigned on February 18 after he also refused to sign the bill into law. In accordance with the constitution, Chief Justice Arriranga PILLAY replaced Chettiar as the interim president on February 18. (Pillay subsequently signed the controversial legislation.) On February 25 the National Assembly elected Karl Auguste OFFMANN and Raouf BUNDHUN as the president and vice president, respectively.

On September 29, 2002, the OPR won 10 of 18 seats in the new Rodrigues Regional Assembly, while the Rodrigues Movement won the remaining 8 seats.

Although many observers doubted the MSM-MMM “marriage” of 2000 would survive, Bérenger assumed the premiership on October 1, 2003, and Jugnauth took the largely ceremonial presidency on October 7. The most noteworthy of Bérenger’s subsequent cabinet changes was the appointment of Pravind Kumar JUGNAUTH (the son of Anerood Jugnauth) as deputy prime minister and finance minister.

At balloting for 62 elected members of the National Assembly on July 3, 2005, the Social Alliance (led by the MLP) won 38 seats, while the alliance of the MSM and the MMM won 22 and the OPR won 2. Prime Minister Bérenger resigned on July 5 and was succeeded the same day by MLP leader Navin Ramgoolam, who formed a new cabinet comprising (for the most part) the parties that had formed the Social Alliance.

Constitution and Government

The Mauritius Independence Order of 1968, as amended the following year by the Constitution of Mauritius (Amendment) Act, provided for a unicameral system of parliamentary government with executive authority exercised by a prime minister appointed by the governor general (as the representative of the Crown) from among the majority members of the Legislative Assembly. In December 1991 the assembly approved a change to republican status as of March 12, 1992, with an essentially titular president, appointed by the assembly to a five-year term, replacing the Queen as head of state. The change also included creation of an indirectly elective vice presidency. The legislature (known under the present basic law as the National Assembly) includes a speaker, 60 representatives directly elected from 3-member districts on the main island, plus 2 from Rodrigues, and the attorney general, if not an elected member. In addition, up to 8 “best loser” seats may be awarded on the basis of party or ethnic underrepresentation as indicated by shares of total vote and total population, respectively. Judicial authority, based on both French and British precedents, is exercised by a Supreme Court, 4 of whose 5 judges (excluding the chief justice) preside additionally in Appeal, Intermediate, District, and Industrial court proceedings. There are also inferior courts and a Court of Assizes. In conformity with the practice of a number of other small republican members of the Commonwealth, final appeal continues to be to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council at London.

Nine districts constitute the principal administrative divisions, with separate administrative structures governing the Mauritian dependencies: The Agalega and Cargados Carajos islands are ruled directly from Port Louis, while Rodrigues Island has a central government under a resident commissioner. On the main island, municipal and town councils are elected in urban areas and district and village councils in rural areas.

In 1991 a Rodrigues Local Council, comprising 21 members appointed by the Minister for Rodriguan Affairs, was established to exercise a degree of autonomy on Rodrigues. However, its mandate expired in 1996 amid political infighting concerning the issue. Subsequently, in November 2001, the National Assembly authorized creation of an elected Rodrigues Regional Assembly (see Legislature, below). In addition to enjoying the same authority as that of local bodies on the main island, the new Regional Assembly was empowered to propose bills to the National Assembly and to oversee development projects and otherwise administer internal initiatives.

Foreign Relations

Mauritius maintains diplomatic relations with most major foreign governments. One principal external issue has been the status of Diego Garcia Island, which was considered a Mauritian dependency until 1965, when London transferred administration of the Chagos Archipelago to the British Indian Ocean Territory (BIOT). The following year, Britain concluded an agreement with the United States whereby the latter obtained use of the island for 50 years. Following independence in 1968 Mauritius pressed its claim to Diego Garcia, while international attention was drawn to the issue in 1980 when Washington announced that it intended to make the island the chief U.S. naval and air base in the Indian Ocean. In July the Organization of African Unity unanimously backed Port Louis's claim, but efforts by Prime Minister Ramgoolam to garner support from the UK government were rebuffed.

In July 1982 Britain agreed to pay $4 million in compensation for its 1965–1973 relocation of families from the Chagos islands to Mauritius. In accepting the payment, Port Louis reversed its position in regard to Diego Garcia and insisted that existence of the U.S. base violated a 1967 commitment by the United Kingdom (denied by London) that the island would not be used for military purposes. The Diego Garcia issue resurfaced in 1989 when U.S.-Soviet détente seemed to reduce the strategic significance of the base and encourage those who supported regional demilitarization. In September a British Foreign and Commonwealth Office official stated that London did not “look unfavorably” on the Mauritian claim. In October Mauritius charged that the accidental bombing of the island by a U.S. fighter plane had endangered nearby civilian aircraft. The installation proved to be of major value to U.S. forces during the Gulf war of early 1991, and the British position thereafter appeared to harden, London's high commissioner to Port Louis declaring in mid-November that the question of British sovereignty over the Chagos archipelago was “not negotiable.” The issue surfaced again in 1996 when the Ramgoolam government demanded a share of the proceeds from fishing permits issued by the BIOT, while stressing that any such income should not be defined as rent for, and thus acceptance of, the U.S. naval base on the BIOT island of Diego Garcia. In October 2000 the British High Court ruled that some 2,000 inhabitants of Diego Garcia and other islands of the Chagos Archipelago had been “unlawfully removed” to Mauritius prior to independence, possibly opening the way for the return of Chagossians to all of the islands in question except, notably, Diego Garcia. (The Creole-speaking Chagossians have not assimilated well into mainstream Mauritian society; many of them live in poverty.) Suits have been filed for substantial UK and U.S. financial support for the proposed return, while Mauritius has continued to press its claim to sovereignty over the islands. In 2004 lawyers representing the Chagossians petitioned Queen Elizabeth to permit the Chagossians to return to the Chagos Archipelago and to compensate the Chagossians further for the UK's previous “unlawful actions.” The petition also requested that the UK rebuild the infrastructure on the islands to permit the resumption of fishing and agriculture. Meanwhile, analysts suggested that Mauritius might pursue its claim over the islands through the International Court of Justice.

Many years earlier, in June 1980, the Ramgoolam government had announced that it was amending the country's constitution to encompass the French-held island of Tromelin, located some 350 miles to the north of Mauritius, thus reaffirming a claim that Paris had formally rejected in 1976. In December 1989 the Jugnauth administration announced that it would seek a ruling on Tromelin from the General Assembly's Committee on Decolonization. Six months later French President Mitterrand, during a tour of the Indian Ocean region, agreed to Franco-Mauritian discussions on the future of the island, although its status remained unchanged as of early 2005.

Mauritius is a member of the Indian Ocean Commission (IOC). In February 1995 it hosted a ministerial meeting to form a regional economic bloc, the Indian Ocean Rim Association for Regional Cooperation (IOR-ARC), which first met in Mauritius in March 1997. In August 1995 Mauritius became a member of the Southern African Development Community (SADC). It is also a member of the Common Market for Eastern and Southern Africa (Comesa). Mauritius is pushing for trade expansion through the IOR-ARC because it finds the IOC and Comesa ineffective.

Current Issues

The long-disenfranchised Creole population rioted in February 1999 after a popular singer died in police custody. Underlying the violence was friction between Creoles, the mixed-blood descendants of African slaves who constitute about 30 percent of the population, and Hindus, the dominant force in government and the extended public sector. The Ramgoolam administration was also buffeted by the resignation of several top officials, who were tainted by scandal, as well as by drought-induced economic decline. Consequently, in August the prime minister felt compelled to dissolve the National Assembly and call for new elections in September, four months early. The MSM and MMM quickly concluded an unbeatable electoral alliance, based on an agreement that former prime minister Jugnauth would reassume the reins of government for three years, with Bérenger serving as prime minister the following two years. The new administration appeared to have the support of the private sector, notably the sugar companies and the Catholic Church. Jugnauth declared the economy and internal security to be his top priorities.

In October 2003 Bérenger, a Creole, became the nation's first non-Hindu prime minister. He pledged to make economic progress the top priority of his administration, but rising unemployment and inflation subsequently appeared to erode support for the MSM-MMM alliance. Further complicating matters for the government were setbacks in the sugar industry (the EU announced sharp cutbacks in the prices it would pay for foreign sugar) and the textile sector (Chinese factories had become intense competitors). As a result, the MLP-led Social Alliance of former prime minister Navin Ramgoolam regained the confidence of its old constituencies with its populist platform and won the July 2005 legislative poll. However, Ramgoolam's new government quickly faced daunting challenges, as a steep rise in oil prices combined with ongoing problems in the sugar and textile industries to buffet the country in 2006 with what commentators regularly referred to as an "economic triple shock."

Political Parties

A large number of political parties have contested recent Mauritian elections (more than 40, presenting 535 office seekers in 2000); few, however, have run candidates in most constituencies, and only a very limited number have secured parliamentary representation. Because most of the groups are leftist in orientation, ideological differences tend to be blurred, with recurrent cleavages based largely on pragmatic considerations.

Government and Government-Supportive Parties

Mauritius Labour Party (MLP). A Hindu-based party, the MLP (also referenced as the Workers' Party [Parti des Travailleurs—PTr]), under the leadership of Seewoosagur Ramgoolam, joined the country's other leading Indian group, the Muslim Action Committee (CAM), in forming the Independence Party (IP) prior to the 1976 election. Collectively, the MLP and the CAM won an overwhelming majority of 47 legislative seats at the 1967 preindependence balloting, whereas the IP retained only 28 in 1976 and lost all but 2 in 1982 (both awarded to the MLP on a "best loser" basis). A condition of the MLP joining the 1983 government alliance was said to be the designation of Ramgoolam as president upon the country's becoming a republic; following failure of a republic bill in December 1983, the longtime MLP leader was named governor general.

In February 1984, after MLP leader Sir Satcam Boolell was relieved of his post as minister of planning and economic development, the party went into opposition. It reentered the government in August 1986, with Boolell as second deputy prime minister. In September 1990 the MLP again moved into opposition, Seewoosagur Ramgoolam's son, Navin, succeeding Boolell as party leader and assuming the post of leader of the opposition. On the basis of a preelectoral accord with the MMM's Paul Bérenger, the younger Ramgoolam became prime minister following the MLP-MMM victory in December 1995. The MLP-MMM coalition dissolved in mid-1997 with Ramgoolam subsequently remaining the head of an all-MLP (with the exception of one OPR minister) cabinet. At that point the MLP was described as holding a majority of 35–37 seats in the assembly. With the MMM aligning with the MSM for the September 2000 assembly balloting, the MLP was left with only the PMXD and several small parties as electoral partners, their coalition securing 36.6 percent of the vote but only 6 of the 62 elected seats.

For the 2005 assembly elections, the MLP led a Social Alliance (Alliance Social) that included the new MSD, the PMXD, the MR, and the MMSN.

Leaders: Dr. Navin RAMGOOLAM (Prime Minister and Leader of the Party), Jean François CHAUMIERE (President), Sir Satcam BOOLELL (Honorary President), Dharam GHOKOOL (Secretary General).

Xavier Duval Mauritian Party (Parti Mauricien Xavier Duval—PMXD). A byproduct of interfamily conflict within the PMSD (below), the PMXD is led by Xavier Luc Duval, the son of the late PMSD leader, Sir Gaëtan Duval. Following his split with his uncle, Hervé Duval (the current PMSD leader), and the formation of the PMXD, Xavier Luc Duval was elected to the National Assembly in a by-election on September 19, 1999, on a MLP-PMXD ticket. He was subsequently named minister of industry, commerce, corporate affairs, and financial services in the new MLP-led cabinet announced on September 26, and the party ran in alliance with the MLP in the September 2000 legislative poll, Duval securing 1 of the “best loser” seats in the assembly following that poll. When the MLP's Navin Ramgoolam became prime minister in 2005, he named Xavier Luc Duval one of his three deputy prime ministers.

Leaders: Xavier Luc DUVAL, Jacques PAN-GLOSE (Secretary General).

Republican Movement (Mouvement Républicain—MR). The MR was founded on the eve of the October 1996 municipal balloting, in which its leader, Rama Valayden, won a local council seat. Valayden had presented himself as an heir to the policies pursued by the late Sir Gaëtan Duval of the PMSD. The MR aligned with the MSM-MMM coalition in the September 2000 balloting, one MR member reportedly securing a seat as an alliance candidate. In May 2001 the MR decided to end its support for the government, and subsequent press reports referred to the MR as an “opposition party.” The MR participated in the MLP-led Social Alliance in 2005, and Rama Valayden was named attorney general and minister of justice and human rights in the new Ramgoolam government.

Leaders: Rama VALAYDEN, Sada ETWAROO.

Mauritian Militant Socialist Movement (MMSM). The MMSM is a radical Hindu group led by former agriculture minister Madun Dullo. It participated in the MLP-PMXD electoral alliance in the September 2000 assembly poll and the MLP-led Social Alliance in 2005.

Leader: Madun DULLO.

Social Democratic Movement (Movement Social-Démocrate—MSD). The MSD was formed in March 2005 by four MSM legislators (including two who had recently resigned from the cabinet) to protest the proposed continuation of the MSM-MMM electoral alliance. The new party joined the Social Alliance for the July legislative balloting.

Leaders: Anil BAICHO, Mukeshawr CHOONEE.

Opposition and Other Parties

Mauritian Socialist Movement (Mouvement Socialiste Mauricien—MSM). The MSM was organized initially on April 8, 1983, as the Militant Socialist Movement (Mouvement Socialiste Militant) by Prime Minister Jugnauth following his expulsion, in late March, from the MMM. Prior to the 1983 election, the MSM, with the MLP, the PMSD, and the OPR, formed a coalition that secured a clear majority of legislative seats. In February 1984 the MLP withdrew from the alliance, although a number of its deputies remained loyal to the government.

The MSM secured 26 of the 41 elective seats won in August 1987 by the reconstituted five-party alliance, from which the PMSD withdrew a year later. The MLP again moved into opposition following an electoral agreement between the MSM and MMM in July 1990, with the new MSM-led alliance winning 59 of 62 elective seats in September 1991. In a disastrous loss in December 1995 all of the MSM deputies, including Jugnauth, lost their seats. However, the MSM formed a coalition with the MMM for the snap legislative elections in September 2000 and secured 54 of the elected seats with 51.7 percent of the vote.

Pravind Jugnauth succeeded his father as leader of the MSM in April 2003. In 2004 he called for retention of the MSM-MMM electoral alliance in the 2005 assembly balloting, prompting several prominent MSM members to quit the party to form the new MSD (above).

Leaders: Sir Anerood JUGNAUTH (President of the Republic), Pravind Kumar JUGNAUTH (Deputy Prime Minister and Chair of the Party), Dr. Beergoonath GHURBURRUN, Emmanuel Jean Leung SHING (Secretary General).

Mauritian Militant Movement (Mouvement Militant Mauricien—MMM). The leadership of the MMM was detained during the 1971 disturbances because of its “confrontational politics,” which, unlike that of other Mauritian parties, was intended to cut across ethnic-communal lines. Following the 1976 election, the party’s leadership strength was only 2 seats short of a majority; in 1982, campaigning in alliance with the Mauritian Socialist Party, it obtained an absolute majority of 42 seats.

In March 1983, 12 members of the MMM government of Anerood Jugnauth, led by Finance Minister Paul Bérenger, resigned in disagreement over economic policy and because they and their supporters believed that Creole should be designated the national language. Immediately thereafter, Jugnauth was expelled and proceeded to form the MSM (above), which, with its allies, achieved a decisive victory at the August 21 election.

Prior to the 1987 balloting, Bérenger, long viewed as a Marxist, characterized himself as a “democratic socialist.” However, he was unsuccessful in securing an assembly seat on either a direct or “best loser” basis. The party itself campaigned as the leading component of a Union for the Future alliance, which included two minor groups, the Democratic Workers’ Movement (Mouvement des Travailleurs Démocrates—MTD), then led by Anil Kumar BAICHOO and later by Sanjeet TEELock, and the Socialist Workers’ Front (Front des Travailleurs Socialistes—FTS). On July 17, 1990, the MMM concluded an electoral accord with the MSM and MTD and formally entered the Jugnauth government on September 26.

In October 1993 Bérenger was briefly ousted as MMM secretary general, but he was returned to office by the party’s Central Committee, which proceeded to expel the anti-Bérenger majority of Political Bureau members, including Prem Nababsingh and Dharmanand Goopt Fokeer, theretofore MMM president and chair, respectively, who remained members of the Jugnauth administration. In April 1994 Bérenger concluded an electoral pact with Navin Ramgoolam of the MLP under which, in the event of a coalition victory, Ramgoolam was to become prime minister and Bérenger his deputy. Two months later Nababsingh and his supporters formally left the MMM to organize the Mauritian Militant Renaissance.

Bérenger resigned his parliamentary seat on November 29, 1994, after having charged the MSM of manipulating the 1991 election, despite having been a government minister at the time. He regained his MP status at a by-election in January 1995 and became deputy prime minister and foreign minister as a result of the MLP-MMM victory in December 1995. However, Bérenger was relieved of his cabinet posts in June 1997, and the MMM moved into opposition when all but one of the party's nine other ministers resigned from the government.

In August 1997 Bérenger spearheaded the organization of a National Alliance (Alliance Nationale—AN) in an apparent attempt to improve his chances of securing the top governmental post in the next election. In addition to the MMM, the AN comprised the PMSD, the RPR, and the MMSM. However, the grouping did poorly in an April 1998 by-election (the AN candidate finished third with 16 percent of the vote), and a correspondent for the Indian Ocean Newsletter described the AN as “having been shot at dawn.” Bérenger subsequently joined with Jugnauth in late 1998 to announce a MMM-MSM “federation” that would present joint candidates in the next general election and share governmental responsibility in the event of success. The federation was formally established in January 1999, and, as expected, Bérenger assumed a deputy post in the coalition with the understanding that he would be named to a similar rank in a Jugnauth-headed government. Following the landslide victory of the MSM-MMM coalition in the September 2000 balloting, Bérenger was named deputy prime minister, with the understanding that he would succeed Jugnauth as prime minister in three years. Bérenger also negotiated a similar proposed arrangement with Pravind Jugnauth of the MSM prior to the 2005 balloting.

On April 8, 2006, Bérenger resigned his position as leader of the opposition in the assembly because relations between the MMM and the MSM deteriorated following the MMM-MSM coalition's defeat in the 2005 elections.

Leader: Paul BÉRENGER (Former Prime Minister), Premnath RAMNAH (Former Speaker of the National Assembly), Ivan COLLENDAVELLO (General Secretary).

Rodriguan People's Organization (Organisation du Peuple Rodriguais—OPR). The OPR captured the two Rodrigues Island seats at the 1982 and 1983 balloting and, having earlier indicated that it would support the MSM-Labour alliance, was assigned one cabinet post in the Jugnauth government of August 1983; it retained the post after the ensuing two elections. The OPR again won Rodrigues's two elective parliamentary seats in 1995, despite its affiliation with the Jugnauth administration. It joined the resultant MLP-led government, although its customary full ministerial responsibility for Rodrigues affairs was downgraded to junior level under the prime minister. The OPR regained the full cabinet authority for Rodrigues affairs in the new government announced in July 1997. The party again secured the two elective seats from Rodrigues in the 2000 and 2005 legislative polls.

Leaders: Louis Serge CLAIR (Former Rodrigues Island Minister and Leader of the Party), J. Benoit JOLICOEUR.

Mauritian Social Democratic Party (Parti Mauricien Social-Démocrate—PMSD). Composed chiefly of Franco-Mauritian landowners and middle-class Creoles, the PMSD initially opposed independence but subsequently accepted it as a fait accompli. Antisocialist at home and anticommunist in foreign affairs, it has long been distinguished for its francophile stance. The party was part of the Ramgoolam government coalition until 1973, when it went into opposition. It won 23 legislative seats at the 1967 election but retained only 8 in 1976, when it reentered the government. Reduced to 2 “best loser” seats in 1982, it won 4 on an elective basis in 1983 and 1987. The party withdrew from the alliance in August 1988 following a dispute over fiscal policy.

The party was awarded one “best loser” seat following the 1991 election. In January 1994 Sir Gaëtan Duval, the leader of the PMSD, failed in an attempt to persuade Prime Minister Jugnauth to form a common front to block the threatened electoral alliance between the MLP and the MMM. At a party congress on May 22 he turned the leadership over to his son, Xavier Luc Duval, under whom the PMSD retreated visibly from its theretofore rightist posture. The party joined the MSM-led coalition in February 1995, with the younger Duval being given the industry and tourism portfolios; however, the move was opposed by the PMSD Central Committee, which in April called on Duval to resign from the government (a move which he undertook only in October for a quite different reason—his opposition to the proposed Asian language amendment). The episode reflected a growing rift between the two Duvals, with Sir Gaëtan subsequently withdrawing from the PMSD to form the Gaëtan Duval Party (Parti Gaëtan Duval—PGD). As PGD candidate he reentered the assembly on a “best loser” basis after the December elections. Because the PMSD had failed to gain representation, the elder Duval effectively resumed its leadership until his death in May 1996, when his seat in the legislature passed to his brother, Hervé Duval. It was reported that Prime Minister Ramgoolam had approached Hervé Duval with a proposal to join the government in late June 1997 following the split in the MLP-MMM coalition. However, the PMSD leader decided to align instead with the MMM in the short-lived National Alliance opposition grouping, a decision that apparently exacerbated Duval’s differences with Xavier Luc Duval, who subsequently formed his own grouping, the PMXD (above). At balloting in 2000 the PMSD was described as associated with the coalition led by the MSM and MMM. (Hervé Duval’s supporters have also been referenced as the Vrais Bleus [True Blues].)

Leaders: Alan DRIVER (President), Hervé DUVAL, Clifford EMPEIGNE.

Green Party (Les Verts). The Green Party was reportedly aligned with the MSM-MMM electoral coalition in the September 2000 legislative balloting, and party leader Sylvio Louis MICHEL was named minister of fisheries in the new cabinet.

Leader: Sylvio Louis MICHEL.

Rodriguan Movement (Mouvement Rodriguais—MR). A regional rival of the OPR favoring U.S.-style federalism rather than separation, the MR was awarded two “best loser” seats following both the 1995 and 2000 legislative polls.

Leaders: Nicolas VON MALLY (Leader of the Opposition and Party Leader), Alex NANCY.

Resistance and Alternative. A center-left grouping launched in March 2005, Resistance and Alternative argued that the “big parties” had failed to solve the nation’s problems.

Leader: Ashok SUBRON (Secretary General).

Party of God (Hizbullah). The Islamic fundamentalist Hizbullah obtained one assembly seat as a “best loser” in the December 1995 election. (Some subsequent reports referenced the seat as belonging to the Mauritian Liberal Movement [Mouvement Libéral Mauricien—MLM], described as Hizbullah’s “ally.”) Reportedly draining Muslim support from the MMM, Hizbullah was credited with 5 percent of the vote in the September 2000 poll but did not receive a “best loser” seat.

Leader: Ceeal MEEAH.

Mauritian Socialist Party (Parti Socialiste Mauricien—PSM). The original PSM was formed in 1979 by the withdrawal from the MLP of a group of dissidents led by Harish Boodhoo. It was dissolved in May 1983 by absorption into the MSM, and Boodhoo was named deputy prime minister. In January 1986 Boodhoo resigned his government post in the wake of a disagreement with Prime Minister Jugnauth over drug policy, and he withdrew from the assembly the following November. Subsequently, he mounted an opposition campaign in his newspaper, Le Socialiste, and in June 1988 announced the PSM’s revival. Boodhoo was aligned with the MSM-MMM alliance for the September 2000 balloting. However, the PSM apparently withdrew its support for the government in early 2002, and Boodhoo subsequently attempted to forge an opposition coalition.

Leader: Harish BOODHOO.

Rally for Reform (Rassemblement pour la Réforme—RPR). The RPR was launched in August 1996 by a dissident faction of the MSM led by Rama Sithanen (a former finance minister) and Sheila Bappoo (who had briefly been MSM secretary general). It formed an alliance with the PMSD for the October 1996 municipal elections, the combined list polling some 25 percent of the vote. In

Cabinet

As of July 1, 2006

Prime Minister
Deputy Prime Ministers

Navinchandra Ramgoolam (MLP)
Ahmed Rashid Beebeejaun
Charles Gaëtan Xavier Luc Duval (PMXD)
Rama Krishna Sithanen

Ministers

Agriculture, Food Technology, and Natural Resources	Arvin Boolell (MLP)
Arts and Culture	Mahendra Gowressoo (MLP) [f]
Civil Service Affairs and Administrative Reforms	Navinchandra Ramgoolam (MLP)
Commerce and Consumer Protection	Rajeshwar Jeetah (MLP)
Defense, Interior, and External Communications	Navinchandra Ramgoolam (MLP)
Education and Scientific Research	Dharambeer Gokhool (MLP)
Environment and National Development	Anil Kumar (MLP)
External Communications	Charles Gaëtan Xavier Luc Duval (PMXD)
Finance and Economic Development	Rama Krishna Sithanen (MLP)
Foreign Affairs, International Trade, and Regional Cooperation	Madan Murlidhar Dulloo (MLP)
Health and Quality of Life	Satya Veyash Faugoo (MLP)
Housing, Lands, and Fisheries	Mohammed Asraf Ally Dulull (MLP)
Industry, Medium Enterprises, Financial Services, and Corporate Affairs	Rajeshwar Jeetah (MLP)
Information Technology and Telecommunications	Marie Joseph Noël-Etienne Ghislain Sinatambou (MLP) [f]
Justice and Human Rights	Jaya Rama Valayden (MR)
Labor, Industrial Relations, and Employment	Vasant Kumar Bunwaree (MLP)
Local Government and Solid Waste Management	James Burty David (MLP)
Public Infrastructure and Land Transport	Ahmed Rashid Beebeejaun (MLP)
Public Utilities	Abu Twalib Kasenally (MLP)
Rodrigues and Outer Islands	Navinchandra Ramgoolam (MLP)
Social Security, National Solidarity, Senior Citizen Welfare, and Reform Institutions	Sheilabai Bappoo (MLP) [f]
Tourism and Leisure	Charles Gaëtan Xavier Luc Duval (PMXD)
Training, Skills Development, Productivity, and External Communications	Charles Gaëtan Xavier Luc Duval (PMXD)
Women's Rights, Child Development, and Family Welfare	Indranee Seebun (MLP) [f]
Youth and Sports	Sylvio Hock Sheen Tang Wah Hing (MLP) [f]

[f] = female

the September 2000 assembly balloting, the RPR was aligned with the MLP-PMXD coalition.

Leaders: Rama SITHANEN, Sheila BAPPOO.

Muslim Action Committee (Comité d'Action Musulman—CAM). The CAM has long represented the interests of the Indian Muslim community. Reports on the September 2000 legislative poll referenced a Mauritian Action Committee (Comité d'Action Mauricien—also CAM). It was not clear if any relationship existed between the two groups. In 2003 members of the Muslim Action Committee reportedly launched a new party called the Muslim League under the leadership of Farook Mohammed BACCUS.

Leader: Youssuf MOHAMMED (President).

National Mauritian Movement (Mouvement National Mauricien—MNM). Led by an ex-police chief who had criticized Prime Minister Ramgoolam's handling of the riots at Port Louis in early 1999, the right-wing MNM campaigned for the 2000 legislative balloting on a platform urging voters to renounce the country's "old parties." (Some confusion may exist over the name of this grouping, some electoral reports also referencing a National Democratic Movement [Raj Dayal].)

Leader: Col. Raj DAYAL.

In addition, there are two far-left organizations that remain active: The Struggle (Lalit), led by Lindsey COLLEN, and the Socialist Workers' Party (Parti Socialiste Ouvrière—PSO), whose secretary general is Didier EDMOND. (In 2005 Lalit called for the United States to close its military base on Diego Garcia and for all of the Chagos Archipelago to be returned to Mauritian sovereignty.)

Other parties participating in the September 2000 assembly elections were Agricultural Planting Movement (Mouvement Planteur Agricole—MPA); Authentic Mauritian Movement (Mouvement Authentique Mauricien—MAM); Liberal Action Party (Parti Action Libéral—PAL); Mauritian Democracy (Démocratie Mauricienne—DM); Mauritian Democratic Movement (Mouvement Démocratique Mauricien—MDM); Mauritius Party Rights (MPR); National Democratic Movement (Mouvement Démocratique National—MDN); NouvoLizur, a grouping led by former cabinet minister Joceline MINERVE which, among other things, supports "Chagossian rights"; Party of the Mauritian People (Parti du Peuple Mauricien—PPM); Socialist Workers Movement (Mouvement Travailleuse Socialiste—MTS); Tamil Council (TC); and the Mauritian Union (Union Mauricienne—UM).

Legislature

The Mauritian National Assembly is a unicameral body containing 62 elected deputies (3 from each of the 20 constituencies on the main island and 2 from Rodrigues Island), plus up to 8 appointed from the list of unsuccessful candidates under a "best loser" system designed to provide "balanced" ethnic and political representation. The legislative term is five years, subject to dissolution. In the National Assembly elections held on July 3, 2005, the Social Alliance (led by the Mauritius Labor Party) won 38 of the 60 elected seats from the main island, the other 22 going to the coalition of the Mauritian Socialist Movement (MSM) and the Mauritian Militant Movement (MMM). The Rodriguan People's Organization (OPR) won the 2 elected seats on Rodrigues Island. In the subsequent best loser distribution of appointed seats, the Social Alliance was accorded 4 additional seats; the MSM-MMM coalition, 2; and the OPR, 2.

Speaker: Rajikeswur PURRYAG.

Rodrigues Regional Assembly. As authorized by a constitutional amendment approved by the National Assembly in November 2001, the Rodrigues Regional Assembly comprises 18 members, 12 elected from six constituencies on a first-past-the-post system and 6 elected on a proportional basis. In the first balloting for the assembly on September 25, 2002, the Rodriguan People's Organization secured 10 seats and the Rodriguan Movement, 8 seats. The assembly was inaugurated on October 15.

Communications

The traditionally free Mauritian press was subject to censorship under the state of emergency imposed in 1971, but restrictions were lifted on May 1, 1976. Radio and television are under semipublic control.

Press

The following are published daily at Port Louis in English and French, unless otherwise noted: Weekend (85,000), weekly; Le Mauricien (35,000);

Cinq Plus (30,000), weekly; L'Express (30,000); Le Quotidien (30,000); Le Dimanche (25,000), weekly; Mauritius Times (13,500), weekly; Le Nouveau Militant (6,000), MMM weekly; Chinese Daily News (5,000), in Chinese; China Times (3,000), in Chinese; Maurice Soir (2,000), in French; The Sun, MMM organ; Vani, PSM weekly.

Broadcasting and Computing

The Mauritian Broadcasting Corporation operates two national radio networks and two television channels. There were approximately 299,000 television receivers and 180,000 personal computers serving 150,000 Internet users in 2003.

Intergovernmental Representation

Ambassador to the U.S.

(Vacant)

U.S. Ambassador to Mauritius

(Vacant)

Permanent Representative to the UN

Somduth SOBORUN

IGO Memberships (Non-UN)

AfDB, AU, BADEA, Comesa, CWTH, Interpol, IOC, IOM, IOR-ARC, NAM, OIF, PCA, SADC, WCO, WTO

MOROCCO

KINGDOM OF MOROCCO

al-Mamlakat al-Maghribiyah

---

The Country

Located at the northwest corner of Africa, Morocco combines a long Atlantic coastline and Mediterranean frontage facing Gibraltar and southern Spain. Bounded by Algeria on the northeast and (following annexation of the former Spanish Sahara) by Mauritania on the south, the country is topographically divided into a rich agricultural plain in the northwest and an infertile mountain and plateau region in the east that gradually falls into the Sahara Desert in the south and southwest. The population is approximately two-thirds Arab and one-third Berber, with small French and Spanish minorities. Islam is the state religion, most of the population adhering to the Sunni sect. Arabic is the language of the majority, most others speaking one or more dialects of Berber; Spanish is common in the northern regions and French among the educated elite. Women comprise 35 percent of the paid labor force, concentrated mainly in textile manufacture and domestic service; overall, one-third of the female population is engaged in unpaid family labor on agricultural estates. While an increasing number of women from upper-income brackets have participated in local and national elections, they have thus far obtained only minimal representation.

The agricultural sector employs approximately 40 percent of the population; important crops include cereals and grains, oilseeds, nuts, and citrus fruits. One of the world's leading exporters of phosphates, Morocco also has important deposits of lead, iron, cobalt, zinc, manganese, and silver; overall, mining accounts for about 45 percent of export receipts. The industrial sector emphasizes import substitution (textiles, chemicals, cement, plastics, machinery), while tourism and fishing are also major sources of income. Trade is strongly oriented toward France, whose economic influence has remained substantial. Since the early 1980s the economy has suffered from periodic droughts, declining world demand for phosphate, rapid urbanization, and high population growth. Unemployment remains a problem, with youth and talent seeking opportunity in Europe. Economic growth has been disappointing according to a report by the country's Higher Planning Authority: Morocco has failed to meet targets in growth, investment, and exports during the past five years. One piece of good news has been the improved performance of agriculture, which has benefited because of better rainfall, but it also points to Morocco's continued dependence on that sector of the economy. Remittances from workers abroad and steady tourist receipts have also helped the economic picture. Trade liberalization continues with the European Union, and in 2004 Morocco and the United States signed a free trade agreement. While these measures were expected to strengthen foreign business and investment, they also represented competition to Moroccan farmers and textile industries.

Living conditions remain low by regional standards, and wealth is poorly distributed. However, with its low inflation rate, cheap labor pool, and reputation as an "oasis of stability" in an otherwise turbulent region, Morocco is considered by some as a potential target for substantial Western (particularly European) investment. To encourage such interest, the government continues to privatize many state-run enterprises, address the high (52 percent) illiteracy rate, and reform the stock market, tax system, and banking sector. Recent political liberalization has also reportedly been aimed, at least in part, at securing additional Western support.

A more costly wage structure and higher oil subsidies contributed to a rapidly rising budget deficit and a concomitant drop in the GDP growth rate to 1.2 percent in 2005. On a more positive note, the 2004 free trade agreement with the United States took effect in January 2006, improving prospects for increased direct foreign investment. Concurrently, Morocco's decision to allow private purchase of shares in the largest state-owned bank and the state telecommunications company further enhanced the climate for foreign capital.

Government and Politics

Political Background

Originally inhabited by Berbers, Morocco was successively conquered by the Phoenicians, Carthaginians, Romans, Byzantines, and Arabs. From 1912 to 1956 the country was subjected to de facto French and Spanish control, but the internal authority of the sultan was nominally respected. Under pressure by Moroccan nationalists, the French and Spanish relinquished their protectorates, and the country was reunified under Sultan MOHAMED V in 1956. Tangier, which had been under international administration since 1923, was ceded by Spain in 1969.

King Mohamed V tried to convert the hereditary sultanate into a modern constitutional monarchy but died before the process was complete. It remained for his son, King HASSAN II, to implement his father's goal in a constitution adopted in December 1962. However, dissatisfaction with economic conditions and the social policy of the regime led to rioting at Casablanca in March 1965, and three months later the king assumed legislative and executive powers.

In June 1967 the king relinquished the post of prime minister, but the continued hostility of student and other elements led to frequent governmental changes. A new constitution, approved in July 1970, provided for a partial resumption of parliamentary government, a strengthening of royal powers, and a limited role for political parties. Despite the opposition of major political groups, trade unions, and student organizations, an election for a new unicameral House of Representatives was held in August 1970, yielding a pro-government majority. However, the king's failure to unify the country behind his programs was dramatically illustrated by abortive military revolts in 1971 and 1972.

A new constitution was overwhelmingly approved by popular referendum in March 1972, but the parties refused to enter the government because of the monarch's reluctance to schedule legislative elections. After numerous delays, elections to communal and municipal councils were finally held in November 1976, to provincial and prefectural assemblies in January 1977, and to a reconstituted national House of Representatives in June 1977. On October 10 the leading parties agreed to participate in a "National Unity" cabinet headed by Ahmed OSMAN as prime minister.

Osman resigned on March 21, 1979, ostensibly to oversee reorganization of the proroyalist

Political Status: Independent since March 2, 1956; constitutional monarchy established in 1962; present constitution approved March 1, 1972.

Area: 274,461 sq. mi. (710,850 sq. km.), including approximately 97,343 sq. mi. (252,120 sq. km.) of Western Sahara, two-thirds of which was annexed in February 1976 and the remaining one-third claimed upon Mauritanian withdrawal in August 1979.

Population: 29,891,708 (2004C); 30,310,000 (2005E), including Western Saharans (273,000 in 2005E).

Major Urban Centers (2005E): RABAT (1,654,000), Casablanca (2,957,000), Fez (967,000), Marrakesh (840,000), Oujda (406,000).

Official Language: Arabic.

Monetary Unit: Dirham (official rate July 1, 2006: 8.68 dirhams = $1US).

Sovereign: King MOHAMED VI, became king on July 23, 1999, following the death of his father, HASSAN II.

Heir to the Throne: Crown Prince HASSAN.

Prime Minister: Driss JETTOU (nonparty), appointed by King Mohamed in October 2002, replacing Abderrahmane YOUSOUFI (Socialist Union of Popular Forces); reappointed on June 8, 2004.

National Assembly of Independents (RNI), although the move was reported to have been precipitated by his handling of the lengthy dispute over the Western Sahara (see Disputed Territory, below). He was succeeded on March 22 by Maati BOUABID, a respected Casablanca attorney.

On May 30, 1980, a constitutional amendment extending the term of the House of Representatives from four to six years was approved by referendum, thus postponing new elections until 1983. The king indicated in June 1983 that the legislative poll, scheduled for early September, would be further postponed pending the results of a referendum in the Western Sahara to be sponsored by the Organization of African Unity (OAU, subsequently the African Union—AU). On November 30 a new “unity” cabinet headed by Mohamed Karim LAMRANI was announced, with Bouabid, who had organized a new moderate party eight months earlier, joining other party leaders in accepting appointment as ministers of state without portfolio.

The long-awaited legislative poll was finally held on September 14 and October 2, 1984, with Bouabid’s Constitutional Union (UC) winning a plurality of both direct and indirectly elected seats, while four centrist parties collectively obtained a better than two-to-one majority. Following lengthy negotiations, a new coalition government, headed by Lamrani, was formed on April 11, 1985.

Although King Hassan appeared to remain popular with most of his subjects, domestic opposition leaders and Amnesty International continued to charge the government with human rights abuses and repression of dissent, including the alleged illegal detention and mistreatment of numerous leftists and Islamic fundamentalists arrested in 1985 and 1986. On September 30, 1986, the king appointed Dr. Azzedine LARAKI, former national education minister, as prime minister, following Lamrani’s resignation for health reasons.

Attributed in large measure to improvements in the economy, calm subsequently ensued, with domestic and international attention focusing primarily on the Western Sahara. Thus, a national referendum on December 1, 1989, overwhelmingly approved the king’s proposal to postpone legislative elections due in 1990, ostensibly to permit participation by Western Saharans following a self-determination vote in the disputed territory.

In mid-1992, amid indications that the referendum might be delayed indefinitely or even abandoned, the government announced that forthcoming local and national elections would include the residents of Western Sahara as participants. On August 11 King Hassan reappointed Lamrani as prime minister and announced a “transitional cabinet” to serve until a postelection cabinet could be established under new constitutional provisions (see Constitution and government, below).

The basic law revisions were approved on September 4, 1992, by a national referendum, which the government hailed as a significant step in its ongoing democratization program. Widespread disbelief greeted the government's claim that 97.5 percent of the electorate had participated and that a 99.9 percent "yes" vote had been registered.

In balloting for directly elective house seats, delayed until June 25, 1993, the newly established Democratic Bloc (Koutla), a coalition of center-left opposition groups led by the old-guard Is-tiqlal party and the Socialist Union of Popular Forces (USFP), secured 99 seats. They won only 15 more in the September 17 voting in electoral colleges made up of local officials, trade unionists, and representatives of professional associations. Meanwhile, the National Entente (Wifaq), a group of center-right royalist parties, increased its representation from 116 at the first round of balloting to 195 after the second. The Democratic Bloc subsequently charged that the indirect election encompassed widespread fraud, an allegation that received some support from international observers.

Although King Hassan rejected the Democratic Bloc's demand that the results of the indirect poll be overturned, he did propose that the bloc participate in the formation of a new cabinet, the first of what the king envisioned as a series of alternating left-right governments. The offer was declined because of the monarch's insistence that he retain the right to appoint the prime minister and maintain de facto control of the foreign, justice, and interior portfolios. Consequently, Lamrani formed a new nonparty government on November 11.

With his poor health again cited as the official reason for the change, Lamrani was succeeded on May 25, 1994, by former foreign minister Abdellatif FILALI, a longtime close advisor to the king. On June 7 Filali presented the monarch with a ministerial list unchanged from that of his predecessor, while King Hassan continued to seek Democratic Bloc leadership of a new coalition government. The negotiations eventually collapsed in early 1995, in part because of the king's wish that Driss BASRI, long-term minister of state for interior and information, remain in the cabinet. The opposition parties had objected to Basri's influence for many years, charging that he had sanctioned human rights abuses and tolerated electoral fraud. Nonetheless, Basri retained the interior post on February 28 when Filali's new government, including 20 members of the National Entente, was announced.

Despite his failure to draw the leftist parties into the government, the king continued to pursue additional democratization, particularly regarding the proposed creation of an upper house of the legislature that, theoretically, would redistribute authority away from the monarchy to a certain degree. The king's proposal was affirmed by a reported 99.56 percent "yes" vote in a national referendum on September 13, 1996, most opposition parties having endorsed the amendment (see Constitution and government, below, for details).

Local elections were held on June 13, 1997, with seats being distributed along a wide spectrum of parties and no particular political dominance being apparent. Such was also the case with the November 14 balloting for a new House of Representatives as the Koutla, Wifaq, and a bloc of centrist parties each won about one-third of the seats. On the other hand, the indirect elections to the new House of Councilors revealed a decided tilt toward the Wifaq, not a surprising result considering its long-standing pro-government stance.

Continuing to pursue an alternating left-right series of governments, King Hassan was subsequently able to finally persuade the Democratic Bloc to assume cabinet control, and on February 4, 1998, he appointed Abderrahmane YOUSOUFI of the USFP (which had won the most seats in the House of Representatives) as the next prime minister. As formed on March 14, the new cabinet included representatives from seven parties, although the King's supporters (most notably Basri) remained in several key posts.

King Hassan, whose health had been a concern since 1995, died of a heart attack on July 23, 1999; Crown Prince SIDI MOHAMED succeeded his father immediately, the official ceremony marking his enthronement as King MOHAMED VI being held on July 30. Shortly thereafter, the long-suspect Driss Basri was dismissed as minister of the interior and moved to Paris. The new king confirmed his support for Prime Minister Youssoufi and his government. The cabinet was reshuffled on September 6, 2000, with Youssoufi retaining the top post, but the new king replaced him with an independent, Driss JETTOU, in 2002. In 2004 the cabinet was again reshuffled, with many new cabinet appointments being made and Jettou remaining as prime minister.

Constitution and Government

Morocco is a constitutional monarchy, the Crown being hereditary and normally transmitted to the king's eldest son, who acts on the advice of a Regency Council if he accedes before age 20. Political power is highly centralized in the hands of the king, who serves as commander in chief and appoints the prime minister; in addition, he can declare a state of emergency, dissolve the legislature, veto legislation, and initiate constitutional amendments. Constitutional revisions approved in 1992 empowered the prime minister, instead of the king, to appoint and preside over the cabinet (albeit still subject to the king's approval); broadened the authority of the House of Representatives to include, inter alia, the initiation of confidence motions and the launching of investigations; and established new Constitutional and Economic/Social Councils. The preamble of the basic law was also altered to declare "the kingdom's attachment to human rights as they are universally recognized."

Until recently, legislative power had been nominally vested in a unicameral House of Representatives, one-third of whose members were indirectly designated by an electoral college. The new upper house (House of Councilors), provided for in the 1996 referendum, is elected indirectly from various local government bodies, professional associations, and employer and worker organizations. All members of the House of Representatives are now elected directly. Included in the new legislature's expanded authority is the power to censure the government and to dismiss cabinet members, although such decisions can still be overridden by the king.

The judicial system is headed by a Supreme Court (Majlis al-Alaa) and includes courts of appeal, regional tribunals, magistrates' courts, labor tribunals, and a special court to deal with corruption. All judges are appointed by the king on the advice of the Supreme Council of the Judiciary.

The country is currently divided into 49 provinces and prefectures (including four provinces in Western Sahara), with further division into municipalities, autonomous centers, and rural communes. The king appoints all provincial governors, who are responsible to him. In addition, the basic law changes of September 1996 provided for 16 regional councils, with some members elected directly and others representing various professional organizations.

Foreign Relations

A member of the UN and the Arab League, Morocco has been chosen on many occasions as a site for Arab and African Islamic conferences at all levels. It has generally adhered to a nonaligned policy, combining good relations with the West with support for African and especially Arab nationalism. Morocco has long courted economic ties with the European Community (EC, now the European Union—EU), although its request for EC membership was politely rebuffed in 1987 on geographic grounds. An association agreement was negotiated in 1995 with the EU, which reportedly had begun to perceive the kingdom as the linchpin of a European campaign to expand trade with North Africa.

Relations with the United States have been friendly, U.S. administrations viewing Morocco as a conservative counter to northern Africa's more radical regimes. An agreement was signed in mid-1982 that sanctioned, subject to veto, the use of Moroccan air bases by U.S. forces in emergency situations. Periodic joint military exercises have since been conducted, with Washington serving as a prime supplier of equipment for Rabat's campaign in the Western Sahara.

During early 1991 Rabat faced a delicate situation in regard to the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait the previous August. Many Arab capitals were critical of King Hassan for contributing 1,700 Moroccan troops to the U.S.-led Desert Shield deployment in Saudi Arabia and other Gulf states; domestic sentiment also appeared to be strongly tilted against Washington. However, the king defused the issue by permitting a huge pro-Iraq demonstration in the capital in early February and by expressing his personal sympathy for the Iraqi people during the Gulf war. His middle-of-the-road approach was widely applauded both at home and abroad.

Morocco's role in regional affairs has been complicated by a variety of issues. Relations with Algeria and Mauritania have been marred by territorial disputes (until 1970, Morocco claimed all of Mauritania's territory). The early 1970s brought cooperation with the two neighboring states in an effort to present a unified front against the retention by Spain of phosphate-rich Spanish Sahara, but by 1975 Morocco and Mauritania were ranged against Algeria on the issue. In an agreement reached in Madrid on November 14, 1975, Spain agreed to withdraw in favor of Morocco and Mauritania, who proceeded to occupy their assigned sectors on February 28, 1976, despite resistance from the Polisario Front, an Algerian-backed group that had proclaimed the establishment of an independent Saharan Arab Democratic Republic (SADR). Following Mauritanian renunciation of all claims to the territory in a peace accord with Polisario on August 5, 1979, Moroccan forces entered the southern sector, claiming it, too, as a Moroccan province.

Relations with Algeria were formally resumed in May 1988 prior to an Arab summit at Algiers on the uprising in the Israeli-occupied territories. The stage was thus set for diplomatic activity that in the wake of first-ever talks between King Hassan and Polisario representatives in early 1989 appeared to offer the strongest possibility in more than a decade for settlement of the Western Sahara problem. Although little progress was achieved over the next seven years on a proposed UN-sponsored self-determination vote, a new UN mediation effort in 1997 rekindled hopes for a settlement (see Disputed Territory, below). Relations with Algeria improved further following the 1999 election of the new Algerian President, Abdelaziz Bouteflika, who suggested that bilateral affairs be handled independently of the conflict in the Western Sahara.

Long strained ties with Libya (which had been accused of complicity in several plots to overthrow the monarchy) began to improve with a state visit by Muammar Qadhafi to Rabat in mid-1983. The process of rapprochement culminated in a treaty of projected union signed by the two leaders at Oujda on August 13, 1984. An inaugural meeting of a joint parliamentary assembly was held in Rabat in July 1985, and commissions were set up to discuss political, military, economic, cultural, and technical cooperation. By February 1989, cordial relations paved the way for a summit in Marrakesh, during which Qadhafi joined other North African leaders in proclaiming the Arab Maghreb Union.

Morocco's attitude toward Israel has been markedly more moderate than that of many Arab states, in part because more than 500,000 Jews of Moroccan ancestry live in Israel. King Hassan was known to relish his conciliatory potential in the Middle East peace process and was believed to have assisted in the negotiations leading up to the Israeli/PLO agreement of September 1993. Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin made a surprise visit to Rabat on his return from the historic signing in Washington, his talks with King Hassan being heralded as an important step toward the establishment of formal diplomatic relations between the two countries.

In late 2001 relations between Morocco and Spain were strained by disagreements over illegal immigration, fishing rights, and smuggling. In July 2002, the countries were involved in a brief military standoff over an uninhabited islet (called Perejil by Spain, Leila by Morocco, and claimed by both) off the coast of Ceuta. With U.S., EU, and Egyptian mediation, the two sides agreed to withdraw their troops from the islet and to begin cooperating on various issues. Tensions eased dramatically when Spain's conservative government was replaced by the Spanish Socialist Workers Party in March 2004. In January 2005, Spain's King Juan Carlos paid an official visit to Morocco, a further sign of improved relations.

U.S. Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld visited Morocco in February 2006 and praised the king for his cooperation with U.S. counterterrorism efforts. (Morocco is a signatory to the U.S.-led Trans-Sahara Counterterrorism Initiative, a $500 million, seven-year program.) Anti-U.S. protesters, in particular the Moroccan Association for Human Rights, expressed displeasure that the state of domestic political freedoms and human rights in Morocco was apparently not among topics on the agenda.

Relations with Spain improved after the election success of the Spanish Socialist Workers Party in 2004, but stresses were evident surrounding the issue of illegal migration of Africans through Morocco into Spain. In September 2005 five migrants were killed and approximately 100 injured as they attempted to scale the security fences that divide Moroccan territory from the North African Spanish enclave of Ceuta; another six were killed during a similar incident in early October. Following a tightening of security in that location, Italy protested to Morocco that it was seeing an increase in illegal immigrants trying to cross the Mediterranean from Morocco to Italy in small boats.

Current Issues

Western capitals appeared to be generally satisfied with King Mohamed's efforts at democratization. His coalition government works efficiently, and the approval of young ministers indicates his commitment to moving Morocco forward. Past abuses of human rights, including the disappearance of dissenters, seem to have diminished. The status of women in Moroccan society has been officially reformed, with the legal age for marriage raised from 15 to 18 and polygamy virtually outlawed.

The rise of radical Islamists—spurred on by the suicide attacks and the war in Iraq—has been of concern to the palace. Several blasts on one day in early 2003 in Casablanca killed more than 40 people. Some 2,000 Moroccans were convicted for the bombings, with several given death sentences and others long prison terms. A new anti-terrorism law was swiftly passed amid concerns in the media that increased powers of detention and surveillance would erode the gains in human rights. Although a survey by the U.S.-based Pew Research Center indicated that 45 percent of Moroccans had a favorable view of Osama Bin Laden (compared with 65 percent in Pakistan and 55 percent in Jordan), Moroccans seemed to support the government's efforts to crack down on perpetrators of political violence. Also encouraging was the government's initiation of a new housing program and renewed efforts to industrialize the northern coast in recognition that poverty and joblessness in the slums had created potential breeding grounds for radicalism.

The rate of unemployment continued to be a thorny issue, as unemployed graduates frequently protested outside parliament, demanding government jobs. In December 2005, several students set themselves on fire during such a protest, reportedly yelling "a civil service job or death." While none died, a number were badly burned.

As 2005 came to a close, a Moroccan truth commission—formally called the Equity and Reconciliation Commission (IER)—released its final report on alleged human rights abuses during the reign of King Hassan. The commission, described as the first of its kind in the Arab world, had been set up in January 2004. The commission reported that between independence in 1956 and the end of Hassan's rule in 1999, nearly 600 people were killed, and opposition activists were systematically suppressed, with numerous instances of torture and disappearances. The commission heard from more than 16,000 people and recommended that more than 9,000 victims receive compensatory payments. Many prodemocracy activists, including the Moroccan Association for Human Rights, criticized the panel for its policy of withholding the names of those found responsible for the abuses and for not recommending prosecution of the perpetrators. They also disputed the IER's numbers, maintaining that at least 1,500 people had been killed during protests on March 21, 1965, alone, and another 500 to 1,000 in protests during 1981. The hearings were televised throughout the country, an event unprecedented in the region.

Political Parties

Government Parties

Democratic Bloc (Bloc Démocratique). Launched in May 1992 to promote the establishment of a “healthy democracy within the framework of a constitutional monarchy,” the Democratic Bloc or Koutla (“coalition”), currently includes the following three groups. (The UNFP was reportedly an initial member of the bloc, but recent references have not listed it as a component.) All of the bloc’s founding members except the PPS (under PRP, below) urged voters to abstain from the September 1992 constitutional referendum, while in February 1993 all except the UNFP withdrew from participation in the national commission created to supervise upcoming legislative elections. The protesters charged that the commission was failing to pursue electoral law revision necessary to ensure “free and fair elections.” However, all of the bloc’s components participated in the 1993 balloting, securing 114 seats overall, with affiliated labor organizations winning six more. Most of the bloc’s success (99 seats) came in the direct election, leading to its contention that the results of the indirect election had been “falsified.” After protracted debate, the bloc in November rejected King Hassan’s invitation to name most of the ministers in a new government, insisting that it should be given a right of veto over all appointments. However, after its components secured 102 seats in the 1997 balloting for the House of Representatives, the Koutla agreed to lead a new coalition government, which was appointed in March 1998 under the leadership of the USFP’s Abderrahmane Youssoufi. In October 2002, Youssoufi was replaced by the independent Driss Jettou, who was renominated in 2004.

Independence Party (Parti de l’Istiqlal, or Istiqlal—PI). Founded in 1943, Istiqlal provided most of the nation’s leadership before independence. It split in 1959, and its members were relieved of governmental responsibilities in 1963. Once a firm supporter of the throne, the party now displays a reformist attitude and supports the king only on selected issues. Stressing the need for better standards of living and equal rights for all Moroccans, it has challenged the government regarding alleged human rights abuses. In July 1970 Istiqlal formed a National Front with the UNFP (below) but ran alone in the election of June 1977, when it emerged as the (then) leading party. It suffered heavy losses in both the 1983 municipal elections and the 1984 legislative balloting.

In May 1990 Istiqlal joined the USFP (below), the PPS (under PRP, below), and the OADP (below) in supporting an unsuccessful censure motion that charged the government with “economic incompetence” and the pursuit of “antipopular” and “antisocial” policies. In November 1991 Istiqlal announced the formation of a “common front” with the USFP to work toward “establishment of true democracy,” and the two parties presented a joint list in 1993, Istiqlal’s 118 candidates securing 43 seats in the direct Majlis poll. As with many other long-standing Moroccan parties, Istiqlal’s older and younger members have been at odds recently. Istiqlal was the leading party in the June 1997 local elections but fell to fifth place in the November house balloting. In the 2002 direct elections, the party won 48 seats, and its secretary general, Abbas El Fassi, was named minister of state.

Leaders: Mohamed DOURI, Abbas EL FASSI (Secretary General).

Socialist Union of Popular Forces (Union Socialiste des Forces Populaire—USFP). The USFP was organized in September 1974 by the UNFP-Rabat Section (see UNFP, below), which had disassociated itself from the Casablanca Section in July 1972 and was accused by the government of involvement in a Libyan-aided plot to overthrow King Hassan in March 1973. The USFP subsequently called for political democratization, nationalization of major industries, thorough reform of the nation’s social and administrative structures, and the cessation of what it believed to be human rights abuses by the government. It secured the third-largest number of legislative seats in the election of June 1977 but withdrew from the House in October 1981 in protest at the extension of the parliamentary term. A year later it announced that it would return for the duration of the session ending in May 1983 so that it could participate in the forthcoming electoral campaigns. The majority of nearly 100 political prisoners released during July–August 1980 were USFP members, most of whom had been incarcerated for alleged antigovernment activities in 1973–1977.

After 52 of its 104 candidates (the USFP also supported 118 Istiqlal candidates) won seats in the June 1993 Majlis balloting, the union was reportedly divided on whether to accept King Hassan's offer to participate in a coalition government, the dispute ultimately being resolved in favor of the rejectionists. Subsequently, the USFP was awarded only four additional house seats in the September indirect elections. First Secretary Abderrahmane Youssoufi resigned his post and departed for France in protest over "irregularities" surrounding the process. The party also continued to denounce the "harassment" of prominent USFP member Noubir EL-AMAOUI, secretary general of the Democratic Confederation of Labor (Confédération Démocratique du Travail), who had recently served 14 months in prison for "insulting and slandering" the government in a magazine interview.

Youssoufi returned from his self-imposed exile in April 1995, apparently in response to overtures from King Hassan, who was again attempting to persuade leftist parties to join a coalition government. Although observers suggested that the USFP would soon "redefine" the party platform and possibly select new leaders, a July 1996 congress simply reconfirmed the current political bureau. Meanwhile, one USFP faction was reportedly attempting to "re-radicalize" the party under the direction of Mohamed BASRI, a longtime influential opposition leader. In June 1995 Basri returned from 28 years in exile, during which he had been sentenced (in absentia) to death three times.

The USFP was the leading party in the November 1997 house balloting, securing 57 seats and distancing itself somewhat from its Koutla partner Istiqlal (32), with which it had been considered of comparable strength. Subsequently, the 74-year-old Youssoufi (once again being referenced as the USFP first secretary) was named by King Hassan to lead a new coalition government, although many younger USFP members reportedly opposed the party's participation. Internal dissent continued, as some radical members charged Youssoufi and the party administration with acting timidly in government and failing to push for further reforms in state institutions. Demands for a leadership change were reportedly voiced in the party congress in March 2001, especially by younger members and those associated with labor unions. However, Youssoufi managed to retain his post, prompting some members to leave the party to form the National Ittihad Congress (CNI, below). USFP was the leading party in the 2002 elections, winning 50 seats.

Leaders: Mohammed El YAZGHI (First Secretary), Abdelwahed RADI, Fathallah OUALALOU.

Party of Renewal and Progress (Parti du Renouveau et du Progrès—PRP). The PRP is the successor to the Moroccan Communist Party (Parti Communiste Marocain), which was banned in 1952; the Party of Liberation and Socialism (Parti de la Libération et du Socialisme), which was banned in 1969; and the Party of Progress and Socialism (Parti du Progrès et du Socialisme—PPS), which obtained legal status in 1974. The single PPS representative in the 1977 chamber, Ali YATA, was the first Communist to win election to a Moroccan legislature. The fourth national congress, held in July 1987 at Casablanca, although strongly supportive of the government's position on the Western Sahara, criticized the administration's recent decisions to privatize some state enterprises and implement other economic liberalization measures required by the International Monetary Fund (IMF). However, by mid-1991 the PPS was reported to be fully converted to perestroika, a stance that had apparently earned the party additional support within the Moroccan middle class. In late 1993 Yata unsuccessfully urged his Democratic Bloc partners to compromise with King Hassan in formation of a new government.

The party's current name was adopted in 1994 in conjunction with its "repositioning" as a social democratic grouping under the growing influence of Ali Yata's son, Nadir. However, subsequent news reports have often still referred to the group under the PPS rubric. Ali Yata, who had been reelected to his post of PRP secretary general in mid-1995, died in August 1997 after being struck by a car. In March 2002 the PRP and the PSD (below) announced that they had launched the Socialist Alliance (Alliance Socialiste) and that they were planning to cooperate in the legislative poll in September. In that election the PRP collected only 11 seats.

Leaders: Nadir YATA, Khalid NACIRI, Ismail ALAOUI (Secretary General).

National Assembly of Independents (Rassemblement National des Indépendant—RNI). The RNI was launched at a Constitutive Congress held October 6–9, 1978. Although branded by left-wing spokesmen as a "king's party," it claimed to hold the allegiance of 141 of 264 deputies in the 1977 Chamber. Subsequent defections and other disagreements, both internal and with the king, resulted in the party's designation as the "official" opposition in late 1981. It won 61 house seats in 1984, thereafter returning to a posture of solid support for the king and the government. RNI leader Ahmed Osman, a former prime minister and former president of the House of Representatives, is one of the country's best-known politicians. Previously affiliated with the National Entente, the RNI participated (as did the MNP) in the November 1997 elections as an unaligned "centrist" party (winning 46 seats) and subsequently agreed to join the Koutla-led coalition government named in early 1998. In 2002 RNI won 41 seats.

Leaders: Ahmed OSMAN (President), Moulay Mustafa Ben Larbi ALAIOU.

Popular National Movement (Mouvement National Populaire—MNP). The MNP was organized in October 1991 by longtime Berber leader Mahjoubi Aherdane, who was ousted as secretary general of the MP in 1986. The new party won 25 house seats in 1993. A number of MNP members left the party in mid-1996 to form the MDS (below). The MNP won 19 seats in the 1997 balloting for House of Representatives, having shed its National Entente orientation. Ahmed MOUSSAOUI, the minister of youth and sports, was expelled from the MNP in April 2001 and was subsequently reported to have joined the new Democratic Union. The MNP won 18 seats in 2002.

Leaders: Mahjoubi AHERDANE (Secretary General), Hassan MAAOUNI.

Other Parties

Socialist Democratic Party (Parti Socialiste et Démocratique—PSD). The PSD was established in October 1996 by OADP members who disagreed with that group's rejection of King Hassan's proposed constitutional changes. The party won six seats in 2002 balloting.

Leaders: Abdessamad BELKEBIR, Mohamed Habib TALEB, Aissa QUARDIGHI (Secretary General).

Democratic Forces Front (Front des Forces Démocratiques—FFD). Launched in 1997 by PRP dissidents, the FFD won 9 seats in the November house balloting, and its leader was named to the March 1998 cabinet. In 2002 the party won 12 seats.

Leader: Thami KHYARI (National Secretary).

National Entente (Entente Nationale). The National Entente, also known as the Wifaq (Agreement) Bloc, initially comprised five center-right parties, the three listed below and the MNP and RNI (above). The UC, MP, PND, and RNI had served as leading government parties from April 1985 to August 1992. In November 1993 King Hassan announced that the Entente, whose members held 195 of 333 seats in the recently elected House of Representatives, had decided not to enter the new government in order to permit component parties to concentrate on internal matters. However, after the failure of a protracted effort to persuade leftist parties to participate, 20 Entente members (9 from the UC, 8 from the MP, and 3 from the PND) were named to the cabinet formed in February 1995. Although the MNP and the RNI declined cabinet representation, they announced they would provide the government with legislative support. Those two parties were subsequently listed as operating outside the Wifaq umbrella for the 1997 elections, at which the UC, MP, and PND secured 100 house seats. In 2002 the three parties dropped to 55 seats.

Constitutional Union (Union Constitutionnelle—UC). Founded in 1983 by Maati Bouabid, the UC is a moderate party that emphasizes economic self-sufficiency. Said to have royal support, the party won 83 house seats in 1984. The UC's representation fell to 54 seats in 1993, although it retained a slim plurality and one of its members was elected president of the new house. Bouabid died in November 1996, exacerbating problems within a party described as already in disarray. The UC was the second leading party in the November 1997 house balloting, winning 50 seats, but dropped to 16 in 2002.

Leader: Mohamed ABIED.

Popular Movement (Mouvement Populaire—MP). Organized in 1958 as a monarchist party of Berber mountaineers, the MP was a major participant in government coalitions of the early 1960s. It secured the second-largest number of legislative seats at the election of June 1977 and was third-ranked after the 1984 and 1993 elections.

In October 1986 an extraordinary party congress voted to remove the MP's founder, Mahjoubi Aherdane, from the post of secretary general, replacing him the Mohand Laenser. Aherdane subsequently formed a new Berber party (see MNP, above). In the 2002 elections the MP won 27 seats and Laenser was named minister of agriculture.

Leader: Mohand LAENSER (Secretary General).

National Democratic Party (Parti National Démocrate—PND). The PND was founded as the Democratic Independents (Indépendants Démocrates—ID) in April 1981 by 59 former RNI deputies in the House of Representatives. At the party's first congress on June 11–13, 1982, its secretary general, Mohamed Arsalane al-JADIDI, affirmed the PND's loyalty to the monarchy while castigating the RNI for not providing an effective counterweight to the "old" parties.

Leader: Abdallah KADIRI.

Justice and Development Party (Parti de la Justice et du Développement—PJD). The PJD was formerly known as the Popular Constitutional and Democratic Movement (Mouvement Populaire Constitutionnel et Démocratique—MPCD). The MPCD was a splinter from the Popular Movement. It won three legislative seats in 1977 and none in 1984 or 1993.

In June 1996 the moribund MPCD was rejuvenated by its merger with an unrecognized Islamist grouping known as Reform and Renewal (Islah wa al-tajdid), led by Abdelillah BENKIRANE. The Islamists were allocated three of the MPCD's secretariat seats, and Benkirane was generally acknowledged as the party's primary leader. He announced that his supporters had relinquished their "revolutionary ideas" and were now committed to "Islam, the constitutional monarchy, and non-violence." The party won 9 seats in the House of Representatives in 1997, while Benkirane was successful in a by-election on April 30, 1999. The PJD has gained popularity, taking 42 seats in the House of Representatives in 2002, having won in most districts where it was permitted to run a candidate. In local elections in 2003, it scaled back the candidates it presented, with leader Saad Eddine OTHMANI explaining that the party did not want to scare off foreign investors with high-profile wins.

The PJD is widely expected to have significant success in the parliamentary elections in 2007, and observers anticipate that the party will become a partner in a government coalition.

Leader: Saad Eddine OTHMANI (Secretary General).

Action Party (Parti de l'Action—PA). The PA was organized in December 1974 by a group of Berber intellectuals dedicated to the “construction of a new society through a new elite.” It won two legislative seats in 1977, none in 1984, and two in 1993 and 1997.

Leader: Mohammed EL IDRISSE.

Democratic Party for Independence (Parti Démocratique pour l'Indépendance—PDI). The PDI, a small but long-standing grouping (also referenced as the Parti de la Choura et de l'Istiqlal, or Choura), won three seats in the 1993 direct house election and a surprising six seats in the indirect election.

Leaders: Abdelwahed MAACH.

Democratic and Social Movement (Mouvement Démocratique et Social—MDS). Launched in June 1996 (as the National Democratic and Social Movement) by MNP dissidents, the Berber MDS is led by a former official of the interior ministry.

Leader: Mahmoud ARCHANE (Secretary General).

United Socialist Left (Gauche Socialiste Unifiée—GSU). The GSU is a left-wing formation that was launched at a constitutive congress in July 2002 when the OADP merged with three minor radical groupings, namely the Movement of Independent Democrats, the Movement for Democracy, and the Independent Left Potentials.

Leader: Mohamed Ben Said AIT IDDER (Secretary General).

Organization of Democratic and Popular Action (Organisation de l'Action Démocratique et Populaire—OADP). Claiming a following of former members of the USFP and PPS, the OADP was organized in May 1983. It obtained one seat in 1984 balloting and two seats in 1993. A new 74-member Central Committee was elected at the third OADP congress, held November 5–6, 1994, in Casablanca.

The OADP was one of the few major parties to oppose the king's constitutional initiatives of 1996, some of its members subsequently splitting off to form the PSD (above) because of the issue. The OADP won four seats in the November 1997 Majlis elections. Although the OADP was a member of the ruling Democratic Bloc, it was not listed as having any members in the March 1998 cabinet. The OADP sources defined the group's stance as one of “critical” support of the coalition government.

Leader: Mohamed BENSALD (Secretary General).

National Union of Popular Forces (Union Nationale des Forces Populaires—UNFP). Formed in 1959 by former Istiqlal adherents, the UNFP subsequently became a coalition of left-wing nationalists, trade unionists, resistance fighters, and dissident members of minor parties. Weakened by internal factionalism, government repression, the disappearance of its leader Mehdi BEN BARKA (while visiting France in 1965), and the neutrality of the Moroccan Labor Union (UMT), the party subsequently split into personal factions. In 1972 the National Administrative Committee replaced the ten-person Secretariat General and three-person Political Bureau with a group of five permanent committees. The Political Bureau thereupon formed its own organization, UNFP–Rabat Section, which was banned for several months in 1973 for activities against the state and subsequently reorganized as the USFP (above). The UNFP formally boycotted the legislative elections of 1977 and 1984, as well as the municipal balloting of June 1983; it won no seats in 1993. Recent references to the Democratic Bloc have not listed the UNFP among its components, despite its previous inclusion in that umbrella group.

Leader: Moulay Abdallah IBRAHIM (Secretary General).

Party of the Democratic and Social Vanguard (Parti de l'Avant-Garde Démocratique et Socia—PAGDS). Formed by USFD dissidents in 1991, the PAGDS boycotted the 1997 elections on the ground that its members had been harassed by the government.

Leader: Ahmed BENJELLAIME.

Other parties, a number of which won seats in 2002, include the Alliance of Freedoms (Alliance des Liberté—ADL), led by Ali BEL HAJ; the Citizens' Initiatives for Development (Initiatives Citoyennes pour le Développement—ICD), led by Mohammed BENHAMOU; the Democratic Union (Union Démocratique—UD), led by Bouazza IKKEN; the Moroccan Liberal Party (Parti Marocain Libéral—PML), led by Mohammed ZIANE; the National Ittihad Congress (Congrès National Ittihad—CNI), a breakaway group from the USFP led by Abdelmajid BOUZOUBAA; the National Party for Unity and Solidarity (Parti National pour l'Unité et la Solidarité—PNUS), led by Muhammad ASMAR; the Party of Citizens' Forces (Parti des Forces Citoyennes—PFC), led by Abderrahim LAHJOUJI; the Party of Environment and Development (Parti de l'Environnement et du Développement—PED), led by Ahmed AL ALAMI; the Party of Promise (Parti al-Ahd), led by Najib EL OUAZZANI; the Party of Reform and Development (Parti de la Réforme et du Développement—PRD), led by former RNI member Abderrahmane EL KOHEN; the Party of Renewal and Equity (Parti du Renouveau et de l'Équité—PRE), led by Chakir ACHEHBAR; and the Social Center Party (Parti du Centre Social—PCS), led by Lachen MADIH.

Clandestine Groups

Justice and Welfare (Adl wa-al-Ihsan). The country's leading radical Islamist organization, Adl wa-al-Ihsan was formed in 1980. Although denied legal party status in 1981, it was informally tolerated until a mid-1989 crackdown, during which its founder, Sheikh Abd Assalam Yassine, was placed under house arrest and other members were imprisoned. The government formally outlawed the group in January 1990; two months later, five of its most prominent members were given two-year prison terms, and Yassine's house detention was extended, touching off large-scale street disturbances in Rabat. Although the other detainees were released in early 1992, Yassine remained under house arrest, King Hassan describing fundamentalism as a threat to Moroccan stability. An estimated 100 members of Adl wa-al-Ihsan were reportedly among the prisoners pardoned in mid-1994, Yassine pointedly not among them. He was finally released from house arrest in December 1995 but was soon thereafter placed under "police protection" for apparently having criticized the government too strenuously. (Among Yassine's transgressions, in the eyes of the government, was his failure to acknowledge King Hassan as the nation's supreme religious leader.) His house arrest prompted protest demonstrations in 1998 by his supporters, whom the government also charged with responsibility for recent protests among university students and a mass demonstration in late December 1998 protesting U.S.–UK air strikes against Iraq. Although the group remained proscribed, Yassine was released from house arrest in May 2000. He reportedly continued to be critical of the royal family and the government, but based on Yassine's rejection of violence, the government tolerated the group's activities. However, in May 2006 the government arrested hundreds of Adl wa-al-Ihsan members across the country, apparently in reaction to rumors that the party had planned an uprising. Those rounded up were later freed, but party members claimed that materials such as computers and books had been seized from party offices.

In a separate matter, Yassine's daughter, Nadia YASSINE, head of the organization's feminist branch, was charged with insulting the monarchy after she gave an interview to a Moroccan newspaper in which she asserted that the monarchy "was not suitable for Morocco," that a republic would be preferable, and that the king's regime was likely to collapse soon. She faced up to five years in prison. After the United States expressed opposition to her prosecution, her trial was postponed indefinitely.

Leader: Sheikh Abd Assalam YASSINE.

Cabinet

As of June 1, 2006

Prime Minister
Minister of State

Driss Jettou (ind.)
Abbas El Fassi (Istiqlal)

Ministers

Agricultural, Rural Development, and Marine Fisheries Communication, Spokesman of the Government Culture
Energy and Mining
Employment and Vocational Training
Environment, Territory Development
Equipment and Transport
Finance and Privatization
Foreign Affairs and Cooperation
Foreign Trade
General Secretary of the Government
Habous (Religious Endowments) and Islamic Affairs
Health
Industry, Trade, and Upgrading the Economy
Interior
Justice
Modernization of the Public Sector
National Education, Higher Education, Staff Training,
and Scientific Research
Relations with Parliament
Social Development, the Family, and Solidarity
Tourism, Handicraft, and Social Economy

Mohand Laenser (MNP)
Mohamed Nabil Benabdallah (ind.)
Mohamed Achaari (USFP)
Mohammed Boutaleb (ind.)
Mustapha Mansouri (Istiqlal)
Mohamed El-Yazghi (USFP)
Karim Gellab (ind.)
Fathallah Oualaou (USFP)
Mohamed Benaissa (RNI)
Mustapha Mechahouri (ind.)
Abdessadek Rabiaa (ind.)
Ahmed Toufig (ind.)
Mohammed Chaik Biadillah (ind.)
Salaheddine Mezouar (ind.)
Chakib ben Moussa (ind.)
Mohamed Bouzoubaa (ind.)
Mohamed Boussaid (ind.)
Habib El Malki (ind.)

Mohammed Saad El Alami (Istiqlal)
Abderrahman Harouchi (ind.)
Adil Douiri (Istiqlal)

Ministers Delegate (Ministries)

Foreign Affairs and Cooperation
Foreign Affairs, Moroccans Living Abroad
Interior

Tayeb Fassi Fihri
Nouzha Chekrouni [f]
Fouad Ali El-Himma

Secretaries of State

Agriculture, Rural Development, and Sea Fisheries
Employment and Vocational Training
National Education, Higher Education, Staff Training,
and Scientific Research
Social Development, Family, and Solidarity Youth

Mohamed Mohattane
Said Oulbacha
Anis Birou
Yasmina Baddou [f]
Mohammed El Gahs

[f] = female

In 1985 and 1986 there were a number of arrests of people appearing to be members of two left-wing groups: Ila al-amaam (To the Future), formed in the 1960s by a number of PPS Maoist dissidents, and Qaidiyyun (The Base), an outgrowth of a 23 Mars group of the 1970s, most of whose supporters entered the OADP. Many of the detainees were released in mid-1989 under a royal amnesty. Ila al-Amaam's former leader, Abraham SERFATY, was allowed to return to Morocco in late 1999. Members of another banned organization, Shabiba al-islamiya (Islamic Youth), have also been sentenced to prison terms, often in absentia, for antiregime activity. The group was founded by Abdelkarim MOUTIA, a former nationalist.

Legislature

The constitutional amendments of September 1996 provided for a bicameral Parliament (Barlaman) comprising an indirectly elected House of Councilors and a directly elected House of Representatives. Previously, the legislature had consisted of a unicameral House of Representatives, two-thirds of whose members were directly elected with the remainder being selected by an electoral college of government, professional, and labor representatives.

House of Councilors (Majlis al-Mustasharin). The upper house consists of 270 members indirectly elected for nine-year terms (one-third of the house is renewed every three years) by local councils, regional councils, and professional organizations. At the first election on December 5, 1997, the National Assembly of Independents won 42 seats; the Democratic and Social Movement, 33; the Constitutional Union, 28, the Popular Movement, 27; the National Democratic Party, 21; the Independence Party, 21; the Socialist Union of Popular Forces, 16; the Popular National Movement, 15; the Action Party, 13; the Democratic Forces Front, 12; the Party of Renewal and Progress, 7; the Socialist Democratic Party, 4; the Democratic Party for Independence, 4; and various labor organizations, 27. In the election to renew one-third of the house on September 15, 2000, the National Assembly of Independents won 14 seats; the Popular National Movement, 12; the National Democratic Party, 10; the Popular Movement, 9; the Constitutional Union, 8; the Independence Party, 7; the Democratic and Social Movement, 6; the Democratic Forces Front, 5; the Socialist Union of Popular Forces, 3; the Party of Renewal and Progress, 2; the Action Party, 2; the Socialist Democratic Party, 2; the Democratic Party for Independence, 1; and various labor organizations, 3.

Speaker: Mustapha OUKACHA.

House of Representatives (Majlis al-Nawwab). The lower house has 325 members directly elected on a proportional basis for five-year terms. (Under electoral law revision of May 2002, 30 seats were set aside for women; those seats were to be contested on a proportional basis from national lists for the September 2002 balloting, while the other 295 seats were to be elected on a proportional basis from 92 multi-member constituencies.) Following the election of September 27, 2002, the distribution of seats was as follows: Socialist Union of Popular Forces, 50; Independence Party (Istiqlal), 48; Justice and Development, 42; National Assembly of Independents, 41; Popular Movement, 18; Constitutional Union, 16; National Democratic Party, 12; Democratic Forces Front, 12; Party of Renewal and Progress, 11; Democratic Union, 10; Democratic and Social Movement, 7; Socialist Democratic Party, 6; Party of Promise, 5; Alliance of Freedom, 4; Party of Reform and Development, 3; United Socialist Left, 3; Moroccan Liberal Party, 3; Party of Citizens' Forces, 3; Party of Environment and Development, 2; National Ittihad Congress, 1.

Speaker: Abdelwahed RADI.

Communications

Press

Moroccan newspapers have a reputation for being highly partisan and outspoken, although those incurring the displeasure of the state face reprisal, such as forced suspension, and government control has at times been highly restrictive. The following are published daily in Casablanca in French, unless otherwise noted: Le Matin du Sahara (100,000), replaced Le Petit Marocain following government shutdown in 1971; al-Alam (Rabat, 100,000), Istiqlal organ, in Arabic; L'Opinion (Rabat, 60,000), Istiqlal organ; Maroc Soir (50,000), replaced La Vigie Marocaine in 1971; al-Maghrib (Rabat, 15,000), RNI organ; al-Mithaq al-Watani (Rabat, 25,000), RNI organ, in Arabic; al-Anbaa (Rabat, 15,000), Ministry of Information, in Arabic; al-Bayane (5,000), PRP organ, in French and Arabic; Libération, USFP organ; al-Ittihad al-Ishtiraki, USFP organ, in Arabic; Risalat al-Umma, UC organ, in Arabic; Anoual (Rabat), OADP weekly, in Arabic; al-Mounaddama, in Arabic. al-Mouharir, a USFP organ, and al-Bayane were suspended in the wake of the June 1981 riots at Casablanca. The latter was permitted to resume publication in mid-July but, having had a number of its issues confiscated in early 1984 because of its reporting of further Casablanca disturbances, it was suspended again from October 1986 until January 1987. Two months later, the government seized an issue of Anoual, apparently in response to its coverage of prison conditions, and took similar action against al-Bayane in January 1988 because of its stories on problems in the educational system and recent demonstrations at Fez University. The USFP's al-Ittihad al-Ishtiraki was also informed that it would be censored because of its coverage of the student disturbances. In mid-1991 the government banned distribution of the first issue of Le Citoyen, a weekly established by political dissidents to promote government reform. Following the enthronement of the reform-minded King Mohamed VI in 1999, the government somewhat relaxed its grip on the print media. However, from 2000 through mid-2002 various issues of Le Journal, the independent weekly L'Economiste, Maroc-Hebdo, the Islamist weekly Risalat al-Foutawah, Le Reporter al-Moustaquil, Le Quodien du Maroc, Chamal, Demain, and Al-Sahifa were banned. Domestic and international journalists' organizations criticized a libel law adopted in April 2002, accusing the government of eroding civil and press liberties by making it easier to file libel suits. In May 2006, Human Rights Watch issued a report critical of tightening controls on the press, citing recent harassment of independent news weeklies that had questioned government policies.

News Agencies

The Moroccan Arab News Agency (Wikalat al-Maghrib al-Arabi—WMA), successor to the former Maghreb Arabe Presse, is an official, government-owned agency. Most major foreign agencies maintain offices in Rabat.

Broadcasting and Computing

Broadcasting is under the supervision of the Broadcasting Service of the Kingdom of Morocco (Idhaat al-Mamlakat al-Maghribiyah). The government-controlled Radiodiffusion-Télévision Marocaine provides radio service over three networks (national, international, and Berber) as well as commercial television service; transmission by a private television company was launched in 1989. In addition, the Voice of America operates a radio station in Tangier. There were approximately 7.1 million television receivers and 600,000 personal computers serving 800,000 Internet users in 2003.

Intergovernmental Representation

Ambassador to the U.S.

Aziz MEKOUAR

U.S. Ambassador to Morocco

Thomas RILEY

Permanent Representative to the UN

Mustapha SAHEL

IGO Memberships (Non-UN)

AfDB, AFESD, AMF, AMU, BADEA, EBRD, IDB, Interpol, IOM, LAS, NAM, OIC, OIF, PCA, WCO, WTO

Disputed Territory

Western Sahara

The region known since 1976 as Western Sahara was annexed by Spain in two stages: the coastal area in 1884 and the interior in 1934. In 1957, the year after Morocco attained full independence, Rabat renewed a claim to the territory, sending irregulars to attack inland positions. In 1958, however, French and Spanish troops succeeded in quelling the attacks, with Madrid formally uniting Saguia el Hamra and Rio de Oro, the two historical components of the territory, as the province of Spanish Sahara. Mauritanian independence in 1960 led to territorial claims by Nouakchott, with the situation being further complicated in 1963 by the discovery of one of the world's richest phosphate deposits at Bu Craa. During the next dozen years, Morocco attempted to pressure Spain into relinquishing its claim through a combination of diplomatic initiatives (the UN first called for a referendum on self-determination for the Sahrawi people in 1966), direct support for guerrilla groups, and a legal challenge in the International Court of Justice (ICJ).

Increasing insurgency led Spain in May 1975 to announce that it intended to withdraw from Spanish Sahara, while an ICJ ruling the following October stated that Moroccan and Mauritanian legal claims to the region were limited and had little bearing on the question of self-determination. Nevertheless, in November King Hassan ordered some 300,000 unarmed Moroccans, in what became known as the Green March, to enter the territory. Although Spain strongly objected to the action, a tripartite agreement with Morocco and Mauritania was concluded at Madrid on November 14. As a result, Spanish Sahara ceased to be a province of Spain at the end of the year; Spanish troops withdrew shortly thereafter, and Morocco and Mauritania assumed responsibility for Western Sahara on February 28, 1976. On April 14 Rabat and Nouakchott reached an agreement under which Morocco claimed the northern two-thirds of the region and Mauritania claimed the southern one-third.

The strongest opposition to the partition was voiced by the Popular Front for the Liberation of Saguia el Hamra and Rio de Oro (Polisario, see below), which in February 1976 formally proclaimed a government-in-exile of the Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic (SADR), headed by Mohamed Lamine OULD AHMED as prime minister. Whereas Polisario had originally been based in Mauritania, its political leadership was subsequently relocated to Algeria, with its guerrilla units, recruited largely from nomadic tribes indigenous to the region, establishing secure bases there. Neither Rabat nor Nouakchott wished to precipitate a wider conflict by operating on Algerian soil, which permitted Polisario to concentrate militarily against the weaker of the two occupying regimes and thus to aid in the overthrow of Mauritania's Moktar Ould Daddah in July 1978. On August 5, 1979, Mauritania concluded a peace agreement with Polisario at Algiers, but Morocco responded by annexing the southern third of Western Sahara. Meanwhile, Polisario launched its first raids into Morocco while continuing a diplomatic offensive that by the end of 1980 had resulted in some 45 countries according recognition to the SADR.

During a summit meeting of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) in Nairobi, Kenya, in June 1981, King Hassan called for a referendum on the future of the disputed territory, but an OAU special implementation committee was unable to move on the proposal because of Rabat's refusal to engage in direct negotiations or to meet a variety of other conditions advanced by Polisario as necessary to effect a cease-fire. As a result, conflict in the region intensified in the second half of the year.

At an OAU Council of Ministers meeting in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, on February 22, 1982, a SADR delegation was, for the first time, seated, following a controversial ruling by the organization's secretary general that provoked a walkout by 18 member states, including Morocco. For the same reason, a quorum could not be declared for the next scheduled Council of Ministers meeting in Tripoli, Libya, on July 26, or for the 19th OAU summit, which was to have convened in Tripoli on August 5. An attempt to reconvene both meetings in November, following the "voluntary and temporary" withdrawal of the SADR, also failed because of the Western Sahara impasse, coupled with disagreement over the composition of a delegation from Chad. Another "temporary" withdrawal of the SADR allowed the OAU to convene the long-delayed summit in Addis Ababa in May 1983 at which it was decided to oversee a referendum in the region by the end of the year. Morocco's refusal to meet directly with Polisario representatives forced postponement of the poll, while the 1984 Treaty of Oujda with Libya effectively reduced support for the front's military forces. Subsequently, Moroccan soldiers crossed briefly into Algerian soil in "pursuit" of guerrillas, while extending the area under Moroccan control by 4,000 square miles. The seating of an SADR delegation at the 20th OAU summit in November 1985 and the election of Polisario Secretary General Mohamed Abd al-AZZIZ as an OAU vice president prompted Morocco's withdrawal from the organization.

At the sixth triennial Polisario congress, held in "liberated territory" in December 1985, Abd al-Azziz was reelected secretary general; he subsequently appointed a new 13-member SADR government that included himself as president, with Ould Ahmed continuing as prime minister. The following May a series of "proximity talks" involving Moroccan and Polisario representatives concluded at UN headquarters in New York with no discernible change in the territorial impasse. Subsequently, Rabat began construction of more than 1,200 miles of fortified sand walls that forced the rebels back toward the Algerian and Mauritanian borders. Polisario, while conceding little likelihood of victory by its 30,000 fighters over an estimated 120,000 to 140,000 Moroccan soldiers, nonetheless continued its attacks, hoping that the economic strain of a "war of attrition" would induce King Hassan to enter into direct negotiations—a position endorsed by a 98–0 vote of the 41st UN General Assembly. The UN also offered to administer the Western Sahara on an interim basis pending a popular referendum, but Rabat insisted that its forces remain in place. In 1987 the SADR reported an assassination attempt against Abd al-Azziz, alleging Moroccan complicity. Rabat denied the allegation and suggested that SADR dissidents may have been responsible.

Following the resumption of relations between Rabat and Algiers in May 1988, which some observers attributed in part to diminishing Algerian support for Polisario, progress appeared to be developing toward a negotiated settlement of the militarily stalemated conflict. On August 30, shortly after a new SADR government had been announced with Mahfoud Ali BEIBA taking over as prime minister, both sides announced their "conditional" endorsement of a UN-sponsored peace plan that called for a cease-fire and introduction of a UN peacekeeping force to oversee the long-discussed self-determination referendum. However, agreement was lacking on the qualifications of those who would be permitted to participate in the referendum and whether Moroccan troops would remain in the area prior to the vote. Underlining the fragility of the negotiations, Polisario launched one of its largest attacks in September before calling a cease-fire on December 30, pending face-to-face talks with King Hassan in January 1989. Although the talks eventually broke down, the cease-fire continued throughout most of the year as UN Secretary General Javier Pérez de Cuéllar attempted to mediate an agreement on referendum details. However, Polisario, accusing Rabat of delaying tactics, initiated a series of attacks in October, subsequent fighting being described as some of the most intense to date in the conflict. Another temporary truce was implemented in March 1990, and in June the UN Security Council formally authorized creation of a Western Saharan mission to supervise the proposed referendum. However, it was not until April 29, 1991, that the Security Council endorsed direct UN sponsorship of the poll, with the General Assembly approving a budget of $180 million, plus $34 million in voluntary contributions, for a UN Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara (referenced by its French acronym, MINURSO). The mission's charge included the identification of bona fide inhabitants of the territory, the assembly of a voting list, the establishment of polling stations, and supervision of the balloting itself. The plan appeared to be in jeopardy when fierce fighting broke out in August between Moroccan and Polisario forces prior to the proposed deployment of MINURSO peacekeeping troops; however, both sides honored the UN's formal cease-fire date of September 6.

By early 1992 the broader dimensions of the Western Sahara conflict had significantly changed. The collapse of the Soviet Union and heightened internal problems for Polisario's principal backers, Algeria and Libya, created financial and supply problems for the rebels. At midyear it was estimated that more than 1,000 rank and file had joined a number of dissident leaders in defecting to Morocco. Meanwhile, Morocco had moved tens of thousands of settlers into the disputed territory, thereby diluting potential electoral support for Polisario. In addition, the proposed self-determination referendum, which the UN had planned to conduct in February, had been postponed indefinitely over the issue of voter eligibility, Polisario leaders charging that UN representatives had compromised their impartiality through secret dealings with Rabat. An unprecedented meeting, brokered by the UN at El Aaiún between Moroccan and Polisario representatives, ended on July 19, 1993, without substantial progress. The main difficulty lay in a dispute about voting lists, Polisario insisting they should be based on a census taken in 1974 and Morocco arguing that they should be enlarged to include the names of some 100,000 individuals subsequently settling in the territory.

A second round of face-to-face talks, scheduled for October 1993, was cancelled at the last moment when Polisario objected to the presence of recent defectors from the front on the Moroccan negotiating team. Although the prospects for agreement on electoral eligibility were regarded as slight, MINURSO began identifying voters in June 1994 with the hope that balloting could be conducted in October 1995. Registration proceeded slowly, however, and UN officials in early 1995 protested that the Moroccan government was interfering in their operations. In April, UN Secretary General Boutros Boutros-Ghali reluctantly postponed the referendum again, sentiment reportedly growing within the UN Security Council to withdraw MINURSO if genuine progress was not achieved shortly.

In May 1996 the Security Council ordered a reduction in MINURSO personnel, UN officials declaring an impasse in the voter identification dispute and observers suggesting that hostilities could easily break out once again. However, face-to-face contacts between Polisario and Moroccan officials resumed in September, but no genuine progress ensued. It was reported that only 60,000 potential voters had been approved, with the cases of some 150,000 other "applicants" remaining unresolved at the end of the year.

New UN Secretary General Kofi Annan made the relaunching of the UN initiative in Morocco one of his priorities in early 1997 and in the spring appointed former U.S. Secretary of State James Baker as his personal envoy on the matter. Baker's mediation led to face-to-face talks between Polisario and representatives of the Moroccan government in the summer, culminating in the announcement of a "breakthrough" in September. Essentially, the two sides agreed to revive the 1991 plan with the goal of conducting the self-determination referendum in December 1998. They also accepted UN "supervision" in the region pending the referendum and agreed to the repatriation of refugees under the auspices of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees. MINURSO resumed the identification of voters in December 1997; however, the process subsequently again bogged down, with most observers concluding that the Moroccan government bore primary responsibility for the foot-dragging. Annan launched what he said would be his final push for a resolution in early 1999, calling for the resumption of voter registration at midyear leading up to a referendum by the end of July 2000.

In September 1999 several pro-independence riots in Western Sahara were suppressed by what some saw as an over-reaction by the police, who beat and arrested scores of demonstrators. The heavy-handedness of the security forces reportedly strengthened the resolve of King Mohamed VI to oust the "old guard" of the Moroccan regime, especially Interior Minister Driss Basri. Although the new king later espoused a more flexible stance toward the Western Sahara issue, UN special envoy Baker noted in April 2000 that he remained pessimistic about the prospects of a resolution of the conflict, citing Morocco's insistence that Moroccan settlers in Western Sahara be eligible in the proposed referendum. In September 2001 Polisario rejected Baker's proposal to grant the Western Sahara political autonomy rather than hold an independence referendum. Recent interest in oil drilling in the region reportedly further complicated the matter. In November 2002 King Mohamed described the notion of a self-determination referendum as “obsolete.” In mid-2004 the UN Security Council adopted a resolution urging Morocco and Polisario to accept the UN plan to grant Western Sahara self-government. Morocco rejected the proposal and continued to insist that the area be granted autonomy within the framework of Moroccan sovereignty. In August 2005 Polisario released 404 Moroccan prisoners, the last of the soldiers it had captured in fighting. The front said it hoped that the gesture would lead to Moroccan reciprocity and then a peace settlement. In November 2005, the king renewed his call for autonomy for the region within “the framework of Moroccan sovereignty,” but the Polisario Front quickly rebuffed what it referred to as the king’s “intransigence.”

The stalemate lasted into 2006. Morocco continued to administer the annexed territory as four provinces: three established in 1976 (Boujdour, Es-Smara, El-Aaiún) and one in 1979 (Oued ed-Dahab). The SADR administers four Algerian camps, which house an estimated 190,000 Sahrawis, and claims to represent some 83,000 others who remain in the Western Sahara.

Sahrawi Front

Popular Front for the Liberation of Saguia el Hamra and Rio de Oro (Frente Popular para la Liberación de Saguia el Hamra y Rio de Oro—Polisario). Established in 1973 to win independence for Spanish (subsequently Western) Sahara, the Polisario Front was initially based in Mauritania, but since the mid-1970s its political leadership has operated from Algeria. In consonance with recent developments throughout the world, the once strongly socialist Polisario currently promises to institute a market economy in “the future Sahrawi state,” except in regard to mineral reserves (which would remain state property). The front also supports “eventual” multipartyism, its 1991 Congress, held in Tindouf, Algeria, pledging to draft a “democratic and pluralistic” constitution to present for a national referendum should the proposed self-determination vote in the Western Sahara go in Polisario’s favor. In other activity, the Congress reelected longtime leader Mohamed Abd al-Azziz as secretary general of the front and thereby president of the SADR. However, in August 1992 the defection to Morocco of the SADR foreign minister, Brahim HAKIM, served to point up the increasingly tenuous position of the rebel movement. Subsequently, a new SADR government-in-exile announced in September 1993 was most noteworthy for the appointment of hard-liner Brahim GHALI as defense minister.

In 1995 Polisario reportedly was still threatening to resume hostilities if the UN plan collapsed. However, it was widely believed that the front’s military capacity had by then diminished to about 6,000 soldiers.

The Ninth Polisario Congress, held August 20–27, 1995, reelected Abd al-Azziz as secretary general and urged the international community to pressure the Moroccan government regarding its perceived stonewalling. In September a new SADR government was announced under the leadership of Mahfoud Ali Larous Beiba, a former SADR health minister. On October 12 the first session of an SADR National Assembly was convened in Tindouf, its 101 members having been elected via secret ballot at local and regional “conferences.” A new SADR government was named on January 21, 1998, although Beiba remained as prime minister and a number of incumbents were reappointed. Beiba was succeeded on February 10, 1999, by Bouchraya Hamoudi Bayoun.

In the summer and fall of 2005, many Sahrawis had begun referring to their campaign against Morocco as an “intifada,” and Abd al-Azziz called for assistance from South Africa’s Nelson Mandela and U.S. President George W. Bush in resolving the Western Sahara standoff.

Secretary General: Mohamed Abd al-AZZIZ (President of the SADR).

Prime Minister of the SADR: Bouchraya Hamoudi BAYOUN.

MOZAMBIQUE

REPUBLIC OF MOZAMBIQUE

República de Moçambique

---

The Country

Mozambique lies on the southeast coast of Africa, its contiguous neighbors being Tanzania on the north; Malawi and Zambia on the northwest; and Zimbabwe, South Africa, and Swaziland on the west and south. Mozambique's varied terrain comprises coastal lowlands, central plateaus, and mountains along the western frontier. The country is bisected by the Zambezi River, which flows southeastward from the Zambia-Zimbabwe border. The population, while primarily of Bantu stock, is divided into several dozen tribal groups, most speaking distinct local languages or dialects. A majority of the population is Christian (according to the 1997 census); about one-quarter of the population practices traditional religions, and there is a Muslim minority of about 18 percent. Catholic and Anglican churches, many of which were closed following independence, have regained influence as a result of the government's retreat from a rigidly Marxist-Leninist orientation. Women constitute 48 percent of the labor force, primarily in the agricultural sector; there are a number of female ministers, including the prime minister, in the current cabinet.

Agriculture remains the mainstay of the economy, employing two-thirds of the work force and providing the principal cultivated exports: cashew nuts, cotton, sugar, and tea. Seafood is also an important export. Following independence, agricultural output declined—particularly in production of sugar and cotton as well as of such minerals as coal and copper—as the government introduced pervasive state control and the Portuguese community, which possessed most of the country's technical and managerial expertise, left the country. In the early 1980s, however, the government began to encourage limited private ownership, foreign investment, and the development of family-owned and operated farms. For the most part, industry has been limited to processing agricultural commodities, although significant deposits of natural gas, as well as bauxite, iron, manganese, tantalite, uranium, and other ores await exploitation.

The economy contracted sharply from 1982 to 1986, as insurgency and drought inflicted widespread death and deprivation that necessitated massive emergency food imports and other aid. Subsequently, a recovery program sponsored by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) contributed to moderate economic growth, although social conditions, particularly in rural areas, remained dismal as the result of rebel activity.

In June 1993 international donors pledged some $70 million to aid the estimated 4 million internally displaced Mozambicans and to launch a massive repatriation program in light of progress toward resolution of the longstanding civil war. However, returning refugees faced grim economic conditions, as reflected by an average annual per capita income of less than $80 (the world's lowest, according to the World Bank). The imposition by the government of fiscal austerity and other reforms subsequently sparked an impressive recovery, GDP growing by more than 10 percent annually from 1996–1999 and Mozambique becoming the “darling” of the IMF and World Bank, which had helped to negotiate substantial debt relief packages. However, despite having returned to food self-sufficiency, Mozambique remained among the lowest-ranked nations regarding development, and poverty was widespread, much of the population living in small villages lacking electricity or running water.

It was widely expected that GDP growth would again approach double digits in 2000 based on the continued inflow of substantial foreign investment. However, severe flooding early in the year significantly damaged those prospects. Indeed, the government announced that GDP growth for 2000 was only 2.1 percent, while inflation registered 12.7 percent for the year. The economy recovered in 2001, however, with real GDP rising by 13.9 percent. Through mid-2002, the World Bank, the IMF, and the World Trade Organization continued to praise the country's economic performance and the government's policies.

Growth continued through 2003, propelled by expansion in manufacturing, construction, and service industries. In 2004 the World Bank provided $790 million in grants for debt relief. In addition, the IMF pledged $7.7 million in assistance over a three-year period to support government efforts to reform and restructure the economy. (Banking reform and intensified privatization efforts were requested.) The IMF also approved $110 million to fund construction of a major railway in Zambezi Province as a conduit for manufactured goods and passengers to the interior of the country.

In 2005 it was reported that GDP had increased annually by an average of 8 percent over the past ten years, one of the highest long-term growth rates in Africa. Collaterally, the poverty rate had declined from 69 percent of the population in 1997 to 54 percent. Inflation had dropped to 8 percent in 2005.

Government and Politics

Political Background

Portuguese hegemony was established early in the 16th century, when Mozambican coastal settlements became ports of call for traders from the Far East. However, it was not until the Berlin Congress of 1884–1885 that Portuguese supremacy was formally acknowledged by the European powers. In 1952 the colony of Mozambique became an Overseas Province and, as such, was constitutionally incorporated into Portugal. In 1964 armed resistance to Portuguese rule was initiated by the Mozambique Liberation Front (Frente de Libertação de Moçambique—Frelimo), led by Dr. Eduardo MONDLANE until his assassination by Portuguese agents in 1969. Following Mondlane's death, Samora MACHEL and Marcelino DOS SANTOS overcame a bid for control by Frelimo Vice President Uriah SIMANGO and were installed as the movement's president and vice president, respectively. After the 1974 coup in Lisbon, negotiations in Lusaka, Zambia, called for the formation of a new government composed of Frelimo and Portuguese elements and for the attainment of complete independence in mid-1975. The agreement was challenged by leaders of the white minority, who attempted to establish a white provisional government under right-wing leadership. After the collapse of this rebellion on September 10, 1974, most of the territory's 250,000 whites migrated to Portugal or South Africa.

On June 25, 1975, Mozambique became an independent “people's republic,” with Machel assuming the presidency. Elections of Frelimo-sponsored candidates to local, district, provincial, and national assemblies were held during Political Status: Former Portuguese dependency; became independent as the People's Republic of Mozambique on June 25, 1975; present name adopted in constitution that came into effect on November 30, 1990.

Area: 309,494 sq. mi. (801,590 sq. km.).

Population: 16,542,740 (1997C); 19,434,000 (2005E). The 1997 figure includes an adjustment of 5.1 percent for underenumeration.

Major Urban Center (2005E): MAPUTO (1,122,000).

Official Language: Portuguese (a number of African languages are also spoken).

Monetary Unit: Metical (market rate July 1, 2006: 25,860 meticals = $1US). (In November 2005 the Assembly of the Republic approved legislation providing for the introduction of a "new metical" [worth 1,000 old meticals] as of July 1, 2006. Both old and new meticals were to be considered legal tender at least until the end of the year.)

President: Armando Emilio GUEBUZA (Mozambique Liberation Front); elected on December 1–2, 2004, and inaugurated on February 2, 2005, to succeed Joaquim Alberto CHISSANO (Mozambique Liberation Front).

Prime Minister: Luisa Dias DIOGO (Mozambique Liberation Front); appointed by the president on February 17, 2004, to succeed Dr. Pascoal Manuel MOCUMBI (Mozambique Liberation Front), who earlier had announced his intention to resign; reappointed by the president on February 3, 2005, following presidential and legislative elections on December 1–2, 2004.

September–December 1977. In an apparent easing of its commitment to Marxist centralism, the government took steps in the early 1980s to separate government and party cadres. However, a government reorganization in March 1986 reestablished party domination, with the Council of Ministers being divided into three sections, each directed by a senior member of the Frelimo Political Bureau.

On July 26, 1986, Mário Fernandes da Graça MACHUNGO, an economist who had overseen recent liberalization of the economy, was sworn in as prime minister, a newly created post designed to permit President Machel to concentrate on defense of the regime against the Mozambique National Resistance (Resistência Nacional Moçambicana—Renamo), which had grown from a relatively isolated opponent to an insurgent force operating in all ten provinces. Machel, who had remained a widely respected leader despite the country's myriad problems, died in a plane crash on October 19 and was succeeded on November 6 by his longtime associate, Foreign Affairs Minister Joaquim Alberto CHISSANO. Chissano extended the economic liberalization policies initiated by his predecessor, overtures to the West for emergency and development aid generally being well-received. However, domestic progress remained severely constrained by Renamo attacks on civilians and the concurrent destruction of farms, schools, and health facilities.

In part to seek accommodation with the rebels, Frelimo abandoned its commitment to Marxism-Leninism in July 1989. A year later, direct talks with Renamo representatives were launched in Rome, Italy, and in August 1990 Frelimo's Central Committee endorsed the holding of multiparty elections in 1991.

On November 2, 1990, following extensive National Assembly debate, a new, pluralistic constitution was adopted. Subsequently, a tenuous cease-fire negotiated with Renamo on December 1 broke down, the rebels withdrawing from the Rome talks. The talks resumed in May 1991, and five months later the rebels agreed to halt armed activity, to drop demands for a UN transitional government, and to recognize the government's authority. For its part, the government agreed to procedures by which Renamo could function as a political party following a formal cease-fire.

After several weeks of deadlock in the ninth round of the Rome talks, the parties finally agreed on a protocol, which was signed March 12, 1992. It provided for election to the Assembly of the Republic by proportional representation; the holding of simultaneous legislative and presidential balloting; the formation of a National Electoral Commission, one-third of whose members would be named by Renamo; and government assistance to Renamo in establishing itself as a political grouping in every provincial capital. After another delay, the round continued with a June 10 agreement on the formation of a unified, nonpartisan army; the specifics of a cease-fire; and transitory arrangements before the general election. On August 5 Chissano and Renamo leader Gen. Afonso DHLAKAMA held their first ever face-to-face meeting, and on August 7 they reached an accord on a cease-fire and electoral preparations. Subsequently, despite reports of Renamo intransigence and an increasingly restive national army, Chissano and the rebel leader signed a peace treaty in Rome on October 4, ending the 16-year-old conflict. Included in the treaty were provisions for a cease-fire, multiparty elections within a year, the establishment of a 30,000-member army drawn equally from the existing forces, a political amnesty, and Western-financed repatriation of refugees. Five days later the assembly approved the treaty and the launching of the UNs' Operation in Mozambique (Operação das Nações Unidas em Moçambique—ONUMOZ), a peacekeeping force with responsibility for disarming both combatants, integrating troops into the new armed forces, organizing elections, and securing trade routes.

In April 1993 the UN Security Council voiced "serious concern" over implementation of the October 1992 accord because of a shortfall in funds for deployment of peacekeeping troops and the withdrawal of Renamo members from the cease-fire and control commissions established under the treaty. Renamo subsequently indicated that it would not return to the commissions until a number of logistical problems had been resolved and some $15 million to support its political activities had been received.

On June 3, 1993, the commissions resumed meeting, and on June 21 the disarmament program was launched. Two months later the Joint Commission for the Formation of the Mozambique Defense Armed Forces announced that it had reached agreement on creation of the inclusive Mozambique Defense Armed Forces. In addition, an August 27–September 3 meeting between Chissano and Dhlakama, their first since 1992, yielded an accord on territorial administration, following Renamo's retreat from insistence that it be given jurisdiction over the provinces it controlled. At a further meeting on October 16–20 the two agreed on the establishment of a 20-member electoral commission (to be composed of ten government appointees, seven Renamo officials, and three from other opposition parties). Thereafter, the peace process continued to advance as the government and Renamo settled electoral law differences and formally agreed to a demobilization plan that would commence on November 30 and continue for six months.

By mid-January 1994 over 50 percent of the rebels were reported to have arrived at demobilization sites. By contrast, the government was widely criticized for a compliance level of only 19 percent. Nonetheless, President Chissano, responding to a Security Council call for a transfer of power to democratically elected officials by the end of November, announced that the country's first multiparty balloting would take place on October 27–28.

At the long-deferred balloting (extended by one day to October 29), President Chissano was a clear victor, polling 53.7 percent of the vote, compared to 33.7 percent for his principal opponent, Renamo's Dhlakama. While the legislative outcome was much closer (129–112), no opposition members were named to the government subsequently formed under former foreign minister Pascoal Manuel MOCUMBI.

Under pressure from the opposition and international donors to broaden its definition of what constituted a viable polling district, the assembly, with Renamo support, approved a constitutional amendment in November 1996 that provided for the establishment of a local government electoral system wherein communities with a functioning administration and a "reasonable" local tax base would participate in polling. In early 1997 Renamo reversed itself, threatening to stalemate the assembly and boycott elections if the scope of the polling was not expanded. Nevertheless, in March 1997 the assembly approved the creation of a nine-member, bipartisan national elections commission, which it charged with preparing for balloting. In June it was announced that elections would be held in 23 cities and 10 towns (1 in each of the provinces) in December, one year after originally scheduled. Balloting was subsequently postponed until May 1998 and, once again, in March 1998 to June 30.

Thereafter, after months of threats, in April 1998 the partners in the Coordinating Council of the Opposition formally announced their intention to boycott the local polling, citing the government's unwillingness to allow their representatives to participate in the commission that was investigating alleged electoral roll fraud. The opposition's subsequent efforts to garner support for their boycott plans appeared to have succeeded dramatically, as on June 30 less than 20 percent of the electorate was reported to have participated in the balloting. In the immediate aftermath of the elections, during which Frelimo candidates easily overwhelmed a field of independent competitors, the opposition declared the polling "null and void" and threatened to launch a civil disobedience campaign if the results were upheld. Subsequently, however, the Renamo-led opposition announced that it would not hinder the efforts of the newly elected officials, asserting that it was turning its attention to preparing for general elections in 1999.

Chissano once again defeated Dhlakama (52.3–47.7 percent) in the presidential poll conducted on December 3–5, 1999, while Frelimo won 133 seats in the concurrent assembly balloting, compared to 117 seats for Renamo and its recently formed opposition alliance called the Renamo/Electoral Union (Renamo/União Electoral—Renamo/UE). After the Supreme Court rejected a Renamo/UE call for nullification of the results, Chissano was sworn in for another five-year term on January 15, 2000. Two days later he reappointed Mocumbi to head a new all-Frelimo cabinet, which was described as bringing "fresh blood" into the government while retaining the "tested core" of the previous administration.

In February 2003, Renamo announced that it would run alone in upcoming municipal elections, thereby leading ten other opposition parties to form a new electoral coalition—the Movement for Change and Good Governance (Movimento para a Mudança e Boa Governação—MGB)—to oppose Frelimo and Renamo. In the municipal elections held on November 19, 2003, Frelimo won 28 mayoral posts and a majority of council posts in 29 municipalities, while Renamo won 5 mayor's races and council majorities in 4 municipalities (its best showing in municipal elections since multiparty elections were implemented). Although there was low voter turnout (estimated at 24.2 percent) and Renamo complained of irregularities, monitors from the European Union (EU) judged the elections free and fair, and the Constitutional Council confirmed the results in January 2004.

On February 19, 2004, former World Bank economist and Finance Minister Luisa Dias DIOGO was appointed prime minister. (Mocumbi had earlier announced his plans to retire from the premiership in order to take a UN job.) Diogo became the country's first female prime minister. Analysts suggested that she was appointed ahead of presidential and legislative elections in an effort to reinvigorate Frelimo and demonstrate a commitment by the party to economic reform.

Chissano having announced in 2001 that he would not seek reelection in 2004, Frelimo chose Armando GUEBUZA as its presidential candidate. In balloting on December 1–2, Guebuza won 63.74 percent of the vote. His closest rival was Dhlakama, who received 31.72 percent of the vote. In concurrent legislative balloting, Frelimo won 62.03 percent of the vote and 160 seats, while Renamo won 29.73 percent, and 90 seats. None of the other 23 parties received more than 2 percent of the vote. Both the presidential and legislative elections were heavily criticized by the opposition and international observers. Renamo protested to the Constitutional Council, and its deputies initially refused to take their seats in the assembly. Nonetheless, on January 20, 2005, the council certified the results. Diogo was reappointed as prime minister on February 3, and she subsequently formed a new cabinet of Frelimo appointees.

Constitution and Government

The 1975 constitution characterized the People's Republic of Mozambique as a "popular democratic state" while reserving for Frelimo "the directing power of the state and society," with decisions taken by party organs to be regarded as binding on all government officials. A subsequent constitution, adopted in August 1978, set as a national objective "the construction of the material and ideological bases for a socialist society." The president of Frelimo served as president of the republic and chief of the armed forces, while an indirectly elected People's Assembly was designated as the "supreme organ of state power."

The basic law approved by the assembly in November 1990 contained no reference to Frelimo or leadership of the working class, while "People's" was dropped from the state name. It provided for a popularly elected president serving a maximum of two five-year terms. The Council of Ministers continued to be headed by a presidentially appointed prime minister, with national legislators selected on a proportional basis in multiparty balloting. In addition to freedom of association and of the press, the new document guaranteed various human and civil rights, including the right to private property and the right to strike. A Supreme Court heads an independent judiciary.

A number of constitutional amendments were approved by the Assembly of the Republic in November 2004, although most of the basic elements of the 1990 text remained intact. (The president continued to hold the power to appoint the prime minister, cabinet ministers, and provincial governors.) The amendments reaffirmed the authority of the Constitutional Council (established in 2003) to rule on the constitutionality of legislation and to validate election results. Other changes provided for an Ombudsman (appointed by a two-third's majority in the assembly) to investigate allegations of misconduct by state officials, for the election of provincial assemblies (beginning in 2008), and for the establishment of an advisory Council of State (comprised of automatic members [such as former presidents, former assembly presidents, and the runner-up in the most recent presidential election], as well as members appointed by the president and the assembly). Although the new council was given no formal decision-making authority, the president was required to consult with the council on a broad range of matters, including the conduct of elections. The basic law revisions also removed the president's immunity from prosecution by authorizing impeachment by a vote of two-thirds of the assembly.

The governors of the country's ten provinces are appointed by the president, who may annul the decisions of provincial, district, and local assemblies. The city of Maputo (which has provincial status) is under the administrative direction of a City Council chair.

Foreign Relations

Avowedly Marxist in orientation until mid-1989, the Frelimo government was for many years the beneficiary of substantial economic, technical, and security support from the Soviet Union, Cuba, East Germany, and other Moscow-line states. However, links with the West began to increase in 1979. The UK and Brazil extended credit, and in 1982 Portugal resumed relations that had ceased in 1977 as a result of the nationalization of Portuguese holdings. Relations with the United States, troubled since 1977 by charges of human rights abuses, reached a nadir in 1981 with the expulsion of all U.S. embassy personnel for alleged espionage. Relations were reestablished in July 1983, and President Machel made a state visit to Washington in September 1985, securing economic aid and exploring the possibility of military assistance. President Chissano was similarly received in March 1990 by President George H. W. Bush, who promised an unspecified amount of U.S. aid for reconstruction and development. Meanwhile, in 1984 Mozambique had been admitted to the IMF and World Bank, signifying a desire on Maputo's part to become a more active participant in the world economy.

Despite its prominence as one of the Front-Line States committed to majority rule in southern Africa, Mozambique maintained economic links to white-dominated South Africa as a matter of “realistic policy,” with some 40,000 Mozambicans employed in South African mines and considerable revenue derived from cooperation in transport and hydroelectric power. However, relations were severely strained by South African support for the Renamo insurgents in the 1980s. In a 1984 nonaggression pact, the “Nkomati Accord,” South Africa agreed to stop aiding Renamo in return for Mozambique’s pledge not to support the African National Congress (ANC) in its guerrilla campaign against the South African minority government. The accord proved ineffective, however, as growing rebel activity fostered Mozambican suspicion of continued destabilization attempts by its white-ruled neighbor. In August 1987 the two countries agreed that the pact should be reactivated, prompting an unprecedented meeting between President Chissano and South African President Botha in September 1988, at which Botha again promised not to support the insurgents. In 1990 President Chissano announced that he was convinced that the new government in Pretoria had indeed halted its support of Renamo and that the two countries could now concentrate on economic cooperation.

The civil war also dominated Maputo’s relations elsewhere in the region. The Zimbabwean government, declaring “If Mozambique falls, we fall,” sent an estimated 10,000 troops to combat the Renamo rebels, particularly in the transport corridor to Beira, which played a central role in the Front-Line States’ effort to reduce dependence on South African trade routes. In December 1986 Tanzanian President Mwinyi also agreed to make troops available to Mozambique, as did Malawi following a dispute over alleged Renamo bases within its borders (see Malawi article). In 1992 Zimbabwean president Robert Mugabe, along with Italian officials, played a major role in brokering the peace accord that was signed in Rome in October.

By early 1993 approximately 1.7 million Mozambicans had taken refuge in neighboring countries, Malawi housing 1.1 million. On June 12 Mozambique and the UN High Commission for Refugees (UNHCR) formally inaugurated a repatriation operation (beginning with exiles in Zimbabwe), which observers described as the largest ever in Africa, and by August 19 Mozambique had signed repatriation agreements with Malawi, Swaziland, and Zambia. The repatriation program was formally terminated on November 21, 1995, at which time the UNHCR announced that more than 1 million refugees had returned home.

The most surprising foreign policy development of 1995 was Mozambique’s admission to the Commonwealth as the group’s 53rd member. Its entry on a “unique and special case” basis had been urged by its anglophone neighbors as a means of enhancing regional trade, most importantly in cashew nuts, which critics insisted was effectively controlled by Indian and Pakistani interests.

In 1996 Mozambique negotiated security agreements with Malawi, Swaziland, and Zimbabwe in an effort to squelch the border violence attributed to Chimwenje, a shadowy grouping of Zimbabwean dissidents who were allegedly led and trained by former Renamo militiamen from bases along their shared borders (for more information on Chimwenje see article on Zimbabwe). Meanwhile, following approximately a year of negotiations, Mozambique signed an agreement with South Africa in May that provided South African farmers with access to Mozambican agricultural land. The deal was opposed by both Renamo leaders and Frelimo activists, who charged that “exporting white farmers to Mozambique” was favored by South Africa’s ANC as a means of freeing up land for black settlement. At the same time, South Africa and Mozambique inaugurated the Maputo Corridor Development Project with the aim of redeveloping the trade route between Johannesburg and Maputo and refurbishing the latter’s harbor. In 2002 the government initiated a program to resettle white farmers from Zimbabwe whose land had been expropriated.

Relations between Mozambique and the United States have improved in recent years. In 2002, Chissano, along with the leaders of Botswana and Angola, met with U.S. President George W. Bush in Washington, D.C., in a summit on development of the region. Mozambique is part of the U.S.

Africa Growth and Opportunity Act (AGOA) that offers preferential trade opportunities to African states. Relations with European states also remained strong, with both France and Russia agreeing in 2002 to cancel portions of Mozambique's debt. Meanwhile the EU increased direct annual aid to Mozambique to $131 million per year through 2007.

In 2002 and 2003 Mozambique conducted a series of cooperative military exercises with Portugal. (The two countries also have an agreement whereby soldiers from Mozambique are trained in Portugal.) Although the relationship between the two countries subsequently remained essentially strong, friction developed in 2005 over the proposed takeover by Mozambique of a hydroelectric plant on the Zambesi River for which the Portuguese government held 85 percent financial responsibility. New President Guebuza refused to accept the amount of back debt that Portugal demanded be paid by Mozambique prior to the transfer of ownership, and, although a tentative agreement was announced in late 2005, its implementation remained unfinalized as of mid-2006. Meanwhile, the Guebuza administration reached out to a broad range of other potential donors for assistance, achieving success most notably with China, Germany, and India.

Current Issues

International observers concluded that the December 1999 elections were generally free and fair, but the Renamo/UE alleged fraud on the part of the government. The significant support for the Renamo/UE in legislative balloting and Dhlakama's surprisingly strong challenge to President Chissano was attributed in large part to the ongoing political cleavage between southern Mozambique (Frelimo's stronghold) and the rest of the country. Among other things, voters in the northern and central areas were reportedly upset that the recent influx of foreign capital was concentrated in Maputo, while poverty remained widespread in rural areas. In addition, Renamo's charges of corruption in government circles appeared to have resonated with some segments of the population. Nevertheless, for his part, Chissano described the election results as a vindication of Frelimo policies and called the balloting a "fundamental step" in the consolidation of democracy, which would earn the country further foreign assistance.

Tension between the government and the opposition rose significantly in November 2000, when more than 40 people were killed during country-wide protest demonstrations called by Renamo. Dhlakama had earlier announced that "all doors of dialogue were shut" following Chissano's unilateral appointment of governors in the provinces "won" by Renamo. Interestingly, the violent events were followed by a significant thaw in Frelimo/Renamo relations as Chissano and Dhlakama agreed to form "working committees" to discuss "their disagreements." Although it was announced that the government would take Renamo's "input into consideration" in appointing governors in the disputed provinces, the exact form of this accommodation remained unclear. Dhlakama also shied away from formally recognizing the president, acknowledging only that Chissano "was de facto governing the country." Analysts noted that the perceived toning down of Dhlakama's previously fiery rhetoric could be attributed in part to problems he was facing within his own party (see Renamo under Political Parties, below).

During the 2004 presidential campaign, divisions within Frelimo emerged between the supporters of Armando Guebuza (the Frelimo candidate) and Chissano. The new cabinet appointed following Guebuza's victory contained many new members and appeared to represent an attempt by the new president to break with Frelimo's "old guard." In addition to purging many "Chissanoistas" from their former posts throughout government ranks, Guebuza also launched a broad anticorruption initiative that often focused on members of the former administration. (Guebuza described the "remoralization" of government as his top priority.) Tensions between Frelimo and Renamo also remained high, although Dhlakama (who continued to refuse to accept the validity of the 2004 election results) agreed to take his seat on the new Council of State in December 2005 on the grounds that too many critical governmental decisions were being made without appropriate opposition influence. Under-scoring the ongoing friction, a bipartisan assembly commission, established in 2005 to propose electoral law reforms, disbanded in April 2006 without reaching agreement.

Political Parties

For its first 15 years of independence Mozambique was a one-party state in which the Mozambique Liberation Front (Frelimo) was constitutionally empowered to guide the operations of government at all levels. However, after extensive national debate, the government concluded in 1990 that a “significant minority” of the population desired a multiparty system. Consequently, constitutional revision in October guaranteed freedom of association, with subsequent legislation establishing the criteria for party legalization. Following President Chissano’s February 6, 1991, announcement that legislation sanctioning political party formations (approved in January) was now in effect, a number of groups announced their intention to hold inaugural congresses, and by January 1994, 13 political parties had been legally recognized. Some 25 parties contested the 2004 legislative elections.

Government Party

Mozambique Liberation Front (Frente de Libertação de Moçambique—Frelimo). Founded in 1962 by the union of three nationalist parties and led by Dr. Eduardo Mondlane until his death in 1969, Frelimo engaged in armed resistance to Portuguese rule from 1964 to 1974, when agreement on independence was reached. At its third national congress in 1977, the front was designated a Marxist-Leninist party (directed by a Central Committee, a Political Bureau, and a Secretariat), but at the fourth party congress in 1983 economic philosophy began to shift toward the encouragement of free-market activity. Following the death of Samora Machel in October 1986, the Central Committee designated his longtime associate, Joaquim Alberto Chissano, as its political leader.

Frelimo retreated even further from Marxist doctrine at the group’s fifth congress in 1989.

Terming itself the vanguard of “the Mozambican people” rather than a “worker-peasant alliance,” the party opened its membership to many formerly excluded groups, such as private property owners, the business community, Christians, Muslims, and traditionalists. The congress also called for a negotiated settlement with Renamo, bureaucratic reform, and emphasis on family farming rather than state agriculture.

Although President Chissano easily defeated Renamo’s Afonso Dhlakama at the 1994 election, Frelimo as a party performed much more poorly, barely securing a majority of legislative seats. On a regional basis the results were quite mixed, the party substantially outpolling Renamo in the south, while being decisively defeated in the center and trailing marginally in the north.

In what was described as a break with “old guard” leadership, five of the Frelimo Central Committee’s six members were replaced on July 24, 1995, and Manuel Tome was appointed as the party’s new secretary general. In spite of these changes, corruption charges continued to dog the party. Observers attributed Frelimo’s subsequent endorsement of a proposal to limit the geographic scope of municipal elections to weak support beyond its southern base. Challenged only by small opposition groups and independent candidates, Frelimo dominated balloting for local posts in June 1998. It secured 48.5 percent of the vote and 133 seats in the December 1999 legislative balloting.

During a party congress in June 2002, Chissano was reelected as Frelimo chair. However, former parliamentary leader Armando Guebuza was elected as the new secretary general and the party’s 2004 presidential candidate despite the fact that Chissano had supported Herder MUTEIA for the post. Guebuza was elected president in the 2004 balloting, and Frelimo increased its seats in the assembly to 160. Significant friction was subsequently reported between President Guebuza and former members of the Chissano administration (see Current issues, above).

Leaders: Armando GUEBUZA (President of the Republic and Secretary General), Luisa Dias DIOGO (Prime Minister), Joaquim Alberto CHISSANO (Former President of the Republic and Chair of the Party), Manuel TOME (Parliamentary Leader).

Opposition Group

Mozambique National Resistance/Electoral Union (Resistência Nacional Moçambicana/ União Electoral—Renamo/UE). Formed in mid-1999, the Renamo/UE electoral alliance secured 38.8 percent of the vote and 117 seats in the December legislative balloting, a surprisingly good result in the opinion of most analysts after what was generally viewed as a “threadbare” campaign and the grouping’s ongoing lack of “coherent strategies.” (Distribution according to component parties, which included those indented below as well as Unamo, was unavailable, although the influence of the non-Renamo parties was considered minimal, and most seats certainly went to Renamo members.) Collaterally, Renamo/UE presidential candidate Afonso Dhlakama won 47.7 percent of the votes in the presidential balloting in 1999.

Renamo contested municipal elections independently in 2003, but Renamo/UE ran in the presidential and legislative elections in 2004. The alliance was hurt by the defection of Renamo members to form the Party for Peace, Development, and Democracy (see below) and the loss of Unamo (see below).

Leaders: Afonso DHLAKAMA (Chair), Manecas DANIEL (Vice Chair), Maximo DIAS (Chair of the Renamo/UE General Assembly), João ALEXANDRE (Secretary General).

Mozambique National Resistance—MNR (Resistência Nacional Moçambicana—Renamo). Also known as the Movimento Nacional da Resistência de Moçambique (MNRM) and as the André Group, after its late founder, André Matade MATSANGAI, Renamo was formed in the early 1970s primarily as an intelligence network within Mozambique for the white Rhodesian government of Ian Smith. Following Rhodesia’s transition to majority rule as “Zimbabwe” in 1980, Renamo developed into a widespread anti-Frelimo insurgency, relying on financial support from Portuguese expatriates and, until the early 1990s, substantial military aid from South Africa. The 20,000-member Renamo army, comprising Portuguese and other mercenaries, Frelimo defectors, and numerous recruits from the Shona-speaking Ndaue ethnic group, operated mainly in rural areas, where it interdicted transport corridors and sabotaged food production. Widely condemned for terrorist tactics, including indiscriminate killing and mutilation of civilians, Renamo, although largely stalemating the government militarily, generally failed to gain external recognition. In an apparent attempt to foster its nationalist image, Renamo launched an “Africanization” program in 1987 that included replacements for white Portuguese at its Lisbon-based headquarters. Further image-building took place at the 1989 Renamo congress, which revamped the movement’s internal bodies. The congress also declared that Renamo was no longer intent on overthrowing the government but was seeking instead a peace settlement under which it could participate as a recognized “political force” in free elections resulting from constitutional revision. However, the Renamo leadership appeared disconcerted when, in 1990, the government agreed to hold such elections. Thereafter, despite a December 1, 1990, cease-fire, Renamo’s military activities continued, thus supporting a widely held view that apart from its advocacy of a multiparty system the group lacked a political agenda.

When rebel strikes coincided with the re-opening of peace talks in March and May 1991, there was speculation that party president Gen. Afonso Dhlakama had lost control over some of his forces. Thereafter, in negotiations with the government in Rome, Renamo, weakened by dwindling finances and pressed by South Africa, the UK, and the United States to negotiate seriously, signed the first of a series of concessionary protocols. By mid-1992 it was apparent that the lengthy rebellion was drawing to a close.

While Dhlakama failed in his bid to win the presidency from Chissano in December 1994, the results of the legislative poll left Renamo only marginally second to Frelimo. In May 1995 President Chissano stated that, while Dhlakama could not be styled leader of the opposition (because he was not an elected member of the People's Assembly), he would be accorded "dignified status."

Although Renamo's legislative initiatives were blocked in the Frelimo-controlled assembly in 1995–1996, observers credited Dhlakama with continuing to enhance both the group's and his own political viability. In November 1996 Renamo legislators reportedly gave unanimous support to a constitutional amendment altering local election laws. In early 1997, however, the party reversed itself, threatening to boycott upcoming balloting unless the 1996 bill was repealed. Amid escalating tensions, the party organized nationwide antigovernment demonstrations in May 1997.

Although Renamo officials publicly insisted that they had no interest in returning to an armed struggle, arson attacks and disruption of the water supply were reported in July 1997. Subsequently, Dhlakama denounced the government's use of force to suppress the unrest, reportedly warning that Renamo would not rule out using force to defend itself against government "aggression."

Citing the need for the party to be "more flexible," Dhlakama forced the ouster of Secretary General Jose de CASTRO and Assistant Secretary General Albino FAIFE in January 1998. João Alexandre was subsequently named to Castro's former post. A split was reported in 2000 between those Renamo members, including a number of legislators, who appeared to be interested in negotiating a settlement with Frelimo and those, led by Dhlakama, who at midyear were still refusing to accept the results of the December 1999 legislative and presidential elections. In September 2000 the party's former legislative leader, Raul DOMINGOS, was expelled for "having collaborated with Frelimo" and for "corruption" during secret talks he allegedly held with the government. (Some analysts noted that Domingos had previously been seen as a possible successor to Dhlakama.)

Allegedly facing increasing dissent within the party, Dhlakama nevertheless was reelected as Renamo's president in November 2001.

At a subsequent party congress, a ten-member political committee was created as a means to decentralize party leadership and broaden the party's appeal. In the 2004 presidential elections, Dhlakama again ran as the party's candidate, receiving 31.74 percent of the vote. The Renamo-led electoral alliance won 29.73 percent of the vote in the concurrent legislative elections, its representation declining from 117 to 90 seats in the assembly. Renamo deputies initially boycotted the assembly to protest perceived irregularities in the polling, but, after the Constitutional Council upheld the results, the deputies were seated in January 2005.

A number of regional and local Renamo leaders reportedly defected to Frelimo in 2006, apparently in the hope of improving their chances in the upcoming provincial and municipal elections.

Leaders: Gen. Afonso Macacho Marceta DHLAKAMA (President), Ossufo QUITINE (Legislative Leader), Jafar Gulamo JAFAR (Spokesman), João ALEXANDRE (former Secretary General), Ossufo MOMAD (Secretary General).

Mozambican Social Democratic Party (Partido Moçambicano da Social Democracia—PMSD). The PMSD was launched as political heir to the Mozambican Nationalist Movement (Movimento Nacionalista Moçambicana—Monamo) at the conclusion of Monamo's first congress in May 1992. Monamo had been founded in 1979 by exiled former Frelimo members led by Máximo Dias, who in 1973–1974 had attempted to persuade the Lisbon government to negotiate with the insurgents. In the late 1980s Monamo merged with the West German-based Mozambique National Independent Committee (Comité Nacional Independente de Moçambique—Conimo) to form the Mozambican Political Union (União Política Moçambicana—Upomo). In 1989 the group called for an immediate cease-fire under UN auspices, the departure of foreign troops, and the holding of national elections. Upomo operated until adoption of the 1990 constitution, after which Dias returned to Mozambique and Monamo reportedly decided to seek legal party status on its own. (Despite the formal change of name in 1992, the Monamo acronym continues in use.)

The Monamo/PMSP participated in the 1994 balloting in a Patriotic Alliance (Aliança Patriótica—AP) with the FAP (immediately below) that won 1.95 percent of the vote.

In 2006 Dias reportedly threatened to leave the Renamo/UE coalition because of the dominance of Renamo. (He contended that Renamo consistently appointed its own members to any vacant party or government posts.)

Leader: Dr. Máximo Diogo José DIAS (Secretary General).

Patriotic Action Front (Frente de Acção Patriótica—FAP). Founded in 1991, the FAP was a proponent in 1992 of delaying multiparty elections and naming a two-year transitional government.

Leaders: José Carlos PALAÇO (President), Raulda CONCEIÇÃO (Secretary General).

National Convention Party (Partido de Convenção Nacional—PCN). In October 1992 the Indian Ocean Newsletter described the PCN as a possible “third force” between Frelimo and Renamo. Amid nationwide debate in late 1992–early 1993 on the implementation of the October peace treaty provisions, the party urged the government to adhere to the timetable that called for elections in late 1993. The PCN, led by Lutero Simango, son of former national vice president Uriah Simango, was also linked to controversial former chief of staff Col. Gen. Sebastião MABOTE, who became a vocal critic of the regime after his ouster from the government in 1991 for alleged participation in a coup plot.

Leaders: Lutero SIMANGO (Chair), Inácio CHIRE, Luís GUIMARÃES, Abel Gabriel MABUNDA (Secretary General).

Mozambique People’s Progress Party (Partido de Progresso do Povo Moçambicano—PPPM). The PPPM held its inaugural congress in July 1992 and was legalized in December. In 1993 supporters of its (then) vice president, Miguel Mabote, withdrew to form the PT (below). The PPPM won 1.06 percent of the vote in the 1994 legislative poll.

Leader: Dr. Padimbe KAMATI (President), Che ABDALA (Secretary General).

Democratic Renewal Party (Partido Renovador Democrático—PRD). Denied legal status in September 1993, the (then) Mozambique Federal Party (Partido Federal de Moçambique—Pafemo) subsequently abandoned its original name and amended its constitution, deleting statutes that had been described as critical of the federal government. Consequently, in January 1994 the PRD became the 13th legally registered party. It secured 1.01 percent of the vote in the 1994 legislative poll.

Leaders: Maneca DANIEL (President), Mariano Janeiro BORDINA.

United Democratic Front (Frente Democrática Unida—FDU). The FDU was formed in late 1994 by Mariano Janeiro Turbina, former head of the defunct Pafemo (see PRD, above) and theretofore commander of an anti-Frelimo guerrilla force in central Mozambique.

Leader: Mariano Janeiro TURBINA.

United Front of Mozambique–Democratic Convergence Party (Frente Unida de Moçambique–Partido de Convergência Democrática—Fumo-PCD).

Linked to Germany’s Christian Democrats, Fumo-PCD held its inaugural congress in Maputo in January 1993. The party secured 1.39 percent of the legislative votes in 1994. It joined the Renamo/UE in 1999 despite the objection of Fumo-PCD founder Domingos Arouca, who resigned from the party’s presidency in protest. A June 2000 Fumo-PCD congress offered Arouca the position of “honorary president,” but he angrily refused the post.

Leaders: Jose Samo GUDO (President), Dr. Domingos António Mascarenhas AROUCA (Former President), Pedro LOFORTE (Secretary General).

The other minor parties participating in the Renamo/UE were the Mozambique Independents Alliance, led by Ernesto SERGIO and Khalid Hussein MAHOMED; the National Unity Party, led by Hipóloto de JESUS; and the Ecological Party of Mozambique (Partido Ecologista de Moçambique—Pemo).

Other Groups Contesting the 2004 Legislative Elections

Party for Peace, Democracy, and Development (Partido para a Paz, Democracia, e Desenvolvimento—PPDD). Formed in 2003 by disaffected members of Renamo, including Raul Domingos, the PPDD is a liberal party that promotes nonpartisanship in public administration. At the first party congress on October 4, 2003, Domingos was nominated to run for the presidency in 2004. He placed third in the balloting with 2.73 percent of the vote. The PPDD also came in third in the concurrent legislative elections with 2 percent of the vote. Most analysts believe that the PPDD pulled votes away from Renamo.

Leader: Raul DOMINGOS.

Movement for Change and Good Governance (Movimento para a Mudança e Boa Governação—MGB). The MGB was an electoral alliance formed prior to the 2004 elections to rally behind a single candidate for the presidency and to pool resources for the legislative elections. The MGB consisted of Unamo and the small Party of All Mozambican Nationalists (Partido de Todos os Nativos Moçambicanos—Partonamo). In the legislative elections, the MGB received .36 percent of the vote.

Leader: Carlos Alexandre REIS (Chair and 2004 presidential candidate).

Mozambican National Union (União Nacional Moçambicana—Unamo). Reportedly then in control of three battalions of rebel fighters in Zambezia province, Unamo was formed in 1987 by a Renamo breakaway faction. Subsequently, some of its leaders appeared to be operating from Malawi while others established an office in Lisbon. However, by late 1990, Unamo forces, stationed along the Malawian border, were reported to be “on good terms” with the government. Meanwhile, political leaders had returned from exile in anticipation of Unamo being recognized as a legal party, spokesmen indicating it would participate in upcoming legislative contests but would endorse President Chissano in his reelection bid.

In March 1991 the party formally characterized itself as a social-democratic “peaceful organization” with 20,000 members and offices in nine provinces. One year later it was the first opposition party granted legal status. However, in August 1992 party president Carlos Alexandre Reis was imprisoned for financial crimes for which he had been convicted and sentenced in absentia seven years earlier.

In April 1994 Unamo was alleged to be financing Rombezia, an armed group in northern Mozambique led by Manuel ROCHA and Octavio CUSTODIO, which was descended from the African National Union of Rombezia (União Nacional Africana da Rombezia—UNAR). The UNAR was believed to have been formed by the Portuguese secret police in the 1960s to promote an independent state in the Rovuma and Zambezia provinces (which gave the grouping its name).

Unamo secured only .73 percent of the vote in the 1994 legislative balloting and subsequently announced it was forming the extraparliamentary United Salvation Front (Frente Unida de Salvação—FUS) with the PSLD, PPPM, PT, PRD, Pacode, and Pimo. However, in 1999 Unamo chose, as did the PPPM and the PRD, to participate in the Renamo/UE, while the other FUS members either ran alone or in different coalitions. In 2004, however, Unamo joined the MGB, while Reis ran as the Unamo candidate for the presidency. He received .9 percent of the vote.

Leaders: Carlos Alexandre REIS (President), Florencia João Da SILVA (Secretary General).

Democratic Union (União Democrática—UD). The UD was formed in 1994 as a coalition of Panade, Palmo, and the National Party of Mozambique (Partido Nacional de Moçambique—Panamo), led by Marcos JUMA and Chabane ASSANE. It secured 5.15 percent of the vote in the December legislative poll, thereby gaining nine seats and becoming only the third party, behind Frelimo and Renamo, to gain representation. (Earlier editions of the Handbook incorrectly assigned those seats to the Democratic Union of Mozambique [União Democrática de Moçambique—Udemo], a former separatist group in northern Mozambique.) However, Palmo left the UD in mid-1999, and the rump coalition of Panade and Panamo managed only 1.48 percent of the vote (and consequently no seats) in the December balloting. The UD only received .34 percent of the vote in the 2004 legislative elections. Juma reportedly led Panamo to join the Constructive Opposition Bloc in 2006.

Leaders: José Chicuarra MASSINGA, Marcos JUMA.

National Democratic Party (Partido Nacional Democrático—Panade). Panade was launched in late 1992 by José Massinga, a former foreign ministry official who was discharged in 1979 for alleged links to the U.S. intelligence network. The party's platform, based on "Christian values and human dignity," reportedly mirrored the teachings of activist Catholic bishops in central Mozambique. The group was legalized in 1993.

Leader: José Chicuarra MASSINGA.

Liberal Democratic Party of Mozambique (Partido Liberal Democrático de Moçambique—Palmo). Reportedly seeking legal recognition in late 1990, Palmo criticized the nonindigenous population for "controlling" the economy to the detriment of "original" (black) Mozambicans. At the party's first congress on May 6–11, 1991, Martins Bilal won a hotly contested presidential contest over Dr. António Palange. Consequently, another prominent leader, Casimiro Miguel Nhamithambo, resigned from the party, criticizing it for "lacking democracy" and launching a breakaway group (PSLD, below).

In July 1998 a dispute between Bilal and Palange split Palmo, with Bilal claiming that the party's National Committee had suspended Palange, whose recent assumption of the UD leadership mantle had given him increased national prominence. For his part, Palange asserted that the committee had lacked a quorum and that it was Bilal who had in fact been dismissed from the party for financial malpractice. In November Palange was formally expelled from Palmo. He subsequently launched his own formation (CDU, below).

Palmo had filled 5 of the 9 legislative seats won by the UD in 1994. However, it split from the UD in August 1999, securing 2.47 percent of the vote and no seats in the December poll. In balloting in 2004, Palmo received 0.30 percent of the vote.

Leader: Martins Luis BILAL (Chair), Antonio MUEDO (Secretary General).

Labor Party (Partido Trabalhista—PT). The PT was formed in 1993 by a breakaway faction of the PPPM. In early 1997 the party's vice president and secretary general were expelled for allegedly embezzling PT funds. The PT contested several municipal races but failed to win any seats in 2003. The PT won .56 percent of the legislative vote in 1994, 2.69 percent in 1999, and .47 percent in 2004. In 2006 the PT was reported to have joined the Constructive Opposition Bloc led by Pimo.

Leaders: Miguel MABOTE (President), Luis MUCHANGA (Secretary General).

Social, Liberal, and Democratic Party (Partido Social, Liberal e Democrático—PSLD). The PSLD was formed by former Palmo leader Casimiro Nhamithambo, who complained of the parent group "lacking democracy." The PSLD, also referenced by the initials SOL, was a founding member in early 1999 of the Mozambican Opposition Union (União Moçambicana da Oposição—UMO), which its supporters hoped would serve as an electoral front for as many as a dozen parties. Nhamithambo initially served as the UMO secretary general, but he resigned from that post later in the year as the result of friction with Wehia RIPUA, the leader of another UMO component—the Mozambique Democratic Party (Partido Democrático de Moçambique—Pademo). Although Nhamithambo announced at that time that the PSLD would remain in the UMO despite the dispute, the PSLD ultimately contested the December 2000 legislative poll on its own, winning 2.02 percent of the vote. (Only three groups finally ran under the UMO banner: Pademo, the Democratic Congress Party [Partido do Congresso Democrático—Pacode], and the Democratic Party for the Reconciliation of Mozambique. Meanwhile, the UMO supported Renamo’s Afonso Dhlakama in the presidential race after Ripua’s candidacy was disallowed due to faulty nomination papers.) In 2004, the PSLD won .46 percent of the legislative vote.

Leader: Casimiro Miguel NHAMITHAMBO.

Independent Party of Mozambique (Partido Independente de Moçambique—Pimo). Described as a “thinly disguised Islamic party,” Pimo won 1.23 percent of the legislative vote in 1994 and .71 percent in 1999. Pimo leader Yaqub Sibinde attempted to run for president in 1999, but his nomination was declared invalid by the Supreme Court. In 2003, Pimo won 3 posts in municipal elections in predominately Islamic areas. In 2004 Sibinde ran for the presidency and received .91 percent of the vote. In the concurrent legislative elections, Pimo received .59 percent of the vote. In 2006 Sibinde was reported to have formed an opposition alliance of 18 minor parties called the Constructive Opposition Bloc. Besides Pimo, other members of the Bloc included the PT and Panamo.

Leader: Yaqub Neves Salomão SIBINDE.

Democratic Liberal Party of Mozambique (Partido Democrático Liberal de Moçambique—Padelimo). Formed in 1998, Padelimo won .80 percent of the vote in the 1999 legislative balloting and .12 percent in 2004.

Leader: Joaquim José NYOTA.

Social Broadening Party of Mozambique (Partido de Ampliação Social de Moçambique—Pasomo). Pasomo won .05 percent of the legislative vote in 1999 and .52 percent in 2004.

Leader: Helder Francisco CAMPIRA.

Green Party of Mozambique (PVM). Formed in 1997, the PVM (also known as Os Verdes [The Greens]) split into two factions prior to the 1999 elections, one supportive of membership in Renamo/UE and the other committed to an independent campaign. In 2004, the independent faction gained .33 percent in legislative elections.

Leader: Armando Bruno João SAPEMBE.

Other parties or groups that contested the 2004 legislative elections included the Broad Opposition Front (Frente Alargada da Oposição—FAO), a coalition of conservative parties that included the small Liberal Front (Frente Liberal—LF) and received .25 percent of the vote; the Party of Freedom and Solidarity, which received .88 percent of the vote; the National Reconciliation Party, which received .6 percent of the vote; the Ecological Party-Land Movement, which received .4 percent of the vote; and the Congress of United Democrats (Congresso dos Democratas Unidos—CDU), formed in January 2002 by António PALANGE following his expulsion from Palmo. A number of other minor parties also received less than 1 percent of the vote.

Other Parties and Groups

Mozambique Democratic Internationalist Party (Partido Internacionalista Democrático de Moçambique—Pidemo). Pidemo was launched in early 1994 by João Kamacho on a platform advocating a federalist system of government.

Leader: João KAMACHO.

Mozambique Communist Party (Partido Comunista de Moçambique—Pacomo). The formation of Pacomo was announced on April 12, 1995.

Leader: Almeida TESOURA.

Other minor parties include the Democratic Alliance of Mozambique (Aliança Democrática de Moçambique—ADM), led by José Pereira BRANQUINHO; the Democratic Confederation

Cabinet

As of June 1, 2006

Prime Minister      Luisa Dias Diogo [f]

Ministers

Agriculture and Rural Development	Tomas Mandlate
Development and Planning	Aiuba Cuereneia
Education	Aires Bonifacio Aly
Energy	Salvador Namburete
Environmental Action Coordination	Luciano Andre de Castro
Finance and Planning	Manuel Chang
Fisheries	Cadmiel Muthemba
Foreign Affairs and Cooperation	Alcinda Abreu [f]
Health	Paulo Ivo Garrido
Industry and Commerce	Antonio Fernando
Interior	José Pacheco
Justice	Esperanca Alfredo Machavela [f]
Labor	Helena Taipo [f]
Mineral Resources	Esperanca Bias [f]
National Defense	Gen. (Ret.) Tobias Dai
President's Office with Responsibility for Parliamentary Affairs	Isabel Manuel Nkavandeka [f]
President's Office with Responsibility for Diplomatic Affairs	Francisco Caetano J. Madeira
Public Works and Housing	Felicio Zacarias
Science and Technology	Venancio Simao Massingue
State Administration	Lucas Chomera
Tourism	Fernando Sumbana Júnior
Transport and Communications	Antonio Francisco Mungwambe
War Veterans' Affairs	Feliciano Salomao Gundana
Women and Social Action Coordination	Virgília B. N. Santos Matabele [f]
Youth and Sports	David Simango

[f] = female

Note: All of the above are members of the Mozambique Liberation Front of Mozambique (Confederação Democrática de Moçambique—CDM), led by Domingos CARDOSO; the Mozambique Agrarian Party (Partido Agrário de Moçambique—PAM); the Revolutionary Party of the United Socialist People of Mozambique (Partido Revolucionário do Povo Socialista Unido de Moçambique—Prepsumo); the Social Democratic Party (Partido Social Democrático—PSD), led by Cárlos

MACHEL; and the Waterworkers and Farmers of Mozambique (Regedores e Camponeses de Moçambique—Recamo), led by Arone SIJAMO.

Legislature

A People's Assembly (Assembleia Popular), consisting of Frelimo's (then) 57-member Central Committee, was accorded legislative status at an uncontested election in December 1977. The body was increased to 210 members in April 1983 by the addition of government ministers and vice ministers, provincial governors, representatives of the military and of each province, and ten other citizens. While its term was not constitutionally specified, the original mandate was set by law at five years. The lengthy poll eventually conducted in August–December 1986 was for 250 deputies, indirectly elected by provincial assemblies from a list of 299 candidates presented by Frelimo. The name of the body was changed to the Assembly of the Republic in the 1990 constitution, which also provided for future elections to be conducted by direct universal suffrage on a multiparty basis.

Assembly of the Republic (Assembleia da República). The current legislature is a unicameral body of 250 members elected on a proportional basis for five-year terms. Parties must secure 5 percent of the votes on a nationwide basis to gain representation. At the balloting of December 1–2, 2004, the Mozambique Liberation Front won 160 seats and the Mozambique National Resistance/Electoral Union, 90.

President: Eduardo MULEMBWE.

Communications

Press

After having maintained strict control of the media since independence, the government in 1990 permitted substantial press liberalization. In late 1991 a press law was ratified, giving existing publications six months to reregister in accordance with new provisions, including revised ownership rules. In July 2001 the New York–based Committee to Protect Journalists reported that Mozambican journalists were exhibiting a degree of self-censorship in regard to investigations into corruption because of intimidation emanating from the November 2000 murder of a reporter from the independent daily, Metical, which subsequently went out of business. Among other things, journalists complained that the government's investigation of the murder lacked intensity. The following are published in Maputo and Beira, respectively: Notícias (33,000), government controlled, and Diário de Moçambique (16,000). In 1993 Mediacoop, a cooperative publishing venture founded by a group of independent journalists, launched Mediafax, a daily, and in early 1994, Savana, a weekly. Other publications include the progovernment weekly Domingos (25,000) and the pro-Renamo Imparcial.

News Agencies

The official facility is the Mozambique Information Agency (Agência de Informação de Moçambique—AIM); a number of international agencies are represented in Maputo.

Broadcasting and Computing

Government broadcast facilities include Rádio Moçambique and Televisão de Moçambique. There were approximately 122,000 television receivers and 90,000 personal computers serving 60,000 Internet users in 2003.

Intergovernmental Representation

Ambassador to the U.S.

Armando Alexandre PANGUENE

U.S. Ambassador to Mozambique

Helen R. MEAGHER LA LIME

Permanent Representative to the UN

Filipe CHIDUMO

IGO Memberships (Non-UN)

AfDB, AU, BADEA, CPLP, CWTH, IDB, Interpol, IOR-ARC, NAM, OIC, SADC, WCO, WTO

NAMIBIA

REPUBLIC OF NAMIBIA

---

The Country

Bordered on the north by Angola and Zambia, on the east by Botswana, on the southeast and south by South Africa, and on the west by the Atlantic Ocean, Namibia consists of a high plateau bounded by the uninhabited Namib Desert along the Atlantic coast, with more desert land in the interior. The inhabitants are of diversified origins, although the Ovambo constitute by far the largest ethnic group (a majority of 51 percent in the 1981 census, slightly less than 50 percent on the basis of a 1986 estimate). A substantial exodus has reduced the white population, traditionally engaged in commercial farming and ranching, fish processing, and mineral exploitation, from approximately 12 percent to 6.6 percent. Other groups include the Kavango, the Herero, the Damara, the Nama, and those classified as “coloured.” The country is one of the world’s largest producers of diamonds, which yield about half of export earnings, and uranium; copper, lead, zinc, tin, and other minerals are also available in extractable quantities. These resources yielded substantial economic growth during the 1970s; subsequently, falling mineral prices, extended periods of drought, and internal insecurity caused severe recession, marked by 40–50 percent unemployment, 13–16 percent inflation, and severe budgetary problems. In July 1990 international donors committed $200 million to help offset a $270 million fiscal shortfall caused by South Africa’s withdrawal from the economy. GDP growth averaged 5 percent annually in 1990–1993 and 3 percent annually in 1994–1999; inflation measured 8.8 percent in 1997. Current economic policies focus on further exploitation of the country’s rich fisheries, export manufacturing, promotion of private investment, and programs designed to ameliorate the severe maldistribution of wealth and an unemployment rate estimated to be as high as 35 percent.

Steady economic growth continued in the early 2000s, with GDP increasing by an average of 3–4 percent annually. Significantly, inflation fell to 5 percent by 2004 after the Bank of Namibia cut interest rates from 12.75 percent to 5 percent over a four-year period. One of the main growth sectors of the Namibian economy was commercial fishing, which accounted for one-third of total exports in the early 2000s. A 2002 agreement to allow Namibian craft to fish in South African territorial waters further expanded the sector.

In addition to continued mineral exploitation and fishing, international firms have invested $800 million in the development of natural gas fields, scheduled to begin production in 2006. Long-term plans are to use the fields to produce electricity for export to surrounding states, including South Africa. In an effort to ameliorate unemployment and poverty, the government launched a controversial land redistribution program in 2004 (see Current issues, below) in order to increase farm ownership among black Namibians. The program continued to be of regional interest in 2006, with Namibia and four other nations meeting in Pretoria in March for a five-day conference on the subject. Despite the economic challenges of an unemployment rate exceeding 20 percent and widespread poverty, real GDP growth was projected to be 3.5 percent in 2005, according to the International Monetary Fund (IMF), owing mainly to “surging” diamond production. The prevalence of HIV/AIDS in the country (an estimated 20 percent of the population) continued to be a major concern.

Government and Politics

Political Background

South West Africa came under German control in the 1880s, except for a small enclave at Walvis Bay, which had been annexed by the United Kingdom in 1878 and subsequently became a part of South Africa. Having occupied the whole of South West Africa during World War I, South Africa was granted a mandate in 1920 to govern the area under authority of the League of Nations. Declining to place the territory under the UN trusteeship system after World War II, South Africa asked the UN General Assembly in 1946 for permission to annex it; following denial of the request, Pretoria continued its rule on the strength of the original mandate.

Although the international status of the territory and the supervisory authority of the United Nations were repeatedly affirmed in advisory opinions of the International Court of Justice (ICJ), the court in 1966 declined on technical grounds to rule upon a formal complaint by Ethiopia and Liberia against South Africa’s conduct in the territory. The UN General Assembly then terminated the mandate in a resolution of October 27, 1966, declaring that South Africa had failed to fulfill its obligations. A further resolution on May 19, 1967, established an 11-member UN Council for South West Africa, assisted by a UN commissioner, to administer the territory until independence (originally set for June 1968) and to prepare for the drafting of a constitution, the holding of an election, and the establishment of responsible government. The council was, however, refused entry by the South African government, which contended that termination of the mandate was invalid. South Africa subsequently disregarded a number of Security Council resolutions to relinquish the territory, including a unanimous resolution of December 1974 that gave it five months to initiate withdrawal from Namibia (the official name adopted on December 16, 1968, by the General Assembly).

Beginning in the mid-1960s, South Africa attempted to group the black population into a number of self-administering tribal homelands (“Bantustans”), in accordance with the so-called Odendaal Report of 1964. Ovamboland, the first functioning Bantustan, was established in October 1968, but its legitimacy was rejected by the UN Security Council. Fully implemented, the partition plan would have left approximately 88,000 whites as the largest ethnic group in two-thirds of the territory, with some 675,000 black inhabitants confined to the remaining third.

Both the Organization of African Unity (OAU, subsequently the African Union—AU) and the South West Africa People’s Organization (SWAPO) consistently pressed for full and unconditional self-determination for Namibia. In May 1975, however, Prime Minister Vorster of South Africa stated that while his government was prepared to “exchange ideas” with UN and OAU representatives, it was not willing to accede to the demand that it “acknowledge SWAPO as the sole representative of the Namibian people and enter into independence negotiations with the organization.”

On September 1, 1975, the South African government convened a constitutional conference in Turnhalle, Windhoek, on the future of the territory. SWAPO and other independence groups boycotted

Political Status: Former German territory assigned to South Africa under League of Nations mandate in 1920; declared to be a United Nations responsibility by General Assembly resolution adopted October 27, 1966 (resolution not recognized by South Africa); subject to tripartite (Angolan-Cuban-South African) agreement concluded on December 22, 1988, providing for implementation from April 1, 1989, of Security Council Resolution 435 of 1978 (leading to UN-supervised elections on November 1 and independence thereafter); independence declared on March 21, 1990.

Area: 318,259 sq. mi. (824,292 sq. km.).

Population: 1,826,854 (2001C); 2,161,000 (2005E). Both area and population figures include data for Walvis Bay (see Political background and Foreign relations, below).

Major Urban Center (2005E): WINDHOEK (282,000).

Official Language: English.

Monetary Unit: Namibian Dollar (market rate July 1, 2006: 7.13 dollars = $1US). Introduced on September 13, 1993, the Namibian dollar is at par with the South African rand, which is also legal tender in Namibia.

President: Hifikepunye POHAMBANDA (South West Africa People's Organization of Namibia); popularly elected on November 15–16, 2004, and inaugurated on March 21, 2005, to succeed Samuel (Sam) Daniel Shafilshuna NUJOMA (South West Africa People's Organization of Namibia).

Prime Minister: Nahas ANGULA (South West Africa People's Organization of Namibia); appointed by the president following parliamentary elections on November 15–16, 2004, and sworn in on March 21, 2005, to succeed Theo-Ben GURIRAB (South West Africa People's Organization of Namibia).

1976, Chief Clemens KAPUUU, then leader of the Herero-based National United Democratic Organization, presented a draft constitution that called for a bicameral legislature encompassing a northern chamber of representatives from Bantu areas and a southern chamber that would include representatives from the coloured and white groups. On August 18, during the third session of the conference, a plan was advanced for the creation of a multiracial interim government to prepare Namibia for independence by December 31, 1978. Despite continued opposition from SWAPO, the conference's constitution committee unanimously approved a resolution on December 3 that called for establishment of the interim government within the next six months.

Although a draft constitution calling for representation of the territory's 11 major racial and ethnic groups was approved by the Turnhalle delegates on March 9, 1977, and was subsequently endorsed by 95 percent of the white voters in a referendum on May 17, it continued to be opposed by SWAPO as well as by a "contact group" of diplomats representing the five Western members of the UN Security Council (Canada, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, the United Kingdom, and the United States). The Western delegation visited Windhoek on May 7–10 and subsequently engaged in talks with South African Prime Minister Vorster in Cape Town, in the course of which it indicated that the Turnhalle formula was unacceptable because it was "predominantly ethnic, lacked neutrality, and appeared to prejudice the outcome of free elections." The group added, however, that the appointment of an administrator general by the South African government would not be opposed insofar as it gave promise of contributing to "an internationally acceptable solution to the Namibia question." For his part, Vorster, prior to the appointment of Marthinus T. STEYN as administrator general on July 6, agreed to abandon the Turnhalle proposal for an interim government, to accept the appointment of a UN representative to ensure the impartiality of the constituent election in 1978, and to initiate a withdrawal of South African troops to be completed by the time of independence. He insisted, however, the conference and organized demonstrations against it. As a result, the Ovambos, with approximately half of the territory's population, were represented by only 15 of 135 delegates. At the second session of the conference, held March 2–19, that the South African government had no intention of abandoning its jurisdiction over Walvis Bay and certain islands off the South West African coast. (Governed as part of South Africa until 1922, when it was assigned to South West Africa for administrative purposes, Walvis Bay was reincorporated into South Africa's Cape Province in August 1977.)

During November and December 1977 representatives of the "contact group" engaged in inconclusive discussions with leaders of SWAPO and of the black African "Front-Line States" (Angola, Botswana, Mozambique, Tanzania, and Zambia). The main problem concerned South African security forces within Namibia, SWAPO asserting that their continued presence would influence the outcome of the projected election despite a UN presence. Nonetheless, Administrator General Steyn moved energetically to dismantle the territory's apartheid system, including abolition of the pass laws and the Mixed Marriages Act, in preparation for the 1978 balloting.

On March 27, 1978, Chief Kapuuu, who had assumed the presidency of the Democratic Turnhalle Alliance (DTA, see Political Parties, below), was shot and killed by unknown assailants on the outskirts of Windhoek. The assassination removed from the scene the best-known tribal figure apart from SWAPO leader Sam NUJOMA, who denied that his group had been involved. Three days later the Western nations presented Prime Minister Vorster with revised proposals calling for a cease-fire between SWAPO guerrillas and the 18,000 South African troops in the territory. The latter force would be expected to withdraw from the border areas and gradually decrease to 1,500, with UN troops being positioned to maintain order in preparation for Constituent Assembly balloting. South Africa accepted the plan on April 25 after receiving assurances that the status of Walvis Bay would not be addressed until after the election, that the reduction of its military presence would be linked to "a complete cessation of hostilities," and that some of its troops might be permitted to remain after the election if the assembly so requested. On July 12 SWAPO agreed to the Western plan, which had also been endorsed by the Front-Line States. The UN Security Council approved the plan on July 27, but Pretoria reacted bitterly to an accompanying resolution calling for the early "reintegration" of Walvis Bay into South West Africa and subsequently announced that its own final approval would be deferred. In early September South African Foreign Minister Botha denounced the size of the proposed UN military force for the territory, and two weeks later he indicated that his government had reversed itself and would proceed with an election of its own before the end of the year. Undaunted, the Security Council on September 29 approved Resolution 435, which called for the formation of a 7,500-member UN Transitional Assistance Group (UNTAG) to oversee free and fair elections, while declaring "null and void" any unilateral action by "the illegal administration in Namibia in relation to the electoral process." Administrator General Steyn nonetheless proceeded to schedule balloting for a Constituent Assembly, which on December 4-8, without SWAPO participation, gave the DTA 41 of 50 seats.

In May 1979 the South African government agreed to the Constituent Assembly's request that the body be reconstituted as a National Assembly, although without authority to alter the status of the territory. Collaterally, conflict between SWAPO guerrilla forces and South African troops intensified, the latter carrying out a number of preemptive raids on SWAPO bases in Angola and Zambia. By midyear negotiations between UN and South African representatives had not resumed, Pretoria having rejected a contact group proposal to establish bases for SWAPO forces in Namibia as a counter to South African installations. In an effort to break the deadlock, Angolan President Agostinho Neto, a few weeks before his death in September, proposed the creation of a 60-mile-wide demilitarized zone along the Angolan-Namibian border to prevent incursions from either side. He also pledged that Angola would welcome a UN civilian presence to ensure that any guerrillas not wishing to return to Namibia to participate in an all-party election would be confined to their bases.

Although Pretoria agreed to "the concept" of a demilitarized zone, discussions during 1980 failed to yield agreement, and on November 24 UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim called for a meeting in Geneva in January 1981 to discuss all "practical proposals" that might break the lengthy impasse. Earlier, DTA spokesmen had urged repeal of the General Assembly's 1973 recognition of SWAPO, arguing that the root of the problem lay in the fact that "the UN is required to play a neutral role in respect of implementation but at the same time is the most ardent protagonist of SWAPO."

During 1981–1982 units of both the South West Africa Territorial Force (SWATF) and the South African Defence Force (SADF) conducted numerous "search and destroy" raids into Angola, Pretoria insisting that the withdrawal of Cuban troops from the latter country was a necessary precondition of its own withdrawal from Namibia and the implementation of a UN-supervised election. Thus, Prime Minister Botha declared at a Transvaal National Party congress in September 1982 that his government would never accede to Namibian independence unless "unequivocal agreement [could] first be reached" on the linkage issue. Subsequently, an Angolan spokesman indicated that a partial withdrawal of Cuban forces was possible if Pretoria would agree to reduce the size of its military presence to 1,500 troops and discontinue incursions into his country. The overture prompted a secret but inconclusive series of talks between Angolan and South African ministerial delegations on the island of Sal in Cape Verde in early December, the South African foreign minister subsequently asserting that responsibility for a Cuban withdrawal was "the task of the Americans."

In November 1983 a Multi-Party Conference (MPC) of seven internal groups, including the DTA, was launched in Windhoek in an effort to overcome the standoff. Although the "Windhoek Declaration of Basic Principles" that was issued on February 24, 1984, did little more than reaffirm the essentials of the earlier UN plan, South African Prime Minister Botha announced in March that his government would be willing to enter into negotiations with all relevant parties to the dispute, including the Angolan government and UNITA, the Angolan rebel movement that enjoyed de facto SADF support. However, the overture was rejected by SWAPO on the ground that only Namibian factions should be involved in independence discussions. Collaterally, Angola offered to participate as an observer at direct negotiations between SWAPO and Pretoria. Two months later Zambian President Kenneth Kaunda and South West African Administrator General Willem VAN NIEKERK jointly chaired a meeting in Lusaka that was attended by representatives of South Africa, SWAPO, and the MPC, while a meeting between van Niekerk and SWAPO president Nujoma was held in Cape Verde on July 25. Although unprecedented, the bilateral discussions also proved abortive, as did subsequent talks involving Washington, Luanda, SWAPO and/or Pretoria; progress on the issue was further inhibited in mid-1985 by evidence of continued U.S. and South African support for UNITA.

After lengthy discussion with the MPC, on June 17, 1985, Pretoria installed a Transitional Government of National Unity (TGNU), with a cabinet, 62-member legislature, and Constitutional Council of representatives from the MPC parties. Having largely excluded Ovambos, the new administration was estimated to command the support of perhaps 16 percent of the population and was further limited by Pretoria's retention of veto power over its decisions; not surprisingly, international support for the action was virtually nonexistent. While the TGNU's "interim" nature was stressed by Pretoria, which mandated a formal constitution within 18 months, stalled negotiations with Angola and continued SWAPO activity provoked South African intimations that the arrangement could lead to a permanent "regional alternative to independence."

In early 1986 Pretoria proposed that independence commence August 1, again contingent upon withdrawal of the Cubans from Angola. The renewed linkage stipulation, termed by the United Nations as "extraneous," prompted both Angola and SWAPO to reject the plan as nothing more than a "public relations exercise." In September a UN General Assembly Special Session on Namibia strongly condemned South Africa for effectively blocking implementation of the UN plan for Namibian independence and called for the imposition of mandatory sanctions against Pretoria; however, U.S. and UK vetoes precluded the passage of resolutions to such effect by the Security Council.

During 1987 South Africa continued to seek Western recognition of the TGNU as a means of resolving the Namibian question. However, even within the TGNU, differences emerged regarding a draft constitution and the related question of new elections to second-tier legislative bodies.

In 1988 the long drawn-out dispute moved toward resolution. A series of U.S.-mediated negotiations among Angolan, Cuban, and South African representatives that commenced in London in May and continued in Cairo, New York, Geneva, and Brazzaville (Republic of the Congo), concluded at UN headquarters on December 22 with the signing of an accord that linked South African acceptance of Resolution 435/78 to the phased withdrawal, over a 30-month period, of Cuban troops from Angola. The agreement provided that the resolution would go into effect on April 1, 1989, with deployment of UNTAG (approximately 7,100 individuals from 22 countries.) As ratified by the Security Council on February 16, the timetable further provided that South African troop strength would be reduced to 1,500 by July 1, followed by the election of a constituent assembly on November 1 and formal independence for the territory by April 1990.

Ten groups were registered to contest the slightly deferred Constituent Assembly election of November 7–11, 1989, with SWAPO winning 41 of 72 seats and the DTA winning 21. On February 16, 1990, the assembly elected Nujoma to the presidency of the new republic. He was sworn in by UN Secretary General Pérez de Cuéllar during independence ceremonies on March 21, with Hage GEINGOB being installed as prime minister of a 20-member cabinet.

In July 1993 Namibia and South Africa agreed to joint administration of Rooikop Airport at Walvis Bay, and on August 18 South African President de Klerk announced that his government had agreed to relinquish its claim to the port. The actual withdrawal on March 1, 1994, was hailed as completing the process of Namibian independence.

On July 18, 1994, Windhoek's already battered economic record was dealt a further blow when the auditor general released a report criticizing the Nujoma government for widespread financial mismanagement and accusing three ministries of criminal fraud. However, on December 6, one day before Namibia's first presidential and legislative elections since independence, South African President Nelson Mandela announced his country's plans to forgive Namibia's $190 million debt. Thereafter, propelled by Mandela's timely largess and SWAPO's enduring image as the party of independence, President Nujoma and SWAPO legislative candidates easily outpaced the opposition at balloting on December 7–8, capturing approximately 76 percent of the presidential vote and 53 assembly seats. Nujoma's sole competitor, Mishake MUYONGO of the renamed DTA of Namibia (who received 23 percent of the vote), cited SWAPO's dominance in the north and declared that the elections left Namibia divided along ethnic lines. Although SWAPO captured the two-thirds assembly majority necessary to amend the constitution, Nujoma had announced earlier that any proposed changes would be submitted to popular referendum. SWAPO reportedly gained control of 27 of 45 local councils at the February 1998 balloting, followed by the DTA of Namibia with nine.

On October 16, 1998, the SWAPO-dominated National Assembly approved a constitutional amendment that granted President Nujoma the opportunity to compete for a third presidential term and increased the powers of the office. On October 30 the assembly voted against a DTA of Namibia proposal to hold a popular referendum on the bill, despite its earlier pledges to the contrary, and on November 19 the National Council also passed the third-term amendment, leaving final approval to Nujoma, who signed the bill into law in 1999. Despite continued opposition objections to the constitutional revamping, Nujoma was easily reelected for a third term in balloting on November 30–December 1, 1999, securing 76.8 percent of the vote, while SWAPO maintained its assembly dominance in concurrent legislative balloting. On August 27, 2002, Nujoma appointed cabinet minister Theo-Ben GURIRAB as the new prime minister.

In late March 1999 Nujoma slightly reshuffled his government, appointing several prolabor deputy ministers in what observers described as an apparent attempt to counter the formation of a new party, the Congress of Democrats (CoD), by Ben ULENGA, a former independence fighter and trade unionist who had recently left SWAPO as the result of his opposition to the third term for Nujoma. The CoD, which called for an anticorruption drive among public officials and for the withdrawal of Namibian troops from the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC), was expected by some observers to offer SWAPO its first genuine electoral challenge, perhaps enough to cost the ruling party its comfortable legislative majority. However, SWAPO easily maintained more than enough seats to permit constitutional revision at will.

Although President Nujoma volunteered in April 2001 to seek a fourth term if he believed that popular will favored such a decision, late in the year he announced that he had ruled out another term. Meanwhile, tension was reported between Nujoma and Prime Minister Geingob, resulting in the appointment of Theo-Ben Gurirab to the premiership in August 2002. (Geingob declined Nujoma's offer of another cabinet post.)

In May 2004 a SWAPO party convention nominated Hifikepunye POHAMBANDA (the minister of lands, resettlement, and rehabilitation) as the party's presidential candidate in the November elections. Pohamba was challenged by six other candidates: Ben ULENGA (CoD), Katuutire KAURA (DTA of Namibia); Kuaima RIRUAKO (National Unity Democratic Organization—NUDO); Justus GAROËB (United Democratic Front—UDF); Henk MUDGE (Republican Party—RP); and Jacobus PRETORIUS (Monitor Action Group—MAG). Pohamba received 76.3 percent of the vote in the November 15–16, 2004, elections, with his closest rivals being Ulenka with 7.34 percent and Kaura with 5.2 percent (all of the other candidates received less than 5 percent). In the concurrent legislative elections, SWAPO maintained its dominance in the legislature, winning 55 of the 72 seats (the CoD won 5; the DTA, 4; NUDO, 3; UDF, 3; the RP, 1; and the MAG, 1). Following the elections, a new cabinet composed of SWAPO members was chosen, with Nahas ANGULA, the former minister of higher education, training, and employment creation, as prime minister.

Constitution and Government

On February 9, 1990, the Constituent Assembly approved a liberal democratic constitution that became effective at independence on March 21. The document provides for a multiparty republic with an executive president, selected initially by majority vote of the legislature (but by direct election thereafter) for a maximum of two five-year terms. (An amendment was approved in 1998 to permit incumbent President Nujoma to serve a third term, although the two-term limit will still exist for future presidents.) The bicameral legislature encompasses a National Assembly elected by proportional representation for a five-year term and a largely advisory National Council consisting of two members from each geographic region who are elected by regional councils for six-year terms. A Council of Traditional Leaders advises the president on the utilization and control of communal land. Provision is made for an independent judiciary, empowered to enforce a comprehensive and unamendable bill of rights, considered to be the centerpiece of the document. Capital punishment and detention without trial are outlawed. The basic law also calls for a strong affirmative action program.

Regional and local units of elective government, delineated on a purely geographical basis, are to function "without any reference to the race, colour or ethnic origin" of their inhabitants.

Foreign Relations

At independence Namibia became the 50th member of the commonwealth and shortly thereafter the 160th member of the United Nations. For economic reasons, it was deemed necessary to continue trading with South Africa; at the same time it viewed continuance of Pretoria's apartheid policies as precluding the establishment of normal diplomatic relations. Thus South Africa was permitted to maintain a mission in Windhoek that did not have the status of a full-fledged embassy.

In September 1990 it was reported that discussions (South Africa rejected the term "negotiations") had begun on the future status of South African-controlled Walvis Bay, title to which was claimed in both countries' constitutions. The talks continued in March 1991 without yielding agreement, Pretoria indicating that the only concession it would consider would be some form of joint administration of the enclave, but in November the two governments agreed to establish an interim joint administration committee. On August 21, 1992, the Walvis Bay Joint Administrative Body was formally launched. Meanwhile, neither government retreated from its territorial claim, with South Africa insisting that it would withhold a final decision until after it had formed a post-apartheid government. However, on August 16, 1993, in a major decision of the multiparty forum convened to decide on the future of South Africa, the South African government delegation agreed under pressure from the African National Congress and other participants to transfer the Walvis Bay enclave to Namibia. South Africa, however, refused in November 2000 to continue negotiations with Namibia on the precise position of the Orange River border between the two countries. The disagreement over the border issue continued through late 2002.

A seemingly less consequential dispute with a neighboring country has turned on the status of Sedudu, a small island in the middle of the Chobe River along the southern border of Namibia's Caprivi Strip. The island had been assumed to be part of Botswana until 1992, when Namibia advanced a claim that yielded a number of armed skirmishes in the area. Following an unsuccessful mediation attempt by President Mugabe of Zimbabwe, the two nations agreed in early 1995 to forward the dispute to the ICJ. On December 15, 1999, the ICJ ruled in favor of Botswana regarding Sedudu, and Namibia announced that it would accept the decision.

In an effort to end illegal trading across its border with Angola (which had been closed since September 1994), Windhoek ordered troops to fire at vehicles attempting to cross the frontier in 1995. Encountering continued insecurity along the border, Namibian authorities decided in September to create a "control unit" in support of defense and police efforts to monitor contraband traffic. On the other hand, a meeting between Namibian and Angolan officials in March 1996 was described as "positive," and in April Namibia welcomed the arrival of UN troops in southeastern Angola, suggesting that, when the peacekeepers had established themselves, the border might be reopened. In July 1997 an international human rights group accused the Nujoma administration of being responsible for the disappearance of over 1,700 Angolans since the 1994 crackdown.

In late August 1998 President Nujoma confirmed speculation that Namibian forces had been sent to the Democratic Republic of the Congo at the request of the DRC's president, Laurent Kabila, to help Kabila's army fight Rwandan-backed rebels. While effectively acknowledging domestic critics' assertions that his office had acted unilaterally, Nujoma attributed his decision to join Angola and Zimbabwe in aiding the DRC to the "spirit of Pan-Africanism, brotherhood and international solidarity." Thereafter, in late October the DRC rebellion topped the agenda of Nujoma's summit with South African President Mandela. The latter had been a critic of involving the forces of the members of the Southern African Development Community (SADC) in the violence. The country's involvement with the conflict in DRC was widely criticized by the Namibian opposition during 1999 and 2000. Following the assassination of Kabila in 2001, Namibian troops were withdrawn under the auspices of a UN agreement.

In February 2001 Namibia joined Angola and Zambia in the establishment of a tripartite mechanism aimed at improving security along their mutual borders, Windhoek having continued to provide the Angolan government with military support in the campaign against UNITA.

After the cease-fire agreement between the Angolan government and UNITA (see article on Angola), the Namibian government began repatriating Angolan refugees, with 20,000 having been returned by the end of 2003.

In 2001 descendants of Hereros killed by the Germans during their occupation of the country filed a suit in the United States against the German government, seeking $2 billion in reparations. Although the suit was dismissed in 2004, Germany formally apologized for the role played by its colonial officials in the 1904–1907 Herero uprising against German rule. Nonetheless, relations between Germany and Namibia remain close, and Germany continues to be a leading Namibian donor.

Relations between Namibia and Brazil increased significantly during Nujoma's tenure as president. Brazilian companies were contracted to explore the edges of Namibia's continental shelf in order to determine the country's formal oceanic boundaries. In addition, under the terms of the 2002 Naval Cooperation Agreement, Brazil provided assistance to construct a naval port at Walvis Bay and to train Namibian naval officers in return for the purchase of Brazilian-built vessels for the Namibian navy. Namibia has also developed closer military ties with Russia. A 2001 bilateral military accord called for Russian technical and military assistance and the eventual purchase of Russian-built MiG fighters.

In late 2005, following President Pohamba's visit to Beijing, relations with China were enhanced as the two countries signed extradition and trade agreements, and China pledged continued economic and social assistance to Namibia.

Current Issues

Following approval of the constitutional amendment granting President Sam Nujoma the opportunity to compete for a third presidential term,

Windhoek's attention in late 1998 turned to the intertwined issues of regional council elections (November 30) and secessionist activity in the Caprivi Strip region. Observers ascribed low voter participation in regional polling to both apathy and the adherence of DTA of Namibia supporters to a boycott called by the party in protest of the government's refusal to postpone balloting in those regions affected by the alleged uprising. (See Caprivi Liberation Front under Illegal Groups in Political Parties and Groups, below, for additional information.)

Following the 2004 elections, which were initially described as free and fair by foreign observers, opposition groups took the electoral commission of Namibia to court over alleged irregularities. The charges were prompted by the discovery of uncounted ballots that had been removed from polling places. A recount in March 2005 confirmed the SWAPO victory, although opposition parties gained a small number of additional votes. Otherwise, the electoral developments were most noteworthy for the smooth presidential transition after 15 years of rule by the "father of the nation," Sam Nujoma.

Following several stalled initiatives to redistribute land from white-owned farms to landless blacks, the government intensified its program to expropriate the farms in 2004. Previous efforts had been based on the voluntary sale of land and had resulted in the transfer of approximately 10 percent of the country's 7,000 white-owned farms to members of the majority population (and the resettlement of some 25,000 people). The government's new plan called for the expropriation of about one-third of the remaining white-owned farms, although the government pledged that owners would be compensated. In 2005 the budget for land purchases was doubled to $8 million, and Namibia received $10.4 million from Germany for training and technical assistance for the new farmers (although not for land costs). The government announced it hoped to maintain the vitality of the agricultural sector in order to avoid the problems that resulted from expropriations in countries such as Zimbabwe. In 2006 the government was still grappling with ways to improve the program and speed its implementation. Another issue still unresolved in 2006 pertained to the discovery of eight mass graves in late 2005, reported to be the remains of SWAPO liberation fighters killed the day the UN resolution on Namibian independence was signed. Government officials called for a “truth commission” but as of June 2006 had not come up with a plan on whether to exhume the bodies or how to deal with the graves.

Political Parties and Groups

Government Party

South West Africa People’s Organization of Namibia (SWAPO). Consisting mainly of Ovambos and formerly known as the Ovambo People’s Organization, SWAPO was the largest and most active South West African nationalist group and was recognized prior to independence by the United Nations as the “authentic representative of the Namibian people.” Founded in 1958, it issued a call for independence in 1966 and subsequently initiated guerrilla activity in the north with the support of the OAU Liberation Committee. Further operations were conducted by the party’s military wing, the People’s Liberation Army of Namibia (PLAN), from bases in southern Angola. A legal “internal wing” engaged in political activity within Namibia, although it was the target of arrests and other forms of intimidation by police and South African military forces. SWAPO’s co-founder, Andimba TOIVO JA TOIVO, was released from 16 years’ imprisonment on March 1, 1984, and was immediately elected to the organization’s newly created post of secretary general. In February 1988, at what was described as the largest such meeting in the movement’s history, 130 delegates representing about 30 branches of SWAPO’s internal wing reaffirmed their “unwavering confidence” in the exiled leadership of Sam Nujoma and their willingness to conclude a cease-fire in accordance with implementation of the UN independence plan. Nujoma returned to Namibia for the first time since 1960 on September 14, 1989, and was elected president of the new republic by the Constituent Assembly on February 16, 1990.

At a party congress in December 1991, the first since the group’s inception, delegates reelected Nujoma and Rev. Hendrik Witbooi, party president and vice president, respectively, while Moses GAROËB captured the secretary generalship from Toivo ja Toivo. The congress also elected a new Central Committee (enlarged from 38 to 67 members) and adopted a revised constitution, expunging references to the PLAN and changing descriptions of the group from a “liberation movement” to a “mass political party.”

At presidential and legislative balloting in December 1994 President Nujoma and SWAPO legislative candidates captured approximately 70 percent of the vote. However, some internal friction was subsequently reported between Nujoma loyalists and the party’s “pragmatists” over Nujoma’s allegedly heavy-handed direction of party affairs. Thereafter, in what observers described as a possible shift of power to the group’s younger leaders, in April 1996 Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs Netumbo Ndaitwah was named party secretary general. He replaced Garoëb, who had resigned days earlier.

In May 1997, at SWAPO’s second congress since independence, party delegates adopted a resolution supporting amendment of the constitution to allow Nujoma a third presidential term. In addition, SWAPO Vice President Witbooi retained his post, staving off a challenge by Prime Minister Hage Gottfried Geingob, while cabinet member and Nujoma confidante Hifikepunye Pohamba was elected secretary general.

On the eve of the extraordinary party congress of August 29–30, 1998, Ben Ulenga, Namibia’s high commissioner to Britain and a SWAPO central committeeman, resigned from his overseas post to protest the plans to allow Nujoma a third term as well as the deployment of Namibian troops in the DRC. Ulenga’s public denouncement of the Nujoma amendment, the first by a ranking SWAPO member, colored the late August proceedings, at which the congress rebuffed calls from party dissidents for a debate on the issue and formally approved the proposed bill. In November the party voted to suspend Ulenka, who had recently led “like-minded” colleagues in the formation of a self-described bipartisan grouping. (In early 1999 Ulenka launched the Congress of Democrats, below.)

Meanwhile, at regional council balloting in December 1998 SWAPO easily won the majority of the posts at polling marked by low voter turnout. In the legislative election in November–December 1999 the party got 76.1 percent of the vote and won 55 seats in the National Assembly. Nujoma easily was reelected president with 76.8 percent of the vote. At the August 2002 congress, the party’s politburo underwent a significant change, with new officers being elected. Some analysts noted that new prime minister Theo-Ben Gurirab, new SWAPO vice president Hifikepunye Pohamba, and new secretary general Ngarikutuke Tjiriange were among the possible successors to Nujoma, who had announced in late 2001 that he would not seek a fourth presidential term.

In May 2004 Pohamba was chosen as Nujoma’s successor at a party conference. Nujoma was reelected as party president with his term set until 2007. In November 2004 Pohamba was elected president of Namibia with 76.3 percent of the vote. In the concurrent legislative elections, SWAPO won 55 seats. Gurirab was subsequently elected speaker of the assembly, and Nahas Angula was appointed prime minister.

Party infighting erupted in 2005 after SWAPO secretary and deputy works minister Paulas KAPIA was accused in a scandal involving state funds (the opposition claimed Nujoma was involved as well; he refuted the allegations.) Kapia resigned his government post and his assembly seat, and was suspended from the party. Some observers suggested that it was President Pohamba who forced the resignation of Kapia, a Nujoma protégé; subsequently, Nujoma returned Kapia to the party payroll. The rift between “Nujomaists” and backers of former foreign minister Hidipo HAMUTENYA, who took over Kapia’s assembly seat, deepened after Jesaya NYAMU, a leading party member for some 40 years (and loyal to Hamutenya), was dismissed from the party in late 2005 for alleged “serious misconduct.” The vote to oust him reportedly divided the party between backers of Nujoma and Hamutenya, with some observers speculating that Hamutenya might throw his support to Pohamba in an effort to remove Nujoma from the party presidency.

Leaders: Samuel (Sam) Daniel NUJOMA (Former President of the Republic and President of the Party), Theo-Ben GURIRAB (Speaker of the National Assembly), Rev. Hendrik WITBOOI, Hifikepunye POHAMBAMBA (President of the Republic and Vice President of the Party), Ngarikutuke TJIRIANGE (Secretary General).

Other Parties Participating in the 2004 Legislative Elections

DTA of Namibia. The grouping known as the Democratic Turnhalle Alliance (DTA) until adoption of the abbreviated form in November 1991 was launched in the wake of the Turnhalle Conference as a multiracial coalition of European, coloured, and African groups. Advocating a constitutional arrangement that would provide for equal ethnic representation, the DTA obtained an overwhelming majority (41 of 50 seats) at the Constituent Assembly balloting of December 4–8, 1978, and was instrumental in organizing the Multi-Party Conference in 1983. Its core formations were the white-based Republican Party (RP), organized in October 1977 by dissident members of the then-dominant South West Africa National Party (SWANP), and the Herero-based National United Democratic Organization (NUDO), which had long advocated a federal solution as a means of opposing SWAPO domination. (For a list of other groups participating in the formation of the DTA, see the 1999 Handbook.)

At a Central Committee meeting on November 30, 1991, DTA officials announced the transformation of the coalition into an integrated political party. The committee also reelected the party leaders to permanent positions, adopted a new constitution, and announced that the group would thenceforth be known as the DTA of Namibia.

An intraparty chasm between former RP leader Dirk MUDGE and a faction led by party president Mishake MUYONGO and information secretary Andrew Matjila widened in the wake of the DTA of Namibia's poor showing at regional and local council elections in November–December 1992. At a central committee meeting in February 1993, the Muyongo faction pressed Mudge to resign, arguing that his former ties to South Africa had contributed to the party's loss of electoral support from all but small-town whites and the Herero and Caprivi communities. In April Mudge announced that he would be vacating his parliamentary seat, insisting that he had made the decision for purely personal reasons and would retain the DTA of Namibia chairmanship. In mid-1994 Matjila broke with the party, and less than a year later Mudge resigned his party post and bowed out of politics. Thereafter, at balloting in December, Muyongo secured only 23 percent of the presidential vote, while the party's parliamentary representation fell to 15 seats, the DTA of Namibia claiming that there had been widespread voting irregularities.

On August 25, 1998, the DTA of Namibia's Executive Committee suspended Muyongo from the party presidency and named Vice President Katuutire Kaura interim party leader after Muyongo called for the secession of the Caprivi Strip region from Namibia. Muyongo subsequently assumed control of the militant Caprivi Liberation Movement (see CLF, under Illegal Groups, below).

The legislative elections on November 30–December 1, 1999, proved nearly disastrous for the DTA of Namibia as the party secured less than half of what it did in 1994, winning only 9.5 percent of the vote and 7 seats in the National Assembly. In the presidential election, Kaura received 9.6 percent of the vote. In early April 2000 the DTA of Namibia and the UDF formed an opposition coalition when the negotiations with the CoD broke down.

The DTA of Namibia won four seats in the 2004 legislative elections while its presidential candidate, again Kaura, placed third with 5.2 percent of the vote. The defections of DTA of Namibia members to the RP and NUDO hurt the party most in the December Regional Council elections, where voters split among the three parties, giving SWAPO its greatest success ever in such balloting. The DTA of Namibia had 16 candidates elected to the councils in the 1998 elections but only 2 in the 2004 balloting.

Leaders: Johan DE WAAL (Chair), Katuutire KAURA (President and 2004 presidential candidate), Nico SMIT (Secretary General).

United Democratic Front (UDF). The UDF is led by Justus Garoëb, longtime head of the Damara Council, which withdrew from the MPC in March 1984; chair of the group is Reggie Diergaardt, leader of the Labour Party, a largely coloured group that was expelled from the DTA in 1982 but participated in the MPC subsequent to its November 1983 meeting. Two small leftist groups were also Front members: the Communist Party of Namibia (CPN) and the Trotskyist Workers' Revolutionary Party (WRP). The UDF ran a distant third in the November 1989 election, winning four assembly seats. At balloting in November–December 1992 the party was unable to lessen the gap between itself and the two major parties, capturing only 1 of 13 regional council seats.

In a November 1993 action opposed by other clan chiefs, UDF president Garoëb was enthroned as the king of Damara. Thereafter, observers attributed Garoëb's failure to participate in the December 1994 presidential balloting, despite a pledge to the contrary, to the UDF's poor financial condition. Meanwhile, the party, securing only 2 percent of the vote, lost two of its four assembly seats.

In late 1998 a UDF spokesman denounced SWAPO's legislative efforts to grant Nujoma a third term. The UDF received 2.9 percent of the vote in the legislative elections on November 30–December 1, 1999, and won two seats in the National Assembly while Garoëb secured 3 percent of the vote in the presidential poll.

In the 2004 presidential balloting Garoëb gained 3.8 percent of the vote, while the UDF gained an additional seat in the assembly.

Leaders: Justus GAROËB (King of Damara, President of the Party, and 2004 presidential candidate), Eric BIWA (Chair).

Congress of Democrats (CoD). The CoD was launched in March 1999 by former SWAPO stalwart Ben Ulunga, who had been suspended by SWAPO in 1998 after he criticized efforts to permit President Nujoma to run for a third term and had formed a grouping styled Forum for the Future. Included in the CoD's platform were calls for a smaller cabinet and the withdrawal of Namibian troops from the DRC. The CoD won 9.9 percent of the votes in the legislative elections held on November 30–December 1, 1999. It won 7 seats in the National Assembly and became the official parliamentary opposition, supplanting the DTA of Namibia. Ulunga received 10.5 percent of the vote in the presidential election.

The CoD lost support in the 2004 elections; Ulunga only received 7.34 percent of the presidential vote while the party fell to five seats.

Leaders: Ben ULENGA (President and 2004 presidential candidate), Nora SCHIMMINGCHASE (Vice President), Kalia GERTZE (Secretary General).

South West Africa National Union (SWANU). Formerly coordinating many of its activities with SWAPO's internal wing, the Herero-supported SWANU joined with the Damara Council and a number of smaller groups to form a multiracial coalition in support of the Western "contact group" solution to the Namibian problem. SWANU's president, Moses Katjioungua, participated in the 1983 MPC meeting and in September 1984 was reported to have been replaced as party leader by Kuzeeko Kanguuehi, who indicated that the group would leave the MPC, with a view to possible merger with SWAPO. In October, on the other hand, Katjioungua was again identified as holding the presidency, with Kanguuehi described as the leader of a dissident faction (subsequently styled SWANU-Left).

The incumbent's anti-SWAPO orientation was reflected by his inclusion in the "national unity" cabinet of 1985. A founding member of the Democratic Coalition of Namibia (DCN), SWANU abruptly dropped out of the grouping in November 1994 while Katjioungua stayed within the DCN. SWANU formed an electoral alliance with the Workers' Revolutionary Party (below), which received less than 0.5 percent of the vote in the legislative election on November 30–December 1, 1999. SWANU secured less than 1 percent of the vote in the 2004 legislative elections.

Leaders: Dr. Rihupisa KANDANDO (President), Kuzeeko KANGUEEHI (Vice President), Hitjevi Gerson VEII.

Monitor Action Group (MAG). A conservative, predominantly white grouping, the MAG won one assembly seat in December 1994. The MAG received 0.7 percent of the vote in the legislative election on November 30–December 1, 1999, and won one seat in the National Assembly.

In the 2004 polls Jacobus Pretorius received 1.2 percent of the presidential vote, while the party retained its single seat in the assembly.

Leader: Jacobus W. F. ("Kosie") PRETORIUS (2004 presidential candidate).

Republican Party (RP). Originally part of the DTA, the RP was reestablished as an independent party in 2003 under the leadership of Henk Mudge, the son of Dirk Mudge, the leader of the former Republican Party within the DTA. The conservative RP won 1.9 percent of the vote in the 2004 elections and gained a seat in the assembly for the first time. In addition, the younger Mudge ran as a presidential candidate; he came in fifth with 1.95 percent of the vote.

Leaders: Henk MUDGE (2004 presidential candidate), Carola ENGELBRECHT (Secretary General).

National Unity Democratic Organization (NUDO). Led by the Herero High Chief, Kuaima Riruako, former members of NUDO left the DTA of Namibia in 2003 to reestablish their Herero-based party. In the 2004 elections NUDO secured 4.79 percent of the vote and three seats in the assembly. Riruako came in third with 5.2 percent of the vote in the presidential poll.

Leader: Kuaima RIRUAKO (2004 presidential candidate).

Namibia Democratic Movement of Change (DMC). Established by former DTA of Namibia member Frans Goagoseb, the DMC received 0.53 percent of the vote in the 2004 legislative poll.

Leaders: Frans GOAGOSEB (President), Claudia NAMISES (Secretary General).

Other Parties and Groups

Workers' Revolutionary Party (WRP). The Trotskyite WRP was formed in 1989 and was part of the UDF. The WRP contested the 1994 legislative election and received 0.19 percent of the vote. For the 1999 balloting, the WRP formed an electoral alliance with SWANU (above).

Leaders: Werner MAMUGWE, Hewat BEUKES.

Christian Democratic Action for Social Justice (CDA). Supported principally by Ovambos, the CDA was formed in January 1982 by members of the National Democratic Party who withdrew from the DTA because of the latter's failure to organize as a unified grouping. The CDA contested the 1989 independence vote, and the party's leader subsequently announced it was withdrawing from politics.

Leader: Rev. Peter KALANGULA (President).

Federal Convention of Namibia (FCN). Strongly opposed to the UN independence plan, the FCN was organized by J. G. A. Diergaardt, a former minister of local government and leader of the Rehoboth Free Democratic Party (Rehoboth Bevryder Demokratiese Party—RBDP). The RBDP was an outgrowth of the former Rehoboth Liberation Front (RLF), which endorsed the partition of Namibia along ethnic lines and obtained one assembly seat in 1978 as representative of part of the Baster community, composed of Afrikaans-speaking people with European customs. The RFDP was an original member of the MPC but in 1987 joined the SWANP in opposing the draft constitution endorsed by other TGNU members.

In 1994 the FCN chose former Women's Party (WP) leader Hileni LATVIO as its presidential candidate; however, Latvio failed to register her candidacy by the appropriate date and was denied an extension. The FCN won less than 0.5 percent of the vote in the 1999 legislative elections and won no seats.

Leader: Kaptein J. G. A. (Hans) DIERGAARDT (Chair).

National Democratic Party for Justice (NDPFJ). The launching of the NDPFJ was announced in November 1996 by SWAPO dissidents who in May 1995 had coalesced as SWAPO-Justice. The latter dissolved in 1997, and its leader, Ngiwete NDJOBABA, subsequently joined the CoD. Ndjoba died in February 2004.

Namibia Movement for Independent Candidates (NMIC). The NMIC was launched in July 1997 on a platform stressing the need to incorporate Namibian youths into the political process. In September 1998 NMIC became affiliated with the DTA of Namibia (above).

Leader: Joseph KAUANDENGE.

Illegal Groups

Caprivi Liberation Front (CLF). Formed in 1994, the CLF has sought autonomy or independence for the Caprivi Strip, a narrow portion of northern Namibia that juts about 250 miles into central Africa, touching the borders of Angola, Botswana, Zambia, and Zimbabwe. The strip, theretofore part of the British protectorate of Bechuanaland (subsequently Botswana), was ceded to Germany, colonial ruler of South West Africa, in 1890 as part of a land swap that included Britain's assumption of control in Zanzibar. The region is part of the former ancestral kingdom of Barotseland, which also included portions of Zambia, Botswana, and Zimbabwe. In the 1970s and 1980s the strip was used by South African forces as a base for military activities against independence

Cabinet

As of June 1, 2006

Prime Minister
Deputy Prime Minister

Nahas Angula
Dr. Libertina Amathila [f]

Ministers

Agriculture, Water, and Rural Development	Nick Iyambo
Defense	Maj. Gen. Charles Namoloh
Education	Nangolo Mbumba
Environment and Tourism	Willem Konjore
Finance	Saara Kuugongelwa-Amathilia [f]
Fisheries and Marine Resources	Abraham Iyambo
Foreign Affairs	Marco Hausiku
Health and Social Services	Richard Kamwi
Home Affairs and Immigration	Rosalia Nghidinwa [f]
Information and Broadcasting	Netumbo Nandi-Ndaitwah [f]
Justice and Attorney General	Pendukeni Iivula-Ithana [f]
Labor	Alpheus Naruseb
Lands, Resettlement, and Rehabilitation	Jerry Ekandjo
Mines and Energy	Errki Nghimtina
Presidential Affairs	Albert Kawana
Regional and Local Government and Housing	John Pandeni
Safety and Security	Peter Tsheehama
Trade and Industry	Immanuel Ngatjizeko
Without Portfolio	Ngarikutuke Tjiriange
Women's Affairs and Child Welfare	Marlene Mungunda [f]
Works, Transport, and Communications	Joel Kaapanda
Youth, Sport, and Culture	John Mutorwa

[f] = female

fighters in Namibia as well as against the Angolan government.

In 1998 the Namibian government reported that a security sweep had uncovered training bases in Caprivi for the CLF-affiliated Caprivi Liberation Army. Several thousand Caprivians subsequently fled to Botswana, including Mishake Muyongo, the CLF/CLA leader who been dismissed from both SWAPO and the DTA of Namibia for his secessionist sentiments. In early August 1999 a small group of alleged CLA members attacked security locations in the town of Katima Mulilo, the fighting leaving at least 16 dead. The insurgents were quickly routed, but the Namibian government declared a state of emergency in the region for three weeks and implemented what critics described as a heavy-handed crackdown that allegedly included the abuse of detainees. Among the factors reportedly fueling antigovernment sentiment among Caprivians (primarily from the Lozi ethnic group) is the political and economic dominance of Ovambos in Namibia.

Leader: Mishake MUYONGO (under asylum in Denmark).

Legislature

The Namibian Parliament consists of an indirectly elected National Council and a National Assembly whose voting members are directly elected.

National Council. The largely advisory upper house is a 26-member body containing two members from each of 13 regional councils; the term of office is six years. The national body launched its first session on May 11, 1993, following regional and local elections on November 29–December 4, 1992, at which the South West Africa People's Organization of Namibia (SWAPO) won control in 9 regions and the Democratic Turnhalle Alliance of Namibia (DTA of Namibia) in 3, with the United Democratic Front (UDF) holding the balance of power in 1. After SWAPO gained control of 12 of the 13 regional councils in balloting on November 30–December 1, 2004, the distribution of seats in the National Council was SWAPO, 24; the DTA of Namibia, 1; and the UDF, 1.

President: Asser Kuveri KAPERER.

National Assembly. The 72 members of the current lower house were initially elected on November 7–11, 1989, to the Namibian Constituent Assembly, which at independence assumed the functions of an ordinary legislature with a five-year mandate. The lower house balloting of November 15–16, 2004, resulted in the distribution of seats as follows: the South West Africa People's Organization of Namibia, 55; the Congress of Democrats, 5; the DTA of Namibia, 4; the National Unity Democratic Organization, 3; the United Democratic Front, 3; the Republican Party, 1; and the Monitor Action Group, 1. In addition to the elected members, up to six nonvoting members may be named by the president.

Speaker: Dr. Theo-Ben GURIRAB.

Communications

Press

Although there are generally few restrictions on the press, in 2001 the government forbade state agencies and institutions from advertising or purchasing The Namibian in response to articles that were critical of the government. The following newspapers are English dailies published in Windhoek, unless otherwise noted: New Era (25,000), weekly; Die Republikein (12,000), DTA organ in Afrikaans, English, and German; The Namibian (11,000); Windhoek Observer (10,000), weekly; Allgemeine Zeitung (5,000), in German; Windhoek Advertiser, daily (5,000); Namibia Economist; Namibia News; Namibia Today, pro-SWAPO; Tempo, weekly; Namib Times, biweekly, published in Walvis Bay; The New Era, government biweekly; and the regional Caprivi Vision.

News Agencies

A Namibian Press Agency (Nampa) was launched by SWAPO in November 1987; the Italian-based Inter Press Service (IPS) and the South African Press Association maintain offices in Windhoek.

Broadcasting and Computing

The Namibian Broadcasting Company (NBC), formerly the South West Africa Broadcasting Company (SWABC), is accountable to the Ministry of Information and Broadcasting, although with a mandate to operate as an independent service. However, in October 2002 President Nujoma ordered the NBC to stop broadcasting foreign programs. In addition, during the 2004 elections opposition parties charged that NBC provided the government party, SWAPO, with a disproportionate share of airtime and refused some requests to broadcast opposition advertisements. Radio broadcasts, which commenced in 1979, are transmitted over eight channels in 11 regional languages; television service, initiated in 1981, broadcasts in English, with a commitment to add ethnic languages when feasible. The country's first private commercial radio station commenced operation in April 1994. There were approximately 73,000 television receivers and 191,000 personal computers serving 65,000 Internet users in 2003.

Intergovernmental Representation

Ambassador to the U.S.

Hopelong Uushona IPINGE

U.S. Ambassador to Namibia

Joyce A. BARR

Permanent Representative to the UN

Martin ANDJABA

IGO Memberships (Non-UN) AfDB, AU, Comesa, CWTH, Interpol, NAM, SADC, WCO, WTO

NIGER

REPUBLIC OF NIGER

République du Niger

---

The Country

A vast landlocked country on the southern border of the Sahara, Niger is largely desert in the north and arable savanna in the more populous south-land, which extends from the Niger River to Lake Chad. The population includes numerous tribes of two main ethnic groups: Sudanese Negroes and Hamites. About 75 percent of the population is classified as Sudanese Negro, with Hausa being the predominant subgroup (56 percent); Hamites, found in the north, include the nomadic Tuareg, Toubou, and Peulh subgroups. The population is largely (85 percent) Muslim, with smaller groups of animists and Christians. While French is the official language, Hausa is the language of trade and commerce and is constitutionally classified, along with Arabic and five other tribal languages, as a “national” language. Women constitute a minority of the labor force, excluding unpaid family workers.

Agriculture and stock raising occupy 90 percent of the work force, the chief products being millet and sorghum for domestic consumption and peanuts, vegetables, and live cattle for export. The country’s major exports are cotton and uranium, of which Niger is one of the world’s top five producers. Coal, phosphates, iron ore, gold, and petroleum have also been discovered, but their exploitation awaits development of a more adequate transportation and communication infrastructure. Niger’s economy declined in the 1980s, with agriculture suffering from both floods and drought. Also, a decrease in uranium demand contributed to a severe trade imbalance and mounting foreign debt. The introduction of austerity measures, while generating substantial social unrest, yielded assistance from the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and debt rescheduling from the Paris Club. In June 1996 the IMF approved a new three-year loan to facilitate further structural adjustments.

The government’s economic policies in 1996–1998, which focused on privatization of state-run enterprises, were described as “broadly satisfactory,” with GDP growth rising from 2.8 percent in 1997 to 10.4 percent in 1998. However, political turmoil and an eight-month imposition of military rule following the assassination of President Mainassara halted economic progress, as some external financing was frozen and domestic arrears (including the payment of civil service salaries) accumulated. GDP consequently contracted by 0.6 percent in 1999, although a degree of fiscal stability returned after a democratically elected civilian government was installed late in the year. GDP grew by an average of about 1.5 percent per year between 2001 and 2003 in view of returned support from the IMF and World Bank, which have endorsed the new government's commitment to structural reform and financial transparency. Drought and widespread devastation by locusts in 2004 weakened the economy and resulted in a lack of trade and subsequent GDP growth of less than 1 percent. Because of progress the country made in economic reforms, however, the IMF provided substantial debt relief at the end of 2005. The fund projected GDP growth of about 4 percent for Niger in 2006, though analysts suggested that long-term prospects for Niger (one of the poorest and least developed countries in the world) largely would depend on enhanced regional economic cooperation.

Government and Politics

Political Background

An object of centuries-old contention among different African peoples, Niger was first exposed to French contact in the late 19th century. Military conquest of the area began prior to 1900 but, because of stiff resistance, was not completed until 1922, when Niger became a French colony. Political evolution began under a constitution granted by France in 1946, with Niger becoming a self-governing republic within the French Community in 1958 and attaining full independence in August 1960. Although its membership in the community subsequently lapsed, Niger has retained close economic and political ties with its former colonial ruler.

The banning of the Marxist-oriented Sawaba (Freedom) Party in 1959 converted Niger into a one-party state under the Niger Progressive Party (Parti Progressiste Nigérien—PPN), headed by President Hamani DIORI, a member of the southern Djerma tribe. Thereafter, Djibo BAKARY led Sawaba elements to continue their opposition activity from abroad, with terrorist incursions in 1964 and 1965 that included an attempt on the president's life. The Diori government, carefully balanced to represent ethnic and regional groupings, was reelected in 1965 and 1970 by overwhelming majorities but proved incapable of coping with the effects of the prolonged Sahelian drought of 1968–1974. As a result, Diori was overthrown on April 15, 1974, by a military coup led by Gen. Seyni KOUNTCHÉ and Maj. Sani Souna SIDO, who then established themselves as president and vice president, respectively, of a Supreme Military Council (Conseil Militaire Suprême—CMS). On August 2, 1975, Kountché announced that Sido and a number of others, including Bakary, had been arrested for attempting to organize a second coup.

A National Development Council (Conseil National pour le Développement—CND), initially established in July 1974 with an appointive membership, was assigned quasi-leadership status in August 1983, following indirect election of 150 delegates. Earlier, on January 24, Oumarou MAMANE had been appointed to the newly created post of prime minister; on August 3 he was named president of the reconstituted CND. Hamid ALGABID replaced him as prime minister on November 14.

President Kountché died in a Paris hospital on November 10, 1987, after what was apparently a lengthy illness. He was immediately succeeded by the army chief of staff, (then) Col. Ali SAIBOU. After being formally invested by the CMS on November 14, the new president named Algabid to head an otherwise substantially new government.

On August 2, 1988, following a July 15 cabinet reorganization that included the return of Mamane as prime minister, Saibou announced the formation of a National Movement for a Developing Society (Mouvement National pour une Société de Développement—MNSD) as the “final step in normalization of Niger's politics.” The CND, whose constituent functions had been reaffirmed by Saibou in December 1987, was given the task of further defining the role of the MNSD.

Adding to the complexity of the restructuring process was General Saibou's declaration on Political Status: Former French dependency; independence declared August 3, 1960; military regime established April 15, 1974; constitution of September 1989, providing for single-party military/civilian government, suspended on August 4, 1991, by a National Consultative Conference that had declared itself a sovereign body on July 30; multiparty constitution of December 27, 1992, suspended by military coup on January 27, 1996; new constitution adopted on May 22, 1996, following approval by national referendum on May 12; constitution suspended by the military-based National Reconciliation Council on April 11, 1999; new multiparty constitution providing for return of civilian government approved by national referendum on July 18, 1999, and promulgated on August 9.

Area: 489,189 sq. mi. (1,267,000 sq. km.).

Population: 10,790,352 (2001C); 12,283,000 (2005E).

Major Urban Center (2005E): NIAMEY (including suburbs, 991,000).

Official Language: French.

Monetary Unit: CFA Franc (official rate July 1, 2006: 513.01 CFA francs = $1US). (The CFA franc, formerly pegged to the French franc, is now permanently pegged to the euro at 655.975 CFA francs = 1 euro.)

President: Mamadou TANDJA (National Movement for a Developing Society—Victory); elected in second-round balloting on November 24, 1999, and sworn in for a five-year term on December 22; reelected in second-round balloting on December 4, 2004, and sworn in for a record five-year term on December 21. (Prior to Tandja's first term Maj. Daouda Malam WANKÉ had served as head of state and chair of the newly formed National Reconstruction Council; he was appointed on April 11, 1999, following the assumption of power by a military junta in the wake of the assassination of President Ibrahim Baré MAÏNASSARA on April 9.)

Prime Minister: Hama AMADOU (National Movement for a Developing Society—Victory); appointed by the president on December 31, 1999, and sworn in on January 3, 2000, to succeed Ibrahim Assane MAYAKI; formed new government on January 5, 2000; reappointed by the president on December 24, 2004, and formed new government on December 30, 2004.

January 1, 1989, that the initial congress of the MNSD would elect the membership of a Supreme Council of National Orientation (Conseil Suprême de la Orientation Nationale—CSON) to replace the CMS, while the CND would become an advisory Economic and Social Council (Conseil Economique et Social—CES). On May 17 Saibou was elected president of the CSON, thereby becoming, under a new constitution approved in September, the sole candidate for election as head of state on December 10. Saibou was credited with more than 99 percent of the votes, as was the single list of 93 MNSD candidates concurrently elected to the new National Assembly.

The post of prime minister was eliminated upon the formation of a new government on December 20, 1989. However, it was reestablished in a March 2, 1990, reshuffle precipitated by student-government confrontations in Niamey; Aliou MAHAMIDOU, a government industrial executive, was named to the position. Three months later, the CSON committed itself to “political pluralism,” and in mid-November, after encountering further dissatisfaction with his policies, Saibou announced that a National Consultative Conference would convene to consider constitutional reform.

