"When a man has his wages stolen from him, year after year, and the laws sanction and enforce the theft, how can he be expected to have more regard to honesty than has the man who robs him?"

(Paragraph 9)

"I was, in fact, a slave in New York, as subject to slave laws as I had been in a Slave State. Strange incongruity in a State called free!"

(Paragraph 10)

"He remonstrated with her for harboring a fugitive slave … and asked her if she was aware of the penalty. She replied, 'I am very well aware of it. It is imprisonment and one thousand dollars fine. Shame on my country that it is so! I am ready to incur the penalty. I will go to the state's prison, rather than have any poor victim torn from my house, to be carried back to slavery.'" girlhood in North Carolina through her flight to her grandmother's home, her escape to Philadelphia, her time with the Willis family, her freedom, and other events. Throughout the narration the names of the characters are changed, such that she herself is "Linda Brent," her brother is "William Brent," her children are "Benjamin" (or "Benny") and "Ellen," Dr. Norcom is named "Dr. Flint," Samuel Sawyer is "Mr. Sands," Nathaniel Parker Willis is "Mr. Bruce," and Willis's second wife, who bought Jacobs's freedom, is "Cornelia Bruce."

(Paragraph 13)

By the first paragraph of Chapter XL, the narration has reached the time when William Brent decides to head to California to take part in the gold rush and agrees that Benjamin, Linda Brent's son, will go with him. Left alone, the narrator decides to return to New York and to the Bruce family, where she was previously employed. Mr. Bruce has taken a new wife, Cornelia, whom the narrator describes as "aristocratic" but also as heartily opposed to slavery and resistant to any of the "sophistry" used by southerners to defend it. In the third paragraph, the narrator makes reference to an event of "disastrous import to the colored people"—the passage of the Fugitive Slave Act of 1850. She refers to a slave by the name of Hamlin who was hunted down by the "bloodhounds" of the North and South in New York. In describing the impact of the law on New Yorkers, she refers to the "short and simple annals of the poor." This is a line originally from Thomas Gray's famous poem "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard" (1751) and later used by Abraham Lincoln in 1859 to describe his childhood. The paragraph also makes reference to Jenny Lind, a Swedish opera singer known in America as the "Swedish Nightingale." The narrator makes the point that while "fashionables" were listening to opera, "the thrilling voices of poor hunted colored people went up … from Zion's church," a reference to the city's African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church. Because of the new law, many blacks who had found homes in the city had little choice but to flee, perhaps to Canada; many wives and husbands discovered that their spouses were fugitive slaves and liable to capture. Making matters worse was the fact that children born to a slave mother were themselves legally slaves, so fathers faced the prospect of losing not only their wives but also their children to slave catchers.

In paragraph 4 the narrator refers to the discussions she and her brother had before he left for California, pointing out his anger at the new law. The narrator then goes on to describe how she and others had to go about the city through back streets and byways, living in constant fear of being taken by slave catchers. Vigilance committees were formed to keep tabs on the activities of slave catchers, and New York's blacks kept their eyes on newspapers that reported the arrival of southerners at the city's hotels. The phrases "running to and fro" and "knowledge should be increased" are from the book of Daniel in the King James Bible.

In paragraphs 5–9, the narrator tells the story of a slave named Luke whom she had known as a child. Luke had been owned by a particularly cruel master who depended on Luke for his care but beat him constantly—or called on the town constable to do so for him. After the master died, Luke hid some of the man's money in the pocket of the pants in which he would be buried. At the time of the burial, Luke asked for the pants, in this way getting funds that enabled him to flee to New York with the goal of reaching Canada—where he would have joined an estimated twenty thousand New York African Americans who fled to Canada after the law was passed. The narrator encounters Luke in New York and learns of his plans. Luke refers to "speculators," men who purchased the rights to runaway slaves so as to catch them and then sell them to the highest bidder. The narrator concludes this portion of the account by noting that Luke's tale offered an example of how the slave system corrupted morals: "When a man has his wages stolen from him, year after year, and the laws sanction and enforce the theft, how can he be expected to have more regard to honesty than has the man who robs him?"

With paragraph 10, the narrator returns to her own experiences, again stressing how anxious she was that she could be caught, especially with the approach of summer. She reflects on the irony that she was in a "free" state but still felt like a slave. Her anxiety was well advised, for she learned that Dr. Flint was on the hunt for her and had learned from informants about her mode of dress. In point of fact, the real-life Norcom placed newspaper ads in which he offered a reward of $100 for information about her. The ads stressed that "being a good seamstress, she has been accustomed to dress well, has a variety of very fine clothes, made in the prevailing fashion, and will probably appear, if abroad, tricked out in gay and fashionable finery." When she informed Mrs. Bruce of the danger she was in, Mrs. Bruce offered to allow the narrator to carry her daughter about so that if the narrator were caught, the authorities would have to return the Bruce child to her mother. In this way Mrs. Bruce could learn of the capture and take action to help. In paragraph 13 the narrator notes that Mrs. Bruce had a proslavery relative who questioned her decision to harbor a fugitive slave. When he asked her whether she knew the penalty for doing so, she acknowledged that she did but expressed her willingness to go to jail "rather than have any poor victim torn from my house, to be carried back to slavery." The narrator concludes the account by noting that she went to the safety of Massachusetts to avoid capture. The Massachusetts senator referred to by the narrator was probably Robert Rantoul, Jr., an outspoken opponent of the Fugitive Slave Act who provided a legal defense for Thomas Sims, the first purported slave captured under the new act in Massachusetts.

Audience

The most pertinent audience for Incidents in the Life of a Slave Girl consisted of those Americans who still needed convincing that the slave system had to be eradicated. Shortly after the book's publication, Jacobs and Lydia Maria Child began writing letters to newspaper editors, bookstore owners, and anyone else they could think of who would advertise and promote the book. Jacobs's brother John, now living in London, published a condensed version of the book under the title A True Tale of Slavery, leaving out the sexual elements to make it more palatable to English readers. The book achieved some popularity with its British audience and fueled more intense opposition to slavery in England.

In particular, Jacobs and Child saw middle-class Christian white women as a primary audience for the book, hoping that the sexual harassment Jacobs endured would motivate Christian women to take up the cudgel against slavery after feeling its corrupting moral influence. In this regard, a passage from Child's introduction provides insight into the writer's intention:

> I am well aware that many will accuse me of indecorum for presenting these pages to the public; for the experiences of this intelligent and much-injured woman belong to a class which some call delicate subjects, and others indelicate. This peculiar phase of Slavery has generally been kept veiled; but the public ought to be made acquainted with its monstrous features, and I willingly take the responsibility of presenting them with the veil withdrawn. I do this for the sake of my sisters in bondage, who are suffering wrongs so foul, that our ears are too delicate to listen to them. I do it with the hope of arousing conscientious and reflecting women at the North to a sense of their duty in the exertion of moral influence on the question of Slavery, on all possible occasions.

Incidents in the Life of a Slave Girl found a new audience in the twentieth century and beyond as feminists and literary critics began to discover the literary merit of slave narratives and thus directed attention to documents giving voice to the disenfranchised rather than works by prominent New England authors. During the Great Depression, the Works Projects Administration, one of the federal agencies created as part of Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal, put unemployed researchers and writers to work in the Federal Writers' Project. One of the project's major undertakings entailed writers' interviewing surviving African Americans who had been slaves prior to the passage of the Thirteenth Amendment, which abolished slavery, and documenting their stories. From 1936 to 1938 the project's writers recorded the stories of more than twenty-three hundred former slaves, to be presented in a series of volumes, with each volume focusing on the narratives of former slaves in particular states. Jacobs's North Carolina was featured in the project's 1939 volume These Are Our Lives. In the twenty-first century, Americans have learned more about Jacobs through a successful Broadway play by Lydia Diamond titled Harriet Jacobs.

Impact

Jacobs confessed in letters to her friend Post that she felt some reticence about committing her life story to paper, largely because it would deal with the sexual exploitation of slaves and because she would have to make known her own status as an unwed mother. It was for these reasons that she created the fictional persona Linda Brent, who narrates the story. The book differed from other slave narratives of the era in its focus on two major themes regarding the female narrator's life, as that of a "fallen woman" and as that of a heroic woman who keeps her children from falling prey to chattel slavery. Notably, the book accordingly uses two different styles: When Jacobs is discussing her efforts on behalf of her children, she writes in a direct, pointed style. When the subject turns to sexual exploitation and her own sexual history, the style becomes more indirect and elevated, similar to the style of much popular fiction from the time. The fact that Jacobs's narrative was written by a woman was alone a distinguishing factor. The slave narratives of writers such as Frederick Douglass and Solomon Northup focus on the largely solitary efforts of a heroic man. Jacobs, on the other hand, embedded her narrative in more of a social context that includes family relationships and friendships both within and outside the black community.

Some readers found the book too unbelievable to be true and accused the author of exaggerating and fictionalizing for sensational effect. Some thought that the book had to have been written by a white woman, and some scholars continue to suggest that Child had more of hand in shaping and even writing the book than she admitted. Jacobs, though, tried to counter these reactions by insisting on its veracity. In an appendix, Post bore witness to the book's truth. So, too, did an African American Bostonian named George W. Lowther, who after the Civil War would be elected to the Massachusetts House of Representatives and who wrote of the book,

> However it may be regarded by the incredulous, I know that it is full of living truths. I have been well acquainted with the author from my boyhood. The circumstances recounted in her history are perfectly familiar to me. I knew of her treatment from her master; of the imprisonment of her children; of their sale and redemption; of her seven years' concealment; and of her subsequent escape to the North.

See also Fugitive Slave Act of 1793; First Editorial of the North Star(1847); Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Dred Scott v. Sandford(1857); Twelve Years a Slave: Narrative of Solomon Northup (1853); Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1865).

Further Reading

■ Articles

Cutter, Martha J. "Dismantling 'The Master's House': Critical Literacy in Harriet Jacobs' Incidents in the Life of a Slave Girl." Callaloo 19, no. 1 (Winter 1996): 209–225.

Miller, Jennie. "Harriet Jacobs and the 'Double Burden' of American Slavery." International Social Science Review 78 (June 2003): 31–41.

■ Books

Federal Writers' Project. North Carolina Slave Narratives: A Folk History of Slavery in North Carolina from Interviews with Former Slaves. Bedford, Mass.: Applewood Books, 2006.

Fisch, Audrey, ed. The Cambridge Companion to the African American Slave Narrative. Cambridge, U.K.: Cambridge University Press, 2007.

Garfield, Deborah M., and Rafia Zafar, eds. Harriet Jacobs and "Incidents in the Life of a Slave Girl": New Critical Essays. Cambridge, U.K.: Cambridge University Press, 1996.

Heglar, Charles J. Rethinking the Slave Narrative: Slave Marriage and the Narratives of Henry Bibb and William and Ellen Craft. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2001.

Johnson, Yvonne. The Voices of African American Women: The Use of Narrative and Authorial Voice in the Works of Harriet Jacobs, Zora Neale Hurston, and Alice Walker. New York: Peter Lang, 1998.

Shockley, Ann Allen, ed. Afro-American Women Writers, 1746–1933: An Anthology and Critical Guide. New Haven, Conn.: Meridian Books, 1989.

Taylor, Yuval, ed. I Was Born a Slave: An Anthology of Classic Slave Narratives. Chicago: Lawrence Hill Books, 1999.

Washington, Mary Helen. "Meditations on History: The Slave Narrative of Linda Brent." In Invented Lives: Narratives of Black Women, 1860–1960, ed. Mary Helen Washington. New York: Doubleday, 1987.

Yellin, Jean Fagan. Harriet Jacobs: A Life. Cambridge, Mass.: Basic Civitas Books, 2004.

———, ed. The Harriet Jacobs Family Papers. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2008.

■ Web Sites

Child, Lydia Maria. Introduction to Incidents in the Life of a Slave Girl, Written by Herself. Documenting the American South, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill Web site.
http://docsouth.unc.edu/fpn/jacobs/jacobs.html.

"Harriet Jacobs." Harriet Jacobs Web site.
http://www.harrietjacobs.org.

Lowther, George W. Appendix to Incidents in the Life of a Slave Girl, Written by Herself. Documenting the American South, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill Web site.
http://docsouth.unc.edu/fpn/jacobs/jacobs.html.

—Michael J. O'Neal

Questions for Further Study

1. What impact did the Mexican-American War have on the issue of slavery in the decade before the Civil War?

2. Most slave narratives published during this era were written by men. How do you think Jacobs's narrative might differ from those because of her experiences as a woman?

3. By the time Jacobs was born, the Fugitive Slave Act of 1793 was already on the books. What made the Fugitive Slave Act of 1850 more frightening for her and her children?

4. What was "Bleeding Kansas"? What part did it play in the sectional divide that led to the Civil War?

5. Compare this document with Twelve Years a Slave: Narrative of Solomon Northup. What similar experiences did the authors have? How were their experiences different?

Document Text

Harriet Jacobs's Incidents in the Life of a Slave Girl

My brother, being disappointed in his project, concluded to go to California; and it was agreed that Benjamin should go with him. Ellen liked her school, and was a great favorite there. They did not know her history, and she did not tell it, because she had no desire to make capital out of their sympathy. But when it was accidentally discovered that her mother was a fugitive slave, every method was used to increase her advantages and diminish her expenses.

I was alone again. It was necessary for me to be earning money, and I preferred that it should be among those who knew me. On my return from Rochester, I called at the house of Mr. Bruce, to see Mary, the darling little babe that had thawed my heart, when it was freezing into a cheerless distrust of all my fellow-beings. She was growing a tall girl now, but I loved her always. Mr. Bruce had married again, and it was proposed that I should become nurse to a new infant. I had but one hesitation, and that was my feeling of insecurity in New York, now greatly increased by the passage of the Fugitive Slave Law. However, I resolved to try the experiment. I was again fortunate in my employer. The new Mrs. Bruce was an American, brought up under aristocratic influences and still living in the midst of them; but if she had any prejudice against color, I was never made aware of it; and as for the system of slavery, she had a most hearty dislike of it. No sophistry of Southerners could blind her to its enormity. She was a person of excellent principles and a noble heart. To me, from that hour to the present, she has been a true and sympathizing friend. Blessings be with her and hers!

About the time that I reentered the Bruce family, an event occurred of disastrous import to the colored people. The slave Hamlin, the first fugitive that came under the new law, was given up by the bloodhounds of the north to the bloodhounds of the south. It was the beginning of a reign of terror to the colored population. The great city rushed on in its whirl of excitement, taking no note of the "short and simple annals of the poor." But while fashionables were listening to the thrilling voice of Jenny Lind in Metropolitan Hall, the thrilling voices of poor hunted colored people went up, in an agony of supplication, to the Lord, from Zion's church. Many families, who had lived in the city for twenty years, fled from it now. Many a poor washerwoman, who, by hard labor, had made herself a comfortable home, was obliged to sacrifice her furniture, bid a hurried farewell to friends, and seek her fortune among strangers in Canada. Many a wife discovered a secret she had never known before—that her husband was a fugitive, and must leave her to insure his own safety. Worse still, many a husband discovered that his wife had fled from slavery years ago, and as "the child follows the condition of its mother," the children of his love were liable to be seized and carried into slavery. Every where, in those humble homes, there was consternation and anguish. But what cared the legislators of the "dominant race" for the blood they were crushing out of trampled hearts?

When my brother William spent his last evening with me, before he went to California, we talked nearly all the time of the distress brought on our oppressed people by the passage of this iniquitous law; and never had I seen him manifest such bitterness of spirit, such stern hostility to our oppressors. He was himself free from the operation of the law; for he did not run from any Slaveholding State, being brought into the Free States by his master. But I was subject to it; and so were hundreds of intelligent and industrious people all around us. I seldom ventured into the streets; and when it was necessary to do an errand for Mrs. Bruce, or any of the family, I went as much as possible through back streets and by-ways. What a disgrace to a city calling itself free, that inhabitants, guiltless of offence, and seeking to perform their duties conscientiously, should be condemned to live in such incessant fear, and have nowhere to turn for protection! This state of things, of course, gave rise to many impromptu vigilance committees. Every colored person, and every friend of their persecuted race, kept their eyes wide open. Every evening I examined the newspapers carefully, to see what Southerners had put up at the hotels. I did this for my own sake, thinking my young mistress and her husband might be among the list; I wished also to give information to others, if necessary; for if many were "running to and fro," I resolved that "knowledge should be increased."

This brings up one of my Southern reminiscences, which I will here briefly relate. I was somewhat acquainted with a slave named Luke, who belonged to a wealthy man in our vicinity. His master died, leaving a son and daughter heirs to his large fortune. In the division of the slaves, Luke was included in the son's portion. This young man became a prey to the vices growing out of the "patriarchal institution," and when he went to the north, to complete his education, he carried his vices with him. He was brought home, deprived of the use of his limbs, by excessive dissipation. Luke was appointed to wait upon his bed-ridden master, whose despotic habits were greatly increased by exasperation at his own helplessness. He kept a cowhide beside him, and, for the most trivial occurrence, he would order his attendant to bare his back, and kneel beside the couch, while he whipped him till his strength was exhausted. Some days he was not allowed to wear any thing but his shirt, in order to be in readiness to be flogged. A day seldom passed without his receiving more or less blows. If the slightest resistance was offered, the town constable was sent for to execute the punishment, and Luke learned from experience how much more the constable's strong arm was to be dreaded than the comparatively feeble one of his master. The arm of his tyrant grew weak, and was finally palsied; and then the constable's services were in constant requisition. The fact that he was entirely dependent on Luke's care, and was obliged to be tended like an infant, instead of inspiring any gratitude or compassion towards his poor slave, seemed only to increase his irritability and cruelty. As he lay there on his bed, a mere disgraced wreck of manhood, he took into his head the strangest freaks of despotism; and if Luke hesitated to submit to his orders, the constable was immediately sent for. Some of these freaks were of a nature too filthy to be repeated. When I fled from the house of bondage, I left poor Luke still chained to the bedside of this cruel and disgusting wretch.

One day, when I had been requested to do an errand for Mrs. Bruce, I was hurrying through back streets, as usual, when I saw a young man approaching, whose face was familiar to me. As he came nearer, I recognized Luke. I always rejoiced to see or hear of any one who had escaped from the black pit; but, remembering this poor fellow's extreme hardships, I was peculiarly glad to see him on Northern soil, though I no longer called it free soil. I well remembered what a desolate feeling it was to be alone among strangers, and I went up to him and greeted him cordially. At first, he did not know me; but when I mentioned my name, he remembered all about me. I told him of the Fugitive Slave Law, and asked him if he did not know that New York was a city of kidnappers.

He replied, "De risk ain't so bad for me, as 'tis fur you. 'Cause I runned away from de speculator, and you runned away from de massa. Dem speculators vont spen dar money to come here fur a runaway, if dey ain't sartin sure to put dar hans right on him. An I tell you I's tuk good car 'bout dat. I had too hard times down dar, to let 'em ketch dis nigger."

He then told me of the advice he had received, and the plans he had laid. I asked if he had money enough to take him to Canada. "'Pend upon it, I hab," he replied. "I tuk car fur dat. I'd bin workin all my days fur dem cussed whites, an got no pay but kicks and cuffs. So I tought dis nigger had a right to money nuff to bring him to de Free States. Massa Henry he lib till ebery body vish him dead; an ven he did die, I knowed de debbil would hab him, an vouldn't vant him to bring his money 'long too. So I tuk some of his bills, and put 'em in de pocket of his ole trousers. An ven he was buried, dis nigger ask fur dem ole trousers, an dey gub 'em to me." With a low, chuckling laugh, he added, "You see I didn't steal it; dey gub it to me. I tell you, I had mighty hard time to keep de speculator from findin it; but he didn't git it."

This is a fair specimen of how the moral sense is educated by slavery. When a man has his wages stolen from him, year after year, and the laws sanction and enforce the theft, how can he be expected to have more regard to honesty than has the man who robs him? I have become somewhat enlightened, but I confess that I agree with poor, ignorant, much-abused Luke, in thinking he had a right to that money, as a portion of his unpaid wages. He went to Canada forthwith, and I have not since heard from him.

All that winter I lived in a state of anxiety. When I took the children out to breathe the air, I closely observed the countenances of all I met. I dreaded the approach of summer, when snakes and slaveholders make their appearance. I was, in fact, a slave in New York, as subject to slave laws as I had been in a Slave State. Strange incongruity in a State called free!

Spring returned, and I received warning from the south that Dr. Flint knew of my return to my old place, and was making preparations to have me caught. I learned afterwards that my dress, and that of Mrs. Bruce's children, had been described to him by some of the Northern tools, which slaveholders employ for their base purposes, and then indulge in sneers at their cupidity and mean servility.

I immediately informed Mrs. Bruce of my danger, and she took prompt measures for my safety. My place as nurse could not be supplied immediately, and this generous, sympathizing lady proposed that I should carry her baby away. It was a comfort to me to have the child with me; for the heart is reluctant to be torn away from every object it loves. But how few mothers would have consented to have one of their own babes become a fugitive, for the sake of a poor, hunted nurse, on whom the legislators of the country had let loose the bloodhounds! When I spoke of the sacrifice she was making, in depriving herself of her dear baby, she replied, "It is better for you to have baby with you, Linda; for if they get on your track, they will be obliged to bring the child to me; and then, if there is a possibility of saving you, you shall be saved."

Document Text

This lady had a very wealthy relative, a benevolent gentleman in many respects, but aristocratic and pro-slavery. He remonstrated with her for harboring a fugitive slave; told her she was violating the laws of her country; and asked her if she was aware of the penalty. She replied, "I am very well aware of it. It is imprisonment and one thousand dollars fine. Shame on my country that it is so! I am ready to incur the penalty. I will go to the state's prison, rather than have any poor victim torn from my house, to be carried back to slavery."

The noble heart! The brave heart! The tears are in my eyes while I write of her. May the God of the helpless reward her for her sympathy with my persecuted people!

I was sent into New England, where I was sheltered by the wife of a senator, whom I shall always hold in grateful remembrance. This honorable gentleman would not have voted for the Fugitive Slave Law, as did the senator in "Uncle Tom's Cabin;" on the contrary, he was strongly opposed to it; but he was enough under its influence to be afraid of having me remain in his house many hours. So I was sent into the country, where I remained a month with the baby. When it was supposed that Dr. Flint's emissaries had lost track of me, and given up the pursuit for the present, I returned to New York.

Glossary

Benjamin	the fictional name Jacobs gives to her son, Joseph
"the child follows the condition of its mother"	a reference to the fact that under the law, the children of a slave mother were automatically born as slaves
Dr. Flint	the fictional name Jacobs gives to her master and tormentor, Dr. James Norcom
Fugitive Slave Law	the Fugitive Slave Act of 1850
Jenny Lind	a famous Swedish opera singer
Linda	Linda Brent, the persona Jacobs adopts in her narrative
Mr. Bruce	the fictional name Jacobs gives to Nathanial Parker Willis, the New Yorker who took her in
"running to and fro" … "knowledge should be increased"	quotations from the book of Daniel in the King James Bible
"short and simple annals of the poor"	a line originally from Thomas Gray's 1751 poem "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard," later used by Abraham Lincoln to describe his childhood speculator	a person who purchased the rights to runaway slaves so as to catch them and then sell them to the highest bidder
Uncle Tom's Cabin	the widely read antislavery novel by Harriet Beecher Stowe wife of a Senator	probably a reference to Robert Rantoul, Jr., an outspoken opponent of the Fugitive Slave Act
William	the fictional name Jacobs gives her brother John

John Brown (Library of Congress)

Osborne P. Anderson: A Voice from Harper's Ferry

1861

"We visited the plantations and acquainted the slaves with our purpose to effect their liberation."

Overview

In 1861 Osborne Anderson published A Voice from Harper's Ferry: A Narrative of Events at Harper's Ferry; With Incidents Prior and Subsequent to Its Capture by Captain Brown and His Men to present his eyewitness account of events during and revolving around John Brown's raid on the federal arsenal at Harpers Ferry, Virginia (now West Virginia), of October 16–18, 1859. After the capture and execution of the other raiders, Anderson was the only one left alive who had been present in Harpers Ferry during the raid; because he believed that southern accounts were biased, he felt compelled to give an account of the event from the raiders' perspective. The book's publication, accomplished by the author with the aid of antislavery Bostonians, was announced in William Lloyd Garrison's newspaper The Liberator on January 11, 1861, and in Frederick Douglass's Monthly in the February 1861 issue. The book became an important source for historians and biographers of the renowned abolitionist Brown.

Context

Despite the fact that he was born free in the northern United States, Osborne Anderson, an African American, lived in a world in which he was considered a nonperson. The movement to abolish slavery was very much alive, but it had primarily succeeded in creating a hostile relationship between northern and southern states. The Compromise of 1850, which included the new Fugitive Slave Act of 1850, decreeing that those who helped fugitive slaves would be prosecuted and ordering northerners to aid in the capture and return of fugitive slaves to their masters, only served to deepen that hostile relationship. Subsequently, Harriet Beecher Stowe's antislavery novel Uncle Tom's Cabin, published in 1852, fanned the flames of northern hatred for slavery and encouraged northerners to flout the Fugitive Slave Act by aiding fugitive slaves. While Stowe was attempting to persuade southerners to eschew slavery based on an appeal to emotion and religious beliefs, she succeeded only in making many southerners feel personally angry. The Kansas-Nebraska Act of 1854 prolonged the debate over slavery by allowing the residents of the two new territories to decide for themselves via the ballot box whether they would enter the union as slave states or free states.

John Brown was a white man who had always been opposed to slavery, but in November 1837, following the murder of Elijah P. Lovejoy, editor of an antislavery newspaper in Alton, Ohio, Brown publicly declared his personal war on slavery and committed himself to its destruction. He had come to believe that the only way to end slavery was through the use of violence. Thus, in 1855, Brown joined with five of his sons in an attempt to help bring the Kansas Territory into the Union as a free state. With antislavery and proslavery factions battling for control of the land and of the vote, "Bleeding Kansas" became a microcosm of the future Civil War; in the end, Kansas emerged as a free state (incorporated on January 29, 1861). By then, Brown had made himself a legend and a wanted man primarily because of his actions following the sack of Lawrence, Kansas, by proslavery factions on May 21, 1856. To avenge the murders of five Lawrence residents, Brown ordered and carried out the murder of five proslavery men who lived along the banks of the Pottawatomie Creek. This incident came to be known as the Pottawatomie Massacre.

Rendered a fugitive, Brown became a hero to white and black abolitionists alike. Fleeing to the East, he was welcomed and sheltered, and he gained financial backers, including the "Secret Six"—a group of wealthy, white abolitionists who approved of his plans to use violence to end slavery. Also known as the "Committee of Six," the group included Thomas Wentworth Higginson, minister and author; Samuel Gridley Howe, physician, social reformer, and philanthropist; Theodore Parker, Unitarian minister and social reformer; Franklin Sanborn, journalist, educator, and biographer of John Brown (1885); Gerrit Smith, philanthropist and politician; and George Luther Stearns, a wealthy industrialist. Brown's original plan involved rescuing slaves from the slave states a few at a time, but it eventually escalated into plans for a slave insurrection. In order to follow through on either plan, he felt that he needed the help of free blacks; thus, he attempted to gain the support

Time Line

1800

■ May 9
John Brown is born in Torrington, Connecticut.

1830

■ July 27
Osborne Anderson is born in West Fallowfield, Pennsylvania.

1850

■ September 18
As part of the Compromise of 1850, the Fugitive Slave Act of 1850 is passed, by which northerners are forbidden to help fugitive slaves escape and ordered to aid in their return to their owners.

1854

■ May 30
Through the Kansas-Nebraska Act, residents of the two new territories are allowed to vote on whether their territory will enter the Union as a slave state or a free state; five of Brown's sons subsequently move to Kansas to help ensure that it enters as a free state.

1856

■ May
Following the sack of Lawrence, Kansas, by proslavery forces, Brown orders the murder of five proslavery settlers at Pottawatomie Creek; Brown becomes a wanted man and leaves Kansas in September.

1857

■ Brown travels throughout New England recruiting financial backers for his planned raid, including the Secret Six; he orders one thousand pikes in Connecticut for the purpose of arming slaves.

1858

■ April
Anderson meets Brown during the latter's first visit to Chatham, Canada West, in preparation for the Chatham Convention.

■ May 8–10
Brown, Anderson, Martin Delany, and other abolitionists attend the Chatham Convention.

of prominent black abolitionists such as Frederick Douglass, Harriet Tubman, and Martin Delany.

Brown's attempts to recruit black assistance led to his planning a conference at Chatham, in Canada West (now Ontario, Canada), where he recruited Osborne Anderson. Brown paid his first visit to Chatham in April 1858 in preparation for the Chatham Convention of May 8–10, 1858. While in town, Brown stayed with members of the Shadd family, which was also sheltering Anderson; they offered Brown the use of their printing press to record and spread his ideas. His goal was to recruit black Canadian abolitionists to take part in his planned slave insurrection in the South. Thirty-four blacks from the local area attended the convention; Brown brought twelve of his followers—eleven white and one black. Delany organized the convention and served as chairman; Anderson served as secretary. Brown used the convention to lay out his "Provisional Constitution and Ordinances for the People of the United States," with the purpose of establishing his credibility as a careful planner and highlighting his differences from other leaders of slave insurrections, such as Nat Turner.

Although Brown gained the support of black Canadian abolitionists at the convention, he was unwilling to reveal many specific details about his plans. But by the summer of 1859, his plans were in place, and John Brown, Jr., returned to Chatham in August 1859 to issue a call to arms among those who had attended the convention. Unfortunately for Brown, over a year had gone by, and support for his plans had dwindled. Mary Ann Shadd, however, felt that someone needed to represent the Chatham contingent, and Anderson volunteered. Thus, he became one of only two Canadians to take part in the raid (the other being Stewart Taylor).

Brown led the raid of the arsenal at Harpers Ferry, Virginia, on October 16, 1859. He then had only twenty-one followers, including five blacks and sixteen whites. He led eighteen of them into Harpers Ferry, and they quickly captured two bridges, the arsenal, the rifle factory, and the engine house. But by noon on October 17, militia groups arrived from nearby locales and attacked Brown's men who were holding the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad bridge. Thus, Brown and his men were cut off from their major escape route. After an attack on the engine house and on Brown's men at the rifle factory, it seemed clear that all was lost. The local militia was later joined by Colonel Robert E. Lee and ninety U.S. marines. On the morning of October 18, Brown was asked to surrender; following his refusal, Lee's marines attacked the engine house, capturing Brown and those of his men who were still alive. Anderson and Albert Hazlett were the only two men to escape from Harpers Ferry itself (as the other five accomplices who escaped were not in Harpers Ferry). Anderson and Hazlett made their way back toward Chambersburg, Pennsylvania, but separated before they reached their goal. Anderson made it to Chambersburg and from there proceeded to York, to Philadelphia, and thence to Canada. Hazlett, on the other hand, was captured near Newville, Pennsylvania, and returned to Virginia, where he was tried, convicted, and hanged. As for Brown, he was captured on October 18; convicted of murder, treason, and inciting a slave insurrection on November 2 at the Charles Town courthouse; and hanged on December 2, to be buried on his farm in North Elba, New York.

Anderson was thus the only one of Brown's men to witness the events at Harpers Ferry and live to tell about them. With the assistance of Shadd, Anderson then wrote A Voice from Harper's Ferry, published in Boston in 1861. Subsequent to Brown's raid, the South, believing itself more and more threatened by northern abolitionists, began to arm; eighteen months later, the Civil War began.

About the Author

Osborne Perry Anderson was an abolitionist, author, and political activist and one of five black raiders who followed John Brown in his attack on the arsenal at Harpers Ferry in 1859. He was born free in West Fallowfield, Pennsylvania. His father, Vincent Anderson, moved the family to West Goshen (near West Chester) around 1850. There Anderson met the Shadds, a family of black abolitionists. In the early 1850s he followed them to Chatham, Canada West, one of several Canadian communities in which free blacks and fugitive slaves from the United States could find a haven. Blacks could be full citizens in Canada, and it is estimated that forty to fifty thousand African Americans had moved there by 1850. Anderson lived with the Shadd family and became a printer's apprentice at the Provincial Freeman, a newspaper founded by Mary Ann Shadd, the first black woman an editor on the continent. Thus, Anderson was in Chatham when Brown planned and held his convention there.

Unlike many other recruits, Anderson paid his own way to the rally point of Chambersburg, Pennsylvania, arriving on September 16, 1859. There, he stayed with a local black barber named Henry Watson, and on September 24 he walked (by night) from Chambersburg to meet Brown near the Kennedy Farm in Maryland, a place that Brown had rented to be used as a staging area for the raid. The raid on the federal arsenal at Harpers Ferry, Virginia, began on October 16, 1859, and ended two days later. Anderson, being the only one of Brown's men to witness the raid and live to tell the story, proceeded to write A Voice from Harper's Ferry, which was edited by Shadd, his mentor, and published in 1861. Along with an estimated fifty thousand other Canadians, Anderson went south to the United States when the Civil War began. While some historians believe that he served in the army, there is no record of such service; he did, however, work as a recruiter for the Union army's U.S. Colored Troops.

Following the war, Anderson resided in the United States, where he had trouble supporting himself. He revisited Harpers Ferry a year before his death, pointing out strategic scenes to Richard Hinton, who would author John Brown and His Men: With Some Account of the Roads They Traveled to Reach Harper's Ferry (1894). In 1872, Anderson died penniless in Washington, D.C., and was buried in a pauper's grave. Because of his abolitionist activities, Anderson is claimed by Canada as a national hero.

Time Line

1859

- October 16 The raid at Harpers Ferry begins, ending in Brown's defeat and capture two days later.
- December 2 Convicted of murder, treason, and inciting a slave insurrection, Brown is hanged.

1861

- January Anderson publishes A Voice from Harper's Ferry.
- April 12 Fort Sumter, in Charleston, South Carolina, is fired upon by Confederate forces, marking the beginning of the Civil War.

1863

- January 1 Abraham Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation abolishes slavery in the southern slave states.

1865

- December 18 The Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution abolishes slavery in the United States.

1872

- December 13 Anderson dies in Washington, D.C.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

In A Voice from Harper's Ferry (in which the author, as have others, added an apostrophe to the town's name), Anderson narrates his participation in Brown's raid on Harpers Ferry of October 1859, including events leading up to the raid and his escape afterward. Anderson journeyed to Chambersburg, Pennsylvania, in September 1859 and from there to the Kennedy Farm in Maryland, the final staging area for the raid. He gives details of life at the Kennedy Farm and the final council meeting on October 16, when Brown gave eleven specific orders to the raiders regarding their duties during the raid. He next describes the raid itself, including the capture of prisoners, the engine house, the armory, the two bridges, and the rifle factory. The arming of slaves occurred on October 17, as did the attack on Brown's men by federal troops. After describing Brown's capture, Anderson relates his escape with Albert Hazlett, Hazlett's capture, and the fate of the other five raiders who escaped. Like Hazlett, John Cook escaped but was captured and returned to Virginia for trial. Thus, only five of Brown's men survived the raid. Anderson's final chapter details the responses of slaves during the raid and their participation in and support of the raid. The book ends with a series of poems praising Brown.

Gerrit Smith, one of the Secret Six (Library of Congress)

♦ Preface

Because he was an eyewitness of the events of October 16 and 17, 1859, during the raid on Harpers Ferry, Anderson feels compelled to give an account of those events. He establishes his credibility by arguing that no one can question the fact that he was one of Brown's raiders; after all, he points out that he is a wanted man. He also notes that only two raiders escaped from Harpers Ferry—he himself and Hazlett. But since Hazlett was later captured in Pennsylvania, returned to Virginia, and hanged, Anderson is the only one left alive who can give a true account of what happened from the point of view of the raiders. In fact, five other raiders escaped, but they were not in Harpers Ferry itself. Owen Brown, F. J. Merriam, and Barclay Coppic had remained at the Kennedy Farm in Maryland to guard the arms stored there; Cook and Charles P. Tidd had been in Harpers Ferry early on October 16 but were ordered by Brown to go to the Kennedy Farm to aid in moving arms closer to Harpers Ferry.

♦ Chapter X

In Chapter X, Anderson begins with the entry of the raiders into the town of Harpers Ferry and shows how easily Brown and eighteen of his men captured the two bridges into and out of town, the engine house, the arsenal, and the rifle factory. (Three of the twenty-one raiders meanwhile remained at the Kennedy Farm to guard the weapons.) Three watchmen were taken prisoner along with several townspeople who were walking about. Anderson announces proudly, "These places were all taken, and the prisoners secured, without the snap of a gun, or any violence whatever."

Anderson is intent on showing the fear and cowardice of some of the southerners who were taken prisoner. For example, the watchman at the bridge "asked them to spare his life." The watchman guarding the engine-house yard at Harpers Ferry refused to open the gate but "commenced to cry," and when the raiders took Colonel Lewis Washington prisoner, he begged for his life and "cried heartily when he found he must submit." Colonel Washington was also "taken aback" when told to present to Anderson "the famous sword formerly presented by Frederic [the Great] to his illustrious kinsman, George Washington"; Frederick the Great, the king of Prussia, was an admirer of Washington and reportedly had sent the sword to him in 1780. When John Allstadt, another plantation owner, was taken prisoner, "he went into as great a fever of excitement as Washington had done." Evidently, awareness of previous slave insurrections convinced these men that they were doomed. Nat Turner's 1831 rebellion, for example, was still fresh in the memory of Virginia's slave owners, since it had occurred in Southampton County, Virginia, and had resulted in the deaths of some fifty-five white people. Perhaps because he understood this fear and wished to show the difference between Brown's insurrection and previous ones, Anderson makes a point of telling his readers that each prisoner was assured by his captors that he would not be harmed.

In this chapter, Anderson also discusses encounters with local blacks who were asked to "circulate the news," with the result that "many colored men gathered to the scene of action." He also reports the first death: Ironically, a free black who worked as a baggage handler, Heyward Shepherd (referred to as "Haywood"), was shot by the raiders at the bridge—before he could be identified as black—because he refused an order to halt.

♦ Chapter XI

Anderson records the spread of terror and fear among the residents of Harpers Ferry and among the prisoners. More prisoners were taken, and Brown ordered Tidd, Cook, and William Leeman, along with fourteen armed slaves, to begin moving the secured arms from the Kennedy Farm to a schoolhouse near the ferry. Brown also ordered Anderson to begin passing out pikes, from Brown's wagon, to the slaves from the Washington and Allstadt plantations as well as to other blacks who had arrived on the scene.

As in Chapter X, Anderson dwells on the cowardice of white southerners: "The cowardly Virginians submitted like sheep, without resistance, … until the marines came down." He also introduces a new topic—Brown's desire to make arrangements about the prisoners, which causes some delay, though, as Anderson points out, it was "no part of the original plan." According to Anderson, "This tardiness … was eventually the cause of our defeat."

U.S. Marines storming the engine house at Harpers Ferry (Library of Congress)

♦ Chapter XII

Anderson, who was stationed in the arsenal—his being in that location saved his life—reports on the initial triumph of Brown's men over the armed troops who arrived to put down the insurrection. Brown ordered his men out into the street, and they fired upon the troops, scattering them. Anderson declares that "they seemed not to realize, at first, that we would fire upon them," and he notes their hasty retreat to the bridge, where they awaited reinforcements. He mentions the death of Dangerfield Newby, shot by a man hiding in a store. The "cowardly murderer" was quickly brought down by Shields Green.

During a lull in the fighting, Brown's prisoners requested breakfast, and he obliged by ordering food from the Wager House, a nearby hotel. Anderson attempts to set the record straight regarding the legend that Brown ordered food for his men in the heat of the conflict; rather, Anderson asserts that the Wager House offered food to Brown and his men, but he suspected the food might have been poisoned and refused it. Similarly, Anderson spends a good deal of time in this chapter further attempting to set the record straight about the myth of southern chivalry and the alleged bravery of white plantation owners. He points to the fact that the white lower classes and marines fought the raiders, while slave owners held back. He also points to the shootings of Watson Brown and A. D. Stevens, who were wounded while carrying flags of truce.

♦ Chapter XIII

In this chapter, Anderson again discusses the lack of honor that he witnessed among the raiders' opponents, especially in regard to the flags of truce and "the brutal treatment of Captain Brown and his men in the charge by the marines on the engine house." Although Brown was not captured until early Tuesday morning, October 18, when a contingent of marines commanded by Robert E. Lee stormed the engine house, while apparently Anderson and Hazlett escaped late on Monday, October 17, Anderson writes that he "saw the charge upon the engine house with the ladder" leading to "Brown's capture," which he describes in some detail. Anderson pays lofty tribute to Green, one of the black raiders who was captured by the marines: "Wiser and better men no doubt there were, but a braver man never lived than Shields Green."

♦ Chapter XIV

It is clear that Anderson feels that he either has been or may be accused of cowardice for having left Harpers Ferry; thus, he attempts to explain why he and Hazlett did not remain. Since

Essential Quotes

"Monday, the 17th of October… Gray dawn and yet brighter daylight revealed great confusion, and as the sun arose, the panic spread like wildfire. Men, women, and children could be seen leaving their homes in every direction; some seeking refuge among residents, and in quarters further away, others climbing up the hillsides, and hurrying off in various directions, evidently impelled by a sudden fear, which was plainly visible in their countenances or in their movements."

(Chapter XI)

"Hardly the skin of a slaveholder could be scratched in open fight; the cowards kept out of the way until danger was passed, sending the poor whites into the pitfalls, while they were reserved for the bragging, and to do the safe but cowardly judicial murdering afterwards."

(Chapter XII)

"On the Sunday evening of the outbreak, we visited the plantations and acquainted the slaves with our purpose to effect their liberation, the greatest enthusiasm was manifested by them—joy and hilarity beamed from every countenance. One old mother, white-haired from age and borne down with the labors of many years in bond, when told of the work in hand, replied: 'God bless you! God bless you!'"

(Chapter XIX)

"John Brown did not only capture and hold Harper's Ferry for twenty hours, but he held the whole South. He captured President Buchanan and his Cabinet, convulsed the whole country, killed Governor Wise, and dug the mine and laid the train which will eventually dissolve the union between Freedom and Slavery."

(Chapter XIX)

out of the six men originally stationed at the arsenal, he and Hazlett were the only ones left and felt that they could do nothing, they decided to escape while they still could, in order to fight another day. As they escaped, they captured a prisoner who told them that seventy "citizens" had been killed. Again, Anderson is trying to counter subsequent southern claims—in this instance, that Brown's raiders had killed only twenty southerners.

After their prisoner begged for his life and assured them that he would not inform on them, Hazlett and Anderson let him go—but having second thoughts, they soon concealed themselves. Sure enough, troops pursued them, but the two raiders fought them off, killing a few, and the troops returned to Harpers Ferry. Once more, Anderson records the lack of honor among southerners and the cowardice of the enemy.

♦ Chapter XV

Anderson admired the wisdom and courage of John Kagi, Brown's second in command, and although he does not openly criticize Brown here, Anderson notes that Kagi foresaw the danger that they were in and urged Brown early on to leave Harpers Ferry, to no avail. As the man was a participant in the assault on Kagi's position, Anderson learns from the prisoner taken by himself and Hazlett the details of Kagi's death. Anderson describes the courage of Kagi, John Copeland, Sherrard Lewis Leary, "and three colored men from the neighborhood," who defended the rifle factory against "as many as five hundred" men in all.

♦ Chapter XIX

In conventional rhetorical fashion, Anderson saves the most controversial subject for last: the actions of local slaves during the Harpers Ferry raid. In order to counter the claims of southerners "that the slaves were cowardly," he gives numerous examples to prove that they were not. They indeed supported the raid, and Brown told him that he was "agreeably disappointed in the behavior of the slaves; for he did not expect one out of ten to be willing to fight." Anderson projects, based on the examples he gives, "that hundreds of slaves were ready, and would have joined in the work, had Captain Brown's sympathies not been aroused in favor of the families of his prisoners." Again, there is a note of criticism in his appraisal of Brown's actions as commander.

Audience

Anderson's target audience consisted of both whites and blacks. He particularly wanted to show white southerners, as well as northerners, that the southerners whom Brown's party encountered at Harpers Ferry were cowards. But Anderson's most immediate audience was black. On January 1, 1861, for example, a meeting of black citizens was held at the Twelfth Street Baptist Church in Boston to promote Anderson's book. Excerpts from the book were read aloud, and a collection was taken up for Anderson, who was still a wanted man and in dire financial straits. The book, which sold for fifteen cents, was available for purchase at the Anti-Slavery Office in Boston. The book later became and remains an excellent source for biographers of Brown and historians writing about the raid on Harpers Ferry.

Questions for Further Study

1. Based on what you know about John Brown and his raid on Harpers Ferry, do you believe that he was a hero, a crazed fanatic, or perhaps a bit of both? Would your opinion change or remain the same if you knew that Virginia governor Henry Wise, a staunch southerner, personally interviewed Brown and found him to be sane and eloquent?

2. What impact did Brown's raid and the attendant publicity surrounding the event have on the course of the nation toward civil war?

3. Compare Brown's raid with the rebellion led by Nat Turner early in the century, as recounted in The Confessions of Nat Turner (1831). Do you see any similarities between the events and their impact? How were they different?

4. Try to imagine yourself living in 1850s Virginia. Do you think you would have advocated violence to end the slave system? Why or why not?

5. In the modern era, some groups resort to violent acts because they believe such acts serve a higher purpose. An example would be "eco-terrorists" who destroy logging equipment or laboratories where animal experimentation takes place. Do you think that the motives behind and effectiveness of these contemporary actions are similar to or different from those of John Brown?

Impact

Brown's raid has often been referred to as the "catalyst of the Civil War" because it widened the breach between the North and South. In the North, the philosopher and essayist Ralph Waldo Emerson and the naturalist and writer Henry David Thoreau spoke out in Brown's defense, justifying his violent acts, labeling him a hero, and comparing him to Christ because he had sacrificed his life for the slaves. Even northerners, who disapproved of Brown's violent means, believed that his end—the destruction of slavery—was ultimately good. Indeed, on the day of Brown's execution, northern church bells tolled for the martyred hero. While Brown's belief that violence was required to destroy slavery had not yet gained universal approval among northerners, his actions and his much-quoted antislavery testimony during the trial had given them food for thought; thus, his ideas began gaining support.

In the South, of course, Brown's actions were universally condemned, but, more important, southerners lived in fear of similar future attacks. Before Brown's raid, slave owners had focused on the threats posed by northern abolitionists who had established the Underground Railroad to aid runaway slaves and on their attempts to keep new states from being admitted to the Union as slave states. After Brown's raid, slave owners feared abolitionists who would arm their slaves and lead them in slave insurrections. Such fears led many southerners to support South Carolina's Governor William Henry Gist when, in November 1859, he called for what he believed was the only possible solution to the threat posed by Brown's raid: secession from the Union and the establishment of a confederacy of southern states.

Anderson's book seems to have had minimal impact on any general audience in its own day, and indeed it almost disappeared. But it has become a popular source among historians of today who focus on black studies and the abolitionist movement, particularly those seeking to establish proof of participation by local blacks in the raid on Harpers Ferry.

See also The Confessions of Nat Turner (1831); Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Emancipation Proclamation (1863); Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1865).

Further Reading

■ Books

Du Bois, W. E. B. John Brown. New York: International Publishers, 1962.

Finkelman, Paul, ed. His Soul Goes Marching On: Responses to John Brown and the Harpers Ferry Raid. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1995.

Hinton, Richard J. John Brown and His Men: With Some Account of the Roads They Traveled to Reach Harper's Ferry. 1894. Reprint. New York: Arno Press, 1968.

Libby, Jean. Black Voices from Harpers Ferry: Osborne Anderson and the John Brown Raid. Palo Alto, Calif.: Libby, 1979.

McCarthy, Timothy P., and John Stauffer, eds. Prophets of Protest: Reconsidering the History of American Abolitionism. New York: New Press, 2006.

Oates, Stephen B. To Purge This Land with Blood: A Biography of John Brown. 2nd ed. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1985.

Quarles, Benjamin. Allies for Freedom: Blacks and John Brown. New York: Oxford University Press, 1974.

Russo, Peggy A., and Paul Finkelman, eds.Terrible Swift Sword: The Legacy of John Brown. Athens: Ohio University Press, 2005.

Sanborn, Franklin B. The Life and Letters of John Brown: Liberator of Kansas and Martyr of Virginia. 1885. Reprint. New York: Negro Universities Press, 1969.

Stowe, Harriet Beecher. Uncle Tom's Cabin. New York: Signet Classics, 2008.

Villard, Oswald Garrison. John Brown, 1800–1859: A Biography Fifty Years After. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1943.

■ Web Sites

"John Brown's Provisional Constitution." University of Missouri–Kansas City School of Law "Famous Trials" Web site. http://www.law.umkc.edu/faculty/projects/Ftrials/johnbrown/brownconstitution.html.

—Peggy A. Russo

Document Text

Osborne P. Anderson: A Voice from Harper's Ferry

Preface

My sole purpose in publishing the following Narrative is to save from oblivion the facts connected with one of the most important movements of this age, with reference to the overthrow of American slavery. My own personal experience in it, under the orders of Capt. Brown, on the 16th and 17th of October, 1859, as the only man alive who was at Harper's Ferry during the entire time the unsuccessful groping after these facts, by individuals, impossible to be obtained, except from an actor in the scene and the conviction that the cause of impartial liberty requires this duty at my hands alone have been the motives for writing and circulating the little book herewith presented.

I will not under such circumstances, insult nor burden the intelligent with excuses for defects in composition, nor for the attempt to give the facts. A plain unadorned, truthful story is wanted, and that by one who knows what he says, who is known to have been at the great encounter, and to have labored in shaping the same. My identity as a member of Capt. Brown's company cannot be questioned, successfully, by any who are bent upon suppressing the truth; neither will it be by any in Canada or the United States familiar with John Brown and his plans, as those know his men personally, or by reputation, who enjoyed his confidence sufficiently to know thoroughly his plans.

The readers of this narrative will therefore keep steadily in view this main point that they are perusing a story of events which have happened under the eye of the great Captain, or are incidental thereto, and not a compendium of the "plans" of Capt. Brown; for as his plans were not consummated, and as their fulfilment is committed to the future, no one to whom they are known will recklessly expose all of them to the public gaze. Much has been given as true that never happened; much has been omitted that should have been made known; many things have been left unsaid, because, up to within a short time, but two could say them; one of them has been offered up, a sacrifice to the Moloch, Slavery; being that other one, I propose to perform the duty, trusting to that portion of the public who love the right for an appreciation of my endeavor. O.P.A.…

Chapter X. The Capture of Harper's Ferry—Col. A. D. Stevens and Party Sally Out To the Plantations—What We Saw, Heard, Did, Etc.

As John H. Kagi and A. D. Stevens entered the bridge, as ordered in the fifth charge, the watchman, being at the other end, came toward them with a lantern in his hand. When up to them, they told him he was their prisoner, and detained him a few minutes, when he asked them to spare his life. They replied, they did not intend to harm him; the object was to free the slaves, and he would have to submit to them for a time, in order that the purpose might be carried out.

Captain Brown now entered the bridge in his wagon, followed by the rest of us, until we reached that part where Kagi and Stevens held their prisoner, when he ordered Watson Brown and Stewart Taylor to take the positions assigned them in order sixth, and the rest of us to proceed to the engine house. We started for the engine house, taking the prisoner along with us. When we neared the gates of the engine-house yard, we found them locked, and the watchman on the inside. He was told to open the gates, but refused, and commenced to cry. The men were then ordered by Captain Brown to open the gates forcibly, which was done, and the watchman taken prisoner. The two prisoners were left in the custody of Jerry Anderson and Adolphus Thompson, and A. D. Stevens arranged the men to take possession of the Armory and rifle factory. About this time, there was apparently much excitement. People were passing back and forth in the town, and before we could do much, we had to take several prisoners. After the prisoners were secured, we passed to the opposite side of the street and took the Armory, and Albert Hazlett and Edwin Coppic were ordered to hold it for the time being.

The capture of the rifle factory was the next work to be done. When we went there, we told the watchman who was outside of the building our business, and asked him to go along with us, as we had come to take possession of the town, and make use of the Armory in carrying out our object. He obeyed the command without hesitation. John H. Kagi and John Copeland were placed in the Armory, and the prisoners taken to the engine house. Following the capture of the Armory, Oliver Brown and William Thompson were ordered to take possession of the bridge leading out of town, across the Shenandoah river, which they immediately did. These places were all taken, and the prisoners secured, without the snap of a gun, or any violence whatever.

The town being taken, Brown, Stevens, and the men who had no post in charge, returned to the engine house, where council was held, after which Captain Stevens, Tidd, Cook, Shields Green, Leary and myself went to the country. On the road, we met some colored men, to whom we made known our purpose, when they immediately agreed to join us. They said they had been long waiting for an opportunity of the kind. Stevens then asked them to go around among the colored people and circulate the news, when each started off in a different direction. The result was that many colored men gathered to the scene of action. The first prisoner taken by us was Colonel Lewis Washington. When we neared his house, Capt. Stevens placed Leary and Shields Green to guard the approaches to the house, the one at the side, the other in front. We then knocked, but no one answering, although females were looking from upper windows, we entered the building and commenced a search for the proprietor. Col. Washington opened his room door, and begged us not to kill him. Capt. Stevens replied, "You are our prisoner," when he stood as if speechless or petrified. Stevens further told him to get ready to go to the Ferry; that he had come to abolish slavery, not to take life but in self-defence, but that he must go along. The Colonel replied: "You can have my slaves, if you will let me remain." "No," said the Captain, "you must go along too; so get ready." After saying this, Stevens left the house for a time, and with Green, Leary and Tidd proceeded to the "Quarters," giving the prisoner in charge of Cook and myself. The male slaves were gathered together in a short time, when horses were tackled to the Colonel's two-horse carriage and four-horse wagon, and both vehicles brought to the front of the house.

During this time, Washington was walking the floor, apparently much excited. When the Captain came in, he went to the sideboard, took out his whiskey, and offered us something to drink, but he was refused. His fire-arms were next demanded, when he brought forth one double-barreled gun, one small rifle, two horse-pistols and a sword. Nothing else was asked of him. The Colonel cried heartily when he found he must submit, and appeared taken aback when, on delivering up the famous sword formerly presented by Frederic to his illustrious kinsman, George Washington, Capt. Stevens told me to step forward and take it. Washington was secured and placed in his wagon, the women of the family making great outcries, when the party drove forward to Mr. John Allstadt's. After making known our business to him, he went into as great a fever of excitement as Washington had done. We could have his slaves, also, if we would only leave him. This, of course, was contrary to our plans and instructions. He hesitated, puttered around, fumbled and meditated for a long time. At last, seeing no alternative, he got ready, when the slaves were gathered up from about the quarters by their own consent, and all placed in Washington's big wagon and returned to the Ferry.

One old colored lady, at whose house we stopped, a little way from the town, had a good time over the message we took her. This liberating the slaves was the very thing she had longed for, prayed for, and dreamed about, time and again; and her heart was full of rejoicing over the fulfilment of a prophecy which had been her faith for long years. While we were absent from the Ferry, the train of cars for Baltimore arrived, and was detained. A colored man named Haywood, employed upon it, went from the Wager House up to the entrance to the bridge, where the train stood, to assist with the baggage. He was ordered to stop by the sentinels stationed at the bridge, which he refused to do, but turned to go in an opposite direction, when he was fired upon, and received a mortal wound. Had he stood when ordered, he would not have been harmed. No one knew at the time whether he was white or colored, but his movements were such as to justify the sentinels in shooting him, as he would not stop when commanded. The first firing happened at that time, and the only firing, until after daylight on Monday morning.

Chapter XI. The Events of Monday, Oct. 17—Arming The Slaves—Terror. In the Slaveholding Camp—Important Losses to Our Party—The Fate of Kagi—Prisoners Accumulate—Workmen at the Kennedy Farm, Etc.

Monday, the 17th of October, was a time of stirring and exciting events. In consequence of the movements of the night before, we were prepared for commotion and tumult, but certainly not for more than we beheld around us. Gray dawn and yet brighter daylight revealed great confusion, and as the sun arose, the panic spread like wildfire. Men, women and children could be seen leaving their homes in every direction; some seeking refuge among residents, and in quarters further away, others climbing up the hillsides, and hurrying off in various directions, evidently impelled by a sudden fear which was plainly visible in their countenances or in their movements.

Document Text

Capt. Brown was all activity, though I could not help thinking that at times he appeared somewhat puzzled. He ordered Sherrard Lewis Leary, and four slaves, and a free man belonging in the neighborhood, to join John Henry Kagi and John Copeland at the rifle factory, which they immediately did. Kagi, and all except Copeland, were subsequently killed, but not before having communicated with Capt. Brown, as will be set forth further along.

As fast as the workmen came to the building or persons appeared in the street near the engine house, they were taken prisoners, and directly after sunrise, the detained train was permitted to start for the eastward. After the departure of the train, quietness prevailed for a short time; a number of prisoners were already in the engine house, and of the many colored men living in the neighborhood, who had assembled in the town, a number were armed for the work.

Capt. Brown ordered Capts. Charles P. Tidd, Wm. H. Leeman, John E. Cook, and some fourteen slaves, to take Washington's four-horse wagon, and to join the company under Capt. Owen Brown, consisting of F. J. Merriam and Barclay Coppic, who had been left at the Farm the night previous, to guard the place and the arms. The company, thus reinforced, proceeded, under Owen Brown, to move the arms and goods from the Farm down to the school-house in the mountains, three-fourths of a mile from the Ferry.

Capt. Brown next ordered me to take the pikes out of the wagon in which he rode to the Ferry, and to place them in the hands of the colored men who had come with us from the plantations, and others who had come forward without having had communication with any of our party. It was out of the circumstances connected with the fulfilment of this order, that the false charge against "Anderson" as leader, or "ringleader," of the negroes, grew.

The spectators, about this time, became apparently wild with fright and excitement. The number of prisoners was magnified to hundreds, and the judgment-day could not have presented more terrors, in its awful and certain prospective punishment to the justly condemned for the wicked deeds of a life-time, the chief of which would no doubt be slaveholding, than did Capt. Brown's operations.

The prisoners were also terror-stricken. Some wanted to go home to see their families, as if for the last time. The privilege was granted them, under escort, and they were brought back again. Edwin Coppic, one of the sentinels at the Armory gate, was fired at by one of the citizens, but the ball did not reach him, when one of the insurgents close by put up his rifle, and made the enemy bite the dust.

Among the arms taken from Col. Washington was one double-barrel gun. This weapon was loaded by Leeman with buckshot, and placed in the hands of an elderly slave man, early in the morning. After the cowardly charge upon Coppic, this old man was ordered by Capt. Stevens to arrest a citizen. The old man ordered him to halt, which he refused to do, when instantly the terrible load was discharged into him, and he fell, and expired without a struggle.

After these incidents, time passed away till the arrival of the United States troops, without any further attack upon us. The cowardly Virginians submitted like sheep, without resistance, from that time until the marines came down. Meanwhile, Capt. Brown, who was considering a proposition for release from his prisoners, passed back and forth from the Armory to the bridge, speaking words of comfort and encouragement to his men. "Hold on a little longer, boys," said he, "until I get matters arranged with the prisoners." This tardiness on the part of our brave leader was sensibly felt to be an omen of evil by some us, and was eventually the cause of our defeat. It was no part of the original plan to hold on to the Ferry, or to parley with prisoners; but by so doing, time was afforded to carry the news of its capture to several points, and forces were thrown into the place, which surrounded us.

At eleven o'clock, Capt. Brown dispatched William Thompson from the Ferry up to Kennedy Farm with the news that we had peaceful possession of the town, and with directions to the men to continue on moving the things. He went; but before he could get back, troops had begun to pour in and the general encounter commenced.

Chapter XII. Reception to the Troops—They Retreat to the Bridge—A Prisoner—Death of Dangerfield Newby—William Thompson—The Mountains Alive—Flag of Truce—The Engine House Taken.

It was about twelve o'clock in the day when we were first attacked by the troops. Prior to that, Capt. Brown, in anticipation of further trouble, had girded to his side the famous sword taken from Col. Lewis Washington the night before, and with that memorable weapon, he commanded his men against General Washington's own State.

Document Text

When the Captain received the news that the troops had entered the bridge from the Maryland side, he, with some of his men, went into the street, and sent a message to the Arsenal for us to come forth also. We hastened to the street as ordered, when he said "The troops are on the bridge, coming into town; we will give them a warm reception." He then walked around amongst us, giving us words of encouragement, in this wise:—"Men! be cool! Don't waste your powder and shot! Take aim, and make every shot count!" "The troops will look for us to retreat on their first appearance; be careful to shoot first." Our men were well supplied with firearms, but Capt. Brown had no rifle at that time; his only weapon was the sword before mentioned.

The troops soon came out of the bridge, and up the street facing us, we occupying an irregular position. When they got within sixty or seventy yards, Capt. Brown said, "Let go upon them!" which we did, when several of them fell. Again and again the dose was repeated.

There was now consternation among the troops. From marching in solid martial columns, they became scattered. Some hastened to seize upon and bear up the wounded and dying,—several lay dead upon the ground. They seemed not to realize, at first, that we would fire upon them, but evidently expected we would be driven out by them without firing. Capt. Brown seemed fully to understand the matter, and hence, very properly and in our defence, undertook to forestall their movements. The consequence of their unexpected reception was, after leaving several of their dead on the field, they beat a confused retreat into the bridge, and there stayed under cover until reinforcements came to the Ferry.

On the retreat of the troops, we were ordered back to our former post. While going, Dangerfield Newby, one of our colored men, was shot through the head by a person who took aim at him from a brick store window, on the opposite side of the street, and who was there for the purpose of firing upon us. Newby was a brave fellow. He was one of my comrades at the Arsenal. He fell at my side, and his death was promptly avenged by Shields Green, the Zouave of the band, who afterwards met his fate calmly on the gallows, with John Copeland. Newby was shot twice; at the first fire, he fell on his side and returned it; as he lay, a second shot was fired, and the ball entered his head. Green raised his rifle in an instant, and brought down the cowardly murderer, before the latter could get his gun back through the sash.

There was comparative quiet for a time, except that the citizens seemed to be wild with terror. Men, women and children forsook the place in great haste, climbing up hillsides and scaling the mountains. The latter seemed to be alive with white fugitives, fleeing from their doomed city. During this time, Wm. Thompson, who was returning from his errand to the Kennedy Farm, was surrounded on the bridge by the railroad men, who next came up, taken a prisoner to the Wager House, tied hand and foot, and, at a late hour of the afternoon, cruelly murdered by being riddled with balls and thrown headlong on the rocks.

Late in the morning, some of his prisoners told Capt. Brown that they would like to have breakfast, when he sent word forthwith to the Wager House to that effect, and they were supplied. He did not order breakfast for himself and men, as was currently but falsely stated at the time, as he suspected foul play; on the contrary, when solicited to have breakfast so provided for him, he refused. Between two and three o'clock in the afternoon. armed men could be seen coming from every direction; soldiers were marching and counter-marching; and on the mountains. a host of blood-thirsty ruffians swarmed, waiting for their opportunity to pounce upon the little band. The fighting commenced in earnest after the arrival of fresh troops. Volley upon volley was discharged, and the echoes from the hills, the shrieks of the townspeople, and the groans of their wounded and dying, all of which filled the air, were truly frightful. The Virginians may well conceal their losses, and Southern chivalry may hide its brazen head, for their boasted bravery was well tested that day, and in no way to their advantage. It is remarkable, that except that one fool-hardy colored man was reported buried, no other funeral is mentioned, although the Mayor and other citizens are known to have fallen. Had they reported the true number, their disgrace would have been more apparent; so they wisely (?) concluded to be silent.

The fight at Harper's Ferry also disproved the current idea that slaveholders will lay down their lives for their property. Col. Washington, the representative of the old hero, stood "blubbering like a great calf at supposed danger"; while the laboring white classes and non-slaveholders, with the marines (mostly gentlemen from "furrin" parts), were the men who faced the bullets of John Brown and his men. Hardly the skin of a slaveholder could be scratched in open fight; the cowards kept out of the way until danger was passed, sending the poor whites into the pitfalls, while they were reserved for the bragging, and to do the safe but cowardly judicial murdering afterwards.

Document Text

As strangers poured in, the enemy took positions round about, so as to prevent any escape, within shooting distance of the engine house and Arsenal. Capt. Brown, seeing their manouevres, said: "We will hold on to our three positions, if they are unwilling to come to terms, and die like men."

All this time, the fight was progressing; no powder and ball were wasted. We shot from under cover, and took deadly aim. For an hour before the flag of truce was sent out, the firing was uninterrupted, and one and another of the enemy were constantly dropping to the earth.

One of the Captain's plans was to keep up communication between his three points. In carrying out this idea, Jerry Anderson went to the rifle factory, to see Kagi and his men. Kagi, fearing that we would be overpowered by numbers if the Captain delayed leaving, sent word by Anderson to advise him to leave the town at once. This word Anderson communicated to the Captain, and told us also at the Arsenal. The message sent back to Kagi was, to hold out for a few minutes longer, when we would all evacuate the place. Those few minutes proved disastrous, for then it was that the troops before spoken of came pouring in, increased by crowds of men from the surrounding country. After an hour's hard fighting, and when the enemy were blocking up the avenues of escape, Capt. Brown sent out his son Watson with a flag of truce, but no respect was paid to it; he was fired upon, and wounded severely. He returned to the engine house, and fought bravely after that for fully an hour and a half, when he received a mortal wound, which he struggled under until the next day. The contemptible and savage manner in which the flag of truce had been received, induced severe measures in our defence, in the hour and a half before the next one was sent out. The effect of our work was, that the troops ceased to fire at the buildings, as we clearly had the advantage of position.

Capt. A. D. Stevens was next sent out with a flag, with what success I will presently show. Meantime, Jeremiah Anderson, who had brought the message from Kagi previously, was sent by Capt. Brown with another message to John Henrie, but before he got far on the street he was fired upon and wounded. He returned at once to the engine house, where he survived but a short time. The ball, it was found, had entered the right side in such manner that death necessarily ensued speedily.

Capt. Stevens was fired upon several times while carrying his flag of truce, and received severe wounds, as I was informed that day, not being myself in a position to see him after. He was captured, and taken to the Wager House, where he was kept until the close of the struggle in the evening, when he was placed with the rest of our party who had been captured.

After the capture of Stevens, desperate fighting was done by both sides. The marines forced their way inside the engine-house yard, and commanded Capt. Brown to surrender, which he refused to do, but said in reply, that he was willing to fight them, if they would allow him first to withdraw his men to the second lock on the Maryland side. As might be expected, the cowardly hordes refused to entertain such a proposition, but continued their assault, to cut off communication between our several parties. The men at the Kennedy Farm having received such a favorable message in the early part of the day, through Thompson, were ignorant of the disastrous state of affairs later in the day. Could they have known the truth, and come down in time, the result would have been very different; we should not have been captured that day. A handful of determined men, as they were, by taking a position on the Maryland side, when the troops made their attack and retreated to the bridge for shelter, would have placed the enemy between two fires. Thompson's news prevented them from hurrying down, as they otherwise would have done, and thus deprived us of able assistance from Owen Brown, a host in himself, and Tidd, Merriam and Coppic, the brave fellows composing that band.

The climax of murderous assaults on that memorable day was the final capture of the engine house, with the old Captain and his handful of associates. This outrageous burlesque upon civilized warfare must have a special chapter to itself, as it concentrates more of Southern littleness and cowardice than is often believed to be true.

Chapter XIII. The Capture of Captain John Brown at the Engine House.

One great difference between savages and civilized nations is the improved mode of warfare adopted by the latter. Flags of truce are always entitled to consideration, and an attacking party would make a wide departure from military usage, were they not to give opportunity for the besieged to capitulate, or to surrender at discretion. Looking at the Harper's Ferry combat in the light of civilized usage, even where one side might be regarded as insurrectionary, the brutal treatment of Captain Brown and his men in the charge by the marines on the engine house is deserving of severest condemnation, and is one of those blood-thirsty occurrences, dark enough in depravity to disgrace a century.

Captain Hazlett and myself being in the Arsenal opposite, saw the charge upon the engine house with the ladder, which resulted in opening the doors to the marines, and finally in Brown's capture. The old hero and his men were hacked and wounded with indecent rage, and at last brought out of the house and laid prostrate upon the ground, mangled and bleeding as they were. A formal surrender was required of Captain Brown, which he refused, knowing how little favor he would receive, if unarmed, at the hands of that infuriated mob. All of our party who went from the Farm, save the Captain, Shields Green, Edwin Coppic and Watson Brown (who had received a mortal wound some time before), the men at the Farm, and Hazlett and I, were either dead or captured before this time; the particulars of whose fate we learned still later in the day, as I shall presently show. Of the four prisoners taken at the engine house, Shields Green, the most inexorable of all our party, a very Turco in his hatred against the stealers of men, was under Captain Hazlett, and consequently of our little band at the Arsenal; but when we were ordered by Captain Brown to return to our positions, after having driven the troops into the bridge, he mistook the order, and went to the engine house instead of with his own party. Had he remained with us, he might have eluded the vigilant Virginians. As it was, he was doomed, as is well known, and became a free-will offering for freedom, with his comrade, John Copeland. Wiser and better men no doubt there were, but a braver man never lived than Shields Green.

Chapter XIV. Setting for the Reasons Why O.P. Anderson and A. Hazlett Escaped from the Arsenal, Instead of Remaining, When They Had Nothing to Do—Took a Prisoner, and What Resulted to Them, And to this Narrative, Therefrom—Pursuit, When Somebody Got Killed, And Other Bodies Wounded.

