In the name of Jesus Christ,
the Preface begins

Wishing to respond to the importunity of the brothers, with Christ's favour I shall describe the life of our blessed patron; and I shall in the first place endeavour to persuade all who may read it to have faith in the established facts that I relate, and to regard the substance rather than the words, which appear, I think, crude and of little worth. Let them remember that the kingdom of God inheres not in exuberance of rhetoric, but in the blossoming of faith. Let them not despise the publication of deeds that are profitable, and that have not been accomplished without the help of God, on account of some unfamiliar words of the Irish tongue, a poor language, designations of men, or names of tribes and places; words that, I suppose, are held to be of no value, among other different tongues of foreign peoples.

We have thought that the reader should be warned of this also, that for the sake of brevity, we have left out many things concerning the man of blessed memory, even things that were worthy of remembrance; and that to avoid cloying the appetite of those who shall read, only a few things out of very many have been written down. And every future reader of these things will, I think, perhaps observe that rumour has spread widely among the peoples only very little of the very great matters concerning this blessed man, in comparison with even these few things that we propose now briefly to set down.

After this first slight preface I pass on, with God's help, to tell of our superior's name, in the beginning of the second.

In the name of Jesus Christ,
the second Preface

There was a man of venerable life and blessed memory, the father and founder of monasteries, who received the same name as the prophet Jonah. For although sounding differently in the three different languages, yet what is pronounced iona in Hebrew, and what Greek calls peristera, and what in the Latin language is named columba, means one and the same thing. So good and great a name is believed not to have been put upon the man of God without divine dispensation. According to the truth of the gospels, moreover, the Holy Spirit is shown to have descended upon the only-begotten son of the eternal Father in the form of that little bird that is called a dove. Hence often in sacred books a dove is understood to signify mystically the Holy Spirit.

Similarly in the gospel, the Saviour himself bade his disciples to have within them the simplicity implanted in the pure heart of doves. For indeed the dove is a simple and innocent bird. Therefore a simple and innocent person also was rightly called by this name, since he with dovelike disposition offered to the Holy Spirit a dwelling in himself. This name aptly fits what is written in the Book of Proverbs, 'Better is a good name than many riches'. Not only was this our superior by God's gift worthily enriched from the days of his infancy with the adornment of this proper name, but also, many revolving years before the day of his birth, by revelation of the Holy Spirit to a soldier of Christ, he was named as a son of promise in a miraculous prophecy. For it is an accepted fact passed down to us from ancient men who knew of it that a certain British stranger, a holy man, a disciple of the holy bishop Patrick, called Maucte, prophesied thus of our patron, saying: 'In the last years of the world a son will be born, whose name Columba will become famous through all the provinces of the islands of Ocean, and will brightly illumine the latest years of the earth. The fields of our two monasteries, mine and his, will be separated by the width of one small hedge: a man very dear to God, and of high merit in his sight.'

The bottom corner of this folio (3b, 4a) has been stained, and is slightly reinforced, perhaps with injury to some letters. The first a of tra/dita (3b27), and the gnovi of cognovi (3b28), and the qu of quaedam (3b24), have apparently been written later, and certainly not by the text hand, but very possibly over traces of letters written by the text hand. The shortened version (derived from A) in L, C, F, S, reads cognovi; so also P. D reads congruo. Stephen White transcribed congrua.

¹⁰ craxaturum A; caraxaturum B1 B2

In describing the life and character of this our Columba, I shall first in brief language condense in as small space as I can, and at the same time bring before the eyes of the reader, his holy way of life; and shall also set before those that read, as morsels to be eagerly savoured, some instances of his miracles. These things will be more fully disclosed below, divided into three books, of which the first will contain prophetic revelations; the second, divine miracles effected through him; the third, appearances of angels, and certain manifestations of heavenly brightness above the man of God. Let not any one suppose that I will write concerning this so memorable man either falsehood, or things that might be doubtful or unsure; but let him understand that I shall relate what has come to my knowledge through the tradition passed on by our predecessors, and by trustworthy men who knew the facts; and that I shall set it down unequivocally, and either from among those things that we have been able to find put into writing before our time, or else from among those that we have learned, after diligent inquiry, by hearing them from the lips of certain informed and trustworthy aged men who related them without any hesitation.

⁹ xxxiiii. A; triginta iiiior B1; triginta quattuor B2

The holy Columba was born of noble parents, having as his father Fedelmith, Fergus's son, and his mother, Ethne by name, whose father may be called in Latin 'son of a ship', and in the Irish tongue Mac-naue. In the second year after the battle of Cul-drebene, the forty-second year of his age, Columba sailed away from Ireland to Britain, wishing to be a pilgrim for Christ.

Devoted even from boyhood to the Christian noviciate and the study of philosophy, preserving by God's favour integrity of body and purity of soul, he showed himself, though placed on earth, ready for the life of heaven; for he was angelic in aspect, refined in speech, holy in work, excellent in ability, great in counsel. Living as an island soldier for thirty-four years, he could not pass even the space of a single hour without applying himself to prayer, or to reading, or to writing or some kind of work. Also by day and by night, without any intermission, he was so occupied with unwearying labours of fasts and vigils that the burden of each several work seemed beyond the strength of man. And with all this he was loving to every one, his holy face ever showed gladness, and he was happy in his inmost heart with the joy of the Holy Spirit.

¹⁰ conversatus. A punctuation mark (up-sign) after this word is added later (probably in the ninth century), but is intended to show that the sentence does not end here, as Reeves wrongly supposed.

⁸ regibus. B2 writes [P]rophetationes to regibus as one item.

⁹ unus, in A, has been added by the text hand above the line, with a dot to place it after septimanae ; but the missing quorum has not been supplied. A mark above the end of septimanae is unintelligible. B2 reads correctly : De duobus pueris quorum unus secundum verbum ejus in fine septimane mortuus est. The chapter-heading in A 22a contains quorum, but omits unus.

¹⁰ de signo to vir. This item is here entered as a chapter-heading in A B2 ; but below (23a) the manuscripts (A B1 B3) do not give it as a separate chapter.

Now the chapter-headings of the first book begin.

- [I 1] Summary of miracles of power.
 [I 2] Of the abbot Saint Finten, Tailchan's son ; how Saint Columba prophesied concerning him.
 [I 3] His prophecy concerning Ernene, Crasen's son.
 [I 4] How he foretold the coming of Cainnech.
 [I 5] Of the peril of Saint Colman, of the family mocu-Sailni, revealed to Saint Columba.
 [I 6] Of Cormac, grandson of Léthan.
 [I 7-8] His prophecies concerning battles :
 [I 9-15] Concerning kings.

Of prophetic revelations

[I 1] A summary of miracles of power

What proofs of his powers the venerable man displayed must briefly be shown in the beginning of this book, according to our promise given above.

By virtue of prayers and in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ he healed people who endured the attacks of various diseases.

He, one man alone, with God's aid repulsed innumerable hostile bands of demons making war against him, visible to his bodily eyes, and preparing to inflict deadly diseases upon his community of monks; and they were thrust back from this our principal island.

With Christ's help, he checked the raging fury of wild beasts, by killing some and strongly repelling others. Swelling waves also, that once in a great storm rose like mountains, quickly subsided at his prayer, and were stilled. And his ship, in which he himself chanced to be sailing, was at that time, when the calm fell, carried to the desired haven. On his return from a visit of some days to the district of the Picts, he raised his sail against the blasts of contrary wind, in order to confound the magicians, and so his boat put out and sped on a rapid course as though it had had a following wind.

At other times also, through his prayers, winds unfavourable to voyagers were changed to favourable ones.

In the same district mentioned above, he took a white stone from the river, and blessed it, so that it should effect some cures. Contrary to nature, that stone, when immersed in water, floated like an apple. This divine miracle was performed in the presence of king Brude and his household.

In the same province, he restored to life—and this is a major miracle—the dead son of a believing layman, and gave him back alive and unharmed to his father and mother.

At another time, in his youth, when the blessed man was in Ireland, living as a deacon with the holy bishop Findbarr, and the necessary wine for the most holy mysteries was lacking, by virtue of prayer he changed pure water into true wine.

Sometimes also there appeared to certain of the brothers, on various different occasions, a great light of heavenly brightness poured out upon him, either in the darkness of night or in the light of day.

He was held worthy to receive in shining light the sweet and most pleasant visitations of holy angels.

Often, by revelation of the Holy Spirit, he saw the souls of just men borne by angels to the height of heaven ; and time and again he beheld other souls of the wicked being carried to hell by demons.

Very often he foretold the future rewards of many who still lived in mortal flesh, of some happy, of others sad.

And in the terrible crashings of battles, by virtue of prayer he obtained from God that some kings were conquered, and other rulers were conquerors. This special favour was bestowed by God, who honours all saints, on him, not only while he continued in this present life, but also after his departure from the flesh, as on a triumphant and powerful champion.

Of this special honour, conferred by the Almighty from on high upon the honourable man, we shall offer one more example, that was shown to Oswald, the English ruler, on the day before he fought against Catlon, a mighty king of the Britons. One day when king Oswald was encamped in readiness for battle, sleeping on his pillow in his tent he saw in a vision Saint Columba, radiant in angelic form, whose lofty height seemed with its head to touch the clouds. The blessed man revealed his own name to the king, and standing in the midst of the camp he covered it with his shining raiment, all but a small remote part ; and gave him these words of encouragement, the same that the Lord spoke to Joshua ben-Nun before the crossing of the Jordan, after the death of Moses, saying : ' Be strong, and act manfully ; behold I will be with you ', and so on. Thus in the vision Saint Columba spoke to the king, and added : ' This coming night, go forth from the camp to battle ; for the Lord has granted to me that at this time your enemies shall be turned to flight, and your adversary Catlon shall be delivered into your hands. And after the battle you shall return victorious and reign happily'.

The king, awakened after these words, related this vision to the assembled council. All were thereby strengthened, and the whole people promised that after returning from the battle they would believe, and accept baptism. For up to that time all that land of the English was shadowed by the darkness of heathenism and ignorance, excepting the king Oswald himself, and twelve men who had been baptized with him, while he was in exile among the Irish. Why should I say more ? On that same following night, as he had been instructed in the vision, king Oswald advanced from the camp, with a much smaller army, to battle against many thousands. And as had been promised to him, a happy and easy victory was granted to him by the Lord. King Catlon was slaughtered ; and the victor, returning from the battle, was afterwards ordained by God as emperor of the whole of Britain.

This was confidently narrated to me, Adomnan, by my predecessor, our abbot Failbe. He asserted that he had heard the vision from the mouth of king Oswald himself, relating it to abbot Segene.

This also seems to be a thing that should not be passed unnoticed: that certain lay people of the same blessed man, though they were guilty men and blood-stained, were through certain songs of his praises in the Irish tongue, and the commemoration of his name, delivered, on the night in which they had chanted those songs, from the hands of their enemies who had surrounded the house of the singers; and they escaped unhurt, through flames, and swords, and spears. A few of them had refused to sing, as if valuing little the chantings of the holy man's commemoration, and miraculously those few alone had perished in the enemies' assault.

Of this miracle it has been possible to produce not two witnesses or three, as law requires, but a hundred or more. For not in one place or time only is the same thing proved to have happened, but it has been established beyond any doubt as having happened at various places and times, in Ireland and Britain, but in like manner and with the like cause of deliverance. We have learned these things, without room for doubt, from people who knew the facts in every district, wherever the same thing happened, with the same miracle.

But to return to our subject : along with the miracles that, by the gift of God, this man of the Lord performed while he lived in mortal flesh, he began from his youthful years to be strong also in the spirit of prophecy ; to foretell future events ; to declare absent things to those present, because although absent in the body he was present in spirit, and able to observe what took place far away. For according to the words of Paul, ' he who clings to the Lord is one spirit '. So too, as this holy man of the Lord, Columba, himself admitted to a few brothers who once questioned him closely about this very thing, in some speculations made with divine favour the scope of his mind was miraculously enlarged, and he saw plainly, and contemplated, even the whole world as it were caught up in one ray of the sun.

These things have here been related concerning the powers of the holy man, so that the more avid reader may savour, as a foretaste of a sweeter feast, what has been written in brief and, with the Lord's help, will be more fully related below, in three books. It seems to me not improper to tell now, though in inverted order, of the prophecies of the blessed man, which at various times he uttered concerning certain holy and eminent men.

[I 2] Of the abbot Saint Finten,
son of Tailchan

Saint Finten, who was afterwards held in high repute among all the churches of the Irish, with God's help preserving from the age of boyhood integrity of body and soul, and being devoted to studies of divine wisdom, had in his heart, while still in the years of his youth, the purpose of leaving Ireland and going to our holy Columba, in order to live in pilgrimage. Burning with that desire, he went to a friend of his, a certain elder in his own tribe, a very wise and venerable priest, who was called in Irish Colum Crag; to obtain from him, as from a wise man, some advice. When he had exposed to him these things that were in his mind, he received from him this answer: 'Who can forbid your desire inspired, as I think, by God, and devout; and say that you ought not to sail over to the holy Columba?'

In the same hour it happened that two monks of Saint Columba arrived. On being asked about their journey, they said: 'We have recently rowed from Britain, and today have come from the oakwood of Calcach [Derry]'. 'Is all well with your father, the holy Columba?' said Columb Crag. With many tears, and very sorrowfully, they said: 'Truly he is well, our patron; since within the last few days he has departed to Christ'. When they heard this, Finten and Columb, and all who were present there, with faces prostrate to the ground, wept bitterly. Thereupon Finten inquired, saying: 'Whom has he left as his successor?' 'Baithene, his foster-son', they said. And while all exclaimed, 'A worthy and fitting successor', Columb said to Finten: 'What in this case, Finten, will you do?' He answered: 'If the Lord permits, I shall sail out to Baithene, who is a wise and holy man; and if he receive me, I shall have him as my abbot'.

Thereafter he kissed and bade farewell to Columb, prepared his voyage, and crossing without any delay, reached the island of Io [Iona]. Up to that time his name was not yet known in these parts, and so he was at first received with the hospitality given to an unknown guest; and next day he sent an intermediary to Baithene, desiring speech with him face to face. being approachable, and accessible to strangers, bade him be brought in. He was brought at once, and first, as was fitting, bowed his knees and prostrated himself upon the ground; and arose when bidden by the older saint. He sat down, and was questioned by Baithene, who did not as yet know his tribe and province, name and manner of life, and for what reason he had undertaken the labour of voyaging. Thus questioned, he related everything in order, and begged humbly to be received.

The elder saint, hearing this from his guest, and at the same time recognizing that this was the man of whom Saint Columba had once prophetically foretold, said to him: 'I ought indeed, my son, to give thanks to my God at your coming; but this you must know for certain, you shall not be our monk'. When he heard this, the guest was much saddened, and said: 'Perhaps because I am undeserving I am not thought worthy to become your monk'. Thereupon the elder replied: 'I said this not because you were unworthy, as you say. But although I should have preferred to keep you with me, I cannot profane the command of Saint Columba, my predecessor, through whom the Holy Spirit prophesied of you. For, speaking with prophetic lips, privately to me alone one day, he said this, among other things: "You must now, Baithene, give close attention to my words. Immediately after my expected and much wished-for passing from this world to Christ, there will come to you a brother from Ireland, who, directing rightly his youth in virtuous

His name is Finten, of the family mocu-Moie, and his father is called Tailchan; and he will humbly request you to receive and include him among the other monks. But in God's prescience it is not predestined for him to become a monk of any abbot, but he has long since been chosen by God as an abbot of monks, and a leader of souls to the heavenly kingdom. You will therefore refuse to keep this man with you in these islands of ours, lest you should even seem to oppose the will of God. But tell him these words, and send him back in peace to Ireland; so that he may construct a monastery in the coastal territories of the Lagen, and there feed a flock of Christ's sheep, and lead unnumbered souls to the heavenly country".

Hearing this, the younger saint with a shower of tears gave thanks to Christ, and said: 'May it happen to me according to the prophetic and miraculous foreknowledge of Saint Columba'. Within a few days, in obedience to the words of the saints, and receiving Baithene's blessing, he sailed over to Ireland in peace.

At one time, when for some months the blessed man remained in the midland district of Ireland, while by God's will founding the monastery that is called in Irish Dairmag [Durrow], it pleased him to visit the brothers who lived in the monastery of Clóin of Saint Ceran [Clonmacnoise].

When they heard of his approach, all those that were in the fields near the monastery came from every side, and joined those that were within it, and with the utmost eagerness accompanying their abbot Alither they passed outside the boundary-wall of the monastery, and with one accord went to meet Saint Columba, as if he had been an angel of the Lord. On seeing him they bowed their faces to the earth, and he was kissed by them with all reverence, and singing hymns and praises they led him with honour to the church. They bound together a kind of barrier of branches, and caused it to be carried about the saint as he walked, by four men keeping pace with him; lest the elder Saint Columba should be troubled by the thronging of that crowd of brothers.

Meanwhile, a boy of the congregation, much looked down upon for his countenance and bearing, and not yet approved by the elders, came up behind, keeping out of sight as much as he could, intending to touch, secretly and if possible without the blessed man's knowledge or perception, were it but the hem of the cloak in which the blessed man was wrapped. But this was not concealed from the saint. For what he could not with bodily eyes observe, done behind his back, he discerned with spiritual sight. So he suddenly stopped; and putting out his hand behind him he took hold of the boy's neck, pulled him forward, and made him stand before his face. When all those that stood by said, 'Send him away! Send him away! Why do you keep hold of this unlucky and mischievous boy?', on the contrary the saint drew from his pure breast these prophetic words: 'Let be, brothers, let be'. And to the boy, who was trembling greatly, he said: 'My son, open your mouth, and put out your tongue'. In great trepidation the boy then opened his mouth as he was bidden, and put out his tongue, which the saint, extending his holy hand, earnestly blessed. And the saint spoke thus prophetically, saying: 'Although this boy appears to you now contemptible

This was Ernene, Crasen's son, famous afterwards among all the churches of Ireland, and very widely known. He related to abbot Segene all these words that I have written above, of the prophecy concerning himself. My predecessor Failbe also was present along with Segene, and listened intently; and from his disclosure I too have myself learned these same words that I have related.

During those days in which the saint was a guest in the monastery of Clóin, he prophesied also many other things, by revelation of the Holy Spirit: that is to say, concerning the great dispute that after many days arose among the churches of Ireland over the diversity in time of the Easter festival; and concerning some angelic visitations revealed to him, in which certain places within the enclosure of that monastery were frequented by angels, at that time.

[I 4] Of the arrival of the abbot Saint Cainnech, which Saint Columba had prophetically foretold

At another time, in the island of Io, on a day of crashing storm and unendurably high waves, when the saint, sitting in the house and giving orders to the brothers, said: 'Prepare the guest-house quickly, and draw water for washing the feet of guests', one of the brothers then said: 'On this very windy and too-perilous day, who can cross in safety even the narrow strait?' Hearing him, the saint spoke thus: 'To one holy and chosen man, who will reach us before the evening, the Omnipotent has granted calm, though in the midst of storm'.

And behold, on the same day, a ship that the brothers had for some time awaited and in which Saint Cainnech was, arrived according to the saint's prophecy. The saint with the brothers went to meet him, and honourably and hospitably received him. And the sailors who were in the ship with Cainnech, when asked by the brothers what kind of voyage they had had, replied in exact agreement with what Saint Columba had earlier foretold of storm and calm together, by God's dispensation, in the same sea and at the same hours, but miraculously separated; and they declared that they had not felt the storm, which they had seen far off.

He is called Colman Ela mocu (sic lege) Seilli in T. 9b28-9. The Latin Life of Colman Elo in Plummer 1910, I, p. 258, says that he was a son of Beogne. The Irish tract Apigitir crábaid (' Alphabet of devotion ') was attributed to this Colman Beogna's son, not to Colman maccu Béognae, as in Kuno Meyer's title (Ź.C.P., III, p. 447). The date of its composition was actually later ; and according to Kenney 1929, not earlier than the eighth century. Colman Elo's death was commemorated on 26 September (Oengus 1905, p. 196 ; cf. the commentary ibid., p. 212). He is called ' priest ' by Adomnan (64a-65a) in the year before Columba's death, and was presumably not yet bishop at the time spoken of in 16b.

In like manner on another day, Saint Columba, while he was living in his mother church, suddenly exclaimed, with a smile : ' Colman, Beogna's son, has begun to sail over to us, and is now in great danger in the surging tides of the whirlpool of Brecaín ; and sitting in the prow he raises both hands to heaven, and blesses the troubled and very terrible sea. But the Lord terrifies him thus, not in order that the ship in which he sits may be overwhelmed by the waves in shipwreck, but rather to rouse him to more fervent prayer that with God's favour he may reach us after passing through the danger '.