The conference opened on July 29, 1991, with 1,204 delegates from 24 political groups and 69 mass organizations in attendance. After declaring its sovereignty and electing André SALIFOU as chair, the conference suspended the constitution on August 9 and transferred all but ceremonial presidential powers from Saibou to Salifou. It was decided at the time that Prime Minister Mahamidou would remain in office. However, on November 1, in the wake of an inquiry into the May 1990 massacre of Tuareg nomads by government troops, Amadou CHEIFFOU was named to succeed Mahamidou for a 15-month transition to multiparty balloting scheduled for January 31, 1993. On November 2 the conference appointed a 15-member High Council of the Republic (Haut Conseil de la République—HCR), chaired by Salifou, to serve as a constituent assembly and provisional legislature for the duration of the transitional period. The following day the conference voted to disband the HCR in favor of another form of transitional government.

Cheiffou announced the creation of a transitional government on November 4, 1991, which was then dissolved on March 23, 1992, in the wake of a failed military coup on February 28; a new cabinet was named on March 27. In early July Cheiffou survived a nonconfidence motion triggered by a mid-June decision to recognize Taiwan in exchange for an economic aid package, an arrangement that the HCR branded as contravening National Conference resolutions. The split between Cheiffou and the HCR proved short-lived, as the two agreed at an August 7 meeting to reconcile their differences. Meanwhile, preparations for a constitutional referendum and multiparty election proceeded haltingly. The new constitution was finally approved on December 26 by 89 percent of referendum voters, despite observations that the polling was marred by irregularities.

In late December 1992 the government admitted it had lost control over troops assigned to the northeastern Tuareg region where the insurgent Front for the Liberation of Air and Azaouad (FLAA) had resumed activity, further complicating the transitional process. Seven months earlier, the government had responded to the FLAA capture of some 28 military personnel and two officials of the recently restyled MNSD-Nassara by giving the army control of security in the region, a decision criticized by local Tuareg officials as equivalent to imposing a state of emergency. Frustrated by the rebels' unwillingness to release their prisoners, the army, apparently without government approval, arrested 186 alleged FLAA rebels and supporters, including a number of prominent Tuareg members of the transitional administration. Tuareg officials denounced a subsequent soldiers-for-civilians exchange offer and appealed to the UN for assistance. A Niamey offer to create a "forum for national reconciliation" in November was rebuffed by the Tuaregs, who questioned the government's ability to provide for their safety.

Following a National Assembly election on February 14, 1993, the MNSD-Nassara, with a plurality of 29 seats, appeared likely to form a coalition with one or more of its competitors, as a means of retaining control of the government. However, two days later, nine opposition parties, decrying the possibility of MNSD-Nassara controlling 50 assembly seats and continuing its rule, formed a majoritarian Alliance of Forces of Change (AFC). At the first round of presidential balloting on February 27 MNSD-Nassara candidate Mamadou TANDJA led the eight-candidate field with 34.22 percent of the vote, followed by Mahamane OUSMANE of the Democratic and Social Convention-Rahama (CDS-Rahama), with 26.59 percent. However, at the second round on March 27, Ousmane was able to surpass Tandja with 54.42 percent of the vote, thanks to solid AFC backing; he was sworn in for a five-year term on April 16. The next day Mahamadou ISSOUFOU, leader of the Nigerien Party for Democracy and Socialism-Tarayya (PNDS-Tarayya), was appointed prime minister. Issoufou named a cabinet on May 23.

In early 1994 opposition legislators launched a boycott against the Assembly, but all 33 were arrested for advocating civil disobedience following violent antigovernment demonstrations on April 16–17. Among those incarcerated for their roles in the unrest were Tandja and the leaders of two theretofore AFC parties, André Salifou of the Union of Democratic Patriots and Progressives-Chamoua (UPDP-Chamoua) and Issoufou AS-SOUMANE of the Democratic Union of Progressive Forces-Sawaba (UDFP-Sawaba). Their defection lent credence to reports of discord within the AFC, apparently stemming from the president's poorly received efforts to seize Mahamadou Issoufou's prime ministerial powers.

The AFC lost its assembly majority on September 25, 1994, when the PNDS-Tarayya broke with the coalition, complaining it had been marginalized by the CDS-Rahama. Prime Minister Issoufou resigned on September 28, and Ousmane named CDS-Rahama cabinet minister Abdoulaye SOULEY as the new head of government the same day. However, on October 16, two days after the MNDS-Nassara and PNDS-Tarayya had successfully orchestrated an assembly nonconfidence vote, the 11-day-old Souley government was forced to dissolve. The following day Ousmane reappointed Souley, who proffered the same cabinet. A second nonconfidence vote ensued and, faced with the choice of appointing a prime minister from the new parliamentary majority or dissolving the National Assembly and holding a new legislative election, Ousmane chose the latter.

On January 9, 1995, three days before the election, the MNSD-Nassara coalition threatened a boycott due to alleged voter registration fraud and the assassination of an opposition candidate, Seydou Dan DJOUMA. Nevertheless, the coalition participated in the poll and captured 43 legislative seats; AFC-affiliated groups secured the remaining 40. Ousmane ignored MNSD-Nassara's request that he name Hama AMADOU as prime minister, despite the party's assembly majority, and instead appointed another MNSD-Nassara member, Amadou Boubacar Cissé, on February 8. Two days later the MNSD-Nassara expelled Cissé, and on February 20 the assembly voted to censure the new prime minister. The following day Ousmane dismissed Cissé and appointed Amadou, who subsequently formed a cabinet drawn from supporters of the new governing coalition.

Despite differences within the Tuareg leadership, a final peace accord was signed on April 25, 1995. On June 12, the National Assembly unanimously decided to grant full amnesty to all participants of the civil war. Meanwhile, political turmoil continued in Niamey as the AFC, which had earlier accused the MNSD-Nassara and its partners of "monstrous irregularities" during the January polling, criticized Prime Minister Amadou's new government for failing to represent "half of the population." Ousmane refused Amadou's call for a cabinet meeting on July 6, in an apparent attempt to avert a vote on his own non-cabinet appointments. Amadou contended that Ousmane lacked the authority to name government officials and responded by ordering riot police to prevent Ousmane-appointed administrators from entering their offices. Despite subsequent negotiations, Amadou dismissed the officials in question on August 1; however, a Niamey court immediately reinstated them. On August 4 the prime minister held a cabinet meeting without Ousmane, who promptly declared all cabinet decisions "null and void."

In early October 1995 opposition parliamentarians aligned with Ousmane declared that the prime minister had deliberately violated the constitution by convening the cabinet without presidential approval and called for his censure. However, their attempt to pass a nonconfidence motion on October 8 failed (in part because some members boycotted the vote to protest the absence of the assembly speaker). In November international mediators met with the president and prime minister in what was described as a successful attempt to end the constitutional impasse, although the question of who controlled government appointments remained unresolved.

On January 27, 1996, at least ten people were killed in a military coup directed by Army Chief of Staff Col. Ibrahim Baré MAÏNASSARA, who claimed that he had acted to end the "absurd, irrational, and personalized crisis" gripping the Nigerien government. Following seizure of the presidential palace and assembly building, Maïnassara announced the "dismissal" of the president and prime minister (both of whom had been arrested), the dissolution of the assembly, suspension of political party activity, and his own installation as chair of the National Salvation Council (Conseil pour le Salut National—CSN), an 11-member military body organized to govern until a civilian government could be reestablished. On January 30 the CSN designated Boukari ADJI, vice governor of the Central Bank of West African States (BCEAO), as prime minister.

In February 1996 Maïnassara appointed a 100-member Committee of Wisemen to act as an advisory council and a 32-member Coordinating Committee for the Democratic Renewal to supervise the restoration of a democratic government and draft a new constitution. At a meeting chaired by Mainassara on February 12, Ousmane and Amadou publicly acknowledged the “constitutional problems” that had prompted the coup and endorsed the CSN’s early governing efforts.

On February 17, 1996, the CSN announced a timetable for the return to a democratically elected government, which called for a constitutional referendum in September and presidential and legislative elections by the end of the year. However, under pressure from France, which on March 6 became the first international donor to renew ties with the junta, the CSN released a revised timetable that moved the schedule up by three months. On March 27 the regime established a transitional legislature, the National Forum for Democratic Renewal, consisting of members from the Committee of Wise-men and the Coordinating Committee, as well as former National Assemblymen. The National Forum met for the first time on April 1 and six days later it approved a draft constitution that included provisions for a second legislative body (a Senate), as well as a government wherein the prime minister would be accountable to the president. On April 19 the National Forum released yet another transitional timetable, rescheduling the constitutional referendum to May 12, presidential balloting to July 7, and legislative elections to September 22.

The constitutional referendum was approved on May 12, 1996, by 92 percent of the voters—though the election was poorly attended. Mainassara revoked the ban on political parties May 19, and lifted the state of emergency four days later. Meanwhile, a clash between government forces and rebels near Lake Chad was reportedly the first such incident since early March, when Tuareg and Toubou leaders had agreed to implement a unilateral cease-fire as a sign of support for the military regime.

In balloting July 7–8, 1996, Brig. Gen. Mainassara (who was promoted on May 14) captured the presidency, securing 52 percent of the vote, according to government figures. However, the election was marred by the junta’s termination of the Independent National Electoral Commission (CENI) on the second day of voting and installation of a National Electoral Commission (CNE) filled with Mainassara’s supporters. Dismissing the regime’s claim that it had dissolved the CENI to end the “corruption” of ballots by opposition activists, Mainassara’s top three challengers (former president Ousmane, MNSD-Nassara chair Mamadou Tandja, and former National Assembly president Mahamadou Issoufou) filed a petition to have the results overturned. (Ousmane had been credited with 19.75 percent of the vote, Tandja 15.65 percent, and Issoufou 7.6 percent. The fifth candidate, Moumouni DJERMAKOYE of the ANDP-Zaman Lahiya, secured 4.77 of the vote; he did not formally contest the results.) The Supreme Court officially validated Mainassara’s electoral victory July 21, and on August 23 the new president named a cabinet, again led by Prime Minister Adji, which included no military officials.

Following his inauguration on August 7, 1996, President Mainassara attempted to negotiate an agreement that would prompt angry opposition groups to participate in upcoming legislative elections. Among other things, he dissolved the CNE on August 30 and announced the formation of a new electoral commission. However, the opposition, most of which coalesced in September as the Front for the Restoration and Defense of Democracy (FRDD), demanded that the members of the CENI be reappointed and that other measures be taken to ensure fair elections. Unconvinced of the regime’s democratic intentions, the FRDD ultimately boycotted the balloting for a new National Assembly held on November 23, paving the way for the National Union of Independents for Democratic Renewal (UNIRD), which had recently been established by supporters of resident Mainassara, to win 59 of the 83 seats. Declaring the transition to civilian government complete, Mainassara dissolved the CSN on December 12. On December 21 he appointed a new government, headed, ironically, by Amadou Cissé, whose attempted appointment to the premiership in February 1995 had triggered the constitutional crisis leading up to the January 1996 coup.

Antigovernment sentiment culminated in large-scale demonstrations in the capital in early January 1997. Mainassara responded with a crackdown that resulted in the arrest of the FRDD leaders; however, the detainees were released after ten days, regional leaders having apparently persuaded the president to adopt a less harsh approach.

On March 31, 1997, Maïnassara dissolved the Cissé government in response to the opposition's agreement to set aside its preconditions for entering into negotiations (i.e., dissolution of the assembly and organization of fresh elections) and accept cabinet postings. However, talks between the two sides quickly broke down, and no opposition members were included in the government named on June 13. The opposition rejected subsequent government entreaties, and unrest was reported throughout the country. Consequently, on November 24 Maïnassara again dismissed the Cissé government, accusing it of "incompetency" and failing to ease political tensions.

On November 27, 1997, Ibrahim Assane MAYAKI was named to replace Cissé, and on December 1 a new government was appointed. Despite Maïnassara's pledge to include opposition figures in the new cabinet, only one minister, Tuareg leader Rhissa ag BOULA, came from outside the pro-presidential coalition of parties. Moreover, a number of Cissé ministers were reappointed.

Opposition candidates captured a majority of the contested seats at local, municipal, and regional balloting on February 7, 1999. Heightened government-opposition tension was consequently reported in Niamey after the Supreme Court (acting, according to the opposition, under pressure from the administration) ordered extensive repolling in early April.

On April 9 President Maïnassara was assassinated at the Niamey airport upon returning from a trip to Mecca, reportedly by members of the presidential guard. Troops immediately took control of the capital, and Prime Minister Mayaki dissolved the assembly, suspended political party activities, and asserted that he and his cabinet would continue governing until a "unity" government was formed. After two days of uncertainty, however, junior army officers announced on April 11 that they had assumed power and formed a National Reconciliation Council (Conseil de Réconciliation Nationale—CRN), whose chair, Maj. Daouda Malam WANKÉ (theretofore commander of the presidential guard), was also named head of state. The junta suspended the constitution and formally dissolved the government and Supreme Court. In addition, the results of the February elections were annulled. At the same time, the military announced a nine-month transitional plan that would culminate in the inauguration of an elected president. On April 16, 1999, the CRN named an interim government that included Wanké as the head of government, Mayaki in a diminished prime ministerial role, and a number of FRDD ministers.

A new constitution, designed, among other things, to resolve the presidential/prime-ministerial power-sharing confusion of the early to mid-1990s, was approved by 90 percent of the vote in a national referendum on July 18, 1999, although turnout was estimated at only 32 percent. Seven candidates ran in the presidential election on October 17, and in runoff balloting on November 24 Mamadou Tandja of MNSD-Nassara defeated Mahamdou Issoufou of PND-Tarayya, 60 percent to 40 percent. The MNSD-Nassara also secured a plurality in new assembly balloting on November 24, and in coalition with the CDS-Rahama controlled a comfortable majority of 55 legislative seats. Tandja was inaugurated on December 22 and, upon the recommendation of the assembly, named fellow party member Hama AMADOU as prime minister on December 31. In addition to the MNSD-Nassara and CDS-Rahama, the new cabinet announced on January 5, 2000, also included representatives of two small, nonlegislative parties—the UFPDP-Sawaba and PUND-Salama—as well as two leaders of former Tuareg rebel organizations. However, in a reshuffle on September 17, 2001, the ministers from the UFPDP-Sawaba and PUND-Salama were dropped from the cabinet.

The country's first municipal elections, postponed from May 4, 2004, were successfully held on July 24, 2004, with councilors elected to represent 206 communities.

Tandja was reelected in 2004, after winning the first round of balloting on November 16 and easily defeating Issoufou in second-round balloting on December 4 with 65.5 percent of the vote. He named a new cabinet on December 30, which included five women and retained Amadou as prime minister. The assembly, also elected on December 4, seated seven members from a new party formed earlier in the year by former transitional leader Cheiffou: the Rally for Social Democracy (RSD).

Constitution and Government

In January 1984 President Kountché created a National Charter Commission, largely comprised of CND members, to develop a constitutional framework that was ultimately endorsed in a national referendum on June 14, 1987. On December 17 of the same year, General Saibou announced the formation of a national “reflection committee” to finalize guidelines for the new basic law, which was approved by popular referendum on September 24, 1989. Capping the government structure was the CSON, whose 67 civilian and military members (14 serving as a National Executive Bureau) were elected by the MNSD and whose president became sole candidate for election to the presidency of the republic. The 1989 document, which also provided for a National Assembly of 93 MNSD-approved members and for a judiciary headed by a presidentially appointed Supreme Court, was suspended by the National Conference on August 9, 1991.

By mid-1992 the presidency had been reduced to an essentially symbolic institution, as true executive power was exercised by the prime minister who until early 1993 answered to a quasi-legislative High Council of the Republic (HCR). One of the functions of the HCR was to oversee the drafting of the new basic law, which was approved by national referendum on December 27, 1993. The document provided for a directly elected president to serve a once-renewable five-year term. A presidentially nominated prime minister was responsible to a unicameral National Assembly whose 83 members were also elected for five-year terms.

Upon its ascension to power in early 1996 the CSN military regime suspended the 1993 document and appointed a commission to draft a new charter. The new constitution, which was approved by national referendum on May 12, 1996, featured an executive branch headed by a powerful president, thus clearly distinguishing itself from its predecessors. Meanwhile, in early June the regime created a ten-member High Court of Justice and granted it sole authority to prosecute the president and government members.

The 1996 basic law was suspended by the CRN on April 11, 1999, and an interim Consultative Council (Conseil Consultative—CC) was appointed in May by the new military head of state, Maj. Daouda Malam Wanké, to draft yet another constitution. As approved in a national referendum on July 18, the new basic law accorded strong power to the president to prevent a reoccurrence of the difficulties experienced in interpreting the 1993 document with regard to the authority of the prime minister versus the president.

Foreign Relations

Prior to the 1974 coup Niger pursued a moderate line in foreign affairs, avoiding involvement in East-West issues and maintaining friendly relations with neighboring states, except for a brief period of territorial friction with Dahomey (subsequently Benin) in 1963–1964. The Kountché government established diplomatic links with a number of communist states, including China and the Soviet Union, and adopted a conservative posture in regional affairs, including a diplomatic rupture with Libya from January 1981 to March 1982. Tripoli was periodically charged thereafter with backing anti-Niamey forces, including those involved in a late 1983 coup attempt and northern Tuareg rebel activity in 1985 and 1990. However, a bilateral security agreement in December 1990 eased tensions between Niger and Libya.

Niamey’s relations with neighboring Algeria and Mali have been complicated since October 1991 by the resurgence of militant Tuareg activities across their shared borders. In March 1992 a meeting between Prime Minister Cheiffou and Tuareg officials in Algeria yielded a two-week truce. However, the truce was allowed to lapse, and in February 1993 Nigerien and Malian troops clashed, after reportedly mistaking each other for Tuareg units. The January 1996 military coup in Niger drew condemnation from both regional and international observers, with France, the European Union, and the United States suspending aid payments. Although Paris resumed cooperation in March 1996, Washington reiterated its stance following the controversial July presidential elections.

A number of regional and other international capitals condemned the military takeover in April 1999; France, for example, promptly broke off its relations with Niger and suspended all aid. Such pressure was considered influential in the subsequent quick return to civilian rule, after which normal international relations were reestablished and external financial assistance was resumed.

In May 2000 a long-standing dispute between Niger and Benin over ownership of Lete Island and a number of smaller islands in the Niger River resurfaced. After mediation by the Organization of African Unity (OAU, subsequently the African Union—AU) failed to produce successful border delineation, the case was submitted to the International Court of Justice (ICJ) in mid-2001. In 2005 the ICJ ruled that 16 of the 25 disputed islands, including Lete, belonged to Niger.

Current Issues

Although the events of April 1999 had, in the opinion of many observers, all the earmarks of a military coup d'état, CRN Chair Wanké did not acknowledge any involvement in the killing of President Maïnassara. Instead, he argued that the junta had assumed power only as a result of the chaos that ensued following the “tragic accident.” In any event, it did not appear that an intense investigation into the death of the manifestly unpopular Maïnassara would be conducted, as the general populace and political party leaders seemed primarily concerned with the junta's plans for return to civilian government—which, to the surprise of some analysts, was accomplished rather smoothly by the end of the year. (Wanké died on September 15, 2004, at age 58.) Both the presidential and legislative polls were described as fairly conducted by international observers, and the results were accepted in most domestic quarters. The administration of President Tandja, who had campaigned on a platform calling for national unity, was widely credited by the international financial community for having stabilized the economy. However, the newly formed opposition group known as the Coordination of Democratic Forces (Coordination des Forces Démocratiques—CFD) criticized the government for “ruling by edict” in order to accommodate the IMF and other lenders. The CFD organized street protests and presented several censure motions in the assembly, which were ultimately unsuccessful. Eyebrows were also raised by the decision to grant amnesty to everyone involved in the 1996 coup and the events of April 1999. Also, the government faced pressure from student protesters and Islamic organizations, some of whom had been banned in November 2000 for “disturbing the peace.” On a positive note, however, most former rebel groups were officially disarmed as of mid-2000; a weapons-burning ceremony in September symbolized the end of large-scale rebellion.

Tension between the government and the opposition continued into 2002, with the opposition criticizing the government's heavy-handed response to a midyear mutiny by soldiers in the southeastern town of Diffa over payment arrears and working conditions. Although the revolt was quickly squashed, the government limited civil liberties and press freedoms. In April 2003 a pilot project was launched to rid the southeast Nigerien region near Chad of weapons. Under the auspices of the UN, communities that handed in small arms were to receive public works and health and education assistance.

Slavery continues to be a major part of the culture and in March 2005 some 3,000 people in the capital protested the detention of anti-slavery activists. The government, for its part, denies that slavery exists. Niger faced a food crisis in 2005, which government authorities refused to label a “famine” despite the dire needs of a third of the population. UN and other aid was lagging, which analysts said was due to similar suffering by some 4 million people in other poor regions. By 2006, the IMF joined the now urgent appeal for donor assistance. Violent protests and kidnappings of petroleum industry workers occurred at midyear, reportedly by militant groups angered over what they said was the lack of oil profits being used to aid impoverished communities.

Political Parties

Political parties were not permitted in Niger during the more than 13 years of the Kountché regime. The National Movement for a Developing Society (MNSD, below) was established as a government formation in 1988, and some 15 parties received provisional recognition in the five months following President Saibou's November 1990 acceptance of a multiparty system. All party activity was suspended in the wake of the January 1996 coup, but the ban was soon lifted on May 19. However, the new standards guiding party formations and activities were described as restrictive. Nevertheless, numerous coalitions were formed in 1996–1998, though alliances continued changing. Most notably, the once powerful Alliance of Forces of Change (Alliance des Forces de Changement—AFC) appeared to have collapsed by the late 1990s. (For further information on the AFC, see p. 680 of the 1998 Handbook.)

Political party activity was suspended immediately following the April 1999 military takeover; however, within days of President Mainassara's death the leading opposition groups announced their intention to cooperate with the military junta, and the suspension was lifted.

In March 2000 the PND-S-Tarayya, RDP-Jamaa, ANDP-Zaman Lahiya, and a number of smaller parties formed a loose antigovernment coalition called the Coordination of Democratic Forces (Coordination des Forces Démocratiques—CFD). In response the MNSD-Nassara and several allies, including the CDS-Rahama, announced the creation of an Alliance of Democratic Forces (Alliance des Forces Démocratiques—AFD) in July. The ANDP-Zaman Lahiya joined the AFD coalition on July 8, 2002.

The following year the CFD protested President Tandja's coalition approval of a new law eliminating the requirement that ministers seeking elected office must first resign from their government position. The CFD members were angry that they had not been consulted, as electoral changes were usually made by consensus in the past.

Government Parties

National Movement for a Developing Society–Victory (Mouvement National pour une Société de Développement Nassara—MNSD-Nassara). General Saibou announced the formation of the MNSD on August 2, 1988. Rejecting calls for a multiparty system, he claimed that the new group would allow for the “plural expression of opinions and ideological sensibilities,” while paving the way for a normalization of politics in Niger.

General Saibou was reelected MNSD chair at a party congress on March 12–18, 1991, during which a transition to multipartism was formally endorsed. The military also announced its withdrawal from politics, and the MNSD added the Hausa word Nassara (Victory) to its name. On July 12, just as the party prepared to enter the competitive arena, Saibou resigned his chairmanship, citing a need to serve in a nonpartisan capacity.

At legislative balloting on February 14, 1993, the MNSD-Nassara secured 29 seats, 7 more than its nearest competitor; however, the subsequent formation of the AFC coalition relegated the then-ruling party to minority status. Accusing the new group of procedural irregularities, the MNSD-Nassara refused to promote a candidate for the National Assembly presidency in April; thereafter, it spearheaded numerous protests against the government's alleged “constitutional violations.” In October ten party members were sentenced to prison for engaging in violent clashes with security forces, and in March 1994 Mamadou Tandja, the MNSD-Nassara's leader and former 1993 presidential candidate, was arrested for his alleged role in an antigovernment demonstration in Niamey.

The MNSD-Nassara again captured 29 seats in legislative balloting in January 1995, thus retaining its position as the dominant partner in the parliamentary coalition it had led since late 1994. Tandja secured 15.65 percent of the vote during presidential balloting in July 1996. Tandja and his fellow PND-Tarayya and CDS-Rahama presidential competitors (below) subsequently sought to have the elections nullified, claiming “massive fraud,” but the Supreme Court promptly dismissed their petitions.

In September 1996 the MNSD-Nassara joined the PND-Tarayya, CDS-Rahama, and several other small groups in launching the Front for the Restoration and Defense of Democracy (Front pour la Restauration et la Défense de la Démocratie—FRDD), which immediately became the primary opposition to the Maïnassara regime. The leaders of the front demanded the restoration of the “original” Independent National Commission (CENI), equal access to the media, and supervision of the balloting by the Organization of African Unity and/or the United Nations as preconditions for FRDD participation in the upcoming national elections. Despite some apparent compromise on the part of the government, the FRDD ultimately called for a boycott of the legislative balloting.

Following prodemocracy demonstrations in Niamey in early January 1997, the leaders of the three main FRDD components were arrested and reportedly threatened with prosecution by a tribunal especially created for that purpose by President Maïnassara. However, the party leaders and 60 other detainees were released ten days later and immediately urged the resumption of antigovernment demonstrations.

Each of three main FRDD components presented its own presidential candidate in the first round of balloting in 1999, and Mamadou Tandja led with 32.3 percent. Thanks in part to the support of former president Mahamane Ousmane of the CDS-Rahama, Tandja was elected with 59.9 percent of the vote in the second round. For the November 1999 legislative balloting the MNSD-Nassara was portrayed as still aligned with the CDS-Rahama, but no longer with the PND-Tarayya.

Tandja again took the lead in the presidential elections of 2004, taking 40.7 percent of the vote in the first round of balloting on November 16. He retained his post in the second round of balloting on December 4 with a resounding victory (65.5 percent of the vote) by striking alliances with ANDP-Zaman Lahiya candidate Moumouni Djermakoye (who was fifth in first-round balloting) and Amadou Cheiffou of the Rally for Social Democracy-Gaskiya who ran as an independent (fourth in the first round), and gaining the support of the CDS’s Ousmane, who garnered just 24.6 percent of votes in the first round, and Hamid ALGABID of the Democratic Rally of the People-Jamaa (sixth place in the first round). MNSD captured 47 legislative seats, a gain of 9 from the previous elections, though it failed to gain an absolute majority of the expanded 113-member assembly (see Legislature, below). The legislative election coincided with the second round of the presidential elections on December 4.

Leaders: Col. (Ret.) Mamadou TANDJA (President of the Republic), Hama AMADOU (Prime Minister of the Republic and Secretary General of the Party).

Democratic and Social Convention—*Rahama
(Convention Démocrate et Sociale—Rahama—CDS-Rahama). In the legislative balloting of February 1993 CDS-Rahama captured 22 seats, the most of any opposition party. Its candidate Mahamane Ousmane, who had finished second in the first round of balloting, captured the presidency with 54.42 percent of the vote in the second round of presidential balloting on March 27. In January 1995 the party increased its assembly representation to 24 seats. Ousmane was ousted from office in the January 1996 coup; his bid to regain the presidency in the July balloting fell short as he came in second (at least according to government tallies) with 19.75 percent of the vote. He finished a close third in the first round of presidential balloting in 1999 with 22.5 percent of the vote. The CDS-Rahama subsequently threw its support behind Mamadou Tandja of the MNSD-Nassara for the second round. In the 2004 presidential balloting, Ousmane was again third in the first round of voting, and again threw his support behind Tandja in the second round. CDS-Rahama won 22 seats in the assembly balloting of 2004.

Leaders: Mahamane OUSMANE (Speaker of the National Assembly and Former President of the Republic), Nabram ISSOUFOU.

Nigerien Alliance for Democracy and Progress-Zaman Lahiya (Alliance Nigérienne pour la Démocratie et le Progrès-Zaman Lahiya—ANDP-Zaman Lahiya). On August 28, 1992, ANDP-Zaman Lahiya vice president Birgi Raffini, a former Saibou government official, was arrested during an army crackdown on suspected FLAA rebels and sympathizers. He was released in early 1993, and his party won 11 seats in legislative balloting that February. ANDP-Zaman Lahiya's candidate, Moumouni Adamou Djermakoye, secured only 15 percent of the vote in the first round of presidential balloting, but his support for the CDS-Rahama's Ousmane was described as pivotal to Ousmane's presidential victory. In April Djermakoye was named National Assembly president. The party's legislative representation fell to 9 seats in January 1995.

At presidential balloting in July 1996 Djermakoye received only 4.77 percent of the vote, finishing last in the five-candidate field. The ANDP-Zaman Lahiya was the only major party not to boycott the November 1996 elections, at which it secured eight seats.

In 1998 the ANDP-Zaman Lahiya joined the PUND-Salama and the PNA (see below) to form a pro-Mainassara group called the Alliance of Democratic Social Forces (Alliance des Forces Démocratiques et Sociales—AFDS). Djermakoye won 7.7 percent of the votes in the first round of presidential balloting in 1999 and endorsed Mahamadou Issoufou of the PNDS-Tarayya in the second round. The ANDP-Zaman Lahiya agreed to join the progovernment Alliance of Democratic Forces in 2002.

In 2004, presidential candidate Djermakoye received only 6.1 percent of the vote in the first round of balloting, the fifth of six candidates. Since his party belongs to the ruling coalition, his support in the second round likely went to Tandje. ANDP-Zaman Lahiya won five seats in the assembly election of 2004.

Leaders: Moumouni Adamou DJERMAKOYE (Party President, 1999 and 2004 presidential candidate, and Former National Assembly President), Birgi RAFFINI (Vice President).

Rally for Social Democracy-Gaskiya (Rassemblement pour Sociale Démocrate—RSD-Gaskiya). The RSD-Gaskiya split off from CDS in January 2004. Amadou Cheiffou, a former transitional prime minister from 1991 to 1993 and party leader, ran as an independent presidential candidate in 2004, receiving only 6.3 percent of the vote in the first round of balloting. However, the new party did win seven seats in the assembly and subsequent representation in the cabinet of President Tandje.

Leader and founder: Amadou CHEIFFOU (Former Prime Minister and 2004 presidential candidate).

Democratic Rally of the People-Jamaa (Rassemblement Démocratique du Peuple-Jamaa—RDP-Jamaa). The RDP-Jamaa held its inaugural congress on August 14–19, 1997, and was the party of then-President Mainassara. Thereafter the party emerged as the leader of a loose coalition of parties that supported the president. At local and municipal polling in early 1999, the RDP-Jamaa reportedly captured the largest number of seats; however, the military junta that came to power in April nullified the balloting.

Intraparty fighting erupted over the choice of a 1999 presidential nominee, leading former Prime Minister Amadou Boubacar Cissé and his supporters to leave the party (see UDR, below). Meanwhile, Hamid Algabid of the RDP-Jamaa won 10.9 percent of the vote in the first round of presidential balloting and supported Mahamadou Issoufou of the PNDS-Tarayya in the second round. In the first round of presidential elections in 2004, Algabid won only 4.9 percent of the vote, finishing in last place. He supported Tandja in the second round. The party won only six seats in the Assembly elections of 2004.

Leaders: Hamid ALGABID (Chair and 1999 and 2004 presidential candidate), Abdourahamane SEYDOU (Secretary General).

Other Legislative Parties

Nigerien Party for Democracy and Socialism–Tarayya (Parti Nigerien pour la Démocratie et le Socialism–Tarayya—PNDS–Tarayya). In the legislative election of February 1993 the PNDS–Tarayya, then affiliated with the AFC, won 13 seats. Having gained only a 16 percent vote share in the first round of 1993 presidential balloting, party leader and presidential candidate Mahamadou Issoufou was eliminated from the runoff election; he was subsequently named prime minister.

On September 25, 1994, the PNDS–Tarayya withdrew from the AFC, claiming that it had been “betrayed” by its coalition partners, and three days later Issoufou resigned his prime ministerial post. In mid-October the PNDS–Tarayya joined with the MNSD–Nassara in a successful nonconfidence motion against the Souley government. In the January 1995 legislative poll the party won 12 seats; Issoufou was then elected National Assembly president. He captured 7.6 percent of the vote as the party’s standard-bearer in the July 1996 presidential elections. He fared significantly better in 1999, finishing second in the first round with 22.8 percent of the vote before losing the runoff with 40.1 percent. Once aligned with the MNSD–Nassara and the CDR–Rahama in the FRDD, the PNDS–Tarayya competed against those parties in the 1999 legislative balloting in alliance with the RDP–Jamaa and ANDR–Zaman Lahiya.

Issoufou faced a runoff with incumbent President Tandja in 2004, after winning 24.6 percent of the votes in first-round balloting. In the second round, Tandja handily defeated his rival with 65.5 percent of the vote. However, the PNDS–Tarayya ran in coalition with a number of small parties and won 17 seats in the 2004 legislative election (see Legislature, below).

Leaders: Mahamadou ISSOUFOU (Former National Assembly President and 1999 and 2004 presidential candidate), Mohammed BAZOUM.

Nigerien Democratic Front–Mutunci

(Front Démocratique Nigerien–Mutunci—FDN–Mutunci). The launching of the FDN–Mutunci in late January 1995 represented a redefinition of the Nigerien Progressive Party (Parti Progressiste Nigerien—PPN), which had previously operated as the local section of the African Democratic Rally (Rassemblement Démocratique Africain—RDA) under the PPN/RDA rubric. The new name was adopted shortly after the group withdrew from the AFC, as it was being increasingly dominated by CDS–Rahama. The platform advanced by the FDN–Mutunci calls for the “preservation” of Niger’s sovereignty and the “strengthening of national cohesion.” The party won one seat at the January 1995 balloting and none in November 1996.

Ide Oumarou was elected chair of FDN–Mutunci at a party congress in October 1998. Thereafter, he announced that the group (still widely referred to as the PPN/RDA) would align itself with parties supporting President Maïnassara. It ran in coalition with smaller parties for the 2004 assembly elections (see Legislature, below).

Former party chair Ide Oumarou died in February 2002. At the time of his death he had been vying with RDA leader Abdoulaye Diori Hamani, son of the country’s first president, for chairmanship of the party.

Leaders: Dan Dicko DANKOLODO (Former Chair), Oumarou Garba YOUSOUFOU (1993 presidential candidate), Léopold KAZIENDE.

Niger Party for Self-Management (Parti Nigérien pour l’Autogestion—PNA). Former CDS vice chair Sanoussi Jackou formed the PNA in early 1997. It supported Mamadou Tandja in the 1999 presidential balloting despite its previous affiliation with the AFDS. Chair Jackou received a four-month suspended prison sentence in May 2002 after he was accused of slander and inciting racial hatred. In January 2005 he was released after serving a one-month prison sentence for insulting an ethnic group during a radio broadcast.

In the 2004 legislative elections the PNA allied in various coalitions along with PNDSTaraya (see Legislature, below).

Leader: Sanoussi JACKOU.

Nigerien Social Democratic Party—Alheri (Parti Social Démocrate du Niger—Alheri—PSDN—Alheri). At legislative balloting in January 1995 the PSDN—Alheri increased its representation from one seat to two. The group did not appear to participate in the November 1996 balloting, but it returned in 2004 to regain one seat.

Leaders: Gagara GREIMA, Malam Adjil WAZIRI, Katzelma Omar Mahaman TAYA (1993 presidential candidate).

Other Parties

Union of Popular Forces for Democracy and Progress—Sawaba (Union des Forces Populaires pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—Sawaba—UFPDP—Sawaba). The UFPDP—Sawaba is an offshoot of the UDN—Sawaba (below). It was led by Djibo Bakary, a 74-year-old former prime minister and former opponent of President Diouri, from May 1957 to December 1958. He was unanimously elected party president in February 1992. Running on a platform calling for national unity and increased dialogue with the Tuareg rebels, Bakary captured 1.68 percent of the presidential vote in February 1993. The party lost both of its former legislative seats in January 1995 and was equally unsuccessful in the November 1996 balloting. Bakary died in 1998.

The UFPDP—Sawaba supported Mamadou Tandja in the 1999 presidential poll and was rewarded with a cabinet seat in the January 2000 government. However, the UFPDP—Sawaba minister, Issoufou Assoumane, was not reappointed in the September 2001 reshuffle; he formed a new political party (USN, below) in October.

Party for National Unity and Development—Salama (Parti pour l'Unité Nationale et le Développement—Salama—PUND—Salama). Previously unknown, the pro-Tuareg PUND—Salama won three assembly seats in January 1995, including two seats in non-Tuareg districts, but was unsuccessful in the November 1996 balloting.

Although aligned with the ANDP—Zaman Lahiya in the pro-Mainassara AFDS (launched in 1998), the PUND—Salama supported Mamadou Tandja of the MNSD—Nassara in the 1999 presidential campaign. The PUND—Salama was accorded a seat in the January 2000 cabinet but lost the post in the September 2001 reshuffle.

Leader: Pascal MAMADOU.

National Union of Independents for Democratic Renewal (Union Nationale des Indépendants pour le Renouveau Démocratique—UNIRD). The UNIRD was launched in 1996 as an electoral vehicle for supporters of President Mainassara. It won 56 seats in the November assembly balloting and 3 more at subsequent by-elections, its political dominance enhanced even further by pledges of support from several smaller legislative parties and independents. However, its presidential candidate, Amadou Djibo, won only 1.7 percent of the vote in the first round of presidential balloting, so the party endorsed Mahamadou Issoufou in the second round. The UNIRD secured no seats in the 1999 legislative poll.

Leaders: Moutari MOUSSA (Former Speaker of the National Assembly), Amadou DJIBO (1999 presidential candidate).

Union of Democratic Patriots and Progressives—Chamoua (Union des Patriotes Démocratiques et Progressistes—Chamoua—UPDP—Chamoua). The UPDP—Chamoua is led by André Salifou, who was named National Conference chair in August 1991. Salifou's position in the transitional government disqualified him from running for the presidency, and the party advanced Illa Kane, who captured only 2.55 percent of the vote.

In April 1994 Salifou and a number of UPDP-Chamoua activists were arrested for alleged involvement in an antigovernment demonstration reportedly triggered by President Ousmane's attempts to marginalize his AFC partners. Subsequently, the UPDP-Chamoua broke from the AFC, and in January 1995 the party lost one of its two assembly seats. The party won four seats in the November 1996 legislative balloting, at which time it was described as aligned with the UNIRD in support of the Maïnassara regime. Salifou won 2.1 percent of the vote in the first round of the 1999 presidential balloting.

Leader: André SALIFOU (Chair and 1999 presidential candidate).

Party for People's Dignity (Parti pour la Dignité du Peuple-Daraja—PDP-Daraja). The PDP-Daraja was launched in October 1995 and secured three assembly seats in November 1996. It supported Mamadou Tandja in the second round of the 1999 presidential poll.

Leader: Ali TALBA.

Workers' Movement Party—Albarka (Parti du Mouvement des Travailleurs—Albarka—PMT-Albarka). The PMT-Albarka was formed in the early 1990s by the merger of the People's Union for Democratic Action (Union Monde pour l'Action Démocratique—UMAD) and the Workers' Liberation Party. The group won two seats in the 1996 legislative balloting. It supported Mamadou Tandja in the 1999 presidential balloting.

Leader: Omar Idi ANGO.

Movement for Democracy and Progress—Alkawali (Mouvement pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—Alkawali—MDP-Alkawali). The MDP-Alkawali, also called the Movement for Democracy and Panafricanism, secured one seat in the 1996 assembly balloting. It supported Mamadou Tandja in the 1999 presidential campaign.

Leader: Dr. Mai Manga BOUKAR.

Union for Democracy and Progress (Union pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—UDP). The UDP was one of several small parties to participate in the launching of the FRDD. However, at intraparty balloting in 1998 Abdoulaye Tondi defeated the incumbent UDP president, Bello Tiousso GARBA, and the party subsequently moved into the propresidential camp. In 1999 the UDP supported Mamadou Tandja for president.

Leader: Abdoulaye TONDI (President).

Union for Democracy and Social Progress—Amana (Union pour la Démocratie et le Progrès Social—Amana—UDPS-Amana). On August 28, 1992, (then) UDPS-Amana leader Akoli Daouel was imprisoned during the army's crackdown on suspected Tuareg dissidents.

A deadly grenade attack on a UDPS-Amana meeting at Agades in October 1994 was blamed on Tuaregs angered by ongoing negotiations with the government. Thereafter, in the legislative balloting of January 1995, the party doubled its parliamentary representation to two seats.

Although technically an opposition grouping, the UDPS-Amana was awarded a cabinet portfolio by Prime Minister Amadou in February 1995. However, under pressure from opposition allies, who termed the appointment "regrettable," the minister was expelled from the party. The UDPS-Amana won three seats in the November 1996 assembly elections.

Leaders: Mohamed ABDULLAHI (Chair), Mohamed MOUSSA, Akoli DAOUEL.

Nigerien Democratic Union—Sawaba (Union Démocratique Nigerien—Sawaba—UDN-Sawaba). The UDN-Sawaba failed to win any seats in the legislative balloting of February 1993 or January 1995.

Leader: Karimou MAMAN.

Niger National Front (Front National du Niger—FNN). The FNN was launched in early 1993 on a platform calling for "greater justice" for Peulh nomads through reversal of "persecution and arbitrary actions" against the group.

Leader: Salifou SADIKOU (Secretary General).

Other parties and groups active in 2001 included the Union of Independent Nigeriens (UNI), led by Djibo Tinder; the Union for Democracy and the Republic—Tabbat (UDR-Tabbat); the radical Islamist Alliance for Democracy and Progress (Alliance pour la Démocratie et le Progrès—Zumunci—ADP-Zumunci), led by Issoufou BACHAR; the Democratic and Socialist Renewal Union (Union Démocratique et Socialiste du Renouveau—UDSR), led by Ibrahim Abdou GAUGE; the left-wing Revolutionary and Democratic Organization of Niger (Organisation Révolutionnaire et Démocratique du Niger—ORDN); the Nigerien Party for Socialism (Parti Nigérien pour le Socialisme—Imani—PNS-Imani), led by Boukari Maman SANI; the Party for Democracy and Renewal (Parti pour la Démocratie et le Redressement—PRD), led by Moumouni YACOUBA; the Party of Consultation and Peace (Parti de la Concertation et de la Paix—Chawara—PCP-Chawara), led by Katzelma Omar TAYA; the Patriotic Movement for Solidarity and Progress (Mouvement Patriotique pour la Solidarité et le Progrès—Anoura—MPSP-Anoura), led by Moussa OUMAROU; the Popular Front of National Liberation (Front Populaire de Libération Nationale—Chamsya—FPLN-Chamsya), led by Jamboy Sabo DIALLO; the Rally for a Green Sahel (Rassemblement pour un Sahel Vert—Niima—RSV-Niima), led by Adamou GARBA; the Republican Party for Liberties and the Progress of Niger (Parti Républicain pour les Libertés et le Progrès de Niger—Nakowa—PRLPN-Nakowa), led by Alka ALMOU; the Revolutionary Organization for the Defense of Democracy (Organisation Révolutionnaire pour la Défense de la Démocratie—ORDD), led by Mama SUNI; the Revolutionary Organization for the New Democracy (Organisation Révolutionnaire pour la Démocratie Nouvelle—Tarmamoua—ORDN-Tarmamoua), led by Maman Sadi ADAMOU; the Union for Democracy and Republic (Union pour la Démocratie et la République—UDR), a splinter from the RDP-Jama'a formed in September 1999 by former prime minister Amadou Boubacar CISSÉ; the Union for the Republic (Union pour la République—UPR), led by Karimou MAMAN; the Union of Independent Democrats (Union des Démocrates Indépendants—UDI) led by Ali Sirfi MAIGA; the Union of Nigerien Socialists (Union des Socialistes Nigérien—USN), a splinter from the UFDPD-Sawaba formed in October 2001 by Issoufou ASSOUMANE, who was the minister of environment and desertification in Hama Amadou's cabinet until September 17, 2001.

Former Rebel Groups

Organization of the Armed Resistance (Organisation de la Résistance Armée—ORA). ORA emerged in March 1995 upon the temporary demise of the CRA when the FLAA withdrew from the coalition (see below). Successful implementation of a final peace agreement, signed by Rhissa ag Boula on behalf of the ORA on April 25, 1995, was viewed as depending on the resolution of differences between the FLAA and CRA chair Mano Dayak. In June the ORA denounced the inclusion of the so-called “self-defense” groups in the proposed amnesty, arguing that the groups were responsible for attacks on Tuareg civilians.

At the end of 1996 the FPLS and the ARLN reportedly left ORA to join the new UFRA (below) in an attempt to “rationalize” the Tuareg leadership situation. At that point it was not clear if Boula's FLAA would maintain the ORA structure, as FLAA appeared to be the dominant, and perhaps only, component in the ORA. Furthermore, the FLAA also appeared to have distanced itself from the 1995 accord. Such concerns were at least temporarily eased in September 1996 when the ORA reportedly integrated a number of its fighters into the government's newly formed “peacekeeping detachment.” (In 1998 the ORA and the CRA turned in their weapons when parliament granted amnesty to the rebel groups in March.) In 1997 Boula was named to the Mayaki government. He remained in the new governments announced in January 2000 and September 2001, but was dismissed from his post as tourism minister in the Tandja government on February 13, 2004. Boula was then arrested and jailed for his alleged involvement in the assassination of a militant member of the ruling party, MNSD-Nassara, in January (see FLAA, below). He was released in March 2005, allegedly after his brother, rebel leader Mohamed ag Boula (see below), claimed he would not release four kidnapped soldiers until his brother was freed. (The hostages returned home in February 2005 after Libya helped secure their release.)

Leaders: Rhissa ag BOULA (Chair), Attaher ABDOULMOUMINE (Vice Chair).

Front for the Liberation of Air and Azaouad (Front de Libération de l’Air et l’Azaouad—FLAA). The Nigerien FLAA is a 400–1,000 member military wing of the greater Tuareg nomadic movement also active in Algeria and Mali. The FLAA “blue people,” so-called because of the staining of their skin by their traditional blue cloth robes, are based in the Air mountains approximately 600 miles northeast of Niamey. The FLAA insurgency began in 1990 in response to the “exploitation and persecution” of the Tuareg nomads and sought the withdrawal of government forces and a broader distribution of the region’s uranium ore wealth—although the Nigerien government denied the existence of any armed Tuareg group until early 1992.

FLAA activity increased dramatically in October 1991, as Tuareg officials criticized the recently concluded National Conference for failing to respect their “needs.” Niamey responded to Tuareg demands for a troop withdrawal and greater autonomy in early 1992 by declaring its readiness to enter into formal negotiations with the insurgents. In mid-March the government reported that it had met with FLAA leaders, and on May 12 Niamey announced a truce, which Algeria and France would help mediate. Two weeks later, however, it accused the FLAA of violating the accord and authorized the army to take responsibility for security in the north. On August 27 Nigerien troops, later described as renegades by Niamey, launched a crackdown on alleged FLAA dissidents and sympathizers and arrested 186 people, including prominent Tuareg officials in the transitional government. The FLAA declared war and launched a series of offensives in early September. On September 14 FLAA representatives in Paris called on the United Nations to help end the “arbitrary treatment and terror imposed on the Tuareg civilian community.”

Although the government claimed to have released 57 of the Tuareg detainees by late December 1992, the FLAA issued an ultimatum on December 31, threatening an even deeper crisis if all Tuareg prisoners were not immediately released. On January 9, 1993, nine MNSD-Nassara negotiators were killed and 20 FLAA fighters were killed or wounded when the FLAA launched an attack on the venue of negotiations with traditional Tuareg chiefs. In mid-March the FLAA, responding to MNSD-Nassara electoral losses, announced a truce as a peace offering to the new government; in April it released 26 prisoners of war and agreed to extend the truce as a goodwill gesture to President Ousmane. However, by midyear the party was buffeted by the defection of a number of top officials, led by Mano Dayak.

After the arrest of Rhissa ag Boula (see ORA, above), a leftist publication reported that resistance fighters had met in April 2004 and agreed to reestablish FLAA. In October 2004, combatants claiming to be members of FLAA clashed with government troops in the Air Mountains. Mohamed ag BOULA, brother of FLAA founder Rhissa ag Boula, claimed responsibility for the attack. In 2005 it was reported that several hundred former FLAA members had joined the Libyan army (some analysts said Tripoli was suspected of financing the Tuareg rebellion in 1991).

Leaders: Mohamed ag BOULA, Mohammed EWANGAI.

Union of Forces of the Armed Resistance (Union des Forces de la Résistance Armée—UFRA). The UFRA was formed in November 1996 by the FPLS and the ARLN (theretofore members of the ORA), the FFL, and three other groups: the People's Army for the Liberation of the North (Armée du Peuple pour la Libération du Nord—APLN), the Popular Front for the Liberation of Northern Niger (Front Populaire pour la Libération du Niger Nord—FPLNN), and the United Revolutionary Movement (Mouvement Révolutionnaire Uni—MRU). It was reported that a ten-member executive committee had been established under the chairmanship of the FPLS's Mohamed Anako, who endorsed the April 1995 accord with the government and called upon other Tuareg groups to join UFRA to complete its implementation. Although one stated goal of the UFRA was to reduce confusion concerning the Tuareg leadership, its immediate effect was just the opposite.

In September 1996 the UFRA was among the rebel groups reported to have been integrated into the national "peacekeeping detachment." However, amid reports that its leadership was unhappy with government "mop up" offensives in early September 1997, the UFRA rejected the government's call for all rebel groups to complete disarmament procedures by September 30 and formed an alliance with the FARS, the Coalition of Toubou and Tuareg Armed Resistance. Clashes between the new alliance and government forces left at least 50 people dead before a cease-fire was announced in November. In June 1998 it was reported that the UFRA had completely disarmed.

Leader: Mohamed ANAKO (Chair).

Popular Front for the Liberation of the Sahara (Front Populaire pour la Libération de la Sahara—FPLS). The FPLS was launched on January 28, 1994, by Mohamed Anako and Issad Kato, who pledged to cooperate with existing Tuareg groups. In April 1999, Anako was reportedly appointed minister without portfolio and special adviser to head of state Maj. Daouda Wanké, a move some observers said was meant to avert further violence following Wanké's ascension after the assassination of President Maïnassara.

Leaders: Mohamed ANAKO, Issad KATO.

Revolutionary Army for the Liberation of Northern Niger (Armée Révolutionnaire pour la Libération du Niger Nord—ARLN). The ARLN refused to participate in negotiations with the government in October 1993, but reversed that position in 1994. Emerging from splits within the ARLN in October 1994 and March 1995 were the Liberation Forces Front (Front des Forces pour la Libération—FFL) and the Revolutionary Liberation Movement of the North (Mouvement Révolutionnaire pour la Libération du Niger Nord—MRLN), led by Ibrahim ROUMAR.

Leader: Mohammed ABDOULMOUMINE.

Coordination of Armed Resistance (Coordination de la Résistance Armée—CRA). Originally formed in January 1994 by the FLAA, FPLS, ARLN, and FLT (below), the CRA met in Tenere in early February to elect an executive bureau and draft a platform calling for the creation of an autonomous Tuareg territory and Tuareg representation in the armed forces, government, and National Assembly. The coalition participated in talks with the government in Ouagadougou, Burkina Faso, in late February and in Paris in June, which ultimately resulted in a preliminary peace accord on October 9.

The CRA splintered in March 1995 following a disagreement between FLAA leader Boula and CRA chair Mano Dayak over the latter's approach to renewed peace negotiations. Immediately thereafter, Boula reorganized the CRA members, including the Dayak-led FLT, under the ORA banner; however, in June the FLT withdrew from the coalition. In July Dayak announced that he had revived the CRA; he would no longer respect the peace agreement and further negotiations would have to include his new Toubou and Arab allies (below).

In October 1995 FLT militants were accused of violating the peace accord; however, Dayak continued to negotiate with the government, and CRA officials pledged to proceed with peace talks following his death in a plane crash in December. Thereafter, at a summit of the leaders of the

Cabinet

As of June 1, 2006

Prime Minister Hama Amadou

Ministers

Agricultural Development	Labo Moussa
Animal Resources	Abdoulaye Djina
Basic Education and Literacy	Hamani Harouna
Civil Service and Labor	Kanda Siptey [f]
Commerce and Promotion of the Private Sector	Habi Mahamadou Salissou
Culture, Arts, and Communication	Oumarou Hadary
Equipment	Seini Oumarou
Finance and Economy	Ali Lamine Zeine
Foreign Affairs, Cooperation, and African Integration	Aïchatou Mindaoudou [f]
Government Spokesman	Mohamed Ben Omar
Handicrafts and Tourism	Amadou Nouhou
Interior and Decentralization	Mounkaila Modi
Justice and Keeper of the Seals	Mati Moussa
Mines and Energy	Mohamed Abdoulahi
National Defense	Hassane "Bonto" Souley
Population and Social Development	Boukari Zila Mahamadou [f]
Privatization and Restructuring of Enterprises	Gazobi Laouali Rahamou [f]
Promotion of Women and Protection of Children	Ousmane Zeinabou Moulaye
Public Health and the Fight Against Endemic Diseases	Ary Ibrahim
Relations with Institutions	Mohamed Ben Omar
Secondary and Higher Education, Research, and Technology	Ousmane Galadima
Territorial and Community Development	Mahaman Moussa
Transport	Souleymane Kane
Urban Affairs, Housing, and Census	Diallo Aïssa Abdoulaye
Vocational Education, in Charge of Youth Employment	Abdou Daouda
Water Resources, Environment, and the Fight Against Desert Encroachment	Abdou Labo
Youth and Sport	Abdourahamane Seydou

Secretaries of State

Economic Reform	Hamida Arzake
Endemic Diseases	Abdoulwahid Halimatou Ousseini [f]

[f] = female

Tuareg and Toubou fronts in Kawar on March 8, 1996, the CRA agreed to recognize the 1995 peace accord and joined the others in declaring a unilateral ceasefire as a sign of support for the military regime. Consequently, the junta offered to include the CRA in its "application" of the treaty, and the group signed the accord on April 2.

A split between the CRA and the ORA was reported in November 1996, with the emergence of the new UFRA (see above). Included in the “new” CRA were a number of Toubou and Arab autonomous movements based in the southeast who had complained of being ignored by the peace process.

Leaders: Mohamed AOUTCHEKI Kriska (FLT), Mohammed AKOTE.

Front for the Liberation of Tamoust

(Front pour la Libération de Tamoust—FLT). The FLT was launched in July 1993 by Mano Dayak, previously one of the FLAA’s chief negotiators, and a number of other former FLAA officials who sought continuation of the truce agreement reached with Niamey in March. The FLT was the only Tuareg group to renew the accord in September; a month later its status was bolstered by the addition of another FLAA defector, Mohamed Aoutcheki Kriska.

FLT officials reportedly welcomed the 1996 coup, asserting that the military could “settle certain questions which could not be settled during the period of democracy,” and on February 22 Aoutcheki was named as a special adviser to CSN Chair Maïnassara.

Leaders: Mohamed AOUTCHEKI Kriska, Mohammed EKIIJI (Secretary General).

Democratic Renewal Front

(Front Démocratique pour le Renouveau—FDR). The FDR surfaced in May 1994 in the Lake Chad region under the leadership of Cpl. Ahmed Mohammed, a Nigerien who had served in the Libyan army. A militant group of members from the Arab Choa, Toubou, and Kanouri ethnic groups (who Mohammed claimed had been excluded from the greater Tuareg movement), the FDR professed dedication to “conducting the political and military battle” necessary to bring about the “annihilation” of the present governing system. The FDR’s platform also advocated the division of Niger into federal states with boundaries conforming to “geographical and social reality.”

In the first half of 1995 the FDR’s clashes with government and Tuareg forces reportedly left over 40 people dead. At the same time, the group called attempts to implement the April 1995 peace accord the “facade of democracy” and urged Niamey to recognize their demands for autonomy. FDR/government clashes continued throughout 1996 and 1997.

In August 1998 the FDR signed a peace accord with the government, and party spokesperson Issa Lamine was named to the cabinet in January 2000.

Leaders: Cpl. Ahmed MOHAMMED, Mamane KODELAMI Ali, Goukouni ZENE, Issa LAMINE (Spokesperson).

Rebel Group

Armed Revolutionary Forces of the Sahara

(Forces Armées Révolutionnaires de la Sahara—FARS). The primarily Toubou and Arab FARS gained international attention in February 1997 for kidnapping a Canadian aid worker and three Nigerien security officials in an effort to dramatize demands for an inquiry into the death of 14 FARS fighters in a clash with government forces the month before. Following peaceful resolution of that crisis, the FARS signed a cease-fire agreement with the government in June; however, that accord proved short-lived, and the FARS was subsequently reported to have formed an alliance with the UFRA before the latter grouping disarmed in 1998. In September 2001 the government launched a major crackdown that, among other things, resulted in the death of a FARS leader, Chahayi BARKAYE. In an effort to establish peace, France agreed to help finance the reintegration of some 250 FARS rebels into the northern region of Bilma.

Leader: Barka OUARDOUGOU.

Legislature

The unicameral National Assembly (Assemblée Nationale) was enlarged to 113 members in 2003, based on an increase of nearly 3 million in the country’s population between 1988 and 2001 (the assembly had previously consisted of 83 members). Members are elected for five-year terms. The assembly elected in January 1995 was dissolved by the National Salvation Council on January 27, 1996, and replaced on March 27 by a 600-member transitional body known as the National Forum for Democratic Renewal, which included former assemblymen as well as members of various advisory groups supportive of the new military regime. Balloting for a new assembly was held on November 23—though it was boycotted by most major opposition groups.

On April 10, 1999, Prime Minister Mayaki suspended the assembly in the wake of the assassination of President Maïnassara. Balloting to refill the body was held on November 24, 1999, with the National Movement for a Developing Society—Victory securing 38 seats; the Democratic and Social Convention—Rahama, 17; the Nigerien Party for Democracy and Socialism—Tarayya, 16; the Democratic Rally of the People—Jamaa, 8; and the Nigerien Alliance for Democracy and Progress—Zaman Lahiya, 4.

The most recent rounds of balloting were held on November 16, 2004, and December 4, 2004. The National Movement for a Developing Society—Victory won 47 seats; the Democratic and Social Convention—Rahama, 22; the Nigerien Party for Democracy and Socialism—Tarayya (PNDS—Tarayya), 17; the coalition of the PNDS—Tarayya, the Niger Progressive Party—African Democratic Rally/Niger Party for Self-Management (PPN—RDA/PNA), 4; the coalition of PNDS—Tarayya, the Union of Independent Nigeriens/Union for Democracy and the Republic—Tabbat, 2; the coalition of the PNDS—Tarayya, the PPN—RDA, 2; and the Nigerien Social Democratic Party—Alheri, 1.

Speaker: Mahamane OUSMANE.

Communications

Press

The following are published in French in Niamey: Le Sahel (5,000), daily news bulletin of the government Information Service; Le Sahel Di- manche (4,000), weekly publication of the government Information Service. An independent monthly, La Marche, was introduced in August 1989, while an independent weekly, La Républicain (3,000), commenced publication in 1991. Other publications include Le Tribune du Peuple (3,000), daily in French, and the weekly, Le Démocrate. There are a number of other small newspapers, some of which were subjected in 2000 to government crackdowns, which, in turn, led journalists to charge that the administration was intent on “silencing” the independent press. Journalists in Niger have been periodically arrested and detained on charges of defamation and “inciting ethnic hatred.”

News Agency

The government launched Agence Nigérienne de Press (ANP) in late 1986.

Broadcasting and Computing

The Office de Radiodiffusion-Télévision du Niger (ORTN) operates La Voix du Sahel, a government radio service broadcasting in French, English, and indigenous languages, and also services nine television stations. There were approximately 576,000 television receivers and 8,000 personal computers serving 17,500 Internet users in 2003.

Intergovernmental Representation

Ambassador to the U.S.

Aminata Maiga DJIBRILLA

U.S. Ambassador to Niger

Bernadette Mary ALLEN

Permanent Representative to the UN

Aboubacar Ibrahim ABANI

IGO Memberships (Non-UN)

AfDB, AU, BADEA, BOAD, CENT, CILSS, ECOWAS, IDB, Interpol, IOM, NAM, OIC, OIF, UEMOA, WCO, WTO

NIGERIA

FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF NIGERIA

---

The Country

The most populous country in Africa and one of the most richly endowed in natural resources, Nigeria extends from the inner corner of the Gulf of Guinea to the border of Niger in the north and to Lake Chad in the northeast. Included within its boundaries is the northern section of the former United Nations Trust Territory of British Cameroons, whose inhabitants voted to join Nigeria in a United Nations-sponsored plebiscite in 1961. Nigeria's topography ranges from swampy lowland along the coast, through tropical rain forest and open plateau country, to semidesert conditions in the far north. The ethnic pattern is similarly varied, with tribal groups speaking more than 250 languages. The Hausa, Fulani, and other Islamic peoples in the north, the mixed Christian and Islamic Yoruba in the west, and the predominantly Christian Ibo in the east are the most populous groups. In the absence of reliable information (ethnic identification being excluded from the 1991 census), it has been estimated that nearly half the population is Muslim, with 35 percent Christian and the remainder adhering to traditional religious practices. Numerous traditional rulers retain considerable influence, particularly in rural areas. Women are responsible for the bulk of subsistence farming, and their participation in the paid work force (about 36 percent) is concentrated in sales and crafts.

Nigeria's natural resources include petroleum and natural gas, hydroelectric power, and commercially exploitable deposits of tin, coal, and columbite. Oil production of 2.2 million barrels per day accounts for an estimated 90 percent of exports and provides 80 percent of the government's revenue; some 60–90 percent of Nigerian crude, considered ideal for gasoline production, is exported to the United States. The leading cash crops are cocoa, peanuts, palm products, and cotton, with timber and fish also of importance. The oil boom of the 1970s produced rapid industrial expansion led by consumer nondurables, vehicle assembly, aluminum smelting, and steel production. However, a world glut reduced oil revenue from $26 billion in 1980 to $5.6 billion in 1986, precipitating industrial contraction and cutbacks in government and personal spending, with per capita income dipping by more than half (from $670 to $300) during 1979–1988. Thus, a structural adjustment program launched in 1986 was actually more stringent than a number of International Monetary Fund (IMF) austerity plans that Lagos had previously been unwilling to adopt. It focused on reviving non-oil exports, achieving a Political Status: Independent member of the Commonwealth since 1960; republic established in 1963; civilian government suspended as the result of military coups in January and July 1966; executive presidential system established under constitution effective October 1, 1979; under military rule following successive coups of December 31, 1983, and August 27, 1985; constitution of Third Republic promulgated May 3, 1989; existing state organs dissolved following military takeover of November 17, 1993; 1979 constitution restored and Provisional Ruling Council established on November 21, 1993; current constitution entered into effect May 29, 1999, with installation of new civilian government.

Area: 356,667 sq. mi. (923,768 sq. km.).

Population: 88,992,220 (1991C); 130,445,000 (2005E). The 1991 census was undertaken with far greater care than a 1973 predecessor, the results of which were officially repudiated as being grossly inflated insofar as the northern count was concerned. On the other hand, estimates in 1988 ranged as high as 105 million, raising the possibility that the 1991 figure might be unrealistically low. The suspicion was enhanced in November 1994 by the Constitutional Convention's "rejection" of the 1991 results.

Major Urban Centers (1991C): ABUJA (107,069), Lagos (5,195,247), Kano (2,166,554), Ibadan (1,835,300), Kaduna (933,642), Benin City (762,719), Port Harcourt (703,421), Maiduguri (618,278), Zaria (612,257), Ilorin (532,089), Jos (512,300). The 1991 figure for Lagos was unquestionably conservative, a UN estimate for mid-2000 being 10,103,000. Other 2000 estimates: Kano (2,763,000), Ibadan (2,284,000), Kaduna (1,273,000).

The transfer of government offices from the longtime capital of Lagos to the new capital of Abuja was officially described as completed on December 12, 1991.

Official Language: English (the leading indigenous languages are Hausa, Igbo, and Yoruba).

Monetary Unit: Naira (official rate July 1, 2006: 128.40 naira = $1 US).

President: Gen. (Ret.) Olusegun OBASANJO (People's Democratic Party); directly elected on February 27, 1999, and inaugurated for a four-year term on May 29; reelected on April 19, 2003, and sworn in for a second four-year term on May 29.

Vice President: Abubakar ATIKU (People's Democratic Party); elected on February 27, 1999, and inaugurated on May 29, for a term concurrent with the president; reelected on April 19, 2003, and sworn in for a second four-year term on May 29.

realistic naira exchange rate, and discouraging the purchase of luxury goods. Not surprisingly, nationwide protests against the program were reported in 1987 and 1988, with particularly violent confrontations erupting in May–June 1989.

In January 1994 the Abacha government presented a budget that abandoned virtually all of the 1986 reforms. Subsequently, in the wake of sharp criticism from international lenders, the January 1995 budget revived free-market policies. The economy nonetheless remained severely distressed under the influence of rampant official corruption, external debt of more than $33 billion, and ongoing concern over the nation's political future. Abacha's successor, Gen. Abdulsalam Abubakar, moved quickly in 1998 to mend relations with the World Bank and the IMF, pledging to speed up the privatization of state-run industries and combat corruption. Moreover, in January 1999 the government abolished the heavily criticized dual-rate system of foreign exchange (which had allowed officials and favored segments of the business community to purchase U.S. dollars at one-fourth the market rate), and Lagos announced the end of its ten-year rift with the IMF, with which it had begun new negotiations on easing its huge debt burden. Nigeria's GDP grew in real terms by 6.4 percent in 1996, 3.9 percent in 1997, 2.3 percent in 1998, 2.5 percent in 1999, 3.2 percent in 2000, and 4 percent in 2001. Annual inflation was estimated at 20 percent in 2001. Although the IMF approved new lending in August 2001, it subsequently continued to criticize the government's economic management.

Increased federal and state spending subsequently undermined the government's efforts to secure foreign assistance for debt relief. In 2002 the IMF suspended Nigeria's participation in its debt reduction program because of excessive government spending. The World Bank also reduced its lending program to Nigeria by half in 2003. Rising oil and gas revenues offset higher federal and state spending in 2004. In addition, the government implemented a new long-range program to repair decaying infrastructure such as roads and pipelines. The National Economic Empowerment and Development Strategy (NEEDS) program was also launched in an effort to restore international confidence in the Nigerian economy. Meanwhile the government initiated a broad effort to recover part of the estimated $2.2 billion that was reportedly funneled out of the country during the tenure of President Abacha (see Current issues, below).

High oil prices provided significant additional resources in 2004–2005 for the government, which, among other things, established a $6 billion “emergency fund.” GDP growth remained at about 3.5 percent annually for 2004–2005, although inflation jumped to 20 percent in the latter year. Satisfied with the government's recent reform efforts, the IMF in 2005 announced new aid and support for additional debt relief. Late in the year, the Paris Club of creditor nations accepted an agreement under which Nigeria could fulfill its obligation to them by paying only $12 billion of the $30 billion owed. In April 2006 the government announced that it had made its final payment to the Paris Club members.

Government and Politics

Political Background

Brought under British control during the 19th century, Nigeria was organized as a British colony and protectorate in 1914, became a self-governing federation in 1954, and achieved independence within the Commonwealth on October 1, 1960. Under the guidance of its first prime minister, Sir Abubaker Tafawa BALEWA, Nigeria became a republic three years later, with the former governor general, Dr. Nnamdi AZIKIWE of the Ibo tribe, as president. The original federation consisted of three regions (northern, western, and eastern); a fourth region (the midwestern) was created in 1963.

Though initially regarded as one of the most potentially viable of the new African states, independent Nigeria was beset by underlying tensions resulting from ethnic, religious, and regional cleavages. Weakened by strife and tainted by corruption, the federal government was overthrown on January 15, 1966, in a coup that cost the lives of Prime Minister Balewa and other northern political leaders and resulted in the establishment of a Supreme Military Council (SMC) headed by Maj. Gen. Johnson T. U. AGUIYI-IRONSI, the Ibo commander of the army. Resentment by northern Muslims of the predominantly Ibo leadership and its subsequent attempt to establish a unitary state resulted on July 29 in a second coup, led by a northerner, Col. (later Gen.) Yakubu GOWON. Events surrounding the first coup had already raised ethnic hostility to the boiling point. Thousands of Ibo who had settled in the north were massacred before and after the second, while hundreds of thousands began a mass flight back to their homeland at the urging of eastern leaders.

Plans for a constitutional revision that would calm Ibo apprehensions while preserving the unity of the country were blocked by the refusal of the Eastern Region's military governor, Lt. Col. Odumegwu OJUKWU, to accept anything less than complete regional autonomy. Attempts at conciliation having failed, Colonel Gowon, as head of the federal military government, announced the assumption of emergency powers and the reorganization of Nigeria's 4 regions into 12 states on May 28, 1967. Intended to equalize treatment of various areas and ethnic groups throughout the country, the move was also designed to increase the influence of the eastern region's non-Ibo inhabitants. The eastern region responded on May 30 by declaring independence as the Republic of Biafra, with Ojukwu as head of state. Refusing to recognize the secession, the federal government initiated hostilities against Biafra on July 6. Peace plans were subsequently proposed by London, the Commonwealth, and the Organization of African Unity (OAU, subsequently the African Union—AU). However, Ojukwu rejected them repeatedly on the ground that they failed to guarantee Biafra's future as a "sovereign and independent state." Limited external support, mainly from France, began to arrive in late 1968 and enabled Biafra to continue fighting despite the loss of most non-Ibo territory, massive casualties, and a growing threat of mass starvation. A series of military defeats in late 1969 and early 1970 finally resulted in surrender of the rebel forces on January 15, 1970.

The immediate postwar period was one of remarkable reconciliation, as General Gowon moved to reintegrate Ibo elements into Nigerian life. Not only were Ibo brought back into the civil service and the military, but the federal government also launched a major reconstruction of the devastated eastern area. Normal political life remained suspended, however, and on July 29, 1975, while Gowon was attending an OAU meeting in Kampala, Uganda, his government was overthrown in a bloodless coup led by Brig. (later Gen.) Murtala Ramat MUHAMMAD. In October the SMC charged a 50-member committee with drafting a new constitution that would embrace an "executive presidential system."

Muhammad was assassinated on February 13, 1976, during an abortive coup apparently provoked by a campaign to wipe out widespread government corruption. He was succeeded as head of state and chair of the SMC by Lt. Gen. (later Gen.) Olusegun OBASANJO, who had been chief of staff of the armed forces since the 1975 coup.

A National Constituent Assembly met in 1977 to consider the constitution proposed by the committee established two years earlier. The assembly endorsed a draft on June 5, 1978, although the SMC made a number of changes before the new basic law was promulgated on September 21, at which time Nigeria's 12-year-old state of emergency was terminated and the ban on political parties was lifted.

Elections were contested in mid-1979 by five parties that had been approved by the Federal Electoral Commission (Fedeco) as being sufficiently national in representation. Balloting commenced on July 7 for the election of federal senators and continued, on successive weekends, with the election of federal representatives, state legislators, and state governors, culminating on August 11 with the election of Alhaji Shehu SHAGARI and Dr. Alex EKWUEME of the National Party of Nigeria (NPN) as federal president and vice president, respectively. Following judicial resolution of a complaint that the NPN candidates had not obtained a required 25 percent of the vote in 13 of the 19 states, the two leaders were inaugurated on October 1.

By 1983 public confidence in the civilian regime had waned in the face of sharply diminished oil income, massive government overspending, and widespread evidence of official corruption. Nonetheless, the personally popular Shagari easily won reelection in the presidential balloting of August 4. Subsequent rounds of the five-week election process, marred by evidence of electoral fraud and by rioting in Oyo and Ondo states, left the ruling NPN in control of 13 state houses, 13 governorships, and both houses of the National Constituent Assembly. After the balloting, the economy continued to decline, with an austerity budget adopted in November further deepening public discontent. On December 31 a group of senior military officers (most of whom had served under Obasanjo) seized power. On January 3, 1984, Maj. Gen. Muhammadu BUHARI, formerly Obasanjo's oil minister, was sworn in as chair of a new SMC, which launched a "war against indiscipline," reintroduced the death penalty, and established several special tribunals that moved vigorously in convicting numerous individuals, including leading politicians, of embezzlement and other offenses.

In the wake of increasing political repression and a steadily worsening economy, Buhari and his armed forces chief of staff, Maj. Gen. Tunde IDI-AGBON, were deposed by senior members of the SMC on August 27, 1985. The ensuing administration, headed by Maj. Gen. (later Gen.) Ibrahim BABANGIDA as chair of a new Armed Forces Ruling Council (AFRC), abolished a number of decrees limiting press freedom, released numerous political detainees, and initially adopted a more open style of government that included the solicitation of public opinion on future political development. However, there was a countercoup attempt late in the year by a group of disgruntled officers, several of whom were executed in March 1986.

In September 1987, the Babangida regime announced a five-year agenda for return to civilian government. The schedule called for promulgation of a new constitution and lifting of the ban on political parties in 1989, gubernatorial and state legislative elections in 1990, and federal legislative and presidential elections in 1992. To guard against tribal and religious fractionalization, the AFRC adopted the recommendation of a university-dominated "Political Bureau" that only two political parties be sanctioned. Late in 1987 Babangida announced that most former and current leaders, including himself and the rest of the AFRC, would be barred from running in forthcoming elections. Local nonparty elections were held on December 12, 1987; however, many of the results from that poll were invalidated, and further balloting was conducted on March 26, 1988.

In May 1989 General Babangida lifted the ban on party politics, calling on parties to register with the National Electoral Commission (NEC) and announcing details of a draft constitution that had been presented to him in April by the National Constituent Assembly. Although more than 50 parties were reportedly interested in securing recognition, a short enrollment period and a complex application process limited the number of actual petitioners to 13, 6 of which were subsequently recommended to the AFRC for further reduction to 2. However, on October 7, amid reports of the arrest of "illegal" party members, Babangida cited "factionalism" and "failing marks" on preregistration examinations as reasons for dissolving all 13 parties and substituting in their place the regime-sponsored Social Democratic Party (SDP) and National Republican Convention (NRC).

In January 1990 General Babangida cancelled state visits to Italy and the United States in the wake of widespread unrest provoked by a December 29 reshuffle of senior military and civilian officials. The tension culminated in a coup attempt on April 22 in Lagos by middle-ranked army officers, with at least 30 persons being killed in heavy fighting.

On August 30, 1990, General Babangida announced another extensive cabinet reshuffle and the appointment of Vice Admiral Augustus AIKHOMU to the newly created position of vice president of the republic. Shortly thereafter, in furtherance of General Babangida's plan to "demilitarize" politics, Aikhomu and a number of other senior government leaders retired from military service, while ten military state governors were replaced by civilian deputies pending the upcoming gubernatorial elections. Meanwhile, organization of the SDP and NRC continued under stringent government supervision, with two-party local elections being held on December 8.

Neither of the parties secured a clear advantage in the 1990 local poll or in gubernatorial and State Assembly elections in December 1991, although the SDP won control of both the Senate and House of Representatives in National Constituent Assembly balloting on July 4, 1992. Party presidential primaries (on August 7 and again on September 12, 19, and 26) were invalidated on grounds of widespread irregularities, with presidential balloting originally slated for December 5 being rescheduled to June 1993. Concurrently, General Babangida announced that the AFRC would be replaced by a National Defense and Security Council (NDSC) and that the existing Council of Ministers would be abolished in favor of a civilian Transitional Council to pave the way for the planned installation of a new government on August 27, 1993. On December 15, 1992, Chief Ernest Adegunle SHONEKAN was named to chair the Transitional Council, which, along with the NDSC, was formally installed on January 4, 1993.

The long-delayed presidential balloting went ahead on June 12, 1993, with the SDP candidate, reputed billionaire Moshood Kashimawo Olawale ("MKO") ABIOLA, the apparent winner over the NRC's Bashir Othma TOFA. However, on June 16 the NEC bowed to a court injunction restraining it from announcing the outcome. The two parties thereupon agreed to form an interim coalition government if General Babangida would authorize a return to civilian rule by the previously agreed upon date of August 27. The general's response being negative, serious rioting erupted in Lagos on July 5, followed by the announcement that a new election, from which the earlier candidates would be excluded, would take place on July 31. Not surprisingly, this plan was scuttled, with Babangida naming Shonekan as head of an Interim National Government (ING) before stepping down as president on August 26.

On September 19, 1993, the NEC announced that new presidential and local elections would be held on February 19, 1994. However, on November 10 the Federal High Court unexpectedly pronounced the ING unconstitutional, and on November 17 Shonekan resigned in favor of a new military administration headed by Defense Minister Sani ABACHA, who had long been viewed as the "power behind the throne" of both the Babangida and Shonekan governments. Subsequently, Abacha formally dissolved both the ING and the National Constituent Assembly, banned the SDP and NRC, and, on November 24, announced the formation of a Provisional Ruling Council (PRC) comprised of senior military figures and several members of a new cabinet-level Federal Executive Council (FEC).

On April 22, 1994, the regime outlined the first phase of a political transition program that called for the convening of a constitutional conference to prepare a draft basic law for approval by the PRC. Elections were held nationwide in May to select the conference participants, although the balloting was boycotted by a number of prodemocracy groups as well as organizations representing southern interests.

On June 22, 1994, Moshood Abiola, who, based on the 1993 poll, had declared himself president 11 days earlier, emerged from hiding to address a rally in Lagos; he was arrested the following day for treason. On June 27 General Abacha opened a National Constitutional Conference (NCC), which was promptly adjourned for two weeks because of "logistical problems." Subsequently a large number of strikes erupted to protest Abiola's arrest and resumption of the NCC. The most serious of the stoppages was by the oil unions, whose resistance crumbled in late August after the PRC had replaced their leaders with military-appointed administrators.

On September 6, 1994, the PRC issued several new decrees that restricted the media and precluded legal challenges to action taken by the regime in regard to "the maintenance of law and order." Further underscoring the regime's hard-line approach, the new 25-member PRC formed on September 27 contained only military officers, even though 4 of the 11 members on the previous council had been civilians. Meanwhile, NCC sessions continued, and in October the conference gave its preliminary endorsement to a draft constitution (see Constitution and government, below). In addition, the NCC in December formally notified the military that the transition to a civilian government was expected to be accomplished by January 1, 1996. Initially appearing to support that schedule, the PRC dissolved the FEC on February 8, 1995, so that members of the council could "prepare for their upcoming political careers." However, the new FEC, which was appointed on March 20, reportedly favored an extension of military control, the apparent policy change being attributed to turbulence surrounding the recent arrest of a group of military officers and civilians in connection with an alleged coup plot. Consequently, on April 25 the NCC reversed its earlier decision regarding the deadline for a return to civilian government and approved a new resolution granting the Abacha regime what amounted to an "open-ended tenure." As a result, the final NCC report, submitted to Abacha on June 27, contained the draft of a new basic law but no proposed timetable for its implementation.

The international criticism prompted by the apparent retrenchment on democratization intensified sharply when minority rights activist Kenule SARO-WIWA and other members of the Movement for the Survival of the Ogoni People (MOSOP) were hung on November 10, 1995, soon after their conviction on what were perceived outside the government to be highly dubious murder charges. However, the regime angrily rejected what it termed external meddling in its domestic affairs and refused to reevaluate its proposed timetable, which called for the government to turn authority over to an elected civilian government on October 1, 1998.

Local elections were held on March 16, 1996, although political parties remained proscribed. The campaign period was limited to only five days, and balloting was conducted by having voters line up behind their preferred candidate, a practice long criticized by prodemocracy activists. Facing ongoing internal and external pressure, the government in June issued regulations for the proposed legalization of a limited number of political parties, five of which were recognized in September. Six new states were established on October 1, and the government announced that 183 additional municipalities would be created for the next local elections, with balloting to be conducted on a limited multi-party basis.

The local elections were held on March 15, 1997, followed by balloting for state assemblies on December 6. Meanwhile, on November 17 President Abacha announced that the cabinet had been dissolved, a number of incumbent senior ministers being left out of the government appointed on December 18.

At national legislative elections on April 25, 1998, the United Nigeria Congress Party (UNCP) reportedly captured the majority of the seats. Voter turnout was described as scant (as little as 10 percent in some areas), with many Nigerians apparently heeding the opposition's call for a boycott of the contest. Subsequently, at least seven people were killed and dozens arrested when government forces clashed with prodemocracy demonstrators in Ibadan in early May. Meanwhile, Abacha was reportedly named as the candidate of all the legal parties for the upcoming presidential election.

On June 8, 1998, Abacha died of an apparent heart attack, and the following day Gen. Abdulsalam ABUBAKAR was sworn in as his replacement. Opposition militants derided Abubakar's inaugural pledge to adhere to his predecessor's transitional program, and in mid-June government troops forcibly broke up an opposition demonstration. Thereafter, Abubakar approved the release of dozens of political prisoners, and in early July UN Secretary General Kofi Annan announced that the regime was preparing to release all political prisoners, including Abiola, who had reportedly agreed to relinquish his claim to the presidency. However, on July 7 (the eve of his release) Abiola fell ill during a meeting with a high-level U.S. mission and died.

On July 8, 1998, Abubakar dissolved the five legal parties as well as the government named by Abacha. Two weeks later he called for the creation of an "unfettered" democracy and announced that he would soon release all political prisoners and allow the free formation of political parties. To that end, in early August the regime appointed a 14-member electoral commission, the Independent National Electoral Commission (INEC), which it charged with overseeing a transitional schedule expected to culminate in the return to civilian rule in May 1999. On August 21 Abubakar named a new cabinet, which included only five holdovers from the Abacha government. Four days later, the INEC released an electoral timetable calling for local elections in December, gubernatorial polling in January 1999, and legislative and presidential balloting on February 20 and 27, respectively. Twenty-five political groups applied for provisional legal status between August 27 and September 5, and nine were subsequently registered. However, at local elections in December only three of those parties—the People's Democratic Party (PDP), the All People's Party (APP), and the Alliance for Democracy (AD)—secured the minimum vote tally (at least 5 percent in 24 of the 36 states) required to maintain their legal status and continue on to the next electoral stages. (The PDP, under the leadership of Gen. Obasanjo, led all parties in the local balloting with approximately 60 percent of the vote.)

At gubernatorial elections held January 9–30, 1999, the PDP once again overwhelmed its competitors, capturing 21 of the 36 state houses (unrest in the state of Bayelsa had forced officials to postpone balloting there from January 9 to January 30). Seeking to prevent further PDP domination, the APP and AD subsequently announced their intention to form an electoral alliance and forward a joint candidate for president. On February 5 the INEC ruled that such an alliance would be illegal; however, faced with an APP/AD threat to boycott further elections, the commission subsequently reversed itself, although it precluded the two groups from using a single symbol on ballot papers.

The PDP won approximately two-thirds of the seats in both the Senate and House of Representatives at poorly attended legislative polling on February 20, 1999. In presidential balloting on February 27 General Obasanjo completed the sweep for the PDP, capturing 62.8 percent of the vote and easily defeating Samuel Olujemisi (“Olu”) FALAE, the APP/AD candidate. International observers asserted that the elections “generally” reflected “the will of the people” but refused to describe them as “free and fair” because both sides appeared to have tried to rig the balloting. Obasanjo was sworn in on May 29, and on the same day the new constitution (signed by Abubakar on May 5) also came into effect. On June 28 Obasanjo swore in a new 47-member cabinet, claiming the large size was necessary to represent Nigeria’s ethnic and regional diversity. The government included representatives from all 36 states as well as ministers from all three registered parties. Obasanjo dismissed ten members of the cabinet on January 30, 2001, in the wake of intensifying criticism over the government’s economic policies. A reshuffled cabinet was announced on February 8.

Political discord increased significantly in June 2001 when religious and ethnic conflict between Christians and Muslims in the northern state of Bauchi left 1,000 dead. Another 1,000 were killed in continuing violence in the region before the end of the year. One area of dispute was Muslim efforts to implement sharia, or Islamic religious law. In addition, a series of general strikes by oil workers threatened to disrupt production.

The registration of political parties having begun in 2002, multiparty legislative and presidential elections were held on April 12, 2003. The PDP again won a commanding majority in both the House of Representatives and the Senate, its strongest opposition coming from the All Nigeria People’s Party (ANPP), the successor to the APP. Gubernatorial races were also held on April 19, and the PDP secured 29 of the 36 governorships. The PDP also won about two-thirds of the total seats in the state assemblies in elections held May 3.

The presidential elections held on April 19, 2003, were contested by 20 candidates. Obasanjo was reelected with 62 percent of the vote. His closest rival was former SMC chair Buhari, with 32 percent. No other candidate received more than 3.5 percent of the vote. Buhari challenged the results, but the federal Court of Appeal ruled in favor of Obasanjo, who was inaugurated on May 29. However, it was not until July 17 that Obasanjo was able to form a new federal government. Obasanjo’s second term was initially marked by efforts at economic reform, including the development and implementation of the National Economic Empowerment and Development Strategy (NEEDS), and a broad range of anticorruption campaigns, but strikes and other problems in the petroleum sector continued to constrain the government’s efforts. On May 18, 2004, because of the escalating violence in the region, Obasanjo declared a state of emergency for Plateau State and ordered the federal government to take control from the state governor and assembly. This marked the first time that the federal government had taken over a state since 1962 (see Current issues, below).

Constitution and Government

Before General Muhammad’s assassination in February 1976, he had announced that the 12 states created in 1967 would be expanded to 19 to alleviate the domination of subunits by traditional ethnic and religious groups, thus helping “to erase memories of past political ties and emotional attachments.” A decree establishing the new states was subsequently promulgated by General Obasanjo. A centrally located area of some 3,000 square miles was also designated as a federal capital territory, with the federal administration to be transferred (a process declared completed in late 1991) from Lagos to the new capital of Abuja.

In September 1987 two new states, Katsina and Akwa Ibom, were created out of territory formerly in Kaduna and Cross River, respectively. President Babangida subsequently announced that his administration would not consider further changes. However, in August 1991 he reversed himself with a decision to further increase the number of states to 30 based on “social justice, the principle of development, and the principle of a balanced federation.” On October 1, 1996, President Abacha announced the creation of six more states, one in each region, arguing that the expansion would serve the “decentralization” process. It was also announced that 183 new municipalities would be established, bringing the total to 776.

Region (Pre-1967)	State (1967)	State (1987)	State and Capital (1996)
Northern	Benue Plateau	Benue	Benue (Makurdi) †Kogi (Lokoja)*
		Plateau	Plateau (Jos) ‡Nassatawa (Lafia)
	Kano	Kano	Kano (Kano) †Jigawa (Dutse)
	Kwara	Kwara	Kwara (Ilorin)
	North-Central	Kaduna	Kaduna (Kaduna)
		Katsina	Katsina (Katsina)
	North-Eastern	Bauchi	Bauchi (Bauchi) ‡Gombe (Gombe)
		Borno	Borno (Maiduguri) †Yobe (Damaturu)
		Gongola	†Adamawa (Yola) †Taraba (Jalingo)
	North-Western	Niger	Niger (Minna)
		Sokoto	Sokoto (Sokoto) †Kebbi (Birnin Kebbi) ‡Zamfara (Gusau)
	Eastern	East-Central	Anambra	Anambra (Akwa) †Enugu (Enugu)
			Imo	Imo (Owerri) †Abia (Umuahia) ‡Eboniyi (Abakaliki)
Rivers		Rivers (Port Harcourt) ‡Bayelsa (Yenagoa)
South-Eastern		Cross River	Cross River (Calabar)
	Akwa Ibom	Akwa Ibom (Uyo)
Mid-Western	Mid-Western	Bendel	†Delta (Asaba) †Edo (Benin)
Western	Lagos	Lagos	Lagos (Ikeja)
	Western	Ogun	Ogun (Abeokuta)
		Ondo	Ondo (Akure) ‡Ekiti (Ado-Ekiti)
	Oyo	Oyo (Ibadan) †Osun (Oshogbo)

†created in 1991

‡created in 1996

*also includes territory from Kwara

**also includes territory from Enugu

The 1979 constitution established a U.S.-style federal system with powers divided among three federal branches (executive, legislative, and judicial) and between federal and state governments. Executive authority at the national level was vested in a president and vice president who ran on a joint ticket and served four-year terms. To be declared the victor on a first ballot, a presidential candidate was required to win a plurality of the national popular vote and at least one-quarter of the vote in two-thirds of the (then) 19 states. Legislative power was invested in a bicameral National Assembly comprising a 95-member Senate and a 449-member House of Representatives.

Upon assuming power on December 31, 1983, the Supreme Military Council (SMC) suspended those portions of the constitution "relating to all elective and appointive offices and representative institutions." A constitutional modification decree issued in January 1984 established a Federal Military Government encompassing the SMC; a National Council of States, headed by the chair of the SMC and including the military governors of the 19 states, the chief of staff of the armed forces, the inspector-general of police, and the attorney general; and a cabinet-level Federal Executive Council (FEC). The decree also provided for state executive councils headed by the military governors. Following the coup of August 1985, the SMC was renamed the Armed Forces Ruling Council (AFRC), and the FEC was renamed the National Council of Ministers. The chair of the AFRC was empowered to serve as both the head of state and chief executive. However, responsibility for civilian "political affairs" was delegated to a chief of general staff. Following the AFRC's announcement in September 1987 of a five-year schedule for return to civilian government, a 46-member Constitution Review Committee was created to prepare a revision of the 1979 basic law.

In May 1988 a 567-member Constituent Assembly was established to complete the work of the Constitution Review Committee. The most controversial issue faced by the assembly was the proposed institution of sharia (Islamic religious law), which was not favored by Muslim president

Babangida or the Christian population. Unable to reach agreement, the assembly provided two separate and divergent submissions on the matter, which the president stated the AFRC would review in the context of "the national interest."

The draft constitution of the "Third Republic," presented to the AFRC by the Constituent Assembly in April 1989, mirrored the 1979 basic law with the notable addition of anticorruption measures and extension of the presidential term to six years. The document took no position on sharia, as Babangida claimed the issue would constrain debate on other provisions and should be addressed separately at a future time. The existing judiciary was left largely intact, although it was enjoined from challenging or interpreting "this or any other decree" of the AFRC.

A new National Assembly was elected on July 4, 1992, and convened on December 5. Presidential balloting was, however, deferred until June 12, 1993, with a return to constitutional government scheduled for the following August 27. In the meantime, a Transitional Council, with a chair as nominal head of government, was designated to serve in a quasi-executive capacity. The system nonetheless remained tutelary, since both legislative and executive actions were subject to review by the president and the military-civilian National Defense and Security Council (NDSC). Coincident with President Babangida's resignation in 1993, the Transitional Council was abolished, not in favor of a constitutional government but of an Interim National Government (ING), which was in turn superseded by the Provisional Ruling Council (PRC)/Federal Executive Council (FEC) in November.

The 369 participants in the constitutional conference that convened on June 27, 1994, had been selected in widely boycotted balloting on May 23 and 28 from a list of PRC-approved candidates. The conference's recommendations were formally submitted to the PRC on June 27, 1995, and the provisions in the new proposed basic law called for a presidency that would rotate between the north and the south, the election of three vice presidents, the creation of several new states, and the installation of a transition civilian government pending new national elections. However, many of the 1995 document's provisions were not included in the draft charter released by the Abubakar regime for comments in September 1998. The new draft more resembled the 1979 constitution, providing for a strong, executive president who is responsible for nominating a cabinet that is subject to senate approval. At the state level, power is vested in a popularly elected governor and the state legislature. In early 1999 the regime announced that it had agreed on details of the new constitution, which was promulgated into law in May. The 1999 document specifies a federal system with the 36 states and federal capital territory. The states are divided into 776 local government districts and municipalities. Both the executive president and the two-house legislature serve four-year terms. The upper house, the Senate, has 109 members, whereas the lower House of Representatives has 360 members. The legislature and the president are elected by universal suffrage.

Foreign Relations

As a member of the United Nations (UN), the Commonwealth, and the OAU, Nigeria adhered (following independence) to a policy of non-alignment, opposition to colonialism, and support for liberation movements in all white-dominated African territories. It actively participated in OAU committees and negotiations directed toward settling the Chadian civil war, the Western Saharan conflict, and disputes in the Horn of Africa. At the regional level, Nigeria was the prime mover in negotiations leading to the establishment in 1975 of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) and spearheaded the ECOWAS military and political involvement in Liberia in 1990 and Sierra Leone in 1998.

Benin and Cameroon have challenged Nigerian territorial claims along the Benin-Nigeria border and in offshore waters, respectively. In 1989 President Babangida sought to repair relations that had been strained by expulsion of illegal aliens by the Shagira regime, primarily by providing Benin with financial assistance. Cameroon and Nigeria continued to assert rival claims to the Bakassi Peninsula, several deaths having been reported during military clashes in 1994 in that oil-rich region. Briefs in the case were submitted to the International Court of Justice (ICJ) during the first half of 1995, but tension stemming from the dispute subsequently remained high. Seeking to repair relations even as legal wrangling over the region continued, president-elect Obasanjo visited Cameroon in early 1999.

In 2002 the ICJ ruled in favor of Cameroon in the border dispute. The governments of both Cameroon and Nigeria subsequently entered into the UN-brokered talks to implement the decision. By 2003 Nigeria had turned over more than 30 small villages to Cameroon in exchange for control of a small area. A second round of territorial exchange occurred in July 2004, and diplomatic relations were also restored between the two countries. However, in September the Obasanjo administration refused to participate in a third round of land exchange. That led to a new UN effort (see article on Cameroon).

Relations with Benin were also strengthened in the early 2000s. Joint border patrols were initiated in 2002 between the two states, who subsequently agreed to redraw their borders. Three areas claimed by Nigeria were turned over to the government in Lagos in return for its release of seven areas claimed by Benin. In addition, in May 2003 Nigeria and Benin agreed, along with Ghana and Togo, to the construction of a 1,000-kilometer pipeline to transship oil.

Following independence Nigeria maintained relations with both eastern and western governments, establishing strong economic ties with Britain, Canada, the Soviet Union, and the People's Republic of China. Nigeria's current leading export partner is the United States, although relations with the U.S. government were somewhat strained when the Nigerian government, after having criticized Iraq's invasion of Kuwait in August 1990, remained neutral during the armed confrontation of early 1991.

Relations between Lagos and London, weakened by the flight to Britain of a number of political associates of former president Shagari, were formally suspended in mid-1984, when British police arrested a Nigerian diplomat and expelled two others for the attempted kidnapping of former transport minister Umaru DIKKO, who was under indictment in Nigeria for diversion of public funds. Full relations with the United Kingdom resumed in February 1986, with Dikko being denied asylum in early 1989.

Despite Nigeria's reported admission to full membership in the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC) in 1986, intense Christian opposition yielded the appointment of a commission to evaluate the implications of the move. As a result, the country formally repudiated its links to the conference in 1991, although the OIC continues to list Nigeria as one of its members. Muslims objected strenuously to the 1991 reversal of an 18-year lapse in relations with Israel, although the Babangida regime two years earlier had recognized the Palestinian claim to statehood.

In April 1994 the U.S. State Department accused Nigerian government officials of complicity in a global drug trafficking network that supplied upwards of 40 percent of the heroin entering the United States. However, the United States stopped short of imposing economic sanctions because of "vital national interests."

In February 1998 Nigerian troops were at the vanguard of the ECOWAS Monitoring Group (Ecomog) that invaded Freetown, Sierra Leone, in an effort to restore to power the democratically elected government of Ahmed Tejan Kabbah. (Kabbah had been forced into exile in the aftermath of the military coup [see separate article on Sierra Leone for further details].) In March 1999 Nigerian president-elect Obasanjo reiterated his country's commitment to restoring peace in Sierra Leone and pledged to keep Nigerian troops there as long as necessary. In 2004 Nigeria still had 2,400 troops in Sierra Leone.

The Obasanjo administration was also active in international efforts to resolve the Liberian civil war. In 2003 Liberian leader Charles Taylor accepted a Nigerian proposal whereby he would receive asylum in Nigeria in exchange for surrendering power. Taylor left Liberia for Nigeria in August 2003 and settled in Calabar. Nigeria then contributed 1,500 troops to the UN-sponsored peacekeeping mission to Liberia in October 2003.

The new civilian regime installed in 1999 received much international praise for its attempt to eliminate widespread corruption and its commitment to democratic practices. Among other things, the United States restored military ties and announced that Nigeria would receive $10 million in military aid. In addition, a U.S.-Nigerian committee was established in 2005 to address regional security issues as well as to combat violence in Nigeria's oil-producing areas.

Reports surfaced in 2006 that Nigeria was pursuing negotiations with China toward an agreement whereby Chinese companies would be granted oil licenses in return for as much as $4 billion in infrastructure grants. Nigeria also reportedly agreed to purchase military aircraft from China.

In March 2006 former Liberian leader Taylor tried to flee from Nigeria when it became apparent that President Obasanjo planned to extradite him. However, Taylor was captured and turned over to a special UN court for trial on charges of having committed war crimes.

Current Issues

Widespread disbelief greeted the government's announcement in March 1995 that it had uncovered a coup plot involving some 150 military officers and prominent civilians, including former head of state Olusegun Obasanjo. Prodemocracy groups argued that the Abacha regime, already considered one of the most repressive in Nigeria's history, had concocted the charges as part of an effort to "clear the political landscape of opposition" (a claim that was lent further credence in June when several other dissidents were arrested). The international community also expressed concern over the regime's hard-line tactics, particularly after a report was issued in July that a secret military tribunal had given a life sentence to Obasanjo, one of the continent's most respected "elder statesmen" and the only Nigerian military leader ever to have turned control over to an elected civilian government.

U.S. president Bill Clinton was among the world leaders calling for clemency for Obasanjo and the other prisoners, and his administration imposed aid and diplomatic sanctions to pressure Abuja on the matter. Meanwhile South African president Nelson Mandela urged an embargo on arms sales to Nigeria until Moshood Abiola was released from prison, where he was awaiting trial on charges of treason for having declared himself president after the 1993 balloting. In addition, in September a special Commonwealth committee suggested that economic sanctions (including a possible embargo on Nigerian oil exports) be applied unless democratization measures were adopted quickly.

President Abacha reacted angrily to the criticism, promising "retaliatory measures" against western nations attempting to "destabilize Nigeria." However, in what was seen as an attempt to ward off further sanctions, Abacha on October 1, 1996, proposed a three-year transition to civilian government (see Political background, above) and commuted the sentences of the March 1995 "coup plotters." (All death sentences were reportedly changed to life imprisonment, whereas Obasanjo's term was reduced to 15 years.) External reaction to the transition proposal was tepid at best, and, in any event, prospects for improvement in the regime's image were obliterated upon the hanging of activist Kenule Saro-Wiwa and eight others in early November. International concern having turned to outrage, the Commonwealth heads of government suspended Nigeria's membership, the European Union (EU) discontinued all development cooperation, and many nations withdrew their diplomatic representatives from Nigeria.

Consequently, Nigeria entered 1996 in the role of a "pariah state," and developments over the next year did little to alter that situation. The government refused to permit Commonwealth representatives into the country until November and, even then, blocked access to prisoners such as Obasanjo and Mobiola. (The Commonwealth subsequently appeared split between hard-liners such as Canada and the United Kingdom, who were willing to consider an oil embargo, and others, most notably African states, who appeared content to maintain the current level of pressure on the Abacha regime.) In addition, following a fact-finding mission to Nigeria in March, the UN Human Rights Committee accused the government of a wide range of abuses.

President Abacha also faced internal challenges in 1996, as evidenced by several “purges” of the military leadership (including a revamping of the PRC membership) and the reported outbreak of fighting between Sunni and Shiite Muslims in Kaduna in September. In addition, local elections in March and recognition of five political parties in September elicited only scorn from prodemocracy groups. Furthermore, economic conditions remained dismal for ordinary Nigerians, faced with rapidly rising prices as well as corruption within the government and the business sectors that had been described as among the most pervasive in the world.

Two bomb attacks in Lagos killed several soldiers and wounded more than 30 other people in January and February 1997, no groups claiming responsibility. The government subsequently intensified its crackdown on opposition groups, among other things charging Nobel Prize winner Wole SOYINKA (in self-imposed exile) and 14 other dissidents with treason in March. Spokesmen for the regime linked several subsequent attacks to the National Democratic Coalition (NADECO), although impartial observers strongly questioned any such link and suggested the government was merely attempting to silence some of its most effective critics. Harassment was also reported of journalists who questioned the regime. On another and perhaps more genuinely threatening front, the regime reported that a coup attempt had been uncovered in late December. Meanwhile, in October the Commonwealth heads of government had decided to continue Nigeria’s suspension for another year, and expulsion was threatened in case General Abacha failed to carry through with the proposed return to civilian government by October 1, 1998. Consequently, attention in early 1998 focused on plans for legislative elections in April and presidential balloting in August. Initial analysis of the latter was less than encouraging, however, as Abacha attempted to secure the nomination of all the legal parties before his death in June.

Upon assuming office in June 1998, General Abubakar initially signaled his intent to follow Abacha’s electoral schedule. However, he soon abandoned his deceased predecessor’s plan, annulled the recent legislative results, dissolved the five legal parties, appointed a new government, and pledged to hand over power to a popularly elected civilian government in 1999. Those efforts were met with praise (albeit guarded) from most international observers, and in October 1998 the EU announced a partial lifting of sanctions against Nigeria. Moreover, in March 1999 the United States ended its sanctions, thereby paving the way for new IMF and World Bank loans. Meanwhile, Britain dispatched a high-level mission to Lagos to discuss Nigeria’s readmission to “the world economic and political community,” and in April the Commonwealth’s foreign ministers recommended that Nigeria’s suspension be lifted. At the same time, the incoming Obasanjo administration and PDP-dominated legislature confronted economic, political, and social problems of immense proportions. Among the most pressing issues awaiting the new government were violent political and social unrest in the economically critical oil-producing regions, a decayed infrastructure, and a treasury depleted by corruption. As a first step in Obasanjo’s anticorruption program, in June he expelled 60 senior military officers and suspended all contracts negotiated by the Abacha government.

Ethnic tensions in the oil-producing Niger Delta escalated throughout the fall of 1999, resulting in the deployment of 2,000 government troops to the state of Bayelsa.

Religious violence claimed hundreds of lives and dominated Nigerian affairs in 2000–2002 as a dozen northern states instituted sharia despite opposition from the federal government. (Some analysts suggested that the northern states were employing sharia as another “weapon” in their long-standing effort to wrest authority from the federal government.) The issue received extensive international attention in November 2002 when the Miss World contest in the northern city of Kaduna had to be cancelled in light of deadly rioting sparked by a newspaper article that had inflamed portions of the Muslim population.

Strikes and violence continued during the 2003 presidential poll, although foreign observers described the election as generally free and fair, with some irregularities, including voter intimidation and ballot tampering in 13 states. The main opposition candidate, former SMC chair Buhari, contested the results, but his challenge was dismissed by an appeals court. Meanwhile, following the elections, striking oil employees took 97 foreign workers hostage on offshore petroleum rigs. The hostages were released after negotiations among the striking workers, the government, and the main union. In June a nationwide strike began over the rising price of fuel, and security forces killed several protestors. The strike ended in July after the government agreed to implement price controls on fuel and investigate the actions of security forces. A second major nationwide strike was called in October because of perceived government inaction; however, the government preempted the strike with the arrest of several union leaders. In October 2004 unions launched another general strike after the government announced a 25 percent increase in fuel prices. Clashes between police and demonstrators during the strike again left several dead and dozens wounded.

Tensions between Christians and Muslims escalated into renewed violence in May 2004 when some 600 people were killed and more than 30,000 fled their homes in the northern city of Kano. Religious fighting in Plateau State led Obasanjo to declare a state of emergency on May 18, 2004. The president suspended the authority of the governor and state assembly and appointed a federal official to oversee the state for six months.

Ethnic groups in the Niger Delta threatened to force foreign oil companies out of the area in October 2004 amid violence and interethnic strife. The uncertainty created during the crisis led the price of oil on the international market to increase significantly.

As part of President Obasanjo's economic reform efforts, he continued to seek a reduction of Nigeria's foreign debt burden in 2004. He received a pledge from the United Kingdom to partially reduce its total debt, and in addition, the United Kingdom pledged to trace the $2.1 billion that reportedly had been funneled through British banks during the Abacha regime. This followed a March 2005 decision by the Swiss government to return $458 million inappropriately banked by Abacha. Obasanjo also launched a major anticorruption initiative in 2004, and investigations were initiated against several officials, including the state governor of Plateau, who was arrested in London by Nigerian and British police for money laundering. In addition, the education minister was fired and charged with bribing federal officials in March 2005, and the national police chief resigned in January 2005 amid allegations that he embezzled $7 million.

The government convened a National Political Reforms Conference (NPRC) in February 2005 in an effort to ease tensions among the regions. After contentious debate, the conference in April issued a report that called for increased oil revenues to be allocated to southern and eastern regions and rejected the proposed revision of the constitution to permit Obasanjo to run for a third term. The latter issue was permanently put to rest in May 2006 when the Senate blocked an amendment presented by supporters of a third term. (Obasanjo agreed to abide by that ruling.) Attention thenceforth turned to what observers agreed would be a turbulent campaign leading up to the 2007 presidential and legislative elections. In June Obasanjo signed a new electoral law designed to reduce fraud in the elections by, among other things, limiting donations to campaigns and strengthening the authority of the election commission.

The other dominant issue in late 2005 and early 2006 was sustained severe discord in the oil-rich Niger Delta region. Two groups—the Niger Delta's People's Volunteer Force (NDPVF) and the Movement for the Emancipation of the Niger Delta (MEND)—claimed responsibility for a number of attacks on pipelines and kidnappings designed to disrupt production in pursuit of greater autonomy for the region and compensation for environmental damage done by oil companies in the state of Bayelsa. In June 2006 MEND declared a “cease-fire” after a Nigerian court ordered Shell (the country’s largest oil-producer) to pay $1.5 billion for environmental “reparations.”

Political Parties and Groups

Upon assuming power in December 1983, the Supreme Military Council (SMC) banned all political parties, arrested many of their leaders, and confiscated their assets. The ban was lifted on May 3, 1989, and 13 parties were legalized, 2 of which were to be selected to contest upcoming elections. However, the government, having become dissatisfied with that process, subsequently dissolved the existing parties and, on October 7, 1989, two new parties—the Social Democratic Party (SDP) and the National Republican Convention (NRC)—were created by presidential decree. The political platforms of the new groups were dictated by the regime, which also provided financial support until January 1991 when it declared the parties to be “on their own.” Subsequently, the SDP and the NRC were dismantled when all party activity was banned by the Abacha regime on November 18, 1993.

On June 27, 1995, General Abacha announced that the ban on “political activity” had been lifted, although “rallies and campaigns” remained restricted and other constraints continued as a consequence of the country’s severe political turmoil. On June 17, 1996, the National Electoral Commission of Nigeria (NECON) announced the regulations for registration of parties, which were required, among other things, to secure the signature of 40,000 voters from each region and to forswear accepting money from external sources. The regulations promised public financing for the recognized groups. Some 23 political associations reportedly purchased the registration forms, but only 15 completed them within the 30-day limit imposed by the NECON. On September 30 NECON announced that five parties had been recognized; the other aspirants were ordered to dissolve immediately. Although the NECON argued that the selections had been based on an unbiased “point system,” opposition leaders called the process a “sham,” observers generally supporting their assessment that the newly recognized parties all shared a “conservative” point of view, which meant tacit support of the current military regime and its proposed transition schedule. Meanwhile, no opponents of the Abacha government appeared to have gained a legal foothold.

In April 1998 all five legal parties nominated Abacha to be their presidential candidate at balloting then scheduled for August. However, following Abacha’s death in June, his successor, General Abubakar, dissolved the five parties and called on political associations to register with the newly created Independent National Electoral Commission (INEC). Between August 27 and September 9, 25 political groups applied to the INEC for provisional legal status. Only nine of the applicants met the baseline qualifications—including maintaining functional offices in 24 states—and at local elections in December only three of those groups, the People’s Democratic Party (PDP), the All People’s Party (APP), and the Alliance for Democracy (AD), secured the voting tally necessary to maintain their legal status and move onto legislative and presidential elections. The other six were reportedly deregistered. Three new parties (the NDP, UNPP, and APGA) were registered in June 2002, and by 2006 some 35 parties had been legalized.

Parties That Participated in the 2003 Elections

People’s Democratic Party (PDP). The PDP was formed in Lagos in August 1998 as an umbrella for more than 60 organizations, including many from the so-called Group of 34, which registered among its leaders traditional chiefs, businesspeople, academicians, and a strong contingent of retired generals. Alex EKWUEME, a former national vice president, and Jerry GANA emerged from the PDP’s inaugural meetings as the group’s chair and second in command, respectively. The party presented a platform that reflected its broad political base—advocating the “guided” deregulation of the economy, respect for human rights, and improved funding for health care and education.

In late October 1998 Gen. Olusegun Obasanjo, the military head of state between 1976 and 1979, joined the PDP, and, with Obasanjo at the helm, the party subsequently swept local and gubernatorial elections, won a majority in the assembly, and in February 1999 captured the national presidency.

In January 2003 the PDP elected Obasanjo as its presidential candidate for the upcoming elections, which he won with 62 percent of the vote. The PDP also retained its majorities in the federal Senate and House of Representatives and among state governors and state assemblies.

Fighting developed in 2005 between President Obasanjo and Vice President Abubakar Atiku over the proposed constitutional amendment to permit Obasanjo to seek a third term (see Current issues, above). The split also appeared to reflect the schism between the party’s founding members (“concerned elders”) led by Atiku and the “progressive faction” led by Obasanjo. A party congress elected Ahmadu Ali as the PDP chair, and Obasanjo’s supporters blamed Ali for the defeat of the constitutional amendment. Subsequently, a PDP faction led by Solomon Lar declared itself the real leadership of the party and sued for access to the PDP assets.

Leaders: Gen. Olesegun OBASANJO (President of the Republic), Ahmadu ALI (Chair), Abubakar ATIKU (Vice President of the Republic), Solomon LAR (Leader of dissident faction), Chief Ojo MADUEKWE (National Secretary).

All Nigeria People’s Party (ANPP). The ANPP is a successor to the All People’s Party (APP), a center-right grouping established in September 1998 by some 14 Ibo and Hausa-Fulani political associations, including the People’s Congress (PC), the New Era Alliance (NEA), the National Unity Forum (NUF), and the Democratic Vanguard (DV). Within the APP’s ranks were some former members of the five parties dissolved in July 1998, as well as so many associates of former president Abacha that APP detractors derisively labeled the group the “Abacha’s People’s Party.” The APP forwarded its own candidates for local, gubernatorial, and national legislative balloting in late 1998 and early 1999, capturing one-quarter of the governorships and representation in both assembly bodies. On the other hand, prior to the 1999 presidential balloting, the APP formed an electoral alliance with the AD (below). After the AD’s standard-bearer, Samuel Oluyemisi Falae, outpolled the APP’s proposed candidate, Oghonaya ONU, in intra-alliance balloting, the APP backed Falae’s presidential bid.

Membership in the APP largely came from the northern region. In July 2000 the party claimed to have reorganized in an attempt to widen membership to the southeast, with particular focus on the Igbo tribe. As part of the APP’s reorganization, the party set up a monitoring mechanism to ensure that the party’s elected officials lived up to the party platform. (The APP tended to support the implementation of sharia in northern states.)

In May 2002 the APP announced its intention to change its name to the ANPP in anticipation of a planned merger with the then-unrecognized UNPP (below). However, both parties subsequently suffered internal factionalization over the proposed merger, with one APP faction demanding retention of the party’s original rubric. In November a special APP national convention ratified the name change, although only a portion of the UNPP membership joined the group.

In the 2003 elections Muhammadu Buhari ran as the ANPP’s presidential candidate and received 32 percent of the vote. In the legislative elections, the ANPP secured 96 seats in the house and 27 in the senate, making it the largest opposition party.

Leaders: Modu SHERIFF (National Chair), Etubon ASUQUO (National Secretary).

Alliance for Democracy (AD). The Yoruba-dominated AD draws on a long tradition of leftist, nationalist politics that originated before independence under the guidance of Chief Obafemi AWOLowo and continued more recently in the National Democratic Coalition (NADECO, below). The AD called for greater regional autonomy and constitutional reform, and AD candidates sought office in late 1998 and 1999 on a platform promising privatization of state-run enterprises, reduction of Nigeria's debt burden, and free education and health care. In early 1999 the AD formed an electoral alliance with the APP in preparation for presidential balloting, and an AD moderate, Samuel Oluyemisi ("Olu") Falae, subsequently captured the right to head the alliance ticket.

Falae finished a distant second at the February 1999 elections, which he decried as rigged in favor of the PDP. Subsequently, he petitioned the Court of Appeals to overturn the election results; however, when the court rejected his bid in early April, he reportedly abandoned his legal challenge.

In late 1999 the party factionalized over a leadership dispute. Yusuf MAMMAN, who became chair in December, was accused of misconduct for neglecting to call a party convention. The northern faction then suspended his position on December 20 and elected Adamu SONG as pro tem chair. Both men claimed the leadership post in the spring of 2000. Because of the split, the AD did not field a candidate in the 2003 presidential election. In the legislative elections, the AD won 34 seats in the house and 6 in the senate.

Leader: Ahmed ABDULKADZR (Chair).

National Democratic Party (NDP). Described as a "pan-Yoruba" party, the NDP was launched in 2001 as a merger of several groups in pursuit of "true federalism." Ike NWACHUKWU, the NDP candidate in the 2003 presidential election, received less than 1 percent of the vote. In legislative balloting, the NDP secured 2 percent of the vote in the house and gained one seat. It received less than 2 percent of the vote in senate elections and no seats.

In April 2006, the NDP announced that former president Ibrahim Babangida would be the party's candidate in the 2007 presidential election.

Leaders: Aliyu Habu FARU (Chair), Kenny MARTINS, Idongesit NKANG (National Secretary).

United Nigeria People's Party (UNPP). The UNPP is a successor to the United Nigeria Democratic Party (UNDP), which was launched in August 2001 by, among others, former members of the PDP and supporters of former president Babangida. The UNDP changed its name to the UNPP in May 2002 to avoid confusion with the UN Development Program (also UNDP). The UNPP subsequently was splintered by a proposed merger with the APP; although some UNPP members joined the new ANPP, a rump UNPP continued to operate. Jim NWOBODO, the UNPP candidate in the 2003 presidential poll, secured 0.43 percent of the vote. In the concurrent legislative balloting, the UNPP secured 2.72 percent of the vote in the senate (but no seats) and 2.8 percent of the vote and two seats in the house.

In 2006, it was reported that many members of the UNPP had defected to the newly-formed Movement for Restoration and Defense of Democracy (MRDD, below).

Leaders: Mallem Salek JAMBO (Chair), Ukeje NWOKEFORO (National Secretary).

All Progressive Grand Alliance (APGA). Launched in April 2002, the APGA is led by a prominent chief of the Southern Igbo ethnic group, Chekwes Okorie. However, its founders criticized those who branded the APGA as an "Igbo party," arguing instead that it intended to represent "all the marginalized people of Nigeria." Okorie came in third in presidential balloting in 2003 with 3.29 percent of the vote. The party also gained two seats in the house but none in the senate in 2003.

A faction of the party led by Chief Victor UMEH claimed to be the legitimate leadership of the APGA in 2005–2006, and the party was reported to be on the verge of a split.

Leaders: Chief Chekwes OKORIE (Chair), Said Baba ABDULLANI (National Secretary).

People's Redemption Party (PRP). The PRP was formed in 2002 under the leadership of Balarabe Musa, who was also the party's unsuccessful presidential candidate in 2003. The PRP won one seat in the house in 2003.

Leader: Balarabe MUSA.

Other parties participating in the 2003 elections included (all received less than 1 percent of the vote and no representation in the legislature): the People's Salvation Party (PSP), which was created in 2002 and is led by Alhaji WADA NAS; the National Conscience Party (NCP), formed in October 1994 by Gani FAWEHINMI, an attorney and political activist who was arrested in mid-1995; the Justice Party (JP), led by former NADECO member Ralph OBIOHA and former NDP member Chris OKOTIE (2003 presidential candidate); the Movement for Democracy and Justice (MDJ), led by Kalli Al-Gazali ALH and Mohammed Dikko YUSUF (2003 presidential candidate); the Progressive Action Party (PAC), led by A. C. NWODO; the People's Mandate Party (PMP), led by Arthur NWANKWO (who was also the party's 2003 presidential candidate); the All Peoples' Liberation Party (APLP), led by Alhaji Umar Mohammed; the New Nigeria Peoples' Party (NNPP), chaired by B. O. ANIEBONAM; and the United Democratic Party (UDP), formed in 1998.

Other Groups

Campaign for Democracy (CD). Formed in late 1991 by some 40 human rights, labor, and social organizations, the Lagos-based CD was subsequently at the forefront of efforts to force the military to turn authority over to a civilian government. Having released, against court orders, what it described as reliable figures concerning the June 1993 presidential balloting, the CD organized a general strike in response to the government's refusal to permit the installation of Moshood Abiola as president. A number of CD leaders and members were detained in the subsequent standoff with the Abacha regime, with the coalition calling for a sovereign national conference to establish a transitional government pending new elections. In 1996 CD leader Dr. Beko Ransome-Kuti was sentenced to prison on charges (dismissed as spurious by many observers) related to the alleged coup plot in March.

Leader: Dr. Beko RANSOME-KUTI.

National Democratic Coalition (NADECO). Organized in May 1994 by a group of former politicians, retired military officers, and human rights activists, NADECO demanded that the Abacha regime yield to an interim government led by Moshood Abiola, the apparent winner in the aborted 1993 presidential election. As in the case of other prominent antigovernment figures, several NADECO leaders were temporarily detained, including the revered 87-year-old ex-governor of Ondo, Michael AJASIN. NADECO unsuccessfully supported a People's Progressive Party for recognition in 1996, and Ajasin angrily denounced the failure of the regime to legalize opposition groupings.

Wole Soyinka, the prominent exiled critic of the government who was involved in the reported formation of several external groups (see Nalicon, immediately below), was identified as a NADECO leader in 1997. Soyinka (in absentia) and other NADECO supporters were charged with treason in March 1997 for their antiregime activities. In early May 1998 NADECO's secretary general, Ayo Opadokum, was among 20 opposition activists arrested when a rally at Ibadan turned violent.

Beginning in mid-1998 the Abubakar regime released a number of opposition figures and was reportedly preparing to release Moshood Abiola when Abiola died. In October Soyinka, who had been a leading advocate for Abiola's release, returned from exile, where most recently he had been calling for the formation of a South African-style human rights tribunal to investigate the alleged abuses of Nigeria's military regimes. Subsequently, NADECO Chair Ndubuisi Kanu stated that the organization would resume its role as unofficial opposition, although it would not assume the status of political party.

Leaders: Commodore Ndubuisi KANU (Chair), Bolaji AKINYEMI, Wole SOYINKA, Ayo OPADOKUM (Secretary General).

National Liberation Council of Nigeria (Nalicon). Formed in exile in June 1995 by Wole Soyinka (winner of the 1986 Nobel Prize for Literature, who had fled Nigeria in November 1994) and other government critics, Nalicon advocated a “boycott” of the Abacha regime, which it accused of, among other things, massive human rights abuses. In April 1996 Soyinka announced that several exiled opposition groups had formed a United Democratic Front of Nigeria (UDFN), which called for an international embargo on Nigerian oil sales as part of the effort to topple the government.

Leader: Wole SOYINKA.

Movement for the Survival of the Ogoni People (MOSOP). MOSOP pressed the government for years on the rights of the indigenous Ogoni ethnic group in oil-rich southwestern Nigeria. Having previously suggested that a self-determination referendum would be appropriate, MOSOP has more recently concentrated on forcing the government to share the oil wealth more equitably with the local population.

Kenule SARO-WIWA (a well-known author, minority rights activist, and longtime MOSOP leader) was arrested in 1994 on murder charges involving the death of four progovernment Ogoni leaders. Saro-Wiwa vehemently denied the charges, calling them a blatant attempt by the Abacha regime to silence his criticism. Most internal and external observers remained extremely skeptical of Saro-Wiwa’s guilt, and western and African capitals urged his release. However, Saro-Wiwa and eight others were found guilty by a special military tribunal in late October 1996 and, following ratification of the sentences by the PRC, were hanged on November 10. The executions prompted an international outcry that contributed significantly to the government’s sustained isolation in 1996–1998.

MOSOP subsequently attempted to change the constitution so that the presidency would rotate on a regional basis.

Leader: Ledum MITEE.

Arewa People’s Congress (APC). The APC is a northern nationalist group that formed as a counter to the militant nationalist Yoruba OPC (see below). It has pledged to protect “northerners” in the southwest region.

Movement for the Actualization of the Sovereign State of Biafra (MASSOB). An Ibo group formed by lawyer and activist Ralph Uwazurike in 1999, MASSOB advocates the secession of Biafra and is opposed to the introduction of sharia in northern states. In October 2005 Uwazurike and six members of MASSOB were arrested on charges of treason and organizing an illegal organization.

Leader: Ralph UWAZURIKE.

O’odua People’s Congress (OPC). The OPC is a militant organization that advocates secession of the Yoruba. It was allegedly behind a November 1999 dispute between Yoruba and Hausa merchants in the Lagos market that killed dozens. In addition, the OPC was blamed for several attacks in early 2000, including the murder of a Banga police officer. Some members of the OPC support the spread of sharia in northern states in the hope that the issue will further divide the country and thereby make Yoruba secession easier to obtain.

United Democratic Forum (UDF). The UDF was launched by a group of moderate northerners and so-called “Middle-Belters” who oppose the implementation of sharia as well as the northern nationalist APC. The UDF was formed by Suleman TAKUMA, a Nuper from the Niger state.

Advanced Congress of Democrats (ACD). The ACD was formed in April 2005 to oppose President Obasanjo’s bid for a third presidential term. The party attracted a number of elected officials at the state and national level, including members of the house and senate, as well as senior PDP figures, including former chair of the PDP, Audu OGBEH. The party is mainly comprised of Northerners and is essentially an anti-PDP formation. After Obasanjo announced that he would not stand for a third term, the party announced a progressive platform that emphasized honesty in politics and government campaign. The ACD attracted members from other parties, principally the Alliance for Democracy.

Leaders: Lawal KAITA (Former Governor of Kaduna), Ghali Umar NA'ABA (Former President of the House of Representatives), Abubakar RIMI (Former Governor of Kano).

Movement for Restoration and Defense of Democracy (MRDD). The MRDD was formed in February 2006 by disaffected members of the UNPP and the PRP. The MRDD opposed President Obasanjo's bid for a third term.

Leader: Alh JIMETA (National Chair).

Other groups mentioned in news reports in the past decade include the Democratic Alternative, led by Alao AKA-BASHORUM, the attorney for detained 1993 presidential candidate Moshood Abiola; the Eastern Mandate Union, formed by tribal leaders and politicians from southeastern Nigeria under the leadership of Patrick Dele COLE and Chuba OKADIGBO; the Liberal Democrats (LD), formed in August 1998 in Abuja and led by Baghir TOFA; the Movement for National Reconciliation, led by Anthony ENAHARO; the National Conscience Party, formed in October 1994 by Gani FAWEHINMI, an attorney and political activist who was arrested in mid-1995; the National Democratic Movement (NDM), led by Emmanuel OSAMOR; the New Democratic Party (NDP); the Nigerian People's Movement, which represents the interests of the Igbo ethnic group in eastern Nigeria; the Northern Elders' Forum, a conservative group; the People's Democratic Congress (PDC), which was launched in August 1998 in Enugu by Chief Emeka OJUKWU, who had been active in the Biafra independence movement; the People's Liberation Party (PLP), a coalition of youth organizations formed at Abuja in September 1998 under the leadership of Goodnews Guben ABBE; the United Action for Democracy (UAD), which organized anti-Abacha rallies in early May 1998; the United Democratic Congress, led by Alhaji Usman ABATEMI; and "Vision '99."

Groups formed after 2000 include the Fourth Dimension, formed in 2001 by former military officers and led by Adm. (Ret.) Augustus AIKHOMU; National Frontier, created in 2001 by several former governors and senior military officers and led by Edwin Ume EZEOKE; IBB Vision 2003, established in 2002 as a political front for former president Ibrahim Babangida; and the National Solidarity Party (NSP), formed in 2001 by ex-military officers.

The African Democratic Congress (ADC) was formed in 2006 by Chief Okewo OSUI, and the Fresh Democrats were established in 2006 under the leadership of Chris OKOTIE.

In addition, the following groups have been linked to unrest in the Niger Delta area: the Ijaw Youth Organization, which is composed of radical elements of the ethnic Ijaw tribe who have asserted their desire for a role in Nigerian political life and greater benefits from the oil removed from their territory; the Federated Niger Delta Izon Communities (FNDIC), who warned foreign oil workers to leave the region in late 1998 because their safety could "no longer be guaranteed"; and the Ijaw-dominated Rivers' States Coalition. In January 1999 Ijaw-related unrest caused the postponement of a gubernatorial election, and further violence was reported throughout the beginning of the year.

In 2005 a new insurgent group—the South-South Liberation Movement—was launched with the goal of creation of a Niger Delta Republic. The movement was reportedly led by a former Nigerian Army warrant officer, John ADIE. Meanwhile, the Niger Delta's People's Volunteer Force (NDPVF), led by Mujahid DOKUBO-ASARI, was reported to have undertaken a number of attacks on oil production facilities. Dokubo-Asari was arrested for treason in September 2005, an appeals court rejecting bail for the jailed leader in June 2006. NDPVF members repeatedly warned of new attacks if Dokubo-Asari was not released. Although jailed, Dokubo-Asari reportedly negotiated the release of foreign hostages on several occasions.

The most active and militant of the Niger Delta groups has been the Movement for the Emancipation of the Niger Delta (MEND), which emerged in early 2006 when it conducted a series of attacks on oil production facilities. MEND was

Cabinet

As of September 6, 2006

President
Vice President

Gen. (Ret.) Olusegun Obasanjo
Atiku Abubakar

Federal Executive Councilors

Agriculture and Rural Development	Adamu Bello
Aviation	Babaloa Borishade
Commerce	Aliyu Modibbo Umar [f]
Communications	Obafemi Anibaba
Cooperation and Integration in Africa	Lawan Guba
Culture and Tourism	Chief Fani Kayode
Defense	Rabi Kwankaso
Education	Obiageli Ezekwesili [f]
Environment	Helen Esuene [f]
Federal Capital Territory	Mallam Nasir el-Rufai
Finance	Nenadi Esther Usman [f]
Foreign Affairs	Joy Ogwu [f]
Health	Eyitayo Lambo
Housing and Urban Development	Rahman Olusegun Mimiko
Industry	Fidelis Naanmiap Tapgun
Information and National Orientation	Frank Nweke Jr.
Intergovernmental Affairs, Youth Development, and Special Duties	Grace Ogwuche [f]
Internal Affairs	Oluyemi Adeniji
Justice and Attorney General	Chief Bayo Ojo
Labor, Employment, and Productivity	Hassan Muhammed Lawal
Police Affairs	Broderick Bozimo
Power and Steel	Liyel Imoke
Science and Technology	Isoun Turner
Solid Minerals Development	Leslye Obiora [f]
Sports and Social Development	Bala Bawa Ka'oje
Transport	Precious Sekibo
Water Resources	Muktari Shagari
Women Affairs	Maryam Ciroma [f]
Works	Chief Cornelius Adebago

Ministers of State

Agriculture and Rural Development	Bamidele F. Dada
Education	Sayyad Abba Ruma
Finance	Elias N. Mbam
Foreign Affairs	Abubakar Tanko
Health	Halima Tayo Alao [f]
Internal Affairs	Joseph O. Itotoh
Petroleum Resources	Edmund Dakoro
Power and Steel	Ahmed Abdulhamid
Transport	Habibu Aliyu Mohammed
Water Resources	Salome Audu Jankada
Works	Malam Yahaya Abdulkarim

[f] = female

subsequently believed responsible for the kidnapping of foreign oil workers. It repeatedly demanded compensation from foreign oil companies for environmental damage done in the Niger Delta and demanded the release of NDPVF's Dokubo-Asari. MEND reportedly finances its operations through large-scale bunkering of oil.

Legislature

The former National Assembly, encompassing a Senate and a House of Representatives, was dissolved in December 1983. It was revived under the 1989 constitution, with an election of members to four-year terms in both houses on July 4, 1992. However, the new body did not convene until December 5 and was again dissolved in the wake of the November 1993 coup.

Five parties approved by the Abacha regime were permitted to contest the balloting for a new assembly on April 25, 1998. According to preliminary results, the United Nigeria Congress Party captured a comfortable majority of the seats; however, the election results were annulled, and the five parties were dissolved following Abacha's death in June. New elections were held on February 20, 1999, among the three parties that had achieved the required electoral threshold in the December 1998 local elections (see Political background, above).

Senate. The upper chamber consists of 109 seats: 3 from each state and 1 from the Federal Capital Territory of Abuja. Following the balloting of April 12, 2003, the seats were distributed as follows: the People's Democratic Party, 76; the All Nigeria People's Party, 27; and the Alliance for Democracy, 66.

President: Kenechukwu NNAMANI.

House of Representatives. The lower house consists of 360 seats, with the actual number of seats per state being apportioned on the basis of population. Following the balloting of April 12, 2003, the seats were distributed as follows: the People's Democratic Party, 223; the All Nigeria People's Party, 96; the Alliance for Democracy, 34; United Nigeria People's Party, 2; All Progressive Grand Alliance, 2; National Democratic Party, 1; and the People's Redemption Party, 1; vacant, 1.

President: Aminu MASARI.

Communications

The Nigerian media returned to their position among the freest and most active in Africa following repeal, after the coup of August 1985, of the previous regime's Decree No. 4, which had authorized numerous media suspensions and the imprisonment of journalists for "inaccurate reporting." On the other hand, the popular and outspoken weekly Newswatch, whose founding editor-in-chief Dele Giwa was killed by a letter bomb in 1986, was banned for several months in 1987 for publishing details of the government's political transition plan, while a British freelance journalist was expelled in July 1991 because of reports on the country's fiscal problems that the regime found unacceptable. On August 15, 1994, the Abacha regime closed down the country's most respected newspaper, the Guardian, after it had published a report that government officials were at odds over the release of Moshood Abiola. Subsequently, two other prominent dailies—the National Concord and the Punch (both owned by Abiola)—were temporarily banned in 1995, and stringent restrictions were placed on the rest of the media.

Press

The following are published daily in Lagos, unless otherwise noted: Times (420,000 daily, including evening edition, 100,000 Sunday), government owned; Nigerian Tribune (Ibadan, 109,000), independent; Nigerian Observer (Benin City, 150,000, 60,000 Sunday), state owned; Nigerian Standard (Jos, 100,000 daily, 130,000 Sunday), state owned; New Nigerian (Kaduna, 80,000), federal-state owned; Nigerian Chronicle (Calabar, 50,000 daily, 163,000 Sunday), state owned; New Democrat (Kaduna South, 100,000); Sketch (Ibadan, 64,000 daily, 125,000 Sunday), government owned; The Renaissance (Enugu, 50,000).

News Agencies

The official News Agency of Nigeria (NAN) was established in 1978. A number of foreign agencies maintain offices in Lagos.

Broadcasting and Computing

In November 1975 the government assumed control of all radio and television broadcasting facilities, placing them under a newly created National Broadcasting Corporation that was itself superseded in 1978 by the nominally independent Federal Radio Corporation of Nigeria (FRCN) and Nigerian Television Authority (NTV). Subsequently, numerous regional and state broadcast facilities were launched. There were approximately 8.6 million television receivers and 900,000 personal computers serving 750,000 Internet users in 2003.

Intergovernmental Representation*Ambassador to the U.S.

George Achulike OBIOZOR

U.S. Ambassador to Nigeria

John CAMPBELL

Permanent Representative to the UN

Aminu Bashir WALI

IGO Memberships (Non-UN)

AfDB, AU, BADEA, CWTH, ECOWAS, Interpol, IOC, IOM, NAM, OPEC, PCA, WCO, WTO

RWANDA

REPUBLIC OF RWANDA

République Rwandaise (French)

Republika y'u Rwanda (Kinyarwanda)

The Country

Situated in the heart of Africa (adjacent to Burundi, Tanzania, Uganda, and the Democratic Republic of the Congo), Rwanda consists mainly of grassy uplands and hills endowed with a temperate climate. The population comprises three main ethnic groups: the Hutu, or Bahutu (85 percent); the Tutsi, or Batutsi (14 percent); and the Twa, or pygmies (1 percent). There are about equal numbers of Roman Catholics and animists, with small Protestant (9 percent) and Muslim (1 percent) minorities. In addition to English, French, and Kinyarwanda (the three official languages), Kiswahili is widely spoken. Women account for about half of the labor force, primarily as unpaid agricultural workers on family plots; female representation in government and party posts is minimal, though the 2003 constitution called for increased participation by women in all levels of government, civil service, and policymaking.

Economically poor, Rwanda has been hindered by high population growth (it is one of the most densely populated states in Africa), inadequate transportation facilities, distance from accessible ports, and the ravages of civil war. Over 90 percent of the people depend on agriculture for their livelihood, and goods are produced largely for local consumption. Coffee is the leading cash crop and principal source of foreign exchange, although tea cultivation is expanding. Industry is concentrated in food processing and nondurable consumer goods, but the mining of cassiterite and wolframite ore is also important. International assistance has focused on economic diversification, while recent state budgets have concentrated on agricultural and infrastructural development. Rwanda's GNP per capita rose to $270 in 1991 but then plunged because of economic and social carnage in 1994 (see Political background, below).

Despite the subsequent problems associated with civil war and the massive displacement and return of perhaps 2 million Rwandans, as of mid-2002 Rwanda was continuing to make considerable progress in rebuilding its economy. Due to the improved security situation, favorable weather conditions, additional foreign aid, increased food production, and the partial revival of exports, real GDP had grown by 13.8 percent in 1997, 8.9 percent in 1998, 7.6 percent in 1999, 6.0 percent in 2000, and 6.7 percent in 2001 (according to the International Monetary Fund [IMF]), while annual inflation had fallen into negative figures by the end of 2001. Reinforcing the country's economic infrastructure subsequently became the primary focus of governmental policy, which attracted substantial donor assistance. The IMF and World Bank, noting the progress in structural reform, offered debt relief, while at the same time encouraging the government to improve its revenue-collection system and intensify the privatization of state-run enterprises. A drought in 2003 cut agricultural production and caused growth to slow, while inflation rose to 9.4 percent. In addition, proposed economic reforms and privatization initiatives remained uncompleted. By 2004, only 30 of 74 state-owned enterprises scheduled for privatization had made the transition to private ownership. The international community also closely monitored the termination of the current transitional government and the return to a fully-elected civilian administration as well as resolution of the huge backlog of criminal cases arising from the conflict of 1994 (see Political background and Current issues, below).

Rwanda achieved GDP growth of 3.7 percent in 2004 and 6 percent in 2005, and the government was credited with continued liberalization of the economy and retrenchment in public spending. In 2005 the IMF and World Bank announced that Rwanda had met the requirements for large-scale debt reduction through the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) initiative. The IMF also pledged additional lending for poverty reduction programs. For its part, the government launched programs designed to attract foreign investment, particularly in regard to an ambitious plan to make Rwanda a "high-tech hub" for central Africa by extending phone and Internet service into rural areas.

Government and Politics

Political Background

Like Burundi, Rwanda was long a feudal monarchy ruled by nobles of the Tutsi tribe. A German protectorate from 1899 to 1916, it constituted the northern half of the Belgian mandate of Ruanda-Urundi after World War I and of the Belgian-administered trust territory of the same name after World War II. Resistance to the Tutsi monarchy by the more numerous Hutus intensified in the 1950s and culminated in November 1959 in a bloody revolt that overthrew the monarchy and led to the emigration of thousands of Tutsis. The Party of the Movement for Hutu Emancipation (Parti du Mouvement de l'Émancipation Hutu—Parmehutu), founded by Grégoire KAYIBANDA, won an overwhelming electoral victory in 1960, and Rwanda proclaimed itself a republic on January 28, 1961, under the leadership of Dominique MBONYUMUTWA. Since the United Nations did not recognize the action, new elections were held under UN auspices in September 1961, with the Hutu party repeating its victory. Kayibanda was accordingly designated president on October 26, 1961, and trusteeship status was formally terminated on July 1, 1962. Subsequently, Tutsi émigrés invaded the country in an attempt to restore the monarchy; their defeat in December 1963 set off mass reprisals against the remaining Tutsis, resulting in 10,000–15,000 deaths and the flight of 150,000–200,000 Tutsis to neighboring countries.

The Hutu-dominated government consolidated its position in the elections of 1965 and 1969. Moreover, with President Kayibanda legally barred from seeking another term in the approaching 1973 election, the constitution was altered to assure continuance of the existing regime. The change fanned hostility between political elements from the northern region and those from the southern and central regions, the latter having dominated the government since independence. Beginning in February 1973 at the National University in Butare, renewed Hutu moves against the Tutsis spread quickly to other areas. The government did not attempt to quell the actions of the extremists, and continued instability raised the prospect of another tribal bloodbath or even war with Tutsi-ruled Burundi. In this context, a bloodless coup took place on July 5, 1973.

The new government, under Maj. Gen. Juvénal HABYARIMANA, moved quickly to dissolve the Political Status: Republic proclaimed January 28, 1961; independent since July 1, 1962; multiparty constitution adopted June 10, 1991, but full implementation blocked by ethnic-based fighting; peace agreement signed August 4, 1993, in Arusha, Tanzania, providing for transitional government and multiparty elections by 1995; twenty-two month transitional period announced January 5, 1994; new transitional government installed on July 19, 1994, by the Rwandan Patriotic Front (FPR) after taking military control in the wake of “genocide” of April 1994; new constitution (providing for a four-year, FPR-led transitional government but including provisions of the 1991 basic law and the 1993 Arusha peace agreement) adopted by the Transitional National Assembly on May 5, 1995; transitional period extended by the FPR for four years on June 8, 1999; new constitution providing for full transition to civilian rule adopted on June 4, 2003, following a national referendum on May 26.

Area: 10,169 sq. mi. (26,338 sq. km.).

Population: 8,128,553 (2002C); 8,928,000 (2005E).

Major Urban Center (1993E): KIGALI (276,000).

Official Languages: English, French, Kinyarwanda. (English was designated as an official language by the National Assembly in January 1996.)

Monetary Unit: Rwanda Franc (official rate July 1, 2006: 552 francs = $1US).

President: Maj. Gen. Paul KAGAME (Rwandan Patriotic Front); named interim president by the Supreme Court on March 24, 2000, following the resignation the previous day of Pasteur BIZIMUNGU (Rwandan Patriotic Front); elected in a permanent position by the combined Transitional National Assembly and cabinet on April 17, 2000, and inaugurated on April 22; reelected by popular vote on August 25, 2003, and inaugurated for a seven-year term on September 12.

Prime Minister: Bernard MAKUSA; appointed by the president on March 8, 2000, to succeed Pierre-Célestin RWIGEMA (Republican Democratic Movement), who had resigned on February 28; formed new government on March 20, 2000; reappointed by the president on October 11, 2003, and formed new government on October 19, following legislative elections on September 30.

legislature, ban political organizations, and suspend portions of the constitution. A civilian-military government, composed largely of young technocrats, was subsequently installed, and it established a more centralized administrative system. A regime-supportive National Revolutionary Movement for Development (Mouvement Républicain National pour le Développement—MRND) was organized in mid-1976 and was accorded formal status as the sole legal party under a new constitution adopted by referendum on December 17, 1978. Subsequently, it was announced that the same poll had confirmed Habyarimana for an additional five-year term as president.

In 1980 the administration declared that it had foiled a coup attempt allegedly involving current and former government officials, including Maj. Théonaste LIZINDE, who had recently been removed as security chief after being charged with corruption. Lizinde received a death sentence, which was subsequently commuted to life imprisonment.

Single-party legislative balloting was conducted in 1981, 1983, and on December 26, 1988. Habyarimana, the sole candidate, was accorded additional five-year terms as president by means of referendums in 1983 and on December 19, 1988. In July 1990 Habyarimana called for the drafting by 1992 of a new national charter, which would separate governmental and MRND powers, reduce the size of the bureaucracy, and establish guidelines for the creation of a multiparty system. However, political reform was delayed by an October 1990 invasion from bases in Uganda of the Tutsi-dominated Rwandan Patriotic Front (Front Patriotique Rwandais—FPR), obliging the government to call in French, Belgian, and Zairean troops to help repel an FPR advance on Kigali. In March 1991 a cease-fire was negotiated, although fighting continued intermittently thereafter.

On April 6, 1991, a National Synthesis Commission was charged with revising the constitution, and a draft charter was completed on April 30. On June 2 the president announced the legalization of multiparty politics, and the revised constitution was adopted on June 10, one year ahead of schedule. (Earlier, plans for a national referendum were reportedly abandoned for economic reasons.) On October 12 Justice Minister Sylvestre NSANZIMANA was named to the newly created post of prime minister, and on December 30 he announced the installation of a bipartisan administration drawn from what was now termed the National Republican Movement for Democracy and Development (Mouvement Républicain National pour la Démocratie et le Développement—MRNDD) and the Christian Democratic Party (Parti Démocratique Chrétien—PDC), one of a number of newly registered formations.

In April 1992 the Social Democratic Party (Parti Social-Démocrate—PSD), Liberal Party (Parti Liberal—PL), and Republican Democratic Party (Parti Démocratique Républicain—MDR), which had refused to enter the government unless an opposition leader was named prime minister, agreed to join an expanded five-party administration headed by the MDR's Dismas NSENGIYARE-MYE pending legislative balloting within a year. In early June the new administration's plan to expedite a debate on a national conference and then hold general elections was foiled when the FPR ejected government forces from a large area of northern Rwanda and threatened to continue its advance unless granted a role in the administration. During preliminary talks held June 5–7 in Paris, the FPR and the government agreed to revive the March 1991 cease-fire and hold a full-scale peace conference.

The first round of talks held July 10–14, 1992, in Arusha, Tanzania, with Western and regional observers in attendance, yielded a truce and a new cease-fire to take effect July 19 and 31, respectively. Thereafter, despite reports of continued fighting, negotiations continued, and on October 31 a power-sharing protocol was announced. On January 10, 1993, following two months of debate on the composition of a transitional government, a formal peace agreement was signed that would give the FPR, MDR, PDC, PL, and PSD a majority of seats in the cabinet and National Assembly. The MRNDD, which was assigned six cabinet seats, and a weakened presidency, denounced the agreement, saying that it categorically refused to participate in the future broad-based transitional government. By early February more than 300 people, predominantly Tutsis, had reportedly been killed in violent anti-accord demonstrations allegedly orchestrated by the MRNDD and the Coalition for the Defense of the Republic (Coalition pour la Défense de la République—CDR), an openly anti-Tutsi group, which had been excluded from the government. In response to continuing violence, the FPR announced that it was withdrawing from peace negotiations, and on February 8 it launched an attack on government forces in northern Rwanda near the site of a recent Tutsi massacre. However, the deployment of additional French troops (bringing their number to 600), officially to protect foreign nationals, enabled the regime to survive.

Following further negotiations with the FPR in Arusha in March 1993, Habyarimana was able in July to appoint a new coalition government of the same five “internal” parties, although this time with a more accommodating faction of the MDR, headed by Agathe UWILINGIYIMANA as prime minister. Renewed Arusha talks subsequently yielded a new 300-page treaty that was signed by President Habyarimana and FPR chair Alexis KANYERENGWE on August 4. Under the new accord, a Hutu prime minister acceptable to both sides would be named and the FPR would be allocated 5 of 21 cabinet posts in a government to be installed by September 10, with multiparty presidential and legislative elections to be held by mid-1995. In addition, a united military force would be formed, 40 percent of which would be Tutsi and 60 percent Hutu. Earlier, on June 22, the UN Security Council had voted to establish a UN Observer Mission Uganda–Rwanda (UNOMUR) to verify that no external military assistance was reaching the FPR. In accordance with the August agreement, the Security Council voted on October 4 to establish a UN Assistance Mission in Rwanda (UNAMIR), which was mandated to monitor the cease-fire and to contribute to security and national rehabilitation in the run-up to the planned elections.

Bickering among the Rwandan parties and delays in UNAMIR deployment made it impossible to meet a September 1993 deadline for the start of the transitional period or a revised target date of December 31. Thus, a new timetable was announced by Habyarimana when, on January 5, 1994, he assumed the presidency for a 22-month transitional period preparatory to multiparty elections in October 1995. However intense criticism from both the FPR and the "internal" prodemocracy parties forced the president to postpone the designation of a transitional government and interim legislature. The assassination by unknown assailants on February 21 of PSD leader and government minister Félicien GATABAZI, a Hutu who had promoted rapprochement with the FPR, provoked a new crisis. On February 22 Habyarimana declared an indefinite extension of the transitional phase amid street clashes in which the chair of the Hutu CDR, Martin BUCYANA, was slain by a mob of PSD supporters.

Previous violence in Rwanda paled in significance compared with the wholesale slaughter that followed the death of Habyarimana on April 6, 1994. Both he and President Ntaryamira of Burundi died when their plane was shot down on approach to Kigali airport. (No official determination has been made regarding responsibility for the downing of the plane.) The reaction of Hutu militants in Rwanda, led by the Presidential Guard and CDR militia, was to embark on an orgy of killing, not only of Tutsis but also of Hutus believed to favor accommodation with the FPR. Among those murdered within hours of the president's death were Prime Minister Uwilingiyimana and members of her family, at least one minister, Constitutional Court Chair Joseph KAVAUNGANDA, and ten Belgian soldiers of the UNAMIR force.

As prescribed by the constitution, the president of the National Development Council, Theodore SINDIKUBWABO, assumed the presidency on April 9, 1994, appointing an interim government headed by Jean KAMBANDA as prime minister and including the five parties represented in the previous coalition. Although a broader-based transitional administration was promised within six weeks, the FPR rejected the legitimacy of the new government (claiming that the presidency should have passed to the president of the yet-to-be-inaugurated transitional legislature) and declared a new military offensive. On April 12, as FPR forces closed in on Kigali, the new government fled to Gitarama, some 30 miles to the south. Meanwhile, French, Belgian, and U.S. troops had been deployed in Rwanda to evacuate foreign nationals. On April 14, upon completion of the transfer of the foreign nationals, Belgium withdrew its 420-strong contingent from UNAMIR. That action, coupled with the failure of UN mediators to arrange a lasting cease-fire, prompted the UN Security Council, in a controversial decision on April 22, to vote unanimously for a reduction of UNAMIR from 2,500 to 270 personnel.

The FPR offensive and the effective absence of an international military presence served to incite the Hutu militants in Rwanda to even greater savagery against the Tutsi minority and presumed Hutu opponents. Gangs of machete-wielding soldiers and militia members reportedly roamed the countryside, engaging in systematic and indiscriminate slaughter of men, women, and children. Although numbers were impossible to verify, the death toll was estimated to be at least 200,000 by late April and perhaps as high as 800,000—a scale of killing officially described by the UN as "genocidal." The carnage caused a mass exodus from the country, both of surviving Tutsis and of Hutus fearing FPR vengeance. By early May some 1.5 million refugees had crossed into neighboring countries, creating one of the most severe humanitarian crises ever to afflict independent Africa.

Following widespread criticism of its April 22 decision, the UN Security Council on May 17, 1994, reversed itself by approving the creation of a UNAMIR II force of 5,500 troops, while embargoing arms supplies to the Rwandan combatants. Mainly at U.S. insistence, however, only 150 unarmed observers were initially dispatched, followed by an 800-strong Ghanaian contingent charged with securing Kigali airport. Deployment of the bulk of the force was contingent on a further report from the UN secretary general on its duration, mandate, and composition, and on the attitude of the warring factions to a heightened UN presence. The immediate reaction of the FPR to the UN decision was one of suspicion that UNAMIR II would forestall its imminent military victory. On May 30, with FPR forces controlling portions of Kigali, UN mediators succeeded in bringing about talks between government and rebel representatives. However, little of substance resulted from these and subsequent meetings, while a cease-fire agreement signed under the auspices of the Organization of African Unity (OAU, subsequently the African Union—AU) in Tunisia on June 14 was equally ineffectual. Accounts continued to emerge from Rwanda of atrocities, some allegedly committed by advancing FPR forces. Especially deplored in the West was the murder on June 9 by FPR soldiers (later described as “renegades” by the FPR leadership) of the (Hutu) archbishop of Kigali, two Hutu bishops, and ten Catholic priests.

The UN Security Council on June 9, 1994, unanimously extended the UNAMIR mandate for a six-month period and approved the speedy deployment of two further battalions, which were to protect civilians in Rwanda and facilitate the international relief effort. However, difficulties and delays in assembling and equipping the UNAMIR force (most of which was to be provided by African states) led France to propose on June 15 that it should dispatch 2,500 troops pending the arrival of the enlarged UNAMIR contingent. The Security Council endorsed the French proposal on June 22 (albeit with five members abstaining), and French troops (supported by a small Senegalese contingent) arrived in Rwanda the next day. The result was the establishment of a large “safe area” southeast of Lake Kivu for surviving Tutsis as well as for Hutus fleeing the advancing FPR forces.

The FPR leadership expressed strong opposition to the French deployment, disputing the French claim to nonpartisanship in the conflict in light of the French record of support for the Hutu-based Habyarimana regime. Moving quickly to consolidate its position, the FPR completed its capture of Kigali on July 4, 1994, and two weeks later declared itself the victor in the civil war. On July 19 the Front installed a new transitional government, with a moderate Hutu, Pasteur BIZIMUNGU, as president, and another Hutu, Faustin TWAGIRAMUNGU (the opposition’s nominee for the post following the August 1993 agreement) as prime minister. The FPR military commander, Maj. Gen. Paul KAGAME, became vice president and defense minister, while Tutsis took most of the remaining portfolios. In addition to the FPR and MDR, the PDC, PL, and PSD were represented in the new administration, while the MRNDD and CDR were excluded.

Because of widespread reports of mass killings, the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) in September 1994 suspended its policy of encouraging Rwandan refugees in Zaire to return home, and on November 8 the Security Council established an International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) to prosecute those responsible for genocide “and other serious violations of international humanitarian law.” Subsequently, the 70-member Transitional National Assembly provided for under the 1993 Arusha agreement convened in Kigali on December 12 (see Legislature, below).

On April 22, 1995, the image of the FPR-controlled government was severely tarnished by the Tutsi-dominated army’s massacre of some 2,000 Hutus in the Kibeho refugee camp near Gikongoro. The universally condemned action slowed the voluntary return of Rwandans from Zaire, in addition to setting back efforts to secure badly needed international aid. This and other atrocities by the victorious Tutsis were reportedly the reason for the resignation of Prime Minister Twagiramungu on August 28, with Pierre-Célestin RWIGEMA, the relatively obscure primary and secondary education minister, being named three days later as Twagiramungu’s successor and the head of a government which included a number of new Tutsi members in posts formerly assigned to Hutus. By all accounts, however, Major General Kagame remained the most powerful figure in the administration, and on March 24, 2000, he moved into the presidency following the resignation of President Bizimungu. Earlier, on March 8, Bernard MAKUSA, a relatively unknown former ambassador to Burundi and Germany, was appointed to succeed Rwigema as prime minister.

Prime Minister Rwigema's resignation in late February 2000 was attributed to his deteriorating relationship with the Transitional National Assembly (which was investigating alleged financial improprieties on the part of government officials) as well as conflict with other MDR leaders. Likewise, an intraparty power struggle in the FPR apparently contributed to the resignation of President Bizimungu in March. The installation of Major General Kagame as president merely formalized his already de facto authority. Kagame called upon all Rwandan refugees to return home and pledged to pursue national reconciliation, although his status as the nation's first Tutsi president since independence created additional unease for those already concerned over the lack of Hutu representation in government. That worry was not alleviated by the March 2001 district elections, in which party activity was again barred and most of the successful candidates appeared to be aligned with the FPR.

In April 2003 the Transitional National Assembly approved a new draft constitution that was put before voters in a national referendum on May 26, 2003. The new basic law was approved by a 93.4 percent vote and became effective June 4. Among other provisions, the constitution created a bicameral legislature and provided for direct elections of the president. In an effort to prevent further ethnic conflict, the constitution also prohibited any parties based solely on race, gender, or religion. However, some opposition parties and international human rights groups charged that this provision was enacted to reinforce the political domination of the FPR.

Prior to the presidential elections, the constitutional court ruled that the MDR and the PDC were illegal parties because of their role in the events of 1994. Consequently, the MDR candidate—former prime minister Twagiramungu—and the PDC candidate—Jean-Népomuscène NAYINZIRA—were forced to run as independents. At the balloting on August 25, 2003, Kagame was elected with 95.1 percent of the vote, followed by Twagiramungu with 3.6 percent and Nayinzira with 1.3 percent.

Legislative balloting took place September 29–30 and October 2, 2003. Of the 53 directly contested seats, a coalition led by the FPR secured 40 seats; the PSD, 7; and the PL, 6. Makusa was reappointed prime minister and formed a new government on October 19.

Constitution and Government

Under the 1978 constitution, executive power was vested in a president elected by universal suffrage for a five-year term, the president of the MRND being the only candidate. He presided over a Council of Ministers, which he appointed, with the secretary general of the MRND being empowered to serve as interim president should the incumbent be incapacitated. A unicameral National Development Council, also elected for a five-year term, was to share legislative authority with the president and, by four-fifths vote, could censure (but not dismiss) him.

On June 10, 1991, President Habyarimana signed into law a new charter distinguished by the introduction of a multiparty system and the separation of executive, legislative, and judiciary powers. Under the 1991 constitution, executive powers were shared by the president and a presidentially appointed prime minister, who named his own cabinet. In addition, the legislature's presiding officer was empowered to serve as interim president if the incumbent left the country or became incapacitated. The constitution also stated that while political party formations could organize along ethnic and tribal lines, they had to be open to all.

On May 5, 1995, the Transitional National Assembly that had convened five months earlier adopted a new constitution incorporating the essentials of the 1991 document as well as elements of the 1993 power-sharing peace agreement. On June 8, 1999, the FPR secretary general announced that the transition period, initially scheduled to expire in 1999, would be extended to 2003.

The new constitution adopted on June 4, 2003, created a bicameral legislature and provided for a directly elected president, limited to two seven-year terms. Amendments to the constitution in October 2005 reduced the number of provinces from 12 to 5, the number of districts from 106 to 30, and the number of "sectors" (local administrative units) from 1,545 to 416. The consolidation was seen as a way to save money and streamline government. In February 2006 the language in the constitution regarding property rights was strengthened to assist returning refugees in recovering their property.

The judiciary, headed by a Supreme Court, includes magistrates', prefectural, and appeals courts; a Court of Accounts; a Court of Cassation; and a Constitutional Court composed of the Court of Cassation and a Council of State. The president and vice president of the Supreme Court are elected by the Senate. (See Current issues, below, for information on the recent creation of local village courts outside the regular system.)

Foreign Relations

Under President Kayibanda, Rwandan foreign policy exhibited a generally pro-Western bias but did not exclude relations with a number of Communist countries, including the Soviet Union and the People's Republic of China. Following the 1973 coup, however, the country took a pronounced "anti-imperialist" turn; Rwanda became the first African nation to break relations with Israel as a result of the October 1973 Arab-Israeli war, and it also contributed to the support of liberation movements in southern Africa. At the same time, President Habyarimana initiated a policy of "opening" (l'ouverture) with adjacent countries. Despite a tradition of ethnic conflict between Burundi's ruling Tutsis and Rwanda's ruling Hutus, a number of commercial, cultural, and economic agreements were concluded during a visit by Burundian President Micombero in June 1976, while similar agreements were subsequently negotiated with Tanzania and Côte d'Ivoire. Burundi, Rwanda, and Zaire established the Economic Community of the Great Lakes Countries in 1976; two years later, Burundi, Rwanda, and Tanzania formed the Organization for the Management and Development of the Kagera River Basin.

Relations with Uganda were strained for several decades following independence by large numbers of refugees crossing the border in both directions to escape tribal-based hostilities. Following the overthrow of Ugandan President Apollo Milton Obote in 1985, some 30,000 Ugandan refugees returned from Rwanda. However, more than 200,000 Rwandan Tutsis remained in Uganda. Rwanda in 1986 urged that all the refugees be given Ugandan citizenship, but Uganda granted the status only to those with ten years of official residency. Despite continued concern over the refugee issue, agreements on trade, security, and communications strengthened relations between the countries in 1986 and 1987. On the other hand, a Ugandan plan to restrict property rights of foreigners was one of the reported impulses for the invasion of northern Rwanda by Ugandan-based rebels of the FPR in October 1990. Ugandan President Museveni denied any prior knowledge of the attack and criticized the rebels, many of whom were recent deserters of the Ugandan military; nonetheless, relations between Uganda and Rwanda deteriorated as the FPR made military inroads in the early 1990s.

In 1995 and 1996 Rwanda's foreign relations continued to be defined by the encampment of an estimated 2 million Rwandans outside its borders. In August 1995 the UN lifted its embargo on the sale of weapons to Rwanda after months of lobbying by Rwanda, which claimed that members of the former Hutu government now exiled in Zaire were engaging in cross-border guerrilla attacks. In response to the end of the embargo, Kinshasa launched a violent and unsuccessful repatriation program, claiming that Kigali was preparing to attack the refugee camps. A subsequent repatriation attempt in February 1996 strained relations even further, and throughout the first half of 1996 the two capitals accused each other of employing "destabilization" tactics. Meanwhile, in mid-April the FPR cheered the withdrawal of the last UN peacekeepers from Rwanda. (The Tutsi regime held the UN forces responsible for both allegedly collaborating in the 1994 genocide and undermining the regime's attempts to govern.) During the second half of 1996 a stunning sequence of events in Burundi, Zaire, and Tanzania, respectively, resulted in the repatriation of approximately 650,000 refugees to Rwanda. In Burundi the military coup by Tutsi officers in late July reportedly sparked fear of reprisal attacks among the refugees, and, following the departure of 130,000 people, Bujumbura on August 27 announced the closing of the last of its camps. Thereafter, in mid-November, several hundred thousand refugees were reported to have fled back across the border from their encampments in eastern Zaire after an allegedly Kigali-funded rebellion on behalf of Zairean Tutsis, the Banyamulenge, resulted in the rout of Zairean troops and Rwandan Hutu militiamen who had been seeking to establish a "Hutuland" in the region. In December Tanzanian government forces, with the tacit and unprecedented approval of the UN Office of High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), forcibly repatriated over 200,000 refugees to Rwanda.

In 1997 Rwanda, along with five other nations, supported the forces of Laurent Kabila in Zaire, hoping a rebel victory there would enable Rwanda to close the rear bases of the Hutu guerrillas as well as the camps where they sought refuge. After the Kabila victory, the refugee camps along the border were closed, but guerrillas drifted across into Rwanda with returning refugees and regrouped in Rwanda. Meanwhile, Rwandan government forces who had crossed the border into the former Zaire remained in two provinces, North and South Kivu, in a de facto occupation apparently with Kabila's tacit approval. Relations between Kinshasa and Kigali subsequently deteriorated, as Kabila distanced himself from Tutsi influence, prompting hostility among the Banyamulenge Tutsis in the eastern portion of the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC), as Zaire had been renamed. In July 1998 Kabila announced an end to military cooperation with Rwanda, and in August a full-fledged rebellion broke out against his administration (see article on the DRC). By November Rwanda acknowledged that its troops were allied with the anti-Kabila rebels, claiming that the DRC government was rearming the Hutus responsible for the 1994 genocide.

In an unexpected turn of events, forces from Rwanda and Uganda, previously allied in support of anti-Kabila rebels in the DRC, clashed in north-east DRC in August 1999, with underlying factors apparently including support for different anti-Kabila factions in the DRC and perhaps most importantly, rivalry regarding eventual preeminence in the region. Fighting between the Rwandan and Ugandan troops erupted again in the spring of 2000.

In November 2001, Kagame began a series of meetings with the leader of Uganda, Lt.-Gen. Yoweri Museveni. Following mediation efforts by South Africa and the United Kingdom, in 2003, the two governments agreed to take stronger action to prevent rebels and dissident groups from crossing each other's borders and initiating conflicts. In addition, the two heads of state agreed on the voluntary repatriation of 26,000 Rwandans remaining in refugee camps in Uganda. In July 2002 a peace accord was signed in Pretoria, South Africa, between Rwanda and the DRC. By October, all 23,400 Rwandan troops had withdrawn from the DRC, and in September 2003 the two countries reestablished diplomatic relations.

In March 2005, the government offered to contribute troops to the proposed UN peacekeeping mission in Darfur, Sudan. Rwanda eventually lent 2,000 soldiers to that effort.

In May 2006 President Kagame met with U.S. President George W. Bush in Washington. The United States announced at the meeting that it was increasing its bilateral aid to Rwanda.

Current Issues

By the end of 1997 an estimated 1.5 million refugees had returned, but the FPR regime still fell short of fulfilling what it had delineated as one of the top prerequisites for national reconciliation—resolution of the judicial process for the tens of thousands of predominantly Hutu prisoners imprisoned (in reportedly subhuman conditions) for their alleged roles in the 1994 genocide. In fact, the FPR continued to be plagued by charges, largely unsubstantiated, that the Tutsi-controlled military was engaging in its own campaign of revenge killings. Meanwhile, the ICTR—26 justices assigned to more than 100,000 cases—proceeded at a glacial pace, hampered, according to a January 1998 UN internal investigation, by a mismanaged judicial system. By the end of 1997, three years after the massacres, the ICTR had not convicted a single defendant. Kigali's judicial efforts, which disposed of less than 300 cases in 1997, also foundered when a plea-bargaining program failed to break the logjam, causing observers to note that, barring new developments, most prisoners would die in prison long before their cases could come to trial.

Meanwhile, the toll from ethnic conflict increased in the second half of 1997 (with at least 6,000 more murders during the year, according to UN monitors) as Hutu guerrillas grew in strength and began making daylight raids, particularly in the northwest, where they had wide popular support. Although the guerrillas appeared to have no hope of a military victory, their attacks seemed aimed at making Rwanda ungovernable.

During ICTR testimony in February 1998 the former UNAMIR commander in Rwanda said he had advised the UN leadership of the impending genocide and asked for authorization (never granted) to prevent it. Similarly, a report by the Belgian parliament released in February 1998 claimed the Belgian, French, and U.S. governments also had credible advance warning of the genocide. U.S. President Bill Clinton visited Rwanda in March as part of an African tour, and he acknowledged that the United States and other Western nations had been slow to react to the developments of 1994. (In July 2000 an OAU panel strongly criticized the United States, France, Belgium, the UN, and others—including church groups—for failing to prevent or stop the genocide and called for a “significant level of reparations.”)

In April 1998 Rwanda publicly executed 22 persons convicted of murders committed during 1994, and by June thousands of other prisoners had pleaded guilty, apparently to avoid death sentences.

In early September the ICTR (recently expanded by the UN in response to widespread criticism) issued its first guilty verdict. Shortly thereafter, the tribunal sentenced former interim prime minister Jean Kambanda to life in prison following his conviction on genocide charges. (Kambanda had admitted his guilt earlier and had reportedly provided evidence against other officials.)

Despite the ongoing judicial quagmire, a degree of normalcy had returned to Rwanda by early 1999, as evidenced by the successful completion of non-party local elections in March, the first balloting since 1988. At the same time, however, instability persisted near the DRC border, hundreds of thousands of civilians having moved into camps protected by government troops. International attention also remained focused on the Rwandan government's significant role in the DRC civil war (see article on the DRC). Under those circumstances, it was not surprising that the transitional government in July extended its mandate for four more years, with FPR leaders concluding that security conditions did not permit the organization of multiparty elections.

The return to normality continued with the government in December 2001 adopting a new flag, national anthem, and national seal. However, Hutu groups continued to assert periodic discrimination and retaliation by the FPR-dominated government. Domestically, hopes for Tutsi-Hutu reconciliation rested, in part, on the reestablishment in early 2002 of the traditional gacaca system, in which elected village judges were to adjudicate the cases of some 90,000 detainees still facing charges relating to the events of 1994. (Most of the other cases, involving those accused of ordering mass killings or participating in rapes, were to be handled by the normal court system. Meanwhile, the “masterminds” of the genocide still faced trial at the ICTR, which as of April 2002 had arrested 60 of the 75 people who had been indicted so far. Only eight convictions had been achieved by that time, although a number of high-profile cases were on the docket for the remainder of the year.)

In January 2003, the government ordered the release of 40,000 detainees, but reserved the right to arrest the released people if new evidence emerged. By the end of the year, some 25,000 had been released. Survivor groups severely criticized the measure, claiming that many involved in the genocide were being released. Meanwhile, the gacaca courts began to adjudicate an increasing number of cases. In August 2003, one gacaca court convicted 105 people in a mass two-day trial.

The passage of the new constitution and subsequent presidential and legislative elections in 2003 finalized the transition to civilian government. Defeated presidential candidate Faustin Twagiramungu protested the official results, claiming that widespread irregularities had occurred. However, the Supreme Court ruled against him, and international observers characterized the balloting as generally free and fair, despite certain significant problems.

By March 2005 the ICTR had convicted 22 defendants and acquitted 3. In addition to complaints about the continued slow pace of case resolution, criticism emanated from Rwandan Hutus over the fact that no Tutsis had been indicted by the ICTR, despite Hutu assertions that revenge killings and other atrocities had been committed by Tutsis from the FPR in 1994. Meanwhile, the gacaca courts faced a backlog of some 95,000 cases by the end of the year. Tension also arose from the release of documents from the Kambanda trial that appeared to support Tutsi arguments that the Hutu attacks in 1994 had been well coordinated and discussed in advance at high levels of government.

Reports surfaced in mid-2006 of a possible power struggle within the Kagame administration. For his part, the president pointed to the nation's recent economic progress (see The Country, above) as evidence of effective governance. He also emphasized that a former Rwandan finance minister had recently been named president of the African Development Bank, while another Rwandan had been named one of the four deputy directors of the World Trade Organization. Kagame described those events as indications of success in his efforts to elevate the status and visibility of Rwanda in the international community.

Political Parties

A one-party state after the 1973 coup, Rwanda adopted a multiparty constitution on June 10, 1991. By mid-1993 it was reported that 17 parties, including the preexisting National Republican Movement for Democracy and Development (MRNDD), had been recognized. However, the MRNDD was not included in the government installed in July 1994 after the military victory of the FPR over the forces of the previous regime. Party candidates were not permitted at the March 1999 village elections or the March 2001 communal balloting, the government concluding that party activity might exacerbate ethnic tensions.

Under the terms of the 2003 constitution, the government has the power to ban political parties that might advocate civic unrest or exacerbate ethnic differences. Using this provision, the government banned the MDR, PDC, and several smaller parties prior to the 2003 elections (see below).

Government and Progovernment Parties

Rwandan Patriotic Front (Front Patriotique Rwandais—FPR). Currently the dominant political force in Rwanda, the FPR is a largely Tutsi formation that invaded Rwanda in October 1990 from Uganda under the command of Rwandan refugees who were formerly officers in the Ugandan armed forces. However, most of the original leadership, including FPR founder Fred RWIGYEMA, were killed in fighting with government troops in late 1990 and early 1991.

Buoyed by a series of stunning victories in early June 1992, which yielded control of much of northern Rwanda, the FPR called on the Rwandan government to integrate FPR members into both the military and the government, reduce the president's power, allow all refugees to return, and hold multiparty elections. The FPR signed the Arusha peace agreement on August 4, 1993, but implementation was subject to repeated delays. The massacres of Tutsis and moderate Hutus, which followed the death of President Habyarimana in April 1994, impelled the FPR to launch a new offensive, which brought it to power three months later. The victory was attributed largely to the military leadership of Maj. Gen. Paul Kagame, who, although designated as vice president in the new regime, was widely regarded as its preeminent figure. Kagame consolidated his power when he was elected FPR president in February 1998 and president of the republic in March 2000. Kagame was subsequently reelected president for a seven-year term in 2003. During legislative elections, the FPR led an electoral coalition that received 73.78 percent of the vote and 40 seats. (The FPR gained 33 seats alone.)

Leaders: Maj. Gen. Paul KAGAME (President of the Republic and President of the Front), Col. Alexis KANYARENGWE (Former President of the Front), Charles MURIGANDE (Secretary General).

Christian Democratic Party/Centrist Democratic Party (Parti Démocratique Chrétien—PDC). The PDC accepted one cabinet post in the governments of December 1991 and April 1992. A PDC member also served in the Makusa government until March 2001. Prior to the 2003 presidential elections, the PDC was banned. It reconstituted itself as the Centrist Democratic Party (Parti Démocrate Centriste—PDC) before legislative elections, and the reconstituted PDC joined the FPR-led coalition. It won three seats. Former PDC President Jean-Népomuscène Nayinzira placed third in the national presidential polling in 2003.

Leader: Alfred MUKEZAMFURA.

Social Democratic Party (Parti Social-Démocrate—PSD). One of the first three opposition parties to be recognized under the 1991 constitution, the PSD was one of several prodemocracy parties that accepted cabinet posts from April 1992, and in August 1993 it was a signatory of the Arusha peace agreement. The assassination of its leader, Félicien GATABAZI, in February 1994 sparked the violence in Rwanda, which escalated to genocidal proportions from April onward. Following the death of President Habyarimana two months later, PSD president Frederic NZAMURAMBAHO and vice president Felicien NGANGO also died. The PSD's Juvénal Nksui, then speaker of the assembly, was sacked by the legislature in March 1997 and accused of incompetence after failing to sign into law a bill passed by the assembly that would make the president accountable to it. The PSD won six seats in the 2003 legislative elections. Party leader Vincent Biruta was elected to the Senate and was subsequently elected speaker of that body. The PSD participated in the subsequent Kagame unity government.

Leader: Vincent BIRUTA (Speaker of the Senate), Juvénal NKSUI (Former Speaker of the Assembly), Jacqueline MUHONGAYRIE.

Liberal Party (Parti Liberal—PL). Joining the MDR and PSD in refusing to enter the Nsanzimana government of December 1991, the PL accepted three cabinet posts under the MDR's Dismas Nsenyiremye in April 1992 and also participated in subsequent coalitions, becoming as a consequence split into progovernment and antigovernment factions. The latter joined the government installed by the FPR following its military victory in July 1994. The PL's Joseph SEBARENZI became speaker of the assembly when that body sacked Juvénal Nksui (see PSD, above); however, Sebarenzi resigned his speaker's position in January 2000 amid a power struggle within the party and in the face of parliamentary criticism. He was subsequently reported to have assumed self-imposed exile in the United States. Prosper Higirow became party chair in 2001. In the 2003 elections, the PL secured seven seats. The PL was given a cabinet post in the subsequent Kagame unity government.

Leaders: Prosper HIGIRO (Chair), Esdra KAYIRANGA, Joseph MUSENGIMANA, Odette NYIRAMIRIMO.

Other progovernment parties that contested the 2003 legislative elections included the Islamic Democratic Party (Parti Démocratique Islamique—PDI), formed in 1992 and led by André Bumaya HABIB; the Rwandan People's Democratic Union (Union Démocratique du Peuple Rwandais—UDPR), formed in 1992 and led by Adrien RANGIRA; and the Rwandan Socialist Party (Parti Socialiste Rwandais—PSR), a workers' rights party launched in 1991 and led by Medard RUTIJANWA.

Other Parties and Groups

Party for Progress and Concord (Parti pour le Progrès et la Concorde—PPC). The PPC was formed in 2003 after the MDR was outlawed. It is comprised mainly of Hutus. In the 2003 legislative elections, the PPC received 2.2 percent of the vote, below the 5 percent threshold needed for representation.

Leader: Christian MARARA.

Republican Democratic Movement (Mouvement Démocratique Républicain—MDR). A predominantly Hutu party, which draws its support from the central Rwandan capital region, the MDR is a direct descendant of Grégoire Kayibanda's Parmehutu—MDR, which was banned in 1973. The current party was legally registered on July 31, 1991, and in November it led, along with the recently recognized PL and PSR (above), a march in Kigali in support of a national conference. From April 1992 the MDR headed successive coalition governments that included other prodemocracy parties, although the appointment of the MRD's Agathe Uwilingiyimana as prime minister in July 1993 was strongly opposed by an antiregime MDR faction. Meanwhile one of the MDR's leaders, Emmanuel GAPYISI, who had also served as president of the Forum for Peace and Democracy (a group opposed to both President Habyarimana and the FPR), had been assassinated on May 19, 1993.

The MDR was a signatory of the August 1993 Arusha peace agreement with the rebel FPR, and Faustin Twagiramungu (of the MDR antiregime wing) became the agreed nominee of the prodemocracy parties for the premiership in the envisaged transitional government. Many MDR members, including Uwilingiyimana, were killed by Hutu extremists in the bloodletting that followed President Habyarimana's death in April 1994. Early in May the antigovernment MDR faction formed an alliance called the Democratic Forces for Change (Forces Démocratiques pour le Changement—FDC) with the opposition faction of the PL, the PDC, and the PSD (above). The eventual military victory of the FPR resulted in Twagiramungu being appointed prime minister of a transitional government in July; he resigned in late August 1995.

The appointment of Pierre-Célestin Rwigema as Twagiramungu's prime ministerial successor exacerbated the intraparty rift between Twagiramungu's antiregime followers and the so-called "liberal" wing of the party, led by Rwigema and Anastase GASANA, the foreign affairs minister whom Twagiramungu's allies had labeled an FPR "straw man." For his part, Gasana was a vocal critic of the former prime minister, describing his government as guilty of "inaction and inefficiency." In December 1995 Twagiramungu rejected as "null and void" a motion forwarded by Gasana, Jean-Pierre BIZIMANA, and Laurien NGIRABANZI to force him from his party post. Subsequently, in March 1996 Twagiramungu split from the MDR to create a new anti-FPR grouping (see FRD, below).

In August 1998 the MDR's executive committee was dissolved, and party president Bonaventure UBALIJORO, who had been arrested in July, was dismissed and succeeded by Prime Minister Rwigema. In March 1999 four members of the party were expelled from the legislature, three for alleged involvement with the Interahamwe, the extremist Hutu militias. The fourth, Jacques Maniraguha, had repeated allegations made by a local official on trial for genocide that Prime Minister Rwigema had armed the Interahamwe just before the genocide of 1994. In April the prime minister, on behalf of the party, asked the Rwandan people to forgive the MDR for its role in 1994. Rwigema was subsequently reported to have feuded with other MDR leaders, and the party's political bureau approved changes in MDR governing bodies (although keeping Rwigema as party president) prior to Rwigema's resignation from his prime minister's post in February 2000. Rwigema subsequently moved to the United States, Rwanda issuing an international warrant for his arrest in connection with the events of 1994. Meanwhile, the MDR, which had expelled Rwigema in August 2000, reaffirmed its support in 2001 for the "collegial" power-sharing agreement with the FPR.

Prior to the 2003 legislative elections, the National Assembly voted to dissolve the MDR under the terms of the 2003 constitution. Former MDR member Twagiramungu ran for the presidency in 2003 and placed third. Many members of the MDR joined the new Hutu-based party, the Party for Progress and Concord (Parti pour le Progrès et la Concorde—PPC).

Party for Democracy and Renewal (Parti pour la Démocratie et le Renouveau—PDR). Formed in mid-2001 by former president Pasteur Bizimungu after he had resigned his government post following an apparent disagreement with Maj. Gen. Kagame of the FPR, the PDR (also known as ubuyanja, Renewal) was subsequently banned by the government on the grounds that the new grouping promoted ethnic hostility. Bizimungu, a Hutu who had served as an “icon of reconciliation” during his presidency, was arrested in mid-2002. He was convicted in 2004 on charges of embezzlement and incitement to civil disobedience and sentenced to 15 years in prison.

Leader: Pasteur BIZIMUNGU (Former President of the Republic).

Rally for Return and Democracy (Rassemblement pour la Démocratie et le Retour—RDR). Based in the refugee camps of eastern DRC, the RDR is the most prominent of the exile political groupings. The RDR has been critical of the UNHCR’s compliance with FPR demands, claiming that a forced repatriation of the Hutu refugees “would mean handing over the refugees to their torturers.” In January 1997 the RDR denounced the genocide trials of Hutus as a “mockery of justice,” claiming, for example, that alleged murderers were falsely accused by those who wanted their property. In June the RDR reportedly decided to become a political party, while in April 2000 the grouping reacted in a conciliatory manner to President Kagame’s inaugural speech in which he urged exiles to return home.

Leaders: Charles NDEREYENE, François NZ-ABAHIMANA.

Resistance Forces for Democracy (Forces de Résistance pour la Démocratie—FRD). The FRD, listed in a previous edition of the Handbook under its provisional name, United Political Forces, was launched by former Hutu prime minister Faustin Twagiramungu and former interior minister Seth SENDASHONGHA in Brussels on March 26, 1996, following their breaks from the MDR and FPR, respectively. Both had been sacked by the government in August 1995 after objecting to an expansion of army power, which the military claimed was necessary to hunt down perpetrators of genocide. Highlighting the new party’s platform were calls for the ouster of the Tutsi regime (which the FRD cited as an unbreachable impediment to the return of Rwanda’s primarily Hutu refugees) and the drafting of a new power-sharing constitution based on the 1993 Arusha peace agreement. Furthermore, the FRD accused the FPR regime of engaging in “genocide” against the Hutu population. Two of the party’s key leaders were in exile, Twagiramungu in Brussels and Sendashongha in Nairobi, when the latter was assassinated in May 1998. Moderates had wanted Sendashongha to return to Kigali to lead reconciliation efforts. Twagiramungu strongly criticized President Kagame’s call in April 2000 for exiles to return to Rwanda, charging that Kagame was attempting to cover up his “crimes against humanity.” Nonetheless, Twagiramungu returned to Rwanda in June 2003 and launched a bid for the presidency as an independent. He placed second in the balloting, but challenged the results. His challenge was overturned by the Supreme Court.

Leader: Faustin TWAGIRAMUNGU (Former Prime Minister).

Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (Forces Démocratiques pour la Libération du Rwanda—FDLR). Described in 2004 and early 2005 as one of the last major organized resistance groups outside Rwanda, the Hutu FDLR was accused by some Western leaders of involvement in the killing of civilians in the DRC. In March 2005 the FDLR formally apologized for its role in the 1994 killings in Rwanda. In April 2005 the FDLR declared it was disarming, and the leadership announced the group’s intention

Cabinet

As of June 1, 2006

Prime Minister Bernard Makusa (ind.)

Ministers

Agriculture and Animal Resources	Anastase Murekezi
Commerce, Industry, and Tourism	Protais Mitali
Defense	Maj. Gen. Marcel Gatsinzi (ind.)
Education	Jean d'Arc Mujawamariya
Finance and Economic Planning	James Musoni
Foreign Affairs	Charles Murigande (FPR)
Health	Jean-Damascène Ntawukuliryayo (PSD)
Infrastructure	Stanislas Kamanzi
Internal Security	Sheikh Fazil Musa Harerimana
Justice	Edda Mukabagwiza [f]
Labor and Civil Service	Paul-Manasseh Nshuti
Lands, Environment, Forestry, Water, and Mines	Christophe Bazivamo (FPR)
Local Government and Social Affairs	Protais Musoni
President's Office	Solina Nyirahabimana [f]
President's Office in charge of Science, Technology, and Research	Romain Murenzi (PL)
Prime Minister's Office in charge of Gender and Women in Development	Valérie Nyirahabineza (ind.) [f]
Prime Minister's Office in charge of Information Youth, Culture, and Sports	Laurent Nkusi (PL)
	Joseph Habineza

Ministers of State

Agriculture	Daphrose Gahakwa
Energy and Communication	Albert Butare
Environmental Protection	Patricia Hajabakiga [f]
Finance and Economic Planning	Monique Nsanzabaganwa [f]
Foreign Cooperation	Rosemary Museminari [f]
HIV/AIDS and other Infectious Diseases	Innocent Nyaruhirira
Industry and Investment Promotion	Vincent Karega
Primary and Secondary Education	Joseph Murekeraho
Rural Development and Social Affairs	Christine Nyatanyi [f]
Skills Development and Labor	Angelina Muganza [f]
Water and Natural Resources	Bikoro Munyanganizi

[f] = female

to return to Rwanda from the DRC and to try to establish a legal political movement.

FDLP leader Ignace MURWANASHYAKA was arrested in Germany in April 2006 on alleged immigration violations. The Rwandan government asked for his extradition, but the German government refused the request.

It was reported in early 2002 that two exile groups in Belgium—the African Democratic Congress and the Movement for Peace,

Democracy, and Development—had launched a new anti-Kagame coalition called the Rwandan Democratic Alliance. Another opposition coalition—the Alliance for Democracy and National Recovery—was reportedly launched in Brussels in April under the leadership of Valens KAJEGUHAKWA.

Legislature

Prior to the resumption of hostilities between the Rwandan armed forces and the Rwandan Patriotic Front in April 1994, the legislature consisted of a unicameral National Development Council (Conseil pour le Développement National) of 70 members elected on December 26, 1988, from 140 candidates nominated by the MRND. Under the terms of the power-sharing agreement reached by the government and FPR on January 10, 1993, and confirmed by the Arusha peace agreement of August 4, 1993, a transitional legislative body was formally launched on December 12, 1994.

Under the terms of the 2003 constitution, a bicameral Parliament was created.

Senate. The Senate consists of 26 indirectly elected members who serve eight-year terms. Twelve senators are elected by regional councils; eight are appointed by the president; four are elected by a regulatory forum of the country's political parties; and the remaining two are elected by university staffs and faculty. In addition, former presidents of the republic can request to be members of the Senate. The first senators were sworn in on October 10, 2003.

Speaker: Vincent BIRUTA.

Chamber of Deputies. The lower house consists of 80 members who serve five-year terms. Fifty-three are directly elected by a system of proportional representation in which parties must achieve a 5 percent threshold to gain representation. Two deputies are elected by the National Youth Council and one by the Federation of the Associations of the Disabled. The remaining 24 deputies are elected by a joint council, which includes representatives from provincial, district, and city governments, as well as members of the executive committees of women's groups at various regional levels. Following the balloting of September 29–30 and October 2, 2003, the 53 popularly elected seats were divided as follows: Rwandan Patriotic Front, 33; Liberal Party, 7; Social Democratic Party, 6; Centrist Democratic Party, 3; Islamic Democratic Party, 2; Rwandan People's Democratic Union, 1; and the Rwandan Socialist Party, 1.

Speaker: Alfred MUKEZAMFURA.

Communications

Press

On August 14, 1991, the legislature adopted a press law guaranteeing, with certain restrictions, a free press. Most papers stopped publishing as the result of the 1994 genocide, although the situation has since returned to normal. The press is generally considered to be supportive of the government and exercises a degree of self-censorship in that regard. There are no daily papers; the government information office in Kigali publishes Imvaho (The Truth, 51,000), a weekly in Kinyarwanda, and La Relève (Relief, 1,700), a monthly in French. The weekly Umuseso is generally perceived as the most independent publication; progovernment (according to the journalism watchdog organization Reporters Without Frontiers) publications include The New Times, L'Enjeu, Grand Lacs Lebdo, and L'Horizon.

News Agency

The official facility is Agence Rwandaise de Presse (ARP).

Broadcasting and Computing

The government-controlled Radio Rwanda broadcasts daily in Kinyarwanda, Kiswahili, and French. Deutsche Welle Relay Kigali broadcasts in German, French, English, Hausa, Kiswahili, Portuguese, and Amharic. The government's Television Rwanda is the only TV facility. There were approximately 718,000 radio and 864,000 television receivers in 1999, with some 30,000 Internet users reported in 2003.

Intergovernmental Representation

Ambassador to the U.S.

Zac NSENGA

U.S. Ambassador to Rwanda

Michael R. ARIETTI

Permanent Representative to the UN

Joseph NSENGIMANA

IGO Memberships (Non-UN):

AfDB, AU, BADEA, CEEAC, CEPGL, Comesa, Interpol, IOM, NAM, OIF, WCO, WTO

SAO TOME AND PRINCIPE

DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF SAO TOME AND PRINCIPE

República Democrática de São Tomé e Príncipe

---

The Country

Located in the Gulf of Guinea some 125 miles off the coast of Gabon, Sao Tome and Principe embraces a small archipelago of two main islands (after which the country is named) and four islets: Cabras, Gago Coutinho, Pedras Tinhosas, and Rolas. Volcanic in origin, the islands exhibit numerous craters and lava flows; the climate is warm and humid most of the year. Of mixed ancestry, the indigenous inhabitants are mainly descended from plantation laborers imported from the African mainland. The Portuguese population, estimated at more than 3,000 before independence, has reportedly declined to less than 100. Roman Catholicism is the principal religion. Women constitute about one-third of the economically active population and hold a limited number of leadership positions in politics and government.

Sao Tome and Principe was once the world's leading producer of cocoa, although production has declined in recent years. Tourism and construction now contribute more to economic growth, and oil revenues from the Gulf are expected to dominate the economy in coming years. Most food is imported, often in the form of donations, with copra, coffee, palm kernels, sugar, and bananas produced domestically. Consumables dominate the small industrial sector. The country relies heavily on foreign aid because cyclical droughts, low world cocoa prices since 1980, and the flight of Portuguese managers and skilled labor at independence haven taken a toll on the economy. The government began moving away from a Marxist orientation in the mid-1980s; recent emphasis has been on denationalization (most importantly in the cocoa industry), encouragement of foreign investment, reduction of subsidies, currency devaluation, and other "pragmatic" liberalization measures that have won the support of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and World Bank. In addition, the government has tried to diversify the economy by developing fishing and tourism.

In 1998 the World Bank ranked Sao Tome and Principe third on its list of the world's 40 most heavily indebted poor countries. Consequently, the government adopted a structural adjustment program proposed by the IMF, which was designed to reduce the budget deficit, address the high external debt, intensify privatization, promote foreign Political Status: Achieved independence from Portugal on July 12, 1975; constitution of November 5, 1975, revised in December 1982, October 1987, August 1990, and March 2003.

Area: 387 sq. mi. (1,001 sq. km.).

Population: 137,599 (2001C); 188,000 (2005E).

Major Urban Center (2005E): SAO TOME (53,600).

Official Language: Portuguese.

Monetary Unit: Dobra (market rate July 1, 2006: 6,825 dobras = $1US).

President: Fradique de MENEZES; popularly elected (as a member of Independent Democratic Action) on July 29, 2001, and sworn in for a five-year term on September 3 to succeed Miguel Anjos da Cunha Lisboa TROVOADA (Independent Democratic Action); reelected (as the candidate of the alliance of the Democratic Movement of Forces for Change and the Party of Democratic Convergence) on July 30, 2006, and inaugurated for a second five-year term on September 3.

Prime Minister: Tomé Soares da VERA CRUZ (Democratic Movement of Forces for Change); appointed by the president following the legislative elections on March 26, 2006, and inaugurated on April 21 as head of a minority government in succession to Maria do Carmo SILVEIRA (Movement for the Liberation of Sao Tome and Principe—Social Democratic Party).

investment, and reduce unemployment. GDP grew by 2.5 percent in 1999 and 2.9 percent in 2000, while inflation continued its downward trend to 13 percent in 1999 and 9.6 percent in 2000. In early 2000 the IMF congratulated the government for having achieved “a good measure of stability” in the economy, and the IMF subsequently agreed to a three-year support program designed to solidify the recent structural reforms, combat widespread poverty, and alleviate the “unsustainable” external debt burdens. In the latter regard, the Paris Club of creditor nations approved a three-year debt reduction plan. The country expected to receive the benefit of another $200 million in debt relief in 2006, in accordance with terms of an IMF-sponsored Highly Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) program. Meanwhile, offshore oil surveys have brought rough estimates of large deposits of oil in the Gulf. No reserves have yet been proven, but Sao Tome and Principe shares an economic development zone with Nigeria that is believed to hold more than 10 billion barrels of crude. The petroleum resources are scheduled to be developed in accordance with an arrangement that will give Nigeria 60 percent of the revenue and Sao Tome and Principe 40 percent.

Government and Politics

Political Background

Discovered by Portuguese explorers in 1471, Sao Tome and Principe became Portuguese territories between 1522 and 1523 and, collectively, an Overseas Province of Portugal in 1951. Nationalistic sentiments became apparent in 1960 with the formation of the Committee for the Liberation of Sao Tome and Principe (CLSTP). In 1972 the CLSTP became the Movement for the Liberation of Sao Tome and Principe (MLSTP), which quickly became the leading advocate of independence from Portugal. Based in Gabon under the leadership of Dr. Manuel Pinto da COSTA, the group carried out a variety of underground activities, particularly in support of protests by African workers against low wages.

In 1973 the Organization of African Unity (OAU, subsequently the African Union—AU) recognized the MLSTP, and in the same year Portugal granted the country local autonomy. After the 1974 military coup in Lisbon, the Portuguese government began negotiations with the MLSTP, which it recognized as sole official spokesperson for the islands. The two agreed in November 1974 that independence would be proclaimed on July 12, 1975, and that a transitional government would be formed under MLSTP leadership until that time. Installed on December 21, 1974, the transitional government council encompassed four members appointed by the MLSTP and one by Portugal. Upon independence, da Costa assumed the presidency and promptly designated his MLSTP associate, Miguel Anjos da Cunha Lisboa TROVOADA, as prime minister. In December 1978, however, Trovoada was relieved of his duties, and in October 1979 he was arrested on charges that he had been involved in a projected coup, one of a series that da Costa claimed to have foiled with the aid of Angolan troops. The president subsequently served as both head of state and chief executive without serious domestic challenge, despite Trovoada's release in 1981. In late 1987 the government, which had already introduced many economic liberalization measures, launched a political liberalization campaign as well (see Constitution and government, below). One of the first official changes was the revival of the office of prime minister; Celestino Rocha da COSTA was appointed to the post in January 1988.

The reform process culminated in an August 1990 referendum that endorsed abandonment of the country's single-party system, and on January 20, 1991, the recently legalized Party of Democratic Convergence (PCD) out-distanced the now restyled MLSTP-Social Democratic Party (MLSTP-PSD) by winning 33 of 55 National Assembly seats. On February 8 the PCD General Secretary, Daniel Lima dos Santos DAIO, was named to head a new government, and on March 3 former prime minister Trovoada secured election as head of state. President da Costa had earlier announced his retirement from public life.

Prime Minister Daio, who was viewed as being responsible for economic hardship generated by an IMF-mandated austerity program, was dismissed on April 22, 1992, in favor of his finance minister, Norberto José d'Alva COSTA ALEGRE. Despite an MLSTP-PSD call for a unity government, the cabinet announced by Costa Alegre on May 16 was composed solely of PCD members.

On July 2, 1994, Trovoada sacked Costa Alegre in favor of Evaristo de CARVALHO, who, although a PCD member, had long been close to the president. Four days later Carvalho was expelled from the PCD, which called for a new presidential election. Trovoada responded on the nights of July 7 and 8 by appointing a Carvalho-recommended government of "presidential friends." On July 10, after the PCD had announced that it intended to introduce a motion declaring the new administration unconstitutional, Trovoada dissolved the National Assembly and called for the election of a successor.

At legislative balloting on October 2, 1994, the MLSTP-PSD returned to power with the capture of a near-majoritarian 27 seats, while the PCD and President Trovoada's recently legalized Independent Democratic Action (ADI) party each secured 14. On October 25 Trovoada appointed MLSTP-PSD secretary general Carlos Alberto Dias Monteiro da GRAÇA prime minister. Although da Graça had pledged to form a government of "national union," he named a cabinet dominated by MLSTP-PSD members on October 28.

On August 16, 1995, a group of Cuban-trained rebel soldiers led by Lt. Orlando das NEVES stormed the presidential palace, taking President Trovoada prisoner; however, Trovoada resumed his duties a week later after issuing a pardon to the officers who had seized him. Among the concessions reportedly made to secure Trovoada's release were pledges to name the long-anticipated unity government and restructure the military.

In anticipation of the formation of a multiparty government on December 29, 1995, the MLSTP-PSD, the ADI, and the Opposition Democratic Coalition (Codo) signed a cooperation pact. Two days later, MLSTP-PSD deputy secretary general Armindo Vaz de ALMEIDA was named to replace da Graça as prime minister, and on January 5, 1996, he named a cabinet that included seven members from the MLSTP-PSD, four from the ADI, and one from Codo, despite Codo's lack of legislative representation.

At delayed presidential balloting on June 30, 1996, Trovoada led a five-man field with 40.85 percent of the vote, followed by former president da Costa (39.14 percent), the PCD's Alda BANDEIRA (14.63 percent), former prime minister da Graça, and Armindo TOMBA, an anticorruption journalist. In a second-round runoff on July 21, Trovoada defeated da Costa on a 52–48 percent split.

On September 20, 1996, an assembly non-confidence motion reportedly orchestrated by the assembly president, Fortunato PIRES, forced the resignation of the Almeida government. Later MLSTP-PSD efforts to have Pires appointed to the vacant post were blocked, however, by Trovoada and the ADI, and on November 13 Trovoada appointed the MLSTP-PSD's deputy secretary general, Raúl Bragança NETO, prime minister. On November 28 Neto named a government that included six MLSTP-PSD ministers, three from the PCD, and one independent.

Shrugging off responsibility for Sao Tome and Principe's economic plight, the MLSTP-PSD captured a majority of the legislative seats (31) at polling on November 8, 1998, with the ADI improving to 16 seats and the PCD falling to 8. The MLSTP-PSD subsequently nominated Guilherme Posser da COSTA, a former foreign minister and ambassador, to be the next prime minister, and Costa and his government (comprising MLSTP-PSD members only) were sworn in on January 5, 1999.

In first-round presidential balloting on July 29, 2001, businessman Fradique de MENEZES (56.3 percent of the vote) defeated former president Manuel Pinto da Costa (38.4 percent) and three minor candidates. Several attempts to form a "cohabitation" government failed, in part because President Menezes rejected cabinet recommendations from the MLSTP-PSD. Menezes, who had been inaugurated in September, consequently dismissed Prime Minister Costa and his cabinet and then named former prime minister Carvalho to head a "presidential initiative" government including members from the ADI and the PCD. Calling the minority government "unconstitutional," the MLSTP-PSD walked out of the assembly, precipitating a political crisis that prompted President Menezes to dissolve the assembly on December 7 and call for early elections. Concurrently, news sources reported that the leading political parties had agreed to allocate cabinet posts according to the seats won by each party in the new legislative balloting.

In the assembly poll on March 3, 2002, the MLSTP-PSD secured a one-seat plurality of 24 seats over the new electoral coalition formed by the PCD and the recently launched, pro-Menezes Democratic Movement of Forces for Change (MDFM). On March 26 the president appointed Gabriel COSTA (a former leader of the MLSTP-PSD but now an independent described as "close" to the MDFM) as the new prime minister. The cabinet that took office in April contained, according to the previously determined proportion, members of the MLSTP-PSD, the MDFM-PCD coalition, and the new Uê Kédadji alliance that had been formed by the ADI, Codo, and others prior to the assembly poll, in which Codo captured third place with 8 seats.

Following a dispute between Prime Minister Costa and Defense Minister Victor MONTEIRO, President Menezes dismissed Costa and the rest of the cabinet on September 27, 2002. On October 3 the president appointed Maria das NEVES de Souza (MLSTP-PSD) as the new prime minister. On October 6 das Neves announced her new cabinet, which again included members of her own party, the coalition of the MFDM and PCD, and the Uê Kédadji alliance.

In November 2002 the National Assembly approved a resolution for constitutional reform altering the semipresidential system to reduce presidential power. Despite President Menezes's objections, the new constitution took effect in March 2003, reducing presidential power but maintaining a semipresidential system.

A bloodless military coup in June 2003 briefly deposed Menezes while the president was in Nigeria, but negotiations led to his return to office July 23. He appointed Damiao ALMEIDA prime minister on September 17, and a reshuffled cabinet made up of MLSTP-PSD and ADI was sworn in the next day. The minister of natural resources and environment, Arlindo CARVALHO, resigned May 16, 2005, over delays in the allocation of oil exploration licenses, and on June 3 the prime minister and entire cabinet also resigned. Maria do Carmo SILVEIRA was named prime minister June 7 and her new cabinet, with MLSTP-PSD members holding 8 of the top 12 positions, was appointed the next day. In legislative elections on March 26, 2006, Menezes's MDFM won 23 seats, surprising many by finishing ahead of the MLSTP-PSD, which fell to 20 seats. The ADI took 11 seats. Menezes subsequently named Tomé Soares da VERA CRUZ—an engineer who had previously held the position of minister of natural resources—as head of a new minority MDFM-PCD government.

On July 30, 2006, with the backing of the MDFM-PCD, Menezes was reelected president, winning 60.6 percent of the vote. Menezes's main opponent, former foreign minister Patrice TROVOADA, backed by the ADI and the MLSTP-PSD, received 38.8 percent of the vote. A third candidate, independent Nilo GUIMARÃES, got 0.6 percent of the vote.

Constitution and Government

The 1975 constitution, as revised in 1982, identified the MLSTP as the “directing political force” for the country, provided for an indirectly elected National Popular Assembly as the supreme organ of state, and conferred broad powers on a president, who was named by the assembly for a five-year term.

In October 1987 the MLSTP Central Committee proposed a number of constitutional changes as part of a broad democratization program. Theretofore elected by the People's District Assemblies from candidates nominated by an MLSTP-dominated Candidature Commission, legislators would now be chosen by direct and universal suffrage. Independent candidates would be permitted in addition to candidates presented by the party and “recognized organizations,” such as trade unions or youth groups. The president would be elected by popular vote rather than being designated by the assembly; however, only the MLSTP president (elected by secret ballot at a party congress) could stand as a candidate. In the course of approving the reform program, the assembly provided for the restoration of a presidentially appointed prime minister.

As a consequence of the August 1990 referendum, a multiparty system was introduced, together with multicandidature presidential balloting. The National Assembly conferred local autonomy upon Principe in 1994, and elections were held there in March 1995 for a seven-member regional assembly and a five-member regional government (headed by a president). The new bodies were installed April 29, 1995.

The judiciary is headed by a Supreme Court, whose members are designated by and responsible to the assembly. Administratively, the country is divided into two provinces (coterminous with each of the main islands) and 12 counties (11 of which are located on Sao Tome).

Foreign Relations

Despite the exodus of much of the country's Portuguese population from 1974 to 1975, Sao Tome and Principe continued to maintain an active commercial trade with the former colonial power, although the generally cordial relations were strained in mid-1983 over a projected aid package and the activities of Lisbon-based groups opposed to the da Costa regime. Following independence, diplomatic relations were established with the Soviet Union and the Eastern-bloc countries as well as the major western states. Relations with other former Portuguese dependencies in Africa, particularly Angola, have been close; in 1978 some 1,000 troops from Angola, augmented by a small contingent from Guinea-Bissau, were dispatched to Sao Tome to guard against what President da Costa claimed to be a series of coup plots by expatriates in Angola, Gabon, and Portugal. However, most of the troops were withdrawn by the mid-1980s as part of a rapprochement with the West that included a bilateral military cooperation agreement with Lisbon and the signing of a three-year fishing pact with the European Community in 1987.

Regional relations have also improved, and growing ties with nearby francophone nations underscore the fact that France is now the country's leading trade partner. In November 1999 Sao Tome and Principe joined six of its Gulf of Guinea neighbors (Angola, Cameroon, Republic of the Congo, Equatorial Guinea, Gabon, and Nigeria) in agreeing to establish the Gulf of Guinea Joint Commission (GGJC) to coordinate "cooperation and development" in the oil- and fish-rich region. In early 2001 Sao Tome and Principe reached an accord with Nigeria to establish a Joint Development Zone (JDZ) in disputed waters in the Gulf of Guinea, thereby ending years of dispute over economic exploitation of the oil- and fish-rich waters. It was agreed that Nigeria would receive 60 percent and Sao Tome and Principe 40 percent of the revenue from joint oil-licensing revenues.

Tensions arose between Sao Tome and Principe and Nigeria over the awarding of operating rights in the JDZ in May 2005, but cooperation between the two countries over oil development appears to be on track.

Recently, Sao Tome and Principe's relationship with the United States has drawn closer. In February 2005, the U.S. Navy sent the submarine tender USS Emory S. Land to the Gulf of Guinea area. Sao Tome and Principe was one of several nations in the Gulf of Guinea region that received training for local security forces, as well as assistance with numerous other infrastructure projects.

Current Issues

The probability of petroleum wealth remains uppermost in the minds of residents of Sao Tome and Principe and has had a dramatic effect on its politics. The stakes are enormous. With no oil yet pumped, the little country of some 150,000 citizens should receive millions of dollars in signature bonuses for the awarding of geographic blocs to giant oil companies that want to explore for oil, plus a share of the oil eventually produced. The signature bonuses alone could amount to $412 million, with Nigeria receiving 60 percent and Sao Tome and Principe receiving 40 percent, a bonanza for a country whose total tax revenues for 2004 were less than $15 million. The front-end signature bonus designated in the treaty with the consortium exploring the first bloc should provide Sao Tome and Principe with $49 million, approximately 10 times the country's annual revenue from its largest export crop, cocoa.

The potential windfall also raises fears of corruption by government officials handling the oil accounts. In an early sampling of trouble, a bloodless coup in 2003 that temporarily deposed President Menezes was undertaken by a military group proclaiming their concerns about how the oil wealth would be managed. Menezes had admitted receiving a $100,000 payment from the Environmental Remediation Holding Corporation (ERHC), a Nigerian company that made lucrative deals in the JDZ that most observers believe were not favorable to Sao Tome. Following the coup in 2003 the president was reinstated after negotiations with the rebels, but more oil-related trouble loomed. Amid charges and counter-charges of corruption, by September 2004 the government had changed six times in three years. Questions and angry debate continue concerning terms of the contract with ERHC, with accusations being leveled that the company has neither sufficient resources nor adequate experience to have been entrusted with the area's drilling rights, but instead received the contract due to "sweetheart" arrangements among various Nigerian investors and certain politicians from Sao Tome and Principe. There is also some outrage over the fact that ERHC is exempt from paying any signing bonuses, unlike the other signatories. However, news reports allege that many officials involved felt somewhat boxed in by the fact that opening an investigation into terms of the treaty could work to the country's disadvantage—if the probe delayed signings with consortiums interested in drilling in other blocs past the time of the first explorations. Officials fear that initial drilling could reveal "dry holes"—news that could dampen enthusiasm on the part of other consortiums to sign further agreements, or at least affect the terms they would be willing to extend.

The awarding of five blocs of the JDZ on May 31, 2005, brought further disagreement. Patrice Trovoada, oil adviser to President Menezes and an oil broker himself, protested the awarding of the best blocs to a consortium of U.S. companies, claiming irregularities and influence peddling. Others countered that his protests merely reflected his relationship with an independent U.S. company, Anadarko, which he championed to receive operating rights in one of the blocs. Trovoada was fired as oil adviser, and Menezes had to dismiss his own chief of staff, Mateus RITA, from the bilateral Joint Ministerial Council after disclosures that Rita owned 500,000 shares in the ERHC. Menezes then flew to Abuja, Nigeria, and signed off on the bloc awards, which provoked further crises. Prime Minister Damiao Vaz de Almeida resigned and Maria do Carmo Silveira of the MLSTP-PSD was named prime minister. A new cabinet heavily loaded with MLSTP-PSD members was named the next day. In June 2005, blocs 2 through 6 were allocated, and production-sharing contracts were signed with the highest bidders the following November. In January 2006, Chevron became the first oil company to begin exploratory drilling within the blocks.

The smooth transfer of millions of dollars in signature bonuses for oil development rights depends on how well the new government operates. Despite the accusations and frequent shifts in power, outsiders believe Sao Tome and Principe stands a better chance than most new petro-states of straightening out its priorities. Few ethnic tensions exist because the population shares a history as former plantation slaves to the Portuguese, who operated the country as an overseas province until independence in 1973. The Sao Tome government has begun developing rules and institutions for the oil sector that were not present in other new oil states. Late in 2004 a revenue management law was co-drafted by a team from New York's Columbia University and signed into law. The new law sets up an oversight committee and requires the government to give priority to poverty reduction and social spending in health, education, and infrastructure. It remains to be seen whether these priorities actually prevail.

Some citizens, apparently angered at the perceived failure of the government to improve basic services in recent years, barricaded the roads leading to some polling places during the March 26, 2006, legislative elections. (Repolling was held in a number of districts a week later.) Not surprisingly, economic issues, particularly involving oil, appeared to dominate public concerns in the elections. Observers suggested that Prime Minister Vera Cruz and his new minority government faced a difficult task in placating a restive population until the oil spigot is turned on, as currently anticipated, in 2010.

Political Parties

Government Parties

Democratic Movement of Forces for Change (Movimento Democrático das Forças para da Mudança—MDFM). The MDFM was formed in late 2001 by former members of the ADI (below) close to President Menezes. The MDFM later established an electoral alliance with the PCD (below) for legislative balloting in 2002. That alliance won the largest number of seats, 23, in the March 2006 voting.

Leader: Tome Soares da VERA CRUZ (Prime Minister and Secretary General).

Party of Democratic Convergence (Partido da Convergência Democrática—PCD). The PCD was launched in 1987, initially as an underground movement styled the Reflection Group (Grupo de Reflexão—GR), which surfaced as an open opposition formation following the introduction of multipartyism in August 1990.

In January 1996 the PCD named party president Alda Bandeira de CONÇEICÃO as its presidential candidate. At the same time, despite Miguel Trovoada's entreaties, the party refused to participate in the government formed in early 1996. Following Bandeira's third-place finish in the first round of presidential polling in June, the PCD switched its support to Trovoada. Subsequently, although it was at first reported to have backed the choice of Assembly President Pires as the successor to outgoing prime minister Almeida, the PCD, in accord with the MLSTP-PSD, supported the appointment of Raúl Bragança Neto in November and became the junior partner (with three portfolios) of the subsequent coalition government.

At legislative polling in November 1998 the PCD's representation fell from 14 to 8 seats. The party was not included in the new government installed in January 1999, its votes no longer being required for the MLSTP-PSD to command a legislative majority. Since 2000 the PCD has been part of the Democratic Platform, and it supported the ADI's candidate in the 2001 presidential election. The PCD was given cabinet posts in the new cabinet in September 2001. The PCD entered into an electoral alliance with the MDFM (above) for the legislative balloting in 2002 and 2006, winning 23 seats in each poll.

Leader: Leonel Mario D'ALVA.

Opposition Parties

Movement for the Liberation of Sao Tome and Principe—Social Democratic Party (Movimento de Libertação de São Tomé e Príncipe—Partido Social Democrata—MLSTP-PSD). The outcome of an earlier Committee for the Liberation of Sao Tome and Principe (Comité de Libertação de São Tomé e Príncipe—CLSTP), the MLSTP was founded in 1972 and gradually became the leading force in the campaign for independence from Portugal. At its first congress in 1978, the movement defined itself as a “revolutionary front of democratic, anti-neocolonialist, and anti-imperialist forces”; however, it did not formally adopt Marxism-Leninism despite the ideology's influence on its leaders and their economic policies. MLSTP-PSD served as the country's only authorized political group until the adoption of a multiparty system in August 1990. Two months later, (then) President da Costa retired from leadership of what had been redesignated the MLSTP-PSD.