Of the men assigned a position in the arsenal by Captain Brown, four were either slain or captured; and Hazlett and myself, the only ones remaining, never left our position until we saw, with feelings of intense sadness, that we could be of no further avail to our commander, he being a prisoner in the hands of the Virginians. We therefore, upon consultation, concluded it was better to retreat while it was possible, as our work for the day was clearly finished, and gain a position where in the future we could work with better success, than to recklessly invite capture and brutality at the hands of our enemies. The charge of deserting our brave old leader and of fleeing from danger has been circulated to our detriment, but I have the consolation of knowing that, reckless as were the half-civilized hordes against whom we contended the entire day, and much as they might wish to disparage his men, they would never have thus charged us. They know better. John Brown's men at Harper's Ferry were and are a unit in their devotion to John Brown and the cause he espoused. To have deserted him would have been to belie every manly characteristic for which Albert Hazlett, at least, was known by the party to be distinguished, at the same time that it would have endangered the future safety of such deserter or deserters. John Brown gave orders; those orders must be obeyed, so long as Captain Brown was in a position to enforce them; once unable to command, from death, being a prisoner, or otherwise, the command devolved upon John Henry Kagi. Before Captain Brown was made prisoner, Captain Kagi had ceased to live, though had he been living, all communication between our post and him had been long cut off. We could not aid Captain Brown by remaining. We might, by joining the men at the Farm, devise plans for his succor; or our experience might become available on some future occasion.

The charge of running away from danger could only find form in the mind of some one unwilling to encounter the difficulties of a Harper's Ferry campaign, as no one acquainted with the out-of-door and in-door encounters of that day will charge anyone with wishing to escape danger, merely. It is well enough for men out of danger, and who could not be induced to run the risk of a scratching, to talk flippantly about cowardice, and to sit in judgment upon the men who went with John Brown and who did not fall into the hands of the Virginians; but to have been there, fought there, and to understand what did transpire there, are quite different. As Capt. Brown had all the prisoners with him, the whole force of the enemy was concentrated there, for a time, after the capture of the rifle factory. Having captured our commander, we knew that it was but little two of us could do against so many, and that our turn to be taken must come; so Hazlett and I went out at the back part of the building, climbed up the wall, and went upon the railway. Behind us, in the Arsenal were thousands of dollars, we knew full well but that wealth had no charms for us, and we hastened to communicate with the men sent to the Kennedy Farm. We traveled up the Shenandoah along the railroad, and overtook one of the citizens. He was armed, and had been in the fight in the afternoon. We took him prisoner, in order to facilitate our escape. He submitted without resistance, and quietly gave up his gun. From him we learned substantially of the final struggle at the rifle factory, where the noble Kagi commanded. The number of citizens killed was, according to his opinion, much larger than either Hazlett or I had supposed, although we knew there were a great many killed and wounded together. He said there must be at least seventy killed, besides wounded. Hazlett had said there must be fifty, taking into account the defence of the three strong positions. I do not know positively, but would not put the figure below thirty killed, seeing many fall as I did, and knowing the "dead aim" principle upon which we defended ourselves. One of the Southern published accounts, it will be remembered, said twenty citizens were killed, another said fifteen. At last it got narrowed down to five, which was simply absurd, after so long an engagement. We had forty rounds apiece when we went to the Ferry, and when Hazlett and I left, we had not more than twenty rounds between us. The rest of the party were as free with their ammunition as we were, if not more so. We had further evidence that the number of dead was larger than published, from the many that we saw lying dead around.

When we had gone as far as the foot of the mountains, our prisoner begged us not to take his life, but to let him go at liberty. He said we might keep his gun; he would not inform on us. Feeling compassion for him, and trusting to his honor, we suffered him to go, when he went directly into town, and finding every thing there in the hands of our enemies, he informed on us, and we were pursued. After he had left us, we crawled or climbed up among the rocks in the mountains, some hundred yards or more from the spot where we left him, and hid ourselves, as we feared treachery, on second thought. A few minutes before dark, the troops came in search of us. They came to the foot of the mountains, marched and counter-marched, but never attempted to search the mountains; we supposed from their movements that they feared a host of armed enemies in concealment. Their air was so defiant, and their errand so distasteful to us, that we concluded to apply a little ammunition to their case, and having a few cartridges on hand, we poured from our excellent position in the rocky wilds, some well-directed shots. It was not so dark but that we could see one bite the dust now and then, when others would run to aid them instantly, particularly the wounded. Some lay where they fell, undisturbed, which satisfied us that they were dead. The troops returned our fire, but it was random shooting, as we were concealed from their sight by the rocks and bushes. Interchanging of shots continued for some minutes, with much spirit, when it became quite dark, and they went down into the town. After their return to the Ferry, we could hear the drum beating for a long time; an indication of their triumph, we supposed. Hazlett and I remained in our position three hours, before we dared venture down.

Chapter XV. The Encounter at the Rifle Factory.

As stated in a previous chapter, the command of the rifle factory was given to Captain Kagi. Under him were John Copeland, Sherrard Lewis Leary, and three colored men from the neighborhood. At an early hour, Kagi saw from his position the danger in remaining, with our small company, until assistance could come to the inhabitants. Hence his suggestion to Captain Brown, through Jeremiah Anderson, to leave. His position, being more isolated than the others, was the first to invite an organized attack with success; the Virginians first investing the factory with their hordes, before the final success at the engine house. From the prisoner taken by us who had participated in the assault upon Kagi's position, we received the sad details of the slaughter of our brave companions. Seven different times during the day they were fired upon, while they occupied the interior part of the building, the insurgents defending themselves with great courage, killing and wounding with fatal precision. At last, overwhelming numbers, as many as five hundred, our informant told us, blocked up the front of the building, battered the doors down, and forced their way into the interior. The insurgents were then forced to retreat the back way, fighting, however, all the time. They were pursued, when they took to the river, and it being so shallow, they waded out to a rock, mid-way, and there made a stand being completely hemmed in, front and rear. Some four or five hundred shots, said our prisoner, were fired at them before they were conquered. They would not surrender into the hands of the enemy, but kept on fighting until every one was killed, except John Copeland. Seeing he could do no more, and that all his associates were murdered, he suffered himself to be captured. The party at the rifle factory fought desperately till the last, from their perch on the rock. Slave and free, black and white, carried out the special injunction of the brave old Captain, to make sure work of it. The unfortunate targets for so many bullets from the enemy, some of them received two or three balls. There fell poor Kagi, the friend and adviser of Captain Brown in his most trying positions, and the cleverest man in the party; and there also fell Sherrard Lewis Leary, generous-hearted and companionable as he was, and in that and other difficult positions, brave to desperation. There fought John Copeland, who met his fate like a man. But they were all "honorable men," noble, noble fellows, who fought and died for the most holy principles. John Copeland was taken to the guard-house, where the other prisoners afterwards were, and thence to Charlestown jail. His subsequent mockery of a trial, sentence and execution, with his companion Shields Green, on the 16th of December—are they not part of the dark deeds of this era, which will assign their perpetrators to infamy, and cause after generations to blush at the remembrance? …

Chapter XIX. The Behavior of the Slaves—Captain Brown's Opinion.

Of the various contradictory reports made by slaveholders and their satellites about the time of the Harper's Ferry conflict, none were more untruthful than those relating to the slaves. There was seemingly a studied attempt to enforce the belief that the slaves were cowardly, and that they were really more in favor of Virginia masters and slavery, than of their freedom. As a party who had an intimate knowledge of the conduct of the colored men engaged, I am prepared to make an emphatic denial of the gross imputation against them, They were charged especially with being unreliable, with deserting Captain Brown at the first opportunity, and going back to their masters; and with being so indifferent to the work of their salvation from the yoke, as to have to be forced into service by the Captain, contrary to their will.

On the Sunday evening of the outbreak, we visited the plantations and acquainted the slaves with our purpose to effect their liberation, the greatest enthusiasm was manifested by them—joy and hilarity beamed from every countenance, One old mother, white-haired from age and borne down with the labors of many years in bond, when told of the work in hand, replied: "God bless you! God bless you!" She then kissed the party at her house, and requested all to kneel, which we did, and she offered prayer to God for His blessing on the enterprise, and our success. At the slaves' quarters, there was apparently a general jubilee, and they stepped forward manfully, without impressing or coaxing. In one case, only, was there any hesitation. A dark-complexioned free-born man refused to take up arms. He showed the only want of confidence in the movement, and far less courage than any slave consulted about the plan. In fact, so far as I could learn, the free blacks in the South are much less reliable than the slaves, and infinitely more fearful. In Washington City, a party of free colored persons offered their services to the Mayor, to aid in suppressing our movement. Of the slaves who followed us to the Ferry, some were sent to help remove stores, and the others were drawn up in a circle around the engine-house, at one time, where they were, by Captain Brown's order, furnished by me with pikes, mostly, and acted as a guard to the prisoners to prevent their escape, which they did.

As in the war of the American Revolution, the first blood shed was a black man's, Crispus Attuck's, so at Harper's Ferry, the first blood shed by our party, after the arrival of the United States troops, was that of a slave. In the beginning of the encounter, and before the troops had fairly emerged from the bridge, a slave was shot. I saw him fall. Phil, the slave who died in prison, with fear, as it was reported, was wounded at the Ferry, and died from the effects of it. Of the men shot on the rocks, when Kagi's party were compelled to take to the river, some were slaves, and they suffered death before they would desert their companions, and their bodies fell into the waves beneath. Captain Brown, who was surprised and pleased by the promptitude with which they volunteered, and with their manly bearing at the scene of violence, remarked to me, on that Monday morning, that he was agreeably disappointed in the behavior of the slaves; for he did not expect one out of ten to be willing to fight. The truth of the Harper's Ferry "raid," as it has been called, in regard to the part taken by the slaves, and the aid given by colored men generally, demonstrates clearly: First, that the conduct of the slaves is a strong guarantee of the weakness of the institution, should a favorable opportunity occur; and, secondly, that the colored people, as a body, were well represented by numbers, both in the fight, and in the number who suffered martyrdom afterward.

The first report of the number of "insurrectionists" killed was seventeen, which showed that several slaves were killed; for there were only ten of the men that belonged to the Kennedy Farm who lost their lives at the Ferry, namely: John Henri Kagi, Jerry Anderson, Watson Brown, Oliver Brown, Stewart Taylor, Adolphus Thompson, William Thompson, William J. Leeman, all eight whites, and Dangerfield Newby and Sherrard Lewis Leary, both colored. The rest reported dead, according to their own showing, were colored. Captain Brown had but seventeen with him, belonging to the Farm, and when all was over, there were four besides himself taken to Charlestown, prisoners, viz: A. D. Stevens, Edwin Coppic, white; John A. Copeland and Shields Green, colored. It is plain to be seen from this, that there was a proper percentage of colored men killed at the Ferry, and executed at Charlestown. Of those that escaped from the fangs of the human bloodhounds of slavery, there were four whites, and one colored man, myself being the sole colored man of those at the Farm.

Document Text

That hundreds of slaves were ready, and would have joined in the work, had Captain Brown's sympathies not been aroused in favor of the families of his prisoners, and that a very different result would have been seen, in consequence, there is no question. There was abundant opportunity for him and the party to leave a place ill which they held entire sway and possession, before the arrival of the troops. And so cowardly were the slaveholders, proper, that from Colonel Lewis Washington, the descendant of the Father of his Country, General George Washington, they were easily taken prisoners. They had not pluck enough to fight, or to use the well-loaded arms in their possession, but were concerned rather in keeping a whole skin by parleying, or in spilling cowardly tears, to excite pity, as did Colonel Washington, and in that way escape merited punishment. No, the conduct of the slaves was beyond all praise; and could our brave old Captain have steeled his heart against the entreaties of his captives, or shut up the fountain of his sympathies against their families—could he, for the moment, have forgotten them, in the selfish thought of his own friends and kindred, or, by adhering to the original plan, have left the place, and thus looked forward to the prospective freedom of the slave—hundreds ready and waiting would have been armed before twenty-four hours had elapsed. As it was, even the noble old man's mistakes were productive of great good, the fact of which the future historian will record, without the embarrassment attending its present narration. John Brown did not only capture and hold Harper's Ferry for twenty hours, but he held the whole South. He captured President Buchanan and his Cabinet, convulsed the whole country, killed Governor Wise, and dug the mine and laid the train which will eventually dissolve the union between Freedom and Slavery. The rebound reveals the truth. So let it be!

Glossary

Crispus Attuck	Crispus Attucks, an African American killed in the Boston Massacre of 1770 and sometimes regarded as the first casualty of American Revolution engine house	a structure where train engines are housed and repaired furrin	dialect pronunciation of "foreign"
Governor Wise	Henry Wise of Virginia, who personally interviewed John Brown after his arrest and, with some reluctance, ordered his execution
Kennedy Farm	a Maryland farm Brown rented as a staging area for the raid
Moloch	an ancient god associated with costly sacrifices, often by fire parleying	talking, from the French parler meaning "to talk" or "to speak" pitfalls	in combat, concealed holes in the ground, dug with the purpose of impeding or injuring attacking troops
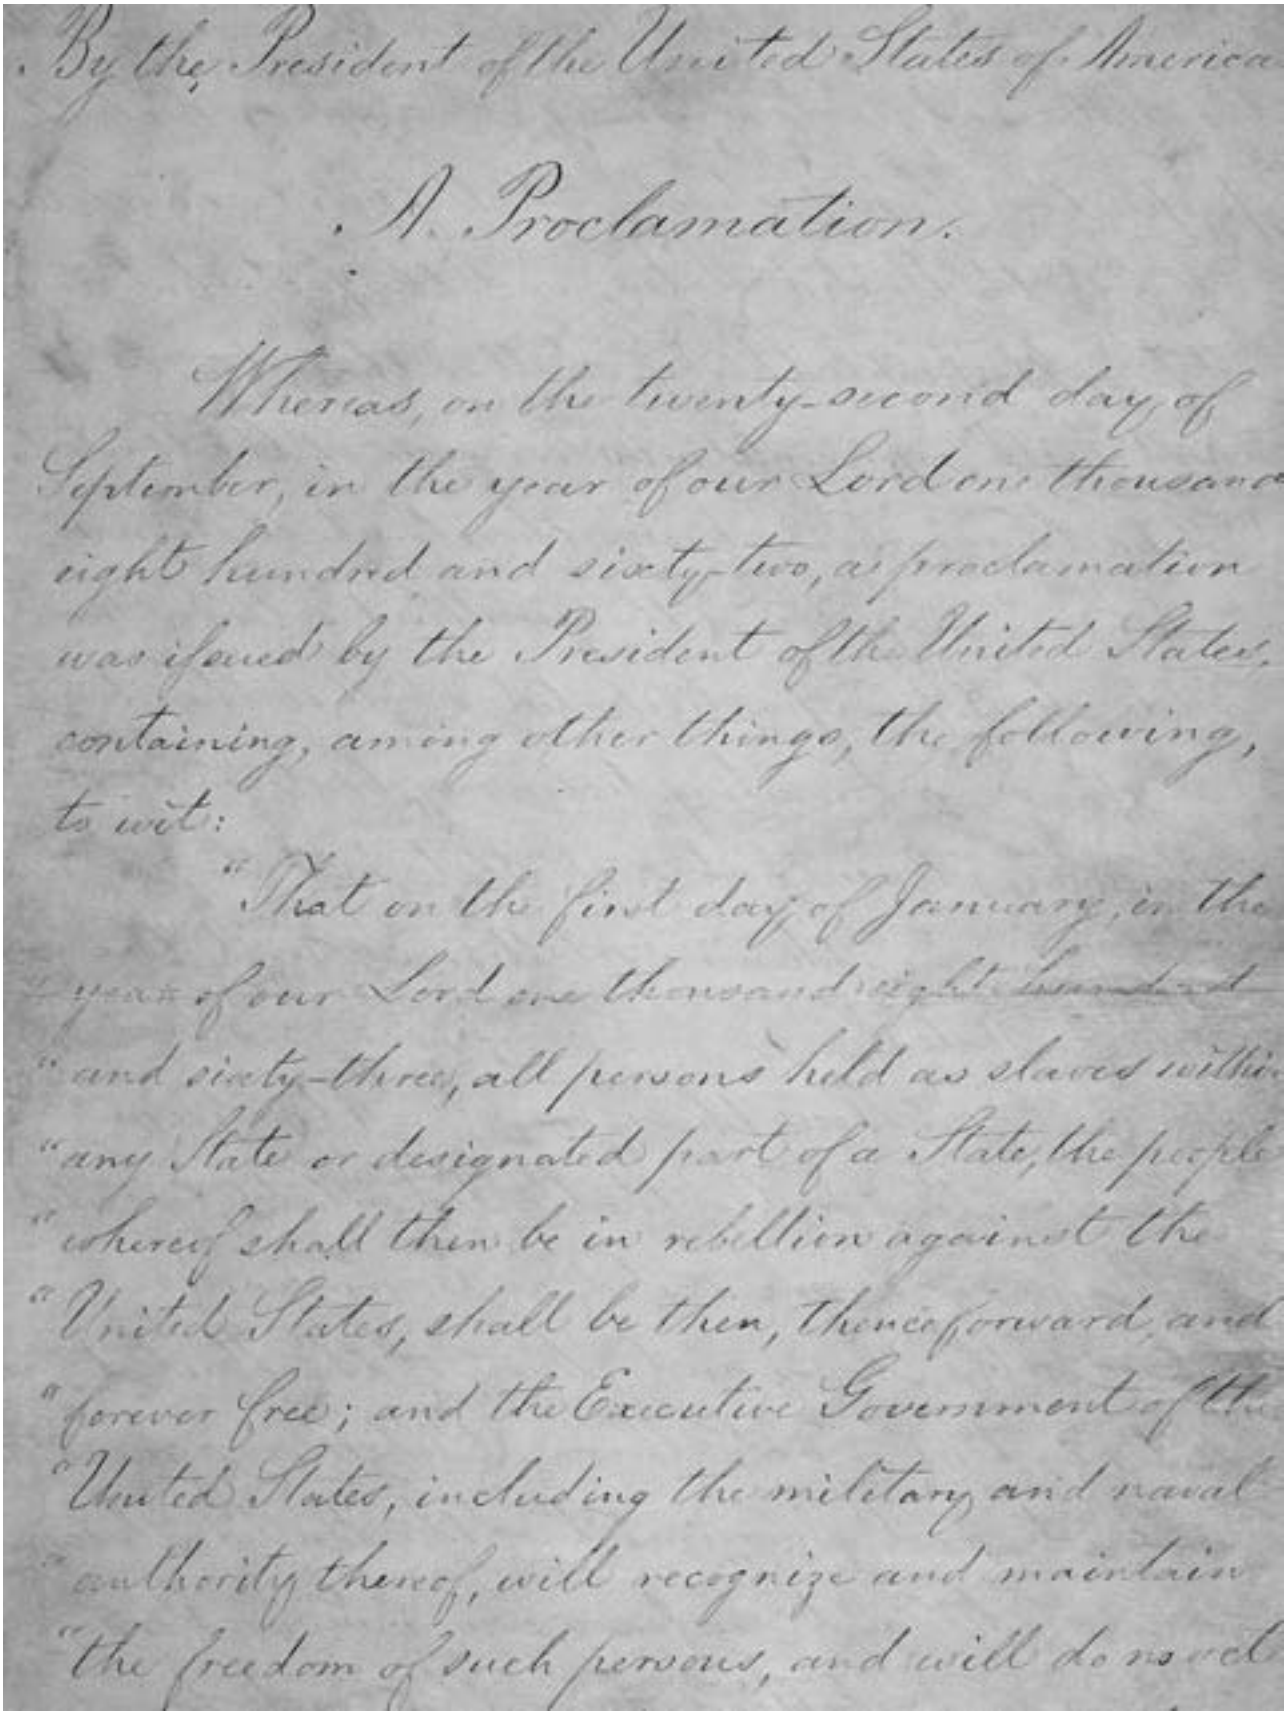
President Buchanan	James Buchanan, the fifteenth U.S. president
Wager House	a hotel in Harpers Ferry
Zouave	originally, a North African soldier who served with the French army but by the time of the Civil War any soldier who adopted the colorful uniform and elaborate drill maneuvers of the Zouaves



By the President of the United States of America

A Proclamation.

Whereas, on the twenty-second day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-two, a proclamation was issued by the President of the United States, containing, among other things, the following, to wit:

"That on the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, all persons held as slaves within any State or designated part of a State, the people whereof shall then be in rebellion against the United States, shall be then, thenceforward, and forever free; and the Executive Government of the United States, including the military and naval authority thereof, will recognize and maintain the freedom of such persons, and will do no act

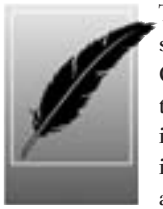
Emancipation Proclamation (National Archives and Records Administration)

Emancipation Proclamation

1863

"Upon this act, ... I invoke the considerate judgment of mankind, and the gracious favor of Almighty God."

Overview



The Emancipation Proclamation freed all slaves in the states that constituted the Confederacy. The document emphasizes that this action was a "war measure," taken, in part, to protect the slaves who were being offered refuge in Union forts, garrisons, and vessels. The proclamation was also offered as a moral statement, as an "act of justice" in accordance with the U.S. Constitution, and as a "military necessity." That President Abraham Lincoln was addressing not merely his countrymen and the rebels but the world and his maker as well is clear from the document's parting statement: "I invoke the considerate judgment of mankind, and the gracious favor of Almighty God."

Context

Lincoln issued the Emancipation Proclamation on September 22, 1862, freeing forever those slaves in the Confederate states. (The proclamation would take effect on January 1, 1863.) At that time the Civil War, begun in the spring of 1861, had yet to turn decisively in the North's favor, although Lincoln was beginning to envisage victory at long last after the Union army's success in the Battle of Antietam. He had been elected to office pledging to keep the Union together, and when the South seceded, his main task became that of reuniting his nation. Although he was opposed to slavery and its extension into new states and territories, Lincoln never advocated complete, let alone immediate, abolition of what was known as the "peculiar institution." During the early stages of the war, he successfully kept border slave states like Maryland and Missouri in the Union by not issuing statements that might have driven them toward the Confederacy. Even with this proclamation, slaves in the border states within the Union remained the property of their owners.

Pressure on Lincoln to issue this proclamation had been building for some time. He had not been opposed to emancipation in principle once the war was in progress, but he thought the timing of such an act would be crucial; it would have to come at a time when it would foster respect and inspire his troops. Lincoln had rescinded an earlier proclamation of emancipation issued by John Frémont, one of the Union's commanders, in Missouri. Lincoln viewed Frémont's proclamation not only as premature but also as insubordinate, since it was the commander in chief's duty to make such a declaration. Moreover, Lincoln wanted to issue a very carefully worded document that would limit the scope of emancipation. Indeed, fervent abolitionists criticized Lincoln for not going so far as to liberate all slaves.

Lincoln's aim, however, was to cause disruption behind Confederate lines. He hoped that his proclamation would inspire slaves to desert their masters and join the Union cause. He also hoped that the dramatic act would prevent England and France from recognizing the legitimacy of the Confederacy and supporting rebel forces. While the Emancipation Proclamation was primarily a political and diplomatic document as well as a military measure, it nevertheless acquired enormous symbolic meaning because, for the first time, it made slavery itself one of the primary issues of the war. The ideological precedent this document set led to the enlistment of some two hundred thousand soldiers and sailors in the Union army and navy.

About the Author

Abraham Lincoln, born on February 12, 1809, in a one-room log cabin in southeastern Kentucky, grew up in a frontier environment. He had little formal education but was a prodigious reader, favoring the Bible, Shakespeare, and biographies. As a young man he studied law. At age twenty-three he ran unsuccessfully for a seat in the Illinois General Assembly, to which state his family had moved when he was nine. He served briefly in the Black Hawk War before being elected to the state legislature in 1834. Admitted to the bar in 1837, Lincoln proved to be a successful attorney, admired for his ability to argue on his feet in court cases.

In 1842 Lincoln married Mary Todd, daughter of a prominent southern family. The couple had four children, but only one, Robert, survived into adulthood. Quarrelsome but proud of her husband, Mary supported Lincoln's political ambitions. He was elected for one term in the

Time Line

1860

- November 6
  Abraham Lincoln is elected president.
- December 20
  South Carolina becomes the first southern state to secede following the election of Lincoln as president.

1861

- March 4
  Lincoln is inaugurated as president.
- April 13
  Fort Sumter, in South Carolina, surrenders to Confederate forces, beginning the Civil War.
- April 17
  Virginia secedes from the Union.
- May 16–June 8
  Arkansas, North Carolina, and Tennessee secede.
- August 6
  Congress approves the first Confiscation Act, declaring Confederate slaves seized by the Union army to be free.
- August 30
  John C. Frémont, then commander of the Western Department, stationed in Missouri, proclaims the slaves in that state "forever free." Lincoln promptly rescinds Frémont's proclamation.

1862

- July 17
  Congress approves the second Confiscation Act, declaring slaves taking refuge behind Union lines to be free.
- September 17
  The Union is victorious at Antietam.
- September 22
  Lincoln issues the Emancipation Proclamation, to take effect in one hundred days.

U.S. House of Representatives and made a notable speech opposing the Mexican-American War; the speech proved unpopular, however, and he did not run for reelection. Indeed, Lincoln's political career then seemed over not only because of his own politics but also because he had linked his future with that of the Whig Party, which steadily lost ground to the Democrats in the 1850s.

Lincoln's political prospects actually rose in 1854 when a new party, the Republicans, took control of the Illinois legislature. Lincoln was the Republican candidate for senator in the famous 1858 election, when he debated Stephen Douglas, the incumbent Democratic senator and a politician with a national profile and the ambition to be president. Although Lincoln's outstanding performance in the debates drew national attention, his party lost the statewide election, and Douglas retained his seat as senator.

During those debates, Lincoln enunciated his position on the sensitive issue of slavery. Douglas attempted to portray Lincoln as supporting equality for blacks and whites, knowing full well that the electorate would reject such a position. Douglas himself advocated "popular sovereignty"—that is, allowing each state to vote on whether to accept or reject slavery. Lincoln objected, making no attempt to hide his rejection of slavery but promising not to oppose the institution where it already existed. Lincoln did emphasize that he opposed "Slave Power"—that is, the political position of those states intent on spreading slavery to the territories in the West—as he wanted to contain the peculiar institution within its current southern borders.

Even though Lincoln's position on slavery was not radical, the southern states made clear that they would not remain in the Union should he be elected president. This threat of secession notwithstanding, Lincoln was genuinely surprised when the South made good on its warning; his objective then was to prosecute a war that would preserve the Union. In fact, Lincoln wished to prioritize the Union even if that meant retaining slavery in the South, although he also intended to consider abolition or partial emancipation if those actions would have the effect of reuniting the country. Lincoln's role as a symbol of northern dominance that secessionists could not abide culminated in his assassination in April 1865 by the southern sympathizer John Wilkes Booth.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

In the summer of 1862, Lincoln concluded that freeing the slaves was essential if the Union was to emerge victorious from the war. Up until then, Lincoln had opposed the national government's interference with the present institution of slavery. He had only reluctantly signed into law the two Confiscation Acts, the first (1861) freeing Confederate slaves seized by the Union army and the second (1862) freeing slaves who had taken refuge behind Union lines. He was concerned about the seizure of property without due legal process, but he decided that the acts were temporary measures taken in time of war, and the Supreme Court declared the acts constitutional.

Radical Republicans like William Graham Sumner had been urging the president to free the slaves—an act he could then take because the Union was at war with the Confederacy. In addition to Frémont's proclamation freeing the slaves, General David Hunter, in command of the Military Department of the South, proclaimed that "slavery and martial law in a free country are altogether incompatible" and declared that slaves in Florida, Georgia, and South Carolina were "forever free." Lincoln voided both decrees, asserting that only he, as commander in chief, could order such sweeping action; he did also note that he saw no constitutional reason why he could not issue an emancipation proclamation.

As early as July 1862, Lincoln began to draft the wording of just such an emancipation edict. He proceeded cautiously, uncertain whether the restrained document he proposed to his cabinet would have the desired effect of bolstering the Union's fortunes in the war. One early draft offered compensation to Confederate states if they would cease their rebellion. But subsequent drafts deleted such conciliatory language and focused specifically on the fate of slaves in the rebellious states.

The final version of the Emancipation Proclamation reads like a legal document drafted by Lincoln the lawyer. It is a carefully couched, formal piece of writing devoid of most of the president's gift for somber yet inspiring rhetoric. Because Lincoln was taking a momentous step in American history, he was extraordinarily mindful of setting limits upon what would be denoted by the word emancipation, which means, of course, "setting free or the condition of being free." The primary thrust of Lincoln's decree was that he was liberating only those slaves in the areas engaged in rebellion; he was setting them free from their southern masters.

The first paragraph of the document provides the date and the authority under which the proclamation is being made. The formal language harks back to the earliest proclamations in history—the kind that were announced in the Roman Forum, although the phrase "in the year of our Lord" emphasizes that this historic declaration is rooted in the Christian era. The effort to be absolutely precise and measured is one of the hallmarks of this edict.

The next paragraph states the main purpose of the document, which is to announce that on January 1, 1863, all slaves in the rebellious areas "shall be, then, thenceforward, and forever free." The wording is essential, because late in the Civil War certain slave states were considering liberating slaves who would agree to fight for the Confederacy. With Lincoln's proclamation, however, freedom was not contingent; southern slaves needed to do nothing in particular in order to gain their freedom. In other words, whatever else might have been stated in the document, it extended an unequivocal grant of freedom to a certain segment of slaves. Moreover, this grant of freedom was not merely a matter of words, as the proclamation specifies that the U.S. government, including its military organizations, would be obligated not only to recognize but also to "maintain" that freedom. Thus, Lincoln set the precedent for the federal government's being responsible for the security of the freed men and women. He also added the proviso that the "military and naval" authorities would do nothing to "repress" the efforts of former slaves to secure their "actual freedom." Commanders in the battlefield, engaged in occupying enemy territory, would be prohibited from taking any actions that would make it harder for "such persons" to escape bondage. In being used as a term referring to slaves and former slaves, the word persons accorded a measure of respect for a group that had been fully repressed, to the extent that each slave was counted as three-fifths of a person in the U.S. Constitution. Still, Lincoln stopped short of ordering the armed forces to actively secure the freedom of "such persons." In many cases, Union commanders had already deliberately assisted and even proclaimed the liberation of slaves, but the president held back from making such actions an explicit war aim.

In the midst of the war, Lincoln could not be sure which states or groups of states might be in rebellion as of January 1, 1863. That is why in the third paragraph he stipulates that the executive (Lincoln himself) would proclaim on a certain date which areas remained in rebellion. Thus, Lincoln left open the possibility that states in rebellion as of September 22, 1862, might return to the Union before January 1, 1863. Provided that a majority of the qualified voters in such states elected representatives to Congress and that no "strong countervailing testimony" indicated that the states had not fully determined to rejoin the Union, the executive would no longer consider them in rebellion. The implications of this statement are striking: In effect, Lincoln suggested that southern slave states might return to the Union and keep their slaves. The likelihood at that point of a Confederate state returning to the Union was remote, but in the 100 days leading up to January 1, 1863, the fortunes of war might have brought

Time Line

1863

- January 1
  The Emancipation Proclamation takes effect.
- July 1–3
  The Battle of Gettysburg is fought, and Robert E. Lee's invasion of the North fails.

1865

- April 9
  Lee surrenders to Ulysses S. Grant, and the Civil War is ended.
- April 14
  John Wilkes Booth shoots Lincoln; the president dies the following day.
- December 18
  The Thirteenth Amendment abolishes slavery.

Abraham Lincoln (Library of Congress)

some surprises. Indeed, Lincoln was leaving open a way for the rebellious states to return to the Union without sacrificing what they considered their property—that is, the slaves. Passages like this one constitute one reason why the Emancipation Proclamation disappointed some abolitionists and was attacked by others.

The fourth paragraph, like the first, states Lincoln's formal authority as commander in chief to issue the Emancipation Proclamation. He emphasizes that his declaration is a "fit and necessary war measure" and that it was undertaken only because of the exigencies of an "armed rebellion." Lincoln knew full well that the North would have offered little support for the unequivocal, absolute, and immediate liberation of all slaves, and he did not want his efforts to win the arduous, costly, and tragic war to be conflated with the agitations of abolitionists. An announcement of the complete abolition of slavery everywhere in the North and South alike would have signaled a drastic change in Lincoln's objectives in fighting the war—and might have caused border states with slaves to secede from the Union.

Paragraph 5 names the states in rebellion but also specifies "excepted parts" of those states (like the parishes in Louisiana) that were under Union control. In those parts no longer considered in rebellion, the proclamation would have no effect; they would be left "precisely as if this proclamation were not issued." The sixth paragraph reiterates in legal language that the slaves in the states and parts of states named in the fifth paragraph were now liberated "for the purpose aforesaid" (that is, as a war measure), and the freedom of "said persons" was to be recognized and maintained by military and naval authorities.

Lincoln addresses the former slaves in the seventh paragraph, enjoining them not to take up violence, except for their own protection, and to work "faithfully for reasonable wages." This curious statement was the result of discussions about what would happen to the masses of people who would suddenly be freed. How would they defend themselves? How would they find employment and be paid for it? Before the Civil War, considerable public argument took place over how slave labor depressed the wages of free men, and Lincoln's statement here seems to allude to that concern. The newly freed slaves, in other words, were to make sure not to be exploited, such as by working for unreasonably low wages offered by employers seeking to take advantage of a cheap—and impoverished—new labor pool.

Lincoln broke new ground in paragraph 8, stipulating that former slaves could become part of the war effort, though only in a supportive capacity at garrisons, in forts, aboard ships, and so on. In other words, conspicuously absent from this declaration is an invitation to former slaves to enlist in the army and navy as combatants. Doubts existed that slaves could make effective frontline soldiers, particularly that they would stand up to enemy fire. Lincoln had also needed to consider the fact that northern troops might object to serving beside former slaves. Regardless of the aims of the war, the idea of equality between whites and African Americans was not one that the majority of whites entertained. Even Lincoln himself, at this point, was not prepared to acknowledge such equality, let alone put it into practice by integrating former slaves into the armed forces. Nevertheless, this paragraph represents a step forward in Lincoln's thinking, as he envisioned an enlarged role for the freed slaves. In fact, they would eventually be recruited to fight on the front lines of the war.

Although Lincoln repeats in paragraph 10 that the proclamation is an act of "military necessity," that phrase is encircled by his assertion that it is an "act of justice" and that he invokes the "considerate judgment of mankind, and the gracious favor of Almighty God." In cloaking the largely political and military action in moral and even religious terms—and however painstakingly he dressed the document up as a legal one forged for limited purposes in a time of war—Lincoln made his proclamation a symbolic statement. Acts of justice, in other words, are far more than matters of "military necessity," and Lincoln was looking not only to the opinions of his fellow Americans but also to the "considerate" (that is, mindful or thoughtful) judgment of humankind as well as to the blessing of his creator. This note of humility—of subjecting himself to the verdict of history, so to speak, and to God's approval—was Lincoln's way of transforming his deed into an act of universal significance.

Lincoln ends the proclamation by noting that he has had the seal of the United States affixed to the document and by again specifying the date and the fact that it represents the eighty-seventh year of the country's independence. In this way, Lincoln reaffirmed his faith in the Union without explicitly saying so.

An engraving copied from an 1864 painting, done at the White House, titled
The First Reading of the Emancipation Proclamation before the Cabinet (Library of Congress)

Secretary of State William H. Seward, at one time Lincoln's rival for the presidency, witnessed the document. Seward was sympathetic to the abolitionists but became a trusted and shrewd adviser to the president. Although he worried that the proclamation might cause deep divisions in the North and a slave rebellion in the South that would complicate the war effort, he backed Lincoln's strategy, and most of Lincoln's cabinet did so as well. The appearance of Seward's name on the proclamation surely communicated a message to those who wanted the complete abolition of slavery; in witnessing the document, Seward was implying that this measure was as much as could be expected at that point in the war.

Given its limited scope, the Emancipation Proclamation certainly could not have been the last word on the abolition of slavery. Lincoln understood as much, but as a politician and war leader he believed that the document was as bold a declaration as he could then make. He undoubtedly realized that pressures to accomplish more, such as to more fully involve the former slaves in the war—even to grant them citizenship—had to be withstood; further issues would have to be confronted in the near future. Lincoln believed that for the present, a temporizing message was as much as he and the nation could countenance. Although critics might have deemed the proclamation indecisive or evasive, Lincoln saw it as a way to come to terms with the current state of public opinion, to gain time, and to advance the state of public consciousness about a controversial issue.

Audience

Although Lincoln's intended audience actually was not blacks or former slaves, he was acutely conscious of the profound significance of the Emancipation Proclamation for the people who would be freed from bondage. Shortly after signing the document, he gave it to an associate to read to a group of blacks assembled on Pennsylvania Avenue near the White House. As they listened to the words, they shouted, clapped, and sang in a robust demonstration of their approval.

Lincoln's proclamation was aimed primarily at northern soldiers and voters who would see in the edict a strengthening of their moral authority and at the southern nonslave populace as well as governments abroad that might hesitate to declare support for a Confederacy that remained dedicated to "Slave Power." After all, the British nation had abolished slavery, and although members of

Essential Quotes

"That on the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, all persons held as slaves within any State or designated part of a State, the people whereof shall then be in rebellion against the United States, shall be then, thenceforward, and forever free."

(Paragraph 2)

"And I hereby enjoin upon the people so declared to be free to abstain from all violence, unless in necessary self-defence; and I recommend to them that, in all cases when allowed, they labor faithfully for reasonable wages."

(Paragraph 7)

"And upon this act, sincerely believed to be an act of justice, warranted by the Constitution, upon military necessity, I invoke the considerate judgment of mankind, and the gracious favor of Almighty God."

(Paragraph 10)

the British government might have held a certain sympathy for the traditional, quasi-aristocratic South, Lincoln's "act of justice" would make it difficult for them to take sides against the Union.

Impact

The first wave of response to the Emancipation Proclamation varied by population but was generally favorable, drawing positive comments from such observers as the prominent abolitionist leader William Lloyd Garrison, the former slave and abolitionist leader Frederick Douglass, and the writer Ralph Waldo Emerson. Lincoln's political party, the Republicans, likewise welcomed the proclamation. Democrats, on the other hand, denounced Lincoln's decree as unconstitutional and later nominated General George McClellan to oppose Lincoln in the 1864 presidential election. McClellan vowed not to fight a war to free slaves. Southerners, meanwhile, charged Lincoln with fomenting a slave revolt. Abroad, the response was mixed, with some British newspapers hailing Lincoln's humanitarian action and others supporting the South and criticizing the proclamation. Regardless of such criticism, the British government delayed consideration of a proposal to recognize the Confederacy, which meant that Lincoln had gained his objective of buying time with the proclamation.

A second wave of response to the document turned quite negative. In November 1862 northern voters returned Democratic majorities in several states that had voted for Lincoln in 1860, although Lincoln's party still held a slim majority in Congress. In the words of the historian Thomas Keneally, Lincoln's critics pointed out that all he had done was "liberate the slaves his armies had not so far encountered. He realized that this could leave the proclamation open to mockery, and some abolitionists at one end of the scale and many Democratic newspapers and orators at the other end obliged him."

While many historians emphasize that northern public opinion was against making the abolition of slavery a war issue, the biographer Richard Carwardine notes that the proclamation had a profound impact on Union soldiers. Many felt their moral conviction strengthened by the decree; they indeed believed that they were fighting for a just cause. The historian Doris Kearns Goodwin notes that the proclamation "superseded legislation on slavery and property rights that had guided policy in eleven states for nearly three-quarters of a century. Three and a half million blacks who had lived enslaved for generations were promised freedom." Although Lincoln worried over the immediate reactions to the proclamation, he had his eye on posterity, noting that his place in history would likely be secured by the Emancipation Proclamation. He considered the decree the crowning achievement of his administration.

See also War Department General Order 143 (1863).

Further Reading

■ Books

Carwardine, Richard. Lincoln: A Life of Purpose and Power. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2006.

Donald, David Herbert. Lincoln. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1995.

Gienapp, William E. Abraham Lincoln and Civil War America: A Biography. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.

Goodwin, Doris Kearns. Team of Rivals: The Political Genius of Abraham Lincoln. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2005.

Guelzo, Allen C. Abraham Lincoln: Redeemer President. Grand Rapids, Mich.: W. B. Eerdmans, 1999.

Keneally, Thomas. Abraham Lincoln. New York: Lipper/Viking, 2003.

McClure, A. K. Abraham Lincoln and Men of War-Times: Some Personal Recollections of War and Politics during the Lincoln Administration. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1997.

Neely, Mark E., Jr. The Last Best Hope of Earth: Abraham Lincoln and the Promise of America. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1993.

Oates, Stephen B. With Malice toward None: The Life of Abraham Lincoln. New York: Harper & Row, 1977.

Paludan, Phillip Shaw. The Presidency of Abraham Lincoln. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1994.

Thomas, Benjamin P. Abraham Lincoln: A Biography. New York: Knopf, 1952.

Questions for Further Study

1. While drafting the Emancipation Proclamation, Lincoln replied to an editorial in the New York Tribune attacking him for paying too much deference to border states with slaves and arguing that he should act on emancipation. Lincoln responded by noting that his highest priority was to save the Union, not to free the slaves. He went on to say that if he could save the Union by freeing some slaves or by freeing all of them, he would do so. What do Lincoln's sentiments reveal about his state of mind and his political calculations, considering that he was trying to stay true to his principles as well as to take into account northern attitudes toward blacks?

2. Some critics have described the Emancipation Proclamation as lacking the emotion and vigor of some of Lincoln's other writings and speeches. Allen Guelzo, however, explains why Lincoln did not publish a more comprehensive or inspiring document: A proclamation with broader scope—say, freeing all slaves in the North and South alike—would have been challenged by the Supreme Court, which was still headed by Chief Justice Roger Taney, a former slaveholder. Research Taney's infamous opinion in the case Dred Scott v. Sandford (1857); then consider the political and moral issues that Lincoln had to confront and why he ultimately decided to offer the proclamation as a war measure.

3. Compare and contrast Lincoln's response to the decision in Dred Scott v. Sandford (1857) with his decision to issue the Emancipation Proclamation.

4. Compare and contrast Lincoln's position on slavery in his First and Second Inaugural Addresses.

■ Web Sites

"Civil War Harper"s Weekly, September 14, 1861: Fremont's Slave Proclamation." Civil War Web site.
http://www.sonofthesouth.net/leefoundation/civil-war/1861/september/slave-proclamation.htm.

McRae, Bennie J. "Major Generals John C. Fremont and David Hunter versus President Abraham Lincoln." Lest We Forget Web site.
http://www.coax.net/people/lwf/FHL_POL.HTM

"Suggested Lincoln Sources." History Now Web site.
http://www.historynow.org/12_2005/ask2b.html.

—Carl Rollyson

Document Text

Emancipation Proclamation

By the President of the United States of America:

A Proclamation.

Whereas, on the twenty-second day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-two, a proclamation was issued by the President of the United States, containing, among other things, the following, to wit:

"That on the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, all persons held as slaves within any State or designated part of a State, the people whereof shall then be in rebellion against the United States, shall be then, thenceforward, and forever free; and the Executive Government of the United States, including the military and naval authority thereof, will recognize and maintain the freedom of such persons, and will do no act or acts to repress such persons, or any of them, in any efforts they may make for their actual freedom.

"That the Executive will, on the first day of January aforesaid, by proclamation, designate the States and parts of States, if any, in which the people thereof, respectively, shall then be in rebellion against the United States; and the fact that any State, or the people thereof, shall on that day be, in good faith, represented in the Congress of the United States by members chosen thereto at elections wherein a majority of the qualified voters of such State shall have participated, shall, in the absence of strong countervailing testimony, be deemed conclusive evidence that such State, and the people thereof, are not then in rebellion against the United States."

Now, therefore I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, by virtue of the power in me vested as Commander-in-Chief, of the Army and Navy of the United States in time of actual armed rebellion against the authority and government of the United States, and as a fit and necessary war measure for suppressing said rebellion, do, on this first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, and in accordance with my purpose so to do publicly proclaimed for the full period of one hundred days, from the day first above mentioned, order and designate as the States and parts of States wherein the people thereof respectively, are this day in rebellion against the United States, the following, to wit:

Arkansas, Texas, Louisiana, (except the Parishes of St. Bernard, Plaquemines, Jefferson, St. John, St. Charles, St. James Ascension, Assumption, Terrebonne, Lafourche, St. Mary, St. Martin, and Orleans, including the City of New Orleans) Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, and Virginia, (except the forty-eight counties designated as West Virginia, and also the counties of Berkley, Accomac, Northampton, Elizabeth City, York, Princess Ann, and Norfolk, including the cities of Norfolk and Portsmouth), and which excepted parts, are for the present, left precisely as if this proclamation were not issued.

And by virtue of the power, and for the purpose aforesaid, I do order and declare that all persons held as slaves within said designated States, and parts of States, are, and henceforward shall be free; and that the Executive government of the United States, including the military and naval authorities thereof, will recognize and maintain the freedom of said persons.

And I hereby enjoin upon the people so declared to be free to abstain from all violence, unless in necessary self-defence; and I recommend to them that, in all cases when allowed, they labor faithfully for reasonable wages.

And I further declare and make known, that such persons of suitable condition, will be received into the armed service of the United States to garrison emancipation	the act of freeing, the act of setting free from certain restrictions, or the condition of being free proclamation	a formal government announcement forts, positions, stations, and other places, and to man vessels of all sorts in said service.

Glossary

Document Text

And upon this act, sincerely believed to be an act of justice, warranted by the Constitution, upon military necessity, I invoke the considerate judgment of mankind, and the gracious favor of Almighty God.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the City of Washington, this first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty three, and of the Independence of the United States of America the eighty-seventh.

By the President: ABRAHAM LINCOLN

WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

Two soldiers of the Twenty-third New York Infantry—one black and one white—sit in front of a tent during the Civil War. (Library of Congress)

Frederick Douglass: "Men of Color, To Arms!"

1863

"The iron gate of our prison stands half open. One gallant rush from the North will fling it wide open."

Overview

Frederick Douglass, a prominent African American who had escaped from bondage and became an outspoken abolitionist, delivered his speech "Men of Color, To Arms!" before a crowd in his hometown of Rochester, New York, in 1863. In this speech Douglass encourages free blacks in the North to see the Civil War as the means of ending the system of human bondage that was still thriving in the American South. These African Americans continued to encounter discrimination, as they were denied citizenship and were often consigned to low-paying menial labor, but in Douglass's eyes, blacks could overcome such prejudice by performing heroically on the battlefield. His Rochester speech has since been considered one of the clearest appeals for the enlistment of African Americans in the Union army, and it serves as an excellent example of Douglass's talent for oratory and his position as the leading black intellectual of his day.

Context

African Americans had been a vital part of the American armed forces long before the Civil War. Black soldiers fought in the American Revolution and defended New Orleans in 1815, but a federal law passed in 1792 prohibited them from serving in state militias or the regular army. When the Civil War broke out in 1861, public opinion in the United States was generally not in favor of using African American troops. Some critics feared that blacks lacked the courage necessary for combat, while others resented any action that would raise blacks' position in the racial hierarchy and challenge white supremacy. Likewise, some African Americans in the North were skeptical that black enlistment would truly lead to more equality for blacks within the military or among civilian society more generally.

Some white and black abolitionists, however, understood that African Americans could provide an essential contribution to the northern war effort. Former slaves and other free blacks in the North swelled with the same patriotism that encouraged white men to join the military; these men also felt a special burden to aid their brothers who still languished under the cruel slave system. Abolitionists believed that black troops would disprove negative criticisms and help African Americans become further integrated into northern society. Likewise, slaves in the South, who began flocking to Union lines in staggering numbers after the attack on Fort Sumter, South Carolina, in April 1861, presented Union commanders with a dilemma: Since the Confederacy had no qualms about using slave laborers to aid its military actions, why should the Union refuse to use black soldiers to bolster its own war effort? Union general Benjamin Butler was the first to use these refugees—whom he called "contrabands"—to build defensive trenches, serve as camp cooks, and perform other menial labor at Fortress Monroe, the coastal Union bastion near Hampton, Virginia. These escaped slaves were pursued by their owners, but after the passage of the First Confiscation Act on August 6, 1861, army commanders were not obligated to return slave owners' property. Other leading military officials, like Secretary of War Simon Cameron, spoke publicly about the benefits of black enlistment. General John C. Frémont, commander of the Department of the West based in Saint Louis, Missouri, went a step further and issued a proclamation on August 30, 1861, declaring that the slaves of any Missourian who was disloyal would be freed. His proclamation received support from many northerners, but it complicated President Abraham Lincoln's efforts to bring southern states back into the fold.

Lincoln's attitude toward black troops would change over the course of the Civil War, but at the beginning of the conflict his greatest concern was to keep the border slaveholding states (Missouri, Kentucky, Maryland, and Delaware) in the Union, and to demonstrate to the Confederacy that reunion was still a viable possibility. He illustrated his intentions by making clear that emancipation was not a war aim of the Lincoln administration (thus tacitly promising slaveholders that their human property was safe). Early in 1861 he directed Union officials to send slaves who hid behind army lines back to their owners, an action that emphasized Lincoln's ultimate plan to preserve the Union. However, when Union forces increasingly found themselves on the defensive,

Time Line

1861

- April 12
  Confederate forces fire on Fort Sumter in South Carolina, officially beginning the Civil War.
- August 6
  Congress passes the First Confiscation Act, authorizing Union forces to seize any property (including slaves) from defeated Confederates.

1862

- July 17
  Congress passes the Second Confiscation Act, mandating the surrender and freedom of slaves in the service of the Confederate government.
- September 22
  President Abraham Lincoln and his advisers release the preliminary draft of the Emancipation Proclamation, which gives the Confederate states until January 1, 1863, to surrender.
- September 27
  The Louisiana Native Guards is the first African American regiment (with whites as senior officers) to be officially mustered into the Union Army.

1863

- January 1
  The Emancipation Proclamation goes into effect, freeing all slaves living in the states still in rebellion (that is, the Confederacy).
- February
  Frederick Douglass begins to recruit for the Fifty-fourth Massachusetts. Two of his sons, Lewis Douglass and Charles Douglass, enlist in the regiment.
- March 2
  Douglass delivers his speech "Men of Color, To Arms!" before a crowd in Rochester, New York.
- July 17–18
  Black troops fight in two of their most significant battles of the war: The First Kansas Colored Volunteer Infantry repels a Confederate force near Honey Springs, Indian Territory (Oklahoma), and the 54th Massachusetts assaults Fort Wagner, South Carolina.

Lincoln began to alter his stance on black recruitment and supported the passage of the First Confiscation Act, which he signed on August 6, 1861. Heavy casualties contributed to this change of heart. He also worked closely with his advisers to create a preliminary draft of the Emancipation Proclamation, which was released in September 1862, shortly after the Union victory at Antietam; this signaled his shift toward making slavery's abolition an official goal of the administration.

With Lincoln's strategy changing, and public opinion in the North moving increasingly toward support of black enlistment, Congress passed the Second Confiscation Act on July 17, 1862. This act mandated that all slaves who belonged to Confederate masters would be free and that any black person who was employed by the Union forces was also free. The first black unit to be officially mustered into the army was the Louisiana Native Guards, initially brought into service by Benjamin Butler in his General Order No. 63, published on August 22, 1862. Meanwhile, General James Lane, an ardent abolitionist (and U.S. senator) in the new state of Kansas, began the recruitment of black troops to protect Kansas citizens from Confederate guerrillas clustered along the Kansas-Missouri border. His actions were technically not sanctioned by Lincoln or the army's leading generals, but after the issuance of the Emancipation Proclamation in 1863, the only remaining barrier to the use of black troops disintegrated. The Emancipation Proclamation declared that all slaves living in a state in rebellion were free. This made the Civil War a war of emancipation as well as a war to reunite the Union, since advancing Union armies stood to gain support from the newly freed slaves in conquered territory. Lane's troops were the first black regiment to encounter Confederates on the battlefield at a skirmish in Bates County, Missouri; these troops were officially mustered into the service in 1863 as the First Kansas Colored and Second Kansas Colored.

The governor of Massachusetts, John A. Andrew, also sought permission to raise two regiments of black troops. The War Department authorized this recruitment, and Andrews solicited Frederick Douglass, the former slave and noted abolitionist, to assist in locating free black men willing to fight for the cause of freedom. Douglass began recruiting for the Fifty-fourth Massachusetts Regiment of the United States Colored Troops in February 1863. The Bureau of Colored Troops, the government body assigned to administer the recruitment and organization of these units, was created by the War Department on May 1, 1863.

About the Author

Frederick Douglass was a prominent abolitionist and outspoken advocate for black equality, who had himself been born into slavery on a Maryland plantation sometime in February 1818, under the name Frederick Augustus Washington Bailey. His mother was enslaved, and his father was an unknown white man, who at one point Douglass believed may have been his mother's owner. As a child he was separated from his mother, living instead with various other relatives. At age eight he moved to Baltimore to work for a carpenter named Hugh Auld, and it was in Baltimore that he first learned to read and encountered abolitionist newspapers that would inspire him to make an escape.

After enduring harsh whippings and other mistreatment at the hands of white overseers and slave owners—including an infamous encounter with a cruel slave breaker named Edward Covey—the twenty-year-old Douglass finally made his escape on September 3, 1838. He fled by steamboat and then by train to New York City, and from there he settled in Massachusetts to begin his new life as a free man, taking the new name "Frederick Douglass." While he was in Massachusetts, he cultivated a friendship with his fellow abolitionist William Lloyd Garrison, who published an influential and controversial newspaper called The Liberator, the same paper that had first inspired him to seek freedom in the North. With Garrison's encouragement, in 1841 Douglass delivered his first public lecture in Nantucket, to a packed crowd that had assembled for the annual convention of the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society.

His experience at that abolitionist meeting set him on a course that would make him a leading national advocate of emancipation; he began a widespread lecture tour that made him a prominent voice in the movement thanks to his personal experiences as a slave. The attendant publicity (both negative and positive), however, made Douglass fearful that his former owner might capture him, so in 1845 he moved to Britain, where he spent two years making connections with British supporters of black equality; he returned to the United States in 1847, after English abolitionists purchased his freedom. After settling in Rochester, New York, he established a series of abolitionist newspapers, including The North Star (1847–1851), Frederick Douglass' Paper (1851–1860), and Douglass' Monthly (1858–1863). When full-scale civil war broke out in 1861, Douglass eagerly suggested that free blacks be allowed to fight and help free their enslaved brethren who lived in the South. He assisted with the recruitment of the Fifty-fourth Massachusetts, encouraging two of his sons—Lewis and Charles—to join the regiment. During the war Douglass consulted with the Lincoln administration and was a constant advocate for black equality. He continued to proclaim his support of black troops until the war's end in 1865, at which point he could easily have been described as the most famous African American of his time. He worked for full racial equality until his death in Washington, D.C., on February 20, 1895.

Douglass authored several books, including three versions of his autobiography, in addition to numerous editorials and newspaper articles in many of the leading abolitionist papers like The Liberator, the Anti-Slavery Advocate, and other publications. The best known of these works was his first autobiography, the Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass, an American Slave, published in 1845. This narrative is still considered one of the most moving accounts of slave life in the American South.

Time Line

1863

■ August 10
Douglass visits President Lincoln at the White House to plead for equal treatment of black soldiers.

1864

■ April 12
Confederate general Nathan Bedford Forrest massacres approximately three hundred Union soldiers, including African Americans, near Fort Pillow, Tennessee.

1865

■ April 9
Union general Ulysses S. Grant and Confederate general Robert E. Lee meet at Appomattox Court House, where Lee surrenders. The Civil War comes to an end.

■ December 6
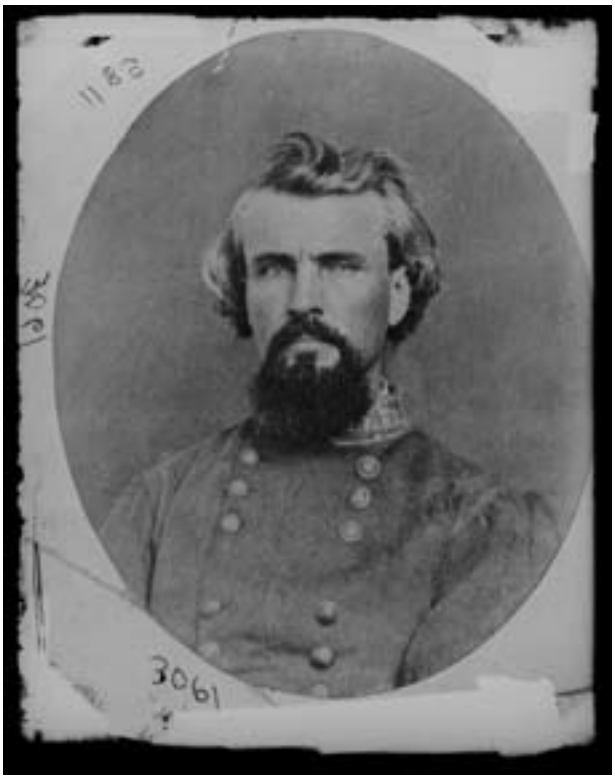
The Thirteenth Amendment, which abolishes slavery, is ratified.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

In the opening lines of his speech, Douglass grounds his arguments in his prophetic belief that this war will bring about great advances in the struggle for racial equality. After establishing that black troops would eventually be used, regardless of the northern public's criticisms, Douglass turns to an examination of how the ongoing Civil War is not merely a war over states' rights; it is a war to determine whether or not slavery would be part of the American legal, political, economic, and social system. Here he advances his first main point: The only logical response to southerners' perpetuation of slavery is to enlist black troops in the war effort; anyone should have been able to see that "the arm of the slave was the best defense against the arm of the slaveholder."

Douglass had been a vocal proponent of black enlistment throughout the war, but it was not until 1863 that the Emancipation Proclamation created a path that could fulfill his dreams. Influencing the government's position on this matter had been a slow (even tedious) process, but in the next section of his speech he encourages the audience not to revisit the history of black enlistment. The war effort could not be delayed any longer: "Action! Action! not criticism, is the plain duty of this hour. Words are now useful only as they stimulate to blows." Although Douglass had always advocated the use of violence to free slaves, the ongoing war had convinced him that this was the perfect time for northern blacks—whether they had been born free or slave—to accept this challenge.



General Nathan Bedford Forrest (Library of Congress)

Next, Douglass addresses the black critics of black enlistment, methodically dismantling the fallacies behind their reluctance to fight. He even calls these critics "weak and cowardly men.… They tell you this is the 'white man's war'; and you will be 'no better off after than before the war.'" Some black northerners' resistance to enlistment, according to Douglass, stemmed from their fear that white officers would carelessly place them on the front lines to be sacrificed "on the first opportunity." As Douglass and his audience were aware, even northerners who supported the war effort and believed that slavery was an immoral system did not necessarily support full racial equality, and this prejudiced attitude could engender resentment among the ranks of white officers who commanded black regiments. Douglass did not want such negativity to discourage black men who were willing to perform their civic duty on the battlefield, since "liberty won by white men would lose half its luster." Instead of giving credence to these objections leveled by "cowards," he encouraged black men to prove their bravery by enlisting. Lest anyone suspect that he had not given this matter due consideration, Douglass reassured the audience that "the counsel I give comes of close observation of the great struggle now in progress, and of the deep conviction that this is your hour and mine."

The previous points all serve as an introduction to the heart of Douglass's argument: that after much thought he is confident enough in his convictions to use plain language and "call and counsel you to arms." He links blacks' involvement in the military directly to the furtherance of black rights in the United States, declaring, "I urge you to fly to arms, and smite with death the power that would bury the government and your liberty in the same hopeless grave." The destiny of African Americans is here tied directly to the continuation of the Union.

Who will lead this fight? In paragraph 2 he presents the practical implications of this call to arms and announces how Massachusetts is poised to take the lead in black enlistment. Massachusetts harbors only a small population of free blacks, but Douglass encourages those in Rochester to "go quickly and help fill up the first colored regiment from the North." Douglass had been in contact with the governor of Massachusetts, John A. Andrews, in addition to other key political and military figures in the days and weeks leading up to this speech. He reassures the audience that he is an authorized spokesperson who knows the details of the enlistment process and that any black men who enlisted would be accorded the same wages and treatment as white soldiers. Although he does not state whether the officers would be white or African American, he promises that these leaders would treat all their recruits equally and without discrimination.

The closing section of Douglass's speech includes the most powerfully inspiring rhetoric of the entire presentation, and it is also the richest in terms of historical references. Douglass suggests an analogy to the audience, observing that the slave system in the South is a prison and that those African Americans who are already free now have the responsibility to save their brethren who still labor in bondage. He calls to mind some of the great black revolutionaries in American history as a reminder that this current conflict is only an extension of a battle that had been raging in the hearts of African Americans for centuries. First he names Denmark Vesey, a former slave in Charleston, South Carolina, who planned a rebellion against slaveholders in 1822; before Vesey and his compatriots could implement their plan, word got out to the local white community and a full-scale panic erupted in the countryside. Vesey was executed in 1822. Douglass then references Nathaniel (Nat) Turner, a Virginia slave who launched a full-scale rebellion in 1831 that ended with the deaths of at least fifty-five whites and most members of the rebellion (including Turner himself). Last, he recalls that two former slaves—Shields Green and John Anthony Copeland—had participated in John Brown's raid on the federal arsenal at Harpers Ferry, Virginia, in October 1859. Green had spent some time in Rochester, the site of Douglass's speech, prior to his involvement with Brown, so his name would have been familiar to the audience. Both Green and Copeland were executed in Charles Town, Virginia (now West Virginia), on December 16, 1859, for their involvement in the raid. These men had paved the way for black involvement in the military. According to Douglass this was the perfect opportunity for northern blacks to combat slavery and "win for ourselves the gratitude of our country, and the best blessings of our posterity through all time."

Essential Quotes

"A war undertaken and brazenly carried on for the perpetual enslavement of colored men, calls logically and loudly for colored men to help suppress it."

"Action! Action! not criticism, is the plain duty of this hour. Words are now useful only as they stimulate to blows. The office of speech now is only to point out when, where, and how to strike to the best advantage. There is no time to delay."

"The iron gate of our prison stands half open. One gallant rush from the North will fling it wide open, while four millions of our brothers and sisters shall march out into liberty. The chance is now given you to end in a day the bondage of centuries, and to rise in one bound from social degradation to the place of common equality with all other varieties of men"

"This is our golden opportunity. Let us accept it, and forever wipe out the dark reproaches unsparingly hurled against us by our enemies. Let us win for ourselves the gratitude of our country, and the best blessings of our posterity through all time."

Audience

Douglass delivered this speech in Rochester, New York, but in broader terms, by titling his speech "Men of Color, To Arms!" Douglass was speaking to the entire free black population of the North. He knew this message would be printed and would function as a rallying cry to encourage blacks' involvement in the Union effort; additionally, his speech reinforced the convictions of the many northern blacks who had been vocalizing their desires to enlist, pressing against Lincoln's unsupportive policies since the beginning of the conflict in 1861. In addition, Douglass fully understood that white critics of black enlistment would read his speech, and as a result, they might become more comfortable with the concept of black soldiers. His fervent call for blacks to fight for the Union cause was, in effect, distributed to a national audience.

Impact

After the publication of this speech in Douglass' Monthly, the great abolitionist's beliefs about blacks' fitness for military duty and their opportunity to bring about the freedom of their people were disseminated not only to his readership but also, through republication in other northern newspapers, to a wider audience. Thanks to this speech, the American public was exposed to Douglass's impassioned rhetoric in favor of emancipation and the use of black troops, and as the war progressed, more northerners came to agree with his position. Douglass had himself been disenchanted with Lincoln's policies, but in this speech he made clear to the black public that their involvement in the military effort would reinforce the importance of equal treatment of all individuals, regardless of race. Douglass's established place as a leading voice for racial equality guaranteed that his speeches and publications would generate conversation and debate among both northerners and southerners. For modern readers of this transcript, Douglass's position illustrates how freed blacks and abolitionists were an integral part of the effort to recruit black troops. Historians today acknowledge that Douglass's "To Arms" describes in vivid language how African American soldiers could aid in the Union's triumph and, more important, prove their right to equality and their readiness to become full citizens of American society.

Despite (or perhaps because of) the North's hesitance to arm former slaves and other free blacks, African American regiments thoroughly proved their mettle on the battlefield. Perhaps the most famous episode of blacks in combat was the Fifty-fourth Massachusetts's assault on Fort Wagner, near Charleston, South Carolina, in July 1863, which has been memorialized by Augustus Saint-Gaudens's sculpture in the Boston Common (1897) and by the movie Glory (1989). The commander of the Fifty-fourth, Robert Gould Shaw, was killed, and 271 of his men were killed, wounded, or taken prisoner. From a military perspective the engagement failed, but after that night the Fifty-fourth became a symbol of how African American regiments could perform with valor and determination in the face of fierce opposition. William H. Carney, who had distinguished himself at Fort Wagner, was the first African American to earn the highest military decoration, the Medal of Honor. Just one day earlier, in Indian Territory, the First Kansas Colored had beaten off a far larger force of Texas Confederates at the Battle of Honey Springs. By 1863, thanks to the Fifty-fourth Massachusetts and other black regiments, African Americans' place in the military was generally accepted both by the Lincoln administration and many members of the northern public.

Black troops did, however, continue to encounter racism and discrimination from government officials, military officers, and the general public. Lingering concerns regarding blacks' ability to serve, combined with continued discrimination from whites, required that black regiments be commanded only by white officers. Key leaders in the administration maintained that since most black soldiers were inexperienced, it made sense to have white officers, who could effectively teach new recruits how to drill and how to perform in battle. These arguments did little to assuage the apprehension of black recruits who feared that such a policy could foster widespread discrimination, but as the tide of public opinion turned in favor of black regiments, the army adjusted its policy and granted some officers' commissions to surgeons. By some estimations, there were around one hundred black officers who received commissions during the Civil War.

In addition to fighting prejudice at home in the North, black troops faced even greater challenges on the battlefield. Confederate officers resented the Union's use of black troops and often mistreated blacks who were captured or who surrendered. In Missouri, James Williams, commander of the 1st Kansas Colored, found that some members of his scouting party had been captured by Confederate guerrillas; although Williams attempted to arrange for a prisoner exchange, the guerrillas refused and executed one of the black prisoners. Williams reciprocated by executing one of the captured Confederate soldiers, showing that racial recrimination would not be tolerated. Situations such as this were not uncommon in other black regiments. On April 12, 1864, a force of about 2,500 Confederates under the command of Nathan Bedford Forrest assaulted Fort Pillow, in Tennessee. There were some six hundred Union men garrisoned at the fort, about half of them former slaves. Forrest's men violated the terms of the flag of truce and overran the fort, brutally massacring most of the black men within. (Over 60 percent of the blacks were killed.) After this cruelty, a rallying cry among other black troops was "Remember Fort Pillow!"

Black soldiers received less pay than white troops, even though the first black regiments to formally enlist (which included the First South Carolina and the Fifty-fourth and Fifty-fifth Massachusetts) had all been promised equal pay by the War Department. Black soldiers received $10 per month, with $3 of that taken for their clothing allowance; meanwhile, white soldiers received $13 per month, plus $3.50 for clothes. It was not until June 15, 1864, that Congress finally passed legislation ensuring that black soldiers would receive equal pay. A problem arose, however, over the matter of retroactive wages. The adjutant general's office maintained that only men who were legally free after April 19, 1861, would receive back pay, which excluded some recruits and consequently damaged the black regiments' morale. Finally—after much protest on the part of black soldiers, white officers, and recruiters—legislation passed on March 3, 1865, guaranteed that retroactive equal pay would be given to all African American regiments that had been promised equal treatment by the military. Although this had been a years-long struggle, by war's end black troops were on a more equal footing with their white comrades, illustrating how revolutionary the Civil War period was in terms of altering the racial hierarchy present in the North.

By war's end, approximately 178,892 black soldiers had served in the Union army, making up a little more than 12 percent of the armed forces. Of that number, more than one-third died either as the result of injuries sustained in battle or of disease. When the hostilities ceased in 1865, most black regiments were mustered out of active service. Some of these troops stayed on with the army and went to military outposts in the West, gaining the nickname "Buffalo Soldiers." African Americans throughout both the North and the South were officially emancipated with the Thirteenth Amendment, which was ratified on December 6, 1865. Less than five years later, black men won the right to vote with the passage of the Fifteenth Amendment. Since that time, blacks have served honorably in every major military conflict in American history.

See also The Confessions of Nat Turner (1831); First editorial of the North Star (1847); Emancipation Proclamation (1863); War Department General Order 143 (1863); Thomas Morris Chester's Civil War Dispatches (1864) Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1865); Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1870).

Further Reading

■ Books

Blight, David W. Frederick Douglass' Civil War: Keeping Faith in Jubilee. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1989.

Cornish, Dudley Taylor. The Sable Arm: Black Troops in the Union Army, 1861–1865. 2nd ed. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1987.

Douglass, Frederick. The Life and Times of Frederick Douglass: His Early Life as a Slave, His Escape from Bondage, and His Complete History. New York: Dover Publications, 2003.

Foner, Eric. Forever Free: The Story of Emancipation and Reconstruction. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2005.

Glatthaar, Joseph T. Forged in Battle: The Civil War Alliance of Black Soldiers and White Officers. New York: Free Press, 1990.

McPherson, James. The Struggle for Equality: Abolitionists and the Negro in the Civil War and Reconstruction. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1964.

Manning, Chandra. What This Cruel War Was Over: Soldiers, Slavery, and the Civil War. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2007.

■ Web Sites

"The Fight for Equal Rights: Black Soldiers in the Civil War." National Archives "Teaching with Documents" Web site.
http://www.archives.gov/education/lessons/blacks-civil-war/.

"Frederick Douglass National Historic Site, Virtual Museum Exhibit." National Park Service Web site.
http://www.nps.gov/history/museum/exhibits/douglass/.

—Kristen K. Epps

Questions for Further Study

1. Explain how President Abraham Lincoln's views regarding the enlistment of black troops during the Civil War changed. Why do you think he altered his views?

2. Compare this document with Thomas Morris Chester's Civil War Dispatches (1864). How did the actions of black troops that Chester wrote about help to realize the views that Douglass expressed?

3. Douglass expressed great optimism about the Civil War and what he believed its impact would be on racial issues and the position of African Americans. Do you believe that after the Civil War he felt vindicated or disappointed?