At another time, when the holy man was in the island of Io, after many years had gone by since the above-mentioned battle, he suddenly said to his attendant Diormit: 'Strike the bell'. Summoned by its clang, the brothers ran quickly to the church, the holy superior going before them. He knelt down and addressed them there: 'Now let us pray earnestly to the Lord for this people, and for the king Aidan. For in this hour they are going into battle'. And after a short time he left the oratory, and looking into the sky
 he said: 'Now the barbarians are turned to flight;
 and the victory is yielded to Aidan, unhappy though it is'. And also the blessed man told prophetically
 the number of the dead in Aidan's army, three hundred and three men.

[I 9] A prophecy of Saint Columba
concerning king Aidan's sons

At another time, before the above-mentioned battle, the saint questioned king Aidan about a successor to the kingdom. When he answered that he did not know which of his three sons should reign, Artuir, or Echoid Find, or Domingart, the saint then spoke in this manner : 'None of these three will be king ; for they will fall in battles, slain by enemies. But now, if you have others that are younger, let them come to me, and the one whom the Lord has chosen from among them to be king will run at once to my knee'.

They were called, according to the saint's word ; and when Echoid Buide came in, he leaned on Columba's bosom. Immediately the saint kissed and blessed him, and said to the father : 'This is the survivor, and he will reign after you as king ; and his sons will reign after him'.

All these things were completely fulfilled afterwards, in their time. For Artuir and Echoid Find were slain a little while later, in the battle of the Miathi mentioned above. Domingart was killed in a rout of battle in England. And Echoid Buide succeeded to the kingdom after his father.

[I 10] Concerning Domnall, Aid's son

Domnall, Aid's son, while still a boy, was brought by his foster-parents to Saint Columba in the ridge of Céte. And he, looking upon him, asked: 'Whose son is this, whom you have brought?' When they replied, 'This is Domnall, Aid's son, who has been brought to you in order that he may return enriched with your benediction', and when he had blessed him, the saint said immediately: 'This boy will in the end outlive all his brothers, and will be a very famous king. He will never be delivered into the hands of enemies; but will die on his bed by a peaceful death, in old age, and within his own house, surrounded by a crowd of his intimate friends'. All these things were truly fulfilled according to the blessed man's prophecy concerning him.

[I 11] Concerning Scandlan, Colman's son

At the same time and in the same place, while Scandlan, Colman's son, was held in chains by king Aid, the saint went to him, desiring to see him; and after

In Tigernach, Scandlan Mór is called 'king of Osraige' at his death, about A.D. 644; but his father is not there named (T. 10b10). Adomnan is evidence of a tradition that Scandlan's father was Colman, the king of Osraige who died about 607 (T. 9b2). Colman was perhaps for a time deprived of the kingship (cf. Plummer 1910, I, pp. 166-7); and according to regnal lists, he was immediately succeeded not by Scandlan but by Cennfaelad. Apparently Cennfaelad, who was succeeded by Scandlan, was erroneously represented in some king-list to have been Scandlan's father. Scandlan was a child in 575.

And again you will be a fugitive from the kingdom ; and will be in exile for a number of days after which, recalled by the people, you will reign for three short seasons '.

All these things were entirely fulfilled according to the saint's prophecy. [I 14] Prophecy of the blessed man concerning king Diormit's son who was called Aid
Slane in the Irish tongue

At another time, when the blessed man was staying for some days in Ireland, and Aid (mentioned above) came to him, he spoke to him prophetically thus, saying: 'My son, you must take heed lest by reason of the sin of parricide you lose the prerogative of monarchy over the kingdom of all Ireland, predestined for you by God. For if ever you commit that sin, you will enjoy not the whole kingdom of your father, but only some part of it, in your own tribe, and for but a short time'.

These words of the saint were fulfilled exactly according to his prediction. For after Aid had treacherously killed Suibne, Colman's son, he had dominion over the part of the kingdom that had been yielded to him for no more, as it is told, than four years and three months.

It may be inferred from this prophecy that the siege of Dumbarton, which was the subject of an Irish tale, and in which the Irish settlers presumably gained the fortress, did not occur before Roderco's death.

⁵ ut A B₁ B₃. Reeves read hic ut, erroneously.

[I 15] The blessed man's prophecy concerning the king Roderco, Tóthal's son, who reigned in the rock of Clóth [Clyde]

At one time this king, since he was a friend of the holy man, sent Lugbe mocu-Min to him with a kind of secret commission, desiring to know whether he should be slain by enemies, or not. So Lugbe, when he was questioned by the saint about the king, and his kingdom and people, answered as if in pity, and said: 'Why do you ask about that afflicted man, who can never know at what hour he is to be killed by enemies?' Then the saint spoke: 'He shall never be delivered into the hands of enemies; but he shall die on his own feather pillow, in his own house'.

This prediction of the saint concerning king Roderco was fully fulfilled. For according to the saint's word he died in his own house, a peaceful death.

[I 16] Prophecy of the saint concerning two boys of whom [one], according to the saint's word, died at the end of a week

At another time two laymen came to the saint, then living in the island of Io. One of them, named Meldan, questioned the saint about his son, who was present, as to what would happen to him. To him the saint spoke thus : ' Is not this the day of Sabbath ? At the end of a week, on the Friday, your son will die, and on the eighth day from now, that is on the Sabbath, will be brought here for burial '.

Likewise the other layman, named Glasderc, also asked a similar question about the son whom he had with him there, and he received from the saint this reply : ' Your son Ernan shall see his grandsons, and shall be buried on this island in old age '.

All these things were entirely fulfilled in their times, in accordance with the saint's words concerning the two boys.

[I 17] Prophecy of the saint concerning Colcu, Aid Draigniche's son, one of the descendants of Féchre ; and concerning a hidden sin of his mother

At another time the saint questioned Colcu (named above) who was living with him in the island of Io, about his mother, whether she were a religious woman, or no. Colcu replying said : ' That my mother is of good character and good repute, I know '. Then the saint spoke thus prophetically : ' Set out soon, God willing, for Ireland, and question your mother very earnestly about a very grave sin that she has hidden, and that she is not willing to confess to any man '.

Hearing this, he complied and departed for Ireland. His mother, assiduously questioned by him, at first denied, but yet confessed, her sin; and by doing penance according to the saint's decision she was restored. And she marvelled greatly at what had been revealed to the saint concerning her.

Colcu returned to the saint, and remaining with him for some days questioned him about the end of his own time on earth; and obtained from the saint this reply: 'You will be for many years the head of a church within your native country that you love. And if at any time you chance to see your butler amusing himself at a supper-party of friends, and swinging a pitcher in a circle by its neck, know that you shall very soon die'.

Why say more? This same prophecy of the blessed man was fulfilled in all things precisely as it had been prophesied, of this Colcu.

[I 18] Concerning Laisran the gardener, a holy man

On a certain day the blessed man ordered one of his monks, called Trenan, of the family mocu-Runtir, to go to Ireland as an emissary. He, obeying the order of the man of God, prepared for his voyage quickly; and he complained to the saint that he lacked one mariner. This man will be the companion of your journey in Ireland for some days, and when you return he will accompany you to us. A man chosen by God, he will live a good life in this my monastery throughout the rest of his time⁹.

Why say more? Trenan received a blessing from the saint, and crossed with full sails through all the seas. And behold, as the ship neared the harbour, Laisran mocu-Moie ran faster than the others and took hold of the prow. The sailors perceived that he was the man of whom the saint had spoken before.

[I 19] How the saint spoke with foreknowledge
concerning a great whale

On a certain day, while the venerable man was in the island of Io, a brother named Berach, intending to sail to the island of Eth [Tiree], went in the morning to the saint, and desired his blessing. The saint looked upon him and said: 'My son, be very careful not to attempt to take the direct route across the open sea to the land of Eth this day, but instead to sail round about, by the small islands; lest you be terrified by a prodigious monster, and be scarcely able to escape'.

After receiving the saint's blessing, he went away, and entered his ship; and as though making light of the saint's command, transgressed it. And so, while crossing the wide stretch of the sea of Eth, he and the sailors that were with him there looked up, and behold, a whale, of marvellous and enormous size, swimming on the surface, rose up like a mountain, and opened gaping jaws, with many teeth. So then the rowers dropped the sail, and in great terror reversed their course, and were with difficulty able to escape from the wash raised by the motion of the beast. Remembering the saint's prophetic words, they marvelled.

Also on the same day, in the morning, the saint gave news of the same whale to Baithene, who was about to sail to the above-mentioned island; and he said: 'In the middle of last night, a great whale rose from the depths of the ocean, and today it will rise to the surface of the sea between the islands of Io and Eth'. Baithene said to him in reply: 'I and that beast are in God's power'. 'Go in peace', said the saint; 'your faith in Christ will protect you from this danger'.

Thereupon Baithene received the saint's blessing and sailed from the harbour. And after covering a

[I 20] Prophecy of the holy man concerning one Baitan, who with the others had sailed
out looking for a desert place in the sea

At another time, a man Baitan, by family a descendant of nia-Taloir, asked to be blessed by the saint on going to seek with the others a desert place in the sea. Bidding him farewell, the saint pronounced the following prophecy concerning him : ' This man, who goes to seek a desert in the ocean, will not lie buried in a desert place, but will be buried in that place in which a woman will drive sheep across his grave '.

The same Baitan, after long circuitous voyaging
through windy seas, having found no desert place,
returned to his country ; and for many years he continued there as the head of a small church, which in Irish is called Lathreg-inden. After some seasons in the

there. And about the same time, it happened that because of an attack by enemies the neighbouring lay-people, with their women and children, took refuge in the church of that place. And so it came about that one day a woman was observed driving her sheep through the burial-place of that man, who had recently been buried there. And one of those that saw it, a holy priest, said: 'Now the prophecy of Saint Columba has been fulfilled, that was made known many years ago'.  who slept with his mother

At another time, the saint roused the brothers in the dead of night; and when they had assembled in the church he said to them: 'Now let us pray earnestly to the Lord, because in this hour a sin unheard-of in this world has been committed, for which the judicial penalty must be very terrible'. And on the following day, in answer to a few of the brothers who asked him about that sin, he said: 'After a few months, that unhappy fellow will arrive in the island of Io, accompanying Lugaid, who will know nothing of the matter'.

So one day, after some months had passed, the saint gave an order to Diormit, and said: 'Rise quickly:
 see, Lugaid is approaching. Tell him that he must cast out upon the island of Male [Mull] the wretch that he has with him in the ship, so that he may not set foot upon the sod of this island'. Obeying the saint's command, Diormit went down to the sea and, when Lugaid came near, repeated to him all that the saint had said about the unhappy man. That unfortunate, hearing these things, swore that he would never take food with others until he had first seen Saint Columba, and spoken with him.

Diormit returned to the saint and reported to him these words of the unfortunate man. On learning them, the saint went down to the harbour ; and when Baithene suggested, quoting as evidence passages of holy scripture, that the wretch's penitence should be accepted, the saint said in reply : ' Baithene, this man has perpetrated fraticide, in the manner of Cain, and incest with his mother'.

Thereupon the wretch, kneeling on the shore, vowed that he would perform what the laws of penance required, according to the decision of the saint. And to him the saint replied : ' If you do penance among the Britons with wailing and weeping for twelve years, and do not return to Ireland until your death, perhaps God will condone your sin'. Saying this, the saint turned to his people and said : ' This man is a son of perdition ; he will not fulfil the penance that he has promised, but in a little while will return to Ireland, and will there shortly perish, killed by his enemies'.

All these things happened thus, in accordance with the saint's prophecy. For the wretch returned to Ireland about the same time, and in the district that

One day, Baithene went to the saint and said : ' I have need of one of the brothers, to run through and emend with me the psalter that I have written '. Hearing this, the saint spoke thus : ' Why do you impose this trouble upon us, without cause ? Since in this psalter of yours, of which you speak, neither will one letter be found to be superfluous, nor another to have been left out ; except a vowel I, which alone is missing '. And so, when the whole psalter had been read through, exactly what the saint had foretold was found to be confirmed.

Similarly one day, while he sat beside the hearth in the monastery, he saw at a little distance Lugbe, of the family mocu-Min, reading a book. To him he suddenly said : ' Take care, my son, take care ! For I believe that the book you are studying is going to fall into a vessel full of water '.

Further, on another day there was a shouting, beyond the strait of the island of Io. The saint, sitting in the hut that was supported on planks, heard the shouting, and said: 'The man who is shouting beyond the strait is not a man of delicate perceptions. Now today he will upset and empty the horn that holds my ink'. His attendant Diormit, hearing him say this, stood for a little while in front of the door, and awaited the arrival of the cumbersome guest, so as to protect the ink-horn; but presently some other matter caused him to withdraw from there, and after he had withdrawn the disturbing guest arrived. And, eagerly advancing to kiss the saint, he upset and emptied the horn of ink with the border of his garment.

fourth day of the week, tomorrow, we propose to fast ; but nevertheless a disturbing guest will arrive, and the customary fast will be relaxed'.

This befell as it had been revealed to the saint beforehand. For on the same fourth day of the week, in the morning, another stranger shouted across the strait : a very religious man, by name Aidan, Fergno's son, who (it is said) for twelve years attended upon Brenden mocu-Alti. He, when he arrived, relaxed that day's fast, as the saint had said.

[I 27] Concerning a pitiable man who shouted beyond the above-mentioned strait

Also on a certain day the saint, hearing some one shouting beyond the strait, spoke in this manner : ' Much to be pitied is that man who is shouting and who has come to us to seek things suitable for physical remedies, when today the fitter thing for him was to occupy himself with true repentance for his sins. For in the end of this week he will die'.

Those who were there present made this saying known to the unfortunate man when he arrived ; but, thinking little of it, he took what he had asked for, and went away at once. And in accordance with the prophetic words of the saint, before the end of the same week he died.

[I 28] The holy man's prophecy concerning a city of the Roman dominion, consumed by sulphurous fire that had fallen from heaven

Similarly at another time, on a day after the threshing of the grain, Lugbe, of the family moccu-Min, whom we have mentioned above, going to the saint was quite unable to look upon his face, which was flushed with marvellous redness ; and becoming greatly afraid he quickly fled away. But the saint called him back by slight clapping of his hands. Returning, he was at once asked why he had run away so quickly, and he made this reply : ' I fled because I was much afraid '.
And proceeding with greater confidence, after a slight pause, he took courage to question the saint, saying :
' No fearful vision has been shown to you, has it, in this hour ? ' The saint gave him this answer : ' Very terrible retribution has just now been made, in a distant part of the world '. ' What kind of retribution ', said
the youth, ' and in what country has it been made ? '
Then the saint spoke thus : ' In this hour, sulphurous flame has been poured down from heaven upon a city of the Roman dominion within the borders of Italy ;
close upon three thousand men, not counting the number of women and children, have perished, and before the present year is ended the Gallic sailors arriving from the provinces of Gaul will tell you the same '.

the holy man, to the chief place of the district; and he questioned the master and sailors of a ship that arrived, and heard those things about the city and its inhabitants related by them, all precisely as the memorable man had said before.

[I 29] Vision of the blessed man concerning Laisran, Feradach's son

On a very cold winter day the holy man was afflicted with great sorrow, and wept. His attendant, Diormit, questioned him about the cause of his sadness, and received from him this answer: 'Not without good cause, my son, do I grieve at this hour, when I see that Laisran is now harassing my monks in the construction of a large building, although they are exhausted with heavy labour; and it vexes me greatly'.

Strange to tell, at the same moment of time Laisran, whose abode was in the monastery of the plain of the oakwood [Durrow], being in some way impelled, and as if kindled with an inward fire, ordered that the monks should cease work; that some consolation of food should be prepared; and that they should not only take leisure on that day, but also rest on the remaining days of rough weather. The saint, hearing in the spirit these consolatory words spoken by Laisran to the brothers, ceased to weep; and wonderfully gladdened

[I 30] Concerning Féchna, a wise man; how he came as a penitent to Saint Columba, by whom his coming was foretold

At another time, the saint was sitting on the top of the hill that at a little distance overlooks this monastery of ours; and turning to his attendant Diormit he spoke, saying: 'I wonder why a certain ship from Ireland approaches so slowly. It brings a wise man who has become guilty of a misdeed, and who will soon arrive, in tearful repentance'.

After a short interval the attendant, looking out to the south, saw the sail of a ship that was approaching the harbour. When he pointed out to the saint that the ship was coming in, Columba rose quickly, saying: 'Let us go to meet the new-comer, whose true repentance Christ accepts'.

When the saint reached the harbour, Féchna stepped down from the ship and ran to meet him. Kneeling before his feet, he groaned bitterly, with weeping and lamentation, on bended knees; and confessed his sins before all those that were present. Then the saint, as much in tears as he, said to him: 'Rise, my son, and

At another time the holy man sent two monks to another of his monks, by name Caitan, who was at that time prior in the monastery that even today is called by the name of his brother, Diún, beside the lake of the river Aub [Awe] ; and by the same messengers he sent these words : 'Go quickly, hasten to Caitan, and bid him come to me without any delay'. Obeying the saint's word they set out, and arrived at the monastery of Diún, and communicated to Caitan the nature of their mission. In the same hour, without lingering in any way, he accompanied the envoys of the saint, and as companion of their journey speedily reached him in the island of Io. The saint, when he saw him, thus addressed him, speaking to him in these words : ' You have done well, Cailtan, in hastening to me obediently. Rest for a little. As one that loves his friend, I have sent to invite you, so that here with me in true obedience you may end the course of your life ; for before the end of this week you will pass to the Lord in peace'.

Cailtan, hearing this, rendered thanks to God ; and weeping he kissed the saint, and after he had received his blessing went to the guest-house. He fell ill on that same following night, and in accordance with the saint's word he departed to Christ the Lord within the same week.

[I 32] The holy man's prophetic foresight, concerning two brothers who were pilgrims

On one Lord's-day, there was a shout on the other side of the often-mentioned strait. The saint heard the cry, and said to the brothers that were present with him : ' Make haste, and bring to us quickly the pilgrims, who come from a district far away'. They obeyed at once, crossed over, and brought the guests. After kissing the guests, the saint then questioned them about the motive of their journey. They said in reply : ' We have come, to be pilgrims in your monastery for this year'. To them the saint gave this answer : ' You cannot remain in pilgrimage with me for the space of one year, as you say, unless first you take the monastic vow'. Those that were present there marvelled greatly that this was said to guests who had arrived in that very hour. The elder brother, in answer to these words of the saint, said: 'Although until this hour

 we have not at all had this purpose in mind, yet we shall follow your counsel which, we believe, is divinely inspired'.

Why say more? At that same moment they entered the oratory with the saint, and on bended knees devoutly took the monastic vow. Thereupon the saint turned to his monks and said: 'These two strangers, offering themselves as a living sacrifice to God, and consummating in a short space long years of service as soldiers of Christ, presently within this same month will depart
 in peace to Christ the Lord'.

When they heard this, the two brothers gave thanks to God, and were conducted to the guest-house. After an interval of seven days, the elder brother fell ill, and after that week was completed he departed to the Lord. Similarly also the other fell ill after another seven days, and in the end of that week passed happily to the Lord. And so according to the saint's true prophecy, they both ended this life within the space of that same month.

[I 33] The holy man's prophecy
concerning a certain Artbrano

When the blessed man was spending some days in the island of Sci [Skye], in a certain place he struck with his staff a plot of ground beside the sea, and spoke thus to those that accompanied him: 'My children, strange to tell, today in this place, on this plot of ground, a certain pagan old man, who has preserved natural goodness throughout his whole life, will be baptized, and will die, and will be buried'. And behold, after the space of about one hour, a little ship came to land at that harbourage, and in its prow was carried a feeble old man, the leader of the cohort of Geon (?). Two young men lifted him from the ship, and set him down in front of the blessed man. And as soon as he had, through an interpreter, received the word of God from the saint, he believed, and was baptized by him. And after the rites of baptism had been performed, he presently died in that place, as the saint had prophesied, and there his companions buried him, building a cairn of stones. It can still be seen today upon the sea-coast. And the stream of that place, in which he received baptism, down to the present day named after his name, is called by the people of the district 'dobur of Artbrano'.

[I 34] Concerning a boat transferred from one place to another by night, at the command of the saint

At another time, the saint, on a journey across the spine of Britain, finding a hamlet among deserted fields, made his lodging there beside the bank of a stream that flowed into a lake. In the same night, when his companions were slumbering, and had tasted their first sleep, he roused them, saying: 'Go out now, go quickly, and bring hither at once our boat that you left in a house beyond the stream; and place it in a nearer hut'. They obeyed at once, and did as they were bidden. And when they were again at rest, after some little time the saint silently touched Diormit, saying: 'Now stand outside the house, and see what is happening in the hamlet where first you put your boat'. Obeying the saint's command, he left the house, looked back, and saw that the whole village was being consumed with devastating flame. He returned to the saint, and reported what was happening there. Thereupon the saint gave the brothers an account of a certain hostile pursuer who had set fire to those houses on that night.