Da Costa returned to party activity from retirement in 1998 in preparation to run for the presidency in July 2001. He was defeated by Fradique de Menezes of the ADI, and the MLSTP-PSD was excluded from the new government. De Menezes dissolved the National Assembly in December and announced new legislative elections in March 2002, after which a new, more broadly based government would be formed. In that election no party obtained an overwhelming majority, with the MLSTP-PSD winning 24 of the 55 seats, the MDFM-PCD securing 23, and the UK, a coalition of five other parties, winning the other 8. The new coalition government, although headed by an independent, Gabriel da Costa, included representatives of the MLSTP-PSD, the MDFM-PCD, and the UK, as well as a number of independents. De Menezes dismissed da Costa in September 2002 and appointed Maria das Neves de Souza of the MLSTP-PSD as his successor. She remained in office for two years until Menezes dismissed her in September 2004 amid accusations of her involvement in financial scandals. Appointed in her place was Damiao Vaz d'Almeida, also of the MLSTP-PSD. In February 2005, former prime minister and vice president of the party Guilherme Posser da Costa replaced Manuel Pinto da Costa as the party's president. In June 2005 the MLSTP-PSD threatened to resign from the government and force new parliamentary elections. After negotiations de Menezes and the MLSTP-PSD agreed to form a new government and avoid early elections. Maria do Carmo Silveira, a respected head of the Central Bank and a member of the MLSTP-PSD, became the new prime minister and finance minister.

In the March 2006 legislative elections, the party finished second behind the MDFM-PCD, winning 20 seats.

Leader: Guilherme Posser da COSTA (President).

Independent Democratic Action (Acção Democrática Independente—ADI). The ADI was formed in 1992 under the leadership of President Trovoada's political advisor, Gabriel Costa, and participated in municipal elections of that year as an “independent group.” It was legally registered in early 1994, at which time Trovoada was identified as a member. The ADI won 14 seats in the 1994 assembly balloting and 16 in 1998, claiming

Cabinet

As of July 1, 2006

Prime Minister
Deputy Prime Minister

Tomé Soares da Vera Cruz (MDFM)
Maria dos Santos Tebus Torres (PCD) [f]

Ministers

Defense and Internal Affairs
Economy
Education, Culture, Youth, and Sport
Finance and Planning
Foreign Affairs
Health
Justice and Parliamentary Affairs
Labor, Solidarity, Women, and the Family

Natural Resources and the Environment Public Administration, State Reform, and Territorial Administration
Public Works and Infrastructure
Social Communication and Regional Integration

Lt. Col. Oscar Aguiar Sacramento Sousa (MDFM)
Cristina Maria Fernandes Dias (MDFM) [f]
Maria de Fatima Leite de Sousa Almeida (MDFM0) [f]
Maria dos Santos Tebus Torres (PCD) [f]
Carlos Gustavo dos Anjos (PCD)
Arlindo Vicente de Assunção Carvalho (PCD)
Justino Tavares Veiga
Maria de Cristo dos Santos Raposo de
Carvalho (MDFM) [f]
Maule de Deus Lima (MDFM)
Armindo Vaz Rodrigues Aguiar (PCD)

Delfim Santiago das Neves (MDFM)
Tomé Soares da Vera Cruz (MDFM)

[f] = female

irregularities in the latter poll. In 2000 the ADI began to collaborate with the PCD, Codo, UNDP, and PPP in an alliance called the “Democratic Platform.” In the presidential election in July 2001, the ADI candidate, Fradique de Menezes, captured the presidency with the support of the Democratic Platform parties. In September the ADI formed a coalition government with the PCD. In November the ADI formed an alliance with the Democratic Platform parties and the PRD to counter the MLSTP-PSD in legislative elections in 2002. Menezes fell into disagreement with pro-Trovoada factions within the party. Those close to Menezes launched the MDFM (above) in late 2001. The ADI participated in the UK (see below) from late 2001 until seceding from the coalition, in which it had been the principal entity, in early 2006. The ADI won 11 seats on its own in the March 2006 elections.

Leader: Patrice TROVOADA (Secretary General).

New Wave Movement (Movimento Novo Rumo–NR). This newly formed party won one seat in the March 2006 legislative elections.

Leader: Joao GOMES.

Other Parties and Groups

Uê Kédadji (UK). The UK was established in late 2001 as an alliance of the ADI (above) and Codo (see below) and the National Union for Democracy and Progress (União Nacional para a Democracia o Progresso—UNDP), the People’s Progress Party (Partida Progresso do Povo—PPP), and the Democratic Renovation Party (PRD), led by Armindo GRAÇA. The UNDP and the PPP had been recognized in September 1998 and were part of the Democratic Platform, formed in 2000, that supported the ADI candidate in the 2001 presidential balloting. After the 2002 balloting, the UK held eight seats in the legislature. The ADI left the alliance in early 2006, and the UK failed to win any seats in the legislative elections in March.

Opposition Democratic Coalition (Coligação Democrática da Oposição—Codo). Codo was launched in March 1986 as an alliance of two Lisbon-based opposition groups, the Independent Democratic Union of Sao Tome and Principe (União Democrática Independente de São Tomé e Príncipe—UDISTP) and the Sao Tome and Principe National Resistance Front (Frente da Resistência Nacional de São Tomé e Príncipe—FRNSTP), to combat what they called the “totalitarianism” of the da Costa government. Although the UDISTP previously had taken the position that its goals were to be reached through “peaceful means,” its association with the FRNSTP, generally considered a more radical group, led to a Codo posture that did not rule out “recourse to armed struggle.”

Leader: Manuel Neves e SILVA.

Among the other groups active as of 2002 were the Sao Tome Workers’ Party (Partido Trabalhista São Tomense—PTS), led by Anacleto ROLIM; the Democratic Renovation Party of Progress (Partido da Renovação Democrática—PRD), led by Armindo GRAÇA; the Popular Party of Progress (Partido Popular do Progresso—PPP), led by Francisco SILVA; and the National Union for Democracy and Progress (União Nacional para Democracia e Progresso—UNDP), led by Manuel Paixao LIMA.

Legislature

Formerly an indirectly elected National Popular Assembly (Assembleia Popular Nacional) of 40 members, the current National Assembly (Assembleia Nacional) is a unicameral body of 55 members directly elected for five-year terms. In the most recent balloting of March 26, 2006 (and reruns in 18 districts on April 2), the electoral alliance of the Democratic Movement of Forces for Change and the Party of Democratic Convergence won 23 seats; the Movement for the Liberation of Sao Tome and Principe—Social Democratic Party, 20; Independent Democratic Action, 11; and the New Way Movement, 1.

President: Francisco DA SILVA.

Communications

Press

The following are published in Sao Tome: Diário da República, government weekly; Notícias; Nova República; O País Hoje (Country Today); O Parvo; Tribuna.

News Agency

In mid-1985 the Angolan News Agency, AN-GOP, joined with Sao Tome’s national radio station in establishing STP-Press.

Broadcasting and Computing

Radio programming is transmitted by the official Rádio Nacional de São Tomé e Príncipe (RNSTP). Televisão de São Tomé e Príncipe, which began broadcasting on a limited basis in 1992, today services some 68,000 sets. There were approximately 15,000 Internet users in 2003.

Intergovernmental Representation

Ambassador to the U.S. and Permanent Representative to the UN

Ovidio Manuel Barbosa PEQUENO

U.S. Ambassador to Sao Tome and Principe

R. Barrie WALKLEY (resident in Gabon)

IGO Memberships (Non-UN)

AfDB, AU, BADEA, CEEAC, CPLP, Interpol, NAM, OIF

SENEGAL

REPUBLIC OF SENEGAL

République du Sénégal

---

The Country

Senegal is situated on the bulge of West Africa between Mauritania on the north, Mali on the east, and Guinea and Guinea-Bissau on the south. Gambia forms an enclave extending into its territory for 200 miles along one of the area's four major rivers. The predominantly flat or rolling savanna country has a population of varied ethnic backgrounds, with the Wolof, whose language is widely used commercially, being the largest group. French, the official language, is spoken only by a literate minority. In the 1988 census 94 percent of the population was identified as Muslim, the remainder being animist or Christian. Islamic "brotherhoods" exercise significant economic and political influence throughout the country, most of them espousing what Western observers would describe as a moderate version of Islam. One such group is the Mouride brotherhood, said to represent as many as two million Sufi Muslims around the city of Touba. The illiteracy rate, while declining in recent years, remains at 62 percent, somewhat higher than for the continent as a whole.

About 70 percent of the population is employed in agriculture; peanuts, the principal crop, once accounted for one-third of export earnings, but production has declined. Cotton, sugar, and rice (most supplies of which have traditionally been imported) have become the focus of agricultural diversification efforts, while fishing, phosphate mining, oil refining, and tourism have grown in importance. Economic difficulties, as exemplified by rising prices and high urban unemployment, have been addressed since 1977 by a series of adjustment programs that have reduced the role of the state in most sectors, liberalized trade measures, and limited government spending. These programs earned Senegal a high level of foreign aid, generous terms in rescheduling its more than $4.2 billion external debt, and support from the International Monetary Fund (IMF). Overall economic improvement was minimal in the early 1990s, and in 1994 the IMF extended additional credit to Dakar to support programs it had adopted to offset the devaluation of the CFA franc, including a reduction of custom tariffs and a "moderate wage policy." GDP grew by an average of more than 5 percent annually from 1996 to 2000, earning praise from the IMF and World Bank. At the same time, Senegal

Political Status: Former French dependency, independent since August 20, 1960; presidential system established under constitution promulgated March 7, 1963; Senegalese-Gambian Confederation of Senegambia, formed with effect from February 1, 1982, dissolved as of September 30, 1989.

Area: 75,750 sq. mi. (196,192 sq. km.).

Population: 6,896,808 (1988C); 10,591,000 (2005E).

Major Urban Center (2005E): DAKAR (2,167,000).

Official Language: French.

Monetary Unit: CFA Franc (official rate July 1, 2006: 513.01 francs = $1US). (The CFA franc, previously pegged to the French franc, is now permanently pegged to the euro at 655.957 francs = 1 euro.)

President: Abdoulaye WADE (Senegalese Democratic Party); elected in second-round balloting on March 19, 2000, and inaugurated for a seven-year term on April 1 in succession to Abdou DIOUF (Socialist Party).

Prime Minister: Macky SALL (Senegalese Democratic Party); appointed by the president on April 22, 2004, to succeed Idrissa SECK (Senegalese Democratic Party), who resigned on April 21.

entered the new millennium with an economy that remained peasant-based and stressed by unequal distribution of wealth, high unemployment, an external debt of $3.5 billion, and deteriorating social services. Nonetheless, Senegal subsequently experienced steady, if modest, economic growth, which was accompanied by low inflation. As the result of sound fiscal policy, the government was also able to lower deficits and increase tax revenue.

In April 2003 Senegal was granted $33 million from the IMF for economic restructuring from 2003 to 2005. A year later, the IMF declared that Senegal had completed the necessary steps under the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) initiative. As a result, Senegal was accorded nearly $500 million in debt relief, thereby reducing its debt to $1.9 billion. Meanwhile, GDP growth of 6 percent was reported for 2004, with inflation of only 1.4 percent.

In 2006, the World Bank announced that Senegal was one of 17 countries that qualified for additional debt relief under the Multilateral Debt Relief Initiative.

Government and Politics

Political Background

Under French influence since the 17th century, Senegal became a French colony in 1920 and a self-governing member of the French Community in November 1958. In January 1959 it joined with the adjacent French Soudan (now Mali) to form the Federation of Mali, which became fully independent within the Community on June 20, 1960. Two months later Senegal seceded from the federation, and the separate Republic of Senegal was proclaimed on September 5. President Léopold Sédar SENGHOR, a well-known poet and the leader of Senegal's strongest political party, the Senegalese Progressive Union (Union Progressiste Sénégalaise—UPS), governed initially under a parliamentary system in which political rival Mamadou DIA was prime minister. An unsuccessful coup in December 1962 resulted in Dia's arrest and imprisonment (until his release in 1974) and the establishment by Senghor of a presidential form of government under his exclusive direction. In an election held under violent conditions on December 1, 1963, Senghor retained the presidency, and his party won all of the seats in the National Assembly, as it also did in the elections of 1968 and 1973.

In response to demands for political and constitutional reform, Senghor in early 1970 reinstated the post of prime minister, while a constitutional amendment adopted in 1976 sanctioned three political parties, the ideology of each being prescribed by law. In early 1979 a fourth, essentially conservative, party was also accorded recognition. Additional parties were legalized under legislation enacted in April 1981.

Although he had been overwhelmingly reelected to a fourth five-year term on February 26, 1978,

President Senghor resigned on December 31, 1980, and, as prescribed by the constitution, was succeeded by Prime Minister Abdou DIOUF. The new administration extended the process of political liberalization, most restrictions on political party activity being lifted in April 1981. Coalitions were proscribed, however; thus the opposition did not present a serious threat to the ruling Socialist Party (Parti Socialiste—PS) in the presidential and legislative balloting of February 27, 1983, Diouf winning reelection with 83 percent of the vote, and the PS capturing 111 of 120 assembly seats. At the subsequent poll of February 28, 1988, Diouf was reported to have been reelected by 73 percent of the vote, with the PS being awarded 103 assembly seats. Controversy surrounding this election and its aftermath tarnished Senegal's long-standing democratic reputation. While the major opposition parties boycotted local elections in November 1990, a number of their leaders, including Abdoulaye WADE, Diouf's principal opponent in the 1982 and 1988 presidential campaigns, were named to a government headed by Habib THIAM on April 7, 1991. However, in October 1992 Wade and three other cabinet members from Wade's Senegalese Democratic Party (Parti Démocratique Sénégalais—PDS) resigned from the government, claiming they had been marginalized by their PS colleagues and included in only "trivial" decision making.

At first-round balloting on February 21, 1993, President Diouf was credited with winning 58 percent of the valid vote, thus eliminating the need for a second round. Wade was runner-up with a vote share of 32 percent. In the legislative poll of May 9, the PS won a reduced majority of 84 assembly seats, with the PDS securing 27 seats.

On May 15, 1993, the Constitutional Council's vice president, Babacar SEYE, was assassinated by a group identifying themselves as the People's Army. On May 16 Wade and a number of his PDS colleagues were detained after one of the alleged conspirators, Cledor SENE, claimed to be acting on their orders. On June 7 Sene recanted his story, publicly apologized to Wade for attempting to "decapitate" the PDS. Thereafter, relations between government and opposition grew increasingly acrimonious, as two PDS deputies, Mody SY and Samuel SARR, remained imprisoned for alleged involvement in the assassination, and the PDS mounted a demonstration in late July on behalf of their release. On August 24 the National Assembly further aggravated the situation by approving an emergency economic austerity plan that called for cuts in civil service salaries. Implementation of the measure was temporarily suspended following a general strike on September 2. In early October Wade and his wife, Viviane WADE, who had previously been released, were rearrested for their alleged involvement in Seye's assassination, and on November 5 over 130 opposition activists were arrested for participating in an antigovernment rally organized by the PDS and the African Party for Democracy and Socialism/And Jëf (Parti Africain pour la Démocratie et le Socialisme/And Jëf—PADS/AJ). (And Jëf is a Wolof expression meaning "to unite for a purpose.") Violent clashes erupted during a demonstration against the effects of the mid-January 1994 CFA devaluation, and the government moved quickly to indict Abdoulaye Wade and Landing SAVANE, leader of the PADS/AJ, for "breach against the state security," a charge for which 73 others were also being detained. However, on May 26 the Wades and their fellow PDS members were cleared of involvement in the Seye assassination, and at midyear Sy and Sarr were released after launching hunger strikes. In August Wade and Savane were acquitted of the February charges. In October three people were sentenced for their roles in Seye's assassination, although no motive was revealed.

In March 1995 the Diouf administration scored what appeared to be a major political victory when Wade accepted a cabinet-level post. As a result, the government contained three of the four leading groups previously aligned as regime opponents. In addition, although Wade had previously refused to enter the government unless the PDS was given half the posts in a 20-member cabinet, he now agreed to accept only 5 portfolios in a 33-member cabinet.

Amid reports of increasing violations of a two-year-old cease-fire between the government and secessionist Casamance rebels in southern Senegal, security forces in May 1995 arrested Fr. Augustin DIAMACOUNE Senghor, leader of the Movement of Democratic Forces of Casamance (Mouvement des Forces Démocratiques de la Casamance—MFDC). Full-scale fighting erupted following Diamacoune's detention, and in mid-June the cease-fire was formally abandoned. In September the government attempted to start peace talks in Ziguinchor, but fighting continued as MFDC militants refused to negotiate until Diamacoune, who had been placed under house arrest, was freed. In response to the release of a number of his associates in early December, Diamacoune called for an end to the uprising, and on December 30 charges against him were dropped. The following day Diouf announced the creation of a parliamentary upper house, a Senate, which he described as the first step in an effort to decentralize power through a process of "regionalization."

In early 1996 the Diouf administration announced that independent candidates would be prohibited from participating in the rural, regional, and municipal elections scheduled for November. Grassroots groupings and small opposition parties then accused Diouf of retreating from his pledge to decentralize power. Electoral preparations were threatened by the renewal of Casamance rebel activity, and in May the president's party rebuffed proposals to form an independent electoral commission. At balloting on November 24 the PS won what was described as a landslide victory, although voter turnout was reported at only about 50 percent, and opposition parties criticized some aspects of the way the elections were conducted.

In March 1997 President Diouf convened a conference to review the 1996 elections with the purported aim of improving polling procedures. However, 19 opposition parties accused the PS of attempting to dominate the proceedings and withdrew from the conference in May. In August the Diouf administration, in an abrupt about-face, announced that it would establish an independent electoral commission, the National Elections Observatory (Observatoire National des Elections—ONEL), and published a draft electoral reform document that opposition leaders described as meeting "80 percent" of their demands.

At legislative balloting on May 25, 1998, PS candidates dominated an 18-party field, winning 93 seats in the expanded 140-member assembly; the PS's nearest two competitors, the PDS and the newly formed Union for Democratic Renewal (Union pour le Renouveau Démocratique—URD), secured 23 and 11 seats, respectively. Although the PDS, URD, and four other parties petitioned to have the polling results overturned because of alleged fraudulent tallying, the ONEL and international observers described the elections as generally free and fair. On July 3 Diouf named Mamadou Lamine LOUM to replace Thiam as prime minister, and the following day a new cabinet that included only one non-PS member was announced. Elections to fill the legislature's newly formed upper house, or Senate, were held on January 24, 1999, candidates affiliated with the PS winning all 45 elective seats. In August 1998 the PS-dominated assembly had voted 93–1 to abolish the limit on presidential terms, thereby permitting the Diouf presidency to continue past 2000. All but two opposition legislators boycotted the session, and the following day all of the leading opposition politicians condemned the assembly vote at an unprecedented joint news conference.

Eight candidates contested the first round of presidential balloting on February 27, 2000, with Diouf securing 43 percent of the vote and Wade 30 percent. Most of the other candidates threw their support to Wade in the second round, which he won, 58.7 to 41.3 percent. Following his inauguration on April 1, Wade appointed Moustapha NIASSE of the Alliance of Forces for Progress (Alliance des Forces pour le Progrès—AFP) as prime minister to head a coalition cabinet that also included the PADS/AJ, the Independence and Labor Party (Parti de l'Indépendance et du Travail—PIT), and the Democratic League–Labor Party Movement (Ligue Démocratique–Mouvement pour le Parti du Travail—LD-MPT).

As promised during the 2000 presidential campaign the PDS and its allies presented a number of constitutional amendments for a national referendum on January 7, 2001. The measures, which abolished the presidentially appointed Senate and otherwise reduced the president's authority, were approved by 94 percent of the voters in a reported 66 percent turnout.

Invoking a provision in the new basic law that authorized the president to call for new legislative elections after the most recently elected assembly had served for at least two years, Wade dissolved the assembly on February 15, 2001, and ordered new elections for April 29. Meanwhile, friction between Wade and Niasse intensified, and the prime minister left his post (having either resigned or been dismissed, depending on whose account was accurate) on March 3. He was succeeded by Mame Madiou BOYE, an independent who had been serving as justice minister; Boye thereby became Senegal's first female prime minister.

The PDS-led "Sopi" (Wolof for "Change") coalition (see Political Parties, below) dominated the April 29, 2001, assembly balloting, despite the defection of the AFP and the PIT from the government. The new government named by Boye on May 12 was again led by the PDS and several of its smaller electoral partners.

On November 4, 2002, President Wade dismissed Prime Minister Boye in the wake of a ferry disaster that claimed 1,200 lives and attracted intense international scrutiny. Wade appointed Idrissa SECK, his chief of cabinet, to form a new government. The ferry disaster continued to dominate Senegalese politics for the next several years, and the chief of staff of the armed forces and the chief of staff of the air force were both removed because of the military's slow response to the disaster.

In August 2003 the Seck government resigned in response to growing public discontent with the inquiry into the ferry's sinking and negative reaction to the government's response to severe flooding that year. Seck was reappointed prime minister and asked to develop a government of national unity, but most opposition parties declined to join the government, which remained largely dominated by propresidential parties. Tensions between Wade and Seck resulted in the latter's dismissal as prime minister on April 21, 2004; former interior minister Macky SALL was named the next day to lead a reshuffled cabinet. Seck was subsequently charged with subversion and embezzlement and kicked out of the PDS (see Current issues, below). Wade conducted several cabinet reshuffles in 2005–2006 in an apparent effort to increase his control over the government and party ahead of the 2007 presidential elections.

Constitution and Government

Senegal is administratively divided into eleven regions, each headed by a presidentially appointed governor who is assisted by an elected Regional Assembly; the regions are divided into departments. The constitution provides for a president elected by direct universal suffrage, with runoff balloting for the two top contenders if none secures an absolute majority. Under amendments approved in 1991, presidents were limited to two terms, although the incumbent (Abdou Diouf), already elected twice, was permitted to stand one more time. An amendment in 1993 extended presidential terms to seven years. The two-term restriction was formally abandoned in 1998, thereby permitting Diouf to contest the 2000 balloting as well. Amendments in 2001 reimposed the two-term limit and returned the length of the term to five years. The president appoints the prime minister (the office having been abolished in 1983 and revived in 1991), who in turn appoints the Council of Ministers in consultation with the president. Legislative power was vested in a unicameral National Assembly until December 31, 1995, when President Diouf announced the creation of a Senate to act as an upper house. The first Senate was elected in January 1999, but that body was abolished in the 2001 constitutional amendments. Under initial procedures, half of the assembly members were elected from Senegal's departments, on a "first past the post" basis, the other half by proportional representation from a national list. However, electoral changes adopted in 1989 provided that national lists would be dropped from future elections, with all members being chosen on a departmental basis. Only parties registered at least four months before an election were allowed to participate; neither independent candidacies nor opposition coalitions were permitted. However, the combination of departmental and national lists was reestablished for the April 2001 assembly election in accordance with the January constitutional revisions. Party restrictions were also lifted as were barriers to electoral coalitions. The principal judicial organs, under a system revised in 1992, include a Constitutional Council, one of whose functions is to rule on electoral issues; a Council of State; a Court of Cassation; and a Court of Appeal; with magistrate courts at the local level. In addition, a High Court of Justice, chosen by the assembly from among its own membership, is responsible for impeachment proceedings. Elections for municipal and rural community councilors were held in May 2002.

Foreign Relations

Formally nonaligned, Senegal has retained especially close political, cultural, and economic ties with France. An active advocate of West African cooperation, it has participated in such regional groupings as the Economic Community of West African States, the Permanent Inter-State Committee on Drought Control in the Sahel, and the Organization for the Development of the Senegal River. (The members of the latter are Mali and Mauritania.) Regional relations improved substantially as the result of a "reconciliation" pact signed in Monrovia, Liberia, in March 1978, ending five years of friction with Guinea and Côte d'Ivoire.

Under President Senghor, Senegal maintained a generally conservative posture in African affairs, refusing to recognize Angola because of the presence of Cuban troops there, supporting Morocco against the claims of the insurgent Polisario Front in the Western Sahara, and breaking relations with Libya in mid-1980 because of that country's alleged efforts to destabilize the governments of Chad, Mali, and Niger as well as Senegal. Reflecting the "spirit of our new diplomacy"—essentially an effort to introduce greater flexibility in its relations with other African governments—Dakar announced in February 1982 that it would reverse its long-standing support of the Angolan resistance movement and recognize the MPLA government in Luanda. Ties with Algeria were strengthened in the course of reciprocal visits by the respective heads of state in 1984 and 1985; relations with Libya eased as the result of a visit by Colonel Qadhafi in December 1985 and were formally restored in November 1988.

In light of the unusual geographic relationship between the two countries, one of Senegal's most prominent regional concerns has been its association with Gambia. A 1967 treaty provided for cooperation in foreign affairs, development of the Gambia River basin, and, most important, defense. Consequently, Senegalese troops were dispatched to Banjul, Gambia, in October 1980 amid rumors of Libyan involvement in a projected coup and again in July 1981 when an uprising threatened to topple the Jawara administration (see article on Gambia). The latter incident was followed by an agreement to establish a Confederation of Senegambia, completed on February 1, 1982. Although the component states remained politically independent entities, the Confederation agreement called for the integration of security forces, the establishment of an economic and monetary union, and the coordination of policies in foreign affairs, internal communications, and other areas. A joint Council of Ministers and an appointed Confederal Assembly were established, and it was agreed that the presidents of Senegal and Gambia would serve as president and vice president, respectively, of the confederation. In practical terms, however, little progress was made in actualizing the confederation, Gambia in particular appearing to procrastinate in the endeavor. Many Gambians criticized what was perceived as an unequal relationship, while Gambian government and business leaders questioned the wisdom of their country's proposed entrance into the franc zone. Economic union was also hindered by the fact that Gambia had long favored liberal trade policies in contrast to Senegal's imposition of high protective tariffs. In August 1989 Senegal unilaterally withdrew some of its troops from Gambia, and President Diouf declared that the confederation, having "failed in its purpose," should be "frozen." Gambian President Jawara responded by suggesting it be terminated completely, and a protocol was quickly negotiated formally dissolving the grouping as of September 30. Despite a presidential summit in December 1989, relations remained cool through 1990 as Senegal enacted trade sanctions aimed at stemming the importation of foreign goods via its relatively duty-free neighbor. In January 1991 the two countries moved to reestablish bilateral links by the conclusion of a treaty of friendship and cooperation. As finalized in June, the treaty provided for annual summits and the establishment of joint commissions to ensure implementation of summit agreements.

In May 1989 the third conference of francophone heads of state met in Dakar amid deepening hostility between Senegal and Mauritania that had been triggered by a dispute on April 9 over farming rights along their border. Rioting in both Dakar and Nouakchott had ensued, causing death or injury to several hundred people and the cross-repatriation of an estimated 150,000–300,000, including a substantial number of Moors, who had dominated the crucial small-business retail sector in the Senegalese capital. The situation continued in crisis for the balance of the year. Relations remained broken, with a continuing exodus (forced, according to Senegalese charges) of blacks from Mauritania to Senegal; Nouakchott announced preparations for a possible war. In January 1990 border forces exchanged artillery fire across the Senegal River, but diplomatic efforts, led by Organization of African Unity (OAU, subsequently the African Union—AU) president Hosni Mubarak, helped avert additional violence. By early 1991 relations had again deteriorated, as Nouakchott accused Senegal of aiding antigovernment rebels and Dakar charged Mauritania with arming Casamance separatists with Iraqi weapons. Meanwhile, relations with Guinea-Bissau, already strained by Bissau's refusal to recognize a July 1989 international court decision favoring Senegal in their maritime border dispute, were exacerbated by a clash in May 1991 that left 17 dead and by reports that Bissau was also supporting the Casamance rebels.

A May 1991 rapprochement between Dakar and the Casamance insurgents had a positive effect on relations with both Guinea-Bissau and Mauritania.

The choice of the former as the site for the signing of a cease-fire agreement signaled a further lessening of tensions, and on July 18 an agreement to reopen the Senegalese-Mauritanian border paved the way for restoration of diplomatic relations on April 23, 1992. However, on December 12 tension again flared with the bombing by Senegalese forces of alleged Casamance bases in northern Guinea-Bissau. Four days later the Senegalese government offered its apologies after Bissau had protested the violation of its border, and on December 22 it was reported that Casamance leader Diamacoune had been expelled from Guinea-Bissau.

In May 1994 Dakar demanded the withdrawal of Iran's ambassador, accusing Teheran of supporting the activities of the Islamic fundamentalist movement in Senegal. Fear of the spread of Islamic fundamentalism also dominated a meeting among Senegal, Mali, and Mauritania in January 1995, with the three agreeing to "combat fanaticism in all its forms." On February 10 Senegalese aircraft bombed a suspected Casamance rebel base in Guinea-Bissau, Dakar ignoring Bissau's subsequent demand for an explanation of the attack. However, in September Dakar and Bissau signed a security cooperation pact, and in December the prospect of closer relations improved markedly when Bissau agreed to withdraw its earlier objections to the 1989 court ruling on their shared maritime border. In 1996 Senegal continued to enjoy improved relations with its neighbors, signing cooperation agreements with Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Mali, and Mauritania. On a less positive note, efforts to repatriate the Mauritanian refugees residing in Senegal since 1989 were only haltingly successful.

In June 1998 President Diouf deployed troops to Guinea-Bissau to shore up the embattled government there, underlining Dakar's concern that the Casamance region in Senegal would erupt in violence if the pro-Casamance Bissau rebels secured power in Guinea-Bissau (see article on Guinea-Bissau). The administration's military strategy initially drew widespread support; however, by August opposition leaders had begun to question the effort. In March 1999 the last of the Senegalese troops were withdrawn. In 2001 armed forces from Guinea-Bissau destroyed the main Casamance rebel bases in that country. In 2002 separatist groups launched a new round of negotiations with the Senegalese government following the appointment of a new government peace commission. The government committed to a number of infrastructure programs in the province and released some government-held rebels on bail. In response the rebels adopted a cease-fire, although rebels opposed to the negotiations continued to launch minor attacks.

Wade enhanced the international status and influence of Senegal during the early 2000s by, among other things, condemning antidemocratic tendencies among African leaders. Senegal also served as an active force for regional peace by contributing peacekeeping troops to operations in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Côte d'Ivoire, and Liberia.

Wade has maintained close ties with France but has also reached out to other major powers. In February 2002 he hosted Tony Blair, the first British prime minister to visit Senegal. During the meeting Blair pledged support for the New Partnership for Africa's Development (NEPAD), an organization launched through the OAU in October 2001 to promote socioeconomic recovery in Africa. In April 2002 Wade hosted the first major NEPAD conference. Wade also worked to improve relations with the United States and met with U.S. President George W. Bush in Senegal in July 2003. In addition, Senegal pledged to cooperate with the United States in the global war on terrorism. In 2003 Wade angered France by his refusal to condemn the U.S.-led war in Iraq.

On December 30, 2004, the government and the main rebel group in Casamance, the MFDC, signed a comprehensive peace settlement, although some minor rebel factions continued to fight the central government. (In March 2006, fighting between competing factions of the MFDC displaced 5,000 civilians along the border between Senegal and Guinea-Bissau.)

Tensions emerged in 2005 over a Gambian decision to double the tariff on ferry traffic on the Gambia River, which prompted Wade to close border crossings. The dispute was later resolved with a 15 percent reduction in the tariffs.

In October 2005, Senegal reestablished diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China, ending Senegal's long-standing recognition of Taiwan. Economic relations between Dakar and Beijing were the main reason for the action, as trade between the two countries had increased by 25 percent per year since 2003. In April 2006, the prime minister led a trade delegation to China in an effort to further enhance trade and investment in Senegal.

Current Issues

The peaceful transfer of presidential power from the PS to the PDS in 2000 was widely hailed as a triumph for the constitutional process in a continent more often known for violent changeovers. Despite having served as chief executive since 1981, President Diouf conceded gracefully. For 75-year-old Abdoulaye Wade the victory was a testament to perseverance (the campaign was his fifth) and to growing support for his long-time populist message. The new president quickly launched a number of ambitious projects designed to promote agro-industry, with particular emphasis on private-sector development. At the April 2001 legislative balloting, the public appeared still to be in the mood for a change, giving Wade a nearly two-thirds majority to work with in the assembly. By mid-2002, however, some analysts suggested that economic realities were beginning to impinge on the new administration's honeymoon, while the PS and other opposition parties were reportedly achieving more effective coordination.

In 2004 the government announced plans to build a new capital city some 150 kilometers from Dakar. The new capital would allow for a centralized and modern government center and would facilitate economic development through new construction and the renovation of existing government facilities for private development. In July 2005, parliament passed a measure that changed the location of the proposed capital to a new site near Kebemer.

Public opposition was provoked in January 2005 by a law designed to pardon those responsible for political crimes or acts committed since 1983 and to help promote the peace settlement in Casamance. Opposition groups asserted that the law was an attempt to cover up past crimes by former government officials and asked the Constitutional Council to examine the measure.

On July 15, former prime minister Seck was arrested on charges of embezzlement and later with endangering national security. On August 3 parliament voted to strip Seck of immunity and forced him to appear before a special anticorruption court. The court dismissed the embezzlement and subversion charges, and the former prime minister was released from prison in February 2006. Seck continued to face a minor charge of overspending government funds; however, his release allowed him to launch his 2007 presidential campaign, reports indicating that he hoped to draw support from the PDS and other progovernment parties.

In late 2005 legislative elections scheduled for May 2006 were postponed until February 2007, ostensibly to save money by combining the polling with presidential elections. Wade redirected the $13 million allocated for the 2006 balloting to help relocate Senegalese displaced by flooding. Opposition leaders met in Dakar in December 2005 and issued a joint statement condemning the postponement. Several opposition parties also launched discussions about the formation of electoral alliances prior to the 2007 balloting. Meanwhile, in spite of his age, Wade announced his intention to campaign for reelection.

Poverty remains Senegal's main social and economic problem. Estimates are that some 57 percent of the population lives in poverty. In response, the government has expanded spending on social programs so that education and health care now account for more than half the national budget. Wade has set a goal of reducing poverty in Senegal by half by 2015. The government has also launched an ambitious bid to make Senegal a leading tourist destination among Muslims. In March 2005 Wade conducted a tourism conference for Muslim foreign ministers. The country hopes to increase the number of wealthy tourists from Muslim states such as Morocco and Tunisia.

Political Parties

In March 1976 the National Assembly approved a constitutional amendment authorizing three political parties, each reflecting a specific ideological "current" that President Senghor had declared to exist in Senegalese society. Senghor's own Socialist Party (PS) adopted the centrist position of "democratic socialism," while the two other legal parties, the Senegalese Democratic Party (PDS) and the African Independence Party, were assigned "liberal democratic" and "Marxist-Leninist" postures, respectively. In early 1979 the amendment was altered to permit the legal establishment of a fourth, essentially right-wing, party—the Senegalese Republican Movement. The process of liberalization reached a conclusion in April 1981, when the assembly removed most remaining restrictions on party activity. More than 60 groups currently enjoy legal status.

A number of opposition parties including the PDS, the PADS/AJ, and the MSU operated in a loose coalition called Uniting to Change Senegal until that grouping's demise following the PDS's decision to join the government in 1995. After the PDS withdrew from the government in March 1998, it spearheaded the formation of an Alliance of Forces for Change (Alliance des Forces pour le Changement—AFC), which also included the PADS/AJ, the CDP, and the PIT. The AFC was superseded in late 1999 by the formation of an opposition coalition known as Alternance 2000 to challenge the PS in the 2000 presidential balloting. The new coalition, which endorsed Abdoulaye Wade of the PDS in the first round of the presidential election, was dominated by the PDS but also included the LD-MPT, PADS/AJ, MSU, PIT, UDF, ADN, and FAR/Yoon Wi. In early 2000 Alternance 2000 joined with a number of other opposition groupings, including the AFP, CDP, and URD, to form the Front for Fair and Transparent Elections (Front pour la Régularité et la Transparence des Elections—FRTE) to combat what the members perceived to be efforts by the PS to sabotage the election. The FRTE was not an electoral coalition; several members, including Alternance 2000, the AFP, CDP, and URD, presented their own presidential candidates in the first round.

Following the first round of presidential balloting on February 27, 2000, a number of groups previously aligned in the FRTE (including Alternance 2000, the AFP, CDP, and FSD) formed the Front for Change (Front pour l'Alternance—FAL) to support Wade in the second round after the PDS/Alternance 2000 leader promised that his victory would be followed by installation of a coalition government. Meanwhile President Diouf of the PS was also endorsed in his reelection bid by a coalition called the Patriotic Convergence (Convergence Patriotique—CP), which included the PDS-R, BGC, and others.

The FAL essentially collapsed when Moustapha Niassé of the AFP resigned as prime minister in early March 2001 and the AFP cabinet members also left the government. Consequently, the PDS organized the Sopi Coalition, which ultimately included upwards of 40 smaller groups (including the LD-MPT, CDP, UDF, ADN, and PSR), to contest the April 29 assembly balloting. Meanwhile, the AFP, PIT, PPS, and a number of other opposition parties formed a loose preelection coalition called the Front for Defense of Democracy (Front pour la Défense de la Démocratie—FDD), under the leadership of the PIT's Amath DANSOKHO. The Sopi Coalition was credited with winning 89 of the legislative seats. Subsequently, opposition parties (including the PS, AFP, URD, and PIT) organized a Permanent Framework for Consultation (Cadre Permanent de Concertation—CPC) to work against the policies of the PDS-led government. In response, the PDS organized a grouping known as the Convergence of Actions around the President for the 21st Century (Convergence des Actions autour du Président en Perspective du 21ème Siècle—CAP-21). The CAP-21, which included the PADS/AJ, the LD-MPT, and some 20 other smaller groups, contested the May 2002 municipal balloting as an electoral coalition, as did the CPC.

Government and Government-Supportive Parties

Senegalese Democratic Party (Parti Démocratique Sénégalais—PDS). The PDS was launched in October 1974 as a youth-oriented opposition group to implement the pluralistic democracy guaranteed by the Senegalese constitution. Although standing to the left of President Senghor on certain issues, it was required by the constitutional amendment of March 1976 to adopt a formal position to the right of the government party. Having charged fraud in both the 1980 and 1983 legislative elections (although the PDS was one of two opposition parties to gain representation on the latter occasion), PDS leaders participated in the 1984 municipal boycott and asserted their regret at having campaigned in 1983. Following the return from abroad of party leader Abdoulaye Wade in early 1985, the PDS led a number of mass prayer demonstrations for radical change, with Wade calling for “a transitional government of national unity.”

As the major force in Senegal's growing opposition movement, the PDS appeared to pose a genuine threat to the PS in the 1988 legislative and presidential campaigns, partly as a result of its alliance with the LD-MPT and the PIT (below). Although presidential candidate Wade was officially credited with 26 percent of the vote, widespread indications of electoral abuse suggested that his actual total may have been higher.

In 1991 Wade attributed his acceptance of a cabinet post to fears that continued opposition activity would destabilize the country. However, Wade resigned from the government in October 1992 in what was viewed as an attempt to recapture the allegiance of PDS members estranged by his alliance with Diouf. Shortly thereafter Wade announced that the party would present candidates at the forthcoming legislative poll and entered the presidential contest in which he ran second to the incumbent, with a 32.03 percent share of the vote.

In July 1993 the PDS, ignoring a government ban, organized a demonstration for the release of jailed party deputies Mody Sy and Samuel Sarr, both of whom had been held since mid-May for their alleged involvement in the assassination of the Constitutional Council's vice president. On October 1 Wade, who had himself been detained for two days after the assassination, was arrested along with his wife for their alleged roles in the killing. Within days a number of other prominent PDS leaders, including Abdoulaye FAYE and Ousmane NGOM, were also implicated in the assassination.

On November 5, 1993, a number of party members were arrested for leading antigovernment demonstrations, and on February 18, 1994, Wade was reimprisoned for his participation in rioting, which erupted following the devaluation of the CFA franc. At a perfunctory military trial on February 24 Wade was convicted of a "breach against state security." However, on May 26 charges against him and his associates in connection with the 1993 assassination were dropped. Wade was one of five PDS leaders to accept cabinet portfolios in August 1995.

In March 1998 the PDS withdrew from the government and legislature after the PS legislators increased the size of the latter. At the same time Wade reportedly predicted that the PDS would win as many as 80 seats at polling in May. However, the party fell far short of such expectations, securing just 23 seats, and in June Ousmane Ngom and a number of other party leaders left the grouping to form the Senegalese Liberal Party (below). In July Wade resigned his assembly post, saying that he would focus his efforts on resolving the PDS's in-traparty disputes.

Wade finished second with 30.97 percent of the vote in the first round of presidential balloting in February 2000. However, after securing the support of most of the other first-round runners-up, Wade went on to defeat President Diouf in the second round in March with 58.7 percent of the vote, setting the stage, in conjunction with the PDS legislative victory in April 2001, for one of the continent's most remarkably peaceful shifts in political power.

In April 2002 it was reported that the Party for Progress and Citizenship (Parti pour le Progrès et la Citoyenneté—PPC) had agreed to merge with the PDS. The PPC, formed in 2001 by Mbaye Jacques DIOP after he quit the PS, had secured one seat in the 2001 legislative balloting. A similar decision to merge with the PDS was also reported on the part of the Senegalese Democratic Party—Renewal (Parti Démocratique Sénégalais—Rénovation—PDS-R), which had been organized in June 1987 by an anti-Wade faction within the PDS that announced as its goal the establishment of a "truly secular and pluralist democracy." PDS-R candidates secured minuscule legislative vote shares in the 1988 and 1993 elections, while supporting Diouf for president on both occasions. Serigne Lamine DIOP, the PDS-R secretary general, was named minister of justice and keeper of the seals in the Loum government formed in July 1998, the party having secured one seat in the May legislative balloting.

In April 2005, 14 PDS members of parliament announced their intention to leave the party and form a new group, the Forces of Change. After it was ruled that the 14 would have to resign their seats and campaign in special elections, they returned to the PDS.

Wade's main political rival within the PDS, Idrissa Seck, was dismissed as prime minister in April 2004. In August Seck was also dismissed from his post as PDS executive secretary, and he and several of his supporters were expelled from the party. Seck later announced he would contest the 2007 presidential elections.

Leaders: Abdoulaye WADE (President of the Republic and Secretary General), Macky SALL (Prime Minister).

Democratic League—Labor Party Movement (Ligue Démocratique—Mouvement pour le Parti du Travail—LD-MPT). A self-proclaimed independent Marxist group with links to Senegal's leading teachers' union, the LD-MPT contested both the 1983 and 1984 elections. At its second congress in December 1986, the League's secretary general, Abdoulaye Bathily, called for "disorganized alliances" between opposition parties and advanced an economic "alternative to the recipes of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank" as a means of establishing a socialist society. The party supported PDS candidate Abdoulaye Wade in the 1988 presidential poll but presented its own legislative candidates, securing no seats on a 1.4 percent vote share.

In April 1988 LD-MPT Secretary General Bathily was given a suspended sentence for having organized an illegal antigovernment demonstration, while five other party activists were indicted on similar charges late in the year. In 1990 Bathily intensified his criticism of the Diouf administration's policies and called for a non-Diouf "unity" government. Thereafter, despite the co-option of a number of opposition colleagues, Bathily initially refused Diouf's offer of a cabinet portfolio, citing Dakar's repressive policies in Casamance. However, Bathily ultimately agreed to become environment minister in June 1993, with the party being awarded a second portfolio in August 1995. Following the May 1998 legislative poll (at which it won three seats), the LD-MPT declined to participate in the next government. Instead it proposed the formation of a unified opposition front against the PS and President Diouf. Six of the 89 successful candidates from the Sopi Coalition in the 2001 legislative balloting were identified as LD-MPT members. Two LD-MPT deputies briefly served in the government in 2005, before disputes with Wade led to their dismissal during a cabinet reshuffle.

Leader: Dr. Abdoulaye BATHILY (1993 presidential candidate and Secretary General).

African Party for Democracy and Socialism/And Jëf (Parti Africain pour la Démocratie et le Socialisme/And Jëf—PADS/AJ). The PADS/AJ was formed in 1991 by merger of the Revolutionary Movement for the New Democracy (Mouvement Révolutionnaire pour la Démocratie Nouvelle—MRDN) and two other left-wing groups, the People's Democratic Union (Union pour la Démocratie Populaire—UDP) and the Socialist Workers' Organization (Organisation Socialist des Travailleurs—OST).

Also known as And Jëf, a Wolof expression meaning "to unite for a purpose," the MRDN was a populist southern party of the extreme left that included former socialists and Maoists. It was permitted to register in June 1981 but joined the 1983 and 1984 election boycotts. In 1988 one of its leaders, Landing Savane, won 0.25 percent of the vote as a presidential candidate. The UDP was organized in 1981 by a pro-Albanian MRDN splinter group, while the OST was a small Marxist-Leninist formation launched in 1982.

Landing Savane ran a distant third as the 1993 presidential nominee of the PADS/AJ. For the May legislative balloting the party participated with the RND (below) in a Let Us Unite (Jappoo Liggeeyal) Senegal coalition that won three assembly seats. In November Savane was arrested for organizing a demonstration against the Diouf administration's economic austerity program. Given a suspended sentence for the incident, the PADS leader was re-arrested in February 1994 and, along with Wade, he was subsequently convicted of provoking antigovernment riots.

The PADS/AJ captured four seats in the 1998 legislative balloting; subsequently it cooperated with the PIT and PLS to run a joint slate of candidates at the January 1999 Senate elections under the banner of "And Fippu." After supporting Abdoulaye Wade of the PDS in the 2000 presidential campaign, the PADS/AJ secured two seats in the 2001 legislative poll (on 4.1 percent of the vote) and subsequently joined the PDS-led parliamentary faction. Savane and Mamadou Diop were given posts in subsequent PDS-led governments.

Leaders: Landing SAVANE (Secretary General), Mamadou DIOP.

Convention of Democrats and Patriots (Convention des Démocrates et des Patriotes—CDP). Also known as Garab-Gi ("The Cure"), the CDP was founded in May 1992 by Iba Der Thiam, a former education minister and UNESCO Executive Council member, who promptly announced his presidential candidacy. Thiam also proposed the signing of a nonaggression pact by opposition parties to encourage election monitoring as well as joint endorsement of the leading opposition candidate at the first round of presidential balloting.

In December 1994 the CDP and the RND (below) issued a joint statement rejecting the Uniting to Change coalition's call for the drafting of a national consensus program, describing it as a self-serving PDS maneuver. However, after Thiam secured 1.2 percent of the vote in the first round of the 2000 presidential poll, he threw his support behind Wade in the second round, becoming the coordinator of the FAL. The CDP, noted for its antipoverty platform and, more recently, an increasingly Islamic orientation, secured one seat as a member of the Sopi Coalition in the 2001 legislative balloting. In May 2005, it was reported that the CDP had agreed to merge with the PDS.

Leader: Iba Der THIAM (1993 and 2000 presidential candidate and Secretary General of the Party).

Movement for Socialism and Unity (Mouvement pour le Socialisme et l'Unité—MSU). The MSU was registered in 1981 as the People's Democratic Movement (Mouvement Démocratique Populaire—MDP), which, led by longtime Senghor opponent Mamadou Dia, called for a program of socialist self-management of the economy. Dia was one of the few prominent Senegalese political figures to oppose establishment of the Senegambian Confederation. The MDP contested the 1983 general election but boycotted subsequent balloting.

The MSU was listed as a member of Alternance 2000, and official government sources indicated that one MSU member was elected in the 2001 legislative balloting as a member of the Sopi Coalition. However, perhaps indicating a split within the party, news reports described the MSU, under the leadership of Sheikh Tidiane BA, as aligning with the PIT for the assembly elections. As of 2002 Ba was still being described as an opponent of the Wade government.

Leaders: Mamadou DIA (Former Prime Minister), Mouhamadou N'DIAYE (National Coordinator).

Action for National Development (Action pour le Développement National—ADN). Organized in mid-1996 under the leadership of Mamadou Moustapha Diop, the ADN participated in the Sopi Coalition in the 2001 legislative balloting.

Leader: Mamadou Moustapha DIOP.

Senegalese Republican Party (Parti Sénégalais Républicain—PSR). In the first round of the 2000 presidential election the PSR's Ousseymou Fall secured 1.12 percent of the vote. Subsequently, the party joined the Sopi Coalition for the 2001 legislative poll.

Leaders: Ousseymou FALL (2000 presidential candidate), Ely Madiodo FALL (Secretary General).

Front for Socialism and Democracy (Front pour le Socialisme et la Démocratie—FSD). Launched under the direction of a prominent Muslim leader, Cheikh Abdoulaye Dieye, the FSD captured one seat in the 1998 legislative balloting on a platform emphasizing care for the elderly and women. Dieye captured 0.97 percent of the first-round vote in the 2000 presidential election, and the FSD subsequently joined the FAL.

Leader: Cheikh Adoulaye DIEYE.

Other pro-Wade formations include the Senegalese Democratic Rally (Rassemblement Démocratique Sénégalais—RDS), led by Abdou Latif GUEYE; the Union of Senegalese Patriots; the Popular Democratic Rally (Rassemblement Démocratique Populaire—RDP), formed by Ibrahim Masseck DIOP; the Democratic Union for Federalism/Mboloomi (Union Démocratique pour le Fédéralisme/Mboloomi—UDF/Mboloomi); and the Union for Democratic Renewal/Front for Change (Union for Democratic Renewal/Front pour l'Alternance—URD/FAL), a breakaway faction from the URD (below) that joined the Sopi Coalition for the 2001 legislative balloting under the leadership of Mahmoud SALEH.

Opposition Parties

Socialist Party (Parti Socialiste—PS). Known until December 1976 as the Senegalese Progressive Union (Union Progressiste Sénégalaise—UPS), the PS consistently held a preponderance of seats in the National Assembly until 2001. A moderate Francophile party long identified with the cause of Senegalese independence, the UPS was founded by Léopold Senghor in 1949 in a secession from the dominant local branch of the French Socialist Party. From 1963 to 1974 it was the only legal party in Senegal; it absorbed the only significant opposition grouping, the leftist Parti de Regroupement Africain-Sénégal (PRA) in 1966 in furtherance of Senghor's "national reconciliation" policy. In early 1981, following his resignation of the presidency, Senghor withdrew as party secretary general. During an extraordinary conference in March 1989, the PS voted to assign internal authority to a ten-member Executive Committee that was directed to recruit new members and assist in "rejuvenation" of the party. At the PS congress in 1990, Abdou Diouf was reappointed secretary general and given unchecked control of a restructured, "non-hierarchical," 30-member Politburo.

The PS experienced unprecedented levels of intraparty violence prior to its 1996 congress, spurring a call from Diouf for "reconciliation." Meanwhile Diouf and Ousmane Tanor Dieng were elected to the newly created party presidency and executive secretaryship, respectively, with the latter assuming administrative responsibilities previously assigned to the secretary general.

In March 1998 a PS faction, led by Djibo KA, broke off from the party and formed the URD (below). Among the reasons cited for Ka's decision was Diouf's reported elevation of Dieng to the status of heir apparent.

Another prominent PS member, Moustapha Niasse, left the PS after 40 years to form the AFP (below), the recent departures contributing to Diouf's failure in his 2000 reelection bid. Although Diouf was reconfirmed as the PS leader at an October 2000 congress, he subsequently announced plans to retire from politics.

The PS led the opposition to the 2006 postponement of legislative elections and tried to rally opposition parties. The PS was also reported to be active in efforts to form an electoral coalition ahead of the 2007 balloting.

Leaders: Abdou DIOUF (Former President of the Republic), Mamadou Lamine LOUM (Former Prime Minister), Cheikh Abdoul Khadre CIS-SOKHO (Former National Assembly President), Ousmane Tanor DIENG (Secretary General).

Alliance of Forces for Progress (Alliance des Forces pour le Progrès—AFP). Formed by Moustapha Niasse in the fall of 1999 after he had left the PS, the AFP supported Abdoulaye Wade in the second round of the 2000 presidential election after Niasse had finished third in the first round with 16.76 percent. Under an apparent electoral agreement with Wade, Niasse was named prime minister in Wade's first cabinet, but he subsequently quit that post in early 2001. The AFP, some of whose support comes from the Tidjane Islamic Brotherhood, competed alone in the 2001 legislative elections, finishing second to the Sopi Coalition.

Leader: Moustapha NIASSE.

Union for Democratic Renewal (Union pour le Renouveau Démocratique—URD). The URD, originally styled the Democratic Renewal (Renouveau Démocratique—RD), was formed by former interior minister Djibo Ka in November 1997 to act as a reform group within the PS; however, in December Ka and ten of his dissident colleagues were suspended from the PS for three months. Subsequently, Ka declared his intention to forward an independent list of candidates at legislative balloting in May 1998. In March 1998 the PS rejected Ka's list, and on April 1 he resigned from the group and formally launched the URD. Having emerged from the 1998 legislative polling with 11 seats, the URD presented Ka as its candidate in the first round of the 2000 presidential election. He finished fourth with 7.08 percent of the vote and somewhat surprisingly threw his support to Abdou Diouf in the second round. A split in the URD regarding that decision (one faction joined the Sopi Coalition) apparently contributed to the URD's decline to three seats following the 2001 legislative poll.

Leader: Djibo KA (Secretary General and 2000 presidential candidate).

Independence and Labor Party (Parti de l'Indépendance et du Travail—PIT). Organized by a group of PAI dissidents and permitted to register in 1981, the PIT was recognized by Moscow as Senegal's "official" Communist Party. It contested both the 1983 and 1984 elections but won no assembly or town council seats. The party joined the LD-MPT in supporting PDS presidential candidate Wade in 1988, while its legislative candidates won only 0.8 percent of the vote and no seats. The PIT secretary general was among those arrested after the elections, but the charges were later dismissed. In mid-1989 the PIT entered into negotiations with the ruling Socialist Party, and the party was awarded two portfolios in the cabinet reshuffle of August 1995. However, both ministers were ousted a month later in the wake of a PIT Central Committee statement critical of the Diouf administration.

The PIT was a member of Alternance 2000 in support of the 2000 presidential bid of Abdoulaye Wade, and the party's secretary general, Amath Dansokho, served in the first Wade cabinet. However, the two leaders subsequently quarreled and Dansokho resigned from the government in early 2001. Dansokho was briefly arrested in July 2005 for making antigovernment statements.

Leader: Amath DANSOKHO (Secretary General).

Alliance Jéf Jël. Formerly known as the Alliance for Progress and Justice/Jéf Jël, this grouping adopted its current name at a party congress in June 2000.

Leaders: Talla SYLLA (President), Moussa TINE.

National Democratic Rally (Rassemblement National Démocratique—RND). Established in February 1976, the RND described itself as a “party of the masses.” It applied, without success, for recognition in September 1977, and two years later its founder, Cheikh Anta DIOP (who died in 1986), was ordered to stand trial for engaging in unauthorized party activity. The RND was legalized in June 1981; it subsequently repeatedly criticized the government for its position on Chad and for its “systematic alignment with the positions of France and the United States.” Evincing an anti-Wade orientation, the RND retained its single legislative seat in 2001, although it garnered only 0.7 percent of the vote.

Leader: Madior DIOUF (Secretary General).

Senegalese Liberal Party (Parti Libéral Sénégalais—PLS). The PLS was formed in June 1998 by Ousmane Ngom and a number of other PDS defectors after they failed to gain central committee posts in their former party. At the group's founding meeting, Ngom described the PLS as a vehicle of “liberalism” and denounced Wade's rule of the PDS as monarchical. The PLS participated in the 1999 Senate election in an And Fippu Coalition, which also included the PIT and PADS/AJ.

Leader: Ousmane NGOM.

Other Parties Contesting the 2001 Legislative Elections

African Independence Party (Parti Africain de l'Indépendance—PAI). Founded in 1957 and composed mainly of intellectuals in southern Senegal, the PAI was legally dissolved in 1960 but was subsequently recognized as the “Marxist-Leninist” party called for by the 1976 constitutional amendment. Claiming to be the “real PAI,” a clandestine wing of the party denounced recognition as a self-serving maneuver by the Senghor government. In March 1980 two leaders of the splinter faction, Amath Dansokho and Maguette THIAM, were charged with inciting workers to strike, but in 1981 they were permitted to register the group as a distinct party (see PIT, above). Having unsuccessfully contested the 1983 election, the PAI joined the November 1984 boycott. In early 1987 the formation of a front uniting the PAI with the MDP (see under MSU, above) and the former Communist Workers' League (Ligue Communiste des Travailleurs—LCT) was announced, although no legislative candidates were presented by any of the three in 1988.

The PAI supported Abdou Diouf in the 2000 presidential campaign and presented its own candidates (unsuccessfully) in the 2001 legislative poll.

Leaders: Majhemouth DIOP (President), Balla N'DIAYE (Vice President), Bara GOUDIABY (Secretary General).

Senegalese Republican Movement (Mouvement Républicain Sénégalais—MRS). The MRS is a self-styled “right-wing” party organized by former National Assembly vice president Boubacar GUÉYE. In August 1977 the party applied for legal recognition, which was not granted until February 1979. It supports human rights, free enterprise, and private property. At the domestic political level, it has urged parliamentary election of the president; regionally, it has proposed the introduction of a common currency for OAU member countries.

Leader: Demba BA (Secretary General).

Party for the African Renaissance (Parti pour la Renaissance Africaine—PARENA). Devoted primarily to the issues of women's rights and the "lack of transparency" in governmental affairs, PARENA attempted to present its leader, Mariame Ly Wane, as a presidential candidate in 2000 but she was disqualified on technical grounds.

Leader: Mariame Ly WANE.

Senegalese People's Party (Parti Populaire Sénégalais—PPS). Legalized in December 1981, the PPS was also organized by a number of PAI adherents, who did not immediately delineate its program, indicating only that they supported the "restructuring of Senegalese society on new and scientific bases." Some of its members have been involved in demonstrations led by Casamance separatists (see MFDC, below). The party received only 0.2 percent of the vote in the 1983 legislative and presidential elections and did not participate in 1988 or 1993.

Leaders: Semou Pathe GUEYE, Magatte LOUM, Dr. Oumar WANE (Secretary General).

Other parties that competed unsuccessfully in the 2001 legislative balloting were the Rally of Ecologists of Senegal (Rassemblement des Écologistes du Sénégal—RES); Party of Renewal and Citizenship (Parti de la Renaissance et de la Citoyenneté—PRC); the Assembly of African Workers—Senegal (Rassemblement des Travailleurs Africains—Sénégal—RTAS), a social-democratic party recognized in March 1997; the Reform Movement for Social Development (Mouvement de la Réforme pour le Développement Social—MRDS); the Movement for Democracy and Socialism/Naxx

Jarinu (Mouvement pour la Démocratie et le Socialisme/Naxx Jarinu—MDS/NJ); the Union for the Republic (Union pour la République—UPR); the Social Democratic Party/Jant-Bi; the Democratic Union of Progressive Patriotic Forces (Union Démocratique des Forces Progressistes Patriotiques—UDFP); and the Citizens' Movement for a Democracy of Development (Mouvement des Citoyens pour une Démocratie de Développement).

Other Parties and Groups

Senegalese Democratic Union—Renewal (Union Démocratique Sénégalais—Rénovation—UDS-R). Organized in February 1985 and legally recognized in July, the UDS-R is led by Mamadou Fall, a well-known trade-union leader and former deputy, who was expelled from the PDS while in the assembly for "divisive activities." Fall describes himself as a "progressive nationalist" seeking to promote the "unification of healthy forces." The party presented no candidates in 1988. It secured one legislative seat in May 1993, which it retained in 1998.

Leader: Mamadou Puritain FALL (Secretary General).

Other parties include the Action Front for Renewal/"The Way" (Front d'Action pour le Renouveau/Yoon Wi—FAR/Yoon Wi), led by Bathie SECK; the Gainde Centrist Bloc (Bloc des Gainde Centristes—BGC), which captured a single seat in the May 1998 legislative balloting under the leadership of PDS dissident Jean-Paul DIAS, who was arrested in April 2006 for antigovernment remarks; the Reform Party (Parti de la Réforme—PR), whose leader, Abdourahim AGNE, was arrested in May 2005 for sedition; and the Rally for Unity and Peace (Rassemblement pour l'Unité et la Paix—RUP), a Louga-based grouping headed by Moctar N'DIAYE.

Illegal Groups

Movement of Democratic Forces of Casamance (Mouvement des Forces Démocratiques de la Casamance—MFDC). The MFDC was launched as a clandestine grouping advocating the secession of the Casamance region of southern Senegal. Many supporters, including MFDC leader Fr. Augustin Diamacoune Senghor, were jailed following demonstrations in the provincial capital of Ziguinchor in the early 1980s, and another 152 people were arrested in 1986 for allegedly attending a secret MFDC meeting. Diamacoune and most of the other detainees were subsequently released, the government being perceived as having adopted a more conciliatory approach in dealing with the separatist issue. However, new MFDC-army clashes were reported in late 1988.

In a series of actions that commenced in mid-1990, Diamacoune and most other MFDC civilian leaders were arrested or forced into exile following a resurgence of separatist violence spearheaded by Attika ("Fighter"), the MFDC's military wing. The uprising, which the separatists claimed was the result of their being economically and socially marginalized, continued through late 1990. However, in May 1991, following a series of secret meetings with ethnic Diola parliamentarians negotiating on Diouf's behalf, MFDC leaders agreed to a cease-fire and disarmament. Reports of the negotiations supported observers' suspicions that the separatists encompassed a limited number (300–500) of ethnic Diolas.

In April and May 1992 renewed separatist activity was attributed to a militant MFDC splinter and despite an escalating verbal confrontation between Dakar and the MFDC leadership over the military's allegedly heavy-handed response to the violence, the Diouf administration, as late as September, absolved the MFDC leadership of blame for the cease-fire breakdown.

On July 8, 1993, the MFDC signed a cease-fire agreement with the government that included provisions for further negotiations, a bilateral prisoner release, the deployment of French military observers, and the establishment of a refugee repatriation program. However, renewed clashes were reported three days later, and open fighting resumed following the government's killing of an MFDC activist in September. Thereafter, no serious cease-fire violations were reported until January 1995, when a pro-independence faction led by Léopold SANIA rejected the peace accord and resumed guerrilla activities. Following a government air attack on an alleged MFDC base in Guinea-Bissau in February, the rebels denied having personnel there.

In April 1995 the government deployed an additional 1,000 troops in the Casamance region in response to persistent breaches of the cease-fire, including the disappearance of four French tourists who were assumed to have been kidnapped by the MFDC. In late April the government announced the arrest of some 50 suspected activists, including Father Diamacoune, and in mid-July the separatists formally abandoned the cease-fire. While Diamacoune's imprisonment served as a rallying point for MFDC faithful during the 1995 crisis, his influence with party militants reportedly had already begun to wane. Subsequently, despite his declaration of a unilateral cease-fire in January 1996, rebel attacks continued throughout the first half of the year.

After a year of relative calm in the region, fierce fighting broke out in August 1997 as the government responded to renewed rebel activity with a massive offensive, and by late September over 100 people were reported dead. Meanwhile, the fighting widened the split in the MFDC between the hard-line northern wing, led by Mamadou Sane, and Diamacoune's predominantly southern followers, who were described as prepared to abandon their demand for independence in return for a government promise to speed development of the region. In early 1998 the two factions were reported to be in open conflict. Furthermore, troops from Guinea-Bissau were reportedly laying siege to Sane's long-time safe havens within Bissau's border.

In March 1998 the government claimed to have killed 50 MFDC fighters preparing to attack a village near Ziguinchor. Thereafter, fighting was reported throughout the region during the run-up to legislative polling; however, the government deployed a large number of forces to the area for the balloting period, and few incidents were reported.

Amid reports that the MFDC was preparing to enter into negotiations with the Diouf administration, the group's military and political leaders met in Banjul, Gambia, in April 1999. However, on April 30, 17 people were reported killed in a clash between the rebels and government forces, thus underscoring continued reports that the movement was splintered.

Some MFDC fighters were reported to have disarmed in mid-1999, and another questionable cease-fire was announced late in the year. However, the leadership dispute within the MFDC continued, as did the low-level war between rebels and government troops. Additional negotiations were launched in December 2000, new Senegalese President Abdoulaye Wade having declared resolution of the conflict a top priority for his government. A peace pact was again announced in March 2001, ostensibly providing for a cease-fire, release of prisoners, return of refugees and displaced persons, and infrastructure rehabilitation, particularly road repairs. It also appeared that Diamacoune and his supporters had renounced their secessionist stance and instead had agreed to pursue greater autonomy for the region while remaining a part of Senegal. The accord was greeted hopefully by many observers, especially following a face-to-face meeting between Wade and Diamacoune and the MFDC's call for fighters to lay down their guns for the April national legislative balloting. Banditry and sporadic killings continued, however, precluding finalization of a permanent settlement.

At a mid-2001 MFDC Congress, Diamacoune was moved to the group's presidency, a role considered more ceremonial in nature than his previous post. Meanwhile, Sidi Badji, a hard-liner perceived as a rival to Diamacoune, was reportedly named head of military affairs. Badji subsequently claimed the secretary general's position, and the power struggle between his "radical" faction (which also included military commander Salif SADIO) and Diamacoune's "peacemaking" faction continued into mid-2002. On September 19, 2004, Diamacoune became honorary president, while Biagui became the effective leader of the MFDC. Meanwhile, continuing violence barred much rehabilitation of the poverty-stricken region. The MFDC signed a peace agreement with the government on December 30, 2004. The MFDC plans to reestablish itself as a legitimate political party and contest legislative elections in 2007. In March 2006, the Sadio-led faction of the MFDC launched attacks against other MFDC groupings. In response, security forces from Guinea-Bissau launched an offensive against MFDC positions in an attempt to end the factional fighting.

Leaders: Fr. Augustin DIAMACOUNE Senghor (Honorary President), Mamadou SANE, Sidi BADJI, Jean-Marie BIAGUI (Secretary General).

Men and Women Fighting for Truth (Dahira Moustarchidine wal Moustarchidate). A radical Islamic youth movement, the group, also known as "Guides," was banned on February 17, 1994, two days after a violent protest in Dakar calling for President Diouf's ouster. A month earlier the group's leader, Mostapha Sy, had been sentenced to a one-year prison term for an antigovernment speech at a PDS rally in October 1993.

Leader: Mostapha SY.

Legislature

The National Assembly currently consists (as authorized by constitutional revision in January 2001) of 120 members, 65 elected on a majoritarian basis at the department level and 55 elected on a proportional basis from national party lists. Members serve five-year terms, although the assembly is subject to presidential dissolution after two years. The 2001 constitutional revision also eliminated the Senate, a 45-member body (elected by the assembly and local, municipal, and regional officials) that had first been elected in January 1999.

At the most recent assembly balloting of April 29, 2001, the Sopi Coalition (led by the Senegalese Democratic Party) won 89 seats; the Alliance of Forces for Progress, 11; the Socialist Party, 10; the Union for Democratic Renewal, 3; the African Party for Democracy and Socialism/And Jëf, 2; and the Senegalese Liberal Party, the Party for Progress and Citizenship, the Alliance Jëf Jël, the National Democratic Rally, and the Independence and Labor Party, 1 each. (The elections due in May 2006 were postponed to 2007).

President: Pape DIOP.

Cabinet

As of July 1, 2006

Prime Minister Macky Sall (PDS)

Ministers of State

Economy and Finance	Abdoulaye Diop (ind.)
Fisheries	Djibo Leyti Ka
Foreign Affairs	Cheikh Tidiane Gadio (ind.)
Infrastructure, Equipment, and Transport	Habib Sy
Justice; Keeper of the Seals	Cheikh Tidiane Sy

Ministers

Agriculture and Water	Farba Senghor
Armed Forces	Bécaye Diop (PDS)
Civil Service, Labor and Professional Organizations	Adama Sall
Commerce	Mamadou Diop (PDS/AJ)
Culture and Communication	Mame Birame Diouf
Decentralization and Regional Planning	Ousmane Ngom
Education	Moustapha Sourang (ind.)
Environment and Conservation	Thierno Lo
Expatriates	Abdoul Diop
Family and Social Development	Aida Mbodj [f]
Health, Hygiene, and Medical Prevention	Issa Mbaye Samb [f]
Housing and Construction	Oumar Sarr
Industry and Handicrafts	Bineta Samb Ba [f]
Information and Government Spokesman	Bacar Dia
International Cooperation and Regional Cooperation	Lamine Ba
Livestock	Oumou Khairy Gueye Seck [f]
Mining and Energy	Madicke Niang
NEPAD and Good Governance	Abdoul Aziz Sow
Parliamentary and African Union Relations	Awa Fall Diop [f]
Planning and Sustainable Development	Mamadou Sidibe
Posts, Telecommunications, and Information and	Joseph Ndong (PDS)
New Communication Technologies	Joseph Ndong (PDS)
Prevention, Public Hygiene, and Sanitation	Abdou Fall
Scientific Research and Technology	Yaye Kene Gassama Dia
Small- and Medium-Sized Enterprises and	Marie-Pierre Sarr Traore [f]
Women's Entrepreneurship and Micro-Finance	Marie-Pierre Sarr Traore [f]
Sport	Daouda Faye
Technical and Professional Education	Georges Tendeng
Tourism and Air Transport	Ousmane Masseck Ndiaye
Urban and Regional Planning	Assane Diagne
Youth	Aliou Sow

Ministers Delegate

Budget	Adjibou Soumare
Literacy, National Languages, and Francophonie	Diegane Sene
Local Development	Sokhna Toure Fall [f]
Preschool Education	Ibrahima Fall [f]

[f] = female

Communications

Press

Newspapers are subject to government censorship and regulation, although a number of opposition papers have recently appeared in the 1990s, some evading official registration by means of irregular publication, and restrictions have eased significantly in recent years. The following, unless otherwise noted, are published daily in French in Dakar: Le Soleil (45,000), government-owned; Sud Quotidien (30,000), independent; Wal Fadjiri (The Dawn, 15,000), independent Islamic daily; Le Matin, independent; Le Populaire, independent; L'Actuel; Tract; La Pointe; Afrique Nouvelle (15,000), Catholic weekly; Sénégal d'Aujourd'hui (5,000), published monthly by the Ministry of Communications; Nouvel Horizon, independent weekly; Eco Hebdo, weekly.

News Agencies

Agence de Presse Sénégalaise (APS) is the official facility; the Pan-African News Agency (PANA), as well as a number of foreign agencies, also maintain offices in Dakar.

Broadcasting and Computing

Broadcasting is controlled by the Radiodiffusion-Télévision du Sénégal (RTS). In July 1994

SUD FM, Senegal's first private radio station, joined two radio networks, Radio Sénégal-Inter and Radio Sénégal II. On November 14, 2005, West African Democracy Radio (WADR) began broadcasting from Dakar throughout West Africa. The station was created with support from the Open Society Initiative for West Africa. A number of new independent radio stations have started broadcasting recently, their aggressive reporting having reportedly contributed to the opposition's electoral victories in 2000 and 2001. In addition to the state television channel, there are several semi-private stations. There were approximately 395,000 television sets and 220,000 personal computers serving 225,000 Internet users in 2003.

Intergovernmental Representation

Ambassador to the U.S.

Amadou Lamine BA

U.S. Ambassador to Senegal

Janice L. JACOBS

Permanent Representative to the UN

Paul BADJI

IGO Memberships (Non-UN)

AfDB, AU, BADEA, BOAD, CILSS, ECOWAS, IDB, Interpol, IOM, NAM, OIC, OIF, PCA, UEMOA, WCO, WTO

SEYCHELLES

REPUBLIC OF SEYCHELLES

Republik Sesel

République des Seychelles

The Country

The Seychelles archipelago consists of some 115 islands in the Indian Ocean about 600 miles northeast of Madagascar. Over 85 percent of the population is concentrated on the largest island, Mahé, which has an area of approximately 55 square miles (142 sq. km.); most of the remainder is distributed between the two northern islands of Praslin and La Digue. Most Seychellois are of mixed French-African descent and adhere to Roman Catholicism. There are small minority groups of Indians and Chinese. Nearly 98 percent of adult women are classified as “economically active,” largely in subsistence agriculture; women are, however, more likely than men to be literate.

Tourism is a significant source of national income and employs about 30 percent of the labor force. Small-scale industries provide about one-quarter of GDP, while the fishing sector produces about 30 percent of export earnings. The export of copra has declined sharply in recent years, and other cash crops are limited in scope. The economy is also underpinned by a growing offshore banking sector. (Hopes that oil would deliver economic salvation receded in October 1995 when a British company abandoned exploratory drilling south of the islands, though renewed optimism was evidenced when a U.S. firm was awarded a similar bid in 2005.) After recording moderate increases during the previous several years, GDP contracted by 3 percent in 1999, with consumer prices rising by 6.2 percent. The slump was attributed by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and other observers to a recent fall in tourism revenues, the government’s continued heavy involvement in the economy, and a dramatic shortage of foreign currency reserves. Modest improvement was achieved in 2000, with GDP growing by 1.2 percent, but the economy subsequently dropped again, with real GDP declining significantly in 2002–2005. (In early 2005 the Paris Club canceled Seychelles’ debt following the December 2004 Indian Ocean tsunami.) Though real GDP growth was projected to improve somewhat in 2006, it was still expected to remain in negative numbers (–1.4 percent, compared to –2.3 percent in 2005.) The government has recently solicited foreign investment for the tourism sector and

Political Status: Independent member of the Commonwealth since June 29, 1976; present constitution approved by referendum of June 18, 1993.

Area: 171 sq. mi. (429 sq. km.).

Resident Population: 75,876 (1997C); 83,500 (2005E); some 30,000 Seychellois live abroad, mainly in Australia and the United Kingdom.

Major Urban Center (2005E): VICTORIA (25,100).

National Languages: Creole, English, French. (Creole had replaced English and French as the official language in 1981, but all three languages were codified as “national languages” in the 1993 constitution.)

Monetary Unit: Seychelles Rupee (official rate July 1, 2006: 5.52 rupees = $1US).

President: James Alix MICHEL (Seychelles People’s Progressive Front); installed as president on April 14, 2004, following the retirement of France Albert RENÉ (Seychelles People’s Progressive Front); elected to a five-year term in presidential balloting of July 28–30, 2006, and inaugurated on August 1.

Vice President: Joseph BELMONT (Seychelles People’s Progressive Front); nominated by the president on April 15, 2004, and confirmed by the National Assembly on April 16; elected with running mate President Michel in balloting of July 28–30, 2006, and inaugurated on August 1.

promoted Seychelles as a provider of offshore financial services. However, the IMF noted there is little such activity in the latter area because of the lack of financial supervision in Seychelles. The IMF cited an “urgent” need for banking reforms and legislation that would criminalize the financing of terrorism.

Government and Politics

Political Background

Following a half-century of French rule, Seychelles became a British possession under the Treaty of Paris in 1814. Originally administered from Mauritius, it became a Crown Colony in 1903. A partially elected governing council was established in 1967, and limited self-government under a chief minister was introduced in 1970. Following a constitutional conference in London in March 1975, the legislative assembly established in 1970 was increased from 15 to 25 members, the 10 new members being nominated by the two parties in the government coalition. Concurrent with the achievement of independence on June 29, 1976, the former chief minister, James R. MANCHAM, was designated president, and the former leader of the opposition, France Albert RENÉ, became prime minister.

On June 5, 1977, while the president was attending a Commonwealth conference in London, the government was overthrown in a near-bloodless coup that installed René as the new head of state. In balloting on June 23–26, 1979, conducted under a single-party socialist constitution adopted on March 26, René was confirmed in office for a five-year term.

After assuming power, President René encountered a series of external and internal challenges to his authority. In November 1979 he announced the discovery of an antigovernment plot “sponsored from abroad” that allegedly involved ousted president Mancham and a force of mercenaries based in Durban, South Africa. Among the 85–100 people arrested in the wake of the allegations were the head of the country’s immigration service, a former minister of finance, and a French citizen who had been advising the Seychelles police force. A potentially more serious threat was averted in November 1981 with the detection at Mahé’s Pointe Larue airport of a group of mercenaries led by the celebrated Col. Michael (“Mad Mike”) Hoare, an Irishman who had been involved in a number of African destabilization efforts during the previous two decades. In the course of a pitched battle with units of the Seychelles People’s Defence Force (SPDF), some 45 of the invaders commandeered an Air India Boeing 707 and ordered the pilot to fly them to Durban, where they eventually surrendered to South African police. Released on bail in early December, the mercenaries were rearrested on January 5, 1982, in the wake of mounting international criticism. Most were given modest jail sentences under the South African Civil Aviation Offenses Act, Colonel Hoare ultimately being released in May 1985.

In August 1982 some 150 lower-ranked members of the SPDF seized key installations on Mahé in an abortive protest against alleged ill-treatment by senior military officials, while in September 1986 a number of army officers loyal to the minister of defense, Col. Ogilvy BERLOUIS, were charged with plotting to assassinate the president. In London, the exile Seychelles National Movement (Mouvement National Seychellois—MNS) claimed knowledge of the 1986 plot, saying that the principals had been divided as to its implementation; subsequently, Colonel Berlouis resigned his post and left the country for Britain.

Despite exile opposition calls for a boycott, President René was reelected by a reported 92.6 percent of the vote on June 17, 1984, after having announced that those failing to participate would lose their right to public assistance. The National Assembly was subsequently replenished at single-party balloting on December 5, 1987, while the president was accorded a third term on June 9–11, 1989. In early 1990 President René declared that recent developments in Eastern Europe were of no concern to his administration, and at midyear he insisted that the Seychelles would “continue on the same path” with no acceptance of political change. However, in November he adopted a somewhat different posture by commenting favorably on the possibility of a reform referendum, albeit with reference only to the conduct of intraparty affairs. In March 1991 he was further reported to favor limited administrative decentralization through the reestablishment of district councils, whose members would, however, have to be supporters of the ruling Seychelles People’s Progressive Front (SPPF).

On September 12, 1991, the assembly approved a Local Government Bill that provided for the multiple candidature, one-party election of local councils, whose heads were to meet with the Central Committee of the SPPF to rule on the desirability of a referendum on constitutional revision. However, in a remarkable turnabout on December 3, an extraordinary SPPF congress (meeting with the council heads elected two days earlier and identified as constituting a new assembly) voted unanimously to endorse an unexpected proposal by René to introduce a pluralist system. Under the plan (formally approved by the assembly on December 27), opposition parties would be permitted to register by January 1992 and a Constituent Committee would be elected by proportional representation in July to draft a new constitution. Earlier, the president had called on all political exiles, including his predecessor, to return to the Seychelles, provided that they retract their “accusations” against his regime.

At the Constituent Committee balloting on July 26, 1992, the SPPF won 14 seats on the basis of a 58.4 percent vote share, while the Democratic Party (DP) of former president Mancham was awarded 8 seats on the basis of a 33.7 percent share; no other groups secured representation. On September 18 the DP delegation withdrew from the constitutional talks, charging the SPPF with “bulldozer tactics” in attempting to meet a presidential deadline for a referendum on the document in November and a general election in December. Six days later Mancham announced a DP boycott of the proceedings, with the SPPF delegation (which constituted a quorum) indicating that it would continue alone. On October 6 opposition objectives became more specific: (1) separation of the overlapping roles of district councilors and local party officials; (2) termination of links between the SPPF and the armed forces; (3) a halt to state funding for the SPPF; (4) unhindered access to the media, including autonomy for the Seychelles Broadcasting Company; and (5) deletion of an electoral provision that would allocate nondirectly elective legislative seats in accordance with the distribution of the presidential vote.

In the face of opposition criticism, the draft constitution secured the approval of only 53.7 percent of the votes cast (60 percent being needed for acceptance) at the referendum of November 15, 1992. The DP thereupon returned to the Constituent Committee and participated in the approval on May 7, 1993, of a revised draft that received popular endorsement by 73.6 percent of participating voters on June 18. At a general election under the new basic law on July 23, President René retained his office on the basis of a 60 percent vote share, while the SPPF was victorious in all but one of the directly elective constituencies.

New presidential and assembly elections were held on March 20–22, 1998, with President René and the SPPF again winning by convincing margins. René was reelected with 67 percent of the vote, 7 points higher than he had scored in the 1993 election; in addition, James MICHEL, whom René had appointed as vice president the previous year, was elected as René's running mate. (Michel had taken on a number of René's former duties as a consequence of the president's ill health and was widely considered to be the likely presidential successor.) René's nearest competitor was Rev. Wavel RAMKALAWAN, leader of the United Opposition (UO), who secured 20 percent of the vote, while former president Mancham of the DP finished with 14 percent. The DP also fared poorly in the assembly balloting, winning only one seat (down from the five they had held previously). Meanwhile, the SPPF, with 30 legislative seats, improved its total by 3 from 1993; the UO became the main opposition party, such as it was, with 3 assembly seats.

Following the approval by the National Assembly in 2000 of a constitutional amendment allowing the president to call presidential elections separately from legislative elections, René called for an early presidential poll on August 31–September 2, 2001. Once again facing Ramkalawan (representing the Seychelles National Party [SNP] as the UO had been renamed), René was reelected with 54.19 percent of the vote. Ramkalawan, however, significantly improved his vote share to 44.95 percent, partly because of Mancham's decision not to run. The cabinet announced by René on September 5 included reshuffled assignments but no new members.

In October 2002 the assembly voted to dissolve itself and hold new legislative balloting on December 4–6. Although the SPPF retained its plurality (23 of 34 seats on a 54 percent vote share), the SNP improved from 3 to 11 seats (on a 40 percent vote share).

President René, citing the fact that he was "getting older," resigned the presidency on March 31, 2004, and Michel was inaugurated as his successor on April 14. Joseph BELMONT, a cabinet member since 1982, was confirmed as vice president by the assembly on April 16. An opposition (SNP) motion to dissolve the assembly to allow for parliamentary elections at the same time as presidential balloting in 2006—a year ahead of schedule—was rejected by the full body in May 2006. Presidential elections subsequently were held July 28–30, 2006, in which the incumbent Michel and running mate Vice President Belmont garnered 53.73 percent of the votes. Michel, elected for a five-year term, defeated the SNP's Ramkalawan and running mate Annette GEORGES (45.71 percent of the vote), and independent Philippe BOULLÉ (0.56 percent). A reshuffled cabinet was sworn in on August 9, 2006.

Constitution and Government

The 1993 constitution provides for a multiparty presidential system, under which the chief executive is elected for a thrice-renewable five-year term. Legislative authority is vested in a unicameral National Assembly. Constitutional amendments introduced in July 1996, following their adoption by an SPPF congress in late May, created the post of vice president and also increased the number of directly elective seats in the assembly from 22 to 25, while reducing the proportional seats to a maximum of 10 subject to a threshold of 10 percent of the vote.

The judiciary encompasses a Court of Appeal, a Supreme Court (part of which sits as a Constitutional Court), an Industrial Court, and magistrates' courts. Local government, seemingly necessary for geographic reasons, was abolished in 1971 following problems growing out of a district council system that had been introduced in 1948. However, the councils were revived in 1991.

Foreign Relations

The main objectives of Seychelles' foreign policy following independence were the "return" of a number of small islands and island groups administered since 1965 as part of the British Indian Ocean Territory and designation of the Indian Ocean as a “zone of peace.” In March 1976, prior to debate on the Seychelles independence bill in the House of Commons, the British government indicated that arrangements had been made for the return to Seychelles of the islands of Aldabra, Desroches, and Farquhar; however, the Chagos Archipelago would remain as the sole component of the British Indian Ocean Territory. Included in the archipelago is Diego Garcia, where the United States, under an agreement concluded with Britain in 1972, maintained military and communications facilities. There was also a U.S. space-tracking station on the island of Mahé, where, despite the Diego Garcia issue, relations between American personnel and the Seychellois were relatively cordial. In July 1989, while visiting Washington, President René agreed to a five-year extension of the station’s lease, which in 1984 provided 5 percent of the state’s revenue. In 1995 Washington announced it was closing the station in a cost-cutting move and transferring its activity to a new facility on Diego Garcia.

Relations between Seychelles and South Africa were by no means enhanced as a result of the 1981 coup attempt on Mahé. The South African proceedings against Colonel Hoare and his associates were confined entirely to air piracy charges on the ground that judicial notice could not be taken of activities beyond Pretoria’s jurisdiction. The defendants nonetheless argued that the coup had been undertaken with arms supplied by the South African Defence Force and with the full knowledge of the National Intelligence Service (NIS). The trial judge agreed that it would be “naive” to assume that the NIS was unaware of the plot, since one of the mercenaries was a former NIS agent. This finding was not disputed by Prime Minister P. W. Botha, who nevertheless argued that “neither the South African Government, the Cabinet nor the State Security Council” had been informed and that “no authorization was therefore given for any action.” Significantly, 34 of the mercenaries convicted on the air piracy charges were given time off for good behavior and released on November 27, 1982, after spending only four months in prison. By early 1992 relations between the two countries had noticeably warmed, permitting the establishment of consular and trade (though not ambassadorial) relations.

In mid-1988 Seychelles established formal diplomatic relations with the neighboring island states of Mauritius and the Comoros. The three, along with Madagascar and France (representing Réunion), are members of the Indian Ocean Commission (IOC) set up in 1982 to promote regional cooperation and economic development.

Relations with the United States were also damaged in 1996 by the withdrawal of the U.S. satellite-tracking operations on Mahé (which yielded $4.5 million a year to the Seychelles treasury) and by the closure of the U.S. embassy in Victoria (responsibility for Seychelles transferring to the U.S. ambassador to Mauritius). In addition, a U.S. State Department report in March criticized Seychelles’ human rights record, referring to the ruling party’s “pervasive system of political patronage and control over government jobs, contracts, and resources.” (Similar criticisms were included also in the department’s 2001 report.) In the wake of increasing global terrorist attacks, the United States in 2005 pledged continued support to the Seychelles military (see Current issues, below).

Current Issues

There was little effective challenge to President René and the SPPF at the 1998 general elections. UO President Ramkalawan subsequently emerged as the primary government critic, his uncompromising stance reportedly garnering a degree of additional public support in view of growing economic difficulties, which included a large trade imbalance, debt payment arrears, and slumping tourism. The IMF urged a reduction in spending on state-run enterprises and other structural reforms, and the administration imposed modest austerity measures in late 1998. However, the private sector subsequently continued to press for trade liberalization measures, particularly the elimination of the government’s monopoly on the sale of certain products. The administration remained opposed to the reforms as of mid-2000, earning further reproach from the IMF, World Bank, and the African Development Bank. The government also continued to promote the offshore banking sector, despite the fact that Seychelles had already been placed on the list of questionable “tax havens” by the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD).

René’s call for early presidential elections in 2001 was viewed by some observers as an attempt to show the world, particularly foreign investors, that his government had not lost popular support. It was also noted that a convincing victory might have permitted René to implement the austerity measures being demanded by the international financial community. However, the president’s 54 percent vote share in the balloting was widely perceived as surprisingly narrow and unlikely to empower the government to launch any bold economic initiatives. In addition, runner-up Wavel Ramkalawan accused the government of voter intimidation and other electoral abuses, and he and his SNP boycotted René’s inaugural. (International observers were divided on whether the elections were completely free and fair, although it was generally conceded that the alleged violations, even if true, would not have been sufficient to have altered the final outcome of the race.)

René in March 2002 rejected the reforms outlined by the IMF on the grounds that they would “cripple the economy.” However, following the SPPF’s decline in the early assembly elections in December, dialogue was reopened with the IMF and several requested reforms were enacted. Subsequently, the European Parliament in 2003 questioned the status of human rights in Seychelles following a crackdown on SNP supporters. In addition, in early 2004 opposition leaders argued that the René administration was attempting to limit their voice in the assembly and decrease the authority of the assembly overall. Consequently, René’s decision to relinquish the rest of his presidential term to his longtime ally James Michel in April 2004 was not a complete surprise. René, 68, said he was retiring because he wanted to turn power over to a “younger person” who would nevertheless continue the policies pursued by René since the 1977 coup. (René’s 27-year tenure was one of the longest ever for an African head of state.)

The Indian Ocean tsunami of December 2004 produced few casualties in Seychelles but caused some $30 million in damage. Significantly, considering earlier tension (see Foreign relations, above) the United States promised reconstruction aid. Among other things, U.S. officials said that the United States and Seychelles had developed a good “military-to-military relationship.” Washington reportedly viewed Seychelles as important geographically as a transit area for visiting U.S. ships. There were also concerns that Seychelles could be used as a transfer point by terrorists seeking access to Africa.

The SNP initially demanded early presidential elections upon René’s resignation, claiming the SPPF was simply attempting to provide Michel with a “training ground” for the 2006 election. (Michel’s elevation to the presidency was constitutionally authorized.) However, SNP leader Ramkalawan subsequently accepted Michel’s presidency, Michel reportedly having made reconciliation overtures to long-standing René opponents. For his part, Michel pledged to concentrate on improving the economy, with emphasis on dialogue with the private sector (a potentially significant policy shift). Meanwhile, René continued to serve as the leader of the SPPF and retained significant political influence in general. In mid-2006, Ramkalawan was unsuccessful in his bid to dissolve the assembly so that concurrent elections could be held with presidential balloting (see Political background, above). While all 11 legislators of the SNP voted in favor of the motion, all 22 members of the SPPF voted against, the majority party contending that the minority party lacked the authority to call for dissolution of the assembly.

Political Parties

Prior to the 1977 coup, government was shared by the centrist Seychelles Democratic Party (SDP), led by President James R. Mancham, and the left-of-center Seychelles People’s United Party (SPUP), headed by Prime Minister France René. Following the coup, René stated that the SDP “has not been banned, it has simply disappeared.” The government-supportive Seychelles People's Progressive Front (SPPF) was the sole legal party from June 1978 until January 1991, following which other parties, including Mancham's Democratic Party were recognized. Provision was also made for the financial support of parties from public funds.

Government Party

Seychelles People's Progressive Front—SPPF (Front Populaire Progressiste des Seychelles—FPPS). The SPPF was organized in early 1978 as successor to the SPUP. Like its predecessor, it advocated a broad spectrum of "progressive" policies while attempting to cultivate relations with Catholic clergy sympathetic to its approach to social issues. Upon the retirement of Secretary General Guy SINON in May 1984, President René was named to succeed him as head of an expanded secretariat of 13 members, René's former position as party president being abolished.

In an address before the SPPF annual congress in 1985, René called for improvements in agriculture, employment, and housing, while emphasizing that "the rights of the majority come before the rights of the individual." Delegates to the party's fifth congress in 1991 approved a Central Committee declaration that "the SPPF believes in the one-party system and in the socialist option" but left open the possibility of a future referendum on multipartyism. It also endorsed revival of an earlier system of party-controlled elective district councils, prior to approving a return to political pluralism at an extraordinary congress in December (see Political background, above). Most of the previous members were retained in the Central Committee elected at the May 1998 SPPF congress. René was reelected as party chair during the annual SPPF conference on April 3, 2005, even though many observers had expected him to vacate the post following his resignation as president of the Republic in 2004.

Leaders: James Alix MICHEL (President of the Republic and Secretary General of the Party), Joseph BELMONT (Vice President of the Republic), France Albert RENÉ (Former President of the Republic and Chair of the Party), Daniel FAURE, Francis MACGREGOR (Speaker of the National Assembly).

Opposition Party

Seychelles National Party (SNP). The SNP is the successor to the United Opposition (UO), which changed its name at a July 1998 congress. The UO had been formed by the three parties immediately below to oppose the 1993 constitution in both its original and final forms. Its candidate, Philippe Boule, ran a distant third in the presidential balloting of July 23, while its legislative success was limited to a single proportionally allocated seat. Boule announced his retirement from politics in September 1995 (see National Alliance Party, below) during the party's first convention, at which its member of parliament, Rev. Wavel Ramkalawan, defeated Gabriel Hoareau of the MNS for the party presidency. Ramkalawan finished second in the 1998 presidential election with 20 percent of the vote. The UO won three seats in parliament to become the leading opposition group, and Ramkalawan (who was reelected as party leader during the July 1998 congress at which the SNP rubric was adopted) subsequently attracted substantial press coverage for his "fierce" criticism of the René administration. While relations between Ramkalawan and René appeared to improve during the 2002 elections, government forces launched a crackdown on an SNP demonstration in July 2003. The SNP subsequently won 11 seats in the December 2002 legislative elections. During the party's annual convention in August 2005, Ramkalawan appealed to Nichol Gabriel, former interim leader of the Democratic Party (DP), to form an alliance with the SNP prior to the upcoming elections (see DP, below).

Leaders: Rev. Wavel RAMKALAWAN (President of the Party and 1998, 2001, and 2006 presidential candidate), Annette GEORGES (Treasurer and Ramkalawan's 2006 running mate), Roger MANCIENNE (Secretary).

Seychelles Party (Parti Seselwa—PS). Led by Jean-François Ferrari, son of Maxime Ferrari (former foreign minister and leader of the RPSD, see below), and formerly referenced most frequently by its French rubric, Parti Seychellois, the free enterprise-oriented PS was, prior to its legalization, the domestic clandestine affiliate of the RPSD/UDM (see below). The younger Ferrari remained party leader upon the return of his father, who occupied himself primarily with the launching of a new Institut Seychellois pour la Démocratie. Jean-François Ferrari, publisher of the opposition weekly Regar, was among those arrested in the July 2003 crackdown.

Leaders: Rev. Wavel RAMKALAWAN, Jean-François FERRARI (Secretary).

Seychelles National Movement (Mouvement National Seychellois—MNS). The MNS was originally formed in Brussels in 1984 as an affiliate of the MPR (below).

Leaders: Gabriel (Gaby) HOAREAU (President), Robert FRICHOT (Vice President), Terry SANDAPIN (Secretary).

National Alliance Party (NAP). The NAP was organized in early 1992 by Philippe Boullé and Kathleen Pillay, a former UDM (see below) leader. (Boullé later ran as the UO's presidential candidate in balloting in 1993 and announced his retirement in 1995 from active politics. However, he ran as an independent candidate in presidential balloting in 2001, securing only 0.86 percent of the vote, and again in 2006, winning a mere 0.56 percent.)

Leader: Kathleen PILLAY (Secretary).

Other Parties and Groups

Democratic Party (DP). The DP was legalized in March 1992 as a revival of the former SDP. Its leader, Sir James Mancham, returned from exile on April 12, 1992. Subsequently, the DP and the SPPF were viewed as the country's two principal political "currents."

Mancham was reelected party leader at an extraordinary party congress on March 18, 1995, from which his intraparty opponents were excluded. (DP dissident Christopher GILL, one of those expelled from the congress for complaining about Mancham's "tightfisted" control, subsequently announced the formation of a New Democratic Party. Gill, the only DP member to gain a directly elected legislative seat in 1993, was reported in late 1997 to have crossed over to the SPPF, despite his previous extremely negative analysis of the René government.) The DP was beaten badly in the 1998 elections, securing only one parliamentary seat, while Mancham won only 14 percent of the vote in the presidential balloting. Mancham declined to run in the 2001 presidential election. The DP polled only 3.1 percent in the 2002 elections, thereby losing its seat in the assembly. Mancham retired as party leader in January 2005, although he subsequently was reportedly involved in planning a conference of opposition leaders designed to promote "reconciliation."

In 2006 party leaders formed an alliance with the SNP to counter the SPPF in upcoming elections. The DP supported the SNP's Ramkalawan in the presidential election (DP members being assured of several ministerial posts if Ramkalawan were elected). In a related move in March 2006, the DP replaced interim leader Nichol Gabriel—who observers said was reluctant to consider the alliance—with Paul Chow, reportedly of the party's "old guard" who gave his full backing to the SNP alliance. Gabriel assumed the post of party secretary.

Leaders: Paul CHOW (Leader), Bernard ELIZABETH, Sir James R. MANCHAM (Former President of the Republic), Paul CHOW (Former Secretary), Nichol GABRIEL (Secretary).

The only other party to present candidates in the 2002 assembly balloting was the Social Democratic Alliance, which fielded one candidate. However, several independent candidates contested the elections.

A British-based organization known simply as the Resistance Movement (Mouvement pour la Résistance—MPR) appeared to have been implicated in the November 1981 coup attempt, while a South African-based Seychelles Popular

Cabinet

As of August 9, 2006

President	James Alix Michel
Vice President	Joseph Belmont

Ministers

Arts, Culture, and Sports	Sylvette Pool [f]
Community Development and Youth	Vincent Meriton
Education	Bernard Shamlaye
Environment and Natural Resources	Ronald Jumeau
Finance	Daniel Faure
Foreign Affairs and International Cooperation	Patrick Pillay
Health	MacSuzy Mondon [f]
Investment, Industry, and Technology	Jacquelin Dugasse
Land Use and Habitat	Joel Morgan
Social Affairs and Employment	Marie-Pierre Lloyd [f]

[f] = female

Anti-Marxist Front (SPAMF) announced late in the year that it had known of the mercenary effort but had declined to participate on the ground that it was unworkable. A third group, the Seychelles Liberation Committee (Comité de la Libération Seychelles—CLS) was launched in Paris in 1979.

In November 1985 MPR leader Gérard HOAREAU was assassinated outside his London residence by an unknown assailant. Former president Mancham charged the René government with the killing, which was vehemently denied by a spokesman for the Seychelles embassy. A month earlier David JOUBERT, a former Mancham cabinet official, had announced the revival of the SDP as a London-based exile formation, although Mancham, who had become a British citizen, dissociated himself from the action.

During a speech before a House of Commons committee in February 1990 Mancham invited all of the exile groups to join him in a Crusade for Democracy in Seychelles (CDS) and subsequently called for the formation of an opposition United Democratic Front (UDF). A less conservative London exile, former foreign minister

Dr. Maxime FERRARI, displayed ambivalence toward the Mancham overture and in December 1990 launched a Rally of the Seychelles People for Democracy (Rassemblement du Peuple Seychellois pour la Démocratie—RPSD) that, somewhat unrealistically, appeared to seek common ground between Mancham and René.

A meeting of Seychelles opposition groups in Brussels, Belgium, on March 15–17, 1991, included representatives of the MNS, the SDP, and the RPSD, as well as of the Alliance for the Restoration of Democracy and Pluralism (Alliance pour la Restauration de la Démocratie et du Pluralisme—ARDP), led by Christophe SAVY, and the Seychelles Organization for Liberty (Organisation Seychelloise pour la Liberté—OSL), led by Desiré André UZICE. Those in attendance (Mancham being conspicuous by his absence) denounced “the obstinacy” of President René “in maintaining his single, totalitarian, party in power.” Another non-Mancham conference organized by RPSD leader Ferrari in Munich, Germany, on July 21–24 concluded with the formation of an exile United Democratic Movement (UDM).

Legislature

The unicameral National Assembly (Assemblée Nationale) has 25 directly contested seats from 25 single-member constituencies, plus up to 10 seats allocated on a proportional basis to parties winning at least 10 percent of the vote. (A party gets one proportional seat for each 10 percent of the vote it receives in the balloting for the directly contested seats.) The term of office is five years. The results of the most recent elections on December 4–6, 2002, were as follows: Seychelles People's Progressive Front, 23 (18 directly contested, 5 proportional); and the Seychelles National Party, 12 (7 directly contested and 5 proportional).

Speaker: Francis MACGREGOR.

Communications

Press

The following are published in Victoria in Creole, English, and French: The Seychelles Nation (3,500), daily government organ; Seychelles Today, monthly published by the Ministry of Finance; L'Echo des Îles (2,900), pro-SPPF Catholic weekly; The People (1,000), SPPF monthly; Seychelles Review, DP monthly; and Nouvo Vizyon, the SNP's Creole-language newsletter. Regar, a non-government weekly, was forced to suspend publication temporarily in December 1994 after losing a libel case to the head of presidential security. Another nongovernmental organ, the Independent, was advised by the state-owned printing facility in mid-1995 that its stories would thenceforth be vetted before publication because of complaints by opposition leader Mancham of "irresponsible and provocative" reporting of the DP's internal problems.

The U.S. State Department's 2001 report on human rights in Seychelles expressed concern over the potential effects on press freedom of a new Broadcasting and Telecommunications bill, which had been approved in early 2000. In early 2002 the Paris-based journalists' rights association, Reporters Without Frontiers, protested what it described as the government's "harassment" of Regar through heavy financial penalties resulting from libel lawsuits filed by some top government officials. Government opponents also criticized the high registration fees that are required to launch private radio and television stations.

News Agency

The official facility is the Seychelles Agence de Presse (SAP).

Broadcasting and Computing

In early 1992 President René announced that the government-controlled Radio-Television Seychelles (RTS) would be granted autonomous status equivalent to that of the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC), and in early May its name was changed to the Seychelles Broadcasting Corporation (SBC). The system broadcasts locally from Victoria in English, French, and Creole. A missionary facility, the Far East Broadcasting Association (FEBA), services several domestic radio stations and transmits in a wide variety of languages to other Indian Ocean islands, South Asia, the Middle East, and Eastern and Southern Africa; in September 1995, however, FEBA announced that it was cutting back some of its operations because of "high operating costs." There were approximately 22,400 television receivers and 14,000 personal computers serving an equal number of Internet users in 2003.

Intergovernmental Representation

Ambassador to the U.S. and Permanent Representative to the UN

Emile Patrick Jérémie BONNELAME

U.S. Ambassador to the Seychelles

(Vacant)

IGO Memberships (Non-UN)

AfDB, AU, BADEA, Comesa, CWTH, Interpol, IOC, NAM, OIF, WCO, WTO

SIERRA LEONE

REPUBLIC OF SIERRA LEONE

---

The Country

Facing the South Atlantic and nearly surrounded by the Republic of Guinea on the northwest, north, and east, Sierra Leone ("lion mountain") encompasses three geographic regions: a peninsula in the west; a western coastal region, which consists of mangrove swamps and a coastal plain; and a plateau in the east and northeast. The indigenous inhabitants range over 12 principal tribal groups, the most important being the Mende in the south and the Temne in the north. There are also numerous Creole descendants of freed slaves. A variety of tribal languages are spoken, with Krio, a form of pidgin English, serving as a lingua franca. Traditional religions predominate, but there are many Muslims in the north and Christians in the west.

The agricultural sector of the economy employs about two-thirds of the work force. Rice is the main subsistence crop, while cocoa, coffee, and palm kernels are the leading agricultural exports. Gold, bauxite, and rutile are among the minerals extracted, with a rapidly dwindling diamond reserve providing approximately 20 percent of export earnings in 1992 (down from 60 percent in 1980). The International Monetary Fund (IMF), the World Bank group, and the European Community/ Union (EC/EU) have been among the international agencies extending recent aid in support of efforts to revive an economy that has deteriorated markedly since the mid-1970s. Until quite recently, the assistance proved largely ineffectual, inflation rising to nearly 110 percent in 1990, with the balance of payments severely weakened by declining rice production and commodity smuggling. Upon assuming power in April 1992 the STRASSER regime stressed its intent to honor Sierra Leone's international obligations. Subsequently, the regime's first budget, released in July, was highlighted by a three-year public investment plan formulated with World Bank assistance, and inflation for the year declined sharply to 36 percent. In March 1994 the IMF rewarded Freetown's restructuring efforts by reopening credit lines that had been frozen since 1988. Economic activity reportedly ground to a virtual standstill during the military's control of power from May 1997 to February 1998. A blockade of the Freetown harbor was lifted in late February 1998, thus allowing commercial activity to resume.

In late 1998 observers reported that mining and agriculture sectors in the north and east had been decimated by fighting. Furthermore, the subsequent return to full-scale civil war effectively

Political Status: Independent member of the Commonwealth since April 27, 1961; republic proclaimed April 19, 1971; one-party constitution adopted June 1978; multiparty constitution approved by popular referendum on August 23–30, 1991, with effect from September 24; government overthrown in military coup of April 29, 1992; ruling military council overthrown and replaced by “reconstituted” military council on January 16, 1996; democratically elected president inaugurated on March 29, 1996; government overthrown in military coup of May 25, 1997; ruling military council forcibly removed by regional forces on February 13, 1998; previously elected government reinstated on March 10, 1998; July 1999 Lomé peace accord and UN peacekeepers unable to halt ongoing violence; cease-fire agreed between government and insurgents on May 16, 2001; previously elected president and majority party won elections of May 14, 2002.

Area: 27,699 sq. mi. (71,740 sq. km.).

Population: 3,700,000 (1985C), including a 5.2 percent adjustment for underenumeration; 5,412,000 (2005E).

Major Urban Center (2005E): FREETOWN (824,000, including suburbs).

Official Language: English.

Monetary Unit: Leone (market rate July 1, 2006: 2,976 leones = $1US).

President: Ahmad Tejan KABBAH (Sierra Leone People’s Party); elected on March 16, 1996, to succeed Brig. Gen. Julius Maada BIO (Chair, Supreme Council of State); sworn in on March 29; ousted in military coup led by Major Johnny Paul KOROMA (Armed Forces Revolutionary Council) on May 25, 1997; returned to office on March 10, 1998, following Koroma’s removal by the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group on February 12; reelected on May 14, 2002, and sworn in for another four-year term on May 19.

Vice President: Solomon BEREWA (Sierra Leone People’s Party); elected on May 14, 2002, and sworn in on May 19 for a term concurrent with the president’s in succession to Albert Joe DEMBY (Sierra Leone People’s Party).

dashed hopes for economic growth in 1998 and 1999. In December 1999 the IMF approved emergency assistance for the country to ease the government’s efforts to reconstruct the economy, and a cease-fire in 2001 fostered the resumption of normal activity.

Diamond mining, the country’s third largest employer, has been a prime beneficiary of the cessation of hostilities. The smuggling of “blood diamonds,” a key feature of the civil war, was curbed by a United Nations diamond embargo on Sierra Leone in 2000 and a subsequent diamond-certification scheme known as the Kimberley process. Since then, the government has regained partial control over the diamond trade, enabling it to raise $126 million in tax revenues on the industry in 2004 alone.

Economic growth improved in 2005–2006, with a further decline in inflation (to 9.5 percent) and increased foreign investment in oil and mining. The IMF approved a new three-year poverty reduction program for Sierra Leone, citing the government’s “considerable progress” toward economic stability and addressing widespread poverty. (The IMF noted that 80 percent of the population lives on less than $1US per day.) The fund urged the government to enforce tax regulations, accelerate privatization efforts, and diversify and expand exports to bolster revenue. Real GDP growth in 2006 was expected to be about 6 percent. According to a 2006 UN report, corruption and mismanagement of public revenue continued to be of great concern.

Government and Politics

Political Background

Growing out of a coastal settlement established by English interests in the 18th century as a haven for freed slaves, Sierra Leone became independent within the Commonwealth in 1961. Political leadership from 1961 to 1967 was exercised exclusively through the Sierra Leone People's Party (SLPP), a predominantly Mende grouping led successively by Sir Milton MARGAI and his half-brother, Sir Albert M. MARGAI. Attempts to establish a one-party system under the SLPP were successfully resisted by the opposition All People's Congress (APC), a predominantly Temne formation headed by Dr. Siaka P. STEVENS, a militant trade-union leader belonging to the smaller Limba tribe.

Following an unexpectedly strong showing by the APC in the election of 1967, Stevens was appointed prime minister, but he was prevented from taking office by Brig. David LANSANA's declaration of martial law on March 21. Two days later, Lt. Col. Andrew JUXON-SMITH assumed the leadership of a National Reformation Council (NRC) that suspended the constitution, dissolved the parties, and ruled for the ensuing 13 months. The NRC was itself overthrown in April 1968 by a group of noncommissioned officers, the Anti-Corruption Revolutionary Movement, which restored civilian government with Stevens as prime minister.

The ensuing decade was marked by a series of coup attempts and government harassment of political opponents. In 1973 official intimidation contributed to an SLPP boycott of the general election, with the APC winning all but one of the seats in the House of Representatives. In 1975 six civilians and two soldiers were executed in Freetown after being convicted of an attempt to assassinate (then) Finance Minister Christian KAMARA-TAYLOR and take over the government. Under a new constitution adopted by referendum in early June 1978, Sierra Leone became a one-party state; President Stevens was reelected for a seven-year term on June 14.

In early 1985 the president announced his intention to retire, naming army commander Maj. Gen. Joseph Saidu MOMOH as his successor. The new president was confirmed in single-party balloting on October 1; Stevens transferred power to him on November 28, although formal swearing-in ceremonies were not held until January 26, 1986. The House of Representatives was renewed in a multicandidate, one-party poll held on May 29–30, a year prior to expiry of its normal term.

Momoh's accession was greeted with enthusiasm that subsided when a campaign to "instill military discipline" in fighting corruption and managing the economy failed to yield tangible results. By mid-1990 the Momoh regime's inability to check inflation, generate the funds for civil service salary payments, or maintain basic services had provoked widespread civil unrest and calls for the adoption of a new, multiparty constitution. Consequently, at an extraordinary APC meeting in August, President Momoh named economist Peter TUCKER to head a National Constitution Review Commission to explore government reorganization along "democratic lines." (At the same time, Momoh described multiparty activity as incompatible with Sierra Leone's tribal structures and widespread illiteracy.)

In late March 1991, less than a week after having reiterated his opposition to the idea, Momoh announced that he welcomed the introduction of a multiparty system. Two months later, the Tucker Commission submitted its report, and in early June the life of the existing House of Representatives was extended to enable it to approve a pluralistic basic law. On July 2, following intense debate both within and outside the government, the House of Representatives ratified the new constitution, and on August 23–30 the document was approved by popular referendum; over 60 percent of the 2.5 million participants reportedly favored its enactment. On September 23 President Momoh named a transitional government to rule until multiparty elections that were tentatively scheduled for late 1992. One day later the constitution was promulgated, and on September 30 the ban on political parties was officially lifted.

On April 29, 1992, army units, angered at a lack of pay and the failure of the government to provide them equipment to end a 13-week rebellion in eastern Sierra Leone, ousted President Momoh, who flew to exile in Guinea. On May 1 Capt. Valentine Strasser and (then) Lt. Solomon Anthony James MUSA were named chair and vice chair, respectively, of a National Provisional Ruling Council (NPRC). On May 2 the NPRC appointed a 19-member government, which included several members of the NPRC and six civilians. Two days later the NPRC dissolved the legislature and suspended political activity. On July 14 Captain Strasser announced that the NPRC would thenceforth be known as the Supreme Council of State (SCS) and would no longer be involved in day-to-day administration. Concurrently, ministers were redesignated as secretaries of state, with Musa serving in the quasi-prime ministerial post of chief secretary. In October a 15-member advisory council was established with a mandate to work out the "modalities" of a return to multipartyism, with an emphasis on involving citizens in the democratization process.

In mid-December 1992 the regime established a special military tribunal "in the interest of maintaining peace, security, and public order" and to assure that criminals were "rapidly punished." On December 28 government troops violently repulsed an alleged coup attempt by the so-called Anti-Corruption Revolutionary Movement (ACRM), a grouping of pro-Momoh civilians and military personnel (some of whom were already incarcerated). On December 30, following a summary military trial, 26 people (9 ACRM members and 17 others who had been convicted of high treason for their involvement in an earlier incident) were executed. The executions drew international condemnation; several Western donors announced suspension of aid payments.

On April 29, 1993, amid reports of widespread disillusionment with the one-year-old "revolution," Strasser announced the commencement of a three-year transition period to culminate in multiparty elections. In addition, the chair promised to launch an inquiry into the special military tribunal's activities and to ease some security measures.

In a government reshuffle on July 5, 1993, Capt. Julius Maada BIO replaced Musa as SCS vice chair and chief secretary. Musa's dismissal came amid reports that he had clashed with Strasser about the return to multipartyism and that he harbored his own presidential ambitions. In December Dr. James JONAH was appointed chair of the newly established Interim National Electoral Commission (INEC), which had been charged with preparing for presidential and legislative elections tentatively scheduled for 1995.

In 1994 the Strasser regime's credibility was impaired by the alleged complicity of government troops in widespread banditry and its inability to suppress the military activities of the Revolutionary United Front (RUF, below), a Sierra Leonean offshoot of Charles Taylor's National Patriotic Front of Liberia (NPFL, see Liberia article) led by Foday Savannah SANKOH; the Strasser regime claimed the RUF had been organized to punish Sierra Leone for its peacekeeping role in Liberia. By midyear RUF-related violence was reportedly responsible for the deaths of hundreds of individuals and the dislocation of thousands. Consequently, in July the State Advisory Council, noting that "local people must be collaborating" with the insurgents, announced the creation of a National Security Council charged with ending the hostilities. Thereafter, despite reports that most of the country was "lawless," the government released a draft constitution in October, which included provisions for a return to civilian rule by 1996.

On November 12, 1994, the junta executed 12 soldiers in an apparent attempt to intimidate the so-called "sobels" (soldiers during the day, rebels at night) whom observers described as increasingly beyond Freetown's control. On November 25, bolstered by reports that an offensive had severely weakened the rebels, the Strasser government called on the RUF to begin negotiations on a peace accord and cease-fire, pledging that they would be allowed to form a political party in preparation for multiparty elections. The RUF, which had gained international attention two weeks earlier when it had kidnapped two British citizens, initially rejected the offer but on December 4 met with government negotiators for discussions, which were described as "frank." However, the rebels' kidnapping campaign continued into 1995; they reportedly seized an additional 15 foreigners by February. (All of the hostages were eventually handed over to International Red Cross representatives on April 20.)

On March 31, 1995, Captain Strasser announced a major government restructuring, under which

Health and Social Services Secretary Lt. Col. Akim GIBRIL would become chief secretary in place of Bio, who remained SCS vice chair while assuming the position of chief of the defense staff “to provide additional mettle” to the armed forces in its campaign against the RUF. On April 27 Strasser promised to lift the ban on political parties and relinquish power to a democratically elected president in January 1996. He also offered the RUF a truce to negotiate an end to the conflict that had claimed some 5,000 lives since 1991. On May 18 he asked the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) to broker negotiations with the rebels; however, the RUF rejected the initiative, calling instead for Strasser to convene a sovereign national conference to decide the future of the country.

On June 21, 1995, the regime lifted the ban on political parties, but two days later it issued a list of 57 people, headed by former president Momoh, who were ineligible to compete in the upcoming balloting. On August 18 the government convened a National Consultative Conference; however, despite its earlier entreaties, the RUF refused to attend. Among the rulings adopted by the conference were the postponement of balloting until February 1996 and the organization of simultaneous presidential and legislative polling.

On October 3, 1995, a coup attempt led by at least eight senior military officers was quashed by troops loyal to Strasser, who was out of the country. The failed uprising highlighted the growing chasm in the SCS between those who opposed the return to a civilian government and its advocates, purportedly led by Strasser.

On January 16, 1996, Strasser was overthrown by his second-in-command, Brig. Gen. Julius Bio, who claimed that Strasser had been scheming to retain the presidency; Bio announced that he would lead a “Reconstituted” Supreme Council of the State (RSCS). At his inauguration the following day, Bio promised to continue preparations for “transparent, free, and fair” elections and urged the RUF to begin peace talks. In response, the RUF announced a one-week, unconditional cease-fire and called for postponement of the elections, saying it would not negotiate with a civilian government. Subsequently, Bio expressed interest in rescheduling the balloting; however, following a meeting with the leaders from a number of the newly recognized political groups on January 24, he reiterated his intent to adhere to the pre-coup electoral schedule.

At the first round of legislative and presidential balloting on February 26–27, 1996, the SLPP captured 36.1 percent of the vote, easily outpacing the United People’s Party (UNPP, below), which finished second with 21.6 percent, and 11 other parties. Meanwhile, SLPP presidential candidate Ahmad Tejan KABBAH and UNPP leader John KARIFA-SMART finished first and second, respectively, in their 12-candidate race. However, because neither captured a majority, a second round of balloting was held on March 15, with Kabbah winning with a 59.49 percent of the vote tally.

The Kabbah administration moved quickly to build on the peace initiative its predecessor had begun with the RUF, and on April 23, 1996, agreement was reached between Kabbah and Sankoh on a “definitive” cease-fire and the establishment of committees to draft disarmament and peace accords. On May 30 Freetown announced that it had reached agreement with the RUF on 26 of 28 articles in a proposed peace plan, leaving unresolved only the timetable for the withdrawal of foreign troops and the establishment of a national debt commission. However, the rebels continued to refuse to recognize the Kabbah government publicly and insisted that the cease-fire was only provisional. At the same time, the administration’s announced intention to reduce the military ranks from 18,000 to approximately 4,000 added the threat of yet another military coup to a domestic security landscape already populated by RUF dissidents, “sobels,” and escaped prisoners.

On September 8, 1996, at least six soldiers were arrested after senior military officials were alerted to their alleged plans to overthrow the government, and within a week 150 more soldiers were purged in response to an executive order demanding the dismissal of suspected dissidents. Meanwhile, a series of clashes between government forces and rebels in the east threatened the six-month-old cease-fire. However, when government troops reportedly gained the upper hand on the battlefield, President Kabbah and RUF leader Sankoh signed a peace treaty at Abidjan, Côte d'Ivoire on November 30. Highlighting the accord were provisions for the immediate end to hostilities, the demobilization and disarmament of the RUF, and the integration of rebel soldiers into the national army. Furthermore, the agreement entitled the RUF to transform itself into a legal political party.

Sporadic fighting was reported throughout late 1996 and early 1997; the RUF and government accused each other of violating the peace accord. In addition, clashes were reported between alleged "sobels" and ethnic Kamajor militiamen allied with the president. On March 12 the RUF's Sankoh was detained in Nigeria, and on March 15 he was dismissed from the RUF by senior party officials who accused him of blocking implementation of the peace accord. Subsequently, Sankoh's supporters threatened to attack Freetown unless he was returned from Lagos.

On May 25, 1997, junior army officers fighting alongside RUF militants overran the prison where the defendants in the September 1996 coup plot were being held. Subsequently, under the leadership of one of the freed prisoners, Maj. Johnny Paul KOROMA, the combined forces took control of Freetown and overthrew the government (with Kabbah fleeing to Guinea). On May 28 the military junta abolished the constitution and banned political parties. Meanwhile, 300,000 people reportedly fled the country amid heavy fighting between the junta's forces and Nigerian-led ECOWAS troops, who had launched a countercoup offensive. On June 1 the junta established a 20-member Armed Forces Revolutionary Council (AFRC) and named Koroma its chair. Unable to dislodge the rebel soldiers, the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group (Ecomog) announced a cease-fire on June 2. Nevertheless, regional and international observers vowed not to let the coup stand and refused to recognize the Koroma regime.

On June 17, 1997, Major Koroma was sworn in as the leader of the AFRC, and he subsequently agreed to participate in internationally mediated negotiations. However, the talks were promptly abandoned after the junta leader demanded a four-year term. Frustrated with Koroma's intransigence, ECOWAS officials tightened sanctions against the AFRC in late August, and on September 2 Ecomog forces bombed Freetown in an effort to enforce an embargo on imported goods. Furthermore, on October 8 the UN Security Council adopted a resolution empowering Ecomog forces to enforce oil and arms sanctions against the regime. On October 24, under pressure of heavy shelling, AFRC negotiators agreed to a peace plan that included provisions for a disarmament process (beginning December 1), Kabbah's reinstatement on April 22, 1998, immunity for the junta's forces, and a future government role for RUF leader Sankoh. Despite the accord, clashes continued between the AFRC and Ecomog forces, and in mid-December 1997 Koroma asserted that the timetable for implementing the pact would be delayed.

Following a week of particularly intense fighting, Ecomog forces captured Freetown on February 13, 1998. On February 17 ECOWAS announced the formation of an interim "special supervision committee," headed by Vice President Albert DEMBY and the Nigerian leader of the Ecomog forces, Col. Maxwell Khobe. On February 20, 25 of the AFRC leaders were captured as they attempted to escape into Liberia (Koroma is widely believed to be dead or in hiding somewhere in West Africa). President Kabbah was officially reinstated on March 10 and promptly named a 15-member cabinet.

As of March 1998 Ecomog-directed, pro-presidential forces reportedly controlled 90 percent of Sierra Leone. In addition to attempting to wrest control of the remainder of the country from the remnants of the combined AFRC-RUF forces, the reinstated Kabbah government faced a myriad of other challenges, including resurrecting a devastated economy; reintegrating tens of thousands of dislocated and homeless citizens; and reestablishing relations with Sankoh and the RUF, many of whose fighters reportedly had hidden their weapons when confronted by the Ecomog offensive. Meanwhile, the Kabbah administration pressed ahead with legal actions against former Koroma coup members and their alleged collaborators. In October Freetown ignored observers' calls for leniency and executed 24 people for treasonous acts, including Koroma's brother, Brig. Gen. Samuel KOROMA. On October 23 Sankoh, who had been returned for trial from Nigeria in July, was sentenced to death for similar offenses. (Collaterally, on November 5 former president Momoh received a ten-year jail term for his ties to Koroma, who remained a fugitive.) Following Sankoh's sentencing, a dramatic upsurge in rebel attacks against civilians was reported; thousands subsequently fled to the capital to escape a campaign marked by atrocities. Despite initial depictions of the violence as being the rebels' last gasp, the RUF and its AFRC military allies advanced to within striking distance of Freetown by December.

In late December 1998 RUF commander Sam BOCKARIE rejected calls for a cease-fire, and on January 6, 1999, the rebels invaded the capital. Approximately 5,000 people were killed before Ecomog troops regained control of the city in mid-month. Thereafter, President Kabbah agreed to let Sankoh participate in cease-fire negotiations; however, apparently emboldened by reports of Ecomog gains elsewhere in the country, Kabbah insisted that the rebels respect the dictates of the 1996 peace accord. Consequently, negotiations proceeded fitfully through February and early March. On March 16 Bockarie broke off talks, reportedly suspecting the government of employing delaying tactics while it won back territory. Subsequently, the Kabbah administration came under pressure from its two largest military backers, the United Kingdom and Nigeria, to seek a negotiated end to its "unwinnable" war.

On May 18, 1999, President Kabbah and rebel leader Sankoh signed an agreement in Togo calling for a cease-fire effective May 25, and a formal peace accord was signed in July. The agreement promised to give the RUF and the AFRC four key government posts and extended total amnesty to RUF and AFRC leaders, including Sankoh, as well as former head of state Momoh, who had been charged with collaborating with the AFRC junta. Amid reports of internal divisions, the RUF and the AFRC agreed to demobilize and disarm and also dropped their demands for an immediate withdrawal of Ecomog troops. The AFRC wing that accepted Koroma's call to stop violence immediately was then reincorporated into the political arena. In October the UN Security Council authorized the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL) to replace the Ecomog troops gradually. In November Sankoh was given powers equivalent to those of vice president, and the RUF and the AFRC were allocated non-senior cabinet posts. Concurrently, the RUF decided to transform itself into a registered political party, adopting the rubric Revolutionary United Front Party (RUFPP). However, the issues of demobilization and disarmament created problems during much of early 2000, and in May the peace agreement broke down as UNAMSIL was moving to replace the Ecomog troops. RUF fighters and some renegade AFRC militia (linked with Eddie KANNEH's wing, which was uneasy with Koroma's call to stop the violence) attacked UNAMSIL detachments, and 19 civilians were killed by Sankoh's bodyguards during a demonstration in front of his residence. Although Sankoh fled the country following the incident, he was apprehended in Nigeria on May 17. Due to advances by UNAMSIL, the pro-government Kamajor militia (styled as the Civil Defense Force [CDF]), Guinean forces opposed to the RUF, and renegade AFRC forces, the rebels were on the defensive for much of the year. In November the RUF agreed once again to commit itself to the peace process and to disarm its troops and relinquish most of its territory to government and UNAMSIL control. In February 2001 Kabbah asked the National Assembly to postpone the presidential and legislative elections due to be held in February and March because of the "uncertain security situation." He also reshuffled his cabinet to include some opposition figures.

As Liberian President Charles Taylor tried to distance himself from the RUF in an effort to clean up his country's image as a protector of the rebels, the RUF signed a peace agreement in May 2001, and another cease-fire was implemented. In August it was announced that elections were expected to be held in June 2002 under a “constituency electoral system,” although in September the National Electoral Commission advised the assembly to adopt a proportional representation system instead. Despite criticism from the opposition that Kabbah was trying to eliminate his potential rivals in the coming elections, as well as fears that some RUF forces might resume fighting, the country appeared to be moving toward some form of normalization.

At a dramatic weapons-burning ceremony on January 18, 2002, which marked the completion of the disarmament process, President Kabbah declared the “war is over,” and the four-year state of emergency was formally lifted on March 1. (An estimated 50,000 people died as a result of the conflict.) Attention subsequently focused on the campaign for the presidential and assembly balloting.

In presidential balloting on May 14, 2002, President Kabbah was elected to another four-year term by securing more than 70 percent of the vote against eight opponents. (Kabbah’s running-mate, Solomon BEREWA, the sitting minister of justice and attorney general and also from the SLPP, was elected to the vice presidency in succession to Albert Joe Demby, who had been dropped from the ticket at the SLPP congress in March.) In concurrent voting for the National Assembly, which had been expanded to comprise 112 members elected on a proportional basis, the SLPP secured 83 seats, followed by the All People’s Congress (APC) with 27 seats, and the Peace and Liberation Party (PLP) with 2 seats. A new cabinet of the SLPP and several independents was sworn in on July 9.

After the elections, international troops who had overseen the cease-fire ending Sierra Leone’s civil war began to withdraw. On July 28, 2002, 400 British troops withdrew, leaving a contingent of military advisers to train the Sierra Leonean army. In November UNAMSIL began the gradual withdrawal of its 17,500-man force, culminating in the removal of all troops by the end of 2005. UNAMSIL was replaced by a small contingent of military advisers—the United Nations Integrated Office in Sierra Leone (UNIOSL)—charged with monitoring the security situation and guarding the war crimes tribunal (see Current issues, below).

The cabinet was reshuffled on September 6, 2005.

Constitution and Government

The 1991 constitution provided for a popularly elected executive president, who could serve for no more than two five-year terms; a parliament, whose members could not serve simultaneously as ministers; and a State Advisory Council composed of 12 paramount chiefs (one from each local district) and ten “emergent citizens” nominated by the president. There was no limit on the number of political parties, provided they met basic requirements. The judicial system included a Supreme Court and a Court of Appeal, as well as a lower tier of high, magistrates’, and native courts.

The somewhat complex executive structure proclaimed by the newly styled Supreme Council of State on July 14, 1992, called for the designation of three SCS members as “principal liaison officers,” each of whom would oversee a number of government departments (successors to the former ministries). The department heads were to be styled secretaries of state under a chief who would report to the SCS. Meanwhile, the SCS had assumed a quasi-legislative function by the issuance of decrees. In October 1994 the SCS released a draft basic charter, which included stipulations that future presidents must be at least 39 years old and native-born Sierra Leoneans.

Sierra Leone is administratively divided into three provinces (Northern, Eastern, Southern), in addition to a Western Region that includes Freetown. The provinces are subdivided into 12 districts and 147 chiefdoms.

Foreign Relations

Sierra Leone has long subscribed to a generally pro-Western foreign policy, while maintaining diplomatic relations with the former USSR, several East European countries, the People's Republic of China, and North Korea. Regionally, it has been an active participant in the Organization of African Unity (OAU, subsequently the African Union—AU) and a long-standing member of OAU committees established to resolve the disputes in Chad and the Western Sahara. Traditionally cordial relations with bordering states were strained by the overthrow of civilian governments in Liberia and Guinea; however, the three countries signed a security agreement in September 1986 and revived the Mano River Union plan for economic cooperation. Tension with Liberia flared again in July 1988 with the expulsion of 63 Sierra Leonean nationals in the wake of a coup attempt against the Doe regime; however, the dispute was seemingly resolved during a two-day "reconciliation summit" in Lomé, Togo, in mid-September. In early 1989 continuing efforts by Freetown to "intensify existing friendly relations" with regional neighbors led to the establishment of joint economic and social commissions with Nigeria and Togo.

Civil war in neighboring Liberia topped Freetown's foreign policy agenda in 1990 as ECOWAS's peacekeeping forces, including Sierra Leonean troops, were dispatched from Freetown. In November Momoh described the influx of Liberian refugees as "stretching thin" his government's resources and characterized Liberian rebel leader Charles Taylor, who had threatened retaliation for Sierra Leone's involvement, as "ungrateful." In March 1991 Taylor, angered by Freetown's participation in the ECOWAS operation, began launching raids into Sierra Leone, and Nigeria and Guinea were reported in mid-April to have dispatched troops to aid in repulsing the intruders. Meanwhile, Freetown also accused Libya, Burkina Faso, and Côte d'Ivoire of aiding the rebels.

By early November 1991 the government and its allies claimed to have routed the guerrillas, and Guinean forces began their withdrawal. However, a cease-fire signed earlier in Yamassoukro, Côte d'Ivoire, proved short-lived; in December Taylor charged Freetown with backing incursions by the Liberian United Movement for Freedom and Democracy (ULIMO), a group linked to the deposed Doe regime. ULIMO admitted to having engaged Taylor's forces but denied being based in Sierra Leone.

During the second half of 1992 Captain Strasser reportedly developed close ties with Nigerian military leader Gen. Babangida, who in early 1993 agreed to provide Sierra Leone with military advisers. Subsequently, Sierra Leone and ULIMO forces were reported to have participated in joint operations against RUF rebels.

In March 1994 the Strasser government pressed Ecomog commanders to establish a buffer zone along its shared border with Liberia, citing increased rebel activity as well as the volatility of Liberia's disarmament process. One month later, the Strasser government expelled Germany's ambassador to Freetown, claiming that his "undiplomatic" behavior, including meetings with Liberia's Taylor, were undermining Sierra Leone interests and threatening relations between the two countries. However, other reports linked the German's ouster to his defense of a Sierra Leonean journalist who had been arrested for criticizing Strasser. In September 1995 seven Guinean soldiers, stationed at Sierra Leone in fulfillment of a defense pact between the two nations, were killed during a clash with the RUF.

In July 1998 the UN Security Council announced the establishment of a United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL), which it charged with overseeing peacekeeping efforts. In February 1999 UNAMSIL personnel accused Nigerian members of Ecomog of executing civilians suspected of aiding the antigovernment insurgents. Subsequently, observers in Lagos reported that support for continued involvement in Sierra Leone had reached a new low. Meanwhile, Liberia, Libya, and Burkina Faso were alleged to be supplying the rebels with armaments and refuge. Following the agreement reached between the Sierra Leonean government and the RUF in May 1999 (see Current issues, below), there were signs of a thaw in relations with Liberia and Libya. In October the Liberian border was reopened, and in December Sierra Leone and Liberia established a joint security committee.

However, with the breakdown of the agreement and the resumption of violence in May 2000, Sierra Leone's relations with all three countries suspected of helping the RUF deteriorated once again. Although the Mano River Union summit held in May and attended by Sierra Leone, Liberia, Guinea, and Mali "deplored the attacks by the RUF," Kabbah's government and much of the international community continued to charge Liberia with assisting the rebels. With the RUF rebels crossing into the Guinean territory, and the Guinean President Lasana Conté accusing Sierra Leonean and Liberian refugees in his country of assisting the rebels, the Mano River region became a crisis zone and the scene of a severe refugee tragedy.

After the fighting in Liberia's Lofa county intensified in early 2001, Liberian President Charles Taylor renewed his claim that the Sierra Leonean and Guinean authorities were assisting the Liberian rebels. In March the ambassadors of Sierra Leone and Guinea were expelled from Liberia.

There were some signs of thaw, however, after the Sierra Leonean government and the RUF signed a new peace agreement in May 2001. In early October UN Secretary General Kofi Annan announced that he was pleased with the progress made by the Mano River Union members toward restoring peace in West Africa. In January 2006 representatives from Sierra Leone, Liberia, and Guinea met to discuss ways to restore peace in the Mano River basin. Also in 2006, Sierra Leone became a full member of the Community of Sahel and Saharan States (CEN-SAD).

Current Issues

In accordance with the Lomé Accord, a Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC), based on the South African model, was established in 2002 as a forum to enable Sierra Leoneans on both sides of the conflict to relate their wartime experiences. Amputations, rape, and mass killings were common human rights violations during the decade-long conflict. The same year, at the government's request, the United Nations helped establish a special court in Freetown to try the most serious cases of war crimes. In March 2003 the court issued indictments against Foday Sankoh, Sam Bockarie, Johnny Paul Koroma, and former internal affairs minister Sam HINGA NORMAN. Bockarie, a notoriously brutal RUF field commander, and Koroma, then minister of the interior and former head of the Civil Defense Force (CDF), fled to neighboring Liberia. On May 5 Bockarie was killed, allegedly on orders of Liberian President Charles Taylor, who also was indicted in connection with his role in the war but continued to live in exile in Nigeria. On June 29, 2003, the chronically ill Sankoh—the Revolutionary United Front's former leader—died, reportedly of a heart attack, in a Freetown prison. By mid-2005, the court had indicted 13 people, of whom two had died, two had eluded arrest, and nine were in custody. Taylor was captured in March 2006 (reportedly "on the run" with bags of cash) and jailed in Sierra Leone on eleven charges related to war crimes. In June he was transferred to The Hague to stand trial after Swedish lawmakers approved a law allowing a Scandinavian country to imprison Taylor if he is convicted. (The UN had asked the International Criminal Court in the Netherlands to hold the trial to avoid potential problems in the region if the trial were held in Africa; the court agreed on condition that Taylor be jailed in another country if convicted.)

Meanwhile, the government faced increasing criticism by war victims and human rights organizations for delays in implementing the TRC's recommendations, although some groups described the recommendations as "vague and noncommittal."

In anticipation of presidential and legislative elections scheduled for 2007, Sierra Leone's numerous political parties and groups began forming new alliances in an effort to counter the overwhelming political power of the SLPP and the APC and to mount a challenge to Vice President Solomon Berewa, who was expected to be the aging President Kabbah's successor as the SLPP's presidential candidate. The main coalition as of mid-2005 was the Third Force, which included the UNPP, the People's Democratic Party (PDP), and several other parties. Meanwhile, the head of the National Electoral Commission drew criticism for reportedly drawing new election boundaries in 2006, which apparently favored the SLPP.

Political Parties

During Sierra Leone's first 17 years of independence, the principal political groupings were the Sierra Leone People's Party (SLPP), strongest in the Mende area of the south, and the All People's Congress (APC), based in the Temne region of the north. The SLPP dominated from 1961 to 1967 and the APC from 1967 to 1978, when it was accorded monopoly status. Following adoption of the 1991 constitution, a number of new parties emerged, most of which were accorded legal recognition prior to the suspension of political activity in May 1992.

By late 1992 the regime had released the majority of the political figures detained in the aftermath of the coup, the most prominent of whom included SLPP leader Salia JUSU-SHERRIFF and National Action Party (NAP) co-founder Dr. Sheka KANU.

The ban on political party activity was rescinded on June 21, 1995, in preparation for elections promised by early 1996. In August the Interim National Electoral Commission granted provisional registration certificates to approximately 15 groups, 11 of which were granted permission in November to participate in the upcoming elections.

Political parties were banned by the Koroma military junta upon its seizure of power in May 1997. Following his reinstatement in March 1998, President Kabbah authorized parties to resume their activities. His decision to include representatives from only four groups in his reshuffled government was criticized by his opponents, who had expected a more inclusive cabinet.

Following the July 1999 peace and power-sharing agreement, Kabbah reshuffled his cabinet in November, and the rebels (the RUF and AFRC) were given four non-senior posts. After the resumption of fighting in May 2000, however, the three rebel ministers were jailed. In March 2001 Kabbah reshuffled his cabinet to replace retiring and jailed rebel ministers. In an effort described as "forming a more inclusive national unity government" but criticized by opponents as "trying to silence and co-opt" his rivals, Kabbah appointed four new ministers. Three came from the opposition National Unity Party (NUP), People's Democratic Party (PDP), and UNPP to supplement Kabbah's SLPP-dominated government (which had also included civilians); one minister came from the Democratic Center Party (DCP). The latter party, chaired by Aiah Abu KOROMA, reportedly dissolved in 2002 after pledging its support to Kabbah. However, the UNPP, NUP, and PDP announced they were not supporting Kabbah's rule by joining the government but were merely trying to help the country in difficult times. (In 2003, however, NUP leader John BENJAMIN joined the SLPP, following the party's former chair, Dr. John KARIMU, who defected in 2001.) Indeed, the APC, People's Democratic Alliance (PDA), People's National Convention (PNC), People's Progressive Party (PPP), PDP, and UNPP had formed an opposition alliance styled as the Grand Alliance (GA) in August 2000 (see below). A number of smaller parties reportedly joined the GA later. Although the GA members had announced their attempt to "unite under a single political party in due course," by mid-2001 various internal rifts seemed to have rendered that aim difficult to achieve. The APC and UNPP subsequently left the alliance.

In the May 14, 2002, balloting, 11 parties presented candidates for the presidency, and 12 parties were represented in the legislative contest.

Sierra Leone People's Party (SLPP). Led by former second vice president Salia Jusu-Sheriff, whose identification with the Momoh regime was viewed as a political liability, the SLPP was launched as a revival of the party outlawed in 1978.

Ahmad Tejan Kabbah, a 64-year-old veteran politician and former UN development worker, emerged as the SLPP's presidential candidate after an intraparty contest with Charles MARGAI in early 1996. Subsequently, at parliamentary balloting in February 1996, the SLPP secured ten more seats than its nearest competitor while its allies (the PDP, APC, NUP, and DCP) gained an additional 24 seats.

In mid-1998 Kabbah reportedly signaled that he would not seek another term in office. Among those cited by observers as potential successors were Margai, cabinet member Harry WILL, and Sam Hinga Norman, whose command of Kamajor militias had won him wide acclaim. Kabbah reversed his previous announcement, however, during a period of peace, which was followed by a resumption of violence and another time of peace from 1999 to 2001, when he won enough support to ensure another election victory for himself and his party in 2002. Former military leader Julius Bio returned to Sierra Leone in 2004 after ten years in exile and reportedly stated his interest in party leadership while condemning the current regime for its alleged corruption and incompetence. Margai left the party in 2005 after losing the leadership post—and, thus, the opportunity to be the party's presidential candidate—to Solomon Berewa, whom Africa Confidential said was “generally referred to as President Number Two” because Kabbah delegated many official duties to him. Margai started the People's Movement for Democratic Change (PMDC, below) with other SLPP defectors. Bio announced he would not leave to follow Margai and reiterated his support for the SLPP.

Leaders: Solomon BEREWA (Vice President of the Republic and Party Leader), S. U. M. JAH (Chair), Ahmad Tejan KABBAH (President of the Republic), Prince HARDING (Secretary General).

All People's Congress (APC). Leftist and republican in outlook, the APC was formed in 1960 by Dr. Siaka Probyn Stevens in a split with a dissident group headed at that time by Albert M. Margai. Although strongest in Temne territory, the party was not exclusively tribal in character, drawing its support from wage-earning and lower-middle-class elements in both Temne and non-Temne areas. The APC won all but one of the legislative seats in the 1973 election, which was boycotted by the opposition SLPP; it won all but 15 seats in 1977 and was constitutionally unopposed in 1982 and 1986. At the conclusion of an APC conference in August 1985, despite strong support for (then) first vice president Sorie KOROMA, Maj. Gen. Joseph Momoh was nominated as the sole candidate to succeed Stevens as president of the republic. While yielding the post of secretary general to Momoh, Stevens retained the title of chair, as well as the primary loyalty of much of the party's membership, until his death in June 1988. Momoh was reelected unopposed to the party's top post at the tenth APC conference in January 1989, which also yielded abandonment of the positions of chair and vice chair and adoption of a demanding “Code of Conduct” for political leaders and public servants.

At an APC Central Committee and Governing Council joint session on August 17–20, 1990, President Momoh, pressured by calls for political reform, proposed an “overhauling” of Sierra Leone's political system. However, his support in March 1991 for the adoption of a multiparty constitution generated deep fissures within the party. In mid-July two of its leaders resigned their posts, and ten others were suspended for criticizing the document that was approved in late August. In early 1992 the party further redefined its policies and principles, and, by providing for rank-and-file balloting, underwent sweeping personnel changes.

APC presidential candidate Edward Mohammed Turay captured just 5.1 percent of the vote at 1996 balloting, while the party finished fourth in the legislative contest. At the 2002 elections, APC presidential candidate Ernest Bai Koroma won 22.3 percent of the vote, and the party finished second in the legislative election, winning 27 seats.

Koroma ran unopposed for the party leadership in September 2005 and was tapped to represent the APC in the next presidential election. Meanwhile, party member Amara Alkalie KAMARA announced that he would also be a presidential candidate in 2007.

Leaders: Ernest Bai KOROMA (Minority Leader in Parliament and 2002 presidential candidate), Edward Mohammed TURAY (1996 presidential candidate), Mohamed Aka KOROMA (Acting Secretary General).

Peace and Liberation Party (PLP). Established in 2001, the PLP is led by the former AFRC leader Johnny Paul Koroma. It was linked with the Grassroots Awareness movement, one of many peace promotion organizations. At the May 2002 elections, Koroma came in third in the presidential race, while the party won 3.6 percent of the vote—and two seats—in the legislative contest.

Leaders: Johnny Paul KOROMA (whereabouts unknown; 2002 presidential candidate), Darlington MORRISON (Chair), Bai MORROW, Amadu BAH (Spokesperson).

Revolutionary United Front Party (RUF). The Revolutionary United Front (RUF) surfaced in early 1991 as a group of Sierra Leone dissidents who had joined forces with Liberian guerrillas loyal to Charles Taylor along the Sierra Leone–Liberia border, where diamond smuggling had been estimated to yield some $100 million annually. In July 1992 the rebels rejected an appeal by the Strasser regime to surrender and negotiate a resolution of their estrangement from Freetown, demanding instead a national interim government and free democratic elections.

In August 1993 the RUF was described as “unorganized” amid indications that attempts had been made to oust its leader, Foday Sankannah Sankoh (who earlier had been rumored to have died). On December 30 Sankoh’s personal bodyguards surrendered when government troops overran Pujehin, and in early 1994 the RUF leader was reported to have barely escaped arrest during fighting at Kailahun, which resulted in the further capture of elite rebel troops.

Thereafter, although estimates of the actual number of RUF members fluctuated between 100 and 1,000, the group, which had reportedly broken into four units, was credited with orchestrating military activities in over two-thirds of the country. At the same time, its casualty rate climbed precipitously, and by October 1994 some observers suggested that the government’s war with the rebels was nearly concluded. However, in early November the RUF appeared to be invigorated when its seizure of two British nationals drew international attention, and on November 28 the rebels rejected Freetown’s cease-fire entreaties, saying it would only negotiate with the British government.

On January 18–20, 1995, the RUF captured two of the country’s most important mines; however, the rebels suffered numerous casualties in a government counter-offensive that dislodged the insurgents. Subsequently, the RUF requested that the International Committee of the Red Cross act as a mediator in the conflict.

Confronted with a reorganized Sierra Leonean Army and near starvation conditions in areas under their control, RUF political leaders in September 1995 reportedly sought a dialogue with Freetown. However, rebel military activities continued unabated, underscoring the reported split between RUF moderates and militants.

Following the overthrow of the Strasser regime in mid-January 1996, the RUF announced a one-week unconditional cease-fire, and on February 25 the rebels held their first direct talks with the new government in Côte d’Ivoire, where they unsuccessfully sought a delay in nationwide elections. Subsequently, the rebels were blamed for disrupting polling in a number of regions. At a meeting with Brigadier General Bio on March 24, Sankoh agreed to a cease-fire but refused to recognize the civilian government-elect. Thereafter, the Kabbah government expressed “cautious optimism” following a meeting between Sankoh and the new president on April 22–23, which yielded a “definitive” cease-fire. The final accord signed on November 30 permitted the RUF to begin functioning as a political movement immediately, with the understanding that it would apply for formal party recognition within 30 days.

Subsequently, implementation of the peace pact stalled because Sankoh refused to meet with officials seeking to finalize the scheduling of the RUF’s disarmament and reintegration, and in early 1997 the government accused Sankoh of failing to meet his responsibilities as dictated by the accord. Following a meeting with Nigerian officials, Sankoh was arrested in Lagos on March 12. Three days later, a senior RUF official, Philip Sylvester PALMER, announced that Sankoh had been dismissed from the RUF for “thwarting the peace process.” The arrest and ouster of Sankoh (an “international conspiracy” according to his followers) sparked fierce internecine fighting between his loyalists and opponents.

RUF militants played a major role in the fighting, which led to President Kabbah’s overthrow in May 1997, and in June at least three RUF representatives were included in the AFRC. Moreover, the AFRC’s exhaustive diplomatic efforts to win Sankoh’s freedom from detention in Nigeria fueled reports that the RUF was steering the junta’s activities. During negotiations with the AFRC in late 1997, representatives of the Kabbah administration agreed to find a role for Sankoh upon their proposed reinstallation in Freetown. Meanwhile, RUF fighters who had aligned with rebel soldiers were being targeted by Ecomog troops.

Following the peace agreement with the government in July 1999, the RUF was promised cabinet posts, and Sankoh was given powers equivalent to those of vice president. In the meantime, the RUF decided to transform itself into a registered political party (the RUFPP). However, after the breakdown of the agreement and the resumption of fighting in May 2000, Sankoh was jailed, and Issa Sesay replaced him as the interim leader. In June the government asked the UN to set up a special court to try Sankoh and other RUF officials for “war crimes.”

Before and after the RUF’s announcement of commitment to the peace process once again in May 2001, there were signs of a split within the organization. Reportedly, the faction for continuing the war, represented by an uneasy coalition of Sam Bockarie and Dennis Superman Mingo, was in conflict with the official leadership of Sesay and the faction committed to the peace process.

The RUFPP’s presidential candidate, Alimamy Pallo BANGURA, came in fourth, with 1.7 percent of the vote, in May 2002, while the party won 2.2 percent of the vote—and no seats—in the legislative contest.

Sesay, who had been indicted by the special court on war crimes charges, was replaced as interim leader in January 2005 by Peter VANDY. The following month, however, Vandy resigned from the party and joined the SLPP, declaring his belief in the SLPP as the party of reconciliation and multiparty democracy. In early 2006 Sesay remained in detention on war crimes charges. Meanwhile, party official Omrie Golley was charged in 2006 with plotting to overthrow the government.

Leaders: Samuel Gbessay KAMU (Acting Leader), Issa SESAY (in detention), Gibril MASSAQUOI (Spokesperson), Dennis Superman MINGO, Omrie GOLLEY (Peace and Political Council Chair; in detention), Jonathan KPOSOVA (Secretary General).

United National People’s Party (UNPP). The UNPP secured 17 seats behind a 21 percent vote tally at balloting in February 1996. Meanwhile, its leader, banker John Karifa-Smart, placed second in concurrent presidential balloting. In March 1997 Karifa-Smart was charged with contempt and suspended from the assembly. He also unsuccessfully attempted in April 2001 to expel some legislators from the party due to differences on certain policies. Karifa-Smart came in last, with 1 percent of the vote, in the May 2002 presidential election, and the UNPP failed to win any seats in the legislative contest, with 1.3 percent of the vote. In May 2005 the UNPP joined in coalition with the National Unity Movement (below) in advance of the next presidential elections. It backed out of a so-called merger with the RUFPP after some of the latter’s leaders were charged with war crimes.

Karifa-Smart reportedly left politics in 2006, and Abdul Kadi Karim was elected as party leader and 2007 presidential candidate.

Leaders: Abdul Kadi KARIM (Party Leader), Soufian KARGBO (Secretary General), John KARIFA-SMART (1996 and 2002 presidential candidate).

Grand Alliance Party (GAP). Initially formed in August 2000 as a broad coalition in opposition to the SLPP, the GAP splintered in 2001. A number of small parties kept the alliance alive, but it won only 2.4 percent of the vote in the May 2002 legislative election, not enough to secure a seat. Its candidate in the 2002 presidential election, Raymond KAMARA, won 0.6 percent of the vote.

Cabinet

As of June 1, 2006

President	Ahmad Tejan Kabbah (SLPP)
Vice President	Solomon Berewa (SLPP)
Ministers
Agriculture and Food Security	Sama Sahr Mondeh
Community Development and Local Government	Sidikie Brima
Defense	Ahmad Tejan Kabbah (SLPP)
Development and Economic Planning	Mohamed B. Daramy
Education, Science, and Technology	Alpha T. Wurie (SLPP)
Energy and Power	Lloyd During
Finance	John O. Benjamin (SLPP)
Foreign Affairs and International Cooperation	Momodu Koroma
Health and Sanitation	Abbator Thomas [f]
Information and Broadcasting	Septimus Kaikai
Internal Affairs	Pascal Egbenda
Justice and Attorney General	Frederick M. Carew (SLPP)
Labor, Industrial Relations, and Social Security	Alpha O. Timbo
Lands, Country Planning, Forestry, and Environment	Alfred Bobson Sesay
Local Government	Sidique Brima
Marine Resources	Chernor Jalloh (UNPP)
Mineral Resources	Alhaji Mohamed Swarry Deen (SLPP)
Political and Parliamentary Affairs	Eya Mbayo
Social Welfare, Gender, and Children's Affairs	Shirley Y. Gbujama (SLPP) [f]
Tourism and Culture	Okere Adams (SLPP)
Trade and Industry	Kadi Sesay (PDP) [f]
Transport and Communications	Prince A. Harding
Works, Housing, and Technical Maintenance	Caizer J. Boima
Youth and Sports	Dennis Bright
Ministers of State
Presidential Affairs	Sheku Sesay
Eastern Region	Sahr Randolph Fillie-Faboe
Southern Region	S. U. M. Jah (SLPP)
Northern Region	Alex Alie Kargbo
[f] = female

People's Democratic Party (PDP). The PDP was characterized by West Africa as the "loudest" of the new parties, whose "main handicap is the uncharismatic quality" of its leader, former information minister Thaimu BANGURA. In September 1991 Bangura had been named chair of a United Front of Political Movements (UNIFORM), a six-party opposition formation that was subsequently dissolved.

At balloting in February 1996, Bangura placed third in the presidential contest, with 16.1 percent of the vote, and the party won 12 seats.

Subsequently, as an apparent reward for supporting Kabbah in the second round of presidential balloting, the PDP secured three cabinet portfolios.

Bangura died in March 1999. Following infighting between Osman Kamara and former NPRC member Abdul Rahman KAMARA to replace Bangura, Osman Kamara was elected chair. Abdul Rahman Kamara quit the party to form his own organization, the People's Democratic Alliance (PDA) in November. In a cabinet reshuffle in March 2001, Osman Kamara was given the post of the trade and industry minister, although he claimed that the PDP was still an opposition party. He was subsequently replaced. The PDP, with 1 percent of the vote, failed to win a seat in the legislative election of May 2002. The party did not present a presidential candidate but came out in support of Kabbah.

Leader: Osman KAMARA (Secretary General).

Young People's Party (YPP). Described as "one of the most promising new parties" by Africa News, the YPP was formed in April 2001 mainly by university students. Andrew Duramani TURAY placed last in the 2002 presidential election with 0.2 percent of the vote.

Leader: Sylvia BLYDEN (Executive Leader).

National Democratic Alliance (NDA). The NDA fielded candidates for the legislature but not the presidency in 2002. The party reconvened in 2005 after having been inactive for several years.

Leaders: Ansu MASSAQUOI (Acting Chair), Amadu JALLOH, Francis BAWOH (Secretary General), Abdul BAH.

Movement for Progress (MOP). Formed in 2002 to promote "good governance and positive change," the MOP supported the creation of the special war crimes court and presented the only female candidate in 2002, longtime political activist Zainab Bangura. She garnered less than 1 percent of the vote.

Leader: Zainab BANGURA (Chair and Leader and 2002 presidential candidate).

Citizens United for Peace and Progress (CUPP). Founded in 2001 (and registered on September 28) by Sierra Leoneans in the United States, the CUPP advocates "justice for victims" of the decade-long civil war. The party presented a presidential candidate in 2002, Washington lawyer Raymond Bamidele THOMPSON (who received 0.4 percent of the vote), but no legislative candidate.

People's Movement for Democratic Change (PMDC). Registered by the government in April 2006, the PMDC was founded by Charles Margai, who left the SLPP after he lost his bid for the chairmanship, to promote a civilian, democratic government. Margai was arrested in 2006 on a variety of charges related to disorderly behavior against the government.

Leaders: Charles MARGAI, Ansu LANSANA (Secretary General).

In addition to the 11 parties that competed in the May 2002 presidential and legislative balloting, other groups include the People's Progressive Party (PPP), led by former ECOWAS executive secretary Dr. Abass BUNDU; the People's National Convention (PNC), led by 1996 presidential candidate Edward KARGBO; the National Unity Movement (NUM), led by Reginald SCHLENKER-WILLIAMS; the National Alliance Democratic Party (NADP), led by Mohamed Yahya SILLAH; the National People's Party (NPP); and the Sierra Leoneans Advocate for Progress (SLAP), led by Christian JOHNSON.

In February 2000 two new parties were formed, the Liberal Democratic Party (LDP) and the Sierra Leone Socialist Party (SLSP).

Legislature

The Sierra Leone National Assembly is a 124-member unicameral body. At the general elections of May 14, 2002 (the first since February 1996), the Sierra Leone People's Party captured 83 seats; the All People's Congress, 27; and the Peace and Liberation Party, 2. In addition to these 112 members, elected directly to five-year terms, 12 seats were filled by paramount chiefs, representing the 12 provincial districts.

Speaker: Edmond K. COWAN.

Communications

Press

A variety of media rights conferred by the 1991 constitution were effectively abrogated by the post-coup military government, which issued a series of decrees limiting freedom of the press, introducing prior censorship, and severely curtailing private speech. One such enactment outlawed reports “likely to cause alarm, despondency or be prejudicial to the public safety, public tranquility and the maintenance of public order,” while another declared illegal any attempt to influence public opinion “orally or otherwise.” On March 30, 1994, new press guidelines set minimum financial and educational standards for publishers and journalists, respectively. Among the nation’s daily newspapers are the government-controlled Daily Mail (Freetown, 10,000) and the independent Standard Times; weekly organs include The Weekend Spark (20,000), Progress (7,000), The New Globe, The New Breed, the independent Weekly Democrat, and the pro-APC We Yone. The independent Concord Times is published three times a week; The New Shaft (10,000), twice weekly.

News Agencies

The domestic facility is the Sierra Leone News Agency (Slena), established in 1980 after President Stevens complained about “the image given to Third World countries by the press in developed countries.” Reuters, TASS, Xinhua, and Agence France-Presse are among the foreign agencies that maintain bureaus in Freetown.

Broadcasting and Computing

The government-owned Sierra Leone Broadcasting Service (SLBS) operates a number of radio stations broadcasting in English, Krio, Limba, Mende, and Temne; it also provides limited commercial television service. ABC TV is a private television network. Radio stations include Radio Democracy, a pro-government station originally set up as the voice of the Kabbah government in exile; Radio UNAMSIL, the UN network; Believers Broadcasting Network, a Freetown Christian station; Voice of the Handicapped, founded to serve Sierra Leone’s victims of mass amputations carried out during the civil war; and private stations KISS FM (Bo) and SKYY FM (Freetown). There were approximately 70,000 television receivers and 9,000 Internet users in 2003.

Intergovernmental Representation

Ambassador to the U.S.

Ibrahim M. KAMARA

U.S. Ambassador to Sierra Leone

Thomas N. HULL III

Permanent Representative to the UN

Joe Robert PEMAGBI

IGO Memberships (Non-UN)

AfDB, AU, BADEA, CEN-SAD, CWTH, ECOWAS, IDB, Interpol, IOM, MRU, NAM, OIC, WCO, WTO

SOMALIA

SOMALI REPUBLIC

Jamhuuriyada Soomaaliyeed

---

Note: On May 18, 1991, the (then) president of the Somali National Movement (SNM), Abdurahman Ahmed Ali (“Taur”), announced that northwestern Somalia (British Somaliland prior to its incorporation into Somalia in July 1960) had seceded to form an independent Republic of Somaliland. Although the self-proclaimed entity had received no international recognition as of 2006, it is accorded a separate write-up following the present article. An “autonomous region” was declared in the northeastern area of Puntland in 1998; information on that region is contained in this article.

Note: Following numerous cabinet dismissals and resignations from May to early August 2006, President Yusuf Ahmed announced on August 7 that the entire cabinet had been dismissed, although Prime Minister Ghedi remained in office. A new cabinet was announced on August 21.

The Country

The easternmost country in Africa, Somalia (including Somaliland) encompasses a broad band of desert and semidesert territory extending eastward along the Gulf of Aden and continuing southwestward to a point just south of the equator. The Somalis, a people of nomadic and pastoral traditions, share a common religion (Islam) and a common language (Somali). However, interclan rivalry has generated numerous economic and political cleavages, particularly between northern and southern groups. Nonindigenous inhabitants include Arabs, Ethiopians, Italians, Indians, and Pakistanis.

The economy is largely undeveloped, virtually no growth having been achieved in the last three decades and the country remaining one of the world’s poorest with annual per capita GNP falling below $110 in the early 2000s. Agriculture accounts for two-thirds of economic activity, although it is compromised by irregular rainfall. The country possesses some mineral deposits that thus far have not been commercially exploited. Although fishing, textile, and food processing industries have been established, much of the country’s foreign exchange is derived from livestock and livestock-related products. In addition, Somalia has long been the world’s largest producer of myrrh, an incense that is widely used in the Gulf region, China, and France. Development projects, including the construction of a dam for hydroelectric and irrigation purposes across the Juba River in the south, came to a virtual halt following the collapse of the central government in 1991. Meanwhile, inflation, drought, inefficiency in state enterprises, bureaucratic corruption, the presence of refugees from neighboring Ethiopia, and disruptions occasioned by civil war and interclan hostilities subsequently contributed to an overall state of destitution so severe that three-quarters of the population was estimated in mid-1992 to be at risk of starvation. The situation was only partially alleviated by the United Nations and other relief suppliers in 1993–1994. As of 1999 Somalia remained at the bottom of the UN development index, ongoing interclan violence in the south constraining the ability of the international community to deliver aid. The interim national government (unrecognized in several key regions) that was installed in 2000 declared infrastructure development to be second only to security among its priorities. However, Somalia subsequently remained what one UN official described as a “black hole of anarchy” that lacked sufficient institutional structure to process foreign aid that could assist in addressing the dearth of health, educational, and security services. As momentum developed toward the resolution of the long-standing hostilities, the World Bank relaunched some of its aid programs to Somalia in 2003. Optimists also predicted that the installation of a new transitional government in late 2004 to early 2005 would finally permit a semblance of normal attention to the country’s dire economic and social conditions. The European Union (EU) subsequently pledged humanitarian and reconstruction aid, while UN agencies and other aid organizations launched food-distribution initiatives in the drought-affected south. However, the resumption of conflict in the spring of 2006 (see Current issues, below) prompted many aid groups to withdraw personnel and suspend assistance.

Government and Politics

Political Background

Divided into British, French, and Italian sectors at the end of the 19th century, Somalia was partially reunited in 1960 when British Somaliland in the north and the Italian-administered Trust Territory in the south achieved their independence and promptly merged to form the United Republic of Somalia. Large numbers of Somalis remained in Ethiopia, Kenya, and the French Territory of the Afars and the Issas (subsequently Djibouti), and the new Somali regime announced that their inclusion in a “Greater Somalia” was a leading political objective.

The Somali Youth league (SYL) was the country’s principal political party at independence and formed the republic’s initial governments. During the late 1950s and early 1960s Somalia pursued a strongly irredentist policy toward Ethiopia and Kenya, relying increasingly on aid from the Soviet Union and other communist states. A change of policy occurred in 1967 with the presidential election of Abdirashid Ali SHERMARKE and his appointment of Mohamed Haji Ibrahim EGAL as prime minister. Under Egal’s leadership, Somalia maintained its demand for self-determination for all Somalis but emphasized reduced dependence on the communist world, conciliation with neighboring states, and the cultivation of friendly relations with Western countries.

The Egal regime was ousted by military units under the command of Maj. Gen. Mohamed SIAD BARRE on October 21, 1969, in an action that included the assassination of President Shermarke. Pledging to reduce tribalism and corruption, the new military government launched a restructuring along socialist lines of what was now termed the Somali Democratic Republic. Although briefly interrupted by antigovernment plots in 1970 and 1971, the program moved forward at a deliberate pace. In 1970 foreign banks and other foreign-controlled enterprises were nationalized, and in October 1972 local government reorganization was begun. On July 1, 1976, the Supreme Revolutionary Council (SRC) that had been established in the wake of the 1969 coup was abolished, and its powers were transferred to a newly created Somali Revolutionary Socialist Party (SRSP) of which Siad Barre was named secretary general. Civilian government was nominally reinstated following

Political Status: Independent republic established July 1, 1960; revolutionary military regime installed October 21, 1969; one-party state proclaimed July 1, 1976; multiparty system authorized on December 25, 1990, but unimplemented prior to the assumption of power by rebel forces on January 27, 1991; national charter providing for three-year transitional national government adopted by Somali National Peace Conference July 16, 2000, in Arta, Djibouti; Transitional Federal Charter approved January 29, 2004, providing for a four-year transitional government.

Area: 246,199 sq. mi. (637,657 sq. km.), including Somaliland (68,000 sq. mi.; 176,120 sq. km.).

Population: 7,114,431 (1987C); 10,764,000 (2005E). Both figures include Somaliland, estimated at 4,997,000 in 2005.

Major Urban Center (2005E): MOGADISHU (1,257,000, preliminary, including suburbs).

Principal Language: Somali.

Monetary Unit: Somali Shilling (official rate July 1, 2006: 1,340 shillings = $1US). (The United Nations reported an operational rate as of August 1, 2006, of 14,406 shillings = $1US. Earlier, as many as four versions of the shilling reportedly remained in circulation, including some apparently printed by local businessmen, thereby rendering attempts to determine a genuine national currency rate essentially futile. A degree of stability was anticipated following the 2004 comprehensive peace settlement, although it was clear that the UN rate was more "real" than the official rate.)

President: Col. Abdullahi YUSUF AHMED; elected by the Transitional Federal Parliament on October 10, 2004, and inaugurated the same day to succeed nominal Interim President Abdiqassim SALAD HASSAN.

Prime Minister: Ali Mohammed GHEDI; appointed by the president on November 3, 2004; lost confidence motion in the Transitional Federal Parliament (TFP) on December 11, 2004; reappointed by the president on December 13, 2004, and confirmed by the TFP on December 23.

popular approval of a new constitution on August 25, 1979, the one-party election of a People's Assembly on December 30, and the assembly's election of General Siad Barre as president on January 26, 1980.

A state of emergency was declared on October 21, 1980, following a resurgence of conflict with Ethiopia (for a discussion of earlier hostilities, see Foreign relations, below). Radio Mogadishu announced two days later that the SRC had been reconstituted. The emergency decree was rescinded on March 1, 1982, despite reports of a northern army mutiny in mid-February and sporadic border incidents that persisted thereafter. At the legislative election of December 31, 1984, 99.8 percent of the voters were reported to have cast ballots, with less than 1 percent opposing the SRSP's nominees.

In May 1986 Siad Barre suffered severe injuries in an automobile accident, and First Vice President Lt. Gen. Mohamed Ali SAMATAR served as de facto chief executive for several months. Although Siad Barre recovered sufficiently to be the sole candidate for reelection to a seven-year presidential term on December 23, 1986 (in the country's first direct balloting for the position), his poor health and advanced age generated intense speculation as to a successor. Samatar appeared to be a leading candidate, particularly after being additionally named to the new post of prime minister in January 1987. However, in the wake of a government reshuffle in December, all references to his vice presidential role ceased. Given the constitutional significance of the office in regard to succession, the change was interpreted as reflecting Siad Barre's desire to be succeeded either by a family member or an individual from his Marehan clan, to which Samatar did not belong.

During 1988 the Somali National Movement (SNM), a northwestern rebel group that had joined Ethiopian units in a cross-border assault the year before, mounted a broad offensive that eventually succeeded in driving government forces from most of the region's rural areas by mid-1989. President Siad Barre thereupon announced the appointment of a constitutional review committee charged with laying the groundwork for a multiparty system that would permit the SNM to engage in electoral activity, provided it did “not solely seek to satisfy tribal interests.” Meanwhile, other clan-based groups had taken up arms, including the United Somali Congress (USC) in the center and the Somali Patriotic Movement (SPM) in the south.

On September 3, 1990, in the wake of heightened rebel activity, Prime Minister Samatar was dismissed in favor of Mohamed HAWADIE MADAR. On January 20, 1991, as USC forces converged on the capital, Umar ARTEH GHALIB, a former foreign minister who had only recently been released from house arrest, was asked to form an essentially transitional government, and six days later Siad Barre departed for exile in Kenya. (He died in Nigeria on January 2, 1995.) On January 28, one day after assuming control in Mogadishu, the USC appointed its principal financial backer, Ali MAHDI MOHAMED, to the post of interim president. Mahdi, in turn, named Arteh Ghalib to head a reconstituted administration on January 29. However, neither appointment proved acceptable to the SNM, which, after rejecting two invitations to attend “national reconciliation” meetings with its erstwhile allies, announced the secession of the former British Somaliland on May 18 (see article on Somaliland). Subsequently, Gen. Mohamed Farah AIDID was elected USC chair at the party’s third congress held July 4–5, provoking a bitter dispute with President Mahdi because the two came from different Hawiye subclans. In early September at least 300 people were killed in a clash between the two factions in Mogadishu, while more intense fighting, which erupted in mid-November, resulted in the slaughter of at least 4,000 civilians by the end of the year, with some 100,000 having fled the city.

In early February 1992 General Aidid was dismissed as USC chair, formalizing the cleavage between the group’s pro- and anti-Mahdi factions. The action came after the announcement by UN Secretary General Boutros Boutros-Ghali of the first of a number of cease-fires, none of which proved effective despite the arrival in Mogadishu in late March of a UN technical team to monitor the conflict and develop a mechanism for delivering relief supplies. On April 24, in response to the team’s recommendations, the Security Council authorized the creation of a United Nations Operation in Somalia (UNOSOM) to “facilitate an immediate and effective cessation of hostilities . . . and provide urgent humanitarian assistance.” Meanwhile, General Aidid launched a new opposition grouping called the Somali National Alliance (SNA).

On June 6, 1992, representatives of 11 Somali factions, meeting in Bahr Dar in northwest Ethiopia, agreed to support a UN-implemented cease-fire and convene a “comprehensive and joint conference” to “smooth the way” for the establishment of a provisional government in Somalia within three months. However, by late August, with reports that some 2,000 people were perishing daily from starvation, arrangements were made for the deployment of a 500-member UN peacekeeping force to guard relief supplies. In mid-September, responding to heightened evidence of famine, U.S. President George H. W. Bush ordered four warships with 2,400 marines to the Somali coast. On October 1 the United Nations announced that it was increasing its peacekeeping body to 1,200, despite protests from General Aidid, whose forces claimed control of two-thirds of the capital and most of southern Somalia. On November 27 Washington offered to provide 30,000 troops as part of a UN military intervention effort to thwart the theft of food aid. General Aidid thereupon reversed himself and hailed the U.S. overture as a way to “solve our political, economic, and social problems.” On December 4 President Bush ordered the U.S. forces to Somalia as part of a projected multinational United Task Force (UNITAF) of some 35,000 soldiers.

Despite the breakdown of peace talks among 14 warring Somali factions in early January 1993, agreement was subsequently reached on a cease-fire and the appointment of a seven-member committee to lay the groundwork for a national reconciliation conference in mid-March. Meanwhile, the U.S. forces committed to “Operation Restore Hope” commenced a withdrawal, preparatory to handing peacekeeping operations over to a new 28,000-member UN Operation in Somalia (UNOSOM II) in early May.

Intense fighting erupted in the southern port city of Kismayu in mid-March 1993 between forces commanded by Siad Barre's son-in-law, Gen. Mohamed SAID HERSI, and Col. Ahmed UMAR JESS, an ally of General Aidid. However, at the conclusion of the conference in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, on March 27, 1993, it was announced that agreement had been reached on a Transitional National Council for Somalia, which was given a mandate to lead the country to elections within two years.

On May 4, 1993, the UN formally assumed control of the multinational relief effort led since December by a U.S. commander. Unlike previous peacekeeping missions, however, the UN troops were provided with rules of engagement that permitted them to use offensive force to disarm Somali clans. This mandate was invoked on June 11 in retaliation against General Aidid, whose faction was accused of ambushing and killing 23 Pakistani peacekeepers on June 5. The action, which commenced with an attack by U.S. helicopter gunships on Aidid's Mogadishu compound, concluded on June 17 with a ground assault that failed to curb the general's military capability, Aidid himself evading capture. On November 16 the UN Security Council revoked its warrant for the arrest of Aidid, who nonetheless boycotted a further UN-sponsored peace conference in Addis Ababa in November.

A more positive note was sounded at a January 1994 meeting in Mogadishu of elders of Mahdi's Abgal and Aidid's Habr Gedir subclans. Two months later, the two leaders met for the first time in over a year in Nairobi, and on March 24 they signed a somewhat vaguely worded peace accord that called for the formation of a coalition government during a "national reconciliation" meeting on May 15. However, no action was taken on the date specified, and in late June heavy factional fighting again broke out in Mogadishu.

Frustrated in its efforts to reconcile Somalia's rival factions, the UN Security Council voted on November 4, 1994, to withdraw the UNOSOM II force by March 31, 1995. In fact, the UN completed its withdrawal on March 1. Eleven days later Aidid and Mahdi concluded an agreement for joint control of the port and airport, both of which reopened on March 14. However, by mid-May the agreement appeared to be fading, each side charging the other with violating its terms, and on May 25 Aidid's sector of Mogadishu came under shelling from the north. On June 12 Aidid was formally ousted as SNA leader by a joint SNA-USC conference called by his longtime ally and fellow Habr Gedir subclansman, Osman HASAN ALI ("Osman Ato"), who was named the general's successor. Aidid, who refused to accept the conference action, responded by convening a meeting of representatives from a number of groups of supporters who unanimously elected him Somali "president" for a three-year term. On June 16 Interim President Mahdi joined Osman Ato in condemning Aidid's "self-appointment."

In late August 1995 fighting broke out along a Green Line demarcating sectors of Mogadishu controlled by Aidid and Mahdi. The clash was apparently triggered by Aidid's efforts to confiscate weapons from civilians as part of a "rehabilitation and disarmament" drive, which followed the failure of a "reconciliation" conference launched by Osman Ato in Nairobi with the support of the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC). In September Aidid's forces captured the important town of Baidoa, some 90 miles northwest of the capital.

Aidid and his militiamen continued their offensive through early 1996, scoring a number of victories outside of the capital, including the capture of at least two more towns, before being slowed by the Mahdi-allied Rahanweyn Resistance Army (RRA). Subsequently, theretofore low-level hostilities erupted into widespread fighting following the collapse of peace talks in April. Particularly intense clashes were reported in Mogadishu, where, in July, the warring factions were reported to be preparing for an all-out battle for control of the capital. However, on August 1, 1996, General Aidid died from wounds reportedly suffered one week earlier in a battle against Ato's forces in the Medina neighborhood of Mogadishu. Calling Aidid's death an opportunity to launch fresh peace negotiations, Mahdi and Ato immediately announced a cease-fire.

Optimism was quickly dampened, however, by the SNA's election of Aidid's son, Hussein Mohamed Farah AIDID, as "interim president of Somalia." At his "inauguration" on August 4, 1996, Aidid, a U.S.-educated former Marine who had returned to Somalia a year earlier, pledged to gain revenge on his father's killers, and renewed fighting was subsequently reported in Mogadishu. Meanwhile, international observers had persuaded Aidid, Mahdi, and Ato to accept the establishment of a commission to prepare for reconciliation negotiations, and in Nairobi on October 15 the three agreed to begin a cease-fire, remove roadblocks between the areas under their control, and facilitate the distribution of humanitarian aid. The cease-fire proved short-lived, however, with fighting beginning anew in late October.

In mid-November 1996 representatives of 26 groups, including nearly all of the major factions (with the notable exception of Aidid's), convened in Sodere, Ethiopia, for peace talks sponsored by the Organization of African Unity (OAU, subsequently the African Union—AU). On January 3, 1997, the participants announced the creation of a 41-member National Salvation Council (NSC) under the leadership of five faction leaders (including Mahdi and Ato), as well as an 11-member National Executive Committee (NEC). The NSC was charged with organizing a national reconciliation conference (then scheduled for June 1997) at which a transitional government would be formed. For his part, Aidid rejected the NSC's entreaties to participate, reasserting that he was already the "legitimate leader of all Somalia."

Despite the efforts of the NSC's preparatory committee in the first half of 1997, prospects for an all-inclusive agreement remained slim as Aidid continued to refuse to participate and actively sought to resuscitate the October 1996 accord, meeting and signing new pacts with Ato and Mahdi in Cairo, Egypt, in early and late May, respectively. In June the NSC rescheduled the proposed reconciliation conference to November; however, in October the conference was postponed indefinitely, ostensibly because of a lack of international funding. On the other hand, Egypt continued its efforts to provide an alternative to the now-stalemated Sodere plan, and in early December Aidid and leaders of other factions signed an accord in Cairo that included provisions for a "government of national union." The NSC ratified the accord in early January 1998 and scheduled a national reconciliation conference for February 15 to select a transitional president, a prime minister, a 13-member Presidential Council, and a 189-member Council of Deputies. However, the conference was postponed, and, despite subsequent efforts to resuscitate the pact, Somalia remained without a national governing authority. (On March 20 Aidid had reportedly renounced his claim to the presidency and, restyling himself "co-president," had pledged to cooperate with nominal president Mahdi.)

On July 23, 1998, a conference of some 300 leaders from the northeast region of Puntland declared the establishment of an autonomous government under the presidency of Col. Abdullahi YUSUF AHMED, a longtime military and political leader (see Somali Salvation Democratic Front under Political Parties and Groups, below). Although the conference also established a 66-member House of Representatives (appointed by local leaders, essentially on a subclan basis), a charter endorsed by the house (as well as an informal council of traditional leaders) in September rejected secession for the region, calling instead for eventual establishment of a federal system in which regional governments would enjoy extensive autonomy. A transitional government of three years' duration was initially envisioned for Puntland.

On May 2, 2000, in Arta, Djibouti, Ismail Omar Guelleh, the new president of Djibouti, convened a Somali National Peace Conference (SNPC) of prominent Somali figures representing a wide range of constituencies, including religious groups, the business community, traditional elders, intellectuals, women's organizations, and clans. (The conference was endorsed by the UN, OAU, and the Inter-Governmental Authority on Development [IGAD].) On July 16 the SNPC approved a national charter providing for a three-year Transitional National Government (TNG) to be led by a Transitional National Assembly (TNA, appointed on a clan basis) and a president (elected by the TNA). The TNA convened for the first time in Arta on August 13, and on August 27 it elected Abdiqassim SALAD HASSAN, a former deputy prime minister and interior minister in the Siad Barre regime, as president. On October 2 Salad Hassan appointed Ali Khalif GALAYDH, a professor and prominent businessman, as prime minister. Galaydh announced his first ministerial appointments, carefully balanced among clans, on October 20. Although the fledgling interim central government subsequently moved to Mogadishu, its potential effectiveness remained in serious question because it had not received the endorsement of Somaliland, the regional administration established in Puntland, or most factional militia leaders. Of the prominent Somali “warlords,” only Mahdi had attended the SNPC. He was subsequently appointed to the new assembly and pledged his support to the TNG.

In February 2001 Prime Minister Galaydh announced a cabinet reshuffle, with the pro-Mahdi faction of the USC formally joining the government. However, Galaydh’s government, apparently being blamed by the public for the lack of progress in negotiations with the recalcitrant warlords, lost a confidence motion in the assembly by a reported vote of 141–29 on October 28. President Salad Hassan on November 12 named Hasan Abshir FARAH, a former cabinet member, to replace Galaydh. Following the successful negotiation of a power-sharing agreement with several minor warlords in late December, Farah announced a new cabinet on February 16, 2002.

Meanwhile, political affairs in Puntland also remained complicated. As the conclusion neared of the three-year mandate accorded the transitional government of Yusuf Ahmed in 1998, it was announced in late June 2001 that the Puntland House of Representatives and clan elders had extended the government’s authority for another three years, the Puntland administration continuing to reject the legitimacy of the TNG. However, Puntland Chief Justice Yusuf Haji NUR in early July declared the extension “unconstitutional” and announced he had assumed authority as “acting president” pending new regional elections. Yusuf Ahmed rejected Nur’s dictate, and fighting was reported in August between Yusuf Ahmed’s forces (reportedly supported by Ethiopia) and those of Nur’s (believed to have the support of the TNG and, according to charges from Yusuf Ahmed, the Islamic Union [see Political Parties and Groups, below].) With Yusuf Ahmed now “ruling” from the city of Galkacyo and Nur controlling the regional capital of Garowe, a controversial congress of clan elders opened in Garowe in late August. On November 14 the congress, deemed “illegal and destabilizing” by Yusuf Ahmed, elected Jama Ali JAMA, a former army colonel who had been imprisoned for part of the Siad Barre regime, as the new president of Puntland from among 12 candidates. Although Jama was inaugurated on November 19, Yusuf Ahmed’s forces by May 2002 had effectively regained control of the region. The TNG subsequently continued to reference Jama as the “legitimate” president, but Yusuf Ahmed was still exercising full authority as the year ended.

Further complicating the situation in Somalia was the announcement of the formation on April 1, 2002, of an autonomous government in the self-described State of Southwestern Somalia, the third such breakaway administration (the others being Somaliland and Puntland) to be formed. Although internal dissension was reported on the matter, the new regional government was launched under the umbrella of the Somali Reconciliation and Reconstruction Council (SRRC), a loose coalition of southern factions that had been launched in 2001 in opposition to the TNG (see Somali National Alliance under Political Parties and Groups, below, for additional information on the SRRC). Col. Hassan Mohammed NUR (“Shatigadud”) of the RRA was named president of the new administration, also slated to include a cabinet and 145-member legislature.

Most of the major factions in the Somalian conflict resumed negotiations in October 2002 in Kenya, although Somaliland declined to attend. On July 5, 2003, the parties appeared to agree on a transitional peace plan, but Salad Hassan rejected the proposal, claiming that Prime Minister Farah had exceeded his authority by agreeing to allow too much power to remain at the regional level under the tentative agreement. On August 9 Salad Hassan dismissed Farah as prime minister, naming Osman JAMA ALI (former deputy prime minister) to the post. However, Jama Ali resigned on November 28, reportedly due to conflict with the president. He was succeeded on December 8 by Mohamed Abdi YUSUF, the deputy speaker of the TNA, which subsequently endorsed a new 37-member cabinet. Meanwhile, in Puntland, Yusuf Ahmed had initiated peace talks with rival groups in May 2003 that had yielded an agreement under which he was fully recognized as president while former opponents were named to the new Puntland cabinet.

In January 2004 several hitherto reluctant rebel and opposition groups (including the RRA) joined the peace negotiations in Kenya, and on January 29 some 42 factions and warlords signed a potentially historic comprehensive accord based on a Transitional Federal Charter (TFC) that provided for a transitional legislature that would elect a president and confirm a new transitional government. The TNA approved the settlement on February 9, and the new legislature (the Transitional Federal Parliament—TFP) was filled by clan and subclan appointees by early August.

In the third round of balloting for a national president in the TFP on October 10, 2004, Yusuf Ahmed was elected by a vote of 189–79. (Eleven candidates had contended the first round.) On November 3 the new president appointed Ali Mohammed GHEDI as prime minister, but the TFP on December 11 voted down his first proposed cabinet, apparently because a number of clans were not happy with their representation. However, an expanded and revised Transitional Federal Government (TFG) won TFP approval on January 7, 2005, all activity occurring in Kenya due to continued unsettled conditions in Somalia. Somaliland remained divorced from the new institutions, although the breakaway status of the State of Southwestern Somalia appeared resolved by Colonel Shatigadud's inclusion in the new national government.

Constitution and Government

For the decade after the October 1969 coup, supreme power was vested in the Central Committee of the SRSP, whose secretary general served as head of state and chief executive. For all practical purposes these arrangements were continued under a constitution approved in 1979, which provided additionally for a People's Assembly of 177 members, 171 of whom were nominated by the party and 6 by the president. The president was popularly elected for a seven-year term after having been nominated by the SRSP as the sole candidate. These and other provisions of the 1979 basic law were effectively suspended with the collapse of the Siad Barre regime in January 1991, following which the independent republic of Somaliland was declared in May in the northwest (see separate article for details on the administration in Somaliland).

In part with the goal of encouraging eventual participation by the administrations already established in Somaliland and Puntland, the national charter adopted by the SNPC in July 2000 called for a federal system with strong regional governments. Pending formal establishment of such a system under a new constitution, the SNPC authorized a three-year TNG, with legislative responsibility delegated to an appointed House of Representatives. The charter also promised an independent judiciary, protection of the freedom of expression and other human rights, and support for multiparty activity. (For details of new transitional institutions established through the Transitional Federal Charter of January 2004, see Political background, above.)

Administratively, the country is divided into 15 regions, which are subdivided into 70 districts, plus the city of Mogadishu.

Foreign Relations

Although a member of the United Nations, the AU, and the Arab League, Somalia has been chiefly concerned with the problems of its own immediate area, where seasonal migrations by Somali herds-men have long strained relations with neighboring states. The most serious disputes have been with Ethiopia. Somali claims to the Ogaden desert region precipitated conflicts beginning in 1963 that escalated into a full-scale war in 1977–1978 when government troops entered the region, eventually to be driven back by an Ethiopian counteroffensive. The war had international implications, producing a reversal of roles for the Soviet Union and the United States in the Horn of Africa. Ethiopia, previously dependent on the United States for military support, was the recipient of a massive influx of arms and advisers from the Soviet Union and Cuba. Collaterally, Somalia, which had developed an extensive network of relations with communist countries, broke with Moscow and Havana in favor of reliance on the West, eventually agreeing in 1980 to make port facilities available to the U.S. Rapid Deployment Force for the Middle East in return for American arms. Somalia normalized relations with the USSR in 1986 and Cuba in 1989 but continued to receive substantial military aid from the United States.

Although the 1979 constitution called for “the liberation of Somali territories under colonial occupation”—implicitly referencing Somali-populated areas of Kenya as well as of Ethiopia—the Somalis promised that they would not intervene militarily in support of external dissidents. Tense relations and occasional border hostilities continued, however, with Ethiopia supporting the major Somali opposition groups in guerrilla operations. In January 1986 President Siad Barre and Ethiopian leader Mengistu Haile-Mariam established a joint ministerial commission to resolve the Ogaden question, but no results were achieved during the ensuing year, with Somalia condemning Ethiopia for a cross-border attack in February 1987. Following major Ethiopian reverses at the hands of Eritrean secessionists in the north, Siad Barre and Mengistu conferred during a drought conference in Djibouti in March 1988 and agreed to peace talks in Mogadishu in early April. The discussions yielded a communiqué that pledged a military “disengagement and separation,” an exchange of prisoners, the reestablishment of diplomatic relations, and the joint cessation of support for opposition groups.

In early August 1996 Ethiopian forces attacked three towns in Somalia’s Gedo region in an apparent attempt to squash the activities of the Islamic Union (see Political Parties and Groups, below), which had claimed credit for bombings and assassination attempts in Ethiopia as part of its campaign for the Ogaden region’s independence. The offensive continued into 1997, and by early February Ethiopian troops had reportedly overrun the Islamic fighters’ last base in the region. Ethiopia’s military advances proved costly on the diplomatic front, however, as a number of Somalian faction leaders, most important the SNA’s Aidid, condemned the “occupation” and refused to participate in the peace process launched in November 1996 in Sodere, Ethiopia. Thereafter, Aidid’s efforts to revive the short-lived Nairobi accord of October 1996 were actively supported by Kenya and Egypt. The latter championed the establishment of a unified and centrally governed Somalia as opposed to an Ethiopian diplomatic advance, which one analyst labeled “divisive.” Much of southern Somalia subsequently came under Ethiopian influence as the result of Ethiopian initiatives relating to its war with Eritrea in 1998–2000. The TNG in Somalia subsequently accused Ethiopia of supplying weapons to anti-TNG warlords in Somalia. Meanwhile, the activities of the Islamic Union also attracted the interest of the United States because of the latter’s “war on terrorism” following the terrorist attacks in September 2001.

Many African states recognized the TFG established in late 2004 and early 2005 to govern Somalia, and the AU authorized a contingency peacekeeping force for possible deployment in Somalia. Meanwhile, the European Union pledged financial and technical aid for the new administration, but the United States as of mid-2005 had developed only “informal ties” with the TFG. Negotiations over the size and makeup of the proposed AU peacekeeping force continued through 2005, and the outbreak of hostilities in Mogadishu in early 2006 appeared to jeopardize the plan.

In April 2006 Prime Minister Ghedi gave the United States permission to patrol the waters off the coast of Somalia to suppress piracy. (Some 35 pirate attacks had been reported in 2005.) Reports had also previously surfaced that U.S. marines and special forces had undertaken several covert antiterrorist operations in Somalia, prompting minor rioting and protests in some cities.

Current Issues

The establishment of regional administrations in Banaadir (encompassing Mogadishu) and Puntland in mid-1998 exemplified what observers described as a potential “bottom up” approach to ending Somalia’s civil strife. However, the country’s political, economic, and social quagmire subsequently remained intractable, despite the efforts of regional and international mediators. Significantly, unofficial Islamic courts began operating throughout much of the country in the late 1990s, reportedly backed by the business community in the hope of combating rampant banditry and other criminal activity. Islamic militias also apparently challenged the control of long-entrenched warlords in some areas.

The establishment of the Transitional National Government (TNG) in mid-2000 evoked “high emotion” in many domestic sectors as hope spread that nearly a decade of fighting, which had left hundreds of thousands of people dead and millions displaced, was coming to an end. However, despite the fact that mass demonstrations greeted President Salad Hassan in Mogadishu following his inauguration in August, it quickly became clear that the new administration remained tenuous because of the absence of support from numerous warlords, including General Aidid. Salad Hassan and new prime minister Galaydh declared “law and order,” national reconciliation, and infrastructure rehabilitation to be their top priorities. Intense negotiations were subsequently reported between the TNG and recalcitrant warlords, but security issues remained unresolved, costing Galaydh the premiership in late 2001.

The peace talks launched in Kenya in October 2002 were attended by a number of regional leaders as well as representatives of Somalia’s civil society. Although some of the warlords at the negotiations endorsed an immediate cease-fire, sporadic fighting continued in several parts of Somalia. The addition of holdout rebel groups to the negotiations in January 2004 appeared to break the long-standing impasse and offer the best chance to date to end the national nightmare. However, underscoring the continued fragility of the security situation, the Transitional Federal Government (TFG) established in late 2004 and early 2005 remained in Kenya until April 2005. Fighting was reported when Prime Minister Ghedi finally attempted to settle his government in Mogadishu, and most government operations were shifted to more stable cities in the south. Meanwhile, it was unclear how the new national government would ultimately affect the autonomous government in Puntland (where Mohamed Muse HERSI had been elected president in January), and there was no indication of possible reconciliation from Somaliland.

Tensions over where the government should locate subsequently continued to constrain the TFG’s effectiveness, as did reported clan rivalries within the cabinet. Consequently, plans for the demobilization of clan militias in favor of a unified national army failed to produce significant results. Underscoring the fragility of the situation, a bomb exploded following an address by Prime Minister Ghedi in May 2005 in Mogadishu, killing more than 15 people. Ghedi, the cabinet, and some legislators subsequently settled in Jowhar, while other legislators attempted to operate out of Mogadishu. Ghedi survived another assassination attempt during a trip to Mogadishu in November, an event that triggered a new round of fighting in the capital. At the same time it was reported that Islamic fighters were filtering into Mogadishu to support the Islamic Courts Union (ICU, see Political Parties and Groups, below).

The full TNA met for the first time in Baidoa in February 2006. However, it remained clear that the TFG lacked the military means to confront the warlords who had controlled Mogadishu for the past 15 years. Following severe rioting in February, prompted by the publication of cartoons in Denmark deemed offensive to Muslims, fighting intensified in Mogadishu between the ICU militias and the warlords, who had formed the Alliance for the Restoration of Peace and Counter-Terrorism (ARPCT). (It was widely reported that the ARPCT received financial and intelligence support from the United States, which apparently had earlier recruited the warlords to assist in capturing suspected al-Qaida members in Somalia.) Street conflict quickly grew into major battles that culminated in the Islamists routing the warlords and taking control of Mogadishu and surrounding areas in June. The ICU subsequently established a Council of the Islamic Courts to govern the capital.

Much of the population in Mogadishu reportedly welcomed the ICU victory as representing relief from the violence, “arbitrary rule,” and “exploitation” that had marked the reign of the warlords. At the same time, concern was voiced over the potential for the imposition of extreme religious strictures. It was also unclear whether the ICU would decide to try to extend its control throughout the rest of the country. (Hard-liners in the group reportedly called for an Islamic state that would also include parts of Ethiopia, Kenya, and Djibouti.) The international community urged negotiations between the TFG (located in Baidoa) and the Islamists toward creation of a government of national unity. However, talks remained stalled as of mid-August. The Inter-Governmental Authority on Development agreed to send 6,800 peacekeepers to Somalia in case of a comprehensive agreement, but the Islamists, already reportedly infuriated by Ethiopian support for the TFG, rejected the proposal outright.

Political Parties and Groups

From the time of its inaugural congress in June 1976 to the nominal authorization of a multiparty system in December 1990, the Somali Revolutionary Socialist Party (SRSP) was the country’s only authorized political formation. The SRSP virtually ceased to exist with the collapse of the Siad Barre regime in January 1991, at which time a large number of additional groups, almost all of them clan-based, emerged from clandestine or insurrectionary activity. The most important of the new formations was the United Somali Congress (USC), organized in January 1989. Subsequently, in November 1993, several components of the USC helped to launch the Somali Salvation Alliance (SSA), a loose coalition that also included components of the SDM, SAMO, SPM, SSDF, NSA, and SSNM, as well as the Somali Democratic Front, led by Ali MOHAMED HAMED; the Somali National Democratic Union (SNDU); and the Somali National Union (SNU), led by Mohamed RAJIS MOHAMED. The SSA was supportive of Ali MAHDI MOHAMED (who had become the nominal president of Somalia in 1991 following the ouster of Gen. Siad Barre) in his leadership fight with Gen. Mohamed Farah Aidid and, after 1996, General Aidid’s son, Hussein Mohamed Farah Aidid. Both Aidids were supported by the Somali National Alliance (SNA, see below); consequently, other groups routinely added SSA or SNA to their names to indicate their positions regarding the leadership fights.

Severe splintering continued in the SSA in the second half of the 1990s, some factions accusing Mahdi of pursuing a self-serving agenda. Mahdi attended the Somali National Peace Conference (SNPC) in Djibouti in 2000, was chosen as a member of the new Transitional National Assembly, and subsequently fully supported the interim central government led by President Salad Hassan. Although references continued in early 2001 to Mahdi’s leadership of the SSA, he by that time faced a challenge from antigovernment dissidents for use of the SSA rubric (see USC-SSA, below). Mahdi’s supporters reportedly considered a “revival” of the SSA in mid-2002, but the initiative did not subsequently appear to maintain momentum.

Islamic Courts Union (ICU). A fundamentalist movement devoted to the creation of an Islamic state in Somalia governed by sharia (Islamic religious law), the ICU was formed in 2004 by some five of the Islamic courts that had arisen in and around Mogadishu since the mid-1990s and had become the capital’s de facto judiciary. Dominated by the Hawiye clan, the ICU created its own militia to protect the courts and help to enforce the courts' decisions. Following the example of successful fundamentalist movements elsewhere in the world, the Union also set up schools and hospitals in Mogadishu, reportedly gaining popular support for these and other services.

By late 2005 the ICU had grown to include 11 courts, bolstered by a militia force of at least 1,500 Somalis as well as, reportedly, a number of militant Islamists from other countries. In early 2006, the Ifka Halam court led by Sheikh Hassan Dahir Aweys (a hard-line former leader of the Islamic Union currently on the U.S. list of terrorism suspects) launched a campaign to drive the warlord militias out of Mogadishu. The ICU victory was secured in June, and the ICU subsequently announced the establishment of an 88-member Council of the Islamic Courts to govern Mogadishu. Aweys was selected as leader of the new council, while Sheikh Sharif Ahmed, the moderate chair of the ICU, was named head of the council's executive committee.

Leaders: Sheikh Hassan Dahir AWEYS (Leader of the Council of the Islamic Courts); Sheikh Sharif AHMED (Chair of the ICU).

United Somali Congress (USC). Organized in January 1989 by members of the Hawiye clan of central Somalia, the USC was instrumental in the ouster of President Siad Barre in 1991, and the grouping's principal financial backer, Ali Mahdi Mohamed, was shortly thereafter named interim president of the republic. However, at the party's third congress held July 4–5, Gen. Mohamed Farah Aidid was elected USC chair, provoking a bitter dispute with Mahdi and clashes between their respective factions in the autumn that produced widespread death and dislocation in Mogadishu. The USC subsequently remained split between pro-Mahdi and pro-Aidid factions referenced as the USC-SSA and USC-SNA, respectively. Further splintering occurred in June 1995 when Osman Hasan Ali ("Osman Ato"), a longtime ally of Aidid's, turned against the general and was named chair of a dissident USC-SNA.

In February 2001 Muhammad Qanyarsh AFRAH, a USC leader, was named to the cabinet. However, a major USC-SSA faction, under the leadership of Musa Sudi YALLAHOW (who had challenged Mahdi for the SSA leadership in 1999) and Umar Muhammad MAHMUD ("Umar Finish"), continued to reject participation in the government. Further splintering occurred in December when Umar Finish and his supporters signed the proposed expanded power-sharing agreement, while Yallahow opposed the pact. Fighters loyal to Yallahow engaged TNG troops routinely throughout 2002, and his faction remained an integral part of the Somali Reconciliation and Reconstruction Council (SRRC) and joined in the launching of the breakaway autonomous administration in the southwest (see Political background, above). Some factions joined in the negotiations, which resulted in the 2004 TFC, and Osman Ato and Yallahow joined the 2004 transitional government.

Somali National Alliance (SNA). The SNA was launched by Gen. Mohamed Farah Aidid following the leadership conflict in 1992 in the USC (see above). The SNA claimed the support of some two dozen affiliates, including factions of the USC, SDM, SPM, SSDF, and SSNM.

In October 1994 General Aidid, responding to the announcement by his adversary, Ali Mahdi Mohamed, of a Group of Twelve alliance, announced a G-12 of his own that encompassed Aidid supporters from the previous five formations; a number of SSA dissidents; the National Democratic Union (NDU); an SNU faction led by Umar MUNGANI AWEYS; an SAMO faction led by Sheikh JAMA HUSSEIN; a faction of the Somali National Democratic Union (SNDU) led by Ali ISMAIL ABDI and Ahmad MAHMUD ATO; and a United Somalia Party (USP) faction led by Hasan Haji UMAR AMI. The other two places on Aidid's G-12 list were assigned to a northwestern clan grouping, the Somali Democratic Alliance (SDA), and Somaliland's Somali National Movement (SNM), which Abdurahmane Ahmed Ali insisted that he still led (see the Somaliland article for both groups).

In May 1995, Osman Hasan Ali ("Osman Ato"), a longtime adviser to General Aidid, broke with Aidid and announced he had assumed the leadership of the SNA. Osman Ato and his supporters were subsequently referenced as representing a dissident branch of the USC-SNA.

Several additional groups reportedly supported General Aidid at the time of his presidential self-proclamation in June 1995, including the Somali Democratic Movement–Original (SDM–Asalow), led by Dr. Yusuf ALI YUSUF, and an SPM faction led by Barreh UGAS GEDI.

Following the death of General Aidid in August 1996, his son, Hussein Mohamed Farah Aidid, an American-educated former U.S. Marine, was elected “president” and SNA leader, respectively, in a three-day, two-part electoral process that reportedly split the clan along generational lines. Older members criticized his lack of experience and his links to the United States, while younger members heralded his military background and “charisma.” Subsequently, although there was widespread speculation that the younger Aidid would only serve as a figurehead for the SNA’s militia, he immediately pursued reconciliation pacts with a number of SNA clan leaders whom his father had alienated.

In April 1997 approximately 800 SNA militants broke off from the grouping, accusing the Farah Aidid “government” of corruption and complaining that they had not been given the respect due a national army. SNA militiamen subsequently battled with forces from the RRA (below) for control of Baidoa.

Aidid, whose militia continued to control portions of Mogadishu and surrounding areas, declined to participate in the SNPC, held in Arta, Djibouti, in 2000, and rejected the resultant transitional government. In early 2001 Aidid, still referring to himself as chair of the SNA, was announced as chair of the Somali Reconciliation and Reconstruction Council (SRRC), a new grouping of some 21 southern faction leaders committed to establishing their own interim central government as an alternative to the “Arta” plan.

Other prominent SRRC members included the RRA, SSNM, and a main faction of the SPM. Aidid was elected as the first SRRC chair, while Mawlid MA’ANE MAGMUD was named as the group’s general secretary. However, Ma’ane Magmud, described as the leader of the Bantu community in Somalia, broke from the SRRC and endorsed the December 2001 power-sharing agreement between the TNG and several warlords and faction leaders. The SRRC subsequently continued to serve as the primary challenge to the TNG’s authority, and in April 2002 it announced the formation of a break-away state in southern Somalia. Farah Aidid supported the 2004 TFC and was appointed a deputy prime minister and the internal affairs minister in the December transitional government.

Leader: Hussein Mohamed FARAH AIDID (Chair).

Rahanweyn Resistance Army (RRA). Assisted by troops from Ethiopia, the RRA in 1999 seized control of much of south-central Somalia (home to the Digil and Mirifle clans) and expelled Ethiopian rebel groups from the region. The RRA was a core component of the Somali Peace Alliance (SPA), established in August 1999 to promote the “rebuilding” of a central government through the initial establishment of a number of autonomous regional governments. (The SPA was led by Col. Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed of Puntland and also included the pro-Ethiopian wing of the SNF.) In December 2000 the leader of the RRA, Col. Hassan Mohammed Nur (“Shatigadud”), rejected the authority of the TNG, and the RRA subsequently indicated plans to set up its own regional administration. In January 2001 the SPA appeared to have been superseded by a National Restoration Council (NRC), itself a precursor, in part at least, to the SRRC (see SNA, above). Colonel Shatigadud was elected president of the Southwestern Regional Government announced in April 2002, although some RRA members, led by Muhammad Ibrahim HABSADE and Sheikh Adan MADOBE, opposed that initiative. Fierce fighting was subsequently reported between the two RRA factions. Shatigadud was appointed agriculture minister in December 2004. However, in June 2005, there were reports that Shatigadud’s militia forces were regrouping and preparing for renewed attacks. Madobe was appointed minister of justice in the subsequent transitional government.

Leaders: Col. Hassan Mohammed NUR (“Shatigadud”), Mohamed Ali Adeh QALINLEH.

Somali National Front (SNF). The SNF was launched in 1991 by Darod clan interests in southern Somalia as a guerrilla force seeking the return to power of Siad Barre. Led by the former dictator’s son-in-law, Gen. Mohamed Said Hersi (“Morgan”), the group was described as a “fair-weather-ally of Mahdi Mohamed.”

In 1997 SNF militants clashed with Islamic Union fighters fleeing invading Ethiopian troops. Clashes between the SNF and Islamic militants continued into 1998, with the SNF allegedly receiving funding from Ethiopia. In addition, fighting between the SNF and SSDF was reported in the south. Moreover, beginning in April, the SNF suffered from intraparty battles in Kismayu, where General Morgan attempted to fend off attacks by fighters loyal to Omar HAJI MASALEH. (Haji Masaleh and his militiamen were reportedly supported by Mogadishu warlords Farah Aidid and Ali Mahdi.) Severe splintering continued into 2002; by that time General Morgan was no longer referenced as an SNF leader, the progovernment, anti-Ethiopian SNF faction reportedly led by Col. Abdouzarak Issak BINI and the main pro-Ethiopian faction, which joined the NRC and SRRC, led by Mohamad Sayyid ADEN.

Somali Patriotic Movement (SPM). The SPM surfaced in 1989 on behalf of Ogadeni soldiers of the southern Darod clan who formerly supported Siad Barre but had initiated antigovernment attacks in the area between the Juba River and the Kenyan border in an effort to gain autonomy for the region.

The SPM’s leader, Gen. Adan Abdullahi Noor (“Gabio”), was one of five NSC cochairs appointed in early 1997. By that time the SPM was split into at least two main factions—one led by Noor and General Morgan (formerly of the SNF, above) and one led by Col. Umar Jess, who had once partnered with the SNM in Somaliland before joining the SPM in alliance with General Aidid in 1992. Fighting between the two factions for control of the rich agricultural region of the Juba Valley was subsequently reported, as were skirmishes between SPM fighters and those from the rival Juba Valley Alliance (see below). Neither faction reached an agreement with the TNG, Noor and his supporters participating in the launch of the SRRC. Morgan was one of the few major warlords who did not participate in the negotiations over the TFC. He later agreed to support the TFP but opposed the election of Yusuf Ahmed as President.

Leaders: Gen. Adan Abdullahi NOOR (“Gabio”), Gen. Mohamed Said HERSI (“Morgan”), Col. Ahmed Umar JESS.

Islamic Union (A-Itihad al-Islami). The Islamic Union was initially described by the New York Times as a “faction made up of fervently religious people, mostly from the Ogadeni clan of Somalia,” dedicated to gaining independence for the Ogaden region. Throughout the first half of 1996 the Union claimed responsibility for a number of terrorist attacks in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, including the attempted assassination of a cabinet member. In August Ethiopian forces attacked three Union-controlled towns in the Gedo region of Somalia and claimed to have killed over 200 Islamic fighters before withdrawing. Consequently, Union leader Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys declared a “holy war” against Ethiopia and accused Ethiopia of harboring plans to occupy Somalian territory.

In late 1996 Hussein Farah Aidid reportedly sought to establish a dialogue with the Union, and in early 1997 the latter announced its interest in attaining legal party status. However, such concerns were subsequently overshadowed when an Ethiopian offensive into Somalia drove Union fighters from their last remaining military base in the Gedo region. Compounding the Union’s military woes, SNF forces were reported to be attacking Union fighters retreating from the border region. In 1998 the Union accused Ethiopia of orchestrating assassination attempts against its leaders.

The United States expressed concern in the early 2000s about possible links between the Islamic Union and al-Qaida, although Union leaders have steadfastly denied any connection to terrorist activities or proclivities. However, the Union has supported the growing influence of Islamic courts in Somalia. Meanwhile, Col. Yusuf Ahmed, the leader of Puntland, accused the Islamic Union of being behind efforts by Jama Ali Jama to secure power in that autonomous region (see Political background, above, for details). However, some analysts have described reports of Union influence in Somalia as “overblown.” In 2005 Yusuf Ahmed reported that the Union had ceased any major operations in Somalia. Many of the fighters of the Islamic Union were subsequently reported to have joined the Islamic Courts Union (above).

Somali Salvation Democratic Front (SSDF). The SSDF was initially organized in 1982 as the Democratic Front for the Salvation of Somalia (DFSS) by merger of three dissident groups: the Somali Salvation Front (SSF), the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Somalia (DFLS), and the Somali Workers’ Party (SWP). The SSF (also known as Sosaf) had been formed in 1976 as the Somali Democratic Action Front (Sodaf), with headquarters in Rome, Italy, the change of name and relocation to Addis Ababa occurring in early 1979. Its leader at the launching of the DFSS was Col. Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed, who had defected from Somalia with a group of army officers in 1978 following an abortive coup attempt. Most SSF members were drawn from the secessionist-oriented Mijarteyn tribe of northeastern Somalia, some of whom were executed after the coup had failed.

The DFLS, another Ethiopian-backed group, was led at the time of the merger by Abderahman AIDID AHMED, reportedly a former chair of the SRSP Ideological Bureau. The SWP, a Soviet-supported movement headquartered in South Yemen, was led by Hussein SAID JAMA, a former member of the SRSP’s Central Committee.

At the inauguration of the DFSS, Yusuf Ahmed was named chair, Said Jama vice president, and Aidid Ahmed secretary general. A party congress in March 1983 elected a 21-member central committee and a nine-member executive committee and adopted a constitution and a political program that called for the overthrow of the Siad Barre regime, the removal of U.S. bases from Somalia, and the establishment of “genuine peace and cooperation based on the brotherhood of the Horn of Africa.” However, some DFLS and SWP members reportedly were excluded from the new formation at the 1983 congress, and Said Jama and Aidid Ahmed were removed from their leadership positions the following November. In January 1984 it was reported that a number of DFSS members opposed to Yusuf Ahmed’s leadership had accepted government amnesty, as had about 200 guerrillas in May. In July 1985 Said Jama was reported to have founded a splinter group, the Somali Patriotic Liberation Front (SPLF), based, like its SWP predecessor, in Aden, South Yemen. In October 1985 Yusuf Ahmed, who had been criticized for his attempts to lessen Ethiopian influence over the DFSS and for his unwillingness to facilitate further merger of Somali opposition movements, was arrested in Ethiopia and replaced as chair by Gen. Mohamed ABSHIR MUSSE.

In 1989 the DFSS leadership announced that the organization was no longer pursuing military confrontation with the government but was hoping for legal recognition as a political party should proposed political liberalization measures be implemented. What had been restyled as the SSDF split in May 1993, with Yusuf Ahmed concluding an accord with General Aidid, while the rump group under Abshir Musse became a member of the G-12 grouping led by Ali Mahdi. In 2000 the SSDF was referenced as supporting the TNG, an initiative opposed by Yusuf Ahmed, then the leader of the autonomous administration in Puntland. There subsequently was little reference to the SSDF.