4. In the twentieth century, numerous black writers urged African Americans to resist the military draft and refuse to fight in the nation's wars, particularly World War I, World War II, and the Vietnam War. Yet Douglass urged African Americans to take up arms. Why do you think attitudes changed from the nineteenth to the twentieth centuries?

5. Read this entry in conjunction with War Department General Order 143 (1863). What do you think Douglass's reaction to this order was? Why?

Document Text

Frederick Douglass: "Men of Color, To Arms!"

When first the rebel cannon shattered the walls of Sumter and drove away its starving garrison, I predicted that the war then and there inaugurated would not be fought out entirely by white men. Every month's experience during these dreary years has confirmed that opinion. A war undertaken and brazenly carried on for the perpetual enslavement of colored men, calls logically and loudly for colored men to help suppress it. Only a moderate share of sagacity was needed to see that the arm of the slave was the best defense against the arm of the slaveholder. Hence with every reverse to the national arms, with every exulting shout of victory raised by the slaveholding rebels, I have implored the imperiled nation to unchain against her foes, her powerful black hand. Slowly and reluctantly that appeal is beginning to be heeded. Stop not now to complain that it was not heeded sooner. It may or it may not have been best that it should not. This is not the time to discuss that question. Leave it to the future. When the war is over, the country is saved, peace is established, and the black man's rights are secured, as they will be, history with an impartial hand will dispose of that and sundry other questions. Action! Action! not criticism, is the plain duty of this hour. Words are now useful only as they stimulate to blows. The office of speech now is only to point out when, where, and how to strike to the best advantage. There is no time to delay. The tide is at its flood that leads on to fortune. From East to West, from North to South, the sky is written all over, "Now or never." Liberty won by white men would lose half its luster. "Who would be free themselves must strike the blow." "Better even die free, than to live slaves." This is the sentiment of every brave colored man amongst us. There are weak and cowardly men in all nations. We have them amongst us. They tell you this is the "white man's war"; and you will be "no better off after than before the war"; that the getting of you into the army is to "sacrifice you on the first opportunity." Believe them not; cowards themselves, they do not wish to have their cowardice shamed by your brave example. Leave them to their timidity, or to whatever motive may hold them back. I have not thought lightly of the words I am now addressing you. The counsel I give comes of close observation of the great struggle now in progress, and of the deep conviction that this is your hour and mine. In good earnest then, and after the best deliberation, I now for the first time during this war feel at liberty to call and counsel you to arms. By every consideration which binds you to your enslaved fellow—countrymen, and the peace and welfare of your country; by every aspiration which you cherish for the freedom and equality of yourselves and your children; by all the ties of blood and identity which make us one with the brave black men now fighting our battles in Louisiana and in South Carolina, I urge you to fly to arms, and smite with death the power that would bury the government and your liberty in the same hopeless grave. I wish I could tell you that the State of New York calls you to this high honor. For the moment her constituted authorities are silent on the subject. They will speak by and by, and doubtless on the right side; but we are not compelled to wait for her. We can get at the throat of treason and slavery through the State of Massachusetts. She was the first in the War of Independence; first to break the chains of her slaves; first to make the black man equal before the law; first to admit colored children to her common schools, and she was first to answer with her blood the alarm cry of the nation, when its capital was menaced by rebels. You know her patriotic governor, and you know Charles Sumner. I need not add more.

Massachusetts now welcomes you to arms as soldiers. She has but a small colored population from which to recruit. She has full leave of the general government to send one regiment to the war, and she has undertaken to do it. Go quickly and help fill up the first colored regiment from the North. I am authorized to assure you that you will receive the same wages, the same rations, and the same equipments, the same protection, the same treatment, and the same bounty, secured to the white soldiers. You will be led by able and skillful officers, men who will take especial pride in your efficiency and success. They will be quick to accord to you all the honor you shall merit by your valor, and see that your rights and feelings are respected by other soldiers. I have assured myself on these points, and can speak with authority. More than twenty years of unswerving devotion to our common cause may give me some humble claim to be trusted at this momentous crisis. I will not argue. To do so implies hesitation and doubt, and you do not hesitate. You do not doubt. The day dawns; the morning star is bright upon the horizon! The iron gate of our prison stands half open. One gallant rush from the North will fling it wide open, while four millions of our brothers and sisters shall march out into liberty. The chance is now given you to end in a day the bondage of centuries, and to rise in one bound from social degradation to the place of common equality with all other varieties of men. Remember Denmark Vesey of Charleston; remember Nathaniel Turner of Southampton; remember Shields Green and Copeland, who followed noble John Brown, and fell as glorious martyrs for the cause of the slave. Remember that in a contest with oppression, the Almighty has no attribute which can take sides with oppressors. The case is before you. This is our golden opportunity. Let us accept it, and forever wipe out the dark reproaches unsparingly hurled against us by our enemies. Let us win for ourselves the gratitude of our country, and the best blessings of our posterity through all time. The nucleus of this first regiment is now in camp at Readville, a short distance from Boston. I will under take to forward to Boston all persons adjudged fit to be mustered into the regiment, who shall apply to me at any time within the next two weeks.

Document Text

Glossary

Charles Sumner	a U.S. senator from Massachusetts and a leader of the abolition movement
Denmark Vesey	the leader of a planned slave revolt in South Carolina in 1822
John Brown	the white abolitionist who led an unsuccessful raid on the U.S. arsenal at Harpers Ferry, Virginia, in 1859
Nathaniel Turner	commonly called Nat Turner, the leader of a slave revolt in Virginia in 1831 patriotic governor	Governor John A. Andrew of Massachusetts, who backed the recruitment of black troops
Sumter	Fort Sumter in South Carolina, the site of the first hostilities of the Civil War

GENERAL ORDERS, } WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
No. 143. } Washington, May 22, 1863.

I..A Bureau is established in the Adjutant General's Office for the record of all matters relating to the organization of Colored Troops. An officer will be assigned to the charge of the Bureau, with such number of clerks as may be designated by the Adjutant General.

II..Three or more field officers will be detailed as Inspectors to supervise the organization of colored troops at such points as may be indicated by the War Department in the Northern and Western States.

III..Boards will be convened at such posts as may be decided upon by the War Department to examine applicants for commissions to command colored troops, who, on application to the Adjutant General, may receive authority to present themselves to the board for examination.

IV..No persons shall be allowed to recruit for colored troops except specially authorized by the War Department; and no such authority will be given to persons who have not been examined and passed by a board; nor will such authority be given any one person to raise more than one regiment.

V..The reports of Boards will specify the grade of commission for which each candidate is fit, and authority to recruit will be given in accordance. Commissions will be issued from the Adjutant General's Office when the prescribed number of men is ready for muster into service.

VI..Colored troops may be accepted by companies, to be afterwards consolidated in battalions and regiments by the Adjutant General. The regiments will be numbered seriatim, in the order in which they are raised, the numbers to be determined by the Adjutant General. They will be designated: "—— Regiment of U. S. Colored Troops."

VII..Recruiting stations and depôts will be established by the Adjutant General as circumstances shall require, and officers will be detailed to muster and inspect the troops.

War Department General Order 143 (National Archives and Records Administration)

War Department General Order 143

1863

"No persons shall be allowed to recruit for colored troops except specially authorized by the War Department."

Overview

The U.S. War Department issued General Order 143 on May 22, 1863, to organize and provide uniform recruitment and governance of black troops. The order established the Bureau of U.S. Colored Troops, and after that date most existing and all newly recruited African American units were incorporated and administered with the bureau's supervision.

One of the biggest controversies during the American Civil War revolved around the role that African Americans should play in the Union war effort. From the onset of the conflict, African Americans such as Frederick Douglass and other abolitionists urged President Abraham Lincoln to make ending slavery a war aim. African Americans also demanded a more active role in fighting the war. President Lincoln was hesitant to include black troops for several reasons. Racial prejudice was deep-seated in the northern states, and many, including Lincoln, feared that white soldiers would not fight side by side with African Americans. Many northerners held that African Americans were incapable of making good soldiers because they believed that blacks were too servile or cowardly.

Even before the Emancipation Proclamation brought slavery to the forefront of the conflict, blacks strove for inclusion in the ranks of the U.S. military despite the attitudes of northern whites. Both free blacks in the northern states and newly freed slaves in the southern areas under Union control were eager to contribute. Some Union generals began raising black units in occupied areas of the South in 1862, but recruitment began in earnest after formal announcement of the Emancipation Proclamation on January 1, 1863. The first black units were organized as volunteer units of the states. General Order 143 formalized these efforts.

Context

In April 1861, a mere few days after the Civil War had begun when the Confederates fired on Fort Sumter in the harbor at Charleston, South Carolina, a group of African Americans in Cleveland, Ohio, gathered to pledge their support for the Union cause. As they put it, "As colored citizens of Cleveland, desiring to prove our loyalty to the Government, [we] feel that we should adopt measures to put ourselves in a position to defend the government of which we claim protection." They continued: "That to-day, as in the times of '76, and the days of 1812, we are ready to go forth and do battle in the common cause of the country." Although African Americans had taken up arms during the American Revolution and during the War of 1812, federal law had prohibited the enlistment of blacks in state militias and the U.S. Army since 1792. At the beginning of the Civil War there were no black soldiers in the regular army, and most white northerners hoped to keep it that way.

African Americans recognized at the war's outset that this conflict had the potential to rid the United States of slavery, and they were eager to push for their inclusion in the fight. Abraham Lincoln's administration and the mainstream press were careful to declare that the war was about restoring the Union and emphatically denied that the issue of slavery had any role in the conflict. Northern public opinion, at least early in the war, was not prepared to consider challenging the racial balance that placed African Americans at the bottom of the social ladder. Prominent blacks and abolitionists, however, began pushing for the enlistment of black troops almost immediately, and many realized the implications of those fears. Perhaps Frederick Douglass most clearly outlined the fear of white northerners with regard to black military participation. In August 1861 he editorialized in his newspaper, Douglass' Monthly, "Once let the black man get upon his person the brass letters, U.S., let him get an eagle on his button, and a musket on his shoulder and bullets in his pocket, and there is no power on earth which can deny that he has earned the right to citizenship in the United States." Lincoln recognized that military service for blacks would indeed place African Americans in a position to demand the rights of citizenship, including suffrage. He also feared that the presence of black soldiers would discourage white enlistments. Another concern was maintaining the loyalty of the border states, including Maryland, Kentucky, Missouri, and Delaware. Although these were slave states, they had not joined the Confederacy, and the president wanted them to remain part of the Union.

Time Line

1861

- April 12
  The Civil War begins following the firing on Fort Sumter at Charleston, South Carolina.
- May
  General Benjamin F. Butler declares escaped slaves to be the property of the Union and puts them to work behind Union lines.
- August 6
  Congress passes the first Confiscation Act authorizing the seizure of property, including slaves, used to aid the Confederate war effort.

1862

- July 17
  Congress passes the second Confiscation Act, authorizing federal courts to free the slaves of those fighting against the Union, and the Militia Act, authorizing President Abraham Lincoln to enroll African American troops in the Union army.
- September 27
  The First Louisiana Native Guards becomes the first black unit to be recognized by the War Department.

1863

- January 1
  The Emancipation Proclamation takes effect, declaring an end to slavery in the Confederate states under rebellion.
- January
  The First Kansas Volunteer Colored Infantry is mustered into service as the first regiment of African American troops raised in a northern state.
- January
  Governor John A. Andrew of Massachusetts is granted permission to raise an African American regiment, the Fifty-fourth Massachusetts Infantry.
- May 22
  The War Department issues General Order 143, creating the U.S. Colored Troops.

Despite these concerns, pressures to allow black military enlistment mounted from several directions. From early in the war the Confederate army employed free black and slave labor to perform much of the manual work required for the military. Eventually, the Confederate army requisitioned slaves from their masters in much the same way it appropriated food or other necessary supplies. Throughout the war African Americans not only raised much of the food that fed the Confederate troops but also built many of the fortifications and entrenchments that protected troops in the field. The Union general Benjamin F. Butler, in command of troops at Fortress Monroe in Virginia, was one of the earliest advocates of using African Americans in the Union cause. In May 1861 he declared escaped slaves who had labored on behalf of the Confederate war effort as "contraband of war" and refused to return them to their masters. Reasoning that returning the slaves to their masters would benefit the enemy, Butler put them to work behind Union lines. Although the policy was controversial, Lincoln allowed Butler's action to stand. Before the summer of 1861 ended, Congress would pass legislation to more clearly define how the Union army should treat the large numbers of slaves who sought freedom behind Union lines.

Realizing the importance of slave labor to the Confederacy, in August 1861 Congress passed the frst Confiscation Act, permitting the seizure of any property, including slaves, used to aid the Confederate war effort. This provided legitimacy to Butler's ad hoc contraband policy, and over the duration of the war some two hundred thousand "contrabands" worked for the Union army. Although the act sidestepped the issue of emancipation, it did introduce the concept of manumission into federal policy. The same month, General John C. Frémont was bolder in declaring free the slaves of Confederates in Missouri. As commander in charge of the Department of the West in St. Louis, Frémont's emancipation declaration was a part of a larger plan to bring Missouri under closer control of the Union.

Alarmed that the action might lead Missouri and the other border states to join the Confederacy, Lincoln quickly rescinded the order and eventually removed Frémont from his post. Lincoln's action angered abolitionists such as the radical Parker Pillsbury, who condemned the president's act as "cowardly submission to southern and border slave state dictation." Some prominent northern politicians, including Massachusetts governor John A. Andrew and Kansas senator James H. Lane, urged Lincoln to arm African Americans. Along with the generals John W. Phelps and David Hunter, they argued that blacks were eager to fight for the nation. Although Lincoln was not prepared to support a radical emancipation policy in 1861, by midyear 1862, at the urging of these men, he was beginning to see the value of including African Americans in the military. It was also becoming clear that emancipation would necessarily result if African Americans were allowed to enlist in the U.S. Army.

In July 1862 Congress passed two bills that tied emancipation to military enlistment. The second Confiscation Act authorized northern courts to free the slaves of those "engaged in rebellion" and authorized Lincoln to employ "as many persons of African descent as he may deem necessary and proper for the suppression of this rebellion, and for this purpose he may organize and use them in such manner as he may judge best for the public welfare." The Militia Act granted freedom to slaves who worked for the U.S. Army and gave Lincoln the authority to "to receive into the service of the United States, for the purpose of constructing intrenchments, or performing camp service, or any other labor, or any military or naval service which they may be found competent, persons of African descent." While Lincoln and many northerners remained skeptical about arming African Americans, Congress had clearly paved the way for the enlistment of blacks with these two acts. During the summer of 1862 Lincoln also began secretly drafting a proclamation that would emancipate slaves in the Confederate states that had not fallen under Union control.

The public would not learn of the Emancipation Proclamation until September 1862, when it was announced following the Union victory at the Battle of Antietam. Not knowing Lincoln's plan, some northerners attacked his failure to fully execute the emancipation clause of the second Confiscation Act. Douglass proclaimed in an editorial, "The signs of the times indicate that the people will have to take this war into their own hands and dispense with the services of all who by their incompetency give aid and comfort to the destroyers of the country." Horace Greeley, editor of the New York Tribune, complained that Lincoln was too worried about the border states and urged him to enforce the new acts. In the summer and fall of 1862, as Lincoln cautiously danced around the full implementation of the second Confiscation Act, more radical military leaders in the field took it to heart.

The first African Americans to take up arms for the Union cause during the Civil War did so in the South. Empowered by the second Confiscation Act and the Militia Act, commanders in the field were willing and sometimes eager to begin enlisting black units. One of the first to do so was General Butler, who by mid-1862 commanded occupation forces in Louisiana. As his earlier contraband policy might suggest, Butler had no problem employing African Americans to fill a shortfall in the number of Union soldiers available to defend New Orleans. On September 27 he mustered into service the First Louisiana Native Guards. Although blacks had been placed in defensive roles in several small units, this was the first sanctioned regiment of African American soldiers in the Union army. Pleased with the result, Butler organized two additional regiments, the Second and Third Louisiana Native Guards, by November 1862. Other early African American regiments were raised in South Carolina, including the First South Carolina Volunteer Infantry (African Descent), commanded by the abolitionist Thomas Wentworth Higginson. In Kansas, before he had official authorization, Senator James H. Lane began recruiting for the First Kansas Volunteer Colored Infantry, which became the first black regiment recruited in the northern states. All African American units were headed by white commissioned officers, although eventually black soldiers could aspire to the rank of corporal or sergeant, and more than a hundred gained commissioned ranks. By the end of 1862 between three thousand and four thousand black men were serving in five regiments. When first recognized by the War Department, the soldiers in black regiments received $10 monthly pay, $3 less than their white counterparts.

Time Line

1864
- June
  Congress grants equal pay to soldiers in the U.S. Colored Troops.

1865
- The Civil War ends in April, and in December the Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution abolishes slavery in the United States.

1866
- July 28
  Congress authorizes two permanent African American regiments, the Ninth and Tenth United States Cavalry, who would gain renown as the Buffalo Soldiers.

Following the issuance of the final Emancipation Proclamation on January 1, 1863, black enlistment became a major priority and a central part of Lincoln's emancipation program. That month Massachusetts governor John A. Andrew was authorized to raise the Fifty-fourth Massachusetts Infantry, and prominent New England abolitionists rushed to help recruit. Secretary of War Edwin Stanton also authorized Rhode Island and Connecticut to begin recruiting black regiments. Black abolitionists, including Frederick Douglass, Martin R. Delany, Henry McNeal Turner, and John Mercer Langston, recruited broadly across the northern and midwestern states. In March 1863 the army's adjutant general, Lorenzo Thomas, was ordered to the South to head an enlistment drive.

Thomas's southern travels took him to the Mississippi Valley, where he was charged not only with recruiting African American troops but also with finding qualified officers to lead the newly forming regiments. The enlistment drive was successful, as Thomas found many freedmen eager to serve. Thomas's 1863 recruiting resulted in raising twenty black regiments but also pointed to the need for a more ordered system of recruitment and organization to govern the new troops. Issued on May 22, 1863, General Order 143 provided the mechanism for organizing all black regiments under the newly created Bureau of Colored Troops.

Assistant Adjutant General Charles W. Foster was appointed to lead the bureau, and he primarily supervised black enlistment and recruitment in both the North and South for the remainder of the war. Following the creation of the United States Colored Troops, African American regiments with state names, with only a few exceptions, were renamed and designated units of the U.S. Colored Troops. Exceptions were made for a few regiments from Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Louisiana. The significance of renaming the First Kansas Colored Volunteer Infantry as the Seventy-ninth U.S. Colored Infantry or the First Louisiana Native Guards the Seventy-third U.S. Colored Infantry was that instead of being mustered into a state unit, the black soldiers became agents of the U.S. Army. In June 1864, a year after the creation of the Bureau of Colored Troops, Congress granted equal pay to African American soldiers. The Bureau of Colored Troops offered a professional, organized, and well-ordered chain of command and bureaucratic structure that enabled African Americans to gain a permanent place in the military and to stand and fight for the freedom guaranteed by the U.S. government.

Lorenzo Thomas (Library of Congress)

About the Author

General Order 143 was a directive issued by the War Department and as such does not have an author of record. However, the army's adjutant general, Lorenzo Thomas, most likely had a hand in authoring the order. In March 1863 Secretary of War Edwin Stanton ordered Thomas to the Mississippi Valley to recruit and muster regiments of African American troops.

Lorenzo Thomas was born in New Castle, Delaware, in 1804. An 1823 graduate of the U.S. Military Academy at West Point, Thomas was a career army officer who was appointed adjutant general of the army in the early months of the Civil War. In this post he was the person primarily responsible for recruitment and staffing of the army. It was under his watch that large-scale recruitment of black troops began. He was not known as an abolitionist or Radical Republican, who were critical of Lincoln's slowness in freeing the slaves and supporting their legal equality. Instead, as a moderate he was able to convince many of the necessity of enlisting African Americans in the army. Although Thomas did not favor black officers for the new regiments, he was a firm believer that the African American troops should not be relegated to general labor but rather should be given combat assignments. It was during his recruitment drive through Kentucky, Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Tennessee in 1863 that Thomas came to realize that a new organizational system was required, resulting in General Order 143 creating the U.S. Colored Troops.

Following the Civil War, Thomas remained in the adjutant general's post, although his relationship with Secretary Stanton was somewhat tenuous and the secretary reportedly doubted Thomas's loyalty. Perhaps Stanton's concern had some foundation. In 1868, President Andrew Johnson briefly appointed Thomas interim secretary of war to replace Stanton. It was this action that led Congress to declare Johnson in violation of the Tenure of Office Act, resulting in his impeachment. During the impeachment proceedings both Thomas and Stanton claimed to be the secretary of war. After successfully avoiding conviction, Johnson failed to appoint Thomas permanently to the post. Thomas retired from the army with the rank of major general in February 1869. He died in 1875.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

General Order 143 is divided into nine sections. Section I establishes a separate bureau within the War Department to administer and organize African American regiments, officially called Colored Troops. The order provides for an administrative officer and a number of supporting clerks to be appointed by the adjutant general. Section II authorizes the appointment of three or more inspectors to oversee the organization of regiments within the U.S. Colored Troops. These inspectors could be sent anywhere within the northern states under the authorization of the War Department.

Section III attends to the recruitment of white commissioned officers to command units within the Colored Troops. The order authorizes an examining board or boards to evaluate and select among applicants for commissioned posts in command of the newly raised regiments. Section IV restricts recruitment agents to those individuals authorized by the War Department. Recruiters were required to pass the evaluation of a specially created board, and each was permitted to raise only one regiment of Colored Troops.

Members of the 107th U.S. Colored Infantry, shown with musical instruments (Library of Congress)

Sections V and VI link an officer's rank to the number of troops he is authorized to recruit. Once the prescribed number of men was recruited, the adjutant general would grant the appropriate officer's commission. Recruitment could be into companies of about one hundred soldiers, which would then be incorporated into regiments that included up to ten companies. Instead of having regiments that bore a number tied to their locus of recruitment, such as the Fifty-fourth Massachusetts, regiments of the U.S. Colored Troops would be numbered separately in the order in which they were raised. The first unit organized under General Order 143 would be the First U.S. Colored Troops, the next the Second U.S. Colored Troops, and so forth. Section VII authorizes the establishment of recruiting depots and stations and provides for officers to oversee the inspection and mustering of the Colored Troops regiments.

Section VIII concerns the recruitment of noncommissioned officers, generally sergeants and corporals, from within the ranks of the African American members of each regiment. While the commanding commissioned officers of the Colored Troops were drawn from the white army population, African Americans could advance to noncommissioned officer status. An important distinction was made on the basis of responsibility. Commissioned officers enjoyed the responsibility of ultimate command of the regiment, but noncommissioned officers exercised more limited control over men within the unit. Noncommissioned officers were selected based on merit, and those who showed an aptitude for leading could be promoted, as from corporal to sergeant. Each company generally included four sergeants and four corporals, so opportunities to advance to officer status were not common. The final section of the order establishes procedures for directing correspondence and inquiries regarding the Colored Troops. It directs that applications for officer appointments be made directly to the chief of the Bureau of Colored Troops.

Audience

General Order 143 is a military directive whose immediate audience was the Union army. It was especially aimed at those responsible for the administration and recruitment of African American troops. Those recruiting black enlistments outside the auspices of the army were another potential audience of the order. Ultimately, General Order

Essential Quotes

"A Bureau is established in the Adjutant General's Office for the record of all matters relating to the organization of Colored Troops."

(Section I)

"No persons shall be allowed to recruit for colored troops except specially authorized by the War Department."

(Section IV)

"The non-commissioned officers of colored troops may be selected and appointed from the best men of their number in the usual mode of appointing non-commissioned officers."

(Section VIII)

143 was aimed at the nation, as it laid the foundation for organizing and administering the participation of African American soldiers in the Union war effort. Beyond establishing procedures and an administrative structure, the order indicated clearly that African Americans would have a stake in American society.

Impact

By the end of the Civil War in April 1865, the Union army had recruited 178,975 African American soldiers into its ranks. Black troops made up 133 infantry regiments, 4 independent companies, 7 cavalry regiments, 12 heavy artillery regiments, and 10 companies of light infantry. Most of the black Union soldiers were former slaves, although a significant number were drawn from the ranks of the northern free black community. African Americans made up nearly 10 percent of all Union troops serving in the war.

The creation of the Bureau of Colored Troops had implications beyond the Civil War. In establishing a military bureau and administrative structure, General Order 143 set the precedent for permanent inclusion of African Americans in the military. By October 1865 the regiments of the U.S. Colored Troops began demobilizing, but this was not the end to black military participation. On July 28, 1866, Congress authorized the creation of two African American regiments for the regular army. The Ninth and Tenth U.S. Cavalry later gained recognition as the Buffalo Soldiers as they performed important service in the American West in the late 1800s. Although blacks would never again be denied entrance to the military, the U.S. Colored Troops also established the segregation of African Americans into separate units led by white commissioned officers. The U.S. military remained segregated through World War II. Racial separation in the military ended in July 1948 when President Harry S. Truman signed Executive Order 9981 ending segregation in the armed forces.

See also Emancipation Proclamation (1863); Frederick Douglass: "Men of Color, To Arms!" (1863).

Further Reading

■ Books

Douglass, Frederick. "The Proclamation and a Negro Army." In The Frederick Douglass Papers, Series 1: Speeches, Debates, and Interviews, Vol. 3: 1855–63, ed. John Blassingame and John R. McKivigan. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1985.

Fisher, Ernest F. Guardians of the Republic: A History of the Noncommissioned Officer Corps of the U.S. Army. New York: Stackpole Books, 2001.

Higginson, Thomas Wentworth. Army Life in a Black Regiment. 1870. Reprint. New York: Collier Books, 1962.

McPherson, James M. The Negro's Civil War: How American Blacks Felt and Acted during the War for the Union. 1965. Reprint. New York: Ballantine Books, 1991.

Smith, John David, ed. Black Soldiers in Blue: African American Troops in the Civil War Era. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2002.

Trudeau, Noah Andre. Like Men of War: Black Troops in the Civil War, 1862–1865. Boston: Little, Brown, 1998.

■ Web Sites

"The Fight for Equal Rights: Black Soldiers in the Civil War." National Archives "Teaching with Documents" Web site.
http://www.archives.gov/education/lessons/blacks-civil-war/.

—L. Diane Barnes

Questions for Further Study

1. Explore how War Department General Order 143 fit into the struggle of African Americans to gain full citizenship and civil rights in the United States. What rights, if any, do you believe African Americans gained from serving in the U.S. Army during the Civil War?

2. General Order 143 was issued several months after the Emancipation Proclamation. Explore the connection between these two documents. How did freeing slaves in the Confederate areas under rebellion tie to the recruitment of African American troops for the Union army?

3. African American troops complained about getting less pay than white soldiers until Congress granted pay equity in June 1864. What arguments were used to justify paying African Americans less? What arguments were used to support equal pay? Can you think of examples in today's society when certain groups or classes of people receive unequal compensation for equal work?

Document Text

War Department General Order 143

May 22, 1863

I—A Bureau is established in the Adjutant General's Office for the record of all matters relating to the organization of Colored Troops. An officer will be assigned to the charge of the Bureau, with such number of clerks as may be designated by the Adjutant General.

II—Three or more field officers will be detailed as Inspectors to supervise the organization of colored troops at such points as may be indicated by the War Department in the Northern and Western States.

III—Boards will be convened at such posts as may be decided upon by the War Department to examine applicants for commissions to command colored troops, who, on Application to the Adjutant General, may receive authority to present themselves to the board for examination.

IV—No persons shall be allowed to recruit for colored troops except specially authorized by the War Department; and no such authority will be given to persons who have not been examined and passed by a board; nor will such authority be given any one person to raise more than one regiment.

V—The reports of Boards will specify the grade of commission for which each candidate is fit, and authority to recruit will be given in accordance. Commissions will be issued from the Adjutant General's Office when the prescribed number of men is ready for muster into service.

VI—Colored troops may be accepted by companies, to be afterward consolidated in battalions and regiments by the Adjutant General. The regiments will be numbered seriatim, in the order in which they are raised, the numbers to be determined by the Adjutant General. They will be designated: "—Regiment of U. S. Colored Troops."

VII—Recruiting stations and depots will be established by the Adjutant General as circumstances shall require, and officers will be detailed to muster and inspect the troops.

VIII—The non-commissioned officers of colored troops may be selected and appointed from the best men of their number in the usual mode of appointing non-commissioned officers. Meritorious commissioned officers will be entitled to promotion to higher rank if they prove themselves equal to it.

IX—All personal applications for appointments in colored regiments, or for information concerning them, must be made to the Chief of the Bureau; all written communications should be addressed to the Chief of the Bureau, to the care of the Adjutant General,

BY ORDER OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR:

E. D. TOWNSEND, Assistant Adjutant General.

Glossary

adjutant general	the chief administrative officer of a military unit or army regiment	unit of military organization including up to ten companies

The storming of Fort Wagner by the Fifty-fourth Massachusetts (Library of Congress)

Thomas Morris Chester's Civil War Dispatches

1864

"The colored troops fully sustained the most exalted opinion which their ardent friends could possibly entertain."

Overview

Thomas Morris Chester pursued a number of careers, including teaching, law, and journalism. As the first and only African American journalist to cover the Civil War for a major daily American newspaper—the Philadelphia Press—he filed dispatches about the progress of the war. In them, including the two from August 1864 reproduced here, he emphasized the exploits of "colored troops," that is, African American soldiers who fought during the later stages of the Civil War. As such, his reports became important documents in the ongoing debate about the place of African Americans in American society, whether they should be allowed to defend the nation's interests as members of the military, and what their future would be after the war. Chester's dispatches from Virginia, specifically from near Richmond, the Confederate capital, and Petersburg, a vital city to its south, give the modern reader a ground's-eye view of the progress of the war and the part that African American troops played in it.

Context

In January 1865, General Robert E. Lee, the commander of the Confederacy's Army of Northern Virginia, contacted the administration of President Jefferson Davis to request that the troop-starved Confederacy recruit African Americans. He wrote:

> Such an interest we can give our negroes by giving immediate freedom to all who enlist, and freedom at the end of the war to the families of those who discharge their duties faithfully (whether they survive or not), together with the privilege of residing at the South. To this might be added a bounty for faithful service.

Some black regiments were, in fact, mustered, but none ever fought in the war, though some individual blacks took up arms and fought where they could on behalf of the Confederacy.

In the North, however, a different decision was made. The question of whether African Americans, who had been allowed to fight against the British in the Revolutionary War, would be allowed to serve in the Union cause was raised early on. African Americans had offered to serve at least from the time of the Confederacy's attack at Fort Sumter in 1861—the start of the war—but it was not until January 1863, after President Abraham Lincoln issued the Emancipation Proclamation, that Secretary of War Edwin Stanton acceded to Massachusetts governor John Andrew's fervent requests and authorized the creation of an African American volunteer regiment.

The result was the formation of the Fifty-fourth Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry under the leadership of Colonel Robert Gould Shaw, a white officer. So many men volunteered for the black regiment that officials were able to make physical requirements more stringent, creating a regiment that was as fit and able-bodied as any in the Union army, if not more so. Additionally, the large number of volunteers led to the creation of a sister regiment, the Fifty-fifth Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry. Chester, a native of Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, spearheaded recruitment efforts in the Harrisburg area and by June 1863 was able to enlist 135 African American volunteers in the Fifty-fifth.

Harrisburg was under threat of imminent attack, with Confederate forces camped just outside, on the western bank of the Susquehanna River. At the same time, many African Americans displaced by the war were flooding into the city, which previously had been known as a refuge and a stop on the Underground Railroad. Many of them served as laborers to build the city's defenses along the river. Meanwhile, a number of African American volunteers from Philadelphia were rejected by the governor of Pennsylvania and the general in charge of the city's defense, Darius Crouch. In response, Secretary of War Stanton informed Crouch that he should accept volunteers without regard to their race. Two companies of African American recruits were formed from Harrisburg and Philadelphia, one of which was led by Chester, who had been a captain. However, neither company saw action, as the battle for Harrisburg did not take place. Instead, the Confederate troops abandoned their position in order to join the campaign that led to the Battle of Gettysburg in July. Ultimately, the Fifty-fourth

Time Line

1834

■ May 11
Thomas Morris Chester is born in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania.

1850

■ September 18
The federal Fugitive Slave Act is passed.

1853

■ Chester briefly teaches high school in Monrovia, Liberia (the first of several visits to the new nation).

1858

■ November
Chester returns to Liberia and starts an independent newspaper, the Star of Liberia.

1861

■ March 4
Abraham Lincoln is inaugurated as U.S. president.

■ April 12
Confederate forces attack Fort Sumter, South Carolina, starting the Civil War.

1862

■ September 22
Abraham Lincoln issues the preliminary Emancipation Proclamation.

1863

■ January
Secretary of War Edwin Stanton agrees to allow Massachusetts governor John Andrew to form an African American volunteer military unit, the Fifty-fourth Massachusetts Regiment.

■ June
Chester recruits 135 African American volunteers to join the Fifty-fourth's sister regiment, the Fifty-fifth Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry.

■ June
Two companies of African American recruits, one commanded by Chester, are formed in Harrisburg and Philadelphia.

■ July 18
The Fifty-fourth Massachusetts spearheads an unsuccessful assault on Fort Wagner in South Carolina.

Massachusetts would go on to spearhead an assault on Fort Wagner, outside Charleston, South Carolina, on July 18, 1863, its major engagement in the war.

From the Confederate point of view, news from the battlefronts was relentlessly dispiriting during the summer of 1864. Because the war was going so badly, and because many people in the South were coming to regard Jefferson Davis as a tyrant for suspending the writ of habeas corpus (giving authorities the power to make arrests and hold people without charge), the governor of Georgia had pulled his state's troops from the field, and the state threatened to secede from the Confederacy. The Confederate Army of Tennessee was in full retreat. Union troops had a Fourth of July picnic for African Americans on the grounds of Davis's home in Mississippi. In August, Union warships blockaded Mobile Bay off the coast of Alabama, cutting off the last port open to the South. Great Britain, which had remained officially neutral during the war but continued to buy southern cotton and supply the South with ships, severed relations with the South and seized the ships being built for the Confederacy in British shipyards. That month, too, the Union general William Tecumseh Sherman completed his famous "march to the sea" across Georgia, cutting the Confederacy in half, laying waste everything in his path, and capturing Atlanta. Meanwhile, the Confederate army had at most one hundred twenty-five thousand weary, starving troops in the field. The rate of desertion was high, as many soldiers simply threw down their weapons and set off for home. Starved for troops, the Confederacy employed "dog-catchers" in the cities to press into service boys as young as fourteen and men as old as sixty (many of them wounded veterans walking with crutches).

By the summer of 1864, the strategy of the northern generals was to wear down the Confederacy by circling in on Richmond, which lay on the James River just a hundred miles south-southwest of Washington, D.C. The Army of the James, led by General Benjamin Butler, was to move on Richmond from the south and east; the Army of the Potomac, led by General George Meade, was to approach from the north. In what was called the Overland Campaign, a series of bloody engagements took place in Virginia, but they all resulted in a stalemate. From May 8 to May 21, 1864, the battle at Spotsylvania Court House claimed a total of thirty thousand casualties on both sides, almost a fifth of the combatants. The Battle of Cold Harbor, from May 31 to June 12, claimed nearly thirteen thousand Union casualties.

These and other frontal assaults on the capital failed to dislodge the Confederate defenses, so General Ulysses S. Grant, the Union commander, decided on a different tack: to ignore Richmond and focus on Petersburg, a vital railroad hub to the south through which food, supplies, and war matériel passed. The siege of Petersburg, which lasted some 290 days until the spring of 1865, was intended to choke the Confederacy into submission. To resist this siege, the Confederacy, using troops and slave labor, constructed multiple defensive trenches in concentric rings around both cities. One of the major battles of the siege was the Battle of the Crater on July 30. The Union, seeking to break the defensive line around Petersburg, had tunneled underneath and packed the tunnel with four tons of explosives. When the powder blew, a huge crater was formed, into which Union forces stormed; after several hours of fighting, the Union had lost some four thousand troops, compared with just fifteen hundred Confederates. Again, the battle was a stalemate.

In August attention shifted to the area around the James River. Beginning on August 13, Union troops moved into an area called Deep Bottom in an effort to draw Confederate troops away from Petersburg. Over the next week, during the Second Battle of Deep Bottom (a first having been fought in June), the armies skirmished, once again with no clear victor. Union losses were heavy, with many troops dying of heatstroke. Union troops remained bottled up, and many military historians blame the bungling and hesitancy of General Butler for the failure to break through. The battle did succeed, though, in stretching Lee's forces. These and other assaults weakened the Confederate army in much the same way that repeated battering breaks down a door. Thomas Chester was on hand with the Army of the James to witness events around Petersburg and Richmond. He filed a story on August 18 from the Headquarters of the Tenth Corps and then filed a story on August 22 from the Headquarters of the Second Brigade, Third Division of the Eighteenth Army Corps.

About the Author

Thomas Morris Chester (also known as T. Morris Chester) was born in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, on May 11, 1834. His mother was a former slave; his father was a restaurateur whose establishment was a center of African American social and political activity and the sole location in the area where William Lloyd Garrison's abolitionist newspaper, The Liberator, could be bought. Although little is known of Chester's early life, it is clear that early on he was determined to become a lawyer and that he placed a high value on education. At age sixteen he began studies at the Allegheny Institute outside Pittsburgh. These were particularly difficult times for African Americans in the North, particularly escaped slaves, as 1850 marked the passage of the federal Fugitive Slave Act. Under this law, which was designed to appease the South, slave owners or their agents were authorized to capture their escaped slaves and return them to bondage in the South. The threat of this practice (as well as occasional kidnapping of free blacks) decimated the Pittsburgh area's African American population as many blacks fled to locales farther north.

In 1853, Harrisburg's African Americans were engaged in the debate over whether emigration was the best course. Chester was a noteworthy participant in debates about whether freed slaves should remain in the United States or immigrate to the African state of Liberia, founded in part by the American Colonization Society (or, more formally, the Society for the Colonization of Free People of Color of America) in 1821–1822 as a haven for freed slaves. Chester argued in favor of emigration and finally announced his intention to move to Africa. During the 1850s he traveled on three occasions to Liberia, where he taught and, in 1858, founded the newspaper the Star of Liberia. By 1859 he was back in central Pennsylvania promoting emigration. After yet another trip to Liberia (1860–1863), he returned to the United States, which was in chaos amid the Civil War. He helped muster troops for the war effort, but he became disenchanted with the federal government's unwillingness to give equal status to African American recruits, so in 1863 he left the United States for Great Britain, where he lectured on abolition and in support of the Union cause in Britain.

Frustrated with his inability to raise enough money to fund his legal education, Chester returned to Pennsylvania in 1864, where his life took another turn. John Russell Young, the editor of the Philadelphia Press, hired Chester

Time Line

1864

- August 14 Chester is hired by the Philadelphia Press and begins his coverage of the war in Virginia.
- August 18 Chester files the dispatch "Ten Miles from Richmond."
- August 22 Chester files the dispatch "Before Petersburg."

1865

- April 9 Confederate general Robert E. Lee surrenders to Union general Ulysses S. Grant at Appomattox Court House, Virginia, ending the Civil War.

1870

- April Chester becomes the first African American to be called to the English bar.

1873

- Chester becomes the first African American to be admitted to the Louisiana bar.

1884

- Chester assumes the presidency of the Wilmington, Wrightsville, and Onslow Railroad.

1892

- September 30 Chester dies in Harrisburg.

Confederate entrenchments near Spotsylvania Court House, showing felled trees placed in trenches (L brary of Congress) to cover the war as what would today be called an embedded reporter with the Army of the James, led by General Benjamin Butler. He ended his reporting career at the beginning of Reconstruction and returned to Harrisburg, but soon he returned to England, where he studied law and, in 1870, became the first African American to be called to the English bar. That year he returned to the United States, eventually settling in Louisiana, where he took part in local politics and, in 1873, became the first African American to be admitted to the Louisiana bar. He was also made a brigadier general in the Louisiana State Militia, and in 1878 he was appointed as U.S. commissioner for New Orleans. In 1884 his life took an odd turn when he assumed the presidency of the Wilmington, Wrightsville, and Onslow Railroad, a North Carolina company owned by African Americans. In 1892 he returned to his mother's home in Harrisburg, where he died on September 30.

Explanation and A nalysis of the D ocument

Chester began reporting on the operations of the Army of the James and Potomac on August 14, 1864. At that time the opposing armies were entrenched around Richmond and Petersburg. Chester sent dispatches through the fall of Richmond and the early occupation and Reconstruction of the South, with the last dispatch dated June 12, 1865. Reproduced here are two of his early dispatches.

♦ "Headquarters 10th Army Corps Ten Miles from Richmond, August 18, 1864"

Chester begins his dispatch by noting a Union victory. He carefully praises both African American and white troops: "The troops, white and black, covered themselves with undying fame. Their conduct could not have been surpassed." Chester consistently praises the African American troops but is careful to avoid doing so at the expense of white troops, although white officers who treated African American troops as less than equals were not spared his opprobrium. Then, in the second paragraph, he outlines for readers the progression of events. He makes reference to David Bell Birney, the commander of the Tenth Army Corps and a prominent Union general who had taken part in several major battles, including Gettysburg, Chancellorsville, and the Second Battle of Bull Run. Perhaps exercising a bit of wishful thinking, he states, "A few more exhibitions of loyalty and bravery, as evinced during the past few days in this Corps, will soon eradicate the last vestige of prejudice and oppression from the grand Army of the Potomac." He goes on to describe the events surrounding the Battle of Deep Bottom, again extolling the bravery of the African American troops in their assault on Confederate rifle pits in a kind of trench warfare that presaged the massive slaughter of World War I. Many of the Confederate defensive works were highly ingenious. One tactic was to fell trees and place them whole in trenches with their branches pointing toward the direction from which Union troops would assault; the branches, then, would impede troop movement. The result was a large number of skirmishes and hand-to-hand fighting, with Union troops making progress and being pushed back. Chester then describes the actual combat episode, noting that there were between fifty and sixty African American troops killed and wounded. In fact, more than one-third of all African American troops would die in the war, a number approaching sixty thousand.

In the same paragraph, Chester makes reference to General William Birney, the older brother of David Birney. The brothers were the sons of abolitionists, and William played a major role in the recruitment of African Americans. He recruited seven regiments of black soldiers and was appointed to the position of superintendent of enlistment for black troops. Two of these regiments were the Seventh United States Colored Troops and the Ninth United States Colored Troops, both of which had seen action before being transferred to the Tenth Corps.

Chester then describes a cease-fire ("flag of truce") called to allow both sides to gather their dead. He noted that there was evidence that the Union dead had been searched and their valuables taken, commenting that "this act of ineffable meanness has nerved the hearts and strengthened the arms of the defenders of the Union, who will sweep from existence these enemies of God and civilization." In point of fact, Union troops would also seize booty from fallen Confederate troops, though typically the Confederate dead had little of value on them. For their part, the Confederates were often able to find U.S. currency, which was much more valuable than the greatly eroded Confederate money; throughout the South, black market transactions were almost always conducted with U.S. rather than Confederate currency. Chester concludes his dispatch with the ironic note that some Confederates in retreat had been forced to leave behind slave manacles, "which illustrate their character and humanity."

Union seaborne expedition landing on the Atlantic Coast near Deep Bottom, Virginia (Library of Congress)

♦ "Headquarters 2d Brigade, 3d Division, 18th Army Corps; Before Petersburg, August 22, 1864"

In the second dispatch, Chester describes an attack outside Petersburg. The goal of Union troops during the summer and fall of 1864 was to sever all of the town's connecting railroad lines. These rail lines, including the Weldon railroad, were vital to Lee's forces and the city of Richmond, some thirty miles to the north. They were the Confederate capital's only link with the Deep South, providing foodstuffs, supplies, and troops. Union forces engaged in numerous battles and skirmishes in their efforts to seize these rail lines, often tearing up tracks to prevent trains from entering the city. Their efforts were aided by many local Union sympathizers, who took part in nighttime sabotage of tracks, locomotives, and water tanks. Some southern train operators would even lose paperwork to delay troop movements and otherwise undermine the Confederate war effort. The battle that Chester describes took place in the wake of the Union's seizure of the Weldon railroad.

In the section titled "The Negro Troops before Petersburg," Chester notes that there were "many regiments of colored troops." In fact, there were fifteen such regiments in the Eighteenth Corps and a total of twenty-five black regiments in the Army of the James. During the Civil War, a regiment typically consisted of ten companies of soldiers, or a total of a thousand to fifteen hundred men (and occasion-

Essential Quotes

"Another battle has been fought, and a decided advantage has been gained. The troops, white and black, covered themselves with undying fame. Their conduct could not have been surpassed. The colored troops fully sustained the most exalted opinion which their ardent friends could possibly entertain."

("Ten Miles from Richmond")

"There was neither wavering nor straggling; but presenting a fearless front to the enemy, their conduct elicited especial remark, and excited admiration. A few more exhibitions of loyalty and bravery, as evinced during the past few days in this Corps, will soon eradicate the last vestige of prejudice and oppression from the grand Army of the Potomac."

("Ten Miles from Richmond")

"The colored troops were the last to retire, which they did with unwavering firmness and in obedience to orders; not, however, before they gave three cheers, which evinced their dauntless spirit."

("Ten Miles from Richmond")

"The hearts of the colored soldiers in this vicinity have been gladdened by the good news from the extreme left of the Army of the Potomac. Yesterday, about the time the church bells were inviting the inhabitants of your city to renew the assurances of their Christianity, the loud report of cannon announced that once more the defenders of the Union had met its enemies in mortal combat."

("Before Petersburg")

"What Gen. Birney has done others may accomplish, if they do not regard it as humiliating to treat a negro patriot as a man, who offers himself a willing sacrifice upon his country's altar."

("Before Petersburg")

"There is not a day but what some brave black defender of the Union is made to bite the dust by a rebel sharpshooter or picket, but his place is immediately and cheerfully filled by another."

("Before Petersburg")

ally women who had disguised themselves as young men so that they could enlist). Chester goes on to praise General William Birney, who commanded African American troops from Maryland. Reinforcing one of the themes of his dispatches, Chester states,

> The secret of Gen. Birney's success is, that he treats his men as any other gallant officer would regard the defenders of the Union.… What Gen. Birney has done others may accomplish, if they do not regard it as humiliating to treat a negro patriot as a man, who offers himself a willing sacrifice upon his country's altar.

Finally, Chester alludes to the Confederate treatment of captured African American soldiers. He states that "between the negroes and the enemy it is war to the death." Captured African Americans were naturally returned to slavery; at the very least they were treated worse than white prisoners, and in some cases they were reportedly killed as they attempted to surrender. Although Jefferson Davis had issued a decree that captured African Americans were to be returned to their masters, it was widely believed among black troops that they and their white officers were to be put to death. Rumors abounded that entire black regiments had been slaughtered. In response, Lincoln threatened to retaliate, and the issue of the treatment of captured black soldiers contributed to the suspension of prisoner exchanges between North and South in the spring of 1864—a strategic move on the North's part to deplete Confederate forces. Despite the danger not just from combat but from capture, tens of thousands of African Americans volunteered to fight for the Union.

Audience

Chester wrote primarily for the Philadelphia Press. The newspaper is perhaps best known for first publishing in serial form Stephen Crane's classic novel The Red Badge of Courage a year before its 1895 publication in book form. It is notable that Chester was published in this white-owned newspaper in a city where the news media generally offered little news concerning African Americans. Morris's target audiences were manifold: free African Americans of the city, white Philadelphians, military leaders, and even the president. His dispatches sought to promote not only the increased use of African American troops but also their equal treatment in such issues as pay and promotion to officers' ranks.

Impact

There was a slow but steady shift in the viewpoint of the military hierarchy and the Lincoln administration regarding the use of African American troops. At first, blacks were relegated to such roles as digging trenches and defensive earthworks. Then they were armed and eventually allowed to fight. Chester's dispatches highlighted the bravery and successes of the African American troops and must have helped convince a skeptical white public and administration that armed former slaves fighting for the Union cause posed no threat, other than to the Confederacy. By the end of the war some one hundred eighty-six thousand African Americans had served in the Union cause, fully 12 percent of the total of the Union's land forces—though it must be acknowledged that many were forced to "volunteer" at the point of a bayonet, for there was a bounty of $100 for every soldier an officer "recruited." The troops were segregated. The officers who commanded them were largely whites (only a hundred African Americans were commissioned as officers), and for the most part the African American soldiers received reduced pay compared to that of their white counterparts; oddly, African Americans who joined the Confederate army were given equal pay and equal rations. Nevertheless, Chester's dispatches from the Virginia front served as a constant reminder that African Americans were willing and able to participate in a war that would secure their freedom.

After the war, African American soldiers continued to provide meritorious service as the "Buffalo Soldiers," the name given to two cavalry regiments and two infantry regiments that took part in the Indian wars, built roads and forts in the West, escorted the mail, served as park rangers, and fought in the Spanish-American War. In all, the Buffalo Soldiers earned twenty-three Congressional Medals of Honor during the Indian wars. Black soldiers and sailors continued to be segregated through World War I and World War II until 1948, when President Harry S. Truman issued Executive Order 9981 desegregating the military.

See also Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Frederick Douglass: "Men of Color, To Arms!" (1863); Emancipation Proclamation (1863); Executive Order 9981 (1948).

Further Reading

■ Articles

Eggert, Gerald G. "'Two Steps Forward a Step and a Half Back': Harrisburg's African American Community in the Nineteenth Century." Pennsylvania History 58, no. 1 (1991). Reprinted in Joe William Trotter, Jr., and Eric Ledell Smith, eds. African Americans in Pennsylvania: Shifting Historical Perspectives. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1997.

Finkelman, Paul. "Not Only the Judges' Robes Were Black: African-American Lawyers as Social Engineers." Stanford Law Review 47 (1994): 161–209.

■ Books

Blackett, R. J. M. Thomas Morris Chester, Black Civil War Correspondent: His Dispatches from the Virginia Front. 1989. Reprint, New York: Da Capo Press, 1991.

Cornish, Dudley Taylor. The Sable Arm: Black Union Troops in the Union Army, 1861–1865. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1987.

Scott, John Weldon, and Eric Ledell Smith. African Americans of Harrisburg. Charleston, S.C.: Arcadia, 2005.

Slotkin, Richard. No Quarter: The Battle of the Crater, 1864. New York: Random House, 2009.

■ Web Sites

"Robert E. Lee's Position on Arming the Slaves." Son of the South Web site.
http://www.sonofthesouth.net/leefoundation/LettersAndrew-Hunter.htm.

—Keith E. Sealing

Questions for Further Study

1. What was the overall military strategy of the North in the final months of the Civil War? How did northern generals execute this strategy? How successful was it?

2. Imagine that you are at a gathering at which someone asserts that blacks should have fought in the Civil War, since the war was fought in large part to end slavery. How would you set the person straight? Be specific.

3. Some readers of Chester's dispatches might regard them as a form of "cheerleading." Although he criticized commanders who treated black troops poorly, overall his dispatches are filled with praise for both black and white troops. Do you believe he was perhaps exaggerating? If so, how would you justify that?

4. Chester was a proponent of the immigration of blacks to Africa and left the United States on several occasions. Yet he always returned. Why do you think he remained drawn to the United States?

5. Compare this document to Frederick Douglass's "Men of Color, To Arms!" Taken together, what picture of African Americans during the Civil War do the documents produce?

Document Text

Thomas Morris Chester's Civil War Dispatches

Headquarters 10th Army Corps; Ten Miles from Richmond, August 18, 1864

Another step has been taken toward the rebel capital. Another warning has again disturbed the heavily-burdened consciences of the arch conspirators. Lieut. Gen. Grant is rapidly negotiating peace "on this line," and is daily despatching messengers towards Richmond, and into Petersburg, whose powerful reasonings even Jeff Davis will not be able to resist much longer.

Another battle has been fought, and a decided advantage has been gained. The troops, white and black, covered themselves with undying fame. Their conduct could not have been surpassed. The colored troops fully sustained the most exalted opinion which their ardent friends could possibly entertain. Major General Birney, commanding the 10th Army Corps remarked yesterday, without, however, wishing to do any injustice to the whites, that his colored soldiers had done handsomely. There was neither wavering nor straggling; but presenting a fearless front to the enemy, their conduct elicited especial remark, and excited admiration. A few more exhibitions of loyalty and bravery, as evinced during the past few days in this Corps, will soon eradicate the last vestige of prejudice and oppression from the grand Army of the Potomac. The circumstances which gave the colored troops, in conjunction with the others, the opportunity of a passage into public favor, are as follows: On the night of the 13th inst., in accordance with the masterly strategy of General Grant, a part of the 10th Corps crossed the James river at Deep Bottom, and on the 14th moved out on the Darbytown road, and, as a necessary precaution, indulged in skirmishing during the day. About 4 P.M., Brigadier General Wm. Birney commanding a division, sent seven companies of the 7th U. S. C. T., supported by a part of the 9th Regiment U. S. C. T., to retake a line of rifle pits on our left, which had been captured by Brigadier General Terry in the morning, and afterwards abandoned voluntarily by a mistake and reoccupied by the enemy. They sent up a shout of confidence, and, under the inspiration of their beloved commander, General Wm. Birney, the colored troops charged through a corn field and drove the rebels out of the rifle-pits. The enemy poured a heavy fire upon them, but was obliged to yield to their bravery. He was driven out, and we occupied them as a part of our defences. In this assault our loss was between fifty and sixty killed and wounded.

That night our forces moved from Deep Bottom, and took the position which they now occupy. It is an onward to Richmond movement, and thus far is regarded as a success. As speculations always tend to acquaint the enemy with our movements, I will add nothing more than the cheering prospect which now animated this grand army. The crowning act of the Commander-in-Chief may be the reduction of Richmond and Petersburg at the same time.

On the 16th, General Terry was directed to attack the line of the enemy's works on our left, and to drive him from his position. Brigadier General Birney was ordered to hold his division as a support to Brigadier General Terry. General Terry advanced, and drove the enemy out of the first line of rifle-pits, and then stormed the strong line of breastworks, suffering severe loss, but driving the enemy from his position. The rebs rallied, however, in overpowering numbers, to force General Terry to retreat in confusion. Finding himself gradually driven back by a greatly superior force his men acquitting themselves grandly amid a galling fire, Brigadier General Birney moved forward to his support, and with his troops, which consisted of the 2d and 3d Brigades of the 10th Corps, and the 9th U.S. colored troops, he advanced to the enemy's breastworks. The rebels then appeared in great numbers, advancing upon Gens. Birney's and Terry's forces, and a brisk fire was opened and continued on both sides. The enemy in attempting to take the breast works were repeatedly driven back with severe loss. The rebels finally succeeded, however, by moving their troops to our left; a portion of the breast works which had extended beyond our lines, and had not been carried by our forces. By this manoeuvre, they were enabled to pour a galling fire upon our flank and rear, and under which the men on the left were obliged to withdraw, not because they were whipped, but that the position was, under the circumstances, untenable.

General William Birney, after having twice filled the gaps caused by the giving way on the left, was unable to do so again without exposing his lines at other and more vital points. He gave the order to fall back to the first line of rifle-pits, which were captured from the enemy, which was accomplished in good order and without any confusion. The colored troops were the last to retire, which they did with unwavering firmness and in obedience to orders; not, however, before they gave three cheers, which evinced their dauntless spirit.

During this fighting the 3d Brigade, 21 Division, 10th A. C, lost one hundred and forty-eight men and officers, killed, wounded, and missing.

Colonel F. A. Osborn, 21th Massachusetts, was slightly wounded; Major Walroth, 115th New York, wounded in the side; Captain F. W. Parker, 4th N. H., wounded in the face. These officers were wounded while each was temporary commander of the 3d Brigade.

The 4th Regiment N. H. Volunteers lost three killed, thirty-two wounded, and fourteen missing. The killed are Corp. David W. Knox, Joseph Appleyard, and First Sergt. Edmund T. McNell.

The 115th N. Y. Volunteers lost four killed: Sergt. Frank M. Conner, Co. D.; Corp. Abort C. Meisgrove, Corp. J. H. Haynes, and First Sergt. F. W. Francisco; forty wounded, and fifteen missing.

The whole loss in this brigade is thirteen killed, ninety-one wounded, and forty-four missing, making a total of one hundred and forty-eight

♦ Trophies

The 10th Army Corps has captured during this flanking campaign four 8-inch siege guns, six colors, and over five hundred prisoners.

♦ Flag of Truce

Major General Birney requested, yesterday, a cessation of hostilities to allow him to recover his wounded and bury his dead, which were near the enemy's breastworks. It was conceded, and the time was fixed from four to six o'clock P.M. Major J. C. Briscoe and Captain Sweet, aide-de-camp to Major General Birney, and Lieut. Pancoast, ambulance officer, carried the flag of truce. It was received by Captain Rand, aide to General Ewell. Major Briscoe delivered the body of the rebel Gen. Chambliss, killed and remaining within our lines. The Major received our dead. During the existence of the flag of truce the rebel officers manifested no inclination to communicate with our officers. Their countenances wore an aspect of anxiety, not unmingled with chagrin and disappointment. The interchanging was of that formal nature which convinced the Union officers that the enemy was not in the enjoyment of good spirits, or were indulging in pleasing prospects.

♦ Stripping the Union Dead

As the hour approached for the cessation of hostilities, I mounted and advanced to the outer line of our works, to witness the bearing in of our honored dead. Two rows of men, several deep, extending far into the dense forest, formed a passage through which their comrades were now borne on stretchers. As each fallen hero was carried along this passage of brave men, even the solemnity of the scene could not restrain the indignation of the soldiers, as they witnessed the Union dead returned to them stripped of their shoes, coats, pants, and, in some instances, of their shirts. Those who were returned in their pants gave unmistakable evidence of having their pockets rifled—the pockets of which were turned inside out. The mutterings of the men were deep, and their feelings emphatically expressed on witnessing the respected dead dishonored. This act of ineffable meanness has nerved the hearts and strengthened the arms of the defenders of the Union, who will sweep from existence these enemies of God and civilization.

♦ The Enemy Repulsed

Last evening, just after the flag of truce returned, the enemy advanced in line of battle, and made a vigorous effort to turn our left flank, but were forced to retire. Later in the evening an effort was made to drive in our skirmishers, but without success. The firing was so severe for a few minutes that it much resembled the opening of a grand battle.

♦ Slave Manacles

The hurried manner in which the worshippers of the patriarchal institution were obliged to leave these parts for Richmond, compelled them to leave behind several articles which illustrate their character and their humanity. I am, through their haste, able to add to some one's collection two pair of manacles for the wrists, and one iron collar for the neck, which is fastened with a padlock, to which are several links of a chain to be attached, if necessary, to a similar necklace on an individual, by which means quite a number of men and women could be yoked together, single file, for any desirable length.

Headquarters 2d Brigade, 3d Division, 18th Army Corps; Before Petersburg, August 22, 1864

The hearts of the colored soldiers in this vicinity have been gladdened by the good news from the extreme left of the Army of the Potomac. Yesterday, about the time the church bells were inviting the inhabitants of your city to renew the assurances of their

Document Text

Christianity, the loud report of cannon announced that once more the defenders of the Union had met its enemies in mortal combat.

♦ The Enemy Moving to the Left

As soon as the attack began, the enemy, plainly visible to the vigilant black troops in our front, began to hurry off troops to support the attempt which he had undertaken on our left. This information was, no doubt, duly attended to by the authorities.

♦ The Attack

The Weldon railroad having been severed, the enemy, finding an important advantage was gained by the commander-in-chief, sought, by a desperate assault, to drive him from his position, and permit, as heretofore, uninterrupted supplies to reach his army in and around Richmond and Petersburg. The enemy, by a well-conceived piece of strategy, manoeuvered to advance on our flank and rear. Insomuch they had gained an advantage, but the 5th Corps, under the immediate supervision of General Warren, fought with an unwavering firmness that withstood the several assaults of the enemy, and drove him into his jungle to mourn over his disaster—not, however, before three stand of colors and six hundred prisoners were captured.

Another attempt was made last night with renewed vigor, to force our army from its gained position, and in order that the enemy might obtain possession of the important rail communication which he lost. He was repulsed with severer loss than in the morning. Several stand of colors and one brigade were captured.

The rebels during Sunday morning and night fought desperately and furiously, and were only checked by the stubborn resistance which they encountered. General Grant, without weakening any part of his lines, has sent forward sufficient reinforcements to hold his position, and advance when he deems it necessary. A division of negro troops has also been given a position where the enemy will have an opportunity of testing their mettle, should he attempt again to recapture the Weldon railroad. Our losses in the engagements of yesterday were comparatively small, as later dates will corroborate.

♦ The Negro Troops before Petersburg

In General Butler's army there are many regiments of colored troops, who, thus far, have inspired confidence in their officers by the discipline and bearing which they have evinced under the incessant fire of the enemy, along the lines, and the handsome manner in which they have borne themselves whenever opportunity placed them in front of the rebels. It would not be extravagant to predict that they will yet accomplish more brilliant achievements. Their success will depend much on the character of the officers in immediate command. If the men are attached to them for their kindness and consideration on their behalf there is no doubt but what they will follow wherever their superiors may lead. So long as they are commanded by such accomplished gentlemen as Col. A. G. Draper, 36th U.S. Colored Troops, Lieut. Colonel Pratt, of the same regiment, and many other excellent officers whom I will credit when I shall speak of the regiments separately, there is not the least doubt but what they will fully meet public expectation.

In this connection it may not be inappropriate to speak, for the guidance of others, of the enthusiastic admiration of the colored troops under Gen. Wm. Birney for that gallant officer. They are all from Maryland, and were taken from the plantations of their former owners by the General, whom they regard as their deliverer. The General has implicit confidence in their fighting qualities. The highest praise that can be bestowed upon them is, that he prefers them rather than white troops. This is not a mental preference, for he has had the opportunity of electing, and chose to command colored soldiers. The secret of Gen. Birney's success is, that he treats his men as any other gallant officer would regard the defenders of the Union.

There are other colored troops from Maryland, obtained in the same way, but under a different class of officers, in the Army of the Potomac. I trust they will do all that is expected of them, but fear that the kind of men who command them has tended to demoralize rather than to inspire them. What Gen. Birney has done others may accomplish, if they do not regard it as humiliating to treat a negro patriot as a man, who offers himself a willing sacrifice upon his country's altar.

Those before Petersburg have the good fortune to be commanded by good men—though there are some black sheep among them—who are laboring to bring this branch of the service to the highest state of perfection. The kindness of the officers is reflected in the unflinching mettle of the men in the trying positions where duty calls them. There is not a day but what some brave black defender of the Union is made to bite the dust by a rebel sharpshooter or picket, but his place is immediately and cheerfully filled by another under the inspiring glance of such commanders as Colonels Wright, Pratt, and Acting

Document Text

Brigadier General A. G. Draper. They are ever on the alert to catch a glimpse of a rebel, to whom they send their compliments by means of a leaden messenger. Between the negroes and the enemy it is war to the death. The colored troops have cheerfully accepted the conditions of the Confederate Government, that between them no quarter is to be shown. Those here have not the least idea of living after they fall into the hands of the enemy, and the rebels act very much as if they entertained similar sentiments with reference to the blacks. Even deserters fear to come into our lines where colored troops may be stationed. Not unfrequently have they asked if there are any black troops near, and if there were the rebs have entreated that they should not be permitted to harm them. Such has been the effect of Jeff Davis' proclamation for the wholesale massacre of our colored troops, and such will it continue to be until the rebels shall treat all the defenders of the Union as prescribed by the rules of civilized warfare.

The military situation never was more encouraging. The Army of the Potomac during the past few days has successfully performed several strategic movements, which surprised the enemy and gave to us many important advantages. The successful "onward to Richmond," the severing of the Weldon railroad, by means of which the enemy has received all his supplies from the South, and the threatening demonstrations against Petersburg, each one of which is a grand campaign in itself, can be regard-

Glossary

Army of the Potomac	the Union force led by General George Meade, referring to the Potomac River breastwork	any temporary fortification, such as walls or mounds of dirt, that is approximately breast high
Brigadier General Terry	Alfred Howe Terry, who later would assume command of the Tenth Corps when General David Birney died
Brigadier General Wm. Birney	William Birney, General David Birney's older brother and a commander of black troops colors	the flag(s) carried by a military unit into battle
Deep Bottom	a colloquial name for an area in Virginia surrounded by a horseshoe bend in the James River
General Butler's army	the Army of the James, referring to the James River, commanded by General Benjamin Butler
General Warren	Gouverneur Kemble Warren, a former teacher of mathematics who had a reputation for bringing analytic calculation to his military command and who had played a key role in the Battle of Gettysburg inst.	an abbreviation of "instant," meaning "this month"
Jeff Davis	Jefferson Davis, the president of the Confederate States of America
Lieut. Gen. Grant	Ulysses S. Grant, the commander of Union forces
Major General Birney	David Bell Birney, the commander of the Tenth Army Corps
Petersburg	a vital railroad hub to the south of Richmond, Virginia rebel capital	Richmond, Virginia, the capital of the Confederacy during the Civil War
rebs	a common abbreviation of "rebel" applied to Confederates
U.S.C.T.	United States Colored Troops

Document Text

ed as nothing less than the successful accomplishment of a masterly mind. When or where next the commander-in-chief will suddenly appear is a matter which, under the circumstances, should be left to the development of his strategy. Advancing on several points at the same time will effectually checkmate the enemy. One of his principal means of maintaining his position in different parts of the country has been the celerity with which he has been able to move great bodies of troops to places which our army was about to attack. Everything betokens success. The army is in the best of spirits. The colored soldiers are not only ready, but are anxious to meet the rebels.

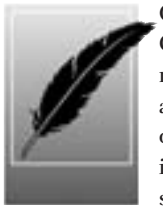
William Tecumseh Sherman (Library of Congress)

William T. Sherman's Special Field Order No. 15

1865

"Each family shall have a plot of not more than (40) forty acres of tillable ground."

Overview



On January 16, 1865, three months before General Robert E. Lee's surrender at Appomattox Court House, Virginia, Major General William Tecumseh Sherman, commander of the Military Division of the Mississippi in Savannah, Georgia, issued his controversial Special Field Order No. 15. The field order was inspired principally by the Union general's determination to rid his army of the large number of escaped, destitute, and homeless slaves who accompanied his army's flanks as it marched across Georgia during his famous raid to the sea of the autumn of 1864. Sherman's order set aside "the islands from Charleston, south, the abandoned rice fields along the rivers for thirty miles back from the sea, and the country bordering the St. Johns River, Florida," for the exclusive settlement of slave refugees. Sherman instructed Brigadier General Rufus Saxton to make available to each head of a black family forty acres of land and to "furnish … subject to the approval of the President of the United States, a possessory title." The army was also to supply the freedpeople with farm animals.

Context

Southern slavery deteriorated as an institution during the Civil War as Union troops enveloped the Confederacy, forever changing the South's economic and social landscape. Because of a lack of consistent reporting and conflicting or nonexistent sources, historians cannot compute accurately the number of African Americans set in motion by the federal invasion and occupation, but they know that by early 1865 as few as five hundred thousand and as many as a million fugitive slaves and free black refugees sought the protection of Union troops and resided within Union lines. Contemporaries termed these people "contrabands" or "freedmen." They participated in large numbers in federally sponsored activities in occupied territory, toiling as soldiers, laborers, residents of contraband camps, and urban workers, and on farms and plantations under federal supervision. Based on the approximation of one million displaced persons, refugees are estimated to have numbered 13,000 on the Eastern Shore of Virginia; 70,000 throughout Virginia's Tidewater region; 17,300 in North Carolina; 25,000 in South Carolina; 106,000 in Louisiana; and 770,000 in the Mississippi Valley.

In the late fall of 1864, as General Sherman and his 62,000-man force marched southeastward from Atlanta to Savannah, the number of black refugees accompanying his army multiplied quickly. According to the historian Willie Lee Rose, "Behind his army followed an ever-increasing throng of liberated Negroes, seeking freedom and security somewhere beyond the confines of the home plantation, perhaps on the coastal islands, waiting quietly in the declining autumn sunlight." Sherman discouraged the refugees, especially the old, young, and sick, from following his army, believing that caring for the indigent would slow his progress, prove deleterious to his soldiers' morale, and compromise his soldiers' effectiveness as a fighting force.

In correspondence dated January 11, 1865, the general lectured Secretary of the Treasury Salmon P. Chase, who had chided Sherman for treating the freedpeople "as a set of pariahs, almost without rights." Responding to this charge, Sherman explained that as he approached Savannah, his force was encumbered by "the crowds of helpless negros that flock after our armies." He complained that "at least 20,000 negros" were "clogging my roads, and eating up our subsistence." Sherman professed that he was unbiased toward blacks, asserting that he would treat white and black refugees equally in the case of their posing "a military weakness."

No racial egalitarian, Sherman defined the role of the army as being to suppress the slaveholders' rebellion and treason, not to emancipate slaves or to provide humanitarian relief to freedpeople. While he was not opposed to the freeing of the South's slaves per se, Sherman nonetheless objected to what he considered the inordinate influence of political abolitionism and abolitionists on President Abraham Lincoln and his administration. Sherman also was among the most vocal of military men to oppose the employment of African Americans as armed soldiers. He reasoned that once black men served as soldiers they would demand full equality, a condition that Sherman considered a threat to white supremacy. At best he favored using black soldiers as "surplus" troops, in labor battalions. Like many

Time Line

1863

- January 1
  President Abraham Lincoln issues the final Emancipation Proclamation, declaring free all slaves in territory remaining in a state of rebellion.

1864

- December 21
  After marching his army across Georgia, General William T. Sherman captures Savannah, Georgia, for the Union.

1865

- January 16
  Sherman issues Special Field Order No. 15, on the resettlement of freedpeople.
- March 3
  Congress establishes the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, known as the Freedmen's Bureau.
- April 9
  General Robert E. Lee surrenders the Confederacy's major army at Appomattox Court House, Virginia, to General Ulysses S. Grant.
- April 14
  John Wilkes Booth shoots President Lincoln, who dies the next day.
- April 15
  Vice President Andrew Johnson becomes president.
- September 12
  As ordered by President Johnson, the Freedmen's Bureau commissioner General Oliver O. Howard issues a circular retracting land contracts to blacks and restoring land to pardoned insurgents.