[I 35] Concerning Gallan, Fachtne's son, who was in the district of Colcu, Cellach's son

On a certain day the saint, sitting in his hut, said prophetically to this Colcu, who was studying beside him: 'Now demons are dragging to hell one grasping leader from among the chief men of your district'. When he heard this, Colcu wrote down the date and hour, on a tablet. And returning to his country after some months, he learned by questioning, from people of the district, that Gallan, Fachtne's son, had died in the same hour in which the blessed man had told him of the seizure by demons.

Cruithnian by race, and of royal lineage ; intending that he should for some years be a pilgrim with him in his monastery. This Aid the Black had been a very bloody man, and a slayer of many men ; he had also killed Diormit, Cerball's son, who had been ordained, by God's will, as the ruler of all Ireland. This same Aid, then, after passing some time in pilgrimage, was ordained as priest, although not rightly, in the above-mentioned Findchan's monastery, a bishop being summoned for the purpose. But the bishop dared not lay his hand upon Aid's head, until first Findchan (whose love for Aid was earthly) laid his right hand upon Aid's head, for confirmation.

When the ordination thus made was afterwards reported to the holy man, he was much displeased. Thereupon he pronounced the following terrible sentence upon that Findchan, and upon the Aid who had been ordained, saying : ' That right hand which, contrary to divine law and the law of the church, Findchan has laid upon the head of a son of perdition will presently rot, and after torments of great pain will precede him into the earth in burial ; and surviving after his hand has been buried he will live for many years. And Aid, unworthily ordained, will return like a dog to his vomit, and he will again be a bloody killer,

This prophecy of the blessed man was fulfilled in regard to them both. For the right hand of the priest Findchan decayed first, and preceded him into the earth, being buried in the island that is called Ommon. But he himself, according to the word of Saint Columba, lived for many years afterwards. And Aid the Black, priest only in name, returned to his former evil deeds, and, pierced with a spear by treachery, fell from the prow of a ship, into the water of a lake, and perished.

lightened (how, I do not know), from this place until we reach the monastery, that I feel no burden'.

Why say more? All those harvest-workers confessed, each on his own behalf, that they had felt in all respects exactly as one of them had openly described. All as one man bowed their knees, and begged of Saint Baithene that he would endeavour to explain to them in their ignorance the cause and origin of the marvellous relief, which he felt as well as the others. Thereupon he gave them this answer, saying: 'You know that our senior, Columba, thinks of us with solicitude and, mindful of our labour, is much distressed when we are late in reaching him. And for the reason that he does not come in the body to meet us, his spirit meets us as we walk, and in this fashion refreshes and gladdens us'. Hearing these words, they knelt down, raising their hands toward heaven with expressions of great joy, and worshipped Christ in the holy and blessed man.

And this too we ought not to pass over in silence that has been told us without question by certain men who knew of it, concerning the voice of the blessed man in singing psalms. This voice of the venerable man, when he sang in the church with the brothers, was raised in an incomparable manner, and was heard at a distance sometimes of four furlongs, that is, five hundred paces, sometimes even of eight, that is, a thousand paces. that stood with him in the church, his voice did not exceed the volume of a human voice in magnitude of sound ; and yet at the same time those that stood at a distance of more than a mile heard the same voice so clearly that they could distinguish every syllable in the verses that he sang. For his voice sounded alike in the ears of those that heard it, near or far. This miracle of the blessed man's voice is proved to have happened only rarely, not always ; but yet it could not have happened at all, without the grace of the Divine Spirit.

This too should not remain untold, which, as an instance of this incomparable uplifting of his voice, is said to have happened once beside the fortress of king Brude. While the saint himself with a few brothers was celebrating according to custom the praises of God, at vespers, outside the king's fortress, certain magicians came close to them, and tried to prohibit it to the best of their power, lest the sound of divine praise from their lips should be heard among the heathen peoples. Understanding this, the saint began to sing the forty-fourth psalm. And in the same moment his voice was, in a marvellous manner, so raised in the air like a terrible peal of thunder, that both the king and the people were filled with intolerable dread.

[I 38] Concerning a certain rich man, who was called Luguid the Lame

At another time, while the saint was for some days in Ireland, he saw a cleric sitting in a car and gaily driving over the plain of Brega. He first asked about him, who he was, and received from that man's friends this answer concerning him: 'That is Luguid the Lame, a wealthy man, and respected among the people'. Then the saint said in reply: 'It is not thus that I see him. But on the day on which he dies, a poor and wretched man, he will have in his possession three stray beasts belonging to his neighbours, retained in one stone enclosure. And he will order one cow, chosen from the stray beasts, to be killed for him, and will ask that a portion of its cooked flesh should be given to him, as he reclines on the same couch with a harlot. So taking a mouthful of that portion, he will then and there be choked, and die'.

All these things, as is said by men who know, were completely fulfilled, according to the saint's prophetic word.

On one occasion, when the saint was for a time in the district of the Irish, that was mentioned a little above, he happened to come on a Lord's-day to a neighbouring small monastery that is called in Irish Trioit [Trevet]. So on the same day, when he heard a certain priest consecrating the sacred elements of the Eucharist, a priest whom the brothers residing there had chosen to perform the ceremony of the Mass because they thought him very religious, the saint suddenly let pass from his lips this terrible saying: 'Now we see clean and unclean intermingled together: the clean rite of the sacred offering administered by an unclean man, who at the same time keeps hidden in his own conscience a great sin'. He came last night secretly, alone, from the island Colossus, and he is trying to conceal himself during the day among sand-hills, under his boat which he has covered with grass; so that by night he may sail across to the small island where the sea-calves that pertain to us breed and are bred; in order that the greedy robber may fill his boat with those that he thievishly kills, and make his way back to his dwelling'.

Seeing him, the saint said to him: 'Why do you repeatedly steal other people's property, transgressing the divine commandment? When you have need, come to us, and you will receive the necessary things that you ask for'. And saying this, he ordered wethers to be killed, and given instead of seals to the miserable thief; so that he should not return home empty.

After some time, the saint, foreseeing in the spirit the thief's imminent death, sent to Baithene, then living as prior in the plain of Long, and bade him send to that thief a fat beast and six measures of grain, as last gifts. When Baithene had dispatched these as the saint had asked him to do, the pitiful thief was found overtaken by sudden death on that day; and the gifts that had been sent were used at his funeral.

And the saint replied: 'Why do you too now utter idle words? How would I ask a song of gladness from that unhappy fellow, who has now suddenly reached the end of his life, slaughtered by enemies?'

After the saint had said this, behold a man on the other side of the river shouted, saying: 'That poet who recently came safely back from you has in this hour been killed upon the way, by enemies'. All who were then present greatly marvelled, and looked at one another in amazement.

On the eighth day, there was a shouting beyond the strait. Then the saint called Lugbe to him, and said to him quietly: 'The man who is now shouting beyond the strait is that old traveller of whom I spoke to you before. Go, and bring him to us'. He was speedily brought in, and with the rest of his news he related this also, saying: 'In the region of the Maugdorni, two men of noble birth have died, each wounding the other; namely, Colman Dog, Ailen's son, and Ronan, the son of Aid, son of Colcu, of the race of the Easterners; near the boundaries of the region where the monastery that is called Cell-rois can be seen'.

After these words of the narrator, the same Lugbe, soldier of Christ, began to question the saint when they were alone, saying: 'Tell me, I beg you, about such prophetic revelations, how they are made to you; by seeing or hearing, or in some way unknown to

' To this the saint said : ' Of the very subtle matter about which you now ask, I shall not be able to tell you anything at all, even the least particle, unless you first kneel and firmly promise me in the name of God on high that you will never, during all the days of my life, tell of this darkest mystery to any person '. Hearing this, Lugbe immediately knelt, and with his face downcast to the ground he fully promised everything, according to the saint's command. Rising as soon as the promise had been completed, he was thus addressed by the saint, who said : ' There are some, although few indeed, on whom divine favour has bestowed the gift of contemplating, clearly and very distinctly, with scope of mind miraculously enlarged, in one and the same moment, as though under one ray of the sun, even the whole circle of the whole earth, with the ocean and sky about it '.

Although the saint, as one that shuns vain-glory, seems to tell this miracle of others of the elect, yet that he has spoken of himself, albeit indirectly, should be doubted by none who has read the apostle Paul, a vessel of election, telling of such visions revealed to himself : for Paul has thus written, not ' I know myself ', but ' I know a man, caught up to the third heaven ' ; and although he seems to tell this of another, none doubts that he speaks in this way of his own person, preserving his humility. Likewise our Columba also has followed him in the account given above of visions of the spirit ; which account the above-mentioned man, whom the saint very greatly loved, was hardly able to extort from him, after making great supplication; as Lugbe himself attested, in the personal presence of other saints, after Saint Columba's death. And from them we have learned of the saint, without any doubt,

 these things that we have related above.

[I 44] Concerning the bishop Cronan

At another time, there came to the saint from the province of the men of Mumu a stranger who humbly kept himself out of sight, as much as he could, so that none knew that he was a bishop. But yet that could not remain hidden from the saint. For on the next Lord's-day, when he was bidden by the saint to prepare, according to custom, the body of Christ, he called the saint to assist him, so that they should as two presbyters together break the Lord's bread. Thereupon the saint,
 going to the altar, suddenly looked upon his face, and thus addressed him: 'Christ bless you, brother; break
 this bread alone, according to the episcopal rite. Now we know you are a bishop: why until now have you tried to conceal yourself, so that the reverence due to you was not paid by us?' Hearing the saint say this,
 the humble pilgrim was much astonished, and reverenced Christ in the saint. And those that were present there, greatly marvelling, glorified God.

[I 45] The holy man's prophecy
concerning the priest Ernan

Also at another time, the venerable man sent the priest Ernan, his aged uncle, to be prior of the monastery that, many years before, he had founded in the island of Hinba. The saint kissed him at his departure, and blessed him; and uttered this prophecy concerning him: 'This friend of mine, now setting out, I do not expect that I shall see again, while he lives in this world'.

So, before many days had passed, the same Ernan was attacked by an illness, and by his own wish was carried back to the saint. And he, greatly rejoicing in his arrival, set out to meet him at the harbour. And Ernan himself, although feeble, yet on his own feet, very eagerly endeavoured to go from the harbour to meet the saint. But when there was between the two a distance of some twenty-four paces, he was overtaken by sudden death, and fell to the ground dying, before the saint could see his face in life; so that the saint's word should not be rendered vain in any way. And therefore the cross was set up in that place before the doorway of the shed; and likewise the other cross, set up where the saint stood when Ernan died, stands even today.

Also at another time, when the saint was a guest at the place that is in Irish called Coire-salcháin, there came to him among the rest a certain layman; and when the saint saw him coming to him in the evening, 'Where' he said, 'do you live?' He replied: 'In the district bordering upon the shores of the lake of Crog-reth is my home'. 'The district that you speak of' said the saint, 'is now being plundered by barbarian marauders'. When he heard this, the unhappy layman began to bewail his wife and children. The saint, seeing that he was greatly grieved, comforted him, saying: 'Go, little man, go! Your whole family has escaped, fleeing to the mountain. But the invaders have driven away with them all your little cattle; and the cruel robbers have likewise carried off with the prey all your household furniture'. Hearing this, the layman returned to his district, and found that everything had happened exactly as the saint had foretold.

of the corcu-Réti, asked the holy man by what death he should be cut off. The saint said to him : 'You will die neither in battle, nor in the sea. A companion of your journey, from whom you suspect nothing, will be the cause of your death'. 'Perhaps' said Góre, 'one of the friends that accompany me may have it in mind to kill me; or my wife, to contrive my death by magic art, for love of a younger man'. The saint said : 'It will not happen so'. 'Why' said Góre, 'will you not tell me now about my slayer?' The saint replied : 'I will not disclose anything to you more plainly now, about that baneful companion of yours, lest you be too greatly troubled by frequent remembrance of what you know, before the day comes on which you will learn the truth of this matter'.

Why linger over words? After some years had passed, it chanced one day that the same Góre was sitting under a ship, and with his own knife was scraping the bark (?) from a spear-shaft. Then he heard some men near by fighting among themselves, and he rose quickly, to part the fighters; and his knee, striking against that knife, which in the sudden movement he had carelessly dropped on the ground, was severely wounded. And by this companion's doing, the cause of his death arose. Directly, with consternation of mind, he remembered that it was in accordance with the prophecy of the holy man. And after some months, oppressed by this evil, he died.

At one time, while the saint was living in the island of Io, he called in one of the brothers, and thus addressed him: 'On the third day from this that dawns, you must watch in the western part of this island, sitting above the sea-shore; for after the ninth hour of the day a guest will arrive from the northern region of Ireland, very tired and weary, a crane that has been tossed by winds through long circuits of the air. And with its strength almost exhausted it will fall near you and lie upon the shore. You will take heed to lift it tenderly, and carry it to the house near by; and, having taken it in as a guest there for three days and nights, you will wait upon it, and feed it with anxious care. And afterwards, at the end of the three days, revived and not wishing to be longer in pilgrimage with us, it will return with fully recovered strength to the sweet district of Ireland from which at first it came. I commend it to you thus earnestly, for this reason, that it comes from the district of our fathers'.

The brother obeyed; and on the third day, after the ninth hour, as he had been bidden, he awaited the coming of the foreknown guest. When it arrived, he lifted it from the shore where it had fallen; in its weakness, he carried it to the lodging; in its hunger, he fed it. When he returned to the monastery in the evening, the saint, not questioning but affirming, said to him: 'God bless you, my son, because you have tended well the pilgrim guest; which will not remain in pilgrimage, but after three days will return home'.

This, precisely as the saint foretold, the event also proved to be true. After being a guest for three days, it first rose from the ground in the presence of its host that had cared for it, and flew to a height; and then, after studying the way for a while in the air, crossed the expanse of ocean, and in calm weather took its way back to Ireland, in a straight line of flight.

a fine day of summer. Then water for washing their hands was brought to the saints in a bronze vessel, from a well close by. When Saint Columba had received it, he spoke thus to abbot Comgell, who was sitting by his side: 'Comgell, the day will come when that well, from which this water, poured out for us, has been brought, will be fit for no human use'. 'How' said Comgell, 'will its springing water be defiled?' Saint Columba then replied: 'Because it will be filled with human blood. For my friends by kinship, and your kinsmen according to the flesh (that is to say the descendants of Néll, and the peoples of Cruthen), being at war will fight a battle in this near-by fortress of Cethern. And so one of my kindred will be slaughtered in the above-mentioned well, and with the blood of that poor fellow, killed among the rest, the place of that well will be filled'.

This true prophecy of his was fulfilled in its time, after many years, in the battle in which, as many people know, Domnall Aid's son was raised up as victor; and in the same well, in accordance with the holy man's prophecy, a certain man of his kindred was killed.

words Cruthini populi represent the Irish Cruthen-tuatha (literally 'Cruthen-tribes'). If Cruthini had been a nominative plural, it would, according to Adomnan's normal usage, have been a noun in apposition, not an adjective. Comgell (called mocu-Aridi, 118a) was a member of the tribe Dal-nAridi, which held the principal kingdom of Cruithni in northern Ireland.

Another soldier of Christ, Finan by name, who for many years lived irreproachably the life of an anchorite beside the monastery of the plain of the oakwood [Durrow], described to me, Adomnan, some things concerning that battle, fought in his presence, and bore witness that he had seen a dismembered corpse in the above-mentioned well; and that returning on the same day, after the battle was fought, to the monastery of Saint Comgell that is in Irish called Cambas, since it was from there that he had come before, he had found there two old men, monks of Saint Comgell. And when he had related to them something concerning the battle that had been fought in his sight, and the well defiled with human blood, they immediately said: 'A true prophet was Columba who, in our hearing, foretold as happening in the future all these things concerning the battle, and the well, that you tell us have been fulfilled today, when, many years ago, he sat with Saint Comgell beside the fortress of Cethern'.

for the blessed man, when, with a large crowd accompanying him, he was returning after the conference of the above-named kings. So when the holy man arrived, the many gifts of the people were presented to him for benediction, laid out in the courtyard of the monastery. While he was blessing and examining them, he pointed especially to the gift of a rich man, saying: 'God's mercy goes with the man whose gift this is, for his mercies to the poor, and his generosity'.

Again, he distinguished one gift among many others, saying: 'I can taste nothing of this, the gift of a wise but avaricious man, unless he first shows true repentance for the sin of avarice'. This saying was quickly made known among the crowd, and hearing it Columb, Aid's son, conscience-stricken, ran up, and on bended knees expressed penitence in the presence of the saint, and promised that he would thenceforward renounce avarice, mend his ways, and practise liberality. And when he was bidden by the saint to rise, from that hour he was cured of the vice of meanness. For he was a wise man, as had been revealed to the saint in his gift.

That generous rich man, by name Brenden, of whose gift mention was made a little above, also heard the saint's words spoken concerning himself; and kneeling at the saint's feet, he prayed that the saint would raise a prayer for him to the Lord. First he was chidden by him for certain sins, and professing repentance he promised that he would thenceforth amend. And so each was corrected and healed of his particular faults.

At another time, with similar knowledge, the saint recognized the gift of a certain niggardly man, Diormit by name, among many gifts that were brought to the great church of Deathrib at the coming of the saint.

Let it suffice to have written down these things, as a few instances out of very many of the blessed man's prophetic gift, in the text of this first book. I say 'few', because it cannot be doubted, in the case of the venerable man, that the instances which, inwardly concealed as holy mysteries, could never come to the knowledge of men, were far more numerous than those that from time to time dripped, as it were, like small drops through the cracks of a vessel filled with new strongly-fermenting wine. For holy and apostolic men, shunning vainglory, very often hasten to conceal, as well as they can, such inner secrets as are manifested to them inwardly by God. But, whether they will or no, God makes known, and in one way or another publicly exposes, some of these things; inasmuch as he wishes to glorify the saints that glorify him, namely the Lord himself, to whom be glory, through the ages of the ages.

Here an end is put to this first book.

[II 1] Of wine that was made from water

At one time, when the venerable man, while still a youth, was living in Ireland with the holy bishop Findbarr, acquiring knowledge of sacred scripture, it chanced on a certain festival that no wine was found for the sacrificial rite. When he heard the attendants of the altar lamenting among themselves over the lack of it, he took a pitcher and went to the well, so that he as a deacon might draw spring water for the sacred purposes of the Eucharist; for at that time he was serving in the order of deacon. So the blessed man blessed in faith the watery element that he drew from the spring, calling on the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, who transmuted water in Cana of Galilee; by whose power in this miracle also the baser, that is the watery, substance was changed into the more desirable form, that is to say of wine, through the hands of the memorable man. The holy man returned from the well and entered the church, and put down beside the altar the Learning this, the holy bishop with the attendants returned great thanks to God. But the holy youth attributed it not to himself, but to the holy bishop Findbarr. And so Christ the Lord manifested through his disciple, as a first evidence of power, this that he had performed through himself in Cana of Galilee, when he made the same thing the beginning of his signs.

Let this miracle of God that was shown through our Columba illumine like a lantern the opening of this book, so that we may pass forward to the other miracles of power that were shown through him.

[II 2] Concerning the bitter fruit of a tree, turned to sweetness by the saint's blessing

Near the monastery of the plain of the oak [Durrow], on its southern side, there was a tree that bore much fruit. Since the inhabitants of the place made a complaint against it because of the too great bitterness of the fruit, the saint went to it one day in the autumn season. And seeing that the tree vainly produced abundant fruit, more hurtful than pleasing to those that tasted it, he raised his holy hand, blessed the tree, and

[II 3] Concerning a crop of grain sown after the middle of summer, and reaped in the beginning of the month of August, at the prayer of the saint, while he was living in the island of Io

At one time, the saint sent his monks to bring bundles of wattle from the field of a certain layman, for the building of a guest-house. When, having filled a freight-ship with the aforesaid materials of wattle, they returned and came to the saint, and said that the layman was much distressed on account of this loss, the saint immediately gave instructions, saying : ' Therefore, lest we offend the man, let twice three measures of barley be taken to him from us ; and let him sow the same at this time, in ploughed land '.

When, according to the saint's command, the grain had been sent to the layman, Findchan by name, and delivered to him with this instruction, he, while receiving it gladly, said : ' How shall a crop sown after mid-summer succeed, against the nature of this land ? of the saint, to whom the Lord will grant whatever he may ask of him'. And likewise the messengers also added this, and said: 'Saint Columba, who has sent us to you with this gift, gave this injunction through us in regard to your crop, saying: "Let that man trust in the omnipotence of God. His crop, although sown after fifteen days of the month of June have passed, will be reaped in the beginning of the month of August".'

The layman obeyed, in ploughing and sowing. And the harvest that, at the time spoken of above, he had sown without hope, he reaped, to the astonishment of all the neighbours, in the beginning of the month of August, fully ripe, according to the saint's word; in a piece of the land that is called Delcros.