Northern Somalia Alliance (NSA). The NSA was formed in 1997 by the merger of the United Somalia Front (USF) and the United Somalia Party (USP). The USF was launched in 1989 to represent the Issa community in the northwest (Somaliland). Subsequently, Somaliland’s President Ahmed Ali pledged that the party would participate in future multiparty elections. Prior to its alliance with the USF, little was known about the northwest-based

Cabinet

As of June 1, 2006 (see headnote)

Prime Minister	Ali Mohammed Ghedi
Deputy Prime Ministers	Hussein Mohamed Farah Aidid Salim Haji Aliyow Ibrow Mohamoud Mohamed
Ministers
Agriculture	Hassan Mohammed Nur ("Shatigadad")
Air and Land Transport	Adan Hasan
Animal Husbandry and Forestry	Ibrahim Muhammad Isaq
Cooperative Development	Muhammad Abdulbhi Kamil
Commerce	Musa Sudi Yallahow
Constitution and Federation	Abdallah Derow Isaq
Culture and Social Services	Abdi Hashi Abdullahi
Defense	Abdirahman Mahmud Ali
Education	Ali Abdullahi Osoble
Energy	Muhammed Nurani Bakar
Finance	Salim Haji Aliyow Ibrow
Fishing and Marine Resources	Hasan Abshir Farah
Foreign Affairs	Abdullah Sheikh Ismail
Health	Abdiaziz Sheikh Yusuf
Higher Education	Hasayn Muhammed Sheikh Husayn
Industry	Abdi Muhammed Tarah
Information	(Vacant)
Internal Affairs	Hussein Mohamed Farah Aidid
Justice	Sheikh Adan Madobe
Labor	Salah Ali Farah
Lands and Settlement	Mowlid Ma'ane Mahmud
Monetary Affairs	Abdikarim Ahmad Ali
National Assets	Mahmud Sayid Adan
National Security	Muhammed Qanyare Afrah
Planning and International Cooperation	Abdirizaq Usman Hasan
Petroleum	Yusuf Ahmad Muhammad
Ports and Marine Transport	Ali Isma'il Abdi
Posts and Communications	Ali Ahmad ("Jengali")
Public Works and Housing	Uthman Hasan Ali Ato
Reconciliation and Somali Communities Abroad	Sheikh Adan Sheikh Muhammad
Reconstruction and Resettlement	Col. Barre Aden Shire
Regional Cooperation	Isma'il Mahmud Hurre ("Buba")
Religious Affairs	Omar Mohamed Mohamud
Rehabilitation and Training of Militia	Botan Ise Alin
Rural Development	Muhammad Mahmud Guled
Science and Technology	Isma'il Hasan Jama
Settlement and Disaster Management	Muhammad Usman Maye
Sports and Youth Affairs	Ahmad Abdullahi Dakir

Tourism and Wildlife	Muhammad Mahmud Hayd
Water and Mineral Resources	Mahmud Salad Nur
Welfare of Disabled and Orphans	(Vacant)
Women's and Family Affairs	Fowzia Muhammad Sheikh [f]

Ministers of State

Defense	Ali Muhammad Hared
Foreign Affairs	Ibrahim Sheikh Ali Hafun
Parliament and Government Relations	Abdrahman Adan Ibdi
Presidency	Khalid Umar Hashi
Prime Minister's Office	Abdulqadin Mahmud Dakane

[f] = female

USP except for its opposition to Somaliland's independence. News reports have made few references to the NSA in recent years.

Leaders: Abdurahman DUALEH ALI (USF Chair); Ali Sheikh IBRAHIM ARAYE (USF); Gen. Mohamed OSMAN ALI (USF Secretary General); Mohamed ABDI HASHI (USP).

Southern Somali National Movement (SSNM). A south coastal formation, the SSNM is led by Abdi Warsame ISSAQ, who withdrew from the SNA in August 1993 to enter the pro-Mahdi G-12. In August 1997 one faction of the SSNM rejoined the pro-Aidid wing of the SNA. The SSNM-SNA, now under the leadership of Abdullahi Sheikh ISMAIL, participated in the formation of the SRRC in 2001 and the subsequent negotiations over the TFC. Ismail was appointed foreign minister in the transitional government installed in late 2004.

Somali Democratic Movement (SDM). The SDM is a Rahanweyn clan grouping that in early 1992 split into pro- and anti-Mahdi factions. Following Aidid's capture of Baidoa in August 1995, pro-Mahdi militants within the SDM formed the Rahanweyn Resistance Army (RRA, see above). As have most Somali parties and groups, the SDM has remained severely factionalized since the mid-1990s.

Leader: Abdulkabir Mohamed ADAN.

Other groups include the Juba Valley Alliance (JVA), which, under the leadership of Col. Barre Aden SHIRE ("Hirale"), has confronted the RRA and "Ethiopian influence" in the Juba Valley (Shire was appointed minister for reconstruction and resettlement in the December 2004 transitional government); the Muslim Youth Party, formed in late 2002 under the leadership of Ibrahim Muhammad HASSAN; the Peace and Development Party, organized in 2002 under the leadership of Gedi Shadron ABDULLAHI and Abdullahi Hassan AFRAH; the Somali African Muki Organization (SAMO), an ally of the RRA; the Somali Democratic Party, originally formed in 1993 in the Gedo region and reportedly relaunched in 2002 under the leadership of Abdi Barre ABDI and Omar Ibrahim MOHAMOUD; the Somali Islamic Party (SIP), which in 2002 called for a foreign peacekeeping force to be deployed in Somalia; the Somali Peace Loving Party, whose chair, Khalid Umar ALI, was reportedly involved in efforts to mediate between the TNG and opposition factions; the Somali Solidarity Party (SSP), formed in Mogadishu under the leadership of Abdulrahman Musa MUHAMMED and Muhammad UTHMAN; the Somali Unification Party, a small grouping led by warlord Hussein Haji BOD, who ultimately endorsed the 2000 reconciliation initiative with the TNG; the Unity for the Somali Republic Party (USRP), launched in 1999 under the leadership of Abdi Nur DARMAN; and the National Democratic League, formed in 2003 and led by Abdiwahid Abdulle ABDI.

Legislature

The former People's Assembly was dissolved after the overthrow of the SRSP government in January 1991. On August 13, 2000, a Transitional National Assembly (TNA) was inaugurated in accordance with the national charter adopted by the Somali National Peace Conference meeting in Arta, Djibouti. The TNA comprised 245 members appointed for a three-year term pending national elections. Each of four major clan groupings (Darod, Hawiye, Dir, and Digil-Mirifleh) was allowed to appoint 44 members, while 24 seats went to smaller clans and subclans. In addition, 25 seats (also reportedly allocated on a clan basis) were designated specifically for women, while Djibouti's President Ismail Omar Guelleh was given 20 appointments. (The charter had initially envisioned a 225-member TNA, but the 20 appointments were extended to President Guelleh, who had hosted the peace conference, to accommodate groupings [mostly small clans and subclans] who objected to their perceived marginalization in the first distribution of seats.) The TNA began formal legislative sessions in October in Mogadishu, although many members reportedly stayed away due to security concerns. Meanwhile, the government of Somaliland, the administration of the self-declared autonomous region of Puntland, and a number of major faction leaders in and around Mogadishu did not accept the authority of the TNA.

In January 2004 most of the parties involved in the political and military conflict in Somalia agreed to a comprehensive agreement that included provision for the creation of an appointed Transitional Federal Parliament (TFP) to serve for four years, following which direct elections were to be held for a permanent legislature. The TFP, sworn in on August 29, comprised 275 deputies; each of the four major clans appointed 61 members, while 31 seats were allocated to smaller clans and subclans.

Speaker: Sharif Hasan Sheikh ADAN.

Communications

Press

The press is undeveloped and circulation is low. During the Siad Barre era, the only daily was the government's Xiddigta Oktobar (October Star), which ceased publication after the former president's overthrow. Current periodicals published in Mogadishu include Ayaamaha, described as supportive of Hussein Farah Aidid; Qaran (Nation, 2,000), daily; Xog-Ogaal, daily; the Mogadishu Times; and Sooyal. The newspaper Sahan is published in the Puntland region.

News agencies

The domestic agency is the Somali National News Agency (Sonna).

Broadcasting

The previously government-owned Somali Broadcasting Service, now controlled by General Aidid's faction, operates Radio Mogadishu. Intermittent television service transmits to some 160,000 receivers in the vicinity of Mogadishu.

Intergovernmental Representation

Ambassador to the U.S.

The Washington embassy closed on May 8, 1991.

U.S. Ambassador to Somalia

(Vacant)

Permanent Representative to the UN

Elmi Ahmed DUALE

IGO Memberships (Non-UN)

AfDB, AFESD, AMF, AU, CAEU, IDB, IGAD, Interpol, LAS, NAM, OIC

SOMALILAND

REPUBLIC OF SOMALILAND

---

The Country

The northwest portion of the Somali Republic as constituted in 1960, Somaliland extends some 400 miles eastward from Djibouti along the Gulf of Aden. Most of the terrain is desert or semidesert, and it is estimated that nomadic animal-herders still constitute about one-half of the population. While sharing, as throughout Somalia, a common religion (Islam) and a common language (Somali), the people are divided into numerous clans and subclans, which contributed to the 1991 break with the south as well as subsequent difficulty in forging a wholly unified regime in the north.

Largely stable and peaceful since 1997, Somaliland has nevertheless failed to achieve international recognition for its independence as the result of concern, particularly among African leaders, that the “Balkanization” of Somalia would embolden secessionists throughout the continent. Consequently, international aid has been constrained, and the economy has depended primarily on remittances from workers abroad (an estimated $300 million in 2005). About 60 percent of the population reportedly relies on agriculture, including livestock, for a living, and annual GDP per capita is currently estimated at only $200. To attract the interest of the international private sector, the government has adopted a free-market orientation, including liberal investment policies. Development plans focus on expanding the production of frankincense and myrrh, exploiting rich coastal fishing grounds, and exploring the potentially lucrative gem sector. It has been estimated that up to two-thirds of the budget goes to military spending, much of it in the form of what are essentially “bribes” to former clan militiamen who have agreed to stop fighting each other in return for employment in the police force. Few resources are therefore available for educational, health, or infrastructure purposes. However, a degree of economic progress (particularly around Hargeisa and the port of Berbera) has been reported in recent years, lending support, in the opinion of some analysts, to the contention of the government that Somaliland would best be served by remaining outside the political and economic “maelstrom” of Somalia proper. Perhaps significantly, the European Union (EU) pledged in 2006 to increase its aid to Somaliland. Meanwhile, oil companies from South Africa, Malaysia, and India were authorized by the Somaliland administration to pursue off-shore oil exploration.

Government and Politics

Political Background

A British protectorate since 1887, Somaliland was overrun by Italian forces at the outbreak of World War II but was recaptured by Britain in 1941. The protectorate was terminated on June 26, 1960, and on July 1 Somaliland joined its theretofore Italian-administered counterpart in the south to form what was styled the United Republic of Somalia, prior to its redesignation as the Somali Democratic Republic in 1969.

In 1988 the Somali National Movement (SNM), a rebel group that had joined with Ethiopian units in a cross-border assault the year before, mounted a broad-gauged offensive that succeeded in driving government forces from most of the northern region's rural areas by mid-1989. However, the government continued its heavy bombing campaign against Hargeisa and other towns, much of the northern population reportedly fleeing to Ethiopia to escape the "genocidal campaign" of the Siad Barre regime. Meanwhile, elsewhere in Somalia, other clan-based groups had taken up arms, most important among them the United Somali Congress (USC) in central regions and the Somali Patriotic Movement (SPM) in the south (see Political Parties and Groups in article on Somalia for details).

On January 27, 1991, USC forces assumed control in Mogadishu, the Somalia capital, and appointed their principal backer, Ali Mahdi Mohamed, to the post of interim president. Ali Mahdi attempted to convene a "conference of national reconciliation" on February 28 but was rebuked by the SNM for having taken the initiative without prior consultation. A second such effort on March 14 also failed, and on May 18 the north proclaimed its independence as the Republic of Somaliland under the presidency of Abdurahman AHMED ALI ("Taur"). Many refugees subsequently returned to Somaliland from Ethiopia, discovering that the recent fighting, which had reportedly left 40,000 dead, had also devastated the region's infrastructure.

Ahmed Ali's control proved to be somewhat tenuous, and he did not attend a grand shir (gathering) of leading tribal, political, and military figures in Somaliland that met for most of February 1993 to discuss clan relations and the formalization of independence. Subsequently, a "parliamentary" meeting of the SNM Central Committee was convened to implement the shir's conclusions. On May 5 the same body named Mohamed Ibrahim EGAL, a former prime minister of Somalia who had been imprisoned by the Siad Barre regime for many years, to succeed Ahmed Ali as president, with Col. Abdurahman ALI, who had been sacked as education minister in February, as vice president.

During a meeting with Gen. Mohamed Farah Aidid of the Somali National Alliance (SNA) in Ethiopia in April 1994, Ahmed Ali unexpectedly called for Somaliland to rejoin Somalia. The appeal was immediately rejected by President Egal, who branded his predecessor as a traitor and termed Somaliland's independence as "irrevocable." Egal reiterated the position in late May by rejecting inclusion in a federal state and indicating that Somaliland would shortly be issuing its own currency and passports.

On October 15, 1994, fighting erupted in Hargeisa airport between government forces and defecting militiamen of the Issaq subclan of Eidogalla. By late November the rebels appeared to control most of the capital, despite claims by President Egal to the contrary, and by early December about three-quarters of the city's population had reportedly fled.

In January 1995, having embarked on a build-up of arms (reportedly supplied by Albania) and with an army increased to more than 3,000 men, Egal mounted an offensive that succeeded in driving the rebels from Hargeisa. On May 9 a spokesman in Nairobi announced the government's appointment of a Peace Committee, although the Mogadishu-based Ahmed Ali continued to support anti-Egal forces. Further clashes occurred in Hargeisa airport in August 1995 and along the frontier with Djibouti three months later. On the latter occasion the government blamed the Djibouti regime for providing support to dissident Issa militiamen belonging

Political Status: Former British Somaliland Protectorate; joined with (Italian) Trust Territory of Somalia on July 1, 1960, to form Somali Republic; announced secession as independent state on May 18, 1991; constitution endorsing independence and providing for multiparty activity approved by national referendum on May 31, 2001.

Area: 68,000 sq. mi. (176,120 sq. km.).

Population: 4,997,000 (2005E).

Major Urban Centers (1984E): HARGEISA (90,000), Berbera (83,000).

Principal Language: Somali.

Monetary Unit: Somaliland Shilling, which became Somaliland's sole legal tender on January 31, 1995, with an initial value of 100 Somali shillings = $1US. Due to the lack of international recognition of Somaliland's self-declared independent status, the exchange value of the shilling is not reported in regular currency listings. However, in July 2006 a market rate was reported of approximately 6,500 shillings = $1US.

President: Dahir Riyale KAHIN (United and Democratic People's Alliance); sworn in (based on his position as vice president and thereby the constitutionally authorized presidential successor) on May 3, 2002, following the death of Mohamed Haji Ibrahim EGAL (initially Somali National Movement, subsequently United and Democratic People's Alliance) the same day; popularly elected on April 14, 2003, and sworn in for a five-year term on May 16.

Vice President: Ahmad Yusuf YASIN (United and Democratic People's Alliance); named by the president on May 16, 2002, and approved by the legislature on May 21; popularly elected on April 14, 2003, and sworn in on May 16 for a five-year term.

to the United Somali Front (see Political Parties, below).

On the political front, meanwhile, in May 1995 the SNM Central Committee, acting as an interim parliament, reelected Egal president. In July Egal appointed a ten-member constitutional drafting committee that he charged with writing a new basic charter within 12 months. However, immediately thereafter, the president employed a Sudanese constitutional consultant who, along with the president and a reportedly shrinking circle of presidential advisors, drew up a draft document that included provisions for a U.S.-style presidency. In response to Egal's proposed constitution, the Central Committee, many of whose members were described as "infuriated" by the president's actions, presented a rival draft highlighted by a parliamentary democracy. The constitutional deadlock continued through mid-1996, thus "forcing" Egal to continue governing by decree.

Concurrent with the expiration of its own charter, the advisory Council of Elders in October 1996 convened a 315-member National Communities Conference to which President Egal presented the two draft documents. In early 1997 the conference provisionally approved a new constitution (see Constitution and government, below), and on February 23 the delegates reelected Egal to a five-year term (the incumbent secured 223 votes in what observers described as remarkably "amicable" polling). In May Egal appointed a new government.

In December 1997 President Egal submitted his resignation to the legislature, complaining of a "lack of collaboration" from his government and other senior officials. Citing the need for stability, the legislators voted overwhelmingly to reject his request, thus compelling the incumbent to continue at his post. Meanwhile, a number of analysts attributed Egal's actions to his desire to fortify his position amid accusations of rampant corruption as well as to underline Somaliland's independence claims at the same time that Somalian faction leaders held unity talks in Cairo, Egypt.

Constitutional amendments were proposed by the government in mid-1999 with the goals of strengthening the role of the president and responding to opposition demands for greater judicial independence. Following a number of further revisions, the new constitution received a reported 97 percent endorsement from those voting in a national referendum on May 31, 2001. Among other things, the new basic law contained an article affirming Somaliland's status as an independent republic. (The Somaliland government had declined to participate in reconciliation talks launched in 2000 in Somalia proper. See article on Somalia for details.) The first multiparty elections under the new constitution were initially scheduled at the local level for December 2001. However, they were subsequently postponed, and in early 2002 the legislature reportedly extended Egal's term of office (as well as that of Vice President Dahir Riyale KAHIN) until February 2003, although opponents of the administration criticized that decision and demanded that another all-inclusive conference of clan elders be held to determine the presidential status.

President Egal died on May 3, 2002, and he was succeeded on the same day by Kahin, following endorsement by an emergency meeting of legislative and ministerial representatives. Kahin's administration subsequently underscored its commitment to independence by declining to participate in the conference launched in Kenya in late 2002 regarding potential power-sharing in Somalia. Local elections were conducted in December 2002, with Kahin's United and Democratic People's Alliance (Ururka Dimuqraadiga Ummadda Bahawday—UDUB) securing a reported 41 percent of the vote, followed by the Solidarity Party (Hisbiga Kulmiye) with 19 percent and the Justice and Welfare Party (Ururka Caddaalada Iyo Daryeelka—UCID) with 11.2 percent. Those three parties consequently qualified for legal status under new constitutional provisions (see Political Parties and Groups, below, for details).

In presidential balloting on April 14, 2003, Kahin was reelected by a razor-thin margin (42.08 percent to 42.06 percent) over Ahmed Mohamed MOHAMOUD ("Silanyo") of Kulmiye. A new "propresidential" government was announced on July 3.

In Somaliland's first national legislative balloting since its declaration of independence, the UDUB secured a plurality of 33 seats in the elections to the House of Representatives on September 25, 2005. However, following the elections, the UCID and Kulmiye announced a cooperation agreement that produced immediate results—the election of a member of the UCID as speaker.

Constitution and Government

The government established in the wake of the May 1991 independence proclamation encompassed a president and vice president, appointed by the SNM, initially for a two-year transitional period during which a constitution was to be drafted that would permit the holding of open, multiparty elections. On May 28 Radio Hargeisa announced that the SNM leadership had also approved the formation of a high court and a civil service, in addition to the appointment of an attorney general, an auditor general, and a Central Bank governor.

In early July 1995 President Egal announced that a ten-member constitutional drafting committee had been appointed and that a basic law for Somaliland would be forthcoming within the ensuing 12 months. Meanwhile, the SNM Central Committee continued to serve as an interim legislature and electoral body for the presidency. In early 1997 the National Communities Conference provisionally approved a constitution that provided for a bicameral legislature (see Legislature, below), an electoral system of direct universal suffrage, and the organization of political parties (although groups with "tribal" or religious affiliations were proscribed). Among the details to surface subsequently about the document were stipulations that future presidents and their spouses be both native Somalians and Muslims. In late 1998 the legislature reportedly approved the implementation of measures based on Islamic religious law.

The 1997 constitution was approved with the provision that it be presented to a national referendum within three years. A one-year extension was granted in February 2000 and a three-month extension in February 2001, with the referendum finally being held on May 31, 2001. The new basic law confirmed Somaliland's independence, strengthened the executive branch, confirmed Islam as the "national faith," provided for a free press, and endorsed multiparty elections at all levels of government through universal suffrage. Somaliland is divided into 6 regions and 30 districts.

Foreign Relations

Refusals to attend “reconciliation” conferences in Djibouti in 1991 were defended by SNM leaders on the ground that the meetings were called to address matters of domestic concern to “Southern Somalia.” However, relations between Djibouti and Somaliland had been less than cordial because of conflict between the Issa community common to both countries and the Issaq grouping in Somaliland.

Despite what was described as a “flurry of meetings” designed to promote international recognition, by mid-1995 no foreign government had complied, partly because of long-standing opposition by the Organization of African Unity (OAU, subsequently the African Union—AU) to secessionist regimes and partly because of uncertainties surrounding continued anarchic conditions in the south. Significantly, while Somaliland had agreed in 1993 to the introduction of 500 UN peacekeepers to supervise the distribution of relief supplies, it rejected any deployment of U.S. troops on the ground that its claim to autonomy would thereby be jeopardized. In May 1994 President Egal threatened to expel any UN personnel advocating reintegration into Somalia.

In mid-1995 President Egal was reported to have sent a fax message to the (then) Israeli prime minister, Yitzhak Rabin, proposing the establishment of “strategic links” between their two countries. Egal spoke of the need to counter Islamic fundamentalism in the Horn of Africa, attributed with some degree of imprecision to “the growing influence of Saudi Arabia and the pro-Islamic Yemen.”

Egal’s efforts to gain international support bore fruit in late 1997 as Djibouti announced that it would exchange diplomatic credentials with Hargeisa. Furthermore, in early 1998 Italy told Egal that it would support an EU proposal to grant Somaliland “semi-diplomatic” recognition. For his part, Egal agreed to accept the offer of limited recognition for an interim period. Such concerns dominated Somaliland’s foreign policy agenda through early 1999, with reports of Hargeisa’s enhanced international standing being balanced by continued calls from regional leaders for Somaliland to be included in a unified Somalia.

Relations with Djibouti deteriorated in 2000 when that country’s leadership played a major role in the establishment of the transitional government in Somalia. However, Somaliland and Djibouti agreed to “normalize” their ties again in 2001. By that time it was clear that, in addition to opposing the notion of reunification with Somalia, Somaliland was in the midst of an ongoing territorial dispute with the Puntland autonomous region in Somalia.

Intense lobbying efforts were reported in 2004 by officials from Somaliland to convince the UK government to recognize Somaliland’s status as a fully independent nation. UK lawmakers visited Somaliland, and London agreed to help pay costs involved in the 2003 presidential poll. In addition, British companies reportedly began negotiations with Somaliland regarding offshore oil exploration. However, no official recognition was forthcoming, as most of the international community pressed (unsuccessfully) the Kahin administration to participate in the comprehensive Somalia peace talks. The AU and the Arab League in 2005 declined requests for membership from Somaliland. Kahin traveled to six African states in 2006 to lobby for recognition, and an AU fact-finding mission concluded that Somaliland’s status was “unique” and that recognition of its independence would not open a “Pandora’s box” of new secessionist movements across the continent as African leaders had been fearing.

Current Issues

In early 1999 President Egal reportedly indicated that Somaliland would be willing to consider reunification talks with Somalia, should warlords there negotiate a cease-fire and establish a permanent central government. However, until such progress was achieved by its “brothers in the south,” Somaliland would continue to strengthen its own governmental institutions. At the same time, Egal pushed for international development aid, reportedly receiving a degree of “empathy” but little actual support from countries reluctant to appear at odds with OAU and UN hopes that all of Somalia, including Somaliland, be reunified under a single federal system. For most observers, the May 2001 constitutional referendum appeared to settle the independence question.

President Egal’s death in May 2002 was widely viewed as creating conditions that could lead to instability, since his hand had been firmly placed on the governmental tiller for so many years. However, new President Kahin managed the transition smoothly, and the first multiparty municipal elections were conducted without incident in December.

President Kahin’s reelection in April 2003 was noteworthy for his amazingly small margin of victory (80 votes out of nearly 490,000 cast). His Solidarity Party challenger initially protested the results, but, following a ruling from the Constitutional Court that validated the outcome, he urged his supporters to accept the verdict.

In October 2003 the government initiated a series of “antiterrorism” measures following an attack on westerners that Kahin blamed on illegal immigrants with connections to militant Islamic organizations. Among other things, foreigners without legal permits were expelled from the country.

After numerous postponements, balloting for the first elected House of Representatives was held in September 2005, as Somaliland remained divorced from the nascent reconciliation in Somalia (see article on Somalia for details). Severe tension was reported over Somaliland’s plan to include the disputed territory of Sool along the border with Puntland in the poll. (Fighting had broken out in that area between forces from Somaliland and Puntland in 2004.) However, the balloting was completed in Sool without violence.

Foreign observers described the 2005 elections as generally fair and free, further bolstering

Somaliland’s argument that it represented an oasis of developing democracy in an otherwise turbulent region and should be rewarded with international recognition. On a more negative note, however, conflict over the election of the speaker of the House of Representatives prompted a walkout by UDUB legislators and riots outside the parliament buildings. After securing the speaker’s post, the UCID/Kulmiye coalition presented a legislative agenda calling, among other things, for sweeping anticorruption measures and a reduction in the president’s national security powers. Meanwhile, the government announced that security forces had arrested a group of heavily-armed men accused of plotting the assassination of public officials and other terrorist acts. (The government characterized the detainees as members of al-Qaida who had been trained in Afghanistan.)

In May 2006 the House of Elders (currently appointed) announced that it had extended its term of office until October 2010 even though elections had been scheduled for October 2006. President Kahin supported the extension, and he and the House of Elders were strongly criticized by UCID and Kulmiye leaders for seemingly trying to hold on to a degree of legislative authority through extra-constitutional means.

Political Parties and Groups

The constitution endorsed by national referendum in May 2001 provided for multiparty activity, with the restriction that parties could not be based on tribal/clan or religious affiliations. It was determined that groups would be provisionally recognized prior to proposed local elections (originally scheduled for December 2001), with those gaining at least 20 percent of the vote in four of Somaliland’s six regions to be granted permanent registration prior to subsequent presidential and national legislative balloting. The first parties were registered in October 2001, but the municipal elections were postponed until December 2002, at which time the first three groups below gained legal status by meeting the constitutional requirement regarding vote totals.

Official Parties

United and Democratic People's Alliance (Ururka Dimuqraadiga Ummadda Bahawday—UDUB). Launched in June 2001 by President Egal, the UDUB was subsequently routinely referenced as the “ruling” party in Somaliland. Although some observers viewed the UDUB as primarily a personal vehicle for Egal, the party was reportedly “resuscitated” by President Kahin following Egal’s death in May 2002. The party went on to dominate the December 2002 municipal elections and to achieve a plurality in the 2005 legislative balloting on a vote share of 40.7 percent.

Leaders: Dahir Riyale KAHIN (President of the Republic), Ahmad Yusuf YASIN (Vice President of the Republic), Usman GARAD (Secretary).

Solidarity Party (Hisbiga Kulmiye). Established in early 2002, Kulmiye is led by Ahmed Mohamed Mohamoud (“Silanyo”), who was chair of the SNM from 1984–1990. Silanyo had resigned from the Egal government in 2001, indicating his desire to campaign for the presidency. Kulmiye finished second to the UDUB in the December 2002 municipal balloting, securing, according to the government, about 83,000 votes to UDUB’s 198,000. Silanyo finished second in the very close vote for president in April 2003. Subsequently, when the Kahin government was criticized by world leaders for refusing to participate in the Somalian peace negotiations, Silanyo announced that he supported Kahin in the matter.

Kulmiye finished second in the 2005 legislative balloting with 30.3 percent of the vote. Following the election, Kulmiye announced a cooperative agreement with the other “opposition” party—the UCID (below).

Leader: Ahmed Mohamed MOHAMOUD (“Silanyo”).

Justice and Welfare Party (Ururka Cadaalada Iyo Daryeelka—UCID). Established as a “modern” party devoted to “good governance,” the staunchly nationalist UCID was described as an outgrowth of a Social Democratic Party that had been previously organized within the diaspora.

UCID leader Farah Ali (“Warabe”) was one of the founders of the SNM and currently owns a private construction company. The UCID secured an estimated 50,000 votes in the December 2002 municipal elections, good for third place among the six contesting parties. Warabe placed third in the 2003 presidential election with 16 percent of the vote. The UCID secured 29 percent of the vote in the 2005 legislative elections, and, after announcement of a UCID/Kulmiye cooperation agreement, the UCID’s Abdirahman Muhammad Irro was elected speaker of the House of Representatives.

Leader: Farah ALI (“Warabe”), Abdirahman Muhammad IRRO (Speaker of the House of Representatives).

Other Parties and Groups

Somali National Movement (SNM). The SNM was organized in London, United Kingdom, in April 1981 by an exile group that declared its commitment to the overthrow of the existing Mogadishu regime but did not wish to ally itself with either the United States or the Soviet Union. Deriving most of its support from Somaliland’s Isaaq clan, the SNM long supported greater autonomy for the area, a “more equitable” distribution of resources, and political democratization. Ideologically, however, the movement suffered from a lack of cohesion, apparently counting Marxist, pro-Western, and Islamic fundamentalist groups within its ranks.

Following the Ethiopian-Somali agreement in April 1988, the SNM was left with no external source of support as its fighters were forced to leave Ethiopia. Subsequently, the SNM initiated wide-scale military activity against the government in the north and announced the capture of Hargeisa, the country’s second city, in December 1989. The SNM formed an operational alliance with Somalia’s other leading rebel groups in mid-1990. Reportedly, the SNM leadership was initially willing to participate in a federal system after the fall of the Siad Barre regime in January 1991, but it bowed to rank-and-file sentiment in opting for independence in May.

Cabinet

As of August 1, 2006

President	Dahir Riyale Kahin
Vice President	Ahmad Yusuf Yasin

Ministers

Agriculture	(Vacant)
Civil Aviation	Aw Nuur Amin
Commerce (Interim)	Hasan Wadaad
Culture and Heritage	Usman Ali Bile
Defense	Ismail Aden Boss
Development of Rural Areas	Fuad Adan Cade
Education	Hasan Haji Mahmud Warsame
Family Planning	Fadhuma Sudi Hasan [f]
Finance	Hussein Ali Dualeh
Fisheries and Coastlines	Mohammed Oday
Foreign Affairs	Edna Adan Ismail [f]
Health and Labor	Usman Qasim Qodah
Information and National Guidance	Abdullahi Muhammad Duale
Interior	Ismail Aden Osman
Justice	Ahmad Hasan Ali Libah
Livestock	Idris Ibrahim Abdi
Mineral and Water Resources	Qasim Sheikh Yunis Ibrahim
Parliament	Abdi Hassan Buuni
Planning	Ahmed Haji Dahir
Post and Transport	Hasan Abdi Khayr
Presidency	Nuh Ahmad Usman
Public Works	Said Sulub
Rehabilitation, Reconstruction, and Resettlement	Abdillahi Hussein Iman
Religion	Sheikh Mohamed
Sports	Mahmud Said Muhammad

Ministers of State

Foreign Affairs	Said Muhammad Nuur
Interior	Adan Mire Muhammad
Public Works	Adan Ahmed Muhammad
Rehabilitation, Reconstruction, and Resettlement	Yasin Fardoon

[f] = female

After being ousted from the Somaliland presidency in favor of Ibrahim Egal in May 1993, Abdurahman Ahmed Ali took up residence in London before surfacing in Mogadishu in August 1994 as a pro-Aidid opponent of secession. In September President Egal denounced a claim from Ahmed Ali that Ahmed Ali remained SNM chair. Thereafter, in early 1996 it was reported that Ahmed Ali was advising an anti-Egal rebel group in the Burao region.

Anti-Egal forces within the SNM accused the president of corruption in 1997 and threatened to launch a legal challenge against the composition of the National Communities Conference. However, such opposition reportedly failed to materialize. The SNM subsequently remained fractionalized concerning Egal's role and other issues, the president's critics also questioning his commitment to independence. Egal in 2001 formed his own political party (see the UDUB, above), with several other former SNM leaders following suit. The SNM ceased to function as a political entity after the 2001 referendum.

United Somali Front (USF). Emphasizing the deep cleavage between Somaliland's Issaq and Issa communities, the latter (reportedly with encouragement from Djibouti) organized the USF in early 1991. Subsequently, President Ahmed Ali approved the action and pledged that USF supporters could participate in future multiparty elections. While claiming to be neutral in the dispute over Somaliland's future, the front's leadership joined Ahmed Ali in calling for federalism rather than independence. The USF participated in peace talks in 2000. The USF subsequently became increasingly marginalized, and it did not participate in the 2002 local elections.

Leader: Abdurahman DUALEH ALI (Chair).

The three other parties reported by the government to have participated (in addition to the UDUB, UCID, and Kulmiye) in the December 2002 municipal elections were the Asad Party, which won 9 percent of the vote and was led by Suleiman Mohamed ADEN, a longtime rival of President Egal's who returned to Hargeisa in 2001; the Sahan Party, a moderate grouping led by Musa BIHE that secured 10.8 percent of the vote; and the Hormood Party, which gained 9.2 percent of the vote. The three parties ceased to be active after the 2002 local elections.

Legislature

Following Somaliland's declaration of independence in 1991, the Central Committee of the Somali National Movement (SNM) served as a nominal "provisional" legislature for several years, although its actual authority was limited due to the subclan conflict that left substantial territory outside SNM control. In May 1993 the SNM "parliament" endorsed the recommendation of a recently concluded grand shir (gathering) for the formal establishment of a two-chamber legislature, comprising a House of Elders and a House of Representatives (initially to be appointed on a clan basis but ultimately to be filled by elections). The two chambers began to operate shortly thereafter, although some clan seats in the House of Representatives remained vacant until August 1994. The new constitution approved by national referendum in 2001 provided for a bicameral Parliament.

House of Elders (Golaha Guurtida). The upper house is authorized to review legislation passed by the House of Representatives and to approve legislation on its own in regard to religion, culture, and security. It comprises 82 members and a number of nonvoting honorary members. The first elections to the House of Elders were scheduled for October 2006, but in a controversial decision the current appointed membership decided in May 2006 to extend its mandate until October 2010.

Speaker: Saleban Muhammad ADAN.

House of Representatives (Golaha Wakiilada). The lower house comprises 82 members directly elected via proportional representation (in six regions) for five-year terms. At the first elections for the house on September 29, 2005, the United and Democratic People's Alliance reportedly secured 33 seats; the Solidarity Party, 28; and the Justice and Welfare Party, 21.

Speaker: Abdirahman Muhammad IRRO.

Communications

Press

Freedom of the press was codified in the constitution approved by national referendum in 2001, although some observers have suggested that government control is still exercised over journalists. Newspapers published in Hargeisa include Jamhuuriya (The Republic, 2,500), an independent daily that was closed by the government in 1997–1998 for printing articles critical of the government; Huuriya (Liberty), daily; Mandeeq, progovernment daily; al-Moujahid (The Fighter), a weekly launched in 1985 by the SNM; and The Republican, an English-language weekly. In October 2003 the editor of Jamhuuriya was briefly detained for publishing “antigovernment” stories.

Broadcasting

In May 1991 the former Radio Hargeisa was renamed Radio Somaliland Republic. Private radio stations are banned. There is no television service.

Intergovernmental Representation

As of September 2006 Somaliland was not a member of the United Nations.

IGO Memberships (Non-UN)

None

SOUTH AFRICA

REPUBLIC OF SOUTH AFRICA

Republiek van Suid-Afrika

Unofficial African Name: Azania

---

The Country

Industrially the most developed country in Africa, the Republic of South Africa is a land of rolling plateaus within a mountainous escarpment that rims its territory on the seaward side and separates the coastal cities of Cape Town and Durban from the inland centers of Johannesburg and Pretoria. The country is peopled by four separate ethnic elements as unequal in numbers as they used to be in political status. The largest but historically least-favored group, comprising approximately 78 percent of the population, consists of the Xhosa, Zulu, and Sotho, who are collectively known as the Bantu; next in order of size is the white community, 10 percent; "Coloureds," or persons of mixed blood, 9 percent; and Asians, mainly Indians living in KwaZulu-Natal Province, 3 percent.

Some three-fifths of the whites are "Afrikaners," who trace their descent from the Dutch, German, and French Huguenot settlers who colonized the country from the 17th century onward. Traditionally agrarian in their social traditions and outlook, they speak Afrikaans, a language closely related to Dutch; are predominantly affiliated with the Dutch Reformed Church; and were the most resolute supporters of the policy of separation of the races (apartheid). The remainder of the whites are largely English-speaking, identify with the British tradition, and have been more involved in business and industry.

South Africa has become a highly urbanized country, with half of the white population, a third of the blacks, and most Coloureds and Asians residing in and around the dozen large cities and towns. The social and economic differences between the white and non-white groups are reflected in the country's literacy rates, estimated at 98 percent for whites but only 85 percent for the country as a whole.

In 1998 women constituted 38 percent of the paid labor force. White women are concentrated in the clerical and service sectors; in predominantly white areas, black women work mainly as domestic servants and casual agricultural laborers. Elsewhere, traditional law restricts female land ownership, although male migration to white-controlled employment sites has left women largely in control of subsistence agriculture. Female participation in government was long limited to minor representation by white women in both national and provincial legislatures; however, women of all races were prominent in the anti-apartheid movement. The awarding of cabinet portfolios to women in the current administration has fulfilled a pledge by former president Mandela that they would be given one-third of all posts at all levels.

The first African country to experience the full force of the industrial revolution, South Africa now has an advanced economy that plays an important role in world economic affairs. It is the world's leading gold producer, supplying nearly one-third of global output; other important mineral products include diamonds, copper, asbestos, chrome, platinum, and vanadium. The principal resource deficiency is oil, although recently discovered ocean reserves are now being tapped. There are, however, abundant coal reserves, which provide a large share of primary energy. Agriculturally, the country is self-sufficient in most foods (except coffee, rice, and tea) and exports wool, maize, sugar, and fruits. Although agriculture now contributes only about 3 percent of GDP, it continues to employ about 10 percent of the labor force. The manufacturing sector, spurred by governmental efforts during the apartheid era to promote industrial self-sufficiency, presently accounts for approximately 25 percent of GDP, with mining adding another 6 percent. Industry as a whole employs about 25 percent of workers. South Africa's leading trade partner is the European Union, with which it concluded in 2000 a free-trade agreement that is planned to cover some 90 percent of transactions by 2012.

Gross domestic product (GDP) growth has averaged only 1.5 percent annually since 1974, contrasted with an average yearly population increase of 2.5 percent. This creeping poverty was exacerbated in the late 1990s by the Russian and Asian economic crises, which contributed to a trade decline and the collateral dampening of GDP growth to only .7 percent in 1998. Meanwhile, unemployment, heavily concentrated in the black population, remained at 35 to 40 percent, with inflation at about 9 percent in 1998. Growth recovered to 2.1 percent in 1999 and then advanced to 3.4 percent in 2000. In the latter year the government introduced an inflation-targeting strategy with a goal of containing consumer price inflation at 3 to 6 percent by 2002.

Mbeki's economic ministers are reportedly among the developing world's best and have restored sound fiscal management and modest growth in gross domestic product. Their Black Economic Empowerment program has begun to redress apartheid's untenably skewed economic legacy. The foreign exchange market is one of the developing world's most liquid, and the corporate sector is solid. The strength of the rand has contributed to a dissipation of inflationary pressures and enabled the Reserve Bank to reconstitute its net international reserve position. The GDP growth was running at an annualized 4.8% in the second quarter of 2005 (compared to 3.7% in 2004 and 2.8% in 2003). However, unemployment continued to remain very high, fluctuating between 30 percent and 40 percent. Some of the joblessness is due to South Africa's belated entry into the global economy and some to administrative inefficiencies. Violent crime is still a scourge. The African National Congress (ANC) has put job creation at the top of its agenda, promising to halve unemployment by 2014. An expanded public works program aims to prime the pump by creating one million jobs within five years. South African labor, while abundant, is expensive. The national trade union federation, COSATU, is a partner in government and is therefore in a position to obtain high wage settlements. AIDS also tends to push labor costs up and will continue to drag the economy down over the next decade. The disease hits working-age adults disproportionately and pushes up absenteeism and insurance costs. It is said to reduce the GDP by at least two percentage points each year.

There has been a subtle shift in the direction of economic policy from market-led to state-led growth. While large-scale privatization remains in disfavor, the focus is on public-private partnerships and public works programs to create jobs. All economic sectors are required to draw up charters committing themselves to black economic empowerment.

Political Status: Fully independent state since 1934; republican regime established May 31, 1961; Interim Constitution ratified on December 22, 1993, with effect from April 27, 1994, for a five-year term; new text signed into law on December 10, 1996, effective February 4, 1997, with certain provisions implemented gradually through 1999.

Area: 470,882 sq. mi. (1,221,037 sq. km.).

Population: 44,819,770 (2001C); 46,745,000 (2005E).

Major Urban Centers (urban areas, 2005E): PRETORIA (administrative capital, 2,534,000), Cape Town (legislative capital, 3,143,000), Bloemfontein (judicial capital, 793,000), Durban (4,610,000), Johannesburg (3,974,000). In 2005–2006 a move was underway to change the name of the administrative capital from Pretoria to TSHWANE. As of August 2006 the change was meeting strong resistance in some quarters.

Official Languages: There are eleven official languages, of which English and Afrikaans are the languages of record.

Monetary Unit: Rand (principal rate July 1, 2006: 7.13 rand = $1US).

President: Thabo Mvuyelwa MBEKI (African National Congress); inaugurated June 16, 1999, for a five-year term, in succession to Nelson Rolihlahla MANDELA (African National Congress), following unopposed election by the National Assembly on June 14; reelected April 23, 2004, to a second five-year term.

Deputy President: Phumzile Gloria MLAMBO-NGCUKA (African National Congress), appointed by the President and sworn in on June 27, 2005, succeeding Jacob Gedleyihlekisa ZUMA (African National Congress).

Government and Politics

Political Background

The Republic of South Africa as it exists today is the result of a long and complicated process of interaction between indigenous peoples and the Dutch and British colonists who came to exploit the territory. The original Cape Colony was settled by the Dutch in the 17th century but fell into British hands as a result of the Napoleonic wars. Discontented Boers, or Afrikaners (largely, but not exclusively, farmers of Dutch or French Huguenot descent) trekked northward in 1835–1837, commencing a half-century subjugation of the Zulu and other native peoples and establishing the independent republics of Transvaal and Orange Free State. Following the discovery of diamonds and gold in the late 19th century, the two Boer republics were conquered by Britain in the Anglo-Boer War of 1899–1902. In 1910 they were joined with the British colonies of the Cape and Natal (annexed in 1843) to form the Union of South Africa, which obtained full independence within the Commonwealth in 1931.

Although South Africa joined with Britain in both world wars, its British and Commonwealth attachments progressively weakened as the result of widespread anti-British sentiment and racial preoccupations. The National Party (Nasionale Party—NP), led by Daniel F. MALAN, came to power in 1948 with a program strongly reinforcing racial separation under white “guardianship.” It proceeded to enact a body of openly discriminatory legislation that was further amplified under Hendrik F. VERWOERD (1958–1966). Segregation was strictly enforced, the already token political representation of non-whites was progressively reduced, and overt opposition was severely repressed. Similar policies were applied in South West Africa, a former German territory occupied by South Africa in World War I and subsequently administered under a mandate from the League of Nations (see entry under Namibia).

Increasing institutionalization of segregation under the Verwoerd regime led to international condemnation. External opposition was intensified by the “Sharpeville incident” of March 21, 1960, during which South African police fired on African demonstrators, killing 69 of them. In view of the increasingly critical stand of other Commonwealth members, South Africa formally withdrew from the grouping and declared itself a republic on May 31, 1961.

Prime Minister Verwoerd was assassinated by a deranged white man in September 1966, but his successor, Balthazar J. VORSTER, continued Verwoerd's policies, bringing to fruition the idea of separating the blacks into separate tribal homelands, or "Bantustans." These areas, encompassing approximately 13 percent of the country's land, were ultimately intended to house upwards of three-quarters of the population. However, a series of minor concessions to the blacks brought about a challenge from the right-wing, or verkrampte ("unenlightened" or "ultra-Conservative"), faction of the National Party under the leadership of Dr. Albert HERTZOG, who formed the Refounded National Party (Herstigte Nasionale Party—HNP) to compete in the 1970 election. The NP easily survived his challenge, the HNP winning no legislative seats on a 3.6 percent vote share, although the longtime opposition United Party (UP) made some gains. At the next parliamentary balloting in April 1974 the NP increased its majority, with the UP losing five seats to the other opposition group, the Progressive Party (PP), which had for some years held only a single seat.

The 1974 Portuguese revolution and subsequent changes in Angola and Mozambique further isolated the South African regime. Early in 1975 the government announced a policy of "ending discrimination" within South Africa and of working for détente in external affairs. The new policy was accompanied by a partial relaxation in apartheid regulations, including a repeal of "Masters and Servants" legislation, portions of which had been in existence for over a century. During the following year, however, the country experienced its worst outbreak of racial violence since the Sharpeville episode in 1960. The rioting, which began in Soweto, near Johannesburg, in mid-June, grew out of black student protests against the compulsory use of Afrikaans as a medium of instruction. Although the government announced in early July that it would begin phasing out Afrikaans at the primary and secondary school levels, the disturbances spread to townships around Pretoria and, in late August and early September, to the heart of Cape Town. Despite the unrest, the Vorster government gave no indication of abandoning its commitment to "separate development" of the races, with the official position being that the policy was not based on race but on the conviction that, within South Africa, blacks made up distinct "nations" to which special political and constitutional arrangements should apply. It was in accordance with this philosophy that nominal independence was granted to the territory that would become known as the black homelands: Transkei in October 1976, Bophuthatswana in December 1977, Venda in September 1979, and Ciskei in December 1981.

Rioting intensified during 1977 amid growing signs that the Vorster government had succumbed to a siege mentality, although its white support increased substantially. Drastic new security legislation was approved, including a Criminal Procedure Bill that substantially augmented the powers of the police while severely limiting the rights of individuals in judicial proceedings. On September 12 Steven BIKO, one of the country's most influential black leaders, died in suspicious circumstances while in police detention. On October 19 the government instituted its most drastic crackdown in two decades, closing the leading black newspaper, arresting its editor, and banning a number of protest groups, including the Black Consciousness movement founded by Biko in 1969. Apparent white endorsement of these moves was revealed in a parliamentary election on November 30, at which the NP captured 134 of 165 lower-house seats.

On September 20, 1978, Prime Minister Vorster announced his intention to resign for reasons of health. Nine days later he was elected by a joint session of Parliament to the essentially titular post of president, succeeding Nicolaas J. DIEDERICHS, who had died on August 21. One day earlier the NP elected Defense Minister Pieter W. BOTHA as its new leader (hence prime minister) over Foreign Minister Roelof F. ("Pik") BOTHA and Plural Relations and Development Minister Cornelius P. MULDER. In November a long-simmering scandal involving alleged corruption and mismanagement of public funds in the Department of Information implicated a number of individuals, including Mulder, who was forced to resign from the government prior to his formal expulsion from the NP in May 1979. On June 4 President Vorster also resigned after being charged with participation in a variety of clandestine propaganda activities and of giving false evidence in an effort to conceal gross irregularities in the affair. He was immediately succeeded, on an interim basis, by Senate president Marais VILJOEN, who was elected to a full term as head of state by Parliament on June 19. Despite the scandal and increasingly vocal opposition from both the HNP and remaining verkrampte elements within the NP, the Botha government remained in power with a marginally reduced parliamentary majority after the election of April 29, 1981, having campaigned on a twelve-point platform, first advanced in 1979, that called for constitutional power-sharing among whites, Coloureds, and Asians, with "full independence" for the black homelands.

In a referendum conducted November 2, 1982, a Constitution Bill, providing for an executive state president and a tricameral parliament excluding blacks, was endorsed by 66 percent of white voters, and was approved by the House of Assembly on September 9, 1983. After balloting for delegates to the Coloured and Indian chambers in August 1984, Prime Minister Botha was unanimously elected president by an electoral college of the majority parties in each House on September 5, and he was inaugurated at Cape Town on September 14.

Faced with mounting internal unrest and near-universal foreign condemnation, the government in April 1985 abandoned two bastions of segregationist legislation: the Mixed Marriages Act and a portion of the Immorality Act that outlawed sex across the color line, while the prohibition of multiracial political movements was lifted in June. These moves, while provoking an immediate backlash by right-wing extremists, were received by black and moderate white leaders as "too little, too late." Clashes between police and demonstrators increased, yielding nearly 300 deaths (mainly of blacks) by midyear. On July 21, in the first such action in a quarter-century, a state of emergency was declared in 36 riot-stricken black districts and townships in the Johannesburg and eastern Cape regions. On August 15, in a speech at Durban, President Botha rejected demands for further racial concessions, insisting that they would constitute "a road to abdication and suicide" by white South Africans. In mid-September, however, he indicated that Parliament would be asked in early 1986 to consider modification of a leading bulwark of residential segregation, the Group Areas Act, with possible revocation of the country's pass laws. The laws required adult black South Africans, on pain of imprisonment, to carry a pass at all times. This hated document showed what, if any, white areas the holder was allowed to enter, and at what times of day.

In an address at the opening of Parliament on January 31, 1986, President Botha shocked the extreme right by declaring that "We have outgrown the outdated colonial system of paternalism, as well as the outdated concept of apartheid." In late April he announced that a bill would be introduced terminating the pass laws, though the legislation would not affect segregation in schools, hospitals, and residential areas. Earlier, on March 7, the partial state of emergency imposed eight months before was rescinded; however, a nationwide state of emergency was declared on June 12 to quell anticipated violence on June 16, the anniversary of the Soweto uprising.

Although the term of the House of Assembly had been extended from 1986 to 1989 to coincide with the five-year mandates of the Coloured and Indian chambers, President Botha announced in January 1987 that an early election for a new white chamber would be held on May 6. The results of the poll reflected a distinctly rightward swing by the white voters: the NP won 123 of the 166 directly elective seats, while the far-right Conservative Party of South Africa (CPSA), with 22 seats, displaced the liberal Progressive Federal Party (PFP, a direct descendant of the PP) as runner-up.

During the ensuing months the government increased the practice of grudgingly yielding on the substance of apartheid while severely limiting the freedom of its opponents. A variety of new press restrictions were announced in August, while the government banned the activities of numerous groups. Banned groups included labor unions; civic, educational, and youth associations; the umbrella United Democratic Front (UDF), which linked some 650 anti-apartheid organizations; and a new Committee for the Defence of Democracy (CDD), organized at Cape Town in March 1988. In September a major constitutional crisis was averted by the government's withdrawal of five bills, designed to tighten residential segregation laws, upon which the two non-white parliamentary chambers had refused to act. Throughout the period numerous long-incarcerated regime opponents were released, while others, primarily from the "new generation" of UDF and other leaders, were arrested and convicted of treason.

On January 18, 1989, President Botha suffered a stroke, and Constitutional Development Minister J. Christiaan HEUNIS was sworn in as acting chief executive the following day. On February 2 Botha resigned as NP leader, with Education Minister Frederik W. DE KLERK being named his successor. On March 13 the party's parliamentary caucus voted unanimously that de Klerk should also become state president; Botha, however, refused to step down and on March 15 resumed the presidency, vowing to stay in office for the remainder of his term. Less than five months later a dispute erupted over Botha's not being advised of a meeting that de Klerk and Foreign Minister "Pik" Botha had scheduled with Zambian President Kenneth Kaunda. Terming the proposed meeting "inopportune" and complaining of having been ignored in the matter, President Botha resigned on August 14, with de Klerk succeeding him on an acting basis the following day.

At balloting for all three legislative chambers on September 6, 1989, the NP retained its overall majority in the House of Assembly, although its share of the vote fell to less than half (48.6 percent). On September 14 de Klerk was named by the parliamentary electoral college to a regular five-year term as president.

On February 2, 1990, de Klerk announced the lifting of bans against the ANC, the Pan-Africanist Congress (PAC), and the South African Communist Party (SACP), and on February 11 he freed the long-incarcerated ANC leader, Nelson Rolihlahla MANDELA. However, on April 17, two weeks before the start of talks with ANC leaders, the president flatly rejected majority rule on the ground that it would "lead to the domination and even the suppression of minorities." He also rejected a demand by right-wing whites for racially-based partition of the country and proposed a system under which power would be shared by all groups and minority rights would be constitutionally guaranteed. For its part, the ANC indicated that it would not engage in full negotiations until the nearly four-year state of emergency had been rescinded (effected in three of the four provinces on June 8) and all political prisoners and exiles had been amnestied.

On June 1, 1990, the government introduced legislation to rescind the Reservation of Separate Amenities Act that had sanctioned "petty apartheid" at public locations, such as beaches, libraries, and places of entertainment. Left in place were the Group Areas Act, which provided for racially segregated residential areas; the Lands Acts of 1913 and 1936, which reserved 87 percent of the country's land for the white minority; and the Population Registration Act, which mandated the classification of South Africans by race from birth.

On June 27, 1990, de Klerk stated that he was prepared to negotiate a new constitution that would eliminate all aspects of apartheid, and on August 7, one day after his second meeting with the president, Mandela announced that the ANC was suspending its 30-year armed struggle. In early October de Klerk and the leaders of the six "self-governing" homelands agreed to scrap the Lands Acts, and on October 15 the Separate Amenities Act was formally repealed; four days later emergency rule was lifted in Natal. Subsequently, in a historic move, de Klerk asked the National Party to open its rolls to all races.

In a "Manifesto for the New South Africa," proclaimed in a speech opening the 1991 Parliament session on February 1, President de Klerk indicated that not only would the Lands and Group Areas acts soon be repealed, but the Population Registration Act would be eliminated prior to constitutional revision. Two weeks earlier the government and the ANC had agreed to convene an all-party conference on the constitutional drafting process, although Chief Mangosuthu BUTHELEZI, leader of the Zulu-based Inkatha Freedom Party (IFP), responded coolly, while the CPSA, the PAC, and the Azanian People's Organization (Azapo) indicated that they would not participate. Meanwhile, on January 29, the ANC's Mandela and Inkatha's Buthelezi met for the first time in 30 years to defuse the bitter rivalry that had caused the death of more than 4,000 persons and had split the anti-apartheid movement. However, within two days of the leaders' reconciliation renewed fighting had broken out between their followers.

The Lands and Group Areas acts were abolished on June 5, 1991, as was the Population Registration Act five days later. Revocation of the Population Act left the capacity to vote (promised by the government under the new constitution) as the major remaining obstacle to black emancipation.

The first session of the Convention for a Democratic South Africa (Codesa), held December 20–21, 1991, featured a "declaration of intent" whereby constitutional proposals would require the approval of both the ANC and the government, with the latter pledging to employ its parliamentary majority to translate Codesa's decisions into law. Meanwhile, the de Klerk administration had become embroiled in an "Inkathagate" scandal stemming from evidence that the South Africa Defence Force (SADF) had been engaged over a three-year period in providing IFP members with anti-ANC military training.

On February 20, 1992, President de Klerk announced that a "whites-only" referendum would be held March 17 to renew his mandate for negotiating with anti-apartheid organizations. The projected poll was immediately denounced by white extremist groups as well as by the leftist PAC and Azapo, which had long demanded that a new basic law be approved by a broadly based constituent assembly rather than by the existing non-black Parliament. The result of the referendum was a triumph for the president, with 68.7 percent of the participants endorsing continuation of the reform process.

The Codesa II session held May 15–16, 1992, proved unproductive, largely because the parties were unable to resolve an impasse over the size of the majority required for interim legislative approval of key constitutional provisions. It was followed on May 27 by the issuance of a six-month study on the sources of internal violence by a commission headed by Richard GOLDSTONE, a respected South African jurist. While not completely exonerating the government, the commission found no evidence of "a sinister and secret organization orchestrating political violence on a wide front." Rather, it attributed the disturbances in the townships to "the political battle between supporters of the African National Congress and the Inkatha Freedom Party." The conclusions of the commission were sorely tested on June 17, when South African police were accused of transporting a group of Zulu-speakers to Boipatong township, south of Johannesburg, where a bloody massacre ensued that claimed 45 lives. After touring Boipatong, ANC Secretary General Cyril RAMAPHOSA insisted that the slaughter was a government response to the launching of an ANC mass action campaign designed to force majority rule. While the government vehemently denied the charge, Nelson Mandela declared on June 21 that negotiations were "in tatters," and the ANC Executive Committee voted two days later to withdraw from Codesa.

ANC suspicions that the Goldstone Commission had not uncovered the whole truth about township violence were confirmed when a raid on a covert operations center of Military Intelligence in Pretoria yielded information that impelled President de Klerk to announce on December 19, 1992, that illegal activities by senior SADF officers were under investigation. In further reports, the commission in October 1993 found strong circumstantial evidence of security force involvement in the violence. In March 1994 it cited allegations of a conspiracy among senior police officers involving a “third force” of agents provocateurs tasked with anti-ANC destabilization in collaboration with the IFP.

Meanwhile, a “record of understanding” drawn up in September 1992 between the ANC and the NP had given renewed impetus to constitutional talks, which were resumed in March 1993 within what was later designated the Multi-Party Negotiating Process (MPNP). The 26 parties involved included several that had boycotted Codesa, notably the PAC and the SACP, the latter being a leading component of the Concerned South Africans Group (COSAG) of apartheid-era formations, including the IFP. The MPNP came under immediate strain as a result of the assassination on April 10 of Chris HANI, SACP general secretary and an ANC executive member. However, counsels of restraint from Mandela and others prevented the violent reaction in the black townships from getting out of control.

Negotiating breakthroughs came in May and June 1993, when most of the MPNP parties agreed that nonracial elections for a five-year transitional government of national unity would take place on April 27, 1994. Also crucial was the ANC’s shift from insistence on a centralized state to acceptance of a federal structure with entrenched powers for provincial governments. The concession did not prevent the IFP and the CPSA from withdrawing from the MPNP shortly before the publication on July 26 of a draft interim constitution providing for equal citizenship rights for all races and a nine-province federal structure integrating the black homelands into the new South Africa. In September the remaining MPNP parties also reached agreement on the creation of a multiracial Transitional Executive Council (TEC), which as approved by Parliament on September 23 was to operate alongside the government in the election run-up to ensure fair play and to monitor the operations of the security forces. After the package of texts had been formally adopted by the MPNP on November 18, the TEC was installed on December 7. Finally, on December 22 Parliament ratified the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Bill by 237 votes to 45, most of those against being CPSA members.

The problem of reconciling opponents, both white and black, to the settlement remained. In May 1993 the CPSA had joined with various right-wing Afrikaner groups to form the Afrikaner People’s Front (Afrikaner Volksfront—AVF) under the leadership of Gen. (Ret.) Constand VILJOEN, a former head of the SADF, with the central aim of achieving self-determination for Afrikaners in a separate homeland. In June tensions mounted when armed members of the Afrikaner Resistance Movement (Afrikaner Weerstandsbeweging—AWB), a highly visible paramilitary group led by Eugene TERRE’BLANCHE, forcibly occupied the building in Johannesburg where MPNP talks were in progress, with no resistance from police. In October the AVF, together with the IFP and other conservative black elements, launched the Freedom Alliance as successor to COSAG. Its constituent elements at first presented a united front against the constitutional settlement, although a January 1994 decision in favor of electoral participation by the Ciskei government (originally a Freedom Alliance member) was a serious setback.

The situation was transformed in March 1994 when the AWB and other Afrikaner paramilitaries, apparently sanctioned by the AVF, tried to protect the Bophuthatswana government of Chief Lucas MANGOPE (a Freedom Alliance member) from ANC-led protests against his decision to boycott the elections. Order was restored by speedy deployment of SADF troops, the Afrikaners being routed with 3 fatalities among at least 60 deaths overall and Mangope being removed from office by decision of the TEC on March 12. In light of this debacle and earlier divisions in the Freedom Alliance, Viljoen broke ranks with the AVF by forming the Freedom Front (Vryheidsfront—VF), which registered for the elections, whereas the CPSA and the other AVF formations maintained their non-participatory stance. The split marked the effective collapse of the Freedom Alliance, as confirmed by the eleventh-hour decision of the IFP on April 19 that it too would contest the forthcoming elections, despite a last-minute bout of bloodletting in Johannesburg on March 28 in which over 50 IFP demonstrators had been killed.

The IFP's participation ensured that South Africa's first multiracial balloting, to be held April 26–29, 1994, would be relatively free of violence. According to the Independent Electoral Commission and numerous foreign observers, it was in the main conducted fairly. As expected, the ANC registered an overwhelming victory in the national contest, winning 252 of 400 seats in the new National Assembly, against 82 for the NP, 43 for the IFP, 9 for the VF, and 14 for three smaller parties. In simultaneous polls for new provincial assemblies, the ANC won majorities in seven provinces, losing only Western Cape (to the NP) and KwaZulu-Natal (to the IFP).

Elected president by unanimous vote of the new Assembly on May 9, 1994, Nelson Mandela was sworn in the following day. Under the terms of the constitutional settlement, the ANC's Thabo MBEKI became first deputy president and de Klerk second deputy president. The new cabinet installed on May 11 contained 19 ANC representatives, 5 from the NP, and 3 from the IFP (including Chief Buthelezi as home affairs minister). The new Senate, its members designated by the newly elected provincial assemblies, convened on May 20, with the ANC holding 60 of 90 seats.

The widespread jubilation accompanying the installation of Nelson Mandela as South African president on May 10, 1994, tended to obscure a variety of problems confronting the new administration. Far-right Afrikaners continued to press for political autonomy, although talks between Mandela and CPSA leader Ferdi HARTZENBERG in Pretoria on August 12 suggested that the AVF did not intend to resort to force. As for the IFP, while Chief Buthelezi had accepted cabinet membership, relations between his Zulu-based formation and Mandela's ANC remained tense. Intensifying post-election controversy was the disclosure on May 19 that on the eve of the election some 7.4 million acres of state land in KwaZulu, about a third of the ex-homeland's area, had been transferred to the control of the Zulu King Goodwill ZWELITHINI under legislation adopted by the outgoing KwaZulu Assembly and approved by President de Klerk, without the knowledge of the ANC. Although the new minister of land affairs, Derek HANEKOM (ANC), announced on June 15 that the transfer would stand, the affair angered many ANC members, who suspected that its purpose had been to entice the IFP into the electoral process.

A year after the advent of majority rule, the most serious political problem facing the government was the disaffection of the IFP and its Zulu supporters, centering on their demand for a degree of autonomy for KwaZulu-Natal that fell little short of independence, including a constitutionally recognized role for the Zulu monarchy. Accompanied by periodic clashes between ANC and IFP supporters, the confrontation worsened in April 1995 when IFP members withdrew from the Constituent Assembly charged with drafting a permanent constitution. Although Chief Buthelezi remained a member of the government, he asserted that his party would not accept any constitution drawn up in its absence and repeated his demand for international mediation of KwaZulu-Natal's dispute with the central authorities. ANC ministers and officials responded that a formal international role in the dispute would imply acceptance of KwaZulu-Natal's claim to separate status; they also insisted that drafting of the new constitution would proceed according to schedule, if necessary without IFP participation.

ANC-IFP relations were further aggravated by President Mandela's admission on June 1, 1995, that he had personally authorized ANC officials "to shoot to kill if necessary" in the March 1994 clashes near the party's Shell House headquarters at Johannesburg, in which over 50 IFP demonstrators had died. Amid IFP calls for his impeachment over this admission, the president sought to regain the initiative by proposing on June 14 that responsibility for the pay and perquisites of tribal chiefs should be transferred from the provincial authorities to the central government. Such a change would pose a special threat to Chief Buthelezi's power base in the KwaZulu-Natal countryside, where control of the purse strings sustained the IFP's network of support among tribal chiefs. Serious IFP-ANC clashes in August 1995 were followed on December 25 by an attack by IFP supporters on the village of Shobashobane (an ANC enclave in KwaZulu-Natal) in which at least 19 people were killed, with the security forces failing to intervene.

In sharp contrast, relations between the ANC and the white minority continued to be accommodating, with occasional rifts within the transitional government being quickly resolved. The discovery by the ANC justice minister in January 1995 that the outgoing NP government had secretly granted indemnities from prosecution to over 3,500 policemen and security officials provoked a cabinet crisis in which de Klerk claimed that he and the NP had been subjected to “insulting attack.” However, the possibility of an NP withdrawal receded when de Klerk and Mandela agreed in a face-to-face meeting on January 20 that a “fresh start” should be made. More surprisingly, the president also established working relations with several Afrikaner groups that had vigorously opposed black majority rule, with a disavowal of violence by General Viljoen and the VF seen as particularly helpful. Most Afrikaner leaders welcomed an offer by Mandela on June 27 that a nonbinding referendum be held to ascertain the views of Afrikaners on the proposal for a separate Afrikaner state (volkstaat), the president accepting that it was the government’s duty “to consider their concerns and fears in a responsible, sensitive and constructive manner.”

Two days after the endorsement of the new constitution in Parliament, F. W. de Klerk announced on May 10, 1996, that the NP was withdrawing from the government of national unity with effect from June 30. He cited the diminishing influence of the NP on government policy, the refusal of the ANC to include power-sharing arrangements in the new constitution, and the need for an effective opposition. Commentators considered that the decision was motivated by a desire to assert the NP’s independence well in advance of legislative elections in 1999. The party subsequently also withdrew from all provincial governments except that of Western Cape, where it was in the majority. President Mandela appointed ANC members to replace the outgoing NP ministers and abolished the post of second deputy president vacated by de Klerk.

Much domestic attention subsequently focused on the initial proceedings of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC), which had been created in July 1995 to investigate human rights abuses and political crimes of the apartheid era with the aim of consigning their legacy to history. Chaired by Archbishop Desmond TUTU (head of the Anglican Church in South Africa until his retirement in June 1996), the TRC was empowered to grant judicial amnesties to people confessing to apartheid-era crimes (depending on their gravity) if it was satisfied that full disclosure had been made and that the crime in question had been politically motivated. The TRC began a scheduled two years of hearings in April 1996, its authority to grant amnesties being upheld by the Constitutional Court in July after the families of several murdered political activists had argued that the commission’s power to protect human rights violators from prosecution and civil damages denied them the opportunity to obtain justice through the courts.

Former state president de Klerk gave evidence to the TRC on August 21, 1996, stating that the security forces had not, to his knowledge, been authorized during the period of NP government to commit human rights abuses, although he apologized for suffering caused by the apartheid system. However, Eugene DE KOCH, a former colonel in the South African police who was convicted in the same month for murder and other crimes during the apartheid era, subsequently claimed in court that members of the former NP government had had full knowledge of a systematic campaign by the police, armed forces, and covert security units against apartheid opponents. Furthermore, in testimony to the TRC in October, several former members of the police claimed that former president P. W. Botha and two former ministers, Louis LE GRANGE and Adriaan VLOK, had ordered state violence against anti-apartheid organizations in the 1980s. (Botha was convicted in August 1998 for refusing to appear before the TRC, although in June 1999 his appeal was upheld on technical grounds.) In May 1997 de Klerk, in a second appearance, again denied knowledge of human rights violations. He retired from politics in August, and the NP inaugurated a new leadership under Marthinus van SCHALKWYK, by which time the party had ended its cooperation with the TRC on the grounds of political bias.

In September 1997 the deadline for submitting petitions to the TRC passed. Among those who did not file and attempted to stave off the TRC's calls to testify were former president Botha and a number of apartheid-era judicial officials. The ANC was the most prominent of the organizations to apply and in its petition admitted to torture, abuse, and even executions; however, the party attempted to justify such actions as being in the name of the "dirty war" fought against apartheid.

The dominant event of 1998 was the October release of a comprehensive report from the TRC. Having reviewed evidence from some 20,000 people, the TRC described apartheid as a "crime against humanity." It also declared the government responsible for a large majority of the abuses committed between 1960 and 1994, condemning the NP regime for a broad range of atrocities that included kidnappings, torture, killings, and bombings. However, the ANC and other liberation groups as well as extreme right organizations were also held accountable for violent acts. Not surprisingly, the report sparked controversy, and every major party rejected its conclusions to some degree. The report cited prominent individuals from across the entire political spectrum for human rights abuses. They included P. W. Botha, Chief Buthelezi, General Viljoen, Eugene Terre'Blanche, and President Mandela's ex-wife, Winnie MADIKIZELAMANDELA, one of the country's most popular female politicians and an ANC leader, who was implicated in a dozen violent acts, including murder. Although the activities of two of the TRC's three committees—the Reparation and Rehabilitation Committee and the Human Rights Violations Committee—drew to a close with the release of the report, the mandate of the Amnesty Committee, with over 1,000 cases yet to review, was extended by act of Parliament "until a date determined by the President."

In December 1997 President Mandela had resigned as ANC president and was succeeded, as expected, by Thabo Mbeki, who led the ANC into the June 2, 1999, national elections. The ANC emerged from the balloting with 266 National Assembly seats, 1 short of the two-thirds majority needed to amend the constitution, prompting party leaders to quickly negotiate a coalition with the Minority Front (MF), an ethnic Indian party that had won a single seat. On June 14 the National Assembly elected Mbeki, without opposition, as president, and he took the oath of office two days later. On June 17 the new president named ANC deputy leader Jacob ZUMA as deputy president and appointed a cabinet in which Chief Buthelezi retained his position as home affairs minister.

Simultaneous elections to the National Assembly and the provincial assemblies took place on April 14, 2004. A total of 21 parties presented candidates in the national ballot while 37 parties contested the provincial elections. The ANC emerged as the dominant party at both national and provincial levels. It gained 279 of the 400 National Assembly seats with 69.7 percent of the votes while the DA took 50 seats with 12.4 percent of the votes cast and the IFP 28 seats with 7.0 percent. The ANC took control of seven of the nine provincial assemblies. Although it failed to win outright majorities in KwaZulu-Natal and Western Cape, the ANC nominated premiers to head all nine provincial governments. The Democratic Alliance, led by Tony LEON, remained the official opposition.

Members of a reconstituted version of the old apartheid-era ruling party known as the New National Party (NNP), and the Azanian People's Organization were included in the cabinet, which contained 12 women, including the foreign minister. Several members of the South African Communist Party (SACP), which held no parliamentary seats, were included by virtue of their dual membership in the ANC. The NNP had an electoral pact with the ANC but received only 1.65 percent of the vote, down from 6.87 percent in 1999. The United Democratic Movement made a better showing with 2.2 percent of the vote (compared with 3.42 percent in 1999), and the newly-formed Independent Democrats, led by Patricia de LILLE, received 1.73 percent. In August Marthinus van Schalkwyk announced the dissolution of the NNP and with some of his colleagues joined the ANC.

However former president F. W. de Klerk refused to follow Schalkwyk into the ANC. In September, when elected officials at the local level were permitted to change parties during a “floor-crossing window,” two-thirds of NNP councilors joined the ANC. In June former president Nelson Mandela officially retired from public life.

On April 23 the Assembly re-elected Mbeki to serve a second term, but Buthelezi, who had held the post of minister of home affairs since 1994, was not reappointed.

Constitution and Government

Under the Interim Constitution adopted by the outgoing Parliament on December 22, 1993, executive power was exercised by a president named for a five-year term by the National Assembly. Legislative authority was vested in a bicameral Parliament consisting of a Senate, 10 of whose 90 members were elected from each of nine regional legislatures, and a National Assembly, half of whose 400 members were elected from national and half from regional party lists. The two houses sat jointly as a Constituent Assembly, which debated and approved a permanent constitution (see below). The Interim Constitution detailed rights of citizenship, which for the first time constituted a universal bill of rights applying equally to all races, to be safeguarded by a Constitutional Court as the supreme judicial authority. In its first major ruling on June 6, 1995, the Court decided unanimously to abolish the death penalty in South Africa.

The four historic provinces (Cape, Natal, Orange Free State, and Transvaal) were replaced by nine new provinces: Eastern Cape, Eastern Transvaal (now Mpumalanga), KwaZulu-Natal, Northern Cape, Northern Transvaal (now Limpopo), North-West, Orange Free State (now Free State), Pretoria-Witwatersrand-Vereeniging (PWV, now Gauteng), and Western Cape, each with an elected legislature. Under the new provincial structure, the four “independent” and six “self-governing” black homelands created by the previous regime were effectively abolished. (For details regarding the “independent” homelands, see the 1993 edition of the Handbook, pp. 762–772.) Town and city councils were established as multiracial, with white and black voters each electing 30 percent of the councilors and the remainder being selected on a nonracial basis.

In November 1995, following 18 months of work by the Constituent Assembly, the first draft of the new permanent constitution was published, with the main political parties reaching agreement on a final version on May 7, 1996, shortly before the expiry of the deadline set during the transitional period. The following day the text was approved overwhelmingly by Parliament. The NP voted in favor, despite its reservations over provisions relating to labor relations, property rights, language, and education, in order to safeguard concessions already secured from the ANC. The IFP was absent for the vote, maintaining its boycott of the Constituent Assembly, from which it had withdrawn in April 1995. Ratified in its final version on December 4 by the Constitutional Court, which had previously rejected certain draft clauses, particularly in relation to the reduction of provincial powers, the new constitution was finally signed into law on December 10 by President Mandela in a ceremony at Sharpeville. The IFP, which had briefly returned to the Constituent Assembly on October 1 before withdrawing again on October 7, accepted the legitimacy of the new document.

The new constitution took effect February 4, 1997, although some provisions (such as those concerning budget responsibilities) were not to be implemented until later in the year and the power-sharing provisions of the 1993 interim constitution were to remain in force until the 1999 general elections. The new basic law incorporated many essentials of the 1993 text, although it abandoned the principle that all parties with 5 percent of the vote should be represented in the cabinet. It also provided for a National Council of Provinces to replace the existing Senate, with the aim of enhancing the influence of the provinces on the policy of the central government—although it fell short of guaranteeing the provincial powers that the IFP had demanded. In addition, it enshrined an extensive bill of rights, one of the most liberal in the world. In the future, changes to the constitution would require the approval of at least two-thirds of the members of the National Assembly and at least six of the nine provinces represented in the National Council.

With regard to ordinary legislation, the powers exercised by the two houses vary. Bills affecting the republic as a whole are introduced in the National Assembly and, if passed, proceed to the National Council, where the members, voting individually, may concur or may propose changes for consideration by the Assembly. Bills affecting the provinces may be introduced in either house, but in the Council each of the nine provincial delegations has one vote. If the two chambers disagree on a provincial bill, an 18-member mediation committee (9 members from each chamber) attempts to reconcile the differences and return compromise legislation for a new vote in both houses. Failing that, the National Assembly may pass the bill with a two-thirds vote and send it on for presidential signature.

In early 1997 the legislature approved the creation of a National House of Traditional Leaders, aiming to provide a forum for the leaders of tribal groups and increasing communication between the legislature and the provinces. The new body was inaugurated on April 17. Members are named by provincial-level Houses of Traditional Leaders. In 2001 the Department of Justice and Constitutional Development, responding largely to requests from rural areas, announced that traditional leaders would be permitted to function as Commissioners of Oaths. At the same time, the Department of Provincial and Local Government has begun the process of more clearly delineating the powers and functions of the traditional leadership.

Provincial governments are led by elected legislatures of 30 to 80 members. Each legislature elects a provincial premier, who heads an Executive Council. Beneath the provincial level are six recently established metropolitan municipalities (“megacities,” incorporating surrounding townships)—Cape Town, Durban Unicity, Ekurhuleni (East Rand), Johannesburg, Nelson Mandela (Port Elizabeth), and Tshwane (Pretoria). There are also 47 district municipalities and 231 local municipalities. Legislatures are elected at each municipal level. In 2000 the proportion of traditional representatives on councils was raised from 10 percent to 20 percent. The smaller jurisdictions are represented throughout the governmental system by the South African Local Government Association (SALGA).

Foreign Relations

Although South Africa was a founding member of the United Nations, its international standing was greatly impaired as a result of the racial restrictions maintained in its own territory and, until late 1988, that of Namibia (South West Africa). In the post-World War II period its rejection of external advice and pressure resulted in an atrophy of international contacts, notably through its departure from the Commonwealth in 1961, its suspension from membership in the Economic Commission for Africa in 1963, and its withdrawal or expulsion from a number of UN Specialized Agencies. It was also denied participation in the UN General Assembly, which repeatedly condemned the policy and practice of apartheid and advocated “universally applied economic sanctions” as the only means of achieving a peaceful solution to the problem. The UN Security Council, while stopping short of economic measures, called as early as 1963 for an embargo on the sale and shipment to South Africa of military equipment and materials.

Relations with the United Nations were further aggravated by South Africa’s refusal to apply economic sanctions against Rhodesia, as ordered by the Security Council in 1966, and its long-standing refusal to relinquish control over Namibia, as ordered by both the General Assembly and the Security Council. Despite its political isolation on these key issues, Pretoria refrained from quitting the world body and attempted to maintain friendly political relations and close economic ties with most Western countries. Regionally, it belonged to the Southern African Customs Union (SACU), along with Botswana, Lesotho, Swaziland, and, later, Namibia. It also cooperated closely with the Ian Smith regime in Rhodesia over economic and defense matters, assisting its neighbor in circumventing UN sanctions. However, in accordance with its policy of seeking détente with neighboring black regimes, it publicly called for a resolution of the “Rhodesian question,” endorsing in 1976 the principle of black majority rule if appropriate guarantees were extended to the white minority of what became in 1980 the Republic of Zimbabwe.

For more than a decade the government mounted repeated forays into Angola in its protracted conflict with Namibian insurgents, while relations with Swaziland and Mozambique were aggravated by the presence of ANC guerrilla bases in both countries, despite the conclusion of a non-aggression pact with the former in 1982 and a similar agreement with the latter (the “Nkomati accord”) in May 1984.

During 1985 Western states came under increased pressure to impose sanctions on the Botha government. U.S. President Reagan had long opposed any action that would disrupt the South African economy, but, faced in mid-September with a congressional threat to act on its own, he ordered a number of distinctly modest punitive actions, with the countries of the European Community (EC, subsequently the EU) following in an equally restrained manner. The principal American prohibitions focused on bank loans and the export of nuclear technology and computers, while the Europeans imposed an oil embargo, halted most arms sales, and withdrew their military attachés. In addition, substantial corporate divestment occurred, particularly by U.S. firms. None of these sanctions presented a serious challenge to South Africa, which was, however, sufficiently aggrieved to threaten an embargo on the export of strategic metals to the United States.

Pretoria’s capacity to act with impunity in regard to neighboring states was amply demonstrated during 1986. On January 1 Lesotho was effectively blockaded, and three weeks later its government was overthrown by forces more supportive of South African efforts to contain cross-border attacks by ANC guerrillas. Subsequently, on May 19, ANC targets in Botswana, Zambia, and Zimbabwe were subjected to bombing attacks by the South African Air Force, in addition to ground raids by units of the SADF. Additional forays were conducted against alleged ANC bases in Swaziland late in the year and in Zambia in early 1987.

During 1988 South Africa’s regional posture softened dramatically. In September President Botha traveled to Mozambique for his first state visit to a black African country. “Fruitful and cordial” discussions were held with President Chissano on a variety of topics, including the supply of power from Mozambique’s Cahora Bassa hydroelectric facility, the status of Mozambican workers in South Africa, and “reactivation and reinforcement” of the Nkomati agreement of March 1984, which promised mutual non-aggression between South Africa and Mozambique. Subsequently, Botha visited Zaire and Côte d’Ivoire for talks with presidents Mobuto and Houphouët-Boigny, respectively. The most important development, however, concerned the Angola-Namibia conflict. During a November meeting at Geneva, Switzerland, Pretoria accepted a U.S.-mediated agreement, previously endorsed by Angola and Cuba, for the phased withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angola, accompanied by a withdrawal of all but 1,000 South African troops from Namibia and a UN-supervised election seven months thereafter in implementation of UN Security Council Resolution 435 of 1978. A protocol finalizing the agreement was signed at Brazzaville, Congo, on December 13, followed by the formal conclusion of a tripartite peace accord at UN headquarters in New York on December 22 (for details, see articles on Angola and Namibia). Not addressed by the Namibia settlement was the status of the port enclave of Walvis Bay, which, although historically South African territory, had been administered since 1977 as part of South West Africa. Preliminary discussions on the issue were launched in March 1991, but it was not until August 16, 1993, in a major decision of the multiparty forum convened to decide the future of South Africa, that the South African government delegation agreed under pressure from the ANC and other participants to transfer the Walvis Bay enclave to Namibia.

Formal conveyance occurred at midnight on February 28, 1994.

In a setback for ANC efforts to increase Pretoria's diplomatic isolation, in September 1990 President de Klerk was received at the white House by U.S. President George H. W. Bush. A few days earlier Foreign Minister Botha had announced that South Africa was prepared to accede to the UN Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (see International Atomic Energy Agency, under UN: Related Organizations) in furtherance of an effort to make the African continent a nuclear weapons-free zone.

The progress made in dismantling apartheid during 1991 yielded significant diplomatic gains for Pretoria on both a global and an African continental basis. Most economic embargo measures imposed by Western nations (save in regard to military items) were relaxed, and in April 1992, after a number of political exchanges with neighboring regimes, President de Klerk made a highly symbolic state visit to Nigeria for talks with the incumbent chair of the Organization of African Unity (OAU, subsequently the African Union—AU), Ibrahim Babangida. No less symbolic was South Africa's reacceptance into international sports activity.

On July 1, 1993, President de Klerk and ANC President Mandela held separate meetings at Washington with U.S. President Clinton and three days later were joint recipients of Liberty Medals at Philadelphia, with President Clinton in attendance. The end of apartheid was further celebrated on October 15, when de Klerk and Mandela were jointly awarded the 1993 Nobel Peace Prize. Concurrently, most UN economic sanctions against South Africa were terminated.

During 1994 South Africa gradually reentered the international community. On June 1 it rejoined the Commonwealth after a break of 33 years; two weeks later it became the 53rd member of the OAU. On June 23, following the Security Council's lifting of its long-standing arms embargo on South Africa, the suspension of Pretoria's participation in the UN General Assembly was rescinded, thus facilitating the reactivation of South African membership in UN specialized agencies. Two months later, South Africa joined the Southern African Development Community (SADC), and in October it signed a cooperation agreement with the EU.

President Mandela's independent line in foreign policy included the cultivation of relations with anti-Western regimes, such as those of Cuba and Libya, which had supported the ANC during the apartheid era. Nevertheless, relations with the United States were also strengthened, and in 1996 Mandela made successful visits to Germany, the United Kingdom, and France.

In November 1996 the South African government announced that it was canceling its diplomatic relations with Taiwan, one of its foremost trading partners, and establishing formal relations with the People's Republic of China with effect from the end of 1997. Although President Mandela said that South Africa wanted to maintain its links with Taiwan on the highest level short of diplomatic ties, in mid-December Taiwan recalled its ambassador for an indefinite period in protest over the South African decision.

South Africa remained a dominant force in regional affairs in 1998, one of its most striking decisions involving the deployment of troops to help restore order in Lesotho in the fall (see article on Lesotho for details). President Mandela also continued to pursue a role as Africa's most prominent peacemaker, becoming heavily involved, for example, in efforts to resolve the conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. In addition, the government further exhibited the independent nature of its foreign policy by extending ties with Iraq and North Korea, despite strong objections from Washington and several EU capitals.

South Africa has emerged in recent years as the continent's most vigorous and ambitious diplomatic power. Mbeki was the leading figure behind the newly created African Union and New Partnership for Africa's Development (NEPAD) and was instrumental in brokering peace in Burundi and the Democratic Republic of the Congo. South Africa provided 3,000 troops in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Burundi as part of UN peacekeeping operations, and Pretoria also has shouldered most of the financial burden. South African companies have struck out north with strong investment strategies. With 40 percent of sub-Saharan Africa's GDP, South Africa is the only country capable of projecting both military power and economic clout. However, South Africa has been criticized for its relations with Zimbabwe, as being insufficiently distanced from the Mugabe government. As one of the richest and most stable countries in Africa, South Africa attracts more refugees, both political and economic, than it can well accommodate. Some critics have described policies and procedures for granting refugees permanent resident status as arbitrary and inconsistent, as they seem to vary throughout the country.

South Africa has consistently opposed the U.S.-led war in Iraq and has promoted relations with many countries with whom the United States is at odds. Nevertheless, the United States considers South Africa as an ally in its efforts to promote democracy in the continent. President George W. Bush pointedly included South Africa in the itinerary during his tour of Africa in 2003.

In June 2006, Chinese premier Wen Jiabao visited South Africa and, addressing a crowd of more than 800 Chinese and South African business people at a forum in Cape Town, declared, "South Africa is China's key partner of strategic cooperation in Africa."

Current Issues

At the June 1999 balloting the dominance of the ANC was evident not only at the national level, but also in the provinces, where it retained outright majorities in seven, formed a coalition government with the IFP in KwaZulu-Natal, and won a plurality in Western Cape. In the national balloting, the Democratic Party, led by Tony LEON, displaced the NNP as the leading opposition formation, winning 38 seats (up from 7 in 1994), while the NNP managed only 28, a net loss of 54. Facing diminished prospects, in June 2000 the NNP joined the DP in forming a Democratic Alliance (DA), the expectation being that a full merger of the parties would eventually occur. The DA surprised many observers by winning 23 percent of the national vote at the December municipal elections, but policy and leadership clashes ultimately led the NNP to part ways with the DP in October 2001. In abandoning the DA for a closer relationship with the ANC, the NNP's van Schalkwyk noted that the two erstwhile antagonists no longer had significant ideological differences. Thus, at the end of 2001 the only opposition formations with more than a handful of National Assembly members were the rump DA (the DP plus the small Federal Alliance) and the United Democratic Movement.

Despite its predominance, in 2000–2002 the ANC often found no clear direction toward resolving fundamental national issues. Criticism of its Growth, Employment, and Redistribution (GEAR) program was voiced not only by the opposition, but also by the closely allied Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU) and the South African Communist Party (SACP). Both faulted the ANC's turn toward market-oriented economics, including its privatization plans for such industries as energy, transportation, and telecommunications. They objected partly on ideological grounds and partly from concern over potential job losses, the rate of unemployment having failed to move significantly lower than the 37 percent average of 1997–1999, and economic growth having remained well below the level needed for achieving real reductions in poverty. At the same time the pace of land redistribution was slow, with the Land Claims Commission and white landowners often in dispute over fair market value. By July 2000 only 3 percent of farmland had been redistributed, far from the 30 percent called for by Parliament in 1994. As a consequence, landless blacks became increasingly impatient as the government attempted to avoid the domestic turmoil and international condemnation associated with the more radical expropriation policy in neighboring Zimbabwe.

In 2000–2002 the Mbeki administration drew withering criticism for its failure to present a cohesive plan for fighting the HIV/AIDS crisis. In April 2000 President Mbeki lent support to a scientifically discredited argument attributing AIDS to causes other than HIV infection, but by October the resultant uproar had led him to temper his comments. Although the government and AIDS activists joined forces to win a patent fight against international pharmaceutical companies, more often than not they were at odds over treatment, costs, and drug distribution, particularly with regard to preventing mother-to-child transmission. Meanwhile, an estimated 11 percent of the South African population has been infected with HIV (at least one estimate places the number at 25 percent), and in 2000 AIDS accounted for 40 percent of all deaths in the 15–49 age group. Such daunting statistics prompted the International Monetary Fund to warn in 2001 of likely “significant demographic changes” in South Africa and of “far-reaching economic and social consequences, including lower economic growth and exacerbation of poverty.” In October 2002 the government reversed itself and announced that it would look into making crucial antiretroviral drugs available through the public health system. Criticism of the government’s response to the problem has continued, however.

The Mbeki administration also struggled to maintain an anticorruption campaign. In June 2001 public hearings opened into a December 1999 arms deal involving the purchase of surface ships, submarines, helicopters, and jet aircraft from a number of EU countries, at a cost of $5.4 billion. Despite accusations that officials had received kickbacks and engaged in other illegalities, in November the resultant report concluded that the procurement procedure had been flawed but not corrupt, although individuals who had derived “some form of benefit from the acquisition process” could be held criminally liable. The National Assembly opposition condemned the report as a whitewash.

The Truth and Reconciliation Commission intended to release the final volumes of its report in 2002, but publication was delayed when the IFP went to court in opposition to conclusions that it had been responsible for major violations of human rights. At the same time, the government, apparently fearing a loss of foreign investment, offered no support for various class action lawsuits, filed in the United States and elsewhere, against banks and multinational corporations that allegedly extended material support to the apartheid-era regime.

Meanwhile, even as South Africa’s official examination of its apartheid-era abuses neared a conclusion, a more recent wave of violence frequently commanded the headlines. An Islamic group, the People Against Gangsterism and Drugs (PAGAD), drew considerable attention. Some members admitted involvement in vigilante attacks against drug traffickers, but PAGAD also allegedly conducted unrelated pipe bombings in the Cape Town vicinity. Among the dozens of targets were a police station and a U.S.-owned restaurant, raising the possibility of political motivation by at least some PAGAD elements. Since 2002 PAGAD activities have diminished considerably.

The extreme right-wing Warriors of the Boer Nation claimed responsibility for a wave of bomb blasts in Soweto on October 30, 2002. The attacks came in the context of a crackdown by authorities against extremist white elements. In November the National Intelligence Agency reported that it had broken up a plot by another group, the Boer Freedom Action (Boere Vryheids Aksie—BVA), to poison township water supplies and attack power and other infrastructure facilities.

In 2004 the ANC consolidated its hegemonic position in South African politics. In 2002 the Constitutional Court had allowed deputies to change parties without losing their seats. Following this ruling, members of the UDM and NNP defected to the ruling party, giving it a two-thirds majority, while the FA and the Afrikaner Eenheidsbeweging lost all their seats. South Africa was becoming more and more a one-party state like many of the African states to the north. At the provincial level members of the IFP defected to the ANC in KwaZulu-Natal.

The Truth and Reconciliation Commission’s final report was presented to the president in 2003. The Commission had granted amnesty to 1,200 people but had rejected more than 5,000 applications. After rejecting a suggestion that a special tax be imposed on companies that had gained from apartheid, Mbeki announced that those designated victims by the TRC would receive a single payment of $3,800 each.

Land redistribution has dominated the public policy agenda along with HIV/AIDS during Mbeki's second term. Fifty thousand white farmers own 87 percent of the country's agricultural land. In 2004 Mbeki signed into law the controversial Restitution of Land Rights Amendment Act, which gives the state the right to expropriate land for restitution purposes without a court order or the seller's agreement. The act applies only to land from which blacks were forcibly removed under the colonial and apartheid regimes. The expropriated farmer will reportedly receive just and equitable compensation. The government's goal is to transfer 30 percent of all agricultural land from white to black farmers by 2014. By mid-2006 there were indications that land redistribution was not going fast enough to meet that goal, and that the government might move away from its stated "willing buyer, willing seller" policy in the direction of forced expropriation.

In June 2005 Schabir SHAIK, financial adviser to deputy president Jacob ZUMA, was found guilty of two counts of corruption and one of fraud in one of the most closely watched criminal trials since the end of apartheid. On June 15, Zuma, whom the judge had called "compliant," was dismissed from the office of deputy president, and two weeks later he was charged with two counts of bribery. In the months that followed, a groundswell of popular support developed for Zuma, a key figure in the fight against apartheid; the powerful trade union COSATU described the pending legal action as a "political trial," and called on President Mbeki to reinstate Zuma. At year's end, however, matters became further complicated when Zuma was charged with raping the 31-year-old daughter of a friend. In May 2006, a judge found Zuma not guilty of rape, and within days he was reinstated as ANC deputy president. Analysts said Zuma emerged "battered but not destroyed." His trial on the bribery charges began at the end of July, but has been postponed until early September so that the judge could consider a motion to dismiss the charges. The outcome of the trial will be a major factor in Zuma's quest to succeed Mbeki as president of South Africa.

Political Parties

During most of the apartheid era South Africa's leading party was the predominantly Afrikaner National Party, which came to power in 1948 and steadily increased its parliamentary strength to a high of 134 (81 percent) of lower house seats at the November 1977 election, before falling to 98 seats (57 percent) in 1989. While not as extremist as the Reconstituted National Party, the Conservative Party of South Africa, or a variety of smaller formations, the National Party was long committed to the general principle of white supremacy. Parties advocating more liberal racial policies fared poorly, with only the Progressive Party winning representation in the House of Assembly at the 1974 election; in 1977, however, a successor organization, the Progressive Federal Party (PFP), became the leading opposition party, with 17 seats, which were increased to 26 in 1981. In 1989 the PFP joined with two other moderate groups to form the Democratic Party, which won 33 directly elective seats in the September balloting.

At the post-apartheid election of April 26–29, 1994, the African National Congress secured an overwhelming majority of National Assembly seats on a vote share of 62.6 percent, followed by the National Party with 20.4 percent and the Inkatha Freedom Party with 10.5 percent.

Some 40 parties, including a number of new groupings, appeared in the run-up to the balloting of June 2, 1999; the government announced that some 16 had been authorized to contest the election to the National Assembly, while 10 more planned to offer candidates at the provincial level only. As of late 2001 over 100 parties were officially registered with the Independent Electoral Commission.

Government Parties

African National Congress (ANC). Organized in 1912 and long recognized as South Africa's leading black formation, the ANC was banned from 1960 to 1990. In October 1989 Walter SISULU, who had been imprisoned for 26 years, was one of seven prominent ANC leaders released from custody by the de Klerk administration; release of the organization's most charismatic figure, Nelson Mandela, occurred on February 11, 1990, while its president, Oliver TAMBO, was permitted to return from more than three decades' exile on December 13. (Tambo died in 1993.) On May 28–31, 1992, the ANC held a policy conference at Johannesburg, during which it celebrated its evolution from a liberation movement to a political party and replaced a 1955 commitment to comprehensive nationalization with an emphasis on a mixed economy. In January 1994, prior to its assumption of power, it did, however, announce an ambitious program to end economic apartheid by redistributing land, building more than a million low-income dwellings, assuming state control of the mining industry, and breaking up white-owned conglomerates. The draft plan, known as the Reconstruction and Development Program, drew immediate criticism from the country's business leaders and yielded a caveat from Mandela that it required "a substantial amount of additional work to be anywhere near what we want it to be."

Among those elected on the ANC ticket in the party's landslide election victory in April 1994 was Winnie Mandela, the controversial estranged wife of the new president, whose 1991 conviction for kidnapping and being an accessory to assault did not deter her appointment as a deputy minister in the new government. Also elected was the ANC secretary general, Cyril RAMAPHOSA, who on May 22 was named by the ANC parliamentary caucus to chair the joint Assembly-Senate sittings that would draft the definitive version of the post-apartheid constitution. In a strengthening of radical elements in the party leadership, Winnie Mandela regained her position on the ANC executive at the 49th congress in December, when First Deputy President Thabo Mbeki succeeded the ailing Sisulu as ANC vice president, thus becoming President Mandela's heir apparent. Mrs. Mandela's dismissal from the government in March 1995, following her public assertions that it lacked radicalism, drew official endorsement from ANC bodies, although she retained strong rank-and-file support. The Mandelas' 38-year marriage ended in divorce in March 1996.

In November 1995 the ANC won 66.4 percent of the votes cast in South Africa's first democratic local elections. In August 1996 President Mandela formally notified the ANC executive committee that he would not seek a second presidential term in the elections due in 1999 and that he would relinquish the ANC presidency at the party's next national conference in 1997.

In April 1997 Winnie Mandela retained her position as president of the ANC's Women's League, despite the party's apparent backing of her challengers, and in September she announced her intention to campaign for the ANC's deputy presidential post. Once again the party backed her opponent, Jacob Zuma, but what ultimately derailed her aspirations was her alleged role in apartheid-era violence, and she withdrew from the deputy leadership race.

As expected, at the ANC's congress held December 16–20, 1997, Nelson Mandela announced his retirement from the party's top post and his chosen successor, Thabo Mbeki, was unopposed in the subsequent election for party president. Also unopposed in their runs for party posts were Zuma, Kgalema Motlanthe (secretary general), and Mendi MSIMANG (treasurer general). For her part, Winnie Mandela secured a seat on the National Executive Committee.

The ANC unsuccessfully tried to block release of the comprehensive TRC report in the fall of 1998, objecting to conclusions that the ANC had been responsible for human rights abuses and acts of terrorism against its opponents during the anti-apartheid campaign and prior to the 1994 balloting. Party officials, led by Mbeki, condemned the report as "scurrilous," but President Mandela, in a pointed departure from the views of his successor, acknowledged that some of the abuses reported by the TRC had occurred and chastised the other ANC leaders for their angry response. Winnie Mandela was singled out in the TRC report for her alleged role in violent acts committed by the Mandela United Football Club, described as her "private army." Nevertheless, she remained popular in the ANC and was placed high on its candidate list for the June 1999 balloting, thereby assuring her election to the Assembly.

At the June 1999 elections the ANC widened its parliamentary majority to 266 seats (with a 66.4 percent vote share) and retained control of seven provincial legislatures. It joined the IFP in a coalition government in KwaZulu-Natal and then in November 2001, having negotiated a cooperation agreement with the NNP, joined in forming a new administration in the ninth province, Western Cape, where it held a plurality of Council seats.

Considerable controversy greeted an April 24, 2001, televised accusation by Minister of Safety and Security Steve TSHWETE that three prominent party members—Cyril Ramaphosa, former Mpumalanga premier Mathews PHOSA, and former Gauteng premier Tokyo SEXWALE—had conspired against President Mbeki's leadership. All three were regarded in some quarters as potential challengers to Mbeki. On December 4 Tshwete publicly apologized.

On October 18, 2001, Winnie Madikizela-Mandela was arrested and charged with fraud and theft involving some $108,000 in dozens of bank loans to fictitious members of the ANC Women's League. Earlier in the month ANC Whip Tony YENGENI had resigned following his arrest for alleged illegal acquisition of an automobile in connection with the controversial 1999 $5.4 billion arms deal with EU countries.

The ANC remains closely tied, through a Tripartite Alliance, to the COSATU and to the South African Communist Party (SACP), despite the latter's recent objections to ANC labor and privatization policies. The three organizations have a considerable overlap in membership, and in recent elections COSATU and SACP candidates have been included on the ANC candidate list.

The ANC's entrenchment as the dominant party in South African politics has been helped by the splintering of opposition parties and the iconic status of ANC leaders such as Mandela and Mbeki. Although voter turnout in South Africa is historically low, the ANC has made heavy inroads among Zulus, working-class people, Indians, and Coloureds. It still has not won over many white voters, who generally vote for the DA or other white liberal or right-wing parties. Most South Africans believe that only the ANC has the interests of blacks at heart and are therefore prepared to overlook its deficiencies.

While South Africans are keenly aware of the dangers of a one-party state, they also realize that the ANC's strength has helped to create one of the most stable countries in Africa. The ANC has also vigorously pursued the attrition of its opponents by wooing legislators and career politicians with jobs and favors. The ANC has made floor-crossing respectable and has helped to create a big tent in which even rival political ideologies can flourish. In a survey conducted by Harvard University two out of three South Africans believe the ANC wields too much power, and that the boundary between party and state is becoming blurred. The same survey reveals that eight out of ten South Africans believe that this poses no threat to democracy.

The outcome of Jacob Zuma's legal problems is likely to have a profound effect on the ANC's future. He is estranged from president Mbeki, but remains popular with many ANC members. Some observers have suggested that controversy over Zuma could go as far as to break up the ANC, with unpredictable consequences for South Africa's future. If Zuma is not convicted he is likely to be a candidate for president in the elections of 2009, the crucial first transfer of power in which Nelson Mandela is neither the incoming nor the outgoing president.

Leaders: Thabo MBEKI (President of the Republic and of the Party), Phumzile MLAMBO-NGCUKA (Deputy President of the Republic), Jacob ZUMA (Deputy President), Patrick LEKOTA (National Chairperson), Kgalema MOTLANTHE (Secretary General).

South African Communist Party (SACP). The SACP was formed in 1953, following dissolution, a year earlier, of the original Communist Party of South Africa (CPSA), which had been organized in 1921. The SACP has long cooperated closely with the ANC, to a number of whose senior organs SACP members have been appointed. The party's former chair, Dr. Yusef DADOO, died in 1983, while its former general secretary, Moses MABHIDA, died at Maputo, Mozambique, in March 1986. A year later, following his appointment as Mabhida's successor, Joe SLOVO resigned as chief of staff of the ANC's military wing, Umkhonto we Sizwe. He returned to South Africa in April 1990. The party gathered for a "relaunching"—its first public rally within South Africa in 40 years—on July 29, 1990.

In a stinging opening address to the SACP's first legal congress on December 8, 1991, Slovo insisted that former Soviet President Gorbachev had "completely lost his way" and that what was being buried in Eastern Europe was not true socialism. Subsequently, Slovo was elected party chair, with the longtime chief of Umkhonto we Sizwe, Chris HANI, being named his successor as general secretary. Hani was assassinated on April 10, 1993.

The SACP, as such, did not contest the 1994 election, its candidates being included on the ANC list. Subsequently, Slovo was awarded the housing portfolio in the Mandela administration, but he died in January 1995. The party candidates were again merged with those of the ANC for the 1999 balloting. About 80 of the ANC's 266 National Assembly representatives have SACP membership, as do a number of cabinet ministers.

The SACP is one of only a few Communist parties in Africa today. But its ideology has been diluted since 1994 when it moved in as a coalition partner with the ANC in a national government. Many of its leaders, such as Chair Charles Nqakula, Jeff RADEBE, and Essop PAHAD, are now cabinet ministers. Since the SACP is now in the position of having to defend ANC policies and programs, hardliners in the party feel that the party's own principles have suffered.

Leaders: Charles NQAKULA (National Chair), Geraldine FRASER-MOLEKETI (Minister of Public Service and Administration), Blade NZIMANDE (General Secretary), Jeremy CRONIN (Deputy General Secretary).

Azanian People's Organization (Azapo). Azapo was launched as a black consciousness movement in early 1978; however, its founders, Ishmael MKHABELA and Lybon Mabasa, were immediately detained, and it did not hold its first congress until September 1979. (Mabasa was subsequently described as the leader of the Social- ist Party of Azania.) Although never a mass party, it enjoyed the support of black intellectuals. Avowedly nonviolent, it adopted a hard line on the possibility of negotiating with the white government and was strongly anti-Codesa. In early 1994 Azapo declared its opposition to the forthcoming all-party election and announced that it would intensify its struggle until land had been returned to the country's blacks. Although Azapo had boycotted the 1994 balloting, it was registered for the 1999 elections, at which it won .2 percent of the vote and one National Assembly seat. In January 2001 the Azapo leader, Mosibudi Mangena, was named deputy minister of education. After its poor performance in the 2004 elections it held unity talks with the Pan Africanist Congress and the Socialist Party of Azania.

Leaders: Mosibudi MANGENA (President), Pandelani NEFOLOVHODWE (Deputy President), Zithulele N. A. CINDI (National Chair).

United Democratic Movement (UDM). The UDM was launched on September 27, 1997, by former NP secretary general Roelf MEYER and former ANC deputy minister Bantu Holomisa on a self-described moderate and nonracial platform. The new grouping was reportedly immediately bolstered by the enrollment of a number of young, liberal NP defectors. Its first secretary general, Sifiso NKABINDE, was murdered in January 1999.

The UDM subsequently was reported to be gaining popular support, and it competed in the 1999 Assembly campaign on a pledge to narrow the gap between rich and poor without imperiling the wealth of the financial elite. The party won 14 seats on a 3.4 percent vote share. In January 2000 Meyer announced his retirement from politics, and the Second National Congress in December 2001 confirmed Holomisa as president.

The UDM is identified with Xhosa interests in Eastern Cape province. It supported the ANC during the latter's bitter struggle with the IFP for control of the KwaZulu-Natal legislature. Floor crossing has cost the UDM heavily. Nine members defected to the ANC, and Mogoboya Ramodike left to form his own party. However the party retains one deputy ministerial post, Ntopile KGANYAGO, Public Works, and for this reason is included among government parties here.

Leaders: Bantu HOLOMISA (President), Gerhard KOORNHOF (Deputy President/Finance Spokesperson), Malizole DIKO (Secretary General).

Other Parliamentary Parties

Democratic Alliance (DA). The DA was established in late June 2000 by the Democratic Party (DP); the New National Party (NNP); and the small Federal Alliance (FA), which earlier in the month had agreed to present its candidates for upcoming local elections on the DP list. Formal merger of the three was delayed, however, pending passage of legislation permitting party consolidations. Initially seen as an attempt by the principal white formations to form a united front, the DA registered considerable success at the December municipal elections, taking 23 percent of the national vote and capturing Cape Town from the ANC. However, differences within the leadership resulted in the departure of the NNP from the DA in November 2001, and local defections in October 2002 delivered control of Cape Town to an ANC-NNP coalition. In 2004 the Democratic Alliance emerged as the principal opposition party in the national parliament with 50 seats.

Leaders: Tony LEON (President and Leader of the Opposition), Joe SEREMANE (Chairperson), Donald LEE (Deputy Chairperson).

Inkatha Freedom Party (IFP). Although predominantly a Zulu organization, the Inkatha, in response to charges of tribalism, voted at a general conference in July 1990 to transform itself “from a liberation movement into a political party” that would be open to all races; however, most observers felt that the organization remained primarily a vehicle for the expression of Zulu interests in KwaZulu.

Bitterly opposed to the ANC and frequently engaged in violence with its larger rival, Inkatha declared in mid-1993 that it would not participate in the 1994 election and joined in an improbable alliance with the leading right-extremist parties and representatives of nominally independent Bophuthatswana and Ciskei in a Concerned South Africans Group (COSAG) that was subsequently styled the Freedom Alliance. Following the ouster of Bophuthatswana’s Lucas Mangope in March 1994, however, the Alliance disintegrated, and Inkatha agreed on April 19 to abandon its boycott of the election. It placed third. The group was awarded three portfolios in the ensuing Mandela administration, including the designation of Inkatha leader Buthelezi as home affairs minister. It nevertheless continued its deep disagreement with the ANC over constitutional and other issues, boycotting the Constituent Assembly charged with drafting a new constitution.

The intraparty schism between those members favoring continued participation in the national government (so-called moderates) and the Buthelezi-led, anti-ANC faction widened in early 1997. At a meeting of the National Council in January, the IFP’s national chair, Frank MD-LALOSE, and Secretary General Jiba JIYANE resigned and were replaced by Buthelezi supporters Ben NGUBANE and Zakhele KHUMALO, respectively. Subsequently, in March, 13 IFP activists were convicted for their roles in the slaying of 19 ANC members in 1995.

The TRC accused the IFP of having caused the death of nearly 4,000 opponents in KwaZulu in 1982–1994, attributing ultimate responsibility for the violence in large part to Chief Buthelezi, who did not testify before the commission or request amnesty. Subsequently, the IFP election campaign in 1999 focused on economic issues. At the June balloting the party won 34 seats in the National Assembly on an 8.6 percent vote share. It continued as national government partner of the ANC, with which it also formed a coalition in KwaZulu-Natal.

The IFP has suffered considerable erosion of support as a result of perceived ANC bulldozer strategies. Relations between the IFP and ANC are now at their lowest ebb since 1994, when the IFP joined the government of national unity. The main arena of the quarrel between the two parties is KwaZulu-Natal, where, in late 2002, the ruling IFP ejected two ANC ministers from the provincial government and formed a partnership with the opposition Democratic Alliance. While Buthelezi and chair Lionel MTSHALI were renominated at the 2004 national congress in Ulundi, Musa ZONDI was nominated for the revived position of secretary general that had been abolished in 1998. The IFP also launched a campaign to shed its image as an exclusively Zulu party and appeal to the broader multiracial community. The IFP no longer has any representation in the government.

Leaders: Chief Mangosuthu (Gatsha) BUTHELEZI (President of the Party).

African Christian Democratic Party (ACDP). The ACDP, a conservative Christian group, was organized prior to the 1994 balloting, at which it won two seats on a 0.5 percent vote share; it also secured representation in three provincial assemblies. In 1997 the ACDP expressed outrage at the government's decision to legalize abortion. The party also contested the 2004 elections, at which it won 1.4 percent of the vote and six assembly seats.

Leaders: Kenneth MESHOE (President), Jo-Ann DOWNS (Deputy President).

Independent Democrats (ID). The ID is South Africa's newest political party, formed in March 2003 under the leadership of Patricia de LILLE. De Lille is a former trade unionist and a long-time member of and MP for the Pan Africanist Congress, which she left to form the ID. With the motto "Back to Basics," the ID's policies are fairly centrist. The party agrees with the ANC on the economy, health, and jobs, although de Lille outspokenly differs on HIV/AIDS.

Freedom Front Plus. This group was founded in 2004 as successor to Freedom Front (Vryheidsfront—VF). The VF was launched by Gen. (Ret.) Constand VILJOEN in March 1994 following a split in the Afrikaner People's Front (AVF; see discussion under CPSA, below) over the issue of participation in the April election, with the VF opting to register to present the case for a "white homeland." Several prominent members of the Conservative Party also defected to the new grouping. In late March the VF stated that its objective was a confederal South Africa based on the "inalienable and non-negotiable" right of self-determination for Afrikaners and all other groups. Subsequent to the April poll, at which it placed fourth with 2.2 percent of the vote, the Front insisted that blatant irregularities had occurred at 80 percent of the voting stations. Having achieved a measure of accommodation with the government under black majority rule, the VF welcomed President Mandela's proposal of June 1995 that a consultative referendum should be held to ascertain Afrikaners' views on the concept of a separate Afrikaner state.

In the TRC report issued in October 1998, General Viljoen was held accountable for certain acts of violence committed by right-wingers during the run-up to the 1994 balloting. Meanwhile, the VF was described as hoping to cooperate with the DP for the 1999 election, at which it won only 0.8 percent of the vote and three National Assembly seats (a loss of six). In August Viljoen was reelected party leader by one vote over Pieter Mulder, but in March 2001 he announced his retirement from active politics. On March 31 Mulder was unanimously elected as his successor. The Freedom Front Plus manifesto calls for self-determination for local communities.

Leaders: Pieter MULDER (Party Leader), Abrie OOSTHUIZEN (Chair).

Pan Africanist Congress of Azania (PAC). A militant ANC offshoot that was also banned in 1960, the PAC long sought to unite all black South Africans in a single national front. Based at Lusaka, Zambia, the Congress announced in May 1979 the establishment in the Sudan of a "June 16 Azania Institute" (named after the June 1976 Soweto uprising) to instruct displaced South African students in a variety of academic and artisan skills. Its underground affiliate, the Azanian People's Liberation Army (APLA), was relatively small, compared to the military wing of the rival ANC. The PAC's longtime leader, John Nyati POKELA, died in June 1985; its president, Zephania MOTHOPENG, was released from nine years' imprisonment in November 1988, while another leader, Jafta MASEMOLA, was released in October 1989. In September 1990 the PAC rejected a government invitation to participate in constitutional talks, branding the overture as “not serious or honest.” In October the PAC joined the ANC and some 60 other groups (Inkatha being the most notable exception) in the attempted formation of a united Patriotic Front. However, the PAC subsequently broke with the Mandela-led formation in opposing Codesa, insisting that it would settle for nothing less than “a democratically elected constituent assembly.” The PAC has abandoned its more radical programs, and it concentrates on the plight of the poor and related issues.

The PAC announced in early 1994 that it was abandoning armed struggle, thus permitting it to register for the April election. The party won 1.2 percent of the vote and five Assembly seats. Following a protracted leadership struggle, Clarence MAKWETU stepped down as PAC president in December 1996 and was replaced by Mmutlanyane Mogoba.

Under Mogoba’s leadership the PAC in 1997 evinced a conciliatory attitude toward whites, while party leaders also expressed an interest in opening a dialogue with the ANC, the PAC’s longtime rival. Subsequently, in January 1999, it was announced that the APLA had been officially disbanded, and the PAC was registered to contest the June national elections, at which it won three seats on a 0.7 percent vote share. In July 2001 the PAC, responding to delays in land distribution and government housing construction, began helping thousands of homeless people occupy a wasteland near Johannesburg. The government quickly evicted them.

Leaders: Mmutlanyane MOGOBA (President), Michael Ngila MUENDANE, Thami ka PLAATJIE (Secretary General).

United Christian Democratic Party (UCDP). The UCDP was founded by Chief Lucas Mangope, former president of the Bophuthatswana homeland. The conservative formation includes in its platform support for the authority of traditional leaders. Despite reports that Mangope considered merging the UCDP with the newly formed UDM in 1997, it contested the 1999 elections independently, winning three seats in the National Assembly on a .8 percent vote share. In 2004 it retained its three seats.

Leaders: Lucas MANGOPE, Paul DIT-SHETELO (Parliamentary Leader).

Minority Front (MF). The MF represents the rights of Indians in South Africa; it participated without success in the 1994 balloting but won one National Assembly seat in 1999 on a vote share of 0.3 percent. It then formed an alliance with the ANC, giving the latter the 267 votes needed to amend the constitution.

Leaders: Amichand RAJBANSI, Sunklavathy RAJBALLY (Member of the National Assembly).

Other Parties and Groups

New National Party (NNP). The NNP is the name adopted by the National Party (Nasionale Party—NP) at a December 1998 congress in an effort to reshape its image from that of the party that had promoted apartheid. A product of a number of splits and mergers extending back to the period before World War II, the NP had come to power under the leadership of Daniel F. MALAN in 1948, and in 1951 it absorbed the Afrikaner Party. Supported by the great majority of Afrikaners and by a growing number of English-speaking South Africans, it became the majority party in 1953. For many years the party’s official doctrine stressed rigorous anti-communism and separate development of the non-white races, with the Bantu homelands developing into independent states. The so-called verligte (“enlightened”) faction under former prime minister Balthazar VORSTER sought to reconcile these policies with the promotion of white immigration, solidarity among all white South Africans, and the pursuit of friendly relations with the outside world, including black African states. These ideas were rejected by the opposing verkrampte (“unenlightened”) faction, which tended to regard the party as a vehicle of specifically Afrikaner nationalism and opposed the inclusion of English-speaking elements in the membership. The dismissal of verkrampte leader Dr. Albert Hertzog in the course of a cabinet reorganization in 1968 was generally interpreted as establishing the predominance of the Vorster faction. Hertzog and other conservative elements withdrew in 1969 to form the Refounded National Party (below). Vorster's influence within the party eroded sharply following the eruption of a Watergate-type scandal (see Political background, above) that forced his resignation as state president in mid-1979.

President Pieter BOTHA resigned as party leader at the party's annual caucus on February 2, 1989, with F. W. de KLERK being elected his successor in a contested vote. At the general election of September 6, the NP retained control of the House of Assembly by a substantially reduced majority. Four months earlier, in a parliamentary speech, de Klerk had asserted that although South Africans should anticipate "drastic changes," the NP was committed to "a constitutional dispensation which will not be conducive to majority rule," since such a condition would be "unjust to minorities." On August 31, however, he announced that the party would thenceforth be open to members of all races.

Following the March 1992 referendum on constitutional revision, de Klerk announced that South Africa's whites had "closed the book on apartheid" and reiterated an earlier pledge that the NP would utilize its parliamentary majority to implement decisions that called for admission of all South Africans to the political process. The NP emerged from the election of April 1994 as the second-ranked party, with de Klerk being named second deputy president in the Mandela administration. A feature of the party scene thereafter was an increasing number of defections from the NP to the ANC, including those of some senior figures.

In February 1996 the NP minister of provincial affairs and constitutional development, Roelf Meyer, announced his resignation from the government to assume the new post of NP secretary general. While remaining a member of the National Assembly and taking over the party's parliamentary leadership, Meyer was charged with charting a new future and image for the NP in the post-apartheid era. To that end, de Klerk announced in May 1996 that the NP was withdrawing from the government of national unity in order to form the parliamentary opposition and to redefine itself as a distinctive political force.

Subsequently, the NP was stunned when Meyer resigned from the party in May 1997 and announced the formation of a new grouping (see UDM, above). In June de Klerk reportedly reached agreement with Freedom Front leader Constand Viljoen to increase the level of cooperation between their two groups. However, de Klerk announced his intention to resign from politics in August. The former national president had been the target of withering criticism from the TRC after he had testified in May that he knew nothing about human rights abuses during his years in leadership positions. Following a reportedly bruising intraparty battle between the party's conservative and moderate wings, Marthinus van SCHALKWYK, a relative unknown, was elected party president.

The TRC strongly condemned former president Botha for the violence, including murder and torture, committed by government security forces during his tenure as prime minister (1978–1984) and president (1984–1989). For his part the unrepentant Botha accused the TRC of "witchhunts" and refused to testify, earning a conviction for contempt that was later overturned on technical grounds.

For the June 1999 balloting the NNP reportedly sought an electoral alliance with the IFP or the Democratic Party (DP), but neither overture succeeded. In the national election the party saw its vote share drop to 6.9 percent; as a consequence its National Assembly representation fell to 28 seats, down from 82 in 1994. In the provinces it won enough West Cape Council seats to form a coalition government with the DP.

On June 25, 2000, the DP and NNP announced that they would merge as the Democratic Alliance (DA), with van Schalkwyk becoming the new formation's deputy chair under the DP's Tony Leon. Policy and personal disputes between the two leaders subsequently surfaced, however, and on October 21, 2001, the NNP withdrew from the DA and announced that it was prepared to seek closer ties to the ANC, with which it no longer had prohibitive policy differences. On November 27 the ANC and NNP announced a cooperative pact, the most immediate consequence being formation of a new ANC-NNP administration in Western Cape. Looking further ahead, the NNP leadership anticipated greater participation throughout government, including at the cabinet level.

On August 7, 2004, the NNP asked its members to join the ANC and agreed to fight all future elections under the ANC banner. The decision sounded the death knell for South Africa's second-oldest party, founded in 1914, two years after the formation of the ANC. While the party was not formally disbanding until September 2005, Marthinus van Schalkwyk said that he was applying for ANC membership and advised his colleagues to do likewise. Support for the NNP in 2004 was only 1.7 percent, compared to 20 percent in 1994 and 7 percent in 1999. Most of the hard-core NNP voters have shifted their allegiance to the DA. By mid-2006 defections of its National Assembly members had reduced its parliamentary representation to zero. The party appeared to have some vestigial existence on the national level, but the scope of its activity was unclear.

Alliance for Democracy and Prosperity (ADP). The ADP is a new political party launched by Nelson RAMODIKE, formerly of the United Democratic Movement.

Conservative Party of South Africa (Konservatiewe Party van Suid-Afrika—CPSA). The CPSA was formally launched in March 1982 by a group of right-wing MPs who had been expelled from the NP for opposing the government's proposals for constitutional reform, which, it was argued, would eventually lead to power-sharing with blacks. During its inaugural rally at Pretoria, it was announced that three formations had agreed to merge with the CPSA: the National Conservative Party—NCP (Nasionale Konservatiewe Party); the "Action for Our Future" (Aksie Eie Toekoms—AET); and the South Africa First Campaign (SAFC), a relatively obscure English-speaking group.

The NCP had been organized in November 1979 (initially as the Action Group for National Priorities) by Dr. Connie Mulder, who had been ousted as a government minister for his role in the Information Department scandal. The AET had been formed in February 1981 by a number of Afrikaner intellectuals who favored rejection of the constitutional proposals and the establishment of separate homelands for all racial groups. Both the NCP and AET had participated in the 1981 election without securing parliamentary representation and were reported in October to have concluded a separate alliance with the Kappie Kommando, an Afrikaner women's group, and the extremist Afrikaner Resistance Movement (AWB, below). Dr. Mulder died in 1988.

The CPSA was runner-up to the NP at the elections of 1987 and 1989. It rejected the Codesa commitment to an "undivided" South Africa, insisting on the right of self-determination, including the possibility of a white homeland. In May 1993 it participated in the formation of the Afrikaner People's Front (Afrikaner Volksfront—AVF), founded to oppose majority rule, partly on the initiative of a "Committee of Generals" headed by Gen. (Ret.) Constand Viljoen, who became the AVF convener. The AVF linked over 20 rightist Afrikaner groups, including the AWB as well as the Afrikaner People's Union (Afrikaner Volksunie—AVU), chaired by G. KRUGER. The Reconstituted National Party (HNP, below) was originally a member but withdrew after finding the grouping unwieldy. Seeking a commitment to the creation of a white homeland, the AVF in October entered into the Freedom Alliance with conservative black elements, but the somewhat implausible coalition collapsed in March 1994 when Viljoen opted to register his new Freedom Front for the April elections. (In late 1996 the AVF reportedly disbanded with the intention of allowing its constituent organizations to develop individual roles.)

Despite the collapse of the Freedom Alliance, the CPSA boycotted the election of April 1994 and thereafter mounted a campaign for the UN to classify Afrikaners as an oppressed indigenous people. The CPSA did not contest the 1999 election independently but offered support to the AWB. Thereafter the CPSA continued to seek amnesties from the TRC for two members who had been convicted of murdering Communist leader Chris Hani in 1993. In 2003 the party amalgamated with the Freedom Front to form the Freedom Front Plus, but it is still registered with the South African Independent Electoral Commission as a national-level party.

Afrikaner Resistance Movement (Afrikaanse Weerstandsbeweging—AWB). Founded in 1973, the extreme right-wing AWB became the most visible of the Afrikaner paramilitary formations opposed to majority rule. In June 1993 armed AWB members invaded the Johannesburg building where constitutional talks were in progress, meeting no resistance from the police on duty. Having been convicted and fined in October for electoral violence in 1991, controversial AWB leader Eugene Terre'Blanche in November urged whites to arm themselves for “inevitable” civil war. In March 1994, however, the failure of AWB and other Afrikaner paramilitaries to preserve the Bophuthatswana regime contributed to the collapse of the broad Freedom Alliance of conservative forces. In April 1996 ten AWB members were imprisoned for their part in a bombing campaign aimed at disrupting the 1994 election.

Further arrests of AWB activists were reported in early 1997. Moreover, in June Terre'Blanche was sentenced to prison for six years for allegedly attempting to murder a black laborer. (In March 2001 he lost his most recent appeal and began serving his sentence.) He was released in 2004. He was also condemned by the TRC for his role in the 1993–1994 violence.

Leaders: Eugene TERRE'BLANCHE, Piet “Skiet” RUDOLPH.

New Labour Party (NLP). Peter Marais quit the NNP in 2003 to create the New Labour Party. Marais was Mayor of Cape Town and premier of the Western Cape.

Leaders: Peter MARAIS, Colin Francois DU SART (Contact).

Refounded National Party (Herstigste Nasionale Party—HNP). The HNP is a right-wing Calvinist party organized by Dr. Albert HERTZOG following his dismissal from the government in 1968. The party, which adopted the racist doctrine that blacks are genetically inferior to whites, competed in four subsequent elections without securing parliamentary representation. Dr. Hertzog (son of original National Party founder J. B. M. Hertzog) relinquished the HNP leadership in May 1977. In March 1979 the NP-dominated Parliament, by amendment to a 1978 electoral act, refused to register the HNP as a political party, although it was permitted to contest most constituencies (none successfully) in 1981 by producing 300 signatures in support of each nomination. It secured its first parliamentary seat, previously held by the NP, at a by-election in October 1985 but was unable to retain it in 1987. Although the HNP withdrew from the AVF shortly after its formation in May 1993, it nevertheless joined the AVF in boycotting the April 1994 election.

The HNP's attempts to reach a broader constituency were reportedly hindered in 1997 by its well-publicized conflicts with other Afrikaner groups, most notably the VF. It was reported in 1998 that the HNP was hoping to contest the 1999 balloting, but it did not appear on the final list of approved parties. Longtime leader Jaap MARAIS died in August 2000 and was officially succeeded by Willem Marais at a March 2001 party congress.

Leaders: Willem MARAIS (Chair), L. J. van der SCHYFF (Chief Secretary).

Legislature

Prior to 1981 the South African Parliament was a bicameral body consisting of a Senate and a House of Assembly, from which blacks lost their previous limited representation in 1959, with Coloureds also being excluded in 1968. The Senate (consisting largely of members designated by the provincial assemblies) was abolished, effective January 1, 1981, some of its duties being assumed by a newly created President's Council of nominated members. A separate South African Indian

Cabinet

As of July 1, 2006

President
Deputy President

Thabo Mvuyelwa Mbeki
Phumzile Gloria Mlambo-Ngcuka [f]

Ministers

Agriculture and Land Affairs	Lulu Xingwana [f]
Arts and Culture	Pallo Jordan
Communications	Ivy Matsepe-Casaburri [f]
Correctional Services	Ngconde Balfour
Defense	Mosiuo Lekota
Education	Naledi Pandor [f]
Environment and Tourism	Marthinus van Schalkwyk
Finance	Trevor Manuel
Foreign Affairs	Nkosazana Dlamini Zuma [f]
Health	Mantombazana Tshabalala-Msimang [f]
Home Affairs	Nosiviwe Mapisa-Nqakula
Housing	Lindiwe Nonceba Sisulu [f]
Intelligence	Ronnie Kasrils (SACP)
Justice and Constitutional Affairs	Bridgitte Mabandla [f]
Labor	Membathisi Mdladlana
Minerals and Energy	Buyelwa Patience Sonjica [f]
Presidency	Essop Pahad
Provincial and Local Government	Sydney Mufamadi (SACP)
Public Enterprises	Alec Erwin
Public Service and Administration	Geraldine Fraser-Moleketi [f] (SACP)
Public Works	Angela Thoko Didiza [f]
Safety and Security	Charles Nqakula (SACP)
Science and Technology	Mosibudi Mangena (Azapo)
Social Development	Zola Skweyiya
Sport and Recreation	Makenkesi Stofile
Trade and Industry	Mandisi Mpahlwa
Transport	Jeff Radebe
Water Affairs and Forestry	Benedicta Lindiwe Hendricks [f]
Governor, Reserve Bank	Tito Mboweni

[f] = female

Note: Except as otherwise stated, all ministers are members of the African National Congress. People designated SACP are also members of the ANC.

Council of 15 elected and 15 appointed members was abolished upon adoption of the 1983 constitution.

The 1983 document provided for a tricameral body encompassing a House of Assembly, a continuation of the former lower house; a House of Representatives, representing Coloured voters; and a House of Delegates, representing Indian voters. Each was empowered to legislate in regard to its "own" affairs, while the assent of all was required in regard to "general" affairs.

The interim constitution, which was in effect from April 27, 1994, to February 4, 1997, was the first to be based on the one-man, one-vote principle. It provided for a Senate of indirectly elected members and a directly elected National Assembly, both with five-year mandates. The two bodies sat jointly as the Constituent Assembly that drafted the permanent basic law, which entered into effect on February 4, 1997, and, among other things, replaced the Senate with a National Council of Provinces.

National Council of Provinces. The National Council replaced the Senate on February 6, 1997, at which time 54 permanent members (6 from each of the nine provinces) and 36 special delegates (4 from each province) were inaugurated. Members are elected by each provincial legislature from among its own ranks. Each delegation is headed by the provincial premier.

Delegations are required to reflect the party makeup of the provincial legislatures. As of mid-2006, the breakdown of the 54 permanent representatives was as follows: African National Congress, 38; Democratic Alliance, 10; Inkatha Freedom Party, 2; United Christian Democratic Party, 1; Freedom Front Plus, 1; Independent Democrats, 1; United Democratic Movement, 1.

Chair: Mosiuoa LEKOTA.

National Assembly. The lower house contains 400 members, 200 of whom are elected by proportional representation from national party lists and 200 from regional lists. All serve a five-year term. At the election of April 15, 2004, the African National Congress won 279 seats; the Democratic Alliance, 50; the Inkatha Freedom Party, 23; the New National Party, 9; the United Democratic Movement, 9; the African Christian Democratic Party, 6; the Freedom Front Plus, 4; the United Christian Democratic Party, 3; the Pan Africanist Congress, 3; the Azanian People's Organization and the Minority Front, 1 each. Since the election many members of the National Assembly have changed party, usually moving to the ANC. As of August 2006 the South African government website shows the African National Congress with 293 seats; the Democratic Alliance, 47; the Inkatha Freedom Party, 23; the United Democratic Movement, 6; the Independent Democrats, 5; the African Christian Democratic Party, 4; the Freedom Front Plus, 4; the National Democratic Convention, 4; the United Christian Democratic Party, 3; the Pan Africanist Congress, 3; the Minority Front, 2; the Azanian People's Organization, 1.

Speaker: Baleka MBETE [f].

Communications

Press

Newspapers are published in both Afrikaans and English, the English-language press having by far the larger circulation because its readership among non-whites outweighs the numerical preponderance of Afrikaners in the white population. After years of restrictions and censorship under the white minority government, the 1993 majority-rule constitution guaranteed freedom of expression in the media. All newspapers are owned by conglomerates. One of the more prominent companies is New Africa Media, a black-owned consortium that controls the newspaper with the largest circulation, The Sowetan, as well as the large publishing business, Times Media Limited. Print media reaches only 20 percent of the population because of the high rates of illiteracy. The majority of the population receives news through radio and television. The following are English dailies, published at Johannesburg unless otherwise noted: Sunday Times (458,000); Rapport (350,000, Sunday), in Afrikaans; The Sowetan (225,000), leading African-oriented daily; The Star (162,000 weekdays, 130,000 Saturday); The Citizen (140,000 weekdays, 110,000 Saturday), tabloid; City Press (130,000), African-oriented weekly; Sunday Tribune (Greyville, 113,000); Ilanga (Durban, 120,000), twice weekly, in Zulu; Beeld (110,000), in Afrikaans; Argus (Cape Town, 110,000); Die Burger (Cape Town, 105,000), in Afrikaans; Daily News (Greyville, 80,000); UmAfrica (Mariannhill, Natal, 60,000), independent weekly in Zulu and English; Natal Mercury (Durban, 40,000); Die Transvaaler (40,000), in Afrikaans; Business Day (40,000); Financial Mail (30,000), weekly; Mail and Guardian (30,000), leading independent; Pretoria News (Pretoria, 25,000).

News Agencies

Domestic service is provided by the South African Press Association (SAPA), an independent agency cooperatively owned by the country's major newspapers; a number of foreign bureaus maintain offices at Johannesburg or elsewhere.

Broadcasting and Computing

The government-owned South African Broadcasting Corporation (SABC) owns and controls the majority of radio and television outlets. It is managed by black executives and broadcasts news in all the main languages of South Africa. SABC-TV commands 85 percent of the market, and SABC dominates radio with 11 stations. The only commercial station is e.tv, which is received by 75 percent of the population. It is owned by a black-owned consortium. There is some self-censorship as a result of official sensitivity to criticism. Black journalists who criticize the government can be accused of disloyalty, and white journalists of racism. There were approximately 8.0 million television receivers and 3.6 million personal computers serving 3.2 million Internet users in 2003.

Intergovernmental Representation

Ambassador to the US

Barbara MASEKELA

US Ambassador to South Africa

(Vacant)

Permanent Representative to the UN

Dumisani Shadrack KUMALO

IGO Memberships (non-UN)

AfDB, AU, BIS-BIZ, CWTH, Interpol, IOM, IOR-ARC, NAM, PCA, SADC, WCO, WTO

SUDAN

REPUBLIC OF THE SUDAN

Jumhuriyat al-Sudan

---

The Country

The largest country in Africa, Sudan borders on nine neighboring states as well as the Red Sea and forms part of the transitional zone between the continent's largely desert north and its densely forested, subtropical south. The White Nile flows north for almost 2,500 miles, from the Ugandan border, past the river's union with the Blue Nile near Khartoum, to Egypt above Aswan. Approximately 70 percent of the population is Arab and/or Muslim and occupies the northern two-thirds of the country, while the largely black south is a mix of Christian and animist. The geographic, ethnic, and religious cleavages have yielded political discord marked by prolonged periods of southern rebellion.

The economy is predominantly agricultural, although only a small part of the arable land is actually cultivated. Cotton is the most important cash crop, followed by gum arabic, of which Sudan produces four-fifths of the world supply. Other crops include sesame seeds, peanuts, castor beans, sorghum, wheat, and sugarcane. The country has major livestock-producing potential, and large numbers of camels and sheep are raised for export. At present, industry is largely limited to the processing of agricultural products and the manufacture of light consumer goods.

Sudan was plagued in the 1980s and 1990s by persistent drought, which led to the death by starvation of more than 200,000 people in 1985 and 1988, as well as by fighting in the south, which impeded relief efforts and dislocated large segments of the population. In 1999 it was estimated that as many as 1.5 million Sudanese had died in the previous 16 years as the result of famine and war, while more than 2 million were in danger of starving as a result of the most recent drought. The situation was further exacerbated by a twofold refugee crisis: An estimated 1 million people, fleeing both the southern insurgency and drought conditions, sought refuge in Khartoum or in neighboring countries while, ironically, large numbers of civilians poured into Sudan to escape fighting in adjacent lands.

One result of the economic distress was an external debt of more than $15 billion and excessive reliance on foreign aid, for many years provided largely by the United States, West Germany, Britain, and Saudi Arabia. However, Western Political Status: Independent republic established in 1956; revolutionary military regime instituted in 1969; one-party system established in 1971; constitution of May 8, 1973, suspended following military coup of April 6, 1985; military regime reinstated on June 30, 1989; ruling military council dissolved and nominal civilian government reinstated on October 16, 1993; nonparty presidential and legislative elections held on March 6–17, 1996; new constitution providing for limited multiparty system signed into law on June 30, 1998; peace agreement signed between the government of Sudan and the Sudanese People's Liberation Movement on January 9, 2005, effectively ending a civil war between the north and the south; six-year power-sharing period initiated on July 9, 2005, with the signing of an interim constitution.

Area: 967,494 sq. mi. (2,505,813 sq. km.).

Population: 24,940,683 (1993C); 35,123,000 (2005E). The 1993 figure does not include an adjustment for undercounting, while a government estimate of 40,200,000 for 2005 appears to be too high.

Major Urban Centers (1993C): KHARTOUM (947,483), Omdurman (1,271,403), Port Sudan (308,195), Kassala (234,622).

Official Language: Arabic (English has been designated the "principal" language in the southern region).

Monetary Unit: Dinar (market rate July 1, 2006: 217.55 dinars = $1US).

President and Prime Minister: Umar Hassan Ahmad al-BASHIR (National Islamic Front [subsequently National Congress]); installed as chair of the Revolutionary Command Council for National Salvation (RCC) following overthrow of the government of Prime Minister Sadiq al-MAHDI (Umma Party) on June 30, 1989, succeeding the former chair of the Supreme Council, Ahmad al-MIRGHANI (Democratic Unionist Party); assumed title of prime minister upon formation of government of July 9, 1989; named president by the RCC on October 16, 1993; elected to a five-year term as president in nonparty multicandidate balloting on March 6–17, 1996, and inaugurated on April 1; formed new government on April 21, 1996; reelected on December 13–20, 2000, and inaugurated for a second five-year presidential term on February 13, 2001; formed new government on February 23, 2001.

First Vice President: Salva KIIR Mayardit (Sudan People's Liberation Movement); appointed on August 11, 2005, to succeed John GARANG (Sudan People's Liberation Movement), who died in a helicopter crash on July 30.

Second Vice President: Ali Uthman Muhammad TAHA (National Islamic Front [subsequently National Congress]); appointed on February 17, 1998, to succeed Maj. Gen. al-Zubayr Muhammad SALIH, who had died in a plane crash on February 12.

assistance, save for contributions to UN food relief operations, was cut back sharply in the 1990s amid concern over Khartoum's alleged human rights abuses and its failure to pursue democratization. In addition, responding to what it perceived to be long-standing government mismanagement of the economy, the International Monetary Fund (IMF) in 1990 declared Sudan to be a "noncooperating" state. Negotiations were resumed in early 1992 after Khartoum agreed to reduce agricultural subsidies, privatize financially untenable government enterprises (including large cooperative farms), and institute a series of austerity measures. However, Sudan's voting rights in the IMF were formally suspended in August 1993 because of an accumulation of arrears, and in early 1994 the country reportedly faced the prospect of becoming the first member ever to be expelled from the Fund. However, in 1998 the IMF described Sudan as having made "substantial progress" regarding economic reform, which had included austerity measures that had earlier prompted antiregime protests while failing to curb the estimated 100 percent annual rate of inflation. Moreover, in August 1999 the IMF lifted its Declaration of Noncooperation from Sudan because of its progress in implementing macroeconomic policies. Economic gains were reflected in the reported real GDP growth of 6 percent and inflation of 16 percent for 1999. Government expectations remained high for further economic recovery due to new oil revenue that was expected to reduce the need to borrow. Nevertheless, the civil war continued to drain resources in all regions and to force substantial internal and external dislocations. The situation was made worse by fighting in Darfur in the west, starting in early 2003, with an estimated 113,000 villagers fleeing to Chad by January 2004 and a death toll leading U.S. officials to declare the killing a genocide (see Current issues, below).

By 2005 the economic outlook for Sudan had become more positive, according to the IMF, which projected real GDP growth to be 8 percent that year, owing primarily to higher revenues from oil and other sectors. The IMF cautioned, however, that progress in resolving Sudan's $15 billion debt hinged on resolution of the Darfur crisis and successful implementation of the peace agreement with the Sudanese People's Liberation Movement (SPLM). Encouragingly, in 2006 it was reported that oil production had doubled since 2004 due to new investments by energy firms from India and China.

Government and Politics

Political Background

Historically known as the land of Kush, Sudan was conquered and unified by Egypt in 1820–1821. Under the leadership of Muhammad Ahmad, the MAHDI (“awaited religious leader”), opposition to Egyptian administration broke into open revolt in 1881; the insurrection had succeeded by 1885, and the Mahdist state controlled the region until its reconquest by an Anglo-Egyptian force in 1896–1898. Thereafter, Sudan was governed as an Anglo-Egyptian condominium, becoming self-governing in 1954 and fully independent on January 1, 1956, under a transitional constitution that provided for a democratic parliamentary regime. A civilian government, led successively by Ismail al-AZHARI and Abdallah KHALIL, was overthrown in November 1958 by Lt. Gen. Ibrahim ABBUD, whose military regime was itself dislodged following protest demonstrations in October and November 1964. The restored constitutional regime, headed in turn by Sir al-Khatim KHALIFA, Muhammad Ahmad MAHGUB, and Dr. Sadiq al-MAHDI (a descendant of the 19th-century religious leader), was weakened both by political party instability and by revolt in the southern provinces.

Beginning in 1955 as a protest against Arab-Muslim domination, the southern insurgency rapidly assumed the proportions of a civil war. Led by the Anyanya (scorpion) movement under the command of Joseph LAGU, the revolt prompted military reprisals and the flight of thousands of refugees to neighboring countries. While moderate southern parties continued to seek regional autonomy within the framework of a united Sudan, exile groups worked for complete independence, and a so-called Provisional Government of Southern Sudan was established in January 1967 under the leadership of Agrev JADEN, a prominent exile leader.

An apparent return to normalcy under a new Mahgub government was interrupted in May 1969 by a military coup organized by a group of nationalist, left-wing officers led by Col. Jafar Muhammad NUMAYRI. With Numayri assuming the leadership of a ten-man Revolutionary Council, a new civilian administration, which included a number of communists and extreme leftists, was formed by former chief justice Abubakr AWADALLA. Revolutionary activity continued, however, including successive communist attempts in 1969 and 1971 to overthrow the Numayri regime. The latter effort succeeded for three days, after which Numayri regained power with Egyptian and Libyan help and instituted reprisals that included the execution of Abd al-Khaliq MAHGUB, the Communist Party's secretary general.

Reorganization of the government continued with the issuance of a temporary constitution in August 1971, followed by Numayri's election to the presidency in September. A month later, in an effort to consolidate his position, Numayri dissolved the Revolutionary Council and established the Sudanese Socialist Union (SSU) as the only recognized political party. Of equal significance was the ratification in April 1973 of a negotiated settlement that temporarily brought the southern rebellion to an end. The terms of the agreement, which provided for an autonomous Southern Sudan, were included in a new national constitution that became effective May 8, 1973. In November the Southern Region voted for a Regional People's Assembly, while the first national election under the new basic law took place in May 1974 for a 250-member National People's Assembly.

In September 1975 rebel army personnel led by a paratroop officer, Lt. Col. Hassan Husayn USMAN, seized the government radio station in Omdurman in an attempted coup. President Numayri subsequently blamed Libya for instigating the uprising, which was quickly suppressed. The attack had been preceded by an army mutiny in Akobo on the Ethiopian border in March and was followed by an uprising in Khartoum in July 1976 that reportedly claimed 300 lives. At a news conference in London on August 4, former prime minister Mahdi, on behalf of the outlawed Sudanese National Front (SNF), a coalition of former centrist and rightist parties that had been organized in late 1969, accepted responsibility for having organized the July rebellion but denied that it had involved foreign mercenaries.

In the months that followed President Numayri undertook a broad-ranged effort to reach accommodation with the dissidents. In July 1977 a number of SNF leaders, including Dr. Mahdi, returned from abroad and were immediately appointed to the Central Committee of the SSU. A year later the Rev. Philip Abbas GHABUSH, titular president of the SNF, expressed his conviction that the government was committed to the building of "a genuine democracy in Sudan" and ordered the dissolution of both the internal and external wings of the Front.

In early 1980 the north was divided into five new regions to provide for more effective local self-government, and in October 1981 the president dissolved both the National Assembly in Khartoum and the Southern Regional Assembly to facilitate decentralization on the basis of new regional bodies to which certain legislative powers would be devolved. Concurrently, he appointed Gen. Gasmallah Abdallah RASSA, a southern Muslim, as interim president of the Southern Region's High Executive Council (HEC) in place of Abel ALIER, who nonetheless continued as second vice president of the Republic. Immediately thereafter a plan was advanced to divide the south into three regions based on the historic provinces of Bahr al-Ghazal, Equatoria, and Upper Nile.

The projected redivision of the south yielded three regional blocs: a "unity" group led by Vice President Alier of the numerically dominant Dinka tribe, who branded the scheme a repudiation of the 1973 agreement; a "divisionist" group led by former rebel commander Joseph Lagu of the Wahdi tribe of eastern Equatoria; and a "compromise" group, led by Clement MBORO and Samuel ARU Bol, which styled itself "Change Two" (C2) after an earlier "Wind for Change Alliance" that had opposed Alier's election to the HEC presidency. None of the three obtained a majority at an April 1982 election to the Southern Regional Assembly, and on June 23 a divisionist, Joseph James TOMBURA, was designated by the assembly as regional president with C2 backing (the alliance being styled "C3"). Six days later President Numayri named General Lagu to succeed Alier as second vice president of the Republic. Earlier, on April 11, Maj. Gen. Umar Muhammad al-TAYYIB (who had been designated third vice president in October 1981) was named to the first vice presidency in succession to Lt. Gen. Abd al-Majid Hamid KHALIL, who had been dismissed on January 25.

As expected, President Numayri was nominated for a third term by an SSU congress in February 1983 and reelected by a national plebiscite held April 15–26. In June the tripartite division of the south was formally implemented, with both the HEC and the southern assembly being abolished.

In the face of renewed rebellion in the south and rapidly deteriorating economic conditions, which prompted food riots and the launching of a general strike in Khartoum, a group of army officers, led by Gen. Abd al-Rahman SIWAR al-DAHAB, seized power on April 6, 1985, while the president was returning from a trip to the United States.

Numayri's ouster was attributed in part to opposition by southerners and some urban northerners to the adoption in September 1983 of Islamic religious law (sharia).

On April 9, 1985, after discussions between the officers and representatives of a civilian National Alliance for the Salvation of the Country (NASC) had proved inconclusive, General Siwar al-Dahab announced the formation of a 14-member Transitional Military Council (TMC), with himself as chair and Gen. Taq al-Din Abdallah FADUL as his deputy. After further consultation with NASC leaders, Dr. al-Gizouli DAFALLAH, who had played a prominent role in organizing the pre-coup demonstrations, was named on April 22 to head an interim Council of Ministers. On May 25 a seven-member southern cabinet was appointed that included representatives of the three historic areas (henceforth to be known as "administrative regions"). Concurrently, the Sudanese People's Liberation Army (SPLA), which had become the primary rebel force in the south under the leadership of Col. John GARANG, resumed antigovernment military activity.

Adhering to its promise to hold a national election within a year, the TMC sponsored legislative balloting on April 1–12, 1986, despite continued insurgency that precluded returns in 41 southern districts. The new body, serving as both a Constituent and Legislative Assembly, convened on April 26 but was unable to agree on the composition of a Supreme (Presidential) Council and the designation of a prime minister until May 6, with a coalition government being formed under former prime minister Mahdi of the Umma Party (UP) on May 15. The UP's principal partner was the Democratic Unionist Party (DUP), which had finished second in the assembly balloting. Although several southern parties were awarded cabinet posts, most "African bloc" deputies subsequently boycotted assembly activity because of alleged underrepresentation and a lack of progress toward sharia repeal.

The Council of Ministers was dissolved on May 13, 1987, primarily because of a split within the DUP that had weakened the government's capacity to implement policy decisions. A new government was nonetheless formed on June 3 with little change in personnel. On August 22 the DUP formally withdrew from the coalition because of a dispute over an appointment to the Supreme Council, although it indicated that it would continue to cooperate with the UP. Eight months later the DUP rejected a proposal by Mahdi for formation of a more broadly based administration that would include the opposition National Islamic Front (NIF). Undaunted, the prime minister resigned on April 16, 1988, to make way for a government of "national reconciliation." Reappointed on April 27, he issued an appeal for all of the parties to join in a proposed national constitutional conference to decide the role of Islam in a future state structure. He formed a new administration that included the DUP and NIF on May 14.

In July 1988 the DUP, reversing an earlier position, joined the fundamentalists in calling for a legislative vote on the introduction of sharia prior to the constitutional conference. On September 19, following the government's introduction of a sharia-based penal code, the southern deputies withdrew from the assembly, and in mid-November, purportedly with the prime minister's approval, DUP representatives met with SPLA leader Garang in the Ethiopian capital of Addis Ababa to negotiate a peace treaty that would entail abandonment of the sharia legislation, the lifting of the state of emergency, and the eventual convening of a national constitutional conference. However, rioting subsequently broke out in Khartoum, and on December 20, in the wake of a reported coup attempt and suspension of parliamentary debate on policy toward the south, Prime Minister Mahdi declared another state of emergency. On December 28 the DUP withdrew from the government in response to Mahdi's failure to recognize the agreement with the SPLA, the DUP ministerial posts being refilled by NIF representatives. On February 27, 1989, after another cabinet reshuffle in which the DUP did not participate, Mahdi threatened to resign if the army did not give him a free hand in working for peace with the rebels. On March 5 some 48 parties and trade unions indicated their general acceptance of the November peace accord, and on March 22 a new governing coalition was announced composed of the UP, the DUP, and representatives of the unions and southern parties, with the NIF in opposition.

In May 1989, while complaining that Khartoum had “done absolutely nothing” to advance the cause of peace, Colonel Garang announced a cease-fire in the south, and a month later he met with northern representatives in Addis Ababa for peace talks mediated by former U.S. president Jimmy Carter. Shortly thereafter, Khartoum agreed to implement the November 1988 accords and schedule a September constitutional conference. However, the plan was nullified on June 30, when the Madhi regime was overthrown in a military coup led by Brig. Gen. Umar Hassan Ahmad al-BASHIR, who assumed the chairship of a Revolution Command Council for National Salvation (RCC). The RCC immediately suspended the constitution, dissolved the Constituent Assembly, imposed emergency rule, and freed military leaders arrested on June 18 for allegedly plotting an earlier coup. Claiming that factionalism and corruption had led to economic malaise and an ineffective war effort, the military regime banned all political parties and arrested senior government and party leaders. On July 9 Bashir assumed the additional office of prime minister, heading a 21-member cabinet composed primarily of career bureaucrats drawn from the NIF and supporters of former president Numayri.

Despite claims that “peace through negotiation” was its first priority, the new government rejected the November 1988 treaty, suggesting instead that the sharia issue be decided by national referendum. However, the SPLA, which sought suspension of sharia while negotiations continued, resumed military activities in October.

A major cabinet reshuffle on April 10, 1990, was construed as a consolidation of Islamic fundamentalist influence, and on April 24 a total of 31 army and police officers were executed in the wake of an alleged coup attempt the day before. Another reshuffle in January 1991 was followed by the introduction of a nine-state federal system (see Constitution and government, below), and on March 22 a new sharia-based penal code was instituted in the six northern states, prompting a strong protest from the SPLA.

In the wake of heavy fighting between his supporters and several SPLA breakaway factions in the south, Garang announced a unilateral cease-fire in late March 1993 as far as the conflict with government troops was concerned. Khartoum endorsed the cease-fire several days later, and a new round of peace talks with Garang representatives resumed in Abuja in late April. The government also initiated parallel negotiations in Nairobi, Kenya, with the SPLA dissidents, who had recently coalesced as the SPLA-United. However, both sets of talks were subsequently suspended, with fighting between government forces and Garang’s SPLA faction having resumed near the Ugandan border by midyear.

On July 8, 1993, Prime Minister Bashir announced a cabinet reshuffle that was most noteworthy for what was described as an “overt increase in NIF involvement.” Subsequently, in a surprise, albeit essentially cosmetic, return to civilian control, the RCC dissolved itself on October 16 after declaring Bashir president and granting him wide authority to direct a transitional government. Shortly thereafter, Bashir announced his administration’s commitment to a largely undefined democratization program that would lead to national elections by the end of 1995. Nevertheless, the new cabinet announced on October 30 appeared to solidify NIF control even further, lending support to opposition charges that the military-fundamentalist alliance had no true intention of loosening its stranglehold on political power.

Following a September 1993 summit of the regional Inter-Governmental Authority on Drought and Development (IGADD, later the Inter-Governmental Authority on Development—IGAD), a quadripartite committee of representatives from Ethiopia, Eritrea, Kenya, and Uganda was established to mediate the Sudanese conflict. However, the talks ended in deadlock in late 1994 after the two sides had “adopted irreconcilable positions on southern self-determination and the relationship between state and religion.”

On March 27, 1995, Bashir announced a unilateral two-month cease-fire to facilitate another peace initiative launched by former U.S. president Jimmy Carter. While the truce was cautiously supported by the leading southern factions, no progress was reported in resolving the conflict, despite a two-month extension of the cease-fire on May 25.

Indicative of what some construed as a weakening northern regime, widespread rioting broke out in several locations, including Khartoum and Port Sudan, in September 1995. The outbreaks, which appeared to be spontaneous, involved both student protesters and conservative elements angered by low salaries and food shortages. Further violence erupted in Khartoum in early January 1996 between police and Muslim fundamentalists calling for conversion of the country's Christians and animists to Islam.

In January 1996 the regime announced that elections would be conducted in March for president and a new National Assembly. However, that balloting (conducted March 6–17) was boycotted by nearly all the major opposition groups, most of whom had coalesced under the banner of the National Democratic Alliance (NDA). Some 40 independent candidates contested the presidential balloting, with Bashir being elected to a five-year term on the strength of a reported 75.7 percent share of the vote. Bashir was sworn in on April 1, and on the same day the new assembly convened and unanimously elected the NIF's Hassan Abdallah ALTURABI (long considered the dominant political leader in the country) as its president. On April 21 Bashir appointed a new cabinet, which did not include (despite previous speculation to the contrary) any members of the SPLA-United or the Southern Sudan Independence Movement (SSIM), the two southern groups with which the government had recently signed a peace accord.

In January 1997 a major rebel offensive was reportedly launched under the leadership of a more cohesive and potent NDA. In April the regime reached another agreement with the SSIM, the SPLA-United, and four other SPLA breakaway groups, calling for suspension of sharia in the south and further discussions regarding autonomy there.

Subsequently, with both the government and the SPLA having claimed military success, a preliminary agreement was reached in July on the resumption of peace talks under a "framework of principles" proposed by IGAD, which envisioned an eventual self-determination plebiscite in the south. However, negotiations, formally opened in October, were quickly suspended until April 1998, and fighting continued.

Elections were held for ten southern gubernatorial posts in November 1997, and on December 1 the SSIM's Riak MACHAR was named head of a new Southern States' Coordination Council (SSCC) and given a four-year mandate to govern the south pending a decision on its permanent political status. However, the exercise was widely viewed as futile, if not surreal, considering Colonel Garang's depiction of the SSCC as a "sham."

A plane crash on February 12, 1998, killed First Vice President Maj. Gen. al-Zubayr Muhammad SALIH (one of the president's oldest and most trusted associates) and a number of other government officials. On March 8 Bashir finally settled on Ali Uthman Muhammad TAHA, considered second in authority in the NIF, to succeed Salih. In addition, the NIF had an enhanced presence in the extensively reshuffled cabinet, which also included dissident Umma members and representatives of the southern rebels who had aligned with Khartoum.

In the face of heavy international pressure for political reform, the assembly, on March 28, 1998, approved the government's proposed new constitution, which, among other things, authorized the legalization of "political associations." The new basic law was endorsed by a reported 96.7 percent "yes" vote in a national referendum in late May and signed into law by President Bashir on June 30, the ninth anniversary of the coup that had brought him to power. On November 23 the assembly approved the Political Association Act, which established the laws governing party activity, and registration of parties began in January 1999.

In the wake of rapidly escalating conflict between Bashir and Turabi, Turabi proposed a series of constitutional amendments in November 1999 to curb Bashir's power. Bashir responded by announcing a three-month state of emergency and dissolving the National Assembly on December 12, 1999 (effective December 13). Bashir's declaration occurred a mere 48 hours prior to the scheduled National Assembly vote regarding Turabi's proposed amendments. On the heels of these events, the cabinet formally issued its resignation on January 1, 2000. Bashir appointed a new cabinet on January 25, retaining his backers in some ministry posts. The power struggle continued, however, because Turabi, although he held no official position, remained secretary general of the National Congress (NC), the successor to the NIF. Meanwhile, the government also was buffeted in February by the departure of Machar and a number of his supporters from the government because of the perceived failure of Bashir to implement the 1997 accord.

On March 12, 2000, the cabinet extended the state of emergency until the end of the year. Bashir further consolidated power by removing Turabi as secretary general of the NC and replacing him with Ibrahim Ahmed OMAR.

Despite seemingly positive negotiations between the government and the UP (see UP under Political Parties and Groups, below), the UP led an opposition boycott of assembly and presidential elections on December 13–23, 2000. Consequently, the NC secured 355 of the 360 contested assembly seats, while Bashir was elected to a second five-year term with a reported 86.5 percent of the vote. (After returning from 14 years in exile in May 1999, former president Numayri, as the candidate of the Popular Working Forces Alliance, finished second with 9.6 percent of the vote in the presidential poll.) DUP dissidents were included in the new cabinet named on February 23, 2001, as were UP dissidents in the reshuffle of August 19, 2002. Two DUP dissidents were also among those named to the cabinet in a reshuffle on November 30, 2002.

Following the signing of the peace agreement in January 2005 between the government and the SPLM (see Current issues, below), a new 30-member power-sharing cabinet was announced on September 22, 2005. Fifteen posts went to the NC, 9 to the SPLM, and 6 to northern and southern opposition groups. On October 21, the first cabinet of the Government of South Sudan was appointed. The 22-member southern unity cabinet included 16 seats designated for the SPLM, 3 for the NC, and 3 for other south Sudan opposition groups.

Constitution and Government

The 1973 constitution provided for a strong presidential form of government. Nominated by the Sudanese Socialist Union for a six-year term, the president appointed all other executive officials and served as supreme commander of the People's Armed Forces. Legislative authority was vested in the National People's Assembly, a unicameral body that was partially elected and partially appointed.

The Southern Sudan Regional Constitution, abrogated by the June 1983 redivision, provided for a single autonomous region governed, in nonreserved areas, by the president of a High Executive Council (cabinet) responsible to a Regional People's Assembly. Each of the three subsequent regions in the south, like the five in the north, was administered by a centrally appointed governor, acting on the advice of a local People's Assembly. In a move that intensified southern dissent, President Numayri announced in June 1984 the incorporation into the north of a new province (Wahdah), encompassing territory theretofore part of the Upper Nile region, where oil reserves had been discovered.

Upon assuming power in 1985, the Transitional Military Committee (TMC) suspended the 1973 basic law, dissolved the central and regional assemblies, appointed a cabinet composed largely of civilians, and assigned military personnel to replace regional governors and their ministers. An interim constitution was approved by the TMC in October 1985 to provide a framework for assembly elections. The assembly members chosen in April 1986 were mandated to draft a new basic law, although many southern districts were unrepresented because of rebel activity. The assembly's charge to act as a constituent body appeared to have ceased with Prime Minister Mahdi's call in April 1988 for the convening of a national constitutional conference.

In January 1987 the government announced the formation of a new Administrative Council for the South, comprising representatives of six southern political parties and the governors of each of the three previously established regions. The Council, although formally empowered with only “transitional” authority, was repudiated by both the “unity” and “divisionist” groups. Subsequently, following the signing of a pro-pluralism “Transitional Charter” on January 10, 1988, to serve as an interim basic law, the Council was suspended, and the administration of the southern provinces was assigned to the regional governors.

During negotiations between the Mahdi regime and southern rebels in early June 1989, an agreement was reached to open a constitutional conference in September. However, the Bashir junta rejected the June agreement and suspended the Transitional Charter. Subsequently, a national “political orientation” conference, held April 29–May 2, 1991, in Khartoum, endorsed the establishment of a pyramidal governmental structure involving the direct popular election of local councils followed by the successive indirect election of provincial, state, and national lawmaking bodies. On February 13, 1992, Prime Minister Bashir appointed a 300-member Transitional National Assembly, and he was named president on October 16, 1993, by the RCC, which then dissolved itself. Elections were held on March 6–17, 1996, to a new National Assembly, with concurrent nonparty balloting for president.

On February 5, 1991, the RCC announced the establishment of a new federal system comprising nine states—six (Central, Darfur, Eastern, Khartoum, Kordofan, and Northern) in the north and three (Bahr al-Ghazal, Equatoria, and Upper Nile) in the south that were subdivided into 66 provinces and 281 local government districts. The states, each administered by a federally appointed governor, deputy governor, and cabinet of ministers, were given responsibility for local administration and some tax collection, although control over most major sectors remained with the central government. In early February 1994 President Bashir announced that the number of states had been increased from 9 to 26, new governors being appointed later in the month. A Southern States Coordination Council was named in December 1997 to govern the south pending final determination of the region’s status, but the authority of the new body remained severely compromised by the opposition of the main rebel group, the SPLA.

On March 22, 1991, a new penal code based on sharia went into effect in the north, the government announcing that the issue would be “open” in regard to the south, pending the outcome of peace negotiations.

The new constitution, which went into effect on June 30, 1998, annulled most previous decrees by the Bashir regime, thereby permitting the reintroduction of a multiparty system. The new basic law described Islam as “the religion of the majority,” although it notes the “considerable number of Christians and animists” in the country and guarantees freedom of religion. The controversial issue of sharia, particularly as it might apply to the south, was skirted, the constitution stating only that the “religion, customs, and consensus of the Nation shall be the sources of legislation.”

Following the peace agreement reached on January 9, 2005, between the government and the SPLM, an interim constitution was signed on July 9, 2005, allowing for power sharing during a six-year transitional period. Whether the south would continue under Khartoum’s rule was to be determined by a referendum in 2011. The south was given a large degree of autonomy, with Garang being named president of the south, as well as first vice president of Sudan. (Salva KIIR Mayardit replaced Garang as president of the south and first vice president of Sudan on August 11, 2005, following the latter’s death on July 30.)

Foreign Relations

During much of the Cold War Sudan pursued a policy of nonalignment, modified in practice by changing international circumstances, while focusing its attention on regional matters. Prior to the 1974 coup in Ethiopia relations with that country were especially cordial because of the prominent role Haile Selassie had played in bringing about a settlement of the initial southern rebellion. Subsequently, Addis Ababa accused Khartoum of providing covert support to Eritrean rebels, while Sudanese leaders charged that SPLA camps were flourishing in Ethiopia with the approval of the Mengistu regime. Not surprisingly, relations between the two countries improved dramatically following the May 1991 rebel victory in Ethiopia; the presumed SPLA contingents subsequently were forced back into Sudan by Ethiopian troops and the Bashir regime became a vocal supporter of the new leadership in Addis Ababa. By contrast, the secular administration in Asmara charged in early 1994 that Sudan was fomenting fundamentalist antigovernment activity in the new nation of Eritrea, and in December it severed relations with Khartoum.

Soon after taking power in 1969 Prime Minister Numayri forged close ties with Egyptian President Nasser within a federation scheme encompassing Sudan, Egypt, and the newly established Libyan regime of Colonel Qadhafi. Although failing to promote integration, the federation yielded joint Egyptian-Libyan military support for Numayri in defeating the communist insurgency of June 1971. However, Numayri was reluctant to join a second unity scheme—the abortive 1972 Federation of Arab Republics—because of Libyan-inspired conspiracies and opposition from the non-Arab peoples of southern Sudan. President Sadat’s own estrangement from Qadhafi during 1973 led to the signing of a Sudanese-Egyptian agreement on political and economic coordination in February 1974. In subsequent years Sadat pledged to support Numayri against continued Libyan attempts at subversion, and Sudan followed Egypt into close alignment with the United States. While rejecting the Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty of 1979, Sudan was one of the few Arab states that did not break diplomatically with Cairo.

Libya, which announced that it would terminate its support of the SPLA rebels, was the first country to recognize the post-Numayri regime, urging the TMC to sever Sudanese links with Egypt. Close military and economic ties were thereupon reestablished with Tripoli, relations with Cairo remaining cool, in part, because of Egyptian President Mubarak’s refusal to extradite Numayri for trial by the new Khartoum government.

In October 1988 Prime Minister Mahdi, reportedly desperate for arms, signed a unity proposal with Colonel Qadhafi, which was immediately denounced by the DUP and in January 1989 labeled “inappropriate” by the United States following reports that Libyan forces had used chemical weapons in attacks on SPLA forces. Concurrently, Washington, whose nonintervention policy had drawn increasing criticism from international aid groups, announced its intention to supply aid directly to drought victims in areas under SPLA control rather than through allegedly corrupt government channels. Four months later Washington cut off all nonfamine relief support because of Khartoum’s failure to service its foreign debt. The ban was reaffirmed (with specific reference to economic and military aid) in March 1990 because of Khartoum’s human rights record and lack of democratic commitment. Later in the year relations with the United States deteriorated even further when Sudan refused to join the UN anti-Iraq coalition, a decision that also cost the Bashir government financial support from Saudi Arabia and Egypt. In addition, many Arab states subsequently expressed concern over the growing influence of Islamic fundamentalism within the Bashir regime. On the other hand, Iran, anxious to support the fundamentalist cause, became a major source of Sudanese economic and, according to some reports, military aid.

In August 1994 authorities in Khartoum seized the long-sought international terrorist Ilich Ramírez Sanchez (a.k.a. “Carlos”), who was flown to Paris for trial on charges stemming from a 1983 attack in the French capital. In return, France was reported to have exercised its influence with the Central African Republic (CAR) to provide Sudanese military transit through CAR territory to the south Sudanese combat zone. In addition, Khartoum appeared to seek French assistance in restoring its relations with the United States in the wake of disappointment with the level of aid forthcoming from its alliance with Iran.

Meanwhile, relations with other neighboring states had deteriorated sharply. In September 1994 Egypt was accused of moving troops into Sudan's northern Halaib region, which was believed to contain substantial oil deposits, and relations plummeted further in mid-1995 after President Mubarak had intimated that the NIF might have been involved in the failed attempt on his life in Addis Ababa on June 26. In the south, Uganda canceled a 1990 agreement providing for a military monitoring team on its side of their border, and in April 1995 it broke relations because of the alleged bombing of a Ugandan village by Sudanese government forces; however, relations were restored in mid-June as the result of talks between presidents Bashir and Museveni that were brokered by Malawian president Bakili Muluzi.

By late 1995 Sudan had come under widespread criticism for its alleged sponsorship of international terrorism, including possible involvement in the Mubarak assassination attempt. On December 19 a group of Organization of African Unity (OAU, subsequently the African Union—AU) foreign ministers, meeting in Addis Ababa, called on Khartoum to extradite three Egyptians wanted for questioning in the Mubarak affair, and on January 31, 1996, the UN Security Council adopted a unanimous resolution to the same effect. Earlier, as an expression of its displeasure, Ethiopia had ordered a reduction in Sudan's embassy staff to four, the closure of a Sudanese consulate, and the banning of all nongovernmental organizations linked to the Sudanese regime.

In 1997 and early 1998, Eritrea, Ethiopia, and Uganda cooperated to constrain the spread of militant fundamentalism in the Horn of Africa, further straining relations with Sudan, which accused the other governments of supporting the SPLM and NDA. (Relations with Ethiopia subsequently improved, however, in conjunction with the outbreak of hostilities between that nation and Eritrea, which Khartoum charged was still backing Sudanese rebels.) Meanwhile, South African President Nelson Mandela played a prominent role in efforts to bring the Bashir regime and its opponents together for peace talks under the aegis of IGAD.

An improvement in regional and international relations was noted in 1999 and 2000 due, in large part, to a "charm offensive" on Bashir's part. Sudan reestablished diplomatic relations with the United Kingdom, Kuwait, Ethiopia, Eritrea, Egypt, and Tunisia. In addition, in December 1999 Sudan and Uganda signed an accord agreeing not to support rebel forces working to overthrow each other's respective governments. Sudan later requested that the UN Security Council lift sanctions imposed in 1996 following accusation of its involvement in the attempted assassination of Mubarak. The Security Council unanimously approved the request in September 2001.

Throughout 2004 and early 2005, the international response to the staggering human rights abuses in Darfur was slow to materialize (see Current issues, below). In April 2005 the UN Security Council voted to refer 51 Sudanese—many of them said to be high-ranking NIF officials—for prosecution in connection with crimes against humanity in Darfur. That same month, Western countries pledged $4.5 billion in urgent food aid for southerners displaced by the civil war.

In response to continuing attacks on Uganda by the Lords Resistance Army (LRA) from bases in Sudan, the newly installed Government of South Sudan signed a security protocol with Uganda in October 2005 calling for joint efforts to suppress the LRA. Reports indicated that the increased security collaboration led many members of the LRA to flee to the Democratic Republic of the Congo. Meanwhile, relations with Chad worsened in 2005 as Chadian rebels launched a series of attacks from bases in Sudan. By December 2005 Chadian President Idriss Déby described the two countries as being in a state of "belligerency" (see entry on Chad).

Current Issues

Running counter to the liberalization taking place throughout much of Africa, the Bashir regime and its fundamentalist supporters were charged with widespread abuse (including torture and execution) of political opponents in the 1990s, in addition to mistreatment of non-Muslim ethnic groups. The resultant curtailment of Western support exacerbated the country's long-standing economic crisis, and observers periodically questioned the government's capacity to survive. However, due in part to the weakness of opposition political forces, the administration proved more resilient than anticipated.

In November 1997 Washington denounced the Bashir government's poor human rights record and alleged support for international terrorism and imposed economic sanctions against Sudan that included a ban on Sudanese exports and seizure of Sudanese assets in the United States. In addition, U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright met with Colonel Garang and other NDA leaders in Uganda. The friction between the United States and Sudan subsequently intensified, and on August 20, 1998, U.S. missiles destroyed a pharmaceutical plant in Khartoum, in response to the bomb attacks on the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania on August 7. Washington claimed the Sudanese facility was producing chemicals used to make nerve gas and that it was connected to the "terrorist network" of militant Islamic fundamentalist Osama bin Laden. However, no evidence supporting the U.S. charges was forthcoming, and many observers ultimately concluded that Washington had erred regarding the possible connection of the plant to nerve gas production. For its part, the government in Khartoum, which had expelled bin Laden from the country in 1996 under U.S. pressure, strongly denied the U.S. accusations and branded U.S. President Clinton a "war criminal." Ironically, the episode generated a degree of sympathy on the international stage for Sudan, whose image also was improved by its new constitution and the return (notionally at least) of multipartyism in early 1999. At the same time, however, the conflict in the south remained generally as intractable as ever; of particular interest to both sides were the oil-rich regions of the Upper Nile and the Nuba mountains.

Apparently as part of an overall effort to enhance his regime's image, President Bashir announced an amnesty for his opponents in June 2000. The SPLM, NDA, and most other opposition groups remained skeptical of the offer, however, and the political climate deteriorated when the state of emergency was again extended in January 2001 and former NIF strongman Turabi and several of his associates were arrested in February after Turabi's Popular National Congress (PNC) had signed an accord with the SPLA to "resist" the government. (Most of the PNC members were released by presidential order in October, but Turabi remained under house arrest until October 2003. He was rearrested on March 31, 2004, along with ten military officers and seven PNC members for what government officials said was a plot to stage a coup. Some reports claimed that those arrested had links to rebels in the western province of Darfur [see below]. Turabi was released on June 30, 2005, when Bashir announced the release of all political detainees.)

Following the al-Qaida attacks in the United States in September 2001, the Sudanese government came under additional international scrutiny. One apparent outgrowth of that increased attention was significant progress toward resolution of the southern conflict, which had led to the death of more than 1 million people (as casualties of either the fighting or related food shortages) and the displacement of 4 million more. A tentative cease-fire was negotiated under U.S. mediation in January 2002, and although there was sporadic fighting in the first half of the year, with the NIF reportedly bombing civilians, a potentially historic accord was signed in Kenya on July 20 by representatives of the government and the SPLM. The agreement, mediated by the IGAD, envisioned the establishment of a joint, six-year transitional administration for the south to be followed by a self-determination referendum in the region. The government also reportedly agreed that sharia would not be imposed in the south. The two sides signed a Comprehensive Peace Agreement on January 9, 2005, in Nairobi, bringing to an end the 21-year war in the south and, ironically, making former enemies Garang and Bashir partners in a new government.

The agreement called for national elections within four years and a referendum on independence for the south to be held in six years. It also stipulated the sharing of power and a 50–50 split of oil profits between the north and the south. In addition, it called for a six-month “pre-interim” period to draft a new constitution; a transitional government in Khartoum under Bashir; a separate administration in the south headed by a first vice president; a national assembly to be appointed within two weeks of the drafting of the interim constitution, with members divided roughly 70–30 north-south, with full legislative authority by 2011; and shared governance by the NC and SPLM of Kordofan and Blue Nile. The SPLM was authorized to keep its army in the south but agreed to withdraw from the east, while the regime agreed to withdraw its troops from the south in two and a half years.

Meanwhile, despite the far-reaching agreement between north and south, another huge and bloody struggle in the western region of Darfur continued unabated. The war, which erupted in February 2003, had been preceded by tribal clashes for years. Escalation occurred when the Darfur Liberation Front claimed in February 2003 to have seized control of Gulu, and government forces were sent to retake the village in early March. The conflict, fueled by the scarcity of water and grazing land, became an increasingly fierce rivalry between Arab tribesmen who raised cattle and needed the land and black African farmers who relied on the water. The fighting intensified in 2004, as black Africans accused the government in Khartoum of using the mounted, Arab Janjaweed militias, sometimes accompanied by fighters in Sudanese military uniforms, to force people from their land.

The government in Khartoum steadfastly refused to apply self-rule to the west, as it had in its agreement with the south. While some 113,000 refugees fled across the border into Chad, fighting continued to intensify, and the U.S. administration of George W. Bush called on the parties to negotiate. The insurgent groups—the Sudan Liberation Movement/Army (SLM/A) and the Justice and Equality Movement (JEM)—claimed that the government had neglected the impoverished areas for years. The UN High Commissioner for Refugees decried the “scorched-earth” tactics used by the government and militias in response to the rebellion in Darfur and appealed for serious efforts to resolve the conflict.

In May 2004 the New York Times reported that an estimated 1 million people had been uprooted by the conflict in Darfur. That same month, human rights workers charged that the government had used the Janjaweed to implement a policy resembling ethnic cleansing. Peace talks began in mid-July, as demanded by U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell, but soon dissolved when Khartoum rejected the rebels’ conditions, including a time frame for disarming the militias. After the threat of punitive measures in short of sanctions by the UN Security Council on July 29, 2004, and a reported protest by 100,000 people in Khartoum against a Security Council resolution, the rebel groups and the government agreed to meet in Nigeria for peace talks in late August. As talks broke down days later and the UN pressed for more monitoring, Powell declared, on September 10, that the United States considered the killing, rape, and destruction in Darfur to be genocide. On behalf of the United States, the secretary asked for urgent action by the Security Council.

On November 9, 2004, the government agreed to ban military flights over Darfur and signed two deals with the rebels after two weeks of talks in Nigeria. However, no agreement was reached on a long-term resolution to the fighting, and violence resumed within weeks. With Washington still pressing the UN for action, on March 23, 2005, the Security Council unanimously approved a resolution calling for 10,000 peacekeepers for Darfur and southern Sudan. However, resistance from the Sudanese government to a UN mission led to the repeated continuation of the AU Mission in Sudan. Another round of peace talks between the two rebel groups and the government was scheduled for later in the year. Rwanda and Nigeria were among the countries that began to send peacekeeping forces into Darfur in July 2005. In May 2005, NATO agreed to assist the AU-led mission in Darfur with transport and other logistical aid. The AU force eventually numbered some 7,000. By September 2005, estimates of those killed in the conflict ranged from 70,000 to 300,000, and 2–3 million people were believed to have been displaced.

On another unsettling front, a tense military situation in eastern Sudan in the states of Kassala and the Red Sea Hills began to escalate in 2005. The Beja people of the east had also long complained about the government ignoring them. Fighting continued through mid-2005 between government and rebel groups, which combined in February as the Eastern Sudan Front (see Political Parties and Groups, below).

On July 10, 2005, Bashir ended the national state of emergency in all but three of Sudan's provinces: Darfur, Kasala, and Red Sea Hills. Bashir also ordered the release of hundreds of political prisoners, including Turabi. The SLM/A subsequently launched a new offensive in Darfur, and the AU initiated a new round of peace talks between the government and the SLM/A and the JEM in Abuja, Nigeria. The AU developed a comprehensive peace plan, which the Sudanese government accepted on April 30, 2006. The plan called for the disarmament of the Janjaweed militias, elections within three years, and the provision of $500 million for the establishment and operation of an autonomous regional authority. One faction of the SLM/A signed the agreement, but another major SLM/A faction and the JEM refused to sign. Meanwhile, Sudan rejected a proposal from UN Secretary General Kofi Annan in April 2006 to replace the AU mission with a more expansive UN-led operation that would have included European and, possibly, U.S. forces.

Political Parties and Groups

Following the 1969 coup, all political parties, except the Sudanese Communist Party (SCP), were outlawed. After the failure of the SCP coup in July 1971, it also was driven underground, and many of its leaders were arrested. The following October President Numayri attempted to supplant the existing parties by launching the Sudanese Socialist Union, modeled after the Arab Socialist Union of Egypt, which remained the country's only recognized political group until its suspension by the TMC in April 1985. More than 40 parties were reported to have participated in the post-Numayri balloting of April 1986, although only the Umma Party (UP), Democratic Unionist Party (DUP), and National Islamic Front (NIF) obtained substantial legislative representation.

In July 1989 the newly installed military regime imposed a new ban on political groups and arrested numerous party leaders. Although most of the detainees were eventually released, the ban continued, with Bashir announcing in late 1990 that the regime had no intention of reestablishing a multiparty system.

In response to the NIF's assumption of substantial, albeit unofficial, political power, a number of the other parties (including the DUP, UP, and SCP), the SPLM, trade union and university organizations, and some disaffected military leaders) formed a loose antigovernment coalition known as the National Democratic Alliance (NDA). An NDA Summit, held in London, England, on January 26–February 3, 1992, called for the establishment of a transitional government in Sudan pending the formulation of a new constitution that would create a multiparty democracy, ensure human rights, and preserve the nation's religious and ethnic "diversity." A second NDA summit in London in February 1994 demonstrated, according to Middle East International, that the Alliance "exists only on paper," as no consensus was reached on the pivotal questions of proposed self-determination for the south and the role of sharia in the state envisioned by the NDA. By contrast, a third summit in Asmara, Eritrea, on June 15–23, 1995, yielded agreement that, if and when the opposition gained power, "religion should be separate from politics," and that a referendum should be held in the south on its secession from the republic. The NDA called for a boycott of the March 1996 presidential and general elections, describing them as a "farce." In June the Alliance charged the Bashir regime with having imposed "religious fanaticism" on Sudan and having established a "politically backward" system of government. A joint NDA military command was established in October under the direction of the SPLM's Col. John Garang.

The NDA suffered a blow in March 2000 when the UP withdrew from the Alliance in the wake of a preliminary agreement between Bashir and UP leader Sadiq al-Mahdi (see UP, below, for additional information). It also was suggested that Mahdi may have been distressed by the authority being exercised by DUP leader and NDA Chair Usman al-Mirghani as well as the military dominance of the SPLM within the Alliance. For its part, the NDA subsequently continued to insist that Bashir step down in favor of a government of national reconciliation. In May 2001 the UP declined an invitation to rejoin the NDA, although Mahdi and Mirghani subsequently met in an effort to assist in devising a comprehensive peace plan. Although both the UP and DUP tentatively endorsed the proposed accords between Khartoum and the SPLM in 2002, the NDA was not officially included in those negotiations. In January 2005, the government reached an agreement in Cairo with the NDA that would reintegrate it into politics.

The new constitution signed into law in June 1998 authorized the formation of political “associations,” and the government began to register parties in January 1999 under guidelines provided by the Political Association Act approved by the assembly in November 1998. Wide latitude was given to a government-appointed registrar of political associations to rule on applications; among other things, groups could be denied legal status if their activity was deemed incompatible with the country’s “cultural course,” an apparent reference to the government’s Islamization campaign. The March 2000 Political Organizations Act for the Year 2000 amended the 1998 act to allow the formation of parties opposed to the government; however, it maintained government power to close down any party. In addition, parties not registered, while permitted to operate freely, were precluded from participating in elections until registered. Subsequently, in August 2002, President Bashir called for a lifting of the ban on parties that had been represented in the legislature at the time of his assumption of power.

National Congress (NC). The NC is a partial successor to the National Islamic Front (al-Jabha al-Watani al-Islami—NIF), which was organized prior to the April 1986 balloting by the leader of the fundamentalist Muslim Brotherhood, Dr. Hassan Abdallah al-Turabi, who as attorney general had been largely responsible for the harsh enforcement of sharia law under the Numayri government. The NIF displayed unexpected strength by winning 51 legislative seats but refused to enter the government until May 1988 because of the UP commitment to revise the sharia system, which the NIF had long wished to strengthen rather than weaken. The NIF gained a number of ministerial seats vacated by the DUP in December 1988 but withdrew from the coalition upon the latter’s return in March 1989. Although Turabi was arrested in July 1989, along with the leaders of many other parties, he was released in December and soon became one of the new regime’s most influential supporters. As it became more and more identified with fundamentalism, the Bashir government appointed numerous NIF adherents to key government posts, most observers agreeing that the Front had become a de facto government party. NIF/Muslim Brotherhood supporters also were reported to be directing the Islamic “security groups,” which had assumed growing authority since 1990, particularly in dealing with government opponents.

Turabi, one of the world’s leading Islamic fundamentalist theoreticians, was subsequently routinely described as the country’s most powerful political figure. A follower of Iran’s late Ayatollah Khomeini, he called for the creation of Islamic regimes in all Arab nations, a position that caused concern in several nearby states (particularly Egypt) as well as in major Western capitals. The NIF’s “number two,” Ali Uthman Muhammad Taha, was named foreign minister in February 1995 and first vice president in early 1998.

It was reported in 1996 that Turabi had directed that the NIF be renamed the National Congress (NC), apparently to reflect a proposed broadening of its scope to serve as an umbrella political organization open to all citizens and to act as a quasi-institutional governing body. Subsequent news reports appeared to use the two names interchangeably, with the NIF rubric predominating. In January 1999 it was announced that a National Congress had been officially registered as a political party, while reports in March indicated similar status had been accorded to a National Islamic Front Party. It was not immediately clear what relationship, if any, the two groupings had to each other or the traditional NIF. Meanwhile, reports (officially denied) surfaced of friction between Turabi and party reformists as well between Turabi and Sudanese President Bashir, who was named chair of the recently established NIF advisory council. Tensions between Turabi and Bashir resulted in the removal of Turabi as general secretary in May. Turabi subsequently formed a new party, the Popular National Congress (PNC, below), and Bashir's supporters formally used the NC rubric in the December 2000 elections.

Leaders: Umar Hassan Ahmad al-BASHIR (President of the Republic and Chair of the Party's Shura Council), Ibrahim Ahmed OMAR (Secretary General), Ahmad Abder RAHMAN, Ali Uthman Muhammad TAHA (First Vice President of the Republic), Ali al-Haj MUHAMMAD, Muhammad Ahmad SALIM (Registrar of Political Associations).

Popular (People's) National Congress (PNC). The PNC is an Islamic fundamentalist organization that was formed by the Turabi faction of the NIF/NC. Turabi had earlier accused President Bashir of betraying the NC's Islamist tenets. Thus, Turabi claimed he was merely adding "Popular" to the original party's name and expelling members who had produced the crisis. Nevertheless, the PNC officially registered as a district party in July 2000. Turabi described the PNC as a "comprehensive shura organization," which indicated it would be outside the government. The PNC has few policy differences with the NC.

Turabi and several of his PNC supporters were arrested in February 2001 (see Current issues, above). Turabi was released in October 2003 and rearrested on March 31, 2004. The registrar of political parties issued a decree on April 1, 2004, to suspend the PNC's activities, following Turabi's arrest. Turabi was released as part of the general amnesty issued by Bashir in July 2005.

Leaders: Hassan Abdallah al-TURABI, Ali al-Hajj MUHAMMAD (Secretary General).

Umma (People's) Party (Hizb al-Umma—UP). A moderate right-of-center formation, the UP has long been led by former prime minister Mahdi. Strongest among the Ansar Muslims of the White Nile and western Darfur and Kordofan provinces, it obtained a plurality of 100 seats at the 1986 assembly balloting. Most of its members traditionally advocated the repeal of sharia law and were wary of sharing power with the fundamentalist NIF. Despite an historic pro-Libyan, anti-Egyptian posture, the party cultivated good relations with Western countries based, in part, on Mahdi's personal ties to Britain.

Prime Minister Mahdi and Idriss al-Banna were arrested shortly after the military coup in June 1989 (the latter being sentenced to 40 years in jail for corruption); Mahdi was released from prison and placed under house arrest in January 1990, amid rumors that the UP was considering some form of cooperation with the new regime. Subsequently, in light of growing fundamentalist influence within the Bashir government, the UP announced an alliance with the SPLM (see Other Groups, below) dedicated to overthrowing the government; ending the civil war; and reintroducing multiparty, secular democracy. The southern liaison notwithstanding, the UP membership was reported to be deeply divided following Mahdi's release from house arrest in May 1991. One faction apparently considered negotiations with the current regime to be pointless, while another supported the convening of a national conference (with full NIF participation), which would organize a national referendum on the nation's political future. With southern groups tending more and more to support independence for their region, the UP in early 1994 was described as "open" on the question. Mahdi was rearrested in June 1994 on charges of plotting against the government and again in May 1995 for a three-month period. He was reportedly invited by the Bashir regime to join the new government formed in April 1996 but declined and eventually fled to Asmara, Eritrea, in December.

The UP was one of the first groups to seek recognition in early 1999, the pronegotiation faction having apparently gained ascendancy. For his part, Mahdi in November concluded an agreement with Bashir known as the “Call of the Homeland Accord,” which proposed a new, pluralistic constitution for Sudan and a four-year transitional period that would conclude with a self-determination referendum for the south. Consequently, in March 2000 Mahdi announced that the UP had withdrawn from the NDA, which he criticized for refusing to negotiate with the government, and directed the Umma militia to honor a cease-fire. Mahdi returned to Sudan in November after four years of exile in Egypt, but the UP nonetheless boycotted the December legislative and presidential elections, arguing that the balloting should be postponed pending comprehensive “national reconciliation.” The UP also declined Bashir’s invitation to join the cabinet in February 2001, again on the premise that a “bilateral” agreement was not appropriate while other opposition groups remained in conflict with the government. However, a UP splinter faction, led by Mubarak al-Fadil al-Mahdi, accepted ministerial posts in August 2002 and in the 2005 unity government.

Leaders: Dr. Sadiq al-MAHDI (Former Prime Minister), Idris al-BANNA, Mubarak Abdullah al-MAHDI, Mubarak al-Fadil al-MAHDI (Assistant to the President of the Republic and dissident faction leader), Sarrah NAGDALLA, Umar Nur al-DAIM (Secretary General).

Democratic Unionist Party (al-Hizb al-Itihadi al-Dimuqrati—DUP). Also right of center, the DUP draws its principal strength from the Khatmiya Muslims of northern and eastern Sudan. Based on its second-place showing at the 1986 poll, the DUP was the UP’s “junior partner” in subsequent government coalitions, although internal divisions prevented the formulation of a clearly defined outlook. The faction led by party chair Usman al-Mirghani included pro-Egyptian traditionalists once linked to the Numayri regime, who were reluctant to repeal sharia until an alternative code was formulated. Younger members, on the other hand, urged that the party abandon its “semi-feudal” orientation and become a secular, centrist formation capable of attracting nationwide support. In early 1986 the DUP reunited with an offshoot group, the Democratic People’s Party (DPP), and subsequently appeared to have absorbed the small National Unionist Party (NUP), which had drawn most of its support from the Khartoum business community.

The party withdrew from government participation in late December 1988 because of failure to implement a southern peace accord that it had negotiated, with the prime minister’s approval, a month earlier; it rejoined the coalition on March 22, 1989. Party leaders Usman and Ahmad al-Mirghani were arrested following the June 1989 coup, but they were released at the end of the year and subsequently went into exile in Egypt.

Although significant divisions apparently remained on both questions, the DUP was described by Middle East International in early 1994 as still officially opposed to independence for the south and “not adverse to some form of Islamic state” for Sudan. The latter issue apparently had contributed to the defection in 1993 of the DUP faction led by former deputy prime minister Sharif Zayn al-Abidin al-HINDI, who advocated the separation of church and state despite his position as a religious leader. A possible change in the DUP’s stance toward fundamentalism and southern secession may have been signaled by the party’s participation in subsequent NDA summits.

DUP Chair Mirghani described the guidelines adopted in late 1998 for legalization of parties as too restrictive, and his supporters did not submit a request for registration, although a splinter group reportedly sought recognition under the DUP rubric. Ahmad al-Mirghani returned from exile in November 2001, but Usman al-Mirghani, who had been elected chair of the NDA in September 2000, remained outside the country despite requests from the Sudanese government for his return. Meanwhile, a DUP splinter faction, calling itself the DUP–General Secretariat, had accepted cabinet posts in the government in February 2001 and in the 2005 unity government.

Leaders: Usman al-MIRGHANI (Chair), Ahmad al-MIRGHANI, Dr. Ahmad al-Sayid HAMAD (Former DDP Leader), Ali Ahmed al-SAYYED, Mohammed al-AZHARI, Ali Mahmoud HASSANEIN.

United Democratic Salvation Front (UDSF). The USDF was formed in 1999 by southern Sudanese political figures and dissidents from the SPLA under the leadership of Riak Machar. The USDF included representatives of rebels groups who had signed the 1997 peace accord with the government in Khartoum and was seen as a progovernment grouping that advocated a peaceful resolution of the north-south conflict. In January 2000, Machar resigned as chair, and he rejoined the SPLA in 2002. He was replaced by Elijah HON at a party congress. In September 2001, the party's general secretary, Ibrahim al-TAWIL, led a large group of USDF members in a defection to the NC. In October 2001, in an effort to unify the party, new leadership elections were conducted, and Eng Joseph Malwal was chosen chair. In March 2003 the USDF signed a cooperation agreement with the NC and was subsequently included in successive cabinets, including the 2005 unity government.

Leaders: Eng Joseph MALWAL (Chair), Faruq GATKOUTH (General Secretary).

Sudanese Communist Party (al-Hizb al-Shuyui al-Sudani—SCP). Founded in 1946 and a leading force in the struggle for independence, the SCP was banned under the Abbud regime and supported the 1969 Numayri coup, becoming thereafter the sole legal party until the abortive 1971 uprising, when it was again outlawed. The SCP campaigned as a recognized party in 1986, calling for opposition to Islamic fundamentalism; repeal of sharia; and the adoption of a secular, democratic constitution. It displayed no interest in joining the government coalition in 1988 but accepted one cabinet portfolio in March 1989. Secretary General Muhammad Ibrahim Nugud Mansur was arrested following the June 1989 coup, and in September four more party members were detained for alleged involvement in an antigovernment protest. Nugud was released from prison in February 1990 but was placed under house arrest until May 1991, at which time he was freed under what the government described as a blanket amnesty for all remaining political detainees. The SCP, operating primarily from exile, subsequently remained active in the anti-NIF opposition, some members of the NDA complaining in late 1992 that the SCP's influence continued at a higher level than was warranted in view of communism's worldwide decline. SCP reformers have recently urged the party to shed its communist orientation in favor of a more moderate left-of-center posture that would attract wider popular participation, but the group's "older generation of leaders" has thus far resisted such a move. The party leadership was reportedly critical in late 1998 and early 1999 of the closer ties apparently being established by UP leader Sadiq al-Mahdi with the NIF government.

Leaders: Muhammad Ibrahim NUGUD Mansur (Secretary General), Ali al-Tijani al-TAYYIB Babikar (Deputy Secretary General).

Progressive People's Party (PPP). The PPP is one of the two major "Equatorial" parties (see SAPC, below) representing Sudanese living near the Zairian and Ugandan borders. Both the PPP and SAPC, unlike the SSPA, are "pro-divisionist," calling for strong provincial governments within a weak regional administration for the south.

Leader: Elioba SURUR.

Sudanese African People's Congress (SAPC). Sudan's other "Equatorial" party, the SAPC was initially represented by Pacifico LOLIK on the Supreme Council named in 1986. However, Lolik was reportedly expelled from the party in 1987 for supporting government plans for a unified southern administration.

Leader: Morris LUWIYA.

Sudanese People's Federal Party (SPFP). As in the case with several other southern parties, the SPFP was awarded a ministry in the coalition government of May 1986.

Leader: Joshua Dei WAL.

Islamic Socialist Party (ISP). A little-known nonregional party, the ISP received attention in 1987 when its leader was named to the Supreme Council as a neutral candidate after a dispute between the UP and the DUP over the filling of a vacancy.

Leader: Mirghani al-NASRI.

Sudanese National Party (al-Hizb al-Watani al-Sudani—SNP). The SNP is a Khartoum-based party that draws most of its support from the Nuba tribes of southern Kordofan. The SNP deputies joined the southerners in boycotting the assembly in 1986 on the grounds that “African bloc” interests were underrepresented in the cabinet. In November 1987 the party’s leader, Rev. Philip Ghabush, was branded a “dictator” by dissidents.

The SNP was officially registered in April 1999, Ghabush having announced his support for the new constitution and laws regarding party formation.

Leader: Rev. Philip Abbas GHABUSH.

Sudanese African Congress (SAC). A southern party based in Juba, the SAC was awarded the ministry of labor in the first post-Numayri cabinet but has since been unrepresented in the government. The SAC represents a more radical viewpoint than the SSPA, calling for a shift in the Sudanese power structure to give the south more voice in national administration. At present the SAC appears strongly oriented toward the SPLM (below), several of its leaders having reportedly joined the movement by 1987.

Leader: Walter Kuniwok Gwado AYOKER.

Sudan African National Union (SANU). A small southern party based in Malakal, SANU (adopting the same name as a pre-Numayri party) supports the division of the south into separate regions for administration.

Leader: Andrew Wieu RIAK.

National Alliance for the Salvation of the Country (NASC). A loose coalition of professional groups, trade unions, interdenominational church groups, and political parties, the NASC was formed in 1985 as an extension of the National Salvation Front (NSF) established the year before. The NASC was instrumental in organizing strikes and other demonstrations that preceded the ouster of President Numayri, but its subsequent efforts to negotiate a north–south reconciliation through a proposed constitutional conference have been largely unproductive.

Leader: Awad al-KARIM Muhammad.

Sudanese Movement of Revolutionary Committees (SMRC). Established in May 1985 as an outgrowth of the Libyan-backed Sudanese People’s Socialist Front (SPSF) formed the previous year, the SMRC adopted an ideology based on the “Green Book” of Colonel Qadhafi. By late 1987, however, it was reported that most “revolutionary committee” activity had ceased in the face of popular disinterest.

Nile Valley Conference (NVC). In seeking official recognition in early 1999, the NVC announced it would pursue “unity” between Sudan and Egypt and otherwise promote regional action.

Leader: Lt. Gen. Umar ZARUG.

Islamic Umma Party (Hizb al-Umma al-Islamiya—IUP). In applying for recognition in early 1999, the IUP announced it would advocate sharia as the sole source of law while promoting “Mahdist” ideology and a nonaligned foreign policy. The IUP was officially registered in April 1999 and convened its first general congress with delegates from all parts of Sudan the same month.

Leader: Wali al-Din al-Hadi al-MAHDI.

Alliance for People’s Working Forces. The Alliance was organized in early 1999 in support of the proposed return of former president Numayri to Sudan. Numayri returned to Sudan after 14 years in exile and officially registered the party in May 1999. He then announced that he would contest the presidential elections scheduled to take place mid-October 2000.

Leader: Kamal al-Din Muhammad ABDUL-LAH.

Party of God (Hizb Allah or Hezbollah). In submitting their application for legal status in early 1999, Hezbollah leaders called for national unity based on Islamic rule and sharia and praised the NIF-led government for having promoted national dialogue and democratization.

Leader: Sulayman Hasan KHALIL.

Other groups that have applied for recognition include the Future Party (Hizb al-Mustaqbal), led by Abd al-Mutal Abd al-RAHMAN; Islamic-Christian Solidarity, launched under the leadership of Hatim Abdullah al-Zaki HUSAYN on a platform of religious harmony and increased attention to social problems; the Islamic Path Party, led by Hasab al-RASUL; the Islamic Revival Movement, led by Siddiq al-Haj al-SIDDIQ; the Islamic Socialist Party, led by Sabah al-MUSBAN; the Liberalization Party; the Moderate Trend Party, led by Mahmud JINA; the Muslim Brothers, led by Sheikh Sadiq Abdallah Abd al-MAJID; the National Popular Front, led by Umar Hasan SHA-LABI and devoted to pan-Arab and pan-Islamic unity; the National Salvation Party; the New Forces Association, led by Abd al-Rahman Ismail KIBAYDAH; the Popular Masses' Alliance, founded by Faysal Muhammad HUSAYN in support of policies designed to assist the poor; the Socialist Popular Party, led by Sayyid Khalifah Idris HABANI; the Sudanese Central Movement, led by Muhammad Abu al-Qasim Haji HAMAD; the Sudan Federal Party, launched by Ahmed DIRAIGE (a leader of the Fur ethnic group) in support of a federal system; the Sudan Green Party, led by Zakaraia Bashir IMAN; and the Sudanese Initiative Party, led by Jafar KARAR.

The formation of a National Democratic Party (NDP) was reported in February as a merger of several small groupings with leftist or nationalist orientations.

Other Groups

Sudanese People's Liberation Movement (SPLM). The SPLM and its military wing, the Sudanese People's Liberation Army (SPLA), were formed in 1983 by Col. John Garang, until then an officer in the Sudanese army. Sent by the Numayri administration to negotiate with mutinous soldiers in southern garrisons, Colonel Garang joined the mutineers and, under his leadership, the SPLA became the dominant southern rebel force. The SPLM and SPLA were supported by Libya prior to Numayri's ouster, when Tripoli endorsed the new regime in Khartoum. The SPLA called a cease-fire immediately following the coup but thereafter initiated military action against the Khartoum government after failing to win concessions on the southern question. Relying on an estimated 20,000 to 25,000 troops the SPLA subsequently gained control of most of the nonurban south; sporadic negotiations with various northern representatives yielded several temporary cease-fires but no permanent solution to the conflict.

The SPLM, which in 1987 began to downplay its initial self-description as "Marxist-Leninist," did not propose secession for the south. Instead, it supported a unified Sudan in which the south would be granted a larger voice in national affairs and a greater share of the nation's economic development programs. However, under pressure from secession-oriented splinters, the SPLM's leaders in 1992 reportedly endorsed the proposed division of Sudan into two highly autonomous, albeit still confederated, states, with the south operating under secular law and the north under sharia.

Prior to mid-1991 the SPLA maintained large training camps in southern Ethiopia with the apparent blessing of the Mengistu regime. Following the change of government in Addis Ababa, however, its units were forced back across the border. In August the Movement was severely splintered when a group of second-tier leaders headquartered in the eastern town of Nasir announced their intention to wrest SPLA control from Garang, whom they accused of perpetrating a "dictatorial reign of terror." Long-standing tribal animosity also appeared to contribute to the split, support for the Nasir faction coming primarily from the Nuer ethnic group, which has had a stormy relationship with Garang's Dinka supporters since the creation of the SPLA (see Anyanya II Movement, below). Several months of fighting between the two factions left thousands dead, Garang's supporters charging the dissidents with the "massacre" of Dinka civilians in January 1992. Although a temporary reconciliation between the SPLA factions was achieved at the Abuja peace talks with the government in June, sporadic fighting resumed later in the summer.

In September 1992 William Nyuon BANY, who had been conducting negotiations with the splinter group on behalf of Garang, defected from the main SPLA branch to form his own faction, which in April 1993 coalesced with other anti-Garang groups as the SPLA-United (below). In early 1994 negotiations between the SPLA and the SPLA-United yielded a tentative cease-fire agreement in which Garang reportedly agreed to support a proposed self-determination vote for the south, which most observers believed would endorse secession. Although discussion also focused on possible reunification of the southern forces, there appeared to be ongoing friction between Garang and the SPLA-United's Riak Machar concerning their prospective leadership roles.

In April 1994 some 500 delegates attended the first SPLA-SPLM conference since 1983. The conference was reportedly called to shore up Garang's authority in the face of competition from the SPLA-United. The SPLM leader was put in charge of the joint military command announced by the NDA in October 1996 after the SPLA-United and Machar's SSIM signed a peace accord with the Bashir government. (See Current issues, above, for information on negotiations between the SPLM and the government.)

In late 2004 rumors surfaced of a "revolt" against Garang by some SPLA officers who favored the independence of the south and wanted Salva Kiir Mayardit to replace Garang as head of the SPLA. However, Kiir reminded the rebel officers of the uprising against Garang in 1991. The rebel officers were impatient with Garang's seeming ineffectiveness in negotiations with Khartoum.

On July 30, 2005, Garang died in a helicopter crash, an event that ignited rioting leading to the death of more than 100 people. He was succeeded as SPLM leader by his deputy, Kiir. Kiir appointed Machar as vice president of the Government of Southern Sudan in August 2005.

Leader: Salva KIIR Mayardit (First Vice President of the Republic, President of South Sudan, and Party Chair), Riak MACHAR (Vice President of South Sudan).

Sudanese People's Liberation Army–United (SPLA-United). The formation of the SPLA-United was announced in early April 1993 in Nairobi, Kenya, by SPLA dissidents who opposed the "one-man rule" of longtime SPLA leader John Garang. Included in the grouping was the Nasir faction (which had been fighting with Garang's forces since August 1991 [see SPLM, above]); William Nyuon Bany's self-styled Forces of Unity; and the so-called Kerubino Group, formed in February by Kerubino Kwanyin Bol and several other dissidents who had escaped from a Garang prison in the fall of 1992.

As of early 1994 the SPLA-United was facing heavy domestic and international pressure to reconcile with the SPLA, internecine fighting having yielded numerous civilian casualties and exacerbated famine conditions in the south. At the same time, the SPLA-United's advocacy of independence for southern Sudan appeared to be gaining widespread support.

A number of splits in the SPLA-United occurred in early 1995, the most important of which was the withdrawal of Nasir faction leader Riak Machar to form a Southern Sudan Independence Movement (SSIM). Concurrently, Nyuon Bany was expelled from the SPLA-United on the ground that he was collaborating with Khartoum, although by early 1996 the rump group was itself reportedly an ally of the north, with Nyuon Bany resuming a pro-Garang posture within the SSIM. In April the SPLA-United and the SSIM signed an agreement with the government in which they endorsed the preservation of Sudan's "known boundaries," apparently thereby relinquishing their drive for independence. Several factions of the SPLA-United were among the groups that reached a peace accord with the government in April 1997.

The SPLA-United, under Lam Akol, subsequently gained strength through a merger with the Southern Sudan Defense Forces (SSDF) led by Machar. As an outgrowth of that agreement, Machar was named head of the new Southern States Coordination Council (SSCC, see Political background, above). However, Machar later pulled out of the government, accusing President Bashir of failing to consult with him regarding governmental appointments. Machar subsequently became the leader of the UDSF (above). Meanwhile, Akol continued to serve in Bashir's cabinet until August 2002, when he was dismissed after he and several supporters had announced they were leaving the NC to form a new party. By that time, Machar and his supporters had reintegrated into the SPLA as southern groups in general attempted to present as unified a front as possible in the increasingly promising peace negotiations. SPLA leader Akol was subsequently appointed foreign minister in the 2005 government of national unity.

Leader: Lam AKOL.

Sudan Liberation Movement/Army (SLM/A). This group is a successor of sorts to the Darfur Liberation Front, a rebel group organized to combat the perceived repression in Darfur. The rebels split into two groups in 2004, as the SLM/A vehemently opposed Khalil Ibrahim, a radical opponent of Khartoum (see JEM, below). The SLM/A claimed to represent the region's black African farmers, who were angry over perceived government support for Arab militias. One faction of the SLM/A, known as the Mani Arkoi and led by Minni Minawi, signed the AU-backed 2006 Darfur peace accord, but the main SLM/A body, led by party chair Abdallah Wahid Mohamed Ahmad Nur, rejected the agreement.

Leader: Adballah Wahid Mohamed Ahmad NUR (Chair), Mustafa TIRAB (General Secretary), Minni MINAWAI (Leader of the Mani Arkoi faction).

Justice and Equality Movement (JEM). The JEM split from the SLM in mid-2004, further complicating peace negotiations with Khartoum, with each of the groups at odds with the others based on tribal rivalries. It reportedly is supported by Islamists close to Hassan Abdallah al-Turabi. In May 2006 the JEM refused to sign the AU-supported Darfur peace plan.

Leader: Khalil IBRAHIM Mohamed.

National Movement for Reform and Development in Dafur. This rebel group, which operates in the north and west, split from the JEM in August 2004 after its leader accused the JEM's Ibrahim of trying to have him assassinated. This group officially announced its formation on October 26, 2004.

Leader: Jibril Abdel KARIM, Nourene Manawi BARTCHAM.

Eastern Sudan Front. Formed on February 1, 2005, this group, which operates in the east, is composed of two rebel groups: the Free Lions Association, whose members are Rashaida tribesmen, and the Beja Congress, which represents the non-Arab, nomadic Beja tribes. Unrest in the impoverished area of eastern Sudan, long ignored by the government, began as a grassroots movement in the 1990s and gained strength with the return of Umar Muhammad TAHIR, the exiled Beja Congress leader, in November 2003. The Congress was banned by the government in October 2003 for its use of violence.

Anyanya II Movement. Anyanya II, so-named in emulation of the Anyanya (scorpion) southern insurgency of earlier decades (see Political background, above), was formed in late 1983, when the Nuer faction broke from the recently formed SPLA. Although the Movement continued its antigovernment activity until the ouster of President Numayri, it subsequently became a progovernment guerrilla group, regularly engaging SPLA troops around the Upper Nile city of Malakal. Despite reports in 1987 of an agreement between Anyanya II and the SPLA to curtail hostilities arising from their longstanding ethnic rivalry, Africa Report stated in late 1990 that the Movement was once again engaging in anti-SPLA activity, reportedly with the support of Khartoum. In the second half of 1991 Anyanya II aligned itself with the Nasir faction of the SPLA but by early 1996 had once again adopted a pro-Khartoum posture.

Leader: David Dogok PUOCH (Secretary General).

Patriotic Resistance Movement of South Sudan (PRMSS). The PRMSS was established in Nairobi, Kenya, in late 1993 by southern Sudanese critical of both SPLA factions. The new grouping, believed to derive its support primarily from

Cabinet

[as of July 1, 2006]

President and Prime Minister	Umar Hassan Ahmad al-Bashir (NC)
First Vice President	Salva Kiir Mayardit (SPLM)
Second Vice President	Ali Uthman Muhammad Taha (NC)

Ministers

Agriculture and Forestry	Mohammed al-Amin Essa Kabashi (NC)
Animal Resources	Qalwak Danek (NC)
Cabinet Affairs	Denik Alor Cole (SPLM)
Culture and Youth	Mohammed Youssef Abdullah (NC)
Defense	Lt. Gen. Abdel-Rahim Hussein (NC)
Education	(Vacant)
Energy and Mining	Awad Ahmed al-Jaz (NC)
Environment and Urban Planning	Ahmed Babakr (NC)
External Trade	George Bornik Neyami (SPLM)
Federal Governance	Abdel-Basit Sabdarat (NC)
Finance	Al-Zubair Hassan Ahmed (NC)
Foreign Affairs	Lam Akol (SPLM)
Health	Tabita Shwkaya (SPLM) [f]
Higher Education and Scientific Research	Peter Cock (SPLM)
Humanitarian Affairs	Kosti Manibi (SPLM)
Industry	Jalal Yusuf Mohammed Digair (DUP)
Information and Communications	El-Zahawi Ibrahim Malik (UP)
Interior	Zubair Bashir Taha (NC)
International Cooperation	Al-Tijani Saleh Fadel (NC)
Investment	Malik Akar Ayar (SPLM)
Irrigation and Water Resources	Kamal Ali Mohammed (NC)
Justice	Mohammed Ali al-Mardi (NC)
Labor, Public Service, and Human Resources	Alson Manani Makaya (NC)
Parliamentary Affairs	Joseph Okilo (SPLM)
Religious Guidance and Endowments	Azhari al-Taji Awad al-Sayyed (NC)
Republic Affairs	Maj. Gen. Bakri Hassan Salih (NC)
Science	(Vacant)
Tourism	Joseph Malwal (UDSF)
Transport and Roads	Kol Manyak Gok (SPLM)
Welfare and Social Development	Samia Ahmed Mohammed (NC)

[f] = female

the Equatoria region of Sudan, reportedly favors a self-determination vote for the south.

Leaders: Alfred Lado GORE, Philip TONGUN, Barri WANJI.

Sudan Invincible Forces of Democracy (SIFD). Formation of the SIFD was announced in Nairobi in late 1993 by southerners seeking a peaceful settlement to the fighting between SPLA factions as well as between the government and the SPLA.

Leader: David Idilla LOBUIN.

Legitimate Command. The Command is a Cairo-based group of former Sudanese officers opposed to the Bashir regime that claims the support of “democratic” officers in the Sudanese army. The Command has participated in NDA summits in recent years, some observers going so far as to describe it as the NDA’s “military wing.”

Leader: Fathi Ahmad ALI.

Sudan Federal Democratic Alliance (SFDA). The SFDA was launched in London in February 1994 under the chairship of Ahmed Dreige, a former Numayri cabinet member. The group has deemed “all means to be legitimate” in securing an end to the Bashir regime and has proposed a substantially decentralized federal structure for Sudan in which the traditional parties would play no role.

Leaders: Ahmed DREIGE (Chair), Sherif HARIR, Suleiman RAHAL.

Sudan Alliances Forces (SAF). The SAF is a rebel group operating in eastern Sudan, reportedly from bases in Ethiopia and Eritrea. In late 1996 it was described as a participant in the NDA, although its fighters were not believed to be under the direct command of the SPLA’s Colonel Garang.

Leader: Brig. Gen. Abd al-Aziz Khalid OSMAN.

Nobility Movement (al-Shahamah). This is a rebel group reportedly formed in October 2004 in West Kordofan state by a former leader of the pro-government paramilitary Popular Defense Forces. The leader, Musa Ali Muhammadayn (also a former governor of al-Rashad province), was dismissed from that post when he decided to remain loyal to Turabi in the latter’s confrontations with Bashir.

Leader: Musa Ali MUHAMMADAYN.

Sudanese National Movement for the Eradication of Marginalization. This rebel group, about which little is known, reportedly operates in Darfur. It claimed responsibility for an attack on an oil field in Darfur on December 20, 2004.