1866

- June 21
  Congress passes the Southern Homestead Act, making public land available for sale at low prices.
- July 16
  Congress passes the second Freedmen's Bureau Act over President Johnson's veto, ensuring continued land availability.

whites of his day, the general perceived the freedmen and women as inferiors and as "problems," as distractions who impeded his work and complicated his military objectives. Whenever possible, Sherman put tools, not weapons, in the hands of black men. He preferred having them work as baggage handlers, ditch diggers, fatigue laborers, fortification builders, lumbermen, servants, and stevedores—not as soldiers. Sherman employed black women as cooks, laundresses, nurses, and servants.

Although Sherman and his men shunned the role of "liberators," the freedpeople of Georgia and South Carolina nonetheless considered the Yankees an army of liberation. They crowded the Union lines for protection from their Confederate masters and relief from fatigue, hunger, sickness, winter cold, and rain. In January the general boasted to Treasury Secretary Chase that far from viewing him as a devil, the freedmen and women "regard me as a second Moses or Aaron. I treat them as free, and have as much trouble to protect them against the avaricious recruiting agents of New England States as against their former masters."

Through March almost one hundred new black refugees would reach the coast each day, adding ten thousand freedpeople to an already swollen and impoverished African American population requiring clothing, food, medicine, shelter, and firewood. Northern observers, largely abolitionists and missionaries, reported numerous cases of Sherman's white soldiers abusing, cheating, and robbing the vulnerable freedpeople, whom they considered ignorant "niggers." "Sherman and his men," reported Arthur Sumner, a teacher-turned-plantation superintendent, "are impatient of darkies, and annoyed to see them so pampered, petted, and spoiled, as they have been here."

On January 11, 1865, responding to reports of the refugees' destitution and the mistreatment of freedpeople by Sherman's troops, Secretary of War Edwin M. Stanton arrived in Savannah to assess the situation for himself. Brusque, businesslike, and unawed by, if not resentful of, powerful military officers like Sherman, Stanton underscored the sovereignty of civilian authority over the army. The two men had tangled previously over Sherman's opposition to the arming of blacks as soldiers. Upon arriving in Savannah, Stanton insisted on interviewing an array of black leaders to gain a clear sense of the social conditions and status of the coastal freedpeople, to assess Sherman's humanitarian efforts on behalf of the freedpeople in his charge, and to gauge the degree to which Sherman protected the blacks' rights. To accomplish this, the secretary of war spoke with African American clergymen, plantation foremen, barbers, pilots, and sailors to gain their perspectives on the conditions of the thousands of refugees who crowded coastal South Carolina and Georgia.

The black leaders shared their concerns candidly with Stanton, informing him that they preferred settling in black communities apart from whites. Sherman later recalled that the freedpeople claimed to favor living in black settlements, "for there is a prejudice against us in the South that it will take years to get over." The secretary of war also polled the blacks regarding their attitude toward Sherman, specifically whether or not the general had manifested "an almost criminal dislike" of people of color and had cruelly undermined their efforts to accompany his army's trek across Georgia.

Sketch of contrabands accompanying the line of Sherman's march through Georgia, from Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper of March 1865 (Library of Congress)

For his part, Sherman dismissed Stanton as an errand boy of the Lincoln administration, at best a political hack. Writing to his wife on January 15, a day before issuing his Special Field Order No. 15, the general remarked, "Stanton has been here and is cured of that Negro nonsense which arises not from a love of the negro but a desire to dodge Service." Sherman opposed arming blacks, he wrote, because he wanted "soldiers made of the best bone & muscle in the land and wont attempt military feats with doubtful materials." Sherman continued: "I have said that Slavery is dead and the Negro free and want him treated as free & not hunted & badgered to make a soldier of when his family is left back on the plantation. I am right & wont Change."

In his Memoirs Sherman remarked,

> It certainly was a strange fact that the great War Secretary should have catechized negroes concerning the character of a general who had commanded a hundred thousand men in battle, had captured cities, conducted sixty-five thousand men successfully across four hundred miles of hostile territory, and had just brought tens of thousand of freedmen to a place of security.

No doubt to Stanton's great surprise and utter disappointment, the black leaders praised Sherman's work with the freedpeople, stating their "inexpressible gratitude" for his efforts on their behalf. Soon after, on January 16, Sherman issued, with Stanton's imprimatur, Special Field Order No. 15.

About the Author

William Tecumseh Sherman was born on February 8, 1820, in Lancaster, Ohio. He graduated from the U.S. Military Academy at West Point, in New York, in 1840. After serving in Florida and South Carolina, Sherman left the military to tour the southern states, gaining especially rich knowledge of the geography of the Mississippi Valley and Georgia. After rejoining the army, Sherman served during the Mexican-American War and in the Pacific Division before resigning again to work as a banker, as a lawyer, and in real estate. In 1859 Sherman assumed the superintendency of the Louisiana State Seminary of Learning and Military Academy.

Following the Confederacy's attack on Fort Sumter in April 1861, Sherman once again returned to the army, rising by May 1862 from colonel to major general of volunteers and serving at the First Battle of Bull Run, in the defense of Kentucky, and at the Battle of Shiloh, in Tennessee. Sherman next commanded the defenses of Memphis

Essential Quotes

"The three parties named will subdivide the land, under the supervision of the Inspector, among themselves … so that each family shall have a plot of not more than (40) forty acres of tillable ground, … with not more than 800 feet water front, in the possession of which land the military authorities will afford them protection, until … they can protect themselves, or until Congress shall regulate their title."

(Clause III)

"In order to carry out this system of settlement, a general officer will be detailed as Inspector of Settlements and Plantations, whose duty it shall be to visit the settlements, to regulate their police and general management, and who will furnish personally to each head of a family, subject to the approval of the President of the United States, a possessory title in writing, giving as near as possible the description of boundaries."

(Clause V)

and fought at Chickasaw Bayou, Arkansas Post, and Vicksburg before assuming leadership of the Army of the Tennessee in October 1863 and then overall command of western troops in March 1864. From March 1864 to June 1865 Sherman led the Military Division of the Mississippi and orchestrated the attack from lower Tennessee into Georgia that culminated in the fall of Atlanta on September 2. This victory occasioned Sherman's promotion to major general in the regular army.

After resting his troops for ten weeks, Sherman dispatched part of his force under Major General George H. Thomas to engage Confederate forces in Tennessee. On November 15, Sherman oversaw a march southeast across Georgia by two columns of infantry and cavalry that covered 250 miles in twenty-six days. With the army traversing central Georgia in a forty- to sixty-mile-wide front, Sherman's men left a swath of destruction in their wake, disrupting communications, destroying government buildings, laying waste crops, and desolating railroads and agricultural equipment. Unquestionably his use of "hard" war—employing the selective destruction of military and civilian targets and psychological warfare in his Georgia and later Carolinas campaigns—helped break the Confederates' will to fight. Sherman's famous "March to the Sea" ended on December 21, when he and his troops entered Savannah. This campaign left white Georgians angry and stunned, while black Georgians stood emancipated and hungry for the fruits of freedom.

Following the war Sherman remained in the army and openly sympathized with the fate of white southerners, not blacks; he opposed the granting of civil and political rights to freedpeople. Sherman commanded the Military Division of the Mississippi, provided military support for the construction of the transcontinental railroad, and participated in the campaigns waged against American Indians. In 1866 Sherman was promoted to lieutenant general and placed in temporary command of the U.S. Army. Following Ulysses S. Grant's assuming the presidency in 1869, Sherman was promoted to full general and appointed commanding general of the army. He retired in 1884 and died on February 14, 1891. Historians continue to debate Sherman's contributions to "total" or "modern" warfare and rely upon his frank, two-volume Memoirs of General William T. Sherman (1875) as an important primary source.

Although he was an Ohio native, Sherman shared the conservative, antiblack, proslavery views of many of his southern friends and comrades in the army, holding contempt multilaterally for African Americans, abolitionists, and southern disunionists. According to the historian Louis Gerteis, the general "despised blacks and secessionists equally" and "scornfully dismissed Northern humanitarian concerns with the freedmen's welfare." Seemingly unabashed, he publicly opposed the Emancipation Proclamation, the recruitment of African American soldiers, and what Sherman considered the granting of special privileges to people of color. The Reverend Henry M. Turner, a free black man from South Carolina who served as chaplain in the U.S. Colored Troops and later as a state congressman in Georgia, dubbed a commander who shared what he termed the general's "ignoble prejudice" to be nothing more than a "Shermanized officer."

Sherman expressed his antipathy toward blacks in general and escaped bondsmen in particular early in the war in his personal correspondence. In July 1862, while commanding in Memphis, Tennessee, he complained to his wife of being bombarded by loyal masters who sought military assistance in tracking down their escaped slaves. "As to freeing the negros," Sherman continued,

> I don't think the time is come yet—when Negros are liberated either they or their masters must perish. They cannot exist together except in their present relation, and to expect negros to change from Slaves to masters without one of those horrible convulsions which at times Startle the world is absurd.

A year later Sherman explained to his brother that blacks proved unreliable as servants and he opposed their recruitment as armed soldiers. "I wont trust niggers to fight yet," he said, "but dont object to the Government taking them from the Enemy, & making such use of them as experience may suggest."

Writing in September 1864, Sherman summarized his attitude toward the granting of civil rights to African Americans: "I like niggers well enough as niggers, but when fools & idiots try & make niggers better than ourselves, I have an opinion." When asked rhetorically whether blacks might not stop Confederate bullets as well as whites, the general retorted: "Yes, and a sand bag is better; but can a negro do our skirmishing and picket duty? … Can they improvise roads, bridges, sorties, flank movements, etc. like the white man? I say no." Shortly after the war, in May 1865, Sherman found himself embroiled in a controversy over the surrender terms he had offered Confederate troops in North Carolina; the general wrote his wife, "Stanton wants to kill me because I do not favor his scheme of declaring the Negroes of the South, now free, to be loyal voters, whereby politicians may manufacture just so much pliable electioneering material."

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

Despite Sherman's antipathy toward blacks and their rights, his Special Field Order No. 15 represented an overarching, positive, and radical step toward settling the freedpeople on abandoned plantation lands. Ironically, as Gerteis explains, "the most thoroughgoing program for blacks" along coastal South Carolina and Georgia "came not from Radicals or self-proclaimed friends of the freedmen, but from … Sherman, a battlefield general with an ill-concealed distaste for blacks and for those laboring among them." The scholar Paul Cimbala explains that Sherman, "no philanthropist or reformer, was primarily concerned with pursuing Confederates into South Carolina. He needed to rid his army of the thousands of slaves who had marched along in its train." A third historian, John Syrett, maintains that although Sherman issued the field orders, "Stanton and Saxton were doubtless chiefly responsible for their content." Regardless, the order incorporated a multitiered solution to solving what Sherman judged a "Negro problem" resulting from emancipation.

From Sherman's perspective, the resettlement of the freedpeople on abandoned plantations offered several advantages. First, so doing would free his army from what he considered the logistical annoyance posed by the thousands of black refugees burdening his troops and crowding along the southeastern Atlantic coast. Second, allowing the freedpeople to occupy abandoned plantations would shift the cost of supporting the newly free men and women from the federal government to their former masters. Third, settling the freedpeople on coastal land would render them (and U.S. forces) less vulnerable to attacks by Confederate cavalry and guerrillas. Finally, a positive, fostering program for the freedpeople would serve to assuage Sherman's critics on the race question. While Sherman was no doubt influenced by pressure from Chase, Stanton, and black leaders to accommodate the freedpeople, his special order stemmed largely from his determination to liberate himself from dealing with the freedpeople, which he considered a military necessity. Accordingly, in the order of January 16, Sherman opens by declaring in clause I that the Sea Island region, extending from Charleston, South Carolina, south to the Saint Johns River in northern Florida, and the coastal lands thirty miles inland along rivers were to be reserved solely for African American settlers. Thousands of acres of additional abandoned land would thus be available to black refugees.

Clause II reserved exclusively for people of color the Sea Islands between Charleston and Jacksonville as well as other settlements carved out in the newly established reservation. Sherman's order also specified that blacks would manage their own affairs in their communities, subject only to the army and the U.S. Congress. This clause underscored the blacks' freedom and stated that the freedmen could not be coerced into military units without specific orders from the president or congress. Nevertheless, Sherman's field order stated that young freedmen were to be encouraged to enlist in units of the U.S. Colored Troops and receive bounties upon enlistment.

In clause III, Sherman articulated the process by which freedmen could settle and establish agricultural operations. In order to do so, "three respectable negroes, heads of families" would petition government officials for a license and then subdivide the land in plots no larger than forty acres of tillable ground and, if bounding water, no more than eight hundred feet of waterfront. Precedent for the forty-acre limitation stemmed from President Lincoln's directive of December 31, 1863, to South Carolina's Direct Tax Commission. The military would protect the freedmen, if necessary, until they could protect themselves and until Congress would legitimize their land titles. The military also would make ships available to the freedmen to assist them in supplying themselves and selling their crops.

Clause IV stated that families of men serving in the U.S. Colored Troops, aboard gunboats, or engaged in commercial fishing or as pilots could settle on plots in the Sherman reservation. According to the fifth clause of the special field order, the blacks were to receive temporary "possessory" title to the abandoned land until the government could uphold their permanent ownership of the land. Clause VI appointed General Saxton to oversee the blacks' settlement of what became known as the Sherman Reserve.

Audience

Sherman's field order held foremost significance to the freedpeople along the coast who hoped that freedom would translate into land ownership and more than the right to labor for others. Like the freed black men and women, Radical Republicans, former abolitionists, and sympathetic military commanders interpreted the general's field order, followed by the land provisions of the 1865 Freedmen's Bureau Act and the 1866 Southern Homestead Act, as confiscating the rich estates of former rebels and redistributing them to their former slaves. The New York Tribune, however, a supporter of emancipation, opposed Sherman's edict based on the fact that it segregated blacks from whites. Southern whites uniformly condemned Sherman's order and sought to reclaim their property through legal means. In the years since Sherman issued Special Field Order No. 15, black activists from W. E. B. Du Bois to contemporary reparationists have identified the order as a promise of "forty acres and a mule"—their rallying cry for compensation for their ancestors' centuries of bondage and institutionalized degradation.

Impact

Despite the assertion in Sherman's Special Field Order No. 15 that freedpeople would be granted "possessory" titles to land, the land provision in the March 1865 Freedmen's Bureau Act made clear that the freedpeople could occupy and rent—but not receive as reparation—up to forty acres of abandoned and occupied land for three years. The refugees could purchase the land based on whatever titles could be provided. In June 1865, General Saxton reported that approximately forty thousand blacks had settled on about 485,000 acres of land. The Freedmen's Bureau then controlled approximately 858,000 acres of land—only roughly 1 percent of the land in the Confederacy.

Sherman's linguistic vagueness encouraged contemporary blacks and their white friends to believe that the government would ultimately grant the freedpeople the land they occupied. But two essential factors—the ambiguity of Sherman's reference to "possessory" titles and President Andrew Johnson's insistence in September 1865 that confiscated land in the Sherman Reserve (except that sold under a court decree) be restored to pardoned former Confederates—undercut all but the symbolic meaning of Sherman's order. Indeed, not surprisingly, Sherman's murky language left contemporary white southerners hopeful of reclaiming their land, through legal action if necessary. In 1866 the process of restoring land to white claimants began, as the freedpeople proved unsuccessful in providing valid "possessory titles" in line with the wording of Sherman's order. On January 31, 1866, the Freedmen's Bureau held only about 464,000 acres of land; by February 1866, bureau officials had already restored 393,000 acres to whites who had received presidential pardons and had successfully proved prior ownership.

Thus, few of the freedpeople who claimed farms in the Sherman Reserve were ultimately allowed to retain their land. Upon General Saxton fell the burden of informing the freedpeople that they would have to surrender the land they occupied. According to the general, by reneging on its promise to distribute land to the freedpeople, the government was violating a solemn pledge. He observed that the former slaves' "love of the soil and desire to own farms amounts to a passion—it appears to be the dearest hope of their lives." For his part, in February 1866 Sherman informed the president,

> I knew of course we could not convey title to land and merely provided 'possessory titles' to be good so long as war and our Military Power lasted. I merely aimed to make provision for the negroes who were absolutely dependent on us, leaving the value of their possessions to be determined by after events or legislation.

In his postwar memoirs Sherman recalled that > the military authorities at that day … had a perfect right to grant the possession of any vacant land to which they could extend military protection, but we did not undertake to give a fee-simple title; and all that was designed by these special field orders was to make temporary provisions for the freedmen and their families during the rest of the war, or until Congress should take action in the premises.

Sherman added that Stanton approved his field order before he announced it. As W. E. B. Du Bois lamented in 1935, Sherman thus had literally given the freedpeople on the Sherman Reserve "only possessory titles, and in the end, the government broke its implied promise and drove them off the land."

Two later pieces of Reconstruction-era legislation continued the "implied promise" of government land grants and complicated understanding of Sherman's field order for generations. First, the Southern Homestead Act of June 1866 set aside public land in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Louisiana, and Mississippi for purchase by freedpeople for a five-dollar fee. The available land, however, was generally of inferior quality, and freedmen lacked sufficient capital to purchase implements and to farm the land properly. When Congress repealed the act in 1876, blacks had cultivated only several thousand acres, mostly in Florida. Second, the July 1866 Freedmen's Bureau Act essentially authorized the government to lease, though not grant outright, twenty-acre lots on government-controlled lands with a six-year option to buy the land. Only some fourteen hundred persons took advantage of this option. By August 1868 the Freedmen's Bureau controlled less than 140,000 acres of land. At best, then, the federal government's Reconstruction-era land policy amounted to an opportunity for former slaves to lease family farms with the later option to buy the property.

In the end, for all of the controversy Sherman's field order generated, it resulted in frightfully little land distributed to freedpeople. In November 1867, General Oliver O. Howard reported that 1,980 heads of families in Beaufort, South Carolina, had paid the government $31,000 for 19,040 acres. Many blacks who settled on their forty acres refused to surrender their claims to the white landowners and ultimately were removed forcibly by the Freedmen's Bureau and the army. Others squatted on marginal land, determined to scratch out a living on unimproved soil. Most black refugees on the Sherman Reserve surrendered their claims and moved elsewhere to work on shares or as tenants on land owned by whites. Writing in 1893, a former missionary to the freedpeople, Elizabeth Hyde Botume, recalled that the freed slaves "regarded the return of the former owners as an inauguration of the old slavery times, with the worst consequences."

Ever since Reconstruction, misreadings and distortions of Sherman's Special Field Order No. 15 by historians and polemicists have fueled demands for reparations by African Americans and their white allies. Repeatedly and erroneously, reparationists have cited Sherman's order as the origin of the U.S. government's alleged promise of "forty acres and a mule." In fact, Sherman's order was never intended to award land to the freedpeople. At best it was the general's short-term strategy to alleviate what he considered the military problem of dealing with the burden of thousands of freedpeople in his army's midst.

Confusion over the awarding of "land for the freedmen" continues today. Proponents of reparations maintain that the government reneged on its wartime pledge to compensate the former slaves for their centuries of bondage with land and animals. Many persons still believe that the so-called promise of "forty acres and a mule" justifies African Americans' appeals for a broad range of compensation—from cash payments to tax credits—for the descendants of America's four million black slaves. They point to Sherman's Special Field Order No. 15 and "forty acres and a mule" as symbols of the government's broken promises and the freed slaves' shattered dreams.

See also Emancipation Proclamation (1863).

Questions for Further Study

1. Describe Sherman's attitude toward African Americans. Was he simply a racist, a liberator, or something between the two? To what extent do you believe his attitude might have been similar to that of many northerners?

2. Sherman opposed the employment of black troops. Compare this document with Thomas Morris Chester's Civil War Dispatches and the events surrounding it. Do you believe that Sherman might have been convinced by Chester's reports?

3. In your opinion, did Sherman's order represent genuine progress or just a symbolic victory for African Americans in the wake of the Civil War?

4. Some northern abolitionists criticized Sherman's order because it created segregated black communities. Others, however, saw it as a form of reparations for slavery. Which do you believe is the more defensible position?

5. Throughout history, invading armies have attracted large numbers of camp followers, including prostitutes, destitute people, curious onlookers, and those who hoped to earn money or subsistence by performing services for the armies. What made the problem of camp followers of Sherman's army unique?

Further Reading

■ Articles

Cox, LaWanda. "The Promise of Land for the Freedmen." Mississippi Valley Historical Review 45 (December 1958): 413–440.

Drago, Edmund L. "How Sherman's March through Georgia Affected the Slaves." Georgia Historical Quarterly 57 (Fall 1973): 361–375.

Pope, Christie Farnham. "Southern Homesteads for Negroes." Agricultural History 44 (April 1970): 201–212.

Smith, John David. "The Enduring Myth of 'Forty Acres and a Mule.'" Chronicle of Higher Education, February 21, 2003, p. B11.

Westley, Robert. "Many Billions Gone: Is It Time to Reconsider the Case for Black Reparations?" Boston College Law Review 40 (December 1998): 429–476.

■ Books

Berlin, Ira, ed. Freedom: A Documentary History of Emancipation, 1861–1867, Series 1, Vol. 2: The Wartime Genesis of Free Labor: The Upper South. Cambridge, U.K.: Cambridge University Press, 1993.

Botume, Elizabeth Hyde. First Days amongst the Contrabands. 1893. Reprint. New York: Arno Press, 1968.

Cimbala, Paul A. The Freedmen's Bureau: Reconstructing the American South after the Civil War. Malabar, Fla.: Krieger Publishing, 2005.

Du Bois, W. E. B. Black Reconstruction in America: An Essay toward a History of the Part Which Black Folk Played in the Attempt to Reconstruct Democracy in America, 1860–1880. 1935. Reprint. New York: Atheneum, 1973.

Gerteis, Louis S. From Contraband to Freedman: Federal Policy toward Southern Blacks, 1861–1865. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1973.

Marszalek, John F. Sherman: A Soldier's Passion for Order. New York: Free Press, 1993.

———. Sherman's Other War: The General and the Civil War Press. Memphis, Tenn.: Memphis State University Press, 1981.

Oubre, Claude F. Forty Acres and a Mule: The Freedmen's Bureau and Black Land Ownership. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1978.

Rose, Willie Lee. Rehearsal for Reconstruction: The Port Royal Experiment. New York: Vintage Books, 1967.

Sherman, William Tecumseh. Memoirs of General W. T. Sherman. 2 vols. New York: Library of America, 1990.

Simpson, Brooks D., and Jean V. Berlin, eds. Sherman's Civil War: Selected Correspondence of William T. Sherman, 1860–1865. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1999.

Syrett, John. The Civil War Confiscation Acts: Failing to Reconstruct the South. New York: Fordham University Press, 2005.

Westwood, Howard C. Black Troops, White Commanders, and Freedmen during the Civil War. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1992.

—John David Smith

Document Text

William T. Sherman's Special Field Order No. 15

I. The islands from Charleston, south, the abandoned rice fields along the rivers for thirty miles back from the sea, and the country bordering the St. Johns River, Florida, are reserved and set apart for the settlement of the negroes now made free by the acts of war and the proclamation of the President of the United States.

II. At Beaufort, Hilton Head, Savannah, Fernandina, St. Augustine and Jacksonville, the blacks may remain in their chosen or accustomed vocations—but on the islands, and in the settlements hereafter to be established, no white person whatever, unless military officers and soldiers detailed for duty, will be permitted to reside; and the sole and exclusive management of affairs will be left to the freed people themselves, subject only to the United States military authority and the acts of Congress. By the laws of war, and orders of the President of the United States, the negro is free and must be dealt with as such. He cannot be subjected to conscription or forced military service, save by the written orders of the highest military authority of the Department, under such regulations as the President or Congress may prescribe. Domestic servants, blacksmiths, carpenters and other mechanics, will be free to select their own work and residence, but the young and able-bodied negroes must be encouraged to enlist as soldiers in the service of the United States, to contribute their share towards maintaining their own freedom, and securing their rights as citizens of the United States.

Negroes so enlisted will be organized into companies, battalions and regiments, under the orders of the United States military authorities, and will be paid, fed and clothed according to law. The bounties paid on enlistment may, with the consent of the recruit, go to assist his family and settlement in procuring agricultural implements, seed, tools, boots, clothing, and other articles necessary for their livelihood.

III. Whenever three respectable negroes, heads of families, shall desire to settle on land, and shall have selected for that purpose an island or a locality clearly defined, within the limits above designated, the Inspector of Settlements and Plantations will himself, or by such subordinate officer as he may appoint, give them a license to settle such island or district, and afford them such assistance as he can to enable them to establish a peaceable agricultural settlement. The three parties named will subdivide the land, under the supervision of the Inspector, among themselves and such others as may choose to settle near them, so that each family shall have a plot of not more than (40) forty acres of tillable ground, and when it borders on some water channel, with not more than 800 feet water front, in the possession of which land the military authorities will afford them protection, until such time as they can protect themselves, or until Congress shall regulate their title. The Quartermaster may, on the requisition of the Inspector of Settlements and Plantations, place at the disposal of the Inspector, one or more of the captured steamers, to ply between the settlements and one or more of the commercial points heretofore named in orders, to afford the settlers the opportunity to supply their necessary wants, and to sell the products of their land and labor.

IV. Whenever a negro has enlisted in the military service of the United States, he may locate his family in any one of the settlements at pleasure, and acquire a homestead, and all other rights and privileges of a settler, as though present in person. In like manner, negroes may settle their families and engage on board the gunboats, or in fishing, or in the navigation of the inland waters, without losing any claim to land or other advantages derived from this system. But no one, unless an actual settler as above defined, or unless absent on Government service, will be entitled to claim any right to land or property in any settlement by virtue of these orders.

V. In order to carry out this system of settlement, a general officer will be detailed as Inspector of Settlements and Plantations, whose duty it shall be to visit the settlements, to regulate their police and general management, and who will furnish personally to each head of a family, subject to the approval of the President of the United States, a possessory title in writing, giving as near as possible the description of boundaries; and who shall adjust all claims or conflicts that may arise under the same, subject to the like approval, treating such titles altogether as possessory. The same general officer will also be charged with the enlistment and organization of the negro recruits, and protecting their interests while absent from their settlements; and will be governed by the rules and regulations prescribed by the War Department for such purposes.

Document Text

VI. Brigadier General R. SAXTON is hereby appointed Inspector of Settlements and Plantations, and will at once enter on the performance of his duties. No change is intended or desired in the settlement now on Beaufort [Port Royal] Island, nor will any rights to property heretofore acquired be affected thereby.

By Order of Major General W. T. Sherman

Black Code of Mississippi

1865

"Every freedman, free negro and mulatto shall ... have a lawful home or employment, and shall have written evidence thereof."

Overview

In 1865 the Mississippi state legislature passed a series of related laws known as the Black Code. These laws, written within months of the conclusion of the Civil War and styled after the state's antebellum slave code, represented the first effort by white Mississippians to define what freedom and citizenship would mean to recently freed slaves and others of African descent. As the Black Code reveals, the initial legal definition that whites offered suggests that they intended the condition of freedom for blacks to differ little from enslavement.

The Mississippi Black Code was the most extreme example of similar codes that sought to nullify the freedom of former slaves and to define their citizenship as virtual enslavement. The laws consequently offer an example of the attitudes of whites toward freedpeople and other people of African descent; they also testify to the persistence of those attitudes across time. Finally, the Black Code is significant because its existence proved to the U.S. Congress that southern states needed a more thoroughgoing reconstruction than that called for by President Andrew Johnson. A year after the passage of the Black Code, Congress assumed authority over Reconstruction in the southern states.

Context

In April 1865, after four years of fighting and deprivation, the Civil War ended. The cessation of fighting, however, did not firmly settle the end of their social system in white southerners' minds. The lack of commitment to black freedom in Washington, D.C., and among white southerners meant that former slaves could not easily acquire citizenship. By the conclusion of 1865, Mississippi, abetted by the U.S. president, offered firm evidence that white southerners, while reluctantly granting the abolition of slavery, refused to grant African Americans equality before the law.

An assassin took the life of President Abraham Lincoln within days of the war's end. Lincoln's generous plan for ensuring the return of the southern states to the Union fell into the hands of his successor, Andrew Johnson. The new president, a native of east Tennessee, significantly modified Lincoln's plan for Reconstruction by adding provisions intended to punish the elite planters of the South, whom he blamed for the secession crisis and the Civil War. In addition to depriving wealthy southerners and certain former Confederates of the right to citizenship, Johnson insisted that before southern states reenter the Union they repeal their secession ordinances and ratify the Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, which ended slavery.

Johnson's plan for Reconstruction, however, was ultimately undemanding. Even though he wished to punish certain Confederate officials and officers as well as wealthy planters, he refused to require that southern states embrace liberal notions of African American citizenship. In an August 1865 letter to Mississippi's provisional governor, William Sharkey, Johnson encouraged him to lead the state constitutional convention, which was meeting at the time, to grant the right to vote only to individuals who could read and write and to owners of property valued at a minimum of $250. Since few, if any, former slaves or African Americans living in Mississippi owned taxable property (real estate) of any sort and few could read and write, Johnson's vision of voting rights in the post-Emancipation era did not include extension of suffrage to more than a handful of blacks. Regarding suffrage, the 1865 constitutional convention chose to replicate the Constitution of 1832; it limited the right to vote to white males over the age of twenty-one.

Two other matters that the president demanded be addressed, the secession ordinance and the abolition of slavery, occupied the 1865 convention delegates. After much wrangling, the delegates declared the ordinance of session "null, and of no binding force." Convention delegates rejected other language that accomplished the same task, lest signers of the 1861 ordinance find themselves subject to prosecution as traitors. Delegates debated vigorously even the abolition of slavery. Foolishly hoping that the federal government might offer former slave owners compensation for the loss of their human property, the convention eventually declared that the state ended the institution of slavery not voluntarily but under duress. Albert T. Morgan, a white northerner who went south during Reconstruction, rightly argued that through such language the delegates intended

Time Line

1860

- December 20
  South Carolina secedes from the Union.

1861

- January 9
  Mississippi secedes from the Union.
- April 12
  The first shots of the Civil War are fired at Fort Sumter in the harbor at Charleston, South Carolina.

1865

- April 9
  Robert E. Lee surrenders the bulk of the Confederate army at Appomattox Court House, Virginia, effectively ending the Civil War.
- April 15
  President Abraham Lincoln dies after being shot the previous day, and Andrew Johnson becomes president.
- November 25
  The Mississippi legislature passes the Black Code.

1867

- March 26
  General E. O. C. Ord arrives in Mississippi as military governor, signaling the start of congressional Reconstruction in the state.

1875

- November 10
  The election of the Democrat John Marshal Stone signals the end of the Reconstruction in Mississippi and the beginning of a slow but certain retreat from the recognition of the fullness of African American citizenship.

that their heirs know that "slavery had not been destroyed." Former slaves viewed the 1865 constitution in a similar manner. A group of former bondsmen meeting at Vicksburg predicted that soon the state of Mississippi would try to enslave blacks again or force them from the state.

At the conclusion of the constitutional convention, delegates filed a report with the newly elected state legislature. The report called for the body to withhold from former slaves "some unbridled privileges for the present." According to the report, "the wayward and vicious, idle and dishonest, the lawless and reckless, the wicked and improvident, the vagabond and meddler must be smarted, governed, reformed and guided by higher instincts, minds and morals higher and holier than theirs." Benjamin Grubb Humphreys, who was elected governor after the convention, embraced the convention report when he told the first postwar legislature: "The purity and progress of both races require that caste must be maintained." Perhaps not surprisingly, the first Mississippi legislature to convene after the Civil War embraced the Black Code.

About the Author

A number of legislators contributed to the authorship of the Mississippi Black Code. While Governor Benjamin Grubb Humphreys probably did not write a word of the laws, he was singularly responsible for pushing the bill through the legislature. Debate over the code consumed an inordinate amount of time in the first postwar session of the legislature. The law was finally approved only when Humphreys offered a compromise between legislators, some of whom wanted to appease Republicans in Washington and thereby to avoid a more stringent Reconstruction process, and some of whom wished to ignore the demands of the federal government and the significance of the Confederacy's military defeat.

Humphreys (1808–1882) was a native of Claiborne County, Mississippi, and a brigadier general in the Confederate army. Before the war, he attended the U.S. Military Academy at West Point, though his participation in a rowdy demonstration, which led to a riot, caused him to be expelled. After his dismissal, he returned to Mississippi, where he became a cotton planter and politician in Sunflower County, the heart of the Mississippi Delta. In 1865 white Mississippians elected him governor, and in 1867 they reelected him. By that time, congressional Reconstruction had begun, and he resigned his office in 1868 soon after being sworn in, rather than operate under the supervision of a military governor. For almost ten years he worked for an insurance company in Jackson, Mississippi, before retiring back to his Sunflower County home.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

The document consists of three parts: "An Act to Confer Civil Rights on Freedmen, and for Other Purposes"; "An Act to Regulate the Relation of Master and Apprentice, as Relates to Freedmen, Free Negroes, and Mulattoes"; and "An Act to Amend the Vagrant Laws of the State."

♦ "An Act to Confer Civil Rights on Freedmen, and for Other Purposes"

In this first section of the Black Code, African Americans were granted the right to buy and sell property other than real estate. By denying blacks the ability to own real property, the legislature attempted to ensure that they would remain dependent laborers. Indeed, Section 1 of the law permits blacks to rent property in cities and towns only if local government expressly allows them to do so. In this way, the legislature was trying to keep blacks in the country, close to agricultural labor, the only labor whites assumed that blacks could perform.

Further attempts to control the labor of blacks appear in Sections 5 through 9. In those sections, African Americans were required to have a legally validated address and employment at the start of each new year, typically the same time that labor contracts were signed. Although blacks received certain protections in the execution of contracts, they were not permitted to break their contracts without "good cause." Doing so would result in prosecution in the courts. The sections of the law addressing those who breached contracts resemble the sections of the separate act that regulated relations between masters and apprentices. By subjecting individuals who broke their contracts to treatment and punishment similar to those meted out to runaway apprentices, the legislature evinced its belief that African Americans could not be trusted to perform their labor.

The act also regulated the social rights of African Americans. While slaves never had the legal right to marry, the Black Code recognized that they could marry as long as they married someone of their own race. The code also allowed former slaves who lived with someone in a spousal relationship to record their relationship as married in the county records. To further clarify who classified as black and was thus prohibited from marrying a white person, the law defined a mulatto as someone with a single "negro" great-grandparent.

Section 4 of the law states that former slaves and others of African descent could testify in civil cases against other African Americans. In criminal proceedings, they could testify against a white person accused of committing a crime against a black person. The restriction on blacks' testimony in the court reflects restrictions that appear in the antebellum slave code.

♦ "An Act to Regulate the Relation of Master and Apprentice, as Relates to Freedmen, Free Negroes, and Mulattoes"

This section of the Mississippi Black Code may be the best known, as it provides ample evidence that lawmakers were reluctant to wholly abolish slavery. The first section of the law required that officers of county courts twice annually file a report listing the names of African Americans under the age of eighteen who were orphans or whose parents could not provide proper care for them. According to the law, juveniles listed on the report would then be apprenticed to a "competent and suitable person." Not only would the treatment provided to orphaned or neglected African Americans differ from the treatment provided to white orphans but former owners of orphaned or poorly cared-for children would also be the preference when the court searched for a suitable master for the child. Apprenticed children would be subject to "moderate" corporal punishment and protected from cruel or inhumane treatment.

Governor Benjamin Grubb Humphreys was responsible for pushing the Black Code through the Mississippi legislature. (Library of Congress)

Gender determined the term of an orphaned or neglected child's indenture. Males would be apprentices until they reached the age of twenty-one; females could achieve release from their indenture upon their eighteenth birthdays. Further, the law allowed the "recapture" of apprentices who fled before their term of service ended, and it permitted punishment of apprentices who refused to return to their masters. Apprentices could, however, challenge their masters' rights to retain them against their will. If a county court judged the apprentice to have good cause for desiring an end to his or her indenture, the court could release the apprentice and fine the master up to $100. Any fine collected would be used for the benefit of the apprentice.

This section of the law also prohibited any white person from helping an apprentice escape his or her master or from enticing an apprentice to accept employment. Individuals convicted of violating the law would be subject to punishment.

♦ "An Act to Amend the Vagrant Laws of the State"

This section of the law defined a broad swath of behavior, including juggling, gambling, and the habitual drinking of alcoholic beverages, as indicative of vagrancy. The law also classified individuals (regardless of color)

Essential Quotes

"Every freedman, free negro and mulatto shall, on the second Monday of January, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six, and annually thereafter, have a lawful home or employment, and shall have written evidence thereof."

(Section 5, An Act to Confer Civil Rights on Freedmen, and for Other Purposes)

"All rouges and vagabonds, idle and dissipated persons, beggars, jugglers, or persons practicing unlawful games or plays, runaways, common drunkards, common night-walkers, pilferers, lewd, wanton, or lascivious persons, in speech or behavior, common railers and brawlers, persons who neglect their calling or employment, misspend what they earn, or do not provide for the support of themselves or their families, or dependents, and all other idle and disorderly persons, including all who neglect all lawful business, habitually misspend their time by frequenting houses of ill-fame, gaming-houses, or tippling shops, shall be deemed and considered vagrants."

(Section 1, An Act to Amend the Vagrant Laws of the State)

who did not work, misspent their money, or did not properly care for themselves or their dependents as vagrants. Prostitutes and gambling house operators, as well as all manner of citizens who obtained their income from illegal or immoral acts, are here classified by the law as vagrants. Individuals who were convicted of vagrancy were to be fined up to $100 and could be sentenced to jail for up to ten days.

African Americans were subject to additional penalties for vagrancy, as were whites who commonly associated with African Americans. Section 2 of the amendment clearly echoes Mississippi's antebellum slave code. Specifically, the section prohibited unemployed blacks from free assembly and white males from assembling with African Americans or from having sexual relations with black women. Blacks convicted of vagrancy under Section 2 of the amendment would be subject to a $50 fine and ten days in jail; white men would be subject to a $200 fine and six months in jail. If convicted, African Americans who could not pay their fines were to be hired out by the county sheriff to labor until their fine was paid. If a black vagrant was too old or infirm to be hired out, then the sheriff could treat the vagrant as a pauper. According to the law, African Americans eighteen to sixty-five years old were required to pay a $1 poll tax to fund the "Freedman's Pauper Fund" in each county. (White paupers were cared for through other means of taxation, not a special pauper's tax.) Refusal or inability to pay the tax caused an African American to be classified as a vagrant and to be hired out to anyone who was willing to pay the tax for the vagrant.

Audience

Public laws are written, in part, to shape behavior. Consequently, the audience to whom the Mississippi Black Code was addressed included all of Mississippi's residents and visitors. However, few Mississippians, including lawyers, law enforcement officials, and judges, would have read the actual text of the law.

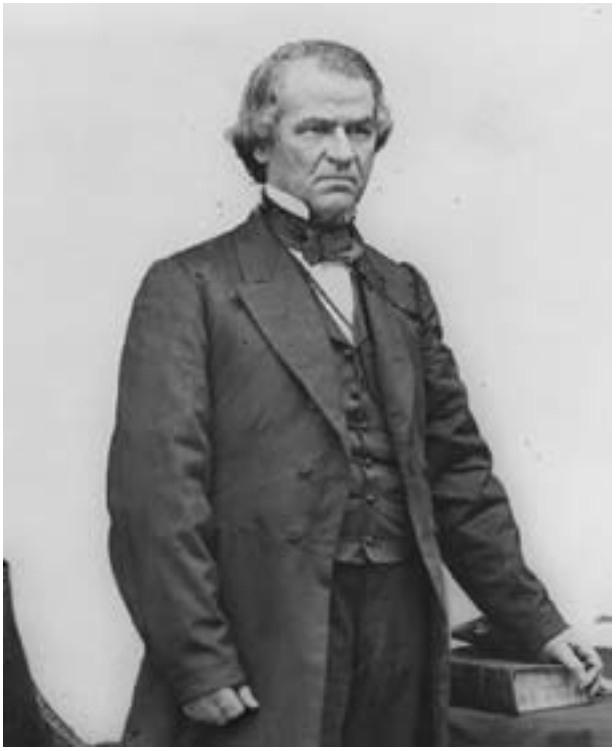
Impact

Passage of the Black Code immediately provoked two reactions in the nation. In the South other state legislators emulated the Mississippi Black Code, yet in the North the laws alerted Republicans in Congress to the fact that white southerners would not voluntarily embrace black liberty. While testifying before Congress in 1865, Colonel Samuel Thomas, an official with the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, noted the persistence of such attitudes:

> The whites esteem the blacks their property by natural right, and however much they may admit that the individual relations of masters and slaves have been destroyed by the war and the President's emancipation proclamation, they still have an ingrained feeling that the blacks at large belong to the whites at large, and whenever opportunity serves they treat the colored people just as their profit, caprice or passion may dictate.

Taken together with President Andrew Johnson's alleged violation of laws and his disdain for Republican measures directed toward ensuring the liberty of former slaves, Congress exerted its authority in 1866 and took over the reins of Reconstruction. With a military governor placed in charge of Reconstruction in Mississippi, the state convened a new constitutional convention, a body elected in the first biracial, statewide election. The constitution that eventually emerged granted the full measure of citizenship to African Americans and thereby removed the Mississippi Black Code from the law books. Despite the code's brief life span, its impact reverberated broadly and throughout the course of Reconstruction.

See also Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1865); Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1868); Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1870).



Andrew Johnson (Library of Congress)

Further Reading

■ Books

Bond, Bradley G. Political Culture in the Nineteenth-Century South: Mississippi, 1830–1900. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1995.

———, ed. Mississippi: A Documentary History. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2003.

Harris, William C. Presidential Reconstruction in Mississippi. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1967.

———. The Day of the Carpetbagger: Republication Reconstruction in Mississippi. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1979.

Journal of the Proceedings and Debates in the Constitutional Convention of the State of Mississippi, August, 1865. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Library, 2005.

Morgan, A. T. Yazoo; or, On the Picket Line of Freedom in the South: A Personal Narrative. 1884. Reprint. New York: Russell and Russell, 1968.

Wharton, Vernon Lane. Negro in Mississippi, 1865–1890. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1947.

Questions for Further Study

1. Compare the Mississippi Black Code with the state's antebellum slave code.

2. How did the Mississippi Black Code differ from the Louisiana Black Code? How might those differences be explained?

3. Describe the restrictions placed upon African Americans by the Mississippi Black Code and by formal laws and ordinances enforced during the epoch of Jim Crow.

■ Web Sites

"African American Voices." Digital History Web site.
http://www.digitalhistory.uh.edu/black_voices/voices_display.cfm?id=82.

"Louisiana Black Codes." About.com "African-American History" Web site.
http://afroamhistory.about.com/library/bllouisiana_blackcodes.htm.

"Race, Racism, and the Law." University of Dayton School of Law Web site.
http://academic.udayton.edu/race/02rights/jcrow02.htm.

"Reconstruction in Mississippi, 1865–1876." Mississippi History Now Web site.
http://teacherexchange.mde.k12.ms.us/MHNLP/reconstructionlp.htm.

—Bradley G. Bond

Document Text

Black Code of Mississippi

An Act to Confer Civil Rights on Freedmen, and for Other Purposes

♦ Section 1.

All freedmen, free negroes and mulattoes may sue and be sued, implead and be impleaded, in all the courts of law and equity of this State, and may acquire personal property, and chooses in action, by descent or purchase, and may dispose of the same in the same manner and to the same extent that white persons may: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not be so construed as to allow any freedman, free negro or mulatto to rent or lease any lands or tenements except in incorporated cities or towns, in which places the corporate authorities shall control the same.

♦ Section 2.

All freedmen, free negroes and mulattoes may intermarry with each other, in the same manner and under the same regulations that are provided by law for white persons: Provided, that the clerk of probate shall keep separate records of the same.

♦ Section 3.

All freedmen, free negroes or mullatoes who do now and have herebefore lived and cohabited together as husband and wife shall be taken and held in law as legally married, and the issue shall be taken and held as legitimate for all purposes; and it shall not be lawful for any freedman, free negro or mulatto to intermarry with any white person; nor for any person to intermarry with any freedman, free negro or mulatto; and any person who shall so intermarry shall be deemed guilty of felony, and on conviction thereof shall be confined in the State penitentiary for life; and those shall be deemed freedmen, free negroes and mulattoes who are of pure negro blood, and those descended from a negro to the third generation, inclusive, though one ancestor in each generation may have been a white person.

♦ Section 4.

In addition to cases in which freedmen, free negroes and mulattoes are now by law competent witnesses, freedmen, free negroes or mulattoes shall be competent in civil cases, when a party or parties to the suit, either plaintiff or plaintiffs, defendant or defendants; also in cases where freedmen, free negroes and mulattoes is or are either plaintiff or plaintiffs, defendant or defendants. They shall also be competent witnesses in all criminal prosecutions where the crime charged is alleged to have been committed by a white person upon or against the person or property of a freedman, free negro or mulatto: Provided, that in all cases said witnesses shall be examined in open court, on the stand; except, however, they may be examined before the grand jury, and shall in all cases be subject to the rules and tests of the common law as to competency and credibility.

♦ Section 5.

Every freedman, free negro and mulatto shall, on the second Monday of January, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six, and annually thereafter, have a lawful home or employment, and shall have written evidence thereof as follows, to wit: if living in any incorporated city, town, or village, a license from that mayor thereof; and if living outside of an incorporated city, town, or village, from the member of the board of police of his beat, authorizing him or her to do irregular and job work; or a written contract, as provided in Section 6 in this act; which license may be revoked for cause at any time by the authority granting the same.

♦ Section 6.

All contracts for labor made with freedmen, free negroes and mulattoes for a longer period than one month shall be in writing, and a duplicate, attested and read to said freedman, free negro or mulatto by a beat, city or county officer, or two disinterested white persons of the county in which the labor is to performed, of which each party shall have one: and said contracts shall be taken and held as entire contracts, and if the laborer shall quit the service of the employer before the expiration of his term of service, without good cause, he shall forfeit his wages for that year up to the time of quitting.

♦ Section 7.

Every civil officer shall, and every person may, arrest and carry back to his or her legal employer any freedman, free negro, or mulatto who shall have quit the service of his or her employer before the expiration of his or her term of service without good cause; and said officer and person shall be entitled to receive for arresting and carrying back every deserting employee aforesaid the sum of five dollars, and ten cents per mile from the place of arrest to the place of delivery; and the same shall be paid by the employer, and held as a set off for so much against the wages of said deserting employee: Provided, that said arrested party, after being so returned, may appeal to the justice of the peace or member of the board of police of the county, who, on notice to the alleged employer, shall try summarily whether said appellant is legally employed by the alleged employer, and has good cause to quit said employer. Either party shall have the right of appeal to the county court, pending which the alleged deserter shall be remanded to the alleged employer or otherwise disposed of, as shall be right and just; and the decision of the county court shall be final.

♦ Section 8.

Upon affidavit made by the employer of any freedman, free negro or mulatto, or other credible person, before any justice of the peace or member of the board of police, that any freedman, free negro or mulatto legally employed by said employer has illegally deserted said employment, such justice of the peace or member of the board of police issue his warrant or warrants, returnable before himself or other such officer, to any sheriff, constable or special deputy, commanding him to arrest said deserter, and return him or her to said employer, and the like proceedings shall be had as provided in the preceding section; and it shall be lawful for any officer to whom such warrant shall be directed to execute said warrant in any county in this State; and that said warrant may be transmitted without endorsement to any like officer of another county, to be executed and returned as aforesaid; and the said employer shall pay the costs of said warrants and arrest and return, which shall be set off for so much against the wages of said deserter.

♦ Section 9.

If any person shall persuade or attempt to persuade, entice, or cause any freedman, free negro or mulatto to desert from the legal employment of any person before the expiration of his or her term of service, or shall knowingly employ any such deserting freedman, free negro or mulatto, or shall knowingly give or sell to any such deserting freedman, free negro or mulatto, any food, raiment, or other thing, he or she shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall be fined not less than twenty-five dollars and not more than two hundred dollars and costs; and if the said fine and costs shall not be immediately paid, the court shall sentence said convict to not exceeding two months imprisonment in the county jail, and he or she shall moreover be liable to the party injured in damages: Provided, if any person shall, or shall attempt to, persuade, entice, or cause any freedman, free negro or mulatto to desert from any legal employment of any person, with the view to employ said freedman, free negro or mulatto without the limits of this State, such costs; and if said fine and costs shall not be immediately paid, the court shall sentence said convict to not exceeding six months imprisonment in the county jail.

♦ Section 10.

It shall be lawful for any freedman, free negro, or mulatto, to charge any white person, freedman, free negro or mulatto by affidavit, with any criminal offense against his or her person or property, and upon such affidavit the proper process shall be issued and executed as if said affidavit was made by a white person, and it shall be lawful for any freedman, free negro, or mulatto, in any action, suit or controversy pending, or about to be instituted in any court of law equity in this State, to make all needful and lawful affidavits as shall be necessary for the institution, prosecution or defense of such suit or controversy.

♦ Section 11.

The penal laws of this state, in all cases not otherwise specially provided for, shall apply and extend to all freedman, free negroes and mulattoes.…

An Act to Regulate the Relation of Master and Apprentice, as Relates to Freedmen, Free Negroes, and Mulattoes

♦ Section 1.

It shall be the duty of all sheriffs, justices of the peace, and other civil officers of the several counties in this State, to report to the probate courts of their respective counties semiannually, at the January and July terms of said courts, all freedmen, free negroes, and mulattoes, under the age of eighteen, in their respective counties, beats, or districts, who are orphans, or whose parent or parents have not the means or who refuse to provide for and support said minors; and thereupon it shall be the duty of said probate court to order the clerk of said court to apprentice said minors to some competent and suitable person on such terms as the court may direct, having a particular care to the interest of said minor: Provided, that the former owner of said minors shall have the preference when, in the opinion of the court, he or she shall be a suitable person for that purpose.

Document Text

♦ Section 2.

The said court shall be fully satisfied that the person or persons to whom said minor shall be apprenticed shall be a suitable person to have the charge and care of said minor, and fully to protect the interest of said minor. The said court shall require the said master or mistress to execute bond and security, payable to the State of Mississippi, conditioned that he or she shall furnish said minor with sufficient food and clothing; to treat said minor humanely; furnish medical attention in case of sickness; teach, or cause to be taught, him or her to read and write, if under fifteen years old, and will conform to any law that may be hereafter passed for the regulation of the duties and relation of master and apprentice: Provided, that said apprentice shall be bound by indenture, in case of males, until they are twenty-one years old, and in case of females until they are eighteen years old.

♦ Section 3.

In the management and control of said apprentices, said master or mistress shall have the power to inflict such moderate corporeal chastisement as a father or guardian is allowed to infliction on his or her child or ward at common law: Provided, that in no case shall cruel or inhuman punishment be inflicted.

♦ Section 4.

If any apprentice shall leave the employment of his or her master or mistress, without his or her consent, said master or mistress may pursue and recapture said apprentice, and bring him or her before any justice of the peace of the county, whose duty it shall be to remand said apprentice to the service of his or her master or mistress; and in the event of a refusal on the part of said apprentice so to return, then said justice shall commit said apprentice to the jail of said county, on failure to give bond, to the next term of the county court; and it shall be the duty of said court at the first term thereafter to investigate said case, and if the court shall be of opinion that said apprentice left the employment of his or her master or mistress without good cause, to order him or her to be punished, as provided for the punishment of hired freedmen, as may be from time to time provided for by law for desertion, until he or she shall agree to return to the service of his or her master or mistress: Provided, that the court may grant continuances as in other cases: And provided further, that if the court shall believe that said apprentice had good cause to quit his said master or mistress, the court shall discharge said apprentice from said indenture, and also enter a judgment against the master or mistress for not more than one hundred dollars, from the use and benefit of said apprentice, to be collected on execution as in other cases.

♦ Section 5.

If any person entice away any apprentice from his or her master or mistress, or shall knowingly employ an apprentice, or furnish him or her food or clothing without the written consent of his or her master or mistress, or shall sell or give said apprentice spirits without such consent, said person so offending shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction there of before the county court, be punished as provided for the punishment of person enticing from their employer hired freedmen, free negroes or mulattoes.

♦ Section 6.

It shall be the duty of all civil officers of their respective counties to report any minors within their respective counties to said probate court who are subject to be apprenticed under the provisions of this act, from time to time as the facts may come to their knowledge, and it shall be the duty of said court from time to time as said minors shall be reported to them, or otherwise come to their knowledge, to apprentice said minors as hereinbefore provided.…

♦ Section 9.

It shall be lawful for any freedman, free negro, or mulatto, having a minor child or children to apprentice the said minor child or children, as provided for by this act.

♦ Section 10.

In all cases where the age of the freedman, free negro, or mulatto cannot be ascertained by record testimony, the judge of the county court shall fix the age.…

Document Text

An Act to Amend the Vagrant Laws of the State

♦ Section 1.

All rogues and vagabonds, idle and dissipated persons, beggars, jugglers, or persons practicing unlawful games or plays, runaways, common drunkards, common night-walkers, pilferers, lewd, wanton, or lascivious persons, in speech or behavior, common railers and brawlers, persons who neglect their calling or employment, misspend what they earn, or do not provide for the support of themselves or their families, or dependents, and all other idle and disorderly persons, including all who neglect all lawful business, habitually misspend their time by frequenting houses of ill-fame, gaming-houses, or tippling shops, shall be deemed and considered vagrants, under the provisions of this act, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not exceeding one hundred dollars, with all accruing costs, and be imprisoned, at the discretion of the court, not exceeding ten days.

♦ Section 2.

All freedmen, free negroes and mulattoes in this State, over the age of eighteen years, found on the second Monday in January, 1866, or thereafter, with no lawful employment or business, or found unlawfully assembling themselves together, either in the day or night time, and all white persons assembling themselves with freedmen, free negroes or mulattoes, or usually associating with freedmen, free negroes or mulattoes, on terms of equality, or living in adultery or fornication with a freed woman, freed negro or mulatto, shall be deemed vagrants, and on conviction thereof shall be fined in a sum not exceeding, in the case of a freedman, free negro or mulatto, fifty dollars, and a white man two hundred dollars, and imprisonment at the discretion of the court, the free negro not exceeding ten days, and the white man not exceeding six months.

♦ Section 3.

All justices of the peace, mayors, and aldermen of incorporated towns, counties, and cities of the several counties in this State shall have jurisdiction to try all questions of vagrancy in their respective towns, counties, and cities, and it is hereby made their duty, whenever they shall ascertain that any person or persons in their respective towns, and counties and cities are violating any of the provisions of this act, to have said party or parties arrested, and brought before them, and immediately investigate said charge, and, on conviction, punish said party or parties, as provided for herein. And it is hereby made the duty of all sheriffs, constables, town constables, and all such like officers, and city marshals, to report to some officer having jurisdiction all violations of any of the provisions of this act, and in case any officer shall fail or neglect any duty herein it shall be the duty of the county court to fine said officer, upon conviction, not exceeding one hundred dollars, to be paid into the county treasury for county purposes.

♦ Section 4.

Keepers of gaming houses, houses of prostitution, prostitutes, public or private, and all persons who derive their chief support in the employments that militate against good morals, or against law, shall be deemed and held to be vagrants.

♦ Section 5.

All fines and forfeitures collected by the provisions of this act shall be paid into the county treasury of general county purposes, and in case of any freedman, free negro or mulatto shall fail for five days after the imposition of any or forfeiture upon him or her for violation of any of the provisions of this act to pay the same, that it shall be, and is hereby, made the duty of the sheriff of the proper county to hire out said freedman, free negro or mulatto, to any person who will, for the shortest period of service, pay said fine and forfeiture and all costs: Provided, a preference shall be given to the employer, if there be one, in which case the employer shall be entitled to deduct and retain the amount so paid from the wages of such freedman, free negro or mulatto, then due or to become due; and in case freedman, free negro or mulatto cannot hire out, he or she may be dealt with as a pauper.

♦ Section 6.

The same duties and liabilities existing among white persons of this State shall attach to freedmen, free negroes or mulattoes, to support their indigent families and all colored paupers; and that in order to secure a support for such indigent freedmen, free negroes, or mulattoes, it shall be lawful, and is hereby made the duty of the county police of each county in this State, to levy a poll or capitation tax on each and every freedman, free negro, or mulatto, between the ages of eighteen and sixty years, not to exceed the sum of one dollar annually to each person so taxed, which tax, when collected, shall be paid into the county treasurer's hands, and constitute a fund to be called the Freedman's Pauper Fund, which shall be applied by the commissioners of the poor for the maintenance of the poor of the freedmen, free negroes and mulattoes of this State, under such regulations as may be established by the boards of county police in the respective counties of this State.

Document Text

♦ Section 7.

If any freedman, free negro, or mulatto shall fail or refuse to pay any tax levied according to the provisions of the sixth section of this act, it shall be prima facie evidence of vagrancy, and it shall be the duty of the sheriff to arrest such freedman, free negro, or mulatto, or such person refusing or neglecting to pay such tax, and proceed at once to hire for the shortest time such delinquent taxpayer to any one who will pay the said tax, with accruing costs, giving preference to the employer, if there be one.

♦ Section 8.

Any person feeling himself or herself aggrieved by judgment of any justice of the peace, mayor, or alderman in cases arising under this act, may within five days appeal to the next term of the county court of the proper county, upon giving bond and security in a sum not less than twenty-five dollars nor more than one hundred and fifty dollars, conditioned to appear and prosecute said appeal, and abide by the judgment of the county court; and said appeal shall be tried de novo in the county court, and the decision of the said court shall be final.

Glossary

freedmen	former slaves who had been emancipated at the conclusion of the Civil War
free negroes	blacks who had been emancipated by their owners, or the children of parents emancipated prior to the start of the Civil War mulatto	a general term used to refer to people of mixed race, though it specifically refers to anyone who had at least one great-grandparent who was black pauper	a term used mainly before the twentieth century to refer to a poor or indigent person
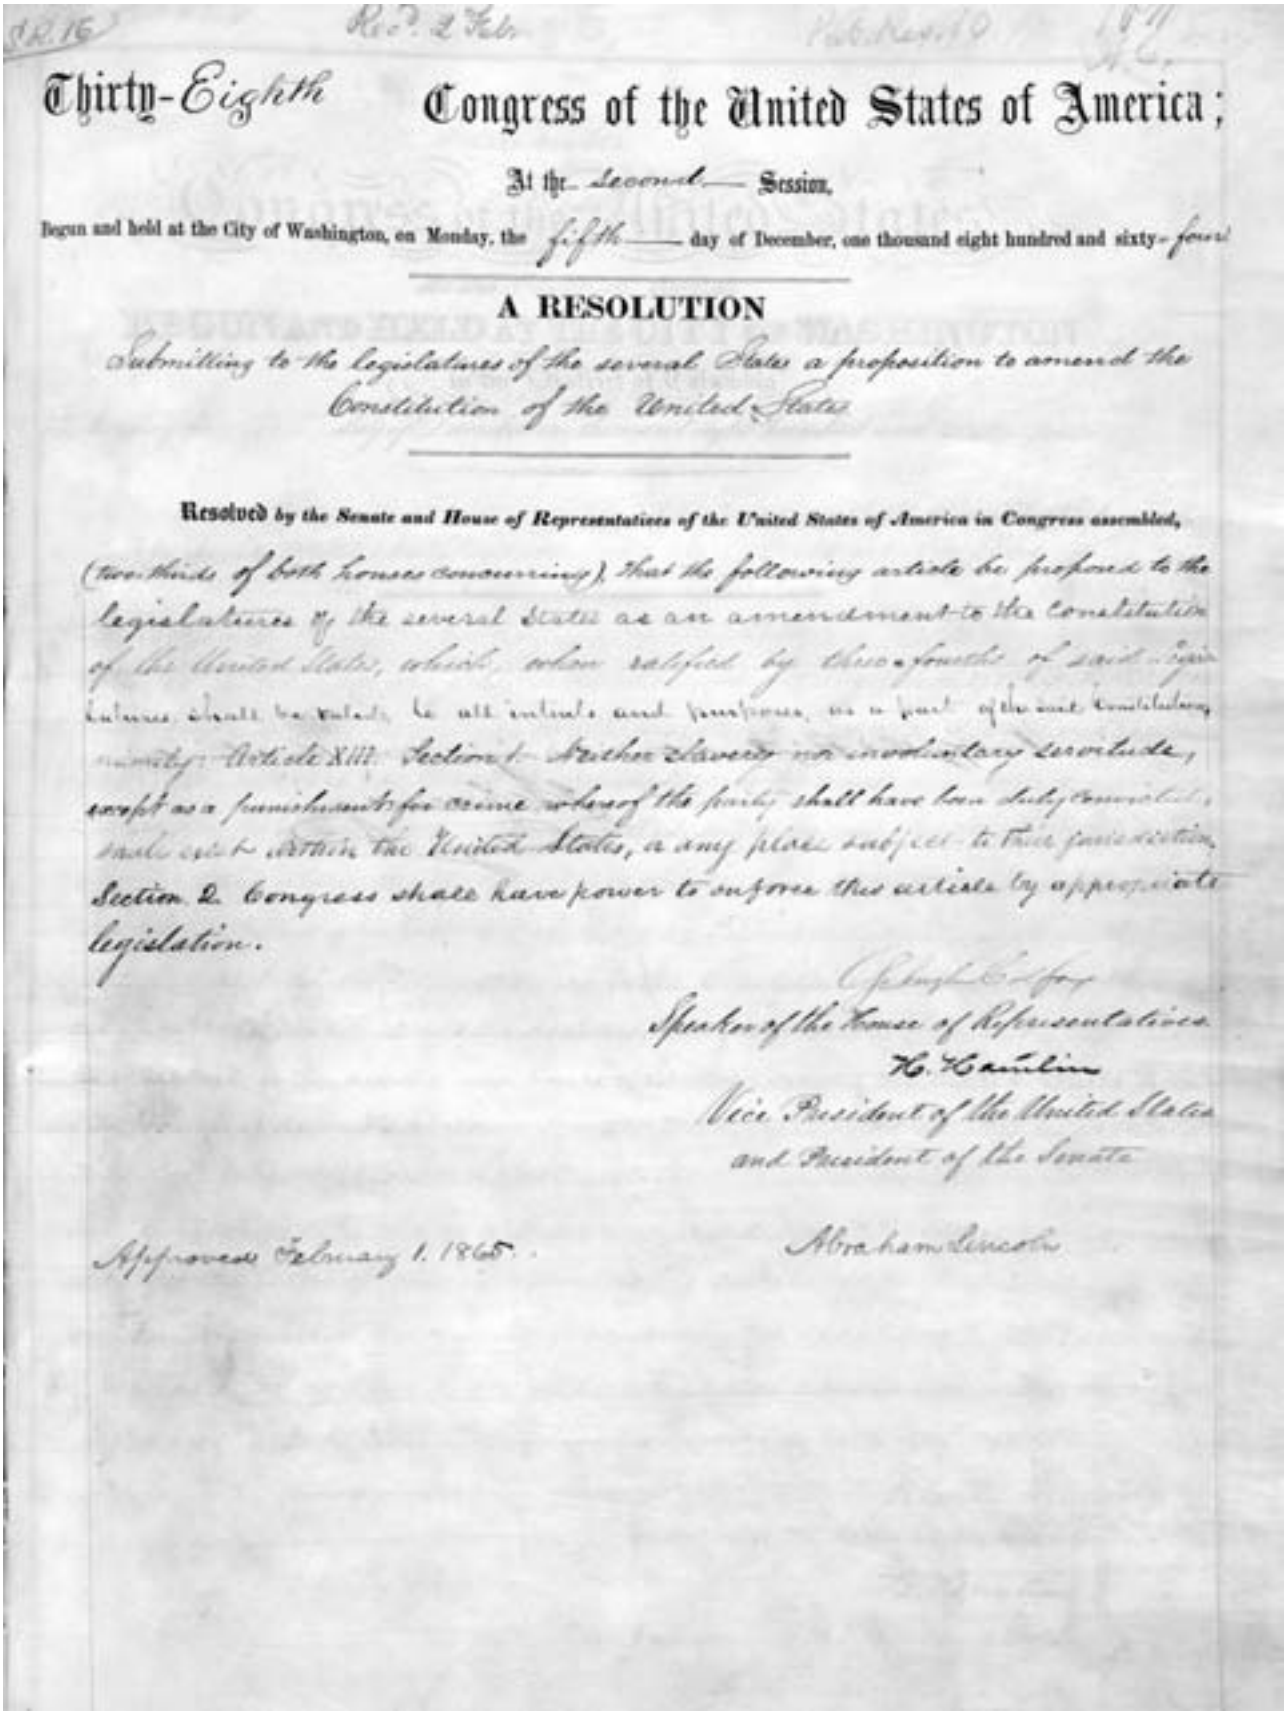
tippling shops	businesses that sold liquor by either the glass or the bottle



Thirty-Eighth Congress of the United States of America;

At the Second Session,

Begun and held at the City of Washington, on Monday, the fifth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four

A RESOLUTION

Submitting to the legislatures of the several States a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of both Houses concurring) that the following article be proposed to the legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said legislatures shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as a part of the said Constitution, namely: Article XIII. Section 1. Neither Slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction. Section 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Schuyler Colfax
Speaker of the House of Representatives

H. Hamlin
Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate

Approved February 1. 1865.

Abraham Lincoln

The Thirteenth Amendment (National Archives and Records Administration)

Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution

1865

"Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude ... shall exist within the United States."

Overview

The Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution legally ended slavery in the United States. It was passed by Congress and ratified by the required three-fourths of the states in 1865. President Abraham Lincoln had issued the Emancipation Proclamation in 1862, declaring slaves in areas in rebellion against the government to be freed by executive decree. Afterward, Lincoln and many of his fellow Republicans had believed that more permanent legislation in the form of a constitutional amendment prohibiting slavery would be needed to ensure that the Emancipation Proclamation could not be subsequently ruled either unconstitutional or a temporary war measure. The Thirteenth Amendment was the first constitutional amendment to be adopted in more than sixty years, and it initiated a series of subsequent amendments, including the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, with which it is often associated. Those two Reconstruction-era amendments guaranteed citizenship and voting rights to African Americans and, along with the Thirteenth Amendment, represented a crucial step in the broadening of the American legal definitions and conceptions of freedom and equality.

Context

Early in the Civil War, the North was divided on the issue of emancipation. The Republican Party and its leader, President Lincoln, opposed the expansion of slavery into the western territories but generally conceded that the Constitution protected the "peculiar institution" in the states where it already existed. A vocal minority of abolitionists within the party called for immediate emancipation, although they differed even among themselves about whether this desirable outcome could best be achieved by executive, legislative, or judicial action. The Democratic Party generally opposed emancipation, although as the war wore on many of its members grudgingly came to accept that the measure in some form might be necessary—to win the conflict, to remove the underlying cause and prevent its recurrence, and to punish the recalcitrant southern slave owners for their continued, and immensely destructive, defiance.

During the "secession winter" of 1860–1861, before the outbreak of the war, Lincoln and other Republicans announced their support for a proposed amendment that would have guaranteed that the federal government could never abolish slavery in the southern states; Lincoln and his fellow Republicans were even willing to make this amendment unamendable in the future. Confederate leaders, convinced that secession and an independent southern nation would prove to be the best means of protecting slavery, scorned this offer. (Ironically for them, the true Thirteenth Amendment, which went into effect at the end of the war, took a form much less favorable to slave owners.) In July 1861 Congress passed, with overwhelming support, the Crittenden-Johnson Resolution, stating that the northern war aims would include the restoration of the Union but not the emancipation of southern slaves.

In the same cautious spirit, Lincoln resisted overt action against slavery in 1861 and for much of 1862. Concerned with maintaining support for the Union in the conflict-ridden border slave states (Maryland, Kentucky, Missouri, and tiny Delaware), the president overruled early emancipation declarations by General David Hunter in South Carolina and General John C. Frémont in Missouri. Lincoln encouraged the leaders of border states to adopt policies of voluntary, compensated emancipation, but without success. General Benjamin F. Butler adopted an effective expedient in May 1861 when he began refusing to return runaway slaves to their masters, characterizing them essentially as spoils of war. By thus treating slaves as property, he avoided the controversy associated with an announced policy of emancipation; while this did not entirely satisfy abolitionists, it was accepted by most northerners as a useful and clever compromise. The influx over Union lines of large numbers of African Americans fleeing slavery and seeking refuge put considerable additional pressure on government leaders to come up with a solution to this colossal problem, with huge moral and practical implications for the future of the nation's existence. Legislators were eventually bombarded with petitions and letters from constituents demanding action to end slavery. Congress essentially af-

Time Line

1857

■ March 6
In the Dred Scott v. Sandford decision, the Supreme Court rules that Congress has no authority to prohibit slavery in the western territories.

1860

■ December 20
South Carolina becomes the first southern state to secede following the election of the northern Republican Abraham Lincoln as president.

1861

■ April 12
The Confederate firing on Fort Sumter begins the American Civil War.

■ March 2
Congress passes a proposed amendment, which is never ratified, barring Congress from interfering with slavery in states where the institution exists.

1862

■ April 16
Slavery is abolished in the District of Columbia.

■ September 22
President Abraham Lincoln issues the Emancipation Proclamation.

1863

■ January 1
The Emancipation Proclamation goes into effect.

1865

■ January 31
Congress proposes the Thirteenth Amendment to the states.

■ April 9
The Confederate general Robert E. Lee surrenders to the Union general Ulysses S. Grant, effectively ending the Civil War.

■ December 18
Secretary of State William H. Seward issues proclamation announcing that the Thirteenth Amendment has been ratified by the necessary three-quarters of the states.

1995

■ March 6
Mississippi ratifies the Thirteenth Amendment, 130 years after initially rejecting it.

firmed Butler's policy with the passage of the first Confiscation Act in August 1861, authorizing representatives of the federal government to confiscate the slaves of disloyal citizens used in support of the rebellion.