[II 4] Of a pestiferous cloud, and the healing of very many people

Also at another time, while the saint was living in the island of Io, as he sat on the little hill that is in Latin called 'great fortress', he saw a heavy rain-cloud that had risen from the sea in the north, on a clear day. Watching it as it rose, the saint said to one of his monks, sitting beside him, by name Silnan, Nemaïd's son,

Men and cattle who suffer from them, afflicted with that poisonous disease, will be sick even to death. But we must take pity upon them and help them in their illness, by the mercy of God. You, Silnan, therefore now go down with me from the hill, and prepare to make a voyage tomorrow, if life continue and God will, after receiving from me bread that has been blessed with invocation of the name of God. When it is dipped in water, men and beasts sprinkled with that water will speedily recover health'.

Why do we linger? On the next day, all the necessary things having been quickly made ready, Silnan received from the saint's hand the bread that had been blessed; and he sailed away in peace. The saint gave him this additional word of encouragement in the hour of his departure, saying: 'Be confident, my son; you will have favourable and prosperous winds, by day and night, until you arrive at the district that is called

Why say more? Following the saint's instruction, after a prosperous and speedy voyage Silnan arrived,
with the Lord's help, at the place aforesaid; and found the people of that district, of whom the saint had foretold, devastated by the pestiferous rain falling upon them from the cloud, which had gone more quickly before him. In the first place six men, in extremity and with death approaching, found in one house near the sea, were sprinkled by Silnan with water of the blessing, and were opportunely restored to health on that same day. The fame of that sudden cure was spread swiftly through the whole of that district, wasted
by very pestilent disease, and drew all the sick people to Saint Columba's messenger, who according to the saint's command sprinkled men and beasts with water in which the blessed bread had been dipped. And immediately recovering full health the men, saved with their cattle, praised Christ in Saint Columba, with very great rendering of thanks.

In the story written above, these two things are, as I think, clearly associated together: that is to say, the grace of prophecy concerning the cloud, and the miracle of power in the curing of the sick. That these things

[II 5] Concerning Maugin, a holy virgin, Daimen's daughter, who lived in Clocher of the sons of Daimen

At another time while the saint resided in the island of Io, in the first hour of the day he summoned a brother, Lugaid by name, whose epithet in Irish speech is Lathir, and addressed him in these words: 'Prepare at once a speedy voyage to Ireland, for it is very needful that I should send you as an emissary to Clocher of the sons of Daimen. In this past night by some mischance the holy virgin Maugin, daughter of Daimen, returning after the office from the oratory to her house, stumbled; and her hip was broken into two pieces. Crying aloud she constantly repeats my name, hoping that she will obtain relief through me from the Lord'.

And the saint added this : 'See, in your presence I [write] on the lid of this box the number of the years, twenty-three, that the holy virgin will live in this present life, after this cure'.

All these things were entirely so fulfilled, just as they had been foretold by the saint. For as soon as Lugaid came to the holy virgin, and her hip was sprinkled, as the saint instructed, with the blessed water, the bone joined firmly with no delay at all, and the hip was completely healed. And with great rendering of thanks she rejoiced over the coming of Saint Columba's emissary, and according to the saint's prophecy, continuing in good works, she lived after her healing for twenty-three years.

people, by invocation of the name of Christ, during those days in which, when he went to the conference of kings, he remained for a short time in the ridge of Céte. By the extending of his holy hand, or when they were sprinkled with water blessed by him, or even by touching the hem of his cloak, or by receiving a blessing of any thing, such as salt, or bread, and dipping it in water, very many sick people, believing, regained full health.

[II 7] Of rock-salt, blessed by the saint,
which fire could not consume

So at another time, Colcu, Cellach's son, requested and received from the saint a piece of rock-salt, blessed for the benefit of his sister and foster-mother, who was suffering from a very severe inflammation of the eyes. That sister and foster-mother received this blessing from her brother's hand, and hung it on the wall above her bed. It happened by a mischance, after some days, that the village was entirely burned down with devastating flame, including that woman's cottage. Strange to say, a small part of that wall remained, standing undamaged, after the whole house had been burned about it, so that the blessed man's blessing, hung up on it, should not perish. And the fire did not dare to touch the two pegs on which this rock-salt hung.

[II 8] Concerning a page that was written by the saint's hand, and that could not be injured
by water

I think that another miracle should not be omitted, that was once performed in connexion with the contrary element. The cycles of many years had run by after the blessed man's departure to the Lord, when a certain young man falling from a horse sank and was drowned in the river that is in Irish called Boend [Boyne], and remained under the water for twenty days. And just as when he fell he had had books enclosed in a skin satchel under his arm, so also he was found after the said number of days holding fast between his arm and side the satchel with the books. When his body was brought back to dry land, and the satchel was opened, among the pages of other books which were not merely damaged, but even rotten, the page written by the holy fingers of Saint Columba was found dry, and not at all injured, as though it had been kept in a coffer.

shoulders of a boy who had slipped from a bridge, and, with the skin satchel that contained it, was submerged in a certain river of the region of the Lagin. This book remained in the water from the Lord's nativity until the days of Easter were concluded, and after that, found on the river bank by some women who were walking there, it was carried to a certain priest Iogenan, a Pict by race, to whom it formerly belonged; in the same satchel, which was not only sodden, but even rotten. When Iogenan opened the satchel, he found his book undamaged, and as clean and dry as if it had remained all that time in a coffer, and had never fallen into the water.

Other similar things too, that occurred in different places, we have heard without question, from those who knew of them, concerning books written by the hand of Saint Columba; which (that is to say the books), lying in water, have been able to remain entirely unharmed. But in the case of the above-named Iogenan's book, we have received an account of the facts, without any possible doubt, from certain truthful and blameless men of good testimony, who found the same book to be, after so many days of immersion, extraordinarily white and clear.

These two things, although performed in small matters, and shown in contrary elements, namely fire and water, bear witness to the honour of the blessed man, and prove how greatly and how highly he is esteemed by God.

[II 10] Of water that, at the prayer of the saint, was produced from hard rock

And because just above reference has been made to the element of water, we ought to mention also other miracles, which the Lord performed through the saint in connexion with the same substance, although in different times and places.

At one time during the saint's life in pilgrimage, while he was making a journey, an infant was brought to him by its parents for baptism. And because water was not to be found anywhere near, the saint turned aside to a rock close by, bowed his knees, and prayed for a little while. And rising after his prayer, he blessed the face of the rock, from which thereupon water flowed in an abundant cascade; and in it he immediately baptized the infant. And also, concerning the baptized child, he pronounced these prophetic words, saying: 'This little boy will live long, to extreme age. In the years of his youth he will sufficiently obey the desires of the flesh, and afterwards, devoted until his death to service as a soldier of Christ, will depart to the Lord in good old age'.

[II 11] Concerning the malignant water of another well, which the holy man blessed,
in the land of the Picts

At one time, when the blessed man passed some days in the province of the Picts, he heard that the fame of another well was wide-spread among the heathen populace, and that the insensate people venerated it as a god, the devil deluding their understanding. For those that drank from this well, or deliberately washed their hands or feet in it, were struck, by devilish art, God permitting it, and returned leprous, or half blind, or even crippled, or suffering from some other infirmity. Led astray by all this, the heathen gave honour to the well as to a god. When he learned of that, the saint went boldly to the well one day. The magicians, whom he often repelled from himself in confusion and defeat, rejoiced greatly when they saw this, since they imagined that he would suffer the like ills, from touching that noxious water. But he, first raising his holy hand in invocation of the name of Christ, washed his hands and feet ; and after that, with those that accompanied him, drank of the same water, which he had blessed. from that day, the demons withdrew from that well, and not only was it not permitted to harm any one, but after the saint's blessing, and washing in it, many infirmities among the people were in fact cured by the same well.

[II 12] Concerning the blessed man's danger on the sea, and the sudden calming of the storm at his prayer

At another time, the holy man began to be in danger on the sea. For the whole body of the ship was violently shaken, and heavily struck by great masses of waves, with a mighty storm of winds that pressed on all sides. Then it happened that the sailors said to him, as he tried with them to bail the water out of the ship : ' What you are doing now does not very greatly profit us in our danger. You should rather pray for us who are perishing '. Hearing this, he ceased to pour out vainly bitter water into the green wave [?], and began to pour out sweet and fervent prayer to the Lord. Marvellously, in the same moment of time in which the saint, standing in the prow, extended his palms to heaven and prayed to the Almighty, the whole tempest of the air and wildness of the sea in less time than it takes to tell subsided and became still ; and immediately

Also at another time, when a very fierce and dangerous storm was blowing, and his companions importuned the saint to pray to the Lord for them, he gave them this answer, and said : ' On this day it is not for me to pray for you in this danger that you are in ; it is for the holy man, the abbot Cainnech '.

I have marvellous things to tell. In the same hour, Saint Cainnech, being in his own monastery, which is in Latin called ' field of the cow ', and in Irish, Ached-bou [Aghaboe], by revelation of the Holy Spirit heard in the inner ear of his heart those words of Saint Columba. And since it chanced that he had begun after the ninth hour to break the holy bread in the refectory, he suddenly abandoned the small table, and with one shoe on his foot, and the other left behind through the excess of his haste, he went hurriedly to the church, with these words : ' We cannot have dinner at this time, when Saint Columba's ship is in danger on the sea. For at this moment he repeatedly calls upon the name of this Cainnech, to pray to Christ for him, and his companions in peril '. After saying these words he entered the oratory, bowed his knees, and prayed for a little storm ceased, and the sea became perfectly calm.

Then Saint Columba, miraculously seeing in the spirit the hastening of Cainnech to the church, although Cainnech was far away, pronounced these words from his pure heart, saying : ' Now, Cainnech, I know that God has heard your prayer. Now your swift running to the church, wearing one shoe, greatly helps us '.

In this so great miracle, the prayers of both the saints worked, we believe, together.

[II 14] Concerning Saint Cainnech's
 staff, left behind at the harbour

At another time the same Cainnech, mentioned above, forgot to take with him his staff, when he began to sail for Ireland from the harbour of the island of Io. After his departure, this staff of his was found on the shore, and put into Saint Columba's hand ; and when he had returned home, he carried it into the oratory, and there for a long time remained alone, in prayer.

So Cainnech, approaching the island of Oídech, suddenly conscious of his forgetfulness, was struck with inward dismay. But after a little while, leaving the ship, and kneeling on the ground in prayer, he discovered, there before him on the turf of the land of Oídech, the staff that he had forgotten and left behind

[II 15] Concerning the holy priests Baithene, and Colman, son of Beogna, when they asked through the blessed man's prayer from God, for wind to be granted favourable to themselves, on the same day, although they were sailing in different directions

Once also the above-named holy men came to the saint and at the same time, with one accord, asked him to ask and obtain from the Lord that favourable wind should be given to them on the following day, when they were to set out in different directions. In reply, the saint gave them this answer : ' Early tomorrow Baithene, sailing from the harbour of the island of Io, will have a favourable breeze until he reaches the harbour of the plain of Long '. And this the Lord granted, according to the saint's word. For Baithene with full sails on that day crossed the whole great sea to the land of Eth [Tiree].

And at the third hour of the same day the venerable man called to him the priest Colman, saying: 'Now Baithene has safely reached his desired harbour. Make ready to sail today; the Lord will presently change the wind to north'. The south wind, complying with the blessed man's word thus uttered, in the same hour changed into a northerly breeze.

And so in one day the two holy men, parting each from the other in peace, put to sea with full sails and favourable breezes; Baithene in the morning to the land of Eth, Colman after mid-day beginning his voyage to Ireland. This miracle, the Lord granting it, was performed by virtue of the prayers of the celebrated man; because, as it is written, all things are possible to him who believes.

After the departure of Saint Colman on that day, Saint Columba pronounced this prophetic saying concerning him: 'The holy man Colman, whom we have blessed on his departure, will never in this world see my face again'. And that was afterwards fulfilled. For in the same year Saint Columba departed to the Lord.

which the blessed man was writing, suddenly stopped. This youth had returned after the milking of the cows, carrying on his back a vessel full of new milk; and he said to the saint that he should bless this burden, according to the custom. Then the saint, being at a little distance, with upraised hand made in the air the saving sign towards it, [and with invocation of the name of God blessed the vessel,] which was at once violently shaken. The fastening-peg of the lid was thrust back through its two holes, and thrown far off; the lid fell to the ground; the greater part of the milk was spilt upon the earth. The boy put down the vessel on its base, upon the ground, with the little that remained of the milk. He bowed his knees in supplication. The saint said to him: 'Rise, Colman. You have been careless in your work today. Before the milk was poured in, you did not, by imprinting the sign of the Lord's cross, expel a demon that lurked in the bottom of the empty vessel. Now, unable to endure the power of that sign, by his trembling he has shaken the whole vessel, and has spilt the milk in his sudden flight. Bring hither therefore the vessel, nearer to me, so that I may bless it.'

When this was done, the half-empty vessel that the saint had blessed was found in the same moment to have been divinely filled again; and the little that had remained before in the bottom of the vessel had, under the blessing of his holy hand, instantly swelled up to the brim.

[II 17] Concerning a vessel that a certain sorcerer, called Silnan, had filled with milk drawn from a bull

This is said to have happened in the house of a rich layman called Foirtgern, who lived on the mountain Cainle. While the saint was a guest there, he judged with a true judgement between two rustics who were disputing, and whose arrival he had foreseen. One of them, who was a sorcerer, at the saint's command by diabolic art drew milk from a bull, which was near by. This the saint commanded to be done, not in order to confirm those sorceries (let it not be thought), but in order to confound them before the crowd. So the blessed man asked that the vessel, full, as it seemed, of this milk, should at once be given to him ; and blessed it with this pronouncement, saying : ' Now this will be shown not to be the true milk that it is thought to be, but blood bleached by the imposture of demons, to deceive mankind '. And immediately that milky colour was changed to its proper nature, that is into blood. The bull also, which for the space of an hour, shrunk with hideous leanness and wasted, was at the point of death, was sprinkled with water that had been blessed by the saint ; and it was cured with marvellous rapidity.

[II 18] Concerning Lugne mocu-Min

One day, a young man of good ability, called Lugne, (who afterwards, when he was an old man, was the prior of a monastery in the island of Elen) came to the saint and complained of a discharge of blood that at frequent intervals during many months had flowed immoderately from his nostrils. The saint bade him come nearer; and blessed him, pressing together both his nostrils with two fingers of the right hand. And from the hour of that blessing until his last day, blood never fell from his nose.

[II 19] Concerning fishes that were specially provided by God for the blessed man

At another time, when the memorable man's companions, active fishers, had caught five fishes in a net, in the river Sale, which abounds with fish, the saint said to them: 'Cast the net once more into the river; and immediately you shall find a great fish, which the Lord has provided for me'. They followed the saint's instruction, and drew in with the net a salmon of marvellous size, provided for them by God.

¹ Alio is written in A as though it began a chapter. The two half-chapters are separated by a line left blank, but both halves are included in A's chapter-heading. Reeves numbered the two halves as one chapter. Each half has a separate title in B₁ B₂ B₃. The title of the second half, in B₁, B₂ (partly missing), B₃, and in the contents-list of B₂ and of B₃, is : De duobus piscibus illo prophetante in flumine quod vocatur böo (boo B₃) reperitis.

² Cei. In A, there is one over-dash, resembling the bar abbreviation-sign. Cf. 43a. Here also cei is probably genitive.

³ bo A, with an over-dash, somewhat resembling an accent ; böo B₁ B₂ ; bo.o. B₃

⁴ Pro to reddiderunt. This sentence seems to have been misplaced in the common source of A B₁ B₂ B₃ ; it should have followed traxerunt, and we have placed it there in the translation. It is to be noted however that pro does not begin a new sentence in any of the manuscripts, and that in A no original punctuation mark follows traxerunt or comitata.

⁵ stagno aporum. Here aporum is a Latin genitive plural of apor, derived from North-British speech. The 'lake of river mouths' was upper Loch

Also at another time, while the saint was staying for some days beside the lake Cei [Lough Key], his companions wished to go fishing ; and he delayed them, saying : ' Today and tomorrow not one fish will be found in the river. On the third day I will send you, and you shall find two great river salmon caught in the net '. So after two days they cast their net and found in the river that is called Bo [Boyle], and drew to land, those two salmon of most exceptional size. And for them the saint and his companions rendered very great thanks to God.

In these two above-mentioned catches of fish there appears the power of miracle, with prophetic fore-knowledge also accompanying it.

[II 20] Concerning Nesan the Crooked, who lived in the district [Lochaber] that borders
upon the lake of river-mouths

This Nesan, when he was very poor, once joyfully received the holy man as a guest. After Nesan had provided for him hospitably according to his means for the space of one night, the saint inquired of him how many cows he had. He said : ' Five '. Thereupon the saint said: 'Bring them to me, so that I may bless them'. They were brought, and the saint raising his holy hand blessed them, and said: 'From this day, your small number of five little cows will increase up to one hundred and five cows'. And because this Nesan was a layman, with wife and children, the blessed man gave him this further benediction also, saying: 'Your seed will be blessed in your sons and grandsons'. All these things were completely fulfilled in accordance with the saint's word, without any diminution.

Linnhe, an Linne Dhubh, and the district named by Adomnan extended to that arm of the sea ; as does the modern district of Lochaber. Cf. Watson 1926, pp. 78-9.

But concerning a certain very niggardly rich man, Vigenus by name, who had slighted Saint Columba, and did not receive him as a guest, he pronounced on the contrary this prophetic doom: 'The riches of that greedy man, who has spurned Christ in pilgrim guests, will from this day be gradually diminished, and will be reduced to nothing. And he himself will be a beggar, and his son will run from house to house with a half-empty bag. And he will die, struck with an axe by one of his enemies, in the trench of a threshing-floor'.

All these things concerning each were completely fulfilled according to the prophecy of the holy man.

Colman, then a poor man, the saint (as has been related above in the case of Nesan) questioned his lay host in the early morning about the nature and amount of his property. Thus questioned, he replied: 'I have but five little cows; if you bless them, they will become more'. He brought them immediately at the command of the saint, who, just as has been told above of the five little cows of Nesan, blessed likewise the five little cows of this Colman also, and said: 'God granting it, you shall have a hundred and five cows. And there will be a blessing of fruitfulness upon your sons and grandsons'.

All these things were very completely fulfilled according to the prophecy of the blessed man, in Colman's fields and cattle, and in his descendants. And in a strange manner, when the number fixed by the saint for either of those men had reached the total of a hundred and five cows, it could not be increased by any means. For those beasts that surpassed the above predetermined number were carried off by various mischances and nowhere seen again; except any one that could be devoted either to the own needs of the household, or else to the use of charity.

In this story, as in the others, a miracle of power, together with prophecy, is clearly shown. For in the great increase of cows, the power of blessing appears equally with that of prayer; and in the predetermination of the number, prophetic foreknowledge.

[II 22] Concerning the destruction of evil-doers who had scorned the saint

The venerable man greatly loved the above-named Colman, whom the power of his blessing raised from poverty to wealth; for Colman rendered him many pious services. There was at that time a certain man, sprung from the royal family of Gabran; an evil-doer, an oppressor of good men, by name Ioan, son of Conall, son of Domnall. He oppressed the aforesaid Colman, Saint Columba's friend, and acting as an enemy had sacked his house, carrying off all that he found there, not once, but twice. So it happened not undeservedly to this evil man that on the third occasion, after his third plundering of the same house, when, with his associates, he was returning, laden with booty, to his ship, he encountered the blessed man, whom he had scorned as being very far away, approaching very near. When the saint rebuked him for his misdeeds, and entreated him to put down the booty, he remained unyielding and obstinate, and scorned the saint; and entering his ship with the booty he scoffed at the blessed man, and mocked him. The saint followed him down to the sea, and entering knee-deep the glassy waters of the ocean

he raised both hands to heaven, and earnestly prayed to Christ, who glorifies his chosen ones that glorify him.

That harbour in which for a little while he stood praying to the Lord, after the persecutor's departure, is in the place that is called in Irish Aithchambas Art-muirchol. Then after finishing his prayer the saint returned to dry land, and sat with his companions on higher ground; and in that hour he spoke to them very terrible words, saying: 'This wretched mortal, who has despised Christ in his servants, will never return to the harbour from which as you saw he has lately departed; and neither will he reach with his fellow evil-doers the other lands for which he makes his course, for he will be overtaken by sudden death. This day very soon, you shall see, a violent squall, hurled from a cloud that rises in the north, will sink him with his company; and not even one of them will survive to tell the story'.