Legislature

Under the Numayri regime, the size and composition of the unicameral National People’s Assembly changed several times, the assembly elected in 1974 being the only one to complete its full constitutional term of four years. All existing legislative bodies were dissolved by the TNC in April 1985.

On April 1–12, 1986, balloting was held for 260 members of a 301-member Constituent Assembly, voting being postponed in many southern districts because of rebel activity. The assembly was dissolved by the Bashir regime in July 1989.

On February 13, 1992, Prime Minister Bashir announced the appointment of a 300-member Transitional National Assembly, which met for the first time on February 24. Included in the new assembly were all members of the Revolutionary Command Council (RCC); a number of RCC advisors; all cabinet ministers and state governors; and representatives of the army, trade unions, and former political parties. The prime minister decreed that the assembly would sit for an indeterminate period, pending the selection of a permanent body as the final step of the new pyramidal legislative structure envisioned by the government.

Elections to a new 400-member National Assembly were conducted on March 6–17, 1996, all candidates running as independents because political parties remained banned. Most of the 275 elected members of the assembly were selected during that balloting, although in October President Bashir appointed eight legislators from constituencies in the south, where voting had been deemed impossible due to the civil war. When the assembly convened on April 1, the elected legislators were joined by 125 legislators who had been selected in January by representatives of local and state councils and numerous professional associations.

At the most recent balloting, held December 13–23, 2000, the National Congress won 355 of 360 contested seats, the remaining 5 being secured by independents. (Most major opposition groups boycotted the balloting, and elections were not held in three southern provinces due to the civil war.) On December 20, 2004, the National Assembly amended the constitution to extend the term of the sitting legislature for one year. Legislators serve four-year terms.

In accordance with the Comprehensive Peace Agreement signed January 9, 2005, seats in the legislature were divided based on a power-sharing quota, with the NC holding 52 percent of the seats; the SPLM, 28 percent; northern opposition parties, 14 percent; and southern opposition parties, 6 percent. The new 450-member “national unity” assembly—appointed by decree by Bashir—convened for the first time on August 31, 2005. Also under the agreement, the south established its own assembly, the South Sudan Transitional Legislative Assembly, which convened for the first time on September 29, 2005.

President: Ahmed Ibrahim al-TAHIR.

Communications

Press

The Bashir government banned all newspapers and magazines with the exception of the weekly military paper, al-Guwat al-Musallaha (Armed Forces), upon its assumption of power in June 1989. The following September two new dailies were issued under government auspices, al-Engaz al-Watani and al-Sudan al-Hadith. In May 1990 a new English-language weekly, New Horizon, was launched. In April 1993 it was reported that al-Khartoum, one of the dailies banned in 1989, had resumed publication from exile in Cairo, Egypt. Two months later the government announced a relaxation of its press monopoly; however, in April 1994 the country’s sole privately owned paper, al-Sudan al-Dawli, was shut down for criticizing the NIF’s continued support of the regime.

On May 10, 2003, the Khartoum Monitor, Sudan’s only English-language daily, was banned. On August 12, 2003, reportedly to bolster support for his regime, President Bashir issued a decree supposedly to end press censorship.

News Agencies

The domestic facility is the Sudan News Agency (SUNA) (Wakalat al-Anba al-Sudan). A number of foreign agencies maintain bureaus in Khartoum.

Broadcasting and Computing

Republic of Sudan Broadcasting (Idhaat al-Jumhuriyah al-Sudan) is a government facility transmitting in Arabic, Amharic, Somali, and Tigrinya as well as in English and French. Television service is provided by the commercial, government-controlled Sudan Television Service. There were approximately 9 million television receivers and 290,000 personal computers serving 300,000 Internet users in 2003.

Intergovernmental Representation

Ambassador to the U.S.

(Vacant)

U.S. Ambassador to Sudan

(Vacant)

Permanent Representative to the UN

(Vacant)

IGO Memberships (Non-UN)

AfDB, AFESD, AMF, AU, BADEA, CAEU, Comesa, IDB, IGAD, Interpol, IOM, LAS, NAM, OIC, PCA, WCO

SWAZILAND

KINGDOM OF SWAZILAND

---

The Country

Bordered on the north, west, and south by South Africa and on the east by Mozambique, Swaziland is the smallest of the three former British High Commission territories in southern Africa. The country comprises a mountainous western region (Highveld), a middle region of moderate altitude (Middleveld), an eastern lowland area (Lowveld), and the so-called Lubombo plateau on the eastern border. About 97 percent of the population is Swazi African, the remainder being of European and European-African (mixed) stock. English is an official language, but siSwati (akin to Zulu) prevails among the indigenous population; Afrikaans is common among the Europeans, many of whom are of South African origin. Christianity is the religion of approximately half the people; there are a few Muslims, the remainder adhering to traditional beliefs. Women constitute about 37 percent of the work force; female participation in government, with the exception of the former queens regent, has been minimal.

The economy is quite diversified, given the country's small land area and population, although its composition, particularly in the mining sector, is changing. Production of iron ore, which accounted for 25 percent of export earnings in 1967, had virtually ceased by the end of the 1970s, while asbestos reserves, after 40 years of extraction, were also approaching depletion. Coal mining, on the other hand, underwent rapid development, while other minerals, such as tin, barites, and silica, were found in commercially exploitable quantities. Under normal conditions, water supplies are sufficient not only to support agriculture, which yields sugar, forest products, and livestock, but also to provide a potential hydroelectric power base. Swaziland experienced real GDP growth of 3.6 percent in 1996 and 3.7 percent in 1997, partially as the result of the government's implementation of economic reforms suggested by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank. Growth declined to about 2 percent in 1998 due to deteriorating economic conditions in South Africa and the effects of the Asian financial crisis.

Growth of 3.5 percent was achieved in 2002, mainly due to expansion of the textile industry, which took advantage of reduced U.S. tariffs and quotas designed to assist developing African nations. However, the economy subsequently continued to suffer from high unemployment, persistent poverty, localized food shortages and, according to some international donors, irresponsible spending

Political Status: Independent monarchy within the Commonwealth since September 6, 1968.

Area: 6,703 sq. mi. (17,363 sq. km.).

Population: 929,718 (1997C); 1,101,000 (2005E).

Major Urban Centers (2005E): MBABANE (administrative capital, 78,000), Lobamba (royal and legislative capital, 11,000), Manzini (33,000).

Official Languages: English, siSwati.

Monetary Unit: Lilangeni (official rate July 1, 2006: 7.13 emalangeni = $1US). The lilangeni is at par with the South African rand, although under a Tripartite Monetary Area agreement concluded among Swaziland, Lesotho, and South Africa on July 1, 1986, the rand ceased to be legal tender in Swaziland.

Sovereign: King MSWATI III; installed on April 25, 1986, succeeding (as Head of State) Queen Regent Ntombi THWALA.

Prime Minister: Absalom Themba DLAMINI; appointed by the king on November 14, 2003, to succeed Paul SHABANGU, who had been serving in an acting capacity since the dismissal of Sibusiso Barnabas DLAMINI by the king on September 30, 2003, following the legislative election of September 20–October 18.

on the part of the royal family. In addition, Swaziland faced one of the highest rates of HIV/AIDS infection in the world; UN officials estimated in 2004 that 39 percent of adults were infected. After many years of seeming failure to implement a plan to combat the pandemic, the government in 2004 declared a national emergency regarding the issue and solicited international assistance in trying to halt the spread of the disease. (In 2005 the infection rate among one age group of teens declined for the first time.) The economy continued its downward trend, with real GDP growth of 1.8 percent in 2005, compared to 2.1 percent in 2004. Little progress was made in reducing poverty, according to the IMF, which cited, among other reasons, the high rate of HIV/AIDS infection, a prolonged drought, and the removal of textile quotas in other countries, resulting in factory closings that contributed to Swaziland's 30 percent unemployment rate. The IMF urged the government to reduce its budget deficit and increase privatization in order to attract investors.

Government and Politics

Political Background

Swaziland came under British control in the mid-19th century when a Swazi ruler requested protection against his people's traditional enemies, the Zulu. Kept intact when the Union of South Africa was formed in 1910, the territory was subsequently administered under native rulers by the British high commissioner for South Africa. Preparations for independence began after World War II and culminated in the promulgation of internal self-government in 1967 and the achievement of full independence within the Commonwealth in 1968 under King SOBHUZA II, who subsequently exercised firm control of the country's political institutions. Following small gains by the semiradical Ngwane National Liberation Congress (NNLC) in a 1972 parliamentary election and frustration of his attempts to have an opposition MP deported, the king in April 1973 repealed the constitution, abolished the legislature, introduced a detention act, and banned all opposition political activity. On August 21, 1982, King Sobhuza died, having technically reigned from the age of one in 1899, although he had not been formally enthroned until 1921 and had not been recognized as paramount ruler by the British until 1966. He was succeeded as head of state by Queen Mother Dzeliwe SHONGWE, authorized to act as regent until a successor king was designated and reached maturity.

The naming of Prince Bhekimpi DLAMINI to succeed Prince Mabandla Fred DLAMINI as prime minister in March 1983 seemed to mark the ascendancy of conservative elements within the royal house. In August Queen Regent Dzeliwe also was ousted from power, reportedly because she differed over the interpretation of her role with traditionalists within the Liqoqo, historically an advisory council of royal family members that had been elevated to the status of Supreme Council of State shortly before Sobhuza's death. Queen Regent Dzeliwe was replaced by Ntombi THWALA, the mother of Prince Makhosetive, who was named successor to the former sovereign on August 10. Two months later, however, Prince Mfanasibili DLAMINI and Dr. George MSIBI, who were prominently involved in the palace coup that installed Queen Regent Ntombi, were dismissed from the Liqoqo.

On April 25, 1986, two years earlier than originally planned, Prince Makhosetive assumed the title of King MSWATI III in an apparent effort to halt the power struggle that had followed his father's death. The 19-year-old king, the world's youngest monarch, moved quickly to consolidate his control, formally disbanding the Liqoqo in June and appointing Prince Sotsha DLAMINI, a relatively obscure former police official, as prime minister on October 6.

After authorizing the arrest in May 1987 of 12 people allegedly involved in the palace intrigue of recent years, the king dissolved parliament in September, one year early. Assembly elections were held in November, and the government was extensively reorganized at the end of the month. Although the king's bold action at the outset of his reign surprised some observers, most Swazis appeared to support his exercise of monarchical prerogative as a means of preserving stability.

The king formally assumed full executive authority at age 21 on April 19, 1989. Three months later he dismissed Prince Sotsha as prime minister, replacing him with Obed Mfanyana DLAMINI. The new prime minister was the founder and former secretary general of the Swaziland Federation of Trade Unions (SFTU), a background that appeared to strengthen the government's capacity to deal with a growing number of labor disputes.

On October 9, 1992, one month before the expiration of its term, the king dissolved Parliament and declared that, with the assistance of his cabinet (which would be restyled a Council of Ministers and act as a caretaker government), he would rule by decree until the adoption of a new constitution and the holding of elections. Balloting scheduled for November was postponed until 1993 to allow for the redefinition of constituencies and compilation of a voters' register. The monarch's action followed his approval of a draft charter that called for retention of the monarchy and the revival of multipartyism (banned in 1973 by King Sobhuza II).

Fearing a conservative backlash if the reform movement outpaced the prerogatives of the royal court and powerful traditional chiefs, the constitutional commission recommended that decisions regarding political parties be deferred. Consequently, candidates at the House of Assembly elections on September 18 and October 11, 1993, competed on a nonparty basis; nonetheless, the polling marked the first time that legislators had been popularly elected and royal family members had been prohibited from participating. Underscoring the change, Prime Minister Obed Dlamini and all but three cabinet ministers lost their seats. As a result, on October 25 King Mswati named Andreas FAKUDZE as interim prime minister with responsibility for all 16 ministries. Ten days later the king appointed Prince Jameson Mblini DLAMINI, a conservative, to succeed Fakudze. Traditionalists hailed the monarch's choice, although the government named by Dlamini on November 10 included several reformists.

A follow-up round to the 1993 balloting was held on October 2, 1994, with voters selecting secretaries for the country's 55 regions (Inkundla). The new officials were described as links between legislators and their constituents, as well as coordinators of development activities in their areas.

The SFTU called a general strike (the most comprehensive in recent years) on March 13–14, 1995, to secure acceptance of a variety of demands, including the reinstatement of summarily dismissed state employees. The action was called off after the government appointed a select committee to consider the grievances. Subsequently, the SFTU called for another strike on July 17, which was called off after the House of Assembly had imposed severe penalties for work stoppages. In mid-August the Senate endorsed a statement by King Mswati that Swazis did not want multiparty politics. Three months later, a well-attended opposition conference rejected the royal assessment.

On January 22–29, 1996, the SFTU organized a widely observed general strike, which was abandoned only after the king ordered the strikers back to work, threatening “to go to war” if necessary to end the action. Although some observers described the SFTU as “tarnished” by its capitulation to the monarch’s threat, on February 16, three days before a scheduled resumption of the strike, King Mswati promised to reform the constitution and consider lifting the political party ban. Subsequently, the union suspended plans for a renewed action; however, prodemocracy rallies continued.

On May 8, 1996, the king dismissed Prime Minister Dlamini, promising “concrete democratic changes.” Subsequently, the king named Deputy Prime Minister Sishayi NXUMALO as acting prime minister, but Nxumalo immediately asserted that the Swazi people were not ready for political parties, which he described as ill-suited for the “close-knit, non-ethnic, traditional society.” Nevertheless, on July 26 the king announced the creation of a 29-member Constitutional Reform Commission (CRC) with responsibility for drafting a new constitution and named former finance minister and IMF executive director, Dr. Sibusiso Barnabas DLAMINI, as the new prime minister. The cabinet was reshuffled on November 13, the king pledging emphasis on economic development and the pursuit of foreign investment and trade.

In April 1998 the king once again reshuffled the government, most notably replacing Deputy Prime Minister Nxumalo with Arthur KHOZA and naming the former to head the Swaziland Investment Promotion Authority (SIPA). Thereafter, in an apparent effort to quell increasingly vocal calls for reform from prodemocracy activists, the king abruptly dissolved the House of Assembly in August in anticipation of balloting in October.

As in 1993, at elections on October 16 and 24, 1998, candidates for the House of Assembly competed on a nonparty basis. Observers attributed the low voter turnout to voter apathy and the prodemocracy forces’ call for an electoral boycott; in addition, union activists reportedly threatened would-be voters. On November 13 the king reappointed Dlamini as prime minister, and on November 20 a new government was sworn in.

On May 31, 2003, the king dissolved the assembly and appointed a special council to act as a caretaker government until elections were held. Paul SHABANGU was appointed as the interim prime minister, although no other cabinet posts were filled. The nonparty elections, which were boycotted by most of the major opposition groups, were conducted on September 20 and October 18. The king appointed five women to the assembly (there had been no women in the previous assembly). Following the elections, the king dismissed Shabangu and appointed Absalom Themba DLAMINI as prime minister on November 14. The cabinet was reshuffled on February 23, 2006, and one minister was replaced on May 24, 2006.

Constitution and Government

For some years after independence, King Sobhuza was reported to have been working on a revised Western-style constitution. However, in March 1977 he announced that he had abandoned the effort in favor of a form of traditional government based on tribal councils (Tinkhundla), which was formally introduced in October 1978. Under the Tinkhundla electoral system, which was voided by decree on October 9, 1992, polling was held without political campaigns or electoral rolls for an 80-member electoral college charged with naming four-fifths of a 50-member House of Assembly, which in turn named half of a 20-member Senate. Ten members of each were designated by the monarch, who also named the prime minister and other cabinet officials.

On February 14, 1992, a royal constitutional commission appointed by the king in late 1991 presented a draft charter for a multiparty electoral system, which was given preliminary approval by the monarch in October. The proposal called for a two-stage balloting process beginning with polling in the 210 Tinkhundla for local representatives from among candidates chosen by the chiefs. At the second round of the secret balloting, first round victors from four to six Tinkhundla were to compete against one another in Inkhundla elections for berths in an expanded House of Assembly and Senate of 55 and 20 members, respectively (the monarch having the right to appoint 10 additional members to each.) The plan, while serving as a partial blueprint for the 1993 and 1998 polls, lacked formal approval, and its status remained distinctly uncertain. A Constitutional Reform Committee (CRC) formed in 1996 proceeded haltingly. In January 2001 a draft constitution report from the CRC was criticized by the opposition and human rights groups as a “doctored document” and “not a truly representative report because group submissions were denied.” The long-awaited new draft constitution was presented to the king in November 2003 but he did not sign it into law until July 26, 2005, after ordering the legislature to amend sections regarding religion and taxing the royal family. The new constitution promulgated on February 8, 2006, has no specific language to legalize political parties (and stipulates that candidates for election must run as individuals.) Though the constitution contains a bill of rights guaranteeing limited freedoms, the king retains ultimate authority (see Current issues, below).

The judiciary, whose members are appointed by the king, encompasses a High Court, a Court of Appeal, and district courts. There are also 17 Swazi courts for tribal and customary issues. Swaziland is divided for administrative purposes into four districts, each headed by a commissioner appointed by the central government.

Foreign Relations

Swaziland is a member of the UN, the Commonwealth, and the African Union (AU, formerly the Organization of African Unity—OAU). It maintains close relations with South Africa as a result of geographic proximity, administrative tradition, and economic dependency (more than 80 percent of the Kingdom’s imports are from South Africa, and a substantial portion of its national income consists of remittances from Swazis employed in the neighboring state). Despite OAU strictures, Swaziland concluded a secret nonaggression pact with Pretoria in 1982 and subsequently strove to contain African National Congress (ANC) activity within its territory.

A series of major raids on purported ANC strongholds by South African security forces in 1986 led to vehement protests by the Swazi government and a December visit by South African Foreign Minister Roelof “Pik” Botha, who reaffirmed his government’s commitment to the 1982 pact and pledged that the incursions would cease. However, in July 1987 two top ANC officials and a Mozambican woman companion were killed in Mbabane. Two additional killings by alleged South African agents in August brought the total number of ANC deaths in 1987 to 11.

Despite its ties to South Africa, Swaziland established diplomatic relations with Mozambique during 1976. The action was prompted by a need to facilitate the movement of goods through the Mozambique port of Maputo. The Mozambique Embassy in Mbabane was Swaziland’s first resident mission from independent Africa, and a security accord was concluded between the two countries in mid-1984.

In September 1989 it was reported that Swaziland and South Africa had agreed on a border adjustment that would bring the largely Swazi-populated South African homeland of KaNgwane within the kingdom. However, no date was given for the formal transfer, which remained unimplemented in mid-1999. In 2001 the king launched a new initiative to discuss border issues with South Africa; however, no progress was subsequently reported toward a settlement.

In March 2005 the king and South African president Thebo Mbeki were scheduled to hold a summit, which activists had hoped Mbeki would use to push for reforms, but the meeting was postponed indefinitely. South African activists continued their efforts in support of democratization in Swaziland by staging a border blockade in 2006. Eight people were shot and wounded on the South African side of the border.

In late 1997 relations between Swaziland and Mozambique were strained after it was reported that a Swazi prince leading a committee studying their shared border had asserted that Swazi territory legally encompassed all of Mozambique's Maputo Province. (The claim was dismissed by Maputo, which declared that it had never been formally contacted by Swaziland.) In 1998–1999 relations between the two turned on repatriation issues. In 1999 Swaziland relocated 500 Mozambicans and began a program to force Mozambicans living in Swaziland to register for military service.

Current Issues

In 2000 opposition pressure for political reforms continued, but the government exhibited little concession. In November a general strike called by the SFTU led to the arrests of a number of prominent trade union and opposition leaders. The king's perceived heavy-handed approach to the prodemocracy movement was criticized by the opposition through 2001 and into 2002. Several neighboring countries (notably South Africa) and other international observers also questioned the regime's policies, particularly following a royal decree in June 2002 permitting the king to overturn court rulings, ban newspapers, and impose penalties on those charged with "ridiculing" royal authority or the government. Events surrounding the drafting of a new constitution also appeared to dampen prospects for liberalization. In August 2001 the CRC had in fact proposed enlarging the king's authority and maintaining the ban on political parties.

The draft constitution was formally presented to the king in November 2003. As expected, the document did not call for the legalization of parties and appeared to many observers to strengthen, rather than weaken, the monarch's authority. Among other things, the proposed new basic law reaffirmed the king's power to appoint the prime minister, cabinet, judges, and other government officials. It also authorized the king to dissolve the assembly and veto any legislation. Although reference was made to rights for women, freedom of expression, and other issues generally addressed by modern constitutions, the opposition immediately dismissed the draft as unacceptable. Leading the campaign against approval was the Coalition of Concerned Civil Organizations (CCCO), launched by business, professional, and legal organizations. Unions, religious groups, and the banned political parties subsequently joined the CCCO in trying to force revision of the draft. However, their efforts were fruitless, as the king signed the new constitution into law in July 2005. The constitution maintains the power of the monarchy and includes a provision that a ruler who does not perform can be removed, his authority then being assumed by the Queen Mother. A bill of rights within the constitution guarantees equality under the law and freedom of religion, speech, and assembly, though the king may suspend certain rights if he finds them to be in conflict with the (undefined) public interest. Observers questioned the commitment to women's rights, citing the fact that women historically have been grouped with minors under the law, and given that the king still has the authority to "claim" and marry underage girls. The CCCO noted that under the constitution the king enjoys legal immunity and protection against investigation by the Swaziland Human Rights Commission.

Perhaps a positive note for prodemocracy activist was that the government issued guidelines for the creation and registration of nongovernmental organizations—a move some said could be a precursor to legal political activity. Opposition leader Obed Dlamini of the NNLC vowed to challenge the constitution by attempting to register his party. The king, for his part, said in 2006 that the country was not ready for political parties and criticized foreign countries that pushed for reforms in Swaziland. Meanwhile, the government blocked a protest rally organized by the People's United Democratic Movement (Pudemo) and banned a women's group from registering as an organization. Tensions in the country were heightened by reports that the king built several lavish palaces for his wives, bought them luxury cars, and otherwise continued to spend large amounts of money, while two-thirds of the population lived on less than $1US per day. On a more positive note, after tough new anticorruption laws were approved in 2006, the king held the country's first summit to address the major problem of graft.

Political Parties

During 1994 a number of parties, including Pudemo (below), joined with human rights and other groups to form a Confederation for Full Democracy in Swaziland (CFDS). During a visit to Johannesburg in September, CFDS representative Sabelo DLAMINI termed the 1993 non-partisan poll a "pseudo election" and warned of civil war that might spill over into South Africa if Swaziland's "undemocratic government" did not agree to free elections. On November 13, 1995, the CFDS sponsored a conference of political and labor groups that called on King Mswati to go into voluntary exile "until we have sorted our political problems out."

In early 1996 the CFDS appeared to have been superseded by the Swaziland Democratic Alliance (SDA), a coalition that included Pudemo; the Swaziland Federation of Trade Unions (SFTU), an 80,000 member grouping led by Jan SITHOLE; and representatives of the Institute for Democracy and Leadership (Ideal), led by Dr. Jerry GULE. Organized to "try to force change," the alliance led a march on the prime minister's office and parliamentary building, which was noteworthy mainly for the paltry number of activists who participated. In early 1999 the SDA was bolstered by the addition of the NNLC (below) to its ranks, and in April the NNLC's Obed Mfanyan Dlamini was elected, along with Pudemo's Jerry NXUMALO and Sithole, to lead the reorganized alliance. In 2003 Obed Dlamini was elected to parliament, and a year later the NNLC reportedly had decided to participate in national elections, which, observers said, would most likely mean the end of the SDA, as other alliance members opposed such participation.

Former Government Party

Imbokodvo National Movement (INM). The Imbokodvo ("Grindstone") Movement dominated the political scene during the late 1960s and was the only political group permitted to function openly after 1973. The leadership of the party has been vacant since the dismissal of Prince Mabandla Dlamini as prime minister in March 1983. The royalist Sive Siyingaba cultural-political group, an offshoot of the INM, called on the king in January 2000 to lift the ban on political parties.

Illegal Opposition and External Groups

People's United Democratic Movement (PUDM or Pudemo). Initial reports about Pudemo surfaced in 1989 when the government accused the group of illegally circulating political pamphlets. In mid-1990 it was reported that, after a period of inactivity, the group had resumed actively campaigning for electoral reform, multiparty democracy, and an end to corruption. The party unilaterally proclaimed its "legality" in February 1992.

In August 1993 party president Kislon SHONGWE reportedly requested refuge at the UK's high commission in Mbabane after he was listed among opposition figures being sought for distributing "seditious pamphlets." A month later Pudemo officials countered international praise for the government's electoral preparations, contending that the balloting could not be considered democratic if the 20-year-old state of emergency remained in place and political parties were not able to participate.

On January 1, 1996, Pudemo threatened to make the country "ungovernable" if the monarch failed to adopt a multiparty democratic system of government. Subsequently, it called for the establishment of an interim government to oversee a transition to democratic rule. Underscoring its more militant stance, Pudemo subsequently replaced Shongwe, who was described as "uncombative," and Secretary General Dominic MNGOMEZULU with Mario Masuku and Bonginkhosi Dlamini, respectively. Masuku was named to the constitutional

Cabinet

As of June 1, 2006

Prime Minister	Absalom Themba Dlamini
Deputy Prime Minister	Albert Shabangu

Ministers

Agriculture and Cooperatives	Mtiti Fakudze
Economic Planning and Development	Rev. Absalom Dlamini
Education	Constance Simelane [f]
Enterprise and Employment	Lufto E. Dlamini
Finance	Majozi Sithole
Foreign Affairs and Trade	Mathendele Moses Dlamini
Health and Social Welfare	Njabulo Mabuza
Home Affairs	Prince Gabheni Dlamini
Housing and Urban Development	Mabili Dlamini
Justice and Constitutional Affairs	Prince David Dlamini
Natural Resources and Energy	Dumsile Sukati [f]
Public Service and Information	Themba Msibi
Public Works and Transport	Elijah Shongwe
Regional Development and Youth Affairs	Chief Siphon Shongwe
Tourism and Environment	Thandi Shongwe [f]

[f] = female

review commission established in May but subsequently resigned on the ground that it had become apparent that the King had no intention of lifting the political party ban. In November 2000, Pudemo was among the forces of opposition to join the general strike called by the SFTU during which Masuku was arrested, together with other opposition leaders. Masuku was acquitted of sedition charges in August 2002.

In 2005 the king accused 13 Pudemo members of firebombing homes and offices of government officials; all were released, but one member was fined $800 after pleading guilty to treason and testifying that Pudemo was behind the attacks. The government cracked down on a Pudemo rally in March 2006, arresting several party members, including Masuku (who was released the same day). Party leaders said they staged the protest to test the constitution's provision regarding political freedom.

Leaders: Mario MASUKU (President), Jerry NXUMALO, Bonginkhosi DLAMINI (Secretary General).

Ngwane National Liberation Congress (NNLC). The NNLC was at the forefront of opposition activities in the 1970s but thereafter was reported to have become defunct. At a meeting of the resuscitated body in December 1998, former prime minister Obed Mfanyana Dlamini was elected president of the congress, and in April 1999 he reportedly agreed to enter into the SDA. In the 2003 legislative elections, Dlamini was elected to the assembly after campaigning as a nonpartisan. In 2005 party member Jimmy HLOPHE, running as an unaffiliated individual, won an assembly seat in a special election following the death of a member of parliament.

Leader: Obed Mfanyana DLAMINI (President of the Party and Former Prime Minister).

Swazi Liberation Movement (Swalimo). The avowedly revolutionary Swalimo was launched in 1978 by Dr. Ambrose Zwane, formerly leader of the NNLC.

Leaders: Dr. Ambrose Phesheya ZWANE, Dumisa DLAMINI (Secretary General).

Swaziland Progressive Party (SPP). The SPP is an outgrowth of the former Swazi Progressive Association, founded in 1929.

Leader: J. J. NQUKU (President).

Swaziland United Front (SUF). The SUF was organized in 1962 as an offshoot of the SPP.

Leader: Matsapa SHONGWE.

Swaziland National Front (Swanafro). Swanafro is a small Manzini-based formation.

Leaders: Elmond SHONGWE (President), Glenrose DLAMINI (Secretary General).

Swaziland Solidarity Network (SSN). Based in South Africa and led by a South African, Solly Mapaila, the SSN is a “pressure group” that has been critical of the Swaziland regime’s alleged efforts to squelch prodemocracy activity. In October 1997 Mapaila, who was himself banned from the kingdom for allegedly fomenting unrest, accused the monarch of maintaining a list of ANC officials it sought to ban from entering the country. The SSN launched a campaign in 2000 calling for the international community to “isolate” Swaziland until political reforms are enacted. It renewed its calls for international action in 2005, citing the king’s reported extravagant spending while most of the population lives in extreme poverty.

Leader: Solly MAPAILA (Chair), Lucky Lukhele (Spokesperson).

Bombings in Mbabane in October and November 1998 were blamed on a militant group styled the “Black Tigers.” An underground grouping called the Makhundu Congress claimed responsibility for a December 2000 bombing of a police and army camp.

Legislature

On October 9, 1992, King Mswati dissolved the bicameral Parliament (Libandla) in preparation for new elections scheduled to follow the adoption of a new multiparty constitution in 1993. However, further deliberation on the draft charter was suspended, and the 1993 and 1998 elections were held on a nonparty basis.

Senate. The Senate is composed of 30 members, 20 chosen by the monarch plus 10 elected by the House of Assembly from within its own ranks. The current upper house was appointed in late October 2003.

President: Chief Gelani ZWANE.

House of Assembly. Enlarged by 15 seats since the 1992 elections, the assembly consists of 65 members, 55 popularly elected (1 for each district) in addition to 10 monarchical appointees. Approximately 250 candidates participated in the most recent lower house balloting, which commenced on September 20 and concluded on October 18, 2003.

Speaker: Charles Sgayoyo MAGONGO.

Communications

In October 1997 the government established the Swaziland Media Council, a seven-member regulatory body.

Press

The following are published in Mbabane in English: Times of Swaziland (18,000), independent daily; Swaziland Observer (11,000), independent daily; The Swazi News (7,000), independent weekly. Publication of the Swaziland Observer was suspended from February 2000–January 2001 due to pressure from the government. In May 2001 the government banned two independent publications (The Guardian of Swaziland newspaper, and a weekly magazine, The Nation) for “operating illegally.”

Broadcasting and Computing

The nation's radio sets receive commercial programs from the government-controlled Swaziland Broadcasting and Information Service and the privately owned Swaziland Commercial Radio, in addition to religious programs from Trans World Radio. The state-owned Swaziland Television Broadcasting Corporation (STBC) transmits to about 130,000 receivers. There were 30,000 personal computers serving 27,000 Internet users in 2003.

Intergovernmental Representation

Ambassador to the U.S.

Ephraim Mandlenkosi HLOPHE

U.S. Ambassador to Swaziland

Lewis W. LUCKE

Permanent Representative to the UN

Phesheya Mbongeni DLAMINI

IGO Memberships (Non-UN)

AfDB, AU, BADEA, Comesa, CWTH, Interpol, NAM, PCA, SADC, WCO, WTO

TANZANIA

UNITED REPUBLIC OF TANZANIA

Jamhuri ya Muungano wa Tanzania

---

The Country

The United Republic of Tanzania combines the large territory of Tanganyika on the East African mainland and the two islands of Zanzibar and Pemba off the East African coast. Tanzania's people are overwhelmingly of African (primarily Bantu) stock, but there are significant Asian (largely Indian and Pakistani), European, and Arab minorities. In addition to the indigenous tribal languages, Swahili (Kiunguja is the Zanzibari form) serves as a lingua franca, while English and Arabic are also spoken. A majority of the population (over 60 percent on the mainland and over 90 percent on Zanzibar) is Muslim, the remainder adhering to Christianity or traditional religious beliefs. Women are estimated to comprise nearly 50 percent of the labor force, with responsibility for over 70 percent of subsistence activities; Tanzanian women have a relatively high level of literacy and are represented in most levels of government and party affairs.

The economy is primarily agricultural, benefiting from few extractive resources except diamonds. The most important crops on the mainland are coffee, cotton, and sisal, which collectively account for approximately two-fifths of the country's exports. The economies of Zanzibar and Pemba are based on cloves and coconut products. Industry, which accounts for about 15 percent of the gross domestic product, is primarily limited to the processing of agricultural products and the production of nondurable consumer goods, although there is an oil refinery that is dependent on imported crude. Modernization plans were enhanced by the completion in mid-1976, with Chinese financial and technical assistance, of the Tanzania-Zambia Railway (Tazara), which links Dar es Salaam and the Zambian copper belt; however, chronic maintenance and management problems have limited Tazara's effectiveness in resolving bottlenecks in the transport sector.

Since 1979 the country has encountered serious economic difficulty, exacerbated by a decline in cash-crop output and rapid population growth. Assistance from the International Monetary Fund (IMF) was suspended in 1982, necessitating severe budget cutbacks. Four years later, faced with an external debt crisis, the government acceded to IMF demands for devaluation of the Tanzanian shilling, price increases for food producers, and Political Status: Independent member of the Commonwealth; established in its present form April 26, 1964, through union of the Republic of Tanganyika (independent 1961) and the People's Republic of Zanzibar (independent 1963); one-party constitution adopted April 25, 1977; multiparty system legalized June 17, 1992.

Area: 364,898 sq. mi. (945,087 sq. km.), encompassing Tanganyika, 363,948 sq. mi. (942,626 sq. km.) and Zanzibar 950 sq. mi. (2,461 sq. km.), the latter including Pemba (350 sq. mi., 906 sq. km.).

Population: 34,569,232 (2002C); 35,426,000 (2005E).

Major Urban Centers (2005E): DAR ES SALAAM (2,692,000), Mwanza (219,000), Zanzibar (town, 217,000), Tanga (190,000), Dodoma (169,000). The deadline for the transfer of government operations to a new capital in Dodoma has been extended numerous times. Although the National Assembly now sits in Dodoma, it remains uncertain when, or even if, full governmental relocation will occur.

Official Languages: English, Swahili.

Monetary Unit: Shilling (official rate July 1, 2006: 1,255 shillings = $1US).

President: Jakaya KIKWETE (Revolutionary Party of Tanzania); elected on December 14, 2005, and sworn in for a five-year term on December 21 to succeed Benjamin William MKAPA (Revolutionary Party of Tanzania).

Vice President: Ali Mohamed SHEIN (Revolutionary Party of Tanzania); nominated by the president on July 13, 2001, and sworn in on the same day following confirmation by the National Assembly to succeed Omar Ali JUMA (Revolutionary Party of Tanzania), who had died on July 4; reelected concurrently with the president on December 14, 2005, and sworn in on December 21.

Prime Minister: Edward LOWASSA (Revolutionary Party of Tanzania); appointed by the president on December 29, 2005, following the general elections of December 14, and confirmed by the National Assembly and sworn in on December 30, 2005, in succession to Frederick Tluway SUMAYE (Revolutionary Party of Tanzania).

President of Zanzibar: Amani Abeid KARUME (Revolutionary Party of Tanzania); elected October 29, 2000 (with a partial rerun on November 5), and sworn in for a five-year term on November 8 to succeed Dr. Salmin AMOUR Jima (Revolutionary Party of Tanzania); reelected on October 30, 2005, and sworn in for a second five-year term on November 2.

liberalization of export-import regulations. Additional economic reforms were pledged during 1991 negotiations with the IMF, which had expressed concern over the slow pace of privatization of state-run enterprises and apparent widespread corruption in the government bureaucracy.

In early 1993 the IMF released an analysis of Tanzanian economic reform efforts during 1986–1992, which noted progress in the previous two years but urged the government to increase its efforts in four areas: liberalizing agricultural markets and prices, privatizing parastatals and state-run industries, controlling inflation, and reducing the money supply. More overt criticism resulted from a December 1994 informal meeting of Tanzanian fund donors in Paris that focused on financial mismanagement, including the government's poor record in customs collection and its frequent issuance of tax exemptions. However, in November 1996 the IMF approved a $234 million three-year credit to assist the economic reforms endorsed by the new Mkapa administration. Thereafter, gains were reported in the mining, agriculture, and tourism sectors. On the other hand, observers described the overall standard of living as dismal, citing drought-induced famine and an economy burdened by large debt-service payments. In April 2000 the IMF and World Bank agreed to support a comprehensive debt relief package for Tanzania, encouraged by reduction in the size of the public sector and greater influence of the free market.

GDP growth averaged about 6 percent annually in the early 2000s, based on expansion in the manufacturing, mining, and construction sectors. GDP growth was 6.3 percent in 2004 and 6.8 percent in 2005, while inflation was 4 percent in 2004 but rose to 6.9 percent in 2005. Poverty levels consequently declined, although drought in 2004 caused severe food shortages that required substantial international assistance. The IMF provided grants and loans under the Fund's Poverty Reduction and Growth Facility (PRGF) initiative. In 2006, Tanzania was one of 17 countries approved for additional debt relief through the World Bank's Heavily Indebted Poor Country (HIPC) initiative.

Government and Politics

Political Background

The former British-ruled territories of Tanganyika and Zanzibar developed along separate lines until their union in 1964. Tanganyika, occupied by Germany in 1884, became a British-administered mandate under the League of Nations and continued under British administration as a United Nations trust territory after World War II. Led by Julius K. NYERERE of the Tanganyika African National Union (TANU), it became independent within the Commonwealth in 1961 and adopted a republican form of government with Nyerere as president in 1962.

Zanzibar and Pemba, British protectorates since 1890, became independent in 1963 as a constitutional monarchy within the Commonwealth. However, little more than a month after independence, the Arab-dominated government of Sultan Seyyid Jamshid bin Abdullah bin KHALIFA was overthrown by African nationalists, who established a People's Republic with Sheikh Abeid Amani KARUME of the Afro-Shirazi Party (ASP) as president.

Following overtures by Nyerere, the two countries combined on April 26, 1964, to form the United Republic of Tanganyika and Zanzibar, renamed the United Republic of Tanzania later in the same year. Nyerere became president of the unified state, and in September 1965 he was overwhelmingly confirmed in that position by popular vote in both sections of the country. Karume, in addition to becoming first vice president of Tanzania, continued to head the quasi-independent Zanzibar administration until April 1972, when he was assassinated. Nyerere thereupon appointed Aboud JUMBE to succeed Karume as first vice president and as leader of the ASP.

On February 5, 1977, TANU and the ASP merged to form the Revolutionary Party of Tanzania (CCM); subsequently, a new constitution was adopted on April 25, according to the CCM a "dominant" role in the Tanzanian governmental system. On November 5, 1980, Prime Minister Edward SOKOINE announced his retirement for reasons of health, and two days later the president named Cleopa David MSUYA as Sokoine's successor. Sokoine returned as prime minister on February 24, 1983, but was killed in an automobile accident on April 12, 1984; he was succeeded 12 days later by Salim Ahmed SALIM. Earlier, on January 27, Vice President Jumbe had submitted his resignation in the wake of mounting secessionist agitation on Zanzibar, Ali Hassan MWINYI having been named his replacement on January 30.

Carrying out a pledge made in early 1984 to step down as head of state upon the expiration of his existing term, Nyerere withdrew from contention at the 1985 CCM congress in favor of Vice President Mwinyi, who was overwhelmingly nominated as the sole candidate for the October presidential balloting. Because of a constitutional prohibition against Zanzibaris occupying both presidential and prime ministerial offices, Prime Minister Salim was replaced following the October 27 poll by Justice Minister Joseph S. WARIOBA, who also assumed the post of first vice president; concurrently, Idris Abdul WAKIL, who had been elected president of Zanzibar on October 13, became second vice president, while Salim was named deputy prime minister and minister of defense.

Mwinyi's elevation to the presidency and his encouragement of private enterprise appeared to stem secessionist sentiment on Zanzibar. However, discord attributed to a variety of economic, religious, and political motives broke out again in late 1987. An apparent power struggle developed between Wakil and supporters of Chief Minister Seif Sharif HAMAD, a leader from the northern island of Pemba (where 90 percent of the islands' cloves are produced), after Hamad was dropped from the CCM Central Committee. On January 23, 1988, Wakil, claiming that dissidents were plotting a coup, suspended the Zanzibari government; three days later he announced a new administration in which Hamad was replaced by Omar Ali JUMA. In May Hamad and six of his supporters were expelled from the CCM for alleged "antiparty" activity. Observers reported a continued "undercurrent of rebellion" on the islands, however, and Hamad was arrested in May 1989 on charges of organizing illegal meetings, the government also accusing his supporters of forming a political group, Bismallah ("In the name of God"), dedicated to "breaking the union."

Mwinyi continued to consolidate his authority during 1990; in March he ousted hard-line socialist cabinet members who opposed his economic policies, and, following Nyerere's retirement on August 17, he was elected CCM chair. On October 28 the president won reelection for a second five-year term, and on November 8 he named John S. MALECELA first vice president and prime minister, replacing Warioba. Meanwhile, on October 21 Salmin AMOUR had been elected president of Zanzibar and second vice president of the republic after Wakil had declined to seek reelection to the posts.

On June 17, 1992, President Mwinyi signed a bill legalizing opposition parties. The legislation had been approved by the National Assembly on May 7 and by the Zanzibar House of Representatives on May 14, following endorsement by the CCM in February. On July 1 the CCM became the first group to be officially registered under the new law, and by the end of August, 12 of the reportedly 35 parties that had requested application forms had been granted provisional registration.

In late 1992 the government released a tentative multiparty electoral schedule, beginning with municipal and local balloting in 1993 and concluding with national elections in 1994–1995. Subsequently, the Civic United Front (CUF), a prominent opposition grouping, and four smaller parties threatened to boycott the polling, saying that the delays favored the CCM and calling instead for the convening of a constitutional conference before any elections were held.

In February 1993, Zanzibari membership in the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC) was categorized as "unconstitutional" and "separatist" by a Tanzanian parliamentary commission. (The membership was reportedly withdrawn in August 1993, although uncertainty on the question continued into 2000 [see Membership in OIC article].) The affair highlighted continued debate within the government over the two regions' respective roles, as well as a growing schism between Christians and Muslims, which was further evidenced by the anti-Muslim rhetoric of the increasingly popular Democratic Party leader, Rev. Christopher MTIKILA, and the militant activities of the Council for the Dissemination of the Koran in Tanzania (Balukta) (see under Political Parties, below).

In April 1993, at the first balloting since the introduction of multipartyism, the CCM, aided by a CUF boycott, easily won two Zanzibari municipal by-elections. However, fiscal problems, coupled with the Muslim fundamentalist issue, continued to bedevil the ruling party. By late 1994, with less than a year remaining before the next presidential poll, its leadership had fallen into disarray, with former president Nyerere criticizing President Mwinyi as a political weakling and attacking Prime Minister Malecela and CCM Secretary General Horace KOLIMBA as "hooligans" who should resign their positions. The immediate upshot was an extraordinary event: a total ministerial boycott of a cabinet meeting called by the president. Mwinyi responded on December 4 by dissolving the National Assembly, and on December 5 he named a new government headed by former prime minister Cleopa Msuya. Meanwhile, the assembly, two days before the dissolution, had approved a constitutional amendment that created a furor on Zanzibar by specifying that henceforth the island president would no longer become a union vice president unless specifically elected as the president's running mate.

In preparation for the first nationwide multiparty elections, the CCM in July 1995 elected Minister of Science Benjamin William MKAPA as its presidential nominee, President Mwinyi being ineligible for a third term. The balloting of October 29 featured more than 1,300 legislative candidates, with nine opposition parties announcing that they would form a postelectoral coalition if it would give them a parliamentary majority. However, in results that were hotly disputed, Mkapapa was credited with winning 61.8 percent of the valid presidential votes, while the CCM garnered 186 of 232 elective assembly seats. Earlier, in even more contentious Zanzibari balloting on October 22, the National Electoral Commission (NEC) had announced that President Amour had been reelected on a 52 percent vote share, with the CCM having been awarded 26 of 50 elective seats in the Zanzibar House of Representatives. Mkapapa subsequently named former agriculture minister Frederick Tulway SUMAYE to head a new cabinet, which contained a majority of relatively young newcomers and excluded nearly all former ministers who had been tinged by charges of corruption.

Of 13 opposition parties that contested the 1995 election, only 4 obtained legislative representation. Their disappointing capture of only 24 percent of the seats on a near 40 percent share of the vote was attributed by many to the majority electoral system and by some to widespread electoral fraud, particularly in the Zanzibari balloting, in which the opposition's Seif Hamad was widely believed to have attracted more than the 48 percent vote share officially credited to him in the presidential poll.

Mkapapa's economic and political reform efforts in 1996 drew broad praise. Such advances were overshadowed, however, by the political stalemate in Zanzibar where the CUF continued to boycott the legislature in protest over the CCM's alleged rigging of the 1995 elections. In addition, the government's anticorruption campaign was tarnished by the resignation of several ministers in late 1996 and early 1997 following bribery and abuse of power investigations, which also prompted a cabinet reshuffle in February 1997.

In January 1998 Commonwealth mediators introduced a seven-point plan to ease the tension in Zanzibar. However, both sides rejected the accord, with President Amour of Zanzibar asserting that there was no crisis. In March the Commonwealth released another proposal that was subsequently reported to have been positively received by the CCM and CUF negotiators. The government continued its crackdown on alleged CUF militants in early 1999, but an agreement was finally signed by the CCM and the CUF providing for the return of the CUF to the National Assembly, the award of two additional assembly seats to the CUF, and the creation of an independent electoral commission to oversee the elections scheduled for October 2000. Each side subsequently charged the other with foot-dragging in implementing some provisions of the accord, and tension remained substantial on the island, exacerbated by the death in October 1999 of former president Nyerere, whose considerable domestic and international prestige and influence had been credited with holding the shaky union together despite significant opposition on both the mainland and the islands. Attention in early 2000 focused on the attempt by Zanzibari President Amour to have the constitution amended to permit him to run for a third term. After reportedly "tumultuous" debate, the CCM rejected the appeal from Amour, who had been widely criticized on Zanzibar for hard-line tactics including the arrest of prominent CUF members on treason charges (see CUF under Political Parties, below).

Balloting for the National Assembly and Zanzibar's House of Representatives as well as for the presidencies of Tanzania and Zanzibar was held on October 29, 2000. However, reruns were required in 16 island constituencies on November 5 because of ballot problems in the initial poll. (The CUF and many other opposition parties boycotted the reruns, arguing that new voting should have been ordered in all island constituencies.) Final results showed President Mkapapa easily securing a second five-year term with 71.7 percent of the vote against three rivals. In addition, the CCM maintained its stranglehold on the assembly and a comfortable majority in the House of Representatives.

Meanwhile, the CCM's Amani Abeid Karume, the son of the first president of independent Zanzibar, was declared winner of the Zanzibari presidential poll with 67 percent of the vote. On November 23, President Mkapa reappointed Prime Minister Sumaye to head a significantly reshuffled CCM cabinet.

On October 27, the vice presidential candidate of the Party for Democracy and Progress (Chadema) party unexpectedly died and consequently, the NEC postponed presidential and legislative balloting on the mainland until December 14 but allowed balloting for offices in Zanzibar to go forward. The Zanzibari elections were marked by flaws and violence, which required a new round of voting in approximately one-third of the districts (see Current issues). Incumbent President Karume was reelected, and the CCM retained its majority in the Zanzibari legislature. Opposition parties decried the balloting and challenged the results.

The CCM candidate, Foreign Minister Jakaya MIKWETE, easily won the 2005 presidential election in Tanzania with more than 80 percent of the vote. In addition, the CCM increased its majority in the National Assembly. Edward LOWASSA was appointed prime minister on December 29, and a CCM cabinet was approved by the assembly on January 6, 2006.

Constitution and Government

An "interim" document of 1965 was replaced on April 25, 1977, by a "permanent" constitution, although the system of government was essentially unaltered. A number of amendments were adopted prior to the 1985 election; significantly, however, Tanzania remained a one-party state, with controlling influence exercised by the CCM at both national and regional levels. Legislation authorizing multiparty activity was approved in 1992 (see Political background, above).

The president is elected by universal suffrage for no more than two five-year terms. Since 1995 the vice president has also been elected as part of a national president/vice president ticket. (Previously, Tanzania had two vice presidents: the president of Zanzibar [who served as first vice president if the president was from the mainland] and a presidentially appointed prime minister. The December 1994 constitutional amendment ending the automatic designation of the Zanzibar president as one of the two vice presidents left the insular region without mandated representation at the national executive level.) The prime minister is currently appointed by the president subject to confirmation by the National Assembly. Cabinet ministers are also appointed by the president.

The National Assembly, more than four-fifths of whose members are at present directly elected, sits for a five-year term, subject to presidential dissolution (in which case the president himself must stand for reelection). The judicial system on the mainland is headed by a High Court and includes local and district courts. In August 1979 a Tanzanian Court of Appeal was established to assume, inter alia, the functions of the East African Court of Appeal, which had ceased to exist with the collapse of the East African Community in 1977. All judges are appointed by the president.

Tanzania's 25 administrative regions (20 on the mainland, 5 on Zanzibar) are each headed by a regional commissioner appointed by the central government. Below the regional level there are municipalities, town councils, and, in rural locations, area or district councils.

On October 13, 1979, a new constitution for Zanzibar was promulgated by its Revolutionary Council after having been approved by the CCM. Under the new system, designed to provide for "more democracy" without contravening the union constitution of Tanzania, the president of Zanzibar is directly elected for a five-year term and held to a maximum of two successive terms. There is also a largely elected House of Representatives endowed with the legislative authority previously exercised by the Revolutionary Council. The latter, however, has been retained as a "high executive council" of cabinet status, with members appointed by the president.

In 2000 the Thirteenth Amendment was ratified by a two-thirds majority in the National Assembly. The measure expanded presidential prerogatives to include the appointment of ten members to the National Assembly and permitted election of the president by a plurality instead of a majority of voters. The amendment also increased the percentage of seats reserved for women from 15 percent to 20 percent. In February 2005 the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified by the assembly. The measure had a number of provisions, including a section that allowed the prime minister to act as president in the absence of the president and vice president. It also loosened the rules surrounding electoral campaigning.

Foreign Relations

Tanzania belongs to the United Nations and most of its Specialized Agencies, the Commonwealth, and the African Union. In addition, it participated with Kenya and Uganda in the East African Community (EAC) until the organization was dissolved in mid-1977. Under President Nyerere's leadership, Tanzania pursued a policy of international nonalignment and of vigorous opposition to colonialism and racial discrimination, particularly in southern Africa, maintaining no relations with Pretoria and strongly supporting the effort of the Front-Line States to avoid South African trade routes. In addition, declaring South African destabilization efforts in nearby states to be a direct threat to Tanzania, the government in 1987 sent troops to Mozambique to assist Maputo in the fight against Renamo rebels. (The troops were withdrawn in December 1988, in part, reportedly, because of the cost of their maintenance.) Tanzania also gave asylum to political refugees from African countries, and various liberation groups were headquartered in Dar es Salaam.

Relations with Britain were severed from 1965 to 1968 to protest London's Rhodesian policy. Relations with the United States have been strained at times by Tanzanian disagreement with U.S. policies on Africa and, until Washington's rapprochement with Peking, by U.S. uneasiness over Tanzanian acceptance of military and economic aid from China.

Long-standing friction with Uganda escalated into overt military conflict in late 1978 (see article on Uganda). After a six-month campaign that involved the deployment of some 40,000 Tanzanian troops, the forces of Ugandan president Idi Amin were decisively defeated, Amin fleeing to Libya. Subsequently, under an agreement signed with the government of Godfrey Binaisa, approximately 20,000 Tanzanians remained in the country to man security points pending the training of a new Ugandan army. During 1980 Kenya and Sudan were among the regional states expressing concern over the continuing presence in Uganda of the Tanzanian troops, the last of which were finally withdrawn in May–June 1981.

Relations with Kenya improved measurably upon the conclusion of a November 1983 accord among the two and Uganda on the distribution of EAC assets and liabilities. The border between Tanzania and Kenya, originally closed in 1977 to "punish" Kenya for allegedly dominating Tanzania's economy, was reopened, and the two countries reached agreement on a series of technical cooperation issues. Rapprochement was further enhanced in December, when the three former EAC members exchanged high commissioners in an effort "to facilitate expansion and consolidation in economic matters." (See Foreign relations in article on Kenya for information regarding the recent reactivation of the EAC.)

In September 1995 Prime Minister Msuya appealed to the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) to aid in the repatriation of more than 800,000 Burundian and Rwandan refugees living in border area camps. In January 1996 the Tanzanian Army turned back an estimated 17,000 Rwandan Hutu refugees fleeing violence in Burundi; however, three days later the government reversed itself and reopened its border. In February relations between Tanzania and Burundi were enhanced by an agreement on border security and refugee repatriation; however, in March, as fighting in Burundi spilled over Tanzania's border, Dar es Salaam rejected the appointment of a Burundian ambassador for the second time, asserting that it was "not siding with either" of the combatants in its neighbor's burgeoning civil war.

Conditions deteriorated significantly toward the end of 1996 when large numbers of Hutu refugees crossed Burundi from Zaire (where Tutsis had destroyed Hutu camps and assumed control of the eastern part of the country) into Tanzania. Burundi's President Buyoya accused Tanzania of supporting Hutu "rebels" and criticized former Tanzanian president Nyerere for spearheading the regional economic sanctions against Burundi. A number of cross-border skirmishes, substantial troop build-up on both sides, and diplomatic posturing were reported throughout 1997, and in February 1998 regional leaders, including President Mpaka, agreed to maintain the sanctions they had first imposed on Burundi in 1996. However, in early 1999 Dar es Salaam lifted its sanctions and announced that it was reestablishing diplomatic relations with Bujumbura. Subsequently, in March, Tanzania ordered the 20,000 Rwandan refugees remaining within its borders to return home, describing security conditions there as safe. However, tension continued into 2000 because of the presence in Tanzania of Rwandan and (especially) Burundian refugees and guerrillas. For example, Tanzanian security forces "arrested" over 160 Burundian Hutu "militiamen" in early 2000.

By the end of 2002, the UN estimated that there were 540,000 Burundian refugees in Tanzania. However, in light of the normalization of relations between the two countries, the governments subsequently launched a broad effort to repatriate the refugees. Additional border crossings were opened, and by the end of 2003 there were 324,000 refugees left. Meanwhile, by February 2004 Tanzania had returned all identifiable Rwandan refugees; according to UN estimates, 20,000 remained in Tanzania illegally.

Earlier, on August 7, 1998, 11 Tanzanians had been killed in Dar es Salaam when alleged militant Islamic fundamentalists set off simultaneous bomb blasts at U.S. embassies in Tanzania and Kenya. (For further details see article on Kenya.)

The European Union (EU) provided $1.9 million in aid to support the 2001 peace accord between the government and the CUF and $14.82 million to assist Burundian refugees. Collaterally, relations between Tanzania and the United Kingdom have remained strong. The UK agreed in 2003 to provide assistance for Tanzania's refugee repatriation efforts, and in 2005 the UK announced that Tanzania would be the first African country to benefit from an initiative to write off the debt of poorer countries. Later in 2005, however, a diplomatic row occurred between the two countries when Tanzania unilaterally ended a $143.5 million water privatization project funded jointly by Britain and the World Bank. The Tanzanian government charged that the foreign companies involved in the project were not fulfilling their obligations. In 2006, the United States granted Tanzania $11 million for an anti-corruption campaign and included the country among six other African states to receive funding from a $1.2 billion initiative to suppress malaria. The United States recently increased its security assistance to Tanzania for counterterrorism efforts.

Current Issues

A key factor in President Mkapa's successful reelection bid in late 2000 was the fractured nature of the opposition, which was unable to agree on a single candidate to challenge him. International observers were generally satisfied with the conduct of the presidential and legislative balloting on the mainland but strongly criticized the situation on the islands. Commonwealth officials described the Zanzibar polls as a "shambles" resulting from "either massive incompetence or a deliberate attempt to wreck at least part of this election." Despite appeals to rerun the voting throughout the islands, the government agreed to new voting in only 16 of 50 constituencies there, leading the CUF and many of the other opposition parties to boycott that round and refuse to accept the final official results of the national and Zanzibari elections as legitimate.

Reflecting widespread anger over the perceived biased nature of the election administration, the CUF in late January 2001 organized demonstrations in Zanzibar and mainland Tanzania, demanding new elections. The government banned the demonstrations and proceeded to disperse the protesters. At least 40 people were killed by police on Pemba under highly questionable circumstances, while some detainees were allegedly subjected to torture and other ill-treatment.

After protracted negotiations, on October 10, 2001, the CCM signed an agreement with the CUF to end the political impasse that had followed the January violence. The accord addressed a number of human rights issues and called for establishment of an independent commission of inquiry into the unrest and provision of compensation to those affected. A Zanzibar court subsequently freed two senior opposition party officials after the state dropped murder charges against them.

In April 2002 the Zanzibari House of Representatives approved constitutional amendments designed to codify several of the changes approved in October 2001. Among other things, the reforms called for restructuring of the electoral commission to include opposition representation. Also envisioned were the establishment of permanent voter lists and reform of the judiciary. In 2004 the Revolutionary Council on Zanzibar announced plans for a new flag, national anthem, and identity cards for the island.

Politics on Zanzibar were subsequently reported to be increasingly influenced by Islamic activism, in part by supporters of the Union for Awakening and Islamic Forums (Uamsho), which organized several antigovernment demonstrations that led to the arrest of some top opposition leaders. There was widespread violence prior to the October 2005 elections; government and opposition groups were accused of attacks. The government reportedly launched a series of raids on the headquarters of opposition parties and arrested a number of opposition leaders. Subsequent rioting left some 14 people dead, and the administration suspended registration of new parties. Meanwhile, in April 2005, CCM offices were bombed on Zanzibar, and a party official was murdered in a separate incident. Police subsequently arrested four activists in connection with the bombing. After the polling in Zanzibar, CUF members and supporters rioted to protest the results, and security forces used tear gas and force to disperse the protesters. Opposition groups complained that the CCM sponsored groups of youths (dubbed Janjaweed after the Sudanese militias) who intimidated voters, and that voters in some districts were either turned away from polling stations or had their ballots destroyed. International observers noted some irregularities but described the voting as generally free and fair. Polling on the mainland was not marred by violence, according to international monitors.

A long-term drought continued to affect Tanzania in 2006. In April the government ordered farmers and ranchers to stop encroaching on game preserves and national parks by June. The drought reduced the country's hydroelectric output and caused mandatory blackouts in some areas of the country.

Political Parties

Constitutional amendments in 1992 allowed the formation of political parties other than the CCM. The first multiparty elections were held in 1995. Nonetheless, the CCM has continued to dominate the legislature and the presidency. In February 2003 opposition parties formed an electoral coalition to oppose the CCM in presidential and legislative balloting in October 2005. The coalition chose Bob Nyanga MAKANI of the Party for Democracy and Progress (Chama Cha Demokrasia na Maendeleo—Chadema) as its chair. Besides Chadema, the coalition included the Civic United Front (CUF), the United Democratic Party (UDP), the National Convention for Constitution and Reform—Maguezi (NCCR—Maguezi), the Tanzania Democratic Alliance Party (Tadea), the National Reconstruction Alliance (NRA), the Democratic Party (Chama Cha Demokrasi—CCD), the National League for Democracy (NLD), the United People's Democratic Party (UPDP), and the Forum for Restoration of Democracy (FORD). The only major opposition parties that did not join the alliance were the Tanzania Labor Party (TLP) and the Justice and Development Party (Chama cha Haki na Usitawi Chausta). The alliance failed to present a unified candidate list for the 2005 legislative balloting and could not unite behind a single candidate in the mainland presidential polling.

Some parties supported the CUF candidate, while a group of four parties rallied behind the NCCR-Maguezi candidate.

Government Party

Revolutionary Party of Tanzania (Chama Cha Mapinduzi—CCM). The CCM was formally launched on February 5, 1977, two weeks after a merger was authorized by a joint conference of the Tanganyika African National Union (TANU) and the Afro-Shirazi Party (ASP) of Zanzibar. During the January conference, President Nyerere had asserted that the new organization would be “supreme” over the governments of both mainland Tanzania and Zanzibar. Subsequently, a National Executive Committee (NEC) was named by a process of hierarchical (indirect) election, with the NEC, in turn, appointing a smaller Central Committee, headed by President Nyerere.

Founded in 1954, TANU had been instrumental in winning Tanganyika’s independence from Britain in 1961. It served after independence as the nation’s leading policymaking forum, nominating the president and candidates for election to the National Assembly. Its program, as set forth in the 1967 Arusha Declaration and other pronouncements, called for the development of a democratic, socialist, one-party state.

The ASP, organized in 1956–1957 by Sheikh Abeid Amani Karume, had played a minor role in Zanzibari politics until the coup of 1964. Subsequently, it became the dominant party in Zanzibar and the leading force in the Zanzibar Revolutionary Council. Communist and Cuban models influenced its explicitly socialist program.

During the CCM’s national conference in 1982, delegates approved a series of proposals advanced by the NEC to reestablish a separation of powers between party and state, particularly at the regional and local levels. Delegates to an extraordinary national party conference in February 1992 unanimously endorsed the introduction of a multiparty system. At the party’s fourth national conference, held in Dodoma on December 17–20, Ali Hassan Mwinyi, who had succeeded Nyerere as state president and party chair in 1985 and 1990, respectively, was reelected chair. In addition, delegates elected (then) Prime Minister Malecela and Dr. Salmin Amour, a Zanzibari, as vice chairmen.

During the first half of 1993 acrimonious debate between the party’s mainland and island factions over the selection process for the vice presidency and military leadership led to the cancellation of two CCM meetings. Furthermore, the party experienced rifts over how to respond to Christopher MTIKILA, the (then) prominent leader of the CCD (below).

In July 1995 Benjamin William Mkapa, then minister of science, education, and technology, defeated two opponents in intraparty balloting for designation as the CCM presidential nominee, and he was subsequently credited with a 61.8 percent vote share in the October–November general election. Underlining his commitment to a reform-minded agenda, Mpaka named only one senior CCM party official to his technocrat-dominated cabinet. Although observers praised the new president’s early initiatives, a split emerged within the party between Mpaka’s supporters and old guard members aligned with former first vice president and prime minister Malecela and former party secretary general Horace Kolimba.

At party balloting on June 22, 1996, Mpaka easily captured the party chairship and, bringing his reform efforts to bear on the CCM, began to replace “old guard” members with his supporters. In February 1997 Horace Kolimba publicly denounced the new team of CCM leaders for their lack of “vision” (a charge that was promptly seconded by the CCM’s Pius MSEKWA, speaker of the assembly). Furthermore, Kolimba accused the party of abandoning its “socialist” origins. The intraparty flap and public relations imbroglio arising from Kolimba’s statements quickly dissipated in March after Kolimba died of a heart attack while defending his position to party officials. At a party congress in 1997, Mkapa was reelected to the party’s top post by acclamation; meanwhile, Mkapa’s continued efforts to infuse fresh blood into the CCM resulted in the election of a number of new faces to top posts. On the other hand, John Malecela’s retention of the vice chairship was described by observers as a reminder of the continued influence (albeit waning), of the party's old guard.

In 1998 the CCM experienced further intraparty tension when, after minimal consultation, Mkapa appointed a three-member CCM team to meet with Commonwealth officials in charge of the negotiations to end the Zanzibar stalemate. Several powerful CCM leaders were subsequently reported to be considering forming a breakaway group in reaction to the CCM-CUF agreement of early 1999. However, as the October 2000 national elections approached, the CCM exhibited greater unity and discipline. A March 2000 special congress rejected an intense effort by controversial Zanzibar President Amour to have the constitution amended to permit him to run for a third term. The CCM also subsequently agreed to delay further consideration of proposed constitutional amendments that had been condemned by opposition groups on both the mainland and Zanzibar.

At a June 2000 CCM congress, President Mkapa was selected without opposition to run for a second term in the October poll. Concurrently, Amani Abeid Karume, a longtime member of the Zanzibari cabinet, was chosen as the CCM candidate for president of Zanzibar from among four candidates, including one supported by Amour. Karume was widely viewed as a strong candidate for the post based on his anticorruption image and the fact that he was the son of Abeid Amani Karume, the first president of independent Zanzibar.

Mkapa was reelected party chair at the 2002 CCM party convention. By April 2005, 11 CCM members had declared their intention to run to succeed Mkapa as president. At a party congress in May, Foreign Minister Jakaya Kikwete was chosen as the party's candidate for the mainland presidency. Kikwete subsequently won the national balloting and was sworn in as president in December 2005. Edward Lowassa, former water minister, was appointed prime minister and formed a CCM government. At a party congress in June 2006, Kikwete was elected party chair.

Leaders: Jakaya KIKWETE (President of the Republic and Chair of the Party), Benjamin William MKAPA (Former President of the Republic), John MALECELA (Vice Chair, Mainland), Ali Hassan MWINYI (Former President of the Republic), Ali Mohamed SHEIN (Vice President of the Republic), Edward LOWASSA (Prime Minister), Amani Abeid KARUME (President of Zanzibar and Vice Chair, Zanzibar), Samwel SITTA (Speaker of the National Assembly), Salim Ahmed SALIM (Member of the Executive Committee and Former Secretary General of the Organization of African Unity), Philip MANGULA (Secretary General).

Opposition Parties

Civic United Front (CUF). Also referenced as the People's Party (Chama Cha Wananchi—CCW), the CUF was founded in late 1991 by former NCCR-Maguzi leader James MAPALALA, a lawyer who had also been instrumental in the February 1990 establishment of the Civil and Legal Rights Movement. Mapalala was reportedly arrested following the creation of the CUF, which was then deemed to be an illegal formation.

As in the case of other opposition groups, the CUF has been wracked by internal dissent; party chair Mapalala went so far in 1994 as to institute court action against his deputy, Seif Sharif Hamad, and Secretary General Shaaban MLOO. Although Hamad was officially declared runner-up to Salmin Amour in Zanzibar's 1995 presidential race, many observers felt he was the actual victor. Labeling the Amour government "illegal," the CUF refused to assume its Zanzibar parliamentary seats and accused the government of falsely arresting its members. Thereafter, despite a ban on its activities, CUF-directed unrest spread, with observers attributing incidents of arson and harassment to the group.

The split between the CUF's mainland and island wings widened dramatically in early 1997 when the former passed a resolution recognizing Amour's Zanzibar government. Intraparty dissension continued to plague the CUF throughout the year, and, in December, 14 members were arrested for their alleged roles in a coup plot in Zanzibar. In early 1998 further arrests of CUF dissidents were reported.

In May 1998 Mapalala broke with the CUF, announcing that he had formed a new group, the Justice and Democracy Party (below). Meanwhile, at Commonwealth-brokered negotiations with the Amour administration, CUF islanders agreed to participate in legislative proceedings, abandoning the position that Amour had to be removed prior to the representatives being seated.

The trial of the 18 CUF members (including four members of the House of Representatives) arrested in 1997–1998 formally opened in February 1999, the charge against them having been upgraded to treason, which carried a mandatory death sentence upon conviction. Proceedings were subsequently postponed until January 2000, when another short session resulted in further delay until at least August. Meanwhile, domestic and international human rights groups criticized the prolonged imprisonment of the defendants, whom Amnesty International described as “prisoners of conscience,” and the apparent political nature of the charges.

At a general congress in early June 2000, Hamad was once again selected as the CUF candidate for president of Zanzibar in the balloting scheduled for October. The CUF candidate for president of Tanzania, Ibrahim Lipumba, finished second in the 2000 poll with 16.3 percent of the vote, while Hamad was credited with 33 percent of the vote in the controversial balloting for president of Zanzibar (see Current issues, above). Meanwhile, all of the 16 seats the CUF secured in the 2000 balloting for the Zanzibar House of Representatives came from CUF strongholds on Pemba. In the 2005 elections, Hamad was again the CUF’s candidate for the presidency of Zanzibar. Hamad was defeated in controversial balloting in which he received 46.07 percent of the vote. (Only 32,000 votes separated Hamad from the winning candidate.) In the legislative balloting in Zanzibar, the CUF increased its seats in the house to 19. Lipumba was also the CUF candidate for president of Tanzania in 2005, but he was again defeated, securing only 11.68 percent of the vote. The CUF remained the largest opposition party with 30 seats in the Tanzanian assembly.

Leaders: Seif Sharif HAMAD (1995, 2000, and 2005 candidate for President of Zanzibar, Secretary General), Ibrahim LIPUMBA (1995, 2000, and 2005 candidate for President of Tanzania and Chair of the Party).

Party for Democracy and Progress (Chama Cha Demokrasia na Maendeleo—Chadema). Chadema was launched in 1993 by former finance minister Edwin I. M. Mtei. It was awarded three elected assembly seats in 1995.

In 1997 Chadema stunned observers when it forwarded the controversial Rev. Christopher Mtikila as a candidate at a legislative by-election contest. (Described by Africa Confidential as a “fiery xenophobic evangelist,” Mtikila, theretofore leader of the CCD, below, has been a staunch critic of the mainland’s union with Zanzibar.)

Chadema supported the CUF candidate in the 2000 presidential poll; in concurrent legislative balloting the party improved its representation to four of the elected seats. The Chadema vice presidential candidate in the 2005 mainland elections died on October 27, 2005, causing a postponement of the balloting until December 14. The party’s presidential candidate, Freeman Mbowe, placed third with 5.9 percent of the vote. Chadema secured five of the elected seats in the legislative polls.

Leaders: Freeman MBOWE (2005 presidential candidate and Chair), Edwin I. M. MTEI (2000 presidential candidate), Willbroad SLAA (Secretary General).

Tanzania Labor Party (TLP). This small party’s profile grew significantly in 1999 when leading opposition figure Augustine Mrema and over 1000 of his followers joined after leaving the NCCR-Maguezi. Mrema won 7 percent of the vote in the 2000 presidential poll, while the TLP secured three of the elected seats in concurrent assembly elections. In mid-2001 the TLP was reportedly riven by factions devoted to Mrema and party founder Leo LWEKAMWA.

The TLP opposed the opposition coalition formed for the October 2005 election and decided to contest the balloting independently. Its candidate, Mrema, placed fourth with less than one percent of the vote. The TLP secured one seat in the assembly.

Leaders: Augustine MREMA (2000 and 2005 presidential candidate and Chair), Rajabu TAO.

United Democratic Party (UDP). The UDP's John Cheyo ran fourth in the 1995 presidential race, with a 3.94 percent vote share; in the assembly balloting the party ran fifth, winning three elective seats. In 1997 the UDP added a fifth seat when Cheyo scored an upset victory in a by-election contest expected to be won by a NCCR-Mageuzi candidate. Cheyo secured 4.2 percent of the vote in the 2000 presidential poll. The UDP was a member of the opposition electoral coalition in the 2005 balloting and supported the CUF candidate in the presidential election. The party secured one seat in the assembly.

Leaders: John CHEYO (1995 and 2000 presidential candidate and Chair), Teddy Kassela BANTU (Secretary General).

National Convention for Constitution and Reform–Mageuzi (NCCR-Mageuzi). The NCCR-Mageuzi was formed in the first half of 1991 as an outgrowth of the Steering Committee for a Transition Towards a Multiparty System, a broad-based organization comprising leading businessmen and lawyers as well as political dissidents and student activists. Its initial chair, Abdallah Said FUNDIKIRA, and vice-chair, James K. Mapalala, subsequently formed splinter organizations (below), although their successors vowed to keep the committee at the forefront of the “multiparty debate” and to push for its legalization. The party was again split in 1994 when Secretary General Prince Mahinja BAGENDA and several of his supporters withdrew to form the National Convention for Constitution and Reform–Asili (the Swahili word for “original”).

In April 1995 Augustine Lyatonga MREMA, who had been dismissed as minister of Labor and Youth Development in February for “indiscipline” and who withdrew from the CCM a month later, was selected as the NCCR-Mageuzi's standard-bearer for the presidential election in October. Mrema was credited with only 27.8 percent of the vote, while his party captured only 16 of 232 elective assembly seats.

Asserting that the current constitution unfairly hampered the opposition's electoral ambitions, the NCCR-Mageuzi announced in early 1997 that its top priority for the year would be to pressure the government into organizing a constitutional conference. However, in May the party's stated agenda was overshadowed when Mabere MARANDO, the NCCR-Mageuzi's secretary general, and Masumbuko LAMWAI, a NCCR-Mageuzi parliamentarian and former CCM member, attempted to oust Mrema, who had accused Marando of acting in complicity with the CCM. During the subsequent legal and political infighting, the Central Committee reportedly aligned behind Marando and his supporters and the National Executive Committee with Mrema. The reportedly irreconcilable nature of the split was underscored by the unwillingness of the two factions (styled the NCCR-Mrema and NCCR-Marando) to cooperate on by-election campaigns, thus, according to observers, costing the group winnable legislative seats. Furthermore, in October both factions sent representatives to an opposition summit.

After sustained legal and political infighting between the two camps, in April 1999 Mrema announced that he was leaving the NCCR-Mageuzi to join the TLP (see below). Lamwai subsequently rejoined the CCM. The NCCR-Mageuzi won only one elected seat in the 2000 legislative poll, while its proposed presidential candidate, Edith LUSINA, was precluded from running for failure to secure sufficient advance signatures of support.

In the 2005 presidential election, four parties, including the FORD, NRA, UMD, and the UPDP, agreed to support the NCCR-Mageuzi candidate, Sengondo Mvungi. The NCCR-Mageuzi failed to gain any seats in the assembly.

Leaders: James MBATIA (Chair), Sengondo MVUNGI (2005 presidential candidate), Hussein Mwaiseje POLISYA (Secretary General).

Other Parties Competing in the 2005 Election

Tanzania Democratic Alliance Party (Tadea). The previously London-based Tadea was founded by Oscar Salathiel KAMBONA, a former TANU secretary general and Nyerere cabinet member who went into voluntary exile in 1967 after government authorities alleged he had been involved in a coup plot. Kambona was also one of the founders of the Tanzania Democratic Front (TDF), formed in London by a number of exile opposition groups to promote the introduction of a multiparty system. Tadea was registered in Tanzania in 1993.

In 1996 the Tadea was buffeted by allegations that its officials had misused publicly funded campaign finances.

The party joined the opposition alliance to contest the 2005 elections and supported the CUF mainland presidential candidate.

Leaders: John D. LIFE-CHIPAKA (Chair), Charles Dotto LUBALA (Secretary General).

Union for Multiparty Democracy (UMD). The UMD was organized in late 1991 by Abdallah Said Fundikira, a well-known Tanzanian businessman, and others who had previously been involved in the NCCR. They proposed that a national conference be held to draft a new Tanzanian constitution that would permit multiparty activity. In addition, the UMD suggested that the union between the mainland and the islands of Zanzibar and Pemba be reevaluated. Following the formation of the UMD, Fundikira was arrested and released on bail after being charged with establishing an illegal organization. The UMD was nonetheless registered in 1993. The UMD supported the NCCR-Maguezi candidate in the 2005 presidential elections and failed to gain any seats in the assembly.

Leaders: Chief Abdallah Said FUNDIKIRA (President of the Party and 1995 candidate for President of the Republic), Stephen M. KIBUGA (Vice President), Hussein Hassan YAHAYA (Secretary General).

National Reconstruction Alliance (NRA). Former industries and trade minister Kigoma Ali MALIMA resigned from the CCM on July 16 to become the NRA's 1995 presidential candidate; however, he died unexpectedly on August 5. Following the elections, the party reportedly faced an audit of its campaign financing practices amid allegations that it had misused public funds.

The NRA joined the electoral coalition that supported the NCCR-Maguezi candidate in the 2005 elections.

Leaders: Rashid MTUTA (Chair), Maoud RATUU (Secretary General).

Forum for Restoration of Democracy (FORD). FORD was formed in April 2001 by CUF dissidents, led by Ramadhani MZEE, to oppose the CUF's bellicose stance versus the CCM. The FORD supported the NCCR-Maguezi candidate in the 2005 presidential balloting.

Leaders: Ramadhani MZEE (Chair), Natanga NYAGAWA (Secretary General).

Justice and Development Party (Chama cha Haki na Usitawi Chausta—Chausta). The Justice and Development Party was launched in Zanzibar in May 1998 by former CUF leader James Mapalala. According to Mapalala, the new party was founded on the principle of development of the "individual." The party was officially recognized in late 2001.

Leaders: James MAPALALA (Chair), Joseph MKOMAGU (Secretary General).

Democratic Party (Chama Cha Demokrasi—CCD). The CCD was formed in late 1991 in anticipation of the introduction of a multiparty system. The CCD is sometimes referred to as the DP. Soon thereafter, the party was thrust into the national limelight by the August 1992 conviction of its leader, Christopher Mtikila, on charges of illegal assembly. The High Court subsequently dismissed the charges against Mtikila, whose nationalistic rhetoric had made him increasingly popular. However, in January 1993, Mtikila was arrested on charges of having fomented sedition and rioting by a speech in which he had accused the government of having "sold [Tanzania] to Arabs and Gaba-cholics [Asians]," urged Indo-Pakistanis, Arabs, Somalians, and Zanzibaris to emigrate, and warned that blood would flow if the alleged favoritism to foreigners continued. He was rearrested a number of times thereafter on a variety of charges, including the leadership of illegal demonstrations.

In 1997 Mtikila ran as a Chadema candidate in a legislative by-election, thus casting uncertainty on the future of the CCD, which had been unable to secure official recognition because of its unwillingness to accept Zanzibar as a legitimate part of the country.

The CCD's candidate in the 2005 presidential election was Mtikila who placed sixth in the balloting.

Leaders: Christopher MTIKILA (2005 presidential candidate and Chair), Natanga NYAGAWA (Secretary General).

The other small parties that competed unsuccessfully in the 2005 assembly balloting were the National League for Democracy (NLD), led by Emmanuel J. E. MAKAIDI (Chair) and Michael E. A. MHINA (Secretary General); the Progressive Party of Tanzania (PPT-Maendeleo), formed in 2003 and led by 2005 presidential candidate Anna SENKORO and Peter Kuga MZIRAY (Chair); Jahazi Asilia, which received less than 1 percent of the vote in the 2005 balloting and is led by Abuu Juma AMOUR (Chair); and the Sauti Ya Umma (SAU), formed in 2005 and led by Paulo KYARA (2005 presidential candidate and Chair).

Other Parties and Groups

Zanzibar Organization. An offshoot of the former Zanzibar Nationalist Party, a predominantly Arab group that was influential prior to the 1964 union, the Zanzibar Organization reportedly supports full independence for Zanzibar, having recently been active within the growing Islamic fundamentalist movement on the island. Members of its leadership reportedly reside in several Gulf states.

Leader: Ali MOSHEN.

Other parties that were registered prior to the 2005 elections but did not participate in the balloting include the National Democratic Union (Nduta), the Tanzania Organization for Democracy and Development (Topodd), Solidarity of United Party (Supa), the Party for Liberation of Poor People (Chudewama), and the National Democratic Party for Rehabilitation (NDPR-Marejesho). The Tanzanian People's Congress (TPC) was registered in November 2004, but its status was revoked on May 7, 2005, after the National Electoral Commission ruled that the grouping had failed to complete required paperwork.

Banned Grouping

Council for the Dissemination of the Koran in Tanzania (Balukta). Balukta is a militant Islamic group that was proscribed by the government in early 1993 amid rumors that it was considering reorganization as a political party. In April approximately 40 members, including leaders Yahya Hussein and Kassim bin Jumma, were arrested on charges stemming from their involvement in a campaign to forcibly close butcher shops selling pork in Muslim districts. The action was depicted by the government as part of a larger destabilization campaign, which included attacks on alcohol distributors and the recruitment of approximately 500 youths for the group's military wing, the Islamic Army, in preparation for a Jihad (Holy War). In June 1993 charges against many of the Balukta members, including Sheikh Hussein, were dropped. Financial and military support for Balukta reportedly originates in Iran and is funneled through the Islamic Party of Kenya.

Leaders: Sheikh Yahya HUSSEIN, Sheikh Kassim bin JUMMA.

Legislature

The Tanzania National Assembly (Bunge), also referenced as the Union Parliament, has a five-year mandate, barring dissolution. The current assembly includes 232 members directly elected in single member constituencies (182 on the mainland and 50 on the islands). The constitution requires that women hold 20 percent of the assembly seats, an increase of 5 percent with the elections in 2000. Following every general election, parties in the assembly must nominate (according to the seats they hold) a number of women to fill any remaining seats of the 20 percent allotted them. The Zanzibar House of Representatives elects 5 of its members to the assembly, and the Tanzanian attorney general

Cabinet

As of July 1, 2006

President	Jakaya Kikwete
Vice President	Ali Mohamed Shein
President of Zanzibar	Amani Abeid Karume
Prime Minister	Edward Lowassa

Ministers of State in the President's Office

Good Governance	Philip Sang'ka Marmo
Political Affairs and Civil Societies	Kingunge Ngombale Mwiru
Public Service Management	Hawa Abdulrahman Ghasia

Ministers of State in the Vice President's Office

Environment	Mark James Mwandosya
Union Affairs	Dr. Hussein Ali Mwinyi

Ministers of State in the Prime Minister's Office

Parliamentary Affairs	Juma Jamaldin Akukweti
Regional Administration and Local Government	Mizengo Kayanza Peter Pinda

Ministers

Agriculture and Food Security	Joseph Mungai
Community Development, Women's Affairs, and Children	Sofia Simba [f]
Defense and National Service	Juma Kapuya
East African Cooperation	Andrew Chenge
Education and Vocational Training	Margareth Sitta [f]
Energy and Mineral Resources	Ibrahim Msabaha
Finance	Zakia Meghji [f]
Foreign Affairs and International Cooperation	Asha Rose Migiro [f]
Health and Welfare Development	David Mwakysusa
Home Affairs	John Zefania Chiligati
Industries and Trade	Nazir Karamagi
Information, Culture, and Sport	Mohammed Seif Khatibu
Infrastructure Development	Basil Mramba
Justice and Constitutional Affairs	Mary Nagu [f]
Labor, Youth Development, and Sports	Jumanne Maghembe
Lands, Housing, and Human Settlement	John Magufuli
Livestock Development	Shukuru Kawambwa
Natural Resources and Tourism	Anthony Diallo
Planning, Economy, and Empowerment	Juma Ngasongwa
Public Safety and Security	Harith Bakari Mwapachu
Science, Technology, and Higher Education	Peter Msola
Water	Stephen Masatu Wassira

[f] = female is entitled to a legislative seat. Another revision made in 2000 allows the president to appoint 10 members. At the most recent balloting of December 14, 2005, the Revolutionary Party of Tanzania (CCM) secured 206 of the directly elected seats; the Civic United Front (CUF), 19; the Party for Democracy and Progress (Chadema), 5; the United Democratic Party (UDP), 1; and the Tanzania Labor Party (TLP), 1. Following the election, the CCM was authorized to nominate an additional 58 women legislators; the CUF, 11; and Chadema, 6.

Speaker: Samwel SITTA.

The Zanzibar House of Representatives is a 75-member body encompassing 50 elected members, 5 regional commissioners, 10 presidential nominees, and 10 members representing women and selected organizations. At the balloting of October 30, 2005, the Revolutionary Party of Tanzania won 30 of the elected seats, and the Civic United Front won 19. (One election had to be rerun.)

Speaker: Pandu Amir KIFICHO.

Communications

Press

The Newspaper Ordinance of 1968 empowered the president to ban any newspaper if he considered such action to be in the “national interest,” while the Newspaper Act of 1976 declared that government approval was required for the creation of any new publications. Additionally, the Zanzibar House of Representatives in September 1988 approved the imprisonment of authors of articles deemed critical of the government. Although press restrictions were eased somewhat as the country implemented its multiparty system, four newspapers, according to 1996 reports, had been temporarily suspended by the government since 1993, with a number of others having been “warned.” The following papers are published in Dar es Salaam: Uhuru (100,000), CCM daily, published Sunday as Mzalendo (116,000), in Swahili; Mfanyakazi (70,000 Wednesday, 120,000 Saturday), in Swahili;

Daily News (50,000), formerly the East African Standard, government-owned daily, in English; The Guardian, independent, in English.

News Agencies

The principal domestic facility has been the government-operated Tanzanian News Agency (Shihata), established in 1976. However, according to reports in April 2000, the National Assembly had voted to abolish Shihata and transfer its responsibilities to the government’s information department (Maelezo). There is also a privately owned Press Service of Tanzania.

Broadcasting and Computing

The two government-owned radio stations are Radio Tanzania, which broadcasts in Swahili and English, and Radio Tanzania Zanzibar, which broadcasts in Swahili. The two stations operate transmitters on approximately 20 different frequencies. In November 1993 the archdiocese of Dar es Salaam launched Radio Tumaini (Hope) “to educate society on several social problems”; the privately owned Radio One also broadcasts from Dar es Salaam. There is a government-run, non-commercial television station on Zanzibar and a government-run and an independent station on the mainland. There were approximately 742,000 television receivers and 200,000 personal computers serving 250,000 Internet users in 2003.

Intergovernmental Representation

Ambassador to the U.S.

Andrew Mhando DARAJA

U.S. Ambassador to Tanzania

Michael RETZER

Permanent Representative to the UN

A. Augustine MAHIGA

IGO Memberships (Non-UN)

AfDB, AU, BADEA, Comesa, CWTB, EAC, EADB, Interpol, IOM, IOR-ARC, NAM, SADC, WCO, WTO

TOGO

REPUBLIC OF TOGO

République Togolaise

---

Note: President Faure Gnassingbé appointed a new prime minister, Yawovi Madji Agboyibo of the Action Committee for Renewal party (CAR), to form a new government in September 2006, in a first step toward forming a government of “national unity” as provided for in the “universal political agreement” that had emerged from negotiations among Togolese government and opposition political leaders in August. Prime Minister Agboyibo, who replaced Edem Kodjo of the Panafrican Patriotic Convergence party, appointed a new coalition cabinet on September 20, and announced that new legislative elections would be held in June 2007.

The Country

Wedged between Ghana and Benin on Africa’s Guinea Coast, the small Republic of Togo extends inland from a 31-mile coastline for a distance of 360 miles. Eighteen major tribal groups are located in its hilly, hot, and humid territory, the best known being the culturally dominant Ewe in the south, whose traditional homeland extends into Ghana; the Mina, another southern people; and the Kabiyé in the north, who staff most of the country’s small army. Although French has been accorded official status, most people use indigenous languages, with Ewe being predominant in the south and Twi in the north. About 75 percent of the population adheres to traditional religious beliefs; the remainder embrace Christianity (20 percent, mainly Roman Catholics) and Islam (5 percent). Somewhat more than half of adult women are in the work force, predominantly in the agricultural and trading sectors; however, there are few women in the government.

The economy depends primarily on subsistence agriculture, the three most important crops being cocoa, coffee, and cotton. Phosphate is the leading export, and oil refining, steel fabrication, and cement production are assuming increasing industrial importance. Smuggling has long been a source of contention with Ghana; as much as a third of Togo’s cocoa exports originates in the neighboring state and is smuggled into Togo in exchange for luxury items that are much cheaper than in other parts of Africa. Development in the 1980s focused largely on tourism, agriculture, and a new free port in Lomé. The World Bank and other international institutions, encouraged by the government's commitment to budget austerity and the privatization of some state-run enterprises, supported these and other efforts to recover from the fall of commodity prices on the world market. However, the economy came to a virtual standstill in 1991, declining sharply thereafter by 8.8 percent in 1992 and by an even more calamitous 13.5 percent in 1993. In addition, foreign aid donors, most notably France and the United States, halted aid payments to protest military and presidential obstruction of democratization efforts. In September 1994 France announced its intention to renew civil and military cooperation agreements, in addition to writing off part of Togo's debt, and in early 1995 the European Union (EU) activated its aid program after a three-year suspension; however, the United States was unwilling to follow suit, reportedly citing the "lack of guarantees for the ongoing democratic process." Togo adopted structural reforms proposed by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) in the mid-1990s, and GDP grew by an annual average of 6.9 percent in 1995–1997. However, GDP declined by about 1 percent in 1998, due to a bad crop harvest and a sharp increase in government spending prior to the disputed June presidential election. (The EU, which had financed much of that electoral process, subsequently suspended its aid payments after announcing it would not recognize President Eyadéma's reelection.) Meanwhile, the IMF urged the government to intensify its privatization efforts, adopt stricter banking regulations, and improve tax collection. GDP rose by 2.7 percent in 1999 but declined by 0.5 percent in 2000, the IMF attributing the economic deterioration, in part, to policy weaknesses, including the slow pace of reform in the public sector. GDP growth returned to 2.7 percent in 2001, with an inflation rate of 3.9 percent for the year.

GDP grew by 4.2 percent in 2002, 2.7 percent in 2003, and 3.0 percent in 2004, fueled by increased agricultural output and expanded phosphate production. Inflation was 3.4 percent in 2004. The government's fiscal status was also improved by better tax collection procedures. However, most international donors continued to withhold assistance due to the Eyadéma regime's poor human rights record and failure to implement democratic reform. In 2004, the EU resumed aid after Togo met 22 preconditions, and in September 2005, the IMF resumed aid to the country. In April 2006 the World Bank included Togo among 11 countries that qualified for debt relief under the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) initiative.

Government and Politics

Political Background

The present Republic of Togo is the eastern section of the former German Protectorate of Togoland, which became a League of Nations mandate after World War I and was divided into separate zones of British and French administration. After World War II France and Britain continued to administer the eastern and western sections, respectively, as United Nations trust territories. Following a UN-supervised plebiscite, Western (British) Togoland became part of the new state of Ghana on the latter's accession to independence in 1957. Eastern (French) Togoland, which became a French-sponsored autonomous republic in 1956, achieved complete independence in agreement with France and the United Nations on April 27, 1960.

Sylvanus OLYMPIO, leader of the predominantly Ewe party then known as the Togolese Unity Committee (CUT), became the country's first chief executive. Olympio's somewhat dictatorial rule, coupled with his alienation of the army by the imposition of an austerity program, contributed to his assassination in 1963. Nicolas GRUNITZKY, Olympio's chief political rival, succeeded him as president and attempted to govern on a multiparty basis with northern support. Grunitzky failed, however, to establish firm control and was deposed in 1967 by (then) Maj. Etienne EYADÉMA, a northerner who was chief of staff of the armed forces. Acting in the name of a National Reconciliation Committee (NRC), Eyadéma suspended the constitution, outlawed political activity, and instituted Political Status: Independent republic since 1960; personal military rule imposed in 1967; one-party state established November 29, 1969; Third Republic proclaimed on January 13, 1980, under constitution adopted in referendum of December 30, 1979; constitution suspended by a National Conference on July 16, 1991; multiparty constitution adopted by popular referendum on September 27, 1992.

Area: 21,622 sq. mi. (56,000 sq. km.).

Population: 2,703,250 (1981C); 5,132,000 (2005E).

Major Urban Center (2005E): LOMÉ (835,000).

Official Language: French.

Monetary Unit: CFA Franc (official rate July 1, 2006: 513.01 francs = $1US). (The CFA franc, previously pegged to the French franc, is now permanently pegged to the euro at 655.957 CFA francs = 1 euro.)

President: Faure Essozimme GNASSINGBÉ (Rally of the Togolese People); elected on April 24, 2005, and inaugurated on May 4 following an extended constitutional crisis triggered by the death on February 5 of his father, Gen. Gnassingbé EYADÉMA (Rally of the Togolese People), who had been president since 1967.

Prime Minister: Edem KODJO (Panafrikan Patriotic Convergence); appointed by the president on June 9, 2005, to succeed Koffi SAMA (Rally of the Togolese People).

direct military rule. Later the same year, he dissolved the NRC and declared himself president. The Rally of the Togolese People (RPT), a regime-supportive party, was established in 1969 and, in that year and in 1971, made pro forma attempts (which were described as overruled by the “popular will”) to return the nation to civilian rule.

A constitution drafted in 1969 was accepted by a reported 98 percent of the registered electorate on December 30, 1979, in balloting at which General Eyadéma (whose first name had been “Africanized” to Gnassingbé in 1974) stood as the sole candidate for a seven-year term as president. Concurrently, a unicameral General Assembly was constituted on the basis of a single list of candidates presented by the RPT.

In September 1986 the government reported that it had rebuffed a coup attempt allegedly fomented in Ghana and Burkina Faso by supporters of the exiled sons of former president Olympio. However, some external critics suggested that the seriousness of the coup attempt may have been overstated by the Eyadéma regime to shift attention away from earlier reports of torture and illegal detention of political prisoners. On December 21 President Eyadéma was unopposed in election to a further seven-year term.

In early October 1990 the imposition of lengthy jail terms on two opposition figures for alleged antigovernment activity ignited a series of protests and strikes. On October 10 President Eyadéma responded by telling a RPT Central Committee meeting that the country’s “apprenticeship in democracy” was complete and preparations should be made for a multiparty system. However, the establishment of a constitutional commission and scheduling of a referendum for late 1991 failed to appease government critics, with violent protests continuing into 1991.

In March 1991 ten opposition groups formed a Front of Associations for Renewal (FAR) under the leadership of Yawovi AGBOYIBO, and four days later, after a meeting with FAR representatives, the president agreed to accelerate reforms. In mid-April he authorized the legalization of opposition parties and pledged to hold multiparty elections within a year. Nevertheless, violent demonstrations continued, fueled by the discovery of the bodies of 30 slain protestors in a Lomé lagoon. Subsequently, in the course of negotiations with opposition leaders, Eyadéma agreed to transfer power to a prime minister to be elected by a National Conference on Togo’s Future, which convened in Lomé on July 8. On July 16 the opposition-dominated conference declared its sovereignty, dissolved the National Assembly, abrogated the 1980 constitution, and stripped Eyadéma of all but ceremonial powers, thus prompting a government and army withdrawal from the proceedings. On July 23 the government rejoined the conference, and, at its close on August 28, the president publicly accepted most of its findings, including a diminished presidency, the election of Joseph Kokou KOFFIGOH as prime minister, and the replacement of the RPT-dominated National Assembly with an interim High Council of the Republic (HCR). However, Eyadéma's military supporters continued to reject both the conference's sovereignty claims and the new government, in particular Koffigoh's assumption of the defense ministry. Subsequently, military coup attempts on October 1 and 8 ended only after public appeals from Eyadéma that the troops return to their barracks.

In mid-October 1991 the HCR, under pressure from newly enfranchised party leaders to establish control of the government, formally ousted Eyadéma, and on November 26 the council banned the RPT on the eve of a party congress. The following day rebel troops surrounded Koffigoh's residence, and on December 2 the troops announced that they had "reclaimed" strategic points throughout Togo and had called on Eyadéma to name a new prime minister and dissolve the HCR. On December 3 Koffigoh was seized by the rebel soldiers and brought to Eyadéma, whereupon the prime minister announced his "surrender" and agreed to Eyadéma's request that he form a national unity government, assignments to which were announced on December 30.

On January 29, 1992, the government issued a revised electoral calendar that called for a constitutional referendum and municipal balloting in early April, a legislative poll in late May, and a presidential election in June. The schedule was subsequently abandoned because of widespread violence, including the May 5 wounding of opposition leader Gilchrist OLYMPIO, son of the former president, in an attack for which Capt. Ernest GNASSINGBÉ, the president's son, was implicated two months later. On August 13 negotiations between a presidential delegation and representatives of eight opposition parties on resumption of the transitional process were suspended, and on August 23 the government, citing ongoing unrest, cancelled a constitutional referendum. Meanwhile, following extensive talks between the president and prime minister, at which the latter reportedly agreed to a number of concessions reversing earlier limitations on the president's power, the transition period, scheduled to expire on August 28, was extended to December 31.

On September 27, 1992, a new constitution was endorsed in a referendum by 99.09 percent of the voters. Concurrently, a new electoral calendar was released, which called for balloting to take place between October and December. However, the democratization process was halted on October 22 with seizure of the National Assembly building by pro-Eyadéma troops, who demanded the release of frozen RPT funds in return for the release of 40 legislative hostages. The crisis was resolved the following day when the HCR agreed to release the funds; however, Koffigoh declared the HCR's action invalid because it was performed under duress, while Eyadéma, who had supported earlier efforts to free the funds, called for sanctions against the intruders. Unappeased by the government's response, the opposition organized a general strike on October 26 to protest the military's action.

On November 11, 1992, Eyadéma, in a direct affront to the prime minister and HCR, rejected as "unconstitutional" Koffigoh's dismissal of two propresidential cabinet ministers, one of whom had reportedly threatened to have the prime minister arrested. The United States responded on November 13 with suspension of $19 million in aid payments. Three days later Togolese unions, acting in concert with the Democratic Opposition Collective (COD-2), launched a general strike, which they warned would continue until the government agreed to the formation of a politically neutral security force, a new government, free and fair elections, prosecution of the troops implicated in the October National Assembly incident, and international monitoring of the transitional period. Meanwhile, Koffigoh's repeated compromises with Eyadéma appeared to have cost him the support of the COD-2, whose leaders, in early January 1993, refused to meet with him.

On January 13, 1993, Eyadéma dismissed Koffigoh, claiming that the transitional government's mandate had ended on December 31, 1992.

However, five days later, in an action that the HCR described as “unconstitutional,” he reappointed Koffigoh to his post. Tensions were further heightened on January 25 when security forces killed at least 20 people demonstrating in support of the arrival of French and German mediators. Nationwide clashes between prodemocracy and government forces were subsequently reported, and at the end of the month, amid reports of rampaging soldiers and an imminent civil war, 300,000 Togolese fled to Benin and Ghana.

Negotiations to break the downward political and social spiral opened on February 11, 1993, in Colmar, France, with representatives of the president, the government, the HCR, and the opposition in attendance; however, Eyadéma’s delegation soon withdrew because of the opposition’s demand for political neutralization of the armed forces. Three days later, following negotiations between the president and prime minister, during which the former reportedly pledged to keep troops loyal to him in their barracks, Koffigoh was named to head a “crisis government” dominated by presidential loyalists. The HCR rejected the legality of the new administration, calling it the product of a “constitutional coup d’état,” and in early March COD-2 leader Olympio reportedly declared that a “short, foreign military intervention” might be necessary to break the stranglehold on the democratization process.

On March 25, 1993, Eyadéma’s top military aide was among a number of military personnel reportedly killed when the president’s residence came under attack from raiders who fled into Ghana. Olympio, who was accused of planning the attack, countered by charging that the incident was part of a purge of army dissidents. Lending credence to his argument, over 140 former Eyadéma troops were reported to have fled Togo by early April, claiming that a presidentially sanctioned ethnic cleansing campaign was indeed under way. Despite the unrest, an election timetable was subsequently released, which called for new presidential and legislative balloting. However, most of the opposition boycotted the long-deferred presidential poll of August 25 at which Eyadéma was credited with reelection amid increasing evidence that he had regained most of his pre-1991 powers.

In late September 1993 the COD-2 threatened to boycott legislative elections then scheduled for December unless the government agreed to provide access to state-controlled media, redefine voting constituencies, and increase the number of poll watchers. The balloting was further postponed until February following renewed fighting near Eyadéma’s residence on January 5, 1994, which left more than 60 dead.

The multiparty poll, which was finally mounted on February 6 and 20, 1994, was marred by violence, with RPT militants accused of attacking opposition candidates. International observers nonetheless endorsed the results, which included a majority of 43 seats for the opposition Patriotic Front (FP) and 35 for the RPT. Subsequently, however, the Supreme Court, responding to petitions filed by the RPT, vacated three seats won by the opposition. Therefore, the FP’s overall lead was imperiled, pending by-elections, which, having initially been scheduled for May, were deferred. Criticizing the Court’s action, the FP’s leading components (the Action Committee for Renewal—CAR and the Togolese Union for Democracy—UTD) threatened to boycott the National Assembly; however, the coalition’s unanimity was sorely tested on April 22, when the president, in apparent violation of an earlier agreement, rejected CAR leader Yawovi Agboyibo as the FP’s prime minister designate in favor of the UTD’s Edem KODJO.

In mid-1994 a RPT characterization of the FP as a “facade of a coalition” seemed increasingly apt, as the CAR resisted UTD entreaties to join Kodjo’s government. Earlier, on May 20, the CAR, which unlike the UTD had carried through on a legislative boycott, announced that it was abandoning the action, explaining that the regime’s failure to mount by-elections by the legally mandated date of May 15 was tantamount to a confession that “conditions for legality, transparency, and security” had not been met. In December the CAR once again withdrew from the assembly, but in April 1995 President Eyadéma and Agboyibo reached an agreement on electoral reform, which called for equal representation for government and opposition parliamentary groups on all electoral commissions. As a result, the CAR rejoined the assembly in August; however, an alliance of RPT and UTD parliamentarians defeated the reform bill in February 1996.

Already strained relations between President Eyadéma and Prime Minister Kodjo deteriorated sharply in May 1996 when the Supreme Court supported Eyadéma's assertion that he alone controlled the appointment of senior administrative officials. For his part, Kodjo reportedly accused the president of establishing a "parallel government." Subsequently, following the RPT's capture of three assembly seats (and consequently a narrow legislative majority) at early August by-election balloting, Kodjo resigned on August 19, citing his desire to avoid the "legal war," which he described as likely to arise from the lack of an "obvious majority." The following day Eyadéma appointed Planning and Territorial Development Minister Kwassi KLUTSE as Kodjo's successor, and on August 27 the new prime minister announced the formation of a new government.

On December 3, 1996, the National Assembly voted to adopt a RPT-drafted document delineating the responsibilities of a new Constitutional Court. The poll was boycotted by the CAR, which had unsuccessfully sought to broaden the court's powers to include mediation of electoral disputes. (The new body was inaugurated in March 1997.) Thereafter, in September, the opposition boycotted an assembly vote on a new electoral code after attempts to persuade the legislature to include provisions for an independent electoral body were rebuffed. The code, approved unanimously by the propresidential legislators, provided for a nine-member commission (four from the propresidential forces and four from the opposition, in addition to an appointed chair).

Following presidential balloting on June 21, 1998, President Eyadéma was credited with a vote share of 52 percent and Gilchrist Olympio of the Union of Forces of Change (UFC) with 34 percent. The remainder of the tally was shared by four other candidates, led by Yawovi Agboyibo with 9.6

percent. However, the polling process was widely criticized by both domestic and international observers. Furthermore, two days after the polling, the chairperson of the electoral commission, Awa NANA, resigned, claiming that her efforts to prepare provisional electoral results had been blocked by "unidentified" individuals widely believed to be presidential supporters. Subsequently, the opposition, led by Olympio, who claimed that he had actually won the election with a 59 percent vote share, refused the president's offer to join a unity government and organized a number of demonstrations and work stoppages. Amid reports of mounting violence, on August 19 Prime Minister Klutse resigned; however, the president reappointed Klutse the following day, and on September 1 Klutse named a government that included a number of new members but no prominent opposition leaders.

In December 1998 government and opposition leaders announced that they had made progress in their efforts to organize a dialogue. Thereafter, however, the preparations ground to a halt as the two sides proved unable to agree on a venue for the proposed talks. Subsequently, in early 1999, the opposition announced its intention to boycott legislative polling then scheduled for early March. The Eyadéma administration rejected calls to delay the balloting until after interparty talks and proceeded with electoral preparations, albeit delaying the start of polling for two weeks.

Following legislative balloting on March 21, 1999, and two subsequent by-elections, the RPT, facing only limited competition from independent candidates and two minor parties, was credited with having won 79 of the 81 seats. On April 17 Klutse dissolved his government and offered his resignation, although he agreed to continue thereafter on a caretaker basis. On May 22 the president appointed Eugene Koffi ADOBOLI, a former official of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, as Klutse's successor. Facing continuing criticism for his inability to improve the economic condition, however, Adoboli resigned on August 25, 2000, one day after a vote of no-confidence against his government in the legislature. The president named Agbéyomé Messan KODJO of the RPT as Adoboli's successor on August 29.

On June 27, 2002, President Eyadéma appointed Koffi SAMA of the RPT to replace Prime Minister Kodjo. (Kodjo was subsequently expelled from the RPT for criticizing the president; he later went into exile.) Sama was sworn in on June 30, and he announced his cabinet on July 5.

The RPT dominated the October 27, 2002, assembly balloting (72 of 81 seats), in part, due to a boycott by most opposition parties. Sama was reappointed as prime minister on November 13. In December the RPT-controlled assembly approved a constitutional revision that removed the limit on the number of presidential terms for one person, thereby permitting Eyadéma to seek another term in the election scheduled for 2003. The assembly also lowered the eligibility age for presidential candidates from 45 to 35, a measure apparently designed to permit the eventual succession of Eyadéma's son, Faure Essozrimma GNASSINGBÉ, who was only 37 years old at the time. Moreover, the basic law was changed to require presidential candidates to have resided in Togo for one year prior to the election. That provision prevented Gilchrist Olympio, who had been in exile in France, from contesting the election; he urged supporters to vote for Emmanuel BOB-AKITANI, the vice president of the UFC.

In the presidential poll of June 1, 2003, Eyadéma was credited with 58 percent of the vote, followed by Bob-Akitani (34 percent), and four minor candidates. Prime Minister Sama and his cabinet resigned on June 23, but the president reappointed Sama on July 1. On July 29 Sama formed a new cabinet that included a few members of minor opposition parties and, notably, Faure Gnassingbé.

President Eyadéma died of a heart attack on February 5, 2005. His son, Faure Gnassingbé, backed by the military and Sama, was immediately named interim president, although the constitution required the speaker of the assembly to fill a presidential vacancy. Because the current speaker, Fambaré NATCHABA, was out of the country at the time, the assembly, on February 6, elected Gnassingbé to replace Natchaba as speaker, and Gnassingbé was sworn in as president the following day to serve until the end of his father's term in 2008. The assembly also rescinded the constitutional provision that new presidential elections be held within 60 days in case of a vacancy. However, in the wake of intense domestic and international criticism, the assembly, on February 21, voted to reverse its decisions (see Foreign relations, below). Gnassingbé resigned as speaker and interim president on February 25 and was succeeded in both positions by Abbas BONFOH (hitherto the deputy speaker) pending new elections. In highly controversial balloting on April 24, Gnassingbé was credited with 60 percent of the vote and runner-up Bob-Akitani with 38.25 percent. After the Constitutional Court validated the results on May 3, Gnassingbé was sworn in on May 4. On June 9, the president appointed Edem Kodjo of the Panafrican Patriotic Convergence (Convergence Patriotique Panafricaine—CPP) as prime minister in an attempt to reach out to opposition groups. Kodjo's new cabinet, formed on June 20, comprised mostly members of the RPT, although several small opposition parties agreed to join. Efforts to form a broader unity government were rebuffed by the major opposition parties.

Constitution and Government

The 1979 constitution provided for a highly centralized system of government headed by a strong executive presiding over a cabinet of his own selection and empowered to dissolve a single-chambered National Assembly after consulting the Political Bureau of the RPT. It detailed a judicial system headed by a Supreme Court that included a Court of Appeal and courts of the first and second instance, with special courts for administrative, labor, and internal security matters.

On July 16, 1991, the National Conference on Togo's Future abrogated the 1979 basic law, transferred all but ceremonial presidential powers to a prime minister, and dissolved the legislature, with assignment of its powers to a High Council of the Republic (HCR), pending the promulgation of a new constitution and the holding of multiparty elections.

A draft constitution accepted by the HCR on July 2, 1992, called for a semi-presidential system with the head of state elected to a once-renewable five-year term and a prime minister chosen by the president from a parliamentary majority and responsible to the legislature, which would also have a five-year mandate. Other projected institutions included a High Court of Justice and a Supreme Court, in addition to a Constitutional Court, an Accounts Court, and an Economic and Social Council. On September 27 the new basic charter was approved by 99.08 percent of the participants in a nationwide referendum. In March 1997 a seven-member Constitutional Court was appointed to serve a seven-year term.

The country is divided for administrative purposes into five provinces, which are subdivided into prefectures that were formerly administered by presidentially appointed chiefs and "special delegations" (councils) but are now subject to prefectural and municipal elections on the basis of direct universal suffrage.

Foreign Relations

Togo's foreign policy has long been based on nonalignment, although historical links have provided a foundation for continued financial and political support from the West. Bowing to pressure from the Arab bloc, diplomatic relations with Israel were severed from 1973 to 1987.

Although one of the smallest and poorest of the African states, Togo has played a leading role in efforts to promote regional cooperation and served as the host nation for negotiation of the Lomé conventions between the European Community (EC) and developing African, Caribbean, and Pacific (ACP) countries. It worked closely with Nigeria in organizing the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) in May 1975 and, having assumed observer status earlier with the francophone West African Economic Community (CEAO), joined the CEAO states in a Non-Aggression and Defense Aid Agreement (ANAD) in 1979. Its major regional dispute concerns the status of Western Togoland, which was incorporated into Ghana in 1957. A clandestine "National Liberation Movement of Western Togoland" has been active in supporting Togo's claim to the 75-mile-wide strip of territory and has called for a new UN plebiscite on the issue. There have been numerous incidents along the Ghanaian border, and the Eyadéma and Rawlings regimes regularly accused each other of destabilization efforts, including the "harboring" of political opponents. Heated exchanges occurred with Ghana and, to a lesser degree, Burkina Faso, following the reported coup attempt in Togo in September 1986. However, Eyadéma avoided charging Accra and Ouagadougou with direct involvement in the plot, and relations were largely normalized by mid-1987, Lomé calling for help from regional organizations to keep further enmity from developing. In December 1991 the Koffigoh administration announced that a comprehensive cooperation agreement had been reached with Ghana.

Togo's foreign affairs in 1992 and early 1993 were determined in great part by its domestic political turmoil. In early November 1992 both Benin and Ghana reported deaths of their nationals in border incidents involving Togolese security forces, although their complaints were relatively low-keyed in apparent support of the transitional government. On November 13 a deteriorating political situation led the United States to suspend all but humanitarian aid payments. Thereafter, in late January 1993, a French and German mediation effort was cut short when 20 prodemocracy demonstrators were killed by government forces outside the negotiation site. In mid-February, France, citing the death of the demonstrators and lack of progress towards democracy, announced restrictions on aid payments. France's decision came only weeks after its former president, Valéry Giscard D'Estaing, had written a controversial letter in support of Eyadéma.

Meanwhile, relations between Togo and Ghana continued to worsen. In March 1993 rebels, who had attacked the Eyadéma compound, retreated into Ghana, setting off an exchange of accusations between the two capitals. In early January 1994 Togo and Ghana were described as "close to war" after Lomé once again accused Accra of aiding alleged anti-Eyadéma insurgents in an attack on the president's residence. For its part, Ghana described the unrest in Togo as "the consequence of the government's refusal to establish a credible democratic process" and called on Lomé to resist always accusing Ghana "whenever there is an armed attack or political crisis." Such charges notwithstanding, relations between the two improved dramatically by midyear; on November 16 diplomatic ties were formally restored, and in December Eyadéma ordered the reopening of their shared border. Lomé's relations with Paris improved when France agreed to reschedule and forgive Togolese debt in May 1995.

In August 1998 the Togolese government reported that troops based near Lomé had been attacked by opposition-affiliated "terrorists" based in Ghana; however, the opposition countered that the fighters were actually government provocateurs who had attacked the headquarters and homes of UFC members. Collaterally, the incident proved to be a showcase for improved relations between Accra and Lomé (the two nations' presidents having signed cooperation agreements in Accra earlier in the year) because Ghana deployed forces to carry out a joint operation with Togolese troops pursuing the alleged "aggressors." However, conflicts over property rights were reported in 1999 along the border between Togo and Ghana, and in March 2001 Togo closed the border without explanation. The border was reopened and relations between the two sides improved dramatically with the election of John Kufuor as president of Ghana.

In 1998 Eyadéma helped mediate the conflict in Guinea-Bissau. Togolese troops also joined the international peacekeeping mission in Guinea-Bissau, and Eyadéma played a role in efforts to end the conflicts in Liberia and Sierra Leone. In addition, Togolese troops participated in the ECOWAS mission in Liberia and the UN mission in Sierra Leone. In light of Togo's importance to regional peacekeeping operations, the United States initiated joint training exercises with the Togolese military in April 2002.

France was the first country to accept Gnassingbé's victory in the 2005 presidential election; Chirac sent formal congratulations to the new president on May 5, 2005.

In February 2006 Gnassingbé traveled to China to promote increased economic interaction between the two countries. (In 2005 trade between Togo and China was worth more than $500 million).

Current Issues

Togolese officials came under intense scrutiny in May 1999 when Amnesty International (AI) released a report titled "Togo: Reign of Terror," which cited numerous human rights violations and claimed that hundreds of government opponents had been executed during the 1998 election campaign. Defiantly, the government arrested several opposition leaders for having "provided erroneous information" to the AI investigators.

In July 1999 representatives of the government and opposition met in Lomé with international mediators and, under heavy pressure from, among others, French President Jacques Chirac, reached an agreement, which included Eyadéma's pledge that he would not seek reelection in 2003 and that new legislative elections would be conducted. An independent electoral commission was established in December, a new election code was adopted in March 2000, and, following heated debates and several setbacks, the electoral commission announced in January 2001 that the new legislative balloting would be conducted in October.

Relations between the government and the opposition remained severely strained in late 2001 and the first half of 2002. Particularly galling to the opposition was an amendment to the electoral code approved by the assembly in February 2002 that required future presidential candidates to have resided in Togo for 12 consecutive months. Critics described the new law as designed to prevent another presidential run by the UFC's Gilchrist Olympio, who remained outside the country. The opposition parties also strongly objected to the government's offer of only 5 seats on the proposed 20-member electoral commission. In view of the impasse on that membership, the government in May appointed a committee of judges to oversee the new legislative elections, which, having already been postponed from October 2001 and March 2002, were finally held in October 2002 without the participation of most opposition parties.

Critics strongly challenged the assembly's decision to permit Eyadéma to run for a third term in 2003 and described the election results as fraudulent. Although international observers accepted the poll as generally free and open, it was noted that the administration had limited the number of opposition rallies and had constrained access to the government-controlled media. Subsequently, the government appeared to soften its stance by releasing some 500 political prisoners, overturning repressive press restrictions, and promising genuine negotiations designed to bring the opposition into the political process. As part of the reform effort, Prime Minister Sama attempted to create an independent electoral commission, but the UFC, CAR, and other opposition parties refused to participate, citing what they perceived to be a continued lack of transparency in the entire election process. As a result, municipal and regional elections scheduled for December 2004 were postponed indefinitely.

President Eyadéma's death in February 2005 ended Africa's longest presidential reign (38 years) and plunged Togo into a complicated constitutional crisis (see Political background, above, for details). Faure Gnassingbé's takeover prompted numerous demonstrations that led to the death of protesters who clashed with police. In addition, regional organizations such as ECOWAS and the African Union condemned the Togolese military for attempting what was perceived as essentially a coup d'état. On February 9, the International Organization of the Francophonie suspended Togo's membership. On February 20, ECOWAS imposed a range of sanctions on Togo, including suspension of the country's membership, a travel ban on Togolese officials, and an arms embargo. Five days later, the AU endorsed sanctions by individual member states. The United States and the EU offered support for the ECOWAS and AU sanctions. These actions apparently triggered Gnassingbé's decision to relinquish the presidency and campaign in new elections scheduled for April 24, 2005. Opposition parties sought a postponement to give them more time to campaign. However, the government rejected any delay and even dismissed the interior minister on April 22 when he publicly called for additional time to prepare better for the balloting.

Gnassingbé's election in April (which the opposition and international observers again described as fraudulent) triggered a new wave of violence and the flight of more than 30,000 people to neighboring countries. The UN reported that more than 500 people were killed in post-election violence. (There was approximately $7 million in property damage.) Turmoil continued throughout the summer, despite Gnassingbé's pledge to support new legislative elections if reconciliation could be achieved with the opposition. Gnassingbé undertook a range of actions to mollify the opposition, including the November 2005 release of 460 political prisoners.

Political Parties

Political parties were banned after the 1967 coup. Two years later, the official Rally of the Togolese People (RTP) was organized as the sole legitimate political party. However, on April 12, 1991, the Eyadéma regime, besieged by antigovernment strikes and protests, reversed the RPT's 24-year-old monopoly. Opposition activities were coordinated by a Front of Associations for Renewal (Front des Associations pour le Renouveau—FAR), a coalition of human rights, prodemocracy, and student groups, which, three days after its launching on March 15, had been promised a national conference by the president if it would halt its demonstrations. In May the FAR was superseded by a Democratic Opposition Collective (Collectif de l'Opposition Démocratique—COD), which in turn gave way to the National Council for the Safeguard of Democracy (Conseil National pour la Sauvegarde de la Démocratie—CNSD) in late December. In July 1992 the CNSD was succeeded by a revived Democratic Opposition Collective (COD-2).

In early 1993 the COD-2 appeared to split into two wings: a “moderate” faction aligned under the banner of the Patriotic Front (FP, below) and a “radical” component, the Union of Forces of Change (UFC, below). Although the FP joined the UFC in boycotting the 1993 presidential election, the linkage was abandoned in early 1994 as the FP ignored the UFC’s call for a boycott of legislative balloting. (In July 1997 ties between the two groups were reestablished; however, a proposed electoral coalition, which would have also included the Party for Democracy and Renewal [PDR, below], collapsed following the UFC’s withdrawal late in the year.)

In early 2002 a group of opposition parties formed The Front (see below), which subsequently participated in the October launching of the Coalition of Democratic Forces (Coalition des Forces Démocrates—CFD) with other groups, including the Panafrikan Patriotic Convergence and the UFC. The CFD sought to present a single candidate for the June 2003 election but ultimately boycotted that balloting due to perceived unwillingness on the part of the administration to permit full electoral participation by the opposition. Prior to the 2005 presidential election, six opposition parties agreed to support the candidacy of Bob-Akitani, including the UFC, the PDR, the Action Committee for Renewal (Comité d’Action pour le Renouveau—CAR), the Democratic Convention of African People (Convention Démocratique des Peuples Africains—CDPA), Alliance of Democrats for Integrated Development (Alliance des Démocrates pour le Développement Intégré—ADDI), and the Union for Democracy and Solidarity—Togo (Union pour la Démocratie et la Solidarité—Togo—UDS—Togo).

Rally of the Togolese People (Rassemblement du Peuple Togolais—RPT). Formed in 1969 under the sponsorship of President Eyadéma, the RPT was Togo’s sole legal party until its constitutional mandate was abrogated by the National Conference in July 1991. In February 1994 the RPT captured 33 of the 57 seats decided in the first round of assembly balloting; however, the party subsequently fell short of an overall majority by winning only two second-round seats. The RPT’s three victories at legislative by-election balloting in August 1996 left the party in control of 38 of 57 seats. It also claimed the vote of former interim prime minister Koffigoh and two former opposition legislators who held seats as independents. In November the RPT absorbed the Union for Justice and Democracy (Union pour la Justice et la Démocratie—UJD), a small grouping that controlled two assembly seats. At the RPT’s congress on January 9–11, 1997, the party continued its recent swing back towards a hard-line posture and away from the proreform, youth movement that had characterized a 1994 congress. Evidencing the sea change were the appointments to the Central Committee of a number of old guard stalwarts. In November the party was bolstered by the addition of another minor party, the Movement for Social Democracy and Tolerance. The RPT captured 79 seats in the 1999 assembly balloting and 72 in 2002.

Following the death of President Eyadéma in February 2005, his son, Faure Gnassingbé, was elected RPT president.

Leaders: Faure Essozimme GNASSINGBÉ (President of the Republic and the Party), Koffi SAMA (Former Prime Minister), Dama DRAMANI (Secretary General).

Coordination of New Forces (Coordination des Forces Nouvelles—CFN). Formed in June 1993 by several parties, including the Union of Democrats for the Republic (Union des Démocrates pour la République—UDR), the Togolese Social Liberal Party (Parti Social-Libéral Togolais—Solito), and several professional associations, the CFN is led by former prime minister Joseph Kokou Koffigoh under a banner describing the party as “resolutely committed to an irreversible democratic process.” At legislative balloting in February 1994 the CFN won one seat. In November 1995 a CFN member, Euphrem Seth DORKENOU, was named to the Kodjo government. The CFN participated (unsuccessfully) in the March 1999 legislative elections, although the party was considered pro-Eyadéma and Koffigoh was named to the cabinet formed in August 2000.

The CFN also failed to win seats in the 2002 elections.

Leaders: Joseph Kokou KOFFIGO (Former Prime Minister), Nicolas NOMEDJI (Executive Secretary).

Coordination of Political Parties of the Constructive Opposition (Coordination des Partis de L'Opposition Constructive—CPOC). Formed in 2002, the CPOC emerged as a formation of opposition parties, which agreed to participate in elections and in the government. The CPOC originally included the Rally for Support for Democracy and Development (RSDD); the Believers' Movement for Equality and Peace (Mouvement des Croyants pour L'Égalité et la Paix—MOCEP), which won one seat in the 2002 elections and is led by Comlangan Mawutoé D'ALMEIDA; the Togolese Youth Movement—Juvento (Mouvement de la Jeunesse Togolaise—Juvento), a nationalist youth movement that won two seats in the 2002 assembly elections and is led by Monsilla DJATO and Abalo FIRMIN; and the Union for Democracy and Social Progress (Union pour la Démocratie et le Progrès Social—UDPS), which won two seats in the 2002 elections and is led by Sekodona SEGO.

Following the 2002 legislative elections, one seat in the government was given to CPOC member Henry OLYMPIO of the RSDD. After the 2003 presidential elections, the government was reshuffled, and a second seat was given to the CPOC. However, Olympio resigned in August 2003 and was replaced by D'Almeida. The RSDD was subsequently expelled from the CPOC.

Rally for Support for Democracy and Development (Rassemblement pour le Soutien pour la Démocratie et le Développement—RSDD). The RSDD is led by Henry Octavianus Olympio, a cousin of the opposition leader Gilchrist Olympio of the UFC. Henry Olympio served in the cabinet of Kwassi Klutse and was appointed minister of democracy and promotion of the rule of law in the government formed by Prime Minister Adoboli in June 1999. However, he was dismissed from the latter post in June 2000.

Olympio was appointed minister for relations with the assembly in 2002, but he resigned in August 2003 over a dispute with the prime minister in which the RSDD leader sought a different cabinet post. Olympio secured less than 1 percent of the vote in the 2005 presidential poll.

Leader: Henry Octavianus OLYMPIO (2005 presidential candidate and Chair).

Panafrican Ecologist Party (Parti Écologiste Panafricain—PEP). Another RPT-supportive grouping, the PEP also participated unsuccessfully in the 1999 legislative election.

Leader: Essohanam LAWANI.

Panafrican Patriotic Convergence (Convergence Patriotique Panafricaine—CPP). The CPP was formed in August 1999 with the formal merger of the UTD (below); the Party of Democrats for Unity (Parti des Démocrates pour l'Unité—PDU); the Democratic Union for Solidarity (Union Démocratique pour la Solidarité—UDS); and the African Party for Democracy (Parti Africain pour la Démocratie—PAD). The CPP was among the main opposition groups that continued talks with the government in 2000 and 2001 and was subsequently active in the formation of the independent electoral commission and the CFD. CPP leader Edem Kodjo was named prime minister in June 2005.

Leaders: Edem KODJO (Prime Minister), Jean-Lucien Savide TOVE.

Togolese Union for Democracy (Union Togolaise pour la Démocratie—UTD). Aligned with the CAR, the UTD secured seven seats (one subsequently vacated) at legislative balloting in February 1994, and on April 22 its leader and former secretary general of the Organization of African Unity, Edem Kodjo, was chosen by the president to head a new government. In March 1995 the UTD temporarily withdrew from the National Assembly following a dispute with the RPT over the assignment of responsibility for two government bodies. Improved UTD-RPT relations were highlighted in November when Kodjo included a number of new RPT representatives in his enlarged cabinet. Furthermore, in February 1996 the UTD's votes were pivotal to an RPT-led assembly rejection of an opposition bid for an independent electoral commission. Thereafter, however, relations between the two deteriorated, and in August 1997 Kodjo claimed to have been attacked by government security forces. Subsequently, the UTD leader reportedly announced his intention to boycott forthcoming presidential elections, asserting that the polling would be rigged in favor of the incumbent. Nonetheless, Kodjo ran as the candidate for the CPP in the 2003 presidential election, placing fifth with just 1 percent of the vote.

The Front (Front Uni de l'Opposition—Le Front). The Front was formed by the four opposition parties below in 2002 in order to coordinate anti-regime efforts, including negotiations over elections and government policy.

Leader: Yawovi AGBOYIBO (National Coordinator).

Action Committee for Renewal (Comité d'Action pour le Renouveau—CAR). The CAR was one of the leaders, along with the UTD, below, in the formation in October 1992 by “moderate” COD-2 parties of the Patriotic Front (Front Patriotique—FP), which sought to maintain links with the government despite the objection of other coalition partners. The FP boycotted presidential balloting in August 1993. However, dismissing calls from the more militant UFC for a second boycott, the FP split from its ally and participated in the February 1994 legislative balloting. The CAR captured 36 seats (2 of which were subsequently vacated); however, despite an earlier pledge, President Eyadéma refused to appoint Yawovi Agboyibo, the CAR's leader and presidential candidate, prime minister.

At a mid-March 1994 meeting, the FP, attempting to dispel rumors that dissension would render the coalition unable to assume a governing role, issued a communiqué demanding the right to form a cabinet. On March 26 the group agreed that the next prime minister would be a CAR member, and two days later it nominated Agboyibo as its choice for the post. Consequently, on April 22 the CAR denounced the appointment of the UTD's Edem Kodjo as prime minister as a “blatant and inadmissible violation” of the March agreement, called on Kodjo to “reconsider” his position, and declared that it would not participate in a UTD-led government, thereby effectively ending the Front's existence. Nevertheless, the following day Kodjo insisted that the FP was still viable and that he controlled a parliamentary majority (albeit a tenuous one in light of a Supreme Court ruling that had invalidated three FP electoral victories).

The CAR boycotted assembly by-election balloting in August 1996, thus conceding the loss of two more seats. Meanwhile, party officials complained that they had been the victim of a RPT-orchestrated “smear campaign.” In October the party's legislative seat total dropped to 32 after a deputy defected to the RPT. (Earlier, two other CAR legislators had quit the party, switching their allegiances to the Eyadéma camp.)

The CAR reportedly organized a number of antigovernment demonstrations beginning in late 1996 and continuing through 1997. Furthermore, the group spearheaded concurrent legislative boycotts. In November 1997 Agboyibo, whom Africa Confidential described as seeming to “seek outright confrontation with the government,” was attacked after attending a function at the U.S. embassy.

Following presidential elections in June 1998, Agboyibo reportedly asserted that the UFC's Olympio was the true top vote-getter. For his part, Agboyibo finished third in the balloting with 9 percent of the tally. The CAR joined the opposition boycott of the 1999 balloting. Agboyibo was found guilty of defamation charges in August 2001. Although a court of appeal nullified a six-month sentence against him in January 2002, he was held on additional conspiracy charges. In mid-March the president ordered his release for the “sake of national reconciliation.”

Agboyibo ran for the presidency in 2003 and placed third with 5.2 percent of the vote. In the 2005 presidential election, CAR supported the candidacy of Bob-Akitani.

Leaders: Yawovi AGBOYIBO (1993, 1998, and 2003 presidential candidate), Dodji APEVON (Secretary General).

Democratic Convention of African People (Convention Démocratique des Peuples Africains—CDPA). In December 1989 CDPA members Godwin TETE and Kuevi AKUE were arrested for distributing antigovernment leaflets. Their sentencing in October 1990 led to violent protests, which in turn were followed by the government's decision to move towards a multiparty system. The CDPA was legalized in 1991.

In September 1992 the house of CDPA leader Nguessan Ouattara was bombed during a wave of political assassination attempts allegedly orchestrated by Eyadéma supporters. In 1993 the CDPA initiated the formation of the Panafrican Social Democrats' Group (Groupe des Démocrates Sociaux Panafricains—GDSP), an opposition coalition that also included the PDR and PSPA (below). (After boycotting the 1994 legislative elections, the GDSP was subsequently dissolved.)

In August 1997 the CDPA's founder and secretary general, Léopold Gnininvi, returned from a four-year, self-imposed exile, and at presidential elections in June 1998 he captured less than 1 percent of the vote.

The CDPA joined the boycott of the 2002 legislative elections and was one of the founding parties of both the CFD and The Front. In 2003, CDPA General Secretary Léopold Gnininvi registered to run in the presidential election, but he subsequently withdrew from the race. The CDPA joined the coalition that supported Bob-Akitani's candidacy in the 2005 presidential elections.

Leaders: Nguessan OUATTARA, Léopold GNININVI (Secretary General and 1998 and 2003 presidential candidate), Emmanuel GUKONU (First Secretary).

The other parties in the Front included the Alliance of Democrats for Integrated Development (Alliance des Démocrates pour le Développement Intégré—ADDI), led by Nagbandja KAMPATIBE, and the Union for Democracy and Solidarity–Togo (Union pour la Démocratie et la Solidarité–Togo—UDS–Togo), led by Antoine FOLLY. Both the ADDI and the UDS–Togo were part of the coalition that supported the candidacy of Bob-Akitani in the 2005 presidential balloting.

Union of Forces of Change (Union des Forces du Changement—UFC). The UFC coalition is led by Gilchrist Olympio, who has long been linked to the MTD (below). In July 1993 the Eyadéma government issued an arrest warrant that linked Olympio to an attack on the president's residence in March, and in early August the UFC leader, who had been calling for a new electoral register, was disqualified from presidential polling for refusing to return to Togo for a medical checkup. Subsequently, the UFC spearheaded a successful boycott of the balloting by its (then) COD-2 partners; however, its calls for a boycott of assembly balloting in February 1994 were ignored. In December 1997 UFC Secretary General Jean-Pierre Fabre was arrested and briefly detained after he sought to investigate the alleged murder of opposition activists by government security forces.

Although officially declared the runner-up at June 1998 presidential balloting, Olympio, who had been blocked from entering Togo from his base in Ghana during the closing days of the campaign, claimed that he had received 59 percent of the vote, not the 34 percent with which he had been credited. Subsequently, the UFC was at the forefront of the antigovernment actions that followed the polling, and in August UFC headquarters were attacked by unknown assailants. Although remaining critical of the French government's previous support of the Eyadéma regime, the UFC followed President Jacques Chirac's call for reconciliation and joined talks with the government in July 1999 along with the CAR and UTD.

The UFC helped form the antiregime CFD in 2002 but withdrew from the group in 2003. Olympio returned to contest the presidential election in 2003 but failed to meet the residency requirements. Bob-Akitani ran as his proxy and placed second in the balloting. Akitani also finished second in the disputed April 2005 presidential poll. In September 2005, UFC member Gabriel Sassouvi DOSSEH-ANYROH was dismissed from the party after he accepted a cabinet post in the Gnassingbé government.

Leaders: Gilchrist OLYMPIO (1998 presidential candidate), Jean-Pierre FABRE (Secretary General), Emmanuel BOB-AKITANI (2005 presidential candidate and Vice President of the Party).

Togolese Movement for Democracy (Mouvement Togolais pour la Démocratie—MTD). Prior to the legalization of political parties in April 1991 the MTD was a Paris-based organization, which claimed in 1980 that 34 people released from confinement on January 13 were “not real political prisoners” and that hundreds of others remained incarcerated. It disclaimed any responsibility for a series of bomb attacks in 1985, while charging that the Eyadéma regime had “unleashed a wave of repression” in their wake. In mid-1986 MTD Assistant Secretary General Paulin LOSSOU fled France in the face of a decision by authorities to expel him to Argentina for his “partisan struggle” against the Eyadéma regime. Several reported MTD members were imprisoned in 1986 for distributing anti-Eyadéma pamphlets, but all of their sentences were commuted by 1987.

The government accused the MTD of complicity in the September 1986 coup attempt, insisting that they planned to install Gilchrist Olympio, exiled son of the former chief executive, as president. Olympio, who was sentenced to death in absentia for his alleged role in the plot, described the charges as “preposterous,” suggesting that internal dissent had generated the unrest. Olympio returned to Lomé on July 6, 1991, under an April 12 general amnesty, to participate in the National Conference. Although claiming no interest in avenging his father’s death, Olympio described the existing regime as lacking “legitimacy.” Subsequently, Africa Confidential cited his influence in Joseph Kokou Koffigoh’s capture of the prime ministerial post.

In May 1992 Olympio was critically wounded in an assassination attempt which took the lives of four others, including MTD leader Eliot OHN. Following his return from rehabilitation in Europe, Olympio emerged as the opposition’s most prominent spokesman, and in early 1993 he reportedly suggested that ECOWAS establish a presence in Togo to counter the reemergence of pro-Eyadéma military factions as well as help facilitate the transitional process.

Leader: Gilchrist OLYMPIO (Party Leader).

Socialist Renewal Pact (Pacte Socialiste pour le Renouveau—PSR). The PSR’s 2003 presidential candidate placed fourth with 2.3 percent of the vote. The PSR was part of the six-party coalition that endorsed Bob-Akitani in the 2005 presidential polling. PSR leader Tchessa Abi broke with other opposition parties and joined the cabinet in June 2005.

Leaders: TCHESSA ABI (Party Leader), Maurice Datuku PERE (2003 presidential candidate).

Union of Independent Liberals (Union des Libéraux Indépendants—ULI). The ULI was launched on August 25, 1993, by Jacques Amouzou, an independent presidential candidate, who pledged to “bridge” the gap between the president and the opposition.

Leader: Jacques AMOUZOU (1993 and 1998 presidential candidate).

Unity Party for Economic and Social Development (Parti Unité pour le Développement Économique et Social—PUDES). The PUDES was formed on November 14, 1993, according to its founder Essogo Juwe Binizi, to combat “tribalism” and fight for “reconciliation, . . . enhancing job creation, and ensuring a fairer distribution of the nation’s wealth.”

Leader: Essogo Juwe BINIZI (Chair).

Also legalized in 1991 were the People's Movement for Democracy and Development (Mouvement du Peuple pour la Démocratie et le Développement—MPDD); the Togolese Alliance for Democracy (Alliance Togolaise pour la Démocratie—ATD), led by Adani Ifé ATAK-PAMEVI, who was an independent presidential candidate in 1993; the Togolese Communist Party (Parti Communiste Togolais—PCT); the Togolese Progress Party (Parti du Progrès Togolais—PPT); and the Togolese Social Democratic Party (Parti Social-Démocrat Togolais—PSDT). (There have been few references to the above groups since the mid-1990s.)

In addition to the CAR, UTD, and PDU, a number of other parties were assigned posts in the September 1992 government, including the centrist Alliance of Democrats for the Republic (Alliance des Démocrates pour la République—ADR), which contested the early legislative elections in August 1996; the Party of Action for Democracy (Parti d'Action pour la Démocratie—PAD), led by Francis EKOH; the Togolese Union for Reconciliation (Union Togolaise pour la Réconciliation—UTR), led by Bawa MANK-OUBU; and the Union for Labor and Justice (Union pour le Travail et la Justice—UTJ), which also contested the legislative elections in 1994.

Other parties that emerged in 1992 and 1993 included the Nationalist Movement for Unity (Mouvement Nationaliste de l'Unité—MNU), led by Koffitse ADZRAKO; the Togolese Democratic Party (Parti Démocratique Togolais—PDT), led by Mba KABASSEMA; and the Movement of October 5th (Mouvement du 5 Octobre—MO5), a militant group led by Bassirou AYEWA and whose name was derived from the date of the first anti-Eyadéma demonstration. In February 1993, MO5 members were reported to have built barricades throughout Lomé to protest the late January killing of opposition demonstrators by government security forces.

In October 1994 five terrorists, who were linked to a group of Togolese exiles led by Logo DOS-SOUVI, were arrested as they prepared to launch a strike in southern Togo from their camp in Ghana's Volta region. In early 1997 former interior minister Kokou MASSEME was arrested in Ghana, where he had reportedly formed a "national liberation army."

Among other formations are the Party for Democracy and Renewal (Parti pour la Démocratie et le Renouveau—PDR), led by Zarifou AYEWA (who joined the cabinet in June 2005); the hard-line Marxist-Leninist Pan-African Socialist Party (Parti Socialiste PanAfricain—PSPA), led by Francis AGBOBLI; the Workers' Party (Parti des Travailleurs—PT), led by Claude AMENGAVI; the National Front (Front National—FN), led by Amela AMELA VI; the Movement of Republican Centrists (Mouvement des Républicains Centristes—MRC), led by Kabou Gssokoyo ABASS; the Party for Renewal and Redemption, whose leader, Nicholas LAWSON, won 1 percent of the vote in the 2005 presidential poll; and the Party for Renewal and Social Progress (Parti pour le Renouveau et le Progrès Social—PRPS), led by Agbessi MAWOU. In 2005, the Initiative and Development Party was formed by Adanu Kokou KPOTUI as the country's 63rd registered party. It was followed in September by the formation of the Democratic Alliance for the Motherland by former prime minister Agbéyomé Messan KODJO and former speaker of the assembly Maurice Dahuku PERE.

Legislature

On July 16, 1991, the National Conference dissolved the existing National Assembly and subsequently transferred its powers to a High Council of the Republic (Haut Conseil de la République—HCR) for a transition period leading to multi-party elections. In early 1993 the HCR, already involved in a constitutional debate with the president over his efforts to reverse the prime minister's dismissal of two cabinet members, once again found itself in conflict with Eyadéma, who, in response to criticism of his dismissal and then reconfirmation of the prime minister, argued that the HCR's mandate had expired along with the transition period. Subsequently, after numerous postponements,

Cabinet

As of September 20, 2006

Prime Minister

Yawovi Madji Agboyibo (CAR)

Ministers of State

Agriculture, Livestock, and Fishing
Foreign Affairs and African Integration
Mines and Energy

Yves Mado Nagou
Zarifou Ayéva (PDR)
Léopold Messan Gnininvi (CDPA)

Ministers

Civil Service, Labor, and Employment
Commerce, Industry, and Handicrafts Communication and Civic Formation
Cooperation and NEPAD
Culture, Tourism, and Leisure
Decentralization and Regional Planning
Defense and Veterans Affairs
Economy and Development
Environment and Forest Resources
Equipment, Transport, Posts, and Telecommunications
Finance and Privatization
Health
Higher Education and Research
Human Rights, Democracy, and Reconciliation
Justice and Keeper of the Seals
Population, Social Affairs, and Promotion of Women
Primary and Secondary Education
Relations with the Institutions of the Republic Security
Small and Medium Size enterprises and Free Zone Promotion
Technical Education and Professional Training
Territorial Administration and Decentralization
Urban Affairs
Water and Water Resources
Youth and Sports

Katari Foli-Bazi
Jean-Lucien Savi de Tové
Gahoun Egbor
Gilbert Bawara
Gabriel Sassouvi Dosseh-Anyroh
Yendja Yentchabré
Kpatcha Gnassingbé
Daniel Kloutse
Issifou Okoulou-Kantchati
Kokouvi Dogbé
Payadowa Boukpassi
Charles Kondi Agba
Messan Adimado Aduayom
Célestine Akouavi Aïdam [f]
Sela Polo
Maïmounatou Ibrahima [f]
Komi Klassou
Tchessa Abi (PSR)
Col. Atcha Titikpina
Bernard Edjaidé Walla
Antoine Agbéwanou Edoh
Kwesi Séléagodji Ahumey-Zunu
Comlan Mally
Yao Florent Maganawé
Richard Tipoé

[f] = female

Togo's first multiparty balloting took place over two rounds on February 6 and 20, 1994.

National Assembly (Assemblée Nationale). The National Assembly is composed of 81 members directly elected for five-year terms. At the most recent balloting on October 27, 2002, the Rally of the Togolese People won 72 seats; the Rally for Support for Democracy and Development 3; the Union for Democracy and Social Progress, 2; the Togolese Youth Movement, 2; the Believers' Movement for Equality and Peace, 1; and independents, 1.

President: Abbas BONFOH.

Communications

For many years the media were almost exclusively government controlled. A highly restrictive press code adopted in October 1990 was significantly relaxed in early 1991; however, in June 1998 yet another more stringent code was adopted. In early 2000 a new press bill further limited press freedom and made "defamation of the government" an offense subject to a prison sentence. In 2000 and 2001 numerous independent and pro-opposition publications came under government scrutiny. In April 2000 the director of the independent weekly L'Exilé was arrested, and his newspaper was suspended for six months.

A second repressive law was passed in 2002 and allowed fines of up to $7,500 and sentences of five years in prison for defaming the president. The law also imposed lesser penalties for defamation of members of the government and the assembly. However, many of the new measures were repealed in August 2004 as part of Togo's effort to restart international aid. Suppression and intimidation of opposition media continued, and in October 2005 there were widespread protests to denounce attacks on opposition journalists.

Press

The following are published in French in Lomé: Togo Presse (15,000), government-owned daily; Le Combat du Peuple, pro-opposition weekly; L'Exilé, Abito, Le Regard, L'Aurore, Le Nouvel Echo, and Le Nouveau Journal, all independent weeklies; Le Nouvel Éclat, pro-government weekly; Le Courrier du Golfe and Forum-Hebdo, independent bi-weekly; La Dépêche, bimonthly; and L'Echos d'Afrique, a pro-CDPA publication.

News Agencies

Agence Togolaise de Presse (ATOP) is the official facility; Agence France-Presse and Deutsche Presse-Agentur maintain bureaus in Lomé.

Broadcasting and Computing

The government-operated Radiodiffusion du Togo broadcasts from Lomé in French, English, and indigenous languages. Télévision Togolaise began programming in Lomé in 1973; other transmitters are located in Alédjo-Kadara and Mont Agon. By the end of 2000, three private channels, Radio Télévision Delta Santé, Radio Télévision Zion-To (with a Christian orientation), and Djabal Nour (with a Muslim orientation) were still operating, while a fourth, TV2, was on the air in 2002. There were approximately 156,000 television receivers and 160,000 personal computers serving 210,000 Internet users in 2003.

Intergovernmental Representation

Ambassador to the U.S.

(Vacant)

U.S. Ambassador to Togo

David B. DUNN

Permanent Representative to the UN

(Vacant)

IGO Memberships (Non-UN)

ADF, AfDB, AU, BADEA, BOAD, CENT, ECOWAS, Interpol, IOM, NAM, OIC, OIF, PCA, UEMOA, WCO, WTO

TUNISIA

REPUBLIC OF TUNISIA

al-Jumhuriyah al-Tunisiyah

---

The Country

Situated midway along the North African littoral between Algeria and Libya, Tunisia looks north and eastward into the Mediterranean and southward toward the Sahara Desert. Along with Algeria and Morocco, it forms the Berber-influenced part of North Africa known as the “Maghreb” (West) to distinguish it from other Middle Eastern countries, which are sometimes referred to as the “Mashreq” (East). Tunisia’s terrain, well wooded and fertile in the north, gradually flattens into a coastal plain adapted to stock-raising and olive culture, and becomes semidesert in the south. The population is almost exclusively of Arab and Berber stock, Arabic in speech (save for a small Berber-speaking minority), and Sunni Muslim in religion. Although most members of the former French community departed after Tunisia gained independence in 1956, French continues as a second language, and small French, Italian, Jewish, and Maltese minorities remain. Women, who constitute approximately 31 percent of the paid labor force, are the focus of relatively progressive national policies on equal rights, educational access for girls, and family planning. In addition, by presidential decree 20 women were elected to the national legislature in 1999 and 43 in 2004. Moreover, the current government includes female ministers and secretaries of state.

About one quarter of the working population is engaged in agriculture, which is responsible for about 13 percent of GNP; the main products are wheat, barley, olive oil, wine, and fruits. Petroleum has been a leading export, although there is also some mining of phosphates, iron ore, lead, and zinc. Industry has expanded to more than 30 percent of GDP, with steel, textiles, and chemicals firmly established. Most development is concentrated in coastal areas, where tourism is the largest source of income; however, poverty is widespread in the subsistence farming and mining towns of the south. Rising oil exports underpinned rapid economic growth in the 1970s, but declining prices and reserves precipitated a tailspin in the early 1980s. Consequently, high unemployment, a large external debt, and growing budget and trade deficits led the government, with encouragement by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and World Bank, to abandon much of its former socialist orientation in favor of economic liberalization in the second half of the decade. Led by growth in the agriculture and food processing sectors, the economy rebounded strongly in the 1990s as the government endorsed further privatization and measures designed to attract foreign investment. As a result, the IMF has touted Tunisia as an example of how effective adjustment programs can be in developing nations if pursued faithfully. At the same time economic advances have not been accompanied by significant democratization measures, and government at all levels remains totally dominated by the ruling party.

GDP grew at an annual average of 5.7 percent from 1996–2000, with inflation running at 3 percent in 2000. The most worrisome economic indicator involved unemployment, estimated at 15 percent (higher among young workers). Although the IMF in early 2001 continued to praise the government for “prudent” economic policies, the fund called for intensification of the privatization program (the government still controls 40 percent of economic production). Real GDP growth was 6.2 percent for 2005, though unemployment remained high. The IMF in 2006, while again commending the government’s fiscal policies that continued to help strengthen the economy, urged reduction of the country’s external debt and reform of the banking sector. GDP growth was projected to be 8.4 percent for 2006, according to the IMF, partly due to the country’s opening up “substantially” to foreign trade.

Government and Politics

Political Background

Seat of the Carthaginian empire destroyed by Rome in 146 BC, Tunisia was successively conquered by Romans, Arabs, and Turks before being occupied by France in 1881 and becoming a French protectorate under a line of native rulers (beys) in 1883. Pressure for political reforms began after World War I and in 1934 resulted in establishment of the nationalist Neo-Destour (New Constitution) Party, which spearheaded the drive for independence under the leadership of Habib BOURGUIBA. Nationalist aspirations were further stimulated by World War II, and an initial breakdown in independence negotiations led to the outbreak of guerrilla warfare against the French in 1952. Internal autonomy was conceded by France on June 3, 1955, and on March 20, 1956, the protectorate was terminated, with the country gaining full independence.

A national constituent assembly controlled by the Neo-Destour Party voted on July 25, 1957, to abolish the monarchy and establish a republic with Bourguiba as president. A new constitution was adopted on June 1, 1959, while Bourguiba’s leadership and that of the party were overwhelmingly confirmed in presidential and legislative elections in 1959 and 1964.

Bourguiba was reelected in 1969, but his failing health precipitated a struggle for succession to the presidency. One-time front-runner Bahi LADGHAM, prime minister and secretary general of the party, was apparently too successful: the attention he received as chair of the Arab Superior Commission on Jordan and as effective executive during the president’s absences led to a falling-out with an eventually rejuvenated Bourguiba; he was dismissed in 1970 and replaced by Hedi NOUIRA. President Bourguiba encountered an additional challenge from Ahmed MESTIRI, interior minister and leader of the liberal wing of the party. The liberals succeeded in forcing democratization of the party structure during the Eighth Party Congress in October 1971, but Bourguiba subsequently reasserted his control over the party apparatus. Mestiri was expelled from the party in January 1972 and from his seat in the National Assembly in May 1973, while Bourguiba was named president for life on November 2, 1974.

In February 1980 Prime Minister Nouira suffered a stroke, and on April 24 Mohamed MZALI, the acting prime minister, was asked to form a new government. Mzali was reappointed following a general election on November 1, 1981, in which three additional parties were allowed to participate, although none secured legislative representation.

Political Status: Independent state since 1956; republic proclaimed July 25, 1957; under one-party dominant, presidential regime.

Area: 63,170 sq. mi. (163,610 sq. km.).

Population: 9,910,872 (2004C); 10,031,000 (2005E).

Major Urban Centers (2005E): TUNIS (734,000), Sfax (Safaqis, 269,000), Ariana (252,000), Ettadhamen (116,000).

Official Language: Arabic; French is widely spoken as a second language.

Monetary Unit: Dinar (market rate July 1, 2006: 1.32 dinars = $1US).

President: Gen. Zine El-Abidine BEN ALI (Democratic Constitutional Assembly); appointed prime minister on October 2, 1987; acceded to the presidency upon the deposition of Habib BOURGUIBA on November 7; returned to office, unopposed, at elections of April 2, 1989, and March 20, 1994; reelected in multicandidate balloting on October 24, 1999, and on October 24, 2004.

Prime Minister: Mohamed GHANNOUCHI (Democratic Constitutional Assembly); appointed by the president on November 17, 1999, to succeed Hamed KAROUI (Democratic Constitutional Assembly), who had resigned the same day.

Bourguiba dismissed Mzali on July 8, 1986, replacing him with Rachid SFAR, theretofore finance minister.

Gen. Zine El-Abidine BEN ALI was named to succeed Sfar on October 2, 1987, reportedly because of presidential displeasure at recent personnel decisions. Five weeks later, after a panel of doctors had declared the aged president medically unfit, Bourguiba was forced to step down in favor of Ben Ali, who designated Hedi BACCOUCHE as his prime ministerial successor.

Although widely termed a “bloodless coup,” the ouster of Bourguiba and succession of Ben Ali were in accord with relevant provisions of the Tunisian constitution. Moreover, the takeover was generally welcomed by Tunisians, who had become increasingly disturbed by Bourguiba’s erratic behavior and mounting government repression of the press, trade unions, legal opposition parties, and other sources of dissent, including the growing Islamic fundamentalist movement. (Following his deposition, Bourguiba retired from public view. He died in April 2000.)

Upon assuming office the Ben Ali government announced its commitment to domestic pluralism and launched a series of wide-ranging political and economic liberalization measures, which included the legalization of some political parties, the loosening of media restrictions, and the pardoning of more than 8,000 detainees, many of them fundamentalists. Additionally, in late 1988, the new regime negotiated a “national pact” regarding the country’s political, economic, and social future with a number of political and labor groups. However, the Islamic Tendency Movement (Mouvement de la Tendence Islamique—MTI) refused to sign the accord, foreshadowing a steady deterioration in relations between the fundamentalists and the government.

Presidential and legislative elections, originally scheduled for 1991, were moved up to April 2, 1989, Ben Ali declaring they would serve as an indication of the public’s satisfaction with the recent changes. No one challenged the popular Ben Ali in the presidential poll, but the legal opposition parties and fundamentalist independent candidates contested the House of Representatives balloting, albeit without success.

On September 27, 1989, Ben Ali dismissed Baccouche and named former Justice Minister Hamed KAROUI as prime minister. The change was reportedly precipitated by disagreement over economic policy, Baccouche having voiced concern over the “social effects” of the government’s austerity program. Shortly thereafter, the government announced the formation of a “higher council” to oversee implementation of the national pact, although several opposition parties and MTI followers, now operating as the Renaissance Party (Hizb al-Nahda—generally referenced as Nahda) boycotted the council’s meetings. Charging that the democratic process was in reality being “blocked” by the government, the opposition also refused to contest municipal elections in June 1990 or national by-elections in October 1991. Apparently in response to criticism that the government’s enthusiasm for democratization had waned as its antifundamentalist fervor had surged, electoral law changes were adopted in late 1993 to assure opposition parties of some legislative representation in the upcoming general election (see Legislature, below). Nevertheless, the RCD, officially credited with nearly 98 percent of the vote, won all 144 seats for which it was eligible in the balloting for a 163-member House on March 20, 1994. On the same date, Ben Ali was reelected without challenge, two potential independent candidates being stricken from the ballot by their failure to receive the required endorsement of at least 30 national legislators or municipal council presidents.

The RCD won control of all 257 municipal councils in local elections on May 21, 1995. While opposition candidates (standing in 47 municipalities) won only 6 of 4,090 seats, it was the first time since independence that the opposition had gained any such representation at all.

Ben Ali was reelected to a third full presidential term (then the constitutional limit) in balloting on October 24, 1999, securing more than 99 percent of the vote against two candidates presented by small opposition parties. Meanwhile, the RCD again secured all the seats for which it was eligible (148) in the concurrent legislative poll. Two days after being sworn in for his new term, President Ben Ali appointed Mohamed GHANNOUCHI, theretofore the minister for international cooperation and foreign investment, as the new prime minister.

Constitutional revision in 2002 removed the limit on the number of presidential terms, thereby permitting Ben Ali on October 24, 2004, to seek a fourth term, which he won with 95 percent of the vote against three other minor candidates. On the same date the RCD won all 152 seats contested on a district basis for an expanded assembly.

In the municipal election of May 8, 2005, to renew 264 councils comprising 4,366 seats, the RCD garnered 93.9 percent of the vote, while 4 opposition parties and 1 independent won representation with 6.1 percent of the vote. Three opposition groups whose candidates were barred from running boycotted the election.

Constitution and Government

The constitution of June 1, 1959, endowed the Tunisian Republic with a presidential system backed by the dominant position of the (then) Neo-Destour Party. The president was given exceptionally broad powers, including the right to designate the prime minister and to rule by decree during legislative adjournments. In addition, the incumbent was granted life tenure under a 1975 amendment to the basic law. In the wake of President Bourguiba’s ouster in 1987, the life presidency was abolished, the chief executive being limited to no more than three five-year terms. (See Current issues, below, for details of constitutional revision in 2002 affecting the presidency.) The succession procedure was also altered, the president of the House of Representatives being designated to serve as head of state for 45–60 days, pending a new election, at which he could not present himself as a candidate. Other changes included reduction of the role of prime minister from leader of the government to “coordinator” of ministerial activities.

The legislature was a unicameral body until 2005, with only a House of Representatives.

The House of Representatives (styled the National Assembly until 1981 and also referenced as the Chamber of Deputies) is elected by universal suffrage for a five-year term. Under Bourguiba it had limited authority and in practice was wholly dominated by the ruling party, whose highly developed, all-pervasive organization served to buttress presidential policies both nationally and locally. Constitutional changes approved in July 1988 contained measures designed to expand the House’s control and influence, although their impact has been minimal. Consultative bodies at the national level include a Social and Economic Council and a Higher Islamic Council. The judicial system is headed by a Court of Cassation and includes three courts of appeal, 13 courts of first instance, and 51 cantonal courts. Judges are appointed by the president. A new constitution approved in a referendum on May 26, 2002, and signed into law by the president on June 2, 2002, introduced a second legislative body, provisions for an upper house (House of Advisers, see below, under Legislature), removed presidential term limits, and raised the age limit for a presidential candidate to 75 (from 70), among other things.

Tunisia is administratively divided into 23 provinces, each headed by a governor appointed by the president. The governors are assisted by appointed government councils and 264 elected municipal councils.

Foreign Relations

Tunisia assumed a nonaligned posture at independence, establishing relations with both Eastern and Western countries, although placing particular emphasis on its relations with the West and with Arab governments. It became a member of the United Nations in 1956 and is active in all the UN-related agencies. It joined the Arab League in 1958 but boycotted its meetings from 1958 to 1961 and again in 1966 as a result of disagreements with the more “revolutionary” Arab states. As a signal of its support for peace negotiations (particularly the 1993 accord between Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization), Tunisia exchanged low-level economic representatives with Israel in October 1994 in what was considered a possible precursor to eventual establishment of full diplomatic relations. However, Tunisia recalled those representatives from Israel in 1997 as part of the broad Arab protest over a perceived intransigence on the part of the Netanyahu administration in Israel.

Beginning in 1979 a series of agreements were signed with Algeria, culminating in a March 1983 “Maghreb Fraternity and Co-Operation Treaty,” to which Mauritania acceded the following December. Relations with Libya, though reestablished in 1982 after a 1980 rupture over seizure of a southern town by alleged Libyan-trained insurgents, continued to be difficult. President Bourguiba’s visit to Washington in June 1985 led to a mass expulsion of Tunisian workers from Libya, as well as reported Libyan incursions into Tunisia and efforts to destabilize its government. After suspending relations with Tripoli in September 1986, Tunis resumed relations a year later following a pledge by Libya to reimburse the expelled workers. Further economic and social agreements, including provisions for the free movement of people and goods between the two countries, were announced in 1988 as Tunisia stepped up its call for regional cooperation and unity, the latter bearing fruit with the formation of the Arab Maghreb Union in February 1989 (see article under Intergovernmental Organizations). Also in 1988, relations were reestablished with Egypt after an eight-year lapse.

The Iraqi invasion of Kuwait in August 1990 appeared to precipitate a change in Tunisia’s theretofore unwavering pro-Western orientation. Although critical of the Iraqi occupation, Tunis strongly condemned the subsequent deployment of U.S. troops in Saudi Arabia and the allied bombing of Iraq in early 1991. However, security forces clamped down on large-scale pro-Iraqi demonstrations during the Gulf war, apparently out of concern that the situation might be exploited by Islamic fundamentalists.

President Ben Ali welcomed the antifundamentalist stance adopted by the Algerian military in early 1992, and Tunis was subsequently in the forefront of efforts among North African capitals to coordinate an “antiterrorist” campaign against Muslim militants. In October 1991 Tunisia recalled its ambassador from Sudan, charging Khartoum with fomenting fundamentalist unrest and providing sanctuary and financial support for groups intent on overthrowing the Tunisian government.

Tunisia is prominent among those nations hoping to develop economic cooperation, and possibly a free trade area, in the Mediterranean region. “Partnership” discussions have been emphasized with the European Union (EU), the focus of an estimated 80 percent of Tunisia’s trade, and Tunis signed an association agreement with the EU in 1995 that provided for the progressive reduction of tariffs (and elimination of many by 2008).

Current Issues

Government/fundamentalist conflict dominated domestic affairs in the early and mid-1990s, the Ben Ali regime denouncing Nahda adherents as “terrorists” intent on seizing power. However, the government’s own hard-line tactics were the subject of increasing domestic and international condemnation, human rights organizations accusing security forces of arbitrary detention and widespread mistreatment of prisoners. Government critics also alleged that the antifundamentalist campaign was being used to deflect attention from the RCD’s continuing status as “virtually a state party” and the retention of as many as 2,000 political prisoners. The situation was seen as creating a problem for Western capitals: on the one hand, the administration’s economic policies had generated widespread success while, on the other, its human rights record was difficult to condone. In 1998 the U.S. State Department described the Ben Ali administration as “intolerant of dissent,” and Amnesty International charged that human rights activists in Tunisia had themselves become the targets of intimidation and imprisonment.

Once again adopting a seemingly unnecessarily restrictive stance, the administration announced that candidates in the 1999 presidential election would be allowed to run only if they had served five years as the leader of a party currently represented in the legislature. Only two challengers qualified and, although the administration heralded the multicandidate nature of the balloting as an important democratization step, critics dismissed the poll as a “parody,” citing the fact that each opposition candidate won less than 0.5 percent of the vote. The RCD’s total domination of the concurrent legislative poll and the municipal elections in May 2000 further supported the argument that the legal opposition parties remained “subservient or marginalized.”

Perhaps in response to growing criticism in the West over human rights issues and the lack of genuine political liberalization, the government released some political prisoners in late 1999 and appeared to accept a more vocal dissent in 2000. However, this modest “Tunisian spring” was the focus of a crackdown in early 2001 as the administration faced intensifying attacks from domestic human rights organizations and challenges in the form of several high-profile petitions and manifestos.

In November 2001 the government introduced controversial proposed constitutional amendments that, among other things, called for the revocation of presidential term limits and the raising of the maximum age of presidential candidates from 70 to 75. Critics described the changes as being designed to permit Ben Ali, currently 65, to govern for many more years. A national referendum on May 26, 2002, approved the basic law revisions by more than 99 percent, according to official reports.

Another focus of attention in 2002 was a reported increase in activity on the part of radical Islamic militants. In April an Islamic Army for the Liberation of Holy Places claimed responsibility for a bomb attack on a synagogue on the island of Djerba that killed more than 20 people. Several months later it was reported that a senior al-Qaida leader had suggested that al-Qaida had also been involved in the bombing.

Despite continued criticism from human rights groups, there appeared to be little subsequent improvement in the treatment of political prisoners. Collaterally, in the wake of the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in the United States, Washington concentrated less on the issue of human rights and more on Tunisia’s antiterror efforts. (In December 2003 the Ben Ali administration adopted broad new antiterrorism legislation that critics claimed could be used to apply harsh penalties to nearly any crime.) Prior to the October 2004 presidential and legislative balloting, Ben Ali pledged to “deepen the democratic exercise,” but opposition parties characterized those elections as a “charade” that was simply propelling Ben Ali toward a “life presidency.” Among other things, the opposition candidates claimed they were victims of intense harassment by the government prior to the balloting.

In apparent response to ongoing criticism from human rights groups, the government agreed in early 2005 to change its detention policy, promising to hold prisoners in solitary confinement for no more than 10 days. (Human Rights Watch claimed Tunisia resorted to lengthy isolation terms for leaders of outlawed Islamist parties as a way of eradicating the Islamist movement.) Subsequently, in September 2005, the Tunisian Human Rights League (Ligue Tunisienne des Droits de l'Homme—LTDH [see Other Groups under Political Parties, below]) was banned from holding its conference.

Syria extradited 21 suspected Tunisian Islamists in 2005, raising concerns in Tunis and Washington. Tunisia, according to observers, has been intent on reassuring its Western allies that it will not allow extremists to stir trouble abroad, concurrently intensifying the government's resolve to exclude such groups from the country's political process.

Political Parties

Although not constitutionally mandated, Tunisia was effectively a one-party state from the time the Communist Party (PCT) was banned in January 1963 until its return to legal status in July 1981. In June 1981 the government had announced that recognition would be extended to all parties obtaining at least 5 percent of the valid votes in legislative balloting on November 1. On September 9 the PCT indicated that it would participate in the election after receiving official assurances that the 5 percent requirement would not be imposed in its case, and in 1983 recognition was extended to two additional opposition parties, the Popular Union Party (Parti de l'Unité Populaire—PUP) and the Democratic Socialist Movement (Mouvement des Démocrates Socialistes—MDS [below]). All three boycotted the 1986 election because of the rejection of many of their candidate lists and administrative suspension of their publications. In November 1987 the Ben Ali government endorsed the legalization of any party that would consent to certain conditions, one (advanced by the House of Representatives in April 1988) being that “no party has the right to refer, in its principles, its objectives, its activities or its programs, to religion, language, race or a regime,” a stipulation that served as a barrier to the legalization of militant Islamic groups. Prior to the 1989 balloting, the government party (RCD, below) offered to head an electoral front that would have guaranteed at least minimal opposition representation in the house. However, the proposal was rejected, ultimately to the dismay of the legal opposition parties, none of which succeeded in winning more than 3 percent of the popular vote. In April 1991 the Ben Ali government agreed to provide the six legal opposition parties with moderate state financial support and limited access to government-controlled television and radio broadcasting facilities. Subsequently, in what the administration described as a further effort to strengthen the role of the opposition parties, the RCD also offered not to present candidates for the House by-elections in October. However, the opposition boycotted the balloting as a protest against the government's unwillingness to revise the electoral law or reduce the RCD's “stranglehold” on the civil service. Electoral law changes guaranteed the opposition a minimal number of seats in the March 1994 national elections, but non-RCD candidates still secured less than 3 percent of the votes even though all the legal parties participated. The government announced in 1997 that the House would be expanded for the 1999 balloting and that electoral revision would attempt to promote opposition representation of up to 20 percent. The House was expanded to 182 members for the 1999 balloting, electoral revision in 1998 having guaranteed opposition representation of at least 34 members.

Government Party

Democratic Constitutional Assembly
(Rassemblement Constitutionnel Démocratique—RCD). Founded in 1934 as the Neo-Destour Party, a splinter from the old Destour (Constitution) Party, and known from October 1964 as the Destourian Socialist Party (Parti Socialiste Destourien—PSD), Tunisia's ruling party was given its present name in February 1988 to provide new impetus to “the practice of democracy” within its ranks. Its moderately left-wing tendency was of less political significance than its organizational strength, derived in large part from affiliated syndicates representing labor, agriculture, artisans and merchants, students, women, and youth. Party members have filled most major government positions since independence.

At the 12th party congress in June 1986 President Bourguiba personally selected a new 90-member Central Committee and 20-member Political Bureau, ignoring party statutes calling for election by delegates. By the end of the year the PSD had ended a 1985 rift in returning to close alignment with the General Union of Tunisian Workers (Union Générale des Travailleurs Tunisiens—UGTT). A special “Congress of Salvation,” held in Tunis July 29–31, 1988, endorsed the political liberalization policies of new President Ben Ali (who was reelected party chair), included a number of young party members in a new 150-member Central Committee, and named a new 12-member Political Bureau.

At a congress held July 29–31, 1993, Ben Ali was unanimously reelected party chair and designated as the RCD presidential candidate in the elections scheduled for March 1994. A new Central Committee was selected, more than half of its 200 members serving for the first time in a reflection of the RCD’s “revitalization” campaign that also included enlargement of the Political Bureau to include several young cabinet ministers and the first female member. In addition, the congress reconfirmed its commitment to free-market economic policies and stated its strong opposition to Islamic fundamentalist “militancy.”

The third RCD congress, held July 30–August 22, 1998, reelected Ben Ali as chair and nominated him as the party’s candidate for the 1999 presidential election, which he won with more than 99 percent of the vote. In the 1999 legislative balloting, the RCD secured 92 percent of the vote; municipal elections in May 2000 and May 2005 produced similar support for the RCD.

On October 24, 2004, Ben Ali won a fourth term with 95 percent of the vote against three other minor candidates.

Political Bureau: Gen. Zine El-Abidine BEN ALI (President of the Republic and President of the Party), Mohamed GHANNOUCHI (Prime Minister and Second Vice President of the Party), Hamed KAROUI (First Vice President of the Party and Former Prime Minister), Hédi MHENNI (Secretary General), Abdelaziz BEN DHIA, Abderrahim ZOUARI, Chedli NEFFATI, Dali JAZI, Fouad MBAZAA (President of the House of Representatives), Habib BEN YAHIA, Abdallah KALLEL, Neziha ZARROUK, Ali CHAOUCH.

Other Legal Parties

Democratic Socialist Movement (Mouvement des Démocrates Socialistes—MDS). Organized as the Democratic Socialist Group in October 1977 by a number of former PSD cabinet ministers who sought liberalization of the nation’s political life, the MDS was refused formal recognition in 1978, although its leader, Ahmed Mestiri, had served as an intermediary between the government and the trade union leadership in attempting to resolve labor unrest. The new grouping was runner-up at the 1981 election but obtained only 3.28 percent of the vote, thus failing to secure either legislative representation or legal status. However, recognition was granted by President Bourguiba in November 1983.

Mestiri was arrested in April 1986 and sentenced to four months in prison for leading demonstrations against the U.S. bombing of Libya. The conviction automatically disqualified him from running for legislative office, the MDS thereupon becoming an early advocate of the November electoral boycott. (Under the amnesty program initiated by the Ben Ali government in late 1987, Mestiri was pardoned for the conviction.) The MDS fared poorly in the 1989 balloting, and Mestiri was criticized for rejecting the RCD’s preelection offer of an electoral front with the MDS and other parties. Subsequently, Mestiri resigned as MDS secretary general, assistant secretary general Dali Jazi having earlier quit the party to join the government. Mestiri was reported to have left the party altogether in early 1992, as criticism grew of the “authoritarian” approach of its new leader, Mohamed Mouada. Factionalization also contributed to the “suspension” by the MDS of another of its prominent leaders, Mustafa BEN Jaafar.

The MDS supported President Ben Ali for reelection in 1994 but challenged the RCD in the national legislative balloting. Although no MDS candidates were successful on their own, ten were subsequently seated in the house under the proportional arrangement enacted to guarantee a multi-party legislature.

In early October 1995 Mouada published a letter criticizing the “lack of political freedom” in Tunisia. Within days he was arrested on charges of having had illegal contacts with representatives of the Libyan government, and in February 1996 he was sentenced to 11 years in prison. Mouada dismissed the charges as “obviously politically motivated,” and his conviction was widely condemned by international observers. Khemais CHAMMARI, a member of the MDS as well as the House of Representatives, was also given a five-year sentence in July for “attacking state security.” Both men were released in December, although Mouada was briefly detained again one year later. Meanwhile, an MDS congress in May 1997 had elected Ismaïl Boulahia to the new leadership post of secretary general, his discussion of the future of the “new MDS” apparently reflecting a diminution of Mouada’s authority. However, Boulahia was not eligible to contest the 1999 presidential election, since he had not held his MDS post the requisite five years, and he subsequently announced the MDS was supporting President Ben Ali for reelection. Meanwhile, the party secured 13 seats in the legislative balloting of 1999, again thanks solely to electoral law guarantees regarding opposition representation.

Mouada was held under house arrest for one month in late 1999 on a charge of defaming the government, and in early 2001 he issued a joint declaration with Nahda leader Rachid Ghanouchi calling for creation of a joint antigovernment front. However, apparently underscoring continued disagreement within the MDS regarding the extent of cooperation with the regime, Boulahia met with President Ben Ali in early 2001 and praised his commitment to “democratic values.” The party supported Ben Ali in the 2004 presidential election and won representation in municipal elections of 2005. Meanwhile, Ben Jafaar continued his heavy criticism of the administration through an unrecognized grouping called the Democratic Forum for Labor and Liberties (Forum Démocratique pour le Travail et les Libertés—FDTL), of which he was described as the secretary general, and the National Council for Tunisian Freedoms (Conseil National pour les Libertés—CNLT [below]), of which he was a founding member.

Leaders: Mohamed MOUADA, Ismaïl BOULAHIA (Secretary General).

Renewal Movement (Harakat Ettajdid/Mouvement de la Rénovation—MR). The Renewal Movement is heir to the Tunisian Communist Party (Parti Communiste Tunisien—PCT), which was founded in 1934 as an entity distinct from the French Communist Party. The PCT was outlawed in 1963 and regained legality in July 1981. Historically of quite limited membership, the party secured only 0.78 percent of the vote at the 1981 legislative balloting. Prior to the opposition boycott, the PCT had intended to participate in the 1986 election in alliance with the RSP (below). Delegates to the party’s 1987 congress denounced IMF-supported changes in the government’s economic policies, particularly the emphasis on the private sector and free-market activity. Subsequently, the PCT supported the political reforms instituted by the Ben Ali government, before joining the MDS and MUP in boycotting the municipal elections in 1990 to protest the “failure” of democratization efforts.

The party’s new name was adopted at an April 1993 congress, leaders announcing that Marxism had been dropped as official doctrine in favor of a “progressive” platform favoring “democratic pluralism.” None of the MR’s 93 candidates was successful in the 1994 national legislative balloting, although four MR members were subsequently seated in the House under the proportional arrangement established for opposition parties. Party leaders complained of widespread fraud in the legislative balloting and described Tunisia’s slow pace of political liberalization as a national “scandal.”

The MR secretary general, Mohamed Harmel, was constitutionally prohibited from contesting the 1999 presidential election due to his age (70). The MR was accorded five seats in the legislature elected in 1999.

MR Chair Mohamed Ali el-Halouani was one of three candidates to oppose President Ben Ali in the 2004 elections. In a rare occurrence, MR supporters demonstrated in Tunis after el-Halouani complained that the party had been blocked from distributing its manifesto. El-Halouani received about 1 percent of the vote and denounced the poll as a “sham.”

Leaders: Mohamed Ali el-HALOUANI (Chair and 2004 presidential candidate), Boujamma RMILI, Mohamed HARMEL (Secretary General).

Unionist Democratic Union (Union Démocratique Unioniste—UDU). Legalized in November 1988, the UDU was led by Abderrahmane TLILI, a former member of the RCD who had resigned from the ruling party to devote himself to the unification of various Arab nationalist tendencies in Tunisia. Tlili garnered 0.23 percent of the vote in the 1999 presidential balloting, the UDU securing seven of the seats distributed to the opposition following the concurrent legislative poll.

Tlili was sentenced to nine years in prison in 2004 on embezzlement charges relating to his former government tenure. The UDU supported President Ben Ali in the 2004 presidential election and won representation in municipal elections in 2005.

Popular Union Party (Parti de l'Unité Populaire—PUP). The PUP is an outgrowth of an “internal faction” that developed within the Popular Unity Movement (MUP, below) over the issue of participation in the 1981 legislative election. Although garnering only 0.81 percent of the vote in 1981, it was officially recognized in 1983 as a legal party, subsequently operating under its current name. The PUP attempted to offer candidates for the 1986 balloting, but most were declared ineligible by the government. The party therefore withdrew three days before the election, citing the same harassment that had led to the boycott by other opposition groups. It participated in “national pact” discussions with the government in 1988, thus asserting an identity separate from that of its parent. PUP Secretary General Mohamed Belhadj Amor won 0.31 percent of the vote in the 1999 presidential campaign, during which he expressed deep dismay over the failure of the so-called “opposition parties” to mount any effective challenge to the RCD. He subsequently resigned the PUP leadership post. His successor, Mohamed Bouchiha, received 3.8 percent of the vote in the 2004 election.

The party won representation in the 2005 municipal elections.

Leaders: Jalloud AZZOUNA, Mohamed Belhadj AMOR (1999 presidential candidate), Mohamed BOUCHIHA (Secretary General and 2004 presidential candidate).

Progressive Democratic Assembly (Rassemblement Démocratique Progressiste—RDP). The RDP had been established as the Progressive Socialist Assembly (Rassemblement Socialiste Progressiste—RSP) by a number of Marxist groups in 1983. The pan-Arabist RSP was tolerated by the Bourguiba government until mid-1986. It formed a “Democratic Alliance” with the PCT and planned to field candidates for the 1986 balloting. However, the coalition boycotted the election after the government disqualified some of its candidates and sentenced 14 of its members to six-month jail terms for belonging to an illegal organization. The party was officially recognized in September 1988. The RSP did not secure any of the legislative seats reserved for opposition parties in 1994 or 1999, and it called for a boycott of the municipal elections of May 2000. The RSP changed its name to the RDP in July 2001 in an effort to “broaden its ideological base.” The RDP reportedly included many Marxists as well as moderate Islamists and liberals.

RDP Secretary General Ahmed Chebbi was blocked from contesting the 2004 presidential election because of a recent decree by President Ben Ali that candidates could be presented only by parties with legislative representation. The RDP consequently called for a boycott of the presidential balloting and withdrew its candidates from the legislative poll.

Leader: Ahmed Néjib CHEBBI (Secretary General).

Liberal Social Party (Parti Social Liberal—PSL). Formed to advocate liberal social and political policies and economic reforms, including the privatization of state-run enterprises, the PSL was officially recognized in September 1988 under the name of the Social Party for Progress (Parti Social pour le Progrès—PSP). The current name was adopted at the first party congress, held in Tunis on October 29–30, 1994. The PSL secured 2 of the 34 seats reserved for opposition parties in the 1999 legislative balloting. PSL Secretary General Mounir Beji won less than 1 percent of the vote in the 2004 presidential poll.

At the party congress in April 2005, Beji was re-elected president, and the party changed its name to the Liberal Social Democratic Party (PSDL). The party won representation in the May 2005 municipal elections.

Leaders: Hosni HAMMANI, Mounir BEJI (President of the Party and 2004 presidential candidate).

Democratic Forum for Labor and Liberties (Le Forum Démocratique pour le Travail et les Libertés—FDTL). Legalized in 2002, the FDTL called for a boycott of the 2004 elections and urged opposition parties to work toward cohesion.

Leader: Mustafa BEN JAFAR.

Other Groups

Popular Unity Movement (Mouvement de l'Unité Populaire—MUP). The MUP was formed in 1973 by Ahmed Ben Salah, a former “super-minister” who directed the economic policies of the Bourguiba cabinet from 1962 to 1969. Ben Salah was sentenced to ten years’ imprisonment in 1969 for “high treason,” although the action was generally attributed to his having fallen out of favor with Bourguiba. After his escape from prison in 1973, Ben Salah directed the MUP from exile, urging the government to return to the socialist policies of the 1960s. The movement reorganized itself as a political party in June 1978 but was unable to gain legal recognition. In early 1981 friction developed within the MUP leadership after the government granted amnesty to all members theretofore subject to legal restriction, the sole exception being Ben Salah. Ben Salah subsequently declared his opposition to the group’s participation in the November 1 balloting, causing a split between his supporters and an “internal” faction (see PUP, above). After maintaining a high international profile throughout his exile, Ben Salah returned to Tunisia in 1988 in the wake of Bourguiba’s ouster. However, the MUP did not sign the “national pact” of late 1988, primarily to protest the government’s refusal to restore Ben Salah’s civil rights, a requirement for his participation in national elections. The MUP joined two legal parties (the MDS and the PCT, above) in an antigovernment coalition in 1990.

Ben Salah was one of several opposition leaders who issued a joint communiqué in London in November 1995 attacking the Tunisian government as repressive. In 1996 the MUP leader was described by Africa Confidential as no longer commanding a significant popular base, and he returned to Tunisia from ten years of voluntary exile in Europe in September 2000.

Leader: Ahmed BEN SALAH (General Secretary).

Renaissance Party (Hizb al-Nahda/Parti de la Renaissance—PR). Also known as the Renaissance Movement (Harakat al-Nahda/Mouvement de la Renaissance), Nahda was formed as the Islamic Tendency Movement (Mouvement de la Tendance Islamique—MTI) in early 1981 by a group of Islamic fundamentalists inspired by the 1979 Iranian revolution. Charged with fomenting disturbances, many MTI adherents were jailed during a series of subsequent crackdowns by the Bourguiba government. However, the MTI insisted that it opposed violence or other “revolutionary activity,” and the Ben Ali government pardoned most of those incarcerated, including the movement’s leader, Rachid Ghanouchi, shortly after assuming power. The new regime also initiated talks that it said were designed to provide moderate MTI forces with a legitimate means of political expression in order to undercut support for the movement's radical elements. As an outgrowth of that process, the MTI adopted its new name in early 1989; however, the government subsequently denied legal status to Nahda, ostensibly on the grounds that it remained religion-based. Undaunted, the group quickly established itself as the government's primary opposition, its "independent" candidates collecting about 13 percent of the total popular vote (including as much as 30 percent of the vote in some urban areas) in 1989 legislative balloting.

Nahda boycotted "higher council" negotiations and municipal elections in 1990, Ghanouchi remaining in exile to protest the lack of legal recognition for the formation and the continued "harassment" of its sympathizers. Friction intensified late in the year following the arrest of three groups of what security forces described as armed extremists plotting to overthrow the government. Although the government alleged that some of those arrested had Nahda links, the party leadership strongly denied the charge, accusing the regime of conducting a propaganda campaign aimed at discrediting the fundamentalist movement in order to prevent it from assuming its rightful political role.

On October 15, 1991, the government announced that it had uncovered a fundamentalist plot to assassinate President Ben Ali and other government officials in order to "create a constitutional vacuum." However, Nahda leaders again denied any connection to violent antigovernment activity, reiterating their commitment to "peaceful methods" of protest and stressing that their vision for the "Islamization" of Tunisia was "compatible" with democracy and a pluralistic society. The disclaimers notwithstanding, the government flatly labeled Nahda "a terrorist organization" and intensified the campaign to "silence" it. Thousands of suspected Nahda sympathizers were detained, many later claiming that they had been tortured or otherwise abused in prison (a charge supported by Amnesty International). At a widely publicized trial in mid-1992 about 170 Nahda adherents were convicted of sedition. A number were sentenced to life imprisonment, including Ghanouchi and several other leaders who were tried in absentia. The government subsequently issued an international arrest warrant for Ghanouchi, who was living in London, but in mid-1993 the United Kingdom granted him political asylum. In 1994 Ghanouchi dismissed the recent Tunisian presidential and legislative elections as "a joke." Despite the "banned and fragmented" status of Nahda, Ghanouchi was described in 1996 as still the only possible "serious challenger" to Ben Ali. A number of Nahda adherents were released in November 1999 from long prison terms. In March 2001 Ghanouchi, in conjunction with MDS leader Mohamed Mouada, proposed establishment by Nahda and the legal opposition parties of a National Democratic Front to challenge the RCD, suggesting to some observers that Nahda hoped to return to mainstream political activity. However, Nahda remained relatively quiescent during the 2004 election campaign.

Leaders: Rachid GHANOUCI (President, in exile), Habib ELLOUZE, Sahah KARKAR (in exile), Sheikh Abdelfatah MOURROU (Secretary General).

Commandos of Sacrifice (Commandos du Sacrifice—CS). Although the government insisted that the CS was the "military wing" of Nahda, the group's leader, Habib Laasoued, described it as independent and, in fact, a rival to Nahda for support among fundamentalists. About 100 members of the commandos were convicted in mid-1992 of planning terrorist acts, although the trials were surrounded by allegations of human rights abuses and other governmental misconduct. Laasoued, who was sentenced to life imprisonment, reportedly acknowledged that the commandos had engaged in theoretical discussions of jihād (Islamic holy war) but denied that any antigovernment military action had actually been endorsed.

Leader: Habib LAASOUED (imprisoned).

Party of Tunisian Communist Workers (Parti des Ouvriers Communistes Tunisiens—POCT). An unrecognized splinter of the former PCT, the POCT is led by Hamma Hammani, who had been the director of the banned newspaper El Badil (The Alternative). Hammani was sentenced to eight years in prison in early 1994 on several charges, including membership in an illegal organization, his case being prominently cited in criticism leveled at the government by human rights organizations. Hammani and another POCT member who had been imprisoned with him were pardoned by President Ben Ali in November 1995. A number of POCT members were convicted in July 1999 of belonging to an illegal association, but most were released later in the year. Hammani and several associates were charged again in absentia in 1999 for having been members of an unrecognized group. In February 2002 they were retried and committed to various prison sentences. In September, however, Hammani and some of the others were released following a hunger strike that had attracted increasing international scrutiny to their case. Hammani called for a boycott of the 2004 elections.

Leader: Hamma HAMMANI.

Several human rights groups have been prominent in the increasingly vocal opposition movement in recent years. They include the unrecognized National Council for Tunisian Freedoms (Conseil National pour les Libertés Tunisiennes—CNLT), founded in 1998 by, among others, Moncef MARZOUKI, who had unsuccessfully attempted to run for president in 1994. In a case that attracted wide international attention, Marzouki was sentenced in December 2000 to one year in prison for belonging to an illegal organization. Meanwhile, as of early 2001 the status of the officially sanctioned Tunisian Human Rights League (Ligue Tunisienne des Droits de l'Homme—LTDH) remained unclear, a Tunisian court having ordered new elections for LTDH leadership posts. The leaders elected in October 2000, including LTDH President Mokhtar TRIFI, had sharply condemned the Ben Ali government after wresting control of the organization from RCD adherents. Trifi was arrested in March 2001.

In mid-1994 it was reported that a militant Islamic group had been organized among Tunisian exiles under the leadership of Mohamed Ali el-HORANI to support armed struggle against the Ben Ali government. The group, which reportedly adopted the name of Algeria's outlawed Islamic Salvation Front (Front Islamique du Salut—FIS), was described as critical of Nahda's official rejection of violence. References have also been made to a Tunisian Islamic Front (Front Islamique Tunisien—FIT), which reportedly has committed itself to armed struggle against the Ben Ali regime. In addition, some 14 members of a fundamentalist group called Ansar were sentenced to jail terms in December 2000 for belonging to an illegal organization, which the government described as having Iranian ties.

Legislature

House of Representatives (Majlis al-Nuwab/Chambre des Députés). The lower house consists of 189 members serving five-year terms. Under a new system adopted for the 1994 election, most representatives (148 in 1999 and 152 in 2004) are elected on a “winner-takes-all” basis in which the party whose list gains the most votes in a district secures all the seats for that district. (There are 25 districts comprising 2 to 10 seats each.) The remaining seats (19 in 1994, 34 in 1999, and 37 in 2004) are allocated to parties that failed to win in any districts, in proportion to the parties' national vote totals.

From the establishment of the house in 1959 until 1994, members of the ruling party (RCD) occupied all seats. Although six opposition parties were permitted to offer candidates at the 1989 balloting and a number of independent candidates sponsored by the unsanctioned Renaissance Party also ran, the RCD won all seats with a reported 80 percent of the vote. RCD candidates also won all 9 seats contested in October 1991 by-elections, which were boycotted by the opposition parties. The house was enlarged from 141 members to 163 for the 1994 election and to 182 for the 1999 balloting. The membership was expanded to 189 seats for the most recent election on October 24, 2004, President Ben Ali decreeing that 43 seats be filled by women. The RCD won all 152 seats that were

Cabinet

As of July 1, 2006

Prime Minister
Secretary General of the Government in Charge of Relations with the House of Representatives and the House of Advisors

Mohamed Ghannouchi
Mounir Jaidane

Ministers

Agriculture and Water Resources	Mohamed Habib Haddad
Communication Technologies	Montassar Ouaili
Culture and Heritage Preservation	Mohamed El Aziz Ben Achour
Development and International Cooperation	Mohamed Nouri Jouini
Director of Presidential Cabinet	Tadh Ouderni
Education and Training	Sadok Korbi
Employment and Professional Integration of Youth	Chadli Laroussi
Equipment, Housing, and Territorial Management	Samira Khayach Belhadj [f]
Finance	Mohamed Rachid Kechiche
Foreign Affairs	Abdelawahab Abdallah
Higher Education	Lazhar Bou Ouni
Industry, Energy, and Small and Medium Enterprises	Afif Chelbi
Interior and Local Development	Rafik Belhaj Kacem
Justice and Human Rights	Béchir Tekkari
Minister of State (Special Advisor to the President)	Abdelaziz Ben Dhia
National Defense	Kamel Morjane
Prime Minister's Office	Zouhair Mdhaffer
Public Health	Ridha Kechrid
Religious Affairs	Boubaker El Akhzouri
Scientific Research, Technology, and Development of Training	Taieb Hadri
Social Affairs, Solidarity, and Tunisians Abroad	Ali Chaouch
State Property and Land Affairs	Ridha Grira
Tourism	Tijani Haddad
Trade and Handicrafts	Mondher Zenaïdi
Transport	Abderrahim Zouari
Women, Family, Children, and Elderly Affairs	Salova Ayachi Labben [f]
Youth, Sports, and Physical Education	Abdallah Kaâbi

[f] = female

contested on a district basis. However, under the proportional system for distributing 37 additional seats, five other parties were allocated seats as follows: The Democratic Socialist Movement, 14; the Popular Union Party, 11; the Unionist Democratic Union, 7; the Renewal Movement, 3; and the Liberal Social Party, 2.

President: Fouad MBAZAA.

House of Advisers. (Majlis al-Mustasharin). The upper body was seated after balloting on July 3, 2005, following a national referendum on May 26, 2002, that provided for several constitutional changes, the creation of the upper House among them. The upper chamber comprises 126 members, 85 of whom are directly elected and 41 appointed by the president, all serving six-year terms.

The members include 14 from each of the 3 main professional unions and federations (the employers' federation, the trade unions, and the farmers' union), and 43 representatives from various regions of the country. Half of the members are renewed every three years.

President: Abdallah KALLEL.

Communications

The media during most of the Bourguiba era were subject to pervasive party influence and increasingly repressive government interference. The Ben Ali government initially relaxed some of the restrictions, although the fundamentalist press remained heavily censored and mainstream publications continued to practice what was widely viewed as self-censorship, bordering on what one foreign correspondent described as "regime worship." In addition, several foreign journalists were subsequently expelled and some international publications were prevented from entering the country for printing articles critical of the government. (The French dailies Le Monde and Libération were banned from March 1994 until March 1995 because of their coverage of events prior to the national elections.) In recent years international journalists' groups have called for Western nations to apply pressure upon the Tunisian government to reduce what has been widely perceived as pervasive restraints on freedom of the press, including the arrests of journalists.

Press

The following, unless otherwise noted, are published daily in Tunis: As-Sabah (The Morning, 50,000), government-influenced, in Arabic; al-Amal (Action, 50,000), RCD organ, in Arabic; L'Action (50,000), RCD organ, in French; Le Temps (42,000), weekly in French; La Presse de Tunisie (40,000), government organ, in French;

Le Quotidien (The Daily, 30,000), independent, in French; Le Renouveau (23,000), RCD organ, in French; La Presse-Soir, evening; as-Sahafa, in Arabic; al-Huriyya, in Arabic; as-Shourouq (Sunrise), independent, in Arabic.

News Agencies

The domestic facility is Tunis Afrique Presse—TAP (Wakalah Tunis Afriqiyah al-Anba); in addition, a number of foreign bureaus maintain offices in Tunis.

Broadcasting and Computing

The Etablissement de la Radio-diffusion-Télévision Tunisienne (ERTT) operates a radio network broadcasting in Arabic, French, and Italian. It also operates three television channels, one of which links the country with European transmissions. The first privately owned radio station was launched in 2003, and the first private television station began broadcasting in early 2005. (Although President Ben Ali portrayed these developments as expansion of freedom of the press, thus far programming on the new stations has lacked political commentary.) There were approximately 3.9 million television receivers and 400,000 personal computers serving 630,000 Internet users in 2003.

Intergovernmental Representation

Ambassador to the U.S.

Mohamed Nejib HACHANA

U.S. Ambassador to Tunisia

William J. HUDSON

Permanent Representative to the UN

Ali HACHANI

IGO Memberships (Non-UN)

AfDB, AFESD, AMF, AMU, AU, BADEA, IDB, Interpol, IOM, LAS, NAM, OIC, OIF, WCO, WTO

Political Status: Independent member of the Commonwealth since October 9, 1962; republican constitution adopted on September 8, 1967; personal military rule (instituted on January 25, 1971) overthrown with establishment of provisional government on April 11, 1979; military regime installed on January 29, 1986; present constitution adopted on September 22, 1995, with effect from October 8.

Area: 93,104 sq. mi. (241,139 sq. km.).

Population: 24,748,977 (2002C); 27,282,000 (2005E).

Major Urban Center (2005E): KAMPALA (metropolitan area, 1,337,000).

Official Language: English (Swahili and Luganda are widely used).

Monetary Unit: New Shilling (principal rate July 1, 2006: 1,865 new shillings = $1US).

President: Lt. Gen. Yoweri Kaguta MUSEVENI; sworn in on January 29, 1986, following the overthrow of Lt. Gen. Tito OKELLO Lutwa on January 27; popularly elected on May 9, 1996, and inaugurated for a five-year term on May 12; reelected for another five-year term on March 12, 2001; reelected in multiparty balloting on February 23, 2006, and inaugurated for another five-year term on May 12.

Vice President: Gilbert Balibaseka BUKENYA, appointed by the president on June 6, 2003, succeeding Dr. Speciosa Wandira KAZIBWE, who resigned; reappointed by the president on May 23, 2006.

Prime Minister: Apolo NSIBAMBI; appointed by the president on April 6, 1999, succeeding Kintu MUSOKE; reappointed on July 13, 2001; reappointed by the president following elections on February 23, 2006, and sworn in with the new cabinet on June 2, 2006.

In mid-1995 planning for privatization reforms was under way, calling for the abolition of government subsidies to state-owned companies, except for public utilities, where the support was to be phased out over a four-year period.

In May 2000 the IMF and World Bank announced that Uganda had qualified for $2 billion in debt service relief over the next 20 years based on the government's adherence to its comprehensive reform program and continued economic progress. By mid-2005 real economic growth was offset by one of the highest population growth rates in the world and widespread poverty. Subsequently, the IMF in 2006 cited poverty reduction as the foremost economic issue for Uganda and urged reforms to curb corruption. Unhappy with the country's slow progress toward democratization and alleged corruption in government spending, the UK, traditionally Uganda's biggest donor, and three other donor countries canceled millions of dollars in aid to Kampala. On a more positive note, the IMF projected GDP growth of 6.6 percent for 2006.

Government and Politics

Political Background

Uganda became a British protectorate in 1894–1896 and began its progress toward statehood after World War II, achieving internal self-government on March 1, 1962, and full independence within the Commonwealth on October 9, 1962. A problem involving Buganda and three other traditional kingdoms was temporarily resolved by granting the kingdoms semiautonomous rule within a federal system. The arrangement enabled Buganda's representatives to participate in the national government, and the king (kabaka) of Buganda, Sir Edward Frederick MUTESA II, was elected president of Uganda on October 9, 1963. The issue of national unity versus Bugandan particularism led Prime Minister Apollo Milton OBOTE, leader of the Uganda People's Congress (UPC) and an advocate of centralism, to depose the president and vice president in February 1966. A constitution eliminating Buganda's autonomous status was ratified in Africa. The success of economic reform was minimal through 1993; annual per capita gross national product (GNP) remained less than $200, while schools and health facilities continued to be severely underfinanced.

April 1966 by the National Assembly, which consisted mainly of UPC members. Failing in an effort to mobilize effective resistance to the new government, the kabaka fled the country in May, and a new republican constitution, adopted in September 1967, eliminated the special status of Buganda and the other kingdoms. Earlier, on April 15, 1966, Obote had been designated president by the National Assembly for a five-year term. In December 1969 he banned all opposition parties and established a one-party state with a socialist program known as the Common Man's Charter.

On January 25, 1971, Maj. Gen. Idi AMIN Dada, commander in chief of the army and air force, mounted a successful coup that deposed Obote while the president was abroad at a Commonwealth meeting. In addition to continuing the ban on opposition political activity, Amin suspended parts of the constitution, dissolved the National Assembly, and secured his own installation as president of the Republic.

Following an invasion by Tanzanian troops and exile forces organized as the Uganda National Liberation Army (UNLA), the Amin regime, which had drawn worldwide condemnation for atrocities against perceived opponents, was effectively overthrown with the fall of Kampala April 10–11, 1979, with Amin fleeing to Libya. Concurrently, the National Consultative Council (NCC) of the Uganda National Liberation Front (UNLF) designated Professor Yusuf K. LULE, former vice chancellor of Makerere University, as president of the republic and head of a provisional government. On June 20 the NCC announced that Godfrey Lukongwa BINAIISA, a former attorney general under President Obote, had been named to succeed Lule in both capacities.

After a series of disagreements with both the NCC and the UNLF's Military Commission, Binaiisa was relieved of his authority on May 12, 1980. On May 18 the chair of the Military Commission, Paulo MUWANGA, announced that a three-member Presidential Commission had been established to exercise executive power through a cabinet of ministers on advice of its military counterpart, pending a national election later in the year.

Former president Obote returned from Tanzania on May 27, 1980, and in mid-June agreement was reached between party and UNLF representatives on four groups that would be permitted to participate in the presidential/legislative campaign. Following balloting December 10–11, the UPC declared that it had secured a majority in the National Assembly, thus assuring Obote's reinvestiture as chief executive. Although the runner-up Democratic Party (DP) denounced the results as fraudulent, most victorious DP candidates took their legislative seats. The Uganda Patriotic Movement (UPM), led by former president Lule and his former defense minister, Yoweri MUSEVENI, refused to accept the one seat it had won. After shedding the party apparatus, Lule and Museveni formed a National Resistance Movement (NRM) and initiated a guerrilla campaign against Obote through the affiliated National Resistance Army (NRA).

During the next five years, while the UNLA achieved some success in repulsing the rebels, the NRA continued to hold the agriculturally important "Luwero triangle" north of Kampala, as well as its traditional strongholds in the Banyankore-dominated southwest. During the same period, many army actions against civilians were reported, including the harassment, wounding, or killing of DP members; by mid-1985, more than 200,000 were estimated to have died, either from army "excesses" or official counterinsurgency efforts.

On July 27, 1985, in a self-proclaimed attempt to "stop the killing," Brig. Basilio Olara OKELLO led a senior officers' coup against Obote, who had lost much international support and was again forced into exile. Two days later the constitution was suspended, and Obote's army chief of staff, Lt. Gen. Tito OKELLO Lutwa, was sworn in as chair of a ruling Military Council. On August 6 General Okello called for all guerrilla groups, including former Amin soldiers, to join his army, while naming Paulo Muwanga, who had served as Obote's vice president, as prime minister and DP leader Paul SSEMOGERERE as minister of the interior. Unlike most other resistance leaders, Museveni, the dominant NRM figure following Lule's death in January 1985, did not accede to Okello's call for “unity,” citing continued abuses by army personnel who routinely failed to defer to Okello. In contrast, the NRA had a reputation for being well disciplined, relatively free of tribal rivalries, and far less brutal toward civilians.

By September 1985, when the first of a series of Kenyan- and Tanzanian-mediated peace talks began in Dar es Salaam, NRA forces had taken control of a number of strategic towns and supply routes, while another Obote associate, Abraham WALIGO, replaced Muwanga as prime minister. In November Museveni announced that “in order to provide services pending an agreement with the regime in Kampala,” an “interim administration” was being established in rebel-held areas. A peace pact signed in Nairobi on December 17 gave Museveni the vice-chairmanship of the Military Council while providing for the dissolution of all existing armed units and the recruitment, under external supervision, of a new, fully representative force. However, the accord did not take effect: After failing to attend “celebrations” scheduled for January 4, 1986, Museveni, citing continuing human-rights abuses, launched a drive on Kampala, which culminated in the overthrow of the six-month-old Okello regime on January 27. Two days later, while NRA forces consolidated their control, Museveni was sworn in as president, thereafter appointing a cabinet that included as prime minister Dr. Samson KISEKKA, formerly the NRM’s external spokesman. In an attempt to prevent further civil war, Museveni also named representatives of other major political groups to his government. However, some UNLA units that had not disbanded fled to the north and the east, where they and other rebel groups continued to resist the NRA.

In mid-1986 Museveni absolved his immediate predecessor, General Okello, of atrocities committed by troops under his command. No such tender was made to former presidents Amin and Obote, with Museveni calling for their repatriation from exile in Saudi Arabia and Zambia, respectively, to face charges by a special commission of inquiry established to review the “slaughter” of Bantu southerners by their Nilotic followers. (Obote died in Zambia in October 2005.)

In February 1988 Museveni named three deputy prime ministers, including DP leader Ssemogerere, to assist the ailing Kisekka. In addition, the cabinet was reshuffled to include more representatives from the north and east, where rebel activity continued to impede national reconciliation. An even more drastic reshuffle was ordered in April 1989 coincident with conversion of the theretofore appointive National Resistance Council (see under Constitution and government, below) into a largely elective body. Six months later the council voted to extend the government’s interim mandate (originally limited by President Museveni to four years) to January 1995. The action was justified by the minister of justice on the grounds that the country lacked the “essential political machinery and the logistics for the evolution of a democratic and a permanent stable government.”

On January 22, 1991, Museveni appointed Kisekka to the new, largely ceremonial position of vice president, with George Cosmas ADYEBO, a 43-year-old economist, named prime minister. The government subsequently conducted a “final sweep” against rebel forces in the north and east, and in July Kampala reported that its troops had decimated the rebel forces, killing 1,500 insurgents between March and July (many, Amnesty International charged, after perfunctory military trials) and absorbing many others into the NRA. In August the government described the remaining rebels, predominantly from Joseph KONY’s Uganda Democratic Christian Army, as “thugs” who had been reduced to raiding villages for food and whose earlier atrocities prevented their reintegration.

In January 1993 Museveni, who continued to reject domestic and international calls for the immediate introduction of multipartyism on the grounds that it would exacerbate religious and ethnic cleavages, announced plans for nonparty elections by the end of 1994. In February the NRC passed a constituent assembly bill that called for the delay of multiparty politics until at least the year 2000 (see Constitution and government, below).

Earlier, in what was described by critics as political repayment to the Baganda people for supporting the NRA struggle in the early 1980s, Museveni had begun negotiating with Baganda to restore its monarch. Consequently, on July 31, 1993, the son of Mutesa II, Ronald Muwenda MUTEBI, was crowned kabaka, an event described as a purely “ceremonial” action. Collaterally, pro forma recognition was granted to the coronation of Patrick David Matthew Olimi KABOYO II as monarch of the smaller Toro kingdom. (Kaboyo died on September 13, 1995, and was succeeded by his three-year-old son, Oyo Nyimba Kabamba IGURU IV.) On June 11, 1994, the oldest of Uganda’s historic kingdoms was restored, with the crowning of Solon Iguri GAFABUSA I as king of the Bunyoro tribe. (The crowning of John BARIGYE as monarch of Uganda’s Ankore kingdom was indefinitely delayed because of disputes within the clan leadership.) Meanwhile, on February 11, 1996, Henry Wako MULOKI, the Basoga’s traditional leader, was reinstated as kyabazinga (king) at a ceremony attended by Museveni.

On March 28, 1994, nonparty balloting was held to fill the 214-seat Constituent Assembly. As anticipated, NRM-affiliated candidates captured the majority of the seats (114), although the president’s actual assembly supporters were reported as numbering only 93.

In December 1994 the government announced that nonparty general elections would be held by late 1995; however, they were deferred until April–May 1996. Meanwhile, the Constituent Assembly on September 22 approved a new basic law that continued the ban on political campaigning and provided that the NRC would remain in existence for another five years. Upon promulgation of the document on October 8, the constituent body was dissolved.

At Uganda’s first presidential balloting on May 9, 1996, President Museveni captured 74.2 percent of the vote, easily outpolling his two competitors, the DP’s Ssemogerere (23.7 percent) and an Islamic candidate, Mohamed MAYANJA Kibirige (2.1 percent). Although Museveni controlled the media and local councils administering the polling, international observers described the polling as “fair.”

Thereafter, at “no-party” legislative polling staged between June 6–27, 1996, NRM candidates secured or were appointed to 271 of the 276 available posts. On July 6 Museveni named an enlarged cabinet that included only NRM members.

In early 1998 Museveni named his half-brother, Gen. Salim SALEH, as defense minister, a post held theretofore by the president himself. The appointment of Saleh, who had been credited with coordinating the government’s highly successful offensives against its various rebel opponents in mid-1997, underscored Museveni’s apparent dedication to a total rout of the Lord’s Resistance Army (LRA—see Political Parties and Groups, below), whose call for a cease-fire in July had been rejected. (Saleh resigned in December after allegations of corrupt financial dealings were made against him.)

In May 1998 Museveni reshuffled the government and, following the retirement of Prime Minister Musoke, on April 6, 1999, the president named Apolo NSIBAMBI to head a substantially altered cabinet. In a referendum on June 29, 2000, 90 percent of the voters endorsed continuance of the “no-party” system.

On March 12, 2001, President Museveni was reelected to another five-year term, securing 69 percent of the vote compared to 28 percent for his nearest rival, Kizza BESIGYE, Museveni’s former doctor and former military ally. Subsequently, the NRM retained its stronghold on the parliament in elections held on June 26, 2001. Although a dozen sitting cabinet members lost their legislative seats, most of them were beaten by other Museveni supporters. Following the elections, Museveni reappointed Prime Minister Nsibambi to head a significantly altered cabinet, which was sworn in on July 24. A constitutional referendum on July 28, 2005 (see Constitution and government, below), allowed for the registration of political parties, among other things, in advance of presidential and parliamentary elections on February 23, 2006. In the multi-party presidential election, Museveni defeated four challengers by garnering 59.26 percent of the vote. His nearest rival, Kizza Besigye, running as the Forum for Democratic Change (FDC) candidate, received 37.39 percent of the vote. The Democratic Party’s John SSEBAANA Kizito won 1.58 percent, and an independent candidate and Miria OBOTE, widow of the former president and candidate of the Uganda People's Congress (UPC), each won less than 1 percent.

In parliamentary elections the same day, the NRM retained power, winning 187 seats, while five opposition parties also won representation (see Legislature, below). A reshuffled and enlarged cabinet, again led by Prime Minister Apolo Nsibambi, was sworn in on June 2, 2006.

Constitution and Government

The 1962 constitution was suspended by Prime Minister Obote in February 1966. A successor instrument adopted in April 1966 terminated the federal system but was itself replaced in September 1967 by a republican constitution that established a president as head of state, chief executive, and commander in chief of the armed forces. While he did not formally revoke the 1967 constitution when he came to power, President Amin in February 1971 assumed judicial as well as executive and legislative powers. Subsequently, though martial law was never declared, military tribunals tried both civil and criminal cases and authorized numerous public executions. With but minor modification, the 1967 constitution was reinstated by the UNLF as the basis of postmilitary government in 1980; it was suspended by the Military Council in mid-1985 and remained inoperative thereafter.

On February 1, 1986, while in the process of organizing an interim government dominated by members of his National Resistance Movement (NRM), President Museveni announced the formation of a National Resistance Council (NRC) to serve as an appointive surrogate for the former National Assembly. The NRC was converted into a largely elective body of 278 members in February 1989.

In early 1993 a 15-member commission, appointed by President Museveni in February 1989, released a report proposing the delay of multipartism for seven years, during which time a largely elected Constituent Assembly would draft a new constitution. (Representatives of special interest groups, including the NRA, NRC, women, youths, and unions, were subsequently added to the 214-member parliament elected in March 1994.) However, the charter that emerged in September 1995 was promulgated without submission to a promised referendum. More importantly, it continued the ban on partisan activity (save behind closed party doors). In the wake of intense criticism from U.S. and British authorities, regime opponents sought to have the ban rescinded but were told that such action could be initiated only by the legislature elected under the constitution as adopted. The "no-party" system was subsequently endorsed by national referendum in June 2000.

Local government has assumed a variety of forms since 1971, the Amin and Lule governments both having reorganized the provincial and district systems. Currently, under initiatives adopted by the Museveni administration, local affairs are handled by several tiers of elected "resistance councils" ranging from village to regional levels.

President Museveni established a Constitutional Review Commission in 2001 to examine possible adaptations to the constitution regarding political parties, federalism, the size of parliament, and voter and candidate eligibility. Opponents criticized the commission as having a pro-NRM bias, having little genuine authority, and failing to reflect the broad spectrum of Ugandan public opinion.

In January 2004 the government initiated negotiations with opposition parties on the transition to multiparty politics and the future system of government. Six months later a court ruling invalidated (on a technicality) the 2000 referendum. Subsequently, as pressure for a multiparty system continued, the parliament voted in May 2005 in favor of a national referendum on a multiparty political system, abolishing the two-term limit on the presidency, and granting the president the authority to dissolve parliament in case of a constitutional crisis. In balloting of July 28, 2005, the amendments were approved by 92.44 percent of voters.

Foreign Relations

From independence, Uganda based its foreign policy on anticolonialism, retaining moderate

Western support from its consistently nonaligned posture. However, reacting to criticism by the Amin regime of U.S. policies in Vietnam, Cambodia, and the Middle East, Washington terminated its economic assistance program in mid-1973 and subsequently closed its embassy because of public threats against officials and other Americans residing in the country. Three years later, in an event of major international import, Israeli commandos raided Entebbe airport during the night of July 3–4, 1976, to secure the release of passengers of an Air France airliner that had been hijacked over Greece by Palestinian Arab guerrillas and flown to Uganda via Libya. Denying allegations that he had cooperated with the hijackers, Amin protested Israel's action and accused Kenya of aiding in its implementation.

Tensions with both Kenya and Tanzania resulted not only in the collapse of the tripartite East African Community (EAC) in June 1977 but ultimately in the Tanzanian military intervention of early 1979 (see Political background, above). The latter action came in the wake of an ill-conceived incursion into northern Tanzania in October 1978 by Ugandan troops, with effective Tanzanian withdrawal from Uganda not occurring until mid-1981 due to retraining requirements of the post-Amin Ugandan army. The two neighbors were critically involved in discussions between the short-lived Okello regime and the NRA, Kenyan president Moi being credited with brokering the December peace agreement between Okello and Museveni. Following Museveni's takeover in January 1986, both governments were quick to recognize the new regime, as was the United States. Nevertheless, relations with Kenya were subsequently strained by a series of border incidents, mutual accusations over the harboring of political dissidents, and Nairobi's displeasure at Ugandan links with Libya, particularly as manifested in an April 1989 trade accord. During a summit of the Ugandan, Kenyan, and Tanzanian presidents in Nairobi on November 22, 1991, the three declared an interest in reactivating cooperation efforts and appointed a three-member commission to draft an agreement.