The emancipation question was inseparable from the problem of precisely how to reconstruct southern state governments and oversee their restoration to the Union after the war. Ensuring that these states would be free of slavery seemed essential to many (though not all) northerners, but how to accomplish that aim was less obvious. Congress began to take more aggressive steps against slavery in 1862, while radicals like the Massachusetts senator Charles Sumner both publicly and privately maintained pressure on President Lincoln to use his war powers as commander in chief to do likewise. The second Confiscation Act, of July 1862, provided for the forfeiture of slaves as well as other property belonging to those supporting the Confederacy. The lack of effective enforcement mechanisms, along with doubts held by Lincoln and others regarding the act's constitutionality, made the act somewhat irrelevant, but it did represent another tentative step toward a federal emancipation policy.

The most famous but not the final blow against American slavery was struck on September 22, 1862, when President Lincoln, shortly following the Union victory at the Battle of Antietam, issued his famous Emancipation Proclamation, freeing all the slaves in areas of the South not occupied by federal troops as of the coming January 1. As this proclamation did not apply to the border slave states that had not seceded—and might ultimately have been regarded by the courts as a temporary war measure only—Lincoln and many of his fellow Republicans recognized that further action would be needed to end slavery and remove the root cause of the conflict between the North and the South. Although many Americans were reluctant to alter the text of the Constitution, which had not been amended for over sixty years and was widely regarded as permanent and sacred, an emancipation amendment seemed to offer the best and most definitive solution to this troublesome issue. As early as 1839 the staunch slavery opponent John Quincy Adams had introduced such a constitutional amendment to bring about abolition; although his proposal had made no headway at the time, the idea had been percolating among his successors in the political antislavery movement.

In December 1863 competing antislavery amendments were introduced in the House of Representatives by the Republican congressmen James M. Ashley of Ohio and James F. Wilson of Iowa. Both men introduced their bills in the context of ongoing debate over how to reconstruct the southern states and bring them back into the Union. They advocated a constitutional amendment barring slavery as a means to ensure republican government in those states. Wilson's proposed amendment included an enforcement clause, empowering Congress to pass legislation to ensure compliance. In this session, however, the House passed neither an emancipation amendment nor any of the envisioned supplemental legislation intended to protect civil rights.

Charles Sumner initially took the lead in pushing for an abolition amendment in the Senate. He hoped not just to end slavery but also to ensure full legal and practical equality for African Americans. Even many fellow members of the Republican Party hesitated to push so far, worrying that the party's fragile wartime coalition of different ideological factions, as bolstered by an important bloc of Democrats who supported the war effort, might be damaged by overly radical legislation. On February 8, 1864, Sumner introduced a constitutional amendment outlawing slavery, hoping that it would be referred to a committee that he chaired on issues related to slavery and freedmen. Following standard legislative practice, however, the amendment was instead referred to the Judiciary Committee, chaired by Lyman Trumbull of Illinois. Trumbull, a less radical Republican than Sumner, oversaw the crafting of a document with less explicit guarantees that former slaves would be granted full citizenship rights and protections.

Sumner's arrogant, humorless personality made it difficult for him to win colleagues over to his more radically egalitarian vision of the proposed amendment. Trumbull, meanwhile, insisted during debate that the more neutral language in his committee's version (much of it borrowed from the well-known Northwest Ordinance) would fully accomplish the same object of ensuring equality for all regardless of race. This claim was likely disingenuous, however. Trumbull and other Senate Republicans were hoping to avoid charges of favoring excessive and revolutionary social and political upheaval on the order of the French Revolution. One senator even expressed the fear that Sumner's amendment's promise that all individuals would be equal before the law could be applied to women, a measure that did not have widespread political support, at least among the men who held a monopoly on voting rights at the time.

The proposed antislavery amendment provoked extensive congressional debate, intended more to inspire supporters back in home districts who would later read published accounts of the speeches than to convince the fellow members, who rarely listened to colleagues' speeches in any event. As 1864 was an election year, the amendment was a particularly potent political issue, and with Lincoln's approval it became part of the Republican Party's campaign platform. The amendment passed the Senate on April 6, 1864, by a vote of 38 to 4; after a fierce struggle and considerable lobbying at the president's behest, it passed the House of Representatives on January 31, 1865, by a vote of 119 to 56, with enough Democrats joining with the Republican majority to ensure the measure's victory. Lincoln enthusiastically indicated his pleasure at this outcome by signing the amendment when it was presented to him, although he was not legally required to do so for it to go into effect.

One of the most difficult issues facing the supporters of the Thirteenth Amendment was that of ratification. Constitutional amendments needed to be ratified by three-quarters of the states in order to take effect. Would the seceded states be counted toward this total? Most Republicans, following the lead of Lincoln, argued that secession was illegal and that the states had not technically left the Union. This presented a dilemma, as some southern states would then have to vote for the abolition amendment in order for it to go into effect. Charles Sumner proposed leaving the Confederate states out of the ratification calculations, but Trumbull and other Republicans successfully opposed this plan, as some worried that the amendment might seem to lack legitimacy if the southern states were not included in the ratification process. In one of his final speeches, only a few days before his assassination, Lincoln indicated that he agreed that all of the states must be allowed the opportunity to ratify the amendment. His successor, Andrew Johnson, implored conventions in the southern states to meet and voluntarily ratify the amendment, and, indeed, enough states ratified the amendment for it to become law. Ominously, however, several of the ratification conventions in the former Confederate states warned that they did not accept the legitimacy of the clause giving Congress the right to pass supplemental legislation ensuring civil rights for African Americans. This significant distinction, generally overlooked by the administration and congressional leaders at the time, suggested that many southern whites were determined to prevent the establishment of equality for African Americans, despite the Thirteenth Amendment's promise of freedom.

Congressman James Mitchell Ashley (Library of Congress)

About the Author

The Thirteenth Amendment had no single author. Some of its key congressional creators and supporters were James M. Ashley, James F. Wilson, Lyman Trumbull, and Charles Sumner.

James M. Ashley was born in Pennsylvania in 1824. The mostly self-educated young man moved west to Ohio in 1848, where he became the editor of a Democratic newspaper and a close political ally of the antislavery leader and future Supreme Court chief justice Salmon P. Chase. Ashley was first elected to Congress in 1858, representing the Republican Party. During the Civil War, he played a leading role in winning support for the emancipation of slaves in the District of Columbia before helping push for the Thirteenth Amendment. He would also favor a punitive Reconstruction policy, including confiscating the property of supporters of the Confederacy and taking away their political rights, which sometimes put him at odds with President Lincoln, who favored a more moderate and generous policy aimed at facilitating reconciliation and reunion. Ashley worked closely with Lincoln, however, in winning support among wavering members of both parties in order to ensure congressional passage of the Thirteenth Amendment. Following the war, Ashley was one of the leaders in the movement to impeach President Andrew Johnson for obstructing Reconstruction, and he aired wild accusations that Johnson had been complicit in Lincoln's murder. He later served as territorial governor of Montana and as a railroad president. He died in 1896.

James F. Wilson, born in Ohio in 1828, was a Republican congressman from Iowa during the Civil War. He had moved to Iowa and begun practicing law and involving himself in politics in the early 1850s, and in 1856 he participated in the convention that revised the state's constitution. Wilson was first elected to Congress in 1861 when his district's former representative, Samuel R. Curtis, resigned to accept an appointment as a general in the Union Army. Once in the Republican-controlled House of Representatives, Wilson was appointed chairman of the Judiciary Committee despite the seniority of other party members on the committee, a compliment to Wilson's legal knowledge, ability, and work ethic. Like Ashley, he also helped win support for ending slavery in the District of Columbia. Following the Civil War, he served in both the Senate and the House of Representatives and as director of the Union Pacific Railroad. Wilson once reputedly turned down an offer of the prestigious position of secretary of state by President Ulysses S. Grant, possibly a wise move given the scandals and misfortune that tarnished the Grant cabinet. Wilson died in 1895, having occupied a prominent place in the Iowa and national Republican leadership for forty years.

Lyman Trumbull of Illinois, a Democrat turned Republican and one of the party's most forceful and respected national leaders during the Civil War era, was born in 1813. He was first elected to the Senate in 1855, triumphing over his rival, Abraham Lincoln, in one of the most bitter setbacks in the career of "Honest Abe." Although Lincoln and Trumbull had an uneasy personal relationship following this contest—and Mary Todd Lincoln afterward refused to speak to Trumbull's wife, Julia, her former friend—the two men put aside their differences to champion Republican policies, including the Thirteenth Amendment, during the Civil War. Feisty and bespectacled, Trumbull broke with Radical Republicans over Reconstruction and voted against the impeachment of Andrew Johnson in 1868. Thereafter, he variously supported the short-lived Liberal Republican movement, returned to the Democratic fold, and even advocated the Populist Party (defending the Socialist labor leader Eugene V. Debs at a trial for the appeal of his conviction for violating a federal antistrike injunction). Trumbull died in 1896.

Charles Sumner first took his seat as a senator from Massachusetts in 1851 at the age of forty, representing first the Free-Soil Party and subsequently the Republican Party. He gained fame for his scholarly oratory and zealous abolitionism as well as for suffering a savage beating from a stout cane wielded by the proslavery South Carolina congressman Preston Brooks on the floor of the Senate in 1856. This famous incident led Sumner to become, in the eyes of many northerners, a heroic symbol of freedom of speech and opponent of southern proslavery barbarism. Sumner did not return to take his Senate seat for several years, though his physical injuries healed relatively quickly. He exercised particular clout in foreign affairs issues owing to his knowledge and wide circle of acquaintances abroad, and he both chaired the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee and served as an adviser to Lincoln on international issues, often much to the annoyance of his long-time political rival Secretary of State William H. Seward. Sumner was one of the Thirteenth Amendment's first and most consistent advocates, and he remained committed to civil rights causes—often finding himself at odds with his fellow Republicans—until his death in 1874.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

The Thirteenth Amendment announces that slavery will no longer be legally permitted in the United States or its territories, with the significant exception that "involuntary servitude" may be imposed on those who have been convicted of crimes. This loophole, to which Charles Sumner strongly objected, permitted those serving jail terms, often African Americans convicted on petty or false charges, to be used as a source of cheap, brutally coerced labor in many southern states well into the twentieth century. The amendment does not specify what the legal status of the former

Essential Quotes

"Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction."

(Section 1)

"Congress shall have the power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

(Section 2)

"In passing this amendment we do not confer upon the negro the right to vote. We give him no right except his freedom, and leave the rest to the states."

(Republican Senator John Henderson, Congressional Globe, April 6, 1864, p. 1438)

"But this amendment is a king's cure-all for all the evils. It winds the whole thing up. He [Lincoln] would repeat that it was the fitting, if not the indispensable, adjunct to the consummation of the great game we are playing."

(Nicolay, p. 475)

slaves would be or if they would be fully entitled to the rights of American citizens. The document also includes an enforcement clause, giving Congress the power to pass laws to enforce emancipation. Unfortunately, lack of political will and Supreme Court decisions leaving most issues of interpretation and enforcement to the states undermined the impact of this clause.

Audience

The Thirteenth Amendment was designed to appeal to northern Republicans and Democrats alike in order to keep both groups behind the war effort; partly for that reason, the authors avoided addressing controversial issues of enforcement, citizenship, and voting rights for the former slaves, which later amendments would address. As the amendment had to be ratified by some southern states as well, its shapers had further incentive to keep its language and provisions as uncontroversial as possible. Moreover, the uncertain question of how it would be read and interpreted by the courts, then and in the future, loomed large.

President Lincoln, like other northern leaders during the Civil War, was also acutely conscious that steps to end slavery in America would be lauded and appreciated by another very meaningful audience: posterity. "We of this Congress and this administration will be remembered in spite of ourselves," he had assured legislators in his annual message to Congress of December 1, 1862. "In giving freedom to the slave, we assure freedom to the free—honorable alike in what we give, and what we preserve.… The way is plain, peaceful, generous, just—a way which, if followed, the world will forever applaud, and God must forever bless." Indeed, the Thirteenth Amendment, like the Emancipation Proclamation, continues to garner laurels for those associated with it, as Lincoln hoped and expected it would.

Impact

The Thirteenth Amendment was widely hailed upon its passage and ratification for effectively ending slavery and bringing the United States into closer proximity to its ideals of freedom and democracy. The decree left open, however, the questions of whether former slaves would possess the full rights of citizenship and of what precisely those rights were. Lincoln's successor, Andrew Johnson, felt that no further federal civil rights legislation was necessary. On the other hand, congressional Republicans, who were displeased with the slow pace of change in the postwar southern states—and with those states' implementation of racist black codes in attempts to create slavery-like status for African Americans—increasingly used the enforcement clause of the Thirteenth Amendment to justify further action to ensure that slavery would be fully abolished. Among the first legislative efforts along these lines were the Freedmen's Bureau Acts, passed in 1865 and 1866, and the Civil Rights Act, passed in 1866—all aimed at ensuring that the former Confederate states did not violate the rights of African Americans. Johnson vetoed the two 1866 bills, breaking decisively with his former Republican allies on Reconstruction and civil rights, but Congress overrode both vetoes. The Civil Rights Act represented an attempt by Republicans to define just what the freedom they had offered the former slaves in the Thirteenth Amendment would look like. The Civil Rights Act defined all native-born Americans as citizens of the United States, negating the Supreme Court's suggestion in the 1857 Dred Scott case that African Americans could not lay claim to citizenship rights. These rights, as envisioned in the Civil Rights Act, did not necessarily include voting rights.

Subsequent constitutional amendments would go further to define the legal rights of African Americans. Ratified in 1868, the Fourteenth Amendment specified that, as citizens, African Americans were entitled to due process and the equal protection of the law; ratified in 1870, the Fifteenth Amendment outlawed the use of race to disqualify citizens from voting. Together, the Thirteenth Amendment and its two successors were truly revolutionary, laying the foundation for a more egalitarian and democratic nation. Widespread resistance to implementing these amendments among white southerners—and their continued use of force, intimidation, and other extralegal methods of denying civil rights to African Americans—ultimately led to the collapse of the Reconstruction state governments in the South by 1877. Afterward came the gradual restoration of white supremacy in the form of a new system of discriminatory segregation. This Jim Crow era lasted for the better part of a century, with the promise of the Thirteenth Amendment left unfulfilled, until the civil rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s.

Indeed, for decades after its passage, as segregation was brutally imposed on African Americans, the Thirteenth Amendment was rarely cited by the courts. Generally, in the late nineteenth century the Supreme Court defined the freedom offered by the Thirteenth Amendment very narrowly and was reluctant to concede to the federal government sufficient power to enforce it. In 1872 the Court ruled in Blyew v. United States that states could refuse to allow African Americans to deliver trial testimony. The 1873 Slaughter-House Cases ruling gave states virtually free rein in defining what the rights of state citizenship for African Americans consisted of, taking the teeth out of the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments. The Plessy v. Ferguson decision of 1896 allowed segregation, in a notorious phrase, as long as the facilities offered to African Americans were "separate but equal." The ruling was ominously silent on how this "equality" would be determined and enforced. Further, in the 1906 case of Hodges v. United States, the Court averred that state courts would have the sole responsibility of identifying and addressing violations of the Thirteenth Amendment, a power that, needless to say, Jim Crow–era southern states were not aggressive in exercising.

Ultimately, a late-twentieth-century Supreme Court case resurrected the dormant amendment. In the Jones v. Alfred H. Mayer Company ruling of 1968, the Court insisted that the constitutional rights of an African American man had been violated when he was barred from buying property in a private housing development owing to his race. The Thirteenth Amendment, the court ruled, had given African Americans freedom and the same status as all other Americans, making such discrimination illegal. Coming in the wake of other judicial and legislative civil rights rulings of the 1950s and 1960s, this case suggested that the full promise of the Thirteenth Amendment would finally be fulfilled.

See also Dred Scott v. Sandford (1857); Emancipation Proclamation (1863); Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1868); Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1870); Plessy v. Ferguson (1896).

Further Reading

■ Articles

Belz, Herman. "The Civil War Amendments to the Constitution: The Relevance of Original Intent." Constitutional Commentary 5 (1988): 115–141.

Zuckert, Michael P. "Completing the Constitution: The Thirteenth Amendment." Constitutional Commentary 4 (1987): 259–284.

■ Books

Basler, Roy P., ed. The Collected Works of Abraham Lincoln. 9 vols. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1953–1955.

Belz, Herman. Abraham Lincoln, Constitutionalism, and Equal Rights in the Civil War Era. New York: Fordham University Press, 1998.

Berlin, Ira, et al., eds. Freedom: A Documentary History of Emancipation, 1861–1867. 4 vols. Cambridge, U.K.: Cambridge University Press, 1982–1993.

Blassingame, John W., et al., eds. The Frederick Douglass Papers. 5 vols. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1979–1992.

Blight, David W., and Brooks D. Simpson, eds. Union and Emancipation: Essays on Politics and Race in the Civil War Era. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1997.

Bogue, Allan G. The Earnest Men: Republicans of the Civil War Senate. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1981.

Cox, Samuel S. Eight Years in Congress, from 1857 to 1865. New York: D. Appleton, 1865.

Dana, Charles A. Recollections of the Civil War: With the Leaders at Washington and in the Field in the Sixties. New York: D. Appleton, 1898.

Du Bois, W. E. B. Black Reconstruction in America: An Essay toward a History of the Part Which Black Folk Played in the Attempt to Reconstruct Democracy in America, 1860–1880. New York: Russell and Russell, 1963.

Hyman, Harold M. A More Perfect Union: The Impact of the Civil War and Reconstruction on the Constitution. New York: Knopf, 1973.

Merrill, Walter M., ed. The Letters of William Lloyd Garrison. 6 vols. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1971–1981.

Nicolay, John G. A Short Life of Abraham Lincoln. New York: Century, 1902.

Paludan, Phillip S. A Covenant with Death: The Constitution, Law, and Equality in the Civil War Era. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1975.

Vorenberg, Michael. Final Freedom: The Civil War, the Abolition of Slavery, and the Thirteenth Amendment. Cambridge, U.K.: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

■ Web Sites

"Annual Message to Congress, Abraham Lincoln, December 1, 1862." Teaching American History Web site.
http://www.teachingamericanhistory.org/library/index.asp?document=1065.

"Documents from Freedom: A Documentary History of Emancipation, 1861–1867." University of Maryland Web site.
http://www.history.umd.edu/Freedmen/sampdocs.htm.

"The End of Slavery: The Creation of the 13th Amendment." HarpWeek Web site.
http://13thamendment.harpweek.com/.

"From Slavery to Freedom: The African-American Pamphlet Collection, 1822–1909." Library of Congress "American Memory" Web site.
http://memory.loc.gov/ammem/aapchtml/aapchome.html.

—Michael Thomas Smith

Questions for Further Study

1. Why might some Americans have voted for the Thirteenth Amendment in 1865? Why might some have voted against it?

2. President Lincoln regarded the Thirteenth Amendment as a "king"s cure-all for all the evils" of slavery, but following his death Congress passed two more amendments in an attempt to complete the work of ensuring freedom and equality for freedmen. Compare and contrast the Thirteenth Amendment with the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments. Which do you think did the most to advance civil rights, and why do you think so?

3. Historians continue to argue about who should receive the most credit for ending slavery: President Lincoln, Congress, the army, or the slaves themselves. Which of these parties do you think played the most crucial role in this process, and why do you think so?

4. The great African American historian and political activist W. E. B. Du Bois wrote in his 1935 book Black Reconstruction in America that "slavery was not abolished even after the Thirteenth Amendment." To what extent and in what ways was this true? How was this possible, once the amendment had become law? What does this suggest about the power of the Constitution?

Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution

♦ Section 1.

Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

♦ Section 2.

Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Testimony before the Joint Committee on Reconstruction on Atrocities in the South against Blacks

1866

"We feel in danger of our lives, of our property, and of everything else."

Overview

The testimony taken by the Joint Committee on Reconstruction consists of a series of interviews conducted after the Civil War to determine the condition of society in the former Confederacy. The Joint Committee, formed by both Senate and House members of the Thirty-ninth Congress in December 1865, investigated reports of violence toward white Unionists and freed slaves in order to determine the extent of federal intervention needed in the South. Opposed to President Andrew Johnson's policy of quick restoration of the southern states to their prewar status, also known as "Presidential Reconstruction," the Joint Committee interviewed 144 people about their experiences in the postwar South, asking specifically about white southerners' treatment of freedpeople and white Unionists as well as their attitudes toward the federal government. Upon the conclusion of its investigation, the committee issued a report summarizing its findings on March 5, 1866, which included transcripts of witnesses' testimony. The testimony largely supported the belief held by Johnson's opponents, the Radical Republicans, that greater oversight was needed to ensure that freedpeople's rights were protected and that the old power structures that had supported slavery and secession were not reestablished. The testimony gave Radical Republicans the proof they needed to wrest control away from Johnson and institute a set of policies known as "Radical Reconstruction," which included a period of military governance, disfranchisement of white Confederates, the extension of the Freedmen's Bureau, and the passage of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution.

Context

Although the Confederate general Robert E. Lee surrendered what remained of his army to Ulysses S. Grant on April 9, 1865, the official cessation of armed conflict left many unresolved questions. Paramount among them was what would become of the former Confederate states and their leaders. Should the two sections immediately be reunited and set about the work of healing and forgiving, or should the South remain separate, under federal control, until its people could demonstrate that they had been thoroughly reconstructed? Could southern whites be trusted to oversee their own affairs, and, most important, respect the rights of the newly freed? Although many rejoiced that the war was over, these troubling questions loomed large on the political horizon.

President Andrew Johnson favored a policy of quick restoration of the southern states to their prewar status. A native of Tennessee and an ardent Unionist, Johnson assumed the presidency upon Abraham Lincoln's death on April 15, 1865. At first, Johnson's well-known dislike for slaveholders and their aristocratic pretensions led many Republicans to believe that his treatment of the South would be much harsher than that of his predecessor, who had urged charity toward errant southerners. Johnson's initial plans to deprive wealthy southerners and high-ranking Confederate leaders of citizenship, along with his demands that the southern states repeal their secession ordinances and ratify the Thirteenth Amendment before being readmitted to the Union, pleased the more radical members of his party. Soon, however, it became apparent that Johnson would do little else to ensure a peaceful transition from slavery to freedom in the South.

Following what he believed would have been President Lincoln's course of action, Johnson issued a general amnesty proclamation in May 1865, effectively relieving Confederates of any fear of criminal prosecution or other retributive measures the government might take against them. He appointed provisional governors to the southern states, many of whom had Confederate sympathies. He also removed federal troops from the South upon request from the provisional governors and in 1866 vetoed key measures aimed at protecting freed slaves, namely the renewal of the Freedmen's Bureau and enactment of a bill on civil rights. (Congress overrode both vetoes.)

Johnson's plans were unpopular among many within his own party, who favored greater federal intervention in the South and a longer, more sustained plan of Reconstruction. Known as Radical Republicans, these men came from an antislavery background and had struggled to make emancipation the primary war aim. While Lincoln hesitated, fearing that such a move would alienate the border states and push them out of the Union, men like Massachusetts sena-

Time Line

1860

■ December
Southern states begin to secede from the Union.

1861

■ April 12
The first shots of the Civil War are fired at Fort Sumter, South Carolina.

1865

■ April 9
Robert E. Lee surrenders to Ulysses S. Grant at the village of Appomattox Court House, Virginia.

■ April 15
President Abraham Lincoln dies from wounds received the previous evening at the hands of John Wilkes Booth; Andrew Johnson becomes president.

■ May 29
President Johnson issues a general amnesty proclamation restoring rights and property to most southern rebels once they have taken a loyalty oath, but which excludes civil and diplomatic officials, military officers, and those who left judicial or political offices to join the Confederacy.

■ November
The Mississippi state legislature passes its Black Code; other southern states follow suit.

■ December 3
The Thirty-ninth Congress meets in Washington, D.C. Among its newly elected members are many former Confederates elected by unreconstructed state legislatures, whom Republicans refuse to seat.

■ December 13
The Joint Committee on Reconstruction is formed by a joint resolution of Congress to investigate the condition of affairs in the southern states and the effects of Johnson's leniency toward former rebels.

■ December 19
The Thirteenth Amendment is ratified, officially abolishing slavery in the United States.

tor Charles Sumner and Pennsylvania congressman Thaddeus Stevens urged the president to see that emancipation was not only a military necessity but also a moral imperative. Their leadership on the issue eventually secured the Thirteenth Amendment (December 1865), which abolished slavery forever. However, Radical Republicans felt that more needed to be done in order to ensure that freedpeople's rights would be firmly established and protected.

Former Confederates responded to Johnson's leniency by passing laws aimed at curtailing black freedom. Known as Black Codes, these state laws attempted to regulate labor relations between white employers and black workers by making it illegal to break an employment contract. The laws enacted fines and jail time for vagrancy, thereby forcing black people to sign contracts with whites, who were often their former owners. The laws also required the apprenticeship of minor children. The Black Codes also forbade freedpeople from owning or carrying firearms, so as to limit their ability to defend themselves against assault or coercion. They instituted curfews and sometimes required blacks to carry passes in order to travel off the plantation, just as they formerly had to do as slaves. The Black Codes criminalized a variety of personal behaviors, such as using insulting language or gestures or otherwise being "insolent." White southerners proudly declared their intention to establish "a white man's country," and the Black Codes aimed to do just that.

White southerners elected former Confederate leaders to positions of political power. Candidates running for office would print on their tickets "late of the Confederate army," and former Confederate officers often wore their old uniforms. In Alabama, a man accused of murdering a Union general was elected sheriff. The unreconstructed state legislatures sent high-ranking Confederate leaders, including their former vice president, Alexander H. Stephens of Georgia, to Congress. They also called state constitutional conventions that valorized the southern war effort and refused to repudiate secession. President Johnson advised provisional governors against such acts of open defiance, but his advice fell on deaf ears. Ultimately, the former Confederates overplayed their hand. Their disloyal behavior and attacks against freedpeople caused Johnson much embarrassment and fueled Radical criticisms against him.

It was in this context that the Joint Committee on Reconstruction was established by the Thirty-Ninth Congress on December 13, 1865, to investigate and report on conditions in the former Confederate states and to propose necessary legislation. Nine representatives and six senators composed the committee: the senators William Pitt Fessenden of Massachusetts, James W. Grimes of Iowa, Ira Harris of New York, Jacob M. Howard of Michigan, Reverdy Johnson from Maryland, and George H. Williams of Oregon and the representatives Thaddeus Stevens of Pennsylvania, Elihu B. Washburne of Illinois, Justin S. Morrill of Vermont, Kentuckian Henry Grider, John A. Bingham from Ohio, Roscoe Conkling of New York, George S. Boutwell from Massachusetts, Missourian Henry T. Blow, and Andrew J. Rogers of New Jersey. Radical Republicans were a minority on the committee, as most of its members were moderate Republicans. There were only three Democrats.

For several months in 1866 four subcommittees took testimony in Washington, D.C., from a variety of sources: among them, U.S. military officers and Freedmen's Bureau officials; former Confederate leaders, including General Robert E. Lee and the Confederate vice president, Alexander H. Stephens; northerners who had spent time in the South; southern Unionists, and black southerners. Only 7 of the 144 witnesses called before the Joint Committee were black. There would have been no blacks testifying at all, except for the fact that a freedmen's rights convention coincided with the hearings in Washington, D.C., and the Virginia delegates to the convention petitioned to appear before the committee. The men were Daniel Norton, a free black man from New York trained as a physician; the Reverend William Thornton, a former slave and minister in Hampton; Madison Newby, a free black landowner from Norfolk who had worked as a boat pilot for Union forces during the war; Richard R. Hill, a former slave also living in Hampton; Alexander Dunlop, a free black before the war and trustee of the First Baptist Church in Williamsburg; Thomas Bain, a fugitive slave living in Massachusetts until emancipation, when he returned to Virginia; and Edmund Parsons, a house servant before the war living in Williamsburg. Based on the overall testimony (most of which was taken in February), the committee issued its report in March of 1866.

About the Author

The seven black men who testified before the Joint Committee came from diverse backgrounds. Their ages ranged from twenty-six to fifty. Some were freeborn, and others had been enslaved until the Emancipation Proclamation set them free. Two came from the North but had ties to Virginia. Despite these differences, however, all the men held positions of respect and authority in their local communities and acted as representatives both at the hearings of the Joint Committee and at a freedmen's convention that took place concurrently with the hearings in Washington, D.C.

Daniel Norton, twenty-six and the youngest among the black Virginians, was a physician from New York State who had come south either during or immediately after the war to aid the freed population. Although he was born in Williamsburg, it is not known whether Norton had been a slave or free or at what age he went to New York. Unlike Norton, the Reverend William Thornton, forty-two, had been a slave until 1863, when the Emancipation Proclamation went into effect. Madison Newby, thirty-three and from Surrey County, had been free before the war and owned his own house and land. Richard Hill, thirty-four, was a former slave from Hampton. Alexander Dunlop, forty-eight, was also a free black before the war, worked as a blacksmith, and was a trustee of the First Baptist Church in Williamsburg. Thomas Bain, forty, was a freedman who had escaped Virginia on the Underground Railroad and was living in Massachusetts at the time of emancipation in 1863, when he returned to Virginia as a missionary. Edmund Parsons, who at fifty was the oldest of the men, had been a house slave in Williamsburg. These men's testimony reveals the attitudes of whites toward their former slaves and their efforts to reassert their domination and supremacy in all areas of life. The testimony provides an important view into life

Time Line

1866

- January The Joint Committee begins to form four subcommittees to take testimony in Washington, D.C., relating to the condition of the South.
- February 3 Seven black Virginians testify before the Joint Committee.
- March 5 The Joint Committee issues its report to Congress and orders the findings and testimony printed for publication.
- April 9 The Civil Rights Act of 1866 is passed by Congress over presidential veto; the bill guarantees equal protection to all citizens regardless of color.
- June 13 Fearing that the Civil Rights Act might face a constitutional challenge, Congress proposes the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.
- July 16 The bill extending the Freedmen's Bureau is passed over presidential veto.

1868

- February 24 The House of Representatives votes to impeach President Johnson over conflicts related to Reconstruction policy.
- July 9 The Fourteenth Amendment is ratified, granting national citizenship "to all persons born or naturalized in the United States" and guaranteeing to them the rights of due process and equal protection.

1870

- February 3 The Fifteenth Amendment is ratified, guaranteeing universal suffrage to all male citizens.

The surrender of Robert E. Lee to Ulysses S. Grant, ending the Civil War (Library of Congress) in the immediate postwar South and the struggles between freedpeople and southern whites to define freedom there. It also gives insight into the problems of establishing a system of wage labor after slavery and freedpeople's efforts to gain economic as well as political independence.

Explanation and Analysis of Document

The most powerful testimony came from the small group of black men who testified before the committee. Although they received some condescending questions from some Committee members (particularly Democrats opposed to the whole process), who asked if they had any "white blood" or could read and or write, the black deponents responded patiently and with great detail about freedpeople's desire to live peaceably and build a better life.

They testified to the mistreatment of freedpeople by white southerners and the need for increased federal protection. The physician Daniel Norton, living in Yorktown, Virginia, testified that he believed freedpeople would be "hunted and killed" if federal troops were removed. As a doctor working among the black community, he was in a position to observe their relationship with local whites. He related how numerous freedmen had not been paid their wages and how their white employers threw them off the land and sold the crops that the freedmen had raised. The employers then dared the freedmen to complain to the government. He insisted that freedpeople were "law-abiding citizens" who loved the federal government and wanted nothing more than to work hard and be productive.

Like Norton, the Reverend William Thornton told of the violence freedpeople endured from whites. In his testimony, Thornton recalled how a white man became enraged at his mention of Abraham Lincoln's assassination in a sermon and told Thornton that once the troops and the Freedmen's Bureau were gone, "we will put you to rights" and promised to break up the black churches. Thornton also recounted how a white man shot a neighboring black man who had unintentionally trespassed on the white man's property.

The black witnesses also negated the contentions of many southern deponents that blacks were lazy and indolent and that they committed breaches of the peace by drinking, carrying weapons, and acting aggressively toward whites. Madison Newby, a landowner, related how he had gone to the county courthouse to pay his taxes but found no federal agent there to take them, so he held on to the money, fearing that disloyal southerners would pocket it. He insisted that blacks wanted to work and would work diligently for decent pay. He reminded the committee that as slaves, blacks were used to hard work. He said that in Surrey County whites would tie blacks up by the thumbs if they did not consent to work for low wages. Newby also testified that whites continued to patrol black neighborhoods, searching their houses, confiscating valuables, and terrorizing the residents.

Richard Hill, a former slave from Hampton, reassured the committee that blacks had no intentions of "amalgamating" with the whites. However, Hill did point out that during the years of slavery, white men frequently had sexual relations with black women, and he suspected that this would continue. White southerners and opponents of Radical Reconstruction argued that interracial marriage would result from extending civil and political rights to freedpeople.

Alexander Dunlop had aided Union troops by giving them information about the local area and had suffered because of it. He was considered a "Union man" and targeted for special abuse by former Confederates. He insisted that freedpeople were anxious to get an education. Because they were poor, however, and whites threatened teachers and drove them away, they needed assistance from the government.

Thomas Bain, living and working as a Methodist missionary in Norfolk, told how whites tricked freedpeople into believing that the military officials had ordered them to punish blacks. Because they did not want to disobey the government, Bain said, freedpeople often submitted to being whipped. Like the others, however, Bain also spoke of freedpeople's eagerness for education and independence.

Finally, Edmund Parsons, formerly a slave, testified that before he was emancipated he always felt "secure" with whites but that now he stood in fear of them. He testifies to the threats that had been made against him and describes how he had been evicted from his house. He also indicates that the African Americans he knows would like to become educated and are grateful for any education they receive.

A caricature of Reconstruction under Andrew Johnson, showing an acrobat with legs stretched between the head of Thaddeus Stevens (Library of Congress)

Audience

As part of a Congressional investigation, the Joint Committee's report and testimony aimed to persuade members of Congress to vote in favor of the Radical Republicans' measures and thereby override President Johnson's vetoes of the Freedmen's Bureau and Civil Rights bills. Upon publication, the report and testimony created a public record justifying federal intervention in the South and amending the Constitution to guarantee citizenship rights to African Americans. Northern newspapers reported on the committee's investigation and excerpted testimony, thereby broadening the documents' scope beyond the walls of Congress. In the end, the black Virginians who testified were speaking directly to Congress and the nation.

Impact

After hearing the testimony, the Joint Committee issued a lengthy report and made recommendations to Congress. The report consists of three parts: the majority report, the minority report, and the testimony. The testimony is divided into three parts. Part I contains the testimony from Tennessee; Part II contains that from Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina; and Part III contains testimony from Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, Florida, Louisiana, and Texas. In the majority report, Republican members of the committee made their case against President Johnson's quick restoration of the southern states and called for tougher measures, including continued use of federal troops, the extension of the Freedmen's Bureau, and passage of the Fourteenth Amendment. Citing testimony given to the committee regarding former Confederates' abuse of freedpeople and white Unionists, the report argued that the southern states remained in a state of open rebellion. The minority report, signed by Reverdy Johnson, Henry Grider, and Andrew Rogers, the Democrats on the committee, countered the majority's conclusions by accusing them of stacking the witness pool in their favor and ignoring evidence presented that proved the South was peaceable and that any violence committed

Essential Quotes

"Question. Do they find any difficulty in obtaining employment at fair wages? … Answer. They do find some difficulty. The slaveholders, who have owned them, say that they will take them back, but cannot pay them any wages. Some are willing to pay a dollar a month, and some less, and some are only willing to give them their clothing and what they eat. They are not willing to pay anything for work."

(Dr. Daniel Norton)

"Question. Do you feel any danger? … Answer. We feel in danger of our lives, of our property, and of everything else."

(Alexander Dunlop)

"Question. Are the black people there anxious for education and to go to school? Answer: Generally they are; but in my neighborhood they are afraid to be caught with a book"

(Madison Newby)

"Question. How are the black people treated in Virginia by the whites since the close of hostilities? Answer. The only hope the colored people have is in Uncle Sam's bayonets."

(Thomas Bain)

was the work of outside agitators or freedmen themselves. The minority report supported President Johnson's lenient policy toward the South. The testimony consists of transcripts of the interviews conducted during the committee's investigation, mostly with white witnesses.

The majority report placed the blame for southern violence squarely on President Johnson's shoulders. At the end of the war, the southern states, according to the report, "were in a state of utter exhaustion," but Johnson had missed a golden opportunity to remake southern society for the better. The report charged Johnson with neglecting his obligation to preserve the life and property of loyal citizens: As "commander-in-chief of a victorious army it was his duty, under the law of nations … to restore order, to preserve property, and to protect the people against violence from any quarter until provision should be made by law for their government." The report argued that Johnson had violated his duty by withdrawing military authority and reinstating disloyal leaders. He had ignored evidence of continued disloyalty, hostility to the government, and violence against freedpeople and loyal whites. Furthermore, he had acted unconstitutionally by assuming unilateral power to reorganize the governments of the southern states, a task the report claimed belonged not to the president but to Congress. By portraying Johnson as not simply inept but criminally negligent, the majority report laid the foundations for his future impeachment.

The report's aggressive tone reflected not only the level of animosity that existed between Radical Republicans and President Johnson but also the importance of controlling the war's meaning for the Republican Party. Radical Republicans remained committed to the emancipationist vision of the war. The report rejected the legality of secession and labeled the Confederate war effort as treasonous as well as murderous.

The minority report claimed that once the war ceased, so too did Congress's war power. Therefore, Johnson's policy of restoration was both expedient and constitutional. They believed that Radical Republicans were driven by greed and revenge. Yet an additional concern animated the minority's opposition to Radical Reconstruction: economics. Not only would it be very expensive to oversee such an expansive Reconstruction effort, it also might delay the South's reemergence as the world's primary producer of cotton.

Whatever the minority objections, the testimony of the seven black men compelled Congress to act on behalf of freedpeople. The Joint Committee's report helped persuade moderate Republicans, who were skeptical of increasing federal intervention, to take a more vigorous path to southern Reconstruction. This shift enabled Radical Republicans to wrest control from President Johnson and eventually led to his impeachment for efforts to circumvent Congress. As a result of the Joint Committee's investigation, Congress extended the Freedmen's Bureau and passed the Civil Rights Act of 1866. The report introduced the Fourteenth Amendment and paved the way for the Fifteenth Amendment, granting universal suffrage to all men regardless of color.

The Joint Committee's report was one of a flurry of such reports and other documents that were issued in 1866. Among them was Carl Schurz's The Condition of the South: Extracts from the Report of Major-General Carl Schurz, on the States of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana: Addressed to the President. Schurz's conclusion was that in his travels throughout the South (at the request of President Johnson), he saw little in the way of national feeling; instead, the war was seen as the result of the perfidy of the Yankees. He noted, too, that while the South fought against the Union, blacks did all they could to aid the Union.

Also in 1866, Secretary of War Edwin Stanton wrote Murder of Union Soldiers in North Carolina, a report issued to the U.S. House of Representatives detailing atrocities committed against Union loyalists and any persons or organizations that aided blacks. Stanton noted that churches and schools were favorite targets and that the South was relying on Johnson and a Democratic Congress to keep blacks in subordinate positions. On July 25, 1866, Elihu Benjamin Washburne, a congressional representative from Illinois and a member of the Select Committee on the Memphis Riots, issued a report, Memphis Riots and Massacres, to Congress. The riot had taken place in May of that year and was one of the events that prompted Congress to assume control of Reconstruction. During the riot, white mobs attacked a black shantytown in Memphis and killed nearly fifty people in an early show of white southern rejection of emancipation. Meanwhile, after the First Convention of Colored Men of Kentucky, held in Lexington, Kentucky, in March 1866, the group issued its proceedings, asserting the place of African Americans in the body politic. Later that year, in October, the Freedmen held a convention in Raleigh, North Caroli-

Questions for Further Study

1. What was the distinction between "Presidential Reconstruction" and "Radical Reconstruction"? What do you think might have been the effects if Presidential Reconstruction had continued to be the policy of the Union?

2. What do you think were President Andrew Johnson's motives in treating the rebellious South with leniency in the immediate aftermath of the Civil War? Do you believe he was right or wrong? Explain.

3. Throughout the Civil War, numerous people living in the Confederacy were loyal to the Union at heart and, in some instances, did what they could to aid the Union by, for example, providing information to Union generals. What do you think the position of these Union loyalists would have been in the months and years following the war? How vulnerable to reprisals do you think they would have been?

4. Even in the twenty-first century, debates continue to rage about the legacy of the Confederacy and its role in the Civil War. Some people continue to regard the Confederacy—and the Confederate flag—as a symbol of a way of life and of an attitude toward state and regional interests versus federal interests. What is your position on this matter?

5. In the years immediately following the Civil War, many African Americans felt a sense of hope, despite the dangers and abuses they suffered. The Emancipation Proclamation had freed slaves, the Thirteenth Amendment abolished slavery, and numerous African Americans were elected to Congress. What happened? Why did this hope collapse in later years?

na, and through published minutes continued to agitate for equal rights and the vote. These documents, together with the Joint Committee report, gave the president, Congress, and the American public a vivid portrait of southern intransigence in the months following the Civil War.

See also Emancipation Proclamation (1863); Black Code of Mississippi (1865); Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1865); Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1868); Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1870).

Further Reading

■ Articles

Lowe, Richard. "The Joint Committee on Reconstruction: Some Clarifications." Southern Studies 3 (Spring 1992): 55–65.

■ Books

Foner, Eric. Reconstruction: America's Unfinished Revolution, 1863–1877. New York: Harper & Row, 1988.

Franklin, John Hope. Reconstruction after the Civil War. 2nd ed. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994.

Kendrick, Benjamin B. The Journal of the Joint Committee of Fifteen on Reconstruction, 39th Congress, 1865–1867. 1914. Reprint. New York: Negro Universities Press, 1969.

Report of the Joint Committee on Reconstruction at the First Session, Thirty-ninth Congress. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1866.

Trefousse, Hans L. The Radical Republicans: Lincoln's Vanguard for Racial Justice. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1969.

Wilbur, W. Allan. "Joint Committee on Reconstruction, 1865." In Congress Investigates: A Documented History, 1792–1974, ed. Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., and Roger Bruns. New York: Chelsea House, 1975.

—Carole Emberton

Document Text

Testimony before the Joint Committee on Reconstruction on Atrocities in the South against Blacks

Washington, February 3, 1866.

Dr. Daniel Norton (colored) sworn and examined.

By Mr. Howard:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. I reside in Yorktown, Virginia.

Question. How old are you?

Answer. About 26 years old.

Question. Are you a regularly licensed physician?

Answer. I am.

Question. Where were you educated?

Answer. In the State of New York. I studied privately under Dr. Warren.

Question. How long have you resided at Yorktown?

Answer. About two years.

Question. Are you a native of Virginia?

Answer. Yes, sir; I was born in Williamsburg, Virginia.

Question. What is the feeling among the rebels in the neighborhood of Yorktown towards the government of the United States?

Answer. They do not manifest a very cordial feeling toward the government of the United States. There are some, of course, who do, but the majority do not seem to manifest a good spirit or feeling.

Question. How are they disposed to treat you?

Answer. Me, as a man, they are generally disposed to treat well, but there are others of my fellow-men whom they do not treat as well.

Question. Are you employed as a physician in white families?

Answer. I have not been employed in any white families, except in one case, since I have been there. I principally practice among the colored.

Question. How do the returned rebels treat the colored people?

Answer. They have in some cases treated them well, but in more cases they have not. A number of persons living in the country have come into Yorktown and reported to the Freedmen's Bureau that they have not been treated well; that they worked all the year and had received no pay, and were driven off on the first of January. They say that the owners with whom they had been living rented out their places, sold their crops, and told them they had no further use for them, and that they might go to the Yankees.

Question. What is the condition of the colored people in that neighborhood?

Answer. They are poor, sir. There is a large settlement near Yorktown, called Slabtown, settled by the government during the war with those who came within the lines. The colored people there are doing such work as they can get to do, oystering, &c.

Question. Are not their old masters ready to employ them for wages?

Answer. There have been some sent for, and in several cases they received such bad treatment that they came back again. (Witness related several instances of this kind.)

Question. Are the colored people in your neighborhood willing to work for fair wages?

Answer. They are, sir.

Question. Do they find any difficulty in obtaining employment at fair wages?

Answer. They do find some difficulty. The slaveholders, who have owned them, say that they will take them back, but cannot pay them any wages. Some are willing to pay a dollar a month, and some less, and some are only willing to give them their clothing and what they eat. They are not willing to pay anything for work.

Question. Are the colored people generally provided with houses in which they can eat and sleep?

Answer. Yes, sir; such houses as they have built themselves, slab-houses.

Question. How do the colored people feel toward the government of the United States?

Answer. They feel determined to be law-abiding citizens. There is no other feeling among them.

Question. Are you a delegate sent to the city of Washington by some association?

Answer. I am. I was sent by three counties; I represent, perhaps, something like fifteen or twenty thousand people. The great trouble, in my opinion, is, that the colored people are not more disposed to return to their former homes on account of the treatment which those who have gone back have received.

Question. State generally whether or not the treatment which these colored people receive at the hands of their old white masters is kind or unkind?

Answer. It is not what I would consider kind or good treatment. Of course I do not mean to be understood that there are not some who treat them kindly, but I mean generally; they do not treat them kindly.

Question. In case of the removal of the military force from among you, and also of the Freedmen's Bureau, what would the whites do with you?

Answer. I do not think that the colored people would be safe. They would be in danger of being hunted and killed. The spirit of the whites against the blacks is much worse than it was before the war; a white gentleman with whom I was talking made this remark: he said he was well disposed toward the colored people, but that, finding that they took up arms against him, he had come to the conclusion that he never wanted to have anything to do with them, or to show any spirit of kindness toward them. These were his sentiments.

Washington, February 3, 1866.

Reverend William Thornton (colored) sworn and examined.

By Mr. Howard:

Question. What is your age?

Answer. Forty-two, sir.

Question. Where were you born?

Answer. In Elizabeth City county, Virginia.

Question. What degree of education have you received?

Answer. My education is very narrowly limited; I have not had the advantages of a first-rate education.

Question. You can read and write?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Can you read the Bible?

Answer. Oh, yes, sir.

Question. Can you read ordinary newspapers?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Can you write a letter on business?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Were you ever a slave?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. When were you made free?

Answer. I was made free under the proclamation.

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. Hampton, Elizabeth City county, Virginia.

Question. How do the old rebel masters down there feel toward your race?

Answer. The feeling existing there now is quite disagreeable.

Question. Do they not treat the colored race with kindness down there?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. What acts of unkindness can you mention?

Answer. I was asked the other day if I did not know I was violating the law in celebrating marriages. I did not know that that was the case, and I went up to the clerk's office to inquire; I said nothing out of the way to the clerk of the court; I only asked him if there had been any provision for colored people to be lawfully married. Said he, "I do not know whether there is or not, and if they are granting licenses you can't have any; that is my business, not yours." After I found I was violating the law, I went to the Freedmen's Bureau and stated the case. A provision was afterwards made in the bureau granting licenses, and authorizing me to marry. Some days after that an old gentleman named Houghton, a white man living in the neighborhood of my church, was in the church. In my sermon I mentioned the assassination of Mr. Lincoln. Next day I happened to meet Houghton, who said to me, "Sir, as soon as we can get these Yankees off the ground and move that bureau, we will put you to rights; we will break up your church, and not one of you shall have a church here." Said I, "For what? I think it is for the safety of the country to have religious meetings, and for your safety as well as everybody else's." "We will not have it, sir," said he, and then he commenced talking about two classes of people whom they intended to put to rights, the colored people and the loyal white men. I asked him in what respect be was going to put them to rights; said he, "That is for myself."

Question. Is he a man of standing and condition in the neighborhood?

Answer. He owns property there.

Question. Is he a rebel?

Answer. Oh, yes.

Question. Can you speak of any acts of violence committed by the whites upon the blacks?

Answer. Yes, sir; about three weeks ago a colored man got another one to cut some wood for him, and sent him into the woods adjoining the property of a Mr. Britner, a white man. The colored man, not knowing the line between the two farms, cut down a tree on Britner's land, when Britner went into the woods and deliberately shot him as he would shoot a bird.

Question. Was he not indicted and punished for that?

Answer. They had him in prison.

Question. Is he not in prison now?

Answer. I heard that they had let him out last Sunday morning.

Question. Do you know any other instances of cruelty?

Document Text

Answer. I have church once a month in Matthews county, Virginia, the other side of the bay. The last time I was over there an intelligent man told me that just below his house a lady and her husband, who had been at the meeting, received thirty-nine lashes for being there, according to the old law of Virginia, as if they had been slaves. This was simply because they were told not to go to hear a Yankee darkey talk. They said he was not a Yankee but was a man born in Virginia, in Hampton, Question. Why did they not resist being flogged?

Answer. They are that much down.

Question. Did they not know that they had a right to resist?

Answer. They dare not do it.

Question. Why?

Answer. I do not know. On the 1st of January we had a public meeting there, at which I spoke. The next night when I was coming from the church, which is about a mile and a half from my house, I met a colored man who told me that there was a plot laid for me; I went back to the church and got five of my church members to come with me. I afterwards learned that a fellow named Mahon, a white man, had determined, for my speech that day, to murder me the first chance.

Question. Did that come to you in so authentic a form as to leave no doubt upon your mind?

Answer. I believe he made the threat. The next day he said to me, "We hope the time will come that these Yankees will be away from here, and then we will settle with you preachers." That gave me to understand that the threat was made.

Question. Do you wish to state any other instances?

Answer. These are as many as I care to speak of.

Question. You are up here as a delegate to make representations to the President in reference to the condition of the colored people?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Are you a regularly ordained minister of the gospel?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. In what church?

Answer. In the Baptist church.

Washington, February 3, 1866.

Madison Newby (colored) sworn and examined.

By Mr. Howard:

Question. Have you any white blood in you?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. Where were you born?

Answer. In Surrey county, Virginia.

Question. How old are you?

Answer. Thirty-three.

Question. Can you read and write?

Answer. I cannot write; I can read a little.

Question. Can you read the Testament?

Answer. A little.

Question. Have you a family?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Have you been a slave before the war?

Answer. No, sir; I never was a slave.

Question. How do the rebel white people treat you since the war?

Answer. They do not allow me to go where I came from, except I steal in there.

Question. Why not?

Answer. They say I am a Yankee. I have been there, but was driven away twice; they said I would not be allowed to stay there, and I had better get away as quick as possible. I had gone down to look after my land.

Question. Do you own land there?

Answer. Yes.

Question. How much?

Answer. One hundred and fifty acres.

Question. Did you pay for it?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you stand in fear of the rebel white men?

Answer. Yes, sir, I do. If all the Union men that are down there would protect us we would not be so much afraid. I went down there to pay my taxes upon my land, but I could not see any person to pay them to; I didn't want to pay any but the United States government; and finally, they told me at the courthouse that I had better let it alone until I could see further about it.

Question. What is your land worth?

Answer. I gave $700 for it.

Question. Is there a house on it?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do the colored people down there love to work?

Answer. They work if they can get anything for it; but the rebel people down there who have got lands will not let the colored people work unless they work for their prices, and they drive them away. They expect colored people down there to work for ten or eighteen cents a day. Six or eight dollars a month is the highest a colored man can get; of course he gets his board, but he may have a family of six to support on these wages, and of course he cannot do it.

Document Text

Question. How do you get your living?

Answer. I am living in Norfolk at present. I piloted the Union forces there when they first came to Surrey; and afterwards the rebels would not let me go back.

Question. Were you impressed by the Union forces, or did you voluntarily act as a guide?

Answer. I was impressed. I told the Union forces when they came that unless they were willing to protect me I did not want them to take me away, because my living was there; and they promised they would see to me.

Question. Did they pay you for your services?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. They gave you enough to eat and drink?

Answer. They gave me plenty to eat when I was travelling, but nothing to drink except water.

Question. Now that the blacks are made free, will they not, if left to themselves without the protection of the whites, become strollers and rovers about the country and live in idleness, and pilfer and misbehave generally?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. Why not?

Answer. Because they have all been used to work, and will work if they can get anything to do.

Question. Do they not want to go away from the old places where they have been accustomed to live and go off west somewhere?

Answer. No, sir; we want to stay in our old neighborhoods, but those of us who have gone away are not allowed to go back. In Surrey county they are taking the colored people and tying them up by the thumbs if they do not agree to work for six dollars a month; they tie them up until they agree to work for that price, and then they make them put their mark to a contract.

Question. Did you ever see a case of that kind?

Answer. Yes, sir, I did.

Question. How many cases of that kind have you ever seen?

Answer. Only one; I have heard of several such, but I have only seen one.

Question. What is the mode of tying up by the thumbs?

Answer. They have a string tied around the thumbs just strong enough to hold a man's weight, so that his toes just touch the ground; and they keep the man in that position until he agrees to do what they say. A man cannot endure it long.

Question. What other bad treatment do they practice on the blacks? Do they whip them?

Answer. Yes, sir; just as they did before the war; I see no difference.

Question. Have you seen them whipped since the war?

Answer. Several times.

Question. By their old masters?

Answer. By the old people around the neighborhood; the old masters get other people to do it.

Question. Do they whip them just as much as they did before the war?

Answer. Just the same; I do not see any alteration in that. There are no colored schools down in Surrey county; they would kill any one who would go down there and establish colored schools. There have been no meetings or anything of that kind. They patrol our houses just us formerly.

Question. What do you mean by patrolling your houses?

Answer. A party of twelve or fifteen men go around at night searching the houses of colored people, turning them out and beating them. I was sent here as a delegate to find out whether the colored people down there cannot have protection. They are willing to work for a living; all they want is some protection and to know what their rights are; they do not know their rights; they do not know whether they are free or not, there are so many different stories told them.

Question. Where did you learn to read?

Answer. I first picked up a word from one and then from another.

Question. Have you ever been at school?

Answer. Never in my life.

Question. Are the black people there anxious for education and to go to school?

Answer. Generally they are; but down in my neighborhood they are afraid to be caught with a book.

Washington, February 3, 1866.

Richard R. Hill (colored) sworn and examined.

By Mr. Howard:

Question. Where do you live?

Answer. Hampton, Virginia.

Question. That is where President Tyler used to live?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Did you know him?

Answer. Yes, I knew him pretty well.

Question. Can you read and write?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. How old are you?

Answer. About thirty-four years.

Question. Were you ever a slave?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Document Text

Question. When did you become free?

Answer. When the proclamation was issued. I left Richmond in 1863.

Question. Did you serve in the rebel army?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. Or in the Union army?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. How do the rebels down there, about Hampton, treat the colored people?

Answer. The returned rebels express a desire to get along in peace if they can. There have been a few outrages out upon the roadside there. One of the returned Union colored soldiers was met out there and beaten very much.

Question. By whom was he beaten?

Answer. It was said they were rebels; they had on Union overcoats, but they were not United States soldiers. Occasionally we hear of an outrage of that kind, but there are none in the little village where I live.

Question. What appears to be the feeling generally of the returned rebels towards the freedmen; is it kind or unkind?

Answer. Well, the feeling that they manifest as a general thing is kind, so far as I have heard.

Question. Are they willing to pay the freedmen fair wages for their work?

Answer. No, sir; they are not willing to pay the freedmen more than from five to eight dollars a month.

Question. Do you think that their labor is worth more than that generally?

Answer. I do, sir; because, just at this time, everything is very dear, and I do not see how people can live and support their families on those wages.

Question. State whether the black people down there are anxious to go to school?

Answer. Yes, sir; they are anxious to go to school; we have schools there every day that are very well filled; and we have night schools that are very well attended, both by children and aged people; they manifest a great desire for education.

Question. Who are the teachers; white or black?

Answer. White, sir.

Question. How are the white teachers treated by the rebels down there?

Answer. I guess they are not treated very well, because they have very little communication between each other. I have not heard of any threatening expression in regard to them.

Question. Did you ever hear any threats among the whites to reduce your race to slavery again?

Answer. They have said, and it seems to be a prevalent idea, that if their representatives were received in Congress the condition of the freedmen would be very little better than that of the slaves, and that their old laws would still exist by which they would reduce them to something like bondage. That has been expressed by a great many of them.

Question. What has become of your former master?

Answer. He is in Williamsburg.

Question. Have you seen him since the proclamation?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Did he want you to go back and live with him?

Answer. No, sir; he did not ask me to go back, but he was inquiring of me about another of his slaves, who was with him at the evacuation of Williamsburg by the rebels.

Question. How do you feel about leaving the State of Virginia and going off and residing as a community somewhere else?

Answer. They do not wish to leave and go anywhere else unless they are certain that the locality where they are going is healthy and that they can get along.

Question. Are they not willing to be sent back to Africa?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. Why not?

Answer. They say that they have lived here all their days, and there were stringent laws made to keep them here; and that if they could live here contented as slaves, they can live here when free.

Question. Do you not think that to be a very absurd notion?

Answer. No, sir; if we can get lands here and can work and support ourselves, I do not see why we should go to any place that we do not want to go to.

Question. If you should stay here, is there not danger that the whites and blacks would intermarry and amalgamate?

Answer. I do not think there is any more danger now than there was when slavery existed. At that time there was a good deal of amalgamation.

Question. Amalgamation in Virginia?

Answer. There was no actual marrying, but there was an intermixture to a great extent. We see it very plainly. I do not think that that troubles the colored race at all.

Question. But you do not think that a Virginia white man would have connexion with a black woman?

Answer. I do, sir; I not only think so, but I know it from past experience. It was nothing but the stringent laws of the south that kept many a white man from marrying a black woman.

Question. It would be looked upon as a very wicked state of things, would it not, for a while man to marry a black woman?

Answer. I will state to you as a white lady stated to a gentleman down in Hampton, that if she felt disposed to fall in love with or marry a black man, it was nobody's business but hers; and so I suppose, that if the colored race get all their rights, and particularly their equal rights before the law, it would not hurt the nation or trouble the nation.

Question. In such a case do you think the blacks would have a strong inclination to unite with the whites in marriage?

Answer. No, sir; I do not. I do not think that the blacks would have so strong an inclination to unite with the whites as the whites would have to unite with the blacks.

Washington, D. C. February 3, 1866.

Alexander Dunlop (colored) sworn and examined.

By Mr. Howard:

Question. How old are you?

Answer. Forty-eight years.

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. In Williamsburg, Virginia. I was born there.

Question. Have you ever been a slave?

Answer. Never, sir.

Question. Are you able to read and write?

Answer. No, sir; I can read some. That was not allowed me there.

Question. Can you read the Bible?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Do you belong to a church?

Answer. Yes; I belong to the First Baptist church of Williamsburg. I am one of the leading men and trustees.

Question. About how many are included in the church?

Answer. Our minutes show seven hundred and thirty-six.

Question. Do you own the church building?

Answer. We do.

Question. Are you a delegate to the President of the United States?

Answer. Yes, sir; I was sent by my people convened at a large mass meeting.

Question. For what purpose?

Answer. My purpose was to let the government know our situation, and what we desire the government to do for us if it can do it. We feel down there without any protection.

Question. Do you feel any danger?

Answer. We do.

Question. Danger of what?

Answer. We feel in danger of our lives, of our property, and of everything else.

Question. Why do you feel so?

Answer. From the spirit which we see existing there every day toward us as freedmen.

Question. On the part of whom?

Answer. On the part of the rebels. I have a great chance to find out these people. I have been with them before the war. They used to look upon me as one of the leading men there. I have suffered in this war; I was driven away from my place by Wise's raid; and so far as I, myself, am concerned, I do not feel safe; and if the military were removed from there I would not stay in Williamsburg one hour, although what little property I possess is there.

Question. In case of the removal of the military, what would you anticipate?

Answer. Nothing shorter than death; that has been promised to me by the rebels.

Question. Do they entertain a similar feeling toward all the freedmen there?

Answer. I believe, sir, that that is a general feeling, I ask them, sometimes, "Why is it? we have done you no harm." "Well," they say, "the Yankees freed you, and now let the Yankees take care of you: we want to have nothing to do with you." I say to them, "You have always been making laws to keep us here, and now you want to drive us away—for what?" They say, "We want to bring foreign immigration here, and drive every scoundrel of you away from here." I told them that I was born in Virginia, and that I am going to die in Virginia. "There is but one thing that will make me leave Virginia," I say, "and that is, for the government to withdraw the military and leave me in your hands; when it does that, I will go."

Question. Has your property been destroyed by the rebels?

Answer. I had not much, except my blacksmith's shop. I carried on a large business there. The rebels and the northern men destroyed everything I had; what the one did not take, the other did; they did not leave me even a hammer.

Question. Have you a family?

Answer. Yes, sir; a wife, but no children; I bought my wife.

Question. How much did you give for her?

Document Text

Answer. I gave four hundred and fifty dollars for my wife, and seven hundred dollars for my wife's sister. After I bought my wife, they would not let me set her free. I paid the money, and got the bill of sale.

Question. What hindered her being free?

Answer. It was the law, they said. She had to stand as my slave.

Question. How extensive is this feeling of danger on the part of colored people there?

Answer. I believe, sincerely, that it is the general feeling.

Question. Did you ever see a black rebel, or hear of one?

Answer. I must be honest about that. I believe that we have had some as big rebel black men as ever were white.

Question. Many?

Answer. No, sir; they are "few and far between;" but I believe that any man who, through this great trouble that we have had, would do anything to stop the progress of the Union army, was a rebel. When Wise made his raid into Williamsburg, I just had time to leave my house and make my escape. They broke up everything I had; they took their bayonets and tore my beds all to pieces. All they wanted was Aleck Dunlop; they wanted to hang him before his own door. One day, since the fall of Richmond, I met General Henry A. Wise at Norfolk. He spoke to me, and asked me how I was. I said, "I am doing a little better than could be expected." Said he, "Why?" Said I, "Them devils of yours did not catch me; I was too smart for them that morning." "Do you think," said he, "they would have hurt you?" "No," said I, "I don't think so, but I know it; they had orders to hang me."

Question. Did Wise admit it?

Answer. He did not say so; but he turned and went off. The day that Wise's men were there, my wife asked them what had I done that they wanted to hang me in preference to anybody else? They said it was because I was a Union man. I had worked for the rebels from the time the war broke out until General McClellan moved up; and then they concocted a scheme to get me to Richmond; but when I saw the wagon coming for me, I went off in the opposite, direction. When General Hooker and General Kearney came there, they sent for me, within three hours of their arrival, and asked me about the country, and what I knew. I gave them all the information I could; that, through a colored friend, got to the secessionists and embittered them against me. The next Union officer who came there was Colonel Campbell, of the 5th Pennsylvania cavalry; and I believe he was as great a rebel as Jeff. Davis. He was governor there for a long time. They captured him, and carried him to Richmond.

Question. The rebels never caught you?

Answer. They have never caught me yet.

Question. How do the black people down there feel about education?

Answer. They want it, and they have a desire to get it; but the rebels use every exertion to keep teachers from them. We have got two white teachers in Williamsburg, and have got to put them in a room over a colored family.

Question. Do the black people contribute liberally to the support of their own schools?

Answer. They are not able, sir. The rebels made many raids there, and destroyed everything they could get their hands on belonging to colored people—beds and clothing.

Washington, February 3, 1866.

Thomas Bain (colored) sworn and examined.

By Mr. Howard:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. Norfolk, Virginia.

Question. How old are you?

Answer. I think about forty.

Question. Have you ever been a slave?

Answer. Yes.

Question. When were you made free?

Answer. When emancipation came, I was in Massachusetts; I had got there on the underground railroad. I went back to Virginia after the proclamation, and sent my child away to Massachusetts; I have been down there ever since.

Question. Can you read and write?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Can you write a letter on business?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Can you read the Bible?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. And newspapers?

Answer. Yes, sir; I subscribe to newspapers.

Question. What is your business?

Answer. Dentist.

Question. Did you ever start to be a dentist?

Answer. Yes, sir; I was raised in the business.

Question. Where?

Answer. In Norfolk. I spent ten years at it in Norfolk, and ten years in Massachusetts.

Question. Have you a family?

Answer. My wife died some time after I was married; I have one child—a daughter.

Question. Are you here as a delegate from the colored people of Norfolk?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. To make representations to the President?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Have you had an interview with him?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. What is the feeling on the part of white rebels at Norfolk towards the colored people?

Answer. Their feelings are very hard—terrible. I have had a chance to travel around some, preaching.

Question. Do you preach?

Answer. Yes, sir; I am a volunteer missionary—a self-sustaining one. The church, under whose auspices I act, is not taxed for my services; neither are the people; I make my practice as I go along; just enough to support me; I can reach most of them in that way; I have a permanent office; and then I travel about the State and preach.

Question. To what denomination do you belong?

Answer. The Wesleyan Methodist.

Question. You preach to the colored people?

Answer. Yes; I have had occasion, of course, to visit a great many.

Question. How are the black people treated in Virginia by the whites since the close of hostilities?

Answer. The only hope the colored people have is in Uncle Sam's bayonets; without them, they would not feel any security; and what is true of the colored people in that respect, is also true of the Union men; the secessionists do not seem to discriminate between them; they do not seem to care whether a northern man is with us or not with us; if he is a Yankee, that is enough; they hardly wait to examine what his views are; it is not uncommon to hear such threats as this: "We will kill one negro, at least, for every rebel soldier killed by them."

Question. Did you, yourself, over hear such a threat as that made?

Answer. I have heard it at night, in the streets of Norfolk. (Witness related some incidents going to show how much afraid the colored people there are of ill treatment from the whites.) Last June there was a threat by a white citizen of Norfolk to get up a riot.

Question. Did he get one up?

Answer. Yes; they got one up.

Question. What did it result in?

Answer. It resulted in three colored men being shot. One white man got shot through the shoulder; had his arm amputated, and died. It was got up to attack the colored people, and clear all the negroes out of the city.

Question. Are the colored people whipped now as they used to be?

Answer. Not in my vicinity; I only hear reports of that.

Question. Have you heard of cases of whipping by white men?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. During the summer?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Many cases?

Answer. Yes, sir; and it is not so much that the colored people are afraid of the white people, as it is that they are a law-abiding people.

Question. Do they submit to be whipped?

Answer. They do, in places near where there are military men. They fool the colored people into believing that the military ordered them to be whipped; they do not want to resist the government.

Question. Are the black people down there fond of education?

Answer. I think that they are excelled by no people in an eagerness to learn.

Washington, February 3, 1866.

Edmund Parsons (colored) sworn and examined.

By Mr. Howard:

Question. How old are yon?

Answer. A little over fifty.

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. In Williamsburg, Virginia.

Question. Can you read and write?

Answer. I can read a little. I have been a regular house-servant, and I had a chance to turn my attention to it.

Question. Have you ever been a slave?

Answer. Yes, sir. I have been a slave from my childhood up to the time I was set free by the emancipation proclamation.

Question. How do the black people in your neighborhood feel toward the rebels?

Answer. I did think myself always secure with the whites; but it is very different now sir, very different.

Question. Do you stand in fear of them?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. What have you to be afraid off

Answer. When the Union forces came there first a good many officers became attached to me and my wife, and we felt perfectly secure; but now the rebels use the officers that are there "to pull the chestnuts out of the fire."

Document Text

Question. Have you heard threats of violence by white rebels against the blacks?

Answer. Yes.

Question. What do they threaten to do?

Answer. They threaten to do everything they can. My wife died about a year ago. I had a house, where I had been living for twenty years. A lawyer there went and got the provost marshal to send a guard and put me out of my house. They broke my things up, and pitched them out, and stole a part of them.

Question. The Union guard?

Answer. Yes, sir; it is a positive fact. They put me out of my own house. That was January, 1866.

Question. What was the pretext for putting you out?

Answer. My wife had been left free. She had a half-sister and a half-brother; and they pretended to be owners of the property where I had been living all my lifetime.

Question. Who was the provost marshal?

Answer. Reynolds.

Question. Do the returned rebels threaten to commit violence on the colored people there?

Answer. I can hear people complaining of that; but I have really been so mortified at the bad treatment I received, that I have not paid much attention.

Question. How do the colored people feel in regard to education?

Answer. They are very anxious to get education, and feel grateful for it.

Question. Are you a member of a church?

Answer. Yes, sir. I have been deacon of the Baptist church for years. It is pretty much my living.

Question. Are you willing to go away and leave old Virginia?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. Why not?

Answer. I would rather stay in Virginia.