After an interval of some little time, the day being very calm, behold, as the saint had said, a cloud arose from the sea, and was released with great clamour of wind; and finding the robber with his booty between the islands Male [Mull] and Colossus [Coll], it suddenly raised a storm in the middle of the sea and sank him. And in accordance with the saint's word not even one escaped of those that were in the vessel. And in a marvellous manner, while all the sea remained calm

[II 23] Of a certain Feradach,
carried off by sudden death

Also at another time, the holy man committed an exile, Tarain by name, of a noble family of the Picts, to the protection of a certain Feradach, a rich man, who lived in the island of Ile [Islay]; earnestly requiring that Tarain should for some months live in Feradach's retinue, as one of his friends. When he had received him from the hand of the holy man, commended with this commendation, after a few days Feradach acted treacherously and, by a cruel order, caused him to be slain. When this monstrous crime was reported to the saint by travellers, he thus declared in reply: ' That unhappy being has lied not to me, but to God; his name will be removed from the book of life. Now in the midsummer season we pronounce these words, but in the autumn season, before he can taste pigs' flesh fattened on the fruit of trees, he will be overtaken by sudden death and carried off to the infernal regions '.

When this prophecy of the holy man was reported to the wretched mortal, he scorned the saint and mocked

him. After some days of the autumn months, a sow fattened on kernels of nuts was slaughtered by his command, before any of his other pigs had been killed. And he ordered that the sow should be quickly disembowelled, and that part of it should at once be broiled for him on a spit; so that the rash fellow, by tasting of it in advance, might confound the blessed man's prophecy. When the part had been broiled, he asked for a morsel to be given him to taste. Before he could bring to his mouth the hand that he had stretched out to receive the morsel, he expired, and fell dead on his back. And those that saw, and those that heard, trembled greatly, marvelled, and glorified Christ, honouring him in his holy prophet.

to kill the¹ saint. In order to prevent this, one of the monks, by name Findlugan, wearing the holy man's cowl, came between, ready to die for him. But miraculously that garment of the blessed man, like a coat of well-fortified and impenetrable armour, could not be pierced even by a strong man's powerful thrust of a very sharp spear, but remained uninjured; and the man that was clad in it was shielded by that covering from hurt or harm. But the miscreant, who [was called] Right Hand, withdrew, believing that the spear had transfixed the holy man.

When a whole year had passed from that day, and the saint was in the island of Io, he said: 'A year has been completed to this day from the day on which Lám Dess did his best to kill Findlugan in my place. But in this hour, as I believe, he is himself being killed'. And in accordance with the revelation of the saint, at the same moment this happened in the island that in Latin may be called 'long'. In a fight that took place there this Lám Dess alone of the men on either side perished, pierced by the javelin of Cronan, Baitan's son (thrown, it is said, in the name of Saint Columba). And after his death, the men stopped fighting.

[II 25] Concerning yet another
oppressor of innocents

While the blessed man, still a young deacon, was living in the region of the Lagingin, studying divine wisdom, it happened one day that a certain cruel man, a pitiless ! oppressor of the innocent, was pursuing a young girl, who fled upon the level surface of the plain. When by chance she saw the aforesaid young deacon's master, the aged Gemman, reading on the plain, she ran straight to him for protection with all the speed she could. Alarmed by this sudden happening he called to him Columba, who was reading at a little distance, so that together they might to the extent of their power defend the girl from her pursuer. But as soon as the man came near, showing them no reverence he killed the girl with a spear, under their robes. And he left her lying dead upon their feet, and turning away began to depart.

Then the old man in great distress of mind turned to Columba, and said : ' For how long, holy boy, Columba, will God, the just judge, suffer this crime, and our dishonour, to go unavenged ? ' Thereupon the saint pronounced this sentence upon the miscreant : ' In the same hour in which the soul of the girl whom he has slain ascends to heaven, let the soul of the slayer descend to hell'. And more quickly than speech, with that word, like Ananias before Peter, so also before the eyes of the holy youth that killer of innocents fell dead on the spot. The fame of this sudden and dreadful vengeance was immediately spread abroad throughout many provinces of Ireland, with wonderful renown of the holy deacon.

Let it suffice to have told so much of terrible vengeance upon enemies. Now we shall tell some few things about animals.

[II 26]

At another time, when the blessed man was for some days in the island of Sci [Skye], being alone for the sake of prayer, and separated from the brothers by a considerable distance, he entered a dense wood, and encountered a boar of remarkable size, which was being pursued by hunting-dogs. The saint saw it a little way off, and stood still, regarding it. Then he raised his holy hand, with invocation of the name of God, and praying intently said to the boar: 'You will approach no further; in the place to which you have now come, die'. When these words of the saint rang out in the wood, not only was the wild beast unable to advance further, but before Columba's face it immediately fell, slain by the power of his terrible word.

[II 27] Concerning a certain water beast driven away by the power of the blessed man's prayer

Also at another time, when the blessed man was for * * * a number of days in the province of the Picts, he had to cross the river Nes [Ness]. When he reached its bank,
he saw a poor fellow being buried by other inhabitants;
and the buriers said that, while swimming not long before, he had been seized and most savagely bitten by a water beast. Some men, going to his rescue in a wooden boat, though too late, had put out hooks and caught hold of his wretched corpse. When the blessed man heard this, he ordered notwithstanding that one of his companions should swim out and bring back to him, by sailing, a boat that stood on the opposite bank.
Hearing this order of the holy and memorable man, Lugne mocu-Min obeyed without delay, and putting off his clothes, excepting his tunic, plunged into the water. But the monster, whose appetite had earlier been not so much sated as whetted for prey, lurked
in the depth of the river. Feeling the water above disturbed by Lugne's swimming, it suddenly swam up to the surface, and with gaping mouth and with great roaring rushed towards the man swimming in the middle of the stream. While all that were there, barbarians and even the brothers, were struck down with extreme terror, the blessed man, who was watching, raised his holy hand and drew the saving sign of the cross in the empty air; and then, invoking the name of God, he commanded the savage beast, and said: 'You will go no further. Do not touch the man; turn backward speedily'. Then, hearing this command of the saint, the beast, as if pulled back with ropes, fled terrified in swift retreat; although it had before approached so close to Lugne as he swam that there was no more than the length of one short pole between man and beast.

Then, seeing that the beast had withdrawn and that their fellow-soldier Lugne had returned to them unharmed and safe, in the boat, the brothers with great amazement glorified God in the blessed man. And also the pagan barbarians who were there at the time, impelled by the magnitude of this miracle that they themselves had seen, magnified the God of the Christians.

to visit the brothers who were engaged upon the building of stone enclosures in the little western plain of the island of Io. After addressing some words of comfort to them, the saint, standing on higher ground, prophesied thus, saying: 'My sons, I know that from this day forward you will never more be able to see my face within this little plain'. When he saw that they were greatly saddened by hearing this, he tried to comfort them as far as might be, and raising both his holy hands he blessed all this island of ours, and said: 'From this moment of this hour, all poisons of snakes shall be powerless to harm men or cattle in the lands of this island, so long as the inhabitants of that dwelling-place shall observe the commandments of Christ'.

[II 29] Concerning a dagger blessed by the saint with the sign of the Lord's cross

At another time, a brother, by name Mo-lua descendant of Briún, came to the saint at a time when he was writing, and said to him: 'Please bless this implement that I have in my hand'. Columba held out his holy hand a little way, made with his pen a sign of the cross, and gave the blessing, while his face was turned towards the book from which he was copying. And when the aforesaid brother went away with the implement that had been blessed, the saint asked:

'What implement have I blessed for the brother?' Diormit, his devoted attendant, said: 'You have blessed a dagger for the killing of bulls or cows'. But he said in reply: 'I trust in my Lord that the implement I have blessed will not hurt either man or beast'.

This word of the saint was proved in that same hour to be very well founded. For the brother went outside the rampart of the monastery, intending to kill a cow, and thrusting strongly made three serious attempts, yet was unable even to pierce its skin. When they knew of this, skilled monks softened the metal of that dagger in a hot fire, and distributed it, melted, by overlaying* it upon all the iron tools of the monastery; and after that, the tools were not able to wound any flesh, because the efficacy of that blessing of the saint continued.

[II 30] Of the healing of Diormit, when he was sick

At another time, Diormit, the saint's devoted attendant, was mortally sick. The saint went to visit him when he was at the point of death, invoked the name of Christ, and, standing by the bedside of the sick man, prayed for him, and said: 'My Lord, I beseech thee, hear my prayer; and while I live take not away from the habitation of this flesh the soul of my devoted servant'. This supplication of the saint was heard ; for immediately after his acceptable prayer, Diormit recovered his full health. Also he survived for many years after the saint's departure to the Lord.

[II 31] Concerning the healing of Finten,
Aid's son, at the point of death

Also at another time, when the saint was making a journey across the spine of Britain, one of his companions, a young man, by name Finten, was attacked by sudden illness and brought to the point of death. His fellow-soldiers sorrowfully implored the saint to pray for him. The saint at once took pity upon them, and spread his holy hands to heaven, with earnest prayer, blessed the sick youth, and said : ' This boy for whom you plead will live a long life ; and after the death of all of us who are here, will survive us, dying in good old age '.

[II 32] Concerning a boy whom the venerable man raised from death, in the name of Christ the Lord

At the time when Saint Columba passed some days in the province of the Picts, a certain layman with his whole household heard and believed the word of life,
through an interpreter, at the preaching of the holy man; and believing, was baptized, the husband, with his wife and children, and his servants. And after the interval of a few short days, a son of the head of the household was seized by a severe illness, and brought to the boundary of death and life. When the magicians saw that he was dying, they began to taunt his parents,
with great reproach, and to magnify their own gods as the stronger, and to belittle the Christians' God as the weaker.

When all this was reported to the blessed man, he was roused with zeal for God, and went with his companions to the house of the layman, his friend; where the parents were performing the sad funeral rites for the child that had lately died. Seeing that they were in great grief, the saint addressed them with heartening words, encouraging them to have no doubt at all of the divine omnipotence. Thereafter he questioned them, saying: 'In what lodging lies the body of the dead boy?' Then the bereaved father led the saint under the sad roof. And he, leaving all the company outside, immediately entered the sorrowful habitation alone; and there at once he knelt, and, his face suffused

with tears, prayed to Christ the Lord. Rising from his knees he turned his eyes to the dead boy, and said: 'In the name of the Lord Jesus Christ be restored to life, and stand upon thy feet'. With these glorious words of the saint, the soul returned to the body; and the dead boy opened his eyes, and lived again. The apostolic man took his hand and raised him, and steadying him on his feet led him out from the house, and committed him, alive again, to his parents. Then a shout of the people arose, mourning was turned into rejoicing, the God of the Christians was glorified.

Let this miracle of power, in the raising of the dead, be attributed to our Columba, in common with the prophets Elijah and Elisha; and a like share of honour with the apostles Peter and Paul and John; and a glorious eternal place in the heavenly land, among both the companies, namely of prophets and apostles, as a man prophetic and apostolic: with Christ, who reigns with the Father in the unity of the Holy Spirit, through all the ages of the ages.

when Broichan, with unyielding and obstinate heart, retained her, the saint addressing him spoke in this manner : ' Know this, Broichan, know that if you will not release for me this pilgrim captive before I depart from this province, you shall presently die '. This he said before king Brude ; and he left the king's house, and came to the river Nes [Ness]. From that river he took a white stone, and said to his companions : ' Mark this white stone. Through it the Lord will work many cures of the sick among this heathen people '. And after pronouncing these words he continued : ' Now Broichan has received a hard blow. For an angel sent from heaven has struck him heavily, and broken into many pieces in his hand the glass vessel from which he was drinking, and has left him breathing with difficulty, and near to death. Let us wait a little in this place for two messengers of the king, sent to us in haste, to obtain our immediate help for the dying Broichan. Now Broichan, terribly stricken, is ready to release the slave-girl '.

the cup, the magician's seizure, the intended release of the slave-girl. And they added this: 'The king and the persons of his household have sent us to you, to obtain your help for his foster-father Broichan, who⁷ is near death'.

When he heard these words of the envoys, the saint sent two out of the number of his companions to the king, with the stone that he had blessed, and said: 'If first Broichan promises that he will release the slave-girl, then let this small stone be dipped in water, and let him drink thereof, and he will at once recover health. But if he refuses, and opposes the slave-girl's release, he will immediately die'.

The two emissaries went to the king's castle, in obedience to the saint's instructions, and repeated to the king the words of the venerable man. When these things had been made known to the king and to Broichan his foster-father, they were very much afraid. And in the same hour the slave-girl, set free, was handed over to the envoys of the holy man. The stone was dipped in water; and, in a marvellous manner, contrary to nature the stone floated in the water, as though it had been an apple or a nut. And the blessing of the holy man could not be submerged. After he had drunk of the floating stone, Broichan immediately returned from the brink of death, and recovered full bodily health.

This stone was afterwards kept among the king's treasures. When it was dipped thus in water, and floated, it effected by the Lord's mercy many cures of diseases among the people. Strange to say, when it was sought by sick people whose time had come, the stone could by no means be found. So also it was looked for on the day of king Brude's death, and it was not found in the place where it had formerly been kept.

[II 34] Of the blessed man's resistance to the magician Broichan; and of contrary wind

After the events recorded above, one day Broichan, addressing the holy man, said: 'Tell me, Columba, when do you intend to sail?' The saint said: 'We propose, God willing and life lasting, to begin our voyage on the day after tomorrow'. Broichan, on the contrary, said: 'You will not have the power; for I have power to raise an adverse wind against you, and to bring up a mist of darkness'. The saint said: 'The omnipotence of God rules all things, and in his name, under his guidance, all our movements are directed'. Why say more? On the appointed day as he had intended the saint came to the long lake of the river Nes [Ness], followed by a large crowd. Then the magicians began to exult, because they saw a great mist brought up, and a stormy adverse wind.

It is not strange that, with God's permission, these things can at times be done by the art of demons, so that even winds and waves can be roused to violence.

In Adomnan's preceding account of Broichan's threat of storm, and in the following account of Columba's voyage, Adomnan uses a few words (e.g. caligo) taken from, or suggested by, Constantius. The relevant passage of Constantius is quoted in Reeves 1857, p. 149, and partly in Brüning 1917, p. 252.

Thus did hosts of evil spirits once attack the holy bishop Germanus in the midst of the sea, when he was sailing from the bay of Gaul to Britain, in the cause of man's salvation. They put perils in his way, and stirred up storms; they covered sky and daylight with a mist of darkness. But more quickly than speech, at the prayer of Saint Germanus all these things were calmed, and ceased. And the mist was cleared away.

So our Columba, seeing that the elements were being roused to fury against him, called upon Christ the Lord. He entered the boat, and while the sailors hesitated, he himself, more steadfast, ordered the sail to be raised against the wind. When this was done, and with the whole crowd looking on, the ship moved with extraordinary speed, sailing against the contrary wind. And after but a short space of time, to the astonishment of all, the adverse winds were turned about, to serve the voyage. So throughout that day, driven by gentle breezes blowing favourably, the blessed man's boat was carried to the desired harbour.

Let the reader reflect how great and of what nature was the venerable man, in whom almighty God made manifest to the heathen people the glory of his name through those signs of miraculous power described above.

⁶ portas. This act is attributed to royal pride, rather than to the king's antagonism to Christianity (cf. p. 85). It belongs to the legend that was expanded in the Life of Comgell (see p. 22).

[II 35] Concerning the sudden spontaneous
opening of the gate of the royal fortress

At another time, that is on the saint's first tiring expedition to king Brude, it happened that the king, uplifted with royal pride, acted haughtily, and did not open the gate of his fortress at the first arrival of the blessed man. When the man of God learned this, he went with his companions up to the doors of the gate, and first imprinting the sign of the Lord's cross upon the doors, he then knocked, and laid his hand upon them. And immediately the bars were forcibly drawn back, and the doors opened of themselves with all speed. As soon as they were open, the saint entered with his associates.

Learning this, the king with his council was much alarmed, and left the house, and went to meet the blessed man with reverence; and addressed him very pleasantly, with words of peace. And from that day onwards, throughout the rest of his life, that ruler greatly honoured the holy and venerable man, as was fitting, with high esteem.

who had invited him. But it happened by some chance that when he came to the church its keys were not found. The saint heard the others lamenting among themselves, that the keys were still missing, and that the doors were barred ; and he himself, going to the doorway, said : ' The Lord has power to open his house for his servants, even without keys '.

Then at this saying, with a vigorous motion the bolts were suddenly drawn back, the door opened of its own accord, and, while every one marvelled, the saint entered the church, first of them all. And he was hospitably entertained by the brothers, and was revered by them all with honour.

[II 37] Of a certain beggarly layman, for whom the saint made a stake and blessed it for the killing of wild animals

At another time, a certain layman came to the saint, a very poor man, who dwelt in that district [Lochaber] that borders upon the shores of the lake of river-mouths. Pitying this wretched man, who had not the means to feed his wife and children, the blessed man bestowed upon him, when he asked, such alms as he could give, and said : ' My poor fellow, take from the forest near by a stick of wood, and bring it to me quickly '. The poor man obeyed, and fetched the wood according to the saint's command. The saint took it, and shaped it into a spike. Sharpening this with his own hands, and blessing it, he bestowed it upon the needy man, and said : ' Keep this spike carefully. It will, I believe, have power to hurt neither man nor any cattle, but only wild animals, and also fish. And so long as you have this stake, there will never be wanting in your house an abundant supply of venison to eat '.

Hearing this, the wretched beggar returned home, rejoicing greatly. He set up the spike in an out-of-the-way part of the district, frequented by wild creatures. * And when the next night had passed, in the early morning he went to visit the spike again, and found that a stag of marvellous size had fallen transfixed upon it.

Why say more ? As we are told, no day could pass without his finding that a stag or a hind, or some other creature, had fallen upon the spike he had fixed up. Also when the house was completely filled with the carcasses of wild animals, he sold to neighbours the excess that the hospitality of his house could not use. But the malice of the devil reached this wretched man, as it did Adam, through his wife. She, not like a wise woman but as a fool, spoke to her husband thus : ' Take up the spike from the ground. For if people, or if cattle, should perish upon it, you yourself and I, with our children, will either be put to death, or be led into slavery '. To this the husband replied : ' That will not happen ; for the holy man said, when he blessed the stake for me, that it will never hurt people, or cattle '.

After these words the beggar, yielding to his wife, went, and lifting the spike from the ground placed it, as if he loved the thing, inside the house, beside the wall. And before long his house-dog fell on it and was killed. When the dog died, the wife said again : ' One of your children will fall upon the stake, and be killed '. Hearing her say this, the husband removed the spike from the wall, and carried it back to the forest, fixing it in a very dense thorn-brake, where, as he thought, no living thing could stumble upon it. But returning on the following day, he found that a she-goat had fallen upon it and been killed. He removed the spike again from there, and fixed it in the river that in Latin may be called ' black goddess ' [Lochy], hiding it near the bank, under the water. When he went back to it next day, he found a salmon of marvellous size impaled and held fast upon it. When he lifted the salmon out of the river he was hardly able to carry it home by himself. He carried the spike back with him from the water at the same time, and fixed it in a high place on the outside of the roof. And on it a raven also, falling from rapid flight, was pierced through, and perished. After that, the wretched man, led astray by the advice of his foolish wife, lifted the spike down from the roof, took an axe, chopped the spike into many small pieces, and threw them into a fire. And afterwards he began *

But that alleviation, the relief of his want, was dependent upon the spike often mentioned above; which if it had been preserved could have supplied the place of snares and nets, and every kind of hunting and fishing, since it was endowed with the blessing of the holy man; but which, when lost, the wretched layman who had for a time been enriched by it bewailed thenceforward, although too late, himself with his whole family, during all the remaining days of his life.

At another time, the blessed man's emissary, by name Lugaid, surnamed Laitir, planning to sail to Ireland as he was bidden, looked for and found among the sea-going equipment of the saint's ship a milk-skin,* and placed it in the sea, to soften, heaping some fairly large stones upon it. And he went to the saint, and told him what he had done with the skin. not be able to have it as my companion in the ship?' The saint said: 'Tomorrow you shall know what the event will disclose'.

So Lugaid went early on the following day to recover the skin from the sea. But the ebb-tide had carried it off in the night. Not finding it, he returned sadly to the saint. He knelt upon the ground and confessed his negligence. The saint said to him reassuringly: 'Do not grieve, brother, over things that perish. The skin that the ebbing tide has carried away, the flowing tide will bring back to its place after you have gone'.

On the same day, after Lugaid's departure from the island of Io, and when the hour of none was ended, the saint spoke thus to those that stood about him, and said: 'Now one of you go to the sea: the skin that Lugaid lamented, and that the ebb-tide had removed, the flood-tide has now brought back and restored to the place from which it had been taken away'. Hearing these words of the saint, one active lad ran to the sea-shore, and raced back carrying the skin, which he had found as the saint had foretold; and he joyfully handed it over in the presence of the saint, while all who were there marvelled.

[II 39] Prophecy of the holy man
concerning Libran of the reed-plot

At another time when the holy man lived in the island of Io, a certain layman who had recently put on clerical dress sailed across from Ireland, and came to the island monastery of the blessed man. Next day the saint found him sitting alone as a guest in the hospice. The saint first asked him about his country, his family, and the cause of his journey; and he declared that he was a native of the district of the Connachta, and that he had made the long laborious journey on purpose to expiate his sins in pilgrimage.