Kampala concluded a security accord with Sudan in mid-1987 but subsequently charged that Khartoum was still aiding anti-Museveni rebel forces. Border tension intensified following the June 1989 coup in Sudan, precipitating the signing of another mutual nonaggression pact in April 1990, which provided for a Sudanese monitoring team on the Ugandan side of their border after Khartoum had accused Kampala of aiding the southern Sudanese rebels. Meanwhile, the Museveni administration accused former president Obote of training soldiers in Zambia, intimating that Lusaka was turning a blind eye to the activity.

Unrest in the Sudan and Zaire/Democratic Republic of the Congo has dominated Uganda's regional relations since the early 1990s. In October 1992 Kampala warned its northern neighbor that it would mount an "appropriate response" against Sudanese troops crossing the border in pursuit of rebels, and in January 1993 it expressed its concern that a Sudanese plot to launch an Islamic fundamentalist movement in Uganda was under way. Meanwhile, the approximately 20,000 Sudanese refugees within Uganda's borders were joined by thousands of Zairians fleeing unrest in their country.

In October 1994 Uganda canceled the 1990 agreement with its northern neighbor and ordered Sudan to withdraw its monitoring group, accusing it of activity incompatible with its mandate. In April 1995 Kampala severed relations with Khartoum, alleging improper activity by Sudanese diplomatic personnel and the sponsorship of a cross-border rebel attack on April 20. A subsequent agreement to adhere to "the principle of good neighborliness" and to work toward "the gradual and eventual restoration of full diplomatic relations" failed to bring an end to the border hostilities, with at least a limited number of Ugandan units operating in support of Sudanese rebels and the NRA conducting raids on Ugandan rebel bases inside Sudan.

Relations were restored with Kenya in January 1996 following a border summit between the two countries' leaders. The discussions also yielded mutual pledges to revive the dormant

EAC. However, the continuing fragile nature of Ugandan-Kenyan ties was subsequently underlined by Nairobi's charge that the Museveni regime was supporting Kenyan rebels.

Meanwhile, rebel-related activities along their shared border continued to buffet Ugandan-Sudanese relations in 1996, with President Museveni reportedly stating at midyear that the situation "could not get much worse unless the two countries went to war." Nevertheless, on September 9 diplomatic representatives from the two countries signed an agreement in Khartoum that reestablished ties. Highlights of the Iranian-brokered accord included provisions for the cessation of "hostile propaganda" and the removal of rebel groups from within approximately 60 miles of the border. In December 1999 President Museveni signed an agreement with Sudanese authorities calling for mutual elimination of support for rebel movements, but in mid-2000 Museveni complained that Sudan was not living up to its end of the bargain. Relations between Sudan and Uganda appeared to improve in 2001, as Sudan reportedly permitted Ugandan forces to conduct military action in Sudan against rebels in the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA). However, Uganda continued to accuse Sudan of helping the LRA, and rebel attacks—some targeting aid workers—continued.

Regional observers described Uganda as playing a crucial role in Laurent Kabila's ouster of the Mobutu government in Zaire (subsequently the Democratic Republic of the Congo—DRC) in 1997. Kampala denied actively supporting Kabila, although admitting that its troops had crossed the border in pursuit of Ugandan rebels. Clashes occurred in August 1999 and the spring of 2000 between previously allied Ugandan and Rwandan troops in Kisangani in north-central DRC. A UN-sponsored disengagement agreement in June 2000 brought relative peace to the area, although tensions between Ugandan and Rwandan military forces remained high. Negotiations between senior levels of the two governments under British auspices in November 2001 failed to resolve the underlying strains between the two countries.

On a positive note, in July 2003 a tripartite agreement was signed among Uganda, Rwanda, and the office of the UN High Commissioner on Refugees, providing for the voluntary repatriation of some 26,000 Rwandans in refugee camps in western Uganda. In February 2004 the two countries signed a bilateral agreement to strengthen cooperation in several fields. Yet Uganda still accuses Rwanda of aiding the rebel People's Redemption Army (PRA), said to operate in eastern Congo and West Nile. Uganda claims the PRA is the armed wing of the new opposition group Forum for Democratic Change (FDC) and its exiled leader, retired colonel Kizza Besigye. The FDC claimed to know nothing of the PRA and accused the government of inventing the connection to discredit the FDC. Both Uganda and Rwanda are accused of meddling in the Ituri Province of the DRC, arming rebels there in exchange for minerals. Museveni and Rwandan President Paul Kagame tried to defuse the situation. In May 2005, three Ugandan soldiers were tried for spying against Rwanda, and months later, as tensions eased, Uganda and Rwanda signed an extradition treaty to crack down on criminals crossing the borders. Meanwhile, Uganda denied UN claims that it was trading weapons for minerals with the DRC.

Current Issues

Uganda, for many years, was the African darling in the eyes of Western nations, which donated millions to back President Museveni's efforts toward democratization and economic reform. Bolstered by an IMF program, the economy recorded average growth of 6 percent in the late 1990s, and inflation plummeted from 240 percent in the late 1980s to 3 percent in the 1990s. However, corruption continued to be of concern, as well as rampant poverty among Uganda's rapidly growing population.

The 20-year war with rebels in the north continued to drain the economy well into the 2000s. According to the U.S. aid agency World Vision, the conflict cost Uganda more than $1.6 billion in lost economic development and left 1.5 million people displaced in refugee camps. The LRA's recruitment methods reportedly included abduction of children and cutting off the lips and noses of those who refused to cooperate. Peace talks collapsed in 2004, and hostilities continued, although Ugandan forces captured or killed several rebel leaders. In 2005 the International Criminal Court (ICC) took the unprecedented step of issuing arrest warrants for five LRA leaders, Joseph Kony among them, for alleged war crimes.

Key domestic issues were addressed in July 2005 with the launch of a multiparty system and extension of the president's time in office beyond the two-term limit as stated in the amended constitution. The national referendum on constitutional amendments did away with the "no-party" system in effect since Museveni took over in 1986, leaving the president's NRM to dominate government. Six opposition groups boycotted the referendum, claiming it was too costly and unnecessary as the groups' fundamental right to political association should not be subject to a vote. Observers said the national referendum was meant to placate donor nations that had been pressing for political reforms. The referendum also strengthened the NRM, which advocated the multiparty system prior to balloting (ostensibly to rid the party of dissenters), and allowed Museveni to take credit for progress toward democratization. The president's power was further increased by his securing a third elected term in multiparty balloting. Museveni's key challenger, Kizza Besigye, was arrested on rape and treason charges in Kampala shortly after he returned to Uganda in 2005 and declared he would be the FDC presidential candidate. His arrest sparked rioting in the capital city; ultimately, he was released on bail and cleared of the rape charge. While Besigye finished a distant second to Museveni, his FDC party secured 39 seats in parliamentary elections. The NRM, however, retained its dominance in the legislature. Given a new mandate, Museveni vowed his government would begin resettling villagers displaced by LRA rebels.

President Museveni attempted to conduct peace talks with Kony in July 2006, ultimately offering the rebel leader amnesty if Kony would agree to give up fighting. Following negotiations in August and a unilateral cease-fire called by Kony, the LRA and Museveni signed a peace treaty to be finalized on September 12. Under provisions of the agreement, the rebels were to leave Uganda and their bases in Sudan and the Democratic Republic of the Congo for areas designated and protected by the government of southern Sudan. Meanwhile, the Ugandan government acceded to the ICC order that it compensate families of those killed by LRA rebels.

Political Parties and Groups

In 1986 President Museveni ordered the suspension of political party activity pending the adoption of a new constitution, although several parties were allowed to maintain offices and small staffs. The 1989 elections were conducted on a "nonparty" basis, even though members of at least four parties (the Conservative Party [CP], the DP, UPC, and UPM) ran for office with their affiliations obvious to voters. Several others, principally political wings of military groups that had been absorbed by the NRA, had by then been effectively dissolved.

In March 1990 the government extended the formal party ban until 1995, President Museveni continuing to question the advisability of restoring a full-fledged multiparty system. Museveni's official explanation for banning political party activity was that it would cause ethnic divisions within the country. NRM officials claimed the country operated under a no-party system, although the opposition charged that the NRM operated as a party even though it claimed not to be one. Originally the ban on all party activity was to last until 2000, when the question of a multiparty system would be addressed in a referendum. The announced result of that referendum was that voters had said yes to a continued "no-party" system with the NRM in control, although the legality of the election was questioned by the opposition. Ultimately, a court invalidated the referendum on a technicality, but the issue of multiparty activity persisted and was addressed in a referendum on June 28, 2005, and a number of political groups emerged in Uganda to address the reforms and to contest the 2006 elections.

Originally the referendum questions of a multi-party versus a no-party system and the extension of presidential term limits were to appear on the same ballot. A “yes” vote for multiparty activity would have also meant a “yes” for term-limit extensions. In a remarkable show of independence in June 2005, Parliament voted to allow citizens to vote on each issue separately. Both amendments were approved by voters, though opposition groups styled the G6 (the FDC, UPC, DP, CP, the Justice Forum [JEEMA], and the Free Movement) boycotted the referendum, and turnout was low (officially 47 percent, though reports from exit polls put turnout at about 20 percent). Multiparty presidential and parliamentary elections were held for the first time in 20 years in February 2006.

Dominant Government Party

National Resistance Movement (NRM). The NRM was formed following the controversial 1980 election by former president Yusuf K. Lule and Yoweri Museveni, the former directing the political wing from exile in London and the latter leading internal guerrilla activity through the National Resistance Army (NRA). Upon his assumption of the presidency in January 1986, Museveni declared that the NRM was a “clear-headed movement” dedicated to the restoration of democracy in Uganda. Despite the ineffectiveness of subsequent membership drives, Museveni on several occasions suggested that the NRM could become the centerpiece of a one-party or limited-party state in which wide-ranging political expression would be permitted but ethnic and religious sectarianism avoided.

In a dramatic turnaround, however, Museveni sponsored the motion in parliament in 2005 for a national referendum on a multiparty system versus a “no-party” system. Museveni championed multiparty political activity, observers said, to appease western donors by assuring them of his intention to move toward a more democratic society. In addition, the multiparty ballot question was paired with a provision that would eliminate the two-term limit on the presidency, thus virtually assuring Museveni of a third five-year term. In the 2006 parliamentary elections, the NRM won 187 seats.

Leaders: Lt. Gen. Yoweri MUSEVENI (President of the Republic and Chair of the NRM), Moses KIGONGO (Vice Chair), Crispus KIYUNGA (National Political Commissar), Ofwono OPONDO (Spokesperson).

Other Legislative Parties

Uganda People’s Congress (UPC). The largely Protestant UPC was formed in 1960 with a stated commitment to “African socialism.” It served as the ruling party under former president Apollo Milton Obote from independence until 1971 and again from late 1980 to 1985. Despite the inclusion of several UPC adherents in the initial Museveni administration, friction persisted between the government and Obote loyalists, particularly hardliners who launched splinters such as the UPF in response to the pro-Museveni posture of their former colleagues.

In February 1991 the October 9 Movement, an Obote-led UPC faction named after the date of Ugandan independence, was reportedly operating from a Nairobi-subsidized “training camp” along the Ugandan border in Kenya. Obote’s chief of staff was identified as Lt. Col. John OGORE; also listed as movement leaders were Peter OTAI, former commander of the Uganda People’s Army (UPA), and Peter OWILI, known as “the butcher of Nile Mansions” for the brutal interrogation methods he employed during Obote’s presidency.

Despite living in exile in Zambia, Obote continued to control the UPC, and in June 1996 he ordered Assistant Secretary General Cecilia OGWAL not to participate in parliamentary elections. However, Ogwal, who had been credited with maintaining party unity after Obote’s departure, defied his edict and captured a seat. Consequently, Obote dismissed her and named James RWANYARARE party spokesman and chair of the UPC’s Presidential Policy Commission (i.e., de facto party leader).

For her part, Ogwal rejected Obote's authority to intervene and announced the formation of her own "task force," an act one observer described as an intraparty "coup" attempt. Her underfinanced splinter was subsequently described as unlikely to challenge Rwanyarare, although she remained a controversial figure in the party. In 2005 Obote dismissed Rwanyarare and dissolved the Presidential Policy Commission, replacing it with a Constitutional Steering Committee. Ultimately, a court ordered the party to sort out its differences following the death of Obote in October 2005. The former president's widow, Miria Kalule Obote, was elected party leader in November 2005. She placed last in 2006 presidential balloting with less than 1 percent of the vote. (She was the first woman presidential candidate in Uganda and the first woman to lead a major political party.) In concurrent parliamentary elections, the UPC won eight seats.

Leaders: Miria Kalule OBOTE (Party Leader and 2006 presidential candidate), Peter WALUBIRI (Secretary General), Akhbar Adoko NEKYON, Livingstone Okello OKELLO.

Democratic Party (DP). An advocate of centralization and a mixed economy that draws on a solid Roman Catholic base, the DP enjoys widespread support in southern Uganda. Officially, it ran second to the UPC in the post-Amin balloting of December 1980, winning 51 of 126 legislative seats, although the results were strongly challenged. The DP subsequently was weakened by defections to the UPC and sporadic harassment, killing, or detention of its leadership by the Obote government. While DP president Paul Ssemogerere joined the Okello cabinet, most DP leaders supported Museveni's NRA in continued guerrilla fighting. Several members of the DP executive committee were included in Museveni's first cabinet, and, despite reports of some deterioration in DP-NRM relations, Ssemogerere was named second deputy prime minister and foreign minister in February 1988; he retained both posts in the cabinet reorganization of July 1991.

In mid-1992 Ssemogerere was the reported leader of a cabinet revolt against Museveni's request for extension of the ban on political party activities; however, in May 1993 he advised party activists to curtail operations in the face of a presidential decree banning theretofore implicitly acceptable activities. In June 1995 the DP leader resigned as second deputy prime minister and minister of public service to position himself for the forthcoming presidential campaign.

In early 1996 the DP and the UPC forged an unofficial alliance, the Inter-Party Coalition (IPC), on the premise that in return for its support of DP candidates at the 1996 elections the UPC would be the opposition's standard-bearer at the next national elections. Subsequently, a number of UPC leaders made campaign appearances with Ssemogerere; however, following the DP leader's overwhelming electoral defeat, the UPC's Obote reportedly denied the coalition's existence. Collaterally, observers speculated that the alliance had cost Ssemogerere the votes of the Baganda people, who had been oppressed by Obote's regime and continued to resent him. Although Ssemogerere described the presidential polling as "rigged" in favor of the incumbent and subsequently boycotted the June legislative balloting, suggestions that the party would go into opposition were greeted with skepticism by observers, who cited the DP's history of participation in NRM governments. Subsequent to the June 2000 referendum (which the DP boycotted) on political party activity, Ssemogerere announced his intention to resign the party presidency, but he stayed on until his retirement in 2005. Factions within the party clashed in advance of the 2005 constitutional referendum but reportedly reunited a month later. John Ssebaana Kizito was elected party leader in November 2005, ending Ssemogerere's 25-year reign, and faction leader Hajji Ali Sserunjogi was elected vice president. Ssebaana finished third behind Museveni in the 2006 presidential election with 1.58 percent of the vote. In concurrent parliamentary elections, the DP won 11 seats.

Leaders: John SSEBAANA Kizito (President and 2006 presidential candidate), Hajji Ali SSERUNJOGI (Vice President), Joseph MUKIIBI (Chair), Ebil OTTOO (Secretary General).

Forum for Democratic Change (FDC). This opposition group was formed in July 2004 by a merger of the Reform Agenda, the Parliamentary Advocacy Forum, and the National Democratic Forum. The FDC's leader in exile, retired colonel Kizza Besigye, had challenged Museveni in the 2001 presidential election. Several opposition members of parliament previously affiliated with the UPC and DP reportedly joined the new group, which declared its intentions of becoming "a strong, democratic, mass organization."

Besigye returned from the United States in 2005 in order to participate in 2006 elections and drew large crowds at a number of rallies in areas that traditionally had supported Museveni. In what observers said was an attempt to prevent Besigye from challenging Museveni in the 2006 elections, Besigye was arrested in Kampala for allegedly supporting the rebel PRA based in the DRC and charged with treason. He was also charged with rape in connection with a 1997 case but was cleared of that charge in March 2006. Earlier, the FDC nominated him as the group's presidential candidate, and Besigye was freed on bail a month ahead of the 2006 presidential election. He came in a distant second to Museveni. The party won 39 seats in the concurrent parliamentary elections.

Leaders: Dr. Kizza BESIGYE (Party Leader and 2001 and 2006 presidential candidate), Sulaiman KIGGUNDU (Chair), Alice ALASO (Secretary General), Sam AKAKI (Spokesperson), Salaami MUSUMBA, Geoffrey EKANYA.

Conservative Party (CP). The CP is a small formation whose leader, prime minister of Baganda in 1964–1966, participated in the Okello and Museveni governments. CP has adopted to some extent the positions of the Baganda Royalist Movement, which has long sought restoration of the traditional Kingdom of Baganda.

In early 2005, rival factions divided the group, and a lengthy dispute over leadership ensued until May, when Mayanja Nkangi, on one side, reconciled with Yusufu Nsubuga Nsombu and John Ken Lukyamuzi on the other. Lukyamuzi, who supported the DP's Ssemogerere in the 1996 presidential election over Museveni, initially supported the FDC's Besigye in 2006, then said he would run for president but did not appear on the ballot. He was forced to leave Parliament in 2006 for allegedly breaking the law by failing to disclose his wealth. Subsequently, a dispute over his leadership of the party remained unresolved as of midyear. The party won 1 seat in the 2006 parliamentary elections.

Leaders: John Ken LUKYAMUZI (Secretary General), Ashe James SEKAGGYA (Vice Chair), Mayanja NKANGI, Yusufu NSUBUGA NSOMBU.

Justice Forum (Justice, Education, Economy, Morality, African unity—JEEMA). The Justice Forum was formed in October 1996 by Mohamed Mayanja Kibirige, who secured only 2.1 percent of the vote in the 1996 presidential election, to rally support for his candidacy in the 2001 presidential election. (Kibirige received just 1 percent of the vote in 2001.) In 2004 the group, which reportedly seeks a democratic, federal system of government, rejected a merger with the FDC.

Kibirige initially announced he would seek the presidency in 2006 but later withdrew.

Leaders: Mohamed MAYANJA Kibirige (President and 1996 and 2001 presidential candidate), Alex OJOK (Vice President), Hussein KYANJO (Secretary General).

Other Groups

Progressive Alliance Party (PAP). Established in April 2005 by Bernard Kibirige, a former aide to Brig. Henry TUMUKUNDE, who was dismissed from his post as Uganda's military intelligence chief, the PAP has had a divisive history.

Its leaders deny that they are front men for Tumukunde, who was arrested in May 2005. (Tumukunde played a key role in Museveni's 1996 and 2001 elections, allegedly using "strong-arm" tactics and military intelligence to help the president.) Meanwhile, a rival intelligence chief and former supporter of Museveni, David Pulkol, left the FDC to join the PAP in September 2005, prompting accusations from Kibirige and other party members that Pulkol was sent by the NRM to spy on and “destroy” the party. Subsequently, however, Pulkol, who also had ties to Tumukunde, was elected party president and nominated as the party’s presidential candidate for the 2006 election. Infighting in the party was blamed for his failing to meet the registration deadline, and in 2006 the group supported Kizza Besigye’s FDC candidacy. A month before the election, about 100 PAP members linked to Tumukunde defected to the NRM and demanded Tumukunde’s release. Reportedly, many of the defectors had been part of a “task force” organized by Tumukunde to support Museveni’s 2001 bid, and they left the PAP in part because the party had no presidential candidate for 2006.

Leaders: David PULKOL (President), Bernard KIBIRIGE (Secretary General), Dr. Kaddu MULINDWA (Interim Chair).

Other groups include The Freedom Movement, part of the so-called G6 group of opposition parties that opposed the 2005 constitutional referendum; Forces for Change, a splinter opposition group formed in March 2005 by Nasser Ntege SSEBAGALA and David Pulkol (who later joined the PAP); the Reform Party, a breakaway group from the FDC, led by Robert NDYOMUGYENYI; the National Peasants Party, led by Erias WAMALA; the Republican Women and Youth Party, led by Stella NAMBUYA; the People’s Independent Party, led by Yahaya KAMULEGEYA; Movement for Democratic Change, led by Paulsen KITIMBO; the Action Party, led by Nelson OCHEGER; the National People’s Organization, led by Abdu JAGWE; the National Convention for Democracy, led by Haji Jingo KAAYA; the Farmers Party of Uganda, led by Mudde Bombakka NSKIO; and the National Unity, Reconciliation, and Development Party, led by Sam SSEKAGYA.

Guerrilla Groups

Lord’s Resistance Army (LRA). The LRA first emerged in the late 1980s as Lakwena Part Two, a small, predominantly Acholi successor group to the Holy Spirit Movement that had been led by “voodoo priestess” Alice LAKWENA from 1986 until her flight to Kenya in 1987. Under the leadership of Joseph Kony, the anti-NRA rebels remained active in northern Uganda, and in early 1991 the militants reportedly began referring to themselves as the Uganda Democratic Christian Army. Following inconclusive negotiations with government representatives in early 1994, Kony and his supporters launched a new offensive under their current name, claiming they were fighting “a holy war against foreign occupation” and seeking to install a government guided by the biblical Ten Commandments.

Casualties linked to the insurgency reached a one-month high of approximately 200 in March 1996. Observers attributed the violent upsurge to the recent arrival from Sudan of freshly armed and trained LRA fighters, many of whom were believed to have been Ugandan youths kidnapped by Kony in 1995. Kidnappings and disfigurements of uncooperative villagers have caused an international condemnation of the LRA. Several attempts at peace talks have failed. In June 1996 Museveni offered amnesty to the “ordinary fighters” affiliated with the LRA and a second group, the West Bank Nile Front (WBNF, see below), but pledged to prosecute the groups’ leaders.

LRA bases in Sudan came under sustained attack by Sudanese rebel forces and the Ugandan Army beginning in April 1997, and in July LRA commanders reportedly called for a cease-fire. Subsequently, in the second half of 1997 Kony led his fighters in a series of cross-border raids, although the LRA had been forced to break into much smaller fighting cells than its usual 150–200 member units. Despite heavy casualties, according to government officials, the LRA continued to replenish its ranks by abducting teenage Ugandans and forcing them to march to Sudan for training and indoctrination.

In late 1998 a group of LRA dissidents led by Ronald Otim KOMAKECH reportedly split from the group following a dispute over the LRA’s alleged targeting of civilians; subsequently, Komakech formed the LRA–Democratic and allied the splinter with the Uganda National Front (UNRF, below). The level of LRA activities actually increased after a December 1999 treaty between Sudan and Uganda ostensibly designed to end support for guerrilla groups. LRA activity subsided in 2000–2001, largely due to behind-the-scenes negotiations mediated by the U.S.-based Carter Center in Atlanta, which tried to initiate talks with LRA leader Kony and his backers, the Sudanese government. In February 2001, however, LRA rebels attacked a northern Ugandan town and abducted 40 people. In March Ugandan wildlife authorities suspended game-viewing activities in parts of the northwestern Murchison Falls National Park following an alleged LRA ambush in which at least 10 people were killed. In 2004 gains made by the Ugandan People's Defense Force (UPDF) against the rebels seemed to compel the LRA to seek a cease-fire. By mid-2005, however, talks had not made significant progress. Meanwhile, evidence of cooperation between Sudanese and Ugandan troops against the LRA raised hopes that combined pressure might force Kony's group into meaningful negotiations. In 2005 the ICC issued arrest warrants for Kony and other LRA leaders.

Leaders: Joseph KONY, Vincent OTTI, Oti LAGONY (Military Commander).

Allied Democratic Forces (ADF). The ADF is reportedly composed of remnants of the late Amon BAZIRA's National Movement for the Liberation of Uganda, and Islamic militant fighters, styled the Salaaf Tabliqs, allegedly funded by the Sudanese government. ADF activity was first reported in 1995, but the group did not achieve prominence until 1997 when its numbers were reportedly swollen by the addition of former Zairean government forces and Rwandan Hutu Interhamwé fighters.

A government offensive in mid-1997 decimated the ADF's fighting strength and drove a majority of its fighters deep into the mountains of the Democratic Republic of the Congo. However, ADF militants were allegedly responsible for grenade attacks in Kampala in early 1998, and thereafter the ADF launched a series of attacks that claimed dozens of civilian lives. In February 1999 the ADF was accused of orchestrating a deadly bomb attack in Kampala. A number of ADF militants were killed in subsequent government raids, while the ADF was accused of killing both civilians and soldiers in several incidents throughout the rest of the year. In April 2000 the Ugandan government pulled out 2,000 soldiers from eastern DRC, claiming that the threat of cross-border ADF incursions was greatly reduced. Ugandan authorities in July arrested 28 ADF recruits accused of undertaking bomb attacks that have killed 67 people and injured 262 others since 1997. The ADF had resorted to urban terrorism after its ground insurgency was defeated in the mountains straddling Uganda's western border with the Democratic Republic of the Congo. Some ADF rebel leaders and fighters allegedly were trained in terrorist Osama bin Laden's Afghan camps, and in December 2001 the United States listed the ADF as a terrorist organization. Clashes between Ugandan forces and ADF rebels continued into 2006, with security forces arresting and killing many suspected ADF members in the western forests of Uganda. The militants reportedly were fleeing the DRC following fighting between the Congolese army and UN peacekeeping forces.

Leaders: Jamir MUKULU, Yusuf KABANDA.

West Bank Nile Front (WBNF). The WBNF was formed during the Obote era by West Nile people who had reportedly been forced to flee to Sudan and Zaire to escape government persecution. Although President Museveni successfully integrated most of the dissident West Nile leaders into his NRM regime and facilitated the repatriation of the majority of the remaining refugees, the WBNF, allegedly funded by Sudan and Zaire, remained active through the 1990s under the leadership of Maj. Juma ORIS. Prior to the 1996 presidential elections the WBNF was reported to have penetrated close to the provincial capital of Arua before being driven back by government forces.

In early 1997 WBNF bases in Zaire were overrun by Ugandan forces, and the rebels fled into Sudan where they suffered further heavy losses at the hands of Sudanese rebels. Oris was reportedly killed in February, and in March the group's deputy commander, Abdulatif Toya, was captured in Sudan. In August another WBNF leader, Hajji

Cabinet

As of August 1, 2006

Prime Minister	Apolo Nsibambi
First Deputy Prime Minister	Eriya Kategaya
Second Deputy Prime Minister	Henry Kajura
Third Deputy Prime Minister	Ali Kirunda Kivejinja
Office of the President	Beatrice Wabudeya [f]
Prime Minister's Office	Adolf Mwesige

Ministers

Agriculture, Animal Husbandry, and Fisheries	Hillary Onek
Defense	Dr. Crispus Kiyunga
East African Affairs	Eriya Kategaya
Education and Sports	Namirembe Bitamazire
Energy and Mineral Development	Daudi Migereko [f]
Finance	Dr. Ezra Suruma
Foreign Affairs	Sam Kutesa
Gender, Labor, and Social Development	Syda Bumba [f]
Health	Dr. Steven Mallinga
Information Communications Technology	Hamu Mullira
Information and National Guidance	Ali Kirunda Kivejinja
Internal Affairs	Ruhakana Rugunda
Justice and Constitutional Affairs and Attorney General	Kiddu Makubuya
Lands, Housing, and Urban Development	Omara Atubo
Local Government	Maj. Gen. Kahinda Otafiire
Public Service	Henry Kajura
Public Works	John Nasasira
Relief and Disaster Preparedness	Tarsis Kabwegyere
Security	Amama Mbabazi
Trade and Industry	Janat Mukwaya [f]
Water and Environment	Maria Mutagamba [f]
Without Portfolio	Dorothy Hyuha [f]

[f] = female

Kabeba, was arrested by government forces. In recent years WBNF activities have been extremely limited.

Leaders: Abdulatif TOYA (under arrest), Hajji KABEBA (Zairean-based Commander, under arrest), Zubair ATAMVAKU.

United Freedom Front/Army (UFF/A). The UFF/A was founded in London, United Kingdom, in February 1999 by Herman Ssemuju, former leader of the National Freedom Party, who had fled Uganda in 1998. (Ssemuju had run for president in 1996.) Among those in attendance at the UFF/A's launching were representatives of the LRA and ADF.

Leader: Herman SSEMUJU.

Other rebel groups have been formed in opposition to the government since Museveni's takeover in 1986, but their activities have mostly subsided or their members have been absorbed by government amnesties. The Uganda National Front (UNRF) led by Ali BAMUZE, for example, began softening its stance toward the regime in 1998, and in June 2002 the government announced that a cease-fire with the UNRF had been reached. In 1994 most of the Ruwenzuru, a 30-year-old Bakonjo autonomist group from the west, surrendered to the government, and responses to presidential amnesty continued after that.

Legislature

The former National Assembly was dissolved following the July 1985 coup. On February 1, 1986, an appointed National Resistance Council (NRC) of 23 members was sworn in to serve as an interim legislature, its enactments being subject to presidential approval. Additional members were named in subsequent months, and in mid-1987 the NRC was expanded to include the cabinet as well as deputy and assistant ministers. In early 1989 the council was further enlarged to 278 members, of whom 210 were indirectly elected (168 on a district constituency basis, 34 as regional women's representatives, 5 representing youth organizations, and 3 representing trade unions), with the remaining 68 appointed by the president.

Balloting for a new, formally recognized Parliament was held on a "no-party" basis in June 1996. Government-supportive candidates captured or were appointed to 271 of the 276 available seats, while unrecognized opposition candidates reportedly secured the remaining 5 posts. Balloting was again held on a nonparty basis on June 26, 2001, for 214 chamber seats. (There are also 81 indirectly elected legislators who are selected by various interest groups, predominately the National Resistance Movement—NRM). In addition, members of the cabinet who are not already sitting legislators serve as ex-officio members of Parliament.) Supporters of opposition parties were allowed to run on an individual basis, and several were elected.

However, it was reported that NRM supporters secured more than 200 of the elected seats.

Following the most recent balloting on February 23, 2006 (the first held on a multiparty basis following the 2005 constitutional revision), the seat distribution was as follows: National Resistance Movement, 187; Forum for Democratic Change, 39; Democratic Party, 11; Uganda People's Congress, 8; Justice Forum, 1; Conservative Party, 1; independents, 29.

Speaker: Edward SSEKANDI Kiwanika.

Communications

Press

The press under the Amin regime was subject to very strict censorship and saw an extremely high rate of attrition. Substantial relaxation occurred after the installation of President Binaisa in June 1979. In March 1981 the Obote government banned a number of papers that had been critical of the UPC and subsequently took additional measures against both foreign and domestic journalists who had commented unfavorably on the security situation within Uganda. The press has enjoyed relative freedom under the current regime. Several private radio stations and private television stations report on local political developments. The largest newspapers and broadcasting facilities that reach rural areas remain state-owned. Governmental corruption is reported. Opposition positions are also presented, but the coverage is often not balanced. Journalists have asked Parliament to enact a freedom of information act so that the public is not denied information. Intermittently journalists are arrested, but generally their cases have been handled fairly in the country's judicial system. The following, unless otherwise noted, are English-language dailies published in Kampala: New Vision (40,000), NRM organ launched in March 1986 as successor to the Uganda Times, which had ceased publication in early 1985; The Monitor (34,000), weekly; Taifa Uganda Empya (24,000), in Luganda; Topic (13,000), radical weekly; Focus (13,000), weekly; Ngabo (7,000), independent, in Luganda; Munno (15,000), Catholic daily, in Luganda; The Star (5,500), independent; The Citizen, DP organ; The Financial Times; Munnansi News Bulletin, DP weekly in Luganda.

News Agencies

The domestic facility is the Uganda News Agency (UNA); a number of foreign agencies maintain bureaus in Kampala.

Broadcasting and Computing

The Ministry of Information and Broadcasting controls Radio Uganda, which broadcasts in 24 languages over two networks, and Uganda Television, which broadcasts primarily in English. There is also an independent television outlet broadcasting in the Kampala area. There were approximately 650,000 television receivers and 103,000 personal computers serving 125,000 Internet users in 2003.

Intergovernmental Representation

Ambassador to the U.S.

Perezi Karukubiro KAMUNANWIRE

U.S. Ambassador to Uganda

Steven Alan BROWNING

Permanent Representative to the UN

Francis K. BUTAGIRA

IGO Memberships (Non-UN)

AfDB, AU, BADEA, Comesa, CWTH, EAC, EADB, IDB, IGAD, Interpol, IOM, NAM, OIC, PCA, WCO, WTO

ZAMBIA

REPUBLIC OF ZAMBIA

---

Note: In preliminary results from the presidential balloting on September 28, 2006, the Movement for Multiparty Democracy (MMD) candidate and incumbent president Levy Patrick Mwanawasa won reelection with a plurality of 43 percent of the vote; Michael Sata of the Patriot Front (PF) placed second with 29 percent; Hakainde Hichilema of the United Democratic Alliance (UDA) placed third with 25 percent. In legislative balloting on the same day, the MMD won 73 seats; PF, 43 seats; UDA, 26 seats; the United Liberal Party, 2 seats; and the National Democratic Front, 1 seat. Independent candidates won 3 seats and results for 2 seats were not yet available.

The Country

Landlocked Zambia, the former British protectorate of Northern Rhodesia, is bordered by the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Tanzania, and Malawi on the north and east, and by Angola, Namibia, Zimbabwe, and Mozambique on the west and south. Its terrain consists primarily of a high plateau with abundant forests and grasslands. The watershed between the Congo and Zambezi river systems crosses the northern part of the country. The bulk of the population belongs to various Bantu tribes, the most influential being the Bemba in the north and the Lozi, an offshoot of the Zulu, in the southwest. (Tribal influences remain highly influential in political affairs.) Nonindigenous groups include a small number of whites (mainly British and South African), Asians, and persons of mixed descent concentrated in the “copper belt” in the north. Nearly three-quarters of native Zambians are nominally Christian, almost equally divided between Catholics and Protestants; the remainder adhere to traditional African beliefs. The official language is English, but Afrikaans and more than 70 local languages and dialects are spoken. Women comprise approximately one-third of the labor force, not including unpaid agricultural workers. Although a number of women involved in the independence struggle achieved positions of influence in the former ruling party, female representation is minimal at local levels.

Zambia is one of the world’s largest producers of copper and cobalt. The former accounts for 75 percent of export earnings, but Zambia’s share of the world copper market has declined significantly in the wake of a nearly 80 percent decline in production, attributed in large part to mismanagement of state-owned mines. Zinc, coal, cement, lime, sulphur, and magnetite are among other minerals being extracted. Agriculture employs two-thirds of the labor force, with maize, peanuts, tobacco, and cotton constituting the chief commercial crops. Because of a booming copper industry, Zambia, until the early 1970s, enjoyed one of Africa's highest standards of living, with rapid development of schools, hospitals, and highways. However, a subsequent decline in copper prices yielded infrastructural decay, rising unemployment within the rapidly growing and highly urbanized population, a foreign exchange shortage, an external debt of more than $6 billion, and the erosion of social services. Although the government had exercised budgetary restraint and relaxed its control of the economy in accordance with International Monetary Fund (IMF) strictures dating to the mid-1970s, rioting over price increases in late 1986 prompted Lusaka to abandon austerity measures and break with the IMF. However, economic reform measures were reinstated in 1998, paving the way for renewal of relations with international lenders and donors. In 1992 the Chiluba government launched a privatization program; however, market reform was subsequently seen as having failed to help the nation's poor (an estimated 83 percent of the population). Funds for education and health remained severely constrained at a time when about one-fifth of the population was believed to be HIV-positive. The IMF and World Bank continued to approve loans (Western aid accounted for one-half of the government's budget), and Zambia was included on the list of countries eligible for the international community's new debt-relief program. However, donors expressed concern over the apparent pervasive nature of corruption in government affairs at all levels. Particularly disappointing to foreign observers was the decision in 2002 of South African mining giant Anglo-American to abandon the massive copper mining initiative it had launched in Zambia only two years earlier. Among other things, the economic distress contributed to the emergence of a degree of political instability that was unusual by Zambian standards.

Severe drought in 2002 caused a decline in agricultural production that left 25 percent of the population temporarily dependent on food aid. Collaterally, the pace of economic reform slowed, prompting the temporary suspension of IMF and World Bank assistance. However, real GDP growth averaged 4.8 percent a year in 2004 and 2005, in part due to soaring copper prices and the investment of $1 billion by mining companies. In addition, the Group of Eight in 2005 canceled Zambia's $2.5 billion debt. Real GDP growth of nearly 6 percent was forecast for 2006, with inflation projected to decline from 15.9 percent to about 10 percent. Meanwhile, the Zambian administration earlier declared a national emergency in regard to HIV/AIDS and began providing free drugs to those infected.

Government and Politics

Political Background

Declared a British sphere of influence in 1888, Northern Rhodesia was administered jointly with Southern Rhodesia until 1923–1924, when it became a separate British protectorate. From 1953 to 1963, it was linked with Southern Rhodesia and Nyasaland (now Malawi) in the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, which was dissolved at the end of 1963 in recognition of the unwillingness of the black majority populations in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland to continue under the political and economic domination of white-ruled Southern Rhodesia. A drive for Northern Rhodesia's complete independence, led by Harry NKUMBULA and Kenneth D. KAUNDA, concluded on October 24, 1964, when the territory became an independent republic within the Commonwealth under the name of Zambia (after the Zambezi River). Kaunda, as leader of the majority United National Independence Party (UNIP), became head of the new state; Nkumbula, whose African National Congress (ANC) had trailed in the preindependence election of January 1964, became leader of the opposition. The political predominance of Kaunda and his party was strengthened at the general election of December 1968, Kaunda winning a second five-year term as president and the UNIP again capturing an overwhelming

Political Status: Independent republic within the Commonwealth since October 24, 1964; under one-party, presidential-parliamentary system from 1972 to adoption of multiparty constitution on August 29, 1991.

Area: 290,584 sq. mi. (752,614 sq. km.).

Population: 10,285,631 (2000C); 11,044,000 (2005E).

Major Urban Center (2005E): LUSAKA (metropolitan area, 1,647,000).

Official Language: English.

Monetary Unit: Kwacha (official rate July 1, 2006: 3,505 kwachas = $1US).

President: (See headnote.) Levy Patrick MWANAWASA (Movement for Multiparty Democracy); popularly elected (in disputed balloting) on December 27, 2001, and inaugurated on January 2, 2002, for a five-year term in succession to Frederick Jacob Titus CHILUBA (Movement for Multiparty Democracy).

Vice President: Lupando MWAPE (Movement for Multiparty Democracy); appointed by the president on October 4, 2004, to replace Nevers MUMBA (National Citizens' Coalition) following Mumba's dismissal on the same day.

legislative majority. In December 1972 Kaunda promulgated a law banning all parties except the UNIP and introduced what was termed "one-party participatory democracy." In December 1978 he was reelected for a fourth term following disqualification of Nkumbula and former vice president Simon M. KAPWEPWE.

On August 27, 1983, the president dissolved the National Assembly to pave the way for an October 27 election, in which, as sole presidential candidate, he garnered 93 percent of the vote and was returned to office for a fifth five-year term. Two years later Kaunda transferred both the prime minister and the UNIP secretary general to diplomatic posts; Defense Minister Alexander Grey ZULU was chosen to head the party, while Prime Minister Nalumino MUNDIA was replaced by Minister of Education and Culture Kebby MUSOKOTWANE.

Following a UNIP restructuring that was generally interpreted as enhancing his personal control of both party and government, Kaunda, again the sole candidate, was elected for a sixth presidential term on October 26, 1988, with a reported 96 percent "yes" vote. On the other hand, eight cabinet members were defeated in assembly elections held the same day, apparently reflecting increased opposition to government policy. Shortly after the election, Kaunda reshuffled the cabinet, and on March 15, 1989, he named Gen. Malimba MASHEKE to replace the young and popular Musokotwane as prime minister; the subsequent posting of Musokotwane to a diplomatic mission lent credence to the view that he had become a political threat to Kaunda.

In early 1990 the regime rejected a number of proposals for liberalization of the Zambian political system. However, by midyear the government had grudgingly agreed to implement reforms in an attempt to appease increasingly vociferous critics, particularly among the trade and business communities. In the wake of a coup attempt in June and price riots in July, Kaunda agreed to a voter registration drive and the freeing of a number of political prisoners. In September, following a series of major prodemocracy rallies, the president announced plans for multiparty elections by October 1991. On December 4 the National Assembly legalized the formation of political parties, and on December 30 the Zambian Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU) aligned itself with the leading opposition group, the Movement for Multiparty Democracy (MMD).

In 1991 the regime's practices, including strict control of the media, drew MMD condemnation and led to violent clashes between MMD and UNIP supporters. Nevertheless, on August 2 the National Assembly approved a new multiparty constitution, and, following its formal signing on August 29, the president dissolved the legislature and allowed the state of emergency decree to lapse for the first time since independence. On October 31, in balloting supervised by former U.S. president Jimmy Carter and representatives of the Commonwealth and the Organization of African Unity (OAU, subsequently the African Union—AU), the MMD's Frederick CHILUBA won 74 percent of the presidential vote and the movement's candidates captured 125 of 150 assembly seats.

The MMD secured a vast majority of the 1,190 local council seats contested on November 30, 1992; however, the ruling party's victories were tainted by a lack of competition in approximately 400 councils, coupled with voter apathy (less than 10 percent of eligible voters reportedly having participated). Observers attributed the apparent growing disenchantment among voters to the effects of a severe economic austerity program compounded by the perception of unmitigated governmental corruption.

On March 4, 1993, the administration's prestige was further damaged when Chiluba declared an indefinite state of emergency and 25 UNIP members, including three of former president Kaunda's sons, were arrested on charges relating to an alleged coup plot. On March 9 the president shortened the detention without trial period from 28 to 7 days, apparently seeking to combat domestic and international charges that his administration had overreacted to reports about the alleged plot, and on May 25 the state of emergency was lifted.

In August 1993 15 prominent MMD officials resigned from the government and National Assembly because of the Chiluba administration's alleged unwillingness to investigate corruption and drug trafficking charges against powerful cabinet ministers; the MMD defectors, citing a "critical national crisis of leadership and governance," launched the National Party (NP). Chiluba dismissed the resignations as the "teething problems" of democratic reform; however, in December international aid donors meeting in Paris voted to withhold aid payments until Lusaka investigated the allegations, and on January 6, 1994, the ZCTU called on the Chiluba administration to dissolve the government. Consequently, on January 11, 1994, Chiluba reshuffled his cabinet, claiming to have ousted tainted ministers, and in March the World Bank agreed to release suspended aid payments despite opposition protestations that the president had shielded corrupt ministers while dismissing two who had sought to expose malfeasance.

On July 3, 1994, Vice President Levy MWANAWASA resigned, citing alleged irresponsibility and greed among his colleagues. On the following day Chiluba named Brig. Gen. Godfrey MIYANDA, theretofore a minister without portfolio, to replace Mwanawasa.

In October 1994 former president Kaunda officially announced that he would end his retirement to campaign for early presidential elections, saying "there is a crisis in Zambia. . . I have accepted the call to come back." Thereafter, in February 1995, Kaunda, who had been under surveillance since August 1994 because of allegations that his return was being financed by foreign backers, was charged with attempting to hold an illegal political party meeting. Meanwhile, the MMD sought to block his presidential eligibility by pressing for a constitutional amendment that would disqualify anyone not born in Zambia of Zambian-born parents (Kaunda's parents having been born in Malawi). Such an amendment, as well as a second amendment disqualifying any person who had already been twice-elected president, were included in a draft document issued on June 16. The proposed charter was released despite the objections of an independent constitutional review commission, which had declared the amendments "rubbish" and accused the MMD of having bribed its authors.

On May 16, 1996, the National Assembly approved the Constitution of Zambia Amendment Act 1996, and 12 days later the president sanctioned the measure, thus officially banning Kaunda from future elections. Subsequent opposition efforts to have the constitutional changes suspended and the upcoming balloting held in accordance with the 1991 document were dismissed in September by the president and High Court, respectively. On the other hand, in an effort to dampen mounting opposition charges that electoral preparations were being "rigged," Chiluba agreed to provide opposition representatives with equal access to the media and oversight of vote tabulation. On October 19 Chiluba dissolved the assembly and announced that presidential and legislative elections would be held on November 18. (The opposition's subsequent charge that the government's mandate would expire on October 31 and that any of its actions thereafter would be illegal were dismissed by the regime as "immature.") On October 23 Kaunda announced that the UNIP would boycott the November elections to protest the constitutional changes and the government's alleged manipulation of the voter registration drive.

As anticipated, President Chiluba and the MMD secured landslide victories at polling on November 18, 1996, with the former capturing 69.5 percent of the vote and his party 131 of the 150 seats contested. Their victories were marred, however, by alleged electoral irregularities and by what one observer described as a "revolt of MMD voters" in high-profile contests won by independents and opposition candidates. Thereafter, amid widespread opposition calls for a campaign of civil disobedience to force the government to hold fresh elections, Chiluba put the military on alert on November 28. On December 2 Chiluba named a new cabinet that was described as "tribalist" because of the preponderance of members from the Northern and Luapula regions (Chiluba is from the latter).

Tensions remained high in Lusaka throughout the first half of 1997 as the Chiluba administration, now reportedly under the direction of MMD hardliners, was sharply denounced by both domestic and international observers for introducing legislation that would strictly regulate both the media and nongovernmental organizations. (In March the latter law went into effect, but in April the government suspended the controversial Press Council Bill.) In early August antigovernment demonstrations in Lusaka turned into rioting, and, at an illegal opposition rally on August 23, Kaunda and Roger CHONGWE, leader of the Liberal Progressive Front, were shot and wounded in what Kaunda described as an assassination attempt.

On October 28, 1997, a group of junior military officers led by Capt. Steven LUNGU (aka "Captain Solo") took over a government radio station and declared that they had established a "National Redemption Council" and were prepared to overthrow the government. Within hours the reportedly drunken rebels were overpowered by forces loyal to the president; nevertheless, the government declared a state of emergency, and in the following weeks more than 80 mid-level officers and dozens of opposition members were detained, with a number of others reportedly fleeing the country amid reports that those arrested were being tortured.

On December 2, 1997, Chiluba demoted his vice president, Brig. Gen. Godfrey Miyanda, to the education ministry and named as his replacement Lt. Gen. Christon TEMBO. Furthermore, Chiluba drastically reshuffled both the government and the military leadership.

In late April 2001 a fractured MMD congress agreed to seek constitutional revision to permit President Chiluba to run for a third term, prompting massive protest demonstrations and significant external condemnation. Under heavy pressure, Chiluba finally declared he would not seek reelection. However, on May 4 he dissolved the cabinet, permitting him to appoint a new government on May 6 that pointedly did not include theretofore Vice President Tembo and some 11 other MMD members who had opposed the third-term initiative.

Former vice president Mwanawasa became the surprise MMD candidate in the December 27, 2001, presidential balloting, securing, according to official results, a narrow victory (28.69 percent to 26.76 percent) over the second-place finisher, Anderson K. MAZOKA of the United Party for National Development (UPND). However, opposition parties charged that the balloting had been rigged and demanded a court review. (The Supreme Court launched a review of the charges but closed the case in November 2004.) Meanwhile, the MMD was also credited with pluralities in the concurrent assembly and municipal elections, the UPND easily outdistancing the other contenders to secure its position as the dominant opposition grouping. Not surprisingly, considering the electoral challenge, no opposition parties were represented in the cabinet appointed by Mwanawasa on January 7, 2002. However, Mwanawasa appointed members of the UNIP and the Forum for Democracy and Development (FDD) to junior cabinet positions in a May 28, 2003, reshuffle. He also named Nevers MUMBA, a prominent pastor and leader of the National Citizens' Coalition (NCC), as vice president. Mumba was in turn succeeded by Lupando MWAPE of the MDD on October 4, 2004, and by 2005 it was reported that the non-MDD cabinet members had been replaced by MDD stalwarts.

On April 5, 2006, the assembly adopted a controversial electoral reform bill establishing the president's authority to set election dates and requiring only a plurality in a single-round election to decide presidential balloting, among other provisions (see Current issues, below). The bill was promulgated on May 19, and in July President Mwanawasa called for tripartite elections to be held on September 28, 2006. (See headnote.)

Constitution and government

Zambia's 1964 constitution was superseded by the adoption at a UNIP conference in August 1973 of a constitution of the "second republic" that reaffirmed the introduction in 1972 of a one-party system and further provided for the sharing of authority between the party and traditional organs of government. To further emphasize the role of the UNIP, its secretary general (rather than the prime minister) was designated the nation's second-ranking official.

On August 2, 1991, the National Assembly adopted a new constitution that provided for multi-party elections, a two-tiered parliament, abandonment of the post of prime minister in favor of a revived vice presidency, and a presidentially appointed cabinet. In 1993 President Chiluba named a 22-member commission to revise the 1991 document. Draft amendments, released in June 1995 in expectation of a constituent assembly and national referendum, were approved by the National Assembly on May 16, 1996, and by President Chiluba on May 28. The Constitution of Zambia Amendment Act 1996 limits participation in presidential polling to Zambian-born citizens whose parents were also born in Zambia and disqualifies traditional chiefs and anyone who has lived abroad during the previous 20 years. The chief executive is limited to two five-year terms.

The judiciary embraces a Supreme Court, a High Court, and various local courts. Administratively, the country is divided into nine provinces, including the city of Lusaka and its environs, which are subdivided into 55 districts.

Foreign Relations

While pursuing a generally nonaligned foreign policy (an 18-year coolness with Britain having been ended by a Kaunda state visit to London in 1983), Zambia consistently opposed racial discrimination in southern Africa and provided sanctuary for numerous exile groups engaged in guerrilla operations against white-controlled territories. Prior to the constitutional changes in South Africa, Zambia's prestige among Front-Line States was pronounced. In the wake of treaties concluded by Angola and Mozambique with South Africa, Lusaka became the headquarters of the African National Congress (ANC), making it a target for bomb attacks in May 1986 by South Africa forces, who also crossed the border on a "reconnaissance mission" in April 1987 that left several persons dead. Kaunda assumed the chairmanship of the Front-Line grouping in early 1985, vowing to promote increased mutual support among member governments. In 1986 he denounced the United States and the United Kingdom for "conspiring" to support the South African government, warning they would share responsibility for the impending anti-apartheid "explosion." Zambia was also in the forefront of a regional plan to lessen reliance on South African trade routes that included rehabilitation of the Benguela Railway in Angola and the Tanzania-Zambia (Tanzam) link to Dar es Salaam. In other regional affairs, troops were at times deployed in border clashes with Malawi and Zaire, the latter agreeing in 1986 to a joint review and demarcation of disputed territory that yielded a settlement in 1989. (Disputes continued to erupt in 2005 at the border, reportedly notorious for illegal crossings and smuggling.) In November 1989 a joint security commission was established with Mozambique in an attempt to thwart cross-border guerrilla activity.

Since its ascension to power in October 1991, the Chiluba government's foreign policy agenda was topped by relations with international creditors. In late 1991 the government negotiated a release of the aid allocations suspended in September when the Kaunda regime had allowed debt repayment and austerity programs to lapse. The government's decision to sever diplomatic ties with Iran and Iraq for their alleged financing of coup plotters against Chiluba was described in Africa Confidential as owing more to "fundamentalist Christian and anti-Muslim" tendencies within the administration than to substantive evidence of foreign involvement. Furthermore, the Chiluba government experienced slow progress in establishing relations with regional neighbors, many of whom were Kaunda supporters and had expressed distrust of the new administration's criticism of the ANC as well as of its links to South African commercial interests.

The Zambian assembly's approval of a controversial constitutional amendment bill in May 1996 provoked widespread disapproval from Zambia's Western donors, and in June a number of them suspended aid payments. Regionally, however, the Southern African Development Community (SADC) was described by observers as having adopted a "passive" position after the Chiluba government rebuffed its initial intervention efforts, and South Africa, the only SADC member considered powerful enough to influence Lusaka, refused to assume a leadership role.

Aid donors remained unwilling to restart payments through the first half of 1997; however, in July the suspension was partially lifted. Negotiations on further relaxation of payment restrictions were postponed after Lusaka imposed a state of emergency from October until March 1998. In May 1998 the World Bank agreed to a new aid package contingent on Lusaka enacting economic and political reforms; in particular, the bank pressed the government to speed privatization efforts and improve its human rights record.

Zambian-Angolan relations deteriorated in early 1999 as Luanda threatened military action against Zambia if Lusaka continued its alleged support for Angolan rebels. Thereafter, in a thinly veiled reference to Luanda, the Chiluba administration blamed "external forces" for a series of bombings in Lusaka. Later agreements between Luanda and Lusaka appeared to ease the tension, however, although a large Angolan refugee population subsequently continued to create difficulties for the Zambian government, as did an influx of refugees from fighting in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. A joint UN-Zambian program to repatriate Angolan refugees subsequently had substantial success, although there continued to be sporadic raids by Congolese rebels into Zambia. In response, the government increased border patrols. The final repatriation of some 34,500 Angola refugees was reported to be under way in 2005, though many were still living in camps in remote areas of Zambia in 2006.

In November 2004 the Zambian military launched a series of training exercises overseen by French military experts. The operations were part of a larger regional initiative through which France hoped to promote military cooperation among Tanzania, Zambia, and Zimbabwe that could lead, among other things, to joint regional humanitarian operations.

Current Issues

Political affairs in the early 2000s were dominated by the question of whether the constitution would be revised by national referendum to permit President Chiluba to seek a third term. Civic groups strongly objected to the initiative, and public anti-Chiluba demonstrations in March 2001 prompted mass arrests and a crackdown on meetings devoted to discussion of the question. Although nearly one-third of the delegates walked out of the MMD congress in late April, Chiluba's bid received official party endorsement, prompting another wave of street protests before the campaign was abandoned. By that time, many analysts had concluded that the party wrangling, resentment over Chiluba's autocratic style, and the perception of substantial corruption in government circles had made the MMD vulnerable in advance of the December elections.

However, although they had proven successful in a number of recent by-elections, some of the opposition parties appeared to be regionally or tribally based and therefore of limited national scope, while the UNIP remained in disarray. In addition, despite much negotiation on the matter, the opposition failed to coalesce behind a single presidential candidate, permitting the MMD's Levy Mwanawasa to eke out a victory in the first-past-the-post contest among 11 candidates. Second-place finisher Anderson Mazoka of the UPND and a number of the other losing candidates immediately charged that the presidential balloting had been severely tainted by, among other things, the intimidation of voters and ballot-box stuffing. International observers agreed that electoral preparations had been seriously flawed, while EU monitors concluded it would be "unsafe" to accept the official results as accurately reflecting the will of the voters. Meanwhile, the president dedicated his new government to combating corruption, a campaign that quickly appeared to place him at odds with many MMD stalwarts, including his predecessor. In July 2002 the National Assembly lifted the immunity from prosecution previously enjoyed by former president Chiluba. As a result, Chiluba was arrested on a wide range of corruption charges. Some 150 other senior figures from the Chiluba government, including the chief of the army and the country's intelligence head, were also arrested. Initial reports estimated that tens of millions of dollars may have been embezzled during the ten years of the Chiluba administration.

The appointment of opposition legislators to the cabinet in May 2003 was seen as an effort by President Mwanawasa to deal with plummeting popular support for the MMD in the wake of the Chiluba scandals. The administration had also been recently confronted by public protests over the effects of austerity measures. Further complicating matters for the government was the decision in August 2004 to postpone the local elections scheduled for November for two years because of financial constraints. Finally, Chiluba was rearrested in September 2004 (the initial charges had been botched by the prosecution), and supporters of the former president split from the MDD to form the Party for Unity, Democracy, and Development (PUDD). (The trial for Chiluba and the others from his administration got under way in 2006.)

As attention in 2005 turned to the 2006 presidential and legislative polls, opposition leaders called for drafting of a new constitution that would, among other things, establish at least a degree of proportional representation in the assembly. The government's critics also demanded revision in the makeup and authority of the electoral commission to help avoid the problems experienced in 2001. However, the electoral reform law adopted by the assembly and endorsed by President Mwanawasa in 2006 rejected the electoral commission's recommendations, including the stipulation that presidential balloting be decided by majority vote. The new law gives the president the authority to set the date of elections (President Mwanawasa set the date for September), which opposition groups claimed would not give them enough time to prepare. Meanwhile, several opposition groups formed alliances in advance of the elections (see Political parties, below), but observers said the opposition was in "disarray," as it had been assumed elections would not be held until closer to the end of the year.

Political Parties

In December 1972, the United National Independence Party (UNIP) became the country's only legal political party. During the late 1980s reformists called for a multiparty system, with President Kaunda repeatedly dismissing the idea as unworkable because of "too many tribal conflicts." However, in September 1990 he bowed to mounting pressure and agreed to termination of the UNIP monopoly. Three months later, the president signed a National Assembly bill legalizing the formation of political parties, and in August 1991 a multiparty constitution was adopted. Thereafter, on October 31 the UNIP, the Movement for Multiparty Democracy (MMD), and 12 smaller parties participated in the first multiparty balloting since 1968.

Dominant Government Party

Movement for Multiparty Democracy (MMD). Formed in mid-1990 as a loose alliance of anti-UNIP groups in support of a voter registration drive, the MMD applied for legal party status immediately following legislative approval of a multiparty system in December. Among other things, the group issued a manifesto declaring its commitment to a free-market economy.

In June 1991 the MMD denounced a proposed draft constitution on the grounds that it would advance an excessively powerful presidency; the party threatened to boycott upcoming elections if it were adopted. Consequently, President Kaunda met in July with MMD leaders to forge a compromise document. Meanwhile, violent clashes between MMD and UNIP supporters continued, and in September the MMD complained that limiting the campaign period to two months favored the incumbents. Nevertheless, at the October 31 balloting Frederick Chiluba of the MMD defeated Kaunda's bid for reelection, with the MMD also winning an overwhelming majority of National Assembly seats. Subsequently, at sparsely attended balloting in late November 1992, the party captured nearly 75 percent of 1,190 local council seats.

In early 1993 a growing interparty chasm was reported between those members urging faster governmental reform and a second, reportedly more influential faction, which was concerned less with reform and more with "strengthening the political and financial interests of the . . . commercial class." Founding member and party chair Arthur Wina was one of 14 prominent MMD officials who withdrew from the grouping in August to protest the dismissal of cabinet ministers identified as having exposed corruption and drug trafficking by their colleagues. Thereafter, more members left the party as its popularity plummeted amid allegations that top officials were sheltered from the effects of the government's economic austerity program. On the other hand, in November 1993 Enoch Kavindele, leader of the United Democratic Party, dissolved his party and joined the MMD, claiming that he and Chiluba shared similar development strategies.

Internal friction, based in part on tribal differences as well as the personal ambition of various MMD leaders, was reported throughout the rest of the 1990s, although the party retained solid political control at both the national and local levels. Fractionalization reached its apex in early 2000 when it became apparent that President Chiluba's supporters were intent on constitutional revision that would permit him a third term. Some 400 delegates walked out of the MMD congress in Lusaka at the end of April to protest the initiative; however, the remaining delegates dutifully endorsed Chiluba as the MMD candidate in the upcoming presidential race, calling for a national referendum on the proposed constitutional change. In the wake of massive protest demonstrations, Chiluba several days later announced he had decided not to seek a third term, but at the same time more than 20 senior members of the MMD (including some 11 cabinet members) were expelled from the party, some of them subsequently helping to form new opposition parties.

In August 2001 Levy Mwanawasa, a prominent attorney and former vice president of the republic, was selected as the new MMD standard-bearer. Critics initially described Mwanawasa as Chiluba's hand-picked successor, but tension was apparent between the two MMD leaders following Mwanawasa's controversial victory in the national balloting, the new president, among other things, reportedly rejecting Chiluba's suggestions for cabinet appointments. Following Chiluba's arrest on corruption charges in 2004, the former president's supporters defected from the MMD and formed the PUDD (below).

The National Citizens' Coalition (NCC), sometimes referred to as the National Christian Coalition, merged with the MDD after the MDD's leader, prominent pastor Nevers Mumba, was appointed vice president in 2003. (Mumba had run for the presidency in 2001 but had received only 2.2 percent of the vote.) In October 2004 Mumba was dismissed as vice president following his comments accusing opposition parties of taking funds from foreign sources. He was forced to leave the party in 2005 after he reportedly accused President Mwanawasa and his wife of using government money to buy party convention votes.

Although Mwanawasa won the party leadership by a landslide in 2005, providing him a mandate to seek a second term as president of the republic in 2006, rifts in the party were reported among rivals who campaigned against him.

Leaders: Levy Patrick MWANAWASA (President of the Republic), Lupando MWAPE (Vice President of the Republic), Samuel MIYANDA (Secretary General).

Other Legislative Parties

In advance of the September 2006 presidential election, three legislative parties—the UPND, UNIP, and FDD—formed the United Democratic Alliance (UDA), with the leader of each party serving as co-president.

United Party for National Development (UPND). Described as representing the interests of urbanized Zambians, the UPND was launched on December 1998 under the leadership of business leader Anderson Mazoka, who had recently left the MMD. The party quickly became a major opposition grouping, winning four of the six legislative by-elections it had contested as of mid-2000. Mazoka, running with the support of the NP (below), secured an official 26.76 percent of the vote in the 2001 presidential balloting, although his supporters charged he had actually won the election and challenged the results in court. Meanwhile, the UPND easily became the leading opposition party by securing 49 seats in the concurrent legislative balloting.

Following Mazoka's death in 2006, a rift developed in the party, with members from the Southern Province backing Mazoka's widow as successor while party officials approached ZCTU president Leonard HIKAUMBA over the party's acting president, Sakwiba SIKOTA. After the party's divisive and chaotic convention in July, in which Lusaka businessman Hakainde Hichilema was elected president, Sikota resigned (along with party vice president Robert SICHINGA and secretary general Logan SHEMENA), and he subsequently formed the United Liberal Party (below). Sikota blamed "tribalism and violence" for the party's election upheaval, though the election was declared fair by the Foundation for Democratic Process (FODEP). Sikota's departure reportedly left the party in disarray, with party vice president for economic and political affairs Patrick Chisanga trying to mend fences.

Leaders: Hakainde HICHILEMA (President), Patrick CHISANGA (Spokesperson).

United National Independence Party (UNIP). The UNIP was formed as a result of the 1958 withdrawal of Kenneth D. Kaunda, Simon M. Kapwepwe, and others from the preindependence African National Congress (ANC), led by Harry Nkumbula. The UNIP was banned by the British in March 1959, reconstituted the following October, and ruled Zambia from independence until October 1991.

On May 29, 1990, in announcing that the National Council had approved the holding of a referendum on multipartyism, President Kaunda stated that it would be "stupid" for the party not to explain to the public that approval of such a system would be equivalent to "courting national disaster." Nevertheless, at the 25th meeting of the UNIP National Council on September 24, 1990, Kaunda announced that referendum plans would be canceled and a multiparty constitution adopted prior to the 1991 poll.

At an extraordinary party congress held August 6–7, 1991, Kaunda faced a leadership challenge from businessman Enoch Kavindele; however, under pressure from party stalwarts, Kavindele withdrew his bid, and Kaunda won unanimous reelection as party president. Thereafter, at nationwide balloting on October 31, both Kaunda and the UNIP suffered resounding defeats, the former capturing only 24 percent of the presidential vote and the latter being limited to 26 assembly seats. In the wake of his electoral defeat, Kaunda resigned as party leader on January 6, 1992, but reversed himself four months later.

Fueled by the defection of a number of party members to Kavindele's newly formed United Democratic Party (UDP) and the UNIP's poor showing at local elections in November 1992, speculation mounted in early 1993 that Kebby Musokwane, who had been elected party president at an extraordinary congress on October 1, would be supplanted by Maj. Wezi Kaunda, head of the UNIP's military wing and son of the former president. However, Wezi Kaunda, along with his two brothers, Tilyenji Kaunda and Panji KAUNDA, were among approximately 25 people, including 7 UNIP central committee members, arrested in March 1993 on charges stemming from an alleged coup plot. For its part, the party denied charges that it had planned to overthrow the Chiluba administration, with Musokwane insisting that he had aided the government in exposing the plot.

In June 1993 former president Kaunda resigned from the party, citing a desire to become "father" to all Zambians and complaining that he had been denied a pension by the Chiluba government. In March 1994 approximately 85 members of the now defunct UDP rejoined the UNIP. (Prior to its dissolution in late 1993 UDP membership had been dominated by UNIP defectors.) In June 1994 the UNIP was instrumental in the formation of the Zambia Opposition Front (Zofro), an opposition umbrella organization that included the Independent Democratic Front (IDF), led by Mike KAIRA; the Labour Party (LP), led by Chipeza MUFUNE; the National Democratic Alliance (NDA), led by Yonam PHIRI (the NDA was reportedly deregistered in 1998); the National Party for Democracy (NPD), led by Tenthani MWANZA; and the Zambia Progressive Party (ZPP).

Although Kaunda's decision in May 1995 to return to political life was coolly received by Musokwane and his youthful supporters, the former president encountered little difficulty in being re-elected to the UNIP presidency on June 28. Kaunda continued to enjoy broad party support throughout 1995 and the first half of 1996 despite intensive government efforts to discredit him. However, in June 1996 former party secretary general Benjamin Mibenge called for an extraordinary UNIP congress to elect a new leader, asserting, according to Africa Confidential, that it was time to break "the myth that Dr. Kaunda can forever lead the party." Meanwhile, the government arrested seven people (including Kaunda) with ties to the UNIP, charging them with complicity in a wave of bombings and bomb threats allegedly masterminded by a terrorist group called Black Mamba, Kaunda's nickname during Zambia's independence drive.

In early October 1996 Zofro announced it would back single candidates in the upcoming legislative balloting. Meanwhile, Kaunda declared his intention of running for president again despite the recent controversial amendment that appeared to have disqualified him. However, later in the month the UNIP announced plans to boycott the legislative balloting, citing what it described as the "mismanagement" of the voter registration drive and charging the government with manipulating the constitution. Furthermore, Kaunda asserted that the continued imprisonment of six prominent party members on treason charges had undermined the UNIP's electoral preparations. The charges were dropped on November 1. (Charges against Kaunda had been dismissed earlier.)

In April 1997 a simmering intraparty rivalry between Kaunda's supporters and members opposed to his continued domination exploded into public view as the two groups clashed at a UNIP function. Internecine concerns were subsequently overshadowed, however, by violent encounters between the UNIP and supporters of the Chiluba government. In June the UNIP and its opposition allies called for foreign intervention to ease the political and social "crisis" gripping Lusaka. Two months later Kaunda accused the government of attempting to assassinate him and Roger Chongwe, leader of the Liberal Progressive Front (LPF), a small party allied with the UNIP.

In January 1998 Kaunda was indicted by the government for his alleged role in the October 1997 coup attempt. The UNIP president was held under house arrest until June 1, when the government, under intense international pressure, dropped the charges. In June Kaunda said he would retire from the UNIP, although he agreed to serve as party president on an acting basis until his successor was elected. Subsequently, members of the UNIP's youth wing were reported to have rallied behind the succession ambitions of Wezi Kaunda. However, Wezi died in November 1999 after being attacked by gunmen in his driveway.

Kenneth Kaunda officially retired from the UNIP presidency at the beginning of an extraordinary congress in Ndola in May 2000. He was succeeded by Francis NKHOMA, a former central bank governor, although severe factionalization was subsequently still reported in the party, particularly in regard to the new president's positive comments about potential cooperation with the MMD, of which he had been a member from 1990 to 1994. Tilyenji Kaunda was elected to the UNIP presidency in April 2001 and won 9.96 percent of the votes in the December presidential election. In 2003 the UNIP announced it would cooperate with the ruling MMD, and UNIP legislators were appointed to junior cabinet posts.

Leaders: Tilyenji KAUNDA (President and 2001 presidential candidate), Njekwa ANAMELA (Vice President), Richard BANDA (Chair).

Forum for Democracy and Development (FDD). Reportedly enjoying support among students and other urban dwellers, the FDD was launched in 2001 by former MMD members opposed to efforts by President Chiluba to run for a third term. Party founders included Lt. Gen. Christon Tembo, who had been dismissed as vice president of the republic by Chiluba in May. Tembo finished third in the 2001 presidential balloting, securing 12.96 percent of the vote according to the official results. The FDD expelled four members in 2003 after they accepted cabinet posts in the MMD-led government. Several other FDD members subsequently left the party and joined the MMD. Former finance minister Edith Nawakwi was elected party president in 2005.

Leaders: Edith NAWAKWI (President), Lt. Gen. Christon S. TEMBO (2001 presidential candidate).

Heritage Party (HP). The HP was formed in 2001 by Brig. Gen. Godfrey Miyanda, a former MMD stalwart and former vice president of the republic, who had left the ruling party in the dispute over a proposed third term for President Chiluba. He rejected pressure to join with the FDD; subsequently, some FDD and MDD members reportedly defected to the party in 2001. Miyanda secured 7.96 percent of the vote in the 2001 presidential balloting, according to official results, and the party gained 4 seats in the legislative balloting.

Leader: Brig. Gen. Godfrey MIYANDA (2001 presidential candidate).

Zambia Republican Party (ZRP). The formation of the ZRP was announced in February 2001 as a merger of the Zambia Alliance for Progress (ZAP, see below), the Republican Party (RP), and the small National Republican Party.

The RP, with support centered in the copper belt, had been founded in mid-2000 by wealthy businessman Ben Mwila and a number of his supporters following their expulsion from the MMD. (Mwila had incurred the wrath of other MMD leaders by indicating a desire to run for president of the republic while a possible third term for President Chiluba was still under consideration.)

Both Mwila and Dean Mungomba of the ZAP announced their presidential ambitions prior to the creation of the ZRP, and friction quickly materialized between the two. Consequently, Mungomba announced that he and his supporters were withdrawing from the ZRP to resume ZAP activity, although a number of former ZAP members remained in the new grouping.

Mwila was officially credited with 4.84 percent of the vote as the ZRP candidate in the 2001 presidential poll. Among other things, the ZRP platform called for increased privatization of state-run enterprises and the extension of agricultural subsidies.

Leaders: Benjamin Yorum MWILA (President and 2001 presidential candidate), Ben KAPITA (Chair), Sylvia MACEBO (Secretary General).

Patriotic Front (PF). The PF was formed in 2001 by disgruntled former MMD members, including Michael Sata, who resigned as MMD secretary general in September to protest what he described as the irregular method of selection of Levy Mwanawasa as the MMD's standard-bearer. Sata was credited with 3.35 percent of the vote in the 2001 presidential poll.

In 2005 Sata was tried for alleged espionage (unresolved as of mid-2006), and in 2006 Sata and party secretary general Guy Scott were charged with defaming the president after Sata allegedly leaked a letter written by President Mwanawasa. Sata claimed the letter was a forgery and a “trap.”

Leader: Michael SATA (President and 2001 presidential candidate), Guy SCOTT (Secretary General).

Other Parties Participating in the 2001 Elections

Agenda for Zambia (AZ). The agenda was launched in October 1996 by Akashambatwa Mbikusita Lewanika and his sister, Inonge, the NP’s former secretary general and interim chair, respectively. Although the group reportedly fielded fewer than six candidates at legislative polling in November, it captured two formerly MMD-held seats. For his part, Lewanika finished fourth in presidential balloting.

In late 1998 the agenda asserted its support for separatists operating in the Caprivi Strip region of Namibia. In a related matter, the AZ also supports self-rule for “Barotseland” in southwestern Zambia (see BPF, below).

After receiving only 0.56 percent of the vote in the 2001 presidential balloting, Inonge Mbikusita Lewanika disbanded the party and joined the MMD. In 2003 she was appointed Zambia’s ambassador to the United States after having served as special envoy to the AU.

Leaders: Akashambatwa Mbikusita LEWANIKA (1996 presidential candidate), Inonge Mbikusita LEWANIKA (2001 presidential candidate).

Social Democratic Party (SDP). The SDP was formed in mid-2000 under the leadership of former diplomat Gwendoline Konie with the goal of addressing issues of special importance to women and young people. Konie, one of the first women to lead a Zambian party, won 0.58 percent of the vote in the 2001 presidential poll. She retired from politics in 2005 after establishing a nongovernment organization to help women in the prevention of HIV/AIDS.

Leader: Gwendoline KONIE (President and 2001 presidential candidate).

National Leadership for Development (NLD). The NLD was launched in mid-2001 by Yobert Shamapande, a former UN official and relative newcomer to domestic politics. Running on a platform that emphasized education, poverty reduction, gender balance in government, and better health services, Shamapande won 0.54 percent of the vote in the 2001 presidential balloting. Thereafter, Shamapande pledged his support to President Mwanawasa’s policies.

Leader: Yobert SHAMAPANDE (President and 2001 presidential candidate).

Zambia Alliance for Progress (ZAP). The ZAP was formally launched in June 1999 by the Zambia Democratic Congress (Zadeco), the National Lima Party (NLP), and a nonparty organization called the National Pressure Group, although it had initially been perceived as a much larger opposition grouping. However, parties such as the AZ, NP, LP, and NCC ultimately declined to join the ZAP, which would have required dissolution of those parties as distinct entities, and, for the AZ and NP, loss of their parliamentary seats.

Zadeco was formed in mid-1995 by several former MMD members of parliament and more than 80 cadres from Kabwata and Kanyama constituencies, who expressed their disillusionment with the parent party. In early 1996 Zadeco leaders reportedly alienated a number of supporters when they issued a handpicked candidate list, thus dashing expectations of intraparty polling. Thereafter, Zadeco president Dean Mungomba was described as at the “forefront” of opposition activists threatening unrest if the Chiluba government remained in office after its mandate expired on October 31, 1996. Mungomba won 12 percent of the votes in the 1996 presidential poll, while Zadeco secured two seats in the concurrent legislative balloting.

Suspected of having played a role in the abortive October 1997 coup, Mungomba was imprisoned and reportedly beaten by government security forces; meanwhile, Zedeco's secretary general, Azwell Banda, fled to Zimbabwe. Thereafter, Zedeco called for international intervention to ease the tensions gripping Lusaka.

In April 1998 a Zedeco faction led by Eden JERRY and Don CHISANDO broke from the group and formed the Zambia Democratic Congress–Popular Front (Zadeco-PF), which its founders asserted was based on the same principles as Zedeco, but without the “undemocratic” leadership. Meanwhile, Mungomba remained imprisoned until December 1998, when the charges against him were dropped.

The NLP had been launched on August 11, 1996 by Guy Scott, a former agriculture minister and MMD parliamentarian (later of the PF), and Ben Kapita, the president of the Zambian National Union of Farmers. At legislative balloting in November, NLP candidates, campaigning on a platform calling for protection of Zambian farmers from foreign competitors, secured 6.6 percent of the vote but no seats.

The first ZAP general congress in July 2000 selected Mungomba as the party's candidate for the 2001 presidential contest. However, Mungomba subsequently participated in the creation of the ZRP in February 2001, apparently with the hope of securing the new grouping's nomination. After withdrawing from the ZRP several months later, Mungomba continued to present himself as the ZAP presidential candidate before leaving the race in October. By that time critics described the rump ZAP as a “one-man show,” and the party secured less than 0.2 percent of the votes in the legislative balloting.

After Mungomba's death in 2005, Zedeco secretary general Langton SICHONE said the party would disband. In 2006, however, Zedeco was still active, though divided by a rift between Sichone (who was reportedly expelled) and leader Dan Pule.

Leader: Dan PULE (President).

National Party (NP). The NP was launched on August 16, 1993, by MMD defectors, including prominent party officials and legislators, who had become disenchanted with the Chiluba administration's apparent unwillingness to combat cabinet-level corruption and drug trafficking. Soon thereafter, former UNIP deputy secretary general Kennedy Shepande joined the new grouping, raising NP hopes of a possible alliance with other UNIP elements.

Pledging to be a “receptive and listening party,” the NP appointed Inonge Mbikusita Lewanika interim chair, making her Zambia's first female political party leader. However, in October 1996 the party announced that Lewanika and her brother, Akashambatwa Mbikusita Lewanika, theretofore NP secretary general, had left the party to form the Agenda for Zambia (above). Meanwhile, party leader Humphrey MULEMBA called on President Chiluba to develop a “dialogue” with opposition parties to address electoral grievances. In early 1997 the NP called for an independent inquiry into what it asserted were the suspicious circumstances surrounding the recent deaths of three party leaders.

In October 1998 the NP suspended three of its assemblymen after they voiced support for the presidential candidacy of Anderson Mazoka, a party member and business leader who had continued to seek backing for his electoral ambitions despite the party's decision to forward its secretary general, Ludwig SONDASHI. Subsequently, Mazoka broke from the NP and formed the UPND (above), although the NP and UPND announced an electoral pact in 2000.

NP President Daniel LISULO, a former prime minister and UNIP stalwart under President Kaunda, died in August 2000. (Lisulo had briefly organized a United Democratic Congress Party [UDCP] in the early 1990s before joining the MMD and then joining other MMD defectors to the NP. He had succeeded Mulemba as NP leader upon Mulemba's death in February 1998.)

Zambia United Development Party (ZUDP). The ZUDP was launched in 2001 by businessman Wilson Mukupa as a grouping dedicated to antipoverty efforts. The ZUDP presented candidates, without success, in the 2001 local elections.

Leader: Wilson MUKUPA.

Other Parties and Groups

An alliance of smaller parties, styled as the National Democratic Front (NDF), formed prior to the 2006 presidential election. The NDF included the All People's Congress (APC); the Party for Unity, Democracy, and Development (PUDD); the Zambia Democratic Congress (Zadeco); the Reform Party (RP); and the ZRP. The APC, led by Kenny NGONDO, later withdrew over a dispute with alliance leader, former vice president of the republic Nevers Mumba. The Zambia Direct Democracy Movement (ZDDM), led by Edwin SAKALA, later was reported to have joined the alliance.

Party for Unity, Democracy, and Development (PUDD). The PUDD was formed in September 2004 by former members of the MMD who supported former President Frederick Chiluba. It also attracted dissident members of the PF who opposed the party's leader, Michael Sata. Former party leader Dan PULE led a cadre of defectors to Zadeco in 2005. Subsequently, former MMD national chair Chitalu Sampa became interim leader of PUDD. The party sought to draw disaffected political figures into a new coalition ahead of the 2006 legislative elections, and though there was speculation that Chiluba might use the new party to challenge President Mwanawasa in the 2006 presidential election, Chiluba's health and legal problems (see Current issues, above) cast doubt on his candidacy.

Leaders: Chitalu SAMPA (President), Josiah CHISHALA (National Chair).

Reform Party (RP). The Reform Party was founded in 2005 by supporters of former vice president of the republic Nevers Mumba after he was expelled from the MDD. (He reportedly had planned to challenge President Mwanawasa for the party presidency.) Mumba said he would be the Reform Party candidate in the 2006 presidential election.

Leader: Nevers MUMBA.

United Liberal Party. Former UPND acting president Sakwiba Sikota formed the United Liberal Party in July 2006 after his failed bid to become UPND president. He broke away with several other senior officials of UPND, accusing the latter party of corruption and tribalism. Many of his supporters were reported to be from his home Western Province.

Leader: Sakwiba SIKOTA.

Barotse Patriotic Front (BPF). References to the BPF first appeared in 1998 in regard to calls for independence or autonomy for a portion of western Zambia that had, along with regions in what are now Namibia and Botswana, been known as Barotse-land. That kingdom of Lozi-speakers had enjoyed what one journalist called "half-independence" under British colonial rule. The area in Zambia became part of that country at independence in 1964 under an autonomy agreement with the UNIP under which the tribal chieftain was to retain significant powers, particularly in regard to control of land and resources. Lozi leaders subsequently claimed that UNIP had abrogated the agreement by stripping the chief of many of his powers.

The BPF in 1999 supported the secessionist activities of the Caprivi Liberation Front, which represents Lozi-speakers in Namibia (see Illegal Groups in article on Namibia for details). The BPF also called for a self-determination vote in western Zambia, prompting the detention of BPF leader Imasiku Mutangelwa on sedition charges. The BPF has acted in concert with a Barotse Cultural Association, while a Forum for the Restoration of Barotse-land in July 2001 petitioned the OAU and the UN to conduct a self-determination referendum. In 2004 the BPF renewed its call to restore the name Barotse-land to the Western Province and for the constitution of Zambia to uphold the 1964 agreement.

Leaders: Imasiku MUTANGELWA (President), Pumulo YUSIKU (Executive Secretary).

Minor parties include the Democratic Party (DP), led by businessman Emmanuel MWAMBA; the Progressive Parties Alliance, led by Paul BANDA; the Unity Party for Democrats (UPD), led by Matthew PIKITI; the Zambia Democratic Party (ZDP), led by Susan JERE; the Zambia Progressive Party (ZPP), led by Ambran ZAPU; and the Zambia United Development Party, led by Wilson MUKUPA.

Cabinet

As of August 1, 2006

President	Levy Patrick Mwanawasa
Vice President	Lupando Mwappe

Ministers

Agriculture and Cooperatives	Mundia Sikatana
Commerce, Trade, and Industry	Dipak Patel
Communications and Transport	Abel Chambeshi
Community Development and Social Services	Steven Manjata
Defense	Wamundila Muli yokela
Education	Brian Chituwo
Energy and Water Development	Felix Mutati
Finance and National Planning	Ngandu Magande
Foreign Affairs	Lt. Gen. Ronnie Shikapwasha
Health	Sylvia Masebo [f]
Home Affairs	Bates Namuyamba
Information and Broadcasting	Vernon Mwaanga
Labor and Social Security	Mutale Nalumango [f]
Lands	Rev. Gladys Nyirongo [f]
Legal Affairs	George Kunda
Local Government and Housing	Andrew Mulenga
Mines and Mineral Development	Kalombo Mwansa
Science, Technology, and Vocational Training	Judith Kapijimpanga [f]
Sport, Youth, and Child Development	George Chulumanda
Tourism, Environment, and Natural Resources	Kabinga Pande
Works and Supply	Marina Nsingo [f]

[f] = female

Legislature

The current National Assembly is a unicameral body consisting of 150 elected members, 8 presidentially appointed members, and the speaker, who is elected by the members of the assembly from outside their membership. The term of office is five years. Prior to the 1991 election candidates were required to be members of the United National Independence Party (UNIP) and endorsed by that party's Central Committee. The most recent elections were held on December 27, 2001, with the Zambia Electoral Commission reporting the following distribution of elected seats: the Movement for Multiparty Democracy, 69; the United Party for National Development, 49; UNIP, 13; the Forum for Democracy and Development, 12; the Heritage Party, 4; the Zambia Republican Party and the Patriotic Front, 1 each; and independents, 1. (See headnote.)

Speaker: Amusaa K. MWANAMWAMBWA.

Communications

Prior to its electoral defeat in October 1991, the UNIP exercised rigid control over the news media. Since then, a flourishing, essentially free press has emerged.

Press

In April 1980, following publication in the Times of Zambia of an article critical of the government, President Kaunda warned that press freedoms might be curtailed. Subsequently, on October 1, 1982, the Times, which had long been dominated by the UNIP, was acquired outright from the British conglomerate Lonrho. The following are English-language newspapers published in Lusaka: National Mirror (40,000), Catholic weekly; Zambia Daily Mail (40,000), government owned; Weekly Post (40,000), influential independent, launched in July 1991; Times of Zambia (32,000 daily, 44,200 Sunday), government owned; The People, independent weekly.

In 1998 a number of Weekly Post staff members were arrested after their paper reported that the Zambian military would be incapable of fending off an Angolan invasion.

News Agencies

The Zambia News Agency (Zana) is the domestic facility; Agence France-Presse, Deutsche Presse-Agentur, and Reuters are among the foreign agencies maintaining bureaus in Lusaka.

Broadcasting and Computing

The government-supervised Zambia National Broadcasting Corporation (ZNBC) controls both radio and television. Radio Zambia transmits in English and seven Zambian languages, while Television-Zambia provides programming for approximately 323,000 television receivers. There were some 95,000 personal computers serving 68,200 Internet users in 2003.

Intergovernmental Representation

Ambassador to the U.S.

Inonge Mbikusita LEWANIKA

U.S. Ambassador to Zambia

Carmen Maria MARTINEZ

Permanent Representative to the UN

Tens C. KAPOMA

IGO Memberships (Non-UN)

AfDB, AU, BADEA, Comesa, CWTH, Interpol, IOM, NAM, PCA, SADC, WCO, WTO

ZIMBABWE

REPUBLIC OF ZIMBABWE

---

The Country

Bordered by Botswana, Zambia, Mozambique, and South Africa, Zimbabwe occupies the fertile plateaus and mountain ranges between southeastern Africa's Zambezi and Limpopo rivers. The population includes approximately 12 million Africans, mainly Bantu in origin; some 200,000 Europeans; and smaller groups of Asians and people of mixed race. The Africans may be classified into two multiracial groupings, the Shona (about 75 percent) in the north and the Ndebele, concentrated in the southern area of Matabeleland. Shona-Ndebele rivalry dates to the 19th century and has contributed to a pronounced north-south cleavage. The majority of the European population is Protestant, although there is a substantial Catholic minority; the Africans include both Christians and followers of traditional religions; the Asians are a mixture of Hindus and Muslims.

In 1982 a Legal Age of Majority Act significantly enhanced the legal status of women (including the right of personal choice in selecting a marital partner, the right to own property outright, and the ability to enter into business contracts); it has, however, been unevenly utilized because of its conflict with traditional law. In 1996 about 44 percent of the paid labor force was estimated to be female; black women are responsible for most subsistence agriculture (cash-crop production had been undertaken mainly by some 4,500 white farmers who at one time owned more than 70 percent of the arable land); white and Asian women are concentrated in the clerical and service sectors.

Zimbabwe is well endowed with natural resources that have yielded a relatively advanced economy oriented toward foreign trade (to which tobacco is a large contributor). The country exports asbestos, chrome, copper, and other mineral products to a wide variety of foreign markets, while agricultural self-sufficiency, until recently, has permitted export of maize and other food crops to shortage-plagued neighbors. Although international trade sanctions were imposed on Zimbabwe (then Rhodesia) from 1965 to 1979, its economy prospered for much of the period because of continued access to trade routes through Mozambique (until 1976) and South Africa, which became the conduit for up to 90 percent of Rhodesian imports and exports. The lifting of sanctions at the end of 1979 further stimulated the economy, although drought and falling commodity prices subsequently contributed to fiscal difficulties, including budget deficits and persistent inflation. In

Political Status: Became self-governing British Colony of Southern Rhodesia in October 1923; unilaterally declared independence November 11, 1965; white-dominated republican regime proclaimed March 2, 1970; biracial executive established on basis of transitional government agreement of March 3, 1978; returned to interim British rule on basis of cease-fire agreement signed December 21, 1979; achieved de jure independence as Republic of Zimbabwe on April 18, 1980.

Area: 150,803 sq. mi. (390,580 sq. km.).

Population: 11,631,657 (2002C); 13,004,000 (2005E). The 2002 figure appears to involve substantial underenumeration.

Major Urban Center (including suburbs, 2005E): HARARE (formerly Salisbury, 1,527,000).

Official Language: English (Shona and Sindebele are the principal African languages).

Monetary Unit: Zimbabwe dollar (official rate, July 1, 2006: 101,196 dollars = $1US).

President: Robert Gabriel MUGABE (Zimbabwe African National Union–Patriotic Front); sworn in as prime minister on April 18, 1980, following legislative election of February 14 and 27–29; reconfirmed following election of June 30 and July 1–2, 1985; elected president by parliament on December 30, 1987, and inaugurated for an anticipated six-year term on December 31, succeeding the former head of state, Rev. Canaan Sodindo BANANA; reelected for a six-year term, following constitutional revision, by popular vote March 28–30, 1990; reelected for another six-year term March 16–17, 1996; reelected for another six-year term March 9–11, 2002.

Vice President: Joseph MSIKA (Zimbabwe African National Union–Patriotic Front); appointed by the president on December 21, 1999, in succession to Joshua Mqabuko NKOMO (Zimbabwe African National Union–Patriotic Front), who died on July 1; reappointed following election of March 2002.

Vice President: Joyce MUJURU (Zimbabwe National Union–Patriotic Front); appointed by the president on December 6, 2004, to succeed Simon MUZENDA, who died in 2003.

addition, unemployment was aggravated by a growing pool of workers seeking better jobs as the result of rapid educational advances for blacks. The government consequently relaxed its control of the economy in favor of private business, industry, and agriculture, while an accelerated rate of disinvestment by foreign companies prompted revision of the country's investment guidelines.

In September 1995 the International Monetary Fund (IMF) announced the nonrenewal of loans for balance-of-payments support for six months in the wake of what were viewed as unacceptable projections of deficit reduction in the 1995–1996 budget. Following President Robert MUGABE's reelection in March 1996 the Zimbabwean business community lobbied the administration to enact the reforms sought by international lenders, including military and civil service budget cuts.

Zimbabwe continues to suffer gravely from severe deterioration of economic, social, and political conditions, in part due to controversy surrounding the government's land redistribution program (see Political background and also Current issues, below). The government has also been buffeted by allegations of corruption and broad mismanagement of the economy, marked by a bloated and inefficient civil service, massive budget deficits, and a soaring inflation rate. Poverty was widespread, and the rate of adults with HIV was 25 percent (though that figure was reported to have declined by 2006).

Real GDP declined by 8.2 percent in 2004 and by 7.2 percent in 2005, while inflation ballooned to a record 620 percent in 2004, then dropped to around 400 percent by the end of 2005. Further exacerbating the faltering economic situation, Zimbabwe was nearly forced to withdraw from the IMF in 2005 because it owed $175 million in arrears. In early 2006, however, following a payment of $9 million, Zimbabwe avoided expulsion but lost its IMF voting rights and access to general resources of the fund. Despite calls for reforms by the IMF and the UN, the government refused help or intervention. By April 2006 conditions grew more dire as the country's inflation rate hit 1,042.9 percent, among the highest in the world; millions of people were said to be suffering from food shortages; and the infant mortality rate was also reported as likely the highest in the world. The government devalued the currency and subsequently introduced emergency reforms, issuing new currency in August and seizing cash from citizens and businesses in an effort to curtail black market trade.

Government and Politics

Political Background

Originally developed and administered by the British South Africa Company, Southern Rhodesia became an internally self-governing British colony in 1923 under a system that concentrated political power in the hands of its white minority. In 1953 it joined with Northern Rhodesia (now Zambia) and Nyasaland (now Malawi) in the so-called Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. However, Southern Rhodesia reverted to separate status in 1963 when the federation was dissolved and Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland prepared to claim their independence. A new constitution granted to Southern Rhodesia by Britain in December 1961 conferred increased powers of self-government and contained various provisions for the benefit of the African population, including a right of limited representation in the Legislative Assembly. However, the measure failed to resolve a sharpening conflict between African demands for full political equality based on the principle of "one-person, one-vote" and white Rhodesian demands for permanent white control.

In view of the refusal of Britain to agree to independence on terms that would exclude majority rule, the colonial government under Prime Minister Ian D. SMITH on November 11, 1965, issued a Unilateral Declaration of Independence purporting to make Rhodesia an independent state within the Commonwealth, loyal to the queen but free of external constraints. Britain repudiated the action, declared the colony to be in a state of rebellion, and invoked financial and economic sanctions; however, it refused to use force against the Smith regime. British Prime Minister Harold Wilson met personally with Smith in December 1966, after which UN sanctions were imposed, and again in October 1968, but no agreement was reached.

Rhodesia approved a new constitution on June 20, 1969, declaring itself a republic; subsequently, Britain suspended formal ties with the separatist regime. However, further British initiatives under Conservative leadership resulted in a set of proposals for settlement of the dispute in November 1971. These proposals were declared unacceptable by independent African leaders at the United Nations, and they were dropped in May 1972 after a 15-member British commission under Lord PEARCE found them equally unacceptable to the majority of Rhodesia's African population.

On December 8, 1974, an agreement was concluded in Lusaka, Zambia, by Bishop Abel MUZOREWA of the African National Council (ANC), Joshua NKOMO of the Zimbabwe African People's Union (ZAPU), Ndabaningi SITHOLE of the Zimbabwe African National Union (ZANU), and James CHIKEREMA of the Front for the Liberation of Zimbabwe (Frolizi), whereby the latter three, representing groups that had been declared illegal within Rhodesia, would join an enlarged ANC executive under Bishop Muzorewa's presidency for a period of four months to prepare for negotiations with the Smith regime aimed at transferring power to the majority. Three days later Prime Minister Smith announced that, upon the receipt of assurances that insurgents within Rhodesia would observe a cease-fire, all black political prisoners would be released and a constitutional conference would be held without preconditions. On December 15, however, Smith again reiterated his government's opposition to the principle of majority rule.

In March 1975 Sithole, who had returned to Salisbury in December, was arrested by Rhodesian authorities on charges of plotting to assassinate his rivals in order to assume the ANC leadership. He was released a month later, following the intervention of Prime Minister Vorster of South Africa. A few days earlier the Zambian government had announced that the Lusaka offices of ZANU, ZAPU, and Frolizi would be closed in accordance with its interpretation of the December 1974 agreement and the subsequent recognition of the ANC by the Organization of African Unity (OAU, subsequently the African Union—AU). ZANU spokesmen responded by charging that the presidents of Botswana, Tanzania, and Zambia had secretly agreed at the December talks to reconstitute the ANC leadership under the presidency of Nkomo without consulting Rhodesian African leaders.

During an ANC executive committee meeting in Salisbury on June 1, 1975, fighting broke out between ZANU and ZAPU representatives, and ZANU announced that it would not send delegates to an ANC congress scheduled for June 21–22. Frolizi also indicated that it would be unrepresented because the government had refused to grant its delegates an amnesty to return to Rhodesia. On June 16 Bishop Muzorewa announced that the proposed congress would not take place “due to serious administrative and other extreme difficulties.”

Following an inconclusive meeting in Victoria Falls held August 25–26, 1975, by the leaders of Rhodesia, South Africa, Zambia, and the ANC, the Nkomo faction, meeting in Salisbury on September 27–28, elected Nkomo president of the ANC within Rhodesia. On December 1 Nkomo and Prime Minister Smith concluded a series of meetings by signing a Declaration of Intention to Negotiate a Settlement of the Rhodesian issue. Under the agreement, which was repudiated by external ANC leader Bishop Muzorewa (then resident in Zambia) and by ZANU leader Sithole, all members of the ANC negotiating team were guaranteed freedom to enter Rhodesia to attend the projected talks.

Early 1976 witnessed an intensification of guerrilla activity by Mozambique-based insurgents under the leadership of former ZANU secretary general Robert MUGABE, the closing of the Mozambique border on March 3, and a breakdown in the talks between Nkomo and Smith on March 19. In early September it was reported that South African Prime Minister Vorster had agreed to a U.S.-British offer to provide upwards of $2 billion in financial guarantees to Rhodesia’s white settlers, contingent upon Salisbury’s acceptance of majority rule. Prime Minister Smith subsequently announced that he had accepted a comprehensive package tendered by U.S. Secretary of State Henry Kissinger in a meeting on September 19 in Pretoria, South Africa, that called for a biracial interim government and the establishment of majority rule within two years. Britain responded to the Kissinger-Smith accord by convening a conference in Geneva between a white delegation led by Smith and a black delegation that included Nkomo, Mugabe, Muzorewa, and Sithole. However, the conference, which ran from October 28 to December 14, failed to yield a settlement, with the black leaders rejecting the essentials of the Kissinger plan by calling for an immediate transfer to majority rule and the replacement of the all-white Rhodesian army by contingents of the nationalist guerrilla forces. Alternative proposals advanced by the black leadership pointed up major differences among the various factions. Mugabe and Nkomo demanded a British presence in Rhodesia (rejected by Sithole) while refusing to accept Sithole’s and Muzorewa’s proposals for an election prior to the transfer of power. Earlier, on September 9, Sithole had announced the withdrawal of ZANU from the ANC, which since its formation in December 1974 had been split into two wings led by Bishop Muzorewa and ZAPU leader Nkomo. Collaterally, Mugabe claimed the leadership of ZANU, while the Sithole group within Rhodesia became known as ANC-Sithole and the Muzorewa group as the United African National Council (UANC).

In September 1976 Mugabe called for a unified military command of all guerrilla forces, and on October 9 he announced the formation of a Patriotic Front (PF) linking ZANU and ZAPU units. Although subsequently endorsed by the OAU and the front-line states—Angola, Botswana, Mozambique, Tanzania, and Zambia—the PF failed to achieve full integration because of the Soviet orientation of ZAPU, many of whose recruits had been trained by Cubans in Angola, and the Chinese orientation of ZANU, most of whose recruits had been trained in Tanzania. To complicate matters further, a dissident ZANU group withdrew its cadres from Mugabe’s leadership on October 11 and formally redesignated Sithole as party president; however, Sithole and Muzorewa continued to assume a relatively moderate posture during 1977, engaging in sporadic negotiations with the Smith regime, while Nkomo and Mugabe constituted the core of a more radical external leadership.

In January 1977 three moderate white groups—the Rhodesian Party, the Centre Party, and the National Pledge Association—created the National Unifying Force to campaign for the effective removal of discriminatory legislation and a meaningful accord with the black majority. However, more crucial pressure was exerted by rightist elements within the ruling Rhodesian Front (RF) following the front's decision in March to liberalize constitutional provisions regarding land tenure. The dissidents were expelled from the RF on April 29 and organized themselves as the Rhodesian Action Party (RAP) on July 4. Since the RF thus lost the majority required for constitutional amendment, a new election was called for August 31, at which the front regained all 50 seats on the European roll.

During 1977 a number of British proposals were advanced in hopes of resolving the impasse on interim rule. In January, concurrent with an announcement that resumption of the Geneva discussions would be indefinitely postponed, Ivor RICHARD, British representative to the UN and chair of the Geneva Conference, called for the appointment of a British resident commissioner in Salisbury who would play a balancing role in the negotiations with “a great deal of constitutional power.” He further proposed an interim Rhodesian Council embracing 20 blacks (5 from each of the leading nationalist factions) and 10 whites (5 British and 5 Rhodesian). The proposal was immediately rejected by Prime Minister Smith, who conveyed his government's opposition to any form of British presence. In September, however, a revised version of the proposal was endorsed by the UN Security Council. Under the new plan, a British resident commissioner (Field Marshal Lord CARVER) would be appointed for a period of six months, during which arrangements would be made for a new constitution and a one-person, one-vote general election. The plan also called for the creation of a new Rhodesian army containing mixed black-white units and the appointment of a UN special representative (Indian Lt. Gen. Prem CHAND, former commander of the UN Force in Cyprus, who was named to the new post on October 4). While the initial reaction by all parties was encouraging, both Nkomo and Mugabe subsequently insisted that transitional control be exercised by the PF rather than by the British commissioner. The change in attitude was occasioned largely by a dispute regarding the timing of a general election, PF leaders insisting, because of Bishop Muzorewa's apparent widespread popularity, that the election be deferred for as long as three years after independence. Subsequently, Prime Minister Smith declared that the British settlement plan had failed and resumed discussions, based on a revision of the earlier Kissinger package, with Muzorewa and Sithole. In December Nkomo declared that front leaders would not join the “fake so-called internal settlement talks by Smith and his puppets.”

Despite the intransigence of the PF, an agreement was reached on March 3, 1978, by Smith, Muzorewa, Sithole, and Mashona Chief Jeremiah S. CHIRAU of the Zimbabwe United People's Organization (ZUPO) to form a transitional government that would lead to black rule by the end of the year. Accordingly, an Executive Council comprising the four was established on March 21, while a multiracial Ministerial Council to replace the existing cabinet was designated on April 12. On May 16 the Executive Council released preliminary details of a new constitution that would feature a titular president elected by parliament sitting as an electoral college. In the face of escalating guerrilla activity, however, the existing House of Assembly voted on June 26—despite the unanimous objection of its black members—to renew the state of emergency that had been in effect since 1965 for another year. More importantly, although all racial discrimination was formally abolished on October 10, the projected national election was postponed in early November, following the failure of a renewed effort to convene an all-party conference, until April 1979.

A new constitution was approved by the assembly on January 20, 1979, and endorsed by 84 percent of the white voters in a referendum on January 30. Although condemned by the UN Security Council by a 12–0 vote (with 3 abstentions) on March 8, a lower-house election was held on April 10 and 17–20 for 20 white and 72 black members, respectively, at which the UANC won 51 seats in the face of a boycott by the PF parties. Following a Senate election on May 23, Josiah GUMEDE of the UANC was elected president of Zimbabwe/Rhodesia, and on May 29 he requested Bishop Muzorewa to accept appointment as prime minister.

On June 7, 1979, U.S. President Carter rejected an appeal for recognition of the new government, expressing doubt that the election had been either free or fair since “the black citizens . . . never had a chance to consider or to vote against the Constitution,” while the white minority retained control of the police, the army, the justice system, and the civil service. Earlier, the newly appointed British prime minister, Margaret Thatcher, had stated that responsibility for deciding on the legality of the Muzorewa government lay with the UK parliament, although Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary Lord Carrington argued in the House of Lords that it would be “morally wrong to brush aside an election in which 64 percent of the people of Rhodesia cast their vote.”

Following renewed guerrilla activity by PF forces in mid-1979, British and other Commonwealth leaders issued a call for talks between representatives of the Muzorewa government and the Patriotic Front. The discussions, which commenced on September 10 and ran for 14 weeks, yielded a cease-fire agreement on December 5 that called for Britain to reassume full administrative authority for an interim period, during which a new and carefully monitored election would be held as a prelude to the granting of legal independence. On December 7 the terms of the agreement (which was not formally signed by the principals until December 21) were approved by parliament, and Lord SOAMES was appointed colonial governor, with Sir Anthony DUFF as his deputy. On December 12 Lord Soames arrived in Salisbury, where he was welcomed by members of the former government of Zimbabwe/Rhodesia, who, one day earlier, had approved a parliamentary bill terminating the Unilateral Declaration of Independence and transferring authority to the British administration.

White and common roll elections were held in February 1980, the Rhodesian Front winning all 20 white seats and Mugabe’s ZANU-PF winning a substantial overall majority in the House of Assembly. Accordingly, Mugabe was asked by Lord Soames on March 4 to form a cabinet that included 16 members of ZANU-PF, 4 members of Nkomo’s Patriotic Front–ZAPU, and 2 members of the RF. The new government was installed during independence day ceremonies on April 18 following the inauguration of Rev. Canaan Sodindo BANANA, a Mugabe supporter, as president of the republic.

The period immediately after independence was characterized by persistent conflict between armed forces of ZANU-PF and PF-ZAPU (units of Mugabe’s Zimbabwe African National Liberation Army [ZANLA] and Nkomo’s Zimbabwe People’s Revolutionary Army [ZIPRA], respectively). To some extent the difficulties were rooted in tribal loyalties, with most ZANLA personnel having been recruited from the northern Shona group, while ZIPRA had recruited primarily from the Ndebele people of Matabeleland. During 1981 the level of overt violence subsided, the government announcing in November that merger of the two guerrilla organizations and the former Rhodesian security force into a 50,000-man Zimbabwean national army had been completed. However, personal animosity between Mugabe and Nkomo continued, threatening the viability of the coalition regime. On February 17, 1982, Nkomo and three other ZAPU government members were dismissed in a major cabinet reorganization, Nkomo declaring that his group should thenceforth be construed as an opposition party. By 1984 violence on the part of dissident Nkomo supporters had produced major confrontations with government forces in Matabeleland, while defections from Ian Smith’s party, renamed the Conservative Alliance of Zimbabwe (CAZ), had reduced its strength in the assembly to seven.

After a series of postponements attributed to a need to redraw electoral districts and prepare new voter lists, the first postindependence legislative elections were held in mid-1985. Smith's CAZ rallied to regain 15 of the 20 white seats on June 27, while in common roll balloting held July 1–4, Mugabe's ZANU-PF won all but 1 of the non-Matabeleland constituencies, raising its assembly strength to 64 as contrasted with ZAPU's 15. Although the results fell short of the mandate desired by Mugabe for introduction of a one-party state, ZAPU members, including Nkomo, responded to overtures for merger talks, which eventually yielded an agreement on December 22, 1987, whereby the two parties would merge, with Nkomo becoming one of two ZANU-PF vice presidents. Three months earlier, following expiration of a constitutionally mandated seven-year entrenchment, the white seats in both houses of parliament had been vacated and refilled on a "non-constituency" basis by the assembly. On December 31 Mugabe, having secured unanimous assembly endorsement the day before, was sworn in as executive president; concurrently, Simon MUZENDA was inaugurated as vice president, with the post of prime minister being eliminated.

The Senate was abolished as of the balloting of March 28–30, 1990, at which Mugabe won 78 percent of the presidential vote and ZANU-PF swept all but four seats in the House of Assembly. Following the election, a second vice presidency was established by constitutional amendment, with Nkomo being named to the post.

On May 1, 1993, the government released a list of 70 farms, encompassing approximately 470,000 acres, which it planned to purchase for redistribution under authority of the 1992 Land Acquisition Act. Subsequently, the powerful Commercial Farmers' Union (CFU), representing approximately 4,000 white farmers, denounced the government for violating its pledge to buy only "derelict and underutilized" properties. Furthermore, Western donors reportedly warned the Mugabe administration that it risked suspension of aid payments if it followed through with its proposed acquisitions. In August the president responded that his government would seize the properties without compensation and expel "resistant" whites if domestic and "racist" foreign interference continued, and in September he dismissed a legal challenge to the Land Act as futile. However, following the revelation in early 1994 that a majority of the 98 parcels appropriated under the act had been granted to senior government officials and civil servants, Mugabe suspended the program in April.

At presidential balloting held March 16–17, 1996, President Mugabe captured a third term. The president's victory was tarnished, however, by the withdrawal of his only two competitors, Sithole and Muzorewa, during the week prior to balloting. Both men complained of being harassed by government security forces, and they charged that the electoral system unfairly favored the incumbent. Furthermore, voter turnout was reported to have been only 32 percent, the first polling since independence to attract less than 50 percent of the electorate. Thus, even with an official 92 percent vote share (Sithole's and Muzorewa's names remained on the ballot, and both garnered votes), Mugabe reportedly secured only 28.5 percent of the potential vote, far from the mandate for which he had campaigned.

ZANU-PF reportedly won most of the seats in local elections in August 1999, although low turnout again tarnished the results. Shortly thereafter, opposition forces coalesced as the Movement for Democratic Change (MDC), which lobbied strongly against the constitutional revision proposed by the government that, among other things, would have made Mugabe president for life, given him the power to dissolve parliament, and endorsed the administration's land redistribution program. Underscoring growing internal discontent, 55 percent of those voting in a national referendum held on February 12–13, 2000, rejected the proposed changes in the basic law.

ZANU-PF barely withstood an electoral challenge from the MDC in new assembly balloting held June 24–25, 2000, securing 62 of the 120 elective seats. Subsequently, in presidential balloting on March 9–11, 2002, Mugabe won another term, defeating Morgan TSVANGIRAI of the MDC 56 to 42 percent, although the MDC, as it had with the legislative balloting, rejected the results as fraudulent. (A court ruling in 2006 rejected Tsvangirai's charge of voter fraud in the 2002 election.)

In the legislative elections of March 31, 2005, ZANU-PF made a strong recovery, winning 78 seats, which, coupled with its 30 appointive seats, gave the president's party a two-thirds majority. The MDC won 41 seats, and 1 seat went to an independent candidate. The president reshuffled the cabinet on April 15, 2005, moving house speaker Emerson MNANGAGWA to a ministry post, among other changes. On August 30, 2005, the House of Assembly voted 103–29 to establish a new 66-member Senate (see Constitution and government, below), in addition to other constitutional amendments. In the first polling for 50 Senate seats on November 26, 2005, the ZANU-PF won 43 and the MDC won 7. Several other parties and independent candidates failed to win representation.

Constitution and Government

The constitution that issued from the 1979 London talks provided for a president designated for a six-year term by the (then) two houses of parliament sitting as an electoral college. Executive authority was vested in a cabinet headed, by a prime minister, with the appointment going to the person best able to command a legislative majority. However, in late 1987 the post of prime minister was abolished in favor of an executive presidency. The (then) unicameral legislature consisted of a 150-member House of Assembly, 120 of whom are popularly elected (see Legislature, below) for five-year terms. There is also an Advisory Council of Chiefs and an ombudsman, appointed by the president, to investigate complaints against actions by political authorities. The judicial system is headed by a High Court (with both general and appellate divisions) and includes magistrate courts at the local level. A national referendum in 2000 defeated proposed changes to enhance presidential authority (see Political background, above, for details).

Since 1980, the assembly has amended the constitution numerous times, most recently in August 2005, when it approved the establishment of an upper house, the Senate (see Legislature, below). Other constitutional amendments approved by the assembly in 2005 denied owners the right to appeal government expropriation of their land and empowered the government to confiscate passports, in the interest of national security, with no right to appeal.

The country is currently divided into ten provinces: West, Central, and East in Mashonaland; North and South in Matabeleland; Midlands; Manicaland; Masvingo; Harare; and Bulawayo (though the latter two are cities, they have provincial status). Each is headed by a centrally appointed provincial governor and serves, additionally, as an electoral district. Local government is conducted through town, district, and rural councils.

Foreign Relations

Zimbabwe became a member of the Commonwealth upon achieving de jure independence in April 1980; it was admitted to the OAU (subsequently the African Union—AU) the following July and to the United Nations in August. In January 1983 it was elected to a seat on the UN Security Council, where its representatives assumed a distinctly anti-American posture. The strain in relations with the United States culminated in 1986 with Washington's withdrawal of all aid in response to strongly worded attacks from Harare on U.S. policy regarding South Africa. Despite (then) Prime Minister Mugabe's refusal to apologize for the verbal onslaughts, the aid was resumed in August 1988.

In regional affairs, Harare occupied a leading position among the front-line states bordering South Africa, concluding a mutual security pact with Mozambique in late 1980 and hosting several meetings of the Southern African Development Coordination Conference (now the SADC). It also provided active support for the Maputo government's anti-insurgency campaign, with approximately 10,000 troops being stationed in Mozambique in 1986, primarily to defend the transport corridor to Beira on the Indian Ocean, which the front-line states viewed as crucial to diminish reliance on South African trade routes. In June 1988 Zimbabwe and Mozambique signed a military cooperation agreement aimed at containing the border activities of the rebel Mozambique National Resistance (Renamo). Nonetheless, news reports in January 1990 that some 60 Zimbabwean civilians had been killed by Renamo insurgents during the preceding six months, prompted Mugabe to extend state of emergency measures. In July Harare closed the border in an attempt to contain the unrest, while the Chissano government engaged in peace talks with Renamo. Thereafter, in compliance with a Chissano-Renamo accord, Zimbabwe on December 28 completed the withdrawal of its troops to defensive positions along Mozambique's trade routes, ceding control of previously held territory to Mozambique government forces. In April 1993, Harare withdrew its remaining troops.

The Zimbabwean government initially declined, for the sake of its own domestic "reconciliation," to provide bases for black nationalist attacks on South Africa. However, the anti-apartheid African National Congress (ANC) continued to operate from Zimbabwean territory, its cross-border attacks yielding retaliatory incursions by South African troops into Zimbabwe.

In February 1997 Zimbabwe and South Africa signed a defense agreement; however, their ties were subsequently strained by what Harare asserted were unfair South African trade practices and Pretoria's crackdown on illegal Zimbabwean immigrants. In February 1998 Zimbabwe, South Africa, and Namibia signed an extradition treaty.

In mid-1998 President Mugabe dispatched troops to the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC) to shore up the presidency of Laurent Kabila, from whose administration Harare reportedly sought mining concessions. At the peak of the conflict, an estimated 12,000 Zimbabwean troops were in the DRC, President Mugabe also strongly endorsing the succession of Joseph Kabila to the DRC presidency after the death of Laurent Kabila in early 2001. The support from Zimbabwe was considered crucial to the lasting power of the DRC administration, although the economic drain on scarce Zimbabwean resources contributed to growing anti-Mugabe sentiment. The last contingent of Zimbabwean troops left the DRC in November 2002.

In 2005 Zimbabwe was reelected to the UN Human Rights Commission, drawing sharp criticism from Western countries, among others, citing Zimbabwe's appalling human rights record.

Zimbabwe increasingly turned to South Africa and to China for financial aid as economic conditions worsened (most Western donors had frozen aid after Mugabe enacted the controversial land redistribution program). South Africa loaned $470 million to bail Zimbabwe out of IMF and humanitarian crises in 2005, and China signed a $1.3 billion energy deal with the Mugabe government in 2006.

Current Issues

A possible settlement appeared in the making in early 1999 concerning the incendiary question of land redistribution. According to the plan, the Zimbabwean government was to buy land from the dominant white farmers for use by black farmers, while the international community was to provide substantial aid for the development of infrastructure related to agriculture. However, the government's true intentions remained obscure as President Mugabe continued to threaten to expropriate the white farms and donor countries demanded significant economic reform on the part of the administration before releasing the promised financial assistance. Consequently, Mugabe attempted to secure authority to seize white farms through proposed constitutional revision. When the national referendum in February 2000 rejected the measure, the so-called invasion of some 1,600 farms by blacks (many from influential war veterans' groups) began. Collaterally, the administration, according to a rising chorus of domestic and international critics, launched a campaign of intimidation against opposition parties, particularly the surging MDC, in advance of the assembly balloting scheduled for June. Attendant disorder left more than 30 people dead as Mugabe promised additional resettlement in language described by one critic as “radical, racist rhetoric.” The president issued a special decree in May empowering himself to pursue his land redistribution initiative; the courts ruled that measure unconstitutional, but Mugabe refused to enforce a court order to evict the black “settlers” from the disputed farms.

Conditions continued to deteriorate following the June 2000 legislative balloting, with the MDC claiming it had been fraudulently deprived of many seats. International observers were reluctant to characterize the balloting as fair, and observers subsequently warned that Zimbabwe could implode, especially when rioting broke out in October. Despite such warnings, Mugabe appeared to harden his stance, pardoning thousands of ZANU-PF adherents who had been implicated in the pre-election violence. Throughout the first half of 2001, the administration also stepped up its attacks on journalists and reform-minded judges, while white-owned businesses in the cities also became the target of “invasions.” (Whites, less than 2 percent of the population, still controlled more than 50 percent of industry and commercial agriculture.) The United Kingdom at midyear withdrew its financial support to protest the takeovers, and unrest increased in August following the “evacuation” of some white farmers. Little progress in settling the dispute ensued during the remainder of the year. The assembly in January 2002 approved legislation banning public gatherings without police approval as an apparent means of undercutting the MDC challenge to Mugabe in the March presidential poll. The Commonwealth suspended Zimbabwe and imposed sanctions, including travel bans and aid restrictions, to protest the heavy-handedness of the administration, with the United States weighing in that Mugabe’s governance was “illegitimate and irrational.” For his part, Mugabe called his reelection a “stunning blow to imperialism” and condemned the “blatant racism of the West.” The farm crisis continued unabated throughout the rest of the year as the country appeared to be approaching financial collapse.

By the end of 2002 more than 28 million acres had been transferred to black Zimbabweans from white commercial farmers, but observers said the majority was redistributed, not to poor farmers, but to high-ranking government officials, army officers, and judges with ties to the ZANU-PF. In 2005 the governor of the central bank called on the government to allow some of the white farmers whose land had been seized to resume growing crops to bolster output. Reportedly, lack of expertise among black farmers who had received land, as well as drought conditions early in the year, resulted in what was described as an “economic catastrophe.” Urgent requests by UNICEF to bring in food aid were rejected by government officials, who insisted the country had enough food. Ultimately, however, the government agreed to allow UN assistance, but only under strict conditions.

With no abatement of the crisis, the government allegedly used food to buy votes in the March 31, 2005, assembly elections (the vote-buying was cited by a Zimbabwe judge in October), increasing its ZANU-PF representation by 16 seats, mainly with support from poor rural areas. The MDC again alleged massive fraud, although AU observers endorsed the elections, albeit citing some concerns, and the South African Development Community (SADC) observer mission found the election to be credible. The ZANU-PF returned with a landslide victory in balloting for a newly established Senate in November 2005, though critics pointed to the very low turnout of 19.5 percent as evidence of voter apathy coupled with a boycott by some members of the opposition MDC. The government party also benefited from a major rift in the MDC, which subsequently split into two factions (see Political Parties, below).

Further exacerbating the declining economic and social conditions, the government in 2005 launched Operation Marambatsvina (“drive out rubbish”) purportedly to rid urban areas of black market traders. Shantytowns were burned and bulldozed, initially displacing some 200,000 people. The MDC charged that the program was meant to punish urban dwellers who voted against the ZANU-PF. While the government said the operation was designed to “restore social order,” critics claimed that by dispersing urban dwellers, the government reduced the possibility of an uprising and drove people back to rural areas in the aftermath of the economic collapse due to the land redistribution program. After a visit by a UN official to assess the situation, President Mugabe pledged to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars over three years to rebuild homes and businesses. However, the slum clearing continued into 2006 under another program called Operation Roundup. By May 2006, both operations had cleared an estimated 700,000 people from Harare.

Also in 2006, white farmers were invited to lease back their land from the government under a 99-year agreement, but the few white farmers still in Zimbabwe were reported to be largely uninterested in the offer.

Political Parties

Prior to the “internal settlement” agreement of March 1978, Rhodesian parties could be broadly grouped into (1) the all-white Rhodesian Front (RF), which maintained overwhelming predominance in the elections of 1965, 1970, 1974, and 1977; (2) a number of small white opposition groups on the right and left of the ruling front; and (3) a variety of black opposition parties ranging from relatively moderate formations under such leaders as Bishop Abel Muzorewa, Reverend Ndabaningi Sithole, and Chief Jeremiah Chirau, to the more radical and overtly insurgent groups led by Robert Mugabe and Joshua Nkomo. The principal African leaders agreed during a summit conference at Lusaka, Zambia, in December 1974 to work together under Bishop Muzorewa of the African National Council (ANC) to achieve majority rule in Rhodesia, but disagreements precluded the creation of a unified black movement. The moderate leaders thereupon joined the RF’s Ian Smith in establishing a transitional government to prepare for a one-person, one-vote election originally scheduled for December 1978 but subsequently postponed to April 1979, while Mugabe and Nkomo entered into a somewhat tenuous Patriotic Front (PF) committed to the military overthrow of the biracial regime.

Although Nkomo expressed a desire to continue the alliance, Mugabe’s Zimbabwe African National Union–Patriotic Front (ZANU-PF) and Nkomo’s Patriotic Front–Zimbabwe African People’s Union (PF-ZAPU) contested the common roll election of February 27–29, 1980, as separate entities, ZANU-PF winning 57 of 80 assembly seats and PF-ZAPU winning 20.

Nkomo’s PF revived its earlier ZAPU designation following the government rupture of February 1982, while ZANU-PF moved toward the establishment of a one-party state that was consummated, on a de facto basis, with the signature of a merger agreement by Mugabe and Nkomo on December 22, 1987. However, on August 2, 1990, 21 of 26 ZANU-PF Politburo members voted against Mugabe’s appeal for a constitutional amendment to institutionalize the one-party system.

At a convention of the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU) in Harare in late February 1999, the ZCTU announced that it had coalesced with the National Constitutional Assembly (NCA), 30 civic groups, and a number of human rights, trade, and student organizations to form a political movement dedicated to pressuring the Mugabe government to enact economic, electoral, and constitutional reforms. Morgan Tsvangirai and Gibson Sibanda, leaders of both the ZCTU and the new coalition, had emerged in 1998 as point men for the anti-Mugabe forces. The NCA subsequently served as a major force in the creation of the nation’s first effective opposition party, the Movement for Democratic Change (below).

By 2005 the MDC had emerged as the chief opposition party and the only one of consequence. None of the numerous smaller parties had been able to elect any of their members to the parliament. In August 2006, opposition leaders, including those from the two MDC factions (below), announced they would form an alliance in an effort to unseat the ZANU-PF.

Government Party

Zimbabwe African National Union–Patriotic Front (ZANU-PF). ZANU was formed in 1963 as a result of a split in the Zimbabwe African People’s Union (ZAPU), an African nationalist group formed in 1961 under the leadership of Joshua Nkomo. Nkomo had in 1957 revived the dormant ANC, which was banned in 1959. He then was elected from exile as the president of a new National Democratic Party, which was declared illegal in 1961, leading to the formation and quick banning of ZAPU. ZANU, led by Ndabaningi Sithole and Robert Mugabe, was also declared illegal in 1964, and both ZANU and ZAPU initiated guerrilla activity against the Rhodesian government announced in November 1965.

In December 1974 ZANU President Sithole agreed to participate (along with ZAPU) in the enlargement of the African National Council to serve as the primary organization for negotiating with the Smith government (see Political background, above, for further information). However, Mugabe opposed such discussions and went into exile in Mozambique, from where he contested Sithole's dominance in ZANU. By late 1976 Mugabe was widely recognized as ZANU's leader, and he concluded a tactical (Patriotic Front—PF) agreement with Joshua Nkomo of ZAPU, although a minority of the ZANU membership apparently remained loyal to Sithole. The PF alliance broke down prior to the 1980 assembly election, Nkomo's group campaigning as PF-ZAPU and Mugabe's as ZANU-PF. Both parties participated in the government formed at independence, although ZANU-PF predominated with 16 of 22 ministerial appointments.

At ZANU-PF's third ordinary congress held December 19–21, 1989, the Politburo was enlarged from 15 to 26 members, the Central Committee was expanded from 90 to 150 members, a national chairmanship was created, and ZAPU was formally incorporated into the party (despite rejection of its demands for a sole vice presidency filled by Nkomo and an expunging of the group's Marxist-Leninist tenets). Furthermore, in an apparent expression of dissatisfaction with reform-minded East European regimes, the party's socialist orientation was redefined to emphasize the Zimbabwean historical, cultural, and social experience. Ultimately, on June 22, 1991, the party agreed to delete all references to Marxism, Leninism, and Scientific Socialism from the party's constitution.

While Mugabe's party leadership subsequently remained unchallenged, the increasing independence of ZANU-PF legislators and local leaders was highlighted in August 1992 by the assembly's rejection of an administration request for a new cabinet post, as well as by reports of regional leaders ignoring candidates forwarded by the national party in favor of their own local choices.

At a party congress in December 1995 Mugabe loyalists blocked efforts to open a party-wide dialogue on the question of presidential succession. At the same time, analysts predicted that party power would soon devolve to a younger generation of financially oriented technocrats and grassroots activists.

The revelation in April 1997 that senior party officials close to Mugabe had allegedly plundered the pension fund of war veterans created a rift in the party between its military and political wings. Meanwhile, analysts, and Mugabe himself, were reportedly critical of the party's senior leadership for having become preoccupied with positioning themselves for possible presidential succession. Reports that the popularity of the president as well as that of the party was waning were underlined in 1998 by the paltry turnout at Mugabe's public appearances and party rallies. Defying both international donors and ZANU-PF moderates, the Central Committee in December urged the president to forge ahead with plans to seize white-owned properties.

Despite the schisms within ZANU-PF, Mugabe was reelected without opposition as party president in 1999. Subsequently, in controversial balloting, ZANU-PF retained a narrow majority in the assembly in June 2000 and Mugabe was reelected to another term as president of the Republic in 2002.

Party solidarity began to disintegrate in 2004 after five party officials were arrested on espionage charges (three of whom were later convicted of spying for South Africa), and a purge of the party targeted members who opposed Mugabe's choice of Joyce Mujuru as vice president of the republic. Mujuru was appointed over house speaker Emmerson Mnangagwa, regarded by many as the president's likely successor. In 2005 Mnangagwa was moved to a low-profile ministry post when the president reshuffled the cabinet following the ZANU-PF's substantial victory in the March assembly election. The president also dismissed from the party information minister Jonathan MOYO after Moyo chose to run as an independent in the assembly balloting. (Moyo won a seat.) At midyear, Mugabe confirmed his plan to retire when his term expires in 2008, but he said he intended to remain active in the party until the 2009 national congress.

Leaders: Robert Gabriel MUGABE (President of the Republic and of the Party), Joseph MSIKA and Joyce MUJURU (Vice Presidents of the Republic and of the Party), Simba MAKONI, Emmer-son MNANGAGWA, Didymus MUTASA, John NKOMO (National Chair).

Other Parliamentary Party

Movement for Democratic Change (MDC). Launched in September 1999, the MDC was an outgrowth of the ZCTU/NCA (see above), its core components including workers, students, middle-class intellectuals, civil rights activists, and white corporate executives opposed to the perceived corruption of the ZANU-PF government as well as its management of the economy. Many of the MDC adherents had been members of the Forum Party of Zimbabwe, which had been established in 1993 under the leadership of Enoch DUMBUTSHENA (a retired chief justice) and David Coltart (see 1999 Handbook for details on the Forum Party).

In a rapid rise, the MDC secured 57 seats in the 2000 assembly balloting. MDC leaders claimed fraud on the part of the government in some 37 of the 62 seats secured by the ZANU-PF. Following party leader Morgan Tsvangirai's loss in the 2002 presidential election, he was charged with treason. That charge was later dropped, and in 2004 he was acquitted of a separate treason charge involving a plot to assassinate Mugabe.

Prior to the November 2005 Senate election the party was deeply divided between Tsvangirai's faction, which opposed participation in the balloting, and a faction led by party secretary general Welshman Ncube that planned to field candidates. Subsequently, 26 members who had been expelled by Tsvangirai stood for election, with only 7 winning Senate seats. A month later the MDC split, leaving the lawful leadership of the party in question. Tsvangirai maintained he was still in charge of the party, despite dissidents claiming he had been expelled. At the party congress in March 2006, Tsvangirai was reelected president and Isaac Matongo was reelected chair.

Several members of an alleged terrorist cell reported to have MDC connections were arrested in 2006 and charged with plotting to overthrow President Mugabe. The Zimbabwe Freedom Movement reportedly had ties to former Rhodesian security forces and was supposedly coordinated by two members of the MDC.

Leaders: Morgan TSVANGIRAI (President of the Party and 2002 presidential candidate), Thokozani KHUPE (Vice President of the Party), Isaac MATONGO (Chair).

Pro Democracy MDC. In early 2006, this dissident faction of the MDC was formed by party secretary general Welshman Ncube after a dispute with the MDC president over participation in the 2005 Senate election. Ncube's faction, styled the Pro Democracy MDC, named former MDC vice president Gibson Sibanda as acting president. The pro democracy group held a congress in February 2006 and elected former student activist Arthur Mutambara, 39, as party president, and Sibanda as vice president. Ncube retained the post of secretary general. The following month, however, Mutambara said it was wrong for MDC members to have contested the Senate elections and he urged those who were elected to resign. Further, he proposed reconciling with Tsvangirai's faction, and as of July, the leaders of both factions vowed to work together to unseat the ZANU-PF.

Leaders: Arthur MUTAMBARA (President), Gibson SIBANDA (Vice President), Welshman NCUBE (Secretary General).

Other Parties

Zimbabwe African National Union–Ndonga (ZANU-Ndonga). ZANU-Ndonga was formerly led by Ndabaningi Sithole, a vocal supporter of Mozambique's Renamo grouping, who announced from exile in the United States that, despite government threats to arrest and prosecute him on treason charges, he would return to Zimbabwe during an October 1991 meeting of the Commonwealth leaders in Harare; in actuality his return was postponed until early 1992. The party, which had controlled the sole opposition parliamentary seat in the late 1980s and retained it in 1990, suffered thereafter from criticism that Sithole's reform proposals were unrealistic and out of touch. By mid-1993, the grouping was described as "disorganized," although at least 18 of its members were reported as being arrested in mid-1994 after engaging in a clash with ZANU-PF supporters near the capital. Its parliamentary representative was killed in an automobile accident in October 1994, but the seat was recaptured by Sithole at a by-election held December 19–20.

In October 1995 Sithole was charged with participation in a plot to assassinate President Mugabe. Shortly thereafter William NAMAKONYA, a Sithole bodyguard who allegedly confessed to being a member of the Mozambique-based Chimwenje rebel group, was found guilty of possessing illegal arms, while on December 1 Simon MHLANGA, a Sithole supporter, was found guilty of having been illegally engaged in guerrilla training.

In March 1996 Sithole, who remained free on bail, announced his withdrawal from the presidential campaign, charging that security forces were harassing his supporters. In late 1997 Sithole was found guilty of treason and sentenced to two years in prison. In January 1998 Sithole, who remained free while preparing an appeal, called for the drafting of a new constitution, asserting that amending the current document, as suggested by other political leaders, would fail to bring down the Mugabe administration.

ZANU-Ndonga supported the MDC in the 2000 legislative campaign, although the party was credited with gaining one seat from the rural district of Chipinge on its own. Sithole died in December 2000, his appeal of his 1997 sentence having never been heard. With Zimbabwe's politics now only a two-party affair, ZANU-Ndonga became increasingly irrelevant. In 2005 it lost a seat in rural Chipinge South that it had held since 1980.

Leaders: Wilson KHUMBULA (President), Gideon CHINOUREI (Secretary General).

United Party (UP). The UP was launched in October 1994 by former UANC leader Bishop Muzorewa and his supporters, following their withdrawal from the Zimbabwe Unity Movement (ZUM). In December it merged with the small Forum Party for Democracy (FPD) in what was briefly styled the United Parties before reverting to the singular form. The UP joined ZUM in boycotting the 1995 balloting. Following the Supreme Court's rejection of his bid to postpone presidential balloting, on March 15, 1996, Bishop Muzorewa announced his withdrawal from the contest, charging that the electoral laws unfairly favored the ZANU-PF.

In the run-up to the June 2000 assembly balloting, the UP announced it was participating in an electoral coalition with ZANU-Ndonga, the ZUD, and the LPZ called the Foundation for Democracy in Zimbabwe (FODEZI). However, complete cohesion in that regard was not achieved, and FODEZI components presented competing candidates in some districts. By 2005 UP had all but disappeared as a political party.

Leaders: Bishop Abel MUZOREWA (President of the Party and 1996 presidential candidate).

Zimbabwe Union of Democrats (ZUD). Officially launched in December 1998, the ZUD is a vehicle for independent legislator Margaret Dongo, who had been credited with revealing the ZANU-PF's role in the veterans' pension fund scandal. (In February 1998 Dongo was reportedly the target of an unsuccessful bomb attack.) Dongo failed in her reelection bid in 2000. There is general agreement that ZUD has, as one observer put it, "sunk into political oblivion." Dongo surfaced to contest the 2005 assembly election as an independent.

Leaders: Margaret DONGO (President), Isaac MANYEMBA (Secretary General).

Popular Democratic Front (PDF). The PDF was originally founded in 1994 as the Front for Popular Democracy (FPD) by Austin Chakawodza, who in 1996 emerged as a prominent opposition spokesman and is based in London. In 1999 Chakawodza announced that the group had adopted the PDF rubric, denouncing some of his internal critics for “masquerading” as the FPD. As a very small opposition party, the PDF has little or no influence on the ruling powers.

Leader: Austin CHAKAWODZA (Chair).

National Democratic Union (NDU). Founded in 1979, the NDU is a very small, conservative Mashonaland grouping that participated in the 1990 legislative poll. In early 1998 the NDU reportedly petitioned the Supreme Court to overturn the Mugabe administration’s land reform proposals.

Leader: Mark MUCHABAIWA.

Zimbabwe Integrated Party (ZIP). Originally launched as the Zimbabwe Integrated Program, a nongovernmental organization devoted to promoting development projects, the ZIP secured 0.02 percent of the legislative vote in 2000 under the leadership of Heneri Dzinotiwei, a mathematics professor and businessman. In June 2006 it was reported that Dzinotiwei had joined Morgan Tsvangirai’s faction in the MDC.

Leader: Heneri DZINOTYIWEI.

Liberty Party of Zimbabwe (LPZ). Described as having a base among migrant workers in South Africa, the anti-Mugabe LPZ secured 0.06 percent of the vote in the 2000 legislative balloting. In 2002 a split in the party reportedly occurred over whether to support Mugabe and his controversial land reforms. LPZ was not a factor in the elections of 2002 and 2005.

Leaders: Canaan MOYO, George MOYO, Jabulani NDLOVU (Secretary General).

Federal Party of Zimbabwe (FPZ). The FPZ, also referenced as the FP, was formed in Bulawayo in December 1994 by a group of dissidents from the Forum Party of Zimbabwe to contest the “tribal domination” imposed on Matebeleland by ZANU-PF. It advocates a Zimbabwe of five provinces, each headed by its own prime minister. It also calls for limiting the term of the country’s president. In 1999 the party reportedly was dissolved as members joined the MDC in an effort to unseat the ZANU-PF.

Leaders: Twoboy JUBANE.

Zimbabwe Unity Movement (ZUM). The ZUM was launched in April 1989 by the so-called bad boy of Zimbabwe politics, Edgar Tekere, in opposition to President Mugabe’s efforts to establish a one-party state. It won two House of Assembly seats in March 1990, with Tekere securing a 16 percent vote-share as Mugabe’s only competitor in the presidential race. The party subsequently splintered when Tekere rejected a new ZUM constitution and proposal to restructure the party hierarchy.

Professing a desire to topple the Mugabe government, the ZUM in early 1994 announced a merger with the United African National Congress (UANC) of preindependence government leader Bishop Abel Muzorewa. The unification under the ZUM rubric failed, however, to attract new members, and by mid-1994 the group was suffering from internal tensions. Three months later Bishop Muzorewa and his supporters withdrew to form the United Party, (above). ZUM boycotted the 1995 election and was described as a “spent force” by 1999.

Leader: Edgar TEKERE.

Zimbabwe People’s Convention (ZPC). The ZPC was formed by former student leaders in mid-1998 on a prodemocracy and anti-Mugabe platform. Subsequently, the ZPC incorporated the members of the Zimbabwe National Liberation War Collaborators’ Association. In 2000, party secretary general Obey Mudzingwa and another high-ranking party official were reported to have joined the MDC.

Leader: Obey MUDZINGWA.

Democratic Party (DP). Launched by ZUM expellees (including Emmanuel MAGOCHE) in 1991, the DP held its inaugural congress in September 1992. In early 1996 the DP was identified as

Cabinet

As of July 1, 2006

President Robert Gabriel Mugabe
 Vice Presidents Joseph Msika
 Joyce Mujuru [f]

Ministers

Agriculture	Joseph Made
Defense	Sidney Tigere Sekeramayi
Economic Development	Rugare Gumbo
Education, Sports, and Culture	Aeneas S. Chigwedere
Energy and Power Development	Gen. Mike Nyambuya
Environment and Tourism	Francis Nhema
Finance	Herbert Murerwa
Foreign Affairs	Simbarashe Mumbengegwi
Health and Child Welfare	David P. Parirenyatwa
Higher and Tertiary Education	Stanislaus Mudenge
Home Affairs	Kembo C. D. Mohadi
Industry and International Trade	Obert Mpofu
Information and Publicity	Paul M. Mangwana (Acting)
Justice, Legal, and Parliamentary Affairs	Patrick Chinamasa
Local Government, Public Works, and National Housing	Ignatius Chombo
Mines	Amos Midzi
National Security	Didymus Mutasa
Policy Implementation	Webster Shamu
Public Services, Labor, and Social Welfare	Nicholas Goche
Rural Housing and Social Amenities	Emmerson Mnangagwa
Science and Technology	Olivia Muchena [f]
Small and Medium Enterprise Development	Sithembiso G. Nyoni [f]
State Enterprises, Anti-Monopolies, and Anti-Corruption	Paul M. Mangwana
Transport and Communications	Chris Mushowe
Water Resources and Infrastructural Development	Munacho Mutezo
Women's Affairs, Gender, and Community Development	Oppah Muchinguri [f]
Without Portfolio	Elliott T. Manyika

Ministers of State

Indigenization and Empowerment	Josiah Tungamirai
Land and Resettlement Programs	Flora Buka [f]

[f] = female

an organizer of the reform-minded MPC grouping. Constitutional reform has been one of the DP's priorities, and in 2004 the party urged the government to present a democratic constitution before the 2005 legislative elections, calling the constitution at the time "colonial and illegitimate."

Leader: Wurayayi ZEMBE (President of the Party).

Other parties participating in the 2000 balloting (all of which received less than 0.1 percent of the vote) included the Zimbabwe Progressive Party (ZPP), led by Justine CHIOTA; the African National Party (ANP); the National People's Alliance (NPA); and the Zimbabwe Congress Party (ZCP).

Other parties participating in the 2005 Senate election included the ANP, the Multiracial Open Party-Christian Democrats (MOP-CD); Peace Action is Freedom for All (PAFA); the Zimbabwe African People's Union-Federal Party (ZAPU-FP), led by Paul SIWELA; and the Zimbabwe Youth in Alliance (ZIYA), led by Daniel MBANJE and Bernard NYIKADZINO. All of the parties received less than 2 percent of the vote.

Other parties and groups include the Committee for a Democratic Society (Codesa), a Matebeleland-based party launched in 1993 under the leadership of Soul NDLOVU; the Conservative Alliance of Zimbabwe (CAZ), an offshoot of the former Rhodesia Front now led by Gerard SMITH and Mike MORONEY; the Multi-Racial Open Party (MOP); the Transparency Front; the United People's Movement (UPM), led by former ZANU-PF minister Jonathan MOYO; the United People's Party (UPP), led by former ZANU-PF official Daniel SHUMBA; the Zimbabwe Independence Party (ZIP); and the Zimbabwe People's Democratic Party (ZPDP), led by Isabel MADANGURE. In addition, there reportedly are two groups claiming the name of the Zimbabwe Labor Party, one led by Alois MACHOKOTO and the other by David MATANGANYIDE, and the Zimbabwe National Congress (ZINC), led by Godwin MUTAMBIRWA.

Legislature

Zimbabwe has had four legislatures since 1978, the first three bicameral (for details see the 1989 edition of the Handbook). As of March 1990 the upper house (Senate) was abolished, the legislature thereupon becoming a unicameral body, the House of Assembly. The bicameral legislature was reinstated in 2005, following a constitutional amendment approved by the house on August 30 to establish an upper chamber Senate.

Senate. The upper body was seated following single-round, plurality system balloting of November 26, 2005. The Zimbabwe African National Union-Patriotic Front won 43 seats and the Movement for Democratic Change won 7. The Senate comprises 66 members, 50 of whom are directly elected (5 from each of the 10 provinces). The non-elective seats comprise 8 held by traditional chiefs, 6 members appointed by the president, and 1 each for the president and deputy president of the Council of Chiefs. All serve five-year terms.

President: Edna MADZONGWE.

House of Assembly. In the most recent balloting of March 31, 2005, the seat distribution was as follows: the Zimbabwe African National Union-Patriotic Front, 78; the Movement for Democratic Change, 41; and independents, 1. The elective seats are determined via direct universal suffrage in a single-round plurality system in 120 single-member constituencies. The assembly also contains 30 nonelective seats: 8 traditional chiefs selected by their peers, 10 provincial governors appointed ex officio by the president, and 12 members appointed by the president. All serve five-year terms.

Speaker: John NKOMO.

Communications

Press

In early 1981 the government purchased 42 percent of the shares of the (South African) Argus group, thereby acquiring control of the largest newspapers in Zimbabwe, which it subsequently published through Zimbabwe Newspapers Ltd. Current government-controlled dailies include The Herald (122,000), published in Harare, and The Chronicle (45,000), published in Bulawayo. Weeklies produced by Zimbabwe Newspapers Ltd. include Sunday Mail (159,000), published in Harare, and Sunday News (50,000), published in Bulawayo.

A number of privately owned papers now exist, the best-selling of which is the Daily News, published in Harare. Independent weeklies published in Harare include the Financial Gazette (35,000), The Standard, the Zimbabwe Independent, and the Zimbabwe Mirror.

In mid-1998 the government passed a bill forbidding foreign ownership of media outlets. Relations between the Mugabe administration and the independent press subsequently deteriorated sharply, and journalists charged the government with widespread harassment and intimidation during and after the 2000 legislative campaign. Meanwhile, independent observers strongly criticized the government-controlled media for exhibiting a strongly pro-ZANU-PF bias in covering the election.

News Agencies

In October 1980 the South African Press Association relinquished its interest in the Salisbury-based Inter-African News Agency, the latter being reorganized as the Zimbabwe Inter-African News Agency (ZIANA). Agence France-Presse, AP, Reuters, and UPI are among the foreign agencies that maintain bureaus in Harare.

Broadcasting and Computing

The Zimbabwe Broadcasting Corporation (ZBC) regulates radio and television stations; service is in English and a variety of African languages. Although ZBC is formally an independent statutory body, it is dependent on public funds and has been broadly criticized in recent years for a progovernment orientation in presenting the news. There were approximately 454,000 television receivers and 620,000 personal computers serving 600,000 Internet users in 2003.

Intergovernmental Representation

Ambassador to the U.S.

Machivenyika Tobias MAPURANGA

U.S. Ambassador to Zimbabwe

Christopher William DELL

Permanent Representative to the UN

Boniface G. CHIDYAUSIKU

IGO Memberships (Non-UN)

ADF, AfDB, AU, BADEA, Comesa, Interpol, IOM, NAM, PCA, SADC, WCO, WTO

PART THREE

INTERGOVERNMENTAL ORGANIZATIONS

---

AFRICAN UNION (AU)

---

Established: Charter of the predecessor Organization of African Unity (OAU) adopted May 25, 1963, in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia; Treaty Establishing the African Economic Community (AEC)—the Abuja Treaty—adopted June 3, 1991, by the OAU heads of state and government in Abuja, Nigeria, and entered into force May 12, 1994; Constitutive Act of the African Union (AU) adopted July 11, 2001, by the OAU heads of state and government in Lomé, Togo, and entered into force May 26, 2001. (The OAU remained in existence during a one-year transitional period ending July 8, 2002; the Abuja Treaty remains a cornerstone of the AU.)

Purpose: To “achieve greater unity and solidarity” among African states; to “accelerate the political and socio-economic integration of the continent”; to “promote and defend African common positions”; to “promote peace, security and stability”; to “promote democratic principles and institutions, popular participation and good governance”; to assist in Africa’s effort “to play its rightful role in the global economy and in international negotiations”; and to “promote sustainable development at the economic, social and cultural levels.”

Headquarters: Addis Ababa, Ethiopia.

Principal Organs: Assembly of Heads of State and Government; Executive Council; Peace and Security Council (15 members); Permanent Representatives Committee; Pan-African Parliament; Economic, Social, and Cultural Council; Commission.

Chair of the Commission: Denis Sassou-Nguesso (Republic of the Congo).

Membership (53): Algeria, Angola, Benin, Botswana, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Cameroon, Cape

Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Comoro Islands, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Republic of the Congo, Côte d’Ivoire, Djibouti, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Gabon, Gambia, Ghana, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Kenya, Lesotho, Liberia, Libya, Madagascar, Malawi, Mali, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mozambique, Namibia, Niger, Nigeria, Rwanda, Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic, Sao Tome and Principe, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Somalia, South Africa, Sudan, Swaziland, Tanzania, Togo, Tunisia, Uganda, Zambia, Zimbabwe. Madagascar, which was suspended by the OAU in June 2002 as a consequence of a disputed change of government, remained under suspension by the AU until reinstated in July 2003.

Working Languages: Arabic, English, French, Kiswahili, Portuguese, Spanish, and “if possible,” other African languages.

Origin and development. The OAU was the most conspicuous result of the search for unity among the emerging states of Africa, a number of whose representatives participated in the first Conference of Independent African States in April 1958 in Accra, Ghana. However, common action was seriously impaired by the division of the newly independent states into rival blocs, notably the “Casablanca group” led by Ghana and Guinea, which stressed left-wing socialism, radical anticolonialism, and pan-Africanism, and the more moderate “Monrovia group,” which favored a cautiously evolutionary and more subregional approach to African problems. In an attempt to heal this split, a 20-state summit conference of African leaders met May 22–25, 1963, in Addis Ababa at the invitation of Emperor Haile Selassie of Ethiopia, and agreed to form the OAU.

Intense controversy erupted in February 1982 over the seating of a delegation from the Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic (SADR)—the national name adopted by the Polisario Front guerrillas in the Western Sahara. The 19th Assembly of Heads of State was unable to convene in August in Tripoli, Libya, because of Moroccan-led opposition to SADR attendance. An effort was made to reconvene the meeting in November, after the SADR was induced to “voluntarily and temporarily” withdraw from participation; however, a new boycott resulted from Libya’s refusal to admit Chadians representing the Hissein Habré government. The summit was finally convened in June 1983 in Addis Ababa with Libya’s boycott still in effect and the SADR seat remaining vacant. Morocco withdrew from the organization following the return of the SADR in October 1984; in support of Morocco, Zaire suspended its membership, but returned as a participant at the 1986 summit.

The OAU long functioned as a sounding board for African opinion on such problems as colonialism and racial discrimination. Thus, the Liberation Committee assisted the South West African People’s Organization in the fight for Namibian independence and supported the African National Congress and the Pan-Africanist Congress in their struggle for majority rule in South Africa. At the same time, attention also focused on refugee problems, human rights issues, and the continent’s deteriorating economic condition, including what the OAU called its “excruciating debt burden.”

In June 1991, meeting in Abuja, Nigeria, the assembly passed the Treaty Establishing the African Economic Community (AEC), which reflected both the OAU’s mounting concern that world events were “marginalizing” Africa and the members’ desire to reverse the continent’s declining economic prospects. To be implemented in six phases over a 30-year period, the Abuja Treaty (as the AEC founding document is commonly called) sought to remove trade and travel barriers and spur development through economic integration, with the ultimate goal of creating an economic union controlled by a Pan-African Parliament and marked by a single African currency. A Court of Justice would also be established. The treaty’s first phase called for the strengthening of existing regional economic bodies in anticipation of their eventual merger.

With South Africa registering progress toward a political settlement, the 1993 OAU summit in Cairo, Egypt, focused on the broader question of conflict resolution throughout the continent. In its Cairo Declaration the summit endorsed the proposed creation of an OAU “mechanism” to help prevent or resolve conflicts both between and within states, although the heads of state declined to authorize establishment of an OAU peacekeeping force, as requested by Secretary General Salim Ahmed Salim of Tanzania.

Final arrangements on the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management, and Resolution were completed at a November 1993 foreign ministers meeting, and an OAU Peace Fund was established to help finance endeavors under the new interventionist mandate. However, concern was expressed during the 1994 summit at Tunis, Tunisia, that OAU efforts in this area were doomed to ineffectiveness unless the organization’s financial status was strengthened. With many members in arrears and additional resources appearing scarce, critics suggested the OAU would be unable to sustain the expensive peacekeeping missions probably needed to resolve the numerous “internal wars” raging on the continent. Such concerns appeared validated when proposed OAU intervention in Rwanda, widely discussed at the summit, was quickly abandoned in favor of French and UN action. The Tunis summit also marked the admission of postapartheid South Africa as the OAU’s 53rd member.

The July 1996 summit in Yaoundé, Cameroon, considered the possibility of sending a peacekeeping mission to Burundi. Regarding such operations, much of the international community, led by the United States, continued to call for the implementation of an OAU intervention mechanism using “all-African” forces. Although the concept had significant support within the OAU as well, the logistical problems and political ramifications associated with intervention in domestic conflicts remained a barrier to effective action.

Civil strife and its aftermath were also among the dominant themes of the OAU's annual summit in June 1997 in Harare, Zimbabwe. On one hand, the body applauded the ouster of Zairean President Mobutu Sese Seko by Laurent Kabila's rebel forces (while urging the latter to fulfill his pledge to hold elections within two years in the newly proclaimed Democratic Republic of the Congo); on the other hand, the OAU gave its approval to the use of force to remove the military junta that seized control of Sierra Leone in late May.

In the second half of 1997, OAU energies were directed at attempting to settle the growing separatist crisis in the Comoro Islands. In August the OAU reported it had convinced the leaders of the independence movements on Anjouan and Moheli Islands to participate in reconciliation talks, and in November the OAU dispatched an eight-member military observation force to the region.

The June 1998 summit in Ouagadougou, Burkina Faso, opened with calls for an end to the fighting between Eritrea and Ethiopia. To help mediate the conflict, summit participants agreed to send a mission to the region from the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management, and Resolution. However, the mission came under criticism from South African President Nelson Mandela, who said it was ineffective. He called instead for the development of alternative means to resolve conflicts on the African continent. Mandela also recommended that the OAU abandon one of its core principles, that of nonintervention, arguing that African nations had a responsibility to protect other Africans living under oppressive regimes.

The 35th OAU summit met July 12–14, 1999, in Algiers, Algeria. Among the notable achievements were passage of a Convention on the Combating and Elimination of Terrorism, which entered into force in December 2002, and an agreement that the OAU would no longer recognize any government that came to power by unconstitutional means. Considerable attention was again devoted to the ongoing conflicts in the continent, particularly involving Ethiopia and Eritrea, the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC), and the Comoros.

The Algiers summit also marked the return of Libya's Mu'ammār al-Qadhafi, who had not attended OAU heads of state meetings in more than 20 years and who now proposed that an extraordinary summit be held to consider establishing a "United States of Africa." As a result, on September 8–9, 1999, the heads of state and government reconvened in Sirte, Libya, and agreed to formation of the African Union as successor to the OAU. Following subsequent negotiations, African leaders signed the Constitutive Act of the AU at the OAU summit July 10–12, 2000, in Lomé, Togo.

At the OAU's fifth extraordinary summit, held March 1–2, 2001, in Sirte, the OAU declared the AU to be established, although the Constitutive Act did not technically enter into force until May 26, 30 days after ratification by the 36th OAU state. The OAU remained in existence for a one-year transition period, during which technical arrangements, such as for financial transfers, were worked out and remaining protocols for various AU organs drafted. On July 9–10, 2002, the heads of state and government, meeting in Durban, South Africa, inaugurated the AU.

Structure. The Assembly of Heads of State and Government, the supreme decision-making organ of the AU (as it was of the OAU), now meets twice annually in ordinary session to define overall AU policy and to supervise the activities of the other AU organs. Substantive decisions are made by consensus or, failing that, a two-thirds majority. A simple majority suffices on procedural questions.

The Executive Council, comprising the foreign ministers or other designated representatives of all member states, meets at least twice a year to confer on preparation for meetings of the assembly, the implementation of assembly decisions, the AU budget, and matters of intra-African cooperation and general international policy. Assisting the Executive Council is the Permanent Representatives Committee, made up of ambassadors accredited to the AU. An advisory Economic, Social, and Cultural Council (ECOSOCC) was launched in March 2005.

Among the actions taken by the July 2002 inaugural summit in Durban was adoption of a Protocol Relating to the Establishment of the Peace and Security Council (PSC) of the African Union. On December 26, 2003, Nigeria became the 27th AU state to deposit its instrument of ratification, thereby bringing the protocol into force. Consisting of 15 members elected with due regard for “equitable regional representation and rotation,” the PSC includes in its mandate supervision of a planned African Standby Force equipped to intervene in crisis situations (see Activities, below). Pending constitution of the PSC, the Central Organ of the OAU’s Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management, and Resolution continued to meet.

The Pan-African Parliament, established under a protocol to the AEC treaty, is envisaged as evolving into a directly elected organ with full legislative powers. Initially, however, it comprises five representatives chosen by and from within the member states’ legislatures and reflecting “the diversity of political opinion in each.” The inaugural parliamentary session was held March 18–20, 2004, in Addis Ababa.

The AU Commission replaced the OAU’s Secretariat. The Commission chair, who is elected by the assembly for a four-year term, is assisted by a deputy and eight elected commissioners. The commissioners separately oversee the Peace and Security Directorate, the Political Affairs Department, the Directorate of Infrastructure and Energy, the Social Affairs Directorate, the Department of Trade and Industry, the Rural Economy and Agriculture Directorate, the Department of Economic Affairs, and the Human Resources, Science and Technology Department. Also coming under the purview of the Commission are the Women, Gender, and Development Directorate; the Afro-Arab Cooperation Department; the Pan African Tsetse and Trypanosomiasis Eradication Campaign (PATTEC); the Programming, Budget, Finance, and Accounting Directorate; the Administration Department; the Office of Legal Counsel; the Policy Analysis Support Unit (PASU); and the Protocol Services

Unit. In addition, the Commission services the Conference on Security, Stability, Development, and Cooperation in Africa (CSSDCA), which was established by the 2000 OAU summit in Lomé and has a primary role in monitoring and evaluation.

The Constitutive Act additionally called for the formation of seven “specialized technical committees”: Rural Economy and Agricultural Matters; Monetary and Financial Affairs; Trade, Customs, and Immigration Matters; Industry, Science, and Technology; Energy, Natural Resources, and the Environment; Transportation, Communication, and Tourism; Health, Labor, and Social Affairs; and Education, Culture, and Human Rights. The assembly may create additional specialized technical committees.

An organ yet to be established is the Court of Justice, which was provided for in the Abuja Treaty. Three new financial institutions are also mentioned in the founding act: an African Central Bank, an African Monetary Fund, and an African Investment Bank. At the eighth Ordinary Session of the Executive Council, held January 16–17, 2006, in Addis Ababa, the first members of the African Court on Human and People’s Rights were elected. Creation of this body was proposed in a protocol to the 1981 African Charter on Human and People’s Rights.

Related specialized agencies, all previously associated with the OAU, include the African Accounting Council, the African Civil Aviation Commission (AFCAC), the African Telecommunications Union (ATU), the Pan-African Institute of Education for Development, the Pan-African News Agency (PANA), and the Pan-African Postal Union (PAPU).

Activities. Based loosely on the model of the European Union (EU), the AU was envisaged as building on existing elements of the OAU—for example, the AEC and the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management, and Resolution—but with a stronger institutional structure. It was also expected to serve as a means of achieving faster sustainable economic development and integration and as a better vehicle for representing unified African positions in international forums and organizations.

During the 2001–2002 transition year, with many AU procedures yet to be codified and key organs yet to be established, conflicts continued to occupy much of the OAU's attention. In May 2001, for example, the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management, and Resolution participated in a meeting in Togo that addressed ongoing problems in Burundi, Comoros, the DRC, Republic of Congo, and the Mano River region of Guinea, Liberia, and Sierra Leone.

The OAU's 37th and final full summit convened July 9–11, 2001, at Lusaka, Zambia, at which time Amara Essy of Côte d'Ivoire was elected OAU/AU secretary general. On the economic front, the summit launched a New Africa Initiative (NAI) with the goal of ending poverty, war, and disease in Africa by 2015 through, among other things, better governance, foreign investment in a more open marketplace, and sustainable development. The NAI represented a consolidation of the Millennium Partnership for the African Recovery Program (MAP), which was proposed in 2000 by the presidents of Algeria, Nigeria, and South Africa, and Senegal's Omega Plan. Having attracted wide support from the developed world and from the UN Economic Commission for Africa, the plan was renamed the New Partnership for Africa's Development (NEPAD) at an October 23 OAU meeting in Abuja, where, in the wake of the September 11 attacks against the United States, terrorism was also a principal discussion topic.

In addition to adopting the PSC's founding protocol, the inaugural AU Assembly of Heads of State and Government in Durban stressed the parallel need for a unified defense and security policy. Although the Constitutive Act continued to uphold the OAU-era principle of noninterference in members' internal affairs, it also set forth "the right of the Union to intervene in a Member State pursuant to a decision of the Assembly, in respect of grave circumstances, namely: war crimes, genocide and crimes against humanity." It also stated, in accordance with a declaration adopted July 2000 in Lomé, that any regime coming to power through unconstitutional means could be suspended from the organization and have sanctions imposed. (As a consequence of the declaration, Madagascar was suspended from the OAU/AU from June 2002 until July 2003, although international calls for action against the Mugabe regime in Zimbabwe went unheeded.)

The first extraordinary AU summit, meeting February 3, 2003, in Addis Ababa, approved several amendments to the Constitutive Act, making explicit, for example, that the "African Diaspora" should participate in building the organization and that the AU will ensure women's "full and effective participation" in decision making ("particularly in the political, economic and socio-cultural areas"). In a significant expansion of the AU's military authority, the extraordinary assembly session also approved extending the grounds for intervention in a member state to include "a serious threat to legitimate order."

On the same day, summit attendees reconvened as the Seventh Ordinary Session of the Central Organ of the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management, and Resolution at the Heads of State and Government Level. The session examined a half dozen "conflict situations" in the continent and expressed its "deep concern" regarding the worsening tensions over Iraq. With regard to Burundi, the Central Organ approved the deployment of troops, as agreed to by the disputants in their December 2002 cease-fire agreement. The first military contingent arrived in late April 2003. As of June 1, 2004, the African Mission in Burundi (AMIB) gave way to a UN-sponsored peacekeeping mission, which was approved unanimously by the Security Council in May. At that time, there were about 2400 AU personnel, including troops from Ethiopia, Mozambique, and South Africa, and military observers, the latter from Burkina Faso, Gabon, Mali, Togo, and Tunisia. The AMIB was generally regarded as a significant contribution to a peace process that concluded with parliamentary and presidential elections in July–August 2005.

The second ordinary session of the assembly met July 10–12, 2003, in Maputo, Mozambique, where a primary focus continued to be organizational matters. In addition to authorizing the Commission and the Executive Council to continue their preparations for getting the PSC operational as soon as possible after completion of the protocol ratification process, the assembly asked the EU to consider funding PSC missions through a Peace Support Operation Facility. The assembly also advanced toward establishment of another major AU organ by approving the Protocol of the Court of Justice of the African Union and sending it on to the individual states for ratification. The assembly did likewise with a Convention on the Prevention and Combating of Corruption and also supported efforts to draft an international code of conduct for counterterrorism. Among other decisions, the assembly decided to hold a 2004 Extraordinary Summit on Employment and Poverty Alleviation in Africa.

The second extraordinary session of the assembly met February 27–28, 2004, in Sirte, at which time it adopted the Common African Defense and Security Policy (CDSP), as called for in the Constitutive Act and the PSC protocol. Asserting that the causes of intrastate conflict, in particular, necessitate a new, multidimensional emphasis on “human security,” the CDSP defines defense as encompassing “both the traditional, military, and state-centric notion of the use of the armed forces of the state to protect its national sovereignty and territorial integrity, as well as the less traditional, non-military aspects which relate to the protection of the people’s political, cultural, social and economic values and ways of life.” Identified among the CDSP’s “building blocks” are various regional groups and mechanisms: the Convention for the Elimination of Mercenaries in Africa (adopted by the OAU in 1977); the African Charter on Human and People’s Rights (1981); the African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of the Child (1990); the Declaration and Plan of Action on Drug Use and Illicit Trafficking Control in Africa (1996); the Kempton Park Plan of Action on a Landmine-Free Africa (1997); the African Nuclear-Weapon-Free Zone Treaty (Treaty of Pelindaba, 1998); the Algiers Convention on the Prevention and Combating of Terrorism (1999); the Bamako Declaration on an African Common Position on the Illicit Proliferation, Circulation, and Trafficking of Small Arms and Light Weapons (2000); and the Declaration on the Framework for an OAU Response to Unconstitutional Changes of Government (2000).

The assembly also requested the commission to convene a panel of experts for advice on revising a draft Non-Aggression and Common Defense Pact in the light of two related proposals: a draft Pact against Aggression and on Mutual Assistance, which had been offered by the Republic of the Congo, and a draft Treaty for a Common Defense and the Establishment of a United Army for the African Union, which Libya had advanced. Among other actions, the extraordinary session adopted the Sirte Declaration on the Challenge of Implementing Integrated and Sustainable Development on Agriculture and Water in Africa.

By the end of 2003 the PSC protocol entered into force, and on March 15, 2004, the Executive Council elected the following as initial PSC members: Algeria, Ethiopia, Gabon, Nigeria, and South Africa, all serving three-year terms; and Cameroon, Republic of the Congo, Ghana, Kenya, Lesotho, Libya, Mozambique, Senegal, Sudan, and Togo, all serving two-year terms. One of the first tasks of the PSC is to organize the African Standby Force (ASF), now planned to be fully operational by 2010. This force is to incorporate police and civilian components as well as military personnel, in keeping with the broad mission of the ASF, which includes possible preventive deployment, peacekeeping, and postconflict disarmament and demobilization.

With regard to regional economic development, NEPAD has begun moving forward with support not only from the African Regional Economic Communities (RECs), but from the UN, the Group of Eight (G-8), the EU, and other international organizations. In 2002 it adopted a Declaration on Democracy, Political, Economic, and Corporate Governance and developed an African Peer Review Mechanism (APRM), which the AU’s 2003 Maputo summit described as intended to “foster the adoption of policies, standards and practices leading to political stability, high economic growth, sustainable development and accelerated regional and continental economic integration.” The Maputo summit, in its Declaration on the Implementation of NEPAD, acknowledged the importance of integrating NEPAD and its organs (Heads of State and Government Implementation Committee, Steering Committee, and Secretariat) into the AU structures and processes. It also called on member states and the RECs to assist NEPAD in implementing programs in such priority areas as agriculture and infrastructure and in developing detailed sectoral action plans in culture, education, environment, health, science and technology, and tourism.

Collaterally, the AU has indicated its intention to accelerate the AEC schedule, for which it will rely heavily on the RECs. Five of the RECs, collectively providing continent-wide coverage, have been described as “pillars” of the AEC process: the Arab Maghreb Union (AMU), the Common Market for Eastern and Southern Africa (Comesa), the Economic Community of Central African States (CEEAC), the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS), and the Southern African Development Community (SADC).

In its July 6–8, 2004, summit held in Addis Ababa, the AU endorsed an estimated $1.7 billion for three years to fund a strategic development plan. It also discussed Darfur and adopted a declaration on gender equality. On September 8–9, 2004, an extraordinary summit was held in Ouagadougou to discuss poverty alleviation and employment. This meeting gave particular attention given to the role of agriculture, education, infrastructure, small- and medium-sized enterprises, and the integration of women into formal employment. The session coincided with issuance of a World Bank report criticizing excessive bureaucratic regulation in Africa, which it said discouraged business enterprise.

At the January 30–31, 2005, summit in Abuja, the assembly decided to meet twice annually. The African Union Non-Aggression and Common Defense Pact was adopted, but by early 2006 only 15 countries had signed and none had ratified it.

The summit participants also agreed to disperse organs geographically: the African Central Bank to a country in West Africa, the Court of Justice to East Africa, the African Monetary Fund to Central Africa, and the Pan-African Parliament to Southern Africa.

The fifth regular summit, held July 4–5, 2005, in Sirte, focused on economic matters. The meeting called for a full cancellation of all African countries’ debts and for “the abolition of subsidies that stand as an obstacle to trade”—an issue slated for discussion at the forthcoming G-8 summit in Scotland. The final declaration also called for two permanent African seats at the UN Security Council, as well as five nonpermanent seats. The AU was only able to offer small contingents for peacekeeping missions to Somalia and the Darfur region of Sudan in 2005, contingents generally considered too small to be fully effective. As of April 2006 the Somalia contingent had not actually deployed, the latest proposal suggesting that AU force should take over from a proposed mission by the Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD), which played a major role in the Somali peace process. (IGAD consists of Eritrea, Ethiopia, Djibouti, Kenya, Uganda, Sudan, and Somalia.) Meanwhile, AU leaders continued to discuss the proposal that the AU assume full responsibility for NEPAD, including NEPAD’s well-scrutinized “peer-review” process through which nations agreed to be assessed regarding good governance, democratic reforms, human rights, and development progress.

A complication to the AU’s peacekeeping efforts in Darfur was Sudan’s bid at the sixth AU summit (held January 23–24, 2006, in Khartoum, Sudan) to assume the organization’s presidency for the year. Amid accusations of genocide over the Sudanese government’s role in the Darfur conflict, it withdrew its bid in favor of the Republic of the Congo (Congo-Brazzaville), but with suggestions that it might renew its bid in 2007. The AU’s peacekeeping force in Darfur, funded by the United States and the EU but at odds with the Sudan government, appeared to be making little progress in stopping the violence. On March 10, 2006, the AU announced it would turn over peacekeeping to the UN on September 30, 2006. In the meantime, it urged bringing its African Mission In Sudan (AMIS) up to full strength of approximately 6200 military personnel, including more than 1500 police. (See the article on Sudan.)

Also in March 2006, the AU decided, on the PSC's recommendation, to send more than 400 personnel (mostly troops and some police) to the Comoros between April and June to help ensure tranquility during presidential elections and the installation of the new president.

ARAB LEAGUE

al-Jami‘a al-‘Arabiyah

---

Official Name: League of Arab States.

Established: By treaty signed March 22, 1945, in Cairo, Egypt.

Purpose: To strengthen relations among member states by coordinating policies in political, cultural, economic, social, and related affairs; to mediate disputes between members or between members and third parties.

Headquarters: Cairo, Egypt. (In 1979 the league transferred its headquarters from Cairo to Tunis, Tunisia, because of Egypt’s peace treaty with Israel. In early 1990 members agreed unanimously to return the headquarters to Cairo, although some offices were scheduled to remain in Tunis. Extensive debate on the issue was reported later in the year as an outgrowth of the schism arising from the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait, but the relocation was formally completed January 1, 1991.)

Principal Organs: Council of the League of Arab States (all members), Economic and Social Council (all adherents to the 1950 Collective Security Treaty), Joint Defense Council (all adherents to the 1950 Collective Security Treaty), Permanent Committees (all members), Arab Summit Conferences, General Secretariat.

Secretary General: Amr Mahmoud Moussa (Egypt).

Membership (22): Algeria, Bahrain, Comoro Islands, Djibouti, Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, Libya, Mauritania, Morocco, Oman, Palestine, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Somalia, Sudan, Syria, Tunisia, United Arab Emirates, Yemen.

Official Language: Arabic.

Origin and development. A long-standing project that reached fruition late in World War II, the league was founded primarily on Egyptian initiative following a promise of British support for any Arab organization that commanded general endorsement. In its earlier years the organization focused mainly on economic, cultural, and social cooperation, but in 1950 a Convention on Joint Defense and Economic Cooperation was concluded that obligated the members in case of attack “immediately to take, individually and collectively, all steps available, including the use of armed force, to repel the aggression and restore security and peace.” In 1976 the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), which had participated as an observer at all league conferences since September 1964, was admitted to full membership. Egypt’s participation was suspended from April 1979 to May 1989 because of its peace agreement with Israel.

Structure. The principal political organ of the league is the Council of the League of Arab States, which meets in regular session twice a year, normally at the foreign ministers level. Each member has one vote in the council; decisions usually bind only those states that accept them, although a two-thirds majority vote on financial and administrative matters binds all members. The council’s main functions are to supervise the execution of agreements between members, to mediate disputes, and to coordinate defense in the event of attack. There are numerous committees and other bodies attached to the council, including permanent committees dealing with finance and administration, legal affairs, and information.

The council has also established an Administrative Court, an Investment Arbitration Board, and a Higher Auditing Board. Additional ministerial councils, attended by relevant ministers or their representatives, are held in a dozen areas including transport, justice, health, telecommunications, and environmental affairs.

Three additional bodies were established by the 1950 convention: a Joint Defense Council to function in matters of collective security and to coordinate military resources; a Permanent Military Commission, comprised of representatives of the general staffs, to draw up plans for joint defense; and an Economic Council, comprised of the ministers of economic affairs, to coordinate Arab economic development. The last was restructured as an Economic and Social Council in 1977. An Arab Unified Military Command, charged with the integration of strategy for the liberation of Palestine, was formed in 1964.

The General Secretariat is responsible for internal administration and the execution of council decisions. It also administers several agencies, including the Bureau for Boycotting Israel (headquartered in Damascus, Syria).

Membership in the league generally carries with it membership in an array of specialized agencies, including the Arab Bank for Economic Development in Africa (BADEA) and the Arab Monetary Fund (AMF), as well as a variety of other bodies dealing with economic, social, and technical matters.

Nearly three dozen ordinary and extraordinary Arab Summit Conferences have been held since the first one met in 1964. Summit resolutions give direction to the work of the council and other league organs, although the organization's charter did not provide a framework for convening summits.

Activities. After many years of preoccupation with Arab-Israeli issues, the league's attention in 1987 turned to the Iraq-Iran conflict as Arab moderates sought a united front against Iran and the potential spread of militant Islamic fundamentalism. An extraordinary summit conference held November 8–11 in Amman, Jordan, condemned "the Iranian regime's intransigence, provocations, and threats to the Arab Gulf States" and called for international "pressure" to encourage Iran to accept a UN-sponsored cease-fire. Although Syrian and Libyan opposition blocked a proposed restoration of membership privileges to Egypt, the summit declared that members could establish relations with Cairo individually. A number of countries, including the Persian Gulf states, quickly did so.

Palestinian issues quickly returned to the forefront of the league's agenda in early 1988 because of the uprising (intifada) in the Gaza Strip and West Bank. A June summit affirmed "moral, political, and diplomatic" support for the intifada while most of the members made individual financial pledges to the PLO. The major development at the May summit in Casablanca, Morocco, was the readmission of Egypt, whose president Husni Mubarak urged the other attendees to stop "wasting time and opportunities" for formulating a "vision" for peace in the Middle East.

A special summit in late May 1990 in Baghdad, Iraq, although convened at the PLO's urging to discuss the mass immigration of Soviet Jews to Israel, focused primarily on U.S. policy. In condemning Washington as bearing a "fundamental responsibility" for Israel's "aggression, terrorism, and expansionism," the league reflected growing frustration among Arabs over the lack of progress in peace negotiations as well as an increased militancy, most forcefully expressed by Iraqi President Saddam Hussein. In an apparent effort to reinforce Arab political unity, the leaders agreed to hold regular annual summits in Cairo, beginning in November.

The prospect for effective cooperation was severely compromised by Iraq's takeover of Kuwait on August 2, 1990, which split the league into two deeply divided blocs. On August 10, the majority (comprising Bahrain, Djibouti, Egypt, Kuwait, Lebanon, Morocco, Oman, Qatar, Somalia, Syria, Saudi Arabia, and the United Arab Emirates) voted to send a pan-Arab force to guard Saudi Arabia against possible Iraqi attack; several members (most notably Egypt and Syria) ultimately contributed troops to the U.S.-led liberation of Kuwait in early 1991. The minority included members overtly sympathetic to Baghdad (such as Jordan, the PLO, and Sudan) and those that, while critical of the Iraqi invasion, were adamantly opposed to U.S. military involvement.

Although both sides continued to promote an “Arab solution” throughout the Persian Gulf crisis, the schism precluded the league from playing any meaningful negotiating role. Symptomatic of the disarray in the Arab world, long-time league secretary general Chedli Klibi of Tunisia resigned in September 1990 after a blistering personal attack by Saudi Arabian officials. The league observer at the United Nations also resigned soon after, citing his inability to cope with Arab fragmentation.

Following the coalition victory over Iraqi forces and the restoration of the Kuwaiti government in early 1991, it appeared that Egypt, the leading Arab coalition member, had regained league dominance, although “intense animosities” reportedly remained from the Persian Gulf crisis. Evidence of Cairo’s standing included the May appointment by the Arab League Council of Egypt’s retiring foreign minister, Ahmad Ismat Abd al-Magid, as the next secretary general.

In September 1993 the Arab League’s foreign ministers gave quick approval to the recently negotiated peace accord between Israel and the PLO. However, the league subsequently announced it would not lift the Arab economic boycott against Israel until Israeli troops withdrew from all the occupied territories. The ban, adopted at the creation of the Jewish state in 1948, precluded any direct commercial contact between Arab countries and Israel. In 1951 a secondary boycott was declared against any companies in the world that conducted business with Israel, followed by a tertiary boycott against any companies dealing with those companies already blacklisted. However, the secondary and tertiary boycotts have been widely ignored recently, and in September 1994 the members of the Gulf Cooperation Council (Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, and United Arab Emirates) announced their formal abandonment.

Nevertheless, for the Arab League as a whole the boycotts remained formally in place. In addition, league officials remained skeptical of the proposed formation of a regional economic cooperation union that would include Israel, as had been proposed by the Middle East and North Africa Summit, held October 30–November 1, 1994, in Casablanca, Morocco. The league argued that its members should establish an Arab Free Trade Association that would exclude Israel.

In the wake of the victory of the right-wing Likud party of Benjamin Netanyahu in the May 1996 Israeli elections, the league held its first full summit since 1990 on June 21–23 in Cairo to address, among other things, Netanyahu’s perceived retreat from previous Israeli positions regarding the Palestinian self-rule process. The summit reaffirmed its positions supporting full Israeli withdrawal from the occupied territories, Palestinian self-determination, and an end to settlement building in the West Bank. However, divisions among members on the issue were readily apparent, with moderate states such as Jordan and Egypt leading successful efforts to dilute stronger language proposed by Syria. In other activity, the summit again criticized Iraq, which was not invited to the session, for its lack of cooperation with the United Nations and issued a statement of support for Bahrain and the United Arab Emirates in their disputes with Iran.

The summit’s final communiqué also called for greater Arab solidarity and a strengthening of the organization’s institutions, although skeptics noted a “hollow ring” to the language. The prospects for institutional reform were also constrained by financial difficulties: only four members (Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, and Syria) had paid their full dues, while the remaining members were a combined $80 million in arrears. As a consequence, the league was forced to close several foreign offices and reportedly had difficulty meeting its payroll at times.

In November 1997, despite the league’s financial troubles, 17 members agreed to proceed with the establishment of the Arab Free Trade Zone in 1998, with the goal of cutting customs duties by 10 percent a year until their elimination at the end of 2007. In other activity during the year, the Arab League foreign ministers, meeting in March in Cairo, recommended that members reactivate the economic boycott against Israel and cease all activity geared toward normalizing relations with that country, given the stalled peace process. For the same reason, the league also urged a boycott of the fourth Middle East and North Africa economic conference held in November in Qatar.

In late 1997 and early 1998 the league expressed concern over rising tension between Iraq and Western capitals. It reportedly encouraged Baghdad to adopt a more conciliatory posture while at the same time warning against “unilateral” U.S. action. An emergency summit convened in early January 1999 to address Iraq’s request that the league condemn the recent U.S.-UK air assaults. However, the final statement from the summit was mild in tone, expressing “uneasiness and concern” over the attacks while at the same time criticizing Baghdad for its “provocative” rhetoric. Similarly, an Arab League Council session in March declined to label (as Baghdad had demanded) the “no-fly zones” in Iraq as illegal.

Another recent focus of attention is antiterrorism. An accord was signed in April 1998 by the interior and justice ministers of the league’s members, who pledged to exchange evidence in terrorist investigations and extradite suspects. The Arab states also agreed not to harbor or assist groups responsible for terrorist acts against Arab nations, although an exemption was granted regarding “national liberation” groups.

In March 2000 the council addressed Israel’s announcement of a pending pullout from its “security zone” in southern Lebanon by warning that renewed Palestinian attacks could result unless Israel provided for the repatriation of Palestinians from refugee camps in the region. The league basically adopted what had been the Syrian position on the matter, rejecting the pullout in the absence of a comprehensive peace agreement—clearly, an effort by Syria to interweave the issue of an Israeli pullout from the occupied Golan Heights.

Although the league subsequently cosponsored peace talks in Djibouti on the Somali conflict, from late September 2000 league concerns were largely dominated by the renewal of the Palestinian intifada, which quickly led to the first emergency summit in four years on October 20–21 in Cairo. As in the past, however, league reaction was far from unified. Libya’s Colonel Qadhafi pointedly avoided the session altogether, anticipating, from his hard-line perspective, an inadequate response to the renewed hostilities. Iraq’s representative called for holy war (jihad), while the majority endorsed a halt to further diplomatic normalization with Israel. (At the time, Mauritania, Morocco, Oman, Qatar, and Tunisia had representative offices in Israel.) The summit communiqué continued to call for a renewal of the peace process, while the participants agreed to set up a $1 billion fund to aid Palestinians affected by the uprising and Israeli counteractions.

The Amman summit of March 27–28, 2001, marked the first regular summit since 1990, with Iraq in attendance as a full participant. The intifada remained a principal subject, although no significant new initiatives resulted. Presummit speculation centered largely on efforts to repair the rift between Iraq and Kuwait, but only marginal progress toward that end occurred. The league ended up calling once again for an end to the sanctions against Iraq but also for Baghdad to work out its differences with the United Nations over inspections and related issues. In other matters, the summit advocated accelerating the movement toward free trade as well as forming a customs union and promoting cooperative development in areas such as transport, telecommunications, and information technology. Two months later on May 16, Amr Mahmoud Moussa, theretofore Egypt’s foreign minister, began his tenure as the league’s new secretary general.

At the 14th Arab League summit, held March 27–28, 2002, in Beirut, Lebanon, attention focused on Iraqi-Kuwaiti relations and on a “land-for-peace” plan offered by Saudi Arabia’s Crown Prince Abdullah to settle the Arab-Israeli conflict. Although Iraq and Kuwait appeared ready to resolve their differences, with Baghdad saying it would henceforth respect Kuwait’s territorial integrity and sovereignty, positive international expectations for the Saudi plan were undercut even before the summit got under way. In the context of continuing Israeli-Palestinian violence, PLO leader Yasir Arafat initially rejected Israeli conditions for his departure from Ramallah and ultimately decided not to attend the summit for fear the government of Israeli Prime Minister Sharon would not permit his return. Egypt's President Mubarak and Jordan's King Abdullah also chose not to attend, while several of the smaller Persian Gulf states sent less senior delegations. In addition, on the summit's opening day the Palestinian delegation withdrew over Lebanon's refusal to permit a satellite address by Arafat. As a consequence of these developments, Crown Prince Abdullah's plan failed to register as great an impact as had been anticipated, although it was endorsed by the attendees.

The Saudi plan called for normalization of relations with Israel and affirmed that state's right to security. In return, Israel was expected to withdraw from all occupied territories and recognize a Palestinian state with East Jerusalem as its capital. The summit's concluding Beirut Declaration both called for a "just solution" to the Palestinian refugee problem and rejected "all forms of Palestinian repatriation which conflict with the special circumstances of the Arab host countries."

In October 2002, Libya's Qadhafi announced he would pull his country from the organization because of its demonstrated inability to deal effectively not only with the Palestinian situation, but also the looming crisis involving Iraq and the United States. A March 1, 2003, summit in Sharm el Sheikh, Egypt, to discuss the Iraq crisis left the league divided after a heated exchange between Qadhafi, who attacked Saudi Arabia for permitting U.S. forces on its soil, and Crown Prince Abdullah. The summit concluded with condemnation of any "aggression" against Iraq but also called for Baghdad's compliance with UN weapons inspections. As late as April 2003, Libya maintained its intention to withdraw from the league, but in May, apparently at the urging of the Egyptian president, Qadhafi reversed himself.

With regard to the "road map" for peace in the Middle East that was formally introduced April 30, 2003, by the "quartet" of the European Union, the United Nations, Russia, and the United States, the Arab League expressed its cautious support. The league welcomed the June decision of militant Palestinian groups to introduce a three-month cease-fire, but a league spokesman cautioned that Israel had yet to "implement its obligations" and cease assassinations, incursions, demolitions, and seizures. He further urged the United States in particular to ensure Israeli compliance with the terms of the peace initiative. On February 25, 2004, in the course of oral presentations before the International Court of Justice in The Hague, the league argued that the separation barrier being erected on Palestinian land by Israel was illegal and "an affront to international law."

In December 2003, the league sent its first official delegation to Iraq, signaling a change in attitude from its earlier criticism of the U.S. invasion in March.

A league summit scheduled for March 29, 2004, in Tunis was abruptly called off two days in advance of the opening because of divisions over peace overtures to Israel, with tensions heightened following Israel's assassination of the leader of the radical Palestinian group Hamas just days prior to the summit. The resulting outrage in the Arab world inflamed league ministers and complicated plans to relaunch the Saudi-backed peace initiative adopted at the 2002 Beirut summit. The collapse of the Tunis summit was widely reported as reflective of the turmoil in Arab ranks.

The rescheduled Tunis summit of May 22, 2004, was marred the first day by the walkout of Libya's Qadhafi, who again threatened to withdraw from the league. Qadhafi said he was "disgusted" by the treatment of Saddam Hussein and Yasir Arafat and wholly dissatisfied with the summit agenda. Furthermore, 10 of the 22 league members did not attend the two-day summit, which ultimately issued a strongly worded denunciation of abuse inflicted on Iraqi prisoners by U.S. forces, pledged further reforms to be launched in league countries, and called for an international security force for the Palestinians. The league also called for an extensive UN role in rebuilding Iraq.

An emergency session of the league was called August 8, 2004, to address ways to help Sudan resolve the humanitarian crisis in Darfur, but little was reported from that event. The issue was again addressed at a meeting specific to that purpose on May 16, 2005, producing a resolution promoting resumption of negotiations between the Sudan government in Khartoum and the Darfur rebels.

On March 22–23, 2005, only 13 of 22 leaders attended the league summit in Algiers, and the resolutions adopted “were of comparatively little significance,” according to the New York Times. However, plans were unveiled for an Arab common market by 2015 and a regional security system. The participants also approved establishment of an interim Arab Parliament, which met for the first time on December 27, 2005, in Cairo. The parliament has 88 representatives, 4 from each Arab League member, but has no legislative authority, leaving its responsibilities and importance unclear, apart from serving as a forum on Arab issues. It was decided that this interim legislature would move to Syria, meeting twice a year with the aim of creating a permanent Arab legislature by 2011. Mohammad Jassim al-Saqr, a Kuwaiti described as a liberal, was elected its speaker.

The Arab League’s response to the landslide victory of the militant group Hamas in the January 2006 Palestinian Authority elections has been mixed. Secretary General Moussa said Hamas should renounce violence against Israel and recognize its right to exist, if it expects to function as a legitimate government. On the other hand, at its March 28–29, 2006, summit in Khartoum, the league pledged to contribute $55 million a month toward the operation of the Palestinian Authority, at a time when some foreign funding appeared likely to be withdrawn because of Hamas’s intransigence.

The 2006 summit, like its predecessor, was not attended by the heads of several member states, for reasons including poor security and Sudan’s position on the Darfur crisis. In addition to its commitment to the Palestinian Authority, the league pledged $150 million to support the mission of African Union peacekeepers in Darfur. This aid, however, was scheduled to begin in October 2006, the month after the AU was expected to hand over its responsibilities to a UN force. At the meeting’s conclusion the Saudi Arabian representative withdrew his country’s offer to host the 2007 meeting, leaving it instead to be held in Egypt.

ARAB MAGHREB UNION (AMU)

---

Established: By the Arab Maghreb Treaty, signed by the heads of state of the member countries on February 17, 1989, in Marrakesh, Morocco, effective July 1, 1989.

Purpose: “To strengthen the bonds of brotherhood which bind the member states and their peoples to each other . . . to work gradually towards the realization of the freedom of movement of [the member states’] people, goods, services, and capital . . . to safeguard the independence of every member state . . . to realize the industrial, agricultural, commercial, and social development of the member states . . . by setting up joint ventures and preparing general and specialized programs . . . to initiate cooperation with a view to developing education at various levels, to preserving the spiritual and moral values derived from the tolerant teachings of Islam, to safeguarding the Arab national identity.”

Headquarters: Casablanca, Morocco.

Principal Organs: Presidential Council (heads of member states), Council of Prime Ministers, Council of Foreign Ministers, Consultative Council, Judicial Body, Follow-up Committee, Specialized Ministerial Commissions, General Secretariat.

Secretary General: Mohamed Habib Benyahya (Tunisia).

Membership (5): Algeria, Libya, Mauritania, Morocco, Tunisia.

Official Language: Arabic.

Origin and development. The idea of a unified northern Africa was first voiced by Arab nationalists in the 1920s and subsequently received widespread support throughout the turbulence of World War II and the independence movements of the 1950s and early 1960s. By contrast, the postindependence era yielded a variety of territorial disputes, political rivalries, and ideological differences that blunted meaningful integration efforts. However, the Maghrebian movement regained momentum following the 1987 rapprochement between Algeria and Morocco (see articles on those countries). Meeting together for the first time in June 1988 in Algiers, Algeria, the leaders of the five Maghrebian countries appointed a commission and five subcommittees to draft a treaty that would encompass the “Greater Arab Maghreb.” After intensive negotiations, the treaty was signed February 17, 1989, following a two-day summit in Marrakesh, Morocco, with formal ratification following shortly thereafter.

Although the five heads of state appeared arm-in-arm after the summit, reports indicated that volatile Libyan leader Mu’ammar al-Qadhafi, upset at the rejection of his proposal that Chad, Mali, Niger, and Sudan be brought into the union, had attended only at the last minute. After the summit Qadhafi continued to push for “one invincible Arab nation” from the Atlantic to the Persian Gulf, and, apparently at his insistence, the Arab Maghreb Treaty left AMU membership open to other countries “belonging to the Arab nation or the African group.”

Structure. The supreme political organ of the AMU is the Presidential Council, comprising the heads of state of the member nations; the chair of the council rotates among the heads of state, who are assisted by a Council of Prime Ministers. The Council of Foreign Ministers is empowered to attend sessions of the Presidential Council and is responsible for preparing summit agendas. Reporting to the Council of Foreign Ministers is a Follow-up Committee, comprising the members' secretaries of state for Maghreb affairs, who are mandated to oversee the implementation of integrationist measures. In addition, Specialized Ministerial Commissions have been established in five areas (with each commission empowered to create subsidiary committees): interior, human resources (judicial affairs, youth and sports, culture and information, labor and social affairs, higher education and scientific research, health), infrastructure (transport, public works, housing and urban development, posts and communications), economy and finance (financial and monetary affairs, commerce, energy and mines, industry, tourism and crafts), and food security.

The original treaty provided for a Consultative Council of ten representatives from each member state; in 1994 the size of each delegation was increased to 30. The Consultative Council meets in ordinary session once a year and in emergency session at the request of the Presidential Council, to which it submits recommendations and draft resolutions. The treaty also calls for a "judicial body," consisting of two judges appointed by each member state, to "deal with disputes concerning the implementation of the treaty and the accords concluded within the framework of the Union." A small General Secretariat operates from Morocco, the participants having pledged to keep the union's bureaucracy to a bare minimum.

Activities. Despite economic and political differences among its members, the AMU was perceived at its formation as having the capacity to provide a significant regional response to the single internal market being planned then by the European Community (EC, later the European Union—EU). In subsequent months preliminary agreement was reported on the establishment of a regional airline and unification of postal and telecommunications services. In addition, several joint industrial projects were approved, and a campaign was launched to vaccinate children against an array of diseases. However, by early 1990, AMU proponents acknowledged that progress had been slower than anticipated in reducing trade barriers, facilitating the movement of people across national borders, and otherwise moving toward economic integration. Consequently, the AMU heads of state, during a January summit in Tunis, Tunisia, agreed to appoint a secretary general, establish a permanent headquarters, and implement other changes to strengthen AMU authority and effectiveness. It was also announced that the AMU defense and foreign ministers were asked to study ways of achieving "cooperation and coordination" in security matters. Nevertheless, several difficult political issues continued to work against regional unity, including Mauritania's displeasure over lack of support from Morocco in its border dispute with Senegal (see articles on Mauritania and Senegal), irritation among several members over positions taken by Libya's Colonel Qadhafi, and failure to resolve the Western Sahara dispute (see Morocco article).

A lack of cohesion was also evident during a July 1990 summit in Algiers, as the heads of state were unable to agree on a location for the permanent AMU headquarters or to select a secretary general. Moreover, as was the case in many Arab organizations, activity within the AMU was subsequently constrained by events associated with Iraq's invasion of Kuwait in August. Although Morocco adopted a solidly anti-Iraq stance and contributed troops to the U.S.-led Desert Shield operation, the other AMU members opposed the presence of U.S. troops in the Persian Gulf. In addition, strong pro-Iraq sentiment surfaced within all of the AMU states, creating concern among some officials over a possible backlash against those North African countries perceived by the EC and other Western nations to have been on the "wrong side" of the Persian Gulf crisis. As a result, the AMU summit in Ras Lanuf, Libya, in March 1991 called on the Arab League to work quickly to heal divisions created by the war so a pan-Arab consensus could be reached on economic, political, and security issues.

During the 1991 summit the AMU heads of state (with the exception of Libya's Colonel Qadhafi, whose absence was unexplained) agreed to establish the organization's General Secretariat in Casablanca, the Maghreb Consultative Council in Algeria, the Maghreb University and Science Academy in Libya, the Maghreb Court in Mauritania, and a Maghreb Bank for Investment and External Trade (Banque Maghrébine d'Investissement et de Commerce Extérieur—BMICE) in Tunisia. In October, Mohammed Amamou of Tunisia was selected as the AMU's first secretary general. However, most of the AMU's planned initiatives subsequently remained unimplemented as conflict among the members left the impression, in the words of the Middle East International, that the union was "dead, if not quite buried."

One major stumbling block to effective regional action was the imposition of limited sanctions by the United Nations against Libya in the spring of 1992 because of Tripoli's refusal to turn over two suspects in the bombing of an airliner over Lockerbie, Scotland, in the late 1980s. Despite strong protests from Colonel Qadhafi, Libya's AMU partners honored the sanctions, although the AMU summit held November 10–11 in Nouakchott, Mauritania, urged the UN to reconsider its position. The summit also issued a declaration condemning the "terrorism" stemming from militant Islamic fundamentalism in the region and called for "concerted effort" to keep it in check.

Some rhetorical commitment to union aims returned at the sixth AMU summit, held after several postponements April 2–3, 1994, in Tunis. In addition to urging faster implementation of previous agreements, the AMU leaders called for intensified trade and security negotiations with the EU. However, the Libyan regime, which, prior to the summit, had bluntly labeled the AMU a "failure," reportedly remained "bitter" that the AMU members were still upholding the UN sanctions. For their part, the AMU leaders expressed "concern" over the effects of the sanctions on the Libyan people and called for a "just, honorable, and swift settlement" based on "international laws, resolutions, and charters."

The next AMU summit was postponed indefinitely after Libya announced it would not assume its scheduled chair tenure because of the Lockerbie impasse. Following the apparent resolution of the sanctions issue in early 1999, observers suggested that a revival of AMU progress was at hand, but the AMU remained essentially moribund because of differences between Morocco and Algeria over the latter's support for the Polisario insurgents in the Western Sahara. The 35th session of the Follow-up Committee convened in Algiers in mid-May, ostensibly to relaunch the union, but little came of the meeting. In August, newly crowned King Mohamed of Morocco proposed to Algerian President Bouteflika that the AMU be reinvigorated, and a month later a Moroccan spokesman described the union as "still a fundamental project in our view." Nevertheless, a summit anticipated for November never occurred, and in February 2000, Tunisian President Ben Ali, marking the union's 11th anniversary, once again urged that the AMU be revived, calling it "a strategic choice and an historical aspiration."

A March 2001 meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers in Algiers was partly undercut by Morocco's unenthusiastic participation. Later in the year, however, it appeared that the Moroccan and Algerian leaders attempted to work around the Western Sahara issue. The fourth session of the Consultative Council met in September in Rabat, Morocco, after a lapse of nine years. In October 2001 the AMU trade ministers announced agreement on a draft free trade area and customs union, while a foreign ministers meeting in January 2002 was viewed as a prelude to a seventh summit in mid-2002, eight years after the sixth. At the January session the ministers appointed Habib Boularès of Tunisia as successor to Secretary General Amamou.

The anticipated June 2002 summit ultimately fell victim to continuing differences over the Western Sahara. Earlier, Colonel Qadhafi offered to mediate the dispute between Algiers and Rabat, with the Polisario Front expressing conditional support for the proposal. Morocco, however, termed the offer unrealistic, and in early June, King Mohamed indicated he would not attend the summit. As a consequence, the meeting was postponed indefinitely.

The Council of Foreign Ministers convened January 3–4, 2003, in Algiers, where one of the concerns was the need for the AMU to adapt to the challenges posed by increasing globalization. The concluding communiqué again denounced Israeli aggression against Palestinians, called for the lifting of sanctions against Iraq as well as remaining sanctions against Libya, and condemned terrorism (while noting the right of resistance against foreign occupation). The foreign ministers also supported continuation of the “5 + 5 dialog” on Mediterranean issues, begun in 1991 with France, Italy, Spain, Portugal, and Malta.

On December 22, 2003, a day before the much-discussed AMU summit was to have been held, the AMU foreign ministers, meeting in Algiers, indefinitely postponed the meeting. The cancellation followed announcements that the king of Morocco, the president of Mauritania, and the Libyan leader had all declined to attend. Shortly before, Mauritania accused Libya of financing a plot to overthrow Mauritania’s government. After the cancellation Colonel Qadhafi indicated the summit might be rescheduled following Algeria’s 2004 presidential election. A subsequent attempt to hold a summit in Tripoli in May 2005 was canceled at the last minute as the king of Morocco declined to attend because of the dispute with Algeria over Western Sahara. Algeria had reiterated its support for the Polisario insurgents in that territory.

The Council of Foreign Ministers continues to meet, exploring ways to revitalize the union and to address such pressing local issues as drought and agriculture, the latter with particular reference to genetically modified crops. In February 2006 the secretary general said the union would be active in monitoring elections over the next year to facilitate Mauritania’s return to democracy, following the August 3, 2005, coup there.

ARAB MONETARY FUND (AMF)

---

Established: By Articles of Agreement signed April 27, 1976, in Rabat, Morocco, with effect from February 2, 1977.

Purpose: To correct disequilibria in the balance of payments of member states; to promote the stability of exchange rates among Arab currencies, rendering them mutually convertible; to promote Arab economic integration and development; to encourage the creation of a unified Arab currency; and to coordinate policies in other international monetary and economic forums.

Headquarters: Abu Dhabi, United Arab Emirates.

Principal Organs: Board of Governors (all members), Board of Executive Directors (9 members), Loan and Investments Committees.

Director General: Jassim al-Mannai (Bahrain).

Membership (22): Algeria, Bahrain, Comoros, Djibouti, Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, Libya, Mauritania, Morocco, Oman, Palestine, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Somalia, Sudan, Syria, Tunisia, United Arab Emirates, Yemen. (The memberships of Iraq, Somalia, and Sudan were suspended in February 1993 because of payments arrears. Sudan reached a repayment agreement, and its membership was reactivated in April 2000.)

Official Language: Arabic.

Origin and development. Although a proposal to form an Arab Payments Union was made by the Arab Economic Council in the 1960s and a meeting was subsequently held for that purpose, the idea was discarded as attention was drawn to more pressing political issues. With the quadrupling of oil prices in 1974, however, concern once again focused on the issue of monetary problems. The objective was now more ambitious: an organization to deal with recycling, or investing, Arab “petrodollars” to decrease dependence on foreign handling of surplus funds. This goal is clearly implicit in the Articles of Agreement signed in April 1976. Since then, the AMF has gradually expanded its mission to promote economic integration and development, to aid Arab financial institutions, to encourage intra-Arab trade, and to assist member countries in structural financial reforms.

Structure. The Board of Governors, comprising one governor and one alternate governor from each member state, serves as the fund’s general assembly and holds all administrative powers. Meeting at least once a year, it is responsible for capitalization, income distribution, the admission and suspension of members, and the appointment of the fund’s director general. The Board of Executive Directors, consisting of the director general and eight experts elected for three-year terms from the member states, performs tasks assigned it by the Board of Governors. Subsidiary departments include the Economic and Technical Department, the Economic Policy Institute, and the Treasury and Investments Department.

One of the AMF’s principal aims is to foster the economic integration of member states. Thus the fund has guaranteed loans to Arab countries to correct payment imbalances resulting from unilateral or pan-Arab development projects. It has also used its capital as a catalyst to advance Arab financial instruments and has promoted creation of a unified Arab currency. It provides technical assistance to the monetary and banking agencies of member countries, largely through training seminars in such areas as branch banking and accounting, bank supervision and internal auditing, and documentary credit. It also cooperates with other Arab and international organizations to discuss and promote areas of common interest.

In late 1987 the AMF launched a restructuring program apparently with widespread support from Arab bankers; its “fresh priorities” included the creation of a regional securities market and the strengthening of securities markets in member states to provide long-term financing for development. In September 1988 the fund endorsed further changes, such as an emphasis on “productive projects” leading directly to economic growth, rather than on the infrastructural programs of earlier years. Although not yet willing to say it would attach conditions to AMF loans, the Board of Executive Directors announced its intention to take a more active interest in how loans were used. The board also approved the creation of an Economic Policy Institute to assist member states in formulating national policies as well as to promote the development of financial strategies for the Arab countries as a group.

Attention subsequently shifted to the Arab Trade Financing Program (ATFP), established by the AMF and other pan-Arab financial institutions to promote trade among Arab countries. The AMF agreed to provide $250 million of the initial $500 million of authorized capital and was accorded control of five of the nine seats on the program’s board of directors. Approved in 1989, the ATFP was scheduled to become operational in 1990 but its launching was delayed by the Persian Gulf crisis. The first ATFP loan agreement (with Morocco) was signed in January 1992.

As was the case with most Arab financial institutions, AMF activity was severely curtailed by the 1990–1991 Gulf War, although it began to rebound in the mid-1990s. Cumulative approvals reached 718.8 million Arab Accounting Dinars (AAD) ($2.9 billion) for 103 projects as of January 1, 1998. Since then, most loans have involved a new Structural Adjustment Facility (SAF), which was set up to support reforms in the financial sector.

In March 2003 the AMF changed its general lending policy, replacing its traditional fixed-interest loans with two types of market-related variable rates on new loans, and allowing member countries to choose between the two. Following the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in the spring of 2003, the AMF played a role in attempts to rebuild Iraqi national life. In March 2004 the fund organized, in conjunction with the International Monetary Fund (IMF), a course on “Macroeconomic Management and Policies” for Iraqi officials from the Central Bank of Iraq and the Iraqi ministries of finance and planning. This course was held at the AMF’s headquarters in Abu Dhabi. The fund declined, however, to write off Iraq’s debts, with Egypt’s the largest in its portfolio, but declared it would seek repayment when the country’s situation improved. At this time the fund approved the reinstatement of Sudan, having approved an agreement to settle its arrears, estimated at nearly $93 million.

The year 2005 was characterized by the beginning of a run-up in oil prices, combined with the sinking value of the U.S. dollar against other major currencies. As a result, the fund’s conservative management made adequate progress, and its educational arm held several conferences and seminars for its member banks on national and international money management.

By early 2006, the AMF warned that the oil boom was discouraging Arab governments from making public sector investments in national infrastructure. Instead, the money flow was forcing more such investment into the private sector, where it would be less centrally managed. The year 2006 also saw the unexpected victory of Hamas in Palestinian Authority elections. The fund announced that it would allocate 10 percent of 2005’s net profits, approximately $50 million, to aid Palestinians, but none of it would go to the Hamas-led government.

CENTRAL AFRICAN ECONOMIC AND MONETARY COMMUNITY (CEMAC)

Communauté Economique et Monétaire de l'Afrique Centrale

---

Established: By the Central African Customs and Economic Union (UDEAC) under a treaty signed March 15–16, 1964, in N'Djamena, Chad; formally succeeded the UDEAC in June 1999, following ratification of the treaty by the member states.

Purpose: To promote socioeconomic integration and sustainable development in Central Africa in the context of monetary and economic unions.

Headquarters: Bangui, Central African Republic.

Principal Organs: Conference of Heads of State, Council of Ministers of the Central African Economic Union, Ministerial Council of the Central African Monetary Union, Executive Secretariat.

Executive Secretary: Jean Nkuete (Cameroon).

Membership (6): Cameroon, Central African Republic, Chad, Republic of the Congo, Equatorial Guinea, Gabon.

Official Language: French.

Origin and development. Prior to attaining independence, the Central African Republic, Chad, the Congo, and Gabon were joined in the Equatorial Customs Union (Union Douanière Equatoriales—UDE), which sought to harmonize the fiscal treatment of industrial investments. In June 1961 Cameroon joined the UDE, and by mid-1962 an external common tariff had been established. In 1964 the members began more comprehensive economic cooperation, including coordination of development policies, especially in the fields of infrastructure and industrialization, and on December 8 they signed in Brazzaville, Congo, a treaty establishing the Central African Customs and Economic Union (Union Douanière et Economique de l'Afrique Centrale—UDEAC), effective January 1, 1966.

In early 1968 Chad and the Central African Republic announced their intention to withdraw from the UDEAC, but the latter reversed itself later in the year. Chad's withdrawal became effective January 1, 1969, although N'Djamena continued to participate in some activities. In December 1975 it was granted observer status in the Council of Heads of State and ultimately rejoined the group in December 1984. Equatorial Guinea joined the UDEAC in December 1983.

The November 1992 UDEAC summit endorsed the creation of a Central African Economic and Monetary Community (Communauté Economique et Monétaire de l'Afrique Centrale—CEMAC). Prompted in part by repercussions from the 50 percent devaluation of the CFA franc in January 1994, a UDEAC summit on March 15–16 in N’Djamena signed a treaty creating CEMAC. Although another summit on December 21–22 in Yaoundé, Cameroon, reaffirmed the integrationist commitment, decisions were again delayed on a timetable for the implementation of CEMAC provisions.

At the February 5, 1998, summit, Gabonese President Omar Bongo urged members to ratify the CEMAC treaty, stating that the establishment of the Central African Monetary Union would “mark the end of recovery and the beginning of a new dynamism.” The only country to have ratified the treaty by that time was the Central African Republic, but the ratification process accelerated thereafter, and the inaugural CEMAC summit was held in June 1999, in Malabo, Equatorial Guinea.

Structure. The Conference of Heads of State meets at least once a year to coordinate the general monetary and economic policies of the participating states. The CEMAC treaty created a Monetary Union (Union Monétaire de l’Afrique Centrale—UMAC), which is under the direction of a Ministerial Council, and an Economic Union (Union Economique de l’Afrique Centrale—UEAC), directed by a Council of Ministers. Specialized institutions integrated into the UEAC are the Interstate Customs School, the Subregional Multisectoral Institute for Applied Technology, the Subregional Institute for Statistics and Applied Economics, and the Development Bank of the Central African States (Banque de Développement des Etats de l’Afrique Centrale—BDEAC). The UMAC incorporates the Bank of the Central African States (Banque des Etats de l’Afrique Centrale—BEAC) and the Banking Commission of Central Africa. The treaty also called for formation of a Community Parliament and a Community Court of Justice.

The chief administrative officer of the CEMAC is an executive secretary, who heads an Executive Secretariat with various divisions and offices responsible for administrative and financial affairs; agriculture, food security, and the environment; the common market; economic analysis; education and culture; industrial commerce and tourism; juridical and institutional affairs; and transport and telecommunications.

Activities. As forerunner of the CEMAC, the UDEAC adjusted common external customs tariffs; coordinated legislation, regulations, and investment codes; harmonized internal taxes; and developed common industrialization projects, development plans, and transport policies. In 1973 the BEAC was established as a central bank for all UDEAC members and Chad, and it continues in that capacity for the CEMAC.

In January 1978 the UDEAC heads of state adopted additional measures designed to facilitate economic unity. These included a projected common income tax, community administration of waterways between Bangui and Brazzaville, and harmonization of legislation dealing with migration and industrialization. In addition, members agreed to increase cooperation in business and civil service administration, to standardize customs procedures, and to establish common structures for scientific and technical research, transportation, communications, and tourism. Subsequently, the UDEAC played a major role in formation of the Economic Community of Central African States (Communauté Economique des Etats de l’Afrique Centrale—CEEAC), an association of 11 French- and Portuguese-speaking states, established in October 1983 (see separate article).

The late 1980s saw the UDEAC make little specific headway on regional economic integration, although a declaration issued at the conclusion of the organization’s 1988 summit reaffirmed the members’ commitment to that goal. The declaration also noted the willingness of members to accept “reasonable social costs” affiliated with structural adjustment policies, provided industrialized nations would accept the “realities” of Africa’s economic problems and increase their development assistance.

A lack of meaningful action also characterized the 1989 summit, the heads of state deciding that the economic crises affecting member states would preclude significant UDEAC financing. In light of continuing financial constraints, the December 1990 summit ordered sharp cutbacks in the UDEAC secretariat staff while deferring consideration of a regional value-added tax and/or a community integration tax. A new secretary general, Thomas Dakayi Kamga of Cameroon, was named at the December 1991 summit, with several modifications regarding customs collections being approved in the hope of alleviating the UDEAC's financial difficulties. A plan was also adopted to abolish import restrictions in mid-1992, although implementation was delayed in the wake of concerted opposition from business interests in member states.

Activity over the next several years focused on establishment of the CEMAC, which was expected to be a more effective vehicle for regional integration. CEMAC was formally inaugurated at a summit on June 25–26, 1999, in Malabo, collateral with the summit of the CEEAC. The two organizations again held parallel summits in June 2000 in Libreville, Gabon, where the CEMAC attendees remarked positively on the ongoing development of institutional arrangements, including formation of an interparliamentary commission; announced their intention to revitalize the BDEAC; and called attention to the challenges presented by economic globalization and the concomitant need for stronger regional and subregional integration. In May–June 2001 the CEMAC/CEEAC trade ministers met in Yaoundé to prepare for ACP (African, Caribbean, and Pacific) trade negotiations with the European Union. At the second regular CEMAC summit, held in mid-December 2000 in N'Djamena, the national leaders agreed to accelerate introduction of a common passport and to establish a regional stock exchange in Libreville.

The focus of attention at an extraordinary summit held in early December 2001 in Libreville was the volatile political situation in the Central African Republic (CAR), where the armed forces chief, General François Bozize, was dismissed because of his alleged involvement in a failed May 2001 coup against President Ange-Félix Patassé. The CEMAC leaders established an ad hoc commission of Presidents Bongo of Gabon, Déby of Chad, and Sassou-Nguesso of the Republic of Congo to encourage the disputants to negotiate. Shortly after the December 5 conclusion of the Libreville session, the CEMAC leaders convened for a previously scheduled annual summit in Yaoundé, where plans for a joint air transport company, introduction of the common passport, and medium-term customs and tax reforms were discussed. The summit also addressed the need to combat money laundering and to restructure the BDEAC. Another topic considered by the attendees was the possible inclusion of Angola, the Democratic Republic of Congo, and Sao Tome and Principe in subregional discussions with the European Union (EU).

Beginning in early 2002 the CEMAC's attention became increasingly diverted by the deteriorating situation in the CAR. An extraordinary summit on August 15 in Brazzaville authorized dispatch of an observer team to the CAR as a consequence of escalating tensions with Chad, which gave refuge to General Bozize. Meanwhile, Bozize loyalists continued to threaten the CAR's internal security. A CEMAC crisis summit in early October 2002 was followed in late January 2003 by the fourth ordinary Conference of Heads of State, which urged the CAR government to open talks with the rebels and called on the two neighboring states to resolve their differences. By that time a CEMAC peacekeeping force was already being deployed to the CAR, replacing a contingent that Libya sent in May 2001 to protect President Patassé's government. On March 15, 2003, however, General Bozize mounted a successful coup, which led the CEMAC Conference of Heads of State, meeting June 2–3 in Libreville, to officially recognize the successor regime. The decision came following General Bozize's presentation of a plan for the rapid restoration of democracy. The conference then called for international humanitarian assistance for the CAR as well as other measures to restore the country's peace and security. Several hundred CEMAC troops from Gabon, Chad, and the Republic of the Congo remained deployed in the CAR with a mandate that included protecting the capital and provincial towns, securing transportation routes, disarming combatants, and restructuring the CAR armed forces.