Glossary

Colonel Campbell	Colonel Thomas Campbell, the provost marshal for Williamsburg, Virginia
Freedmen's Bureau	The Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, established in 1865 to aid newly emancipated African Americans
General Hooker	Joseph Hooker, a major general in the Union army
General Kearney	Philip Kearny, Jr., a brigadier general in the Union army
General McClellan	George McClellan, the commander of all Union forces early in the Civil War
Jeff. Davis	Jefferson Davis, the president of the Confederate States of America during the Civil War
President Tyler	John Tyler, the tenth U.S. president proclamation	the Emancipation Proclamation of 1863
slab-houses	houses sided with rough-hewn planks of lumber
"to pull the chestnuts out of the fire"	to rescue someone
Uncle Sam	a common nickname for the United States underground railroad	the informal system of routes, safe houses, and guides who led slaves to the North prior to the Civil War
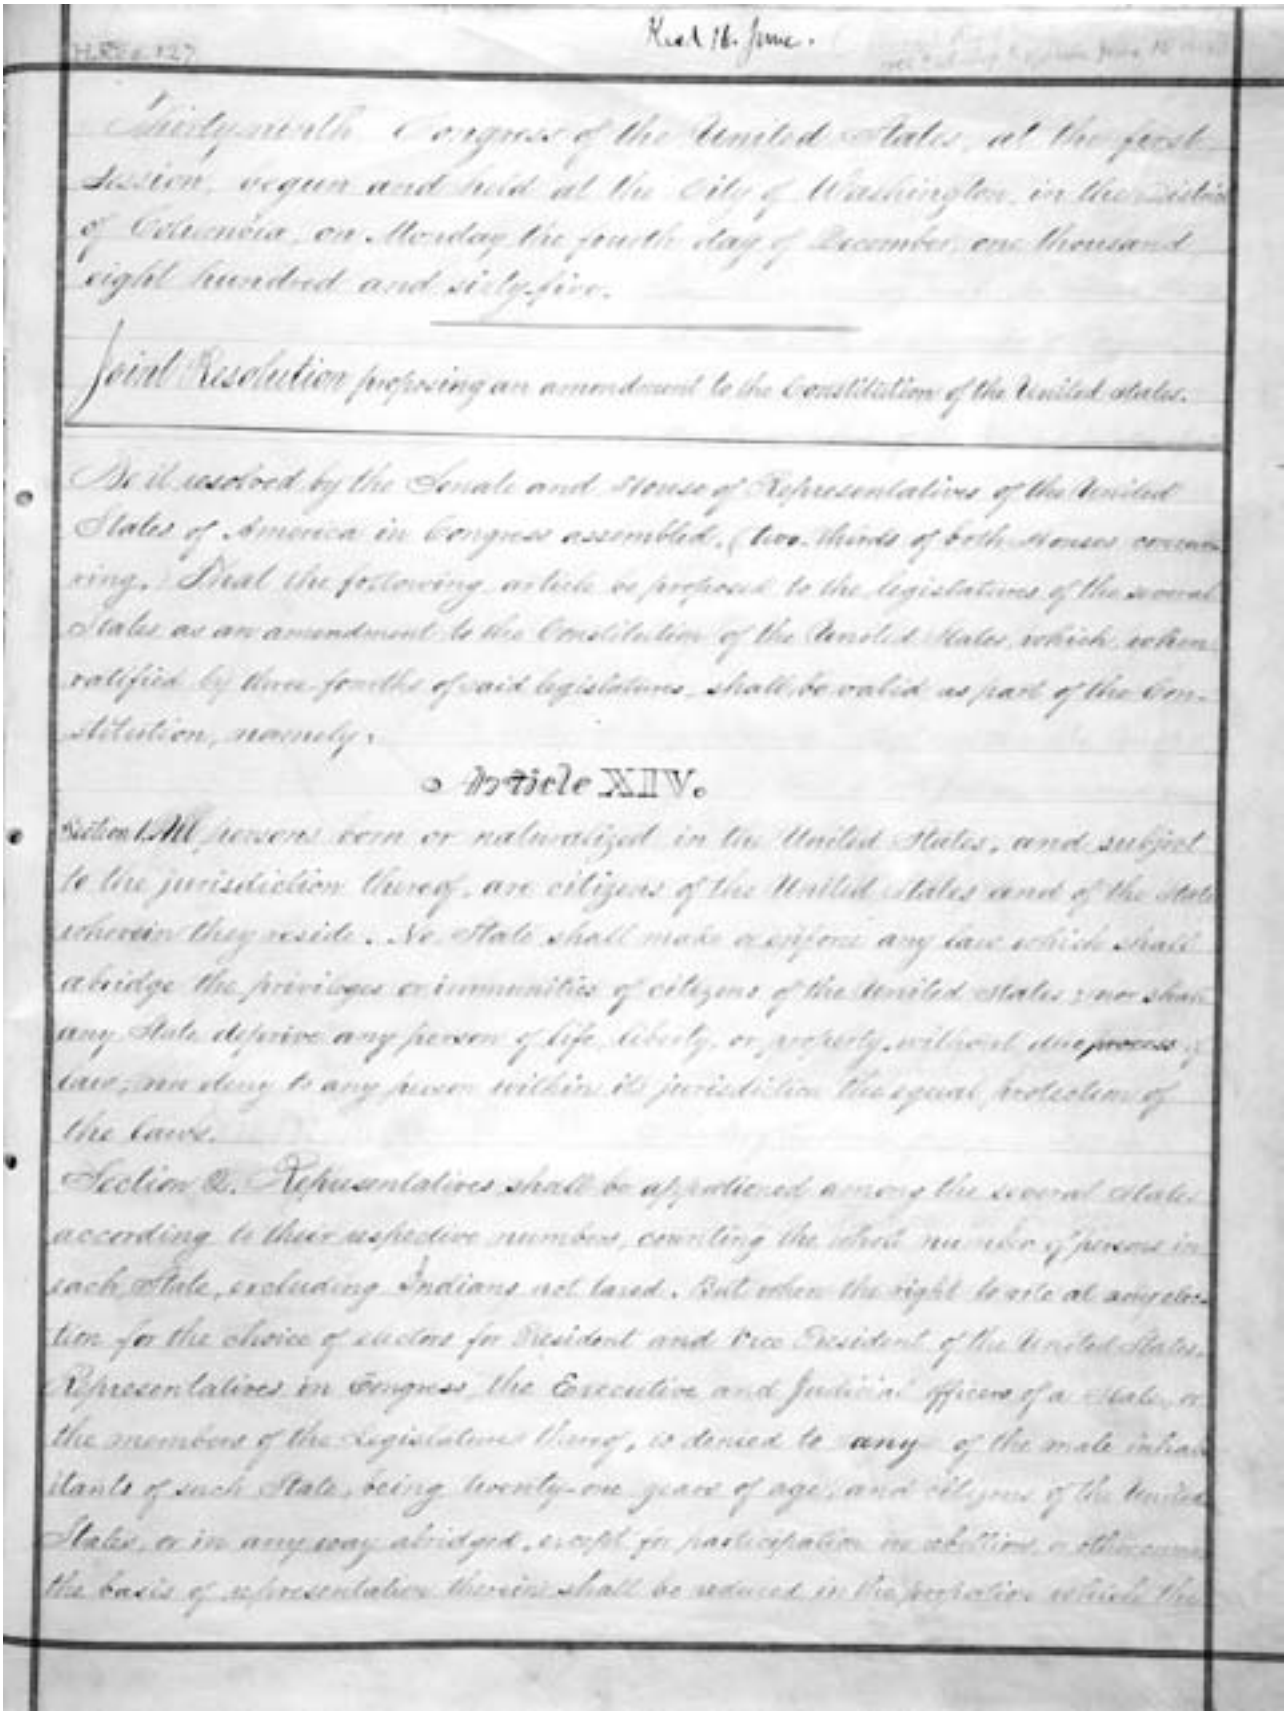
Wise's raid	a raid by the Confederate cavalry led by General Henry A. Wise on a Union command post in Williamsburg, Virginia, in 1862
Yankees	a common nickname for northerners



Rec'd 16 June.

H.R. No. 127

Thirty-ninth Congress of the United States, at the first Session, begun and held at the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia, on Monday the fourth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-five.

Joint Resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring,) That the following article be proposed to the legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said legislatures, shall be valid as part of the Constitution, namely:

Article XIV.

Section 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Section 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the Executive and Judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the

The Fourteenth Amendment (National Archives and Records Administration)

Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution

1868

"No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States."

Overview

Even before the Civil War ended, President Abraham Lincoln wrestled with Congress over how to reconstruct the Union. After Lincoln's assassination, President Andrew Johnson initiated a minimalist program that offended many northerners. The Thirty-ninth Congress, after failing to reach a compromise with Johnson, proposed a constitutional amendment to solve the most pressing issues.

The Fourteenth Amendment extended citizenship and rights to the freed slaves and excluded many prominent former Confederates from government. It revised the formula for congressional reapportionment and settled the status of wartime debts. The Fourteenth Amendment, approved by Congress in June 1866, was pronounced ratified by the states on July 28, 1868. Although today three of its five sections are nonfunctional, the first section of the amendment has been used, especially since the mid-1900s, to expand significantly the rights of African Americans and other groups in society. Accompanying these developments, the powers of the Supreme Court and federal government have increased at the expense of the states. Debate rages to the present day about the ultimate boundaries of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Context

In 1861 the Lincoln administration and Congress declared that the goal of the Civil War was to restore the Union and that slavery was not to be disturbed. By mid-1862 President Lincoln had changed his mind, to the delight of abolitionists and the grudging acceptance of many frustrated northerners. His Emancipation Proclamation and the subsequent Thirteenth Amendment ended the institution. Nevertheless, with the capitulation of the Confederacy in the spring of 1865, the government faced numerous unprecedented questions that the Constitution was unable to answer. Foremost among the uncertainties were, first, the requirements and procedures for readmitting the Confederate states into the Union and, second, the status of the freed slaves. The absence of the politically astute Abraham Lincoln complicated the resolution of these problems.

President Andrew Johnson certainly did not shy away from the task, but his stubbornness allowed for little consultation with Republican congressional leaders. The former Democrat from Tennessee demanded that southern states renounce their Confederate debts and ratify the Thirteenth Amendment. He had little interest in any other steps to assist the freed slaves and was content to leave their progress to state action. Johnson also used presidential pardons to restore some prominent Confederates to political life. He then permitted the obedient former Confederate states to elect state officials as well as representatives and senators to Congress.

The Republican-dominated Thirty-ninth Congress, which first met December 4, 1865, would have none of this. Individual southern states aggravated the situation by enacting so-called Black Codes, which significantly circumscribed the economic and social freedoms of former slaves. At this time political rights were not contemplated by many in the North or South. To counter the Black Codes, Congress passed the Freedmen's Bureau Bill and the Civil Rights Act in February 1866 to give the freed slaves educational and economic opportunities and to guarantee basic civil rights. Johnson vetoed both. Although Congress overrode both vetoes, Republican congressmen concluded that they needed to take a greater initiative to restore the Union and protect African Americans. A constitutional amendment (or series of amendments) seemed the most effective device to remedy the situation and to prevent future legislation from undermining their gains.

About the Author

The Fourteenth Amendment has many authors. It was legislation of the first session of the Thirty-ninth Congress following the recommendation of the Joint Committee on Reconstruction. In general, the Republican majority in Congress was responsible for its major features and success. The criticisms of the Democratic minority did little to reshape the amendment.

Time Line

1861

- April 12
  The Confederates bombard Fort Sumter, beginning the Civil War.

1862

- September 17
  The Battle of Antietam (Maryland) is a draw, but Robert E. Lee's Army of Northern Virginia is forced to retreat.
- September 22
  With the preliminary Emancipation Proclamation, Lincoln warns seceded states of the impending emancipation of slaves.

1863

- January 1
  Using his war powers to issue the Emancipation Proclamation, Lincoln frees the slaves in ten states.

1865

- April 9
  Lee surrenders at Appomattox Court House, Virginia.
- April 14
  Lincoln is shot at Ford's Theatre in Washington, D.C., and dies the next morning.
- December 18
  The Thirteenth Amendment is ratified, ending slavery in the United States.

1866

- March 27
  President Johnson vetoes the Civil Rights Act.
- April 6–9
  The Senate and House of Representatives override the veto of the Civil Rights Act.
- June 8–13
  The Senate and House of Representatives pass the final version of the Fourteenth Amendment.

1868

- July 28
  The Fourteenth Amendment is pronounced ratified.

John A. Bingham, a Republican representative from Ohio, is usually credited with the wording of the crucial first section of the Fourteenth Amendment. He was born in Mercer, Pennsylvania, on January 21, 1815. He attended Franklin College in Ohio and later studied law. Bingham was admitted to the bar in 1840 and served as district attorney for Tuscarawas County, Ohio, from 1846 to 1849. He was known for his antislavery sentiments and had advocated for the rights of free blacks. In 1854, following the political turmoil of the Kansas-Nebraska Act, Bingham was elected to Congress. Although Bingham was defeated in the 1862 congressional election, Lincoln employed his talents in the Bureau of Military Justice and then as solicitor in the U.S. Court of Claims. In the spring of 1865 he was a judge advocate in the commission that tried the Lincoln assassination conspirators. Bingham was returned to Congress, taking his seat in December 1865. In the Joint Committee on Reconstruction, Bingham played an active role, especially in composing draft after draft of what would become the Fourteenth Amendment. Ironically, he was one of the few Republicans who agreed with President Johnson that the Civil Rights Act of 1866 was unconstitutional. Bingham, however, felt that the true solution was a constitutional amendment legitimizing the federal government's protection of black rights. In 1868 Bingham was instrumental in the impeachment of President Johnson. He failed to be renominated in 1872. President Ulysses S. Grant appointed the former congressman to be minister to Japan in 1873, where he served for twelve years. Bingham died in Cadiz, Ohio, on March 19, 1900.

Thaddeus Stevens, a Republican representative from Pennsylvania, led a vigorous opposition to President Johnson's Reconstruction program. His motion created the Joint Committee on Reconstruction to investigate whether southern congressmen should be seated and to propose guidelines for the states' restoration. Stevens, who served as cochair of the Joint Committee, strove to secure maximum punishment of the former Confederates and maximum rights for the freedmen. Born in Danville, Vermont, on April 4, 1792, Thaddeus Stevens graduated from Dartmouth College in 1814 and moved to Pennsylvania that same year. He was admitted to the bar in 1816 and established a law practice in Gettysburg and later in Lancaster. He defended many fugitive slaves without taking a fee. Stevens served in the Pennsylvania legislature and the convention to revise the state constitution. He refused to sign the constitution because it restricted suffrage to white men. From 1849 to 1853 Stevens served in Congress as a Whig who opposed the extension of slavery. He returned to the House of Representatives in March 1859 as a Republican and represented Pennsylvania there until his death on August 11, 1868.

Stevens was the leader of the Radical Republicans in the House during and after the war. He was a vocal critic of Lincoln's moderation on slavery and Reconstruction. He felt that the former Confederate states were conquered territories and that Congress had primary responsibility to supervise such territories. Stevens pushed as hard as he could to secure black suffrage and to disfranchise all Confederates, whom he classified as traitors. Unlike some radicals, however, Stevens had a pragmatic streak. When leading the debate in favor of the passage of the Fourteenth Amendment, he responded to his fellow radicals that he was disappointed with the proposed amendment, but as to why he would "accept so imperfect a proposition? I answer, because I live among men and not among angels." Stevens continued to advocate black suffrage as a condition of readmission to the Union. Two years later he demanded the impeachment of President Johnson, but he was fatally ill at the time and left the matter in the hands of others, including Bingham.

The members of the Joint Committee on Reconstruction conducted the early debates on the Fourteenth Amendment. In January 1866 alone they received more than fifty proposals for constitutional amendments. From the House, in addition to Stevens and Bingham, were Elihu B. Washburne of Illinois, Roscoe Conkling of New York, George S. Boutwell of Massachusetts, Justin S. Morrill of Vermont, Henry T. Blow of Missouri, Henry Grider of Kentucky, and Andrew J. Rogers of New Jersey. The Senate appointed William Pitt Fessenden of Maine, James W. Grimes of Iowa, Jacob M. Howard of Michigan, Ira Harris of New York, George H. Williams of Oregon, and Reverdy Johnson of Maryland. Rogers, Grider, and Johnson were the only Democrats on the committee. Although he was often ill, Fessenden acted as a moderate counterbalance to Stevens's designs.

Time Line

1869
- March 4
Ulysses S. Grant is inaugurated as president.

1870
- July 15
Georgia is readmitted to the Union, becoming the final former Confederate state to be reconstructed.

1873
- April 14
With their decision in the Slaughter-House Cases, the Supreme Court significantly restricts the scope of the Fourteenth Amendment.

1883
- October 15
With their decision in the Civil Rights Cases, the Supreme Court limits enforcement of the Fourteenth Amendment by declaring the Civil Rights Act of 1875 unconstitutional.

1896
- May 18
With the Plessy v. Ferguson decision, the Supreme Court permits "separate but equal" facilities for African Americans.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

♦ Section 1

The least controversial part of Section 1 is the first sentence, which makes it clear that the former slaves are now citizens of the United States and citizens of the states in which they live. National citizenship is thus defined for the first time. This pointedly overturns the Dred Scott decision of 1857. In that Supreme Court case, Chief Justice Roger Taney denied Dred Scott, a slave, his freedom in part on the ground that a black might be a citizen of a state but not of the United States. Therefore, Scott had no right to sue in a federal court. In 1866, however, Republicans wanted to prevent former slaves from slipping into a half-free position by explicitly granting them citizenship and at least the promise of federal protection.

The lengthy second sentence contains three distinctive clauses; the meaning of each remains controversial today. Each prohibits certain state actions. First, the Fourteenth Amendment guarantees to every citizen privileges and immunities; second, all "persons" are protected from a loss of life, liberty, and property without "due process"; and, third, all are to enjoy the "equal protection of the laws." At a minimum, congressmen were determined to stop the southern states from enacting Black Codes that recreated a form of near-slavery. Many, including John Bingham, specifically declared that their intention was to constitutionalize the Civil Rights Act of 1866. Former abolitionists had long wanted to extend to African Americans the natural rights that are celebrated in the Declaration of Independence. The vagueness of Section 1 emerges from the "the difficulties inherent in any attempt to incorporate a natural law concept into a constitution or public law, especially in a federal system," as Harold Hyman and William M. Wiecek put it. "No legal authorities supplied neat definitions of civil rights; none does today, or can."

John Bingham, the principal author of Section 1, took the terms "privileges and immunities" from Article IV, Section 2, of the U.S. Constitution. He and Senator Jacob Howard argued that the phrase embraced not only the rights that the states created for their citizens but also the Bill of Rights. Many scholars today agree with Bingham that the federal government has the power to enforce the Bill of Rights in the states. This represented a huge expansion of federal power in the 1860s. Some of Bingham's colleagues and later scholars disputed this broad interpretation. They observed that privileges and immunities preceded the Bill of Rights and the wording simply meant that citizens visiting from another state would enjoy the same rights as the citizens of that state. These rights might include freedom of movement, property rights, and freedom to make contracts. In essence, the privileges and immunities clause guarantees equality within a state. In the Slaughter-House Cases (1873) the Supreme Court declined to apply the privileges or immunities clause to a Louisiana state law. While most constitutional scholars see this as a poor decision, it would have the real effect of negating whatever meaning the phrase had.

John A. Bingham (Library of Congress)

Section 1 guarantees every person "due process of law." Bingham took this phrase from the Fifth Amendment, which says that the federal government cannot deny due process. The Fourteenth Amendment dictates that a state may not do so either. The accepted interpretation of due process is simply that the legal rules, proceedings, and customs of a state are available to all persons in that state, again with an emphasis on equality for all. Later in the nineteenth century, the Supreme Court would expand the meaning of due process by examining how laws and regulations affected the life, liberty, or property of persons.

Finally, Section 1 restricts states from denying "to any person … the equal protection of the laws." In the 1860s this was another assertion of equal justice and that states could not discriminate against groups of individuals by selectively enforcing laws. As such, it is a subset of rights contained in the privileges and immunities clause. For decades the clause had little impact, to the point where Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes ridiculed it as "the last refuge of a lawyer with no other arguments to make." Again, in time, the meaning of the equal protection clause would change. Because of the confusion over the meaning of "privileges or immunities," the interpretation of what constitutes "equal laws" resulted in a vast expansion of rights and government-enforced toleration of minority groups in society.

♦ Section 2

The Thirteenth Amendment ended slavery, but it remained unclear how to apportion members of Congress in the absence of the three-fifths clause (Article I, Section 2, of the Constitution). On one level the Fourteenth Amendment's answer is not surprising; apportionment is based on the total number of people, excluding Native Americans on reservations and tribal areas. According to Section 2, if a state discriminates against any group of adult males by preventing them from voting for federal or state offices, the state would be punished by losing representation. The total number of people would be reduced in proportion to the group of voters that is excluded. In other words, a state could not benefit with a full representation in Congress if they refused to let some of their male citizens vote.

This section represents a complicated compromise. Radical Republicans like Thaddeus Stevens and Charles Sumner of Massachusetts demanded black suffrage. While most northerners wanted protection for African Americans in the South, they generally were not prepared to give them the right to vote in either the South or the North. On the other hand, if blacks were to be counted as full persons, not three-fifths persons, the southern states would gain approximately ten to twelve representatives. It seemed ironic that because of four years of bloodletting, white southerners would increase their presence in Congress without recognizing the needs and rights of the freedmen. At that time, northern states had small black populations, so excluding them made no difference in their congressional delegations. Senator James Grimes proposed the solution to forgo black suffrage but to prevent the increase of the southern delegation in the House of Representatives. If a former slave state wanted to grant its black male citizens the vote, then the apportionment would change. The Fifteenth Amendment granting suffrage to African Americans would make this section largely moot.

Despite the protests of Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony, and other leaders of the women's rights movement, the word male is used here for the first time in the Constitution. There would be no penalty for denying women the right to vote.

♦ Section 3

The Fourteenth Amendment prevented some Confederates from serving in federal and state offices. This section was also a product of compromise. Radicals wanted to disfranchise anyone who had aided the Confederacy, but this move was seen as too draconian, if not impractical. If blacks were denied political rights, the former Confederate states would be in turmoil for decades. Instead, Congress came up with a much milder punishment. If one had held state or federal office before the Civil War but then renounced loyalty to the United States, that person was to be forbidden to hold federal or state office, with two exceptions. First, anyone who received a presidential pardon before the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment could hold office. Second, the amendment allowed Congress to pardon, in effect, an individual by a two-thirds vote in each house.

In this 1866 engraving, Andrew Johnson holds a leaking kettle labeled "The Reconstructed South" toward a woman representing liberty and carrying a baby who represents the newly approved Fourteenth Amendment. (Library of Congress)

Northerners were upset by two patterns in the months following the end of the war. First, President Johnson was increasingly lenient to wealthy former slaveholders who came to plead for mercy or who sent their spouses to do so. Second, as Johnson's approved state governments came into operation, former Confederate military officers and political leaders were filling positions in state government and being sent to Washington, D.C., to assume seats in Congress. The South's leaders were not showing sufficient sorrow for the death and destruction they had caused.

A substantial amount of the debate recorded in the Congressional Globe surrounds this section and its earlier drafts. Some like Stevens wanted severe penalties for all Confederates. Others wanted disfranchisement until 1870 or 1876. The compromise was to deny political power

Essential Quotes

"No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

(Section 1)

"Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed."

(Section 2)

"No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice-President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same."

(Section 3)

to as many established southern leaders as possible with the hope that new white leaders would emerge with more conciliatory views. As crucial as Section 1 was for the future, Stevens concluded one of his last speeches about the Fourteenth Amendment by exclaiming, "Give us the third section or give us nothing."

♦ Section 4

The Fourteenth Amendment makes it clear that all the debts the United States incurred in prosecuting the war, including soldiers' bounties for enlisting and their pensions, war bonds, greenback currency, and other debts, were legitimate. All Confederate debts, including their paper money and bonds, were worthless. Furthermore, slave owners would not be reimbursed for the loss of their slaves. This section is largely obvious to all. Some Radical Republicans tried to scare the northern public into thinking that if President Johnson had his way and if the Democratic Party gained control of Congress, northern creditors would not be paid in full but Confederates would be paid in full. This was nonsense, or perhaps it was just a ploy to get votes. This section, however, reassured the Union's backers—both foreign and domestic. British shipbuilders who had financed and supplied Confederate blockade-runners, on the other hand, were out of luck. Finally, there was some concern that the Emancipation Proclamation and the Thirteenth Amendment conflicted with the Fifth Amendment, since no one, not even slaveholders, could have their property taken from them without due process of law. Section 4 resolves the issue by explicitly stating that slaveholders would not be compensated for freed slaves.

♦ Section 5

The single sentence of Section 5 repeats Section 2 of the Thirteenth Amendment almost verbatim. Congress would have the authority to defend the rights outlined in Section 1. When Congress passed the Freedmen's Bureau Bill and the Civil Rights Act of 1866, many Republicans felt they had the authority under this provision of the Thirteenth Amendment. President Johnson disagreed, and Republicans feared that the Supreme Court might back the president's interpretation. By reemphasizing Congress's authority in the Fourteenth Amendment, Republicans thought that the problem could be avoided. The Ku Klux Klan Act of 1871 (also called the Civil Rights Act of 1871) and the Civil Rights Act of 1875 are just two manifestations of that belief.

Audience

As an addition to the Constitution this legislation was addressed to the entire nation. Each supporter of the amendment in Congress had his own opinion as to how the balance of federal and state powers was changed to the advantage of the former. All agreed that the rights of all citizens were being expanded.

More specifically, the Fourteenth Amendment was a message to four distinct audiences who had very different interests. First, the amendment told President Johnson that Congress was taking charge of Reconstruction policy. If the southerners (with Johnson's silent consent) were not going to protect the lives and rights of African Americans, Congress would do so. Section 3 struck at Johnson's liberal pardoning policies. President Johnson, of course, would not accept this message and took on the Republicans as they campaigned for Congress in the fall of 1866.

Second, the Fourteenth Amendment was addressed to the former Confederate states. Southern whites were being told to heed Congress if they wished to reenter the Union. They would need a new political leadership, and their Black Codes were unacceptable. Originally, there was a provision that would have admitted a state's delegation to Congress upon its ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment. That measure was tabled. Here the Radical Republicans had their way. Tennessee quickly ratified the amendment and was readmitted, but this move clearly did not set a precedent. It was presumed by many, however, that ratification would substantially advance the states toward readmission. Section 2 also prodded the southern states to adopt black suffrage. Unfortunately, President Johnson encouraged southerners to reject the amendment. With no clear promise of readmission and the drastic consequences of the amendment, white southerners balked.

Third, the message sent to northern voters was that Republicans in Congress, not the president, had their interests at heart. Although it is difficult to measure public opinion, it is safe to say that northerners wanted the South to pay and to express sorrow for what they had done. They also wanted some degree of protection for southern blacks. Johnson and white southerners had utterly disappointed them. Republicans gave the northern electorate hope. By avoiding black suffrage directly, punishing Confederate leaders, and guaranteeing the payment of debts, the Fourteenth Amendment was a rallying issue for Republicans in the 1866 and succeeding elections.

Fourth, for oppressed southern blacks, struggling to make their way amid a hostile and humiliated white population, the Fourteenth Amendment held much promise. Should they ever get the right to vote, the party of Lincoln would be their destination. In the meantime, southern blacks relied upon Congress for protection. The Joint Committee on Reconstruction published a report too late to be used by Congress, but it documented the plight of the freedmen and, of course, appealed to the northern public to aid them.

Impact

Politically the Fourteenth Amendment struck a positive chord with the northern electorate. Not surprisingly, President Johnson misjudged public sentiment. The congressional elections of 1866 produced decisive Republican majorities in both the Senate and the House. The North trusted Congress with the responsibility of Reconstruction, which President Johnson might resist at his own peril.

The Fourteenth Amendment required the ratification of twenty-eight of the thirty-seven states. Connecticut was the first to ratify (June 25, 1866), followed quickly by New Hampshire (July 6) and Tennessee (July 19). Ratification became complicated when, in early 1868, New Jersey and Ohio tried to rescind their approvals. By July 28, 1868, Secretary of State William Seward certified that twenty-eight states had ratified the Fourteenth Amendment, allowing it to go into operation.

The Fourteenth Amendment, and particularly Section 1, has had a complicated history. Supreme Court justices and constitutional scholars have read the intentions of its authors in different ways. The legal scholar Alexander Bickel concludes that Section 1 fulfilled the moderate Republicans' objective of striking down the Black Codes but speculates that perhaps there was a compromise to create language that "was sufficiently elastic to permit reasonable future advances." Thus, the debate about how far to stretch the Fourteenth Amendment continues to rage.

In the Slaughter-House Cases (1873), the Supreme Court pulled away from an expansive application of Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment. The state of Louisiana had the right to create "reasonable" laws, and "reasonable" was defined as applying equally to all. The federal government had no responsibility to supervise the states and should concern itself with fundamental rights. The Court's majority refused to explore the meaning of "privileges or immunities." In the Civil Rights Cases (1883), the Supreme Court struck down the Civil Rights Act of 1875, which prevented discrimination in public accommodations and by private individuals. The Court claimed that the Fourteenth Amendment dealt only with discrimination by state governments. Sadly, the Court's majority in Plessy v. Ferguson (1896) reached the conclusion that "separate but equal" facilities were constitutional.

The concept of due process evolved in important ways. In several cases the Supreme Court examined the substance of state laws to determine whether individuals' liberty and property were unfairly impinged on. In Munn v. Illinois (1876) the Court declared that the State of Illinois could serve the public good by imposing maximum rates charged by grain-storage operators, even though those operators might lose profits. In Santa Clara County v. Southern Pacific Railroad Company (1886) the Court broadened the definition of person to include corporations, who then sought relief from state regulations as an infringement of their property under due process. The Supreme Court began to inspect the details of laws, not just the procedures. This is termed "substantive due process." Such an approach led to the striking down of state regulation of businesses, including laws setting maximum work hours or improving working conditions. Lochner v. New York (1905) is often cited as the classic statement of the doctrine. Amid the massive distress caused by the Great Depression, applying substantive due process to economic regulation was discredited. What is significant is that substantive due process shifted to the "equal protection of the laws" portion of the Fourteenth Amendment.

In the late 1930s Justice Hugo Black suggested that the equal protection clause meant that the federal government had the responsibility to impose the Bill of Rights on the states. The so-called doctrine of incorporation, whereby the Fourteenth Amendment incorporates the liberties in the Bill of Rights and allows the courts to apply them to state laws, is quite controversial. Cases involving gay rights and affirmative action rely on Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Supreme Court in Griswold v. Connecticut (1965) said the Bill of Rights and the Fourteenth Amendment created a zone of privacy for individuals against government intrusion. As such, in Roe v. Wade (1973) the Supreme Court ruled that state laws forbidding abortion represented a violation of a woman's right to privacy and were unconstitutional.

In today's society Section 1 has made it clear that the ways in which states treat their own citizens is a question of federal law. The responsibility of interpreting the Fourteenth Amendment has fallen into the hands of the federal judiciary and has significantly shifted the balance of power in our federal system. The debate over what rights the Fourteenth Amendment protects and the extent of substantive due process to investigate state laws will continue well into the future.

The fates of the other sections of the Fourteenth Amendment were relatively anticlimactic. The Fifteenth Amendment, which allows black suffrage, largely supplanted Section 2. Furthermore, despite decades of regulations in southern states inhibiting black voting, Section 2 was never invoked. No attempt was made to diminish southern congressional delegations. By the late 1890s those former Confederates who were adversely affected by Section 3 were either dead or had been pardoned by Congress. In a symbolic vote in 1978 Congress removed the political disability of Jefferson Davis and Robert E. Lee. With regard to Section 4 the status of the debts of the Union and Confederacy was never in doubt.

See also Emancipation Proclamation (1863); Black Code of Mississippi (1865); Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1865); Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1870); Plessy v. Ferguson (1896).

Questions for Further Study

1. How does the Fourteenth Amendment respond to the concerns of President Johnson in his veto of the Civil Rights Act of 1866? To what extent are the goals of the Civil Rights Act contained in the Fourteenth Amendment?

2. Does the Fourteenth Amendment undermine the federal system set up by the Constitution by subverting the rights of the states? Does it delegate too much power to the central government? Has this readjustment of powers been taken too far in our current society?

3. Does the Fourteenth Amendment undermine democracy by overemphasizing equality at the expense of majority rule and the predominant values of American society?

4. Constitutional scholars and Supreme Court justices debate whether the Fourteenth Amendment incorporates the Bill of Rights. To what degree does the Bill of Rights conflict with or complement the intention of Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment?

Further Reading

■ Articles

Aynes, Richard L. "On Misreading John Bingham and the Fourteenth Amendment." Yale Law Journal 103, no. 1 (October 1993): 57–104.

Bickel, Alexander M. "The Original Understanding and the Segregation Decision." Harvard Law Review 69, no. 1 (November 1955): 1–65.

Harrison, John. "Reconstructing the Privileges or Immunities Clause." Yale Law Journal 101, no. 7 (May 1992): 1385–1474.

West, Robin. "Toward an Abolitionist Interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment." West Virginia Law Review 94 (Fall 1991): 111–155.

■ Books

Benedict, Michael L. The Blessings of Liberty: A Concise History of the Constitution of the United States. 2nd ed. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 2006.

Foner, Eric. Reconstruction: America's Unfinished Revolution, 1863–1877. New York: Harper and Row, 1988.

Hyman, Harold, and William M. Wiecek. Equal Justice under Law: Constitutional Development, 1835–1875. New York: Harper and Row, 1982.

James, Joseph B. The Framing of the Fourteenth Amendment. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1956.

———. The Ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment. Macon, Ga.: Mercer University Press, 1984.

Kendrick, Benjamin B. The Journal of the Joint Committee of Fifteen on Reconstruction, 39th Congress, 1865–1867. Vol. 67. New York: Columbia University Studies in History, 1914.

Nelson, William. The Fourteenth Amendment: From Political Principle to Judicial Doctrine. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1988.

Perry, Michael J. We the People: The Fourteenth Amendment and the Supreme Court. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.

TenBroek, Jacobus. The Antislavery Origins of the Fourteenth Amendment. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1951.

Urofsky, Melvin I. A March of Liberty: A Constitutional History of the United States. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1988.

■ Web Sites

"14th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution." Library of Congress "Primary Documents in American History" Web site. http://www.loc.gov/rr/program/bib/ourdocs/14thamendment.html.

—M. Philip Lucas

Document Text

Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution

♦ Section 1.

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

♦ Section 2.

Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the Executive and Judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

♦ Section 3.

No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice-President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.

♦ Section 4.

The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations and claims shall be held illegal and void.

♦ Section 5.

The Congress shall have the power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

Glossary

abridge	lessen or curtail bounties	recruitment money for those volunteering for the army due process of law	regular legal proceedings and customs immunities	exemptions
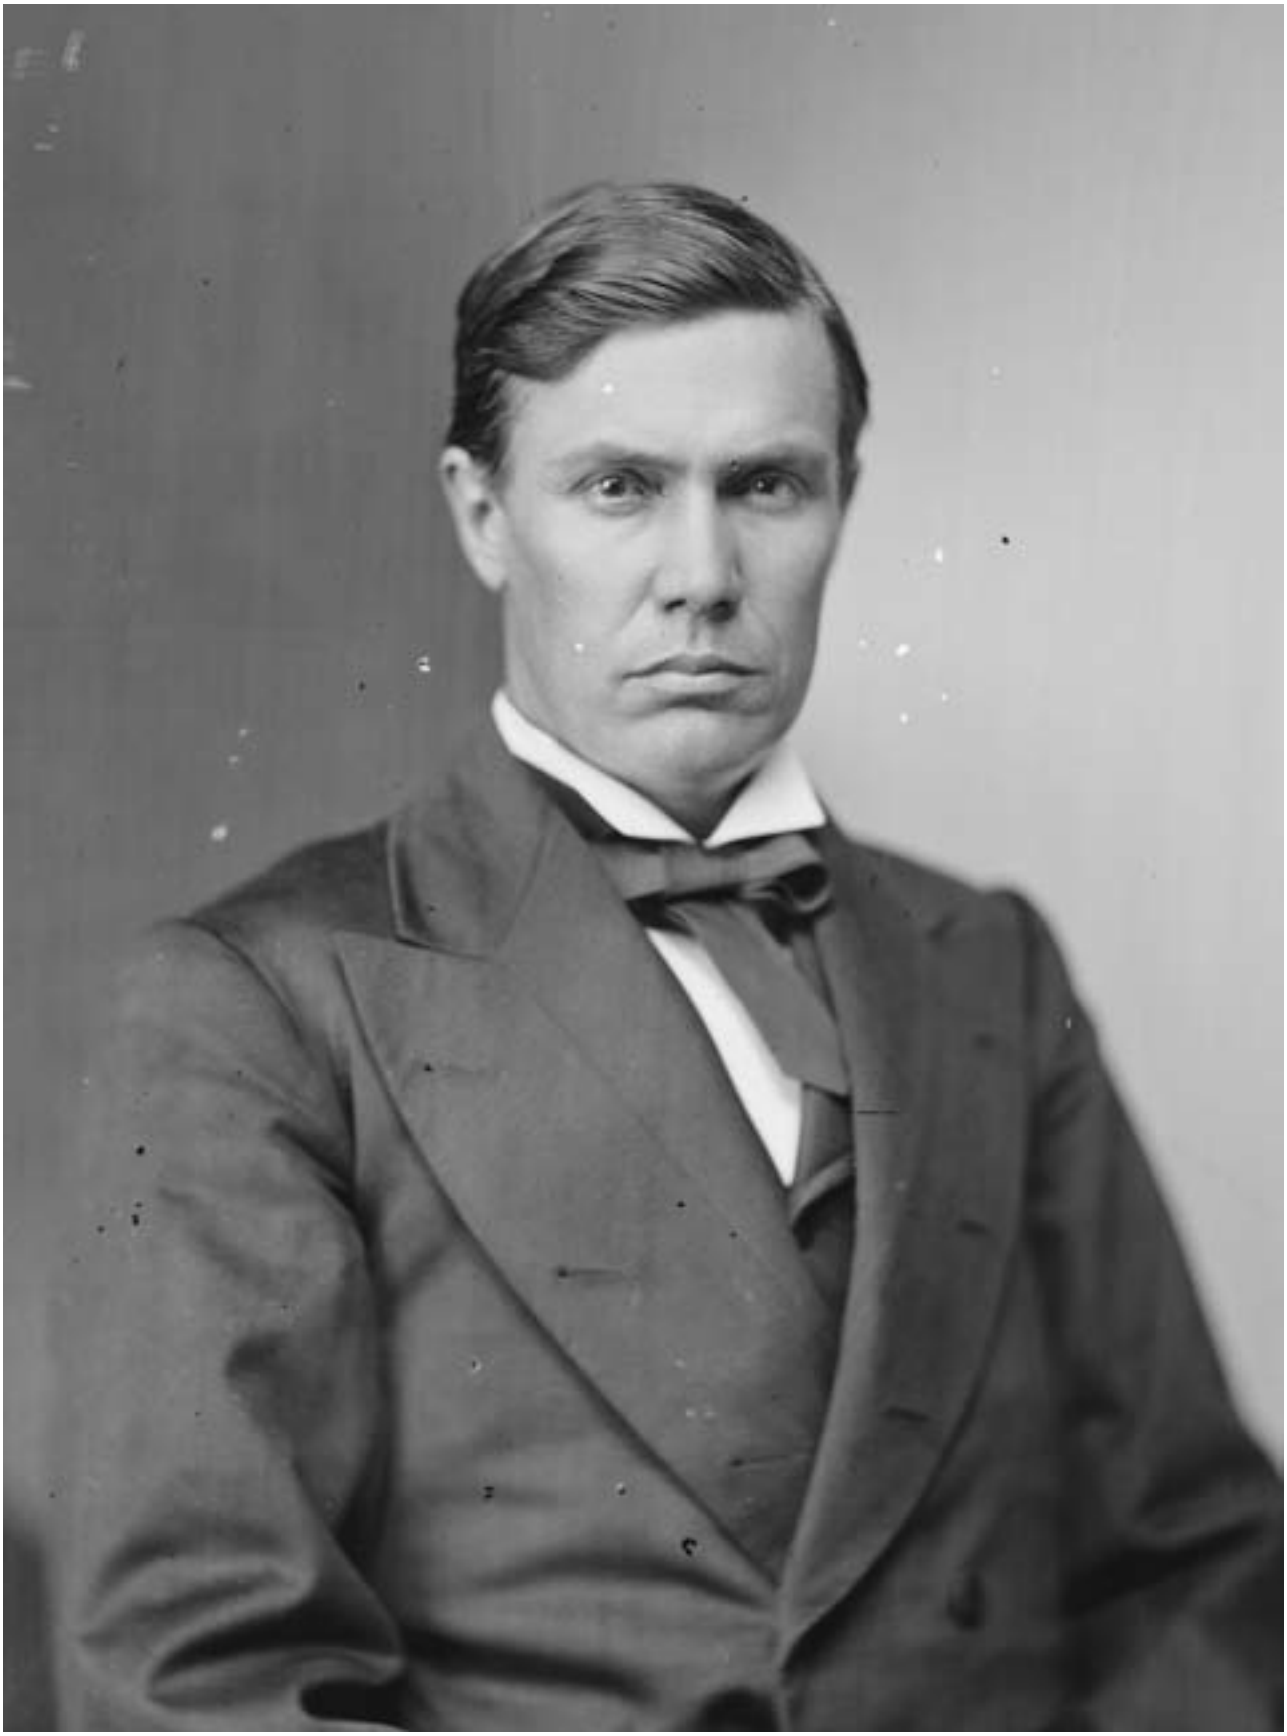
jurisdiction	authority of a government power



Milton A. Candler (Library of Congress)

Henry McNeal Turner's Speech on His Expulsion from the Georgia Legislature

1868

"Am I not a man because I happen to be of a darker hue than honorable gentlemen around me?"

Overview

Henry McNeal Turner's speech to the Georgia legislature in September 1868 was a direct response to the expulsion by that body of twenty-seven African American state legislators. In the first elections initiated by Radical Reconstruction in July 1867, three African Americans were elected to the Georgia Senate and twenty-nine to the Georgia House of Representatives. These black legislators represented a Republican Party that hoped to rise to power in the Reconstruction South by creating a coalition among the newly enfranchised freedmen, sympathetic native southern whites, and northern whites who had come to the South seeking economic prosperity and political opportunities. As in most southern states, Georgia Republicans were riven by factional disputes. Democrats, hoping to take advantage of Republican factionalism, sought means to regain political power for conservative whites.

Years earlier, former governor Joseph E. Brown had suggested the expulsion of the recently elected black legislators on the ground of constitutional ineligibility. On August 6, 1868, a resolution from the House minority committee declared a mulatto representative ineligible. Soon after that, the Democratic state senator Milton A. Candler presented a motion to investigate the eligibility of African Americans to sit in the legislature. White Republicans in the Georgia legislature faced public pressure to attack the evils of "Negro government." By early September, enough Republicans joined with Georgia Democrats to pass resolutions removing African Americans from the legislature. The Senate voted twenty-four to eleven for these resolutions, specifically expelling the blacks Tunis G. Campbell and George Wallace as "ineligible to seats, on the ground that they are persons of color, and not eligible to office by the Constitution and laws of Georgia, nor by the Constitution and laws of the United States." White conservative strength was stronger in the state House of Representatives, where the final vote, cast on September 2, 1868, was eighty-three to twenty-three. In all, close to thirty Republicans in the Georgia legislature supported the measure either by voting for it or by abstaining.

The Republican governor Rufus Bullock defended the expelled blacks, claiming that "the framers of the Constitution made no distinction between electors or citizens on account of race or color, and neither can you." Bullock aimed his protest at the nation's capital, where, with support from black leaders in Georgia, Congress passed the Congressional Reorganization Act of 1869, reconvening the Georgia legislature of 1868 and reseating those black members who had been expelled.

The speech of Henry M. Turner was rooted in an experiment in biracial democracy that underlay Radical Reconstruction. It thus speaks to several important issues in African American political history and in the history of Reconstruction. It sheds illuminating light on the nature of black political leadership, the dynamics of Reconstruction politics in the South, and the ideology of African American leaders during Reconstruction.

Context

During the American Civil War and in its immediate aftermath in 1865, the president took responsibility for reconstructing the Union. In a number of moves made in 1863 and 1864, then President Abraham Lincoln had signaled a moderate approach to reuniting the nation. Lincoln placed his faith in former white Unionist leadership, though he did signal his willingness to see limited suffrage for some blacks. He also registered his opposition to the more radical extremes of Reconstruction by his veto of the Wade-Davis bill (1864), which would have required a prohibition on slavery and made former Confederate states' readmittance to the Union contingent on a majority vote of the so-called Ironclad Oath, which repudiated prior support for the Confederacy. After the Confederate surrender at Appomattox and Lincoln's assassination on April 14, 1865, President Andrew Johnson announced his own plan of Reconstruction. He promised amnesty to those who pledged allegiance to the United States and accepted emancipation, and he announced provisional governors for each of the former Confederate states and required them to ratify the Thirteenth Amendment abolishing slavery, nullify their secession ordinance, and repudiate the Confederate

Time Line

1865

- June
  Presidential Reconstruction begins in Georgia when President Andrew Johnson names James Johnston provisional governor.

1867

- March 7
  Congress passes the first of four Reconstruction Acts, beginning the process of Radical, or Congressional, Reconstruction in Georgia and nine other southern states.
- May
  Georgia blacks organize into Republican Party.
- October
  Georgia votes to hold a constitutional convention.
- December–March
  The Georgia constitutional convention meets in Atlanta.

1868

- June
  Georgia fulfills the requirements of Congressional Reconstruction and is restored to the Union.
- September 3
  Turner is one of the delegates to be expelled from the Georgia legislature, prompting his speech.
- October
  Turner calls for a convention of black leaders in Macon.
- December
  President Grant and Congress reimplement military rule in Georgia.

1870

- December
  The Democrats defeat Republicans in state elections.

1871

- February
  Georgia is finally readmitted to the Union.
- October
  Republican governor Rufus Bullock resigns and leaves the state to avoid certain impeachment. A conservative government is reestablished in Georgia.

debt. Yet during the summer and fall of 1865, southerners exhibited a defiance that disturbed many northerners. They reelected former Confederates to office and passed a series of "Black Codes" that severely compromised the freedom and civil rights of former slaves. In December 1865, Congress refused to recognize these Johnsonian governments, moving Reconstruction into a new phase. The northern senators and representatives were dissatisfied with the readmission process that led to the election of these new southern members of Congress. In not seating them, they also served notice that Congress would make its own terms for Reconstruction.

The framing of Reconstruction policy now lay in the hands of Congress. Led by a Radical faction driven by antislavery idealism and by a commitment to black freedom and civil equality, Congressional Republicans passed a more stringent program of Reconstruction. They first moved to protect the rights of freedmen by extending the life of the Freedmen's Bureau. They also put through the Civil Rights Act of 1866, which asserted the power of the federal government to protect black rights by intervening in state affairs. In June 1866, Congress passed the Fourteenth Amendment (adopted July 9, 1868) that set the basis for citizenship. Still, ten former Confederate states refused to ratify the amendment. In response, Congress passed the first of four Reconstruction Acts on March 7, 1867, which divided ten southern states into five military districts and declared the existing state governments illegitimate and subject to military commanders. Georgia was part of the Third Military District commanded by Major General John Pope. The Reconstruction Acts called for a new registration of voters to elect delegates to constitutional conventions. They also allowed for freedmen to vote while proscribing certain groups of whites. Thus began the period of Congressional, or Radical, Reconstruction in the South.

The process of registration and elections spurred the creation of a Republican Party in the former Confederacy. In all southern states, the Republicans were an alliance of northern whites, native southern white supporters, and African Americans. While blacks constituted a majority of Republican voters in the southern states, they were only a majority of the population in two states, South Carolina and Mississippi. Although the extent of black domination of Reconstruction governments was exaggerated by those whites who opposed them, blacks did serve in the U.S. Congress, state executive and legislative positions, and local offices.

During 1865 and 1866, Freedmen Bureau agents helped initiate the rise of the Republican Party. They made speeches, encouraged organization, and supported the development of a partisan press. Henry M. Turner was a former army chaplain assigned to the bureau in Georgia. The bureau also supplied one of the key players in Georgia Reconstruction politics: John Emory Bryant, a former Union army officer from Maine, founded the Republican newspaper Loyal Georgian in Augusta, Georgia, and later served at the constitutional convention of 1867. Clergymen and missionaries from the Northern Methodist Church also assisted in the birth of the Republican Party. In January 1866 a new organization, the Georgia Equal Rights Association, took the lead in spearheading efforts to mobilize support for Reconstruction. They received help from Union Leagues, pro-Union secret societies formed after the Civil War. The leagues were first popular in the Unionist strongholds in northern Georgia but did little to attract the interest of freedmen. In 1867, General Pope divided Georgia into registration districts to register voters to vote on a constitutional convention. Registration included 102,411 whites and 98,507 blacks. The Republican Party in Georgia was ready for the elections. By March they had a state executive committee and a party chairman.

As in other southern states in 1867, Republican freedmen and their southern and northern white allies were victorious in the elections calling for a constitutional convention. In Georgia, Republicans took advantage of Democratic disorganization and lethargy. Frustrated and discouraged white conservatives sat out the election; only 36,500 whites voted, of the more than 100,000 who had registered. The voters of Georgia approved a convention 102,282 to 4,127. The Georgia constitutional convention began on December 9, 1867. More than 80 percent of the delegates were white, a figure unusually high among southern states. The Radical Republicans, led by Bullock and Bryant, pushed for black suffrage and the disfranchisement of former Confederates. Other Republicans sought the support of white yeoman farmers by pressing the issue of debt relief. The Republican convention guaranteed basic civil and political rights to African Americans. Southern Republicans also created state-funded public school systems, asylums, and penitentiaries and promoted economic prosperity by funding railroad construction.

The constitutional conventions of 1867–1868 created new Republican governments that followed the agenda set forth by the conventions. Over the course of the next decade, however, Republican regimes in each state would succumb to both internal and external forces. Three major factors were responsible for the end of Radical Reconstruction. First, antiblack and anti-Republican violence seriously crippled Reconstruction efforts. Republican officeholders were attacked and often murdered. Second, internecine conflicts within the Republican coalition hampered their ability to rule effectively. In Georgia, the Macon newspaper editor and federal commissioner J. Clarke Swayze became a bitter opponent of fellow Republican Turner. It proved difficult to unite former Whigs and former Democrats. Within the black community, urban elites differed with rural freedmen over prioritizing civil rights or economic issues. Third, Reconstruction in the South was doomed by a growing lack of support among northern Republicans. The administration of President Ulysses S. Grant was crippled by scandals like Crédit Mobilier and the Whiskey Ring. (The former scandal led to the demise of Grant's first vice president; the latter involved Treasury Department agents, who received bribes from whiskey distillers in exchange for assisting distillers in tax evasion.) Economically, the Panic of 1873 led to the creation of a number of dissident parties, like Labor Reform and Greenbackers, that allied with Democrats to defeat incumbent Republicans. Among the northern population, the panic also led to growing concern with domestic financial issues.

Rufus Bullock (Library of Congress)

In several ways, Reconstruction in Georgia followed this regional pattern. Like other states, internal dissensions within Republican ranks led to their defeat. Particularly challenging was the attempt to appeal to both the freedmen and the former Democrats of north Georgia. Georgia Republicans also had to contend with politically motivated terrorism. In March 1868 the Republican legislator George A. Ashburn was assassinated while visiting Columbus after receiving a warning from the Ku Klux Klan. According to Edmund Drago, "At least one-fourth of Georgia's black legislators were threatened, bribed, beaten, jailed or killed during the period." Yet Georgia Reconstruction was distinctive in other ways. Unlike Reconstruction in such states as South Carolina and Mississippi, Radical Reconstruction in Georgia was relatively short lived. And during its heyday, in protest of Congressional Reconstruction that enfranchised African American males, conservative southern white Democrats barred their admission into the Georgia legislature by declaring their ineligibility to holding office both in Georgia and the United States.

About the Author

Henry McNeal Turner was born in Newberry, South Carolina, to free black parents in 1834. As an apprentice to a local planter, Turner acquired the trades of blacksmith and carriage maker. He learned to read and write while working in a law office. Turner joined the African Methodist Episcopal Church in 1848 and became a licensed preacher in 1853. He traveled throughout the South as an itinerant evangelist and, in 1860, took a preaching position at Union Bethel Church in Baltimore, Maryland. In 1862 he moved to Washington, D.C., and, as pastor of Israel Bethel Church there, became a prominent leader in the black community. During the Civil War, President Abraham Lincoln appointed Turner as chaplain to the First Regiment, U.S. Colored Troops.

Turner moved to Georgia in 1865 with the Freedmen's Bureau. He soon became an influential figure in Reconstruction politics in that state. He organized Union Leagues that brought blacks into the Republican Party. Turner once boasted that he had traveled fifteen thousand miles and spoken five hundred times in Georgia. He served as a delegate to the 1866 Georgia black convention and worked for the Republican Congressional Committee in 1867. Turner was elected to the Georgia constitutional convention of 1867–1868. Voters then chose him for the Georgia House of Representatives in 1868. After his expulsion, Turner was reseated by order of Congress in 1870 and reelected in 1871. As a legislator, he submitted bills for an eight-hour day for laborers and to prohibit discrimination on public transportation (primarily streetcars), yet he was the only black member to support a literacy test for voting. Turner's political activism proved dangerous in Georgia in the late 1860s. Two attempts were made on his life, and his home was often protected by armed guards. In 1871 Turner was appointed by national Republicans as customs inspector in Savannah.

Turner was ordained a bishop in the African Methodist Episcopal Church in 1880 and became chancellor of Morris Brown College, an African American institution in Atlanta. He later joined the Prohibitionist Party. Besides publishing three religious periodicals, he became a leading advocate for black emigration from the United States. He met with President Benjamin Harrison to enlist his support in his colonization schemes. Turner served as the vice president of the American Colonization Society and even gave the benediction to the ship Azor as it left Charleston, South Carolina, for Africa in April 1878 with two hundred African Americans aboard. Turner made four trips to Africa during the 1890s. In 1894 the College of Liberia bestowed upon Turner the degree of Doctor of Canonical Law. He died in Windsor, Canada, in 1915.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

Henry McNeal Turner's speech of September 3, 1868, to the Georgia legislature was essentially an impassioned attack on the injustice of his expulsion—an event he claimed in the first paragraph was "unparalleled in the history of the world." One reporter considered it "perhaps the best speech that had been made on his side." No legislator had ever been denied his office on the ground of race. Turner wanted to force his white listeners to look squarely at the fundamental contradiction between the principles of republicanism and racism. Attacking the pillars of white supremacy, he defends (in paragraph 4) the contributions of African Americans: "Who first rallied around the standard of Reconstruction? Who set the ball of loyalty rolling in the state of Georgia?" Turner then pursues the theme of white hypocrisy, pointing out the inconsistency of voting against the Constitution of 1867 while acting as current legislators to remove a black person.

Turner's speech was not as structured as a formal sermon or a political tract nor did it develop one sustained argument. Rather, he used several rhetorical strategies and made a number of points in his protest to the Georgia legislature. He opens his remarks in an essentially defiant tone. He would be defending his right to a seat in the legislature without apology: "I am here to demand my rights and to hurl thunderbolts at the men who would dare to cross the threshold of my manhood." In the next two paragraphs Turner drives home the novel and momentous nature of his case. Never, he claims, has a man been expelled from a governing body for no other offense than the color of his skin. He next reminds his fellow legislators of the political wisdom of giving former slaves political rights, calling it the "safest and best course for the interest of the state." In the fifth paragraph, he points out the irony that he is being expelled by sitting white legislators, many of whom did not even vote for the Georgia constitutional convention or originally recognize the legitimacy of the Radical government.

In paragraphs 6–8, Turner defends political equality between the races. He asks his listeners to remember the essential humanity of African Americans: "Am I a man? … Have I a soul to save, as you have?" He also counters the old proslavery argument that blacks were of a different species and reminds his audience of the contributions of southern blacks. On the basis of this primary political equality, blacks should be able to speak for themselves: "It is very strange, if a white man can occupy on this floor a seat created by colored votes, and a black man cannot do it."

In the following three paragraphs, Turner counters the argument that Congress never gave blacks the right to hold office and insists that a biracial political order was the essence of Reconstruction. If this principle is in doubt, he suggests that the question of a black representative be submitted to the sitting Congress. Moreover, he begins to insist that former slaves deserve this change. White legislators do not realize "the dreadful hardships which these people have endured, and especially those who in any way endeavored to acquire an education."

To appeal to the white legislators, Turner reminds them in paragraphs 12 and 13 that during the Civil War and so far in the postwar period blacks have not behaved in any destructive fashion. He reminds them how few advantages the freed people have had, perhaps appealing to their sympathies as well. In speaking to both African

Essential Quotes

"I am here to demand my rights and to hurl thunderbolts at the men who would dare to cross the threshold of my manhood."

(Paragraph 1)

"Am I a man? If I am such, I claim the rights of a man. Am I not a man because I happen to be of a darker hue than honorable gentlemen around me?"

(Paragraph 6)

"We are willing to let the dead past bury its dead; but we ask you, now for our rights*."*

(Paragraph 13)

"Where have you ever heard of four millions of freemen being governed by laws, and yet have no hand in their making?"

(Paragraph 15)

American and white legislators, Turner then insists that black loyalty to the state depends on the state's loyalty to blacks: "Never lift a finger nor raise a hand in defense of Georgia, until Georgia acknowledges that you are men and invests you with the rights pertaining to manhood." Going back to his defense based on essentials (in paragraph 15), Turner argues that his expulsion contradicts a basic premise of republican government—the consent of the governed.

In paragraphs 16 and 17, Turner seems to reassure his audience, who were perhaps anxious about black radicalism. He repeats his earlier point that blacks will act within the boundaries of political behavior. He reminds white listeners that "we have built a monument of docility, of obedience, of respect, and of self-control, that will endure longer than the Pyramids of Egypt." He also presents himself as a political martyr, comparing his plight with other persecuted pioneers like the religious leader Martin Luther and the scientist Galileo. Finally, Turner warns the legislature that by their action to expel him, they will permanently alienate black voters. In his final paragraphs Turner closes with poetic and religious imagery, comparing the position of blacks to that of the ill-fated British cavalry charge (of October 25, 1854) against Russian forces in the Battle of Balaclava during the Crimean War and warning of providential revenge for "acts of the oppressor."

In his speech to the Georgia legislature, Turner echoed several themes of African American political thought during Reconstruction. First and primary was the fundamental commitment to Jeffersonian notions of independence and equality. Significantly, Turner quoted the Revolutionary premise that "government derives their just powers from the consent of the governed." A second theme was the use of religious principles and language to defend his cause.

> Because God saw fit to make some red, and some white, and some black, and some brown, are we to sit here in judgment upon what God has seen fit to do? As well might one play with the thunderbolts of heaven as with that creature that bears God's image—God's photograph.

Like many Americans in the nineteenth century, Turner saw the scriptures as a political tract that taught the principles of justice.

Turner exhibits a curious mixture of militancy and conciliation in this speech. "I am here to demand my rights," he declares at one point, "and to hurl thunderbolts at the men who would dare to cross the threshold of my manhood." At other points, however, he assures his listeners that the freedman is not seeking retribution: "We are willing to let the dead past bury its dead; but we ask you, now for our rights." Turner even urges his fellow freedmen to pay taxes and obey their employers. Turner's ambivalence might be explained by the nature of his audience. He undoubtedly had to appease the Radicals in the Republican ranks. At the same time, Georgia freedmen needed the support of white Republicans, who needed reassurance that Reconstruction would not turn the racial order upside down.

Audience

Turner was a self-acknowledged spokesman for the black community in Reconstruction Georgia. His role as preacher, Freedmen Bureau official, and state legislator illustrates the central place of black politicians during Reconstruction. After emancipation, African American men and women built community institutions like churches and schools. In Georgia, black leaders also founded newspapers such as the Colored American (1865) and organizations like the Georgia Equal Rights and Educational Association. As a central institution in the black community, the church became, according to Drago, "the focal point of black political life during Reconstruction." Preachers, especially those like Turner from the African Methodist Episcopal Church, entered into the political sphere. Of twenty-two African American delegates to the Georgia constitutional convention, seventeen were ministers. The antebellum free black urban elite contributed disproportionately to Reconstruction politics, providing the core of black leadership in Louisiana and South Carolina.

Congressional Republicans from the North were probably another intended audience of Turner's speech. The northern press kept a very close watch on Reconstruction events in the South. A number of papers, among them the Cincinnati Commercial and the New York Tribune, had southern correspondents. Northerners would have heard about the speech if they did not read it themselves. Radicals in the North, like Benjamin Butler of Massachusetts, spoke for the plight of black Republicans in the South. The correspondence of northern Republicans is filled with letters from the South describing the southerners' problems and seeking aid.

Impact

The expulsion of Henry McNeal Turner and other black delegates from the Georgia legislature heightened antiblack sentiment in the state. White conservatives passed several discriminatory laws against African Americans. One such law deprived them of the right to serve on juries. The Ku Klux Klan also escalated its violence on freed people. A group of blacks meeting in Macon claimed that the expulsion of Turner and other legislators gave support to the "murdering bands" of the Klan. Racial violence in Reconstruction Georgia culminated in September 1868 in a riot in the southern town of Camilla, in which at least seven blacks were killed during a political rally.

Turner's speech and his subsequent expulsion spurred black political leaders in Georgia to action, making them more militant and more willing to challenge the white leadership of the Republican Party. In October 1868, black leaders met in a convention in Macon, where they created the Civil and Political Rights Association to lobby Congress on behalf of southern blacks. They elected Turner as president. Republican losses during the presidential election of 1868 and political opposition led Governor Bullock to Washington, D.C., where he succeeded in receiving federal support for renewed Reconstruction measures. The action of white conservatives in expelling Georgia's black delegates was the kind of incident that incurred the wrath of Radical Republicans in Congress.

While the expulsion of the black delegates opened a breach between white and black Republicans, it did not lead to the formation of a separate black party. African American allegiance to the Republicans was shaken but not broken. The issue of black eligibility to hold elected office came before the Georgia Supreme Court in June 1869. In the case of White v. Clements, Justices Brown and McCay decided in favor of the African American delegates.

In early 1870 the rift widened between the Bullock and Bryant Republican factions on the extent of African American participation in Republican governments and over civil rights legislation. Moderate Republicans began to look for coalition with Democrats. In 1870 they joined with Democrats to support the candidacy of Bryant for Speaker of the House. Georgia Republicans eventually lost the support of Washington, as President Grant became increasingly disillusioned with the Bullock regime. When the 1870 election returned a Democratic majority to the legislature, Governor Bullock resigned his office. By October of 1871, a conservative government was in control of Georgia.

See also War Department General Order 143 (1863); Black Code of Mississippi (1865); Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1865); Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1868); Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1870).

Further Reading

■ Articles

Armstrong, Thomas F. "From Task Labor to Free Labor: The Transition along Georgia's Rice Coast, 1820–1880." Georgia Historical Quarterly 64 (Fall 1980): 432–447.

Carson, Roberta F. "The Loyalty Leagues in Georgia." Georgia Historical Society 20 (June 1936): 125–153.

Cimbala, Paul A. "The Freedmen's Bureau, the Freedmen, and Sherman's Grant in Reconstruction Georgia, 1865–1867." Journal of Southern History 55 (November 1989): 597–632.

Coulter, E. Merton "Henry M. Turner: Georgia Negro Preacher-Politician during the Reconstruction Era." Georgia Historical Quarterly 48 (December 1964): 371–410.

Gottlieb, Manuel. "The Land Question in Georgia." Science and Society 3 (Summer 1939): 356–388.

Matthews, John M. "Negro Republicans in the Reconstruction of Georgia." Georgia Historical Quarterly 60 (Summer 1976): 145–164.

■ Books

Angell, Stephen Ward. Bishop Henry McNeal Turner and African-American Religion in the South. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1992.

Conway, Alan. The Reconstruction of Georgia. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1966.

Drago, Edmund L. Black Politicians and Reconstruction in Georgia: A Splendid Failure. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1982.

Duncan, Russell. Freedom's Shore: Tunis Campbell and the Georgia Freedman. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1986.

Fitzgerald, Michael W. "Reconstruction Politics and the Politics of Reconstruction." In Reconstructions: New Perspectives of the Postbellum United States, ed. Thomas J. Brown. New York: Oxford University Press, 2006.

Foner, Eric. Reconstruction, America's Unfinished Revolution, 1863–1877. New York: Harper and Row, 1988.

Nathans, Elizabeth S. Losing the Peace: Georgia Republicans and Reconstruction, 1865–1871. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1968.

Redkey, Edwin S. Respect Black: The Writings and Speeches of Henry McNeal Turner. New York: Arno Press, 1971.

Thompson, C. Mildred. Reconstruction in Georgia: Economic, Social, Political, 1865–1872. New York: Columbia University Press, 1915.

■ Web Sites

"Reconstruction: The Second Civil War." PBS "American Experience" Web site.
http://www.pbs.org/wgbh/amex/reconstruction/index.html.

—Mitchell Snay

Questions for Further Study

1. Summarize the political climate surrounding Reconstruction after the Civil War. What were the political parties, both major and minor? What interests did they represent? Why was one faction of the Republican Party referred to as the Radical Republicans?

2. Why did the program for Reconstruction espoused by the Republican Party, especially the Radical Republicans, ultimately break down? What forces contributed to its demise?

3. What impact did Turner's expulsion have on the emergence of white supremacist groups such as the Ku Klux Klan?

4. If you had been in charge of the Reconstruction effort after the Civil War, what might you have done differently? Explain how your course of action might have altered the outcome of events.

5. Following the Civil War, numerous laws and constitutional amendments were passed to ensure the freedom and civil rights of African Americans. Among them were the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments; the Ku Klux Klan Act; the Civil Rights Acts of 1866; and the Reconstruction Acts, as well as the funding of the Freedmen's Bureau. How were the southern states ultimately able to circumvent many of these laws?

Document Text

Henry McNeal Turner's Speech on His Expulsion from the Georgia Legislature

Mr. Speaker: Before proceeding to argue this question upon its intrinsic merits, I wish the members of this House to understand the position that I take. I hold that I am a member of this body. Therefore, sir, I shall neither fawn nor cringe before any party, nor stoop to beg them for my rights. Some of my colored fellow members, in the course of their remarks, took occasion to appeal to the sympathies of members on the opposite side, and to eulogize their character for magnanimity. It reminds me very much, sir, of slaves begging under the lash. I am here to demand my rights and to hurl thunderbolts at the men who would dare to cross the threshold of my manhood. There is an old aphorism which says, "fight the devil with fire," and if I should observe the rule in this instance, I wish gentlemen to understand that it is but fighting them with their own weapon.

The scene presented in this House, today, is one unparalleled in the history of the world. From this day, back to the day when God breathed the breath of life into Adam, no analogy for it can be found. Never, in the history of the world, has a man been arraigned before a body clothed with legislative, judicial or executive functions, charged with the offense of being a darker hue than his fellow men. I know that questions have been before the courts of this country, and of other countries, involving topics not altogether dissimilar to that which is being discussed here today. But, sir, never in the history of the great nations of this world—never before—has a man been arraigned, charged with an offense committed by the God of Heaven Himself. Cases may be found where men have been deprived of their rights for crimes and misdemeanors; but it has remained for the state of Georgia, in the very heart of the nineteenth century, to call a man before the bar, and there charge him with an act for which he is no more responsible than for the head which he carries upon his shoulders. The Anglo-Saxon race, sir, is a most surprising one. No man has ever been more deceived in that race than I have been for the last three weeks. I was not aware that there was in the character of that race so much cowardice or so much pusillanimity. The treachery which has been exhibited in it by gentlemen belonging to that race has shaken my confidence in it more than anything that has come under my observation from the day of my birth.

What is the question at issue? Why, sir, this Assembly, today, is discussing and deliberating on a judgment; there is not a Cherub that sits around God's eternal throne today that would not tremble—even were an order issued by the Supreme God Himself—to come down here and sit in judgment on my manhood. Gentlemen may look at this question in whatever light they choose, and with just as much indifference as they may think proper to assume, but I tell you, sir, that this is a question which will not die today. This event shall be remembered by posterity for ages yet to come, and while the sun shall continue to climb the hills of heaven.

Whose legislature is this? Is it a white man's legislature, or is it a black man's legislature? Who voted for a constitutional convention, in obedience to the mandate of the Congress of the United States? Who first rallied around the standard of Reconstruction? Who set the ball of loyalty rolling in the state of Georgia? And whose voice was heard on the hills and in the valleys of this state? It was the voice of the brawny-armed Negro, with the few humanitarian-hearted white men who came to our assistance. I claim the honor, sir, of having been the instrument of convincing hundreds—yea, thousands—of white men, that to reconstruct under the measures of the United States Congress was the safest and the best course for the interest of the state.

Let us look at some facts in connection with this matter. Did half the white men of Georgia vote for this legislature? Did not the great bulk of them fight, with all their strength, the Constitution under which we are acting? And did they not fight against the organization of this legislature? And further, sir, did they not vote against it? Yes, sir! And there are persons in this legislature today who are ready to spit their poison in my face, while they themselves opposed, with all their power, the ratification of this Constitution. They question my right to a seat in this body, to represent the people whose legal votes elected me. This objection, sir, is an unheard-of monopoly of power. No analogy can be found for it, except it be the case of a man who should go into my house, take possession of my wife and children, and then tell me to walk out. I stand very much in the position of a criminal before your bar, because I dare to be the exponent of the views of those who sent me here. Or, in other words, we are told that if black men want to speak, they must speak through white trumpets; if black men want their sentiments expressed, they must be adulterated and sent through white messengers, who will quibble and equivocate and evade as rapidly as the pendulum of a clock. If this be not done, then the black men have committed an outrage, and then representatives must be denied the right, to represent their constituents.

Document Text

The great question, sir, is this: Am I a man? If I am such, I claim the rights of a man. Am I not a man because I happen to be of a darker hue than honorable gentlemen around me? Let me see whether I am or not. I want to convince the House today that I am entitled to my seat here. A certain gentleman has argued that the Negro was a mere development similar to the orangoutang or chimpanzee, but it so happens that, when a Negro is examined, physiologically, phrenologically and anatomically, and I may say, physiognomically, he is found to be the same as persons of different color. I would like to ask any gentleman on this floor, where is the analogy? Do you find me a quadruped, or do you find me a man? Do you find three bones less in my back than in that of the white man? Do you find fewer organs in the brain? If you know nothing of this, I do; for I have helped to dissect fifty men, black and white, and I assert that by the time you take off the mucous pigment—the color of the skin—you cannot, to save your life, distinguish between the black man and the white. Am I a man? Have I a soul to save, as you have? Am I susceptible of eternal development, as you are? Can I learn all the arts and sciences that you can? Has it ever been demonstrated in the history of the world? Have black men ever exhibited bravery as white men have done? Have they ever been in the professions? Have they not as good articulative organs as you? Some people argue that there is a very close similarity between the larynx of the Negro and that of the orangoutang. Why, sir, there is not so much similarity between them as there is between the larynx of the man and that of the dog, and this fact I dare any member of this House to dispute. God saw fit to vary everything in nature. There are no two men alike—no two voices alike—no two trees alike. God has weaved and tissued variety and versatility throughout the boundless space of His creation. Because God saw fit to make some red, and some white, and some black, and some brown, are we to sit here in judgment upon what God has seen fit to do? As well might one play with the thunderbolts of heaven as with that creature that bears God's image—God's photograph.