When, in order to make trial of the nature of his penitence, the saint had exposed to his view the hard and heavy discipline of monastic life, he then said to the saint in reply: 'I am ready for any commands that you may wish to impose upon me, though they be very hard, though they be humiliating'.

To be brief, in that hour he confessed all his sins; and promised, kneeling on the ground, that he would perform all that the laws of penance required. The saint said to him: 'Rise, and sit'; and when he was seated, then addressed him thus: 'You are required

Sed post aliquot dies in servitute peractos, servire homini dedignatus et deo potius obsecundare mallens, desertor illius carnalis domini juramentum infringens decessi⁷; et ad te domino meum prosperante iter perveni'.

88b Ad haec sanctus virum⁸ pro talibus valde angustatus videns sicuti prius profetans profatur, inquit: 'Post septennorum sicut tibi dictum est expletionem annorum, diebus ad me huc quadragesimalibus⁹ venies, ut in paschali sollemnitate ad altarium accedas, | et eucharistiam sumas'.

to complete a penance of seven years, in the land of Eth [Tiree]. We shall live, I and you, God granting it, until you complete the number of seven years'.

Encouraged by these words of the saint, he rendered thanks to God, and said to the saint: 'What must I do with regard to a false oath that I gave? For while I lived in my native land I killed a man. After he was killed, I was held in chains, as one condemned. But a very wealthy relative, of the same kindred, coming to my assistance, opportunely released me, a prisoner, from chains, and rescued me, a condemned man, from death. After my release I promised to him with a binding oath* that I would serve him during all the days of my life. But after some days passed in servitude, disdainful to be a servant of man, and choosing rather to obey God, I broke my oath, and departed, deserting that earthly master. And with the Lord's favour on my journey, I have come to you'.

Seeing that the man was greatly distressed about these things, the saint, as before, spoke prophetically in reply, saying: 'After the completion of the seven years of which you have been told, you will come to me here, throughout the days of Lent, so that in the celebration of Easter you may approach the altar, and receive the Eucharist'.

Why linger over words? The pilgrim penitent obeyed the orders of the holy man in everything. He was sent within those days to the monastery of the plain of Long; and completed there seven full years of penance. In accordance with the saint's former prophetic command, he returned to him for the days of Lent; and after the celebration of Easter had been completed, in which as he was bidden he had approached the altar, he went to the saint, and questioned him about the above-mentioned oath. To his question the saint prophesying made this reply: 'Your earthly lord, of whom you once told me, is alive; and your father, and mother, and brothers, still live. Now therefore you must prepare yourself for a voyage'. With these words he held out a sword decorated with shaped pieces of ivory, saying: 'Take this, to carry with you as a gift that you will offer to your lord for your redemption; but yet he will by no means accept it. For he has a virtuous wife, and yielding to her sound advice he will on that day grant you liberty, freely and without recompense, unloosing according to custom the captive's belt from your loins. But when your mind has been relieved from this anxiety, you will not escape another responsibility arising at your side; for your brothers will together constrain you to make good the filial service that you have for so long owed to your father, and have neglected. But obey their will without hesitation, and receive your aged father into your dutiful care. And although that charge may seem to you

Post haec verba supra memoratus frater, Libranus nomine, accepto munere sancti ditatus benedictione perrexit; et ad patriam perveniens omnia secundum sancti vaticinium invenit vere probata. Nam statim ut pretium suae offerens libertatis ostendit domino accipere volenti, refragans uxor: 'Ut quid nobis' ait, 'hoc accipere quod sanctus pretium misit Columba? Hoc non sumus digni. burdensome, you need not be disheartened, since you will lay it down soon. For on one day you will begin to wait upon your father, and on another at the end of the same week he will have died, and you will bury him. After your father's burial, your brothers will again urge you sharply to pay also the services of filial duty that are owed to your mother. But from that obligation your younger brother will in fact release you, for he will be ready to render in your place all the labour of filial duty that you owe, serving your mother on your behalf'.

After these words, the aforesaid brother, namely Libran, went away, taking the gift and enriched with the saint's blessing. And arriving in his native land, he found everything confirmed as the saint had prophesied. As soon as he showed the price of his liberty, offering it to his master, who was willing to receive it, the master's wife refused, saying: 'How can we take this price that Saint Columba has sent? We are not worthy of this. Let this pious servant be released for him without payment. The holy man's blessing will profit us more than this price that is offered'. When the husband heard this salutary counsel of his wife, he immediately released his slave without payment.

Then Libran, in accordance with the prophecy of the saint, was compelled by his brothers and began to serve his father; and on the seventh day, his father being dead, he buried him. After his father was buried, Libran was compelled duly to devote himself to his mother also; but he was released, because his younger brother came to his assistance, as the saint had foretold, and took his place, speaking to the brothers thus: 'We ought by no means to detain our brother in this

After that, relieved from all his troubles, he bade farewell to his mother, and his brothers, and returned a free man, coming to the place that is called in Irish Daire-Calcig [Derry]. There he found a ship under sail, setting out from the harbour, and called from the shore, begging the sailors to take him with them, as a voyager to Britain. But they repelled him, and would not receive him, because they were not of the monks of Saint Columba. Thereupon he spoke to that venerable man, (who although far distant was yet present in spirit, as the event soon showed) and said: 'Does it please you, holy Columba, that these sailors who will not receive me, your associate, are sailing away with full sails and with favourable winds?' As he said this, the wind that had before been in their favour was changed, more quickly than speech, to a contrary wind. Meanwhile, the sailors saw that the same man was running alongside of them, by the river; and suddenly taking counsel together they shouted to him from the ship, saying: 'Perhaps the wind has turned so suddenly against us because we refused to take you with us. And if now we do invite you to join us in the ship, you will be able to change winds that are now against us into winds that are favourable'. Hearing this, the traveller said to them: 'Saint Columba, to whom I am going, and whom I have obeyed for the last seven years, will,

if you take me with you, be able to obtain from his Lord by the power of prayer a wind that will favour you'. When they heard this, they brought the ship to the land, and invited him to join them in it. Immediately on entering the ship, he said: 'In the name of the Almighty whom Saint Columba blamelessly serves, hoist the sail, making taut the ropes'. They did this, and the contrary winds were at once changed to favourable ones, and a prosperous voyage to Britain followed, with full sails.

After their arrival in British land, Libran left that ship, and blessing the sailors made his way to Saint Columba, who was living in the island of Io. The blessed man received him joyfully, and related in full, without being told by any one, all that had happened to Libran on his journey: of the lord, and his wife's salutary counsel; how Libran had been set free, by her persuasion; also of his brothers; of his father's death, and burial after the end of seven days; of his mother, and of the timely help of his younger brother; of the things that happened on his way back; of the wind, contrary and favourable; of the words of the sailors who at first refused to receive him; of the promise of prosperous winds, and the favourable change of wind after he had been received in the ship. tion, the traveller handed over the price of his ransom, which he had received from the saint. In the same hour the saint gave him a name, saying: 'You shall be called Libran, because you are free.'

In those same days this Libran devoutly vowed the monastic vow. And when he was sent back by the holy man to the monastery in which he had formerly served the Lord as a penitent for seven years, he received these prophetic words concerning him, spoken by Columba in farewell: 'You will live for a long life-time, and end this present life in good old age. Nevertheless your resurrection will be not in Britain, but in Ireland'. Hearing these words, Libran bowed his knees and wept bitterly. Seeing that he was very sad, the saint began to comfort him, saying: 'Rise, and do not be grieved. You will die in one of my monasteries; and your part in the Kingdom will be with my elect monks, and with them you will awake from the sleep of death into the resurrection of life'. Much cheered by the great comfort that he had received from the saint, and enriched with the saint's benediction, he went away in peace.

This truthful prophecy of the saint concerning that man was afterwards fulfilled. For when he had served the Lord obediently as a monk in the monastery of the plain of Long for many years after the passing of Saint Columba from the world, he was sent, a very old man, to Ireland, on some monastic business; and as soon as he landed from the ship he went through the plain of Brega, and came to the monastery of the oak plain [Durrow]. There, hospitably received as a guest, he fell ill of a malady; and on the seventh day of his illness he went to the Lord in peace. And he was buried among the elect monks of Saint Columba, according to his prophecy, to rise again into eternal life.

Let it suffice to have written these true prophecies of Saint Columba concerning Libran of the reed-plot. This Libran is called 'of the reed-plot', because for many years he worked in a reed-plot, gathering reeds. *

[II 40] Of a certain young woman who was suffering, as a daughter of Eve, great and very hard pangs of childbirth

One day, while the saint was in the island of Io, he rose quickly from reading, and said with a smile: 'Now I must go in haste to the oratory, to plead with God for a certain woman in distress, who now in Ireland cries out, calling the name of this Columba, while racked by the pangs of a very difficult birth; and hopes that relief from her distress may be granted to her by the Lord through me, for the reason that she is related to me, and has a father born of my mother's kindred'. Saying this, the saint, moved by pity for that young woman, ran to the church, and bending his knees prayed for

After praying he left the oratory, and spoke to brothers who met him, and said : ' Now the Lord Jesus, born of woman, shows favour, and giving timely help to the sufferer has released her from her distress. And she has safely borne a child, and will not die at this time '.

In the same hour, exactly as the saint had prophesied, the poor woman who called upon his name was relieved, and was restored to health. It was so reported afterwards by some people who crossed the sea from Ireland, from the same district in which the woman lived.

[II 41] Concerning a certain Lugne, a pilot, surnamed Tudicla, who lived in the island of Rechru, and whom his wife held in aversion because he was very ugly

At another time, when the holy man was a guest in the island of Rechru [Rathlin], a certain layman came to him and complained regarding his wife, who, as he said, had an aversion to him, and would not allow him to enter into marital relations. Hearing this, the saint bade the wife approach, and began to chide her as well as he could on that account, saying : ' Why, woman, do you attempt to put from you your own flesh ? The Lord says, " Two shall be in one flesh " .

Therefore the flesh of your husband is your flesh'. She replied : 'I am ready to perform all things whatsoever that you may enjoin on me, however burdensome : save one thing, that you do not constrain me to sleep in one bed with Lugneo. I do not refuse to carry on the whole management of the house ; or, if you command it, even to cross the seas, and remain in some monastery of nuns'. Then the saint said : 'What you suggest cannot rightly be done. Since your husband is still alive, you are bound by the law of the husband ; for it is forbidden that that should be separated, which God has lawfully joined'. After saying this, he continued : 'On this day let us three, myself, and the husband with his wife, pray to the Lord, fasting'. Then she said : 'I know it will not be impossible that things appearing difficult or even impossible may be granted by God to you, when you ask for them'.

In short, the wife agreed to fast on the same day, and the husband also, with the saint. And on the night following, in sleep, the saint prayed for them. On the next day the saint thus addressed the wife, in the presence of her husband : 'Woman, are you today, as you said yesterday, ready to depart to a monastery of nuns?' She said : 'I know now that your prayer concerning me has been heard by God. For him whom I loathed yesterday I love today. In this past night,

[II 42] The blessed man's prophecy concerning the voyage of Cormac, grandson of Léthan

At another time, Cormac, a soldier of Christ, of whom we have briefly related some few things in the first book of this work, attempted for the second time to seek a desert place in the ocean. After he had sailed away from the land, with full sails, over the limitless ocean, in those same days Saint Columba, while he was beyond the spine of Britain, charged king Brude, in the presence of the subject-king of the Orcades, saying: 'Some of our people have recently gone out desiring to find a desert place in the sea that cannot be crossed. Earnestly charge this king, whose hostages are in your hand, that, if after long wanderings our people chance to land in the islands of the Orcades, nothing untoward shall happen to them within his territories'. The saint spoke thus because he foreknew in the spirit that after some months this Cormac would come to the Orcades. And it did afterwards so happen. And because of the aforesaid commendation of the holy man, Cormac was delivered from imminent death in the Orcades.

After an interval of a few months, when the saint was living in the island of Io, one day in his presence men who were conversing together suddenly made mention of Cormac, and spoke in this manner: 'How Cormac's voyage has fared, whether it is successful or not, is still unknown'. Hearing them talk thus, the saint uttered these words, saying: 'You speak of Cormac; today quite soon you will see him arrive'. And after the interval of about one hour, strange to tell, behold, Cormac appearing unexpectedly entered the oratory; and all were amazed and rendered thanks.

Since we have briefly inserted the prophecy of the blessed man concerning the second voyage of this Cormac, we must now write down also some words showing his prophetic knowledge likewise of the third.

While Cormac was labouring for the third time in the sea of Ocean, he came into dangers that nearly caused his death. When his ship, blown by the south wind, had driven with full sails in a straight course from land towards the region of the northern sky, for fourteen summer days and as many nights, such a voyage appeared to be beyond the range of human exploration,⁷ and one from which there could be no return. And so it happened, after the tenth hour of the fourteenth day, that there arose all around them almost overwhelming and very dreadful objects of terror; for they were met by loathsome and exceedingly dangerous small creatures covering the sea, such as had never been seen before that time; and these struck with terrible impact the bottom and sides, the stern and prow, with so strong a thrust that they were thought able to pierce and penetrate the skin-covering of the ship. As those that were present there related afterwards, these creatures were about the size of frogs, very injurious by reason of their stings, but they did not fly, they swam. And moreover they damaged the blades of the oars. Seeing these with the other prodigies, which this is not the time to recount, Cormac and his fellow-sailors were in great alarm and terror, and with tears prayed to God, who is a true and ready helper in times of need.

At that same hour, our Saint Columba also, though far distant in body, was nevertheless in spirit present with Cormac in the ship. So in that moment, calling the brothers together to the oratory with the sound of the bell, and entering the church, he spoke thus prophetically according to his custom to those that were standing by, and said: 'Brothers, pray with your whole might for Cormac, who now in his voyage has far exceeded the bounds of human travel. Now he endures the terrors of certain horrible and monstrous things never before seen, and almost indescribable. In our minds, therefore, we must share the sufferings of our brothers, our fellow-members, who are placed in unendurable danger; and we must pray to the Lord with them. For now behold Cormac, copiously watering his face with tears, prays earnestly with his sailors to Christ, and let us help him in praying, that Christ may take pity upon us, and may turn into a north wind the south wind that has blown for fourteen days, until today; so that this northerly wind may bring Cormac's ship out of its dangers⁷.

After saying this, he bent his knees before the altar, and in a tearful voice prayed to the omnipotence of God, which controls the winds and all things. After praying, he rose quickly, and wiping away the tears joyfully rendered thanks to God, saying: 'Now, brothers, we may congratulate our friends for whom we are praying, because the Lord will now change the south into a [north] wind bringing our fellow-members back from their dangers, and will lead them here to us again'. And simultaneously with his words, the south wind ceased, and the north wind blew for many days afterwards. Cormac's ship was brought back to land, and Cormac came to Saint Columba; and God grant-^{*}ing it they saw each other face to face, to the great wonder of all, and with uncommon rejoicing.

Let the reader therefore consider how great and of what nature was this blessed man, who had such prophetic knowledge, and by invoking the name of Christ was able to command the winds and the ocean.

[II 43] Concerning the venerable man's riding in a carriage without the security of lynch-pins

At another time, when the saint was living for some days in Ireland, compelled by ecclesiastical affairs he entered a carriage that had previously been blessed by him, and that had been yoked, but by some unknown
negligence without the necessary bolts having first been inserted through holes in the ends of the axle-tree.
It was Colman, Echuid's son, a holy man, the founder of the monastery that is called in the Irish language
Snám luthir [Slanore], who on that day acted as driver in the carriage with Saint Columba. The day's driving over the long distances they travelled did not cause any separation of the wheels from the axle-shoulders, or any* slackening, although, as has been said above, the wheels
were held on by no retaining or securing bolts ; God's grace alone so preserving the venerable man that the carriage in which he sat followed a true course, safely
and without any hindrance.

Let it suffice to have written thus far about the miracles of power which the divine omnipotence performed through the memorable man, while he continued in the present life. Now a few must also be recorded of those that are proved to have been granted by the Lord
to him, after his passing from the flesh.

[II 44] Concerning rain that fell upon thirsty
land after some months of drought, the Lord granting it in honour of the blessed man. [The miracle that now with God's favour we are about to describe was performed in our time,
and we have seen it with our own eyes.]

For indeed about seventeen years ago, in the season of spring, there was a very great drought, persistent and severe, in these lifeless fields; to such an extent that the peoples seemed to be threatened by the Lord's curse laid upon transgressors, where he says, in the book of Leviticus: 'I will give to you a sky above like iron, and earth like bronze. Your labour shall be spent in vain. The earth shall yield no produce, nor shall the trees give fruit', and so forth.

Reading this, and in dread of the impending stroke,
we formed a plan, and decided upon this course: that some of our elders should go round the plain that had been lately ploughed and sown, taking with them the white tunic of Saint Columba, and books in his own handwriting; and should three times raise and shake in the air that tunic, which he wore in the hour of his departure from the flesh; and should open his books and read from them, on the hill of the angels, where at one time the citizens of the heavenly country were seen descending to confer with the holy man.

After all these things had been performed according to the adopted plan, strange to tell, on the same day
the sky, which had been bare of clouds during the previous months, namely March and April, was with marvellous rapidity instantly covered with clouds that rose from the sea ; and there was great rain, falling by day and by night. And the earth, previously parched, was well watered, and produced its crop in season, and a very plentiful harvest in that same year. Thus the commemoration of the name of one blessed man, made with his tunic and books, on that occasion brought saving and timely help to many districts and peoples.

⁶ navis A ; naves B1 B2 B3. See p. 131. Reeves silently altered navis to naves, thus completely changing the meaning of A's sentence. The change of navis to naves in the B texts belongs to the class of grammatical emendations, true or false, that are automatically made by medieval scribes. The translation in E.S., I, p. 187, was made from Reeves's text. But A's reading is grammatical, and gives good sense. It eliminates the former implication that dug-out boats were conveyed to Iona. The expression longa navis was not used to mean a dug-out canoe, but meant a sea-going ship built of wood.

[II 45] Concerning winds that were contrary and that by the virtue of the venerable man's prayers were changed to favourable winds

The credibility of miracles of this kind, that happened in past times and that we have not seen, is confirmed for us beyond doubt by those of the present day, that we ourselves have observed. For indeed we ourselves have thrice seen contrary winds turned into favourable ones.

On the first occasion when dressed timbers of pine and oak for a long ship were being drawn over land, and timbers were being conveyed for the great house, as well as for ships, we adopted the plan of laying garments and books of the blessed man upon the altar, with psalms and fasting, and invocation of his name ; in order that he might obtain from the Lord prosperous winds in our favour. And so it happened, God granting it to that holy man. For on the day on which our sailors had made all ready and intended with boats and curachs to tow the pieces of timber through the* sea, the winds that had been contrary on previous days were suddenly changed to propitious ones. Then with God's favour, attended during the whole day by prosperous breezes, without slackening speed and with full sails throughout the long and devious route, that whole sea-transport came safely to the island of Io.

On the second occasion, some years later, when twelve curachs had been collected, and other oak timbers
 were being towed by us from the mouth of the river
 Sale, for the restoration of our monastery, one day, while in still weather the sailors were sweeping the sea
 with their oars, suddenly the wind Favonius, which is* also called Zephyrus, arose against us. We turned aside then to the nearest island, which is called in Irish 'of Airthraig', seeking in it a harbour in which we could remain. But meanwhile we complained about the inconvenience of this contrary wind, and began in a manner as it were to upbraid our Columba, saying:
 'Is this hindrance that opposes us pleasing to you, holy one? Till now, we have expected some consolation of help in our labours to be given by you, with God's favour, since we imagined that you were in somewhat high honour with God'.

A short space, as it were of one moment, after we had spoken, behold, the contrary wind Favonius mar-

¹ ulturnusque A; vult- B₁ B₂ B₃. Favonius was the west wind. Vulturinus usually meant a wind blowing from 30° (more or less) east of south; a wind that in modern sailing might have served to take a boat from Shona to Iona, but hardly in Adomnan's time, and with logs in tow. Adomnan used the word Vulturinus differently. Cf. his De Locis (Geyer 1898, p. 228, and the diagram on p. 231): quatuor . . . ad Vulturinum spectant, qui et Caecias [sic lege; the MSS have lc and lt, misread presumably from an Irish ec] dicitur ventus, alii vero quatuor ad Eurum respiciunt. Here Eurus is 30° (more or less) east of south, and Vulturinus is made 30° (more or less) north of east. A wind from that direction would have been entirely favourable for the voyage from Shona.

vellously fell, and more quickly than speech the favourable Vulturinus blew. Then at our bidding the sailors raised the yards up cross-wise, and the sails, stretching tight the ropes; and rejoicing we were carried by fair and gentle breezes, without any effort, until we reached our island on the same day, and with us all those that had been in the ships, helping us to fetch the wood.