Meanwhile, the CEMAC moved forward on various initiatives, including improvements in cross-border land transport and initiation of the public/private Air CEMAC. This airline, which was initially expected to begin operations by the end of 2003, encountered difficulties in starting up, and its first flight was last heard of as projected for the end of 2005. Its future seems unclear. In addition to their involvement in negotiating partnership agreements with the EU, the CEMAC trade ministers continued to formulate a common position for international trade forums. Other CEMAC concerns included food security and self-sufficiency and sustainable use of the region's forests.

The fifth Heads of State Conference, held January 28, 2004, in Brazzaville, Republic of the Congo, produced a nonaggression pact, an agreement on judicial cooperation between the member states, and an agreement on extradition. The sixth conference was held February 11, 2005, in Libreville. It encouraged peace and civic responsibility in the troubled states of the Central African Republic, Côte d'Ivoire, and Togo, and expressed concern about the deteriorating situation in Darfur.

The seventh conference, held on March 14–15, 2006, in Bata, Equatorial Guinea, was marked by the early return home of the president of Chad, Idriss Deby, in face of an attempted coup against him; the coup failed. The conference, noting the slow progress of subregional integration, set up a task force, due to report in 2008, to see what could be done.

COMMON MARKET FOR EASTERN AND SOUTHERN AFRICA (COMESA)

---

Established: By treaty signed November 5, 1993, in Kampala, Uganda, and effective December 8, 1994.

Purpose: To promote wide-ranging regional economic cooperation, particularly in the areas of agriculture, industry, transportation, and communications; to facilitate intraregional trade through the reduction or elimination of trade barriers and the establishment of regional financial institutions; to establish a common external tariff and internal free trade zone; and to pursue “economic prosperity through regional integration.”

Headquarters: Lusaka, Zambia.

Principal Organs: Authority of Heads of State and Government, Council of Ministers, Committee of Governors, Intergovernmental Committee, Court of Justice, Secretariat.

Secretary General: Erastus J.O. Mwencha (Kenya).

Membership (21): Angola, Burundi, Comoros, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Djibouti, Egypt, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Kenya, Libya, Madagascar, Malawi, Mauritius, Rwanda, Seychelles, Sudan, Swaziland, Tanzania, Uganda, Zambia, and Zimbabwe. (In 1996 signatories Lesotho and Mozambique announced they would not ratify the Comesa treaty but were instead “withdrawing” from Comesa. However, in 1997 Mozambique announced it was only “suspending” its affiliation.)

Origin and development. The creation of a permanent organization to coordinate economic cooperation among eastern and southern African states was first proposed in the mid-1970s by the United Nations’ Economic Commission for Africa and subsequently endorsed by the Organization of African Unity (OAU) in its 1980 Lagos Plan of Action for the continent’s overall economic development. After what were described as “tough negotiations” arising from the seeming incompatibility of some of the national economies in the region and given that many potential members relied on the production of the same commodities, the Preferential Trade Area for Eastern and Southern African States (PTA) was launched on December 21, 1981, by nine nations—the Comoro Islands, Djibouti, Ethiopia, Kenya, Malawi, Mauritius, Somalia, Uganda, and Zambia. Lesotho, Swaziland, and Zimbabwe joined in 1982, followed by Burundi and Rwanda in 1984, Tanzania in 1985, Mozambique and Sudan in 1988, Angola in 1990, and Eritrea, Madagascar, Namibia, and Seychelles in 1993. Zaire also applied for admission in the early 1990s, but consideration of its request was postponed because of its domestic turmoil.

The operational phase of the PTA began in 1984 when tariffs on some goods traded between members were reduced, and a PTA financial clearinghouse, run by the Reserve Bank of Zimbabwe, was established to permit trade based on members’ national currencies. In addition, a PTA Trade and Development Bank was opened in Bujumbura, Burundi, although it moved to Nairobi, Kenya, in 1994.

At the January 1992 PTA heads of state meeting, delegates conceded that the organization had little to show for its first ten years of existence. Many tariffs on trade between members remained high, most of the region's communications and transportation facilities were still subpar, and members' arrears continued to undercut the potential effectiveness of the PTA Secretariat. In addition, most members were preoccupied with turbulent domestic affairs to the apparent exclusion of regional concerns. Nevertheless, supporters of integration expressed the hope that spreading democratization and free market emphasis in the region would soon translate into greater economic cooperation. Toward that end, PTA officials proposed a merger with the Southern African Development Community (SADC), whose overlapping membership and objectives were producing a "parallel existence" between the two groups that was seen as counterproductive. However, the SADC, historically much more successful in attracting international financial support because of its highly visible face-off with apartheid-era South Africa, rejected the proposed union, at least for the time being.

Many of the PTA's original tasks were expanded in the treaty establishing the Common Market of Eastern and Southern Africa (Comesa), which was signed during the PTA's 12th summit on November 5, 1993, in Kampala, Uganda. Following ratification of the Comesa treaty by enough signatories for the accord to enter into force on December 8, 1994, officials and journalists routinely began to refer to Comesa as the "successor" to the PTA, even though several PTA members—Lesotho, Mozambique, and Somalia—ultimately opted not to join Comesa, and two nonmembers of the PTA—Democratic Republic of Congo and Egypt (1998)—did join. Tanzania withdrew in September 2000. The renamed Eastern and Southern Africa Trade and Development Bank continues to be known less formally as the PTA Bank, and the autonomous Compagnie de Réassurance de la Zone d'Échanges Préférentiels (ZEP-RE) is similarly styled the PTA Reinsurance Company in English.

Structure. At the apex of Comesa is the Authority of Heads of State and Government, which establishes by consensus fundamental policy and directs subsidiary organs in pursuit of the Common Market's objectives. The Council of Ministers monitors and reviews the performance of administrators and financial managers in addition to overseeing the organization's programs and projects. An Intergovernmental Committee, comprising permanent secretaries from the member countries, develops and manages cooperative programs and action plans in all sectors except finance and monetary policy, which is the domain of a separate Committee of Governors of the members' central banks. There are also a number of technical committees and a Secretariat, the latter, following a recent reorganization, including five divisions: Administration; Trade, Customs, and Monetary Harmonization; Investment and Private Sector Development; Infrastructure Development; and Information and Networking. The secretary general serves a once-renewable, five-year term. A Court of Justice is responsible for interpreting the Comesa treaty and for adjudicating related disputes between members.

The PTA Bank is the most prominent of various Comesa-established autonomous institutions, which also include the Comesa Bankers' Association (BAPTA), the Comesa Metallurgical Industries Association (Comesamia), the Comesa Telecommunications Company (Comtel), the Eastern and Southern Africa Business Association (ESABO), the Federation of National Associations of Women in Business (Femcom), the Leather and Leather Products Institute (LLPI), and the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers of Eastern and Southern Africa (Pharmesa).

Activities. The initial Comesa summit was held December 7–9, 1994, in Lilongwe, Malawi; however, whereas the treaty had 22 signatories at that point (all the PTA members except Djibouti, Seychelles, and Somalia, plus Zaire), it had only been ratified by 12 (Burundi, Comoro Islands, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Kenya, Madagascar, Malawi, Mauritius, Sudan, Tanzania, Uganda, and Zambia). Thus, although plans were discussed for eventual cooperation in the areas of customs, transportation, communications, agriculture, and industry, formal arrangements remained incomplete, partly because of uncertainties over the relationship between the PTA/Comesa and the SADC.

The outlook for Comesa was further clouded in late 1995 when South Africa announced it did not intend to join. At the end of 1996 Mozambique and Lesotho announced their “withdrawal” from Comesa, and speculation arose that Namibia might follow suit; most SADC members seemed to prefer distinguishable north and south zones of economic cooperation (see SADC article). In 1996 the SADC countries once again vetoed Comesa’s offer to merge as a single trade zone. Kenya, Tanzania, and Uganda considered turning away from Comesa activity in favor of the proposed reactivation of their old East African Community (EAC).

In late January 1997, Secretary General Bingu Mutharika was suspended during an investigation into the recent management of funds within the Secretariat. Mutharika resigned in April (although he continued to deny any wrongdoing), and Erastus Mwencha of Kenya succeeded him in an acting capacity.

Mwencha officially replaced Mutharika at the third Comesa summit, held in mid-1998 in Kinshasa, Democratic Republic of Congo (formerly Zaire). Summit participants agreed to eliminate tariffs and the need for visas within the Common Market by 2000 and to admit Egypt as the first North African member. Egypt officially became a member after ratifying the Comesa treaty later that year, but progress toward the removal of tariffs was slower than hoped. Comesa members were urged to reduce the tariffs by 90 percent by October 1998, but as of early December only Madagascar had done so. Despite this, Comesa still hoped for their total removal in 2000. In other activities, the Comesa Court of Justice, established under the Comesa treaty, held its first session in September 1998, and the PTA Development Bank decided to invite countries from outside the region to become members in an effort to increase the bank’s capital.

Speaking at the fourth Comesa summit May 24–25, 1999, Kenyan President Daniel arap Moi called for greater subregional cooperation, which he described as crucial for achieving high economic growth rates and attracting investment capital. Otherwise, he warned, the Comesa countries would face being marginalized by ongoing economic globalization and competition from other trading blocs. As a key step toward further integration, the summit established a committee charged with preparations for introducing a Free Trade Area (FTA). (Many Comesa members had already reduced tariffs by 60–90 percent on goods produced within the grouping.) The summit participants, acknowledging the collateral importance of regional stability, also agreed to study setting up a mechanism for maintaining peace and security.

Arguably the most significant event in the organization’s history occurred at an extraordinary summit in Lusaka, Zambia, on October 31, 2000, when nine Comesa members—Djibouti, Egypt, Kenya, Madagascar, Malawi, Mauritius, Sudan, Zambia, and Zimbabwe—inaugurated Africa’s first FTA, enabling duty-free trade in goods, services, and capital and eliminating for the participants other nontariff barriers to trade. Political concerns in several states, including Burundi, Rwanda, and Eritrea, delayed their participation, and for Namibia and Swaziland membership in the Southern African Customs Union (SACU) made their entry into Comesa’s FTA problematic. Moreover, in what was generally acknowledged to be a major setback, Tanzania withdrew from Comesa in September 2000, citing the need to streamline its international memberships and preferring to remain in the SADC because of the latter’s emphasis on capacity building for goods production.

Although no additional members joined the FTA by late 2003, others were expected to do so before attainment of Comesa’s next major goal: introducing in 2004 a customs union and tiered Common External Tariff (CET) for capital, raw materials, intermediate goods, and finished goods. Another target date, 2025, has been set for formation of a full-fledged economic community that would feature a monetary union and the free movement of goods, services, capital, and people.

The sixth Comesa summit, held May 22–23, 2001, in Cairo formally endorsed moving ahead with the CET despite problems in administering the FTA, including disputes between Zambia and Zimbabwe, Egypt and Sudan, and Egypt and Kenya. One of the major difficulties was determining how to compensate local industries damaged by the expansion of competition. At the same time, a May 22 meeting of Comesa and the SADC leaders suggested the rivalry between the two organizations had abated somewhat. In fact, they decided to form a Secretariat-level task force charged with coordinating programs and activities.

The 2001 summit's final communiqué directed Comesa to move forward in such areas as gender policy, e-commerce, and food security. Later in the year Comesa launched in Nairobi an African Trade Insurance Agency (ATIA), with funding from the World Bank group, the European Union (EU), and Japan, to protect investors against political risks. In addition, on October 29 Comesa and the United States signed a significant Trade and Investment Framework Agreement.

The May 23–24, 2002, summit in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, saw the reappointment of Secretary General Mwencha. The attendees also authorized the return of the Comesa Trade and Development Bank to Bujumbura and signed a protocol for establishing a Fund for Cooperation, Compensation, and Development.

The organization's eighth summit, held March 17, 2003, in Khartoum, Sudan, focused on the anticipated introduction of the Customs Union and accompanying CET in December. Meanwhile, Secretary General Mwencha reported, intra-Comesa trade had expanded at a rate of 30 percent per year since the 2000 launch of the FTA. At the end of 2003 the FTA still had only nine members, although Rwanda was expected to join early in 2004. Rwanda and Burundi had announced in March 2003 they were preparing to join, as were Namibia and Swaziland, assuming that remaining issues involving their SACU memberships were resolved. Namibia actually left in July 2003, intending to concentrate on its relationship with SACU. The summit also called for further development of basic infrastructure; discussed food security, particularly in light of recurrent crises in the Horn of Africa; and emphasized the need to strengthen regional peace and security. With regard to trade, Comesa agreed to adopt a regional approach in pursuit of an Economic Partnership Agreement with the EU. In addition, while noting that the textile sector was particularly benefiting from improved access to U.S. markets under the U.S. Africa Growth and Opportunity Act (AGOA), the summit participants called for closer cooperation in other sectors, especially agriculture. In other business, the summit received a request for membership from Libya.

The ninth summit was held on June 7–8, 2004 in Kampala, Uganda. Trade and investments within the community were discussed, as was the plan to move to a customs union by the end of the year. For the first time a business summit ran concurrently with the Heads of State and Government meeting, attracting more than 600 delegates. At the tenth summit on June 2–3, 2005, in Kigali, Rwanda, Comesa admitted Libya. Twenty-one countries now belong to Comesa.

THE COMMONWEALTH

---

Established: By evolutionary process and formalized December 31, 1931, in the Statute of Westminster.

Purpose: To give expression to a continuing sense of affinity and to foster cooperation among states presently or formerly owing allegiance to the British Crown.

Commonwealth Center: The Secretariat is located in Marlborough House, London, which also serves as the site of Commonwealth meetings in the United Kingdom.

Principal Organs: Meeting of Heads of Government, Secretariat.

Head of the Commonwealth: Queen Elizabeth II.

Secretary General: Donald McKinnon (New Zealand).

Membership (53, with years of entry): Antigua and Barbuda (1981), Australia (1931), Bahamas (1973), Bangladesh (1972), Barbados (1966), Belize (1981), Botswana (1966), Brunei (1984), Cameroon (1995), Canada (1931), Cyprus (1961), Dominica (1978), Fiji (reentered 1997), Gambia (1965), Ghana (1957), Grenada (1974), Guyana (1966), India (1947), Jamaica (1962), Kenya (1963), Kiribati (1979), Lesotho (1966), Malawi (1964), Malaysia (1957), Maldives (1982), Malta (1964), Mauritius (1968), Mozambique (1995), Namibia (1990), Nauru (1999), New Zealand (1931), Nigeria (1960), Pakistan (reentered 1989, but suspended following military coup of October 1999; readmitted on May 22, 2004), Papua New Guinea (1975), St. Kitts-Nevis (1983), St. Lucia (1979), St. Vincent and the Grenadines (1979), Samoa (1970), Seychelles (1976), Sierra Leone (1961), Singapore (1965), Solomon Islands (1978), South Africa (reentered 1994), Sri Lanka (1948), Swaziland (1968), Tanzania (1961), Tonga (1970), Trinidad and Tobago (1962), Tuvalu (2000), Uganda (1962), United Kingdom (1931), Vanuatu (1980), Zambia (1964). (Zimbabwe, a member since 1980, withdrew in 2003.)

Working Language: English.

Origin and development. A voluntary association that gradually superseded the British Empire, the Commonwealth traces its origins to the mid-1800s, when internal self-government was first introduced in the colonies of Australia, British North America (Canada), New Zealand, and part of what was to become the Union of South Africa. The increasing maturity and independence of these overseas communities, particularly after World War I, eventually created a need to redefine the mutual relationships between the United Kingdom and the self-governing “dominions” that were collectively coming to be known as the “British Commonwealth of Nations.” The Statute of Westminster, enacted by the British Parliament in 1931, established the principle that all members of the association were equal in status, in no way subordinate to each other, and united by allegiance to the Crown.

The original members of the Commonwealth, in addition to the United Kingdom, were Australia, Canada, the Irish Free State, Newfoundland, New Zealand, and the Union of South Africa. In 1949 Newfoundland became a province of Canada, and the Irish Republic became an independent state outside the Commonwealth. South Africa ceased to be a member upon becoming a republic in 1961 because of the opposition of the other Commonwealth countries to Pretoria’s apartheid policies; however, it was readmitted June 1, 1994, following the installation of a multiracial government. Pakistan withdrew in 1972 but rejoined in 1989, although its membership was suspended in response to the coup of October 1999.

The ethnic, geographic, and economic composition of the Commonwealth has been modified fundamentally by the accession of former colonial territories in Asia, Africa, and the Western Hemisphere. This infusion of racially non-white and economically less developed states had significant political implications, including modification of the Commonwealth's unwritten constitution to accommodate the desire of many new members to renounce allegiance to the British Crown and adopt a republican form of government. In 1949 the pattern was set when Commonwealth prime ministers accepted India's formal declaration that, on becoming a republic, it would accept the Crown as a symbol of the Commonwealth association and recognize the British sovereign as head of the Commonwealth. The movement toward a multicultural identity was solidified by the Declaration of Commonwealth Principles adopted by the heads of government at their 1971 Singapore summit. In addition to acknowledging the organization's diversity, the Singapore Declaration enumerated a set of common principles, including the primacy of international peace and order; individual liberty regardless of racial, ethnic, or religious background; people's "inalienable right to participate by means of free and democratic processes in framing the society in which they live"; opposition to "colonial domination and racial oppression"; and the "progressive removal" of wide disparities in wealth and living standards.

The new thrust was further evidenced by a North-South summit in October 1981, which reflected that most Commonwealth members were developing countries. Subsequently, a 1982 report, The North-South Dialogue: Making It Work, proposed many institutional and procedural reforms to facilitate global negotiations on development and related issues, and a 1983 document, Towards a New Bretton Woods, proposed short-, medium-, and long-range changes to enhance the efficiency and equity of the international trading and financial system.

A declaration in October 1987 that Fiji's Commonwealth status had lapsed followed two successive coups, abrogation of the country's constitution, and proclamation of a republic. Readmission required the unanimous consent of the Commonwealth members, and Fiji's application remained blocked until mid-1997 by India on the grounds that appropriate constitutional recognition had yet to be given to the island's Indian population. Fiji was finally readmitted effective October 1, 1997, following the adoption of a new constitution in July, but its membership was suspended in May 2000 following displacement of the elected government. Full participation was restored in late 2001, following democratic elections in August through September.

The October 1991 summit in Harare, Zimbabwe, was noteworthy for the adoption of a declaration redefining the Commonwealth's agenda. The Harare Declaration, drafted under the guidance of a ten-member High Level Appraisal Group, committed all Commonwealth countries, regardless of their political or economic conditions, to promote democracy, human rights, judicial independence, equality for women, educational opportunities, and the principles of "sound economic management."

In a departure from precedent, membership was granted on November 13, 1995, to Mozambique, even though it had never been a British colony and was not at least partly English speaking. A "unique and special" case regarding Mozambique had been presented by its Anglophone neighbors because of regional trade concerns. In 1999 Nauru became the 53rd full member of the Commonwealth after 31 years as a special member, and Tuvalu, also a special member (from 1978), became the 54th full member in 2000. In 2005 Nauru resumed its status as a special member, a category of membership available to very small countries.

In March 2002 Zimbabwe's participation in Commonwealth meetings was suspended as a consequence of a widely condemned presidential election earlier in the month. In response to its continued suspension, Zimbabwe withdrew effective December 7, 2003.

Structure. One of the least institutionalized intergovernmental organizations, the Commonwealth was virtually without permanent machinery until the establishment of its Secretariat in 1965. The symbolic head of the organization is the reigning British monarch, who serves concurrently as constitutional sovereign in those member states that still maintain their traditional allegiance. Since World War II, the heads of government have held biennial meetings, and specialized consultations occur periodically among national ministers responsible for such fields as foreign affairs, defense, finance, education, agriculture, health, trade, legal affairs, science and the environment, and women's and youth affairs. National finance ministers normally convene in the nearest convenient Commonwealth site on the eve of the annual fall meetings of the International Monetary Fund and World Bank to discuss monetary and economic issues.

The Secretariat organizes meetings and conferences, collects and disseminates information on behalf of the membership, and is responsible for implementing collective decisions. The secretary general, who currently serves a four-year term, is assisted by three deputies with responsibilities for political affairs, economic and social development, and development cooperation. Since its reorganization in 2002, the Secretariat has encompassed nine divisions: Communications and Public Affairs, Corporate Services, Economic Affairs, Gender and Human Resources Development, Governance and Institutional Development, Legal and Constitutional Affairs, Political Affairs, Science and Technology, and Special Advisory Services. The organization's technical assistance program is financed primarily through the Commonwealth Fund for Technical Cooperation (CFTC).

The fund is supported by all Commonwealth countries on a voluntary basis, and its governing body includes representatives of all contributors. In addition, a Commonwealth Equity Fund, designed to encourage private sector investment in the emerging stock markets of developing countries, was launched in 1990 and was followed in 1995 by formation of a Commonwealth Private Investment Initiative (CPII). The latter was established to help geographic regions attract capital for small- and medium-sized ventures and for former state enterprises that were being privatized. The first CPII investment fund, for Sub-Saharan Africa, was established in 1996, and others followed. On the political front, a Commonwealth Ministerial Action Group (CMAG) was created in November 1995 to provide guidance toward "good governance" in countries undergoing transition to democracy.

The autonomous Commonwealth Foundation, the formation of which was authorized by the Commonwealth heads of government in 1965, supports nongovernmental organizations, professional associations, and other such bodies. Known informally as the "unofficial Commonwealth," the foundation directs its attention to "inter-country networking, training, capacity-building, and information exchange." The Commonwealth of Learning, likewise authorized by the heads of government and located in Vancouver, Canada, was established in 1987 to promote distance learning and thereby improve access to education and training. Some three dozen additional Commonwealth associations, institutes, councils, and other groups were also established over the years, largely to promote development or disseminate information in such fields as forestry, health, telecommunications, education, journalism, law, and sports. Most are based in London.

Activities. The Secretariat's divisions oversee Commonwealth activities. Among the most prominent, the Political Affairs Division participates in organizing Commonwealth Heads of Government Meetings (CHOGMs), conducts research, aids various committees in their tasks, and monitors political issues and developments of importance to Commonwealth members. Since 1990 its observer missions have also monitored election campaigns, preparations for balloting, and elections in some two dozen Commonwealth countries around the globe, and in 1999 it drafted a "Framework for Principles for Promoting Good Governance and Combating Corruption.” The Economic Affairs Division conducts research and analysis and supports expert groups in such areas as North–South economic relations, protectionist tariffs, reform of the international financial system, debt management, and youth unemployment. Its purview also includes environmental concerns and sustainable development. In the area of technical assistance and development, CFTC provides training, expertise, and advice in the promotion of economic growth, public sector reform, poverty alleviation, infrastructural and institutional development, and capacity building. A Commonwealth Youth Program likewise funded through voluntary contributions, is an effort to encourage youth participation in economic and social development. Among more recent innovations, in 1995 the heads of government endorsed a Commonwealth Plan of Action on Gender and Development.

During the 1980s and early 1990s, the Commonwealth was most prominently identified with its efforts to end apartheid in South Africa, although debate frequently raged within the organization over tactics, especially the imposition of sanctions. Accordingly, the formal readmission of South Africa at midyear was the highlight of 1994, newly elected South African President Nelson Mandela hailing the “sterling contribution” of the grouping to the installation of a nonracial government in Pretoria.

The heads of government meeting held November 8–13, 1995, in Auckland, New Zealand, was dominated by discussion of recent events in Nigeria, which resulted in the suspension of Nigeria’s membership and the launching of efforts (ultimately largely unsuccessful) by the Commonwealth to influence the actions of the military regime in Abuja. The governments of Gambia and Sierra Leone were also criticized for their perceived failure to support genuine democratization; the summit established CMAG in part to “guide” developing Commonwealth countries toward abiding by the principles enunciated in the 1991 Harare Declaration.

Nigeria, Gambia, and Sierra Leone were also major topics at the 1997 Commonwealth heads of government meeting held in Edinburgh, Scotland.

While praising the role Nigeria played in the Liberia conflict, the summit decided to continue the former’s suspension because of ongoing human rights abuses and the suppression of democracy by the government. The summit also indicated it might impose sanctions if they would help move Nigeria toward democracy. Sierra Leone was also suspended (until the restoration of President Tejan Kabbah’s government in March 1998), and the summit called on Commonwealth members to support the UN and ECOWAS sanctions imposed on that country. In contrast, the government in Gambia was praised for having made progress toward genuine democratization.

Another focus of attention at the summit was the promotion of economic prosperity. The heads of government adopted the Edinburgh Commonwealth Economic Declaration, which called for continued global economic integration with greater attention to the smaller, less developed countries that believed they were being “left behind.” To assist the smaller countries, the Commonwealth leaders agreed to support efforts to develop a successor to the Lomé Convention, to offer duty-free access to certain markets, and to establish a Trade and Investment Access Facility (TIAF) with initial funding from Australia, Canada, New Zealand, and the United Kingdom. The Commonwealth leaders also endorsed establishing a Commonwealth Business Council, which would meet every two years to ensure that the voice of the “business community” was heard.

In October 1998 CMAG concluded that the Nigerian government had taken enough steps toward democracy to warrant a lifting of sanctions and a resumption of Nigerian participation in some Commonwealth activities. Full participation was restored May 29, 1999, following presidential elections the previous February. In other activities during the year, a Commonwealth ministerial mission lobbied leading providers of aid and loans to developing countries on behalf of small island states, arguing they deserved special consideration because of their extreme exposure to outside political, economic, and environmental forces.

At the November 12–15, 1999, Commonwealth summit in Durban, South Africa, the organization established a ten-member High-Level Review Group (HLRG) comprising the heads of government of Australia, India, Malta, Papua New Guinea, Singapore, South Africa, Tanzania, Trinidad and Tobago, United Kingdom, and Zimbabwe. The HLRG was assigned the task of recommending how the Commonwealth could best meet 21st century challenges. Issues facing the organization included what measures to take in response to corrupt governments and how to reconcile promotion of good governance with the principle of national sovereignty and noninterference in internal affairs. In this context, a number of Commonwealth countries called for expanding CMAG's mandate to allow firmer action where democratic practices were perceived as under threat—for example, in cases of arbitrarily postponed elections, restrictions on freedom of speech and the press, and evidence of persistent human rights violations. To date, such proposals have been met with less than unanimity, however, given that many Commonwealth countries have questionable records with regard to political pluralism and press independence.

Also at the Durban heads of government session, Donald McKinnon, former deputy prime minister and foreign minister of New Zealand, was elected to succeed Chief Eleazar Chukwuemea (Emeka) Anyaoku of Nigeria as secretary general, effective April 2000. McKinnon, who received wise praise for his role in resolving the Bougainville crisis in Papua New Guinea, subsequently indicated that his priorities would include obtaining debt relief for developing countries, promoting democracy, and facilitating technology transfers. The heads of government also confirmed Pakistan's suspension from Commonwealth activities in the wake of the previous month's coup in Islamabad.

Pakistan (like Fiji, Gambia, Sierra Leone, and the Solomon Islands) continued to be one of the countries on the CMAG agenda for 2001. Recent threatening events in Zimbabwe were also discussed at CMAG's March 19–20 session. Collaterally, HLRG established three working groups to consider the Commonwealth's political role, including conflict prevention and the mandate of CMAG; its developmental role, including how to reduce the “digital divide”; and Commonwealth governance and structures.

The CHOGM scheduled for October 2001 was postponed in the wake of the September 11 terrorist attacks in the United States and then rescheduled for March 2–5, 2002, in Coolum, Australia. The meeting's concluding declaration called for a rationalized and streamlined organizational structure, as HLRG's report recommended. Emphasis was also given to “people-centered economic development,” good governance and human rights, efforts to bridge the widening gap between rich and poor, and the elimination of terrorism. (Some African participants, however, although condemning the September 11 al-Qaida attacks, expressed concern that the definition of terrorism was too closely tied to U.S. and Western concerns and ignored, for example, that a number of present-day African leaders had themselves been branded as terrorists during the colonial and apartheid eras.) In addition, the assembled heads of government voiced support for the New Partnership for Africa's Development (Nepad), which was launched in 2001 under the auspices of the Organization of African Unity (OAU), and endorsed a new assistance effort for small states. Countries continuing under CMAG scrutiny included Fiji, Pakistan, the Solomon Islands, and Zimbabwe.

In keeping with a summit recommendation that they pursue more active consultations, the Commonwealth foreign ministers convened for the first time in September 2002, during the opening days of the annual UN General Assembly session in New York. At that time the ministers agreed to hold annual meetings.

The next CHOGM, which was held December 5–8, 2003, in Abuja, Nigeria, was dominated by the Zimbabwe issue. Although many African states argued that the Mugabe government could best be engaged by lifting the suspension, opponents prevailed. The Commonwealth proceeded to form a balanced committee of leaders from Australia, Canada, India, Jamaica, Mozambique, and South Africa to pursue “national reconciliation” in Zimbabwe and a rapid return of that country to full participation, but Zimbabwe's governing party quickly voted to terminate membership in the Commonwealth. In acknowledging the withdrawal, Secretary General McKinnon, who was elected to a second term at the CHOGM, expressed his hope that Zimbabwe would rejoin "in due course, as have other members in the past." Also at the CHOGM, membership applications from the Palestinian Authority, Rwanda, and Yemen were rejected.

Four and a half years after the military coup that brought Gen. Pervez Musharraf to power, Commonwealth ministers decided to restore full membership to Pakistan at a May 2004 meeting in London. Ministers insisted that General Musharraf uphold his pledge to step down as chief of the army by the end of the year and expected the country to move forward with democratic reforms. Some African nations, including Nigeria and Tanzania, objected to the readmission of Pakistan because they feared that military rulers, who thought that international sanctions could be reversed, might take power in other countries.

The marriage of Prince Charles, Queen Elizabeth's son and heir to the throne, to Camilla Parker Bowles in April 2005 had implications for the Commonwealth. The British Department of Constitutional Affairs stated on March 21 that Parker Bowles would automatically become queen when Charles became king, despite Charles's declarations to the contrary, unless parliaments of the UK and the Commonwealth countries of which the UK monarch was head of state all agreed to a change in the law. On March 23 the Commonwealth Secretariat announced that Charles would not automatically succeed Queen Elizabeth as head of the Commonwealth when he became king. Instead, the various Commonwealth heads of government would elect the next head of the Commonwealth. Appointing anyone other than the British monarch to this symbolic position would mark a substantial shift away from the organization's British and imperial roots.

The next CHOGM, which was held November 25–27, 2005, in Valletta, Malta, declared that Pakistan could remain a member in full standing as long as General Musharraf resigned from the military within two years. Ugandan President Yoweri Museveni was much criticized for the arrest on treason charges of Uganda's main opposition leader, Col. Kizza Besigye. The European Union received criticism for maintaining agricultural subsidies and for a 36 percent cut in the guaranteed price of sugar—a matter of great concern to Commonwealth Caribbean countries. The summit issued a Statement on Multilateral Trade, calling for agreement on trade subsidies at forthcoming World Trade Organization talks. The 2007 CHOGM meeting will take place in Uganda, unless Commonwealth members continue to question Museveni's policies.

COMMUNITY OF PORTUGUESE SPEAKING COUNTRIES (CPLP)

Comunidade dos Países de Língua Portuguesa

---

Established: By statutes signed July 17, 1996, in Lisbon, Portugal, with immediate interim effect pending completion of ratification procedures by member states.

Purpose: To promote “concerted political and diplomatic action” between sovereign and equal member states in the international arena; to assist cooperation, “particularly in the economic, social, cultural, juridical, technical, and scientific fields”; to implement projects “for the promotion and diffusion of the Portuguese language.”

Headquarters: Lisbon, Portugal.

Principal Organs: Conference of Heads of State and Government, Council of Ministers, Standing Committee of Ambassadors, Executive Secretariat.

Executive Secretary: Luis de Matos Monteiro da Fonseca (Cape Verde).

Membership (8): Angola, Brazil, Cape Verde, Guinea-Bissau, Mozambique, Portugal, Sao Tome and Principe, Timor-Leste.

Official Language: Portuguese.

Origin and development. The idea of creating a grouping of Portuguese-speaking countries, in emulation of the (mainly) English-speaking Commonwealth and the Francophonie network, was proposed following the accession to independence of Portugal’s colonies in the mid-1970s. Protracted civil war in Angola and Mozambique contributed to the delay in implementation, as did a lack of enthusiasm on the part of Brazil, in which nearly 80 percent of the world’s 200 million Portuguese speakers live. Eventually, however, the regular ministerial conferences of the seven Lusophone countries yielded a decision by their foreign ministers, meeting in February 1994 in Brasília, that an institutional community should be established. Further instability in Angola and disagreements on funding contributed to the postponement of an intended mid-1995 launch, and it was not until July 1996 that the founding summit convened at the Portuguese capital.

The heads of state of Angola, Brazil, Cape Verde, Guinea-Bissau, Mozambique, Portugal, and Sao Tome and Principe duly signed the statutes of the new community, enunciating eight principles that would govern it: sovereign equality of the member states; no interference in internal matters; respect for national identity; reciprocal treatment; upholding of peace, democracy, the rule of law, human rights, and social justice; respect for territorial integrity; promotion of development; and promotion of mutually advantageous cooperation. The community would be open to any other state with Portuguese as its official language, subject to unanimous decision of the existing members. It was agreed that the statutes would come into effect immediately on a “temporary” basis and would “become definite after conclusion of constitutional formalities by all of the member states.”

Timor-Leste, the former Portuguese Asian colony of East Timor, was admitted as the eighth CPLP member at the organization's fourth summit, on July 31–August 1, 2002.

Structure. The CPLP's statutes prescribe that political decisions be achieved by consensus. The highest organ is the Conference of Heads of State and Government, which meets every two years (unless two-thirds of the members request an extraordinary meeting) and is headed by a president serving a two-year term. Responsibility for the coordination and definition of CPLP activities and approval of its budget is vested in the Council of (Foreign) Ministers, which convenes at least annually and is headed by a president serving a one-year term. The Standing Committee of Ambassadors, currently those in Lisbon, meets at least once a month, charged in particular with supervising the implementation of conference and council decisions by the Executive Secretariat, which is the main executive organ of the CPLP. The secretariat is headed by an executive secretary elected by the Conference of Heads of State and Government for a two-year term, renewable once.

Activities. The intention of the CPLP to adopt the Commonwealth model of an outward-oriented organization, rather than the metropolitan focus characteristic of Francophonie, was highlighted by the appointment of the former Angolan prime minister, Dr. Marcolino José Carlos Moco, as the organization's first executive secretary. This orientation was also apparent in the initial diplomatic tasks that the new community set for itself, namely support for Brazil's quest to become a permanent member of the UN Security Council, and advocacy of self-determination for the inhabitants of East Timor (a Portuguese colony annexed by Indonesia exactly 20 years before the launching of the CPLP). In 1997 the CPLP foreign ministers met for two days to discuss cooperation in the areas of security, services, and immigration.

The second Conference of Heads of State and Government was held in July 1998 in Praia, Cape Verde. The CPLP leaders called on Indonesia to conduct a self-determination referendum in East Timor, which sent an observer delegation to the summit. The summit also condemned renewed rebel activity in Angola, formed a contact group to help negotiate a settlement to the fighting in Guinea-Bissau, and reelected Secretary General Carlos Moco to a second two-year term.

In May 2000 the CPLP defense ministers met in Luanda, Angola, and agreed to establish a joint military force that would cooperate with UN missions in addition to undertaking peacekeeping and humanitarian assignments within the CPLP member countries. As a follow-up to the decision, the community conducted its first joint military maneuvers in October 2000 in Portugal.

On July 17–18, 2000, six of the seven CPLP heads of state (excluding Angola's José Eduardo dos Santos) convened at Maputo, Mozambique, for the third CPLP summit. In addition to electing Brazil's Dulce Maria Pereira as successor to Executive Secretary Carlos Moco, the participants issued a concluding declaration that acknowledged the prevention and treatment of AIDS and other diseases as a prerequisite for sustained development and security, supported the ongoing reconciliation process in Guinea-Bissau, reinforced the importance of international compliance with UN sanctions against the rebel National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA), and asserted that peace, democracy, and human rights would be accorded maximum priority. Also at the summit, Portugal indicated it would finance an International Institute for the Portuguese Language (Instituto Internacional da Língua Portuguesa), to be sited in Cape Verde, as well as a long-distance learning network.

Coincident with independence festivities in May 2002 in Dili, Timor-Leste, the CPLP Council of Ministers held an extraordinary meeting, at which time the newly formed government of the world's newest state requested admission to the CPLP. As expected, the CPLP states granted formal membership at the fourth CPLP summit, held July 31–August 1 in Brasília. Timor-Leste thus became the first Asian member of the community.

The group has focused in recent years on shared security concerns, the spread of HIV/AIDS, and promotion of shared culture. Cultural exchange has include the establishment of a Lusophone Culture Day (Dia da Cultura Lusófona), the CPLP Games (last held in 2005 in Angola), and the attempt to create a FIFA-sanctioned CPLP soccer event. Additionally, the increased ease of movement of CPLP citizens was furthered by changes in visa rules and the installation of a special entry port for CPLP citizens at the Lisbon airport. The organization has also worked to aid in member state crises such as the coup in Sao Tome and Principe and the election controversy in Guinea-Bissau.

A goal of the organization has been to create a CPLP parliamentary assembly. General Secretary Luis Fonseca accepted a proposal to create a working group to that end at the 5th Portuguese Speaking Forum held in April 2006 in Luanda, Angola.

COUNCIL OF ARAB ECONOMIC UNITY (CAEU)

---

Established: By resolution of the Arab Economic Council of the League of Arab States on June 3, 1957, in Cairo, Egypt, effective at its first meeting May 30, 1964.

Purpose: To provide a flexible framework for achieving economic integration of Arab states.

Headquarters: Cairo, Egypt.

Principal Organs: Council, General Secretariat.

Secretary General: Ahmed Guweili (Egypt).

Membership (11): Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Kuwait, Libya, Mauritania, Palestine, Somalia, Sudan, Syria, Yemen. (Egypt's membership was suspended from 1979 to 1988. Although not a de jure state, Palestine succeeded the Palestine Liberation Organization as a member following formation of the Palestinian Authority in 1994.)

Official Language: Arabic.

Origin and development. In January 1956 the Arab League agreed on the necessity for an organization that would deal specifically with the economic problems of Arab countries. As a result, on June 3, 1957, a resolution was passed creating the Council of Arab Economic Unity. The organization officially came into existence May 30, 1964.

In December 1988 the CAEU announced it was lifting a nine-year suspension of Egypt's membership that had been occasioned by Cairo's conclusion of a peace agreement with Israel.

In March 1990, Kuwait announced its intention to withdraw over the council's "poor performance" and that CAEU objectives overlapped those of other Arab organizations. Continuing disputes over budget assessments and shortfalls, including Kuwait's back dues, also played a part in the decision. The CAEU lost its only other Gulf member when the United Arab Emirates withdrew in late November 1999, immediately after a summit of the Gulf Cooperation Council.

Structure. The Council, consisting of the economic, finance, and trade ministers of member states, meets twice a year to discuss and vote on the organization's agenda. The General Secretariat oversees implementation; it also has responsibility for drawing up work plans, which are presented to the council.

Activities. Since its inception, activities have focused on furthering economic development and encouraging economic cooperation among Arab countries. To promote these ends, the Council established an Arab Common Market in 1964. Seven years later the market achieved its initial aim of abolishing all taxes and other duties levied on items of trade between Arab countries. The second part of the plan, a customs union of all members, has not yet been fully implemented. Emphasis has also been given to forming joint Arab companies and federations, to coordinating agricultural and industrial programs, and to improving road and railway networks. Industries in which joint ventures and federations or unions have been formed include textiles, processed foods, pharmaceuticals, fertilizers, building materials, iron and steel, shipping, petrochemicals, and information technology. The CAEU has also promoted harmonization of statistics and data collection.

The CAEU was thrown into disarray by the Persian Gulf crisis in August 1990. Several prominent CAEU members participated in the U.S.-led coalition that succeeded in driving Iraqi forces from Kuwait in early 1991. Subsequently, in part to restore a sense of normalcy to Arab affairs, as well as for humanitarian reasons, the CAEU repeatedly called on the UN Security Council to discontinue its sanctions against Iraq.

The CAEU continues to encounter considerable difficulty in achieving its economic goals. The planned introduction in 1998 of an Arab Free Trade Zone, which had the support of most Arab League members as well as the overlapping CAEU membership, was undermined by requests for exceptions involving nearly 3,000 commodities.

The CAEU Council session held June 6–7, 2001, was notable primarily because it constituted the first such meeting in Baghdad, Iraq, since the 1991 Gulf war. At the session Egypt, Iraq, Libya, and Syria announced they were establishing their own free trade zone, which once again called into question the CAEU's long-term prospects.

The December 2002 CAEU Council session heard Arab League Secretary General Amr Mussa warn of the political, economic, and social consequences posed by threats to the Arab world, principally U.S. antagonism toward the Iraqi government as well as the ongoing Israeli confrontation with Palestinian militants. Also in 2002 the CAEU established a committee to encourage inter-Arab investment by redirecting some of the estimated $1 trillion in Arab funds that are invested elsewhere. More recently, a CAEU-sponsored economic conference in Cairo also called for the repatriation of investment capital, particularly in view of rapid Arab population growth and an unemployment rate that was already approaching 20 percent.

In 2004 the CAEU acceded to the 2001 Agadir (Morocco) Declaration, which was seen as a step toward creating a pan-Arab free trade zone. Initial signatories were Morocco, Jordan, Tunisia, and Egypt. The declaration also proposed launching a Mediterranean Arab Free Trade Association, bringing together various Arab countries with bilateral partnerships with the EU and other foreign entities. Its Council session that year produced a strongly negative report concerning unemployment in Arab countries. It stated it was finalizing details of an Arab Investment Map (AIM), a means of connecting Arab investors with Arab prospective investment recipients. The intent was to make it as easy for Arabs to invest inside the Arab world as it is elsewhere. The CAEU is now concentrating on the AIM. It continues to push for Arab economic self-sufficiency and to warn against domination of key economic sectors by outside entities.

COUNCIL OF THE ENTENTE

Conseil de l'Entente

---

Established: May 29, 1959, in Abidjan, Côte d'Ivoire, by a convention signed by representatives from countries that were once part of French West Africa.

Purpose: To promote political, economic, and social coordination among the member states.

Headquarters: Abidjan, Côte d'Ivoire.

Principal Organs: Council, Ministerial Council, Mutual Aid and Loan Guarantee Fund, Secretariat.

Administrative Secretary: Paul Kouamé (Côte d'Ivoire).

Membership (5): Benin, Burkina Faso, Côte d'Ivoire, Niger, Togo.

Official Language: French.

Origin and development. The Council of the Entente was formed in 1959 by Benin (then Dahomey), Burkina Faso (then Upper Volta), Côte d'Ivoire, and Niger; Togo joined in 1966. In its early years the Entente was seen as a vehicle for Côte d'Ivoire, by far the most economically and politically powerful member, to promote its pre-eminence in west Africa.

In 1966 the Entente adopted a convention that established the Mutual Aid and Loan Guarantee Fund to promote economic development and regional integration; to assist in preparing specific economic projects; to obtain assistance from donor organizations; and to promote increased trade, commerce, and investment among Entente members and their neighbors. In 1970 an associated Economic Community of Livestock and Meat (Communauté Economique du Bétail et de la Viande—CEBV) was established to provide technical and financial support for the region's cattle industry.

Structure. The organization's principal organ, the Council, encompasses the members' heads of state; the location of meetings rotates among the capitals of the members. Council sessions are preceded by meetings of the Ministerial Council, which is comprised of representatives of the five governments.

In accordance with a modified structure adopted in December 1973, a board of directors (the five heads of state) governs the Mutual Aid and Loan Guarantee Fund. Its management committee handles administrative and financial matters, such as the approval of guarantees. The Entente's Secretariat considers applications for guarantees, the reduction of interest rates, and the extension of loan repayment periods. It also provides regional centers with support for technical assistance, development, and cooperation.

Activities. The member states established a port and harbor administration, a railway and road traffic administration, and a unified quarantine organization. Development programs have concentrated on food production, village water projects, expansion of tourism, and energy.

In the 1990s, institutional effectiveness remained marginal at best because member states, several of them beset by sustained political turmoil, failed to make their allotted financial contributions. Consequently, the members' heads of state convened for the first time in 11 years on October 31, 1994, in Kara, Togo, in an effort to "relaunch" the organization, which the participants characterized as “an irreplaceable framework for debate and solidarity.” Nevertheless, Benin boycotted the Council summit held in Kara in February 1996 to protest the presence of Col. Ibrahim Baré Maïnassara, who had led a coup in Niger. Other Council leaders exhorted Colonel Maïnassara to return Niger to civilian government. During the February 20, 1997, summit, the heads of state expressed their concerns about regional security; they feared that the turmoil in the Great Lakes countries would spread to neighboring states. The summit called for the removal of all outside forces from Burundi, Rwanda, and Zaire to promote stability.

At the August 1998 Council meeting, the heads of state denounced illegal arms trade in the region and the associated rise in crime. They also discussed ongoing conflicts in Africa and expressed concern about renewed fighting in Angola. The Council gave its support to the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) and the Community of Portuguese-Speaking Countries (CPLP), which were mediating the crisis in Guinea-Bissau. Entente leaders also signed agreements to establish a regional tourist visa and enhance cooperation among the members’ national lotteries.

At the Entente summit of March 2000, the leaders of the five member states were joined by President Obasanjo of Nigeria for discussions on regional security. This was the first time the head of a nonmember state attended a Council summit. Meeting again in mid-February 2001 in Kara, the Entente executives conducted wide-ranging discussions on political, economic, social, peace, security, and regional stability matters.

The summit’s final communiqué voiced support for the free movement of goods and people in the region, closer integration through ECOWAS and the West African Economic and Monetary Union (Union Economique et Monétaire Ouest-Africaine—UEMOA), and rapid adoption of the founding statute for the OAU-sponsored African Union. Five months later, in late July, the five Entente countries initiated their regional tourist visa.

In March 2002 the five members’ security ministers and their counter-part from Mali met in Niamey, Niger, to discuss regional security issues, including illegal arms sales, banditry, and child trafficking. Shortly thereafter, the Entente Council’s tourism ministers met to review implementation of the regional visa and to identify possible improvements. The prospects for including Ghana and Mali in the regime were also discussed.

In early July 2002 the Entente leaders met in Lomé, Togo, but two months later attention turned from regional cooperation to instability in Côte d’Ivoire. In September a failed coup, continuing conflict, and a resultant flow of refugees complicated the already strained relations between Côte d’Ivoire and Burkina Faso, and their border was closed as a consequence. Although France helped broker a peace agreement between the Ivorian government and rebel forces in March 2003, the border remained closed until September 2003. Burkina Faso’s president did not attend an extraordinary “mini-summit,” which was held in May in Lomé to promote reconciliation in Côte d’Ivoire. Since that time, regional conflicts have severely limited the organization’s ability to function.

EAST AFRICAN COMMUNITY (EAC)

---

Established: By Treaty for the Establishment of the East African Community, which was signed November 30, 1999, in Arusha, Tanzania, and entered into force July 7, 2000; community formally launched January 15, 2001.

Purpose: To coordinate trade, monetary, defense, and sectoral policies with a view toward establishment of a customs union, a common market, a monetary union, and, eventually, a political federation of the partner states.

Headquarters: Arusha, Tanzania.

Principal Organs: Summit, Council of Ministers, Coordination Committee, Sectoral Councils, Sectoral Committees, East African Court of Justice, East African Legislative Assembly.

Secretary General: Juma Volter Mwapachu (Tanzania).

Membership (3): Kenya, Tanzania, Uganda.

Official Language: English. Kiswahili is to be developed as a lingua franca.

Origin and development. The original East African Community (EAC) of Kenya, Tanzania, and Uganda was established in 1967 but collapsed in July 1977, although its affiliated East African Development Bank (EADB), which had been established under an annex to the original treaty, was reorganized by the founding states in 1980 and continues to function. (For background on the original EAC and its collapse, see the section on foreign relations in the Kenya article.) In 1984 the former EAC members signed a Mediation Agreement to explore ways of resuming cooperation, which led in 1993 to an Agreement for the Establishment of the Permanent Tripartite Commission for East African Cooperation. A corresponding Secretariat began operations in Arusha, Tanzania, in March 1996 under Executive Director Francis Muthaura of Kenya.

The main task of the Tripartite Commission soon became negotiation of a new EAC treaty, the three neighboring states having confirmed in 1997 their intention to reestablish the EAC. On November 30, 1999, Presidents Daniel arap Moi of Kenya, Benjamin Mkapa of Tanzania, and Yoweri Museveni of Uganda signed in Arusha the new Treaty for the Establishment of the East African Community. The requisite ratifications having been completed, the treaty entered into force on July 7, 2000, with the EAC being formally launched at a meeting of the three leaders on January 15, 2001.

Structure. The Summit, consisting of the heads of state or government of the three members, provides “general direction and impetus” to the EAC. It meets annually or in extraordinary session at the request of one member state. The summit chairmanship rotates annually; decisions are reached by consensus. The Council of Ministers, which meets at least twice a year, comprises the members’ ministers for regional cooperation plus any other ministers designated by the individual states. As the principal EAC policymaking organ, the council reviews and oversees the EAC’s programs, establishes oversight Sectoral Councils from among its own members, and appoints working Sectoral Committees.

A Coordination Committee, which also convenes at least twice a year, includes the member states' permanent secretaries responsible for regional cooperation; other permanent secretaries may also be named to it by each state. Its responsibilities include implementing council decisions and coordinating the work of the Sectoral Committees. The latter have responsibilities for such concerns as agriculture and food security; energy; education, culture, and sports; fiscal affairs; gender and community development; labor/employment, refugee management, and movement of persons; and transport, commerce, and meteorology.

The Secretariat is headed by a secretary general, who is selected by the summit for a five-year term on a rotational basis. The secretary general is assisted by two deputies, one for Projects and Programs and the other for Finance and Administration.

The treaty also provided for an East African Court of Justice to interpret and apply the treaty, although the Council of Ministers may extend the court's jurisdiction to other areas, subject to protocol approval. The East African Legislative Assembly comprises 5 ex officio and 27 elected members; the latter are selected by the three national assemblies, but sitting deputies and government ministers are excluded.

Activities. Even before conclusion of the new EAC treaty in 1999, the three prospective member states had concluded a 1997–2000 East African Cooperative Development Plan in which they agreed to work toward harmonizing policies in key sectors, making their currencies convertible, easing border crossings, reducing bilateral tariffs, identifying needed infrastructural projects, and bringing investment incentives and codes in line with each other. The first session of the EAC Council convened January 13, 2001, immediately before the first summit, which officially launched the organization. At the second EAC summit, held two months later, the heads of state agreed to move ahead with the Second Cooperative Development Strategy (2001–2005).

Looking ahead, the EAC anticipated quick completion of a Protocol on the Customs Union as well as closer coordination of monetary and fiscal policies, banking regulations, and value added tax (VAT) rates. The EAC also requested the participation of agencies and offices involved in such areas as tourism, posts and telecommunications, investment promotion, and scientific research, plus the participation of civil groups representing, for example, women, youth, professionals, and workers.

The heads of state met for a third time on November 30, 2001, to launch the Court of Justice and the Legislative Assembly and to sign a revised Memorandum of Understanding on Cooperation in Defense, updating a document that they had completed in April 1998. The possible future membership of Rwanda and Burundi was also discussed, but at an April 11, 2002, summit any such expansion was indefinitely postponed. Observers attributed the decision primarily to internal strife in Burundi and Rwanda's involvement in the war in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. Moreover, the EAC leaders saw as their principal short-term goal not expansion, but completion of a Protocol on the Establishment of the East African Customs Union. The Parliamentary Assembly, meeting in early June, renewed a quarter-century-old debate on forming an East African political federation, but the discussion was regarded as largely symbolic at the time.

The heads of state convened again on November 30, 2002, in Arusha, Tanzania, where the topics under discussion included a common external tariff (CET), the community's road network, and development of the Lake Victoria area. In an extraordinary summit on June 20, 2003, in Nairobi, the leaders reached tentative agreement on the CET, including a maximum rate of 25 percent (to be lowered to 20 percent five years after introduction of the customs union). The EAC also reaffirmed its commitment to antiterrorism but cautioned that travel bans imposed on the region by other countries were hampering the tourism industry. The customs union protocol was ultimately approved by the EAC Council of Ministers on November 30, 2003, with the document then being signed by the heads of state in a summit on March 2, 2004 in Arusha. It came into force January 1, 2005, and apart from some complaints by Kenya that Uganda was cheating, it was generally considered a success.

At the seventh summit of heads of state, held on April 5, 2006, in Arusha, an application from Rwanda and Burundi to join the community was passed forward for detailed negotiation, with the expectation that final action would be taken at the next ordinary summit meeting in November 2006.

ECONOMIC COMMUNITY OF CENTRAL AFRICAN STATES (CEEAC)

Communauté Economique des Etats de l'Afrique Centrale

---

Established: By treaty signed by the heads of state of the member countries on October 18, 1983, in Libreville, Gabon.

Purpose: Initially, to end customs duties and other restrictions on trade between the member countries and establish a common market; more recently, to also promote regional integration, security, and stability.

Headquarters: Libreville, Gabon.

Principal Organs: Conference of the Heads of State and Government, Council of Ministers, Secretariat.

Secretary General: Louis-Sylvain Goma (Republic of the Congo).

Membership (11): Angola, Burundi, Cameroon, Central African Republic, Chad, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Republic of the Congo, Equatorial Guinea, Gabon, Rwanda, Sao Tome and Principe.

Official Languages: French, Portuguese.

Origin and development. In 1977 President Mobutu Sese Seko of Zaire proposed a merger of the three-member Economic Community of the Great Lakes Countries (CEPGL, below) with the four-member Central African Customs and Economic Union (Union Douanière et Economique de l'Afrique Centrale—UDEAC) to form a francophone Central African grouping. The proposal resurfaced in 1981, yielding the UDEAC Libreville Declaration in December, which called for the establishment of a group comprising the members of the CEPGL and the UDEAC plus Angola, Chad, Equatorial Guinea, and Sao Tome and Principe. The resulting ten-member CEEAC (plus Angola as an observer) was formally inaugurated December 21, 1985, in Libreville, Gabon, in accordance with a treaty concluded October 18, 1983, in Libreville. Angola became a full member in 1999.

Structure. The principal government body of the CEEAC is the Conference of Heads of States and Government, which meets annually. There is also a Council of Ministers, a Court of Justice, a Consultative Commission, and a Secretariat.

Activities. At the formal launching of the CEEAC, Secretary General Lunda Bululu declared that the aim of the organization was to “promote and reinforce cooperation and a sustained and balanced development in all areas of both economic and social activity between member states.” The 1986 summit charged the secretary general with the drafting of a program of action aimed at increasing intracommunity trade, and also requested that he prepare a study on community transport and communications infrastructure. In July the central bank governors of the member states met in Libreville to consider the establishment of a clearinghouse for the diverse national currencies in use in the area.

At the 1988 summit, support was again voiced for customs, financial, transportation, and communications integration within the community, although there appeared to be little hope for implementation of such plans in the near future given mounting arrears in members' budget contributions—a problem that has perpetually plagued the CEEAC. The 1989 summit underscored the lack of CEEAC consensus on how to reduce trade barriers, the summit leaders deciding to extend debate on the question until at least 1991. However, a “greater sense of urgency” was reported at the 1990 summit, partly in response to challenges posed by the European Community's impending single market and the attention being given to developments in Eastern Europe, possibly to the detriment of African interests. The CEEAC leaders authorized the free circulation within the region of several categories of individuals, such as students and researchers, starting in 1991; agreed to establish a CEEAC bank in Kigali to finance intraregional trade; called for additional airline cooperation among members; and gave priority to road and bridge projects that would facilitate trade within the community. However, the group still appeared “timid” in the opinion of some observers.

Addressing their critics at the 1991 summit, CEEAC leaders expressed the opinion that small regional groupings such as their own should work toward the creation of an economic community covering all of Africa to achieve international negotiating leverage. Underscoring the difficulties facing the smaller organizations, the CEEAC summit on May 17–18, 1992, in Bujumbura, Burundi, achieved little discernible progress because most member states were preoccupied throughout the year by wide-ranging political changes precipitated by the rapid spread of prodemocracy movements in the region.

The community remained in financial crisis in early 1993, and in March staff members went on strike to protest salary arrears. The CEEAC staff went on strike again in May 1994, reportedly criticizing Secretary General Kasasa Mutati Chinyata for not addressing employee concerns. Subsequently, CEEAC activity was severely constrained by ongoing political turmoil within several key member states. Nonetheless, in response to the region's rapidly changing political and governmental landscape, the CEEAC members, under the auspices of the United Nations, drafted a proposed mutual nonaggression pact: defense ministers and/or military leaders from five members (Central African Republic, Congo, Equatorial Guinea, Gabon, and Sao Tome and Principe) initialed the accord in October 1994. Discussion also took place on the creation of a regional conflict prevention body and the designation of special “peacekeeping” forces within members' armed forces. The organization nevertheless remained hamstrung by continuing financial difficulties as well as by regional and intrastate political disturbances.

Meeting in extraordinary session in February 1998 in Libreville, the community heads of state agreed on the necessity of reinvigorating the organization. Accordingly, the summit requested assistance from the UN Economic Commission for Africa in evaluating the CEEAC budget and financial structure, operations, and salaries. The following July, Louis-Sylvain Goma, a former prime minister of the Republic of the Congo, was appointed CEEAC secretary general.

The inauguration of recently reelected Gabonese President Bongo in January 1999 provided an opportunity for “mini-summit” consultations that for the first time included Angola as a full CEEAC member. A month later the member states, convening in Yaoundé, Cameroon, as the UN Standing Advisory Committee on Security Questions in Central Africa, reached agreement on establishing a Council for Peace and Security in Central Africa (COPAX), which was envisaged as a political forum for consultation in the event of threats to peace and security in the region. Also included under COPAX would be a nonstanding multinational force for peacekeeping, security, and humanitarian relief efforts.

In late June 1999 in Malabo, Equatorial Guinea, the CEEAC and the Central African Economic and Monetary Community (Communauté Economique et Monétaire de l'Afrique Centrale—CEMAC, successor to the UDEAC) met in parallel sessions to discuss regional security and economic concerns. At the summit the CEEAC leaders stated their intention to make the organization “a model of regional and subregional integration” as well as a “lynch-pin within the African economic community.” They also agreed to form a CEEAC Parliament, a center for human rights, and a peace and security council. A third extraordinary CEEAC summit in February 2000 in Malabo ratified the COPAX agreement and a mutual assistance pact. A month earlier, eight CEEAC member states (excepting Angola, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and Rwanda) joined eight Western countries (Belgium, France, Italy, Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, United States, United Kingdom) in military exercises designed to improve regional peacekeeping and crisis intervention capabilities. Both the UN and the Organization of African Unity (OAU, subsequently the African Union—AU) had endorsed the training activities.

Opening speakers at the tenth ordinary summit, held June 13–17, 2002, in Malabo, once again called attention to the organization’s precarious financial status. Although the CEEAC was designated as one of the five regional “pillars” of the AU’s African Economic Community (along with ECOWAS, Comesa, the SADC, and the AMU), its financial difficulties and relative lack of integration have diminished its role. Specific measures adopted by the summit called for creation of an “autonomous financing mechanism,” liberalized freedom of movement for nationals of the member states, supported ongoing efforts with the UN Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) to establish a regional food security program, and directed the Secretariat to negotiate financial assistance from the African Development Bank. In addition, with regard to peace and security issues, the attendees approved declarations supporting peace efforts in Angola, Equatorial Guinea, and the Republic of the Congo and also adopted standing orders for three COPAX organs: the Defense and Security Committee, the Early Warning Mechanism of Central Africa, and the nonpermanent Multinational Force of Central Africa. A number of CEEAC states have yet to ratify the COPAX agreement.

In July 2003 the CEEAC condemned a coup in Sao Tome and Principe and then participated in a successful mediation effort led by the Community of Portuguese-Speaking Countries (CPLP). On August 19, 2003, the CEEAC heads of state and government met in Brazzaville and established an International Monitoring Committee for Sao Tome and Principe.

A UN report released in November 2003 attributed regional instability to widespread poverty and a “crisis of governance,” including a lack of transparency and insufficient respect for human rights. These difficulties were exacerbated by such factors as conflicts over the region’s abundant natural resources, smuggling and drug trafficking, and the movement of mercenaries and militias across borders. The report called on the Security Council to assist in the economic stabilization of CEEAC countries that are “emerging from conflict” and those that are undertaking democratic reforms.

Despite the troubled political climate in the region, CEEAC leaders have called for the establishment of a free trade area by 2007 and a customs union by 2008. Some beginnings of this union may have been seen in August 2004, when Cameroon, the Central African Republic, and the Republic of the Congo abolished visas for certain categories of skilled workers and academics.

CEEAC has also made some effort to address the region’s instability. The military chiefs of the CEEAC countries declared, at their annual meeting held April 24–26, 2006, in Brazzaville, that they would work together to promote regional peace. In April 2006 the secretary general declared that CEEAC was ready to send observers to the Democratic Republic of the Congo to help ensure a fair outcome in the June 2006 elections in that country.

ECONOMIC COMMUNITY OF THE GREAT LAKES COUNTRIES (CEPGL)

Communauté Economique des Pays des Grands Lacs

---

Established: By convention signed by the heads of state of the member countries on September 26, 1976, in Gisenyi, Rwanda.

Purpose: To promote regional economic integration; to increase security and welfare for the region; to facilitate political, cultural, technical, and scientific cooperation among the members; and to contribute to the strengthening of national sovereignty and African unity.

Headquarters: Gisenyi, Rwanda.

Principal Organs: Conference of Heads of States, Council of Ministers and State Commissioners, Consultative Commission, Specialized Technical Commissions, Permanent Executive Secretariat.

Membership (3): Burundi, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Rwanda.

Official Language: French.

Origin and development. The first proposal for the creation of an organization concerned with the social, cultural, economic, and political problems of the Central African subregion emerged from discussions held during a 1966 summit of the heads of state of Burundi, Rwanda, and the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC). On August 29, at the conclusion of their four-day meeting in Kinshasa, the three leaders signed a mutual security pact, while Burundi and the DRC signed trade and cultural agreements that contained provisions for closer policy coordination and cooperation. The Kinshasa agreement was reaffirmed during a tripartite summit in 1974 and was strengthened with the addition of clauses on refugees, undesirable aliens, and joint promotion of tourism, communication, and social security measures. In May 1975 the three states' foreign ministers met to discuss a drafted general convention on economic, technical, scientific, and cultural cooperation, the final version of which, establishing the Economic Community of the Great Lakes Countries, was signed by the heads of state of Burundi, Rwanda, and Zaire on September 20, 1976. In 1980 the Development Bank of the Great Lakes States (Banque de Développement des Etats des Grands Lacs—BDEGL) was inaugurated in Goma, Zaire, to finance community projects. The subsequent Economic Community of Central African States (Communauté Economique des Etats de l'Afrique Centrale—CEEAC, above) was formally launched in October 1983 by a treaty signed in Libreville, Gabon, to which all three CEPGL states were signatories. Although left open to "any country in the region which wished to join it in order to contribute to the strengthening of African unity," CEPGL's own membership has remained at three.

Structure. The legal authority of CEPGL is vested in the Conference of the Heads of State, which normally meets once a year to approve the community's budget and action program. Preparation for annual summits and the implementation of CEPGL resolutions are responsibilities of the Council of Ministers and State Commissioners. Technical and administrative assistance for both groups is provided by the Permanent Executive Secretariat. The organization's five Specialized Technical Commissions address political and juridical affairs; society and culture; planning, agriculture, industry, and natural resources; commerce, finance, immigration, and tourism; and public works, energy, and transport.

Activities. Although emerging from a mutual security pact during South Africa's apartheid era, CEPGL in its first two decades focused much of its activities on economic issues. To promote economic development and integration, the community proposed a number of projects, including development of the Ruzizi River Valley for hydroelectric power, methane gas extraction from Lake Kivu, coordination of members' transportation and communications networks, and joint cement, bottling, and agricultural materials production. The CEPGL also acted to harmonize regulation in car insurance and investment, to increase freedom of movement of goods and people, and to coordinate health, agricultural, and other basic research.

The 14th summit was delayed twice because of the civil war in Rwanda before finally being held in the nation's northeastern city of Gisenyi on August 2, 1992. The CEPGL heads of state agreed to seek resolution of border security problems through "regular official contacts." However, a resumption of full CEPGL activity was subsequently precluded by extremely unsettled conditions in the region, including the political stalemate in Zaire, the deaths of the presidents of Burundi and Rwanda in April 1994, and subsequent Hutu-Tutsi conflict in those two countries.

Following the installation of a government led by the Tutsi-dominated Rwandan Patriotic Front in Rwanda in 1994, the defense ministers of the CEPGL countries met June 10, 1995, in Bujumbura, Burundi, to "reactivate" the community's security arrangements. It was concluded that joint forces would patrol the community's common borders, under the direction of a tripartite CEPGL sub-commission. Specifically, the patrols were mandated to combat "armed, destabilizing elements" near the borders, a reference to antigovernment activity emanating from among the estimated 2 million (mainly Rwandan) Hutu refugees in Zaire. However, CEPGL intentions were subsequently overwhelmed by the massive dislocations and fighting that developed in the region in 1996 as Hutu-Tutsi conflict crossed the borders of the three member states and precipitated extreme turmoil, including the rebel victory in Zaire in 1997 and its return to the name of the Democratic Republic of the Congo (see articles on Burundi, Democratic Republic of the Congo, and Rwanda). Through 2004 continuing conflict and a lack of cordial bilateral relations among the members kept the CEPGL in limbo. A meeting in April 2005 in Lubumbashi, Democratic Republic of the Congo, with the EU commissioner of development and humanitarian aid, Louis Michel, was said at the time to mark a new beginning for unity in the Great Lakes region. The sum of 50 million euros was promised for this purpose.

ECONOMIC COMMUNITY OF WEST AFRICAN STATES (ECOWAS/CEDEAO)

Communauté Economique des Etats de l'Afrique de l'Ouest Comunidade Economica dos Estados da Africa do Oeste

---

Established: By Treaty of Lagos (Nigeria), signed May 28, 1975; amended by Treaty of Cotonou (Benin), signed July 24, 1993; entry into force of the latter announced July 30, 1995.

Purpose: "To promote cooperation and integration leading to the establishment of an economic union in West Africa in order to raise the living standards of its peoples, and to maintain and enhance economic stability, foster relations among member states and contribute to the progress and development of the African Continent."

Headquarters: Abuja, Nigeria.

Principal Organs: Authority of Heads of State and Government; Council of Ministers; Community Parliament; Economic and Social Council; Specialized Technical Commissions; Community Court of Justice; ECOWAS Bank for Investment and Development; Executive Secretariat.

Executive Secretary: Mohamed Ibn Chambas (Ghana).

Membership (15): Benin, Burkina Faso, Cape Verde, Côte d'Ivoire, Gambia, Ghana, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Liberia, Mali, Niger, Nigeria, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Togo.

Official Languages: English, French, Portuguese, and "all West African languages so designated by the Authority."

Origin and development. The Economic Community of West African States received its greatest impetus from discussions in October 1974 between Gen. Yakubu Gowon of Nigeria and President Gnassingbé Eyadéma of Togo. The two leaders advanced plans for a more comprehensive economic grouping than the purely franco-phone West African Economic Community (Communauté Economique de l'Afrique de l'Ouest—CEAO; see the article on the UEMOA), which had been recently launched by Côte d'Ivoire, Dahomey (later Benin), Mali, Mauritania, Niger, Senegal, and Upper Volta (later Burkina Faso). The treaty establishing ECOWAS was signed by representatives of 15 West African states on May 28, 1975, in Lagos, Nigeria, and by the end of June had been formally ratified by enough signatories (seven) to become operative. However, it took until November 1976 for an agreement to be worked out on protocols to the treaty. The delay resulted in part from Senegal's effort to make its ratification dependent upon a broadening of the Community to include Zaire and several other francophone states of Central Africa. Ultimately, it was decided that any such expansion would be unrealistic. Portuguese-speaking Cape Verde joined in 1977.

At their 1981 summit ECOWAS leaders agreed in principle to a mutual defense pact under which military units would carry out joint maneuvers and would be mobilized to defend a member under external attack or to act as a peacekeeping force in the event of intra-Community conflict.

In 1991 a special committee was established to propose revisions to the ECOWAS treaty. After extensive negotiation the committee's proposals were adopted in the Treaty of Cotonou, approved at the July 1993 ECOWAS summit. The treaty was designed to make summit decisions binding on all members and also expanded ECOWAS's political mandate. Members agreed, for example, to the peaceful settlement of interstate disputes, the protection of human rights, and the promotion of democratic systems of governance. In addition, a number of new bodies, such as a Community Parliament and an Economic and Social Council, were authorized.

At the conclusion of a summit on July 28–29, 1995, ECOWAS announced that sufficient ratifications had been received for the treaty to enter into effect, although the Parliament and a Community Court of Justice were not inaugurated until 2000 and 2001, respectively. Meanwhile, Mauritania, apparently objecting to moves toward greater military and monetary integration, had announced in December 1999 its intention to withdraw from the organization, effective December 2000.

Structure. The basic structure of ECOWAS consists of an Authority of Heads of State and Government; a Council of Ministers with two representatives from each member; an Executive Secretariat headed by a secretary who is appointed for a four-year period; a Community Court of Justice to settle disputes arising under the treaty; an Economic and Social Council; and eight Specialized Technical Commissions: Administration and Finance; Food and Agriculture; Environment and Natural Resources; Human Resources, Information, and Social and Cultural Affairs; Industry, Science and Technology, and Energy; Political, Judicial, and Legal Affairs and Regional Security and Integration; Trade, Customs, Taxation, Statistics, Money, and Payments; and Transport, Communications, and Tourism. The ECOWAS Community Parliament of 120 national representatives began its inaugural session in November 2000 in Abuja. The Community Court of Justice was inaugurated in January 2001. A Council of Elders has also been formed recently.

The Treaty of Lagos authorized creation of a Fund for Cooperation, Compensation, and Development (FCCD), supported by members' contributions, the revenues of Community enterprises, and grants from non-ECOWAS countries. In addition to financing mutually approved projects, the fund, headquartered in Lomé, Togo, was established to compensate members who suffered losses due to the establishment of Community enterprises or to the liberalization of trade. Upon ratification of treaty changes approved by the Authority in December 2001, the FCCD was reconfigured as the ECOWAS Bank for Investment and Development (EBID), which has the broader mission of financing private investment in infrastructure as well as such public sector activities as poverty reduction.

Activities. Although the May 1990 summit marked the 15th anniversary of the signing of the ECOWAS treaty, the mood was described as "far from celebratory" in light of the domestic problems facing several key members, ongoing disputes between others, and a persistent fiscal shortfall. Despite the absence of half of the heads of state and past ECOWAS difficulty in translating plans into action, several major resolutions were approved. They included the creation of a Standing Mediation Committee to intervene in regional disputes, the approval of a common residency card for the Community, and support for reliance on ECOWAS as the "single economic community in West Africa," an oblique reference to "competing" organizations, such as the CEAO, the Mano River Union, and the Council of the Entente.

Purely economic concerns were pushed into the background by ECOWAS's controversial involvement in the civil war that broke out in Liberia in August 1990. An ECOWAS Monitoring Group (Ecomog) was formed and sent to Liberia to facilitate a cease-fire, organize an interim government, and oversee the holding of new national elections. However, only Gambia, Ghana, Guinea, Nigeria, and Sierra Leone supplied soldiers for the group, and a proposed special ECOWAS summit was canceled because of differences among the members. A tenuous cease-fire was finally negotiated at an extraordinary summit in late November, but the political situation in Liberia remained chaotic.

During the second half of 1991 ECOWAS endorsed the peacemaking efforts of a committee involving the heads of state of Burkina Faso, Côte d'Ivoire, Gambia, Nigeria, and Togo, which in late October yielded the so-called Yamassoukro IV peace accord. The agreement, signed by interim Liberian President Amos Sawyer and Charles Taylor, head of the National Patriotic Forces of Liberia (NPFL), directed Ecomog troops to supervise the disarmament and encampment of rebel forces throughout Liberia, establish a "buffer zone" along the Liberia-Sierra Leone border, and facilitate the holding of elections. However, the NPFL subsequently refused to permit implementation of the agreement. Consequently, the ECOWAS summit on July 27–29, 1992, in Dakar, Senegal, displaying rare unanimity, agreed to impose economic sanctions against NPFL-held Liberian territory if Taylor's forces continued to undermine Ecomog efforts.

To the surprise of some observers, Ecomog began to gain the upper hand in early 1993. Subsequently, in what was seen as a remarkably successful response to the ECOWAS intervention, a peace accord (negotiated with UN assistance) was signed by Liberia's warring factions in July. The appearance of success produced an atmosphere of enthusiasm during the ECOWAS summit in Cotonou, Benin, on July 22–24, West Africa voicing the opinion that the Community had become "planted much more firmly on the international map as a serious and credible organization." Hoping to capitalize on the newfound cohesion, the summit signed the Treaty of Cotonou, a revision of the original Lagos Treaty. The new accord was designed to speed up implementation of a regional common market, which would include, progressively, a monetary union, an internal free trade zone (providing for the free movement of people, goods, services, and capital), and a common external tariff and trade policy. The signatories also committed themselves to "solidarity and collective self-reliance" and pledged to refrain from any aggressive action against another ECOWAS member. In general, ECOWAS was seen as trying to secure its position as the West African "pillar" of the African Economic Community fashioned by the Organization of African States (OAU, subsequently the African Union—AU).

Despite continued concern over the failure of some members to make their allotted financial contributions to the Community, at the August 1994 summit the heads of state and government once again affirmed their confidence in the organization's future. The 18th ECOWAS summit, held July 28–29, 1995, in Accra, Ghana, was described as a "lackluster" event, with only six heads of state among the attendees. Contributing to the Community's malaise were ongoing difficulties in implementing the Liberian peace accord and the sustained political crisis in Nigeria. Despite reports that members' arrears had climbed to over $100 million, the summit leaders reaffirmed their commitment to regional economic cooperation and authorized the use of a "West African traveler's check" as a possible precursor to a common currency. (The check was officially introduced in 1998.)

Throughout 1996 the ECOWAS agenda remained dominated by the problems associated with the Liberian peace process. However, the situation brightened in August with the signing of the Abuja Accord, which directed Ecomog to disarm and demobilize the warring factions by January 31, 1997.

In a change from past summits, an "optimistic" attitude was reported at the meetings held in Abuja, Nigeria, on July 27–28, 1996, only four heads of state failing to attend. Nevertheless, it was clear that problems, such as high arrears, were continuing to impede ECOWAS operations. In order to provide operating funds it was agreed that a small levy on imports from nonmembers would be imposed. (Introduced in July 2003, the Community levy amounted to 0.5 percent of customs duties.)

The major topics of discussion at the summit of August 28–29, 1997, in Abuja were the July election of Charles Taylor as president of Liberia and the May coup in Sierra Leone. In recognition of the apparent resolution of the long-standing Liberian conflict, ECOWAS lifted its sanctions. However, Ecomog troops were directed to remain in the country to help “in the restructuring of Liberia’s national army and police force.” Meanwhile, ECOWAS responded to the overthrow of the Kabbah government in Sierra Leone by recommending a boycott and blockade of the country and the deployment of Ecomog contingents to enforce them. (See article on Sierra Leone for subsequent developments.)

At the October 1998 ECOWAS summit most of the discussions were devoted to promoting peace and stability in the region. Toward this end, the summit participants agreed to ban the trade in and manufacture of small arms throughout ECOWAS and called on other parts of Africa to do the same. The summit also approved a peace accord that ECOWAS representatives had helped to negotiate in Guinea-Bissau (see Guinea-Bissau article for more information) and that committed the Community to providing peacekeeping forces in that country as of early 1999. In what was perhaps the boldest move at the summit, ECOWAS also endorsed a conflict resolution mechanism authorizing ECOWAS to intervene in the internal affairs of its member states if the security of the region were threatened.

The December 9–10, 1999, summit in Lomé, Togo, was highlighted by approval of a draft protocol for the Permanent Mechanism for the Prevention, Management, and Settlement of Conflicts and the Maintenance of Peace in the Region. The Authority also approved creation of a Mediation and Security Council; endorsed conversion of Ecomog into a permanent standby force capable of enforcement, peacekeeping, and humanitarian missions; and voiced continuing support for the Community-wide moratorium on the manufacture, export, and import of light\break weapons.

Although ECOWAS failed to achieve a common external tariff by its target of January 2000, in April the anglophone Gambia, Ghana, Guinea, Liberia, Nigeria, and Sierra Leone, plus Portuguese-speaking Cape Verde, reached agreement on establishing by 2003 a new West African monetary union in parallel to the francophone West African Economic and Monetary Union (Union Economique et Monétaire Ouest-Africaine—UEMOA). In February 2000, apparently setting aside what the ECOWAS chair and president of Mali, Alpha Oumar Konare, termed the anglophone/francophone “distractions” that had long impeded economic integration, ECOWAS and the UEMOA had agreed to a joint action plan that envisaged, in part, a merger of the UEMOA and the proposed second monetary union into a single zone by 2004. On November 17, 2000, the ECOWAS Convergence Council, consisting of the member states’ finance ministers and central bank governors, approved establishment of a transitional West African Monetary Institute (WAMI) in Accra, Ghana, in preparation for the inauguration of a West African Central Bank (WACB). The initial time frame for these developments ultimately proved to be too optimistic, however, because of “macroeconomic and political instability,” and thus the introduction of the second monetary zone was later delayed until 2005, with the date for the merger of the two zones to be decided by the Authority in 2005.

Throughout 2000, developments in Guinea, Liberia, and Sierra Leone continued to generate international concern. The December 2000 summit authorized positioning Ecomog monitors along the three countries’ borders, as had been previously proposed in 1999, shortly before Ecomog’s Liberian mission had effectively ended. Nevertheless, neither Guinea nor Liberia signed a requisite Status of Forces Agreement. The 25th annual ECOWAS summit, which convened in Dakar, Senegal, on December 20–21, called attention to positive developments in the troubled Mano River region but also approved sanctions against recalcitrant rebel groups in Liberia and asked the Liberian government to undertake a “national reconciliation policy.” In addition, the summit took a major step toward creation of the second regional monetary zone, encompassing Gambia, Ghana, Guinea, Nigeria, and Sierra Leone. (The general view was that conditions in Liberia and Cape Verde would prevent their immediate participation.) Among other actions, the summit adopted a special regional food security program, voiced support for the recently established Intergovernmental Action Group against Money Laundering (GIABA) in Dakar, and approved protocols on fighting corruption and human trafficking and on promoting democracy and good governance.

The 26th session of the Authority of Heads of State and Government, held in Dakar on January 26–31, 2003, focused its attention on economic and security issues. Having been designated as the West African coordinator and monitor for the AU-sponsored New Partnership for Africa’s Development (Nepad), ECOWAS reaffirmed its support for the initiative. The summit participants also praised steps taken with the UEMOA toward harmonizing trade liberalization measures, the eventual goal being a regional common market. In addition, progress was noted in the areas of Community water resource management; energy coordination and development, particularly with regard to a planned West Africa Gas Pipeline project involving Benin, Ghana, Nigeria, and Togo; preparations for negotiating an Economic Partnership Agreement (EPA) with the EU; and funding of the EBID. (Member states may use the new Community levy to pay their shares of called up capital.) However, economic and political difficulties had pushed back until 2005 the introduction of the second regional monetary zone and a single currency.

With regard to security, the session heard extensive reports on developments in Côte d’Ivoire and Liberia. In addition to expressing its support for the French-sponsored Marcoussis Accord earlier in the month, ECOWAS remained committed to deployment of a peacekeeping ECOWAS Mission in Côte d’Ivoire (ECOMICI), formation of which had been approved in December 2002. A September 2002 emergency meeting on the crisis in Côte d’Ivoire had established a contact group of Ghana, Guinea-Bissau, Mali, Niger, Nigeria, and Togo. Shortly after the summit, on February 4, 2003, the UN Security Council authorized deployment of the ECOMICI, which numbered over 1,800 troops by the end of the year. With respect to the troubled Mano River area, the January summit called upon the international community to provide additional development assistance to Sierra Leone, where peace had taken hold, but it expressed regret over renewed hostilities in Liberia between the government and rebel forces.

Issues of peace and security continued to dominate the region throughout 2003. Events in Côte d’Ivoire, Liberia, and also Guinea-Bissau prompted a number of emergency summits and other meetings. In early July, following the failure of yet another negotiated cease-fire in Liberia, ECOWAS agreed to dispatch several thousand troops to Monrovia, and the resultant ECOWAS Mission in Liberia (ECOMIL) was deployed in August.

The ECOWAS summit on December 19, 2003, in Accra saw Executive Secretary Mohamed Ibn Chambas and other speakers lament that the repeated political and military crises in the region had diverted ECOWAS from its goal of furthering economic integration and regional development. Chambas also asserted that a lack of political will in some member countries had delayed integration. Nevertheless, those attending the brief summit reiterated a commitment to establishing a West African free trade area by the end of 2005 and introducing a customs union by 2008.

The ECOWAS summit on January 19, 2005, in Accra was marked by dissension over Côte d’Ivoire, whose president, Laurent Gbagbo, was forced to hear declarations that he and his country’s various faction leaders must “search their hearts.” ECOWAS peacekeeping efforts in Côte d’Ivoire had been previously handed over to the African Union—an event that some summit participants described as a failure on their organization’s part. The summit postponed plans to introduce a common currency by July 1, 2005.

In March 2005 ECOWAS launched the Regional Market Systems and Traders' Organizations in West Africa in an effort to improve regional cooperation in trade, with a particular focus on agriculture. The program was seen as the first step toward development of an ECOWAS common agricultural policy. Progress was also subsequently reported in regard to the proposed common external tariff for ECOWAS, a key component of the planned free trade area. Meanwhile, on the political front, ECOWAS was active in early 2005 in helping to resolve the turmoil in Togo; the Community also subsequently assisted in Liberia and Côte d'Ivoire.

At the April 12, 2006, summit, held in Niamey, Niger, the ECOWAS Heads of State approved organizational changes, making its Secretariat into a Commission to increase efficiency and productivity. They approved various efforts to improve the members' economy and infrastructure, including moves toward a common airline and a common standard for mobile telephones. On April 12, 2006, the group's trade ministers met in Abuja to evaluate progress toward the second phase of negotiations with the EU on an Economic Partnership Agreement. This prospective agreement would lead to creation of a free trade area between the two regions.

INDIAN OCEAN COMMISSION (IOC)

Commission de l'Océan Indien

---

Established: Formation by Madagascar, Mauritius, and Seychelles announced July 17, 1982; General Agreement of Cooperation signed January 10, 1984, in Victoria, Seychelles.

Purpose: To organize and promote regional cooperation in all sectors, with particular emphasis on economic development, to affirm an Indian Ocean identity, and to represent the Indian Ocean islands regionally and internationally.

Headquarters: Quatre Bornes, Mauritius.

Principal Organs: Council of Ministers, Committee of Permanent Liaison Officers, Secretariat.

Secretary General: Monique Andreas Esoquelomandroso.

Membership (5): Comoro Islands, France (representing the French Overseas Department of Réunion), Madagascar, Mauritius, Seychelles.

Origin and development. On July 17, 1982, Aneerood Jugnauth, the newly elected prime minister of Mauritius, announced at the conclusion of a state visit by President France Albert René of the Seychelles that an Indian Ocean Commission (IOC) had been formed by their two countries and Madagascar to examine possible regional cooperation. In December the three members' foreign affairs ministers agreed on an IOC constitution, which was submitted to their national parliaments for approval prior to signing a general agreement of regional cooperation in January 1984 in Victoria, Seychelles.

In January 1985 an IOC ministerial session approved the membership request of the Comoro Islands and endorsed France's proposed accession to represent the island of Réunion. The Comoros and France were formally installed as members at the January 1986 ministerial session. At its 1989 session the IOC elected its first secretary general and settled on Mauritius as the site of its permanent headquarters.

Structure. The Council of Ministers is the highest IOC authority, meeting once per year; its presidency rotates among the membership annually. A Committee of Permanent Liaison Officers convenes three times per year to prepare proposals for council sessions, to carry out council decisions, and to promote cooperation between the council and national administrations. The Secretariat, headed by a secretary general, is responsible for the conduct of the organization's daily activities; the secretary general serves a four-year, nonrenewable term. Technical committees, made up of experts from each of the member countries, identify sectoral projects suited to regional cooperation. After approval of a particular project, the responsible committee assumes a managerial role.

At the second IOC Summit of Heads of State or Government, held in December 1999 in St.-Denis, Réunion, the participants decided that henceforth informal summits would convene every four years.

Activities. IOC activities have greatly depended on external assistance, particularly from the European Community/European Union (EC/EU). Areas addressed by IOC projects and programs have included tuna fishing research and development, exploration of new and renewable energy sources, tourism promotion, environmental conservation, oil spill contingency planning, coral reef monitoring, intraregional trade, investment regulations and capital transfers, regional meteorological cooperation, and technical cooperation.

Partly to try pushing integration beyond the “good intentions” state, the first IOC heads of state or government summit was held March 16, 1991, in Antananarivo, Madagascar. In June 1992 the IOC ministers endorsed a new integration plan and in October agreed to a review of the IOC organizational structure. Subsequently, a degree of discord was reported among IOC members who were apparently excluded from a recent initiative spearheaded by Mauritius to form a larger and more formidable Indian Ocean Rim Association. Officials from Australia, India, Kenya, Oman, Singapore, and South Africa attended preliminary meetings in Mauritius in early 1995 on the proposed organization, with discussions focusing on economic cooperation.

As a consequence, the IOC was shunted to the sidelines. France expressed deep concern for the lack of direction and progress of the IOC in the face of direct competition for resources and attention from the new “Anglo-Saxon” Indian Ocean Rim Association, which was officially inaugurated in March 1997 (see the article on the IOR-ARC). One criticism leveled against the IOC by the French was that the organization collected no dues from its members and instead merely served as a channel for foreign development aid. Furthermore, Paris argued that “most IOC projects must be filed away as disappointing failures” because “results are unpredictable, coordination insufficient, and priorities little apparent.”

The second IOC Summit of Heads of State and Government met December 3, 1999, in Réunion, although the government of the Comoro Islands, installed after an April coup, was not represented. (None of the other IOC members recognized its legitimacy.) The session was organized around four broad topics: economic and development issues, including regional cooperation and integration; political matters, including the IOC’s relationship with other regional organizations; peacekeeping and security, including civil defense, drug trafficking, and money laundering; and culture, including matters of education and information technology. Earlier in the year, the island of Zanzibar (a component of the United Republic of Tanzania) requested independent membership, without success.

Over the next several years IOC activities were restrained by domestic political difficulties. In February 2002 the Organization of African Unity (OAU) and the IOC dispatched a joint mediation mission to Madagascar to help resolve a postelection crisis. On October 30–31, 2003, an extraordinary meeting of foreign ministers in Moroni, Comoro Islands, discussed preparations for a quadrennial summit, which was scheduled to be held in Moroni, but continuing political instability in the Comoros ultimately resulted in a decision to delay the gathering until 2004. (In late December 2003 the Comoran factions reached an accord, and a follow-up committee with IOC representation was organized under the auspices of the African Union.) The October meeting also focused on the fight against international terrorism and appointed a Committee of Sages to propose organizational reforms and to help define a future direction for the IOC.

In late 2003 the IOC’s controversial secretary general, Wilfrid Bertile of Réunion, indicated his intention to resign to seek reelection to the Réunion legislature, the Regional Council. He came under criticism from some quarters for not having resigned his legislative seat after taking over as IOC secretary general in 2001.

The July 22, 2005, summit, held in Antananarivo, was attended by all member heads of state, including Jacques Chirac, the French president, representing Réunion. France appeared to be taking an interest in energizing the group, which was doing better as relations improved between Mauritius and the Seychelles. These countries, together with Réunion, are the richest OC members. The meeting gave permission for Réunion to apply for membership in the Common Market for Eastern and Southern Africa (Comesa) (see separate article on Comesa). During 2005 the IOC also signed an agreement with the EU, which was to provide 30 million euros (US$50 million) to finance its programs.

INDIAN OCEAN RIM ASSOCIATION FOR REGIONAL COOPERATION (IOR-ARC)

---

Established: By charter signed at a meeting of 14 insular and littoral Indian Ocean countries March 6–7, 1997, in Port Louis, Mauritius.

Purpose: To “increase cooperation in trade, investment, infrastructure, tourism, science, technology, and human resource development.”

Headquarters: Vacoas, Mauritius.

Principal Organs: Council of Ministers, Committee of Senior Officials, Indian Ocean Rim Business Forum, Indian Ocean Rim Academic Group, Coordinating Secretariat.

Director of the Coordinating Secretariat: Devdasslall Dusoruth (Mauritius).

Membership (18): Australia, Bangladesh, India, Indonesia, Iran, Kenya, Madagascar, Malaysia, Mauritius, Mozambique, Oman, Singapore, South Africa, Sri Lanka, Tanzania, Thailand, United Arab Emirates, Yemen.

Observer (1): Indian Ocean Tourism Organization.

Official Language: English.

Origin and development. Responding to a proposal by the government of Mauritius, on March 29–31, 1995, representatives of Australia, India, Kenya, Oman, Singapore, and South Africa met in Mauritius to discuss economic cooperation, trade liberalization, and potential investment opportunities based on “principles of open regionalism and inclusivity.” To follow up, a working group of government officials, businessmen, and academics developed a charter for a tripartite regional organization. At a ministerial-level meeting March 6–7, 1997, in Port Louis, Mauritius, representatives of the 14 founding states—Indonesia, Madagascar, Malaysia, Mozambique, Sri Lanka, Tanzania, and Yemen in addition to the seven that met in 1995—signed the charter for the Indian Ocean Rim Association for Regional Cooperation (IOR-ARC).

At the second biennial meeting of the Council of Ministers, held in March 1999 in Maputo, Mozambique, the countries of Bangladesh, Iran, Seychelles, Thailand, and the United Arab Emirates were invited to join the IOR-ARC. They were welcomed into the organization at an extraordinary Council of Ministers session in Muscat, Oman, in January 2000, although Seychelles decided to withdraw in July 2003. “Dialog Partners” are China, Egypt, France, Japan, and the United Kingdom. Turkey also has requested dialog status.

Structure. The Council of Ministers, comprising the foreign ministers of the member states, is the highest authority of the IOR-ARC, setting policy, reviewing progress toward the organization’s goals, and creating new organizational bodies. It meets biennially in regular session, but ad hoc meetings also may be called. Convening as needed, a Committee of Senior Officials supervises implementation of council decisions, drafts work programs, and helps seek financing for projects. Working in cooperation with the senior officials are the Indian Ocean Rim Business Forum and the Indian Ocean Rim Academic Group. All organs reach decisions by consensus. The Coordinating Secretariat, headed by a director, is located in Vacoas, Mauritius.

Activities. Apart from providing a regional forum and conducting research in such areas as sectoral tariff levels, the IOR-ARC accomplished little in its first six years. During the March 1999 Council of Ministers session participants agreed to promote trade facilitation and liberalization as well as economic and technical cooperation. Accordingly, they set up a Working Group on Trade and Investment (WGTI), which met for the first time in conjunction with the extraordinary Council of Ministers session in Muscat in January 2000.

Meeting April 7–8, 2001, in Muscat, the Council of Ministers authorized formation of a High Level Task Force (HLTF) with a mandate that included proposing a future direction for the organization, devising a medium-term strategic plan, defining criteria for dialog partners, raising the IOR-ARC's international profile, and examining the functioning and funding of the secretariat. On October 7–13, 2003, the various IOR-ARC organs held meetings in Colombo, Sri Lanka. At the culminating session, the Council of Ministers adopted the HLTF report, which offered recommendations on work programs and provided guidelines for organizing the secretariat.

Long-range organizational goals include eventual elimination of internal tariffs, but some observers have noted that such broad measures will be difficult to achieve. Wide economic disparities persist among the member states, which also participate in other intergovernmental organizations that frequently have competing goals. In addition, there have been reports of major differences between the IOR-ARC members with the largest economies, namely India and Australia.

Recent commentary suggests that the organization has not lived up to its promise. Before July 2005, however, it agreed to allow projects to go ahead with the support of at least six members, rather than by full consensus, and this change in rules might help drive more action. The IOC-ARC has no website, and information about its activities must come from member governments, all of which voice support, and from general news reports.

Ministerial meetings were held August 26–27, 2004, in Colombo and February 21–22, 2006, in Tehran, Iran.

INTER-GOVERNMENTAL AUTHORITY ON DEVELOPMENT (IGAD)

Autorité Intergouvernementale pour le Développement

---

Established: As the Inter-Governmental Authority on Drought and Development (IGADD) by six-nation summit meeting of heads of state and government January 15–16, 1986, in Djibouti; present name adopted March 21, 1996.

Purpose: To coordinate efforts to combat drought and desertification, to develop regional policies on short- and medium-term economic development and, since March 1996, to assist in preventing and resolving conflicts in the region.

Headquarters: Djibouti, Djibouti.

Principal Organs: Assembly of Heads of State and Government, Council of Ministers, Committee of Ambassadors, Secretariat.

Executive Secretary: Attalla Hamad Bashir (Sudan).

Membership (7): Djibouti, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Kenya, Somalia, Sudan, Uganda.

Origin and development. In view of cyclical droughts, which brought widespread famine and death to the region, the leaders of Djibouti, Ethiopia, Kenya, Somalia, Sudan, and Uganda established IGADD during a January 15–16, 1986, conference in Djibouti. Eritrea was admitted in September 1993.

The name of the group was changed to the Inter-Governmental Authority on Development (IGAD) on March 21, 1996, in conjunction with an expansion of the organization's role to include regional conflict prevention and resolution, infrastructural development, and food security and environmental protection.

Structure. The policymaking IGAD body is the Assembly of Heads of State and Government, also called the IGAD annual summit; implementation of its decisions rests with a Council of Ministers, which meets at least twice per year, and a small Secretariat in Djibouti. The March 1996 restructuring increased the size of the Council of Ministers to 14 (2 from each member state) and directed that decisions would henceforth require the vote of two-thirds of the members. The executive secretary, who serves a four-year, once-renewable term, oversees three Secretariat divisions: economic cooperation, agriculture and the environment, and political/humanitarian affairs. Supporting the council and the Secretariat is a Committee of Ambassadors, which comprises the principal representatives of the member states to Djibouti.

Activities. The founders of the IGADD identified the new organization's first priority as the development of a regional "early warning system" to deal with the effects of drought. Other proposed projects emphasized agricultural research, human resources development, and creation of a regional plan for the storage of food and its distribution to needy areas in times of shortage. However, little effective action was achieved by 1990, in large part because of the civil wars in Ethiopia, Somalia, and Sudan and, to a lesser extent, continued sporadic rebel activity in Uganda. Consequently, by 1992 many Western donors had reportedly lost their “enthusiasm” for continued IGADD financing. In May the Council of Ministers announced its intention to restructure the IGADD Secretariat according to the wishes of donors. The council also endorsed France’s proposal that IGADD cooperate with the Arab Maghreb Union (AMU) and the Permanent Inter-State Committee on Drought Control in the Sahel (CILSS) in creating an umbrella organization to monitor drought and desertification throughout much of North, East, and West Africa.

Western support for the IGADD was subsequently reported to be regaining strength, particularly as a result of its growing role in the Sudanese peace negotiations. Consequently, the IGADD Council of Ministers in January 1995 decided to establish the “Friends of IGADD,” a forum for informal consultation with current and potential development partners such as Canada, Netherlands, Norway, the United States, and the United Kingdom. In addition, in April a special one-day summit in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, of six IGADD heads of state (the turmoil in Somalia still precluding that nation’s participation) appointed a ministerial committee to review proposals for “revitalizing and expanding” the organization. Restructuring of the IGADD was approved at a second extraordinary summit March 21, 1996, in Nairobi, Kenya, at which time the organization became the IGAD.

At the eighth IGAD summit, which met November 23, 2000, in Khartoum, Sudan, the closing declaration reflected a desire to move forward on many other concerns while continuing efforts to find resolutions for the conflicts in Somalia and Sudan. The declaration called for drafting a trade protocol; promoting infrastructural cooperation in transport, communications, and power; establishing a disaster preparedness mechanism; and devising national and regional food security programs. The summit also requested the Secretariat to prepare a draft protocol for a Conflict Early Warning and Response Mechanism (CEWARN). The completed protocol was then signed at the ninth summit January 10–11, 2002, in Khartoum. At the same time, the IGAD was actively participating in preparations for the African Union’s planned African Economic Community, serving as the “northern sector” representative within the Common Market for Eastern and Southern Africa—Comesa (see separate article).

The tenth ordinary summit, which met October 20–25, 2003, in Kampala, Uganda, came in the context of renewed hope for resolution of the Sudanese and Somalian conflicts. In the preceding 15 months, as a consequence of ongoing IGAD-sponsored peace talks, a number of agreements were reached between the Sudanese factions, including the July 2002 Machakos (Kenya) protocol, which included the right of self-determination for southern Sudan; an October 2002 memorandum of understanding on ending hostilities; a February 2003 power-sharing accord; and, most recently, a September 2003 agreement on an interim security arrangement. With regard to Somalia, the latest peace talks were initiated under IGAD auspices October 2002 in Eldoret, Kenya, and then transferred in February 2003 to the Kenyan capital, Nairobi. By October the discussions reached a critical juncture regarding a transitional federal charter, and an agreement was ultimately signed January 29, 2004. The agreement caused a Transitional Federal Government (TFG) for Somalia to be formed, temporarily based in Kenya until conditions in Somalia improved. As a consequence of these peace efforts, the IGAD has received wide international praise and has greatly increased its visibility.

Despite its necessary focus on Sudan and Somalia, in 2002–2003 the IGAD also addressed many other concerns. Recognizing the difficulty of financing development projects in the region, in 2002 the Assembly of Heads of State and Government directed the Secretariat to investigate establishing a Special Fund for that purpose. A Conference on the Prevention and Combating of Terrorism was held in June 2003 in Addis Ababa, while a first-ever Conference on Internal Displacement in the IGAD Subregion concluded in September.

Events in Somalia did not turn out as planned. The TFG moved to Somalia in 2005, but remained deeply split among the various warlords. IGAD offered peacekeeping troops to Somalia as early as January 2005, but by mid-2006 this deployment had not occurred. Elements of the TFG objected to receiving ethnic Somali peacekeepers from neighboring countries, and by June 2006 the whole picture changed when an Islamist militia drove warlord groups out of Mogadishu, the Somali capital.

IGAD's 11th summit, held March 20, 2006, in Nairobi expressed more satisfaction over the outcome of the agreements over Sudan, though it called for all possible international help in returning refugees from the conflict.

INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION OF THE FRANCOPHONIE (OIF)

Organisation Internationale de la Francophonie

---

Established: As La Francophonie under a Charter that was adopted on December 18, 1996, in Marrakesh, Morocco, by a Ministerial Conference of francophone states and then endorsed on November 15, 1997, by the Seventh Francophone Summit, held in Hanoi, Vietnam; present name adopted by the Ministerial Conference of the Francophonie on December 4–5, 1998 in Bucharest, Romania.

Purpose: To facilitate the exchange of cultural, educational, scientific, and technological information, particularly but not exclusively among countries with French in common usage; to promote cultural and linguistic diversity, including the teaching of French; to encourage democracy and respect for human rights; to advance the economic development of member states.

Headquarters: Paris, France.

Principal Organs: Conference of Heads of State and Government of Countries Using French as a Common Language (Francophone Summit), Ministerial Conference of the Francophonie, Permanent Council of the Francophonie, General Secretariat, Agency of the Francophonie (Intergovernmental Agency of the Francophonie), Parliamentary Assembly of the Francophonie.

Secretary General: Abdou Diouf (Senegal).

Membership (49): Belgium, French Community of Belgium, Benin, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Cambodia, Cameroon, Canada, Canada–New Brunswick, Canada–Quebec, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Comoro Islands, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Republic of the Congo, Côte d’Ivoire, Djibouti, Dominica, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, France, Gabon, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, Laos, Lebanon, Luxembourg, Madagascar, Mali, Mauritania, Mauritius, Moldova, Monaco, Morocco, Niger, Romania, Rwanda, St. Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Senegal, Seychelles, Switzerland, Togo, Tunisia, Vanuatu, Vietnam.

Associate Members (4): Albania, Andorra, Greece, Macedonia.

Observers (5): Czech Republic, Lithuania, Poland, Slovakia, Slovenia.

Official Language: French.

Origin and development. Efforts to bring together the French-speaking countries of the world date back to the 1960s, some 80 years after the term “francophonie” was first used to identify those peoples and states speaking or otherwise using French. International cooperation initially centered on educational policy and institutions, followed in 1967 by creation of the International Association of French Language Parliamentarians (Association Internationale des Parlementaires de Langue Française—AIPLF). Near the end of the decade the francophone movement began to assume a somewhat more formal character as the First International Conference of Francophone Countries, meeting on February 17–20, 1969, in Niamey, Niger, proposed creation of a clearinghouse for members in the areas of culture, education, and technology. Spearheading the efforts were three African heads of state: Habib Bourguiba of Tunisia, Hamani Diori of Niger, and Léopold Sédar Senghor of Senegal. As a result, the Agency for Cultural and Technical Cooperation (Agence de Coopération Culturelle et Technique—ACCT) was established by a convention signed March 21, 1970, in Niamey, during the Second International Conference of Francophone Countries. The ACCT subsequently grew to encompass all major French-speaking states except Algeria, as well as a number of countries in which French culture was deemed important, although not dominant.

In the 1980s and 1990s the ACCT was involved in the proposed establishment of a full-fledged francophone “Commonwealth.” Although the idea was first suggested to ACCT members in 1980, disputes both within Canada and between Canada and France over the issue of Quebec separatism delayed the convening of a Francophone Summit to work on the proposal until February 17–19, 1986. The summit, held outside Paris, was attended by delegations from 42 countries and regions and adopted a 13-point program of action that called, inter alia, for the formation of a francophone television network, the provision of linguistic data to the francophone world by means of videotext, and the strengthening of cooperation among francophone delegations at the United Nations. Responsibility for a number of the summit’s proposals was given to the ACCT, whose ministerial-level General Conference met in an extraordinary session in December to consider structural and financial reforms that would permit it to assume greater francophone authority. Concurrently, Canada, already the ACCT’s leading financial contributor, announced it was doubling its level of support.

A second summit, attended by 43 delegations from 37 countries (including all ACCT members except Cameroon and Vanuatu), was held September 2–4, 1987, in Quebec, Canada. African economic issues, particularly the external debt crisis and falling world commodity prices, dominated the meeting, during which Canada announced that it was forgiving about $330 million in debts owed by seven African countries. Discussion also continued on the future role of the ACCT in whatever francophone structure might emerge from the summits.

The Third Francophone Summit, held in May 1989 in Dakar, Senegal, maintained the emphasis on Third World debt and development problems. French President Mitterrand garnered the biggest headlines by announcing he intended to ask the French Parliament to forgive 40 percent (an estimated $2.3 billion) of the debt owed to France by the world’s 35 poorest countries. The Fourth Francophone Summit was held November 19–21, 1991, in Chaillot, France, the venue having been changed from Zaire because of objections to Zairean President Mobutu’s apparent antipathy toward political reform.

Continued friction between Canada and France over the role of the ACCT was subsequently reported, Paris apparently charging the agency with promoting Canadian interests at the expense of broader francophone concerns. However, an understanding on the matter was reportedly reached at the Fifth Francophone Summit, held October 16–18, 1993, in Port Louis, Mauritius. France acquiesced to a second term for ACCT Secretary General Jean-Louis Roy, a Canadian, apparently in return for the summit’s agreement to expand the authority of the Permanent Francophone Council (Conseil Permanent de la Francophonie—CPF), which had been established by the 1991 summit. The council was authorized to make “political decisions” on behalf of the francophone countries as well as to coordinate the institutional activities of the francophone community, including the ACCT, between summits. Meanwhile, the summit also approved the renaming of the AIPLF (which in 1989 had changed from Association to Assemblée) as the Francophone Consultative Assembly (Assemblée Consultative de la Francophonie—ACF) and welcomed the grouping under the expanding francophone umbrella.

In anticipation of the next francophone summit, ACCT Secretary General Roy suggested that the group adopt a “more political” approach to enhance its effectiveness, observers taking this to mean, among other things, greater emphasis on such issues as democratization and human rights. However, as expected following the election of rightist Jacques Chirac as the new president of France in May 1995, the sixth summit, held December 2–4, 1995, in Cotonou, Benin, concentrated on economic matters. Among other things, Chirac indicated France would press other leading industrialized nations not to reduce their financial assistance to African nations. He also called for efforts to prevent English from becoming, at the expense of French and other languages, the default language of the Internet and the “information superhighway.”

Returning to the issue of a greater political emphasis, the Francophone Ministerial Conference (Conférence Ministérielle de la Francophonie—CMF) in 1996 proposed a new francophone “charter,” which was approved by the Seventh Francophone Summit, held November 14–16, 1997, in Hanoi, Vietnam. It was agreed that a permanent General Secretariat would be established for La Francophonie on January 1, 1998, under the leadership of former UN secretary general Boutros Boutros-Ghali of Egypt, whose selection as secretary general of the new body reportedly caused consternation among some French-speaking African countries. The summit also approved a “plan of action” regarding support for human rights, democratic values, and economic cooperation. In addition, the new charter directed that the ACCT would subsequently be known as the Agency of the Francophonie (Agence de la Francophonie); the former ACCT thus became the lead agency of the newly formalized Francophonie, with the summit leaders then selecting Roger Dehaybe of Belgium as the new general administrator of the agency. The summit also confirmed a shift in emphasis, as evidenced by the attendance of several countries with, at best, tangential interest in French language concerns. All, however, had indicated their desire to join forces with other countries attempting to ward off “global domination” by Anglo-Saxon (particularly American) culture and language.

The CMF, meeting in Bucharest, Romania, December 4–5, 1998, endorsed Boutros-Ghali’s efforts to heighten the profile of the francophone community, henceforth to be known as the International Francophone Organization (Organisation Internationale de la Francophonie—OIF). In addition, the CMF endorsed renaming the ACF as the Parliamentary Assembly of the Francophonie (Assemblée Parlementaire de la Francophonie—APF) and asked it to play a wider role in helping to solidify legislative institutions in developing countries.

In 1999 the OIF decided that the Agency of the Francophonie would be commonly, although unofficially, referenced as the Intergovernmental Agency of the Francophonie (Agence Intergouvernementale de la Francophonie—AIF) to better reflect its character.

Structure. The Conference of Heads of State and Government of Countries Using French as a Common Language, better known as the Francophone Summit, usually meets every two years to set policy for the OIF. The Ministerial Conference of the Francophonie (CMF), consisting primarily of the members’ foreign ministers, is responsible for seeing that summit decisions are carried out. Two additional “Permanent Ministerial Conferences” address matters of education and of youth and sports; sectoral ministerial conferences also may be convened. The Permanent Council of the Francophonie (CPF), comprising the personal representatives of the members’ heads of state and government, has among its responsibilities organizing summits and seeing that summit decisions are implemented.

The secretary general, who is elected by the summit for a four-year term, has multiple functions, including heading the General Secretariat, chairing the CPF, carrying out international policy, and serving as the OIF’s principal international presence and spokesperson. In addition, he ranks as the senior official of the Agency of the Francophonie (unofficially, the Intergovernmental Agency of the Francophonie—AIF) and proposes that organ's general administrator. As the OIF's principal executing body (opérateur principal), the AIF has as its main responsibility carrying out the cultural, scientific, technical, economic, and legal cooperative programs endorsed by the summit. The CMF also sits as the General Conference of the Agency, while the CPF periodically convenes as the agency's Administrative Council.

In January 2004 a new body, the High Council of the Francophonie (Haut Conseil de la Francophonie) convened for the first time. Encompassing between 30 and 40 individuals selected by the secretary general for once-renewable terms of four years, the High Council has as its mission reflecting on matters of French language and cultural diversity. The 37 individuals named to the first High Council included politicians, artists, writers, media specialists, teachers, jurists, economists, and entrepreneurs from around the globe.

The OIF sponsors four specialized agencies (opérateurs directs): the Agency of Francophone Universities, the French-language TV5 international channel, the Senghor University of Alexandria, and the International Association of Francophone Mayors. Other affiliated bodies and offices include the Francophone Institute for Energy and the Environment in Quebec, Canada, and the Francophone Institute for New Information and Training Technologies in Bordeaux, France. A Parliamentary Assembly serves an advisory role.

Activities. The formal establishment of the OIF solidified efforts by the international francophone community to expand its membership and mission. Recent additions to the membership include Albania, Guinea-Bissau, and Macedonia, none of which has a significant French-speaking population; all, however, have been seeking wider international integration and access to economic and development assistance. In addition to advancing French cultural and linguistic programs, including sponsorship of over 140 rural reading centers in a dozen African countries, the OIF promotes crisis prevention and resolution, strengthening of democratic practices and institutions, ratification of human rights conventions, and adoption of coordinated policies in multilateral trade negotiations. In furtherance of such goals it has established permanent missions to the United Nations, the European Union, and the African Union and has opened regional AIF offices in Libreville, Gabon; Lomé, Togo; and Hanoi, Vietnam.

The Francophone Summit that convened September 3–5, 1999, in Moncton, New Brunswick, Canada, focused its attention once again on matters of cultural diversity. The meeting's final declaration noted that "cultural goods are in no way reducible to their economic dimension" and that the participating leaders "affirm the right of [their] states and governments to freely define their cultural policies and appropriate tools of intervention." The declaration cited the perceived threat posed by multilateral talks and globalization without, however, explicitly referencing an ongoing U.S.-Canadian dispute over Ottawa's efforts to protect Canadian publications, music, and other media from U.S. domination.

The summit also broadly promoted political equality, security, and democracy. The assembled leaders steered clear of openly disputing various members' human rights records, despite a recent assertion by Amnesty International that 35 of the OIF's members and observers were guilty of human rights violations. In addition, the Moncton session set sustainable economic development as a leading goal. The summit declaration placed particular emphasis on the developing information society, including the need for exchange of knowledge and expertise in science and technology.

Having been postponed from October 2001 following the September 11 terrorist attacks on the United States, the ninth Summit met October 18–20, 2002, in Beirut, Lebanon. The session was largely dominated by the looming crisis over Iraq's alleged weapons of mass destruction. A summit resolution noted the "essential role" of the United Nations in resolving the conflict, and the overall stance of the participants clearly supported French President Chirac's opposition to preemptive military action in the absence of Security Council authorization. The ongoing political crisis in Côte d'Ivoire also drew the attention of the participants, who elected former Senegalese president Abdou Diouf as the new OIF secretary general. In a noteworthy development, the summit was attended by Algerian President Abdelaziz Bouteflika, who pointedly dismissed questions from the press about whether or not his country would seek admission to the OIF.

The OIF continues to promote French language and the shared traditions of the Francophone community. The secretary general frequently travels beyond the French-speaking world in support of this mission. The OIF has never failed to condemn antidemocratic moves in French-speaking Africa or to praise prodemocratic efforts, such as voters' approval of a new constitution in the Democratic Republic of the Congo in December 2005.

MANO RIVER UNION

Union du Fleuve Mano

---

Established: By the Mano River Declaration issued by the presidents of Liberia and Sierra Leone on October 3, 1973, and accompanying protocols signed in 1974.

Purpose: To promote the economic development of member states by the elimination of tariff barriers and the creation of new productive capacity, with particular emphasis on the hydroelectric potential of the Mano River; also, in recent years, to further peace, security, and stability in the region.

Headquarters: Freetown, Sierra Leone.

Principal Organs: Ministerial Council, Secretariat.

Secretary General: H. E. Jallow.

Membership (3): Guinea, Liberia, Sierra Leone.

Working Languages: English, French.

Origin and development. The Mano River Union (MRU) was founded in the hope that it might lead to the economic integration of a number of West African states. Guinea joined the group on October 3, 1980, and on May 28, 1981, a customs union was established, with tariff barriers eliminated between the original members and transitional arrangements established for Guinea. However, political conflicts between members, financial problems within the union, and political and economic turmoil within the three member states have precluded the attainment of many of the organization's original objectives.

Meeting May 7–8, 2000, in Conakry, Guinea, the three countries' heads of state approved formation of a Joint Security Committee, a Technical Committee, and Border Security and Confidence-Building Units to resolve security issues and reinvigorate the union.

Structure. General policy, including approval of the union's budget, is normally established by the Ministerial Council, which is to meet yearly. Day-to-day administration is the responsibility of the Secretariat, which maintains offices in Monrovia and Conakry as well as in Freetown, Sierra Leone; in 1980 an Industrial Development Unit was formed within the Secretariat. A more recent emphasis on security matters led to formation of a Joint Security Committee and a supporting Technical Committee in 2000.

Activities. From the mid-1980s the MRU was increasingly beset not only by perennial financial problems but also by adverse political developments. In November 1985 Liberian President Samuel K. Doe accused Sierra Leone of involvement in an attempted coup by an opposition group. Guinea also was charged with complicity and, despite denials by both governments, borders with the two countries were closed. The tension caused virtually all activities to cease and left the organization without an approved budget.

Following mediation by Guinea President Lansana Conté, in July 1986, President Joseph Saidu Momoh of Sierra Leone joined Doe and Conté in the first summit since 1983 in Conakry, Guinea, the three agreeing to end their differences "in the spirit of the Mano River Union." In November 1986 the three heads of state concluded a treaty of nonaggression and security cooperation that prohibited subversive activities by one member against another and called for the creation of a joint committee for settling disagreements within the framework of the Organization of African Unity (OAU). Existing bilateral defense cooperation agreements between Sierra Leone and Guinea and between Liberia and Guinea were incorporated into the agreement.

Ministerial sessions in 1989 and early 1990 authorized feasibility studies on a number of “harmonization” proposals, including the creation of a common currency and development of regional marketing and pricing policies. Also under discussion were road and telecommunications projects and the creation of a regional airline (Mano Air). Subsequently, however, progress was severely compromised by the prolonged civil war in Liberia. Effective regional cooperation was further constrained by the military coup in Sierra Leone in late April 1992, with Guinea sending troops to assist forces remaining loyal to President Momoh before announcing that it would cooperate with the new Freetown government. The presidents of the union members, meeting for the first time in over two years on July 21, 1994, in Conakry, Guinea, again called for the “revitalization” of the grouping. However, political affairs remained tumultuous in all three member states through 1997, yielding a virtual standstill in union activity and the abandonment of the Freetown headquarters by the secretary general.

In the context of continuing turmoil, the MRU’s heads of state met U.S. presidential emissary Jesse Jackson in November 1998 in Conakry. The members pledged to abide by the union’s nonaggression and security cooperation agreement and called for more international aid to the area. In March 1999 Felix Downes-Thomas, head of the UN office in Liberia, encouraged revival of the union which, he asserted, might help resolve distrust between Sierra Leone and Liberia and provide a multilateral forum for addressing regional problems, including refugees, internally displaced persons, arms, and ex-combatants. Nevertheless, repeated efforts by individual countries, the OAU, and, especially, the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) to mediate the multiple disputes proved unavailing until a foreign ministerial meeting of the three principals on March 18–19, 2000, in Monrovia announced that the union’s Secretariat would be revived after a decade of inactivity. On May 7–8 Presidents Conté of Guinea, Charles Taylor of Liberia, and Ahmad Tejan Kabbah of Sierra Leone, joined by ECOWAS Chair Alpha Ouma Konare of Mali, met in Conakry and approved proposals from the March ministerial meeting that included establishing a Joint Security Committee. Through mid-2001, however, mutual hostility continued to characterize interactions between Liberia and its two neighbors, highlighted by ambassadorial expulsions and accusations of support for rebel and opposition groups.

A consultative meeting of foreign ministers held August 13–15, 2001, in Monrovia was followed by an August 22–23 meeting of the new Joint Security Committee, attended by ministers of foreign affairs, security, defense, internal security, and justice. After reviewing the regional security situation the ministers agreed that restoration of peace and stability required measures to “rebuild the confidence of the three member states.” Proposed steps included apprehending and returning to the country of origin dissidents, armed groups, and paramilitary forces responsible for destabilization and enforcing compliance with the Non-Aggression and Security Cooperation Treaty, which had been signed in Freetown on November 20, 1996, and with the 15th Protocol to the Declaration of the Mano River Union on Defense, Security, Internal, and Foreign Affairs, signed at the May 2000 Conakry summit. The participants also agreed to deploy Joint Border Security and Confidence-Building Units along their mutual borders, to encourage repatriation of refugees, and to seek international funds for reviving union organs and programs. Additional ministerial and Joint Security meetings were held in September, and another presidential summit was proposed for 2002.

Under the auspices of King Mohamed VI of Morocco, presidents Conté, Kabbah, and Taylor met in a one-day summit in Rabat, Morocco, on February 27, 2002, in what proved to be yet another abortive effort to resolve their countries’ differences and re-activate the MRU. In late March the Joint Security Committee convened in Freetown, while in early April the three members' foreign ministers met in Rabat to discuss the peace process, including securing their borders and repatriating refugees, and to plan for another summit meeting. Thereafter, a renewed rebellion in Liberia halted progress and ultimately led, in 2003, to the forced resignation and exile of President Taylor. In August 2003 Liberia's interim chief executive, Moses Blah, paid visits to Guinea and Sierra Leone, as did the chair of a transitional government, Gyude Bryant, in November, in the expectation that 2004 could prove to be a more fortuitous year for the region. These expectations were aided by a meeting in Conakry on May 20, 2004, between the heads of state of the four member countries at which the Mano River Union was formally reactivated.

Meanwhile, a number of nongovernmental organizations in the three MRU states also have been attempting to promote peace and stability. In March 2002 a group of civil society organizations proposed a ten-year action plan that included disarming child soldiers, repatriating refugees, organizing general elections, and encouraging socioeconomic development. In December 2003 the United Nations awarded a key human rights prize to the MRU Women's Peace Network. Other recently active groups have included the Mano River Human Rights Network and the MRU Peace Forum. Speaking at the latter's launching in Freetown in February 2004, MRU Secretary General H. E. Jallow identified human rights abuses, the proliferation of small arms, and a lack of press freedom as having contributed to the chaos of the preceding decade.

NONALIGNED MOVEMENT (NAM)

---

Established: In the course of an increasingly structured series of 11 nonaligned conferences, the first of which met September 1–6, 1961, in Belgrade, Yugoslavia, and the most recent, February 24–25, 2003, in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia.

Purpose: To promote a “transition from the old world order based on domination to a new order based on freedom, equality, and social justice and the well-being of all”; to pursue “peace, achievement of disarmament, and settlement of disputes by peaceful means”; to search for “effective and acceptable solutions” to world economic problems, particularly the “disparities in the level of global development”; to support self-determination and independence “for all peoples living under colonial or alien domination and foreign occupation”; to seek “sustainable and environmentally sound development”; to promote “fundamental rights and freedom”; to contribute to strengthening “the role and effectiveness of the United Nations” (Final Declaration, Belgrade, 1989).

Headquarters: None.

Principal Organs: Conference of Heads of State, Meeting of Foreign Ministers, Coordinating Bureau (25 members).

Chair: Abdullah Ahmad Badawi (Malaysia). Malaysia is Chair of the group from 2003–2006.

Membership (116): Afghanistan, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Bahamas, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belarus, Belize, Benin, Bhutan, Bolivia, Botswana, Brunei, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Cambodia, Cameroon, Cape Verde

Islands, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, Colombia, Comoro Islands, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Republic of the Congo, Côte d’Ivoire, Cuba, Cyprus, Djibouti, Dominica Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Gabon, Gambia, Ghana, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Honduras, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Democratic People’s Republic of Korea, Kuwait, Laos, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Libya, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Myanmar, Namibia, Nepal, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Palestine (represented by the Palestinian Authority), Panama, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Philippines, Qatar, Rwanda, St. Lucia, St. Vincent and the Grenadines, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Somalia, South Africa, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Swaziland, Syria, Tanzania, Thailand, Timor-Leste, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkmenistan, Uganda, United Arab Emirates, Uzbekistan, Vanuatu, Venezuela, Vietnam, Yemen, Zambia, Zimbabwe. The 1979 conference refused to seat either delegation (representing the Khieu Samphan and Heng Samrin regimes) from Cambodia, that country being represented by an “empty seat” at subsequent NAM summits until the 1992 meeting. One of the NAM’s founding members, Burma (now Myanmar), withdrew in 1979 but was readmitted in 1992. Venezuela shifted from full member to observer because of a boundary dispute with Guyana and then back to full membership (effective 1989). In September 1991 Argentina’s President Carlos Menem announced his nation’s withdrawal on the ground that the NAM “no longer had any reason to exist.” A June 1994 NAM meeting of foreign ministers refused to seat a delegation from the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (the Serbian and Montenegrin constituent republics of the dissolved Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia), which was attempting to claim the predecessor state’s founding membership in the NAM. Yugoslavia’s membership remained suspended thereafter, and in July 2001 the Federal Republic applied for observer status, which was granted and retained upon the country’s transformation to the State Union of Serbia and Montenegro. Cyprus and Malta became observer states in 2004 when they joined the EU. In May 2006 Antigua and Barbuda and Dominica, previously observers, became full members.

Observer States (16): Armenia, Azerbaijan, Brazil, China, Costa Rica, Croatia, Cyprus, El Salvador, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Malta, Mexico, Paraguay, Serbia as the successor state after the June 2006 split of Serbia and Montenegro, Ukraine, Uruguay. In addition, the following organizations attended the 2003 summit as observers: the African Union, the Afro-Asian People’s Solidarity Organization, the Arab League, the Kanaka Socialist National Liberation Front (New Caledonia), the Organization of the Islamic Conference, the New Independentist Movement of Puerto Rico, and the United Nations.

Guests (32): Australia, Austria, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Canada, Czech Republic, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Republic of Korea, Macedonia, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Poland, Portugal, Romania, Russia, San Marino, Slovakia, Slovenia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, United Kingdom, United States, Vatican. (In addition, many intergovernmental organizations had guest status at the most recent NAM Summit in 2003.)

Origin and development. The first Conference of Nonaligned Heads of State, at which 25 countries were represented, was convened in September 1961 in Belgrade, largely through the initiative of Yugoslavian President Josip Tito, who had expressed concern that an accelerating arms race might result in war between the Soviet Union and the United States. Subsequent conferences, which attracted more and more Third World countries, were convened in Cairo, Egypt, in 1964; Lusaka, Zambia, in 1970; Algiers, Algeria, in 1973; Colombo, Sri Lanka, in 1976; Havana, Cuba, in 1979; New Delhi, India, in 1983; Harare, Zimbabwe, in 1986; Belgrade in 1989; Jakarta, Indonesia, in 1992; Cartagena, Columbia, in 1995; and Durban, South Africa, in 1998. The most recent summit was held February 24–25, 2003, in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia.

The 1964 conference in Cairo, with 47 countries represented, featured widespread condemnation of Western colonialism and the retention of foreign military installations. Thereafter, the focus shifted away from essentially political issues, such as independence for dependent territories, to the advocacy of occasionally radical solutions to global economic and other problems. Thus, in 1973 in Algiers there was an appeal for concerted action by the “poor nations against the industrialized world”; this became a basis of debate within the United Nations for a New International Economic Order (NIEO) and led to the convening of an inconclusive Conference on International Economic Cooperation in late 1975 in Paris, France.

At the 1979 Havana meeting, political concerns resurfaced in the context of an intense debate between Cuban President Castro, who was charged with attempting to “bend” the movement in the direction of the “socialist camp,” and Yugoslavian President Tito, who urged that it remain true to its genuinely nonaligned origins. In search of a compromise, the Final Declaration of the Havana Conference referred to the movement’s “non-bloc nature” and its opposition to both “hegemony” (a euphemism used in reference to presumed Soviet ambitions) and all forms of “imperialism, colonialism, and neocolonialism.” In addition, the conference reiterated an earlier identification of “Zionism as a form of racism.”

At the 1983 New Delhi conference, delegates focused on the precarious financial condition of Third World countries. The conference’s declaration stated, in part, that developed countries should meet with developing countries to discuss debt relief, reduced trade barriers, increased aid for development, and increased cash flow. Its economic proposals, already widely accepted by the world banking community, called for the rescheduling of Third World debt and an increase in Special Drawing Rights by the International Monetary Fund (IMF).

The eighth NAM summit was held in Harare, Zimbabwe, in 1986, the 25th anniversary of the movement. The site was chosen to underscore the group's main concern: the South African government's policy of forced racial segregation. A final declaration called on nonaligned nations to adopt selective, voluntary sanctions against South Africa pending the adoption of comprehensive, mandatory measures by the UN Security Council. The members demanded international pressure to eliminate apartheid, Pretoria's withdrawal from Namibia (South-West Africa), and an end to its aggression against neighboring states.

With Liberia, Singapore, and a number of other members dissenting, the United States was severely criticized for its lack of sanctions against Pretoria, as well as for its policies toward Angola, Libya, and Nicaragua. In implicit criticism of the Soviet Union, the withdrawal of foreign forces from Afghanistan also was urged. The group denounced Israel for its occupation of Arab territory and its activities in Lebanon, while reiterating support for the Palestinians' "just struggle." An appeal was made for the end of interference by unspecified "outsiders" in the Cambodian conflict, and both sides were encouraged to negotiate for peace in the Iran-Iraq war. In addition, an Independent Commission of the South on Development Issues was established to study the causes of underdevelopment and produce common strategies to combat it.

Some of the NAM's most radical members (including Cuba, Iran, and Iraq) stayed away from the 1989 Belgrade summit after preparatory talks revealed that most members favored fewer polemics and a return to the group's original posture of neutrality. Consequently, the meeting's final declaration was markedly less anti-American and anti-Western than previous declarations. Instead, the summit emphasized the need for the movement to "modernize" and develop "a realistic, far-sighted, and creative" approach to international issues in which concordance would be favored over confrontation. The declaration also praised Washington and Moscow for their recent rapprochement, which, by reducing tensions in many areas of the world, had created a "window of opportunity for the international community." At the same time, the Belgrade declaration described the economic situation in the "vast majority of the developing countries" as having "deteriorated dramatically," with many of those nations "suffocating" from the outflow of capital. NAM leaders reaffirmed the NIEO as a "difficult but valid goal," appealing for the developed world to do a better job of addressing the needs of the developing countries.

Structure. By convention, the chief executive of the country hosting the most recent Conference of Heads of State serves as the NAM's chair. Foreign ministers' meetings are generally held annually between conferences, which are usually convened every three years. A Coordinating Bureau, established at the 1973 conference, currently numbers 25 (including the chair, a rapporteur-general and, on an ex officio basis, the immediate past chair) with the following regional distribution: Africa, 10; Asia, 9; Latin America and the Caribbean, 4; Europe, 2. In addition to a Political Committee, an Economic and Social Committee, and a Committee on Palestine, the NAM has created various Working Groups over the years. Those functioning as of 2003 addressed matters of Disarmament, Peacekeeping Operations, Human Rights, Sixth Committee Matters (terrorism), and the Restructuring of the Security Council.

Activities. The NAM emerged somewhat revitalized from its tenth summit, held in 1992 in Jakarta, Indonesia. At the conclusion of the meeting the NAM declared its intention to project itself as a "vibrant, constructive, and genuinely independent component of the mainstream of international relations." With anti-Western rhetoric having been kept to a minimum, the NAM asked developed nations to give "urgent priority" to establishing "a more equitable global economy" and to assist developing nations in resolving the problems of low commodity prices and “crushing debt burdens.” The summit agreed to establish a broad-based committee of experts to devise a debt reduction approach. For their part, reflecting the organization’s increasingly pragmatic approach, NAM members committed themselves to a measure of “self-reliance” in such areas as population control and food self-sufficiency. The Jakarta Message also called for extended South/South trade and investment cooperation. In addition, the NAM said it would press for a restructuring of the United Nations that would include the diminution or elimination of the veto power of the five permanent members of the Security Council and an expansion of council membership.

The most contentious issue at the summit appeared to be the question of Yugoslavian membership, many Arab countries having called for expulsion of the Federal Republic because of events in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Ultimately, the summit postponed a decision in the matter, opting instead to condemn “ethnic cleansing by Serbs” of Muslim communities, without reference to Yugoslavia.

Yugoslavia remained unrepresented at the NAM Meeting of Foreign Ministers held in May–June 1994 in Cairo, Egypt, while action on politically sensitive membership applications from Macedonia and Russia was deferred indefinitely. However, in what was considered one of the high points of the movement’s history (in view of its long-standing anti-apartheid stance), South Africa was welcomed to the NAM ranks following the installation of a multiracial government in Pretoria.

The NAM continued to press for UN restructuring at the 11th summit, held October 18–20, 1995, in Cartagena de Indias, Colombia. It also argued that UN peacekeeping efforts should be cut, so more resources could be used for combating poverty. The summit’s communiqué strongly criticized the United States for continuing its heavy economic pressure against Cuba and urged the industrialized nations to adopt a more “just” system of world trade. However, the movement remained plagued by questions of its relevancy in the post–

Cold War era, with NAM supporters arguing that the organization’s attention should focus on the long-term global division between the North and the South.

The 12th NAM summit, held September 2–3, 1998, in Durban, South Africa, was expected to concentrate on economic issues, but the ongoing fighting in the Democratic Republic of the Congo diverted attention. With regard to the May 1998 testing of nuclear weapons by India and Pakistan, the NAM called on both members to settle their disputes peacefully and articulated its concern over the development of all weapons of mass destruction. The summit also condemned terrorism, insisting that it be countered in accordance with UN principles, not by unilateral initiatives, and expressed regret that the Middle East peace process remained at a standstill—a situation it attributed to Israeli intransigence.

On the economic front, the summit called for the IMF and the World Bank to expand funding to the developing world and for changes in international financial institutions to prevent the kind of economic crisis that was currently plaguing much of Asia. In more general terms, the NAM criticized the direction of globalization, arguing that economic integration was leading many of the poorest countries toward greater poverty.

The NAM was divided over the Kosovo crisis of 1999, with Muslim member states supporting intervention on behalf of the Kosovars and predominantly backing the US-led NATO air war against Yugoslavia in March–June. The division came in the context of a more fundamental concern that the movement was being eclipsed by the (then) 133-member Group of 77, which had gained increasing recognition as an effective voice for the economic interests of developing countries.

The organization’s 13th Ministerial Conference met on April 8–9, 2000, in Cartagena, where the topics under discussion included barring participation by military regimes that had overthrown democratically elected governments. Championed by India, the proposal was generally viewed as an effort to establish democracy as the norm for all members, but observers also noted that New Delhi was clearly targeting Pakistan for exclusion.

The 13th summit was planned for October 2001 in Bangladesh, but the meeting was postponed because of preparations for that country's October 1 national election. In November the newly installed Bangladeshi government announced that it was unable to host the meeting, which had been rescheduled for April 2002, for reasons that included the country's recent economic downturn, inadequate hotel accommodations and other infrastructure and, in the context of the September terrorist attacks on the United States, an inability to guarantee security for the 5,000 or more expected attendees. The venue was subsequently changed to Amman, Jordan, but instability in the Middle East ultimately led the Coordinating Bureau, meeting in April 2002 in Durban, to designate Malaysia as the host. Thus the 13th summit convened on February 24–25, 2003, in Kuala Lumpur.

Attended by some 60 heads of state or government, the first day of the summit included an address by the outspoken, soon-to-retire Malaysian Prime Minister, Mahathir bin Mohamad, who lambasted the West for using undemocratic means to force democracy on other countries, permitting international financial agencies to ignore the debt burden of developing countries, and leaving poorer countries "oppressed and terrorized." Among the specific issues debated at the summit were the threat of war against Iraq and the nuclear crisis in North Korea. In a "Statement Concerning Iraq," the movement warned against the dangers of preemptive action by the United States and its allies, but it also advised the Saddam Hussein regime to comply with UN Security Council resolutions. With regard to North Korea's nuclear program, the summit ultimately supported Pyongyang's contention that a solution would best be found if the U.S. George W.

Bush administration would agree to negotiate directly instead of insisting on multilateral involvement. In addition, as at previous summits, the participants voiced support for the Palestinian people and condemned Israeli actions and alleged human rights abuses in the West Bank and Gaza.

In keeping with its overall theme of "Continuing the Revitalization of the Non-Aligned Movement," the 2003 summit approved the Kuala Lumpur Declaration, which broadly called for multilateral efforts to prevent the marginalization of poorer states but also focused on steps to be taken by the movement's members. Among other things, the declaration urged the wider international community to ensure that globalization leads to the "prospering and empowering of the developing countries, not their continued impoverishment and dependence." In addition, the declaration called upon member states to improve the effectiveness and efficiency of the movement; to enhance unity and cohesion "by focusing on issues that unite rather than divide us"; to meet more frequently with the Group of 77 to improve South-South coordination and cooperation; to bring together states, civil society, and the private sector in a partnership that might bridge the "digital divide"; and to improve North-South understanding through "constructive dialog and interaction" with the Group of Eight and other development partners.

Because the NAM has no central headquarters, it has perhaps suffered in recent years from lack of an official, external face. Malaysia has attempted to address this problem with a very comprehensive website, or "E-Secretariat," which not only documents Malaysia's leadership of the organization, but also thoroughly records all aspects of the movement's work. The fourteenth Conference of Heads of State was scheduled to take place from September 11–16, 2006, in Havana, Cuba.

ORGANIZATION OF ARAB PETROLEUM EXPORTING COUNTRIES (OAPEC)

---

Established: By agreement concluded on January 9, 1968, in Beirut, Lebanon.

Purpose: To help coordinate members' petroleum policies, to adopt measures for harmonizing their legal systems to the extent needed for the group to fulfill its mission, to assist in the exchange of information and expertise, to provide training and employment opportunities for their citizens, and to utilize members' "resources and common potentialities" in establishing joint projects in the petroleum and petroleum-related industries.

Headquarters: Kuwait City, Kuwait.

Principal Organs: Ministerial Council, Executive Bureau, Judicial Tribunal, General Secretariat.

Secretary General: Abdul Aziz A. Al-Turki (Saudi Arabia).

Membership (10): Algeria, Bahrain, Egypt, Iraq, Kuwait, Libya, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Syria, United Arab Emirates. (Egyptian membership was suspended 1979–1989.)

Official Language: Arabic.

Origin and development. Established by Kuwait, Libya, and Saudi Arabia in early 1968 in recognition of the need for further cooperation among Arab countries that relied on oil as their principal source of income, OAPEC was expanded in May 1970 by the accession of Algeria, Bahrain, Qatar, Abu Dhabi, and Dubai. In May 1972 the last two combined their membership as part of the United Arab Emirates. In December 1971 the founding agreement was liberalized to permit membership by any Arab country having oil as a significant—but not necessarily the major—source of income, with the result that Syria and Egypt joined in 1972 and 1973, respectively. Also in 1972, Iraq became a member. A Tunisian bid for membership failed at the December 1981 ministerial meeting because of Libyan opposition stemming from a dispute with Tunis over conflicting claims to offshore oil deposits. Tunisia was admitted in 1982 but four years later withdrew from active membership because it had become a net importer of energy and could not make its OAPEC contributions.

OAPEC joint ventures and projects include the Arab Maritime Petroleum Transport Company (AMPTC), founded in 1973 with headquarters in Kuwait; the Arab Shipbuilding and Repair Yard Company (ASRY), established in Bahrain in 1974; the Arab Petroleum Investments Corporation (Apicorp), set up in 1975 in Damman, Saudi Arabia; and the Arab Petroleum Services Company (APSC), founded in 1977 and operating from Tripoli, Libya. The Arab Engineering Company (Arec), established in 1981 in Abu Dhabi, was dissolved in 1989. Shareholders in these ventures are typically either the member governments themselves or state-owned petroleum enterprises.

Subsidiary companies are the Arab Drilling and Workover Company (ADWOC), based in Tripoli since its formation in 1980; the Arab Well Logging Company (AWLCO), established in 1983 in Baghdad; and the Arab Geophysical Exploration

Services Company (AGESCO), formed in 1984 in Tripoli. The APSC is the sole shareholder in AWLCO and the principal shareholder in the other two. The Arab Company for Detergent Chemicals (Aradet), founded in 1981 in Baghdad, is an Apicorp subsidiary.

Structure. The Ministerial Council, OAPEC's supreme authority, is composed of the members' petroleum ministers, who convene at least twice a year to draw up policy guidelines and direct ongoing activities. An Executive Bureau, which meets at least three times a year, assists the council in management of the organization. A Judicial Tribunal, established in 1980, serves as an arbitration council between OAPEC members or between a member and a petroleum company operating in that country, with all decisions final and binding. The Secretariat, headed by a secretary general and no more than three assistant secretaries general, encompasses the secretary's office and four departments: Finance and Administrative Affairs, Information and Library, Economics, and Technical Affairs. The last two comprise the Arab Center for Energy Studies. A largely ceremonial national presidency of the organization rotates annually among the member states.

Activities. Although OAPEC's activities are directly affected by the world oil market, it plays no institutional role in determining either output quotas or prices, deferring in both cases to the more encompassing Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC). Instead, OAPEC focuses on coordinating related policies within the Arab community. Over the years, it has also invested billions of dollars in its associated ventures and affiliates. Apicorp, for example, has helped finance petroleum and petrochemical projects around the world, including gas liquefaction plants, refineries, pipelines and other means of transport, and facilities for making fertilizers and detergents. In addition to its administrative tasks, the OAPEC Secretariat has compiled and continually updates a comprehensive database of information on oil and energy markets, reserves, production, refining, consumption, and downstream industries, such as petrochemicals. OAPEC also conducts related research projects, sponsors seminars, and produces technical papers and studies.

The December 1990 Ministerial Council meeting was held in Cairo, Egypt, that city having been chosen as OAPEC's temporary headquarters following the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait the previous August. In mid-1992 a report co-authored by OAPEC estimated that the Gulf crisis had cost Arab countries as much as $620 billion and had contributed to rising inflation and a decline of 7 percent in the gross national product of 21 Arab nations in 1991. The destruction of oil wells, pipelines, and other infrastructure alone cost Iraq an estimated $190 billion and Kuwait $160 billion, the report said.

Arab oil affairs remained turbulent into 1994 as several OAPEC members continued to quarrel over OPEC production quotas. There was ongoing disagreement over how and when Iraq would resume oil exports, while OAPEC officials described recent wide fluctuations in oil prices as making it difficult for member states to plan development programs effectively. The organization hoped, however, to return to a degree of normal activity following return to its permanent headquarters in Kuwait at midyear.

Low oil prices remained a major OAPEC concern throughout 1998, a December session of the Ministerial Council urging all oil-producing countries to exercise restraint regarding production levels. In 1999 OAPEC officials also suggested that some members might be well served to encourage private investment in their oil sectors as a means of accelerating economic advancement.

Oil output and the condition of world oil markets, which experienced a dramatic increase in prices in 2000, remained a major focus of the four Ministerial Council sessions held in 2000–2001 in Cairo. In mid-2000 an OAPEC report indicated that Arab countries were contributing about 26 percent of world oil production and that, as of 1999, Arab reserves amounted to 63 percent of the world total.

In recent years OAPEC has also been giving increasing attention to environmental concerns, in part to ensure that the economic standing of its members is not adversely affected by international initiatives intended to reduce greenhouse gases and other pollutants. The Eighth Coordinating Meeting of Environmental Experts was held in Cairo on September 29–30, 2001, its principal focus being coordination of member countries' positions regarding, for example, the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change and the associated Kyoto Protocol. At the same time, OAPEC was preparing for the Seventh Arab Energy Conference, held May 11–12, 2002, in Cairo, where again the focus was on "Energy and Arab Cooperation." Other organizations sponsoring the conference were the Arab Fund for Economic and Social Development (AFESD), the Arab League, and the Arab Industrial Development and Mining Organization (AIDMO).

During 2001–2003 oil prices and resultant income remained somewhat volatile despite improving communication between oil suppliers and consuming nations. At the same time, OAPEC reported, Arab petroleum-refining capacity was increasing, as was regional consumption of natural gas. Known Arab reserves of the latter commodity, about one-fourth of the world total, nevertheless continued to increase as new discoveries outpaced consumption. OAPEC also projected that global oil consumption would rise by about 1.6 percent annually, from 76 billion barrels per day in 2000 to nearly 90 billion barrels per day in 2010.

In March–May 2003 the invasion of Iraq by U.S.-led forces had a minimal impact on oil supplies. It was unclear, however, given the dilapidated state of Iraq's petroleum infrastructure, when or if Iraqi oil production would regain the levels that predated the 1991 Gulf War. A representative of the U.S.-sponsored interim Iraqi Governing Council was expected to attend the Ministerial Council session held in Cairo on December 13, 2003, but he withdrew because of an unspecified "emergency." In December 2005 the Ministerial Council canceled 70 percent of the debt owed the organization by Iraq.

A July 2005 report from OAPEC said that member countries planned to increase their share of world oil production from the (then) 32.2 percent to between 38 and 40 percent by 2010. The report noted that the increase would require substantial new investment by all member countries but particularly by Egypt, Algeria, and Libya. In December 2005 OAPEC announced that the organization's presidency would go to Qatar in 2006, not, as in the normal rotation, to Iraq.

ORGANIZATION OF THE ISLAMIC CONFERENCE (OIC)

---

Established: By agreement of participants at the Conference of the Kings and Heads of State and Government held September 22–25, 1969, in Rabat, Morocco; charter signed at the Third Islamic Conference of Foreign Ministers, held February 29–March 4, 1972, in Jiddah, Saudi Arabia.

Purpose: To promote Islamic solidarity and further cooperation among member states in the economic, social, cultural, scientific, and political fields.

Headquarters: Jiddah, Saudi Arabia.

Principal Organs: Conference of Kings and Heads of State and Government (Summit Conference), Conference of Foreign Ministers, General Secretariat.

Secretary General: Ekmeleddin İhsanoğlu (Turkey).

Membership (57): Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Azerbaijan, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Benin, Brunei, Burkina Faso, Cameroon, Chad, Comoro Islands, Côte d'Ivoire, Djibouti, Egypt, Gabon, Gambia, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Jordan, Kazakhstan, Kuwait, Kyrgyzstan, Lebanon, Libya, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Mauritania, Morocco, Mozambique, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Palestine, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Sudan, Suriname, Syria, Tajikistan, Togo, Tunisia, Turkey, Turkmenistan, Uganda, United Arab Emirates, Uzbekistan, Yemen. Afghanistan's membership was suspended in January 1980, following the Soviet invasion, but in March 1989 the seat was given to the government-in-exile announced by Afghan guerrillas and subsequently to the Afghan government formed after the guerrilla victory. The advent of the Taliban regime in September 1996 in Kabul yielded competition for OIC recognition between it and the overthrown government, with both being refused formal admittance to the OIC foreign ministers' conference in December in Jakarta, although Afghanistan as such continued to be regarded as a member. Egypt's membership, suspended in May 1979, was restored in April 1984. Nigeria's government approved that nation's admission into the OIC in 1986, but the membership was formally repudiated in 1991 in the wake of intense Christian opposition; the OIC has not recognized the latter decision. Uncertainty also surrounds the status of Zanzibar, whose membership request had been approved in December 1992; eight months later it was announced that Zanzibar's application, which precipitated contentious legislative debate in Tanzania, was withdrawn pending the possible forwarding of a Tanzanian membership request.

Observers (10): Bosnia and Herzegovina, Central African Republic, Economic Cooperation Organization, League of Arab States, Moro National Liberation Front, Nonaligned Movement, Organization of African Unity, Thailand, Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus, United Nations.

Official Languages: Arabic, English, French.

Origin and development. Although the idea of an organization for coordinating and consolidating the interests of Islamic states originated in 1969 and meetings of the conference were held throughout the 1970s, the Islamic conference only began to achieve worldwide attention in the early 1980s. From a base of 30 members in 1969, the OIC has doubled in size, with the most recent member, Côte d'Ivoire, being admitted in 2001.

Structure. The body's main institution is the Conference of Foreign Ministers, although a summit of members' heads of state and government is held every three years. Sectoral ministerial conferences have also convened in such areas as information, tourism, health, and youth and sports.

Over the years many committees and departments have evolved to provide input for policy decisions and to carry out the OIC's executive and administrative functions. The organization's general secretary, who serves a four-year, once-renewable term, heads the General Secretariat and is aided by four assistant secretaries general—for science and technology; cultural, social, and information affairs; political affairs; and economic affairs—and a director of the cabinet, who helps administer various departments. The secretariat also maintains permanent observer missions to the United Nations (UN) in New York, United States, and Geneva, Switzerland, and an Office for Afghanistan was recently established in Islamabad, Pakistan. Other OIC organs include the Al-Quds (Jerusalem) Committee, the Six-Member Committee on Palestine, the Standing Committee for Information and Cultural Affairs (COMIAC), the Standing Committee for Economic and Trade Cooperation (COMCEC), the Standing Committee for Scientific and Technological Cooperation (COMSTECH), and various additional permanent and specialized committees. Recent ad hoc committees and groups have included an Ad Hoc Committee on Afghanistan and Contact Groups for Jammu and Kashmir, Sierra Leone, and Bosnia and Herzegovina and Kosovo.

To date, the OIC has established four "specialized institutions and organs," including the International Islamic News Agency (IINA, founded in 1972); the Islamic Development Bank (IDB, 1974), the Islamic States Broadcasting Organization (ISBO, 1975), and the Islamic Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization (ISESCO, 1982). Of the organization's eight "subsidiary organs," one of the more prominent is the Islamic Solidarity Fund (ISF, 1977). The founding conference of a Parliamentary Union of the OIC Member States was held in June 1999.

Activities. During the 1980s three lengthy conflicts dominated the OIC's agenda: the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan, which began in December 1979 and concluded with the final withdrawal of Soviet troops in February 1989; the Iran-Iraq war, which began in September 1980 and ended with the cease-fire of August 1988; and the ongoing Arab-Israeli conflict. At their August 1990 meeting the foreign ministers described the Palestinian problem as the primary concern for the Islamic world. However, much of the planned agenda was disrupted by emergency private sessions concerning the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait on August 2. Most attending the meeting approved a resolution condemning the incursion and demanding the withdrawal of Iraqi troops. In addition to other ongoing conflicts among conference members (such as the dispute between Mauritania and Senegal), the Gulf crisis contributed to the postponement of the heads of state summit that normally would have been held in 1990.

When the sixth summit was finally held December 9–11, 1991, in Dakar, Senegal, more than half of members' heads of state failed to attend. Substantial lingering rancor concerning the Gulf crisis was reported at the meeting, while black African representatives asserted that Arab nations were giving insufficient attention to the problems of sub-Saharan Muslims. On the whole, the summit was perceived as unproductive, with Middle East International going so far as to wonder if the conference would "fade from the international political scene" because of its failure to generate genuine "Islamic solidarity."

In the following three years much of the conference's attention focused on the plight of the Muslim community in Bosnia and Herzegovina. The group's foreign ministers repeatedly called on the UN to use force, if necessary, to stop Serbian attacks against Bosnian Muslims, but the conference stopped well short of approving creation of an Islamic force to intervene on its own in Bosnia and Herzegovina, as reportedly proposed by Iran and several other members.

The seventh OIC summit, held December 13–15, 1994, in Casablanca, Morocco, reached consensus on a code of conduct regarding terrorism and religious extremism in the hope of improving the “global image” of Islam. Among other things, the OIC nations agreed that their territories would not be used for terrorist activities nor would any of them support, “morally or financially,” any Muslim “terrorists” opposed to member governments. However, with states such as Iran and Sudan (both charged with supporting extremist fundamentalists in other nations) signing the OIC statement, some observers described the document as a “face-saving” measure that masked ongoing deep divisions on the issue.

OIC efforts to improve the international image of Islam continued in 1995, notably in conjunction with ceremonies marking the organization’s 25th anniversary. U.S. Vice President Gore held talks with OIC Secretary General Hamid Algabid in March in Jiddah, Saudi Arabia, receiving assurances of the OIC’s “unwavering” support for international stability and offering in return a U.S. commitment to dialogue with the Islamic world in the interests of peace and mutual understanding. The desire for a greater Islamic role in resolving international disputes, expressed in an anniversary declaration issued in September, was also apparent in enhanced OIC participation in UN and other mediatory frameworks.

The 24th OIC foreign ministers’ conference, held December 9–13, 1996, in Jakarta, Indonesia, reiterated familiar positions, including the demand for an independent Palestinian state and Israel’s withdrawal from all territory “captured in war.” With regard to Afghanistan, neither the new Taliban regime nor the government ousted in September was accorded official status, it being resolved that Afghanistan’s OIC seat should remain vacant pro tem “without prejudice to the question of recognition of the government of Afghanistan.” A Taliban delegation was also sent to an extraordinary summit of heads of government held March 23, 1997, in Islamabad to celebrate 50 years of Pakistani independence. While it was again denied official recognition, the delegation was allowed to attend.

The renewed Palestinian intifada and the Israeli response to it provided a principal focus for OIC meetings in 2000. These included the June 27–30 Conference of Foreign Ministers in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, and the ninth summit November 12–13 in Doha, Qatar, which devoted its first day to discussing “the serious situation prevailing in the Palestinian occupied territories following the savage actions perpetrated by the Israeli forces.” Representatives of Iraq, Sudan, and Syria insisted that waging jihad against Israel was required, while others urged political and economic retaliation.

An eighth extraordinary session of the foreign ministers met May 26, 2001, in the context of the continuing hostilities. Meeting June 25–29 in Bamako, Mali, the regular 28th Conference of Foreign Ministers reiterated a call for member countries to halt political contacts with the Israeli government, sever economic relations, and end “all forms of normalization.” The concluding declaration of the session also urged resolution of a familiar list of other conflicts involving, among others, Afghanistan, Armenia and Azerbaijan, Cyprus, Jammu and Kashmir, Iraq, Kosovo, and Somalia. In other areas, the conference urged member states to ratify the Statute of the International Islamic Court of Justice, called for formation of an expert group that would begin drafting an Islamic Convention on Human Rights, condemned international terrorism, noted the progress made toward instituting an Islamic Program for the Development of Information and Communication (PIDIC), and cautioned that care must be taken to ensure that the economic benefits of globalization are shared and the adverse effects minimized.

Immediately after the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks against the United States, the OIC secretary general, Abdelouahed Belkeziz, condemned the terrorist acts, as did an extraordinary Conference of Foreign Ministers session in Doha. The Doha session did not directly oppose the ongoing U.S.-led military campaign against al-Qaida and the Taliban regime in Afghanistan, although it did argue that no state should be targeted under the pretext of attacking terrorism. The foreign ministers session also rejected as counter to Islamic teachings and values any attempt to justify terrorism on religious grounds. Four months later, as part of an effort to foster intercultural dialogue, the OIC foreign ministers met in Istanbul with counterparts from the European Union.

On April 1–3, 2002, a special OIC session on terrorism convened in the Malaysian capital, Kuala Lumpur. In addition to establishing a 13-member committee to implement a plan of action against terrorism, the session issued a declaration that, among other things, condemned efforts to link terrorism and Islam and called for a global conference to define terrorism and establish internationally accepted procedures for combating it. Notably, however, the conference did not voice consensual support for a speech by Malaysian Prime Minister Mahathir bin Mohamad in which he described all attacks on civilians, including those by Palestinians and Sri Lanka's Tamil Tigers, as terrorist acts. The call for a UN-sponsored conference on terrorism was repeated by the Council of Foreign Ministers at their June session in Khartoum.

The impending U.S.-led war against the Saddam Hussein regime in Iraq generated a Second Extraordinary Session of the Islamic Summit Conference on March 5, 2003, in Doha. The meeting included an exchange of personal insults by the Iraqi and Kuwaiti representatives and a warning from the secretary general that a U.S. military campaign would lead to occupation and foreign rule. Concern was also expressed that the Israeli government was taking advantage of the world's preoccupation with the Iraqi crisis to intensify its campaign against Palestinians. The session concluded with a call for the elimination of all weapons of mass destruction (WMDs) from the Middle East.

The tenth OIC Summit Conference, which met October 16–18, 2003, in Putrajaya, Malaysia, featured an address by Prime Minister Mahathir that many Western countries condemned as anti-Semitic because of its stereotypical description of Jewish and Israeli intentions and tactics. The comments came in the context of Mahathir's argument that the Islamic world should focus on winning "hearts and minds" by abjuring violence and adopting new political and economic strategies. The summit concluded with issuance of the Putrajaya Declaration, which noted the "need to restructure and strengthen the Organisation on the basis of an objective review and evaluation of its role, structure, methodology, and decision-making processes, as well as its global partnerships." Included in the closing declaration's plan of action were provisions that called for drafting strategies to strengthen unity, especially at international forums; engaging in further dialogue with the West and international organizations; completing a review of the structure, methods, and needs of the secretariat; promoting the advancement of science and technology (particularly information and communication technology) among member states; and taking steps to encourage the expansion of trade and investment.

In response to subsequent international developments, the secretary general praised improved cooperation between Iran and the International Atomic Energy Agency; condemned the November 2003 terrorist attacks against synagogues in Istanbul as well as those against a housing complex in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia; and welcomed Libya's decision to end the development of WMDs. On February 25, 2004, the OIC argued before the International Court of Justice in The Hague, Netherlands, that the security wall being constructed by Israel on Palestinian land was illegal.

The OIC subsequently continued to condemn acts of terrorism around the world, including the March 2004 bombings in Madrid, Spain; the attacks against London's transit system in July 2005; and the explosions at the Egyptian resorts of Sharm El-Sheikh and Naama Bay later the same month. With regard to developments in Iraq, in August 2005 the OIC urged "prudence and consensus" during deliberations on the draft Iraqi constitution. In particular, the OIC advocated a policy of inclusion, cautioning that the "exclusion of any component of the population" (implicitly, the Sunni minority) would ill serve “the creation of commonly desired conditions of democracy, stability, peace, and welfare in this important member of the OIC.”

A third extraordinary session took place December 7–8, 2005, in Jiddah to address the violent worldwide Islamic outrage following publication in a Danish newspaper of cartoons critical of the Prophet Mohammad. The conference condemned violence, saying that Islam was in a crisis, and offered an ambitious ten-year plan to “revamp Islamic mindsets.” Symbolic of this decision was the intention to reorganize the OIC itself, and to build it a new headquarters in Saudi Arabia. By mid-2006 a design competition for the new facility was under way. Subsequent statements by the secretary general reinforced a nonviolent message.

The 33rd meeting of OIC foreign ministers, held June 19–22, 2006, in Baku, Azerbaijan, reinforced the message of moderation in the Islamic world. Specifically it warned the two rival factions in Palestine from dragging that territory into civil war.

PERMANENT INTERSTATE COMMITTEE ON DROUGHT CONTROL IN THE SAHEL (CILSS)

COMITÉ INTER-ÉTATS DE LUTTE CONTRE LA SÉCHERESSE DANS LE SAHEL

---

Established: Following a March 1973 declaration of a drought-related disaster in the Sahel by Burkina Faso (then Upper Volta), Mali, Mauritania, Niger, and Senegal.

Purpose: To overcome drought, ensure food security, fight desertification, and promote sustainable cooperative development in the Sahel region.

Headquarters: Ouagadougou, Burkina Faso.

Principal Organs: Conference of Heads of State and Government, Council of Ministers, Regional Committee for Programming and Follow-up, Executive Council, Executive Secretariat.

Executive Secretary: Musa Mbenga (Gambia).

Membership (9): Burkina Faso, Cape Verde, Chad, Gambia, Guinea-Bissau, Mali, Mauritania, Niger, Senegal.

Working Languages: French and English. (The introduction of Portuguese and Arabic as working languages was approved in principle.)

Origin and development. The CILSS was formed in 1973 by Burkina Faso (then Upper Volta), Mali, Mauritania, Niger, and Senegal in parallel with efforts by the new UN Special Sahelian Office to marshal aid for countries seriously afected by the 1968–1973 Sahelian drought. Chad soon joined its neighbors in the CILSS, as did Gambia in 1974 and Cape Verde in 1975. By then the Special Sahelian Office was superseded by the UN Sudano-Sahelian office (UNSO), which closely coordinated its activities with the CILSS. (In 1994 the UNSO was reorganized as the UN Development Programme's Office to Combat Desertification and Drought, which was replaced in 2002 by the Drylands Development Centre in Nairobi, Kenya.)

In its first year of existence the CILSS proposed some 300 projects directed toward its principal goals: preparing for future droughts and thereby mitigating their adverse effects, achieving regional security in cereals and other staple foods, and advancing development. The first Sahelian UNSO/CILSS donor conference in July 1975 in Geneva, Switzerland, attracted considerable support for some 50 short-term projects expected to cost $150 million. Also in 1975 the CILSS and various donor countries agreed to establish the Sahel Club, which was inaugurated in March 1976 as an informal forum for coordination and strategy formulation.

In 1984 the CILSS approved the establishment of the Sahel Fund to finance and coordinate national food strategies. The most recent member, Guinea-Bissau, joined in 1986.

Structure. The CILSS was initially a relatively unstructured organization that met in plenary session at least once per year to approve an annual budget and discuss major undertakings. At other times it held joint meetings with such bodies as the UN Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) to address matters of common concern.

At present, the principal CILSS policymaking organs are the Conference of Heads of State or Government, which meets every three years to provide general direction and define major objectives, and a Council of Ministers, which is charged with realizing the organization's objectives. A Regional Committee for Programming and Follow-up reports to the ministers, while an Executive Council monitors overall operations, including budget preparation. The Executive Secretariat is headed by an executive secretary, who serves a three-year term, and includes four councilors responsible for food security, natural resources management, planning, and communications. Affiliated specialized agencies are the Sahel Institute in Bamako, Mali, and the Agrometeorology and Operational Hydrology Center (Agrhymet) in Niamey, Niger.

Activities. In the 1980s regional programs were created to develop an early warning system for food shortages, improve the quality and distribution of grain seeds, expand water supplies, protect plant life, educate the population on ways to counter the effects of drought and desertification in everyday life, and promote alternative energy sources. In addition, the Conference of the Heads of State addressed several related problems, including the region's economic difficulties and its high population growth rate.

The 1992 CILSS summit endorsed a "renewed mandate" for the organization, which experienced severe financial problems for several years because of arrears in members' payments. With the financial crisis continuing, the 11th summit, held in April 1994 in Praia, Cape Verde, approved a cut-back in the CILSS staff from more than 100 employees to approximately 30. The heads of state also agreed to solicit additional external aid for the grouping, based in part on an expanded CILSS emphasis on economic integration, which presumably would make the region more attractive to international investors. As a result of subsequent discussions about assuring adequate funding, the CILSS established the Foundation for Sustainable Development of the Sahel.

At the 12th heads of state and government summit, held in September 1997, in Banjul, Gambia, many outside donors praised the CILSS for its progress. The European Union (EU), for one, called the CILSS one of the continent's most credible institutions and announced it would be one of the three primary organizations in the region to play an important role in the implementation of the Convention for West Africa between the EU and affiliated African, Caribbean, and Pacific (ACP) countries. However, the donors stressed that their continued support was contingent on members meeting their financial obligations to the CILSS. The financial situation of the CILSS was described as "precarious," with the amount members owed to the committee totaling more than $1 million in 1996. To help raise money, the heads of state and government endorsed a Council of Ministers' proposal to set up an endowment.

In late 1998 CILSS ministers, meeting in Banjul, approved a program geared toward assisting women's organizations and improving the management of land and water resources in cooperation with the Islamic Development Bank (IDB) and Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC). Particularly since a June 1994 CILSS-sponsored Regional Conference on Land Tenure and Decentralization, held in Praia, the CILSS had also placed greater emphasis on land tenure issues, and a Project on Local Development in the Sahel (Projet d'Appui au Développement Local au Sahel—PADLOS) was set up to study national land policies.

The 13th CILSS summit convened November 25–26, 2000, in Bamako immediately after sessions of the Regional Committee and the Council of Ministers. Leadership of the Conference of Heads of State and Government passed to Mali's Alpha Oumar Konaré, while Musa Mbenga of Kenya was elected executive secretary for a term that began in February 2001. At the council session ministers reported that, once again, the Sahel was experiencing a “large cereal deficit.”

Convening January 25, 2004, in Nouakchott, Mauritania, the 14th conference reappointed Secretary General Mbenga for a second term and passed the leadership reins to the host country’s president, Maaouya Ould Sid’ Ahmed Taya. Most significantly, the conference resolved to reorient the CILSS toward its original objectives of fighting desertification, addressing regional water needs, and establishing food security. In addition to redefining its focus, the CILSS sought to eliminate duplication of efforts by other regional organizations and to emphasize funding for projects with concrete goals.

This refocusing of attention seems to have helped. Annual crop yields in 2004 and 2005, despite poor rains, were considerably better than forecasted. With better food security, the organization had the opportunity to plan forward. In April 2006 it announced a grant of 79 million euros ($102 million) for a system of 500 solar-powered well pumps throughout its territory. This project was targeted for completion in 2008.

REGIONAL AND SUBREGIONAL DEVELOPMENT BANKS

---

Regional development banks are intended to accelerate economic and social development of member states by promoting public and private investment. The banks are not meant, however, to be mere financial institutions in the narrow sense of the term. Required by their charters to take an active interest in improving their members' capacities to make profitable use of local and external capital, they engage in such technical assistance activities as feasibility studies, evaluation and design of projects, and preparation of development programs. The banks also seek to coordinate their activities with the work of other national and international agencies engaged in financing international economic development. Subregional banks have historically concentrated more on integration projects than have regional development banks.

African Development Bank (AfDB)

Banque Africaine de Développement (BAD)

The Articles of Agreement of the AfDB were signed August 4, 1963, in Khartoum, Sudan, with formal establishment of the institution occurring in September 1964 after 20 signatories had deposited instruments of ratification. Lending operations commenced in July 1966 at the bank's headquarters in Abidjan, Côte d'Ivoire.

Until 1982 membership in the AfDB was limited to states within the region. At the 1979 Annual Meeting the Board of Governors approved an amendment to the bank's statutes permitting non-regional membership as a means of augmenting the institution's capital resources; however, it was not until the 17th Annual Meeting, held in May 1982 in Lusaka, Zambia, that Nigeria announced withdrawal of its objection to the change. Non-African states became eligible for membership December 20, 1982, and by the end of 1983 more than 20 such states had joined the bank.

The bank's leading policymaking organ is its Board of Governors, encompassing the finance or economic ministers of the member states; the governors elect a bank president, who serves a five-year term and is chair of a Board of Directors. The governors are empowered to name 18 directors, each serving a three-year term, with 12 seats to be held by Africans. The bank's African members are the same as for the Organization of African Unity (OAU), save for the inclusion of Morocco (no longer a member of the OAU) and the exclusion of the Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic.

While limiting the bank's membership to African countries was initially viewed as a means of avoiding practical difficulties and undesirable political complications, it soon became evident that the major capital-exporting states were unwilling to lend funds without having a continuous voice in their use. In response to this problem, an African Development Fund (ADF) was established in November 1972 as a legally distinct intergovernmental institution in which contributing countries would have a shared managerial role. The ADF Board of Governors encompasses one representative from each state as well as the AfDB governors, ex officio; the 12-member Board of Directors includes six nonregional designees. Nonregional contributing countries—all of whom, except the United Arab Emirates, are now AfDB members—are Argentina, Austria, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, China, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, India, Italy, Japan, the Republic of Korea, Kuwait, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Saudi Arabia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, the United Kingdom, and the United States. In addition, in February 1976 (with effect from April 1976), an agreement was signed by the bank and the government of Nigeria establishing a Nigeria Trust Fund (NTF) with an initial capitalization of 50 million Nigerian naira (about $80 million). Unlike the ADF, the NTF is directly administered by the AfDB. Together, the AfDB, the ADF, and the NTF constitute the African Development Bank Group.

Earlier, in November 1970, the AfDB participated in the founding of the International Financial Society for Investments and Development in Africa (Société Internationale Financière pour les Investissements et le Développement en Afrique—SIFIDA). Headquartered in Geneva, Switzerland, with the International Finance Corporation (IFC) and a large number of financial institutions from advanced industrial countries among its shareholders, SIFIDA is authorized to extend loans for the promotion and growth of productive enterprises in Africa. Another related agency, the Association of African Development Finance Institutions (AADFI), inaugurated in March 1975 in Abidjan, was established to aid and coordinate African development projects, while the African Reinsurance Corporation (Africa-Re), formally launched in March 1977 in Lagos, Nigeria, promotes the development of insurance and reinsurance activity throughout the continent. The AfDB holds 10 percent of Africa-Re's authorized capital of $50 million. Shelter-Afrique, established to facilitate lending that would improve Africa's housing situation, began operations in January 1984 in its Nairobi, Kenya, headquarters. The AfDB has also participated in the formation of the African Export-Import Bank (Afreximbank), which began operation in 1993.

At the bank's 1988 annual meeting U.S. officials surprised observers by announcing that Washington was now willing to support concessional interest rate rescheduling for the "poorest of the poor" African countries. However, African representatives called for additional debt measures, such as extension of maturities and pegging repayment schedules to a country's debt-servicing "history" and "capacity." The bank also called for closer cooperation with the World Bank in structural adjustment lending and pledged to incorporate environmental and women's concerns into project planning. Following up on discussions initiated at the annual meeting on growing arrears in loan repayments and capital subscription payments, the bank announced late in the year that the countries involved faced suspension of existing loan disbursements and would not be eligible for new loans until the arrears were cleared.

During the 1989 annual meeting and 25th anniversary celebration, at which the bank was described as "probably the most successful of the African multinational institutions," the Board of Governors pledged that lending activity would continue to accelerate. On the topic of debt reduction, the bank praised the initiatives launched at the recent Group of Seven summit but called for further measures, including more debt cancellations by individual creditor nations.

A dispute between regional and nonregional members regarding the bank's future continued at the May 1993 AfDB annual meeting as Western nations continued to press for a stricter policy on arrears, better evaluation of project performance, and greater support for private sector activity. In addition, at the insistence of donor countries, an independent task force was established, under the chairmanship of former World Bank vice president David Knox, to review all bank operations. The task force report, released shortly before the AfDB's May 1994 annual meeting, strongly criticized the bank for keeping poor records, maintaining a top-heavy bureaucracy, and emphasizing the quantity of lending at the expense of quality. The report also supported the contention of donor countries that the accumulation of arrears (more than $700 million) had become a threat to the bank's future. The nonregional members subsequently proposed that regular AfDB lending be limited to “solvent” nations, but African members rejected their advice.

Fractious debate continued at the May 1995 annual meeting. Outgoing AfDB President Babacar N’Diaye, blamed by some for the bank’s deteriorating reputation, issued the counterclaim that responsibility rested with the Board of Directors, many of whose members, he charged, were concentrating on their own “finances and perquisites” at the expense of bank activity. Further tarnishing the bank’s image, the governors were unable to elect a successor to N’Diaye, with regional and nonregional members backing different candidates. However, at a special meeting in Abidjan, in late August the Board of Governors, after nine rounds of balloting, finally chose Omar Kabbaj, one-time official of the International Monetary Fund and a former member of the Moroccan cabinet, as the new AfDB president. Shortly thereafter, Kabbaj announced that an external committee would be established to evaluate the bank’s operations, internal structures, and fiscal status. The new president also pledged that the AfDB would immediately begin to give greater emphasis to private sector loans, one issue on which regional and nonregional members appeared in agreement. Meanwhile, talks on the ADF replenishment remained suspended pending Kabbaj’s restructuring proposals, expected by the end of the year.

Under the leadership of Kabbaj the AfDB subsequently cut approximately 240 employees (20 percent of the staff) and otherwise restructured the bank’s operations, paving the way for an infusion of new capital. At the annual meeting held May 21–22, 1996, the ADF was replenished with $2.6 billion, though this entailed a cut from prior levels. The United States’ contribution was significantly lower than in the past, and several other Western nations also reduced their participation. However, led by Japan, 16 nations added another $420 million to the ADF in June. When ADF lending resumed shortly thereafter, the AfDB adopted guidelines recommended by the World Bank under which the number of states eligible for new loans was reduced from 53 to 12.

Although those changes were widely perceived as representing genuine progress, the AfDB “governance report” released in mid-1996 delineated several continuing problems. The report argued that further “stark” measures needed to be taken to prevent the bank from being relegated to the role of a minor player on the continent. Specific issues to be addressed included “incompetence” in some bank operations, low morale among the remaining employees, and a lack of “financial credibility” stemming from arrears of $800 million amassed by 25 out of 53 recipients. (About 75 percent of the late payments were owed by Angola, Cameroon, Congo, Liberia, Somalia, Sudan, and Zaire.)

In July 1996 a special summit was held in Libreville, Gabon, to discuss issues raised in the report and to plot the future of the Bank, particularly in regard to the contentious issue of “control.” Led by Nigeria, some African countries opposed giving Western members additional decision-making power, despite the bank’s weakened condition. The governance report outlined several alternatives, ranging from a 50–50 split of control between Western and African nations, to no change at all (which might have meant the cessation of Western contributions). Compromise alternatives called for a modest increase in Western decision-making power via a reduction in the total number of seats on the executive board as well a revision of AfDB voting procedures.

The debate over how much control the nonregional members should have continued at the May 1997 annual meeting, with the issue tied directly to discussions on the proposed fifth general increase in capital. Some African members reportedly argued that the capital increase should be refused if it meant turning “veto power” over to the nonregional members. A compromise was reached in March 1998 when it was agreed that a capital increase of about 35 percent ($7.65 billion) would be implemented, with the nonregional share being set at 40 percent. Significantly, while the African members were allowed to retain control of 12 of the 18 seats on the Board of Directors, future discussions would require 70 percent (at least one nonregional vote) endorsement by that board on “crucial” issues.

Under President Kabbaj's leadership, significant structural reforms were implemented during the latter 1990s, contributing to improved international credibility for the bank. Collaterally, a vision statement approved by the Board of Governors in 1999 gave greater emphasis to reducing poverty and increasing productivity, with other concerns including good governance, regional cooperation and development, gender mainstreaming, and environmental sustainability. Operationally, the AfDB was rededicated to meeting client needs through strategic planning and compliance monitoring. An executive restructuring, to take effect in early 2002, included the establishment of two additional vice presidencies, raising the total to five. Areas of vice presidential responsibility were defined as planning, policy, and research; operations in the Central and Western regions; operations in the Northern, Eastern, and Southern regions and the private sector; corporate management; and finance. The reorganization also involved establishing two "operational complexes": sector departments, with responsibility for project management, and country departments, with responsibility for such broader areas as macroeconomic analyses, lending policy, and public sector management.

At the same time, lending by the AfDB group resurged. In 2001 new loan commitments reached 2.4 billion units of account ($3.0 billion, at the year-end exchange rate of $1.26 per UA), the highest level in ten years and 20 percent more than in 2000. The total included $1.7 billion in concessional loan commitments through the ADF and $6.4 million from the Nigeria Trust Fund, for a loan to Mauritius. (In 2000 the trust fund approved loans to Botswana, Gambia, and Guinea, the first new commitments since 1996.) The bank also saw a fivefold increase in private sector activity in 2001, which kept with the 1999 vision statement. Countries that received the most AfDB resources were Tunisia, Morocco, and Algeria, while the comparable ADF leaders were Ethiopia, Mozambique, and Tanzania.

Total bank approvals reached $3.28 billion in 2005, compared to $4.32 billion in 2004, $2.62 billion in 2003, and $2.77 billion in 2002. The decline in 2005 approvals from 2004 was attributed to reduction in HIPC debt relief. As of the end of 2005, cumulative disbursements reached $33.3 billion for more than 3,000 loans and grants. In December 2004 the bank won a new three-year replenishment for the ADF of $5.4 billion, a 43 percent increase over the previous three-year replenishment.

In February 2003 the AfDB temporarily moved its headquarters from Abidjan to Tunis, Tunisia, because of the outbreak of civil war in Côte d'Ivoire. International institutions (led by the Group of Eight) subsequently announced plans for the AfDB to manage a new fund slated to provide as much as $10 billion a year to improve infrastructure in Africa. However, some analysts suggested that the parameters of the new initiative might be reviewed in light of the long and often rancorous battle in mid-2005 to elect a successor to AfDB President Kabbaj, who was retiring after ten years in the position. After numerous ballots that weeded out several candidates, the Board of Governors elected Donald Kaberuka, the finance and economy minister from Rwanda, over Olabisi Ogunjobi, a Nigerian who worked at the bank since 1978. It was widely reported that Kaberuka had enjoyed the support of most of the bank's Western members.

Arab Bank for Economic Development in Africa

Banque Arabe de Développement Economique en Afrique
(BADEA)

The idea of an Arab bank to assist in the economic and social development of all non-Arab African states was first discussed by the Arab heads of state during the Sixth Arab Summit in Algiers, Algeria, in November 1973. The BADEA, with headquarters in Khartoum, Sudan, began operations in March 1975. Its main functions include financing development projects, promoting and stimulating private Arab investment in Africa, and supplying technical assistance. BADEA financing, which cannot exceed $15 million, is limited to 80 percent of projects with total costs up to $12 million and 50 percent of those above that level. Technical assistance is provided in grant form. All member states of the Organization of African Unity, except Arab League participants, are eligible for funding. To date the preponderance of aid has been devoted to infrastructural improvements although the Board of Directors has also accorded additional priority to projects promoting increased food production. The bank has traditionally favored the least-developed countries in its disbursements.

The bank's highest authority is the Board of Governors (one governor for each member), with day-to-day administration assigned to a Board of Directors, one of whose eleven members serves as board chair. The Board of Governors appoints the bank's director general from among the countries not represented on the Board of Directors. The subscribing members of the bank, listed in descending order of contribution, are Saudi Arabia, Libya, Kuwait, Iraq, United Arab Emirates, Qatar, Algeria, Morocco, Oman, Tunisia, Lebanon, Jordan, Bahrain, Sudan, Palestine, Egypt, Mauritania, and Syria. Egypt's membership was suspended from 1979 to 1988.

In a review of its first 25 years of activity, the BADEA reported that infrastructure received more than 50 percent of total commitments, followed by agriculture (30 percent), energy (8 percent), banking (4 percent), and industry (2 percent). In addition to maintaining support for "traditional fields of intervention," beginning with its 1990–1994 five-year plan the bank has placed greater emphasis on projects with a "direct impact on the life of African citizens," such as water supply and food security projects.

In 2000 the BADEA approved $119 million (for 16 projects) in new loans and $5.0 million in technical assistance (for 21 projects), for a total of $124 million. This marked a significant increase over the 1996 total of $90 million. Lending concentrated on potable water supplies, irrigation, and transportation (roads and rail) but also included projects involving fisheries development, a shipyard, an industrial training center, and a hospital.

In 2000 cumulative commitments reached $2.08 billion for 284 development projects, 15 lines of credit, 14 special emergency aid operations, and 239 technical assistance operations. Cumulative disbursements reached $1.17 billion, while cancellations reached $444 million. The BADEA has also administered 37 "soft" loans totaling $214 million that were extended through the Special Arab Fund for Africa (SAAFA) from its commencement of operations in 1974 until 1977, at which time the SAAFA capital was incorporated into that of the BADEA. The bank's subscribed capital is currently $1.5 billion.

The fourth five-year plan (2000–2004) projected $675 million in new commitments—a 35 percent increase over its predecessor—including $125 million in its first year. In general, loans were to carry an interest rate of 1–4 percent over an amortization period of 18–30 years, with a grace period of 4–10 years. The plan included continued financing of Arab exports to African countries, which the bank has handled as a revolving fund.

The BADEA approved $129 million in new loans in 2001, $134 million in 2002, $140 million in 2003, and $139 million (for 21 projects) and $5.7 million in technical assistance (for 24 projects) in 2004. Lending in 2004 centered on infrastructure projects and agriculture. Cumulative disbursements reached $1.6 billion at the end of 2005. In December 2004 the Board of Directors approved the fifth five-year plan, which projected new lending of $900 million in 2005–2009.

Central African States Development Bank

Banque de Développement des Etats de l'Afrique Centrale
(BDEAC)

The Central African States Development Bank was established on December 3, 1975, as a joint venture of Cameroon, the Central African Republic, Chad, (People's) Republic of the Congo, and Gabon, with Equatorial Guinea, previously an observer, joining as a sixth full member in 1986. The bank commenced operations January 2, 1977, as an affiliated organ of the Central African Customs and Economic Union (Union Douanière et Economique de l'Afrique Centrale—UDEAC), which was succeeded in 1994 by the Central African Economic and Monetary Community (Communauté Economique et Monétaire d'Afrique Centrale—CEMAC; see separate entry). Shareholders include the regional states, the African Development Bank, the Bank of Central African States (Banque des Etats d'Afrique Centrale—BEAC), and the governments of France, Germany, and Kuwait, all of whom are represented on the Board of Directors. The member states hold 51 percent of the bank's capital, some 57.2 billion CFA francs in 2001 ($76.8 million at the year-end exchange rate).

The bank's principal mission is to promote economic and social development through financing multinational and economic integration projects in the borrowing member countries. Particular attention is directed toward productive sectors, including efforts to modernize, convert, and privatize; rural infrastructure and development; and operations that contribute to economic integration and realization of the objectives of the CEMAC.

Throughout the 1990s the bank was under severe pressure as the result of growing arrears in loan repayments, unstable economic conditions in the region, and a series of political crises in various member countries. In fiscal year 1991–1992 only two loans, totaling 3.9 billion CFA ($15 million at the time) were approved, bringing the number of cumulative loans to 85. An external audit in 1992 recommended that the bank's operating costs be reduced, and in early 1993 the bank was temporarily closed and placed under military guard after it was announced that half the 80 staff positions would be eliminated. For the rest of the decade the BDEAC failed to regain its momentum amid efforts to establish appropriate administrative structures and policies in the member states.

On January 9, 2001, Director General Emmanuel Dokoua of the Central African Republic was suspended following allegations of mismanagement, which reportedly included spending more than 200 days abroad (most of them in the Central African Republic) during the 1999–2000 fiscal year, using unauthorized funds to rehabilitate his official residence, and consuming most of the bank's investment budget on personal missions. An audit was undertaken by the BEAC, the central facility for the CEMAC states. The post of director general remained vacant until August, when the CEMAC heads of state, meeting in Franceville, Gabon, named former CAR prime minister Anicet Georges Dologuélé to the post. The heads of state had already indicated a desire to revitalize the BDEAC, and the new director general was expected to move rapidly toward addressing the perennial problem of arrears in loan repayments while also seeking renewed support from external partners.

By 2004 it appeared that Dologuélé made progress in restoring the credibility of the BDEAC, with most outstanding repayments collected and the bank having paid off its own debts. It was also reported that technical experts replaced some "political" appointees on the bank's Board of Directors, while greater authority was given to external shareholders such as France and Kuwait. The BDEAC announced plans to focus new lending on small- and medium-sized businesses. At the end of 2005, BDEAC reported 13.9 million CFA francs ($26.7 million) in loans for the year.

East African Development Bank (EADB)

The charter of the East African Development Bank was contained in an annex to the December 1967 treaty establishing the East African Community (EAC), which collapsed in June 1977 because of tensions among its members: Kenya, Tanzania, and Uganda. Because the bank was not supported by EAC general funds, it remained formally in existence, with headquarters in Kampala, Uganda. Subsequently, a mediator responsible for dividing the community's assets among its former members was charged with making recommendations concerning the bank's future, and in late 1979 a new tripartite treaty providing for a revival of EADB activity was drafted. The bank's revised charter, completed during the first half of 1980 and signed by the three members in July, sought to rechannel the thrust of bank lending toward agricultural, infrastructural, and technical assistance efforts.

The bank's principal organ is the Governing Council, which comprises the members' ministers of finance. A Board of Directors includes representatives of the African Development Bank (AfDB), the three member countries, and the private sector. The Danish International Development Agency (Danida) was also represented until it withdrew from the bank in 2000. An Advisory Panel of international financial experts also meets regularly.

In 1990 it was reported that 71 of the EADB's outstanding loans were in arrears, and officials in late 1991 indicated that the bank was experiencing severe operational problems. Much of the difficulty was attributed to currency devaluations arising from members' imposition of structural adjustment policies requested by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) as a condition for further support. (In 1984 the IMF gave the EADB permission to utilize its special drawing rights [SDR] as a unit of account.) Consequently, only two loans totaling SDR 1.53 million ($2.2 million) were approved in 1991, while the bank suffered the first operating loss in its history. The EADB subsequently announced that a "major restructuring" would be implemented.

In 1995 the bank announced it accepted the recommendations of an external panel of experts, who suggested that the EADB become more aggressive in collecting debts, give greater attention to the quality of its loans, and expand its financial advisory services. In addition, the EADB decided to emphasize export-oriented loans as well as those geared to promote tourism in the region. Lending approvals in 1998 totaled $42.1 million, compared to $30 million in 1996 and 1997.

In 1999 the AfDB announced its intention to increase its equity in the bank from SDR 0.35 million to SDR 5.0 million, and loan approvals rose to SDR 34.6 million ($47.3 million, at the year-end exchange rate) before dropping marginally to SDR 34.0 million ($44.3 million) in 2000. Infrastructure (48 percent) and the service sector (28 percent) accounted for most new loans. At the same time, disbursements rose slightly, from SDR 25.2 million ($34.6 million) in 1999 to SDR 27.3 million ($35.5 million). Total assets at the end of 2000 amounted to SDR 133 million ($174 million).

In 2000 the Governing Council approved a long-term strategic plan for 2001–2005 that envisaged an expansion of assets to SDR 300 million ($391 million), partly in anticipation of strengthened international standing occasioned by the revival of the EAC (see separate entry). The final ratification of the new EAC treaty was accomplished July 7, and the three-member community was formally relaunched January 15, 2001. "Total investments" of $51.2 million were reported in 2003, with disbursements registering $23.5 million. In its annual report for 2004 the bank reported loan approvals for the year of $84.4 million, with disbursements of $29.13 million. Approvals were concentrated in the transport and communications and agriculture and fisheries sectors.

The EADB and the China Development Bank signed an agreement in June 2006 to cooperate in mutually agreed development projects in East Africa. At the signing ceremony, the EADB's Director General Godfrey Tumusiime described EADB as "poised to be transformed into the leading agency for facilitation of East African regional integration and development."

West African Development Bank

Banque Ouest-Africaine de Développement
(BOAD)

An agreement to establish a West African Development Bank was initialed at a Paris, France, summit meeting of French-speaking African states on November 13–14, 1973. The bank formally commenced operations January 1, 1976, with headquarters in Lomé, Togo. The BOAD provides regional financing for the eight members (Benin, Burkina Faso, Côte d'Ivoire, Guinea-Bissau, Mali, Niger, Senegal, and Togo) of the West African Economic and Monetary Union (Union Economique Monétaire Ouest-Africaine—UEMOA; see separate entry), its goal being to promote equitable development and achieve economic integration through priority development projects. The other bank members are the African Development Bank, Belgium, the Central Bank of West African States (Banque Centrale des Etats de l’Afrique de l’Ouest—BCEAO), the European Investment Bank (EIB), France, and the German Development Company. The unit of account is the CFA franc, valued as of July 1, 2006, at CFA 513.01 per U.S. dollar.

The organs of the bank include the Council of Ministers of the UEMOA and a Board of Directors comprising two directors from each UEMOA member, one director from the other six members, and the BOAD president, who serves as board chair.

A meeting of member ministers in October 1983 in Niamey, Niger, yielded approval of a bank proposal to implement regional integration projects, harmonize national development policies, and facilitate maximum utilization of internal and external resources. Later in the decade the BOAD, having considerably expanded its association with the international banking community, pledged to use the additional resources, in part, to assist member states in making the economic policy reforms requested by major international financial institutions. In 1989 the BOAD also agreed to seek regional projects for funding, more than 80 percent of loans to that point having been for strictly national projects.

After undergoing internal restructuring to promote greater efficiency and better evaluation of loan performances, the BOAD announced in 1994 that upcoming lending would increase support for the private sector and efforts to strengthen the region’s financial infrastructure. Much of that activity was expected to take place in conjunction with the new UEMOA, which was established in January 1994 as successor to the West African Economic Community (Communauté Economique de l’Afrique de l’Ouest—CEAO). Since then, the BOAD has been considered a “specialized institution” of the UEMOA.

Industry and agro-industry, rural development, transportation, telecommunications, energy, tourism, and other services have been among the sectors receiving support in recent years. In addition, the bank has supported feasibility studies, development of small- and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs), and partnerships with other financial institutions. Regional integration has focused particularly on agricultural processing and on transport infrastructure.

In 2000 the bank approved some 24 projects—including its first to Guinea-Bissau, for a water and energy project—totaling CFA 72.4 billion ($104 million at the year-end exchange rate) in loans, an increase of about 4.7 percent from 1999. About 62 percent of lending went to the public sector, with greater emphasis on integration efforts and projects promoting poverty control. Lending to the private sector concentrated on privatization, industry, and refinancing for SMEs. BOAD cumulative lending reached CFA 555 billion ($796 million) for more than 300 operations, about two-thirds of them public. Leading recipients were Côte d’Ivoire (26 percent) and Benin (19 percent). The BOAD also participated in the multilateral Highly Indebted Poor Countries initiative, and in August 2001 BOAD President Yayi Boni indicated that the bank intended to move forward with a debt reduction program financed primarily by external sources and linked to reforms in individual countries.

In mid 2002 Boni announced BOAD would expand its support to the least-developed countries in the region, calling on national leaders to cooperate in formulating a new regional “vision” for reducing poverty. The bank, which celebrated its 30th anniversary in 2003, agreed to mobilize outside financial support to assist in integrating the region’s financial markets and to protect private investors. Apparently in support of that initiative, the World Bank in 2004 approved a new financing package for BOAD totaling $409 million for the next five years. Late in 2004 attention focused on a membership application, eventually successful, from China.

Boni’s position as bank president became vacant in April 2006 following his election and inauguration as president of Benin.

SOUTHERN AFRICAN DEVELOPMENT COMMUNITY (SADC)

---

Established: By the Treaty of Windhoek, signed August 17, 1992, in Windhoek, Namibia, by representatives from the ten members of the former Southern African Development Coordination Conference (SADCC); Agreement Amending the Treaty signed August 14, 2001, in Blantyre, Malawi.

Purpose: To achieve self-sustaining development and economic growth based on collective self-reliance and interdependence; to achieve sustainable use of natural resources while protecting the environment; to promote and defend regional peace and security; to enhance the standard of living through regional integration, including establishing a free trade area.

Headquarters: Gaborone, Botswana.

Principal Organs: Summit Meeting of Heads of State or Government; Council of Ministers; Organ on Politics, Defense, and Security; Executive Secretariat.

Executive Secretary: Tomaz Augusto Salomao (Mozambique).

Membership (14): Angola, Botswana, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Lesotho, Madagascar, Malawi, Mauritius, Mozambique, Namibia, South Africa, Swaziland, Tanzania, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Working Languages: English, French, Portuguese.

Origin and development. The SADCC originated in a “Southern African Development Coordination Conference” convened in July 1979, in Arusha, Tanzania, by Angola, Botswana, Mozambique, Tanzania, and Zambia (the “Front-Line States” opposed to white rule in southern Africa). A draft declaration entitled “Southern Africa: Towards Economic Liberation” was drawn up proposing a program of action to improve regional transportation, agriculture, industry, energy, and development planning, with a view toward reducing economic dependence on the Republic of South Africa. As a follow-up to the Arusha meeting, the SADCC was formally established during a summit of the heads of state or government of nine countries (the original five plus Lesotho, Malawi, Swaziland, and Zimbabwe) that convened April 1, 1980, in Lusaka, Zambia. Namibia joined the SADCC after achieving independence in 1990.

The SADCC was considered one of the most viable of the continent’s regional groupings although its actual accomplishments were modest compared to its members’ development needs. During its first six years the SADCC concentrated on the rehabilitation and expansion of transport corridors to permit the movement of goods from the interior of the region to ocean ports without the use of routes through South Africa. In 1986, however, SADCC leaders concluded that such infrastructure development would not reduce dependence on South Africa sufficiently unless accompanied by broad, long-term economic growth in the region. Consequently, the SADCC announced that additional emphasis would be given to programs and projects designed to increase production within the private sector and in enterprises with government involvement, expand intraregional trade, support national economic reform, and encourage international investment. The program of action eventually encompassed some 500 projects including small feasibility studies and large port and railway construction projects.

Throughout the 1980s the conference called for the international community to impose comprehensive, mandatory sanctions against Pretoria to protest apartheid. However, consensus was not attained on regional action, such as the severance of air links with Pretoria, primarily because of objections from Lesotho and Swaziland, the SADCC members whose economies were most directly linked to South Africa.

At their tenth anniversary summit in August 1990 the SADCC leaders discussed proposals to expand the conference's mandate and influence, in part by enhancing the authority of the secretariat. The heads of state, concerned with the region's stagnant export revenue and mounting debt burden, emphasized the need to increase intraregional trade over the next decade. In addition, they endorsed "automatic membership" for South Africa once apartheid was dismantled.

While participants in the 1991 summit urged that sanctions be continued against Pretoria pending further democratic "progress," they endorsed preliminary discussions with representatives of the "liberation movements" in South Africa regarding future coordination of economic policies. In addition to possible resolution of the South African issue, peace initiatives in Angola and Mozambique were subsequently cited by SADCC officials as cause for hope that after three decades of violence the region might be headed for a sustained period of peace. With this in mind, a treaty signed August 17, 1992, in Windhoek, Namibia, transformed the SADCC into the SADC, through which members were to seek development and integration in several areas, leading to a full-fledged common market. Although most details of the new organization were left to subsequent negotiations, the SADC members agreed to concentrate for the short term on joint infrastructure development, coordination of investment procedures, and establishment of regional production policies. Arrangements for the free movement of goods, capital, and labor among members were to be made at an undetermined date. The most ardent SADC integrationists also suggested the community might eventually pursue political union, perhaps through a regional parliament, and security coordination.

One immediate concern for the SADC was its relationship with the Preferential Trade Area for Eastern and Southern African States (PTA), established in 1981 with many of the same goals as those adopted by the SADC. In late 1992, with eight of the (then) ten SADC members also belonging to the PTA (with Botswana and Namibia as exceptions), the PTA called for a merger of the two organizations. Not surprisingly, the SADC Executive Secretariat opposed the proposal and at a January 1993 meeting the SADC, reportedly concerned over the PTA's history of ineffectiveness, rejected the overture. However, the SADC subsequently indicated it would try to avoid duplicating PTA activities, suggesting that the PTA could assume full responsibility for economic cooperation among the 11 "northern" or non-SADC countries, with the SADC doing the same for its members.

In one of a summer-long series of remarkable international events precipitated by the democratic transition in Pretoria, the SADC accepted South Africa as its 11th member at a summit held in late August 1994, in Gaborone, Botswana. While welcoming South Africa to their ranks, the other SADC members reportedly expressed concern they might be overwhelmed by its economic might. The summit also began to weigh greater security responsibilities, addressing such proposals as the creation of a mechanism for the peaceful resolution of conflicts among members and the establishment of regional peacekeeping and defense forces. Thus, the SADC defense ministers in November endorsed the concept of a "regional deployment force," which would not be a permanent army but one available for quick mobilization from national armies.

Mauritius became the 12th SADC member in August 1995. The Seychelles and Democratic Republic of the Congo became the 13th and 14th members on September 8 and 9, 1997, respectively, although in 2003 the Seychelles, citing its inability to pay its annual membership fee, announced its intention to withdraw as of mid-2004. At the same time, Madagascar expressed its interest in joining. The 2005 summit welcomed Madagascar as its 14th member.

Structure. Under the terms of the Lusaka Declaration issued in 1980, individual members of the SADCC were assigned coordinating roles over specified economic concerns. Thus, in July 1980 the conference's first operational body, the Southern African Transport and Communications Commission, was formed under Mozambique's leadership. Other states received the following assignments: Angola, energy; Botswana, livestock production, animal disease control, and crop production research; Lesotho, soil and water conservation, land utilization, and tourism; Malawi, fisheries, forestry, and wildlife; Swaziland, manpower development and training; Tanzania, industry and trade; Zambia, development funding and mining; and Zimbabwe, regional food security.

When the SADC was established to replace the SADCC in 1992, it was decided to keep the existing SADCC structure intact for the time being, with additional or reassigned sectoral responsibilities subsequently made: Mauritius, tourism; Mozambique, culture, information, and sports; Namibia, marine fisheries and resources; South Africa, finance and investment; and Zambia, employment and labor. Other changes were made in response to the community's postapartheid regional security concerns, which led in mid-1996 to creation of an Organ on Politics, Defense, and Security. The objectives of the organ included fostering cooperation with regard to issues of law and order, defending against external aggression, and promoting democracy. The organ was also authorized to mediate domestic disputes and conflicts between members.

At an extraordinary summit held March 9, 2001, in Windhoek the SADC approved a report on restructuring that called for phasing out, within two years, the nearly two dozen sector coordinating units and replacing them with four directorates:

trade, finance, industry, and investment; infrastructure and services; food, agriculture, and natural resources; and social and human development and special programs. The structural reform was viewed as essential to advancing regional integration and strategic planning, efficient use of available resources, and equitable distribution of responsibilities.

Under the reorganization, the SADC's chief policymaking organ, the Summit of Heads of State or Government, meets at least once per year, with the position of chair continuing to rotate annually. Between summit meetings, policy responsibility rests on a troika of the SADC chair, his predecessor, and his successor, with other national leaders co-opted as needed. The Organ on Politics, Defense, and Security was given a rotating chairmanship, with the organ's internal structure and functions detailed in a Protocol on Politics, Defense, and Security that was signed at the August 2001 summit. The Council of Ministers remains responsible for policy implementation and organizational oversight. A Standing Committee of Senior Officials, comprising a permanent secretary from each member country, serves as a technical advisory body to the council, with an emphasis on planning and finance.

In addition, the restructuring called for creation of an Integrated Committee of Ministers (ICM) to ensure "proper policy guidance, coordination and harmonization of cross-sectoral activities." The ICM, replacing the Sectoral Committee of Ministers, is primarily responsible for overseeing and guiding the work of the new directorates. It answers to the council and includes at least two ministers from each SADC state. To provide policy coordination, particularly with regard to interstate politics and international diplomacy, a new body, the Ministers of Foreign Affairs, Defense, and Security, was subsequently added to the SADC structure.

Duties of the secretariat, which is headed by an executive secretary, include strategic planning, management of the comprehensive SADC program of action, and general administration. Within the secretariat, a new Department of Strategic Planning, Gender, and Development and Policy Harmonization was established. At the individual state level, representatives of government, the private sector, and civil society meet as SADC national committees to provide input to the central SADC organs and to oversee programs within each jurisdiction.

During the 2000 summit SADC leaders signed a protocol establishing an SADC tribunal, as provided for in the founding treaty. The tribunal will have with responsibility for interpreting the treaty and subsidiary documents and for adjudicating disputes between members.

Activities. The dominant concern for the SADC in 1995 remained the “dual membership” problem regarding the PTA, an issue further complicated by the recent signing of a treaty establishing the Common Market of Eastern and Southern Africa (Comesa). Although most SADC members signed the treaty, several postponed ratification, while South Africa and Botswana indicated their lack of interest in the alignment. Consequently, the SADC summit held August 28 in Johannesburg, South Africa, called for an immediate joint summit between the SADC and PTA/Comesa to resolve the matter. Meanwhile, SADC leaders endorsed the proposed elimination of trade barriers between SADC members and the establishment of a common SADC currency. The summit also signed a protocol for cooperation in water management and launched negotiations on similar protocols in the areas of tourism and energy.

During the summit held August 23–24, 1996, in Maseru, Lesotho, the SADC again declined to merge with Comesa and instead reemphasized its own goal of establishing a Southern Africa Free Trade Area within eight years. (Lesotho and Mozambique subsequently announced they did not intend to ratify the Comesa treaty, while Tanzania eventually dropped out in favor of continued membership in the SADC.) Other protocols were also signed at the SADC summit in the areas of energy, transportation and communications, and illicit narcotics, although an agreement could not be reached on the free movement of people among the SADC countries.

The Organ on Politics, Defense, and Security, launched at the 1996 summit, was at the center of controversy at the September 1997 summit, particularly because of its relative independence from the other SADC institutions. South African President Nelson Mandela, chair of the summit, insisted on bringing the organ under the direct control of the summit, while Zimbabwean President Robert Mugabe, chair of the organ, opposed such a move. Mandela also surprised the summit by proposing the SADC punish members via sanctions if they did not adopt the democratic values central to the organization. His proposal was particularly aimed at Swaziland’s King Mswati III and Zambian President Frederick Chiluba, both of whom were unmoved, in Mandela’s opinion, by attempts to encourage democracy in their countries.

A March 1998 SADC summit established a high-level committee to address the lingering question of how the community should respond to domestic political and security problems. Particular concern was expressed over renewed turmoil in Angola and the troubled nature of political affairs in Lesotho. In May the SADC sent observers to monitor the legislative elections in the latter country; although the SADC team initially approved the conduct of the election, the community was subsequently drawn into a dispute over opposition charges that massive fraud had occurred.

An SADC summit in late July 1998 in Namibia attempted to refocus the community’s attention on economic cooperation. Attendees pledged to eliminate tariffs and other restrictions on 90 percent of intracommunity trade by 2005. However, security matters, particularly the recent outbreak of fighting in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC), returned to the fore at the SADC summit September 13–15 in Mauritius. Several countries urged action in support of the government of DRC President Laurent Kabila; SADC members Angola, Namibia, and Zimbabwe reportedly had already sent troops to the DRC to oppose anti-Kabila rebels. The SADC summit, at Kabila’s insistence, refused to meet with the representatives of Rwanda and Uganda (apparent supporters of the DRC rebels) who traveled to Mauritius to discuss the matter.

The SADC's role in domestic affairs became even more clouded shortly after the summit when South African and then Botswanan troops entered Lesotho to quell unrest generated by anger over the May election, which was followed by a mutiny within the Lesotho Defense Force (LDF). The initiative was described as an SADC intervention based on the community's established principles and procedures, but some SADC members reportedly objected to that classification. By May 1999 an advisory team mandated to help retrain and restructure the LDF replaced the troops.

The 19th summit, held August 18–19, 1999, in Maputo, Mozambique, was dominated by the ongoing instability in the DRC and Angola. Although the summit offered what was described as “moral support” to Angola's government in its campaign against rebel forces, DRC President Laurent Kabila withdrew from the meeting because of what he considered its lack of support for his regime. In economic affairs, the summit confirmed its intention to move forward with establishing a Southern Africa Free Trade Area, as provided for in 1996. Concern was expressed, however, about how small- and medium-sized local businesses should be protected as trade barriers drop.

The August 6–7, 2000, summit in Windhoek drew widespread international criticism for a decision to support the Mugabe government's expropriation of white-owned land in Zimbabwe. The summit's final communiqué also focused on such economic concerns as rising external debt, a regional cereal deficit, the HIV/AIDS crisis, and continuing poverty. The communiqué noted that GDP growth among member states recently rose, but not at the projected 6.8 percent annual rate needed to achieve actual poverty reduction. The crisis in the DRC, which at a January 16 summit generated a call from the SADC for the deployment of UN peacekeepers, also remained an ongoing concern.

The March 9, 2001, summit in Windhoek, in addition to approving the organizational changes called for in a report on restructuring (see Structure, above), elected Mauritian Prega Ramsamy as successor to Namibian Kaire Mbuende, who was dismissed as executive secretary in 2000. In addition, the summit continued to emphasize matters of defense and security. Considerable tension, particularly between South Africa and Zimbabwe, arose over Robert Mugabe's refusal to step aside as chair of the Organ on Politics, Defense, and Security. Some members clearly felt that Mugabe had misused his position in support of the Kabila regime in the DRC. Subsequently, however, it was agreed that the chairmanship would pass to Mozambique's President Chissano at the August 12–14 annual summit. Held in Blantyre, Malawi, the annual session again focused on regional security issues but also formally approved a package of treaty amendments to accommodate the previously accepted structural reforms. The summit additionally authorized formation by Botswana, Mozambique, and South Africa of a task force to confer with Zimbabwe on domestic economic and political issues. Fearing that the land reform crisis would spill over into neighboring countries, the SADC held an extraordinary summit September 11–12 in Harare, Zimbabwe. For the first time, the Mugabe government was publicly chastised from the chair, by Malawi's Bakili Muluzi, for its methods of land redistribution.

In September 2001 South Africa became the first SADC country to implement the free trade protocol signed in 1996 in Maseru. By then, however, the original free trade target date for the community as a whole was pushed back to 2008, when “substantially all” intra-SADC trade is to become tariff free. Exceptions are to be permitted on a country-by-country temporary basis for “sensitive products.” Looking further ahead, the SADC intends to introduce a customs union in 2010 and a full common market in 2012.

A January 14, 2002, extraordinary summit in Blantyre focused on conflicts and security matters in the DRC, Angola, and especially Zimbabwe. The SADC sent a ministerial delegation to Harare in December 2002 that received reassurances from the Mugabe regime about meeting democratic standards for the forthcoming presidential election, but the conduct of the balloting in March 2002 was nevertheless widely condemned internationally. At the October 2–3, 2002, summit in Luanda, Angola, the SADC took no substantive action with regard to Zimbabwe, the main issue under discussion being drought and a resultant food crisis that was severely affecting Lesotho, Malawi, Mozambique, Swaziland, Zambia, and Zimbabwe.

By the August 25–26, 2003, summit in Dar es Salaam, Tanzania, the food crisis had abated, and the SADC turned its focus to economic and social planning, adopting a blueprint called the Regional Indicative Strategic Development Plan (RISDP). The summit also adopted an SADC Charter on Fundamental Social Rights, a Strategic Indicative Plan for the Organ (SIPO), and a mutual defense pact. The defense pact provides for collective action against armed attack and denies support to groups seeking the destabilization of other members, but it continues to uphold the principle of nonintervention in members' internal affairs. Recent security-related measures have also encompassed controlling trafficking in drugs, diamonds, and small arms and light weapons.

A meeting of the Council of Ministers on March 12–13, 2004, in Arusha, Tanzania, officially launched the RISDP, which includes among its economic concerns food security, sustainable growth, trade promotion, regional integration, and development of transport and communications infrastructure. To further emphasize the importance given to combating food shortages and chronic malnutrition, the SADC scheduled an extraordinary summit on agriculture and food security for May 2004.

In the area of social and human development, concerns addressed by the RISDP include gender equality and the AIDS epidemic. In recent years the SADC has given a high priority to advancing gender equality, including the increased participation of women in government and economic development. With regard to HIV/AIDS, however, the SADC's record is less consistent. In July 2003 a special summit on HIV and AIDS convened in Maseru, but only 4 of the SADC's 14 heads of state or government participated in the effort to draft a comprehensive regional plan for confronting the epidemic. How to deal with HIV/AIDS remains a politically charged issue in several SADC countries, especially South Africa. Meanwhile, regional infection rates are among the world's highest, and AIDS has become a major obstacle to economic development.

In the past several years the relationship with Comesa has become less contentious, and a joint SADC/Comesa task force meets regularly. In addition, both have actively supported the African Union's New Partnership for Africa's Development (Nepad). In the wider international sphere, the SADC and the European Union (EU) continue to hold biennial ministerial meetings. SADC/EU working groups have focused on political, security, and economic matters. Negotiations on an SADC/EU Economic Partnership Agreement opened in 2004 in Windhoek. These discussions took a different direction in March 2006 when the SADC, under South African leadership, asked the EU to negotiate a bilateral agreement with the SADC, as opposed to discussions about joining a larger agreement between the EU and less-developed countries.

At the August 2005 summit in Gaborone, Botswana, Tomaz Augusto Salomao of Mozambique was appointed as the new SADC executive secretary. Other activity included the appointment of the first five members of the SADC tribunal. Also in 2005 the SADC activated the first standby brigade of five planned brigades of SADC peace-keeping forces. The force was planned to be full strength by 2010. In June 2006 South Africa proposed that the standby brigade be augmented by a military inspection and surveillance organization, to be called the African Defense Audit Association.

UNITED NATIONS (UN)

---

Established: By charter signed June 26, 1945, in San Francisco, United States, effective October 24, 1945.

Purpose: To maintain international peace and security; to develop friendly relations among states based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples; to achieve international cooperation in solving problems of an economic, social, cultural, or humanitarian character; and to harmonize the actions of states in the attainment of these common ends.

Headquarters: New York, United States.

Principal Organs: General Assembly (all members), Security Council (15 members), Economic and Social Council (54 members), Trusteeship Council (5 members), International Court of Justice (15 judges), Secretariat.

Secretary General: Kofi Annan (Ghana).

Membership: 192.

Official Languages: Arabic, Chinese, English, French, Russian, Spanish. All are also working languages.

Origin and development. The idea of creating a new intergovernmental organization to replace the League of Nations was born early in World War II and first found public expression in an Inter-Allied Declaration signed on June 12, 1941, in London, England, by representatives of five Commonwealth states and eight European governments-in-exile. Formal use of the term United Nations first occurred in the Declaration by United Nations, signed on January 1, 1942, in Washington, D.C., on behalf of 26 states that subscribed to the principles of the Atlantic Charter (August 14, 1941) and pledged their full cooperation for the defeat of the Axis powers. At the Moscow Conference on October 30, 1943, representatives of China, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom, and the United States proclaimed that they “recognized the necessity of establishing at the earliest practicable date a general international organization, based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states, and open to membership by all such states, large and small, for the maintenance of international peace and security.” In meetings in Dumbarton Oaks, Washington, D.C., between August 21 and October 7, 1944, the four powers reached agreement on preliminary proposals and determined to prepare more complete suggestions for discussion at a subsequent conference of all the United Nations.

Meeting from April 25 to June 25, 1945, in San Francisco, California, representatives of 50 states participated in drafting the United Nations Charter, which was formally signed June 26. Poland was not represented at the San Francisco Conference but later signed the charter and is counted among the 51 “original” UN members. Following ratification by the five permanent members of the Security Council and most other signatories, the charter entered into force October 24, 1945. The General Assembly, convened in its first regular session January 10, 1946, accepted an invitation to establish the permanent home of the organization in the United States; privileges and immunities of the UN headquarters were defined in a Headquarters Agreement with the U.S. government signed June 26, 1947.