The question is asked, "What is it that the Negro race has done?" Well, Mr. Speaker, all I have to say upon the subject is this: If we are the class of people that we are generally represented to be, I hold that we are a very great people. It is generally considered that we are the children of Canaan; and the curse of a father rests upon our heads, and has rested, all through history. Sir, I deny that the curse of Noah had anything to do with the Negro. We are not the Children of Canaan; and if we are, sir, where should we stand? Let us look a little into history. Melchizedek was a Canaanite; all the Phoenicians—all those inventors of the arts and sciences—were the posterity of Canaan; but, sir, the Negro is not. We are the children of Cush, and Canaan's curse has nothing whatever to do with the Negro. If we belong to that race, Ham belonged to it, under whose instructions Napoleon Bonaparte studied military tactics. If we belong to that race, Saint Augustine belonged to it. Who was it that laid the foundation of the great Reformation? Martin Luther, who lit the light of gospel truth—a light that will never go out until the sun shall rise to set no more; and, long ere then, Democratic principles will have found their level in the regions of Pluto and of Prosperpine.…

The honorable gentleman from Whitfield [Mr. Shumate], when arguing this question, a day or two ago, put forth the proposition that to be a representative was not to be an officer—"it was a privilege that citizens had a right to enjoy." These are his words. It was not an office; it was a "privilege." Every gentleman here knows that he denied that to be a representative was to be an officer. Now, he is recognized as a leader of the Democratic party in this House, and generally cooks victuals for them to eat; makes that remarkable declaration, and how are you, gentlemen on the other side of the House, because I am an officer, when one of your great lights says that I am not an officer? If you deny my right—the right of my constituents to have representation here—because it is a "privilege," then, sir, I will show you that I have as many privileges as the whitest man on this floor. If I am not permitted to occupy a seat here, for the purpose of representing my constituents, I want to know how white men can be permitted to do so. How can a white man represent a colored constituency, if a colored man cannot do it? The great argument is: "Oh, we have inherited" this, that and the other. Now, I want gentlemen to come down to cool, common sense. Is the created greater than the Creator? Is man greater than God? It is very strange, if a white man can occupy on this floor a seat created by colored votes, and a black man cannot do it. Why, gentlemen, it is the most shortsighted reasoning in the world. A man can see better than that with half an eye; and even if he had no eye at all, he could forge one, as the Cyclops did, or punch one with his finger, which would enable him to see through that.

Document Text

It is said that Congress never gave us the right to hold office. I want to know, sir, if the Reconstruction measures did not base their action on the ground that no distinction should be made on account of race, color or previous condition? Was not that the grand fulcrum on which they rested? And did not every reconstructed state have to reconstruct on the idea that no discrimination, in any sense of the term, should be made? There is not a man here who will dare say No. If Congress has simply given me a merely sufficient civil and political rights to make me a mere political slave for Democrats, or anybody else—giving them the opportunity of jumping on my back in order to leap into political power—I do not thank Congress for it. Never, so help me God, shall I be a political slave. I am not now speaking for those colored men who sit with me in this House, nor do I say that they endorse my sentiments, but assisting Mr. Lincoln to take me out of servile slavery did not intend to put me and my race into political slavery. If they did, let them take away my ballot—I do not want it, and shall not have it. I don't want to be a mere tool of that sort. I have been a slave long enough already.

I tell you what I would be willing to do: I am willing that the question should be submitted to Congress for an explanation as to what was meant in the passage of their Reconstruction measures, and of the Constitutional Amendment. Let the Democratic party in this House pass a resolution giving this subject that direction, and I shall be content. I dare you, gentlemen, to do it. Come up to the question openly, whether it meant that the Negro might hold office, or whether it meant that he should merely have the right to vote. If you are honest men, you will do it. If, however, you will not do that, I would make another proposition: Call together, again, the convention that framed the constitution under which we are acting; let them take a vote upon the subject, and I am willing to abide by their decision.…

These colored men, who are unable to express themselves with all the clearness and dignity and force of rhetorical eloquence, are laughed at in derision by the Democracy of the country. It reminds me very much of the man who looked at himself in a mirror and, imagining that he was addressing another person, exclaimed: "My God, how ugly you are!" These gentlemen do not consider for a moment the dreadful hardships which these people have endured, and especially those who in any way endeavored to acquire an education. For myself, sir, I was raised in the cotton field of South Carolina, and in order to prepare myself for usefulness, as well to myself as to my race, I determined to devote my spare hours to study. When the overseer retired at night to his comfortable couch, I sat and read and thought and studied, until I heard him blow his horn in the morning. He frequently told me with an oath, that if he discovered me attempting to learn, that he would whip me to death, and I have no doubt he would have done so, if he had found an opportunity. I prayed to Almighty God to assist me, and He did, and I thank Him with my whole heart and soul.…

So far as I am personally concerned, no man in Georgia has been more conservative than I. "Anything to please the white folks" has been my motto; and so closely have I adhered to that course, that many among my own party have classed me as a Democrat. One of the leaders of the Republican party in Georgia has not been at all favorable to me for some time back, because he believed that I was too "conservative" for a Republican. I can assure you, however, Mr. Speaker, that I have had quite enough, and to spare, of such "conservatism." …

But, Mr. Speaker, I do not regard this movement as a thrust at me. It is a thrust at the Bible—a thrust at the God of the Universe, for making a man and not finishing him; it is simply calling the Great Jehovah a fool. Why, sir, though we are not white, we have accomplished much. We have pioneered civilization here; we have built up your country; we have worked in your fields and garnered your harvests for two hundred and fifty years! And what do we ask of you in return? Do we ask you for compensation for the sweat our fathers bore for you—for the tears you have caused, and the hearts you have broken, and the lives you have curtailed, and the blood you have spilled? Do we ask retaliation? We ask it not. We are willing to let the dead past bury its dead; but we ask you, now for our rights. You have all the elements of superiority upon your side; you have our money and your own; you have our education and your own; and you have our land and your own too. We, who number hundreds of thousands in Georgia, including our wives and families, with not a foot of land to call our own—strangers in the land of our birth; without money, without education, without aid, without a roof to cover us while we live, nor sufficient clay to cover us when we die! It is extraordinary that a race such as yours, professing gallantry and chivalry and education and superiority, living in a land where ringing chimes call child and sire to the church of God—a land where Bibles are read and Gospel truths are spoken, and where courts of justice are presumed to exist; it is extraordinary that, with all these advantages on your side, you can make war upon the poor defenseless black man. You know we have no money, no railroads, no telegraphs, no advantages of any sort, and yet all manner of injustice is placed upon us. You know that the black people of this country acknowledge you as their superiors, by virtue of your education and advantages.…

Document Text

You may expel us, gentlemen, but I firmly believe that you will some day repent it. The black man cannot protect a country, if the country doesn't protect him; and if, tomorrow, a war should arise, I would not raise a musket to defend a country where my manhood is denied. The fashionable way in Georgia, when hard work is to be done, is for the white man to sit at his ease while the black man does the work; but, sir, I will say this much to the colored men of Georgia, as, if I should be killed in this campaign, I may have no opportunity of telling them at any other time: Never lift a finger nor raise a hand in defense of Georgia, until Georgia acknowledges that you are men and invests you with the rights pertaining to manhood. Pay your taxes, however, obey all orders from your employers, take good counsel from friends, work faithfully, earn an honest living, and show, by your conduct, that you can be good citizens.

Go on with your oppressions. Babylon fell. Where is Greece? Where is Nineveh? And where is Rome, the Mistress Empire of the world? Why is it that she stands, today, in broken fragments throughout Europe? Because oppression killed her. Every act that we commit is like a bounding ball. If you curse a man, that curse rebounds upon you; and when you bless a man, the blessing returns to you; and when you oppress a man, the oppression also will rebound. Where have you ever heard of four millions of freemen being governed by laws, and yet have no hand in their making? Search the records of the world, and you will find no example. "Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed." How dare you to make laws by which to try me and my wife and children, and deny me a voice in the making of these laws? I know you can establish a monarchy, an autocracy, an oligarchy, or any other kind of ocracy that you please; and that you can declare whom you please to be sovereign; but tell me, sir, how you can clothe me with more power than another, where all are sovereigns alike? How can you say you have a republican form of government, when you make such distinction and enact such proscriptive laws?

Gentlemen talk a good deal about the Negroes "building no monuments." I can tell the gentlemen one thing: that is, that we could have built monuments of fire while the war was in progress. We could have fired your woods, your barns and fences, and called you home. Did we do it? No, sir! And God grant that the Negro may never do it, or do anything else that would destroy the good opinion of his friends. No epithet is sufficiently opprobrious for us now. I saw, sir, that we have built a monument of docility, of obedience, of respect, and of self-control, that will endure longer than the Pyramids of Egypt.

We are a persecuted people. Luther was persecuted; Galileo was persecuted; good men in all nations have been persecuted; but the persecutors have been handed down to posterity with shame and ignominy. If you pass this bill, you will never get Congress to pardon or enfranchise another rebel in your lives. You are going to fix an everlasting disfranchisement upon Mr. Toombs and the other leading men of Georgia. You may think you are doing yourselves honor by expelling us from this House; but when we go, we will do as Wickliffe and as Latimer did. We will light a torch of truth that will never be extinguished—the impression that will run through the country, as people picture in their mind's eye these poor black men, in all parts of this Southern country, pleading for their rights. When you expel us, you make us forever your political foes, and you will never find a black man to vote a Democratic ticket again; for, so help me God, I will go through all the length and breadth of the land, where a man of my race is to be found, and advise him to beware of the Democratic party. Justice is the great doctrine taught in the Bible. God's Eternal Justice is founded upon Truth, and the man who steps from Justice steps from Truth, and cannot make his principles to prevail.

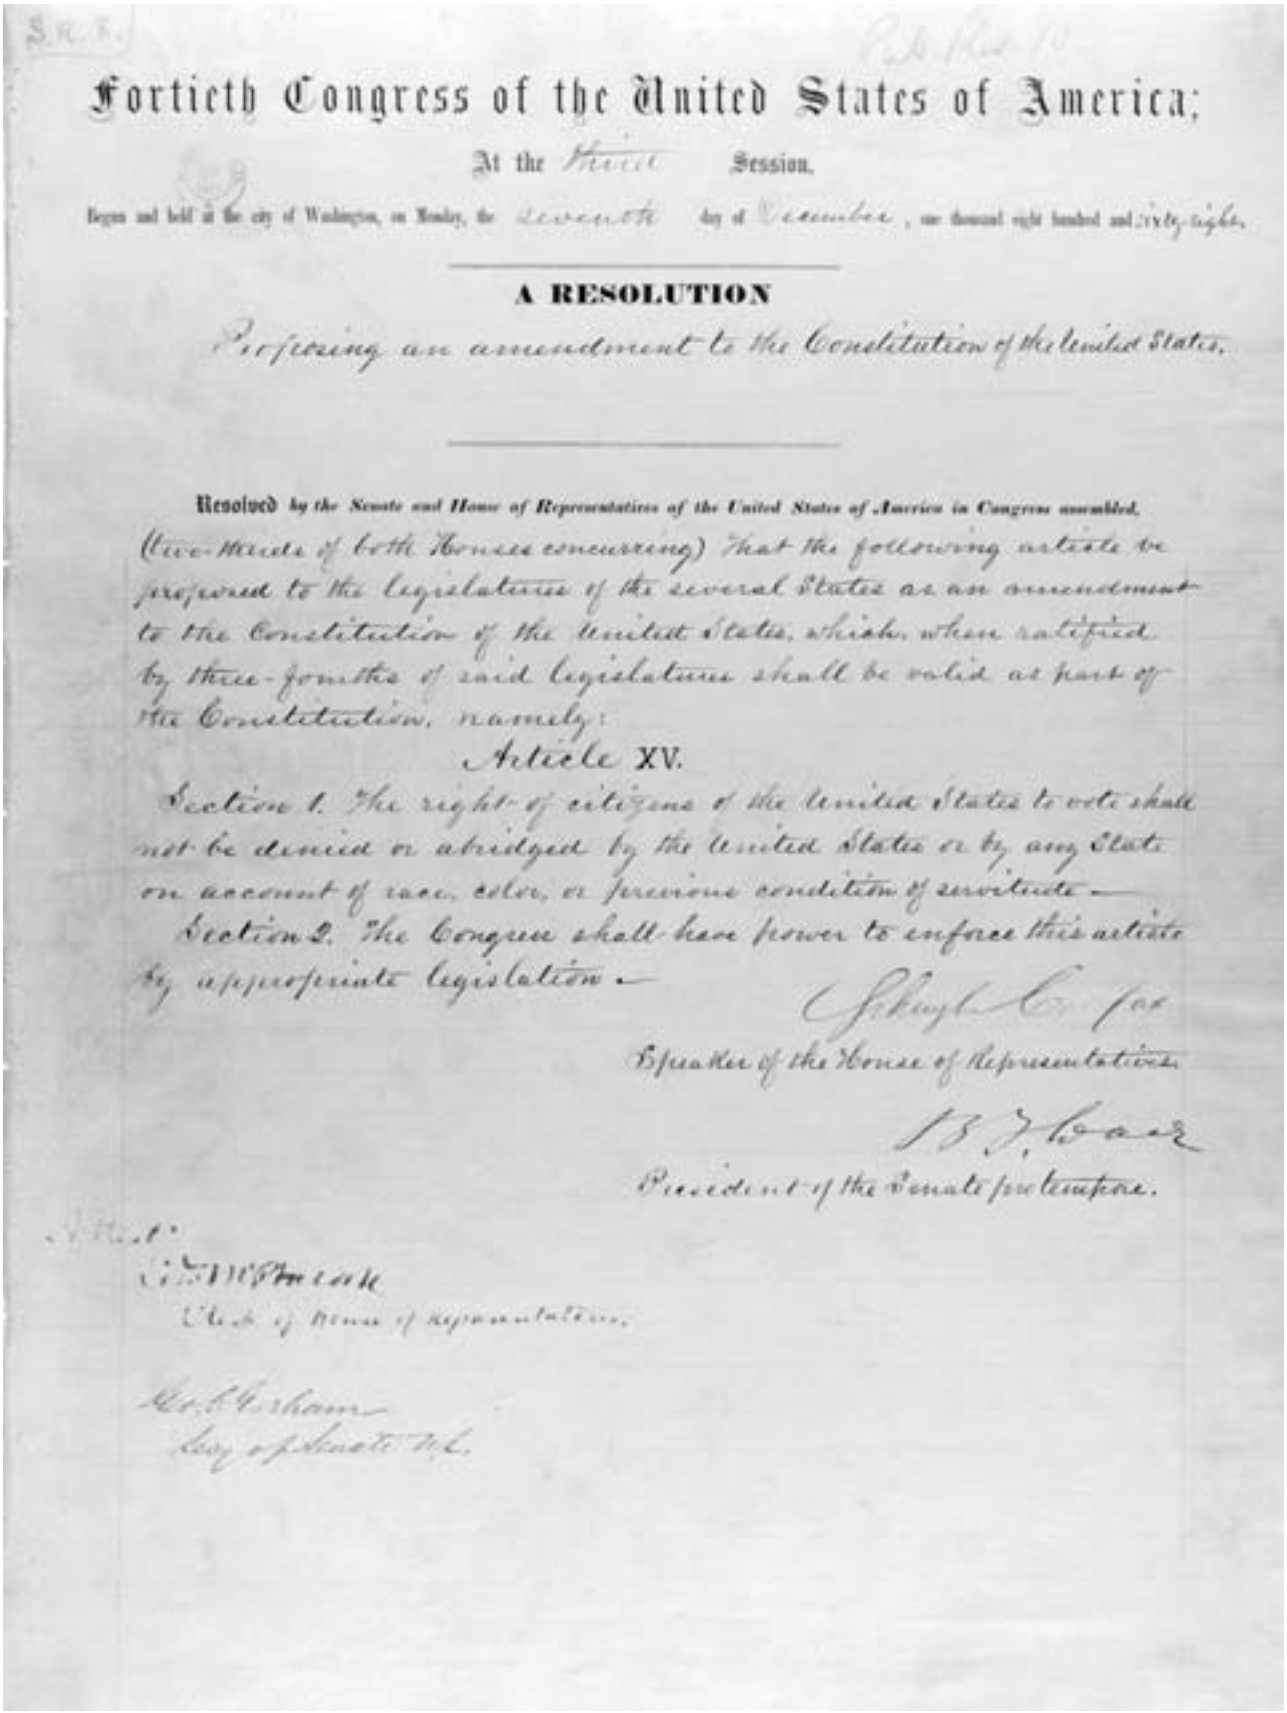
I have now, Mr. Speaker, said all that my physical condition will allow me to say. Weak and ill, though I am, I could not sit passively here and see the sacred rights of my race destroyed at one blow. We are in a position somewhat similar to that of the famous "Light Brigade," of which Tennyson says, they had

Cannon to right of them,
Cannon to left of them,
Cannon in front of them,
Volleyed and thundered.

Document Text

I hope our poor, downtrodden race may act well and wisely through this period of trial, and that they will exercise patience and discretion under all circumstances.

You may expel us, gentlemen, by your votes, today; but, while you do it, remember that there is a just God in Heaven, whose All-Seeing Eye beholds alike the acts of the oppressor and the oppressed, and who, despite the machinations of the wicked, never fails to vindicate the cause of Justice, and the sanctity of His own handiwork.



Fortieth Congress of the United States of America;

At the First Session.

Begun and held at the city of Washington, on Monday, the Seventh day of December, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight.

A RESOLUTION

Proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of both Houses concurring) That the following article be proposed to the legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said legislatures shall be valid as part of the Constitution, namely:

Article XV.

Section 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.—

Section 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.—

Schuyler Colfax

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

H. V. Boutwell

President of the Senate pro tempore.

J. W. Forney

Clerk of House of Representatives.

Geo. C. Gorham

Secy of Senate U.S.

The Fifteenth Amendment (National Archives and Records Administration)

Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution

1870

"The right ... to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

Overview

The Fifteenth Amendment (1870) was the third and last amendment adopted in the era immediate following the Civil War. It prohibited states from denying the right to vote to individuals on the basis of "race, color, or previous condition of servitude." Section 2 of the amendment further vested Congress with power to enforc e it.

The Fifteenth Amendment bears elements of both continuity and discontinuity with earlier American history. Consistent with earlier history, it did not make voting an affirmative right for African Americans or other citizens, but rather it prohibited denying or abridging such groups the right to vote. Because it was the first specific prohibition to be incorporated into the Constitution, it served as a model for the Nineteenth Amendment (1920), which prohibited similar denials based on sex, and the Twenty-sixth Amendment (1971), which prohibited such denials to those who were eighteen years of age or older.

When Congress proposed the Fifteenth Amendment and the states ratified it, Congress was still attempting to "reconstruct" the southern states; this period of Reconstruction began in 1866 and ended in 1877. During this time, federal troops were posted in the South. Congress had forced states to adopt constitutions extending the right to vote to former slaves, and it had required southern states to ratify the Fourteenth Amendment as a condition for renewed representation in Congress.

Ironically, northern voters resisted some of the same requirements that they had imposed on the South. In his pathbreaking study of the Fifteenth Amendment, William Gillette observed that five jurisdictions rejected black suffrage in referendums in 1865. These votes, most of which were overwhelming, occurred in the Colorado Territory in September, in Connecticut in October, in Wisconsin and Minnesota in November, and in the District of Columbia in December. Similar votes rejected such suffrage in the Nebraska Territory in June 1866, in Kansas and Ohio in 1867, in Michigan and Missouri in 1868, and in New York in 1869. Minnesota reversed itself in November 1868, which was the same year Iowa also accepted such suffrage, but these states remained exceptions to the general rule.

Context

The United States transformed from thirteen separate colonies into thirteen states united and independent from Great Britain. Even though they vested powers in a central government, first under the Articles of Confederation from 1781 to 1789 and then under the Constitution that they created in 1787, the states retained numerous rights. Delegates to the Constitutional Convention, rejecting calls to impose a national property qualification on voters, left voting qualifications to the states, simply specifying in Article I, Section 2, of the Constitution that "the Electors [voters] in each State shall have the Qualifications requisite for Electors of the most numerous Branch of the State Legislature." Over time, most states eliminated voting qualifications based on church membership and religious belief—a common requirement in the early colonies—or property ownership; because property was more freely available in America than elsewhere, this qualification had rarely disenfranchised large numbers of voters. American history is commonly portrayed as progressively democratic, but in retrospect the movement was not always as forward as some think. Although its supporters claimed that the presidential election of 1828 ushered in a period of Jacksonian democracy, the emphasis continued to be on universal white male suffrage rather than on universal suffrage. Indeed, because the U.S. Constitution apportioned representation in the U.S. House of Representatives not simply according to white population but also according to "three-fifths" of such "other persons" (a euphemism for slaves), southern whites who were otherwise losing population compared with northerners and westerners continued to be overrepresented there.

Over time, southerners who once defended slavery only as a "necessary evil" came to defend it as a positive good. The South justified slavery on theories of human inequality that contradicted the nation's earlier articulation in the Declaration of Independence that "all men are created equal"; leading southerners argued that slavery both lifted what they regarded as the inferior race and provided leisure time for the superior race to cultivate itself. As southern attitudes hardened in justifying slavery, northern attitudes hardened against it. Not all northerners joined abolition-

Time Line

1776

■ July 4
Congress adopts the Declaration of Independence, which declares that "all men are created equal."

1828

■ November 3
Andrew Jackson is elected president; his election marks the rise of the "common man," which is often associated with universal white male suffrage.

1857

■ March
The U.S. Supreme Court declares in the Dred Scott decision that blacks are not and cannot be U.S. citizens.

1860

■ November 6
Abraham Lincoln is narrowly elected president.

1861

■ April 12
The Civil War begins when southerners fire on Fort Sumter in South Carolina.

1863

■ January 1
The Emancipation Proclamation takes effect; it proclaims the freedom of black slaves behind Confederate lines.

1865

■ April 18
The Confederate army surrenders, ending the Civil War.

■ December 18
The Thirteenth Amendment is ratified, ending slavery.

1866

■ June 13
Congress proposes the Fourteenth Amendment.

1868

■ July 28
The Fourteenth Amendment is declared ratified.

■ November 3
Ulysses S. Grant is narrowly elected president.

ists in favoring immediate emancipation, but an increasing number concluded that the institution was morally wrong and would have to be eliminated.

As slave states continued to lose power vis-à-vis the North, southerners increasingly feared that northern states would eventually strike at their "peculiar institution" of slavery. After the Republican Abraham Lincoln was narrowly elected president in 1860, eleven southern states chose to secede. Lincoln felt duty-bound to preserve the Union, and in 1861 the nation's bloodiest conflict, the Civil War, began. By the end of the war in 1865 Lincoln, who had long regarded slavery as a moral evil, had transformed its objective from that of simply preserving the Union to that of freeing the slaves. His Emancipation Proclamation, which initially applied as a war measure only behind enemy lines, was eventually secured by the ratification of the Thirteenth Amendment, which abolished chattel slavery throughout the nation.

Southern states attempted to limit the freedom of the newly freed slaves through legislation restricting movement and limiting other rights, Congress responded again by proposing the Fourteenth Amendment, which the states ratified in 1868. It overturned the notorious Supreme Court decision in Dred Scott v. Sandford (1857) and declared that all persons including blacks "born or naturalized" within the United States were citizens entitled to the privileges and immunities of U.S. citizens and to due process and equal protection. Ironically, by abolishing slavery, the Thirteenth Amendment increased southern representation in the House of Representatives by invalidating the three-fifths clause; Republicans thought they had to act to ensure that this increased southern representation did not actually work against African American rights. Section 2 of the Fourteenth Amendment, short of specifically prohibiting states from denying the vote to blacks, provided great anguish to advocates of woman's suffrage and allowed representation to be reduced in states that denied or abridged the right to vote to "any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, except for rebellion, or other crime." Congress never reduced a state's representation based on this provision.

During the 1866 congressional elections President Andrew Johnson, who had become president in 1865 after John Wilkes Booth assassinated Lincoln, opposed ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment, which Congress had just proposed. Republicans picked up substantial support in this election, and Congress subsequently approved a bill over Johnson's veto on January 8, 1867, granting black suffrage in the District of Columbia. It followed up with a similar expansion of the franchise in the federal territories and required Nebraska to extend to blacks the right to vote as a condition of its admission into the Union. In the fifth section of the first Reconstruction Act of March 2, 1867, Congress further required southern states to enfranchise blacks as a condition of readmission into the Union and representation within Congress. Although the House of Representatives impeached President Johnson in 1868, the Senate fell a single vote shy of the two-thirds needed to convict him and remove him from office.

In the meantime, sentiment against African American voting outside the South continued to be strong, with Democrats picking up some seats that they had lost in 1866 in special elections. The Republican presidential platform that Ulysses S. Grant ran on in 1868 reflected the party's reluctance to extend the policies it had adopted in the South outside that region. Not surprisingly, Democrats praised President Johnson for opposing congressional Reconstruction and continued to advance the view that, despite the outcome of the Civil War, federalism left determination of the franchise to the states.

The Republican Ulysses S. Grant defeated the Democrat Horatio Seymour by only three hundred thousand votes in the 1868 election; he would have won the Electoral College but not the popular vote without the support of southern blacks whom Republicans had enfranchised. With most African Americans continuing to be grateful to Republicans for both their freedom and their civil and political rights, expanding the franchise to northern blacks presented a way to bolster Republican strength in the North.

Given its brevity, the Fifteenth Amendment is best understood in the context of possible alternatives. The Republican representative George S. Boutwell of Massachusetts initially sought simultaneously to introduce both a bill and an amendment to enfranchise northern blacks, but rights secured by a bill were less secure than those achieved by an amendment, and the fact that Boutwell thought an amendment might be desirable suggested that legislation might exceed existing federal powers. The version of the amendment that Boutwell introduced in the House of Representatives was close to the final version. Ohio's Republican representative Samuel Shellabarger had proposed a more detailed and radical version, while fellow Ohio Republican John A. Bingham had offered a similar proposal, which allowed states to establish a one-year residency requirement.

In the Senate, Nevada Republican William M. Stewart introduced an amendment on January 28, 1869, that would also have protected the rights of African Americans to hold office. Republican Representative Jacob Howard of Michigan proposed a similar amendment, which the Senate defeated on February 8, that would have made it permissible to exclude naturalized Chinese or Irish from balloting. The next day the Senate also rejected a proposal by Henry Wilson that would have abolished restrictions on voting or office holding based on factors including race, color, property, and education and that would thus presumably have precluded literacy tests and poll taxes. The Senate subsequently accepted a modified version of Wilson's amendment and an additional proposal by Indiana Senator Oliver P. Morton to reform the Electoral College.

The House considered the Senate amendment on February 15 but rejected it and requested a conference committee to resolve differences between the two proposals. The longtime abolitionist Wendell Phillips was among those who feared that the Senate's more utopian proposal stood little chance of ratification. Debate continued in both houses until they finally agreed to a conference committee consisting of House members Bingham, Boutwell, and John A. Logan (Republican from Illinois) and Senate members Steward, Roscoe Conkling (Republican from New York), and George Edmunds (Republican from Vermont). This committee adopted the current version of the amendment. The House accepted this version by the necessary two-thirds vote on February 25, 1869, and the Senate agreed to it the next day. William Gillette, in his book on the subject, observes that the amendment sought two limited goals: "to enfranchise the northern Negro" and "to protect the southern Negro against disenfranchisement." He further attributed its passage largely to congressional moderates.

Time Line

1869	■ February 26 Congress proposes the Fifteenth Amendment.
1870	■ February 3 The states ratify the Fifteenth Amendment.
1965	■ August 6 President Lyndon B. Johnson signs the historic Voting Rights Act, which Congress later reaffirms and extends.
1966	■ March 7 and June 13 Relying largely on Section 2 of the Fifteenth Amendment, the U.S. Supreme Court upholds key provisions of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 in South Carolina v. Katzenbach and Katzenbach v. Morgan.

Nevada was the first state to ratify the amendment on March 1, 1869. During this process New York initially approved the amendment and then attempted to rescind its ratification, while Ohio first rejected it and then approved it. (Today's precedents, while still ambiguous, are more favorable to Ohio's actions than to New York's actions.) Congress required some southern states to approve it as a condition of resuming their place in Congress, and Secretary of State Hamilton Fish declared the amendment ratified on March 30, 1870. Southern states, dominated by Reconstruction governments, were most supportive of the amendment, which faced strong opposition in border states, tepid endorsement in the Middle Atlantic states, and considerable conflict in the Midwest. Kentucky, Delaware, California, Tennessee, Maryland, and Oregon all rejected ratification, though some later approved it.

Advocates of women's suffrage, who had called for women's suffrage at the Seneca Falls Convention of 1848 and who were already chafing over the use of the word male to describe voters in Section 2 of the Fourteenth Amendment, were very disappointed by the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment. Susan B. Anthony and Elizabeth Cady Stanton were among those who refused to endorse an amendment that extended suffrage to black men but not to women. When the American Equal Rights Association met in New York City in May 1869, it split into the National Woman Suffrage Association, led by Anthony and Stanton, and the American Woman Suffrage Association, led by Lucy Stone. These organizations continued to work apart until they were united in 1890 as the National American Woman Suffrage Association.

George S. Boutwell (Library of Congress)

About the Author

Two-thirds majorities in both houses of Congress are needed to propose amendments, and approval by three-fourths of the states is required to ratify them. When Congress proposed the Fifteenth Amendment, it followed the procedures used for all previous amendments, sending the amendment to state legislatures rather than to state conventions (as it would later do in the case of the Twenty-first Amendment, repealing national Prohibition on alcohol) for ratification. Some opponents of the amendment in Congress had sought to send the amendment to special state conventions.

The first version of the Fifteenth Amendment, which Republican Representative George S. Boutwell of Massachusetts authored in the House of Representatives, ended up being close to the final version. Ohio representatives Samuel Shellabarger and John A. Bingham, who was largely responsible for the wording of Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment, proposed more extensive amendments in the House. The initial version that the Senate considered, which was also broader than the one that Congress actually adopted, was largely the work of Henry Wilson, a Massachusetts Republican who would later serve as vice president under Ulysses S. Grant.

Ultimately, a congressional conference committee of six men proposed the existing Fifteenth Amendment. The committee focused not only on ironing out the differences between the House and Senate versions of the amendment but also on proposing language that was likely to gain the support of the necessary three-fourths of state legislatures.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

The Fifteenth Amendment consists of two very brief sections. The first provides that "the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." The second specifies that "Congress shall have the power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation." The scope of the Fifteenth Amendment is limited to U.S. citizens. Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment had established that all persons "born or naturalized in the United States" were citizens, but Congress had not yet extended such citizenship to Native Americans, and there was widespread opposition to naturalizing Chinese in the American West as well as Irish and other immigrants in other parts of the country. Whereas the Fourteenth Amendment extended some civil rights to all "persons," the Fifteenth Amendment intended to guard only "citizens" against deprivation of their votes.

In a continuation of federal principles, Section 1 of the Fifteenth Amendment does not positively confer the right to vote on anyone; it simply prohibits denying or abridging such rights based on "race, color, or previous condition of servitude." In contrast to this negative wording, Section 2 more positively vests Congress with enforcement powers, using language almost identical to that employed in Section 2 of the Thirteenth Amendment and Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Audience

Once proposed and ratified by the required majorities, constitutional amendments join other parts of the Constitution as part of what Article VI of the Constitution calls "the supreme law of the land." The language of amendments thus speaks to the American people and to the world as a whole. Like the two previous amendments, the Fifteenth Amendment helped articulate American values and provide legal language that individuals can cite when they attempt to secure their rights in courts. Many Americans, including President Grant, who had favored its adoption, viewed it as the culmination of earlier provisions in the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments and as a practical implementation of the principles articulated in the Declaration of Independence.

This print from 1870 commemorates the celebration over the passage of the Fifteenth Amendment in Baltimore, Maryland. (Library of Congress)

The Fifteenth Amendment arguably carried different messages for North and South. It required states in the North, which had previously rejected black suffrage, to accept it, while attempting to ensure that southern states, on which Congress had imposed such suffrage, would retain it. While the former hopes were largely fulfilled, the latter were dashed relatively quickly and did not reemerge for nearly a century.

Impact

Although the Fifteenth Amendment successfully enfranchised northern blacks, its long-term impact on African Americans in the South for its first one hundred years was negligible. Congress initially adopted Enforcement Acts between 1866 and 1875 designed to prevent obstruction to federal voting, but once northern troops left the South in 1877, whites who had once supported the Confederacy struggled to regain their power. They effectively evaded the force of the Fifteenth Amendment through adoption of numerous stratagems left open when Congress omitted restrictions on property or educational qualifications. The Supreme Court decision in Ex parte Yarbrough (1884) was one of the few cases where the Court upheld federal laws restricting private actions aimed at denying African American voting rights.

Literacy tests, often administered in a highly discriminatory fashion, were used to keep both lower-class whites and blacks from voting. Many states further combined them with grandfather clauses, which the U.S. Supreme Court

Essential Quotes

"The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

(Section 1)

"If it be just, it should not be denied; if it be necessary, it should be adopted; if it be a punishment to traitors, they deserve it."

(Thaddeus Stevens, qtd. in Gillette, p. 31)

"I would sooner cut off my right hand than ask for the ballot for the black man and not for woman."

(Susan B. Anthony, qtd. in McFeely, p. 266)

"The question of suffrage is one which is likely to agitate the public so long as a portion of the citizens of the nation are excluded from its privileges in any State. It seems to be very desirable that this question should be settled now, and I entertain the hope and express the desire that it may be by the ratification of the fifteenth article of amendment to the Constitution."

(Ulysses S. Grant, First Inaugural Address, March 4, 1869)

did not invalidate until Guinn v. United States (1915); such clauses exempted individuals whose grandfathers had voted—at a time when only whites could vote—from such literacy tests. States also adopted poll taxes, which they sometimes made cumulative so that individuals who wanted to vote had to pay the tax not only for that year but also for previous years in which they had not voted. Other states added additional obstacles to voter registration. In still others, racist groups like the Ku Klux Klan used physical violence to intimidate black voters. As the Democratic Party increasingly dominated the South (so that the winners of the Democratic primary almost always won in general elections), it, too, cooperated in black disenfranchisement by excluding blacks until the Supreme Court finally outlawed the practice in Smith v. Allwright (1944).

Although the nation never returned to chattel slavery, judicial interpretations of the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments were extremely limited by the end of the nineteenth century. In the Civil Rights Cases of 1883, the Court decided that the amendments covered only state as opposed to private actions. By 1896 the Court used the doctrine of "separate but equal" to approve the developing system of racial segregation in Plessy v. Ferguson. The Court did not reverse course until its historic 1954 decision in Brown v. Board of Education, which finally began the long process of desegregation.

The Fifteenth Amendment proved so ineffective in its first century that Goldwin Smith, a British-born attorney who presented plans for reforming the Constitution in 1898, favorably cited a petition by Louisiana and other states to repeal it. Ironically, at about the same time, a number of attorneys unsuccessfully argued that the amendment had been so revolutionary and so contrary to American federalism that it had violated implicit constitutional limitations on the constitutional amending process.

However impotent it seemed, in time the amendment provided authority not only for some of the Supreme Court decisions that invalidated its evasions but also for congressional legislation. In 1957 Congress adopted the first of a number of civil rights acts designed to overcome the paucity of southern African American voters. These acts reached their high point with the adoption of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. Relying on congressional enforcement powers in Section 2 of the Fifteenth Amendment, this law suspended the use of literacy tests in seven southern states and used U.S. marshals to register voters. The law further prohibited states from adopting new laws that might restrict black suffrage without federal clearance. Justice Hugo Black was the only justice to object to this provision when the Supreme Court upheld this and other provisions in South Carolina v. Katzenbach (1966). Congress subsequently extended the Voting Rights Act in 1970, 1975, 1982, and 2006.

In 1964 the Twenty-fourth Amendment prohibited the imposition of poll taxes in federal elections. Relying chiefly on the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, the Supreme Court subsequently extended this ban to state elections in Harper v. Virginia Board of Elections (1966). Since the Supreme Court's decision in Baker v. Carr (1962) ruling that issues of state legislative apportionment are justiciable (that is, subject to judicial intervention), the Supreme Court has increasingly overseen state plans for legislative apportionment. In recent years, it has looked with increased suspicion at plans that used racial classifications to configure districts, sometimes even in cases where states used such plans to increase rather than to restrict minority representation. The Court has clearly understood the Fifteenth Amendment as giving it a broad mandate to oversee voting issues.

Questions for Further Study

1. When members of Congress debated the language of the Fifteenth Amendment, they had to decide whether to include protections for women as well as for African American men. Would it have been better for them to sponsor an amendment to protect the rights of both groups that might go down in defeat or for them to do what they chose to do? What do you think might have been the consequences of linking these two rights together?

2. Once federal troops withdrew in 1877 and southerners elected Democrats who opposed racial equality, the Fifteenth Amendment largely remained a virtual dead letter in the South. What, if anything, do you think the authors of the amendment might have done to preclude later evasions through literacy tests, all-white primaries, poll taxes, and the like?

3. Once the Nineteenth Amendment was adopted in 1920, women had few problems accessing the polls. How can you account for the relative success of the Nineteenth Amendment compared with the relative failure (especially in its early years) of the Fifteenth Amendment?

4. Literacy tests and poll taxes proved to be central obstacles to African American voting. Do you think it is possible to make a nonracist argument on behalf of one or both of these mechanisms? How would you make such an argument? Do you think it is convincing? Do you think literacy tests that are administered fairly might encourage people who would not otherwise do so to get an education?

5. Today laws restrict relatively few groups from voting. Restrictions vary from state to state, but they include limits on voting for felons, former felons, the mentally ill, noncitizens, and individuals under the age of eighteen. Do you think any of these restrictions should be lifted? If so, which ones? Explain.

6. The political landscape has changed considerably since the states ratified the Fifteenth Amendment in 1870. Do you think any existing state would seek to reimpose restrictions on African American voting if there was no such amendment today? Generally, do you think it more likely that the national government or the states might seek to restrict such rights?

7. Do you think it is permissible to apportion districts to maximize the likelihood that members of minority races will be able to elect members of their own race? Do you consider such apportionment essentially similar to or qualitatively different from attempting to maximize party advantage?

See also Dred Scott v. Sandford (1857); Emancipation Proclamation (1863); Black Code of Mississippi (1865); Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1865); Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1868); Plessy v. Ferguson (1896); Guinn v. United States (1915); South Carolina v. Katzenbach (1966).

Further Reading

■ Books

Amar, Akhil R. America's Constitution: A Biography. New York: Random House, 2005.

Bernstein, R. B. "Fifteenth Amendment." In Constitutional Amendments: 1789 to the Present, ed. Kris E. Palmer. Detroit: Gale Group, 2000.

Cogan, Neil H. The Complete Reconstruction Amendments and Statutes. 6 vols. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2006.

Gillette, William. The Right to Vote: Politics and the Passage of the Fifteenth Amendment. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1965.

Grimes, Alan P. Democracy and the Amendments to the Constitution. Lexington, Mass.: Lexington Books, 1978.

Keyssar, Alexander. The Right to Vote: The Contested History of Democracy in the United States. New York: Basic Books, 2000.

Kyvig, David E. Explicit and Authentic Acts: Amending the U.S. Constitution, 1776–1995. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1996.

Mathews, John M. Legislative and Judicial History of the Fifteenth Amendment. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1909.

McFeely, William S. Frederick Douglass. New York: W. W. Norton, 1991.

Pendergast, Tom, et al. Constitutional Amendments: From Freedom of Speech to Flag Burning. 3 vols. Detroit, Mich.: UXL, 2001.

Vile, John R. Encyclopedia of Constitutional Amendments, Proposed Amendments, and Amending Issues, 1789–2002. 2nd ed. Santa Barbara, Calif.: ABC-CLIO, 2003.

■ Web Sites

"First Inaugural Address of Ulysses S. Grant." Avalon Project at Yale Law School Web site.
http://www.yale.edu/lawweb/avalon/presiden/inaug/grant1.htm.

Stanton, Elizabeth Cady. "Declaration of Sentiments and Resolutions, Seneca Falls Convention, 1848." Furman University Web site.
http://facweb.furman.edu/~benson/seneca-falls.cmu.

"The Voting Rights Act of 1965." U.S. Department of Justice Web site.
http://www.usdoj.gov/crt/voting/intro/intro_b.htm.

"Voting Rights Act: Timeline." American Civil Liberties Union Web site.
http://www.votingrights.org/timeline/?year=1700.

—John R. Vile

Document Text

Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution

A Resolution Proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of both Houses concurring) that the following article be proposed to the legislature of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which, when ratified by three-fourths of said legislatures shall be valid as part of the Constitution, namely:

♦ Article XV

Section 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude—

Section 2. The Congress shall have the power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Glossary

abridged	curtailed
servitude	slavery

Illustration from* Harper's Weekly *of two Ku Klux Klan members in their disguises (Library of Congress)

Ku Klux Klan Act

1871

"Each and every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high crime."

Overview

During the Reconstruction era after the Civil War, the U.S. Congress passed four Civil Rights Acts, on April 9, 1866; May 31, 1870; April 20, 1871; and March 1, 1875. The third is also known as the Ku Klux Klan (KKK) Act. Collectively, these acts are sometimes called Enforcement Acts, for they were intended to create a more just and racially inclusive American culture by enforcing the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution, which, together with the Thirteenth Amendment abolishing slavery, are often called the Reconstruction Amendments. While the Civil Rights Acts all shaped and protected the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, the KKK Act specifically aimed at violence and conspiracies perpetrated against black Americans.

Context

Postwar civil rights legislation represented a series of compromises between various factions within the Republican Party. Founded in 1854, the Republican Party was a coalition of several mid-nineteenth-century political organizations: Whigs, Free-Soilers, Know-Nothings, and even some pro-Union Democrats. Arriving at a political agenda or platform proved difficult, though by the time of Reconstruction most members of the party supported increased civil rights for blacks. Just what constituted "civil rights," however, was a matter of endless and evolving debate. For the radical minority of the party—the so-called Radical Republicans—civil rights included not only "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" but also the full range of political and social rights, such as voting, jury participation, and equal access to public accommodations.

The Civil War brought an end to slavery in America, thus freeing over four million blacks. But Americans confronted two major challenges in the aftermath of war: the terms of readmission for southern states and the extent of assimilation for freedmen. Most white southerners resented punitive actions against them and resisted attempts to treat blacks as citizens. Southern legislatures passed oppressive laws, called Black Codes, which subjugated blacks in a manner essentially tantamount to slavery by prohibiting their right to vote, carry weapons in public places, work in certain occupations, and sit on juries and by limiting their right to testify against white people in court. Any effort to ensure peace and protect blacks through postwar military rule seemed as necessary to northerners as it was objectionable to southerners.

To assist freedmen to begin anew, Republicans in Congress established the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands (more commonly called the Freedmen's Bureau) on March 3, 1865, hoping to destroy all remnants of the white power structure in the South. The bureau was largely intended to shield the lives, interests, and rights of black Americans. After the congressional election of 1866 and the further radicalization of the Republican Party, Congress passed four Reconstruction Acts in 1867 and 1868. Those acts created five military districts in the seceded states, required approval of new southern state constitutions by Congress, granted voting rights to all adult males in southern states, and forced southern states to ratify the Reconstruction Amendments.

Additionally, Congress passed a series of Civil Rights Acts. The first, passed April 9, 1866, consisted of ten sections and was titled "An Act to protect all Persons in the United States in their Civil Rights, and furnish the Means of their Vindication." Congress designed its legislation in conjunction with the Fourteenth Amendment in an effort to constitutionalize civil rights; it was this amendment that guaranteed to all citizens "due process" and "equal protection" under the law. The chief effect of the act was to confirm the citizenship of all persons born in the United States. To fortify black rights, Congress passed further legislation, reenacting sections of the previous act in the much longer Civil Rights Act of 1870, intended primarily to enforce the Fifteenth Amendment and the right of blacks to vote. This act established criminal penalties for anyone caught interfering with federal elections. Yet white southerners remained recalcitrant, forcing Congress to amend the act of 1870 with the Force Act of February 28, 1871. The Force Act stipulated that

Time Line

1865

- December 6
  The Thirteenth Amendment, abolishing slavery, is ratified.
- March 3
  The Freedmen's Bureau is established by Congress at the request of President Abraham Lincoln.
- December 24
  The Ku Klux Klan is formed in Pulaski, Tennessee.

1866

- April 9
  Congress passes the Civil Rights Act of 1866, making citizens of "all persons born in the United States."

1868

- July 9
  The Fourteenth Amendment, guaranteeing due process and equal protection under the law, is ratified.

1870

- May 31
  Congress passes the Civil Rights Act of 1870 (also called the Enforcement Act) to protect voting rights.

1871

- March
  South Carolina governor Robert Kingston Scott requests federal support to suppress the Ku Klux Klan, and President Ulysses S. Grant asks Congress for emergency relief.
- April 20
  Congress passes the Civil Rights Act of 1871—the KKK Act—to enforce the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment.
- October 17
  President Grant suspends habeas corpus in nine counties in South Carolina, leading to mass arrests of Klansmen.
- November
  The first of two waves of trials of the Ku Klux Klan are conducted in Columbia, South Carolina; a second wave would begin in April 1872.

1875

- March 1
  President Grant signs the Civil Rights Act, guaranteeing equal treatment in "public accommodations."

> all citizens of the United States who are or shall be otherwise qualified by law to vote at any election by the people in any State, Territory, district, county, city, parish, township, school district, municipality, or other territorial subdivision, shall be entitled and allowed to vote at all such elections, without distinction of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; any constitution, law, custom, usage, or regulation of any State or Territory, or by or under its authority, to the contrary notwithstanding.

Despite the ongoing efforts of Congress to peaceably readmit seceded states while simultaneously protecting freedmen, southern legislatures continued to write Black Codes and to impose literacy tests and poll taxes to prevent blacks from voting. At the same time, violence escalated even further throughout the South. Some southerners mounted a campaign of intimidation and murder against blacks and white Republicans in order to preserve white supremacy and prevent black citizenship. Whites were especially eager to inhibit black participation on juries and in elections.

In this environment, various white supremacist vigilante groups appeared, organized under banners such as the Men of Justice, the Pale Faces, the White Brotherhood, the Order of the Rose, and the Constitutional Union Guards. Perhaps the most egregious and methodical perpetrator of hostilities was the Ku Klux Klan, first organized by a group of six middle-class Confederate veterans from Pulaski, Tennessee, on December 24, 1865. Originally intended as a social group, the Klan became a paramilitary extension of the southern Democrats that quickly terrorized blacks throughout the South.

Within a year of its founding, the Klan consisted of several state organizations, each constituted as a Realm managed by a Grand Dragon, the entire organization led by Confederate general Nathan Forrest as Grand Wizard of the Empire. Klansmen (also called Ghouls), posing as ghosts of Confederate dead returned from the battlefield, dressed themselves and their horses in white robes and sheets. These horrifying disguises were employed during midnight rides of unlimited terror, usually intended to keep blacks from the election booths. They left thousands of dead blacks in their wake. In November 1868 alone, Louisiana residents killed 1,081 (mostly black) persons, a level of violence worse than the lynching spree of the late-nineteenth- and early-twentieth-century Jim Crow era. Although the KKK was disbanded during the 1870s, in 1915 the Klan reappeared in even larger numbers, reaching a peak membership of nearly five million by the mid-1920s.

By March 1871, violence against blacks had become sufficiently uncontrollable in South Carolina that Governor Robert Kingston Scott requested federal assistance to restore order. A former Union general and commissioner of the South Carolina Freedmen's Bureau, Scott was a Republican and the first governor of reconstructed South Carolina. As governor, Scott oversaw a massive increase in state debt (already quite large when he took office), thus provoking partisan-induced impeachment proceedings against him by the state assembly. Scott held on to his office, however, allowing him to wage war against the KKK.

Both the legislative and executive branches of the federal government responded to events in South Carolina and Scott's request. President Ulysses S. Grant had already created the Office of Solicitor General to assist the attorney general in prosecuting Klansmen, and Congress had passed the Judiciary Act of 1869 to increase the number of federal judges in the South. In March 1871, after hearing from Governor Scott, Grant asked Congress for emergency legislation, resulting in another enforcement act, namely the Civil Rights Act of 1871, also called the KKK Act. Congress also created the Department of Justice, which began operations on July 1, 1870, to help combat the KKK. Since so many southern police belonged to the Klan, Congress enabled the president to use federal troops in suppressing racial violence. The KKK Act also allowed the president to suspend habeas corpus, creating the possibility of mass arrests without individual charges or court proceedings. Following the act, President Grant issued a proclamation ordering the South Carolina KKK to disperse and surrender its weapons. When the Klan refused to submit to those orders, Grant suspended habeas corpus and sent federal troops to make arrests. Within two months, hundreds of Klansmen were arrested in South Carolina, while many others fled the state. Because the state judicial system could not handle the vast number of defendants, however, most of them were soon released.

Caricature of Radical Republicans bribing African Americans to give false testimony of atrocities and intimidation by the Democrats (Library of Congress)

About the Author

Among the radical leaders of the Republican Party was Benjamin Franklin Butler, the primary author of the KKK Act. Born in Deerfield, New Hampshire, on November 5, 1818, and named for the Founding Father Benjamin Franklin, Butler grew up in Lowell, Massachusetts, where his widowed mother ran a boardinghouse. After graduating from Waterville College (now Colby College) in Maine, Butler was admitted to the bar in Massachusetts. He began his political career as a Democrat and served in the Massachusetts legislature throughout the 1850s, which established his military rank of brigadier general at the start of the Civil War. Butler participated actively in the Democratic Convention of 1860, yet Republican president Abraham Lincoln was so impressed by the general's early and aggressive support for the Union that he appointed Butler as third-highest-ranking major general of the U.S. Volunteers. Nicknamed "Spoons" for his alleged habit of relieving southern homes of their silverware during his harsh administration of New Orleans after the Union recaptured it during the war (earning him, too, the nickname Butler the Beast), Butler also became famous at Virginia's Fort Monroe in 1861 for refusing to return escaped slaves to their masters and thereby creating the notion of slaves as "contraband" of war. After the war, Butler served in the U.S. House of Representatives (1867–1875 and 1877–1879) and as governor of Massachusetts in 1883–1884.

Despite his previous Democratic affiliation, Butler emerged from the Civil War as a devoted Republican; in fact, he could be counted among the more radical members of the party. Along with the U.S. senator of his state, Charles Sumner, Butler proposed the highly progressive Civil Rights Act of 1875, which banned racial discrimination in public accommodations. Butler had already demonstrated his dedication to civil rights, however, with the KKK Act.

During his career, Butler participated in many historic events. As a congressional representative he managed the impeachment trial of President Andrew Johnson in 1868, whereas as governor of Massachusetts he is remembered for having appointed the nation's first Irish American judge, the first African American judge (George Lewis Ruffin), and the first woman to executive office (Clara Barton). His shifting political affiliations, from antebellum Democrat to postwar Radical Republican to post-Reconstruction Greenback (a minor party that advocated the continued use of paper currency) to Democratic governor, are not unique and speak to the enormous social upheaval of the era. Butler died on January 11, 1893, in Washington, D.C.

Senator Benjamin Butler of Massachusetts (Library of Congress)

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

The KKK Act, written in dense, repetitive legislative language, consists of seven sections, the first of which is an unnumbered preamble of sorts, establishing the primary purpose of the act. It states that any person, even a person acting within the law of his state, who deprives a citizen of his or her rights as a citizen can be prosecuted in the U.S. federal courts. This section of the act, now codified as Section 1983 of the U.S. Code, remains the most influential portion of the KKK Act.

The longest section of the KKK Act, section 2, provided the core of this new legislation. Its focus is on conspiracies, that is, the effort by two or more persons to "conspire together to overthrow, or to put down, or to destroy by force the government of the United States." It goes on to list various ways in which this could be done, including the use of force or intimidation, delaying or hindering the execution of laws, seizing U.S. property, and in particular using force or intimidation to prevent a U.S. officer from executing his duty. Additionally, the section specifies any effort to "deter" a party from serving as a witness in court, using force or intimidation to prevent a juror from serving or to influence his verdict, preventing a person from holding public office, or impeding a person from exercising the right to vote. In a broader sense, it prohibited any conspiracy that would deprive a person of equal protection under the law. These offenses would be regarded as high crimes punishable by fines of not less than $500 and not more than $5,000 or imprisonment for not less than six months or more than six years, possibly consisting of hard labor. Notice that the emphasis is on conspiracies, on the actions of "two or more persons." Clearly, the act was targeted at the KKK and similar organizations that conspired to do just the sorts of things this section of the act specifies. Although the KKK began as a fraternal organization, it quickly evolved into a terrorist one. Usually its victims were black leaders, such as ministers, politicians, teachers, or former soldiers. It used floggings, beatings, and rape to intimidate and undermine Reconstruction. In 1868, an election year, the KKK was behind as many as two thousand political assassinations throughout the South. Many of them were carried out with the approval and even support of the Democratic Party.

Section 3, after essentially repeating much of the material from the second section, begins to stipulate the powers the act grants to the president. In the event that a state is unable or unwilling to prevent the offenses from Section 2 (laboriously repeated so as not to leave any uncertainty), the president can call out the militia or the army and navy to enforce the act, with or without the state's request. Section 4 stipulates a further power: that if any of the "unlawful combinations" named in section 3 are organized and armed, "and so numerous and powerful as to be able … to either overthrow or set at defiance" the authorities, or when the threat to public safety is great, the president can suspend the writ of habeas corpus as part of the federal effort to suppress the insurgency. Habeas corpus is a Latin term used commonly in the law; its literal meaning is "you shall have the body," and it refers to the obligation of the government to specify charges against a person who has been arrested and to conduct a trial (and thus not to conduct secret arrests and detentions). By suspending habeas corpus, the authorities have the power to arrest and detain people indefinitely without bringing charges against them or bringing them to trial. Suspension of habeas corpus is an extreme measure that has been taken principally during wartime. Abraham Lincoln took the step during the Civil War, as did Woodrow Wilson during World War I. In the twenty-first century, the issue of habeas corpus has arisen in connection with the detention of suspected terrorists in facilities such as the U.S. base at Guantánamo Bay in Cuba.

The remaining sections of the act are relatively procedural by comparison to the previous ones. Section 5 states that conspirators of the sorts listed could not serve on a grand or petit jury hearing a case arising as a result of this act. A grand jury is one that determines whether there is enough evidence for a case to go to trial; it does not determine guilt or innocence. A petit jury is one that actually hears the case in open court. Additionally, jurors would be required to take an oath swearing that they had never participated in such conspiracies—which would prove to be a problem in South Carolina, where affiliation with the Klan was widespread. Section 6 states that any person who failed to report a KKK Act conspiracy could be treated as a participant to that conspiracy; this provision has been codified in Section 1986 of the U.S. Code. Finally, Section 7 defines the act as supporting, rather than repealing, any and all previous civil rights legislation.

Essential Quotes

"Be it enacted by the Senate and Home of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any person who … shall subject, or cause to be subjected, any person within the jurisdiction of the United States to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution of the United States, shall … be liable to the party injured in any action at law."

(Paragraph 1)

"Each and every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high crime."

(Section 2)

"It shall be lawful for the President, and it shall be his duty to take such measures, by the employment of the militia or the land and naval forces of the United States, or of either, or by other means, as he may deem necessary for the suppression of such insurrection, domestic violence, or combinations."

(Section 3)

"It shall be lawful for the President of the United States, when in his judgment the public safety shall require it, to suspend the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus."

(Section 4)

Audience

The first Enforcement Act (1870) failed to curtail racial violence in the South. Klansmen seemed particularly unimpressed by the law, prompting President Grant to send troops to South Carolina under the command of Major Lewis Merrill. Reacting to the spiraling violence throughout the region, Congress passed yet another enforcement act, tailored even more specifically toward the Klan. The KKK Act served as a stern rebuke and warning to all white supremacists in the South. Democrats and conservative Republicans complained that Congress exceeded its constitutional authority over individuals and dangerously enlarged presidential power. Radical Republicans, by contrast, worried more about the threat posed by paramilitary organizations, compelling them to send a definitive message to the Ku Klux Klan.

Impact

The KKK Act engendered a heroic, though brief, unfunded, and undermanned assault upon racial violence in the South. During Reconstruction, the KKK Act, in conjunction with federal troops (as opposed to state militias), helped suppress the Ku Klux Klan. Partly due to black jurors' presence in federal courts, numerous Klansmen were successfully prosecuted, fined, and imprisoned, most notably in South Carolina. After the KKK trials in South Carolina, the Klan effectively disappeared in America until 1915.

The South Carolina Ku Klux Klan trials stand out as a singular moment in the nineteenth-century campaign for civil rights. On October 12, 1871, President Grant declared nine counties of South Carolina in a state of rebellion and sent in federal troops. Yet Klan-related murders continued.

Thus, on October 17, he suspended habeas corpus in those counties, enabling mass arrests of Klansmen under the KKK Act. Grant's actions had the effect of emptying the streets while filling the jails of South Carolina.

Circuit Court Judge Hugh Lennox Bond of Maryland—recently appointed by President Grant because of his courageous commitment to civil rights—and District Judge George Seabrook Bryan of South Carolina presided over the KKK trials. Far from being an impartial jurist, Bond saw himself as part of a federal team of Klan busters. Bryan was a Democrat and former slaveholder appointed by President Andrew Johnson; his Carolina district court had acquitted most Klansmen. Democrats raised a substantial sum of money for the defense to hire the former U.S. senator from Maryland, Reverdy Johnson, and the former attorney general (under Andrew Johnson), Henry Stanbery, both vocal critics of Republican Reconstruction policy. David T. Corbin, a prominent South Carolina Republican who graduated from Dartmouth College before practicing law in Vermont, handled the prosecution.

The trials began on November 28, 1871, with both sides fully prepared for a major constitutional battle. The fact that the KKK Act required prospective jurors to swear they had never participated in the Klan partly explains the court's difficulty in forming a jury. Fifteen of the twenty-one grand jurors and two-thirds of the petit jurors were black, increasing both the probability of convictions and the animus of local whites.

More than simply deciding the fate of the Klan and the authority of the KKK Act, the court addressed the meaning of Reconstruction, the reach of the amended Constitution, and the fate of civil rights. The prosecution wanted a clear precedent for black rights, arguing that the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments confirmed positive rights and applied the Bill of Rights against the states, while the defense sought to preserve federal-state relations, insisting that the Reconstruction Amendments did nothing to alter the existing federal system. Ultimately, the court heard many cases during its November 1871 and April 1872 terms; thousands of Klansmen were indicted, and over six hundred were convicted. In the first set of trials, the sentences—fines and imprisonment—were relatively light. In the second set the government concentrated on murder cases, and the court imposed eight- and ten-year prison sentences. Although the KKK Act penalties proved less harsh than criminal penalties for murder, it is unlikely that southern state courts would have found Klansmen guilty at all, so the sentences were regarded as better than nothing.

The KKK trials were more than the courts could handle. The sheer number of offenders was too great for an already stretched judiciary. It did not help that defendants were often wealthy whites while the victims were poor blacks. Klansmen cleverly admitted to their crimes in exchange for leniency, which was generally granted. To make matters worse, Democrats constantly criticized the government for partisan excess, militarily despotism, and executive tyranny. Indeed, even northern Democrats denied the existence of the Klan, suggesting it was a partisan fiction of the Republican Party. Despite success in South Carolina, Attorney General Amos Akerman admitted the inadequacy of the federal judiciary to end Klan violence. Thereafter the judiciary focused on ringleaders of the Klan, though prosecutions became increasingly difficult to achieve. By the spring of 1873, prosecutions under the KKK Act were discontinued. While the Klan was temporarily defeated, white supremacy and racial violence remained a fixture in southern life.

The Civil Rights Act of 1875 represents Congress's final attempt to secure civil rights for blacks. The act proved controversial from the moment it was proposed in 1870, not least for its attempt to eliminate segregation in all forms and for redefining civil rights to include what most Americans understood as "social rights." Even many Republicans objected to desegregation in schools, churches, and cemeteries. The notion that Congress could regulate private persons or companies was especially contentious, with Democrats and conservative Republicans repeatedly insisting that the law was unconstitutional and would never be upheld by the Supreme Court.

The 1875 act met with mixed treatment from federal circuit courts before being ruled unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. Hundreds of civil rights cases were tried and appealed during the late 1870s and early 1880s, with federal judges in Pennsylvania, Texas, Maryland, and Kentucky holding the act constitutional, while in New York, Tennessee, Missouri, Kansas, and other states, divided federal circuit courts sent the issue to the Supreme Court, where some of the act's provisions were ruled unconstitutional in the Civil Rights Cases of 1883.

Meanwhile, the Supreme Court impaired the effectiveness of the KKK Act by limiting the reach of the Fourteenth Amendment. In the Slaughter-House Cases (1873) the Court held that the Fourteenth Amendment protected the privileges and immunities only of national, not state, citizenship. Civil rights were thereafter deemed to be privileges of state citizenship and protected by the states. In United States v. Reese (1876), the Court held that Congress went beyond its constitutional authority in various parts of the Enforcement Acts. Since the KKK Act was intended to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment, those decisions rendered the act essentially obsolete. Subsequent Supreme Court decisions, including United States v. Cruikshank in 1876 and Virginia v. Rives in 1880, narrowed the Fourteenth Amendment even further, insisting that it applied only to state action. The Court's decision in United States v. Harris (1883) invalidated the criminal conspiracy section of the KKK Act for the same reason. Finally, when Democrats regained control of Congress later in the nineteenth century, they repealed certain elements of the Enforcement Acts.

Even today, however, federally codified portions of the KKK Act help protect the rights of U.S. citizens. The federal code allows people to sue for state and local violations of federal law and the Constitution. A very broad range of cases are litigated involving equal protection and due process rights as well as constitutional rights applied to the states by the Fourteenth Amendment and subsequent federal statutes. Also, the federal code allows citizens to sue if they are injured by conspiracies formed to prevent an officer of the United States from performing official duties, for obstructing justice, or for depriving others of the equal protection of the laws. The language of these statutes remains largely unchanged from the KKK Act of 1871.

See also Emancipation Proclamation (1863); Black Code of Mississippi (1865); Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1865); Testimony before the Joint Committee on Reconstruction on Atrocities in the South against Blacks (1866); Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1868); Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1870); United States v. Cruikshank (1876); Civil Rights Cases (1883).

Further Reading

■ Articles

Kaczorowski, Robert J. "Federal Enforcement of Civil Rights during the First Reconstruction." Fordham Urban Law Journal 23 (Fall 1995): 155–186.

■ Books

Butler, Benjamin F. Autobiography and Personal Reminiscences of Major-General Benj. F. Butler: Butler's Book. Boston: A. M. Thayer, 1892.

Horn, Stanley F. Invisible Empire: The Story of the Ku Klux Klan, 1866–1871. Montclair, N.J.: Patterson Smith, 1939.

Ingalls, Robert P. Hoods: The Story of the Ku Klux Klan. New York: Putnam, 1979.

Schwartz, Bernard, ed. Civil Rights: Statutory History of the United States. New York: Chelsea House, 1970.

Trelease, Allen W. White Terror: The Ku Klux Klan Conspiracy and Southern Reconstruction. 1971. Reprint. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1995.

Williams, Lou Falkner. The Great South Carolina Ku Klux Klan Trials, 1871–1872. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1996.

■ Web Sites

South Carolina Ku Klux Klan Trials: 1871–72. Law Library—American Law and Legal Information Web site.
http://law.jrank.org/pages/2615/South-Carolina-Ku-Klux-Klan-Trials-1871-72.html.

—R. Owen Williams

Questions for Further Study

1. What were the Black Codes, as exemplified by the Black Code of Mississippi (1865), and why did they make the Ku Klux Klan Act, along with the other Enforcement Acts, necessary in the post–Civil War period?

2. For decades after the Civil War, many people in the former Confederacy bitterly resented what they saw as the intrusion of the victorious North in southern affairs. Try to imagine a different set of historical circumstances in which the North approached the issue of Reconstruction differently. What do you think would have been the effect on newly freed slaves of your alternative version of history?

3. Habeas corpus is one of the fundamental liberties of Americans. What is habeas corpus, and under what circumstances might it be suspended? Do you see any similarity between the president's power to suspend habeas corpus under the Ku Klux Klan Act and the power of twenty-first-century presidents to do so in cases involving suspected terrorism? Explain.

4. For a period of time in the late nineteenth century the Ku Klux Klan was in eclipse, before its resurgence in the early twentieth century. What events led to a period of lessening Klan activity and influence?

5. Read this document in light of the 1876 U.S. Supreme Court case United States v. Cruikshank. In what sense did the Court's decision in that case have the effect of partially undermining the Ku Klux Klan Act?

Document Text

Ku Klux Klan Act

Forty-Second Congress. Sess I.

♦ Chap XXII—*An Act to enforce the Provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and for other Purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and Home of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any person who, under color of any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage of any State, shall subject, or cause to be subjected, any person within the jurisdiction of the United States to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution of the United States, shall, any such law, statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage of the State to the contrary notwithstanding, be liable to the party injured in any action at law, suit in equity, or other proper proceeding for redress; such proceeding to be prosecuted in the several district or circuit courts of the United States, with and subject to the same rights of appeal, review upon error, and other remedies provided in like cases in such courts, under the provisions of the act of the ninth of April, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, entitled "An act to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights, and to furnish the means of their vindication"; and the other remedial laws of the United States which are in their nature applicable in such cases.

Sec. 2. That if two or more persons within any State or Territory of the United States shall conspire together to overthrow, or to put down, or to destroy by force the government of the United States, or to levy war against the United States, or to oppose by force the authority of the government of the United States, or by force, intimidation, or threat to prevent, hinder, or delay the execution of any law of the United States, or by force to seize, take, or possess any property of the United States contrary to the authority thereof, or by force, intimidation, or threat to prevent any person from accepting or holding any office or trust or place of confidence under the United States, or from discharging the duties thereof, or by force, intimidation, or threat to induce any officer of the United States to leave any State, district, or place where his duties as such officer might lawfully be performed, or to injure him in his person or property on account of his lawful discharge of the duties of his office, or to injure his person while engaged in the lawful discharge of the duties of his office, or to injure his property so as to molest, interrupt, hinder, or impede him in the discharge of his official duty, or by force, intimidation, or threat to deter any party or witness in any court of the United States from attending such court, or from testifying in any matter pending in such court fully, freely, and truthfully, or to injure any such party or witness in his person or property on account of his having so attended or testified, or by force, intimidation, or threat to influence the verdict, presentment, or indictment, of any juror or grand juror in any court of the United States, or to injure such juror in his person or property on account of any verdict, presentment, or indictment lawfully assented to by him, or on account of his being or having been such juror, or shall conspire together, or go in disguise upon the public highway or upon the premises of another for the purpose, either directly or indirectly, of depriving any person or any class of persons of the equal protection of the laws, or of equal privileges or immunities under the laws, or for the purpose of preventing or hindering the constituted authorities of any State from giving or securing to all persons within such State the equal protection of the laws, or shall conspire together for the purpose of in any manner impeding, hindering, obstructing, or defeating the due course of justice in any State or Territory, with intent to deny to any citizen of the United States the due and equal protection of the laws, or to injure any person in his person or his property for lawfully enforcing the right of any person or class of persons to the equal protection of the laws, or by force, intimidation, or threat to prevent any citizen of the United States lawfully entitled to vote from giving his support or advocacy in a lawful manner towards or in favor of the election of any lawfully qualified person as an elector of President or Vice-President of the United States, or as a member of the Congress of the United States, or to injure any such citizen in his person or property on account of such support or advocacy, each and every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high crime, and, upon conviction thereof in any district or circuit court of the United States or district or supreme court of any Territory of the United States having jurisdiction of similar offences, shall be punished by a fine not less than five hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment, with or without hard labor, as the court may determine, for a period of not less than six months nor more than six years, as the court may determine, or by both such fine and imprisonment as the court shall determine. And if any one or more persons engaged in any such conspiracy shall do, or cause to be done, any act in furtherance of the object of such conspiracy, whereby any person shall be injured in his person or property, or deprived of having and exercising any right or privilege of a citizen of the United States, the person so injured or deprived of such rights and privileges may have and maintain an action for the recovery of damages occasioned by such injury or deprivation of rights and privileges against any one or more of the persons engaged in such conspiracy, such action to be prosecuted in the proper district or circuit court of the United States, with and subject to the same rights of appeal, review upon error, and other remedies provided in like cases in such courts under the provisions of the act of April ninth, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, entitled "An act to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights, and to furnish the means of their vindication."

Document Text

Sec. 3. That in all cases where insurrection, domestic violence, unlawful combinations, or conspiracies in any State shall so obstruct or hinder the execution of the laws thereof, and of the United States, as to deprive any portion or class of the people of such State of any of the rights, privileges, or immunities, or protection, named in the Constitution and secured by this act, and the constituted authorities of such State shall either be unable to protect, or shall, from any cause, fail in or refuse protection of the people in such rights, such facts shall be deemed a denial by such State of the equal protection of the laws to which they are entitled under the Constitution of the United States; and in all such cases, or whenever any such insurrection, violence, unlawful combination, or conspiracy shall oppose or obstruct the laws of the United States or the due execution thereof, or impede or obstruct the due course of justice under the same, it shall be lawful for the President, and it shall be his duty to take such measures, by the employment of the militia or the land and naval forces of the United States, or of either, or by other means, as he may deem necessary for the suppression of such insurrection, domestic violence, or combinations; and any person who shall be arrested under the provisions of this and the preceding section shall be delivered to the marshal of the proper district, to be dealt with according to law.

Sec. 4. That whenever in any State or part of a State the unlawful combinations named in the preceding section of this act shall be organized and armed, and so numerous and powerful as to be able, by violence, to either overthrow or set at defiance the constituted authorities of such State, and of the United States within such State, or when the constituted authorities are in complicity with, or shall connive at the unlawful purposes of, such powerful and armed combinations; and whenever, by reason of either or all of the causes aforesaid, the conviction of such offenders and the preservation of the public safety shall become in such district impracticable, in every such case such combinations shall be deemed a rebellion against the government of the United States, and during the continuance, of such rebellion, and within the limits of the district which shall be so under the sway thereof, such limits to be prescribed by proclamation, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, when in his judgment the public safety shall require it, to suspend the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus, to the end that such rebellion may be overthrown: Provided, That all the provisions of the second section of an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March third, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, which relate to the discharge of prisoners other than prisoners of war, and to the penalty for refusing to obey the order of the court, shall be in full force so far as the same are applicable to the provisions of this section: Provided further. That the President shall first have made proclamation, as now provided by law, commanding such insurgents to disperse: And provided also, That the provisions of this section shall not be in force after the end of the next regular session of Congress.