That querulous complaint, light though it was, against the holy man profited us in no small measure. It is clear of how great and high merit in the sight of the Lord is the saint whom he heard in so swift changing of the winds.

So too on the third occasion, in the summer season, after the meeting of the Irish synod, when for several days we were delayed by contrary wind among the people of the tribe of Loern, we came to the island of Saine, and there the night of the festive and solemn day of Saint Columba found us waiting, much saddened, because we desired to spend that joyful day in the island of Io. Therefore again, as before, we complained, saying: 'Does it please you, holy one, that we should pass the day of your festivity tomorrow among laymen and not in your church? In the beginning of such a day it is an easy thing for you to obtain of the Lord that the contrary winds should be turned to favourable ones, and that we should celebrate in your church the solemn rites of masses, on your natal day'.

After that night had passed, we arose in the morning
twilight, and seeing that the contrary winds had ceased
we entered the ships, and, with no wind blowing, put out to sea; and immediately the due south wind, which is also called Notus, rose behind us. Then the sailors exulting raised the sails, and thus with no labour this journey of ours was on that day so rapid and so prosperous, God granting it to the blessed man, that just as we had before desired we arrived at the harbour of the island of Io, after the third hour of the day; and later, after the washing of hands and feet, we entered the church with the brothers, and at the sixth hour we celebrated with them the holy ceremonies of the Mass;
on the festival, I repeat, of the Natal day of the saints Columba and Baithene, in the dawn of which, as was said above, we had sailed out from the island of Saine,
a long distance away.

requires, but a hundred, and more.

of the Alps, and the Spanish provinces, separated by the barrier of the Pyrenean mountain), the islands of the Ocean, namely Ireland and Britain, were twice ravaged throughout by a terrible pestilence, excepting two peoples only, that is the population of Picts, and of Irish in Britain, between which peoples the mountains of the spine of Britain are the boundary. And although neither people is without great sins, by which the Eternal Judge is often provoked to anger, yet until now he has spared both of them, enduring patiently. To whom else can this favour conferred by God be attributed, but to Saint Columba, whose monasteries, placed within the boundaries of both peoples, are down to the present time held in great honour by them both?

But what we are now going to tell is, as we judge, not to be heard without sorrow, that there are in both nations many very foolish people who, not knowing that they have been protected from disease by the prayers of saints, ungratefully abuse God's patience. We, however, give frequent thanks to God, who, through the prayers of our venerable patron on our behalf, has protected us from the invasion of plagues, both in these our islands, and in England, when we visited our friend king Aldfrith, while the pestilence still continued and devastated many villages on all sides. Here begins the third book, of angelic visions.

In the first of these three books, as has been indicated above, some things have with the Lord's assistance been described briefly and in few words concerning prophetic revelations ; in the second book above, concerning miracles of power, which have been manifested through the blessed man, and which, as has been said many times, the grace of prophecy often accompanies ; and in this third book, concerning angelic apparitions, that were revealed to others in relation to the blessed man, or to him in relation to others, and concerning those that were made visible to both, though in unequal measure (that is, to him directly and more fully, and to others indirectly and only in part, that is to say from without and by stealth), but in the same visions, either of angels, or of heavenly light. These disparities of the visions will appear clearly below, written in their places.

Now let us begin to describe these angelic apparitions from the time before the birth of the blessed man.

An angel of the Lord appeared to the mother of the venerable man in a dream, one night between his conception and his birth ; and standing there, gave her, as it seemed, a robe of marvellous beauty, in which there appeared embroidered splendid colours, as it were of

After these words, the woman saw that robe gradually recede from her in flight, grow greater, and surpass the breadth of the plains, and excel in its greater measure the mountains and woods. And she heard a voice that followed, speaking thus: 'Woman, do not grieve, for you will bear to the man to whom you are joined by [the bond] of marriage a son, of such grace that he, as though one of the prophets of God, shall be counted in their number; and he has been predestined by God to be a leader of innumerable souls to the heavenly country'. [III 3] Concerning an apparition of holy angels whom Saint Brenden saw going through the plain in company with the blessed man

After many years had passed, when, on a charge of offences that were trivial and very pardonable, Saint Columba was excommunicated by a certain synod (improperly, as afterwards became known in the end), he came to the assembly that had been convoked against him.

When Saint Brenden (the founder of the monastery that is in Irish called Birra [Birr]) saw him approaching at a little distance, he rose quickly and bowed his face, and he kissed Columba reverently. Some of the elders of that assembly, putting the others aside, remonstrated with Brenden apart, saying: 'Why do you not refuse to rise in the presence of an excommunicated person, and to kiss him?' Then he addressed them thus: 'If you had seen what the Lord has deigned to reveal to me this day, concerning this his chosen one, whom you deprive of honour, you would never have excommunicated him whom God not only does by no means excommunicate, according to your unjust decree, but even more and more greatly magnifies'. They said, on the other hand: 'How, we should like to know, does God exalt, as you say, him whom we have excommunicated, not without cause?' 'I have seen a pillar' Brenden said, 'fiery and very bright, going before that man of God, whom you despise; and holy angels accompanying him on his way, through the plain. Therefore I dare not humiliate this man, whom I see to have been predestined by God to be a leader of nations into life'.

When he had spoken thus, not only did they desist, daring to proceed no farther with the excommunication of the saint, but they even honoured him with great reverence.

This utterance was made in Teiltiu [Teltown].

In those same days, the saint sailed over to Britain, with twelve disciples as his fellow-soldiers.

 ordination of kings. And when the venerable man had received it from the hand of the angel, by the angel's command he began to read it. But when he refused to ordain Aidan as king, according to what was commanded him in the book, because he loved Iogenan, Aidan's brother, more, the angel suddenly stretched out his hand and struck the holy man with a scourge, the livid scar from which remained on his side all the days of his life. And the angel added these words, saying :
 ' Know surely that I am sent to you by God, with the book of glass, in order that, according to what you have read in it, you shall ordain Aidan to the kingship. But * if you refuse to obey this command, I shall strike you again'.

So when this angel of the Lord had appeared on three successive nights with the same book of glass in his hand, and had charged him with the same commands of the Lord, for the ordaining of the same king, the holy man submitted to the word of the Lord. He sailed over to the island of Io, and there, as he had been bidden, he ordained as king Aidan, who arrived about that time. And among the words of the ordination he prophesied future things of Aidan's sons, and grandsons, and great-grandsons. And laying his hand upon Aidan's head he ordained and blessed him.

Cummene the White, in a book that he wrote on the miraculous powers of Saint Columba, spoke to this effect, that Saint Columba began to prophesy of Aidan, and of his descendants, and of their kingdom, saying : ' Believe, O Aidan, and doubt not, that none of your opponents will be able to stand against you until first you practise deceit against me, and against my successors. For this reason therefore do you charge your sons that they also shall charge their sons and grandsons and descendants, not through evil counsels to lose their sceptre of this kingdom from their hands. For at whatever time they shall do evil to me, or to my kindred who are in Ireland, the scourge that I have endured from an angel on your account will be turned by the hand of God to a great disgrace upon them. And the heart of men will be taken from them ; and their enemies will be strongly heartened against them.'

This prophecy has been fulfilled in our times, in the battle of Roth, when Domnall Brecc, Aidan's grandson, without cause *

See the Tallaght Discourse § 65, where Leviticus is named as the authority. Reconsecration by a bishop would have been needed to remove the pollution, and Adomnan seems to assume that there wasted the province of Domnall, Ainmuire's grandson. And they are from that day to this still held down by strangers; which fills the breast with sighs of grief.

[III 6] Concerning an apparition of angels carrying the soul of a holy Briton to heaven

At another time, when the holy man was living in the island of Io, one of his monks, a Briton, devoted to good works, was attacked by a bodily affliction, and brought to the point of death. When the venerable man visited him in the hour of his decease, after standing for a little while beside his couch, and blessing him, he quickly left the house, being unwilling to see him die. And immediately after the holy man had gone away from the house, the monk ended the present life.

Then while the memorable man was walking in the court of his monastery, he turned his eyes to the sky, and was much amazed, and marvelled for a long time. A brother, called Aidan, Liber's son, a man of good ability, and religious, who alone of the brothers was present at that hour, bending his knees began to ask the saint to tell him the cause of so great marvelling. To him the saint replied : ' Now I have seen holy angels at war in the air against the adversary powers. And I render thanks to Christ the arbiter, because the angels have victoriously carried off to the joys of the heavenly

[III 7] Concerning a vision, revealed to the holy man, of angels who were leading to heaven the soul of one Diormit

At another time, an Irish pilgrim, coming to the saint, remained for some months with him in the island of Io. One day, the blessed man said to him : ' Now a cleric, a man of your own province, is being carried to heaven by angels. As yet, I do not know his name '.
The brother, hearing this, began to search his memory regarding the province of the easterners, who are in Irish called ind Airthir, and for the name of that holy man. Then he added these words : ' I know another soldier of Christ, named Diormit, who has constructed for himself a little monastery in the same region in which I also lived '. The saint said to him : ' He of whom you speak is the man who has now been led to paradise by angels of God '.

But this also is to be observed with care, that many secret mysteries, hidden from others, but imparted to him by God, were never allowed by this venerable man to reach the knowledge of men. There were for this two reasons, as he at one time told a few of the brothers; namely, to avoid boasting; and not, through wide-spread reports of his revelations, to invite questioning of himself by intolerable crowds of people who wished to ask some question of him.

[III 8] Concerning a strong combat against demons by angels who in that battle brought timely help to the saint

One day, while the holy man was living his life in the island of Io, he sought in wild places a spot more remote from mankind, and suitable for prayer. And when he had begun to pray there, suddenly, as he afterwards informed a few brothers, he saw a foul and very black array of demons making war against him with iron spits. They, as was revealed by the Spirit to the holy man, wished to assail his monastery, and with these same spikes to slaughter many of the brothers. But he, one man against these innumerable enemies, fought a strong fight, taking to himself the armour of the apostle Paul.

So for the greater part of the day the battle continued on both sides, and neither could the numberless enemies defeat the one man, nor was the one strong enough to drive them from his island; until, as the saint afterwards related to a few men, angels of God came to his support. Through fear of them the demons were repelled, and withdrew.

On the same day, when the saint returned to the monastery, after the repulse of the demons from his island, he pronounced these words about those hostile forces, saying: ' The deadly foes who have today, by God's favour, angels helping us, been driven away from the region of this little land, to the land of Eth [Tíree], will cruelly invade the monasteries of brothers there, and will bring upon them pestilential diseases; and many that suffer from the affliction of those diseases will die'.

In accordance with the foreknowledge of the blessed man, that happened in the days that followed. After two days' interval, by the revelation of the Spirit, he said: ' With the help of God, Baithene has contrived well, so that the community of the church over which, by God's disposition, he rules, in the plain of Long, is defended by fasts and prayers from the assault of demons; and no one there, excepting one man who has died, will die on this occasion'.

This was fulfilled according to his prophecy. For while many in the other monasteries of the same island died of that disease, only the one man of whom the saint had spoken died in Baithene's community.

[III 9] Concerning an apparition of angels, whom the man of God saw carrying to the heavens the soul of a certain iron-smith,
named Columb, surnamed Coilrigin

In the midland part of Ireland dwelt a certain iron-smith, much devoted to works of charity, and full of the other acts of righteousness. When this man, the above-named Columb, surnamed Coilrigin, came in good old age to the end of his life, in the same hour in which he was taken from the body, Saint Columba living in the island of Io spoke to some few of the elders who were standing beside him, and said : ' Columb Coilrigin the iron-smith has not laboured in vain. He has been fortunate in procuring with the labour of his own hands the eternal rewards that he desired to buy. See now, his soul is being carried by holy angels to the joys of the heavenly country. For whatever he was able to gain by practising his craft he laid out in alms to the needy '.

heaven the soul of a certain virtuous woman

At another time also, while the holy man lived in the island of Io, one day he suddenly turned his eyes to the sky, and uttered these words : ' Happy woman, happy and virtuous, whose soul the angels of God are now carrying to paradise '.

There was a certain religious brother named Genereus the Englishman, a baker, who while engaged upon the work of baking heard those words coming from the mouth of the saint. And after the end of a year, on the same day of the month, the saint said to the same Genereus the Englishman: 'I see a marvellous thing. Behold, the woman of whom I spoke in your presence a year ago is now meeting in the air the soul of her husband, a pious layman, and is fighting for it along with holy angels against the hostile powers. Through the help of the angels, aided by the righteousness of the mortal man himself, his soul, snatched from the battling of demons, has been brought to the place of eternal rest'.

[III 11] Concerning an apparition of holy angels whom Saint Columba saw at the passing of the blessed Brenden, coming to meet his soul. Brenden was the founder of the monastery that is called Birra in Irish

Again, when the venerable man lived in the island of Io, one day in the early morning he summoned his attendant Diormit (whom we have often mentioned), and gave him an order, saying: 'Let the sacred ministries of the Eucharist be quickly made ready. For today is the blessed Brenden's natal day'. 'Why' said the attendant, 'do you order this solemn rite of the Mass to be prepared, for today? [III 12] Concerning a vision of holy angels who were carrying to heaven the soul of the holy bishop Colman mocu-Loigse

Also on a certain day, when the brothers were putting on their shoes in the morning, preparing to go to the various labours of the monastery, Saint Columba on the contrary gave orders that they should not go to work on that day, and that the rites of the sacred oblation should be prepared, and that there should be the addition of a small meal, as on a Lord's-day. 'And I', he said, 'although I be unworthy, must celebrate today the sacred mysteries of the Eucharist, in veneration of the soul that in this night has ascended to paradise beyond the starry spaces of the heavens, carried between holy companies of angels.'

After these words, the brothers obeyed, and according to the saint's command did not go to work on that day ; and when the sacred ministries had been prepared, they went with the saint to the church, clothed in white, as on a solemn feast-day. But when in the course of countenance: 'Give thanks to Christ; for now holy angels, coming to meet the holy souls, have, like victorious warriors, rescued also that guest, snatched from the battling of demons'.

[III 14] Concerning a manifestation of angels coming to meet the soul of one Emchath

At one time, when the holy man was making a journey on the other side of the Spine of Britain, beside the lake of the river Nes [Ness], he was suddenly inspired by the Holy Spirit, and said to the brothers who travelled along with him: 'Let us hasten towards the holy angels that have been sent from the highest regions of heaven to conduct the soul of a pagan, and who await our coming thither so that we may give timely baptism, before he dies, to that man, who has preserved natural goodness through his whole life, into extreme old age'.

Saying this, the aged saint went as fast as he could, ahead of his companions, until he came to the farmland that is called Airchartdan [Urquhart]. And a certain old man whom he found there, Emchath by name, hearing and believing the word of God preached by the saint, was baptized; and thereupon, gladly and confidently, with the angels that came to meet him he departed to the Lord. And his son Virolec also believed and was baptized, with his whole house.

[III 15] Concerning an angel of the Lord, who

At one time, when the holy man sat writing in his hut, suddenly his face changed, and he uttered from his pure heart this cry : ' Help, help ! ' .

Two brothers, standing at the door, namely Colcu
son of Cellach, and Lugne mocu-Blai, asked the reason of this sudden exclamation. The venerable man gave them this answer, saying : ' One of the brothers was falling from the highest point of the great house that is at the present time being built in the plain of the oakwood, and I bade an angel of the Lord, that stood but now between you, to go with all speed to his rescue '.
Then the saint added this utterance : ' Exceedingly marvellous and almost beyond description is the swiftness of angels' flight, equal as I think to the speed of lightning. For the heavenly one who flew away from us just now, when that man was beginning to fall, came to the rescue as though in the twinkling of an eye, and held him up before he touched the ground ; and he that fell was unable to feel any fracture or injury. How amazing, I say, was this timely and most rapid rescue which, more quickly than words, could be made so very speedily, when so great spaces of sea and land lay between ! ' .

[III 16] Concerning a multitude of holy angels seen when they descended from heaven to a conference with the blessed man

At another time also, while the blessed man lived in the island of Iona, one day he admonished the assembled brothers, with great severity, and said to them: 'Today I wish to go out alone, to the western plain of our island. Let none of you therefore follow me'. They obeyed, and he did go alone as he desired; but a certain brother, a cunning spy, going by another way, took up a position secretly on the top of a little hill that overlooks that plain, wishing to detect the cause of that solitary expedition of the blessed man.

From the top of the little hill the spy saw him standing on a certain knoll of that plain and praying, with his hands outstretched to the sky, and his eyes raised to heaven, and then, strange to tell, behold suddenly a marvellous thing appeared, which the man from his position on the nearby hill looked upon, even with bodily eyes; as I think, not without the permission of God, in order that the name of the saint, and his renown, should, although against his will, afterwards be spread more widely among the peoples, because of this vision made manifest. For holy angels, citizens of the heavenly country, flew down with marvellous suddenness, clothed in white raiment, and began to stand about the holy man as he prayed. And after some converse with the blessed man, that heavenly throng, as though perceiving that they were watched, quickly returned to the highest heaven.

⁷ caelorum. This chapter can hardly be dissociated from the belief prevailing in the ancient Irish church that angels became visible to men in the form of birds. Cf. Plummer 1910, I, p. cxlvii.

The blessed man himself also, after his conference with the angels, returned to the monastery. The brothers were assembled again, and with severe reproof he asked which of them was guilty of a transgression. Thereupon they protested their ignorance; but the one who was conscious of his inexcusable trespass was able to conceal his sin no longer, and with bended knees he prayed humbly for pardon, before the saint, in the midst of the company of the brothers. The saint led him aside, and charged him under severe penalties, as he knelt, to expose to no one, during the days of the blessed man, anything secret, however little, of this angelic vision. But he, after the holy man's departure from the body, revealed to the brothers, with strong affirmation, that apparition of a heavenly assembly. And hence even today the place also of that angelic conference bears witness to the event that occurred in it, in its proper name, which may be rendered in Latin 'knoll of the angels', and in Irish cnoc angel.

From this it is to be noticed and earnestly considered, of what extent and nature were the pleasant visits of angels to the blessed man, often when he was awake on winter nights, and when he prayed in remote places, while others rested; visits that could never come to the knowledge of men, but that without doubt were very numerous: even although certain of them were, by some means or other, in the day or in the night, discernible to men, which were without question very taken too literally, would imply that the name rendered in Irish was not an Irish name.

This same thing is likewise to be noted also of certain manifestations of light, observed by a few, and to be written below.

[III 17] Concerning a column of light seen
to glow from the head of the holy man

At another time, four holy founders of monasteries crossed over from Ireland, to visit Saint Columba, and found him in the island of Hinba. The names of these illustrious men were Comgell mocu-Aridi, Cainnech mocu-Dalon, Brenden mocu-Alti, Cormac grandson of Léthan. They chose, all with one accord, that Saint Columba should consecrate the sacred mysteries of the Eucharist in the church, in their presence. He obeyed their command, and on the Lord's Day according to custom he entered the church, along with them, after the reading of the Gospel. And there, when the rites of the Mass were being celebrated, Saint Brenden mocu-Alti saw (as he afterwards told Comgell and Cainnech) a kind of fiery ball, radiant and very bright, that continued to glow from the head of Saint Columba as he stood before the altar and consecrated the sacred oblation, and to rise upwards like a column, until those holiest ministries were completed.

[III 18] Concerning a descent or visitation of the Holy Spirit remaining over the venerable man, in that same island, for three continuous days and nights

At another time when the holy man was living in the island of Hinba, the grace of the Holy Spirit was poured out upon him abundantly and in an incomparable manner, and continued marvellously for the space of three days, so that for three days and as many nights, remaining within a house barred, and filled with heavenly light, he allowed no one to go to him, and he neither ate nor drank. From that house beams of immeasurable brightness were visible in the night, escaping through chinks of the door-leaves, and through the key-holes. And spiritual songs, unheard before, were heard being sung by him. Moreover, as he afterwards admitted in the presence of a very few men, he saw, openly revealed, many of the secret things that have been hidden since the world began. Also every-thing that in the sacred scriptures is dark and most difficult became plain, and was shown more clearly than the day to the eyes of his purest heart. And he lamented that his foster-son Baithene was not there, who, if he had chanced to be present during those three days, would have written down from the mouth of the blessed man very many mysteries, both of past ages and of ages still to come, mysteries unknown to other men;

¹² cui. In A, in the space between the columns, before cui, there is a dot that appears to have been made by the text hand, and serves as a placing-point; the confused order of the sentence probably resulted from a marginal addition made by Adomnan in the manuscript from which

and also a number of interpretations of the sacred books. But Baithene was detained in the island of Ege [? Eigg] by contrary winds, and was unable to be present until those three days and nights of the incomparable and glorious visitation had come to an end.