The membership of the UN, which increased from 51 to 60 during the period 1945–1950, remained frozen at that level for the next five years as a result of U.S.-Soviet disagreements over admission. The deadlock was broken in 1955 when the superpowers agreed on a “package” of 16 new members: four Soviet-bloc states, four Western states, and eight “uncommitted” states. Since then, states have normally been admitted with little delay. The exceptions are worth noting. The admission of the two Germanies in 1973 led to proposals for admission of the two Koreas and of the two Vietnams. Neither occurred prior to the formal unification of Vietnam in 1976, while action in regard to the two Koreas was delayed for another 15 years. On November 16, 1976, the United States used its 18th veto in the Security Council to prevent the admission of the Socialist Republic of Vietnam, having earlier in the same session, on June 23, 1976, employed its 15th veto to prevent Angola from joining. Later in the session, however, the United States relented, and Angola gained admission. In July 1977 Washington dropped its objection to Vietnamese membership as well.

With the admission of Brunei, the total membership during the 39th session of the General Assembly in 1984 stood at 159. The figure rose to 160 with the admission of Namibia in April 1990, fell back to 159 after the merger of North and South Yemen in May, advanced again to 160 via the September admission of Liechtenstein, and returned to 159 when East and West Germany merged in October. Seven new members (Estonia, Democratic People’s Republic of Korea, Republic of Korea, Latvia, Lithuania, Marshall Islands, and Federated States of Micronesia) were admitted September 17, 1991, at the opening of the 46th General Assembly. Eight of the new states resulting from the collapse of the Soviet Union (Armenia, Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Moldova, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan) were admitted March 2, 1992, along with San Marino. Russia announced the previous December that it was assuming the former USSR seat. Three of the breakaway Yugoslavian republics (Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, and Slovenia) were admitted May 22. Capping an unprecedented period of expansion, Georgia became the 179th member on July 31.

The total dropped back to 178 with the dissolution of Czechoslovakia on January 1, 1993, then moved up to 180 when the Czech Republic and Slovakia joined separately on January 19. On April 8 the General Assembly approved the admission of “The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia,” the name being carefully fashioned because of the terminological dispute between the new nation and Greece. Monaco and newly independent Eritrea were admitted May 28, followed by Andorra on July 28. Palau, which had finally achieved independence following protracted difficulty in concluding its U.S. trusteeship status, became the 185th member December 15, 1994. Kiribati, Nauru, and Tonga were admitted September 14, 1999, and Tuvalu joined September 5, 2000.

A change of government in October 2000 led to the November 1, 2000, admission of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY). On September 22, 1992, the General Assembly, acting on the recommendation of the Security Council, decided the FRY could not automatically assume the UN membership of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. The assembly informed the FRY that it would have to apply on its own for UN membership, and such an application was submitted the following day. However, no action on the request was taken by the assembly because of concern over the Federal Republic’s role in the conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina and, later, its actions regarding the ethnic Albanian population in the Yugoslavian province of Kosovo. As a consequence, the FRY was excluded from participation in the work of the General Assembly and its subsidiary bodies. Throughout this period, however, the UN membership of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia technically remained in effect. A certain ambiguity, apparently deliberate, surrounded the issue, permitting the FRY and others to claim that it was still a member, albeit excluded from active participation, while some nations argued that the membership referred only to the antecedent Yugoslavian state. In any event, the flag of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, which was also the flag of the FRY, continued to fly outside UN headquarters with the flags of all other UN members, and the old nameplate remained positioned in front of an empty chair during assembly proceedings. In October 2000 the Security Council, in a resolution recommending admission of the FRY, acknowledged “that the State formerly known as the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia has ceased to exist.” A representative of the FRY took up the empty seat, and a new FRY flag replaced that of the former Yugoslavia.

On September 10, 2002, the UN admitted Switzerland, which had long maintained a permanent observer mission at UN headquarters and had actively participated as a full member of the various UN specialized and related agencies. The Swiss government, having concluded that UN membership in the post-Cold War era would not jeopardize its long-standing international neutrality, sought admission after winning majority support from Swiss voters at a March 2002 referendum. Timor-Leste became the 191st member on September 27.

In 2003 the FRY became the “state union” of Serbia and Montenegro, which dissolved in June 2006, following a successful independence referendum in Montenegro. Accordingly, on June 28 the world’s newest independent state, Montenegro, was admitted as the UN’s 192nd member. Serbia, as the successor state to the state union, retained the UN seat held to that point by the FRY.

The Holy See (Vatican City State) has formal observer status in the General Assembly and maintains a permanent observer mission at UN headquarters. In July 2004 the UN granted the Holy See the full range of membership privileges, with the exception of voting.

Structure. The UN system can be viewed as comprising (1) the principal organs, (2) subsidiary organs established to deal with particular aspects of the organization’s responsibilities, (3) a number of specialized and related agencies, and (4) a series of ad hoc global conferences to examine particularly pressing issues.

The institutional structure of the principal organs resulted from complex negotiations that attempted to balance both the conflicting claims of national sovereignty and international responsibility, and the rights of large and small states. The principle of sovereign equality of all member states is exemplified in the General Assembly; that of the special responsibility of the major powers, in the composition and procedure of the Security Council. The other principal organs included in the charter are the Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC), the Trusteeship Council (whose activity was suspended in 1994), the International Court of Justice (ICJ), and the Secretariat.

UN-related intergovernmental bodies constitute a network of Specialized Agencies established by intergovernmental agreement as legal and autonomous international entities with their own memberships and organs and which, for the purpose of “coordination,” are brought “into relationship” with the UN. While sharing many of their characteristics, the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) remains legally distinct from the Specialized Agencies; the World Trade Organization, which emerged from the UN-sponsored General Agreement on Tariff and Trade (GATT), has no formal association with the UN.

The proliferation of subsidiary organs can be attributed to many complex factors, including new demands and needs as more states attained independence; the effects of the Cold War; a subsequent diminution of East-West bipolarity; a greater concern with promoting economic and social development through technical assistance programs (almost entirely financed by voluntary contributions); and a resistance to any radical change in international trade patterns. For many years, the largest and most politically significant of the subordinate organs were the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) and the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO), which were initial venues for debates, for conducting studies and presenting reports, for convening conferences and specialized meetings, and for mobilizing the opinions of non-governmental organizations. They also provided a way for less developed states to formulate positions vis-à-vis the industrialized states. During the 1970s both became intimately involved in activities related to program implementation, and on January 1, 1986, UNIDO became the UN’s 16th Specialized Agency.

One of the most important developments in the UN system has been the use of ad hoc conferences to deal with major international problems.

Security Council

Permanent Membership (5): China, France, Russia, United Kingdom, United States. (The other permanent members in late December 1991 accepted Russia's assumption of the seat previously filled by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.)

Nonpermanent Membership (10): Terms ending December 31, 2006: Argentina, Denmark, Greece, Japan, Tanzania; terms ending December 31, 2007: Republic of the Congo, Ghana, Qatar, Peru, and Slovakia.

Security Council: Peacekeeping Forces and Missions

In addition to the forces and missions listed below, the United Nations Command in Korea (established on June 25, 1950) remains technically in existence. The only UN member now contributing to the command is the United States, which proposed in June 1975 that it be dissolved. As of mid-2006 no formal action had been taken on the proposal.

United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara

Mission des Nations Unies pour le Référendum dans le Sahara Ouest
(MINURSO)

Established: By Security Council resolution of April 29, 1991.

Purpose: To enforce a cease-fire in the Western Sahara between Morocco and the Polisario Front, to identify those eligible to vote in the proposed self-determination referendum there, and to supervise the referendum and settlement plan.

Headquarters: Laayoune, Western Sahara.

Force Commander: Maj. Gen. Kurt Mosgaard (Denmark).

Composition: As of July 1, 2006, 192 military observers, 6 civilian police, and 27 troops from Argentina, Austria, Bangladesh, China, Croatia, Denmark, Egypt, El Salvador, France, Ghana, Greece, Guinea, Honduras, Hungary, Ireland, Italy, Kenya, Republic of Korea, Malaysia, Mongolia, Nigeria, Pakistan, Poland, Russia, Sri Lanka, and Uruguay. An additional 2,200 troops and observers had been authorized but not deployed because of the lack of progress in referendum negotiations.

United Nations Mission in Ethiopia and Eritrea (UNMEE)

Established: By Security Council resolution of July 31, 2000.

Purpose: To monitor the cessation of hostilities, the redeployment of Ethiopian and Eritrean forces, and the temporary security zone (TSZ); to chair the Military Coordination Commission formed by the UN and the Organization of African Unity; to coordinate and provide technical assistance for humanitarian mine-action activities in and around the TSZ; and to coordinate mission activities with other humanitarian and human rights activities.

Headquarters: Asmara, Eritrea, and Addis Ababa, Ethiopia.

Force Commander: Maj. Gen. Mohammad Taisar Masadeh (Jordan).

Composition: As of July 1, 2006, 3,373 military personnel, including 221 military observers, from Algeria, Austria, Bangladesh, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bulgaria, China, Croatia, Czech Republic, Denmark, Finland, France, Gambia, Germany, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, India, Iran, Jordan, Kenya, Malaysia, Namibia, Nepal, Nigeria, Norway, Paraguay, Peru, Poland, Romania, Russia, South Africa, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Tanzania, Tunisia, Ukraine, United States, Uruguay, and Zambia.

United Nations Mission in Liberia (UNMIL)

Established: By Security Council resolution of September 19, 2003.

Purpose: To support implementation of the recent cease-fire agreement in Liberia; to support humanitarian and human rights activities; and to assist in training national police and the proposed new restructured military.

Headquarters: Monrovia, Liberia.

Force Commander: Maj. Gen. Joseph Owonibi (Nigeria).

Composition: As of July 1, 2006, 14,840 troops, 184 military observers, and 1,051 civilian police from Bangladesh, Benin, Bolivia, Brazil, Bulgaria, China, Croatia, Czech Republic, Denmark, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Finland, France, Gambia, Germany, Ghana, Indonesia, Ireland, Jordan, Kenya, Republic of Korea, Kyrgyzstan, Malawi, Malaysia, Mali, Moldova, Mongolia, Namibia, Nepal, Niger, Nigeria, Pakistan, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Romania, Russia, Samoa, Senegal, Serbia, South Africa, Sri Lanka, Sweden, Togo, Turkey, Uganda, Ukraine, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay, Yemen, Zambia, and Zimbabwe.

United Nations Mission in the Sudan (UNMIS)

Established: By Security Council resolution of March 24, 2005.

Purpose: To support implementation of the peace agreement signed by the government of Sudan and the Sudanese People's Liberation Movement in January 2005; to provide humanitarian assistance; and to protect and promote human rights in Sudan.

Headquarters: Khartoum, Sudan.

Force Commander: Lt. Gen. Jasbir Lidder (India).

Composition: As of July 1, 2006, 8,034 troops, 635 military observers, and 596 civilian police from Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bangladesh, Benin, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Brazil, Burkina Faso, Cambodia, Canada, China, Croatia, Denmark, Egypt, El Salvador, Fiji, Finland, Germany, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, India, Indonesia, Italy, Jamaica, Jordan, Kenya, Kyrgyzstan, Malawi, Malaysia, Mali, Moldova, Mongolia, Mozambique, Namibia, Nepal, Nigeria, Norway, Pakistan, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Romania, Russia, Rwanda, Samoa, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sweden, Switzerland, Tanzania, Thailand, Turkey, Uganda, United Kingdom, Yemen, Zambia, and Zimbabwe.

United Nations Operation in Burundi

Opération des Nations Unies au Burundi (ONUB)

Established: By Security Council resolution of May 21, 2004.

Purpose: To help implement the Arusha Agreement negotiated by the parties to the conflict in Burundi.

Headquarters: Bujumbura, Burundi.

Force Commander: Maj. Gen. Derrick Mbuyiselo Mgwabi (South Africa).

Composition: As of July 1, 2006, 5,650 troops, 200 military observers, and 120 civilian police from Algeria, Belgium, Benin, Bolivia, Burkina Faso, Cameroon, Chad, China, Egypt, Ethiopia, Gambia, Ghana, Guatemala, India, Jordan, Kenya, Republic of Korea, Kyrgyzstan, Malawi, Malaysia, Mali, Mozambique, Namibia, Nepal, Niger, Nigeria, Pakistan, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Portugal, Romania, Russia, Senegal, Serbia, South Africa, Sri Lanka, Thailand, Togo, Tunisia, Uruguay, Yemen, and Zambia.

United Nations Operation in Côte d'Ivoire

Opération des Nations Unies en Côte d'Ivoire (ONUCI)

Established: By Security Council resolution of February 27, 2004.

Purpose: To facilitate implementation of the peace agreement signed by the parties to the conflict in Côte d'Ivoire. (ONUCI was a successor to the United Nations Mission in Côte d'Ivoire [Mission des Nations Unies en Côte d'Ivoire—MINUCI], a political mission that had been established by the Security Council in May 2003.)

Headquarters: Abidjan, Côte d'Ivoire.

Force Commander: Maj. Gen. Gerardo Cristian Chaumont (Argentina).

Composition: As of July 1, 2006, 6,703 troops, 191 military observers, and 707 civilian police from Argentina, Bangladesh, Benin, Bolivia, Brazil, Cameroon, Canada, Central African Republic, Chad, China, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Croatia, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, France, Gambia, Ghana, Guatemala, Guinea, India, Ireland, Jordan, Kenya, Lebanon, Moldova, Morocco, Namibia, Nepal, Niger, Nigeria, Pakistan, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Romania, Russia, Senegal, Serbia, Sri Lanka, Togo, Tunisia, Turkey, Uruguay, Yemen, and Zambia.

United Nations Organization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo

Mission de l'Organisation des Nations Unies en République Démocratique du Congo
(MONUC)

Established: By Security Council resolution of November 30, 1999, which specified that MONUC would comprise the military liaison personnel authorized by a resolution of August 6, 1999. MONUC's authorized strength was increased in October 2004.

Purpose: In cooperation with the Joint Military Commission (JMC) of the states that signed the July 1999 cease-fire accord, to implement, monitor, and investigate violations of the cease-fire; to assist in the disengagement, redeployment, disarmament, demobilization, resettlement, and reintegration of combatants; to assist in planning and conducting mine-action activities; to assist in the release of prisoners of war, military captives, and remains; to facilitate humanitarian assistance and human rights monitoring, in cooperation with various organizations; and to cooperate with and provide assistance to the Facilitator of the National Dialogue.

Headquarters: Kinshasa, Democratic Republic of the Congo. Liaison offices are maintained in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia; Bujumbura, Burundi; Harare, Zimbabwe; Kampala, Uganda; Kigali, Rwanda; Lusaka, Zambia; and Windhoek, Namibia.

Force Commander: Lt. Gen. Babacar Gaye (Senegal).

Composition: As of July 1, 2006, 15,591 troops, 786 military observers, and 1,103 civilian police, from Algeria, Bangladesh, Belgium, Benin, Bolivia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Burkina Faso, Cameroon, Canada, Chad, China, Czech Republic, Denmark, Egypt, France, Ghana, Guatemala, Guinea, India, Indonesia, Ireland, Jordan, Kenya, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Mali, Mongolia, Morocco, Mozambique, Nepal, Netherlands, Niger, Nigeria, Pakistan, Paraguay, Peru, Poland, Romania, Russia, Senegal, Serbia, South Africa, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sweden, Switzerland, Tunisia, Ukraine, United Kingdom, Uruguay, Vanuatu, and Zambia.

Security Council: International Criminal Tribunals

In the absence of a permanent international court with jurisdiction to prosecute and try cases involving accusations of war crimes, genocide, and crimes against humanity, the Security Council established the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) in 1993 and the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) in 1994. Meeting in Rome, Italy, in 1998, a UN conference approved formation of a permanent International Criminal Court (ICC), which by April 2002 had obtained sufficient ratifications for its establishment in July.

As of August 2006 the ICTY had brought public indictments against 161 individuals, including those who had been acquitted and those whose cases had been withdrawn. Twenty-two individuals were serving sentences and 18 had completed their sentences. Fifty-three individuals were detained, nine individuals were on provisional release, and six indicted individuals remained at large.

Biljana Plavšić, former president of the Serb Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina, was one of the most prominent people to surrender. On November 2, 2002, she pleaded guilty to one count of a crime against humanity for political, racial, and religious persecution, and on February 27, 2003, she was sentenced to 11 years in prison. By far the most prominent figure turned over to the court by national forces was former Yugoslav president Slobodan Milošević, who died on March 11, 2006, during his trial.

As of July 2006 the ICTR had brought public indictments against some 75 individuals and had arrested more than 50 people. Twenty-five cases had reached their conclusion (with 22 convictions), and 25 trials were in progress. The highest-ranking defendant, former Rwandan prime minister Jean Kambanda, pleaded guilty to genocide in 1998 and was sentenced to life in prison.

In August 2000 the Security Council unanimously indicated its support for forming a third war crimes tribunal, for Sierra Leone, that began its proceedings in 2003, although not as a subsidiary body of the Security Council. A similar joint criminal tribunal in Cambodia to prosecute and try former Khmers Rouges is expected to begin its proceedings in 2007.

International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR)

Tribunal Pénal International pour le Rwanda (French)
Urukiko Nshinyabaha Mpuzamahanga Rwagenewe u Rwanda (Kinyarwanda)

Formal Name: International Criminal Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for Genocide and Other Such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighboring States, between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994.

Established: By Security Council resolution of November 8, 1994.

Purpose: To prosecute crimes allegedly committed by Rwandans and others in Rwanda, and by Rwandans in neighboring states, between January 1, 1994, and December 31, 1994, the subject offenses being violations of the 1949 Geneva Conventions, genocide, and crimes against humanity.

Headquarters: Arusha, Tanzania. The office of the prosecutor is located in Kigali, Rwanda.

Chief Prosecutor: Hassan Bubacar Jallow (Gambia).

Permanent Judges: Erik Møse (Norway, President), Arlette Ramarosen (Madagascar, Vice President), Charles Michael Dennis Byron (St. Kitts and Nevis), Sergei Alekseevich Egorov (Russia), Mehmet Güney (Turkey), Khalida Rachid Khan (Pakistan), Liu Daqun (China), Theodor Meron (United States), Fausto Pocar (Italy), Jai Ram Reddy (Fiji), Inés Mónica Weinberg de Roca (Argentina), Wolfgang Schomburg (Germany), William Sekule (Tanzania), Mohamed Shahabuddeen (Guyana), Joseph Asoka Nihal De Silva (Sri Lanka), and Andrésia Vaz (Senegal). There are also nine ad litem judges.

Registrar: Adama Dieng (Senegal).

Economic and Social Council: Regional Commissions

The primary aim of the five Regional Commissions, which report annually to ECOSOC, is to assist in raising the level of economic activity in their respective regions and to maintain and strengthen the economic relations of the states in each region, both among themselves and with others. The commissions adopt their own procedural rules, including how they select officers. Each commission is headed by an executive secretary, who holds the rank of under secretary of the UN, while their Secretariats are integral parts of the overall United Nations Secretariat.

The commissions are empowered to make recommendations directly to member governments and to Specialized Agencies of the United Nations, but no action can be taken in respect to any state without the agreement of that state.

Economic Commission for Africa (ECA)

Established: April 29, 1958.

Purpose: To “initiate and participate in measures for facilitating concerted action for the economic development of Africa, including its social aspects, with a view to raising the level of economic activity and levels of living in Africa, and for maintaining and strengthening the economic relations of countries and territories of Africa, both among themselves and with other countries of the world.”

Headquarters: Addis Ababa, Ethiopia.

Principal Subsidiary Organs: Conference of African Ministers of Finance Planning and Economic Development; Sectoral Ministerial Conferences; Technical Preparatory Committee of the Whole; Follow-up Committee on the Conference of Ministers; seven expert-level committees: Women in Development, Development Information, Sustainable Development, Human Development and Civil Society, Industry and Private Sector Development, Natural Resources and Science and Technology, Regional Cooperation and Integration; Secretariat. The Secretariat includes an Office of Policy Planning and Resource Management and six substantive divisions: African Center for Gender and Development, Development Information Services, Development Policy Management, Economic and Social Policy, Sustainable Development, and Trade and Regional Integration. Subregional Development Centers are located in Tangier, Morocco, for Northern Africa; Kigali, Rwanda, for Eastern Africa; Yaoundé, Cameroon, for Central Africa; Niamey, Niger, for Western Africa; and Lusaka, Zambia, for Southern Africa.

Executive Secretary: Abdoulie Janneh (Gambia).

Membership (53): Algeria, Angola, Benin, Botswana, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Cameroon, Cape Verde Islands, Central African Republic, Chad, Comoro Islands, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Republic of the Congo, Côte d’Ivoire, Djibouti, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Gabon, Gambia, Ghana, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Kenya, Lesotho, Liberia, Libya, Madagascar, Malawi, Mali, Mauritania, Mauritius, Morocco, Mozambique, Namibia, Niger, Nigeria, Rwanda, Sao Tome and Principe, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Somalia, South Africa, Sudan, Swaziland, Tanzania, Togo, Tunisia, Uganda, Zambia, Zimbabwe. (Switzerland also participates in a consultative capacity.)

Recent activities. In early 1993 ECA Executive Director Layashi Yaker, a former Algerian trade minister, joined the heads of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) and the African Development Bank in criticizing the industrialized world's handling of the African debt problem, arguing that many of the continent's countries had made "bold efforts to reform and adjust their economies" but were still facing negative resource flows. At the same time, the trio reproached national leaders in Africa for not having pursued regional economic integration with sufficient vigor. In 1994 Yaker told African finance ministers that the role of government in certain economic areas needed to be strengthened rather than weakened, as external donors had insisted. In particular, "public investment" was required in infrastructure and the development of agricultural technology, Yaker argued, while a "close partnership" was needed between governments and other major institutions in defining national economic strategies. Furthermore, in his end-of-the-year analysis of the continent's economic affairs, Yaker renewed his criticism of Western donors for failing to completely honor their commitments under the UN's New Agenda for Development of Africa in the 1990s.

In 1995 Yaker was succeeded as ECA executive secretary by K. Y. Amoako of Ghana, who stressed the need for national governments to provide "a sound and secure environment for private enterprise" in order to attract additional foreign aid. Amoako, a longtime employee of the World Bank, also launched a wide-ranging evaluation and, ultimately, reorganization of ECA operations to improve efficiency and sharpen the ECA's focus. Subsequently, in the spring of 1996, the ECA was given a number of responsibilities in the new $25 billion UN System-Wide Special Initiative on Africa, launched by the World Bank, a number of other UN-related agencies, and the OAU. Among other things, the initiative was designed to expand basic education and health care on the continent, promote "better governance," and improve water and food security. The reforms sought to reduce the number of meetings and reports, to provide greater cooperation with other important actors in Africa, to encourage more technical support for members as well as greater interaction with them, to stimulate the formation of "strategic partnerships," and to refocus the ECA from nine subprograms covering 21 areas to "five core programs and two cross-cutting themes." The five core programs were "facilitating economic and social policy analysis, ensuring food security and sustainable development, harnessing information for development, promoting regional cooperation and integration, and strengthening development management." The two themes, permeating all five core programs, were fostering the leadership and empowerment of women and strengthening the ECA's capacities. In 1997 the ECA's five Multinational Programming and Operational Centers (MULPOCs) were reorganized as Subregional Development Centers (SRDCs) with an expanded mission and a planned increase in their share of the organization's personnel and budget. The SRDCs were established to facilitate planning, integration, development, cooperation, and information gathering and dissemination at national and regional levels.

Recent ECA initiatives have included sponsorship of African Development Forums, the first of which convened in Addis Ababa in October 1999. Looking toward the 2001 Third UN Conference on Least Developed Countries (LDCs), in November 2000 Executive Director Amoako proposed a "New Global Compact with Africa" as a contribution to the ongoing debate over how best to effect debt relief and expand aid to the developing world. In return for increased development assistance, debt relief under a reformed international financial system, and improved market access, "Africa should be able to put in place the necessary political and economic reforms to ensure that their economies take off," Amoako said. He has also advocated, with increasing urgency, a coordinated, expanded program to fight the HIV/AIDS epidemic, noting, during a speech to the April 2001 OAU Special Summit on HIV/AIDS and Related Infectious Diseases, held in Abuja, Nigeria, that health is a prerequisite for development and that “without a healthy population, economic growth is going to remain a mirage.”

In 2002 the ECA reported that growth in Africa was falling short of expectations, and the commission endorsed the recently proposed New Partnership for Africa’s Development (NEPAD). The ECA proposed a “ground up” approach for that initiative, whereby attention would first focus on development at the national level before progressing to the subregional, regional, and continental levels.

ECA activity in 2003–2005 included criticism of increased U.S. subsidies for U.S. agricultural products. The commission called for revitalization of negotiations in the World Trade Organization that would provide better access to global markets for African commodities. The ECA also noted that the much-publicized debt relief initiative of recent years had to date helped only a handful of African countries. Meanwhile, in mid-2005 the ECA urged its members to deregulate and otherwise reform their communication sectors in order to participate in the “information economy.”

WEST AFRICAN ECONOMIC AND MONETARY UNION (UEMOA)

Union Economique et Monétaire Ouest-Africaine

---

Established: By treaty signed in Dakar, Senegal, on January 10, 1994, by the seven West African countries in the CFA franc monetary zone, with effect from August 1.

Purpose: To coordinate the economic policies of the member states, particularly with regard to human resources, territorial management, agriculture, energy, industry, mines, transportation, infrastructure, and telecommunications; to promote regional monetary and economic integration, coordinated trade policies, and a common external tariff; to create a common market based on the free circulation of people, goods, services, and capital.

Headquarters: Ouagadougou, Burkina Faso.

Principal Organs: Conference of Heads of State and Government, Council of Ministers, Commission, Court of Justice, Court of Accounts, Interparliamentary Committee.

President of the Commission: Soumaila Cissé (Mali).

Membership (8): Benin, Burkina Faso, Côte d'Ivoire, Guinea-Bissau, Mali, Niger, Senegal, Togo.

Official Language: French.

Origin and development. The UEMOA was established in 1994 as successor to the West African Economic Community (Communauté Economique de l'Afrique de l'Ouest—CEAO). The CEAO, which traced its origins to an earlier West African Customs and Economic Union (Union Douanière et Economique de l'Afrique de l'Ouest—UDEAO), had been established under a treaty adopted June 3, 1972 in Bamako, Mali, and related protocols signed April 16–17, 1973, in Abidjan, Côte d'Ivoire. CEAO signatory states included Benin (then Dahomey), Burkina Faso (then Upper Volta), Côte d'Ivoire, Mali, Mauritania, Niger, and Senegal; the organization came into formal existence on January 1, 1974, although it did not become fully operational until later that year. In addition to advancing cooperation in such sectors as agriculture, animal husbandry, fishing, industry, transport, communications, and tourism, the CEAO was envisaged as a step toward establishing a regional common market.

Constrained by such factors as income disparities among its members, rising trade barriers enacted by national legislatures, and huge payment arrears, by 1993 the union was described as “virtually moribund.” It had also been damaged in the 1980s by a financial scandal involving misappropriations from its Solidarity and Intervention Fund (Fosidec), which had been created in 1977 to aid development in poorer member states.

By the early 1990s the larger Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS), to which all the CEAO members also belonged, was pushing for establishment of a single West African economic community that would absorb other subregional groupings. Chafing at ECOWAS's presumption of regional preeminence, the francophone CEAO instead moved toward creation of an economic and monetary authority that would function more effectively than the CEAO. Accordingly, at a CEAO summit in January 1994 the participating states signed the treaty establishing the West African Economic and Monetary Union (UEMOA), which superseded the CEAO on August 1, following completion of the requisite ratifications. Guinea-Bissau became the eighth UEMOA member on May 2, 1997.

Structure. The UEMOA's principal policymaking organ is the Conference of Heads of State and Government, which meets annually. Supporting organs include a Council of Ministers; a Court of Justice; an administrative Commission, which is headed by a president elected for a four-year term; and an Interparliamentary Committee. The last was officially installed March 1998 in Bamako, Mali, as an interim step toward creation of a community parliament. Also included within the UEMOA structure is the pre-existing West African Monetary Union (Union Monétaire Ouest-Africaine—UMOA), which was established by a treaty of November 1973 to oversee financial institutions in the West African CFA franc zone. Affiliated with the UEMOA as specialized autonomous institutions are the Central Bank of West African States (Banque Centrale des Etats de l'Afrique de l'Ouest—BCEAO) and the West African Development Bank (Banque Ouest-Africaine de Développement—BOAD; see separate entry under Regional Development Banks).

Activities. At its first meeting held May 1996 in Ouagadougou, Burkina Faso, the Conference of Heads of State and Government called for establishment of a customs union, initially with a target date of January 1998. Although that target was subsequently pushed back by two years, the UEMOA moved progressively toward the twin goals of reducing internal tariffs and establishing a common external tariff. In July 1996 the union initiated a transitional preferential tariff scheme that eliminated internal levies on locally produced agricultural goods and crafts while reducing by 30 percent import duties on industrial products originating within the union. The second UEMOA summit held June 1997 in Lomé, Togo, was quickly followed by a further cut of 30 percent on industrial levies. The summit had also agreed to reorganize the Abidjan stock exchange as a regional exchange, the Bourse Régionale des Valeurs Mobilières (BRVM).

Meeting at Lomé, the Conference of Heads of State and Government convened twice in 1999, in January and December. In January a principal focus was regional indebtedness, with the session's final communiqué noting that, despite successful national efforts to improve government finances, growth and development continued to be hampered by external debt servicing. In December the attendees adopted a Common Industrial Policy and a Convergence, Stability, Growth, and Solidarity Pact. Shortly thereafter, on January 1, 2000, in perhaps the UEMOA's most significant accomplishment to date, the member states, with the exception of politically troubled Guinea-Bissau, eliminated tariffs on all internally produced goods and instituted a common external tariff (CET) capped at 22 percent. In the following two years it also adopted a code governing transparency of public financing, and common policies with regard to energy and agriculture. At the same time, it moved toward accommodation with ECOWAS, in anticipation of the formation of a second regional monetary union by anglophone non-UEMOA ECOWAS members. Although "macroeconomic and political instability" in the region led ECOWAS to delay introducing the second monetary zone until at least 2005, the ultimate goal remains that of merging the parallel unions into a single West African monetary zone.

A growing convergence of views among the UEMOA members and the other ECOWAS countries has also been evident in other multilateral arenas. For example, following conclusion in June 2000 of the Cotonou Agreement between the European Union (EU) and the associated African, Caribbean, and Pacific (ACP) countries, the members' trade and finance ministers collaborated on preparations for negotiating an Economic Partnership Agreement with the EU. A similar strategy was adopted toward World Trade Organization discussions. Concurrently, the UEMOA reached agreement with the United States on improving trade and investment relations and pursued similar arrangements with several Northern African countries. In addition, the UEMOA actively sought to improve world market conditions for a leading regional commodity, cotton, and took steps to prevent use of the CFA franc, with its direct link to the euro, in money laundering and the financing of terrorism.

At the January 29, 2003, Conference of Heads of State and Government in Dakar, Senegal, discussions were dominated by the political crisis that had erupted in Côte d'Ivoire in 2002. While noting such accomplishments as liberalized intracommunity commerce and progress in harmonizing fiscal legislation, statistics, and macroeconomic policies, the conference also cited a number of deficiencies, including delays in adopting a uniform investment code. The conference called for accelerating structural and institutional reforms as well as measures that would permit freedom of movement, liberalize trade in services as well as goods, and establish community-wide rights of residence and entrepreneurship. In other business, the conference decided to move forward with creation of a Union Parliament.

In the following year, Ivorian instability continued to have a significant impact on the other UEMOA states, not only because Côte d'Ivoire's economy had previously accounted for 40–50 percent of the union's collective GDP, but also because the hostilities had deprived landlocked Burkino Faso, Mali, and Niger of access to their principal seaport, Abidjan. As a consequence, in 2002 the economic growth rate within the union had dropped to 2.7 percent, down from the 3.8 percent of 2001 and well below the 2002 projection of 4.4 percent.

At its January 10, 2004, session in Niamey, the conference reaffirmed regional integration as the cornerstone of development and reiterated its commitment to creation of a customs union and common market. To accelerate growth and promote sustainable development, the attendees adopted a Regional Economic Program (Programme Economique Régional—PER) with an emphasis on modernizing infrastructure and reducing cost factors in production. The conference directed the commission, the BCEAO, and the BOAD to seek financing necessary to carry out the PER. Development of agriculture, transportation, and information and communication technology was also given priority.

In its annual report for 2005, UEMOA noted an improved rate of economic growth among its members, 3.6 percent in 2005 as against 3.2 percent in 2004. The report gave credit chiefly to improved agricultural practices. Growth was uneven however, ranging from 7.5 percent for Burkina Faso to 1 percent for Côte d'Ivoire and Togo.

PART FOUR

APPENDIXES

---

APPENDIX A: CHRONOLOGY OF MAJOR AFRICAN EVENTS, 2006

---

ALGERIA

March. Security Forces Remain on Offensive. Security forces launch a campaign against “Islamist militants” (officially estimated to be fewer than 800) in remote mountainous regions.

May 24. Prime Minister Resigns. Prime Minister Ahmed Ouyahia (National Democratic Rally) resigns. He is succeeded the same day by Abdelaziz Belkhadem (National Liberation Front), who announces a largely unchanged cabinet on May 25.

July. Paris Club Debt Payments Set. Algeria repays half of its $8 billion debt to the international Paris Club of official creditors and signs bilateral accords with other Paris Club member countries for early repayment.

September. Exiled FIS Leader Returns, Seeks Peace. Rabeih Kebir of the banned Islamic Salvation Front, saying he wants to “bolster peace,” returns from self-imposed exile in Germany and asks militants to disarm.

ANGOLA

January. Elections Postponed. The constitution remains in the hands of the assembly, and it is widely reported that no elections will take place until 2007, after President José Eduardo dos Santos backs away from his initial affirmation that elections would be held in 2006.

August. Thousands Die in Cholera Epidemic. The World Health Organization reports that more than 2,000 have died in the six-month cholera epi-demio that has now reached all of the country’s 18 provinces.

October. Voter Registration Begins. The official campaign for November voter registration begins, with an election date still unspecified.

BENIN

March 19. New President Elected. President Boni Yayi wins a landslide victory in second-round balloting after leading 26 candidates in first-round balloting on March 5.

BOTSWANA

October. “Diamonds for Development” Campaign Under Way. Government officials take their positive message about the diamond industry, long associated with conflict in Africa, to the UN and other international organizations. President Festus Mogae estimates that diamond revenue to Botswana has enabled every child in the country under the age of 13 to receive free education.

BURKINA FASO

August. Key Opposition Leader Leaves Politics. Joseph Ki-Zerbo, a leading opposition figure and one of the fiercest critics of the Compaoré administration, retires from politics, citing health reasons.

BURUNDI

April. UN Plans to Withdraw Peacekeepers. The UN announces that it will gradually withdraw its peacekeepers during the year.

September. President, Rebels Sign Cease-Fire Agreement. President Pierre Nkurunziza signs a cease-fire agreement with Agathon Rwasa, the leader of the National Forces of Liberation (FNL) rebel holdouts. Negotiations were still pending regarding the final disarmament of the FNL and its conversion into a political party.

October. Rebel Activity Continues. Rebel activity reportedly continues in the north and southwest. Rebels seek release of all political prisoners.

CAMEROON

April. Cameroon Receives Debt Relief. Cameroon reaches its completion point of the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries initiative.

September 22. Cabinet Reshuffled. President Paul Biya reshuffles the cabinet, drawing criticism for not trimming or merging some of the more than 60 ministerial positions.

CAPE VERDE

January 22. Ruling Party Retains Majority. The African Party for the Independence of Cape Verde (PAICV) wins 41 of 72 seats in National People's Assembly balloting.

February 12. President Reelected. Gen. (Ret.) Verona Rodrigues Pires (PAICV) is reelected to another five-year term. Pires receives 50.98 percent of the vote, defeating former prime minister and opposition leader Carlos Alberto Wahnon de Carvalho Veiga, who receives 49.02 percent.

September 14. Private TV Stations Get a Try-out. Cape Verde agrees to a two-month trial period to allow broadcast licenses for privately owned television stations after thousands protest the closing of an independent station a month earlier.

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

January 1. President Bozizé Rules by Decree. Parliament grants the president, Gen. François Bozizé, authority to rule by decree for three months, beginning January 1, to deal with growing violence and economic challenges. Meanwhile, the International Monetary Fund approves $10.2 million in emergency assistance to help stabilize the economy.

February 1. Agreement Allows Repatriation. The CAR signs an agreement with Sudan to provide for the return of 10,000 Sudanese refugees who had lived in the CAR for the past 16 years. The agreement sets the legal framework for voluntary repatriation.

August 18. Rebel Leader Sentenced to Death. Jean-Jacques Larmassoum, who claimed former president Ange-Félix Patassé engaged him to plot to return Patassé to power, is sentenced to death on conspiracy and other charges.

August 30. Former President Convicted in Absentia. Former president Ange-Félix Patassé, who is in exile in Togo, is sentenced to 20 years of hard labor and fined $12,000 after being convicted in absentia of fraud.

September 29. Repatriation Resumes. The CAR allows the UN to resume voluntary repatriation of thousands of refugees to southern Sudan. The effort had been suspended because of extreme violence in the region.

CHAD

March. Soldiers Arrested in Alleged Assassination Plot. More than 100 soldiers are arrested after an alleged attempt to shoot down President Idriss Déby's airplane. In the ensuing unrest, more than 300 are killed in fighting between government troops and rebel insurgents from the Sudanese border.

May 3. President Reelected. President Déby is reelected for another five-year term.

October. UN Cites Urgent Need for Relocations. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees says continued fighting in northeastern Chad and neighboring Darfur, Sudan, will mean moving another 40,000 Sudanese refugees further inside Chad. In response to accusations by the Sudanese government, Chadian officials deny any involvement in fighting between the Sudanese army and rebels.

COMORO ISLANDS

May 14. President Reelected. Ahmed Abdallah Mohamed Sambi is reelected for a four-year term in a unionwide runoff election. The president subsequently reasserts that his country has sovereignty over the disputed French island of Mayotte.

CONGO, DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF THE

February 18. New Constitution Promulgated. President Joseph Kabila signs a new constitution.

June 12. Troops Deployed in Advance of Elections. The EU announces it will send 2,000 troops to safeguard the first democratic elections in the Democratic Republic of the Congo in 40 years. Approximately 17,000 UN peacekeepers are already present.

July 27. Militia Disarms. The three main militia groups in the troubled eastern province of Ituri agree to disarm in exchange for amnesty and army positions.

July 30. Landmark Elections Held. In first-round balloting for the first democratically elected president, incumbent Joseph Kabila wins 44.81 percent of the vote. In second place, with 20.03 percent of the vote, is Vice President Jean-Pierre Bemba of the Movement for the Liberation of the Congo (MLC). In National Assembly balloting on the same day, the People's Party for Reconstruction and Democracy wins 111 of 500 seats, followed by the MLC with 64. The second and final round is set for October 29.

September 20; October 3. Thousands Flee Violence. Armed gangs force approximately 700 people to flee the northeast in September, while at least 1,000 flee the area in October following fighting between army forces and tribal warriors.

CONGO, REPUBLIC OF THE

January 25. Congo Leads African Union. The Republic of the Congo is chosen over Sudan to head the African Union as a result of opposition to the situation in Darfur.

March 9. Congo Debt Relief Approved. The World Bank and the International Monetary Fund determine that the Republic of the Congo qualifies for several billion dollars in debt relief under the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries initiative.

CÔTE D'IVOIRE

January. Withdrawal of Assembly Support Prompts Protests. The International Working Group (IWG) established in 2005 by the UN announces it will not endorse the proposed extension of the mandate of the current assembly, a primary source of support for President Laurent Gbagbo. Protests follow, including the occupation of UN headquarters in Abidjan. Gbagbo later extends assembly mandate; the IWG differs but takes no action.

February. Peace Talks Lead to Promise of Elections. Various factions reach a tentative agreement to hold elections in October. The UN bolsters its peacekeeping mission.

April. Debt Relief Approved. Côte D'Ivoire qualifies for International Monetary Fund and World Bank debt relief.

October 6. Talks Under Way to Resolve Political Crisis. West African leaders begin talks in an effort to break the political deadlock. At issue is the status of President Laurent Gbagbo. Elections tentatively set for October do not take place as rebels fail to disarm and the government halts the identification of undocumented Ivorians.

October 18. Transition Period to Be Extended. The African Union (AU), in accordance with the UN, recommends that Côte d'Ivoire's current transition be extended for 12 more months, with President Laurent Gbagbo remaining in office despite rebel and opposition leaders insisting he step down. The AU also recommends that control of the army be transferred to Prime Minister Charles Konan Banny. The recommendations are to be worked into a new resolution by the UN Security Council.

DJIBOUTI

March 10 and 31. Local Elections Boost President's Power. In regional and communal elections, the Popular Rally for Progress wins overwhelming victories, further solidifying the president's power down to the local level.

May. Drought Continues to Plague Djibouti. Drought is a major concern in the Horn of Africa during most of 2006, prompting countries worldwide to donate hundreds of millions of dollars as the UN makes repeated urgent requests for aid.

EGYPT

February 14. Local Elections Delayed Two Years. President Husni Mubarak postpones local council elections scheduled for April, saying this will provide time to enact laws for greater decentralization. The move is also seen as an effort to block the growing influence of the Muslim Brotherhood, an Islamic group (represented in parliament) that was expected to gain more support in local elections.

April 24. Terrorist Explosions Again Hit Sinai. Bomb explosions allegedly executed by the Islamic group Jamaat al-Tawhid wal-Jihad (Monotheism and Holy War) kill at least 24 people and wound more than 60 in Egypt's southern Sinai resort of Dahab. Israel closes its border with Egypt in response. The explosions mark the third attack in two years at resorts on the Sinai Peninsula.

May 19. "Unprecedented" Security at Sinai Conference. Security forces swarm Sharm el-Sheikh on the Sinai Peninsula in preparation for World Economic Forum.

August. Egypt Praises Hezbollah. Egyptian leaders praise Hezbollah guerrillas for the way they fought the Israelis after Hezbollah members crossed the border and kidnapped two Israeli soldiers, igniting a war in July. Egypt also supplies humanitarian aid to war-torn Lebanon.

EQUATORIAL GUINEA

August 10. Prime Minister, Cabinet Resign. After having been criticized for poor performance by President Teodoro Obiang, Prime Minister Miguel Abia Biteo Borico and the entire cabinet resign. The president subsequently appoints Ricardo Mangué Obama Nfube (Democratic Party of Equatorial Guinea) to head a new cabinet (appointed August 16).

ERITREA

May. Peacekeeping Scaled Back. The UN Security Council cuts its peacekeeping mission for Eritrea and Ethiopia by 1,000 soldiers and extends the mission by only four months instead of the normal six months.

October 18. Eritrea Reportedly Breaches Security Zone. The UN condemns Eritrea's reported incursion into the buffer zone between Eritrea and Ethiopia.

ETHIOPIA

May. Hundreds Face Trial on Treason Charges. Trials of approximately 100 detainees begin despite calls for President Meles Zenawi to adopt a more conciliatory stance toward the protesters, who include journalists and opposition leaders. Most are charged with treason and face possible death sentences.

May. Border Talks End in Deadlock. Eritrea's reported refusal to lift restrictions on UN peacekeepers halts talks between Ethiopia and Eritrea on resuming the demarcation of their common border.

August 16. Hundreds Die in Floods. Flooding from 11 days of rain brings devastation. The UN focuses rescue efforts in the south, where more than half of the 600 deaths occurred.

October 20. Border Security Unstable. Tensions increase along the disputed border between Eritrea and Ethiopia after Eritrea moves approximately 1,500 troops to the area, according to UN officials.

GABON

January 20. New Prime Minister Appointed. President El Hadj Omar Bongo Ondimba appoints Jean Eyéghé Ndong (Gabonese Democratic Party) as prime minister.

October. President to Seek Reelection. President Bongo announces he will seek another term in the December election.

GAMBIA

January. Pay Raise for Government Workers Prompts Economic Concerns. President Yahya Jammeh announces an unbudgeted 10 percent salary increase for all government workers in a move that raises concerns about economic stability.

March. Arrest Made in Coup Plot. A former army chief is arrested after an alleged attempted coup d'état.

August. Refugees Pour into Gambia. Thousands of refugees from Senegal's southern Casamance region flee to Gambia to escape fighting between Senegalese forces and Casamance separatists.

September 22. President Reelected. President Jammeh (Alliance for Patriotic Reorientation and Construction) is reelected to another five-year term with 67.3 percent of the vote.

GHANA

February. Gold Project Gets Financing. The World Bank approves a $75 million loan for a gold-producing project that is projected to generate between $300 million and $700 million for the country over the next two decades.

GUINEA

April 5. President Dismisses Prime Minister. President Lansana Conté dismisses Prime Minister Cellou Dalein Diallo for alleged gross misconduct.

May 29. President Reshuffles Cabinet; Prime Minister Post Vacant. President Conté reshuffles the cabinet, creating six new, large ministries but leaving the post of prime minister vacant.

GUINEA-BISSAU

April. Offensive Resumes against Rebels. The army resumes its offensive against Casamance rebels along the border with Senegal, resulting in approximately 12,000 civilians fleeing the border region and prompting calls for a cease-fire by the UN.

May. UN Appeals for Aid for Farmers. The UN appeals for $3.6 million to help those in northern Guinea-Bissau who were cut off from the rest of the country by land mines, leaving farmers unable to get to the cashew fields in time for the harvest.

Oct. 3. UN Chief Says Guinea-Bissau Risks Setback. UN secretary-general Kofi Annan says in a report that, although Guinea-Bissau has made some progress toward political reconciliation, the country's poverty and political tensions continue to make it vulnerable to the risk of a major setback.

KENYA

February. Corruption Scandal Rocks Government. Three cabinet ministers resign in the wake of a report alleging that up to 30 members of the government had participated in a phony contracts scheme.

March 2. Government Orders Raid of Media. The Kenyan government orders a police raid of a newspaper and its sister television station, outlets critical of President Emilio Mwai Kibaki's handling of recent corruption scandals. The shutdown is only temporarily sustainable.

April 10. Lawmakers Die in Military Cargo Plane Crash. Five members of parliament are among those killed in an airplane crash in the country's north. They were on a peace mission regarding ethnic tensions in an area north of Nairobi.

July 24. Elections Disputed. By-elections to replace the five members of parliament who were killed are hotly contested by the National Rainbow Coalition of Kenya, among others, and are also marred by charges of vote buying.

September. Urgent Aid Requested as Drought Continues. International aid agencies issue urgent appeals for aid as drought continues and 3 million people face starvation.

LESOTHO

October. New Flag Unfurled. On the 40th anniversary of its independence from Britain, Lesotho unveils a new flag.

LIBERIA

January 16. New Government Installed. The country's new government replaces transitional government following elections in late 2005.

March 25. Taylor Extradited. Nigeria honors a request to extradite former president Charles Taylor to stand trial before the UN-backed Special Court for Sierra Leone on charges of crimes against humanity.

April 11. Liberia Qualifies for Debt Relief. With international debt of $3.2 billion, Liberia qualifies for debt relief under the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries initiative, the International Monetary Fund announces.

June. Taylor to Be Tried at The Hague. The International Court of Justice at The Hague agrees to host Taylor's war crimes trial. The court in Sierra Leone, fearing renewed tensions in the region, had asked that the trial be moved.

July 24. Electricity Restored. Fulfilling a promise made at her inauguration, President Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf turns on street lights in Monrovia, which had been without electricity for 15 years.

October 20. Sanctions Lifted. The UN Security Council announces it will relax trade sanctions it imposed on Liberia's timber in 2003. Earlier in the year the Security Council had partially lifted an embargo on the importation of arms to Liberia.

LIBYA

March 5. Prime Minister Appointed. Al-Baghdadi Ali al-Mahmudi is appointed as secretary general of the General People's Committee (prime minister) by the General People's Congress. The cabinet is reshuffled, with six new secretaries added.

May 15. United States Restores Full Diplomatic Ties. The United States restores full diplomatic relations with Libya and removes Libya from its list of state sponsors of terror. Diplomatic ties had been severed since 1980.

October. Arms Contracts Near. Reports indicate that Libya and France are close to reaching an agreement on arms sales to Libya.

MADAGASCAR

March. Protests Canceled. Major rallies by opposition groups seeking amnesty for those arrested in the 2001–2002 conflict are canceled after the government deploys riot police in the capital.

May 10. New Presidential Election Set. Madagascar's high court upholds President Marc Ravalomanana's recommendation to hold new presidential balloting on December 3.

September 4. Opposition Blasts "Unconstitutional" Election Plan. The opposition demands that President Ravalomanana resign, claiming he has circumvented the constitution by organizing elections before the end of the constitutional term.

MALAWI

February. High Court Overrules President's Attempt to Dismiss Vice President. The high court rules that President Bingu wa Mutharika lacks the constitutional authority to dismiss Vice President

Cassim Chilumpha on charges related to undermining the government.

April. Chilumpha Arrested. Chilumpha, accused of plotting to assassinate Mutharika, is arrested on treason charges.

April. Aid Program Approved. Citing economic progress, the International Monetary Fund approves a three-year aid program.

July 27. Former President Arrested. The Anti-Corruption Bureau charges former president Bakili Muluzi with 42 counts of corruption, fraud, and theft.

September. Debt Canceled. Malawi qualifies for debt relief under the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries initiative.

MALI

January. Mali, China Agree on Economic Pact. Mali signs a broad economic agreement with China. Mali will export more cotton to China; in exchange, China will expand investment in Mali's agriculture, tourism, and telecommunications sectors.

May. "Taureg Issue" Resurfaces. Taureg fighters launch attacks on several cities and military bases in the north.

July. Rebels Agree to Halt Fighting. Taureg rebels agree to stop their militancy in return for intensified government investment in the northern region.

MAURITANIA

February. EU Aids Transitional Government. The European union offers $7 million to help with the government transition following a bloodless coup in 2005.

June 25. Constitutional Amendments Approved. In a referendum, voters overwhelmingly approve amendments proposed by the transitional government to limit a president to two terms of five years each and set a maximum age limit of 75 for a president.

MAURITIUS

October. Preferential Trade Agreement Readied with India. India and Mauritius are poised to sign a preferential trade agreement, which would go into effect in 2007.

MOROCCO

January. Free Trade Agreement Under Way. Morocco's free trade agreement with the United States, negotiated in 2004, goes into effect.

February. U.S. Praises Counterterrorism Efforts. U.S. secretary of defense Donald Rumsfeld visits Morocco and praises King Mohamed VI for his cooperation with U.S. counterterrorism efforts.

MOZAMBIQUE

April. No Agreement on Electoral Reforms. A bipartisan assembly commission, established in 2005 to propose electoral law reforms, disbands without reaching agreement.

July 1. New Currency Introduced. A "new metical" is introduced, but both old and new meticals will be legal tender through the end of the year.

July 3. Debt Canceled. The World Bank cancels most of Mozambique's debt under a plan agreed on by the Group of Eight (G-8) nations at a 2005 summit.

NAMIBIA

June 17. Government Responds to Polio Outbreak. The government begins widespread immunization campaigns (through August) to eradicate an outbreak of polio.

NIGER

January. Food Crisis Prompts Urgent Appeal for Aid. The International Monetary Fund joins an urgent appeal for donor assistance to alleviate the food crisis in Niger.

NIGERIA

January. Turmoil Disrupts Oil-Rich Niger Delta Region. Two groups claim responsibility for several attacks on pipelines and kidnappings designed to disrupt production and to prompt compensation for environmental damage done by oil companies in the state of Bayelsa.

March 25. Nigeria Extradites Former Liberian President. At the request of Liberian president Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf, Nigeria arrests Charles Taylor, turning him over to a special UN court for trial on charges of crimes against humanity.

April 21. Nigeria Pays Off International Debt. Capitalizing on high oil prices, Nigeria makes its final installment payment to the Paris Club of creditor nations.

May. Senate Rejects Changes to Constitution. The Senate rejects proposed changes to the constitution, which would have allowed President Olusegun Obasanjo to stand for a third term in 2007.

June. Court Orders Oil Company to Pay “Reparations.” One of the groups that claimed responsibility for pipeline attacks and kidnappings declares a “cease-fire” after a Nigerian court orders the Shell oil company to pay $1.5 billion in environmental “reparations.”

August. Nigeria Turns Over Disputed Land to Cameroon. Nigeria hands over the disputed Bakassi Peninsula to Cameroon under the terms of a 2002 International Court of Justice ruling. The Nigerian government resettles those who were living on the peninsula.

RWANDA

January. Governors Appointed for New Provinces. In accordance with constitutional amendments approved in late 2005, Rwanda’s provinces are reduced from 12 to 5, and governors are appointed in each province for the duration of the transition period until elections.

February. Constitutional Change Aids Returning Refugees. The language in the constitution regarding property rights is strengthened to assist returning refugees in recovering their property.

May. U.S. Boosts Bilateral Aid. During a meeting between President Paul Kagame and President George W. Bush in Washington, the United States announces it is increasing bilateral aid to Rwanda.

SAO TOME AND PRINCIPE

March. Prime Minister Appointed. Tomé Soares da Vera Cruz is appointed as prime minister by the president following the legislative elections of March 26. Vera Cruz heads a minority government.

July 30. President Reelected. Fradique de Menezes is reelected (as the candidate of an alliance of the Democratic Movement of Forces for Change and the Party of Democratic Convergence) for a second five-year term.

August 29. Opposition Leader Resigns. Guilherme Posser da Costa, president of the main opposition party, Movement for the Liberation of Sao Tome and Principe–Social Democratic Party, resigns. He cites his role in the party’s defeat in the most recent local, legislative, and presidential elections.

SENEGAL

February. Former Prime Minister Released from Prison. A special anticorruption court dismisses embezzlement and subversion charges against former prime minister Idrissa Seck. He is released from prison, enabling him to launch his 2007 presidential campaign.

August–October. Army, Casamance Rebels Clash; Thousands Seek Refuge in Gambia. The army launches an offensive against Casamance separatists, forcing thousands of refugees to flee to Gambia.

SEYCHELLES

May. Assembly Rejects Opposition’s Election Proposal. An opposition motion to dissolve the assembly to allow for parliamentary elections at the same time as presidential balloting in 2006—a year ahead of schedule—is rejected by the full body.

July 28–30. Michel Elected President. James Alix Michel (Seychelles People's Progressive Front) is elected to a five-year term in presidential balloting. Joseph Belmont, Michel's running mate, is elected as vice president.

SIERRA LEONE

January. Mano River Peace Talks Held. Representatives from Sierra Leone, Liberia, and Guinea meet to discuss ways to restore peace in the Mano River basin.

May. Government Cited for Poverty Reduction Efforts. The International Monetary Fund, citing the government's "considerable progress" toward economic stability and addressing widespread poverty, approves a new three-year poverty reduction program for Sierra Leone.

July. New Election Boundaries Raise Concerns. The National Electoral Commission draws criticism for creating new election boundaries that reportedly favor the ruling Sierra Leone People's Party.

August 4. Election Set for July 28, 2007. President Ahmad Tejan Kabbah announces that the next presidential election will be held during the rainy season. Opposition groups criticize the date, saying some regions are hard to reach during the rainy season.

SOMALIA

February. Transitional Assembly Meets for First Time. The full Transitional National Assembly meets for the first time. Following riots prompted by the publication in Denmark of cartoons deemed offensive to Muslims, fighting intensifies in Mogadishu between the Islamic Courts Union (ICU) militias and the warlords, who earlier formed the Alliance for the Restoration of Peace and Counter-Terrorism.

April. U.S. to Patrol Coast. Prime Minister Ali Mohammed Ghedi gives the United States permission to patrol off the coast of Somalia to suppress piracy.

June. Islamists Seize Control of Mogadishu. Islamists rout the warlords and take control of Mogadishu and surrounding areas. The ICU subsequently establishes a Council of Islamic Courts to govern the capital.

July 28. Gunman Kills Cabinet Minister. Rioting follows the assassination of the minister for constitutional and federal affairs in Baidao, the temporary seat of government.

July–August. International Airport, Main Seaport Reopen. Mogadishu's airport and seaport are open for the first time in 11 years.

August 7. President Dismisses Cabinet. Following numerous cabinet dismissals and resignations from May to early August, President Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed announces that the entire cabinet has been dismissed; however, Prime Minister Ghedi remains in office.

August 20. Ethiopian Troops Move into Baidao. In response to tensions between the transitional government and the ICU, Ethiopian troops backed by tanks move into Baidao in support of the government.

August 21. New Cabinet Named. Prime Minister Ghedi announces a new cabinet of 31 ministers.

October. Peace Talks Continue. Ongoing peace talks between the Transitional Federal Government and the ICU take place in Kenya.

October 12. UN Opens More Refugee Camps in Kenya. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees announces the establishment of more camps in eastern Kenya to accommodate thousands of refugees from Somalia.

SOMALILAND

Note: Somaliland still lacks international recognition in 2006.

February. African Union Assesses Proposed Recognition of Somaliland. An African Union fact-finding mission concludes that Somaliland's status is "unique" and that recognition of its independence will not open a "Pandora's box" of new secessionist movements across the African continent, as leaders of other countries had feared.

May. House of Elders Extends Its Term. The House of Elders (currently appointed) extends its term of office until October 2010 even though the first elections for the house had been scheduled for October 2006. President Dahir Riyale Kahin supports the extension.

October 24. President Declares Support for Sharia. President Kahin, in response to pressure from Muslim scholars to clarify his position, announces that sharia is the basis of law in Somaliland.

SOUTH AFRICA

March 1. ANC Overwhelming Winner in Local Elections. The African National Congress (ANC) wins handily in municipal polling.

May. Party Official Acquitted of Rape Charge. A judge finds former deputy president of the republic Jacob Zuma not guilty of rape, and he is reinstated as deputy president of the ANC.

June. China Hails Partnership with South Africa. Chinese premier Wen Jiabao visits South Africa and declares the republic is “China’s key partner of strategic cooperation in Africa.”

September 20. Zuma Bribery Case Dropped. Bribery charges stemming from a 2005 case against Zuma are dismissed, reportedly boosting any potential bid for the presidency.

SUDAN

February 8. Sudan Signs Peace Agreement with Chad. The Tripoli Agreement ends the border conflict in the region that began in December 2005.

April. Sudan Rejects UN Mission. Sudan rejects a proposal from UN secretary-general Kofi Annan to replace the African Union (AU) peacekeeping mission with a more expansive UN-led operation that would have included European and, possibly, U.S. forces.

April 30. African Union Peace Plan Accepted. The Sudanese government accepts a comprehensive peace plan developed by the AU. The plan calls for the disarmament of the Janjaweed militias, elections within three years, and the provision of $500 million for the establishment and operation of an autonomous regional authority. Only one faction of the Sudan Liberation Movement/Army agrees to sign.

May 5. Main Rebel Faction in Darfur Agrees to Cease-Fire. The Sudanese government and the Sudan Liberation Movement/Army sign the AU-backed peace accord.

September. African Union Boosts Troops in Darfur. The AU agrees to increase the number of troops in Darfur and extend the mandate through the end of the year.

October 22. Government Orders UN Envoy to Leave. Jan Pronk, the top UN envoy to Sudan who made comments about low morale in the army, is ordered to leave the country.

SWAZILAND

April. King Says Country Not Ready for Democracy. King Mswati III rejects calls to allow political parties in Swaziland.

July. King Endorses Anticorruption Unit. Tough new anticorruption laws give authority to a ten-year-old entity, among other measures.

TANZANIA

January 6. New Cabinet Installed. The assembly approves a Revolutionary Party of Tanzania cabinet following the party’s victory in elections of 2005.

May. Tanzania Gets $11 Million to Fight Corruption. The United States grants Tanzania $11.15 million for an anticorruption campaign.

June. Debt Relief Approved. Tanzania is approved for debt relief through the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries initiative.

TOGO

April. Togo Qualifies for Debt Relief. The World Bank includes Togo among 11 countries approved for debt relief under the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries initiative.

September. New Prime Minister Named; Unity Government Formed. Yawovi Agboyibo, leader of the opposition Action Committee for Renewal, is named prime minister. He assumes the office on September 18, and on September 20 he names a national unity government, including 16 new ministers.

TUNISIA

Sept. 8. Tunisia Draws Criticism for Canceling NGO Summit. The Tunisian government angers Europeans after calling off at the last minute a conference on employment and the right to work. The EU expresses disappointment over what it says is Tunisia's "negative signals" in the area of human rights.

UGANDA

February 23. First Multiparty Elections in Two Decades. Incumbent Yoweri Museveni garners nearly 60 percent of the vote in defeating four challengers and securing another five-year term as president. The ruling National Resistance Movement also retains an overwhelming majority in the legislature.

Early 2006. Rebel Attacks Continue. Rebels in the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) continue to abduct children and allegedly commit atrocities as the 20-year war with rebels in the north continues. President Museveni pledges after reelection that his government will begin resettling villagers displaced by LRA rebels.

July 16. Uganda's Leaders Begin Talks with LRA. Ugandan officials call on the rebels to cease all hostilities and to disarm during peace talks in Juba, southern Sudan. President Museveni ultimately offers amnesty to LRA leader Joseph Kony if he agrees to quit fighting.

August 25. Uganda, LRA Sign Preliminary Peace Agreement. Under provisions of the agreement, LRA rebels were to leave Uganda and their bases in Sudan and the Democratic Republic of the Congo for areas designated by and protected by the government of southern Sudan.

September. Troops to Deploy to Somalia. Uganda approves sending government troops to war-torn Somalia.

October 15. Uganda, Rebels Violate Truce. Both sides acknowledge they have breached provisions of the agreement, casting further doubt on the success of a final, comprehensive peace accord.

ZAMBIA

April 5. Electoral Reforms Adopted. Zambia's assembly adopts a controversial electoral reform bill establishing the president's authority to set election dates and requiring only a plurality in a single-round election to decide presidential balloting, among other provisions.

July 26. President Sets Election Date. Using the authority granted him under the new electoral reform law, President Levy Patrick Mwanawasa calls for tripartite elections to be held on September 28; opposition groups claim the date, three months earlier than anticipated, does not give them enough time to prepare.

September 28. Mwanawasa, Ruling Party Dominate Elections. President Levy Patrick Mwanawasa (Movement for Multiparty Democracy [MMD]) wins reelection to another five-year term with 42.98 percent of the vote. MMD dissident Michael Sata receives 29.37 percent, and the third-place candidate receives 25.32 percent of the vote. The results are noted by observers in light of Mwanawasa's push for reforms to allow for victory by plurality. In assembly balloting, the MMD wins 72 of 150 directly elected seats.

ZIMBABWE

January–May. Hundreds of Thousands Displaced in Slum-Clearing Program. The government's move to drive out urban dwellers, allegedly those who voted against the ruling party, continues into 2006. Operation Roundup clears an estimated 700,000 people from Harare. President Mugabe pledges to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars over three years to rebuild homes and businesses.

April. Economic Conditions Grow More Dire. Zimbabwe's annual inflation rate hits more than 1,000 percent, among the highest in the world. Millions of people are said to be suffering from food shortages.

April. Zimbabwe Seeks White Farmers. In light of the food crisis following the collapse of the agriculture-based economy after white-owned farms were seized, white farmers are invited to lease back their land from the government. The few white farmers still in Zimbabwe are reported to be largely uninterested in the offer.

July–August. Emergency Reforms Enacted. The government devalues the currency and introduces emergency reforms, issuing new currency in August and seizing cash from citizens and businesses in an effort to curtail trade in the black market.

APPENDIX B: SERIALS LIST

---

Africa Confidential
Africa Research Bulletin (Economic Series)
Africa Research Bulletin (Political Series)
The Annual Register
The Boston Globe
The Christian Science Monitor
The Economist
Editor & Publisher International
The Europa World Year Book
Facts on File
Financial Times
IMF Article IV Reports
IMF Balance of Payments Statistics
IMF Direction of Trade Statistics
IMF Government Finance Statistics
IMF International Financial Statistics
IMF Survey
IMF World Economic Outlook

Indian Ocean Newsletter
Keesing's Record of World Events
Le Monde (Paris)
The New York Times
People in Power
Permanent Missions to the United Nations
UN Chronicle
UN Handbook
UN Population and Vital Statistics Report
UN Statistical Yearbook
UNESCO Statistician Yearbook
US CIA Heads of State and Cabinet Members
US Department of State, Diplomatic List
The Washington Post
Willings Press Guide
World Bank Atlas
World Bank Country Reports
World Development Report

INDEX

---

Entries of only a single page number, and the first number in a multiple-page entry, indicate the first or primary reference to that individual. Additional page numbers typically indicate first references in a different section of a profile or in a closely related profile.

- AALA, Mohammad Abdul, 314
al AASAR, Abdul Moneim, 313
ABACHA, Sani, 681
ABANI, Aboubacar Ibrahim, 675
ABAR, Mahmoud, 294
ABASS, Kabou Gssokoyo, 898
ABATCHA, Aibrahim, 182
ABATEMI, Alhaji Usman, 695
ABBAS, Chetti Ali, 195
ABBE, Goodnews Guben, 695
ABBUD, Ibrahim, 833
ABDALA, Che, 632
ABDALLAH, Ahmed, 206
ABDALLAH, Mouazoir, 219
ABDALLAH, Nasr al-Mabruk, 512
ABDELAZIZ, Maged Abdelfattah, 319
ABDELGHANI, Mohammed Ben Ahmed, 32
ABDEL RAHMAN, Omar, 315
ABDERAMAN, Abaoubakar Mahamat, 182
ABDESSELAM, Belaid, 33
ABDI, Abdi Barre, 789
ABDI, Abdiwahid Abdulle, 789
ABDI HASHI, Mohamed, 789
ABDOU, Ahmed, 210
ABDOU, Chadhouli, 217
ABDOU, Mohamed Ahmed, 221
ABDOULAYE, Kebe, 580
ABDOULAYE, Mahamat, 196
ABDOULMOUMINE, Attaher, 671
ABDOULMOUMINE, Mohammed, 672
ABDULKADZR, Ahmed, 692
ABDULLAH, Kamal al-Din Muhammad, 849
ABDULLAHI, Gedi Shadron, 789
ABDULLAHI, Khalif, 468
ABDULLAHI, Mohamed, 669
ABDULLANI, Said Baba, 692
ABEID, Said, 212
ABEO, De Sodji Zanclan, 84
ABESO, Eugenio, 322
ABIED, Mohamed, 611
ABIOLA, Moshood Kashimawo Olawale, 680
ABOGO, Placido Mico, 329
ABOUBACAR, Ahmed, 216
ABSHIR MUSSE, Mohamed, 787
ABUBAKAR, Abdulsalam, 682
ACHEAMPONG, Ignatius Kutu, 396
ACHEHBAR, Chakir, 613
ACHIDI ACHU, Simon, 138
ACHODE, Codjo, 82
ADAMI, Lahbib, 44
ADAMOU, Maman Sadi, 670
ADAN, Abdulkabir Mohamed, 789
ADAN, Saleban Muhammad, 799
ADAN, Sharif Hasan Sheikh, 790
ADANDE-KINTI, Sédégnon, 82
ADDA, Abadelkrim Ould, 48
ADDAE-MENSAH, Ivan, 404
ADDISU, Legesse, 357
ADEN, Abdallah, 344
ADEN, Mohamed Sayyid, 786
ADEN, Suleiman Mohamed, 799
ADETO, Leopold, 177
ADHIAMBO, Winston Ogola, 468
ADHU, Awiti, 465
ADIAHENOT, Jacques, 376
ADIE, John, 695
ADIMI, Felix, 81
ADINANE, Loufti, 219
ADJEI, Kwabena, 404
ADJI, Boukari, 659
ADJI, Garga Haman, 148
ADJOVI, Séverin, 82
ADOBOLI, Eugene Koffi, 888
ADOU, Adou Ali, 299
ADOUM, Mahamat Ali, 203
ADOYTA, Mohamed, 294, 296
ADYEBO, George Cosmas, 918
ADZRAKO, Koffitse, 898
AFFRETANE, Abdoul Hamid, 219
AFRAH, Abdullahi Hassan, 789
AFRAH, Muhammad Qanyarsh, 784
AFRIFA, Akwasi Amankwa, 396
AGBO, Lionel Jacques, 84
AGBOBLI, Francis, 898
AGBOYIBO, Yawovi, 885, 895, 896
AGER, Joe, 460
AGGUDEY, George, 398, 403
AGNE, Abdourahim, 741
AGONDJO-OKAWE, Pierre-Louis, 376
al AGRUDI, Al-Sayyid Rifaat, 313
AGUIYI-IRONSI, Johnson T. U., 678
AHAW, Ahmed Mohamed, 362
AHENDA, Paddy, 466
AHERDANE, Mahjoubi, 610
AHIDJO, Ahmadou Babatoura, 136, 137
AHIDJO, Mohamed, 143
AHMAD, Abdullah, 519
AHMAT, Braham, 193
AHMED, Bouha Daoud, 299
AHMED, Fouad Mohamed, 218
AHMED, Mahdi, 297
AHMED, Mohamed, 206
AHMED, Mohammad Nur, 343
AHMED, Sharif, 784
AHMED ALI, Abdurahman, 792
AHMED Issa, Mohamed, 288
AHOMADEGBE, Justin, 76
AHOUA, Don Mello, 284
AIDID, Hussein Mohamed Farah, 778
AIDID, Mohamed Farah, 776
AIDID AHMED, Abderahman, 787
AIKHOMU, Augustus, 680, 695
AÏT-AHMED, Hocine, 45
AIT IDDER, Mohamed Ben Said, 612
AJASIN, Michael, 693
AKA-BASHORUM, Alao, 695
AKAKI, Sam, 927
AKAME, Edouard, 142
AKANYANG, Mothusi, 94
AKEF, Muhammad Mahdi, 314
AKIF, Abderrahman, 45
AKINDES, Sylvain Adekpedjou, 84
AKINSANYA, Israel, 498
AKINYEMI, Bolaji, 693
AKLILU, Tshafe Tezaz, 348
AKOL, Lam, 852
AKOTE, Mohammed, 674
AKUE, Kuevi, 896
AKUFFO, Frederick W. K., 396
AKUFO-ADDO, Edward, 396
ALAHASSA, Damien, 82

- ALAIYOU, Moulay Mustafa Ben Larbi, 610
 AL ALAMI, Ahmed, 613
 ALAOUI, Ismail, 610
 ALASO, Alice, 927
 ALEM, João, 159
 ALEMAYEHU, Iyassu, 365
 ALEXANDRE, João, 630, 631
 ALGABID, Hamid, 656, 665, 667
 ALH, Kalli Al-Gazali, 693
 ALI, Abdurahman, 792
 ALI, Ahmadu, 691
 ALI, Ahmed, 363
 ALI, Ahmed Saïd, 218
 ALI, Ali Ben, 220
 ALI, Farah, 297, 797
 ALI, Fathi Ahmad, 854
 ALI, Habib, 363
 ALI, Hanfareh, 363
 ALI, Issoufi Saïd, 220
 ALI, Kamal Hasan, 303
 ALI, Khalid Umar, 789
 ALI, Ousman, 363
 ALI, Salim Ben, 207
 ALI, Umar, 363
 ALIER, Abel, 834
 ALINGUÉ BAWOYEU, Jean, 186, 196
 ALISERIO, Ismail, 362
 ALI YUSUF, Yusuf, 785
 ALLALEH, Kaireh, 292
 ALLEN, Bernadette Mary, 675
 ALLEY, Alphonse, 75
 ALMEIDA, Armindo Vaz de, 718
 ALMEIDA, Damiao, 719
 ALMEIDA, Roberto de, 72
 ALMOU, Alka, 670
 ALVES, Nito, 68
 ALVES, Silvestre, 438
 AMADOU, Hama, 657, 659, 661, 665
 AMAN, Mikael Andom, 348
 AMANI, Mohamed Ag, 555, 557
 AMBOUROUE, Marie-Augustine Houangni, 380
 AMELAVI, Amela, 898
 AMENGAVI, Claude, 898
 AMIN, Idi, 918
 AMISI, Arema Bin, 130
 AMOR, Mohamed Belhadj, 910
 AMOUR, Abuju Juma, 880
 AMOUR, Salmin, 867, 869
 AMOUSSOU, Bruno, 77, 81
 AMOUZOU, Jacques, 897
 ANAKO, Mohamed, 672
 ANAKY, Kobenan, 282
 ANAMELA, Njekwa, 944
 ANDJABA, Martin, 654
 ANDRE, Alexandre Sebastião, 68
 ANDREWS, Henry, 492
 ANDRIAMHAZO, Gilles, 524
 ANDRIAMANJATO, Richard, 527, 534
 ANDRIAMORASATA, Solo Norbert, 536
 ANDRIANARIVÉLO-RAZAFY, Zina, 538
 ANDRIANARIVO, Tantely René Gabrio, 523, 527, 533
 ANDRIANOELISON, José, 533
 ANDRIANTIANA, Rakotovao, 535
 ANGA, Pierre, 252
 ANGO, Omar Idi, 669
 ANGULA, Nahas, 640, 644
 ANIEBONAM, B. O., 693
 ANKRAH, Joseph A., 396
 ANYANG' NYONG'O, Peter, 460
 ANYONA, George, 466
 AOUTCHEKI, Mohamed, 674
 APEVON, Dodji, 896
 APITHY, Sourou-Migan, 75
 ARAFA, Mohammed, 343
 ARAMISSE, Mohamed, 296
 ARCHANE, Mahmoud, 612
 AREF, Ali, 287
 AREGAWÉ, Bereh, 367
 ARIETTI, Michael R., 715
 ARKAAH, Kow Nkensen, 398
 ARNAOUD, Idriss, 293, 299
 AROUCA, Domingos António Mascarenhas, 633
 ARTEH GHALIB, Umar, 776
 ARU, Samuel, 834
 ASAMOAH, Obed Yao, 404, 407
 ASMAR, Muhammad, 613
 ASMEROM, Girma, 345
 ASRAT, Woldeyes, 359
 ASSAMANET, Herve, 380
 ASSANE, Chabane, 634
 ASSANGA, Siga, 145
 ASSEFA, Maru, 354
 ASSEFA, Samuel, 368
 ASSELE, Jean-Boniface, 380
 ASSOUMANE, Issoufou, 658, 670
 ASUQUO, Etubon, 691
 ATAKPAMEVI, Adani Ifé, 898
 ATAMVAKU, Zubair, 930
 ATIKU, Abubakar, 677, 691
 ATNAFU, Abate, 348
 ATTA MILLS, John Evans, 398, 404
 ATTIA, Nock Ag, 566
 ATTOUMANE, Ahmed Ben Cheikh, 208
 AUBAME, Jean-Hilaire, 370
 AUDIJE, Paco, 335
 AWADALLA, Abubakr, 833
 AWADH, Ahmed, 467
 AWEYS, Hassan Dahir, 784
 AWOLOWO, Obafemi, 691
 AWORI, Arthur Moody, 441, 445, 461
 AYACKO, Ochilo Mbogo, 466
 AYALEW, Lidetu, 359
 AYAMBA, Chief, 149
 AYANG, Luis Ondo, 333
 AYEB, Aly, 43
 AYEWA, Bassirou, 898
 AYEWA, Zarifou, 898
 AYOKER, Walter Kunijwok Gwado, 849
 AZALI, Assoumani, 205, 211, 217
 al-AZHARI, Ismail, 833
 al-AZHARI, Mohammed, 848
 AZIKIWE, Nnamdi, 678
 AZONG-WARE, Andrew, 149
 al-AZZIZ, Mohamed Abd, 618, 620
 AZZOUNA, Jalloud, 910
 BA, Amadou Lamine, 745
 BA, Demba, 741
 BA, Mamadou, 413, 419, 420
 BA, Tidiane, 738
 BABA, Ahmed Moktar Sidi, 578
 BABANGIDA, Ibrahim, 679
 BABURIFATO, Deogratias, 132
 BACALE, Celestino Bonifacio, 331
 BACAR, Mohamed, 205, 212, 217
 BACCOUCHE, Hedi, 903
 BACCUS, Farook Mohammed, 599
 BACHAR, Alarit, 201
 BACHAR, Issoufou, 670
 BADA ABBAS, Maldoum, 186
 BADAWI, El Sayed, 312
 BADI, Benba Ould Sidi, 582
 BADIBANGI, Christian, 246
 BADINGA, David, 380
 BADJI, Paul, 745
 BADJI, Sidi, 743
 BADO, Laurent, 110
 BAGAZA, Jean-Baptiste, 116, 128
 BAGENDA, Prince Mahinja, 878
 BAH, Abdul, 771
 BAH, Amadu, 768
 BAH, Hamat, 392
 BAH, Ibrahim Boubacar, 561
 BAH, Ousmane, 420
 BAHDON, Moumin, 289, 293, 297
 BAHEMUKA, Floribert Kisembo, 247
 BAHEMUKA, Judith Mbula, 471
 BAHOLO, Selometsi, 475
 BAICHE, Ahmed, 50
 BAICHO, Anil Kumar, 594, 595
 BAJO, Lamin, 386
 BAKARY, Djibo, 656
 BAKARY, Issa Tchiroma, 143
 al-BAKKUSH, Hamid, 510
 BALAAM, Facho, 197
 BALALA, Khalid Salim Ahmed, 452, 467
 BALALA, Najib, 463, 466
 BALDE, Aboubacar, 437
 BALDE, Joaquim, 435, 436
 BALDE, Mario Ujssumane, 437
 BALEWA, Abubaker Tafawa, 678
 BALIKANI, Bernard, 94
 BALINGA, Benjamins, 329
 BALOPI, Patrick, 94
 BAMUZE, Ali, 931
 BAMVUGINYUMVIRA, Frederic, 119
 BANANA, Cnaan Sodindo, 951, 955
 BANCHI, Roger, 281

- BANDA, Aleke, 549
 BANDA, Hastings Kamuzu, 540
 BANDA, Paul, 947
 BANDA, Richard, 944
 BANDA, Sam Kandodo, 549
 BANDA, Unandi, 551
 BANDEIRA, Alda, 718
 BANDOU, Angéle, 265
 BANGURA, Pallo, 769
 BANGURA, Thaimu, 770
 BANGURA, Zainab, 771
 BANKS, Philip A. Z., 490
 al-BANNA, Idris, 847
 BANNERMAN, Cecilia, 405
 BANNY, Charles Konan, 271, 273
 BANTU, Teddy Kassela, 878
 BANY, William Nyuon, 850
 BANZA, Delphin, 247
 BAPPOO, Sheila, 598
 BAPTISTA, Marcelino, 437
 BARANCIRA, Cyrille, 128
 BARBOSA, Rafael, 425, 435
 BARCELOS, Manuel Rambout, 437
 BARDE, Dienambaye, 201
 BARDE, Lokein, 201
 BARIGYE, John, 920
 BARKAYE, Chahayi, 674
 BARNES, Nathaniel, 504
 BARR, Joyce A., 654
 BARRAKA, Aboubakar Adzalo, 198
 BARRY, Alpha Oumar Rafiou, 423
 BARRY, Mamadou Bhoeye, 418
 BARTCHAM, Nourène Manawi, 852
 al-BASHIR, Umar Hassan Ahmad, 832, 836, 846
 BASRI, Driss, 604
 BASRI, Mohamed, 609
 BATHEAS-MOLLOMB, Stanislas, 264
 BATHILY, Abdoulaye, 737
 BAWOH, Francis, 771
 BAYAGANAKANDI, Epitace, 127
 BAYFORD, Dick, 94
 BAYOUN, Bouchraya Hamoudi, 620
 BAZIRA, Amon, 929
 BAZOUM, Mohammed, 667
 BEADE TOIRIA, Jeremie, 197
 BEAVOGUI, Lansana, 411
 BEBANA, Cheikh Ould Horma Ould, 584
 BECHIR, Mahamoud Adam, 203
 BECHIR, Regis, 198
 BÉDIÉ, Henri Konan, 271, 280
 BEEBEEJAUN, Ahmed Rashid, 590
 BEIBA, Mahfoud Ali, 618
 BEJI, Mounir, 911
 BELETE, Fasika, 360
 BELHADJ, Ali, 48
 BEL HAJ, Ali, 613
 BELINGA EBOUTOU, Martin, 152
 BELKEBIR, Abdessamad, 610
 BELKHADEM, Abdelaziz, 42
 BELLAMY, William M., 471
 BELMOKHTAR, Mokhtar, 583
 BELMONT, Joseph, 747, 749, 752
 BELO, Malungo, 68
 BEMBA, Jean-Pierre, 225, 233, 243
 BEMBE, Antonio Bento, 70
 BEMBE, Anzuluni, 247
 BEN ALI, Zine El-Abidine, 903, 908
 BENANTE, Francisco, 439
 BENBAIBECH, Tahar, 42
 BEN BARKA, Mehdi, 612
 BEN BELLA, Ahmed, 30
 BENBITOUR, Ahmed, 36
 BEN DHIA, Abdelaziz, 908
 BENDJEDID, Chadli, 31
 BENDOUNGA, Joseph, 176
 BENFLIS, Aii, 31, 36
 BENHAMOU, Mohammed, 613
 BENHAMOUDA, Boualem, 41
 BEN JAAFAR, Mustafa, 909, 911
 BENJAMIN, John, 766
 BENJELLAIME, Ahmed, 613
 BENKIRANE, Abdelillah, 611
 BENS Aid, Mohamed, 612
 BENSALAH, Abdelkader, 42, 52
 BEN SALAH, Ahmed, 911
 BENSLEIM, Mohammed, 50
 BENTOUBA, Keita, 419
 BEN YAHIA, Habib, 908
 BEREKET, Simeon, 357
 BÉRENGER, Paul Raymond, 588, 589, 596
 BEREWA, Solomon, 757, 763, 767
 BERLOUIS, Ogilvy, 748
 BERTHE, Abdul Wahab, 565
 BESAC, Serge, 382
 BESIGYE, Kizza, 920, 927
 BESSE, Mulualem, 362
 BETOW, Charles Oma, 144
 BEUKES, Hewat, 651
 BEYENE, Dr, 343
 BEYENE, Petros, 351, 360, 361
 BEZAKA, Alexis, 537
 BIAGUI, Jean-Marie, 743
 BIAMBA, Jean Bertrand, 177
 BIBI, Ane Philippe, 267
 BICHARA, Idriss Agar, 201
 BIDWELL, Belinda, 387, 393
 BIELEU, Victorin Hameni, 147
 BIGIRIMANA, Balthazar, 129
 BIHE, Musa, 799
 BIKELE EKAMI, Gaston, 147
 BIKINKITA, Philippe, 257
 BIKO, Steven, 804
 BIKOMAGU, Jean, 117
 BIKOMO, Santos Pascual, 328
 BILAL, Martins Luis, 634
 BINAISA, Godfrey Lukongwa, 918
 BINI, Abdouzarak Issak, 786
 BINIZI, Essogo Juwe, 897
 BIO, Julius Maada, 757, 759
 BIOKO, Christino Seriche Malabo, 333
 BIRINDWA, Faustin, 228
 BIRTUKAN, Mideksa, 359
 BIRUTA, Vincent, 710, 714
 BISHAW, Makonnen, 359
 BISSIELO, Anaclet, 380
 BISSO, Mamadou, 198
 BITAT, Rabah, 31
 BITSANGOU, Frederic, 267
 BITTAYE, Musa, 390
 BIWA, Eric, 650
 BIWOTT, Nicholas Kipyator Kiprono, 443, 463, 465
 BIYA, Paul, 136, 137, 142
 BIZIMANA, Jean-Pierre, 711
 BIZIMUNGU, Pasteur, 701, 704, 712
 BLACK, Yondo Mandengue, 147
 BLAH, Moses Zeh, 493
 BLYDEN, Sylvia, 771
 BOAHEN, Albert Abu, 402
 BOAKAI, Joseph N., 487, 499
 BOATENG, Agyenim, 402
 BOB-AKITANI, Emmanuel, 889, 897
 BO-BOLIKO, André, 226, 244
 BOCKARIE, Sam, 762
 BOD, Hussein Haji, 789
 BODHO, Pierre Marini, 249
 BOGANDA, Barthélemy, 163
 BOKASSA, Jean-Bédél, 164
 BOKESSA, Anacieto, 335
 BOKILO, Gabriel, 261
 BOKOKO, Bwalalele, 333
 BOKUNGU, Mahele Lioko, 231
 BOLEKIA, Victorino, 327, 329
 BOLERO, Hamada Madi, 212
 BOLEY, George E. S., 491, 505
 BOLONGO, Likulia, 231
 BOLY, Moussa, 107
 BOMBET, Emile Constant, 273, 279
 BONFOH, Abbas, 889, 899
 BONGHO-NOUARRA, Maurice-Stéphane, 254
 BONGO, Albert-Bernard, 370, 371
 BONGO, Ben, 376
 BONNELAME, Emile Patrick Jérémie, 755
 BOODHOO, Harish, 597
 BOOLELL, Satcam, 588, 594
 BOOTH, Donald E., 508
 BORDINA, Mariano Janeiro, 632
 BORICO, Miguel Abia Biteo, 322, 325, 328
 BORWAH, George, 504
 BOTCHWEY, Kwesi, 398
 BOTHA, Pieter W., 804, 825
 BOTHA, Roelof F. ("Pik"), 804
 BOTWE, Dan, 402
 BOUABID, Maati, 603
 BOUACHA, Omar, 45
 BOUAKOUIR, Samir, 45
 BOUBA, Maigari Bello, 136, 143
 BOUBACAR, Sidi Mohamed Ould, 571

- BOUCHAR, Oumar, 196
BOUCHIHA, Mohamed, 910
BOUDA, Gilbert, 112
BOUDIAF, Mohamed, 33
BOUDIAFI, Nouredine, 50
BOUKAMBA-YANGOUMA, Jean-Michel, 264, 265
BOUKANGA, Auguste, 173
BOUKAR, Mai Manga, 669
BOUKHAMKHAM, Abdelkader, 48
BOUKHAZNA, Ali, 44
BOUKOSSO, Vincent Moulengui, 378
BOUKROUH, Nouredine, 34, 44
BOULA, Mohamed ag, 671
BOULA, Rhissa ag, 661, 671
BOULAHIA, Ismaïl, 909
BOULALEH, Ahmed, 289
BOULKHEIR, Massoud Ould, 580, 581
BOULLE, Philippe, 749
BOUMEDIENNE, Houari, 30
BOUNKOULO, Benjamin, 262
BOUNOU, Saïd Dhoïfir, 222
BOURDES-OGOULIGUENDE, Jules, 376
BOURGEAUD, Gilbert, 206
BOURGUIBA, Habib, 902, 903
BOURHANE, Nourdine, 210
BOUSLIMANI, Mohamed, 43
BOUTAMBA, Jean Clement, 379
BOUTEFLIKA, Abdelaziz, 30, 31, 36, 42
BOUTROS-GHALI, Boutros, 308
BOUZOUBAA, Abdelmajid, 613
BOWEN, Hezekiah, 489
BOYE, Mame Madiou, 730
BOZANGA, Simon Narcisse, 164
BOZIZÉ, François, 163, 168
BRAHIMI, Abdelhamid, 32
BRANQUINHO, José Pereira, 635
BREDE, Tchapka, 175
BRIDGEWATER, Pamela E., 408
BRITO, Jose, 161
BROWNING, Steven Alan, 932
BRUMSKINE, Charles, 498
BRYANT, Charles Gyude, 487, 493, 498
BUCYANA, Martin, 703
BUGERA, Déogratias, 242
BUHARI, Muhammadu, 679
BUKENYA, Gilbert Balibaseka, 917
BULA Nyati, Mandungu, 230
BUNDHUN, Raouf, 589, 591
BUNDU, Abass, 771
BURAFUTA, Jean-Paul, 132
BUSIA, Kofi A., 396
BUTAGIRA, Francis K., 932
BUTHELEZI, Mangosuthu, 807, 823
BUTOYI, Appolinaire, 131
BUYOYA, Pierre, 116, 127
- CA, Manuel, 437
CABRAL, Alfredo Lopes, 439
CABRAL, Amílcar, 425
CABRAL, Luis de Almeida, 425
CABRAL, Vasco, 426
CAINES, S. Kathini Maloba, 466
CAMARA, Hassan Musa, 391
CAMARA, Iafai, 426
CAMARA, Oumar, 417
CAMARA, Saad Bouh, 579
CAMPBELL, John, 698
CAMPIRA, Helder Francisco, 635
CANAVAN, Katherine H., 95
CAPCIEL, Delfina Francisco, 69
CARDOSA, Silva, 69
CARDOSO, Domingos, 636
CARVALHO, Arlindo, 719
CARVALHO, Eristo de, 718
CARVER, Lord, 954
CASTRO, Jose de, 631
CEESAY, Yaya, 391
CELESTINO, Celso, 159
CHAABANE, Younes, 49
CHABUKA, Silvester White, 548
CHAKAWODZA, Austin, 964
CHAKUAMBA, Stephen Gwandanguluwe, 541
CHAM, Mamadou Cadi, 391
CHAMASSI, Ben Saïd Omar, 211
CHAMMARI, Khemais, 909
CHAMOLA, Yilma, 367
CHAND, Prem, 954
CHAOLANE, Phoka, 480
CHAOUCH, Ali, 908
CHARDIE, Omar, 294
CHAUMIERE, Jean François, 594
CHEAPOO, Chea, 504
CHEBBI, Néjib, 911
CHEHEM, Ibrahim Chehem, 299
CHEHEM, Mohamed Daoud, 297, 299
CHEIFFOU, Amadou, 657, 666
CHEIKH, Djoussouf, 208
CHEIKH, Mustapha Saïd, 218
CHEIKHOU, Cisse Amadou, 579
CHELLAL, Toufik, 45
CHERIF, Hachemi, 46
CHEYO, John, 878
CHICAMPO, Weca, 335
CHICOTI, Jorge Rebelo Pinto, 67
CHIDUMO, Filipe, 637
CHIDYAUSIKU, Boniface G., 967
CHIHANA, Chakufwa, 541, 548
CHIKEREMA, James, 952
CHILUBA, Frederick, 936
CHILUBA, Jacob Titus, 935
CHILUMPHA, Cassim, 541
CHIMANGO, Louis, 547, 551
CHIMPHAMBA, Brown Beswick, 552
CHINOUREI, Gideon, 963
CHIOTA, Justine, 966
CHIPEMBERE, H. B. M., 540
CHIPENDA, Daniel Julio, 68
CHIRAU, Jeremiah S., 954
CHIRE, Inácio, 632
CHIRWA, Orton, 540, 547
CHIRWA, Robson, 541
CHISANDO, Don, 946
CHISANGA, Patrick, 942
CHISHALA, Josiah, 947
CHISIZA, Yatuta, 540
CHISSANO, Joaquim Alberto, 623, 629
CHIUME, Kanyama, 540
CHIVUKUVUKU, Abel, 67
CHONGWE, Roger, 937
CHOONEE, Mukeshawr, 594
CHOUA, Lol Mahamat, 183, 195
CHOW, Paul, 753
CHUIME, Kanyama, 548
CINDI, Zithulele N. A., 821
CISSE, Ahmed, 419
CISSE, Amadou Boubacar, 659, 670
CISSE, Saliou, 419
CISSE, Soumaïla, 557, 565
CISSOKHO, Abdoul Khadre, 739
CISSOKO, Mariam, 559
CLAIR, Louis Serge, 596
CLARKE, Charles, 499
COELHO, José Augusto da Silva, 69
COLE, Patrick Dele, 695
COLLEN, Lindsey, 599
COLLENDAVELLO, Ivan, 596
COMBARY, Basile, 112
COMBO, Ayouba, 209
COMPAORÉ, Blaise, 97, 98, 106
COMPAORÉ, François, 100
CONCEIÇÃO, Alda Bandeira de, 722
CONCEIÇÃO, Raulda, 632
CONDÉ, Alpha, 412, 419
CONJUGO, Jean-Claude, 175
CONNEH, Aisha, 504
CONNEH, Sekou, 504, 505
CONOMBO, Joseph Issoufou, 98
CONTÉ, Lansana, 411, 418
CORREIA, Carlos, 426, 433
CORREIA, Paulo, 426
COSTA, Celestino Rocha da, 718
COSTA, Gabriel, 719
COSTA, Guilherme Posser da, 719, 723
COSTA, Manuel Pinto da, 717
COSTA, Manuel Saturnino da, 427, 434
COSTA, Noy da, 68
COSTA, Simba da, 68
COSTA ALEGRE, Norberto José d'Alva, 718
COULIBALY, Amadou Gon, 281
COULIBALY, Boubacar Karamoko, 565
COULIBALY, Inza, 565
COULIBALY, Jerome Climanlo, 284
COULIBALY, Moussa Balla, 562, 564
COULIBALY, Ousman, 559
COWAN, Edmond K., 771
CRONIN, Jeremy, 821
CROS, Marcel, 420
CUSTODIO, Octavio, 633

- DABALEH, Abdallah, 297
 DACKO, David, 163
 DACOSTA, Claude-Antoine, 254
 DADDAH, Ahmed Ould, 580
 DADOO, Yusef, 820
 DAFALLAH, al-Gizouli, 835
 DAHN, Marcus, 499, 501
 DAIO, Daniel Lima dos Santos, 718
 DAISSALA, Dakole, 144
 DAKHIL, Mahmud, 518
 DAKIO, Toubé Clément, 112
 D'ALMADA, Fidélis Cabral, 429
 DALMEIDA, Comlangen Mawutoé, 894
 D'ALVA, Leonel Mario, 723
 DAMBA, Pierre Claver, 99
 DANGUE REWAKA, Denis, 382
 DANIEL, Manecas, 630, 632
 DANKOLODO, Dan Dicko, 667
 DANKORO, Soulé, 83
 DANQUAH, J. B., 396
 DANSOKHO, Amath, 735, 740
 DAOUD, Abdel Salam, 313
 DAOUD, Ali Mohamed, 293, 296
 DAOUD, Diaeddin, 313
 DAOUÉL, Akoli, 669
 DARAJA, Andrew Mhando, 882
 DARBO, Bakary Bunja, 386
 DARBOE, Ousainu, 387, 391
 DARMAN, Abdi Nur, 789
 DA SILVA, Francisco, 725
 DATCHOU, Alphonse Ongagou, 263
 DAWIT, Yohannes, 351
 DAYAL, Raj, 599
 DÉBY, Idriss, 181, 185, 193
 DEGEFE, Bula, 367
 DE KLERK, Frederik W., 806, 825
 DE KOCH, Eugene, 810
 DE L'ESTRAC, Jean-Claude, 590
 DeLISI, Scott H., 345
 DELL, Christopher William, 967
 DELLE, Edmund, 403
 DEMBELE, Mamadou, 554
 DEMBY, Albert Joe, 757, 761
 DEMESKA, Balcha, 362
 DENARD, Bob, 206
 DEREJE, Kebede, 360
 DERSIE, Ayalsew, 360
 DESTA, Araya, 345
 DEVINE, Jackie C., 504
 DE WAAL, Johan, 649
 DEYASA, Leta, 362
 DHLAKAMA, Afonso Macacho Marceta, 624, 630, 631
 DHOININE, Ikililou, 205
 DIA, Mamadou, 727, 738
 DIABATÉ, Amidou, 561
 DIABATÉ, Daouda, 285
 DIABATÉ, Henriette Dagbi, 281
 DIABIRA, Lamine, 555
 DIABY, Mamadou Maribatourou, 556
 DIAKITÉ, Josefina Pitra, 73
 DIAKITÉ, Yoro, 554, 565
 DIALLO, Ali Muhammad, 198
 DIALLO, Ali Nouhoum, 563
 DIALLO, Alpha, 579
 DIALLO, Cellou Dalein, 411, 413
 DIALLO, Demqo, 562
 DIALLO, El Hadj Boubacar Biro, 413
 DIALLO, Jambouy Sabo, 670
 DIALLO, Oumar, 556
 DIALLO, Salif, 106
 DIAMACOUNE Senghor, Augustin, 729, 743
 DIARRA, Lamine, 412
 DIARRA, Marimata, 563
 DIARRA, Seydou, 271, 273
 DIARRA, Shaka, 562
 DIARRA, Sidi, 568
 DIAS, Jean-Paul, 741
 DIAS, Máximo Diogo José, 630, 632
 DIAWARA, Daba, 562, 565
 DIBBA, Mustapha, 387, 390
 DICHOU, Abdelmadjid, 50
 DICKO, Mohamedoun, 563
 DICKO, Oumar Hammadou, 561
 DICKSON, Alain, 382
 DIDAH, Mohamed Salek Ould, 584
 DIEDERICHS, Nicolaas J., 804
 DIENG, Ousmane Tanor, 739
 DIERGAARDT, Kaptein J. G. A. Hans, 651
 DIEYE, Adoulaye, 738
 DIKKO, Umaru, 686
 DIKO, Malizole, 822
 DILEITA, Dileita Mohamed, 287, 289, 293
 al-DIN, Yaseen Tag, 312
 DINGAKE, Michael Kitso, 91
 DINI, Ahmed, 288, 294
 DIOGO, Luisa Dias, 623, 625, 629
 DIOMI, Eugene Ndongala, 246
 DIOP, Abdoulaye, 568
 DIOP, Anta, 740
 DIOP, Ibrahim Masseck, 738
 DIOP, Lamine, 736
 DIOP, Majhemouth, 740
 DIOP, Mamadou Moustapha, 737, 738
 DIOP, Mbaye Jacques, 736
 DIOP, Pape, 743
 DIORI, Hamani, 656
 DIOUF, Abdou, 727, 728, 739
 DIOUF, Madior, 740
 DIRAIGE, Ahmed, 850
 DITSHETELO, Paul, 824
 DIVUNGUI DI NDINGE, Didjob, 371, 372, 377
 DJAANFARI, Mohamed, 213
 DJABALLAH, Abdallah, 43
 DJAGANI, Cristina Djombe, 328
 DJAGOUÉ, Leandre, 84
 DJALO, Bubacar Rachid, 435
 DJALO, Ibrahimia Sori, 434
 DJALO, Idrissa, 438
 DJALO, Mamadu, 436
 DJANGONÉ-BI, Djessan Philippe, 285
 DJARMA, Mahamat, 196
 DJATO, Monsilla, 894
 DJEDDAI, Ahmed, 45
 DJERMAKOYE, Moumouni Adamou, 660, 666
 DJEROU, Yaya Dilla, 199
 DJIBO, Amadou, 668
 DJIBRILLA, Aminata Maiga, 675
 DJOGO, Djibril Negue, 183
 DJOHAR, Saïd Mohamed, 207
 DJOKOU, Jean, 145
 DJOMIA, Albert Mbainaido, 198
 DJOUMA, Seydou Dan, 659
 DJOUSSOUF, Abbas, 209, 218
 DLAMINI, Absalom Themba, 857, 859
 DLAMINI, Bhekimpi, 857
 DLAMINI, Bonginkhosi, 863
 DLAMINI, Dumisa, 864
 DLAMINI, Glenrose, 864
 DLAMINI, Jameson Mblini, 858
 DLAMINI, Mabandla Fred, 857
 DLAMINI, Mfanasibili, 858
 DLAMINI, Obed Mfanyana, 858, 863
 DLAMINI, Phesheya Mbongeni, 865
 DLAMINI, Sotsha, 858
 DLAMINI, Sabelo, 862
 DLAMINI, Sibusiso Barnabas, 857, 859
 DOE, Chayee, 504
 DOE, Jackson F., 498
 DOE, Samuel Kanyon, 487
 DOGOLEA, Enoch, 492
 DOH, Félix, 281
 DOKUBO-ASARI, Mujahid, 695
 DOLOGUÉLÉ, Anicet Georges, 168
 DOMINGOS, Manuel Adão, 67
 DOMINGOS, Raul, 631, 633
 DONA-FOLOGO, Laurent, 280
 DONDON, Luc Apollinaire, 175
 DONGO, Longo, 110
 DONGO, Margaret, 963
 DORE, Jean-Marie, 419, 420
 DORKENOU, Euphrem Seth, 893
 DO ROSARIO, António Gualberto, 155
 DOS PASSOS, Luís da Silva, 68
 DOS SANTOS, Fernando ("Nando") Da Piedade Dias, 55, 61
 DOS SANTOS, José Eduardo, 55, 57, 65
 DOS SANTOS, Marcelino, 622
 DOSSSEH-ANYROH, Gabriel Sassouvi, 897
 DOSSOUVI, Logo, 898
 DOSUI, Nicolas, 547
 DOTÉ, Elie, 163
 DOUÉ, Mathias, 284
 DOUGAN, Angel Serafin Seriche, 324
 DOUMBA, Joseph-Charles, 142
 DOURI, Mohamed, 608
 DOWNS, JoAnn, 823
 DOWUONA, Nii Noi, 403

- DRAMAŃI, Dama, 893
 DRAMÉ, Tiéblé, 561
 DREIGE, Ahmed, 854
 DRIR, Mohammad, 358
 DRIVER, Alan, 597
 DUALE, Elmi Ahmed, 790
 DUALEH ALI, Abdurahman, 789, 799
 DUFF, Anthony, 955
 DULLO, Madun, 594
 DUMBUTSHENA, Enoch, 962
 DUNCAN, Daniel Kablan, 271
 DUNN, David B., 900
 DURDA, Abu Zaid Umar, 512
 DU SART, Colin Francois, 827
 DUVAL, Gaëtan, 589
 DUVAL, Hervé, 597
 DUVAL, Xavier Luc, 594
 DYTENYA, Eric K., 405
 DZANJALIMODZI, Respicious, 547
 DZINOTYIWEI, Heneri, 964
- EASTHAM, Alan W., Jr., 552
 EBAO, Sebastien, 262
 EBO, Abbate, 296
 EBOBO, Antonio Pascual Oko, 323
 EBONG, Frederick, 149
 EBOUA, Samuel, 147
 EDMOND, Didier, 599
 EDMOND, Rafimanaheja, 531
 EDWIN, John, 404
 EDZOA, Titus, 142
 EFAYONG, Martin, 382
 EFFAH-APENTANG, Nana, 408
 EFIRD, Cynthia G., 73
 EGAL, Mohamed Ibrahim, 774, 792, 793
 EKANE, Anicet, 148
 EKANYA, Geoffrey, 927
 EKIKI, Mohammed, 674
 EKINDI, Jean-Jacques, 148
 EKOI, Francis, 898
 EKUA AVOMO, Lino Sima, 335
 EKWUEME, Alex, 679, 690
 ELÁ, Salvador, 322
 ELAD, Sam Ekontang, 148
 EL-AMAOUI, Noubir, 609
 ELBAK, Abdou Soule, 205, 212, 217
 EL BANE, Mohamed Abdallahi Ould, 582
 EL FASSI, Abbas, 608
 eL-HASSEN, Bechir, 578
 el-HORANI, Mohamed Ali, 913
 EL IDRISSE, Mohammed, 612
 ELIZABETH, Bernard, 753
 EL KOHEN, Abderrahmane, 613
 ELLOUZE, Habib, 912
 ELOI, Baihon Maloum, 197
 EL OUAZZANI, Najib, 613
 EMBONI, Pierre, 376
 EMPEIGNE, Clifford, 597
 ENAHARO, Anthony, 695
 ENAHOU, Mohamed, 582
 ENDALKACHEW, Makonnen, 348
- ENDJIMOUNGOU, Patrice, 175
 ENGELBRECHT, Carola, 650
 ENGONGA, Armengol, 332
 ENGOUNG-NZE, Alain, 378
 ERDIMI, Timan, 199
 ERDIMI, Tom, 199
 ERNEST, Joma, 535
 ESAYAS, Shegaw, 367
 ESKANDAR, Amin, 312
 ESONO, Miguel, 333
 ESSEKU, Haruna, 402
 ESSENDI, Aluda, 468
 ESSOLOMONGEU, Vincent, 379
 ETWAROO, Sada, 594
 EWANGAI, Mohammed, 671
 EYADEMA, Etienne, 884
 EYADEMA, Gnassingbé, 885
 EYEE, Mohamed Ould Abdellaki Ould, 583
 EZEOKÉ, Edwin Ume, 695
 EZZAT, Mahmoud, 314
- FABRE, Jean-Pierre, 897
 FADIL, Mahamat Saleh, 199
 FADUL, Francisco José, 427, 434
 FADUL, Taq al-Din Abdallah, 835
 FAGBOHOUN, Séfou, 82
 FAHMY, Nabil, 319
 FAIFE, Albino, 631
 FAKI, Moussa, 181, 189
 FAKUDZE, Andreas, 858
 FALAE, Samuel Oluyemisi, 683
 FALL, Ely Madiodo, 738
 FALL, François Lonseny, 413
 FALL, Mamadou Puritain, 741
 FALL, Ousseymou, 738
 FARAH, Daher Ahmed, 298
 FARAH, Hasan Abshir, 779
 FARAH AIDID, Hussein Mohamed, 354, 785
 FARBA, Dieng Boubou, 584
 FARHAT, David, 498, 504
 FAROUK, King, 302
 FARU, Aliyu Habu, 692
 FATONDJI, Pascal, 84
 FAURE, Daniel, 752
 FAWEHINMI, Gani, 693, 695
 FAYE, Abdoulaye, 736
 FAZUL, Mohamed Saïd, 205, 212, 217
 FERNANDES, Domingos, 437
 FERNANDES, Gaspar, 436
 FERNANDES, Tony da Costa, 65-66
 FERNANDEZ, Tomas Mecheba, 330
 FERRARI, Jean-François, 753
 FERRARI, Maxime, 754
 FERUVI, Freddy, 132
 FHIMAH, Lamin Khalifah, 516
 FIKRE-SELASSIE, Wogderes, 349
 FILALI, Abdellatif, 604
 FIOR, Allah, 245
 FIRMIN, Abalo, 894
- FISSEHA, Desta, 349
 FOBBIN, Boniface, 148
 FOKER, Dharmanand Goopt, 595
 FOLLY, Antoine, 896
 FONCHA, John Ngu, 136
 FORD, Robert S., 53
 FOSSUNG, Henry, 149
 FRANCK, Edouard, 165
 FRANQUE, Luis Ranque, 69
 FRASER-MOLEKETI, Geraldine, 821
 FRICHOT, Robert, 753
 FRU NDI, John, 138, 146
 FUAD, King, 301
 FUNDIKIRA, Abdallah Said, 878, 879
 FYLA, Nicéphore, 261
- GAAS, Mohamoda Ahmed, 362
 GABIRAUULT, Olivier, 175
 GABRIEL, Nichol, 753
 GAFABUSA I, Solon Iguri, 920
 GAHUTU, Rémy, 130
 GAKOU, Mamadou, 561
 GALAYDH, Ali Khalif, 779
 GALIAMBO, David, 176
 al-GALIL, Ahmad Hassan Abd, 316
 GAMBA, Louis-Pierre, 173
 GAMBE, Ivan Norbert, 265
 GANA, Jerry, 690
 GANAHO, Joseph, 80
 GANAQ, David Charles, 255, 262
 al GANZOURI, Kamal Ahmed, 304
 GAOMBALET, Célestin-Leroy, 163, 169, 177
 GAPYISI, Emmanuel, 711
 GARAD, Usman, 797
 GARANG, John, 832, 835
 GARBA, Adamou, 670
 GARBA, Bello Tiousso, 669
 GARBA, Salibou, 194
 GARFA, Mahamat, 201
 GAROËB, Justus, 644, 650
 GAROEB, Moses, 647
 GASANA, Anastase, 711
 GASSAGAYE, Antar, 148
 GATABAZI, Félicien, 703, 710
 GATHUU, Mboro, 460
 GATKOUTH, Faruq, 848
 GATO, Paulo Lukamba, 67
 GAUGE, Ibrahim Abdou, 670
 GBAGBO, Laurent, 270, 271, 278
 GBAI-TAGRO, Robert, 284
 GBEZERA-BRIA, Michel, 167
 GBOLLIE, Ciapha, 504
 GEBEYHU, Admasso, 360
 GEBHREHIWET, Hagos, 343
 GEBREAB, Yemane, 343
 GEBREMARIAN, Adhanom, 344
 GEBREMESKAL, Yemane, 343
 GEINGOB, Hage, 643
 GELASA, Dilbo, 364
 GELETA, Shigat, 364

- GEMEDA, Abdullah, 358
 GENENEW, Assefa, 365
 GEORGE, Jerome, 503
 GEORGE, Lawrence, 502
 GORGES, Annette, 749, 752
 GERTZE, Kalia, 650
 GETAHUN, Chekol, 360
 GHABUSH, Philip Abbas, 834, 849
 GHADANSI, Izzidin, 519
 GHALI, Brahim, 620
 al-GHANI, Safwat Abd, 316
 GHANIM, Shukri Muhammad, 511, 512
 GHANNOUCHI, Mohamed, 903, 904, 908
 GHANOUCHI, Rachid, 912
 al GHATRIFI, Naji, 313
 GHAZAL, Fawsi Khalil Mohammad, 313
 GHEDI, Ali Mohammed, 775, 782
 GHOKOOL, Dharam, 594
 GHOZALI, Sid Ahmed, 32, 47
 GHURBURRUN, Beergoonath, 588, 595
 GIBRIL, Akim, 760
 GILL, Christopher, 753
 GIMBY, Lumingu Luís Caneiro, 69
 GIRMA, Wolde Giorgis, 347, 352
 GITHONGO, John, 450
 GIZENGA, Antoine, 225, 243
 GNASSINGBÉ, Ernest, 886
 GNASSINGBÉ, Faure Essozimma, 885, 889, 893
 GNININVI, Léopold, 896
 GOAGOSEB, Frans, 651
 GOLDSTONE, Richard, 807
 GOLHOR, Ali, 196
 GOLLEY, Omrie, 769
 GOLOGO, Mamadou Bachir, 562
 GOLOU, Emmanuel, 81
 GOMA, Louis-Sylvain, 252
 GOMAA, Numan, 305, 312
 GOMES, Antonieta Rosa, 437
 GOMES, Aristides, 425, 429
 GOMES, Carlos, 425, 429, 434
 GOMES, Fernando, 436
 GOMES, Joao, 724
 GOMES, Jorge Victor, 70
 GOMEZ, Henry, 392
 GOMEZ, René, 412
 GONGARAD-NKOUA, Auguste-Célestin, 261
 GOPOLANG, Cornelius, 94
 GORE, Alfred Lado, 853
 GOUDE, Charles Blé, 278
 GOUDIABY, Bara, 740
 GOULED, Hassan, 287, 288, 293
 GOUMBA, Abel, 165, 172, 175
 GOURAD, Barkat, 287, 288
 GOWON, Yakubu, 678
 GRAÇA, Armindo, 724, 725
 GRAÇA, Carlos Alberto Dias Monteiro da, 718
 GRAY, Acarous, 498
 GREIMA, Gagara, 668
 GREY-JOHNSON, Crispin, 394
 GRUNITZKY, Nicolas, 884
 GUDINA, Merera, 365
 GUDO, Jose Samo, 633
 GUEBUZA, Armando Emilio, 623, 625, 629
 GUEÏ, Robert, 271, 272
 GUELLEH, Ismail Omar, 287, 289, 293
 GUELMA, Mohamed Ould, 581
 GUENET, Giram, 365
 GUERANDI, Mbara, 149
 GUET, Goukhouni, 200
 GUEYE, Abdou Latif, 738
 GUEYE, Boubacar, 741
 GUEYE, Semou Pathe, 741
 GUILAVOGUI, Georges Koly, 417
 GUIMA, Frederic Fernand, 112
 GUIMARÃES, Luís, 632
 GUIMARÃES, Nilo, 720
 GUKONU, Emmanuel, 896
 GULE, Jerry, 862
 GUMEDE, Josiah, 955
 GURIRAB, Theo-Ben, 640, 644, 648, 653
 GUSHEIN, Ismael Mohammed Gassim, 418
 HABANI, Sayyid Khalifah Idris, 850
 HABIB, André Bumaya, 710
 HABIB, Mohamed, 314
 HABRÉ, Hissène, 181, 182
 HABSADÉ, Muhammad Ibrahim, 785
 HABYARIMANA, Juvénal, 700
 HACHANA, Mohamed Nejib, 915
 HACHANI, Abdelkader, 47
 HACHANI, Ali, 915
 HACHIM, Hamid Saïd, 211
 HADDAM, Anwar, 48
 HADEF, Mohamed, 45
 HAGAN, George, 403
 HAGOS, Mesfin, 343
 HAIDALLA, Mohamed Khouna Ould, 581
 HAIDARA, Baba Hakib, 562
 HAILEMARIAM, Desalegn, 358
 HAILE SELASSIE, Emperor, 348
 HAILU, Shawel, 359
 HAILU, Yimanu, 350
 HAJI MASALEH, Omar, 786
 HAKIM, Brahim, 620
 HAKIZIMANA, Godefroy, 131
 HALIDI, Ibrahim Abderemane, 208, 217
 HALIDI, Ibrahim Ahmed, 207
 HALIFA, Abdullah, 218
 HALOUANI, Mohamed Ali el-, 910
 HAMAD, Abu al-Qasim Haji, 850
 HAMAD, Ahmad al-Sayid, 848
 HAMAD, Seif Sharif, 869, 877
 HAMADOU, Dabo, 109
 HAMAT, Beshir Disco, 198
 HAMDANI, Ismail, 35
 HAMED, Abdoulaye Ould, 582
 HAMED, Ahmad Youssef, 297, 298
 al-HAMI, Abdullah, 519
 HAMMAN, Talaat Yassin, 316
 HAMMANI, Hamma, 913
 HAMMANI, Hosni, 911
 HAMMOUMA, Mohamed, 45
 HAMROUCHE, Mouloud, 32
 HAMUTENYA, Hidipo, 648
 HAMZA, Mustapha, 316
 HANEKOM, Derek, 809
 HANENA, Saleh Ould, 584
 HANENNA, Cheikh Sidi Ould, 581
 HANI, Chris, 808, 821
 HANNOUN, Louisa, 43
 HARDING, Prince, 767
 HARED, Ismael Guedi, 297, 299
 HARIR, Sherif, 854
 al HARIRI, Abu al-Izz, 313
 HARMEL, Mohamed, 910
 HAROUN, Aboubarkaye, 200
 HAROUN, Ali, 46
 HAROUN, Ibrahim, 343
 HARTZENBERG, Ferdi, 809
 HASAN ALI, Osman, 777
 HASHEM, Salah, 316
 HASSAN, Crown Prince, 603
 HASSAN, Ibrahim Muhammad, 789
 HASSAN, Iwad, 296
 HASSANALI, Mohamed, 220
 HASSANEIN, Ali Mahmoud, 848
 HASSAN II, 602, 603
 HATTAB, Hassan, 50
 HAWADIE MADAR, Mohamed, 776
 HAZI, Ahmed Mohamed, 221
 HENRY, Marcel, 206
 HERSI, Mohamed Muse, 782
 HERSI, Mohamed Said, 786
 HERTZOG, Albert, 804, 827
 HEUNIS, J. Christiaan, 806
 HICHILEMA, Hakainde, 942
 HIFTER, Khalifa, 518
 HIGIRO, Prosper, 710
 HIKAUMBA, Leonard, 942
 HILAL, Mohamed, 314
 HILALI, Saïd, 217
 HILAWÉ, Yosef, 357
 al-HINDI, Zayn al-Abidin, 847
 HINGA NORMAN, Sam, 765
 HIRUY, Tedla Bairu, 342
 HISSENE, Mahamet, 193
 HITIMANA, Mathias, 130
 HLOPHE, Ephraim Mandlenkosi, 865
 HLOPHE, Jimmy, 863
 HOAREAU, Gabriel (Gaby), 753
 HOAREAU, Gérard, 754
 al-HODAIBI, Mamoun, 314
 HOLOMISA, Bantu, 822
 HON, Elijah, 848
 HOOKS, Aubrey, 285
 HOUDE, Valentin Aditi, 84
 HOUMADI, Halifa, 209
 HOUNGBÉDJI, Adrien, 77, 81

- HOUPHOUËT-BOIGNY, Félix, 270
HOWARD-TAYLOR, Jewel, 502
HUDSON, William J., 915
HUGHES, Ebenezer Begyina Sekhi, 407
HULDAR, Abd al-Fatah, 367
HULL, Thomas N., III, 772
al-HUNI, Abd al-Munim, 519
HUSAYN, Faysal Muhammad, 850
HUSAYN, Hatim Abdullah al-Zaki, 850
HUSSEIN, Abdulmejid, 366
HUSSEIN, Harsan, 364
HUSSEIN, Mohamed, 364
HUSSEIN, Moussa, 297
HUSSEIN, Yahya, 880
HYDARA, Sadibu, 386
- IBEDOOU, Younous, 197
IBRAHIM, Abdallah, 210, 221
IBRAHIM, Khalil Mohamed, 852
IBRAHIM, Mohammed, 344
IBRAHIM, Moulay Abdallah, 612
IBRAHIM, Saïd, 206
IBRAHIMA, Idriissou, 80
IBRAHIM ARAYE, Ali Sheikh, 789
IBRAHIMI, Ahmed, 36, 47
IBSA, Daoud, 364
IBSSA, Gutema, 363
IDIAGBON, Tunde, 679
IDOHOU, Simon Bodéhoussé, 85
IDRIS, King, 510
IDRIS, Muhammad, 510
IDRISS, Abdella, 343
IDRISS, Ahmed, 288, 293
IGURU IV, Oyo Nyimba Kabamba, 920
IKKEN, Bouazza, 613
IKOUEBE, Basile, 268
ILEKA, Atoki, 250
ILUNGA, Emile, 242
IMAN, Zakariaa Bashir, 850
IMANYARA, Gitobu, 457
IMBALI, Faustino Fadut, 428
IMRU, Mikael, 348
INJAI, Canjura, 435
INONI, Ephraim, 137, 139, 142
IPINGE, Hopelong Uushona, 654
IRRO, Abdirahman Muhammad, 797, 799
ISAIAS, Afwerki, 337, 343, 345
ISAKA, Blazius, 147
ISHAQ, George, 312
ISMAEL, Hussein, 468
ISMAEL, Mohamed Hafed Ould, 580
ISMAIL, Abdullahi Sheikh, 789
ISMAIL ABDI, Ali, 784
ISSAQ, Abdi Warsame, 789
ISSOUFOU, Mahamadou, 658, 667
ISSOUFOU, Nabram, 666
- JACKOU, Sanoussi, 668
JACKSON, Jeanine E., 113
JACOB, Harmed, 198
- JACOBS, Janice L., 439, 745
JADEN, Agrev, 833
JAFAR, Jafar Gulamo, 631
JAFFAR, Saïd Mohamed, 206
JAGNE, Dodou Bammy, 394
JAGWE, Abdu, 928
JAH, S. U. M., 767
JALLAH, Armah, 504
JALLOH, Amadu, 771
JALLOW, Ebou, 387
JALLOW, Omar, 391
JALLOW, Yaya, 391
JALLUD, Abd al-Salam, 511
JAMA, Jama Ali, 779
JAMA ALI, Osman, 780
JAMA HUSSEIN, Sheikh, 784
JAMATUTU, Alhaji Rahman, 404
JAMBO, Mallem Salek, 692
JAMMEH, Yahya, 385, 386, 390
JAONA, Monja, 524, 536
JATTA, Dembo, 391
JATTA, Sidia, 392
JAWARA, Dawda Kairaba, 385
JAWARA, Lamin Waa, 390, 391
JAZI, Dali, 908
JERE, Susan, 947
JERRY, Eden, 946
JESS, Ahmed Umar, 786
JESUS, Hipólito de, 633
JETTOU, Driss, 603, 605
JIBRIL, Muhammad Fayiz, 518
JIDDOU, Kattry Ould Taleb, 582
JIMETA, Alh, 695
JINA, Mahmud, 850
JIYANE, Jiba, 822
JOÃO, Bengue Pedro, 68
JOHNSON, Christian, 771
JOHNSON, Roosevelt, 491
JOHNSON, Wesley Momo, 487, 501
JOHNSON-SIRLEAF, Ellen, 487, 492, 499
JOINA, Themba, 94
JOLICOEUR, J. Benoit, 596
JONAH, James, 759
JONATHAN, Leabua, 473
JONES, Francisco, 333
JONES, José Luis, 332
JOSE, Mateus, 69
JOUBERT, David, 754
JUA, Paulinus Toh, 146
JUBANE, Twoboy, 964
JUGNAUTH, Anerood, 588, 589, 595
JUGNAUTH, Pravind Kumar, 591, 595
JULU, Charles, 505
JULUE, Charles, 490
JUMA, Marcos, 634
JUMA, Omar Ali, 867, 869
JUMBE, Aboud, 868
JUMMA, Kassim bin, 880
JUSU-SHERRIFF, Salia, 766
JUXON-SMITH, Andrew, 758
- KA, Djibo, 739
KAA-BOGO, William Gitau, 462
KAAYA, Haji Jingo, 928
KABA, Mohamed Mansour, 420, 422
KABA, Nfaly, 422
KABADI, Haroun, 189
KABANDA, Yusuf, 929
KABANGO, Ngola, 67
KABASSEMA, Mba, 898
KABBAH, Ahmad Tejan, 757, 760, 767
KABEBA, Hajji, 930
KABI, Martin Ndafa, 434
KABILA, Joseph, 225, 233
KABILA, Laurent Désiré, 225, 226
KABORE, Alfred, 110
KABORE, Emmanuel Nayabtigungu Congo, 107
KABORE, Marc Christian Roch, 99, 106, 113
KABOYO II, Patrick David Matthew Olimi, 920
KABRI, Tayeb, 45
KABUGUA, John Rukenya, 462
KABURA, Cossan, 132
KABUSHEMEYE, Ernest, 118
KADEGE, Alphonse-Marie, 120
KADIR, Shimer Abdel, 364
KADIRI, Abdallah, 611
KADZAMIRA, Cecilia, 546
KAFANDO, Michel, 113
KAFI, Ali, 33
KAGAME, Paul, 701, 704, 710
KAGWIMA, Francis, 460
KAHIN, Dahir Riyale, 793, 794, 797
KAIDII, George M., 504
KAINGA-KALULUMA, Kate, 547
KAIRA, Mike, 943
KAITA, Lawal, 695
KAJEGUHAKWA, Valens, 714
KAJWANG', Otieno, 466
KALALA, Alafuele, 246
KALANGULA, Peter, 651
KALLEL, Abdallah, 908, 915
KALONJI, Albert, 225
KALUA, Kampelo, 551
KAMACHO, João, 635
KAMANDA, Gerard, 244
KAMARA, Abdul Rahman, 771
KAMARA, Amara Alkalie, 767
KAMARA, Ibrahim M., 772
KAMARA, Osman, 771
KAMARA, Raymond, 769
KAMARA-TAYLOR, Christian, 758
KAMATI, Padimbe, 632
KAMBANDA, Jean, 703
KAMBONA, Oscar Salathiel, 878
KAMEL, Michel, 318
KAMERHE, Vital, 240
KAMITATU, Olivier, 243, 249
KAMOTHO, Joseph, 463, 466

- KAMOUGUÉ, Wadal Abdelkader, 183, 194
 KAMPATIBE, Nagbandja, 896
 KAMU, Samuel Gbessay, 769
 KAMULEGEYA, Yahaya, 928
 KAMUNANWIRE, Perezzi Karukubiro, 932
 KANDANDO, Rihupisa, 650
 KANE, Karim, 418
 KANGE, Lyonga Efase, 149
 KANG'ETHE, Winston Kimathi, 467
 KANGUEEHI, Kuzeeko, 650
 KANIDOUA, Naboho, 106
 KANKOILA, François Mendy, 435
 KANNEH, Eddie, 762
 KANOUTE, Cheikh Ibrahim Khalil, 567
 KANU, Ndubuisi, 693
 KANU, Sheka, 766
 KANYARENGWE, Alexis, 710
 KANYENKIKO, Anatole, 118
 KANYERENGWE, Alexis, 702
 KAPARO, Francis Xavier ole, 470
 KAPERER, Asser Kuveri, 653
 KAPIA, Paulas, 648
 KAPITA, Ben, 944
 KAPOMA, Tens C., 949
 KAPTEN, George, 458
 KAPUUO, Clemens, 640
 KAPWEPWE, Simon M., 935
 KARABA, Bizima, 242
 KARANI, Joseph, 468
 KARANJA, Josephat, 443
 KARAR, Jafar, 850
 KARATASI, Etienne, 130
 KARGBO, Edward, 771
 KARGBO, Soufian, 769
 KARIFA-SMART, John, 760, 769
 KARIM, Abdul Kadi, 769
 KARIM, Jibril Abdel, 852
 al-KARIM, Awad Muhammad, 849
 KARIMU, John, 766
 KARIUKI, Joram Gainé, 467
 KARKAR, Sahah, 912
 KAROU, Hamed, 903, 908
 KARUA, Martha, 456
 KARUMBA, Joseph, 131
 KARUME, Abeid Amani, 868
 KARUME, Amani Abeid, 867, 876
 KASAVUBU, Joseph, 224
 KASSAMBA, Ali Diaby, 107
 KASSESSA, Armindo, 66
 KASSU, Illala, 358
 KATO, Issad, 672
 KATSONGA, Mark, 549
 KATUKU, Mutua, 455, 461
 KAUENDENGE, Joseph, 651
 KAUNDA, Kenneth D., 934
 KAUNDA, Panji, 943
 KAUNDA, Tilyenji, 944
 KAURA, Katuutire, 644, 649
 KAVAUNGANDA, Joseph, 703
 KAWAH, Lami, 508
 KAYA, Paul, 262
 KAYIBANDA, Grégoire, 700
 KAYIRANGA, Esdra, 710
 KAZIBWE, Speciosa Wandira, 917
 KAZIENDE, Léopold, 667
 KEBIR, Rabeh, 48
 KEBZABO, Saleh, 188, 194
 KEDIKILWE, Ponatshego, 91
 KEITA, Ibrahim Boubacar, 556, 564, 567
 KEITA, Modibo, 554
 KEMAL, Saïd Ali, 209, 219
 KENA, Jacob Mokhafisi, 483
 KENGO, Joseph Léon, 226, 244
 KENYATTA, Jomo, 442
 KENYATTA, Uhuru, 445, 463, 465
 KEREKOU, Mathieu, 75, 76
 KERIM, Tijani Ould, 586
 KERROW, Billow, 465
 KETTE, Moïse Nodji, 197
 KGANYAGO, Ntopile, 822
 KGOSIPULA, Mokgweetsi, 92
 KHADIR, Idriss, 45
 KHAKETLA, Bennett Makalo, 481
 KHALIF, Ahmed, 445
 KHALIF, Lakhdar Ben, 43
 KHALIFA, al-Khatim, 833
 KHALIFA, Husayn, 342
 KHALIFA, Mohammed, 467
 KHALIFA, Seyyid Jamshid bin Abdullah bin, 868
 KHALIL, Abdallah, 833
 KHALIL, Abd al-Majid Hamid, 834
 KHALIL, Mustafa, 303
 KHALIL, Sulayman Hasan, 849
 KHAMA, Seretse Ian, 87, 88, 91
 KHAMISI, Joseph, 466
 KHERBI, Amine, 53
 KHITSAM, Rakali, 483
 KHOABANE, Majara P., 483
 KHOUNA, Cheikh el Avia Ould Mohamed, 573, 578
 KHOZA, Arthur, 859
 KHUMALO, Zakhele, 822
 KHUMBULA, Wilson, 963
 KHUPE, Thokozani, 962
 KHYARI, Thami, 610
 KIBAKI, Alex, 455, 461
 KIBAKI, Emilio Mwai, 441
 KIBAKI, Mwai, 443
 KIBASSA, Frédéric, 241
 KIBAYDAH, Abd al-Rahman Ismail, 850
 KIBIRIGE, Bernard, 928
 KIBUGA, Stephen M., 879
 KIBWANA, Kivutha, 452, 461
 KIEH, George Klay, Jr., 500, 502
 KIENTÉGA, Fidèle, 112
 KIFICHO, Pandu Amir, 882
 KIFLE, Tigneh Abate, 361
 KIFLE, Ougoureh, 289, 296
 KIGGUNDU, Sulaiman, 927
 KIGONGO, Moses, 925
 KIIIR, Salva Mayardit, 832, 839, 851
 KIKHIA, Mansur, 518
 KIKWETE, Jakaya, 867, 876
 KILIKU, Joseph Kennedy, 467
 KINA, Jerome Saka, 82
 KING, Augustin Moussavou, 372
 KINIGI, Sylvie, 117
 KINYUA, George, 460
 KIRWA, Kipruto Rono arap, 455, 459
 KISEKKA, Samson, 918
 KITIMBO, Paulsen, 928
 KITOBIO, Simon, 460
 KITUYI, Mukhisa, 458
 KIYUNGA, Crispus, 925
 KI-ZERBO, Joseph, 105, 106, 110
 KLUTSE, Kwassi, 888
 KOBINA, Djény, 279
 KODELAMI, Mamane, 674
 KODJO, Agbéyomé Messan, 889, 898
 KODJO, Edem, 885, 887, 894
 KODOCK, Augustin Frederick, 144
 KOFFIGO, Joseph Kokou, 886, 894
 KOBLA, Djimasta, 187, 196
 KOITA, Tidjane, 582
 KOLAWOLÉ, Antoine Idji, 82, 84
 KOLELAS, Bernard, 253, 263
 KOLIMBA, Horace, 869
 KOLINGBA, André-Dieudonné, 164, 173
 KOMA, Lenyeletse, 94
 KOMAKECH, Ronald Otim, 928
 KOMBA, Justine, 265
 KOMBE, Harry, 463
 KOMBILA, A'Agendieu Thierry, 377
 KOMBILA, Pierre-André, 371, 378
 KOMBO, Musikari, 453, 458
 KOMBO-NAGUEMON, Nestor, 176
 KONARÉ, Alpha Oumar, 555, 556, 563
 KONATÉ, Mady, 565
 KONATE, Sékou, 418
 KONATE, Tréoulé Mamadou, 556, 562
 KONCHELLAH, Gideon, 461
 KONE, Adama, 562
 KONE, Amadou, 284
 KONE, Karamoko, 112
 KONES, Kipkalya, 461
 KONIE, Gwendoline, 945
 KONY, Joseph, 918, 929
 KOORNHOF, Gerhard, 822
 K'OPIYO, Otieno, 458
 KOROMA, Aiah Abu, 766
 KOROMA, Ernest Bai, 767
 KOROMA, Johnny Paul, 757, 761, 768
 KOROMA, Mohamed Aka, 767
 KOROMA, Samuel, 762
 KOROMA, Sorie, 767
 KORTIE, David, 502
 KORTO, Joseph, 503
 KOSGEY, Henry, 465
 KOTY, Abbas, 201

- KOTY, Hisséne, 201
 KOUANDÉTÉ, Maurice, 75
 KOUATÉ, Seydou Badian, 562
 KOUDOUFARA, Dieuonné, 175
 KOULAMALLAH, Ibrahim, 198
 KOULIBALI, Mamadou, 284
 KOUMAKOYÉ, Delwa Kassiré, 187, 195
 KOUMBA-MBADINGA, Max-Anicet, 380
 KOUNTCHÉ, Seyni, 656
 KOYAMBOUNOU, Gabriel, 166
 KPOLLEH, William Gabriel, 488, 499
 KPOMAKPOR, David, 490
 KPORUGBE, Peter, 405
 KPOSOVA, Jonathan, 769
 KPOTO, Robert, 504
 KPOTUI, Adanu Kokou, 898
 KROMAH, Alhaji G. V., 490, 496, 502
 KROMAK, Amara, 504
 KRUGER, G., 826
 KUFUOR, John, 397, 398, 402
 KUMALO, Dumisani Shadrack, 830
 KUNGU, Njuguna, 467
 KUNGUA Kumwanza, Gabriel, 229
 KUYON, Bismark, 490
 KWANGANA, Eduardo, 68
 KWELAGOBE, Daniel K., 91
 KWELE, D. K., 92
 KYANJO, Hussein, 927
 KYARA, Paulo, 880
 KYUNGU, Gabriel, 245
- LAASOUED, Habib, 912
 LADGHAM, Bahi, 902
 LAENSER, Mohand, 611
 LAFIA, Sacca, 83
 LAGANDI, Daniel, 173
 LAGONY, Oti, 929
 LAGU, Joseph, 833
 LAHINIRIAKO, Jean, 531
 LAHJOUI, Abderrahim, 613
 LAISAGER, Jackson, 468
 LAKOUE, Enoch Dérant, 165, 175
 LAKWENA, Alice, 928
 LAMANA, Abdoulaye, 196
 LAMINE, Issa, 674
 LAMIZANA, Sangoulé, 97
 LAMRANI, Mohamed Karim, 603
 LAMWAI, Masumbuko, 878
 LANDO, Honorato, 68
 LANGA, Pius, 476
 LANKOANDÉ, Ali, 110
 LANSANA, Ansu, 771
 LANSANA, David, 758
 LAOBELE DAMAYE, Dangbe, 197
 LAR, Solomon, 691
 LARAKI, Azzedine, 603
 LARIFOU, Saïd, 217
 LARTEY, Daniel, 407
 LASSOUED, Amar, 44
 LATVIO, Hileni, 651
- LAVODRAMA, Prosper, 176
 LAWANI, Essohanam, 894
 LAWSON, Nicholas, 898
 LAYADA, Abdelhaq, 50
 LEAKEY, Richard, 444, 445
 LEANYA, Tsitso, 481
 LECACHEUR, Henri, 537
 LEE, Donald, 822
 LEFOUABA, Gregoire, 265
 LE GRANGE, Louis, 810
 LEITAO, Carlos, 69
 LEJAH, Sempe, 483
 LEKHAL, Yacine, 45
 LEKHANYA, Justin M., 474, 481
 LEKOA, Lapologang Caesar, 95
 LEKOMA, Kopano, 92
 LEKOTA, Mosiuoa, 829
 LEKOTA, Patrick, 820
 LEMBOUMBA, Jean-Pierre, 378
 LEMOHIBAN, Yorongar, 195
 LENCHO, Leta, 363
 LEON, Tony, 811, 816, 822
 LERARRI, Rashid, 47
 LETSIE III, King, 473
 LEVELO, Boniface, 533
 LEWANIKA, Akashambatwa Mbikusita, 945
 LEWANIKA, Inonge Mbikusita, 945, 949
 LEWULA, Tuyaba, 244
 LIDETU, Ayelaw, 360
 LIFE-CHIPAKA, John D., 879
 LIGALE, Andrew, 466
 LILLE, Patricia de, 811, 823
 LIMA, Aristides Raimundo, 158, 160
 LIMA, Manuel Paixao, 725
 LIMA DA VEIGA, Maria de Fatima, 161
 LIMANN, Hilla, 397
 LINGANI, Jean-Baptiste, 98
 LIPUMBA, Ibrahim, 877
 LISSOUBA, Pascal, 253, 263
 LISULO, Daniel, 946
 LITSOANE, Thuso, 483
 LITUMBE, Njoh, 147
 LIYAI, Fanel, 468
 LIZINDE, Théonaste, 701
 LOBUIN, David Idilla, 854
 LODON, Farah, 297, 298
 LOFORTE, Pedro, 633
 LOLIK, Pacifico, 848
 LOMPO, Benoît, 112
 LONA, Etienne, 247
 LOPES, Agostinho, 159
 LOPES, Filomena Viera, 69
 LOSSOU, Paulin, 897
 LOULY, Mohamed Mahmoud Ould Ahmed, 571
 LOUM, Magatte, 741
 LOUM, Mamadou Lamine, 729, 739
 LOUMBABOU, Georges, 265
 LOWASSA, Edward, 867, 871, 876
 LUBALA, Charles Dotto, 879
- LUBANGA, Thomas, 246
 LUBOTA, Francisco Xavier, 69
 LUCKE, Lewis W., 865
 LUEMBA, José Tiburcio, 70
 LUKYAMUZI, John Ken, 927
 LULE, Yusuf K., 918
 LUMA, Martin, 149
 LUMBALA, Roger, 242
 LUMBI, Pierre, 244
 LUMUMBA, François Tolenga, 245
 LUMUMBA, Patrice, 225
 LUNDA Bululu, Vincent de Paul, 226, 246
 LUNGU, Steven, 937
 LUSINA, Edith, 878
 LUTETE, Raphaël Kumba ki, 246
 LUTFI, Ali Mahmud, 303
 LUTUNDULA, Christophe, 246
 LUWIYA, Morris, 848
 LWEKAMWA, Leo, 877
- MAACH, Abdelwahed, 612
 MAALI, Ethmane Ould Cheikh Abou Ali, 578
 MAALIM, Farah, 461
 MAALOU, Mohammed Ould, 581
 MA'ANE MAGMUD, Mawlid, 785
 MAAOUNI, Hassan, 610
 MAATHAI, Wangari, 460, 468
 MABHIDA, Moses, 820
 MABOTE, Miguel, 634
 MABOTE, Sebastião, 632
 MABROUK, Sassi, 45
 MABUNDA, Abel Gabriel, 632
 MACAEFA, Billy, 483
 MACEBO, Sylvia, 944
 MACGREGOR, Francis, 752, 755
 MACHAR, Riak, 837, 851
 MACHEL, Carlos, 636
 MACHEL, Samora, 622
 MACHICUNGO, António João, 68
 MACHOKOTO, Alois, 966
 MACHUNGO, Mário Fernandes da Graça, 623
 MACIAS, Nguema Biyogo, 321
 MACIE, Nguema Biyogo Ngué Ndong, 322
 MACKOUMB-OU-NKOUKA, Anselme, 264
 MADANGURE, Isabel, 966
 MADANI, Abassi, 48
 MADI, Abdul-Ela, 312
 MADI, Mohamed Abdou, 208, 211
 MADI, Mouni, 219
 MADIH, Lachen, 613
 MADIKIZELA-MANDELA, Winnie, 811
 MADOBE, Adan, 785
 MADUEKWE, Ojo, 691
 MADY, ALPHONSE Djedjé, 280
 MADZONGWE, Edna, 966
 MAECHA, Mtara, 219
 MAEMA, Lebohang Fine, 484

- MAGA, Hubert, 75
MAGAMA, Akanyang, 92
MAGANGA-MOUSSAVOU, Pierre-Claver, 378
MAGARA, Omingo, 463
MAGARIAF, Muhammad, 518
MAGOCHE, Emmanuel, 964
MAGONGO, Charles Sgayoyo, 864
MAHAM, Abdou, 578
MAHAMA, Alhaji Aliu, 397, 402
MAHAMA, Edward, 398, 404
MAHAMAD, Souleimane, 146
MAHAMAT, Mersile Atti, 196
MAHAMET, Ibrahim Malla, 200
MAHAMIDOU, Aliou, 657
MAHARANGA, Tsihozony, 536
MAHDI, Muhammad Ahmad, 833
al MAHDI, Sadiq, 313
al-MAHDI, Mubarak al-Fadil, 847
al-MAHDI, Sadiq, 832, 833, 847
al-MAHDI, Wali al-Din al-Hadi, 849
MAHDI MOHAMED, Ali, 776, 783
MAHERZI, Slimane, 49
MAHFOUZ, Naguib, 316
al MAHGUB, Rifaat, 304
MAHGUB, Abd al-Khaliq, 833
MAHGUB, Muhammad Ahmad, 833
MAHIGA, A. Augustine, 882
MAHMOUD, Mahmoud Ali, 200
MAHMUD, Umar Muhammad, 784
MAHMUD ATO, Ahmad, 784
al-MAHMUDI, Al-Baghdadi Ali, 511
MAHOMED, Khalid Hussein, 633
MAHOUKA, Jacques, 263
MAIGA, Ali Sirfi, 670
MAIGA, Choguel, 565
MAIGA, Ousmane Issoufi, 555, 557
MAIGA, Soumaylou Boubèye, 563
MAÏNASSARA, Ibrahim Baré, 657, 659
MAITHA, Emmanuel, 467
MAITHA, Karisa, 457
MAITHA, Moffat Muia, 462
al-MAJID, Sadiq Abdallah Abd, 850
MAKAIDI, Emmanuel J. E., 880
MAKALO, Phoday, 390
MAKANI, Bob Nyanga, 874
MAKAU, Johnstone, 460
MAKHAKHE, Tseliso, 480
MAKHUMULA, James, 550
MAKI, Ali, 296
MAKIYA, Bela Ould, 578
MAKO, Abdoulaye, 562
MAKONI, Simba, 962
MAKUSA, Bernard, 701, 704–705
MAKWANGWALA, Kennedy, 546
MAKWETU, Clarence, 824
MALAININE, Mohamed Lemine Chbhi
Ould Cheikh, 581
MALAN, Daniel F., 803, 824
MALEBO, Vincent Moeketse, 481
MALECELA, John, 869, 876
MALEFANE, Leseteli, 481
MALEK, Redha, 33, 46
MALENDOMA, Timothée, 165, 176
MALEWEZI, John, 549
MALEWEZI, Justin C., 541
MALIMA, Kigoma Ali, 879
MALLOUM, Félix, 182
MALONGA, Hervé Ambroise, 264, 265
MALWAL, Eng Joseph, 848
MAMADOU, Pascal, 668
MAMAN, Karimou, 669, 670
MAMANE, Oumarou, 656
MAMBOUNDOU, Pierre, 372, 380
MAMMAN, Yusuf, 692
MAMPOUYA, Michel, 263
MAMUGWE, Werner, 651
MANCHAM, James R., 747, 753
MANCIENNE, Roger, 752
MANCKASSA, Côme, 265
MANDABA, Jean-Luc, 166
MANDAH, Gaileth Bourkou, 198
MANDAKOUZOU, Jean Paul, 177
MANDELA, Nelson Rolihlahla, 803, 806
MANDINGA, Victor, 434, 435
MANDORO, Maholela, 480
MANDOUNGOU, Senturel Ngoma, 378
MANE, Ansumane, 427
MANE, João Seco, 436
MANGENA, Mosibudi, 821
MANGOPE, Lucas, 808, 824
MANGULA, Philip, 876
MANKOUBU, Bawa, 898
MANN, Simon, 326
MANNEH, Isaac F., 498, 499
MANONDA, Nyerere, 468
al-MANQUSH, Muhammad Ahmad, 512
MANU, Peter Mac, 402
MANUVAKOLA, Eugénio, 67
MANWANGARI, Jean-Baptist, 127
MANYELI, Anthony C., 482
MANYEMBA, Isaac, 963
MANZELA, Guedet, 376
MAOPE, Kelebone, 481
MAPAILA, Solly, 864
MAPALALA, James, 876, 879
MAPURANGA, Machivenyika Tobias,
967
MARAIS, Jaap, 827
MARAIS, Peter, 827
MARAIS, Willem, 827
MARANDO, Mabere, 878
MARARA, Christian, 711
MARDIGUE, Hassan Abdallah, 199
MARGAI, Albert M., 758
MARGAI, Charles, 766, 771
MARGAI, Milton, 758
MARIAM, Mesfin Wolde, 360
MARIKO, Oumar, 565
MARIPE, Knight, 93
MAROGA, Christian-Serge, 372, 380
MARQUARDT, R. Niels, 152, 335
MARSON, Evariste, 531
MARTIN, Daniel D. K., 404
MARTINEZ, Carmen Maria, 949
MARTINS, Felintro Vaz, 437
MARTINS, Ismael Abraão Gaspar, 73
MARTINS, Kenny, 692
MARZOUKI, Moncef, 913
MASARI, Aminu, 697
MASAULI, Stanley, 549
MASEKELA, Barbara, 830
MASEMOLA, Jafta, 824
MASHEKE, Malimba, 935
MASIKA, Jackson, 460
MASIRE, Ketumile Joni, 87, 91
MASON, Othello R., 499
MASSAMBA, Rémy, 241
MASSAMBA-DEBAT, Alphonse, 252
MASSAQUOI, Ansu, 771
MASSAQUOI, François, 491
MASSAQUOI, Gibriil, 769
MASSAQUOI, Roland, 502
MASSEME, Kokou, 898
MASSI, Charles, 174
MASSINGA, José Chicuarra, 634
MASSONDE, Tadjidine Ben Saïd, 209
MASSOUNDI, Rachid Ben, 205
MASUKU, Mario, 863
MASUMBUKO, Omar, 467
MASUMU, Buenaventura Mezui, 329
MATADI, Benedict, 503
MATAJI, R., 483
MATANGANYIDE, David, 966
MATAR, Jabal, 518
MATELA, Luc Adamo, 265
MATENJE, Dick, 546
MATIBA, Kenneth, 443, 452
MATIBA, Raymond, 461
MATONGO, Isaac, 962
MATSANGAI, André Matade, 630
MATTHEWS, Gabriel Baccus, 487
MAWOU, Agbessi, 898
MAYAKI, Ibrahim Assane, 657, 661
MAYANJA, Mohamed Kibirige, 920, 927
MAYE, Florencio, 322
MAYILA, Louis-Gaston, 376
MAYUGI, Nicolas, 126
MAZOKA, Anderson K., 937
MBA, Andrés Moisés, 330
MBA, Léon, 370, 371
MBA, Marcellino Mangue, 329
MBA-ABESSOLE, Paul, 371, 378
MBAATHI, Titus, 466
MBAI, Crispin, 446
M'BAIKOUA, Alphonse, 164
MBALI, Onesmus Musyoka, 466
MBANJE, Daniel, 966
M'BAPANOZA, Soidiki, 216
MBARECK, Sghair Ould, 571
MBARIRE, Cecily, 456
MBATHI, Titus, 456
MBATIA, James, 878

- MBAZAA, Fouad, 908, 914
 MBEKI, Thabo, 803, 809, 820
 MBENGA, Ousainou, 391
 MBERI, Martin, 264
 MBESHERUBUSA, François, 130
 MBETE, Baleka, 829
 MBIDA, Louis-Tobie, 147
 MBIMBI, Sediangani, 68
 MBOGO, Jael, 458
 MBOGO, King'ori, 468
 MBOITEDAS, Jacques, 175
 MBONYUMUTWA, Dominique, 700
 MBORO, Clement, 834
 MBOUNGOU, Kignoumbi Kia, 263
 MBOU-YEMBIT, León, 379
 MBOWE, Freeman, 877
 MBOYA, Lucas, 460
 MBUMBA, Nathaniel, 226
 MBUVI, Bartha, 455
 McCULLEY, Terrence P., 568
 McDONALD, Jackson, 423
 McGEE, James D., 222, 538
 MCHAN-GAMA, Mohamed Saïd
   Abdallah, 220
 MDLALOSE, Frank, 822
 MEAGHER LA LIME, Helen R., 637
 MEBIAME, Léon, 370
 MECHEBA, José, 329
 MEDINA, Paulo, 434
 MEEAH, Ceeal, 597
 MEECE, Roger A., 250
 al-MEGRAHI, Abd al-Basset, 516
 MEHRI, Abdelhamid, 41
 MEKA, Mballo, 245
 MEKOUAR, Aziz, 616
 MEL EG, Theodore, 282
 MELES, Zenawi, 347, 350, 357
 MEMINI, Felix Martin Ze, 379
 MENDES, Catengul, 435
 MENDES, Francisco, 67, 426
 MENDOUGA, Jerome, 152
 MENDOUTOUME, Antoine Meyo, 382
 MENELIK II, Emperor, 348
 MENEZES, Fradique de, 717, 719
 MENGARA, Daniel, 382
 MENGISTU, Haile-Mariam, 348
 MENYOU, Peter S., 503
 MERAFFE, Mompoti S., 91
 MERBAH, 'Abd al-Kader, 45
 MERBAH, Kasdi, 32
 MERERA, Gudina, 360, 362
 MESFIN, Tefer, 365
 MESHOE, Kenneth, 823
 MESSAADIA, Cherif, 41
 MESTIRI, Ahmed, 902
 MEYER, Roelf, 821
 MEZRAG, Madani, 49
 MGHANGA, Mwandawiro, 462
 MHENNI, Hédi, 908
 MHINA, Michael E. A., 880
 MHLANGA, Simon, 963
 MHOUMADI, Abdou, 218
 MICHEL, James Alix, 747, 749, 752
 MICHEL, Sylvio Louis, 597
 MICHUKI, John, 460
 MICOMBERO, Michel, 116
 MIGUEL, José Manuel, 68
 MIKWETE, Jakaya, 871
 MILANZI, Lyson, 551
 MILONGO, André, 253, 264, 265
 MINANI, Jean, 118, 129
 MINAWAI, Minni, 852
 MINERVE, Joceline, 599
 MINGO, Dennis Superman, 769
 MINOR, Charles A., 508
 al-MIRGHANI, Ahmad, 832, 848
 al-MIRGHANI, Usman, 848
 MITEE, Ledum, 694
 MITIFU, Faïda, 250
 MIYANDA, Godfrey, 936, 944
 MIYANDA, Samuel, 942
 MIZIDY, Bonaventure, 265
 MKANGI, George Katana, 466
 MKAPA, Benjamin William, 867, 870, 876
 MKHABELA, Ishmael, 821
 MKHWA, Kenneth, 93
 MKOMAGU, Joseph, 879
 MLAMBO-NGCUKA, Phumzile, 803, 820
 MLENNI, Ferhat, 46
 MLOO, Shaaban, 876
 MMUSI, Peter S., 87
 M'MWIRERIA, Geoffrey Kibiria, 468
 MNANGAGWA, Emmerson, 957, 962
 MNESA, George, 551
 MNGOMEZULU, Dominic, 862
 MOBUTU, François Joseph Nzanga
   Ngbangawe, 246
 MOBUTU, Joseph D., 225
 MOCO, Marcelino José Carlos, 58
 MOCUMBI, Pascoal Manuel, 623, 624
 MODISE, Matlhomola, 92, 93
 MODU, Carmelo, 328, 329
 MODUBULE, Nehemiah, 92, 94
 MOENO, Motiohi, 479
 MOFELI, Charles, 482, 483
 MOGAE, Festus, 87, 91
 MOGOBA, Mmutlanyane, 824
 MOHAMED V, 602
 MOHAMED VI, 603, 604
 MOHAMED, Ahmed Abdallah, 206, 207,
   221, 288
 MOHAMED, Ali, 289, 296
 MOHAMED, Saïd Ali, 208
 MOHAMED HAMED, Ali, 783
 MOHAMMED, Ahmed, 674
 MOHAMMED, Aliu, 397
 MOHAMMED, Youssuf, 599
 MOHAMOUD, Ahmed Mohamed, 794,
   797
 MOHAMOUD, Omar Ibrahim, 789
 MOI, Daniel Teroitich arap, 441, 442, 465
 MOKHEHLE, Ntsu, 473, 474, 479
 MOKHEHLE, Shakhane, 479, 481
 MOKOKO, Jean-Marie Michel, 256
 MOKUY, Alfonse, 328, 329
 MOLLER, Patricia Newton, 134
 MOMAD, Ossufo, 631
 MOMBOULI, Serge, 268
 MOMOH, Joseph Saïdu, 758
 MONDLANE, Eduardo, 622
 MONIBA, Harry, 502, 503
 MONSENGWO Pasinya, Laurent, 227
 MONTEIRO, António, 155, 159
 MONTEIRO, João Baptista, 154
 MONTEIRO, Simao, 159
 MONTEIRO, Victor, 719
 MONYATSIWA, R. K., 92
 MORIFERE, Bamba, 282
 MORLU, John, 503
 MORONEY, Mike, 966
 MORRISON, Darlington, 768
 MORROW, Bai, 768
 MOSAKENG, Makhula, 476
 MOSHEN, Ali, 880
 MOSHOESHOE I, 473
 MOSHOESHOE II, 473
 MOSISILI, Bethuel Pakalitha, 473, 475, 479
 MOTANYANE, Enoch Sephiri, 479
 MOTHOPENG, Zephania, 823
 MOTLANTHE, Kgalema, 820
 MOTO, Feliciano, 323
 MOTO, Severo, 323, 332
 MOTO, Vincente, 331
 MOTSAMAI, Nthohi, 484
 MOTU, Pedro, 330
 MOUADA, Mohamed, 909
 MOUITY-NZAMBA, Benoit, 379
 MOUKNASS, Nah Mint, 579
 MOUNGAR, Fidèle, 187, 196
 MOUPO, Otsweletse, 92
 MOURROU, Abdelfatah, 912
 MOUSSA, Mohamed, 669
 MOUSSA, Moutari, 668
 MOUSSA, Sagno, 421
 MOUSSAOUI, Ahmed, 610
 MOUSTAKIM, Abdou, 220
 MOUSTAPHA, Hamadou, 143
 MOUTIA, Abdelkarim, 615
 MOUYAMA, Sebastien Mamboundou,
   380
 MOYO, Canaan, 964
 MOYO, George, 964
 MOYO, Jonathan, 962, 966
 MOZOGO OVONO, Gaston, 382
 MPAKATI, Attati, 540
 MPHU, Motsamai K., 93
 MPINGA, Kasenda, 226
 MPINGANJIRA, Brown, 550
 MPONERA, John, 541
 M'POYO, Justine Kasa-Vubu, 146
 MRADABI, Mahamoud, 212, 220

- MREMA, Augustine, 877, 878
 MROUDJAE, Ali, 207, 219
 MSEKAWANTHU, Joseph, 548
 MSEKWA, Pius, 875
 MSIBI, George, 858
 MSIKA, Joseph, 951, 962
 MSIMANG, Mendi, 819
 MSUYA, Cleopa David, 868
 MSWATI III, King, 857, 858
 MTEI, Edwin I. M., 877
 MTIKILA, Christopher, 869, 875, 880
 MTSHALI, Lionel, 823
 MTUTA, Rashid, 879
 MUBARAK, Gamal, 311
 MUBARAK, Muhammad Husni, 301, 303, 311
 MUCHABAIWA, Mark, 964
 MUCHANGA, Luis, 634
 MUDAVADI, Wycliffe Musalia, 445, 465, 466
 MUDGE, Dirk, 649
 MUDGE, Henk, 644, 650
 MUDZINGWA, Obey, 964
 MUEDO, Antonio, 634
 MUENDANE, Michael Ngila, 824
 MUFUNE, Chipeza, 943
 MUGABARABONA, Alain, 132
 MUGABE, Robert Gabriel, 951, 953, 962
 MUGHOGHO, Chipimpha, 548
 MUHAMMAD, Ali al-Hajj, 846
 MUHAMMAD, Murtala Ramat, 679
 MUHAMMADAYN, Musa Ali, 854
 MUHAMMED, Abdulrahman Musa, 789
 MUHI al-DIN, Ahmad Fuad, 303
 MUHONGAYRIE, Jacqueline, 710
 MUIGAI, Ngengi, 452
 MUIFE, Paul, 444, 457, 462
 MUJURU, Joyce, 951, 962
 MUKAMARAKIZA, Serge, 129
 MUKAMBA, Jonas Kadiata Nzemba, 246
 MUKASI, Charles, 127
 MUKEZAMFURA, Alfred, 710, 714
 MUKIIBI, Joseph, 926
 MUKULU, Jamir, 929
 MUKUPA, Wilson, 946, 947
 MULAMA, Eliud Ambani, 468
 MULATO, Ernesto, 67
 MULDER, Cornelius P., 804
 MULDER, Pieter, 823
 MULÉLÉ, Pierre, 225
 MULEMBA, Humphrey, 946
 MULEMBWE, Eduardo, 637
 MULENEH, Eyuel, 359, 360
 MULINDWA, Kaddu, 928
 MULIRO, Masinde, 451
 MULOKE, Henry Wako, 920
 MULUMBA, Lukoji, 227
 MULUZI, Bakili, 541, 546
 MUMBA, Nevers, 935, 937, 947
 MUMUNI, Alhaji, 404
 MUNA, Ben, 146
 MUNDIA, Nalumino, 935
 MUNENE, Sebastian, 468
 MUNGANI AWEYS, Umar, 784
 MUNGUL Diaka, Bernadin, 227
 al-MUNTASIR, Umar Mustafa, 512
 MUNYA, Peter, 462
 MUNYAO, Joseph, 457
 MUNYES, John, 458
 MUREITHI, Alex, 455
 MURIGANDE, Charles, 710
 MURUNGARU, Chris, 456
 MURUNGI, Kiraitu, 451, 456
 MURWANASHYAKA, Ignace, 713
 MUSA, Balarabe, 692
 MUSA, Isaac, 490
 MUSA, Solomon Anthony James, 758
 al-MUSBAN, Sabah, 850
 MUSENGIMANA, Joseph, 710
 MUSEVENI, Yoweri, 917, 918, 925
 MUSILA, David, 466
 MUSIMI, G. N., 460
 MUSOKE, Kintu, 917
 MUSOKOTWANE, Kebby, 935
 MUSONGE, Peter Mafany, 137, 138
 MUSSA, Uladi, 545
 MUSULENG-COOPER, Dorothy, 490
 MUSUMBA, Salaami, 927
 MUSYANI, Edward, 548
 MUSYOKA, Stephen Kalonzo, 463, 466
 MUTABAZI, Jean de Dieu, 129
 MUTAMBARA, Arthur, 962
 MUTAMBIKIRWA, Godwin, 966
 MUTANGELWA, Imasiku, 947
 MUTASA, Didymus, 962
 MUTEBI, Ronald Muwenda, 920
 MUTEIA, Herder, 629
 MUTESA II, Edward Frederick, 917
 MUTHARIKA, Bingu wa, 541, 542, 545
 MUTHAURA, Francis, 448
 MUTHUURI, D. S., 461
 MUTURI, Justin, 465
 MUWANGA, Paulo, 918
 MUYIMA, Osee Ndjoko, 246
 MUYONGO, Mishake, 643, 649, 652
 MUZENDA, Simon, 951, 956
 MUZOREWA, Abel, 952, 963
 MVOUBA, Isidore, 253, 257
 MVUNGI, Sengondo, 878
 MWACHIRO, Leslie, 468
 MWACHOFI, Mashengu wa, 463
 MWAMBA, Emmanuel, 947
 MWAMONDWE, Greene, 549
 MWANAMWAMBWA, Amusaa K., 948
 MWANAWASA, Levy Patrick, 935, 936, 942
 MWANGU, Ivuti, 460
 MWANZA, Tenthani, 943
 MWAPE, Lupando, 935, 938, 942
 MWAU, John Harun, 460
 MWAURA, Geogr, 468
 MWENJE, David, 457
 MWILA, Benjamin Yorum, 944
 MWINGI, Omar, 467
 MWINYI, Ali Hassan, 868, 876
 MWIRARIA, David, 451, 457
 MWIROTHO, Salim, 468
 MYBOTO, Zacharie, 372, 379
 MZALI, Mohamed, 902
 MZEE, Rachid, 458
 MZEE, Ramadhani, 879
 MZIRAY, Peter Kuga, 880
 NA'ABA, Ghali Umar, 695
 NABABSINGH, Prem, 590
 NACIRI, Khalid, 610
 NADHOIM, Idi, 205
 NAGBE, Lenn Eugene, 498
 NAGDALLA, Sarrah, 847
 NAGIB, Muhammad, 302
 NAHAYO, Immaculée, 126, 133
 NAHNAH, Mahfoud, 34
 NAHOR, Ngawara, 197
 NAMAKONYA, William, 963
 NAMBEIA, Alberto, 434
 NAMBUYA, Stella, 928
 NAMISES, Claudia, 651
 NANA, Awa, 888
 NANCY, Alex, 597
 NASHA, Margaret, 91
 al-NASRI, Mirghani, 849
 NASSER, Ahmed, 343
 NASSER, Gamal Abdel, 302
 NATA, Théophile, 84
 NATARE V (King), 116
 NATCHABA, Fambaré, 889
 NAWAKWI, Edith, 944
 NAYINZIRA, Jean-Népomuscène, 705
 NAZIF, Ahmed, 301
 NCHAMA, Angel Miko Alo, 329
 NCHEMA, Aquilino Nguema Ona, 332
 NCUBE, Welshman, 962
 NDADAYE, Melchior, 117
 NDALI, Nabia, 194
 NDAMBUKI, Gideon, 465
 NDAM NJOYA, Adamou, 146
 NDARADOUNRY, Leopoldine Adoun, 198
 NDAU, Mwakio, 462
 NDAYIKENGURUKIYE, Jean-Bosco, 125
 NDAYIZEYE, Domitien, 115, 120, 129
 NDEBUGRE, John, 404
 NDEREYENE, Charles, 712
 NDESSABEKA, Wilson, 265
 N'DIAYE, Adamou, 82
 N'DIAYE, Balla, 740
 N'DIAYE, Moctar, 741
 N'DIAYE, Mouhamadou, 738
 NDIKUMASABO, Vincent, 131
 NDIMIRA, Pascal Firmin, 118
 NDIMURUKUNDO, Nicéphore, 131
 NEDITIFEI BOYSEMBE, Daniel, 176

- NDIWO, Rainsford, 551
 NDJOBA, Nghiwete, 651
 NDLOVU, Jabulani, 964
 NDLOVU, Soul, 966
 NDOBEGANG, Michael, 146
 NDOKI MUKETE, Esoka, 148
 NDONG, Jean Eyéghe, 371
 NDONG, Santiago Obama, 331
 N'DONGO, Atanasio, 321
 NDONGO, Manuel Rubén, 331
 NDUWAYO, Antoine, 118
 NDUWIMANA, Martin, 115, 121, 127
 NDWIGA, Njeru, 461
 NDWIGA, Peter, 456
 NDYOMUGYENYI, Robert, 928
 NDZONGANG, Albert, 142
 NDZOUBA-NDAMA, Guy, 382
 NEFFATI, Chedli, 908
 NEFOLOVHODWE, Pandelani, 821
 NEGA, Berhanu, 359, 360
 NEGASO, Gidada, 347, 351
 NEILL, Wayne E., 85
 NEKYON, Akhbar Adoko, 926
 NETO, António Agostinho, 55, 56
 NETO, António Alberto, 68
 NETO, António Domingos Pitra da Costa, 65
 NETO, Raúl Bragança, 719
 NEVES, José Maria Pereira, 155
 NEVES, Orlando das, 718
 NEVES DE SOUZA, Maria das, 719
 NFOR, Ngala, 149
 NGAITHE, Leonard, 471
 NGALA, Noah Katala, 465
 N'GALO, Gaston, 225
 NG'AND'A, Mukara, 467
 NGANGA, Wanguhu, 460
 NGANGO, Felicien, 710
 NGARNOUDJIBE, Sangde, 194
 NGAYAP, Pierre Flambeau, 143
 NGBANGADIBO, Joseph, 176
 NGENDAHAHO, Liboire, 129
 NGENDAKUMANA, Léonce, 118
 NGENDANDUMWE, Pierre, 116
 NGENZEBUHORO, Frederic, 121, 127
 NGEZE, François, 117
 NGILU, Charity, 453, 455, 456
 NGIRABANZI, Laurien, 711
 NGOM, Ousmane, 736, 740
 NGOMA, Arthur Z'ahidi, 225, 240, 246
 NGONDA, Lucas, 67
 NGONDO, Kenny, 947
 NGOR, Armando, 323
 NGOTHE, Gali Gatta, 198
 NGOUABI, Marien, 252
 NGOUARI, Michel Mboussi, 265
 NGOUPANDÉ, Jean-Paul, 166, 174
 NGUA, Santiago, 328
 NGUBANE, Ben, 822
 NGUEMA, Adrien, 379
 NGUEMA, Alberto Sima, 328
 NGUEMA, Bonifacio, 332
 NGUEMA, Fabián Nsue, 330
 NGUEMA, Guillermo, 332
 NGUEMA, Marc Saturnin Nan, 382
 NGUEMA, Ntutumu, 328
 NGUEMA, Alamon, 335
 N'GUESSAN, Pascal Affi, 273, 278
 NGUESSO, Wilfrid, 261
 NGUGI, F., 460
 NGULI, Fidelis, 455, 456
 NGUZA, Jean, 226
 NGWA-NGUEMA, Noël, 379
 NHAMITHAMBO, Casimiro Miguel, 635
 NHASSE, Alamara, 428, 437
 NIANGADOU, Amadou Ali, 565
 NIASSE, Moustapha, 729, 739
 NIEMBA, Jacob Souga, 246
 NIMELY, Thomas Yaya, 505
 NIMLEY, David, 489
 NIYONKURU, Shadrack, 131
 NJIE-SAIDY, Aisatou, 385, 387, 390
 NJIRU, Ken, 468
 NKABINDE, Sifiso, 821
 NKAISERRY, Joseph, 465
 NKANG, Idongesit, 692
 NKANGI, Mayanja, 927
 NKATE, Jacob, 91
 NKETIA, Johnson Asiedu, 404
 NKHOMA, Francis, 944
 NKHUMBWE, Daniel, 548
 N'KODIA, Christophe, 246
 NKOMO, John, 962, 966
 NKOMO, Joshua, 951, 952
 NKOY, Jean-Baptiste, 247
 NKRUMAH, Kwame N., 396
 NKSUI, Juvénal, 710
 NKUEBE, Bofihla, 481
 NKUEBE, Molomo, 482
 NKUMBULA, Harry, 934
 NKURUNZIZA, Pierre, 115, 121, 126
 NKWAZI, Rodger, 549
 NLANDU, Marie-Thérèse Mpolo Nene, 246
 N'LANDU, Wivine Kavidi, 246
 NLEND, Henry Hogbe, 144
 NNAMANI, Kenechukwu, 697
 NOJIBWAMI, Augustin, 128
 NOMEJJI, Nicolas, 894
 NOOR, Adan Abdullahi, 786
 NOOR, Mohamed Ibrahim, 468
 NOUIRA, Hedi, 902
 NOUMAZALAYE, Ambroise, 261, 267
 NOUR, Mahamat, 198
 NQAKULA, Charles, 821
 NQUKU, J. J., 864
 NSABABAWANGA, Patrice, 129
 NSANZE, Terrence, 129
 NSANZIMANA, Sylvestre, 702
 NSENGA, Zac, 715
 NSENGIMANA, Joseph, 715
 NSENGIYAREMYE, Dismas, 702
 NSIBAMBI, Apolo, 917, 920
 NSKIO, Mudde Bombakka, 928
 NSOGO, Romualdo Rafael, 330
 NSUBUGA NSOMBU, Yusufu, 927
 NTABA, Hetherwick, 551
 NTAHONZA, Etienne, 131
 NTAKATSANE, Limakatso, 483
 NTAKIRUTIMANA, Joseph, 134
 NTAMOBWA, Antoine, 134
 NTARYAMIRE, Cyprien, 117
 NTCHAMA, Caetano, 428, 434
 NTHENGE, George, 459
 NTIBANTUNGANYA, Sylvestre, 117
 NTIDENEREZA, Joseph, 132
 NTIMAMA, William ole, 465, 466
 NTOUTOUME EMANE, Jean-François, 371, 372
 NTOW, Nana Ohene, 402
 NUGUD, Muhammad Ibrahim, 848
 NUJOMA, Samuel Daniel, 640, 641, 648
 NUMAYRI, Jafar Muhammad, 833
 NUNO, José Liberal, 70
 NUR, Abdallah Wahid Mohamed Ahmad, 852
 NUR, Ayman, 305, 309
 NUR, Hassan Mohammed, 779, 786
 NUR, Yusuf Haji, 779
 NVODO, Ayissi, 142
 NWACHUKWU, Ike, 692
 NWANKWO, Arthur, 693
 NWOBODO, Jim, 692
 NWODO, A. C., 693
 NWOKEFORO, Ukeje, 692
 NXUMALO, Jerry, 862, 863
 NXUMALO, Sishayi, 859
 NYACHAE, Simeon, 444, 461
 NYAGAWA, Ntanga, 879, 880
 NYAMU, Jesaya, 648
 NYAMWEYA, George, 457
 NYAMWISI, Antipas, 242
 NYANGARESI, Andrew, 466
 NYANGOMA, Leonard, 129
 NYARIBARI, Mathius Ondeyo, 466
 NYASSI, Momodou Shyngle, 391
 NYAWACHI, Josiah, 466
 NYENABO, Isaac W., 507
 NYERERE, Julius K., 868
 NYIKADZINO, Bernard, 966
 NYIRAMIRIMO, Odette, 710
 NYONG, Joseph Owuor, 460
 NYOTA, Joaquim José, 635
 NZABAHIMANA, François, 712
 NZAMURAMBAHO, Frederic, 710
 NZASSIWE, Honoré, 173
 N'ZAU PUNA, Miguel, 65
 NZE, Anuncio, 330
 N'ZE, Pierre, 261
 NZEYIMANA, Joseph, 129
 NZEYIMANA, Laurent, 127
 NZIMANDE, Blade, 821
 NZISIBIRA, Astere, 129

- N'ZITA, Emmanuel, 70
 N'ZITA, Henrique Tiaho, 69
 NZOBONARIBA, Philippe, 129
 NZOBONIMPA, Manassé, 126
 NZOGHE, Anselme, 379
 NZOJBWAMI, Augustin, 132
 NZOMUKUNDA, Alice, 115, 126
 NZU-ZI, Catherine, 243
- OBAME-NGUEMA, Paulin, 372
 OBASANJO, Olusegun, 677, 679, 691
 OBEID, Atef Muhammad, 305
 OBEIDRAHMANE, El Moustapha Ould, 584
 OBIANG, Felipe Ondo, 323
 OBIANG, Rafael, 329
 OBIANG Nguema, Teodoro, 322, 326, 328
 OBIOHA, Ralph, 693
 OBIOZOR, George Achulike, 698
 OBOTE, Apollo Milton, 917
 OBOTE, Miria, 920, 926
 OBWOCHA, Henry, 461
 OCHEGER, Nelson, 928
 ODARTY-LAWSON, Nii, 407
 ODINGA, Jaramogi Oginga Ajuma, 442
 ODINGA, Oburu, 457
 ODINGA, Raila, 445, 463, 466
 ODOYO, Peter, 463
 OFFMANN, Karl Auguste, 589, 591
 OFORI-ATTA, Nana Yaa, 404
 OGBEH, Audu, 694
 OGORE, John, 925
 OGOUEBANDJA, Jules Marius, 382
 OGUIN, Cyrille, 85
 OGWAL, Cecilia, 925
 OHN, Eliot, 897
 OJIAMBO, Julia, 466
 OJOK, Alex, 927
 OJUKWU, Emeka, 695
 OJUKWU, Odumegwu, 678
 OKABE, Saturnin, 264
 OKADIGBO, Chuba, 695
 OKALA, Nicole, 143
 OKELLO, Basilio Olara, 918
 OKELLO, Livingstone Okello, 926
 OKELLO, Tito, 917, 918
 OKINDA, Jérôme, 378
 OKITASOMBO, Otoko, 245
 OKORIE, Chekwas, 692
 OKOTH, William, 460
 OKOTIE, Chris, 693, 695
 OLENGHANKOY, Joseph, 244
 OLHAYE, Roble, 299
 OLIEWO, F., 460
 OLUDHE, Wilfred Omondi, 468
 OLYMPIO, Gilchrist, 886, 897
 OLYMPIO, Henry Octavianus, 894
 OLYMPIO, Sylvanus, 884
 OMAR, Abdelkader, 48
 OMAR, Ibrahim Ahmed, 838, 846
- ONDO, Bonifacio, 321
 ONDO, Felipe, 332
 ONDO, Jeremias, 330
 ONDO, Purificacion Angue, 335
 ONTEIRO, Enrico Correira, 159
 ONU, Oghonnaya, 691
 ONUSUMBA, Adolphe, 242
 ONYANGO, Patrick Ouma, 467
 OOSTHUIZEN, Abrie, 823
 OPADOKUM, Ayo, 693
 OPAR, Francis Munyialo, 461
 OPIANGAH, Nzebi Herve Patrick, 382
 OPIMBA, Alfred, 261
 OPOKU, Kyeretwie, 405
 OPONDO, Ofwono, 925
 ORENGO, James, 458, 460
 ORIS, Juma, 929
 OSAMOR, Emmanuel, 695
 OSMAN, Abd al-Aziz Khalid, 854
 OSMAN, Ahmed, 602, 610
 OSMAN, Mohamed Omar, 364
 OSMAN ALI, Mohamed, 789
 OSSETOUMBA, Lekoundzou Itihi, 261
 OSUI, Okewo, 695
 OTAI, Peter, 925
 OTHMAN, Mohamed Ould Taleb, 583
 OTHMANI, Saad Eddine, 611, 612
 OTTI, Vincent, 929
 OTTOO, Ebil, 926
 OTUKE, Japheth, 466
 OUAÏDOU, Nassour, 188, 203
 OUALALOU, Fathallah, 609
 QUARDOUGOU, Barka, 674
 OUATTARA, Alasanne Dramane, 270, 281
 OUATTARA, Nguessan, 896
 OUEDEI, Goukhouni, 182, 200
 OUÉDRAOGO, Clément Oumarou, 106
 OUÉDRAOGO, Ernest Nongoma, 109
 OUÉDRAOGO, François, 110
 OUÉDRAOGO, Gérard Kango, 109
 OUÉDRAOGO, Gilbert Noël, 109
 OUEDRAOGO, Jean-Baptiste, 98
 OUEDRAOGO, Kadré Désiré, 97, 100
 OUEDRAOGO, Kango, 97
 OUEDRAOGO, Ram, 99, 107
 OUEDRAOGO, Thibaut Nan Halidou, 105
 OUEDRAOGO, Youssouf, 99
 OUKACHA, Mustapha, 615
 OUKANGA, Francis Albert, 175
 OUKO, Robert, 443
 OULD AHMED, Mohamed Lamine, 617
 OULD ATTIA, Atiq, 582
 OULD BNEIJARA, Sid Ahmad, 571
 OULD BOUBACAR, Sidi Mohamed, 572
 OULD BOUCEIF, Ahmed, 570
 OULD DADDAH, Ahmed, 572
 OULD DADDAH, Moktar, 570
 OULD DENNA, Mohamed Hafid, 583
 OULD DIE, Khadri, 584
 OULD HAIDALLA, Mohamed Khouna, 571
- OULD JEH, Lebat, 583
 OULD JEYDID, Moulaye al-Hassan, 582
 OULD KHARCY, Mohamed Abdallah, 582
 OULD LEMBRABET, Mustapha, 582-583
 OULD MAH, Mohamed Mahmoud, 582
 OULD MENAYA, Ahmed, 579
 OULD MOUKNASS, Hamdi, 579
 OULD SALEK, Mustapha, 570
 OULD SIDI, Ahmed Salem, 571
 OUMAR, Acheikh ibn, 185, 198
 OUMAROU, Moussa, 670
 OURETA, Sylvain Miaka, 278
 OUSMANE, Mahamane, 658, 666, 675
 OUTLULE, Samuel Otsile, 95
 OUYAHIA, Ahmed, 31, 34, 42
 OWILI, Peter, 925
 OWILI, Wilson, 468
 OWONA, Grégoire, 142
 OWONO, Joachim Tabi, 147
 OWUSU, Victor, 397
 OYE MBA, Casimir, 370
 OYO, Eulogio, 322
 OYONDI, Reuben, 461
 OYONO AVONG, Secundio, 329
 OYONOH, Daniel, 333
 OYOUOMI, Sylvestre, 382
- PADACKET, Albert Pahimi, 196
 PAHAI, Jean, 146
 PALAÇO, José Carlos, 632
 PALANGE, António, 635
 PALDO, Angostinho, 68
 PALMER, Philip Sylvester, 768
 PANGLOSE, Jacques, 594
 PANGUENE, Armando Alexandre, 637
 PANTON, Richard S., 500
 PARÉ, Parqui Emile, 112
 PATASSÉ, Ange-Félix, 163, 164, 174
 PATRICK, Mthuthuzeli, 482
 PAULO, Juliao Mateus, 65
 PEARCE, Lord, 952
 PEETE, Peete Nkoebe, 481
 PEMAGBI, Joe Robert, 772
 PEQUENO, Ovidio Manuel Barbosa, 725
 PERE, Maurice Datuku, 897, 898
 PEREIRA, Anália de Victoria, 68
 PEREIRA, Aristides, 154, 425
 PERRY, June Carter, 484
 PERRY, Ruth, 492
 PHIRI, Yonam, 943
 PHOSA, Mathews, 820
 PIANIM, Kwame, 405
 PIERCE, Roger Dwayne, 161
 PIKITI, Matthew, 947
 PILLAY, Arriranga, 591
 PILLAY, Kathleen, 753
 PIRES, Fortunato, 719
 PIRES, Mario, 428

- PIRES, Pedro Verona Rodrigues, 154, 155, 158
PITSO, Thabo D., 483
PLAATJIE, Thami ka, 824
POATY-SOURLATY, Alphonse, 252
PODIER, J. Nicholas, 488
POHAMBÁ, Hifikepunye, 640, 644, 648
POIGNET, Augustin, 265
POKELA, John Nyati, 823
POKU, Fritz Kwabenam, 408
POLISYA, Hussein Mwaiseje, 878
POUKRE-KONO, Fernand, 179
POUNGUI, Ange-Edouard, 252
PRETORIUS, Jacobus, 644, 650
PULE, Dan, 946, 947
PULKOL, David, 928
PUOCH, David Dogok, 852
PURRYAG, Rajikeswur, 599
PUYE, Martin, 333
PWAMANG, Gabriel, 404
- al-QADHAFI, Muammar Abu Minyar, 510, 511
al-QADHAFI, Wanis, 510
QALINLEH, Mohamed Ali Adeb, 786
QASIM, Talaat Fuad, 316
al-QAUD, Abd al-Majid, 512
QHOBELA, Molapo, 475, 480
QINAWI, Mamduh Mohammad, 313
QUALI, Luther, 104
QUARDIGHI, Aissa, 610
QUIAH, Oscar, 491
QUITINE, Ossufo, 631
- RABESAHALA, Giselle, 535
RABETSITONTA, Romance, 536
RABETSITONTA, Tovonanahary, 534
RABTI, Bashir, 519
RACHID, Ahmed, 216
RADEBE, Jeff, 821
RADEMBINO-CONIQUET, René, 382
RADI, Abdelwahed, 609, 615
RADJABU, Hussein, 126
RAFALIMANANA, Jean-Jacques, 535
RAFFINI, Birgi, 666
RAFLE, Abdulrashid Dulene, 358
RAGSDALE, Marguerita Dianne, 299
RAGUSU, Daniel Mogaka, 467
RAHAL, Suleiman, 854
RAHARIJOANA, Pierre, 533
RAHERIMANJATO, Jean-Claude, 526
RAHMAN, Ahmad Abder, 846
al-RAHMAN, Abd al-Mutal Abd, 850
RAJAB, Muhammad al-Zarruq, 512
RAJAONARIVELO, Pierrot Jocelyn, 533
RAJAONARIVONY, Narisoa, 538
RAJBALLY, Sunklavathy, 824
RAJBANSI, Amichand, 824
RAJIS MOHAMED, Mohamed, 783
RAKOTOMAJAONA, Désiré, 524
RAKOTOMALALA, Joël, 524
RAKOTOMANORO, Guy Rajemison, 538
RAKOTOMAVO, Pascal, 527
RAKOTONIAINA, Jean-Jacques, 536
RAKOTONIAINA, Justin, 524
RAKOTONIRAINY, Germain, 532
RAKOTONIRAINY, Henri, 533
RAKOTONIRINA, Manandafy, 532
RAKOTOVAHINY, Emmanuel, 526, 535
RAKUNE, Lekhetho, 483
RALITOPOLE, Khauhelo, 480
RAMADAN, Alhaji Ahmed, 404
RAMAEMA, Elias Phisoana, 474
RAMAHATRA, Victor, 525
RAMANANTSOA, Gabriel, 524
RAMANANTSOA, Herivelsona, 533
RAMAPHOSA, Cyril, 807, 819
RAMGOOLAM, Navin, 589, 590, 594
RAMGOOLAM, Seewoosagur, 588
RAMKALAWAN, Wavel, 749, 752, 753
RAMNAH, Premnath, 596
RAMODIKE, Nelson, 826
RAMOREBOLI, G. P., 480
RANAIVOSOA, René, 536
RANDRIAMBAOMAHOVA, Zaka Soa Max Halvanie, 536
RANGIRA, Adrien, 710
RANSOME-KUTI, Beko, 693
RAPOLAKI, Molelekeng E., 484
RASERJAOA, José Yvon, 534
RASSA, Gasmallah Abdallah, 834
al-RASUL, Hasab, 850
RATSIMANDRAVA, Richard, 524
RATSIRAHONANA, Norbert, 526, 532
RATSIRAKA, Didier, 523, 524, 533
RATSIRAKA, Roland, 537
RATUU, Maoud, 879
RAVALOMANANA, Marc, 523, 528, 531
RAVONY, Francisque, 526, 534
RAWIRI, Georges, 377
RAWLINGS, Jerry John, 396, 397
RAWLINGS, Nana Konadu, 403
RAZAFIMAHALEO, Herizo, 527, 534
RAZAFINDRABE, André, 536
RAZAKANIRINA, Mahafaritsy Samuel, 538
RAZANABAHINY, Jérôme Marojàma, 535
RAZANABOHITRA, Jean-Louis, 537
RAZANAMASY, Guy Willy, 525
RAZOARIMIHAJA, Solofonantenaina, 531
REAPOGO, Mathias Gonevo, 173
REBAINE, Ali Fawzi, 45
REEVES, Alfred, 503
REGALA, Agnello, 437
REIS, Carlos Alexandre, 633, 634
RENÉ, France Albert, 747, 752
RESAMPA, André, 531
RETZER, Michael, 882
RIAK, Andrew Wieu, 849
RICCIARDONE, Francis Joseph, Jr., 319
RICHARD, Ivor, 954
RILEY, Thomas, 616
RIMI, Abubakar, 695
RINGADOO, Veerasamy, 590
RIRUAKO, Kuaima, 644, 651
RITA, Mateus, 722
RIVAS, Cándido Muatetema, 322, 324
RMILLI, Boujamma, 910
ROBERTO, Holden, 56, 67
ROBLEH, Aden, 293, 297
ROCHA, Manuel, 633
ROIDERO, Monja, 536
ROLIM, Anacleto, 725
ROLLAND, Ruth, 166
ROMAIN, Niabe, 196
ROMBA, Elie, 198
ROSA, Henrique, 425, 429
ROUMAR, Ibrahim, 672
RUBERWA, Azarias, 225, 242
RUBIA, Charles, 466
RUBUKA, Aloys, 127
RUDOLPH, Piet "Skiet," 827
RUFYIKIRI, Gervais, 126, 133
RUGAMBARARA, Alphonse, 127
RUTIJANWA, Medard, 710
RUTO, William, 463, 465
RWANYARARE, James, 925
RWASA, Agathon, 124, 132
RWIGEMA, Pierre-Célestin, 701, 704
RWIGYEMA, Fred, 709
- SAAD, Amine Michel, 437
SAADANI, Amar, 52
SAADI, Saïd, 34, 46
al SABAH, Ahmad, 313
SABAHI, Hamdin, 311
SABALLY, Sana, 386
SABRI, Ali, 302
SACKO, Soumana, 555
al SADAT, Muhammad Ahmad Anwar, 301, 302
SADIKOU, Salifou, 669
SADIO, Salif, 743
SADO, Junedi, 358
SAHAD, Ibrahim, 518
SAHEL, Mustapha, 616
SAHRAOUI, Nabil, 50
SAIBOU, Ali, 656
SAID, Ahmad al-Amin Mohammed, 343
SAID, Hadji Ben, 220
SAID, Mohammed, 47, 50
al-SAID, Rifaat, 313
SAID HERSI, Mohamed, 777
SAID JAMA, Hussein, 787
SAIFI, Amari, 50
SAITOTI, George, 443
SAJJAD, Rashid, 467
SAKALA, Edwin, 947
SALAD HASSAN, Abdiqassim, 775, 779
SALEH, Ibni Oumar Mahamat, 197
SALEH, Mahmout, 738

- SALEH, Rachid Ould, 578, 585
 SALEH, Salim, 920
 SALESHANDO, Gilson, 92
 SALEY, Alafia Saka, 82, 84
 SALHI, Chawki, 47
 SALIE, Patrick, 483
 SALIF N'DIAYE, Alassane, 282
 SALIFOU, André, 657, 669
 SALIH, al-Zubayr Muhammad, 832, 837
 SALIM, Hilmi, 312
 SALIM, Muhammad Ahmad, 846
 SALIM, Salim Ahmed, 868, 876
 SALL, Macky, 727, 730, 736
 SALLAH, Halifa, 390, 392
 SAMA, Koffi, 885, 889, 893
 SAMAKUVA, Isaias, 67
 SAMATAR, Mohamed Ali, 775
 SAMBI, Ahmed Abdallah Mohamed, 205, 213, 216
 SAMBWA, Pida Nbagui, 226
 SAMKA, Richard, 504
 SAMPA, Chitalu, 947
 SANDAPIN, Terry, 753
 SANDE, Bernardo, 552
 SANE, Mamadou, 743
 SANGARÉ, Mamadou Bakary, 565
 SANHA, Antonio Artur, 429, 434
 SANHA, Malam Bacai, 428, 433, 434
 SANI, Boukari Maman, 670
 SANIA, Léopold, 742
 SANKARA, Bénéwendé, 110
 SANKARA, Thomas, 97
 SANKAWULO, Wilton S., 491
 SANKOH, Foday Savannah, 759
 SANOU, Clement, 108
 SANYANG, Kukoi Samba, 386
 SANPEMBE, Armando Bruno João, 635
 SARADORI, Paul, 197
 SARO-WIWA, Kenule, 681, 694
 SARR, Samuel, 392, 728
 SARYON, Losine N., 503
 SASSOU-NGUESSO, Denis, 252, 253, 261
 SATA, Michael, 945
 SAUDE, Vitor, 426
 SAULET, Anicet, 166
 SAVAI, Lihanda, 468
 SAVANE, Landing, 728, 737
 SAVIMBI, Jonas, 56, 65
 SAVY, Christophe, 754
 SAWYER, Amos, 488, 500
 al-SAYYED, Ali Ahmen, 848
 SCHALKWYK, Marthinus van, 810, 825
 SCHIMMING-CHASE, Nora, 650
 SCHLENKER-WILLIAMS, Reginald, 771
 SCHYFF, L. J. van der, 827
 SCOTT, Guy, 945
 SEABRA, Verissimo Correia, 429
 SEABUENG, Rodgers, 94
 SEBARENZI, Joseph, 710
 SEBOU, Léon, 176
 SECK, Bathie, 741
 SECK, Idrissa, 727, 730
 SEEISO, Leslie David, 474
 SEEISO, Mathealira, 474
 SEEKIE, Raleigh, 489
 SEEPAPITSO IV, 94
 SEGO, Sekodona, 894
 SÉHOUETO, Lazare, 84
 SEII, Tabitha, 457
 SEKAGGYA, Ashe James, 927
 SEKAUTU, Makara Azael, 483
 SEKHONYANA, Evaristus, 475, 481
 SELESO, Masitise, 483
 SELIM, Ali Bazi, 209, 219
 SEMEDO, Rui, 158
 SENDASHONGHA, Seth, 712
 SENDEGEYA, Christian, 125
 SENDEGEYA, Pierre-Claver, 130
 SENE, Cledor, 728
 SENGHOR, Léopold Sédar, 727
 SENKORO, Anna, 880
 SENOUSI, Abdallah, 516
 SEO, Prince, 505
 SERAGEDDIN, Fuad, 312
 SEREMANE, Joe, 822
 SERFATY, Abraham, 615
 SERGIO, Ernesto, 633
 SERICHE, Cristiano, 322
 SESAY, Issa, 769
 SETHOKO, Lethogile, 92
 SETSHWAELO, Lepetu, 92, 93
 SEXWALE, Tokyo, 820
 SEYDOU, Abdourahmane, 667
 SEYE, Babacar, 728
 SEYOUN, Mengesha, 365
 SEZOYA-NGABO, Antoine, 130
 SFAR, Rachid, 903
 SHABANGU, Paul, 857, 859
 SHAGARI, Alhaji Shehu, 679
 al SHAHABI, Naji, 313
 SHAIK, Schabir, 818
 SHALABI, Umar Hasan, 850
 SHALTOUT, Usama Mohammad, 313
 SHAMAPANDE, Yobert, 945 al-SHAMIKH, Mubarak Abdullah, 512
 SHARAFFEDIN, Abdullah, 519
 al SHAZLY, Kamal, 311
 SHEIN, Ali Mohamed, 867, 876
 SHEMENA, Logan, 942
 al SHERIF, Muhammad Safwat, 311
 SHERIFF, Martin, 503
 SHERIFF, Modu, 691
 SHERIFF, Mohamed, 490
 SHERMAN, Varney G., 498, 499
 SHERMARKE, Abdirashid Ali, 774
 SHIKUKU, Joseph Martin, 452, 460
 SHING, Emmanuel Jean Leung, 595
 SHIRE, Barre Aden, 789
 SHITANDA, Peter, 458
 SHONEKAN, Ernest Adegunle, 680
 SHONGWE, Elmond, 864
 SHONGWE, Kislou, 862
 SHONGWE, Matsapa, 864
 SHONGWE, Queen Mother Dzeliewe, 857
 SHUMBA, Daniel, 966
 SIAD BARRE, Mohamed, 774
 SIALE, Silvestre, 323
 SIBACHA, Antonio, 332
 SIBANDA, Gibson, 962
 SIBINDE, Yaqub Neves Salomão, 635
 SIBOMANA, Adrien, 116
 SICHINGA, Robert, 942
 SICHONE, Langton, 946
 SIDDICK, Abba, 182
 al-SIDDIQ, Siddiq al-Haj, 850
 SIDIBE, Mandé, 557, 563
 SIDIME, Lamine, 413
 SIDI MOHAMED, Prince, 604
 SIDIYA, Mohamed Fadel, 581
 SIDO, Sana Souna, 656
 SIDQI, Atif Muhammad, 303
 SIFI, Mokdad, 34
 SIGEJEJE, Cyrille, 129
 SIGH, Nyandeh, 502
 SIJAKE, Nimrod, 483
 SIJAMO, Arone, 636
 SIKOTA, Sakwiba, 942, 947
 SILLAH, Mohamed Yahya, 771
 SILVA, Florencia João Da, 634
 SILVA, Francisco, 725
 SILVA, Geraldo Pereira João da, 68
 SILVA, Manuel Neves e, 725
 SILVEIRA, Maria do Carmo, 717, 720
 SIMANGO, Luterio, 632
 SIMANGO, Uriah, 622
 SIMON, Jacquit Rosat, 533
 SIMPORÉ, Mamadou, 107
 SINDAYIGAYA, Jean-Bosco, 132
 SINDIKUBWABO, Theodore, 703
 SINGHATEY, Edward, 386
 SINON, Guy, 752
 SINYO, Josephine Odira, 462
 al-SIRRI, Yasser, 315
 SISSOKO, Cheick Oumar, 565
 SISULU, Walter, 818
 SITHANEN, Rama, 598
 SITHOLE, Jan, 862
 SITHOLE, Ndabaningi, 952
 SITTA, Samwel, 876, 882
 SIWAR al-DAHAB, Abd al-Rahman, 834
 SIWELA, Paul, 966
 SLAA, Willbroad, 877
 SLOVO, Joe, 820
 SMIT, Nico, 649
 SMITH, Gerard, 966
 SMITH, Ian, 952
 SNOW, Edwin Melvin, 497, 507
 SOAMES, Lord, 955
 SOBHUZA II, King, 857
 SOBORUN, Somduth, 600
 SOFOU, Abdou, 217
 SOGLO, Christophe, 75

- SOGLO, Léhady, 81
 SOGLO, Nicéphore, 76, 81
 SOGLO, Rosine, 81
 SOILIH, Ali, 206
 SOILIH, Saïd, 217
 SOKAMBI, Aristedes, 172
 SOKOINE, Edward, 868
 SOLTANI, Djerra, 43
 SOMÉ, Valère, 112
 SOMPARE, Aboubacar, 422
 SONDASHI, Ludwig, 946
 SONG, Adamu, 692
 SONKO, Jallow, 390
 SORO, Guillaume, 276, 281
 SOROMO, Antoine, 422
 SOUBEIGA, Félix, 110
 SOULEY, Abdoulaye, 659
 SOUMARE, Abdoulaye, 583
 SOUSA, Manuel Inocencio, 158
 SOW, Abdoulaye Sekou, 556
 SOW, Alpha Ibrahim, 420, 423
 SOYINKA, Wole, 688, 693, 694
 SSEBAANA, John, 920, 926
 SSEBAGALA, Nasser Ntege, 928
 SSEKAGYA, Sam, 928
 SSEKANDI, Edward Kiwanika, 931
 SSEMOGERERE, Paul, 918
 SSEMUJU, Herman, 930
 SSERUNJOI, Hajji Ali, 926
 STAFFORD, Joseph D., III, 394
 STEVENS, Siaka P., 758
 STEYN, Marthinus T., 640
 SUBRON, Ashok, 597
 SUILA, Bernard Emmanuel, 246
 SULTAN, Gamal, 318
 SUMAYE, Frederick Thlway, 867, 870
 SUNI, Mama, 670
 SUNKULI, Julius ole, 465
 SURUR, Ahmad Fathi, 303, 318
 SURUR, Elioba, 848
 SWESSI, Braek, 518
 SY, Mody, 728
 SY, Mostapha, 743
 SYAKASSIGHE, Pierre Pay-Pay wa, 243
 SYLLA, Almamy, 560, 565
 SYLLA, Jacques, 523, 528, 531
 SYLLA, Oumar, 422
 SYLLA, Sekou, 422
 SYLLA, Talla, 740

 TABU, Pascal, 245
 TADERSE, Muleneh, 365
 TAHA, Ali Uthman Muhammad, 832, 837, 846
 TAHA, Rifai, 316
 al-TAHIR, Ahmed Ibrahim, 855
 TAHIR, Umar Muhammad, 852
 TAIDA, Mang Iгри, 198
 TAKI, Mohamed, 207
 TAKUMA, Suleman, 694

 TALBA, Ali, 669
 TALEB, Mohamed Cherif, 45
 TALEB, Mohamed Habib, 610
 TALL, Mountaga, 556, 564
 TAMBO, Oliver, 819
 TAMBOURA-SAMA, Joséphine, 110
 TAMBWE, Alexis, 244
 TAMIRAT, Layne, 347, 350
 TANDJA, Mamadou, 657, 658, 665
 TANIS, Stephen, 459
 TANKPINOU, François, 82
 TANOI, Augustus Obuadam, 405
 TAO, Rajabu, 877
 TAPSOBA, Pierre Joseph Emmanuel, 106
 TARMIDI, Bianrifi, 211
 TARN, George J., 504
 TARUS, Stephen, 461
 al-TAWIL, Ibrahim, 848
 AL TAWIL, Mustapha, 312
 TAYA, Katzelma Omar, 668, 670
 TAYA, Maaouya Ould Sidahmed, 571
 TAYLOR, Charles Chankay, 488, 502
 TAYLOR, Tamba, 491
 TAYYIB, Ali al-Tijani, 848
 al-TAYYIB, Umar Muhammad, 834
 TCHESSA ABI, 897
 TCHIBASSA, Arture, 70
 TCHONGO, Salvador, 437
 TCHOTCHONE, Nicolas, 81
 TEELock, Sanjeet, 595
 TEFERA, Legesse, 362
 TEFERA, Walwa, 357
 TEFERI, Banti, 348
 TEKAM, Jean-Michel, 148
 TEKERE, Edgar, 964
 TELLI, Diallo, 410
 Telo, Jean-Félix Demba, 262
 TEMBO, Christon, 937, 944
 TEMBO, John, 541, 547
 TERRE'BLANCHE, Eugene, 808, 827
 TESHAYE, Dinka, 350
 TESHAYE, Gebre-Kidan, 350
 TESHOME, Toga Chanaka, 368
 TESOURA, Almeida, 635
 TETE, Godwin, 896
 TEWELDE, Gebrezgabiker, 343
 TEWOLDE, Wolde-Mariam, 357
 TEYA, Jean-Eudes, 173
 THAIRU, Mbuthia, 468
 THASSINDA, Harsan Uba, 246
 THATCHER, Margaret, 326
 THATCHER, Mark, 326
 THIAM, Habib, 728
 THIAM, Iba Der, 738
 THIAM, Maguette, 740
 THIAM, Saba, 584
 THIAM, Tidjani, 198
 THOMPSON, Margaret, 504
 THOMPSON, Raymond Bamidele, 771
 THOOLA, Ntja, 483

 THWALA, Queen Regent Ntombi, 857, 858
 THYSTERE-TCHICAYE, Jean-Pierre, 254, 262, 268
 TIENDRÉBÉOGO, Issa, 112
 TIENDRÉBÉOGO, Norbert Michel, 112
 TIGZIRI, Mohamed Ouramadane, 46
 TINA, Dieudonné, 146
 TINE, Moussa, 740
 TIPOTEH, Togba-Nah, 500
 TIRAB, Mustafa, 852
 TITINAN, Bire, 196
 TITO, Lindo Bernardo, 68
 TJIPILICA, Paulo, 67
 TJIRIANGE, Ngarikutuke, 648
 TLHOMELANG, Leach, 93
 TLLI, Abderrahmane, 910
 TOFA, Bashir, 680, 695
 TOGOI, Adoum, 193
 TOGOMI, Youssef, 199
 TOIVO JA TOIVO, Andimba, 647
 TOLBA, Mohamed Ould, 586
 TOLBERT, William Richard, 487
 TOLNO, Charles Pascal, 421
 TOLOSSA, Tesfaye, 362
 TOMBA, Armindo, 719
 TOMBALBAYE, N'Garta, 182
 TOMBURA, Joseph James, 834
 TOME, Manuel, 630
 TOMO, Ernest, 375
 TONDI, Abdoulaye, 669
 TONGUN, Philip, 853
 TOQUE, Napoleon, 498, 499
 TORKMANE, Yacine, 44
 TOUABOY, Emmanuel, 179
 TOUATI, Moussa, 43
 TOULEE, G. Narrison, 499
 TOURAB, Rachid Abou, 50
 TOURÉ, Ahmed Sékou, 410, 411
 TOURÉ, Amadou Toumani, 555
 TOURÉ, Faciné, 418
 TOURE, Mamadou Bamou, 562
 TOURE, Sidya, 412, 419, 420
 TOURE, Soumane, 108
 TOURE, Younoussi, 556, 565
 TOVE, Jean-Lucien Savide, 894
 TOYA, Abdulatif, 930
 TRAORE, Diarra, 411
 TRAORE, Dioncounda, 563
 TRAORE, Idrissa, 567
 TRAORÉ, Jean, 414
 TRAORÉ, Karim, 565
 TRAORÉ, Lamine, 562
 TRAORÉ, Malo, 104
 TRAORÉ, Moussa, 554
 TRAORÉ, Youssouf, 562
 TRETÀ, Bocary, 564
 TRIFI, Mokhtar, 913
 TROVOADA, Miguel Anjos da Cunha Lisboa, 717, 718

- TROVOADA, Patrice, 720, 724
 TSHIBANDA, Ramond, 246
 TSHISEKEDI, Etienne, 241
 TSHISEKEDI wa Malumba, Étienne, 227
 TSHOMBE, Moise, 225
 TSHWETE, Steve, 820
 TSIRANANA, Philibert, 524
 TSIRANANA, Pierre, 531
 TSUMA, Chibule wa, 466
 TSVANGIRAI, Morgan, 956, 962
 TUACH, Ket, 363
 TUBMAN, William "Shad," 503
 TUBMAN, William V. S., 487
 TUBMAN, Winston, 502
 TUCKER, Peter, 758
 TUJU, Raphael, 461
 TUMUKUNDE, Henry, 927
 al-TURABI, Hassan Abdallah, 837, 846
 TURAY, Andrew Duramani, 771
 TURAY, Edward Mohammed, 767
 TURBINA, Mariano Janeiro, 632
 TURK, Ibrahim, 313
 TUTU, Desmond, 810
 TWAGIRAMUNGU, Faustin, 704, 712
 TWEAH, Samuel, Jr., 498
- UBALJORO, Bonaventure, 711
 UBAYDI, Abd al-Ati, 511
 UGAS GEDI, Barreh, 785
 ULENGA, Ben, 644, 650
 UMAR, Miftah al-Usta, 512
 UMAR AMI, Hasan Haji, 784
 UMAR JESS, Ahmed, 777
 UMEH, Victor, 692
 al-UQSURI, Wahid, 313
 USMAN, Hassan Husayn, 834
 UTEEM, Cassam, 590
 UTHMAN, Kerneleos, 344
 UTHMAN, Muhammad, 789
 UWAZURIKE, Ralph, 694
 UWILINGIYIMANA, Agathe, 702
 UZICE, Desiré André, 754
- VALAYDEN, Rama, 594
 VALENTIM, Jorge, 67
 VALENTIN, Neatobei Didier, 198
 VALL, Ely Ould Mohamed, 571, 573
 VAN-DUNEM, Fernando José França
 Dias, 55, 58
 VANDY, Peter, 769
 VAN NIEKERK, Willem, 642
 VATUVA, Mario, 67
 VAZ, Francisca, 434
 VAZ, Helder, 434, 436
 VEIGA, Carlos Alberto Wahnon de
 Carvalho, 155, 159
 VEII, Hitjevi Gerson, 650
 VERA CRUZ, Tomé Soares da, 717, 720, 722
 VERWOERD, Hendrik F., 803
- VICTOR, Mfulumpinga Lando, 68
 VIEIRA, Cirilo, 436
 VIEIRA, João Bernardo, 425, 426
 VILJOEN, Constand, 808, 823
 VILJOEN, Marais, 805
 VLOK, Adriaan, 810
 VONINAHITSY, Jean Eugène, 531
 VON MALLY, Nicolas, 597
 VORSTER, Balthazar, 804, 824
 VUEMBA, Jean-Claude, 256
 VUKU, Peter, 499
 VUNDUAWA, Felix, 243
- WABERI, Farah Ali, 299
 WADA NAS, Alhaji, 693
 WADE, Abdoulaye, 727, 728, 736
 WADE, Viviane, 728
 WAIGURU, Benson, 460
 WAIYAKI, Munyua, 457, 467
 WAKIL, Idris Abdul, 868
 WAL, Joshua Dei, 848
 WALL, Aminu Bashir, 698
 WALIGO, Abraham, 918
 WALKLEY, Reuben Barrie, 382, 725
 WALL, Marc McGowan, 203
 WALUBIRI, Peter, 926
 WAMALA, Erias, 928
 WAMALWA, Michael Kijana, 441, 445
 WAMBA, Ernest, 242
 WAMWERE, Koigi Wa, 452, 467
 WANE, Mariame Ly, 741
 WANE, Oumar, 741
 WANJI, Barri, 853
 WANKÉ, Daouda Malam, 657, 661
 WANYOIKE, Kimani, 459, 461, 466
 WARD-BREW, D. N., 404
 WARIOBA, Joseph S., 868
 WARUHIU, Rose, 457
 WASHINGTON, George Toe, 499
 WAWERU, David Ngethe, 468
 WAWERU, Harun, 468
 WAZIRI, Malam Adji, 668
 WEAH, George, 493, 498
 WEISBERG, Robert, 268
 WEKESA, Noah, 455, 458
 WELIME, Wanjala, 455
 WEREKO-BROBBY, Charles, 405
 WESSEH, Aaron, 503
 WESSEH, Commany, 504
 WHITFIELD, John, 502
 WILL, Harry, 767
 WISNER, Walter, 499
 WITBOOI, Hendrik, 648
 WOAHO-TEE, Joseph, 504
 WOCHÉ, Ibrahim, 468
 WODIÉ, Francis, 271, 280
 WOKO, Peter, 92
 WOLOKOLLIE, Dusty, 497, 504
 WOTORSON, Cletus, 499
 WOUNGLY-MASSAGA, Ngouo, 143
- WREH, Tuan, 498
 WYLIE, Joe, 505
- El-YACHROUTU, Mohamed Caabi,
 205, 209
 YACOUBA, Moumouni, 670
 YAHAYA, Hussein Hassan, 879
 YAKUBU, Hawa, 402
 YALA, Kumba, 425, 427, 434
 YALLAHOW, Musa Sudi, 784
 YALLEY, Sam Pee, 404
 YAMASSOUM, Negoum, 188
 YAMEOGO, Herman, 99, 109
 YAMEOGO, Maurice, 97
 YAMUREMYE, Jean Bosco, 130
 YANSUNNU, Magliore, 84
 YAO, Paul Akoto, 282
 YAPWANTHA, Edward, 548
 YASIN, Ahmad Yusuf, 793, 797
 YASSINE, Abd Assalam, 613
 YASSINE, Nadia, 613
 YATA, Ali, 609
 YATA, Nadir, 610
 YAY, Kaya Mohamed, 69
 YAYA, Maidadi Saidou, 146
 YAYI, Boni, 75, 78, 80
 YAYIA, Cheikh Ould Sidi, 583
 El YAZGHI, Mohammed, 609
 YÈ, Arsène Bongnessan, 106
 YEGUIE, Djibril Cayavé, 151
 YENGENI, Tony, 820
 YERODIA, Abdoulaye, 225
 YHOMBI-OPANGO, Jacques-Joachim,
 252, 264
 YOADIMNADJI, Pascal, 181, 189, 193
 YODEYMAN, Joseph, 187, 197
 YOHANNES, Dawit, 368
 YOHANNES, Zemeheret, 343
 YOMA, Routouane, 184
 YONDO, Marcel, 146
 YONLI, Ernest Paramanga, 97, 101, 106
 YORONGAR, Ngarledjy, 195
 YOULOU, Fulbert, 252
 YOUSFI, Youcef, 53
 YOUSSOUFI, Abderrahmane, 603, 604
 YOUSSOUFOU, Oumarou Garba, 667
 YUSIKU, Pumulo, 947
 YUSUF, Abubakar, 463
 YUSUF, Mohamad Abdi, 780
 YUSUF, Mohammed Dikko, 693
 YUSUF AHMED, Abdullahi, 775, 778
- ZABSONRE, Sébastien, 110
 ZADI-ZAOUROU, Bernard, 284
 ZAFY, Albert, 526, 535
 ZAKARIA, Abdou, 210
 al-ZANATI, Zanati Muhammad, 511, 512, 520
 ZAOUI, Ahmed, 50
 ZAPU, Ambran, 947

- ZARROUK, Neziha, 908
ZARUG, Umar, 849
ZAUDITU, Empress, 348
al-ZAWAHIRI, Ayman, 315
al-ZAWAHIRI, Mohammad, 315
ZBIRI, Tahir, 31
ZEINA, Mohamed, 220
ZEMBE, Wurayayi, 966
ZENE, Goukouni, 674
ZERBO, Sayé, 98
ZERE, Adoum Daye, 197
- ZEROUAL, Liamine, 31, 34
ZIAH, Thomas, 490
ZIANE, Mohammed, 613
ZIGUÉLÉ, Martin, 174–175
ZINSOU, Émile-Derlin, 76
ZITOUNI, Dhamei, 49
ZOE, Hananiah, 503
ZON, Tahirou Ibrahim, 110
ZONDI, Musa, 823
ZONGO, Henri, 98
ZONGO, Norbert, 100
- ZONGO, Tertius, 113
ZONGUE-NGUEMA, Pierre, 379
ZOUABI, Antar, 49
ZOUARI, Abderrahim, 908
ZOUMANIGUI, Bakary, 420
ZOUMANIGUI, Gbago, 412, 422
ZULU, Alexander Grey, 935
ZUMA, Jacob, 803, 811, 818, 820
ZWANE, Ambrose Pheheya, 864
ZWANE, Gelani, 864
ZWELITHINI, King Goodwill, 809