[III 19] Concerning the brightness of angelic light that Virgno, a young man of good ability (who by God's guidance was afterwards the ruler of this church, which I, although unworthy, serve) saw descending upon Saint Columba in the church, on a winter night, while the brothers rested in their sleeping-chambers

One winter night, the above-named Virgno, fired with the love of God, entered the church alone for the sake of prayer, while others slept. There, in an exedra that adjoined the oratory wall, he prayed devoutly. After some space of time, as it were of one hour, the venerable man Columba entered the same sacred building; and along with him there entered a golden light, both A and the B texts are derived. Assuming that there was such an addition, the text of A should have read: bonae indolis juvenis (qui postea deo auctore huic praefuit ecclesiae, cui ego indignus licet deservio) super sanctum Columbam . . . discendere viderat. This is the order followed by B1, ?B2, B3, and the contents-list of B2 and of B3. The parenthesis was needed to identify Virgno as the abbot of Iona (see p. 90).

descending from highest heaven and wholly filling the inside of the church. Also the enclosed space of the exedra, in which Virgno tried to conceal himself as well as he could, was filled with the brightness of that heavenly light, which streamed through the partly-open inner door of that room, not without some effect of terror. And just as none can look with direct and undazzled eyes upon the summer midday sun, so also Virgno, who saw that heavenly brightness, could not at all endure it, because the brilliant and incomparable radiance greatly dazzled his sight. When he saw this flashing and terrifying effulgence, that brother was so greatly overcome by fear that no strength remained in him.

Saint Columba left the church after praying for a short time ; and on the following day he summoned to him the awe-stricken Virgno, and spoke to him in these few reassuring words : ' You have been well-pleasing, little son ; you have been well-pleasing ' he repeated, ' in the sight of God, this last night, in lowering your eyes to the ground, through dread of his brightness. For if you had not done so, your eyes would have been blinded by seeing that inestimable light. But you must diligently observe this, never in my life-time to disclose to any one this so great manifestation of light '.

So, through the narration of that Virgno after the passing of the blessed man, this memorable and wonderful thing became known to many people. His, that is Virgno's, sister's son, the honourable priest Comman,

[III 20] Of another nearly-similar vision of light from above

On another night also, one of the brothers, Colcu
by name, of whom we made mention at the beginning,
son of Aid Draigniche, of the descendants of Féchre,
chanced to come to the door of the church, while others slept, and standing there prayed for some time. And then he saw that the whole church was suddenly filled with heavenly light. Quicker than speech, this flash of light vanished from his eyes. He did not know that Saint Columba was at the same hour praying within the church, and after this sudden apparition of light he was much afraid, and returned to his dwelling.

On the following day the saint summoned him, and sharply reproved him, saying : ' Henceforth take great care, my son, not to attempt like a spy to observe heavenly light that has not been granted to you, for it will flee from you ; and not to relate to any one, in my time, what you have seen ' .

[III 21] Concerning another like apparition
of divine light

At another time also the blessed man one day gravely admonished a pupil of his, who was studying philosophy, called Berchan, surnamed Mes-loen, and said: 'Beware, my son, of coming near my lodging this night, as you are accustomed always to do'. But he, hearing this, came to the blessed man's house in violation of the interdict, in the silence of the night while others rested. And craftily spying he set his eyes opposite the holes for the keys, supposing that within the house some heavenly vision was being manifested to the saint, as the event showed to be true. For in that hour the blessed man's lodging was filled with the glory of heavenly brightness; the youthful transgressor could not bear to look upon it, and immediately fled away.

On the following day, the saint took him aside, and reproving him very severely spoke to him these words: 'In this night, my son, you have sinned before God; for you have vainly imagined that the crafty spying that you have denied could be concealed or hidden from the Holy Spirit. Did not I see you in that hour coming to the door of my lodging and going away from it? And if I had not at that moment prayed for you, there before the door either you would have fallen and died, or your eyes would have been torn from their sockets. But this time the Lord has spared you for my sake. And

All these things happened to him afterwards as they had been foretold of him, in accordance with the word of the blessed man.

[III 22] Concerning another apparition, revealed to the holy man, of angels whom
he saw on their way to meet his holy soul,
as if it were about to depart from the body

At another time while the blessed man lived in the island of Io, one day his holy face lit up with sudden mirth, strange and joyous. Raising his eyes to heaven, he rejoiced greatly, being filled with incomparable gladness. Then, after the brief space of a moment, that sweet and pleasant joy was turned into dull sorrow.

Two men were at that time standing at the door of his hut that had been constructed on higher ground. One of them was Lugne mocu-Blai, and the other was called Pilu the Englishman. They too were made sorrowful by his sorrow ; and they asked the cause of his sudden joyfulness and of the sadness following it. And the saint addressed them thus : 'Go in peace. Do not ask me now to explain the cause, either of that gladness, or yet of the sorrow'.

When they heard this, they knelt, weeping; and with faces bowed to the ground they humbly implored that they might learn something of the matter that in this hour had been revealed to the saint. Seeing that they were very sorrowful, he said: 'Because I love you, I am unwilling to cause you sorrow. First you must promise not in my life-time to betray to any person the secret about which you ask'. Thereupon following his injunction they promised readily; and after this promise the venerable man thus spoke to them, saying: 'Thirty years have been completed of my pilgrimage in Britain, down to this present day. Meanwhile, for many days past, I have earnestly requested of my Lord that in the end of this present thirtieth year he would release me from my residence, and at once call me to the heavenly country. And it was this that caused my gladness, about whose cause you sadly question me. For I saw holy angels sent from the high throne to meet and conduct my soul from the flesh. But see now, they have suddenly been held back, and are standing on a rock beyond the strait of our island; they wish to approach, in order to summon me from the body, but they are not allowed to come nearer, and will presently return to the highest heavens. Because what the Lord granted me when I asked it with my whole strength, that I should pass to him from the world on this day, he has changed, more quickly than speech, answering in preference the prayers of many churches for me. And it has so been granted by the Lord to the prayers of those churches that, although against my will, four more years

After the end of the four coming years in this life, by God's favour I shall, with a sudden departure and no preceding bodily distress, joyfully depart to the Lord, with the holy angels who will come to meet me at that time'.

In accordance with these words which the venerable man pronounced, as it is said, not without great lamentation and grief, and also with much weeping, he remained in the flesh for four years afterwards.

[III 23] Concerning the passing to the Lord
 of our holy patron Columba

When the end was drawing near of the four years above-mentioned, after the completion of which the foreteller of truth had long ago foreknown that his present life would come to a close, one day, in the month of May, as we have written in the preceding second book, the saint went, drawn in a wagon (being an old man, weary with age) to visit the labouring brothers, at work in the western part of the island of Io ; and on that day he began to speak to them in this manner, saying : 'At the Easter festival recently held, in the month of April, I desired with desire to depart to Christ the Lord, as had indeed been granted by him to me, if I had so chosen ; but I chose rather to put off a little longer the day of my departure from the world, so that the festival of joy should not be turned for you into sorrow'.

Meanwhile the monks of his congregation that heard him speak these sad things became very sorrowful; and he began to cheer them, as well as he could, with comforting words. After which, still sitting in the wagon, he turned his face to the east, and blessed the island, with the islanders its inhabitants. And from then to the present day, as has been written in the above-mentioned book, the poison of three-forked tongues of vipers has not been able to do any injury to either man or beast. After the words of this blessing, the saint was carried back to his monastery.

Then after a few days had passed, while the rites of the Mass were being celebrated on a Lord's-day according to the custom, the venerable man lifted up his eyes, and suddenly his face was seen to flush with a ruddy glow; for, as it is written, 'The countenance glows when the heart is glad'; and in fact at the same moment he alone saw an angel of the Lord hovering above, within the walls of the oratory itself; and because the calm and lovely sight of holy angels fills the hearts of the elect with joy and exultation, this was the cause of the sudden gladness that filled the blessed man.

When those that were present there asked about this, the cause of the gladness inspired in him, the saint, gazing upward, gave them this reply: 'Wonderful and incomparable is the fineness of angelic nature! See, an angel of the Lord, sent to recover a deposit dear to God, looking down upon us within the church and blessing us, has returned through the roof-courses of the church, leaving no trace of that departure'.

This the saint said, but yet none of those standing by could know of what kind that deposit was, to recover which the angel had been sent. Our patron, however, described as a 'deposit' his own holy soul, entrusted to him by God, which, as will be related below, departed to the Lord after an interval of six consecutive days, on the Lord's-night following.

In the end of the same week, that is, on the Sabbath day, the venerable man himself, and his devoted attendant Diormit, went to bless the nearest barn. After entering it, and blessing it and two heaps of grain that were there in store, the saint spoke thus, and rendering thanks said: 'I greatly congratulate my family of monks, because in this year also, if I have to depart from you to any place, you will have enough [bread] for the year'.

When the attendant Diormit heard this, he began to be sorrowful, and to speak in this manner: 'This year, father, you very often sadden us, because you frequently speak of your passing'. The saint gave him this answer: 'I have a few secret words concerning my departure that I shall be able to communicate somewhat more plainly to you, if you will faithfully promise me not to disclose them to any one before my death'. attendant had completed that promise on bended knees, according to the saint's desire, the venerable man made a statement to this effect : ' This day is called in the sacred books " Sabbath ", which is interpreted " rest ". And truly this day is for me a Sabbath, because it is my last day of this present laborious life. In it after my toilsome labours I keep Sabbath ; and at midnight of this following venerated Lord's-day, in the language of the Scriptures I shall go the way of the fathers. For now my Lord Jesus Christ deigns to invite me. To him I shall depart, I say, when he invites me, in the middle of this night. For so it has been revealed to me by the Lord himself '. The attendant hearing these sad words began to weep bitterly, and the saint tried to comfort him, as well as he could.

After this, the saint left the barn, and returning towards the monastery sat down midway. In that place a cross that was later fixed in a mill-stone is seen, standing by the roadside, even today. And while the saint sat there, resting for a little while, being (as I have said above) weary with age, behold, a white horse came to him, the obedient servant who was accustomed to carry the milk-vessels between the cow-pasture and the monastery. It went to the saint, and strange to tell put its head in his bosom, inspired, as I believe, by God, before whom every living creature has understanding, with such perception of things as the Creator himself has decreed ; and knowing that its master would presently depart from it, and that it should see him no more, it began to mourn, and like a human being to let tears fall freely on the lap of the saint, and foaming much, to weep aloud.

When he saw this, the attendant began to drive away the weeping mourner ; but the saint forbade him, saying : ' Let him, let him that loves us, pour out the tears of most bitter grief here in my bosom. See, man though you are, and having a rational soul, you could by no means know anything of my departure except what I myself have even now disclosed to you. But to this brute and unreasoning animal the Creator has, in what way he would, revealed clearly that its master is going to depart from it '. Thus speaking, he blessed his servant the horse, as it turned sadly away from him.

Going from there, he climbed a small hill overlooking the monastery, and stood on its summit for a little while. And as he stood he raised both hands, and blessed his monastery, saying : ' On this place, small and mean though it be, not only the kings of the Irish with their peoples, but also the rulers of barbarous and foreign nations, with their subjects, will bestow great and especial honour ; also especial reverence will be bestowed by saints even of other churches '.

After these words, he descended from that little hill, returned to the monastery, and sat in the hut, writing a psalter. And when he came to that verse of the thirty-third Psalm where it is written, ' But they that seek the Lord shall not want for anything that is good ', he said : ' Here, at the end of the page, I must stop. The last verse that he wrote aptly befits the holy predecessor, who will never lack eternal good things. And the verse that follows, 'Come, my sons, hear me; I will teach you fear of the Lord', is fittingly adapted to the successor, the father of spiritual sons, a teacher, who, as his predecessor enjoined, succeeded him not in teaching only, but in writing also.

After he had written the former verse, at the end of the page, the saint entered the church for the vesper office of the Lord's-night. As soon as that was finished, he returned to his lodging, and reclined on his sleeping-place, where during the night he used to have for bed, the bare rock; and for pillow, a stone, which even today stands beside his grave as a kind of epitaph. So while reclining there, he gave his last commands to the brothers, in the hearing of his attendant alone, and said: 'I commend to you, my children, these latest words, that you shall have among yourselves mutual and unfeigned charity, with peace. If you follow this course after the example of the holy fathers, God, who gives strength to the good, will help you; and I, abiding with him, shall intercede for you. bestowed, that are prepared for those who follow the divine commandments'.

We have carried down to this point, briefly told, the last words of the venerable patron, when he was, as it were, crossing over to the heavenly country from this weary pilgrimage.

After them the saint was silent for a little, as the happy latest hour drew near. Then, when the beaten bell resounded at midnight, he rose in haste and went to the church and, running, entered in advance of the others, alone; and bowing his knees in prayer he sank down beside the altar. In that moment Diormit, the attendant, following later, saw from a distance the whole church filled inside with angelic light about the saint. As Diormit approached the doorway, the light that he had seen quickly faded. A few more of the brothers also had seen it, when they too were a little way off.

So Diormit entering the church cried in a tearful voice: 'Where are you, where are you, father?' And groping in the darkness, since the lamps of the brothers had not yet been brought, he found the saint lying before the altar. Raising him a little, and sitting down beside him, he placed the holy head upon his lap. Meanwhile the company of monks ran up with lights; and when they saw that their father was dying they began to lament. And as we have learned from some men who were present there, the saint, whose soul had not yet departed, opened his eyes, and looked around on either side, with wonderful joy and gladness of countenance; for he was gazing upon the holy angels that had come to meet him. Then Diormit raised the holy right hand,

In Thesaurus 1903, p. 280, it is suggested that Cloni should here be read Clóin, the nominative singular. But since the B texts agree with A in reading cloni, i.e. the nominative plural, the presumption is that that was what Adomnan wrote. In that case, the lenited f in A would have to be emended to unlenited f. The lenited f would have been correct only if the preceding word were clóin, and already locally used as a feminine noun : in O.I., it was masculine (see Thurneysen 1946, p. 676, translators' note 50).

to bless the saint's company of monks. And the venerable father himself at the same time moved his hand, as much as he was able, in order that he might be seen to bless the brothers even by the movement of his hand, a thing that in the departure of his soul he could not do by voice. And after the holy benediction thus expressed he presently breathed out his spirit.

When that had left the tabernacle of the body, his face continued to be ruddy, and in a wonderful degree gladdened by the vision of angels, so much that it seemed like the face not of a dead man, but of a living sleeper. Meanwhile the whole church resounded with sorrowful lamentations.

And it appears right that this should not be omitted that was revealed to a certain saint in Ireland, in the very hour of the passing of the blessed soul. For in the monastery that in the Irish tongue is called Cloni-finchoil, there was an aged holy man, a soldier of Christ, righteous and wise, who was called Luguid, son of Tailchan. In the early morning he related a vision that he had had, to a man who was likewise a Christian soldier, by name Virgno ; and said, with great lamentation : ' In the middle of this last night Saint Columba, the pillar of many churches, has passed to the Lord. And in the hour of his blessed departure I saw in the Spirit the whole island of Io (where I have never come in the body) lit up with the brightness of angels ; and all the spaces

Also I heard, sounding on high, the songs, tuneful and very sweet, of the angelic hosts, at the very moment when his holy soul went forth among the ascending companies of angels'.

In those same days Virgno rowed over from Ireland, and he remained for the rest of his life in the island of Hinba; and he very often described to the monks of Saint Columba this manifestation of angels of which, as has been said above, he had learned indubitably from the mouth of the holy old man to whom it had been revealed. After completing irreproachably many years in subjection among the brothers, this Virgno completed other twelve years as a victorious soldier of Christ, leading the life of an anchorite, in the place of the anchorites, in Muirbolc-már.

We have not only found the foregoing vision set down in writing, but we have learned it with no uncertainty [from] some elders who knew of it, since Virgno himself had told it to them.

Another vision, differently revealed at the same hour, was told with strong asseveration to me, Adomnan, then a young man, by one of those that had seen it, a

He (himself a holy monk) lies buried among the remains of other monks of Saint Columba, and awaits the resurrection with the saints, in the ridge of Tóimm. He said : ' In that night when Saint Columba passed, by a happy and blessed end, from earth to heaven, I and other men with me, at work on the catching of fish in the valley of the river Fendea, which abounds in fish, saw the whole space of airy heaven suddenly lit up. Startled by the suddenness of this miracle, we raised our eyes and turned them to the region of the rising sun ; and behold, there appeared what seemed like a very great pillar of fire which, rising upwards in that midnight, seemed to us to illumine the whole world like the summer sun at midday. And after that pillar pierced the sky, darkness followed, as after the setting of the sun. Not only was the brightness of this luminous and remarkable pillar seen, with great amazement, by us, who were together in the same place, but many other fishers also, who were fishing here and there among the various pools of the same river, were,

These three miraculous visions, appearing in the very hour of the passing of the venerable patron, testify to the eternal honours conferred on him by God. Let us return to our theme.

In the meanwhile, after the departure of the holy soul, when the matin hymns were ended, the sacred body was carried back from the church, with the brothers' tuneful psalmody, to the lodging from which, alive, he had come a little while before. And for three days and three nights the funeral ceremonies were duly carried out in a worthy and honourable manner. When these had ended in the savoury praises of God, the venerable body of the holy and blessed patron was wrapped in clean fine cloths, and laid in the appointed burial-place that had been made ready, and was interred with fitting veneration, to rise again in bright and eternal light.

What has been handed down to us on good authority concerning those three days of funeral mentioned above, spent according to the custom of the church, shall be related here, almost at the end of this book.

A certain man, one of the brothers, on one occasion in the company of the venerable man spoke unthinkingly, and said to the saint: 'After your death, it is estimated that the entire population of these provinces will row over for the celebration of your funeral, and fill this island of Io'. Upon hearing this, the saint said: 'My child, the event will not prove to be as you say; for a miscellaneous crowd of people will not be able to come to my funeral. Only my family of monks will fulfil the offices of my burial, and worthily perform my funeral rites'.

The omnipotence of God caused this prophetic saying of his to be fulfilled immediately after his death. For during those three days and nights of the funeral a great storm of wind blew without rain, and forbade any one in a small ship to cross the strait in either direction. And after the burial of the blessed man had been completed, straightway the storm was stilled, the wind ceased, and the whole sea was calmed.

Let the reader consider in how great and high honour with God the memorable patron is held, at whose prayer once while he lived in mortal flesh, God granting it, storms were stilled, and seas were calmed; and again, when he had need, on the occasion mentioned above, at his wish blasts of wind sprang up, and stormy seas were raised; which afterwards, as has been said above, when the services of his burial were complete, were changed into a great calm.

This was the end of our memorable patron's life; these were the beginnings of his rewards. Being, in the language of the scriptures, added to the fathers as a sharer in eternal triumphs, united to apostles and prophets, and joined to the number of the thousands of

After the reading of these three books, let every attentive reader observe of how great and high merit, how greatly and highly deserving of honour, our venerable holy superior so often named above was esteemed in the sight of God ; how much and in what manner he was visited by shining angels ; how great in him was the grace of prophecy, how great the power of divine miracles ; how great and how frequent was the brightness of divine light that shone about him, while he still lived in mortal flesh. And even after the departure of his most gentle soul from the tabernacle of the body, this same heavenly brightness, as well as the frequent visits of holy angels, does not cease, down to the present day, to appear at the place in which his holy bones repose ; as is established through being revealed to certain elect persons.

And this great favour also was conferred by God on that man of blessed memory, that, although he lived in this small and remote island of the Britannic ocean, he merited that his name should not only be illustriously renowned throughout our Ireland, and throughout Britain, the greatest of all the islands of the whole world ; but that it should reach even as far as three-cornered

Spain, and Gaul, and Italy situated beyond the Pennine Alps ; also the Roman city itself, which is the chief of all cities. So great and high honour of fame is known to have been bestowed upon that saint, among the other gifts of divine granting, by God, who loves those that love him, and, more and more glorifying those that magnify him with savoury praises, elevates them with boundless honours. And He is blessed through the ages. Amen.

I beseech all those that may wish to copy these books, nay more I adjure them through Christ, the judge of the ages, that after carefully copying they compare them with the exemplar from which they have written, and emend them with the utmost care ; and also that they append this adjuration in this place.

Whoever may read these books of the miraculous powers of Columba, let him pray to God for me, Dorbbene, that I may possess after death eternal life.

¹² Quicumque to possedeam. This signature of Dorbbene is in A only. It is written in red ink, after a line left blank, and with a wider outer margin, probably at a somewhat later time, by the text hand. The red ink used was too thick for free writing ; for that or some other reason the parchment did not take the ink very well. The last four lines of 136a are blank, and there is no writing in the second column.

Page 137 is not divided into columns. It contains the Lord's Prayer in Greek, derived from a text similar to that of the Greek Testament, Matt. vi. 9-13. The writing is based upon Greek uncials of the seventh century.

The writer was probably the same who wrote the text of A. There is no indication that his Greek version was taken from a version written by Adomnan. But it has some value as evidence of the study of Greek in the Irish church of Adomnan's time.

In the lower part of the same page, a relatively modern hand has written about twelve lines, which were later erased.

A hand-copy of the Greek prayer was given in Reeves 1857, pp. xx-xxii, with a discussion.