Sec. 5. That no person shall be a grand or petit juror in any court of the United States upon any inquiry, hearing, or trial of any suit, proceeding, or prosecution based upon or arising under the provisions of this act who shall, in the judgment of the court, be in complicity with any such combination or conspiracy; and every such juror shall, before entering upon any such inquiry, hearing, or trial, take and subscribe an oath in open court that he has never, directly or indirectly, counselled, advised, or voluntarily aided any such combination or conspiracy; and each and every person who shall take this oath, and shall therein swear falsely, shall be guilty of perjury, and shall be subject to the pains and penalties declared against that crime, and the first section of the act entitled "An act defining additional causes of challenge and prescribing an additional oath for grand and petit jurors in the United States courts," approved June seventeenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Document Text

Sec. 6. That any person or persons, having knowledge that any of the wrongs conspired to be done and mentioned in the second section of this act are about to be committed, and having power to prevent or aid in preventing the same, shall neglect or refuse so to do, and such wrongful act shall be committed, such person or persons shall be liable to the person injured, or his legal representatives, for all damages caused by any such wrongful act which such first-named person or persons by reasonable diligence could have prevented; and such damages may be recovered in an action on the case in the proper circuit court of the United States, and any number of persons guilty of such wrongful neglect or refusal may be joined as defendants in such action: Provided, That such action shall be commenced within one year after such cause of action shall have accrued; and if the death of any person shall be caused by any such wrongful act and neglect, the legal representatives of such deceased person shall have such action therefor, and may recover not exceeding five thousand dollars damages therein, for the benefit of the widow of such deceased person, if any there be, or if there be no widow, for the benefit of the next of kin of such deceased person.

Sec. 7. That nothing herein contained shall be construed to supersede or repeal any former act or law except so far as the same may be repugnant thereto; and any offences heretofore committed against the tenor of any former act shall be prosecuted, and any proceeding already commenced for the prosecution thereof shall be continued and completed, the same as if this act had not been passed, except so far as the provisions of this act may go to sustain and validate such proceedings.

Approved, April 20, 1871.

Glossary

color	in legal terms, pretense
elector	a member of the Electoral College, which votes for the president and vice president of the United States immunities	the concept that a state cannot deprive citizens from other states of their rights petit juror	a juror in a trial court, as opposed to a grand juror presentment	an accusation of a crime made by a grand jury on its own initiative review upon error	an appeal to a higher court based on the argument that the lower court erred in its ruling suit in equity	a civil suit, as opposed to a criminal proceeding
Territory	any of the areas formed under the authority of the U.S. government that had not yet been admitted to the Union as states writ of habeas corpus	from the Latin for "we shall have the body," the requirement that the government openly specify the charges against and bring to trial a person accused of a crime

Morrison R. Waite (Library of Congress)

United States v. Cruikshank

1876

"We may suspect that race was the cause of the hostility, but it is not so averred."

Overview

United States v. Cruikshank et al. involved an effort to bring to justice three men accused of participating in the slaughter of some one hundred blacks in Colfax, Louisiana, on April 13, 1873, one of the most sensational incidents of Reconstruction political violence. During Reconstruction, the decade-long period after the Civil War, the federal government passed laws to protect blacks from violence and intimidation as they sought to exercise the right to vote. Nonetheless, in Cruikshank, the Supreme Court affirmed a lower federal court's decision to invalidate the result of a previous verdict of guilty and ordered the release of the defendants.

While the Court's decision rested in large part upon its criticism of a poorly drafted indictment, the narrow grounds upon which it based its decision hampered federal efforts to protect blacks from violence. Coupled with another Court decision, United States v. Reese, the Cruikshank decision marked a significant step in the federal government's retreat from Reconstruction. It would be nearly a century before new legislation reaffirmed the federal government's ability and will to protect African Americans in exercising their right to vote.

Context

In the five years following the end of the Civil War, Congress adopted several measures that together removed race as a barrier to African Americans' right to vote. The change was piecemeal in approach but revolutionary in impact. In March and July 1867 and March 1868, the Reconstruction Acts provided for the enfranchisement of African Americans so as to allow them to participate in fresh elections to establish new state constitutions in ten former Confederate states. African Americans also won election as delegates to these conventions, and the ten state constitutions that eventually emerged from this process secured their right to vote. In July 1868 the Fourteenth Amendment guaranteed citizenship for former slaves and equal protection under the law for all, and, while recognizing that the right of suffrage remained one reserved to the states, it provided that a state's representation in the House of Representatives would be reduced in proportion to the state's restrictions upon suffrage. That year, over half a million African Americans voted in the presidential election, providing the Republican candidate Ulysses S. Grant with his popular majority—though he would have still claimed victory in the Electoral College had blacks not voted in such numbers.

Although Republicans achieved much with the enfranchisement of most southern blacks, blacks still could not vote in many other states, including key northern states such as Ohio and Pennsylvania. Republican efforts to secure suffrage for blacks in several northern states between 1865 and 1868 usually fell short of success. With Grant elected, Republicans turned to amending the Constitution once more, this time to remove barriers to voting for American citizens based on "race, color, or previous condition of servitude," as the Fifteenth Amendment would state. Such phrasing recognized that states remained the primary determiners of suffrage qualifications for their citizens but forbade those states from depriving black citizens of the right to vote based on their race. As constitutional amendments are ratified by state legislatures, not by popular vote, and the Republicans then controlled enough state legislatures for ratification, the Fifteenth Amendment became part of the Constitution in 1870.

Southern white supremacist terrorists first targeted black voters during the 1868 presidential contest. By 1870 Congress decided to take action, and on May 31 it passed the Enforcement Act of 1870, designed to provide federal protection for black voters and the means to prosecute white terrorists. In April 1871 another Enforcement Act, also known as the Ku Klux Klan Act, authorized President Grant to suspend the writ of habeas corpus in the effort to subdue such domestic terrorism: Grant used these powers to pursue the Klan in South Carolina in the fall of 1871. However, the Ku Klux Klan Act was of limited duration, and it expired in 1872. That year, a presidential election year, violence broke out in Louisiana during a closely contested local election whose results were disputed. Both Democrats and Republicans claimed victory; with Congress declining to count the state's electoral vote, it remained unclear for weeks which party would gain control of the state government, including

Time Line

1870

- February 3
  The Fifteenth Amendment is ratified, guaranteeing African Americans' right to vote.
- May 31
  The Enforcement Act of 1870 is passed, protecting the right to vote as outlined in the Fifteenth Amendment.

1871

- February 28
  The 1870 Enforcement Act is amended to reduce registration fraud and allow for federal supervision of elections.
- April 20
  The Enforcement Act of 1871, also known as the Ku Klux Klan Act, is passed to punish the acts of white supremacist terrorists.

1873

- April 13
  Some one hundred African Americans gathered at the town courthouse are slaughtered in Colfax, Louisiana.
- June
  In the Colfax case, ninety-eight defendants are indicted by a federal grand jury, charged with violating the Enforcement Act of 1870.

1874

- February 23
  The first trial of nine Colfax defendants begins in federal court.
- April
  The first trial of the Colfax defendants ends in a mistrial for eight defendants and acquittal for the ninth.
- May 18
  The second trial of the eight remaining Colfax defendants begins.
- June 10
  The second Colfax trial ends with guilty verdicts for three defendants, William J. Cruikshank, John P. Hadnot, and William D. Irwin, on sixteen of thirty-two counts.

the governorship. Eventually the Republicans prevailed—but not without outbreaks of violence, the most sensational of which happened in Colfax, in Grant Parish.

Established in 1869 and named after the nation's eighteenth president, Grant Parish is located along the Red River, north of New Orleans, in the heart of Louisiana; the county seat located at Colfax is named after Grant's first vice president, Schuyler Colfax. It soon witnessed its share of political friction and violence: Both parties claimed victory in the 1872 elections. Clashes between blacks and whites subsequently increased, and in the early spring, blacks seeking protection began flocking to the shelter of the Colfax courthouse. Efforts to prevent a confrontation proved futile, and some three hundred whites gathered outside the courthouse. On Easter Sunday, April 13, 1873, the whites first demanded that the blacks surrender; when that proved unavailing, they allowed women and children to depart. Soon after, a firefight between the two sides commenced. Eventually the whites launched an assault on the courthouse, set it on fire, and tracked down those blacks who had fled from the building, killing some and capturing others. That night, the whites slaughtered the remaining black prisoners. Estimates of the dead for the entire day ranged from fifty to some four hundred black men; a federal investigation settling upon 105 known dead black men, with the fates of dozens more remaining unknown.

Federal officials indicted ninety-eight men under the terms of the Enforcement Act of 1870, among them, William J. Cruikshank, John P. Hadnot, and William D. Irwin, who, along with six other men, had been taken into custody by federal authorities. The nine men were tried in New Orleans before the U.S. circuit court judge William B. Woods. The prosecuting district attorney, James R. Beckwith, with a view to presenting a clean case, carefully narrowed the number of victims to two—Levi Nelson and Alexander Tillman, who had not been involved in resisting the whites by force. (Indeed, Nelson survived the massacre and testified for the government.) A first trial acquitted one defendant, while Woods declared a mistrial for the other eight defendants when the jury was unable to agree on a verdict. Those eight men underwent a second trial in May 1874, and on June 10 three men—Cruikshank, Hadnot, and Irwin—were found guilty of violating section 6 of the Enforcement Act of 1870, which stipulated that if two or more people conspired to violate the provisions of the act or to "oppress" any citizen by trying to prevent him from exercising his rights under federal law or the Constitution, such an act would be punished as a felony, with possible fines and imprisonment.

During the second trial, Judge Woods was joined for short periods of time by the Supreme Court associate justice Joseph P. Bradley, who appeared in New Orleans as part of his duties as a federal circuit-court judge—an onerous additional duty performed by all justices of the Supreme Court at the time. Woods was inclined to uphold the convictions, but Bradley dissented and was determined to explain why. His detailed opinion carefully defined federal power to enforce the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments. He argued that while violence inflicted for racial reasons was well within the jurisdiction of federal law, that motive had to be proved: It was insufficient to argue simply that conflict between people of different races must be due to the racial difference. Unless race as a motive could be established, cases of criminal violence should be handled in state court. Turning to the case at hand, Bradley argued that as the indictment did not expressly specify that Nelson and Tillman's rights as U.S. citizens had been violated owing to their race, there was no justification to treat them under federal law. It was an opinion narrow in its reasoning but broad in its implications. As the district attorney who prosecuted the case later complained, "If the demolished indictment is not good, I am incompetent to frame a good one"; Bradley had come close to implying just that. As Bradley and Woods divided on the propriety of the convictions, the punishment was placed in abeyance, or "arrested," while the Supreme Court heard the case.

Between the time of the massacre at Colfax in April 1873 and the Supreme Court's release of its decision nearly three years later, Republican Reconstruction policy suffered a series of serious setbacks that all but doomed the federal government's efforts to protect African Americans as free people, as citizens, and as voters and officeholders. In several southern states, including Alabama, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Texas, Republicans lost their hold on power as the result of political circumstances, terrorism, and internal friction. In Louisiana and Mississippi, violence played a key role in Democrats' resurgence; although Republicans barely held on to power in Louisiana, they lost it in Mississippi, where the Democrats embraced as a slogan a pledge that they would regain power peaceably if they could and forcibly if they must. An economic depression in 1873 had long-term effects and, combined with debates over monetary policy and tales of Republican corruption and malfeasance, resulted in the Democrats' reclaiming control of the House of Representatives in 1874, shutting down any further efforts to pass legislation to protect black citizens from violence and intimidation.

Even President Grant, who had once expressed his willingness to protect black rights, allowed frustration to get the better of him. In a special message to the Senate in January 1875, he made specific reference to the Colfax massacre, "a butchery of citizens … which in bloodthirstiness and barbarity is hardly surpassed by any acts of savage warfare." Nearly two years later, he declared that while critics of Reconstruction waxed eloquent about the missteps of southern Republican regimes, "every one of the Colfax miscreants goes unwhipped of justice, and no way can be found in this boasted land of civilization and Christianity to punish the perpetrators of this bloody and monstrous crime." Grant at length grew exasperated with the fractious behavior of southern Republicans and eroding support in the North for protecting the fruits of victory. When Mississippi's governor requested that federal troops be dispatched to his state in 1875, the president declined, explaining that "the whole public are tired out with these annual autumnal outbreaks in the South" and would no longer support such federal intervention policy. In fact, Grant himself had nominated Bradley to the Supreme Court in 1870, and it was his administration's Department of Justice, led by Attorney General George H. Williams, that did not seem equal to the task at hand, as much because of its lack of legal skill as a paucity of resources.

The chief justice when Cruikshank was argued from March 30 to April 1, 1875, was Morrison J. Waite, appointed by President Grant. Waite's eight associate justices, aside from Nathan Clifford, were all Republican appointees, though two, David Davis and Stephen J. Field (both Abraham Lincoln's nominees), could no longer be counted as Republicans themselves. Samuel F. Miller and Noah H. Swayne, both also Lincoln nominees, had each hoped to be tapped as the next chief justice; the remaining justices, Ward Hunt, William Strong, and Joseph P. Bradley, had been named by Grant. It was Bradley whose vote while on circuit-court duty in Louisiana brought Cruikshank to the Supreme Court, and he hoped his detailed 1874 opinion would guide the Court's decision and reasoning. Although ideally justices were to rise above their partisan roots, it was generally assumed that they would most often lean in the direction of their previous party affiliation and view cases in that light. When Congress passed legislation establishing an electoral commission to help resolve the disputed election of 1876, among the five commission members from the Court it was assumed that Clifford and Field would cast their votes for the Democratic case while Miller and Strong would side with the Republican claimant. When the sup-

Time Line

1874

- July
  A federal circuit court in Louisiana "arrests" the Colfax convictions, opening the way for the Supreme Court to hear the case.
- November
  Democrats triumph in the midterm congressional elections, retaking control of the House of Representatives.

1875

- January 13
  President Ulysses S. Grant denounces the failure to bring the Colfax defendants to justice.
- March 30–April 1
  The Supreme Court hears the arguments in United States v. Cruikshank.

1876

- March 27
  The Cruikshank decision and opinions are released, overturning the convictions of Cruikshank, Hadnot, and Irwin.

A Harper's Weekly illustration of blacks hiding in the swamps of Louisiana in 1873 (Library of Congress) posedly independent Davis stepped aside to accept election as U.S. senator from Illinois, Democrats wondered whether his replacement, none other than Bradley, would also favor the Republicans. Some Democrats believed otherwise, in part because of Bradley's actions in the course of events that brought the Cruikshank case before the Court, for he had thereby defied Republican preferences.

In 1873 all of the associate justices who heard the arguments in the Cruikshank case had participated in deciding what became known as the Slaughter-House Cases, with Miller delivering the opinion for a slim five-to-four majority on April 14, 1873—the day after the massacre at Colfax. The cases involved a series of suits testing the constitutionality of a Louisiana law that attempted to regulate the state's slaughterhouse industry by establishing a private corporation that would exercise sole control over the industry by allocating space to area slaughterhouses. The suits cited the Fourteenth Amendment in support of their claim that the legislation was invalid. Miller's opinion, allowing the Louisiana law and the controlling corporation to stand, argued that the Fourteenth Amendment's privileges and immunities clause affects only those rights a person holds as part of U.S. citizenship, not as citizens of a state; furthermore, the primary objective of that clause was rather to protect the federal rights of former slaves. Thus, the Fourteenth Amendment did not protect the butchers' interests, namely, to freely pursue their chosen vocation, against the interests of the state. Miller's concept of dual citizenship would appear again in Cruikshank, this time as adverse to the former slaves. Clifford, Strong, Hunt, and Davis had agreed with Miller, while Field, Swayne, and Bradley dissented, along with Waite's predecessor, Salmon P. Chase.

While many members of the Court at first glance seemed sympathetic to the ends of Reconstruction policy, Bradley's circuit-court opinion on the Colfax massacre defendants, coming in the wake of Miller's reasoning in the Slaughter-House Cases, suggested that a majority of the justices were in favor of a strict and narrow explication of congressional legislation, which did not augur well for the prosecution. Moreover, the government's short brief for Cruikshank proved less than compelling in its argument, especially as it sidestepped Bradley's circuit-court opinion, failed to mention either African Americans or the Fifteenth Amendment, and mentioned the Enforcement Acts only in passing. It instead focused on just two counts of the indictment that concerned "conspiracy," arguing that an effort to conspire to deprive anyone of their constitutional rights was punishable under federal law. In contrast, the four briefs filed by the defense—including one by Justice Field's brother, David Dudley Field—argued at length that the pertinent

Essential Quotes

"To bring this case under the operation of the statute, therefore, it must appear that the right, the enjoyment of which the conspirators intended to hinder or prevent, was one granted or secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States. If it does not so appear, the criminal matter charged has not been made indictable by any act of Congress."

"The people of the United States resident within any State are subject to two governments—one State and the other National—but there need be no conflict between the two. The powers which one possesses the other does not. They are established for different purposes, and have separate jurisdictions. Together, they make one whole, and furnish the people of the United States with a complete government, ample for the protection of all their rights at home and abroad."

"Inasmuch, therefore, as it does not appear in these counts that the intent of the defendants was to prevent these parties from exercising their right to vote on account of their race, &c., it does not appear that it was their intent to interfere with any right granted or secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States."

"We may suspect that race was the cause of the hostility, but it is not so averred. This is material to a description of the substance of the offence, and cannot be supplied by implication. Everything essential must be charged positively, and not inferentially. The defect here is not in form, but in substance."

"The charge as made is really of nothing more than a conspiracy to commit a breach of the peace within a State. Certainly it will not be claimed that the United States have the power or are required to do mere police duty in the States."

sections of the Enforcement Act of 1870 were unconstitutional and that the Bill of Rights, far from conferring upon citizens specific rights, simply prohibited their infringement by the federal government and did not apply to state governments. The lawyer Field went so far as to attack the constitutionality of all postwar civil rights legislation, and he sought to bring his arguments before the public by publishing his brief.

All in all, by the time the Supreme Court heard the arguments in the Cruikshank case at the end of March 1875, the political foundations of Reconstruction, flawed as they were, were beginning to erode. By the time the Court released its opinion in March 1876, what had begun as a fighting withdrawal by Reconstruction's supporters was turning into a full-scale retreat to ensure the political survival of the Republican Party in the 1876 presidential contest.

About the Author

Chief Justice Morrison R. Waite composed the Court's opinion in United States v. Cruikshank. At first he had hoped to entrust Associate Justice Nathan Clifford with drafting the Court's opinion, but Clifford's draft, presented to the justices in November 1875, fell short of offering a comprehensive overview of the issues at stake and based the Court's ruling on narrow grounds.

The son of a judge, Waite, born on November 19, 1816, was a native of Connecticut and an 1837 graduate of Yale who moved to Ohio after graduation, eventually settling in Toledo. Originally a Whig in politics, he became a Republican, but his sole brush with political office came when he served a term in the Ohio Senate. In 1871 he served on the legal team that presented the United States' case at a Geneva tribunal convened to settle U.S. claims of damages caused by the CSS Alabama, built by Great Britain to serve the Confederacy. Three years later, in the wake of several frustrated attempts to nominate a new chief justice of the United States, President Grant settled upon Waite, who won confirmation despite critical commentary that he would not be up to the task. Along with United States v. Reese, United States v. Cruikshank provided Waite with his first substantial test as chief justice. After Cruikshank, Waite went on to serve twelve more years as chief justice. When he died on March 23, 1888, he left behind a solid but unspectacular record. If his performance surprised those critics who had criticized Grant for nominating a nonentity, it nevertheless fell short of the greatness achieved by other chief justices.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

Waite's opinion outlines a concept of dual citizenship first developed by the Supreme Court in 1873 in the Slaughter-House Cases. A citizen owed allegiance to both the federal and state governments and, in turn, could expect those governments to protect the specific rights attributable to each jurisdiction. Under this construction it was left to the states to prosecute cases of murder, manslaughter, and homicide as well as most infringements of civil rights.

Although Waite argues that the Fifteenth Amendment in itself does not guarantee the right to vote, he concedes that the amendment's second section constructed a new constitutional right that could be protected by the federal government, namely, that voters not suffer discrimination "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." Yet such wording, he contends, means that the fact that Cruikshank and his collaborators were charged with murdering black Republican voters was not sufficient to bring them under the scope of the Enforcement Act of 1870: Prosecutors had to charge—and prove—that the victims were murdered because of their race. The right not to be discriminated against as such was the only relevant right protected under federal law. But the prosecutors did not demonstrate violation of this right in this instance. The chief justice asserts that the indictments were so vague that they did not sufficiently meet the Fourth Amendment standard of informing the accused of the offense for which they were being tried. Had the indictment specified that race was the basis upon which the accused murdered the victims, then and only then would the actions of the accused have come under the Enforcement Acts.

Waite's opinion mentions the sixteen counts on which Cruikshank, Hadnot, and Irwin were convicted. The first eight counts charged that the defendants "banded together" to deprive Levi Nelson and Alexander Tillman of their rights, while the ninth through sixteenth counts charged, equivalently, that the defendants "conspired" to deprive Nelson and Tillman of their rights. The defendants were charged with seeking to deprive Nelson and Tillman of, in the first and ninth counts, the right to assemble peacefully; in the second and tenth counts, of the right to keep and bear arms; in the third and tenth counts, of the right to not be deprived of life and liberty without due process of law; in the fourth and twelfth counts, of equal rights and equal treatment under law; in the fifth and thirteenth counts, of their rights as citizens by reason of their race; in the sixth and fourteenth counts, of their right to vote; in the seventh and fifteenth counts, of the right to vote without suffering harm; and in the eighth and sixteenth counts, of the free exercise of their rights secured by federal law and the Constitution.

In his opinion, Waite carefully goes through the sixteen counts, which were framed with section 6 of the Enforcement Act of 1870 in mind. That section states that if two or more people "shall band or conspire together" to intimidate or harm "any citizen" to prevent that citizen from exercising his rights secured by the Constitution and federal law, those people could be found guilty of a felony and could be fined, imprisoned, or both. Citing the Slaughter-House Cases, Waite distinguishes between the rights of citizens protected by the federal government and those protected by state government. He reads the Bill of Rights as operating to restrain the federal government, not state governments, and thus quickly sets aside those charges dealing with the right to assemble peacefully and to bear arms. He rather summarily dismisses those counts that addressed the victims' right not to be deprived of life or liberty without due process, arguing that state governments were to protect those rights. Repeatedly he offers a narrow view of federal power based upon his interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment; time and again, he argues that the victims needed to seek recourse at the state level.

Waite also criticizes the indictment as too vague in what it alleged. He rejects the fourth and twelfth counts, charging that they failed to claim race as the reason the defendants attempted to deprive Nelson and Tillman of their civil rights, even as he admits that the Fifteenth Amendment did establish a new right, that of exempting citizens from racial discrimination in their effort to exercise the right to vote. He employs the same justification as the reason the defendants attempted to deprive Nelson and Tillman of the right to vote, thus setting aside the sixth and fourteenth counts: He repeats that reasoning in dismissing the seventh and fifteenth counts, which charged the defendants with endangering Nelson and Tillman because they had voted.

This left two pairs of counts: the fifth and thirteenth, which concerned whether Tillman and Nelson had been deprived of their rights as citizens because of their race, and the eighth and sixteenth, which simply said that they had been deprived of their rights as U.S. citizens. Here Waite finds that section 6 of the Enforcement Act of 1870 went beyond the grant of authority extended to Congress in the Fifteenth Amendment by failing to specify race, rendering the section inappropriate; in turn, he finds the counts "too vague and general" and "so defective that no judgment of conviction should be pronounced upon them."

Waite's opinion develops the notion of federalism and dual sovereignty, reminding Americans that the Court would not nationalize all rights and grant them federal protection. Having failed to specify the federal right being violated as specified in the Enforcement Act of 1870, the indictment, in Waite's opinion, was insufficient and could not sustain a conviction. The Fourteenth Amendment offered minimal protection, as it called for federal intervention to remedy state inaction or violation of the Bill of Rights, but, again, the prosecution did not demonstrate the relevant unlawful activity, namely, any such inaction or violation on the part of the state. In sum, although Waite was willing to accept the responsibility of the federal government to protect a voter from finding his right to vote challenged or blocked owing to his race, the chief justice's decision placed a heavy burden of proof on prosecutors by requiring that they specify that motive and demonstrate it.

Audience

As might have been expected, Democrats celebrated the decision as a blow against Republican Reconstruction policy. They were aware that the decision weakened efforts to protect black voters by forcing prosecutors to prove that the motive of violence against them was their race. Given the limited resources of the Department of Justice, this would not be easy. Moreover, given Democratic control of the House of Representatives, it was extremely unlikely that new legislation would appear that would expand the protection offered black voters under law. However, many Republicans also spoke highly of the decision as responsible and dispassionate. By now, they wondered whether it was politically wise or even possible to protect black rights, given the growing opposition to federal intervention in southern affairs. African Americans and their allies might well have seen the decision as another step backward with a promise of worse to come, but even President Grant, who had been outspoken earlier in his comments on the case, chose to remain silent in the aftermath of the Court's decision.

Impact

The Cruikshank decision marked yet another milepost on the Republican retreat from Reconstruction. With the Democrats in control of the House of Representatives, there would be no chance for Republicans to pass new enforcement legislation. Meanwhile, by the time the decision appeared, the Grant administration was engulfed by charges of corruption involving cabinet members and the White House staff. Although the decision itself did not rule on the constitutionality of the Enforcement Act of 1870, the opinion ensured that its clauses would be construed strictly and narrowly. A second opinion released by the Court on the same day the Cruikshank decision was issued, United States v. Reese, bore more directly upon the Enforcement Act of 1870. In Reese, strictly interpreting the scope and meaning of that legislation, Waite found it insufficient to protect the right outlined in the Fifteenth Amendment, that is, the right to vote as not abridged due to race, color, or previous condition of servitude. The prosecution had charged that Kentucky election officials had violated the law in refusing to allow William Garner, an African American, to vote, but it could not be demonstrated that they did so because of Garner's race.

By March 1876, only three southern states remained under Republican rule: South Carolina, Louisiana, and Florida. Without the threat of federal prosecution, terrorist forces continued to target black voters, tipping the scale toward Democratic candidates. Had southern blacks been allowed to vote freely in the election of 1876, the Republican candidate Rutherford B. Hayes would have then secured the presidency. Instead, the Democratic candidate Samuel J. Tilden claimed a majority of the popular vote, falling just one electoral vote short of the presidency owing to disputed voting returns in the three Republican states still remaining in the South. Through the resulting Compromise of 1877, Hayes was awarded the disputed votes and the presidency in exchange for the promise that federal troops would be removed from the three southern Republican-led states. Grant and then Hayes duly removed the troops from Florida, South Carolina, and Louisiana, and by the summer of 1877 the southern states were all under Democratic rule. Not until the twentieth century would the federal government once more use force and the law to assure blacks their right to vote.

See also Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1865); Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1868); Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1870); Ku Klux Klan Act (1871).

Further Reading

■ Books

Fairman, Charles. Reconstruction and Reunion, 1864–88. Cambridge, U.K.: Cambridge University Press, 2010.

Goldman, Robert M. Reconstruction and Black Suffrage: Losing the Vote in Reese and Cruikshank. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2001.

Kaczorowski, Robert J. The Politics of Judicial Interpretation: The Federal Courts, Department of Justice and Civil Rights, 1866–1876. Dobbs Ferry, N.Y.: Oceana Publications, 1985.

Keith, LeeAnna. The Colfax Massacre: The Untold Story of Black Power, White Terror, and the Death of Reconstruction. New York: Oxford University Press, 2008.

Lane, Charles. The Day Freedom Died: The Colfax Massacre, the Supreme Court, and the Betrayal of Reconstruction. New York: Henry Holt, 2008.

Simpson, Brooks D. The Reconstruction Presidents. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1998.

—Brooks D. Simpson

Questions for Further Study

1. In what way did the Court's decision in this case represent a retreat from Reconstruction and the protection of African Americans afforded by the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments to the Constitution?

2. An ongoing source of dispute in the United States concerns the respective powers of the federal government and those of the states. How did United States v. Cruikshank reflect this struggle?

3. What events led to the Colfax massacre of 1873? Why did the Supreme Court become involved in what could have been regarded as a Louisiana matter?

4. What political consequences did the Court's decision in this case have? How might the history of Reconstruction and the post–Civil War South have been different if the Court had reached a different decision?

5. What could the U.S. government have done differently in enforcing the civil rights of African Americans in the post–Civil War South? If you had been president during the 1870s, what would you have done?

Document Text

United States v. Cruikshank

Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court

This case comes here with a certificate by the judges of the Circuit Court for the District of Louisiana that they were divided in opinion upon a question which occurred at the hearing. It presents for our consideration an indictment containing sixteen counts, divided into two series of eight counts each, based upon sect. 6 of the Enforcement Act of May 31, 1870. That section is as follows:—

"That if two or more persons shall band or conspire together, or go in disguise upon the public highway, or upon the premises of another, with intent to violate any provision of this act, or to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen, with intent to prevent or hinder his free exercise and enjoyment of any right or privilege granted or secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States, or because of his having exercised the same, such persons shall be held guilty of felony, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined or imprisoned, or both, at the discretion of the court—the fine not to exceed $5,000, and the imprisonment not to exceed ten years—and shall, moreover, be thereafter ineligible to, and disabled from holding, any office or place of honor, profit, or trust created by the Constitution or laws of the United States."

The question certified arose upon a motion in arrest of judgment after a verdict of guilty generally upon the whole sixteen counts, and is stated to be whether "the said sixteen counts of said indictment are severally good and sufficient in law, and contain charges of criminal matter indictable under the laws of the United States."

The general charge in the first eight counts is that of "banding," and in the second eight that of "conspiring" together to injure, oppress, threaten, and intimidate Levi Nelson and Alexander Tillman, citizens of the United States, of African descent and persons of color, with the intent thereby to hinder and prevent them in their free exercise and enjoyment of rights and privileges "granted and secured" to them "in common with all other good citizens of the United States by the Constitution and laws of the United States."

The offences provided for by the statute in question do not consist in the mere "banding" or "conspiring" of two or more persons together, but in their banding or conspiring with the intent, or for any of the purposes, specified. To bring this case under the operation of the statute, therefore, it must appear that the right, the enjoyment of which the conspirators intended to hinder or prevent, was one granted or secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States. If it does not so appear, the criminal matter charged has not been made indictable by any act of Congress.

We have in our political system a government of the United States and a government of each of the several States. Each one of these governments is distinct from the others, and each has citizens of its own who owe it allegiance and whose rights, within its jurisdiction, it must protect. The same person may be at the same time a citizen of the United States and a citizen of a State, but his rights of citizenship under one of these governments will be different from those he has under the other. Slaughter-House Cases,16 Wall. 74.

Citizens are the members of the political community to which they belong. They are the people who compose the community, and who, in their associated capacity, have established or submitted themselves to the dominion of a government for the promotion of their general welfare and the protection of their individual as well as their collective rights. In the formation of a government, the people may confer upon it such powers as they choose. The government, when so formed, may, and when called upon should, exercise all the powers it has for the protection of the rights of its citizens and the people within its jurisdiction, but it can exercise no other. The duty of a government to afford protection is limited always by the power it possesses for that purpose.

Experience made the fact known to the people of the United States that they required a national government for national purposes. The separate governments of the separate States, bound together by the articles of confederation alone, were not sufficient for the promotion of the general welfare of the people in respect to foreign nations, or for their complete protection as citizens of the confederated States. For this reason, the people of the United States, "in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty" to themselves and their posterity (Const. Preamble), ordained and established the government of the United States, and defined its powers by a Constitution, which they adopted as its fundamental law, and made its rule of action.

The government thus established and defined is to some extent a government of the States in their political capacity. It is also, for certain purposes, a government of the people. Its powers are limited in number, but not in degree. Within the scope of its powers, as enumerated and defined, it is supreme, and above the States; but beyond, it has no existence. It was erected for special purposes, and endowed with all the powers necessary for its own preservation and the accomplishment of the ends its people had in view. It can neither grant nor secure to its citizens any right or privilege not expressly or by implication placed under its jurisdiction.

The people of the United States resident within any State are subject to two governments—one State and the other National—but there need be no conflict between the two. The powers which one possesses the other does not. They are established for different purposes, and have separate jurisdictions. Together, they make one whole, and furnish the people of the United States with a complete government, ample for the protection of all their rights at home and abroad. True, it may sometimes happen that a person is amenable to both jurisdictions for one and the same act. Thus, if a marshal of the United States is unlawfully resisted while executing the process of the courts within a State, and the resistance is accompanied by an assault on the officer, the sovereignty of the United States is violated by the resistance, and that of the State by the breach of peace in the assault. So, too, if one passes counterfeited coin of the United States within a State, it may be an offence against the United States and the State: the United States because it discredits the coin, and the State because of the fraud upon him to whom it is passed. This does not, however, necessarily imply that the two governments possess powers in common, or bring them into conflict with each other. It is the natural consequence of a citizenship which owes allegiance to two sovereignties and claims protection from both. The citizen cannot complain, because he has voluntarily submitted himself to such a form of government. He owes allegiance to the two departments, so to speak, and, within their respective spheres, must pay the penalties which each exacts for disobedience to its laws. In return, he can demand protection from each within its own jurisdiction.

The Government of the United States is one of delegated powers alone. Its authority is defined and limited by the Constitution. All powers not granted to it by that instrument are reserved to the States or the people. No rights can be acquired under the Constitution or laws of the United States, except such as the Government of the United States has the authority to grant or secure. All that cannot be so granted or secured are left under the protection of the States. We now proceed to an examination of the indictment, to ascertain whether the several rights, which it is alleged the defendants intended to interfere with, are such as had been in law and in fact granted or secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States.

The first and ninth counts state the intent of the defendants to have been to hinder and prevent the citizens named in the free exercise and enjoyment of their "lawful right and privilege to peaceably assemble together with each other and with other citizens of the United States for a peaceful and lawful purpose."

The right of the people peaceably to assemble for lawful purposes existed long before the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. In fact, it is, and always has been, one of the attributes of citizenship under a free government. It "derives its source," to use the language of Chief Justice Marshall in 22 U. S. 211, "from those laws whose authority is acknowledged by civilized man throughout the world." It is found wherever civilization exists. It was not, therefore, a right granted to the people by the Constitution. The Government of the United States, when established, found it in existence, with the obligation on the part of the States to afford it protection. As no direct power over it was granted to Congress, it remains, according to the ruling in Gibbons v. Ogden, id., @ 22 U. S. 203, subject to State jurisdiction.

Only such existing rights were committed by the people to the protection of Congress as came within the general scope of the authority granted to the national government.

The first amendment to the Constitution prohibits Congress from abridging "the right of the people to assemble and to petition the government for a redress of grievances." This, like the other amendments proposed and adopted at the same time, was not intended to limit the powers of the State governments in respect to their own citizens, but to operate upon the National Government alone. Barron v. The City of Baltimore, 7 Pet. 250; Lessee of Livingston v. Moore, id., 551; Fox v. Ohio, 5 How. 434; Smith v. Maryland, 18 id. 76; Withers v. Buckley, 20 id. 90; Pervear v. The Commonwealth, 5 Wall. 479; Twitchell v. The Commonwealth, 7 id. 321; Edwards v. Elliott, 21 id. 557. It is now too late to question the correctness of this construction. As was said by the late Chief Justice, in Twitchell v. The Commonwealth, 7 Wall. 325, "the scope and application of these amendments are no longer subjects of discussion here." They left the authority of the States just where they found it, and added nothing to the already existing powers of the United States.

The particular amendment now under consideration assumes the existence of the right of the people to assemble for lawful purposes, and protects it against encroachment by Congress. The right was not created by the amendment; neither was its continuance guaranteed, except as against congressional interference. For their protection in its enjoyment, therefore, the people must look to the States. The power for that purpose was originally placed there, and it has never been surrendered to the United States.

The right of the people peaceably to assemble for the purpose of petitioning Congress for a redress of grievances, or for any thing else connected with the powers or the duties of the national government, is an attribute of national citizenship, and, as such, under the protection of, and guaranteed by, the United States. The very idea of a government republican in form implies a right on the part of its citizens to meet peaceably for consultation in respect to public affairs and to petition for a redress of grievances. If it had been alleged in these counts that the object of the defendants was to prevent a meeting for such a purpose, the case would have been within the statute, and within the scope of the sovereignty of the United States. Such, however, is not the case. The offence, as stated in the indictment, will be made out, if it be shown that the object of the conspiracy was to prevent a meeting for any lawful purpose whatever.

The second and tenth counts are equally defective. The right there specified is that of "bearing arms for a lawful purpose." This is not a right granted by the Constitution. Neither is it in any manner dependent upon that instrument for its existence. The second amendment declares that it shall not be infringed, but this, as has been seen, means no more than that it shall not be infringed by Congress. This is one of the amendments that has no other effect than to restrict the powers of the national government, leaving the people to look for their protection against any violation by their fellow citizens of the rights it recognizes, to what is called, in The City of New York v. Miln, 11 Pet. 139, the "powers which relate to merely municipal legislation, or what was, perhaps, more properly called internal police," "not surrendered or restrained" by the Constitution of the United States.

The third and eleventh counts are even more objectionable. They charge the intent to have been to deprive the citizens named, they being in Louisiana, "of their respective several lives and liberty of person without due process of law." This is nothing else than alleging a conspiracy to falsely imprison or murder citizens of the United States, being within the territorial jurisdiction of the State of Louisiana. The rights of life and personal liberty are natural rights of man. "To secure these rights," says the Declaration of Independence, "governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." The very highest duty of the States, when they entered into the Union under the Constitution, was to protect all persons within their boundaries in the enjoyment of these "unalienable rights with which they were endowed by their Creator." Sovereignty, for this purpose, rests alone with the States. It is no more the duty or within the power of the United States to punish for a conspiracy to falsely imprison or murder within a State, than it would be to punish for false imprisonment or murder itself.

The Fourteenth Amendment prohibits a State from depriving any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, but this adds nothing to the rights of one citizen as against another. It simply furnishes an additional guaranty against any encroachment by the States upon the fundamental rights which belong to every citizen as a member of society. As was said by Mr. Justice Johnson, in Bank of Columbia v. Okely, 4 Wheat. 244, it secures "the individual from the arbitrary exercise of the powers of government, unrestrained by the established principles of private rights and distributive justice."

These counts in the indictment do not call for the exercise of any of the powers conferred by this provision in the amendment.

The fourth and twelfth counts charge the intent to have been to prevent and hinder the citizens named, who were of African descent and persons of color, in "the free exercise and enjoyment of their several right and privilege to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings, then and there, before that time, enacted or ordained by the said State of Louisiana and by the United States, and then and there, at that time, being in force in the said State and District of Louisiana aforesaid, for the security of their respective persons and property, then and there, at that time enjoyed at and within said State and District of Louisiana by white persons, being citizens of said State of Louisiana and the United States, for the protection of the persons and property of said white citizens."

There is no allegation that this was done because of the race or color of the persons conspired against. When stripped of its verbiage, the case as presented amounts to nothing more than that the defendants conspired to prevent certain citizens of the United States, being within the State of Louisiana, from enjoying the equal protection of the laws of the State and of the United States.

The Fourteenth Amendment prohibits a State from denying to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws; but this provision does not, any more than the one which precedes it, and which we have just considered, add anything to the rights which one citizen has under the Constitution against another. The equality of the rights of citizens is a principle of republicanism. Every republican government is in duty bound to protect all its citizens in the enjoyment of this principle, if within its power. That duty was originally assumed by the States, and it still remains there. The only obligation resting upon the United States is to see that the States do not deny the right. This the amendment guarantees, but no more. The power of the national government is limited to the enforcement of this guaranty.

No question arises under the Civil Rights Act of April 9, 1866 (14 Stat. 27), which is intended for the protection of citizens of the United States in the enjoyment of certain rights, without discrimination on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, because, as has already been stated, it is nowhere alleged in these counts that the wrong contemplated against the rights of these citizens was on account of their race or color.

Another objection is made to these counts that they are too vague and uncertain. This will be considered hereafter, in connection with the same objection to other counts.

The sixth and fourteenth counts state the intent of the defendants to have been to hinder and prevent the citizens named, being of African descent, and colored, "in the free exercise and enjoyment of their several and respective right and privilege to vote at any election to be thereafter by law had and held by the people in and of the said State of Louisiana, or by the people of and in the parish of Grant aforesaid."

In @ 88 U. S. 214, we hold that the Fifteenth Amendment has invested the citizens of the United States with a new constitutional right, which is, exemption from discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. From this, it appears that the right of suffrage is not a necessary attribute of national citizenship, but that exemption from discrimination in the exercise of that right on account of race, &c., is. The right to vote in the States comes from the States, but the right of exemption from the prohibited discrimination comes from the United States. The first has not been granted or secured by the Constitution of the United States, but the last has been.

Inasmuch, therefore, as it does not appear in these counts that the intent of the defendants was to prevent these parties from exercising their right to vote on account of their race, &c., it does not appear that it was their intent to interfere with any right granted or secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States. We may suspect that race was the cause of the hostility, but it is not so averred. This is material to a description of the substance of the offence, and cannot be supplied by implication. Everything essential must be charged positively, and not inferentially. The defect here is not in form, but in substance.

The seventh and fifteenth counts are no better than the sixth and fourteenth. The intent here charged is to put the parties named in great fear of bodily harm, and to injure and oppress them, because, being and having been in all things qualified, they had voted "at an election before that time had and held according to law by the people of the said State of Louisiana, in said State, to-wit, on the fourth day of November, A.D. 1872, and at divers other elections by the people of the State, also before that time had and held according to law."

There is nothing to show that the elections voted at were any other than State elections, or that the conspiracy was formed on account of the race of the parties against whom the conspirators were to act. The charge as made is really of nothing more than a conspiracy to commit a breach of the peace within a State. Certainly it will not be claimed that the United States have the power or are required to do mere police duty in the States. If a State cannot protect itself against domestic violence, the United States may, upon the call of the executive, when the legislature cannot be convened, lend their assistance for that purpose. This is a guaranty of the Constitution (art. 4, sect. 4), but it applies to no case like this.

We are therefore of the opinion that the first, second, third, fourth, sixth, seventh, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, fourteenth, and fifteenth counts do not contain charges of a criminal nature made indictable under the laws of the United States, and that consequently they are not good and sufficient in law. They do not show that it was the intent of the defendants, by their conspiracy, to hinder or prevent the enjoyment of any right granted or secured by the Constitution.

We come now to consider the fifth and thirteenth and the eighth and sixteenth counts, which may be brought together for that purpose. The intent charged in the fifth and thirteenth is "to hinder and prevent the parties in their respective free exercise and enjoyment of the rights, privileges, immunities, and protection granted and secured to them respectively as citizens of the United States, and as citizens of said State of Louisiana … for the reason that they, … being then and there citizens of said State and of the United States, were persons of African descent and race, and persons of color, and not white citizens thereof;" and in the eighth and sixteenth, to hinder and prevent them "in their several and respective free exercise and enjoyment of every, each, all, and singular the several rights and privileges granted and secured to them by the Constitution and laws of the United States."

The same general statement of the rights to be interfered with is found in the fifth and thirteenth counts.

According to the view we take of these counts, the question is not whether it is enough, in general, to describe a statutory offence in the language of the statute, but whether the offence has here been described at all. The statute provides for the punishment of those who conspire "to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen, with intent to prevent or hinder his free exercise and enjoyment of any right or privilege granted or secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States."

These counts in the indictment charge, in substance that the intent in this case was to hinder and prevent these citizens in the free exercise and enjoyment of "every, each, all, and singular" the rights granted them by the Constitution, &c. There is no specification of any particular right. The language is broad enough to cover all.

In criminal cases, prosecuted under the laws of the United States, the accused has the constitutional right "to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation." Amend. VI. In United States v. Mills, 7 Pet. 142, this was construed to mean that the indictment must set forth the offence "with clearness and all necessary certainty, to apprise the accused of the crime with which he stands charged;" and in United States v. Cook, 17 Wall. 174 that "every ingredient of which the offence is composed must be accurately and clearly alleged." It is an elementary principle of criminal pleading that, where the definition of an offence, whether it be at common law or by statute, "includes generic terms, it is not sufficient that the indictment shall charge the offence in the same generic terms as in the definition, but it must state the species—it must descend to particulars."

The object of the indictment is, first, to furnish the accused with such a description of the charge against him as will enable him to make his defence, and avail himself of his conviction or acquittal for protection against a further prosecution for the same cause; and, second, to inform the court of the facts alleged, so that it may decide whether they are sufficient in law to support a conviction, if one should be had. For this, facts are to be stated, not conclusions of law alone. A crime is made up of acts and intent; and these must be set forth in the indictment, with reasonable particularity of time, place, and circumstances.

It is a crime to steal goods and chattels, but an indictment would be bad that did not specify with some degree of certainty the articles stolen. This because the accused must be advised of the essential particulars of the charge against him, and the court must be able to decide whether the property taken was such as was the subject of larceny. So, too, it is in some States a crime for two or more persons to conspire to cheat and defraud another out of his property, but it has been held that an indictment for such an offence must contain allegations setting forth the means proposed to be used to accomplish the purpose. This because, to make such a purpose criminal, the conspiracy must be to cheat and defraud in a mode made criminal by statute; and, as all cheating and defrauding has not been made criminal, it is necessary for the indictment to state the means proposed, in order that the court may see that they are in fact illegal. State v. Parker, 43 N. H. 83; State v. Keach, 40 Vt. 118; Alderman v. The People, 4 Mich. 414; State v. Roberts, 34 Me. 32. In Maine, it is an offence for two or more to conspire with the intent unlawfully and wickedly to commit any crime punishable by imprisonment in the State prison (State v. Roberts), but we think it will hardly be claimed that an indictment would be good under this statute which charges the object of the conspiracy to have been "unlawfully and wickedly to commit each, every, all, and singular the crimes punishable by imprisonment in the State prison." All crimes are not so punishable. Whether a particular crime be such a one or not is a question of law. The accused has, therefore, the right to have a specification of the charge against him in this respect in order that he may decide whether he should present his defence by motion to quash, demurrer, or plea, and the court that it may determine whether the facts will sustain the indictment. So here, the crime is made to consist in the unlawful combination with an intent to prevent the enjoyment of any right granted or secured by the Constitution, &c. All rights are not so granted or secured. Whether one is so or not is a question of law, to be decided by the court, not the prosecutor. Therefore, the indictment should state the particulars, to inform the court as well as the accused. It must be made to appear—that is to say, appears from the indictment, without going further—that the acts charged will, if proved, support a conviction for the offence alleged.

Document Text

But it is needless to pursue the argument further. The conclusion is irresistible that these counts are too vague and general. They lack the certainty and precision required by the established rules of criminal pleading. It follows that they are not good and sufficient in law. They are so defective that no judgment of conviction should be pronounced upon them.

The order of the Circuit Court arresting the judgment upon the verdict is, therefore, affirmed; and the cause remanded, with instructions to discharge the defendants.

Glossary

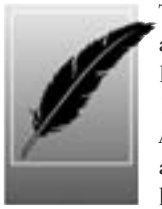
articles of confederation	the initial constitution of the United States, replaced by the present Constitution because they gave too much power to the states and not enough to the federal government
Chief Justice Marshall	John Marshall, the early-nineteenth-century chief justice whose decisions defined many of the powers of the federal government
demurrer	a court pleading filed by a defendant stating that the facts of the case do not support the plaintiff's accusations
Enforcement Act of May 31, 1870	one of three federal laws passed to protect the civil rights of African Americans, especially the right to vote
Justice Johnson	Associate Justice William Johnson
quash	the action of voiding a legal proceeding or court decision

Richard Harvey Cain's "All That We Ask Is Equal Laws, Equal Legislation, and Equal Rights"

1874

"We do not come here begging for our rights....
We come demanding our rights in the name of justice."

Overview



The South Carolina congressman Richard Harvey Cain's speech to the U.S. House of Representatives of January 10, 1874, given the title "All That We Ask Is Equal Laws, Equal Legislation, and Equal Rights," was one of two that he made in support of what became the Civil Rights Act of 1875. The legislation had been first introduced by Senator Charles Sumner and Congressman Benjamin Butler, both of Massachusetts, in 1870. The original all-encompassing bill would have prohibited segregation or discrimination in public accommodations, transportation, jury service, public schools, and churches. It languished in the Senate for five years, until Sumner begged on his deathbed that it be passed. His plea energized the bill's supporters, and it was approved by the Senate, minus, however, its provision banning discrimination in churches.

Despite its success in the Senate, most observers thought the bill would not get through the House. But impassioned speeches by the seven black members of Congress, including Cain, helped create momentum for the bill. All of the men related instances of personal discrimination against them even after their election to Congress. The oratory of Cain's fellow South Carolina congressman Robert Brown Elliott on behalf of the bill attracted national attention, but the powerful words of Cain's speech of January 1874 were little noticed by the press, even among sympathetic Republican newspapers in his home state. However, Cain's speech, together with the others, had ample impact where it counted. One Republican leader in Congress praised all the black congressmen for being more eloquent than their white brethren. Congress was impressed, and the bill became law on March 1, 1875, though it had been further amended to delete the coverage of public schools. Nevertheless, the bill's passage was a major step forward taken just in time, as soon thereafter a Democratic majority took over the House. The enactment of the public accommodations bill was in many ways the high-water mark for the Reconstruction-era Congress.

Context

After the Civil War, the United States attempted to reconstruct the war-ravaged South and lay a foundation for the broader democracy that would encompass both black and white citizens. Emancipation would result in long-term economic and social shifts, but how the law would be molded was the most critical question. When Richard H. Cain moved to South Carolina in 1865, the defeated former Confederates had assumed control of the state government and had enacted the Black Codes, which were modeled after slave codes and were designed to restrict the freedom of African Americans in every aspect of their lives. But South Carolina was a majority black state, and its freedmen did not simply acquiesce to the actions of the former Confederates. In 1865 the Colored People's Convention was held in Charleston to protest such laws. This was the first gathering of black men from throughout the state in South Carolina history, and Cain was among those attending. While the state legislature did not respond to the petition of the black convention to refrain from passing Black Codes, their protest was heard by others. In fact, the state was still under Union army control, and the military commander for South Carolina declared the Black Codes void.

In 1866 Congress passed its first Civil Rights Act, despite President Andrew Johnson's opposition. This act effectively overruled the Black Codes across the South and affirmed the actions of the military governor of South Carolina. The act declared that all Americans were citizens regardless of race and were guaranteed the right to contract, to sue and be sued, to give evidence in court, and to purchase and hold real and personal property. A year later, in March 1867, Congress began enacting a series of statutes known as the Reconstruction Acts. These laws imposed preconditions before congressmen from the southern states could be seated, the most significant of which required that the former Confederate states grant all men the right to vote. In states like South Carolina, this meant that a majority of the voting citizens were now black, and as elections came along black citizens began voting and making laws. Cain was elected a delegate to the state's constitutional convention in 1868. When the state's voters approved the constitution and elected a new legislature, the majority of

Time Line

1863

- January 1
  The Republican president Abraham Lincoln signs the Emancipation Proclamation, freeing all slaves in the rebelling states.

1865

- December 6
  Having been approved that January, the Thirteenth Amendment is ratified by the states.
- April 9
  Robert E. Lee surrenders to the Union general Ulysses S. Grant on behalf of his Confederate army.

1866

- April 9
  The first Civil Rights Act, granting American citizenship to freed slaves, is approved by Congress.
- June 13
  The Fourteenth Amendment, which will extend citizenship to all those born in the United States, is approved.

1867

- March–July
  Three Reconstruction Acts are approved by Congress over President Andrew Johnson's vetoes.
- November
  Elections in which African Americans vote for the first time are held across the South.

1868

- March 11
  The fourth Reconstruction Act is passed by Congress.
- July 9
  The Fourteenth Amendment is ratified.

1870

The first African Americans are named to Congress, through the election of Hiram Revels as senator from Mississippi and Joseph H. Rainey as representative from South Carolina.

those chosen were black, with Cain becoming one of the first black men elected to the state senate. A priority for these legislators was achieving civil rights for all citizens at the state level.

The Reconstruction Amendments to the U.S. Constitution had been approved by Congress and were being ratified by the states during this same period. These were the most important amendments to the Constitution since the Bill of Rights. The Thirteenth Amendment, ratified in 1865, abolished slavery. The Fourteenth Amendment extended citizenship to all those born in the United States and was ratified in 1868. The Fifteenth Amendment granted all men the right to vote and was ratified in 1870. Other than the Thirteenth Amendment, these amendments were not self-executing; federal and state legislation was needed to obtain enforcement, which was one purpose of the Reconstruction Acts—four statues enacted in 1867–1868—and the various civil rights acts. Imposing a system that ensured the participation of the freedmen in the body politic did not resolve the issue of their social equality. The civil rights bill introduced by Senator Sumner in 1870 attempted to address this by banning discrimination in all major areas of everyday life—in public accommodations, transportation, jury service, public schools, and churches. Southern whites by and large opposed any civil rights for the former slaves, and their opposition was often violent. Congress was compelled to pass the Enforcement Acts of 1870 and 1871 (the latter also known as the Ku Klux Klan Act) to protect black citizens from the outrages of these terrorists. Yet Sumner's bill was a much more radical concept. It was one thing to protect blacks from the Klan; it was quite another to mandate equal treatment for them at the hands of local governments and private citizens alike.

Sumner's bill languished for three sessions after its first introduction, but Sumner introduced it in the Senate yet again in December 1873, on the opening day of the second session of the Forty-third Congress. In the House, Congressman Butler did the same. Sumner died on March 11, 1874, and his deathbed request was that his bill be passed. Cain had been elected a U.S. congressman from South Carolina the previous year, and he made an impassioned speech in support of the bill in January 1874. In all, seven black representatives sat in the Forty-third Congress, and all spoke in support of Sumner's civil rights bill.

Speaking in opposition were a number of former Confederate soldiers and officers. Among them were Alexander Stephens, former vice president of the Confederacy and congressman from Georgia, and the Democratic congressman Robert B. Vance of North Carolina, who had been a brigadier general in the Confederate army. Clearly, Vance was proud of his military service and made clear that he and other southern whites considered themselves in all respects superior to blacks. His chief arguments against the bill were insulting and patronizing. He asserted that black men were asking for something they had not earned, their civil rights. But his major concern was one that would echo through the halls of Congress for decades. He argued that the bill would force whites to socialize with blacks.

He warned that forced socialization would destroy the kind relationship that southern whites had established with their freed slaves and that those former slaves could not survive without the help of their former masters.

About the Author

Richard Harvey Cain was born on April 12, 1825, of free black parents in Greenbrier County, Virginia (now in West Virginia). In 1831 the family moved to Gallipolis, Ohio. There he obtained an education through church school classes. In 1844 he was ordained in the Methodist Episcopal Church and assigned to Hannibal, Missouri, but the segregationist practices of the Methodists caused him to resign and join the African Methodist Episcopal Church (AME). He served an AME church in Iowa in the 1850s and then attended Wilberforce University, an AME school in Ohio. When the Civil War broke out, he and other Wilberforce students attempted to enlist but were turned away by the governor of Ohio. From 1861 to 1865, Cain was assigned to a church in Brooklyn, New York. While he was in New York he attended the National Convention of Colored Men, held in Syracuse in 1864.

Following the Civil War, Cain was sent to Charleston, South Carolina. There he reorganized Emanuel Church, which would grow to over four thousand members and become one of the most potent political organizations in the state. In 1867 Cain assumed control of a newspaper, the Charleston Leader, which fostered such important political figures as Alonzo Ransier and Robert Brown Elliott. From the outset of his arrival in Charleston, Cain was quite active in politics. When the Black Codes were proposed, the Colored People's Convention was held in Charleston in 1865 to object to them. The protest failed to dissuade the white legislature from approving the restrictive laws, but the convention's voice was successful in persuading the military commander of South Carolina, the Union general Daniel Sickles, to nullify the Black Codes.

Subsequently, Cain was elected as a delegate to the South Carolina Constitutional Convention of 1868. In the convention, he sponsored a resolution urging Congress to appropriate $1 million to purchase land in South Carolina for freedmen. Although it was not accepted, the idea was incorporated in the establishment of the state land commission. Cain was elected to the state senate from Charleston in 1868 and was a member of the committees on printing (1868–1870), incorporations (1868–1870), and railroads (1869–1870). He became known as "Daddy Cain" because of his leadership on the cause of civil rights for black South Carolinians as well as his influence among his fellow Republicans. He was chairman of the Charleston County Republican Party from 1870 to 1871 and a delegate to numerous state Republican conventions from 1867 to 1876. His political power was demonstrated with his election as the at-large representative from South Carolina to the Forty-third Congress, opening March 4, 1873.

Time Line

1871

- April 20 The Ku Klux Klan Act is approved by Congress.

1872

- Six African Americans are elected to the House of Representatives, including Richard Harvey Cain.

1874

- January 10 Cain delivers a speech in support of the pending civil rights bill.
- March 1 The Civil Rights Act of 1875 is signed into law; a clause that would have led to integration of public schools is dropped from the final bill.

1876

- November Contested election results across the South lead to the Compromise of 1877 and the removal of federal troops from South Carolina and other southern states, effectively ending Reconstruction.

1883

- October 15 In the Civil Rights Cases, the U.S. Supreme Court declares the Civil Rights Act of 1875 unconstitutional.

In Congress, Cain and other black congressmen gained national attention through their oratory in support of the civil rights bill that had been the last cause of Charles Sumner. The bill was all-encompassing, in that it proposed to ban segregation and racial discrimination in public accommodations, public schools, jury selection, cemeteries, transportation, and churches. In March 1874, the dying Sumner urged passage of the bill. After his death, the bill passed the Senate intact except for the proviso on churches. In the House, Cain was one of seven black members who spoke of their personal experiences with discrimination even as congressmen. Also among these men were his protégés Elliott and Ransier. In 1875 the bill passed the House, but without its ban on discrimination in public education.

Cain was not a candidate for renomination in 1874 but was elected to the Forty-fifth Congress, opening March 4, 1877. Cain's service in Congress ended in March 1879. The abandonment of the enforcement of civil rights in the South by the federal government coupled with the threats and violence by southern whites against blacks meant that Group portrait of the senators of the Forty-third Congress (Library of Congress)

Reconstruction was over. Cain, like most African American public officials, exited the political arena and attempted to contribute in other fields. In 1880 he was named a bishop in the AME Church, to preside over the denomination's work in Louisiana and Texas. He was a founder of Paul Quinn College in Austin, Texas (the school later moved to Waco), and served as its president for four years. Cain moved to Washington, D.C., in 1883 and died there on January 18, 1887.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

The chief theme of Cain's speech is that the black man merely wants "equal laws, equal legislation, and equal rights." While the speech was responsive to one by Representative Vance, it was independently a powerful and assertive oration on behalf of the civil rights bill. Cain made clear that African Americans had "come demanding our rights in the name of justice."

♦ The Rights of Citizenship

One of Cain's first points, made in the second paragraph, is that the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments stand for the proposition that black people are "invested with all the rights of citizenship." Next, he addresses Vance's allegation that the civil rights bill would impose social relations. Cain retorts that the bill would simply place "the colored men of this country upon the same footing with every other citizen under the law, and will not at all enforce social relationship with any other class of persons in the country whatsoever." He counters Vance's claim that civil rights were already enjoyed by all people in North Carolina by using his own and other blacks' personal experiences there. Cain relates a story from his fellow South Carolina congressman Elliott: "My colleague … a few months ago entered a restaurant at Wilmington and sat down to be served, and while there a gentleman stepped up to him and said, 'You cannot eat here.'" Cain himself had eaten on the train rather than risk such a confrontation in a North Carolina restaurant, only to be accused of "putting on airs" in paying for dinner service on the train. He caustically ends this portion of his speech by saying, "Yet this was in the noble State of North Carolina."

Next Cain responds to Vance's argument that if the bill were to pass, the black man in the South would lose the friendship of the region's whites. Cain was attempting to appeal to more sympathetic whites, but in paragraph 7 his speech demonstrates a certain amount of naïveté in expressing the belief that the "higher class" of southern whites did not oppose the civil rights bill. Twice more in the speech, Cain exhibits optimism about the country and the age. In some of his most eloquent words, Cain states in paragraph 26, "Rapid as the weaver's shuttle, swift as the lightning's flash, such progress is being made that our rights will be accorded to us ere long."

Illustration depicting South Carolina representative Robert B. Elliot delivering one of several impassioned speeches in favor of the Civil Rights Act of 1875 (Library of Congress)

♦ Equality in Education

Probably the most important provision of the bill to Cain was one that would have prohibited segregation in schools. Naturally, Vance had assaulted this proviso, by claiming that the state university in South Carolina had been destroyed by desegregation. But Cain easily repels this attack. Being from that state, he knew that the University of South Carolina had lost some faculty and students but was still operating and thriving. In fact, the college operated a law school that was soon to produce nearly a dozen black lawyers. Beyond responding to the attack on the University of South Carolina, Cain expresses fervent belief in the value of education. He again asserts that the better class of whites in the South support African American equality, here declaring that they see the value of education for his people. He cites examples from Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and New York to buttress his claim that there would be little trouble in integrated schools. He also uses reports from California, Illinois, and Indiana to demonstrate that discrimination in education is a national problem, further proof of the need for the civil rights provision on education. Cain recognizes that the right to an education is the most paramount civil right. He entreats, "All we ask is that you, the legislators of the nation, shall pass a law so strong and so powerful that no one shall be able to elude it and destroy our rights under the Constitution and laws of our country." Later in the speech, in paragraph 23, he refers to education and jury service as "great palladiums of our liberty." At the end of his speech, Cain briefly returns to the subject of education to cite it as a device critical to civil rights and to declare his belief that the educational system ought not to discriminate against anyone.

Essential Quotes

"But since our emancipation, since liberty has come, and only since—only since we have stood up clothed in our manhood, only since we have proceeded to take hold and help advance the civilization of this nation—it is only since then that this bugbear is brought up against us again."

(Paragraph 11)

"The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Vance] announced before he sat down, in answer to an interrogatory by a gentleman on this side of the House, that they went into the war conscientiously before God. So be it. Then we simply come and plead conscientiously before God that those are our rights, and we want them. We plead conscientiously before God, believing that these are our rights by inheritance, and by the inexorable decree of Almighty God."

(Paragraph 19)

"I want to say that we do not come here begging for our rights. We come here clothed in the garb of American citizenship. We come demanding our rights in the name of justice. We come, with no arrogance on our part, asking that this great nation, which laid the foundations of civilization and progress more deeply and more securely than any other nation on the face of the earth, guarantee us protection from outrage."

(Paragraph 25)

"We come here, five millions of people—more than composed this whole nation when it had its great tea-party in Boston Harbor, and demanded its rights at the point of the bayonet—asking that unjust discriminations against us be forbidden. We come here in the name of justice, equity, and law, in the name of our children, in the name of our country, petitioning for our rights."

(Paragraph 25)

"Inasmuch as we have toiled with you in building up this nation; inasmuch as we have suffered side by side with you in the war; inasmuch as we have together passed through affliction and pestilence, let there be now a fulfillment of the sublime thought of our father—let all men enjoy equal liberty and equal rights."

(Paragraph 28)

♦ Economic Justice

Another argument utilized effectively by Cain is a call for civil rights as a matter of economic justice. Throughout his speech Cain uses his eloquence and facility with language to express this firm belief. At times his words are poetic, such as when he notes, "We have been hewers of wood and drawers of water." He then adds,

> If we have made your cotton-fields blossom as the rose; if we have made your rice-fields wave with luxuriant harvests; if we have made your corn-fields rejoice; if we have sweated and toiled to build up the prosperity the whole country by the productions of our labor, I submit, now that the war has made a change, now that we are free—I submit to the nation whether it is not fair and right that we should come in and enjoy to the fullest extent our freedom and liberty.

He reinforces this point by citing examples of patient service and sacrifice by his people for the nation. He reminds the assembly of the costs incurred by black men in the ranks of the Union army, especially citing their bravery on the battlefields of Fort Wagner, in South Carolina, and Vicksburg, Mississippi. Cain also adapts Vance's defensive affirmation that he had gone to war on behalf of the Confederacy "conscientiously before God" to offer his own prayer to "Almighty God" to grant "our rights by inheritance." Then Cain points out the clarion call of the Declaration of Independence whereby "all men … are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

♦ The Meaning of the Civil War

Cain next moves to respond to the critics of the bill who claimed it would usurp the rights of the states. He expresses astonishment that these congressmen could place states' rights above the rights of individuals. He points out that these same men had joined efforts to pass legislation in Congress in 1860 to save the Union and preserve slavery. Without explicitly stating as much, Cain makes the point that since the war for states' rights had already been lost and the war for civil rights had been won, the patriotic course of action would be to concede that the Reconstruction Amendments were the law of the land. These amendments and the Civil War should compel these "gentlemen" to accept civil rights for all people.

It is in paragraph 24 that Cain's most famous line, lending the speech its title, is uttered: "All that we ask is equal laws, equal legislation, and equal rights throughout the length and breadth of this land." Then Cain responds to Vance's remark that "the colored men" were begging Congress for their rights. Cain denies this by recasting the circumstances, asserting, "We come demanding our rights in the name of justice."

In concluding, Cain expresses an optimism that justice will prevail. His words are again powerful: "Let it be proclaimed that henceforth all the children of this land shall be free; that the stars and stripes, waving over all, shall secure to every one equal rights, and the nation will say 'amen.'" Cain calls on the nation's five million black people to sing a song of rejoicing, and he again emphasizes the toil and sacrifice they have made on behalf of the nation. Before his final words, Cain cites his own support for amnesty for former Confederates; in giving the speech, he turned to Vance and offered to shake hands as he affirmed his "desire to bury forever the tomahawk." Cain then turns his offer into a memorial for the "widows and orphans" of North and South and urges that in their name Congress "let this righteous act be done. I appeal to you in the name of God and humanity to give us our rights, for we ask nothing more."

Audience

The primary audience for Cain's speech was the Forty-third Congress. In addition, during some of the speeches by the black congressmen on behalf of the civil rights bill, the gallery of the House of Representatives was filled by African Americans. The failure of the press to report Cain's speech may suggest that his oration was otherwise little known at the time. But the bill Cain was supporting was especially important to many African Americans, and all Americans would be an audience for the Civil Rights Act of 1875 upon its passage.

Impact

The act imposed both criminal and civil penalties for its violation. Enforcement could be made either by an individual or through federal attorneys, marshals, and commissioners. As the historian John Hope Franklin has pointed out, many African Americans attempted to obtain accommodations, meals, drinks, haircuts, railway passage, and entry into theaters all across the country within days of the act's passage. However, white resistance was substantial. More important, legal enforcement was sporadic, uneven, and sometimes denied. Some cases made it to federal district court, but obtaining convictions by jury proved to be very difficult. When eighteen blacks sued a railroad for relegating them to a segregated car, for instance, the jury found for the railroad. A few federal judges declared the act constitutional, but a greater number of judges declared the law unconstitutional.

The 1875 Civil Rights Act was passed at a time when Reconstruction was both cresting and ebbing. That year, there were more black congressmen than at any other point in the era, but much of the South had fallen back into Democratic hands. South Carolina was one of only three states remaining in Republican control after the elections of 1874. Soon, Reconstruction ended. Violence against Republicans, and especially blacks, preceded the Democratic takeover of the South Carolina state government in 1877. The Compromise of 1877 decided the highly contested U.S. presidency and resulted in the abandonment of enforcement of civil rights in the South by the national Republican Party. Meanwhile, waning support for Reconstruction had already been seen on many fronts. In particular, the courts were proving unsympathetic to civil rights. The judicial retreat from Reconstruction began in 1873 when the Supreme Court in the Slaughter-House Cases held that national citizenship provided few "privileges and immunities." Federal prosecutions under the Enforcement Acts of 1870 and 1871 dropped dramatically across the South in 1875. In 1876 the Supreme Court held in United States v. Cruikshank that the federal government had no authority to prosecute individuals who deprived blacks of their civil rights. The Court said that blacks should instead look to state officials for protection. Of course, state officials in the South were the very people Congress had sought to protect blacks from.

Soon cases were being appealed to the Supreme Court. However, no opinion was issued until 1883, when, in the Civil Rights Cases, the Court declared the 1875 act unconstitutional as applied to public accommodations. The Court reasoned that the Fourteenth Amendment applied only to actions of the states, not private conduct, and that the refusal of service by a private individual did not violate the Thirteenth Amendment because such conduct did not constitute a badge of slavery. Like many of the accomplishments of Reconstruction, the Civil Rights Act of 1875 became a victim to the Jim Crow jurisprudence that would dominate the Supreme Court and the nation for decades to come.

See also Emancipation Proclamation (1863); Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1865); Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1868); Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1870); Ku Klux Klan Act (1871); United States v. Cruikshank (1876); Civil Rights Cases (1883).

Further Reading

■ Books

Bailey, N. Louise, et al. Biographical Directory of the South Carolina Senate, 1776–1985. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1986.

Black Americans in Congress, 1870–2007. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 2008.

Foner, Eric. Reconstruction: America's Unfinished Revolution, 1863–1877. New York: Harper & Row, 1988.

Franklin, John Hope. "The Enforcement of the Civil Rights Act of 1875." In African Americans and the Emergence of Segregation, 1865–1900, ed. Donald G. Nieman. New York: Garland, 1994.

Simmons, William J. Men of Mark: Eminent, Progressive and Rising. 1887. Reprint. New York: Arno Press, 1968.

■ Web Sites

"Richard Harvey Cain." Black Americans in Congress Web site: http://baic.house.gov/member-profiles/profile.html?intID=2.

—W. Lewis Burke

Questions for Further Study

1. Compare this document with George H. White's Farewell Address to Congress in 1901. Both speeches were made by black legislators, and both were addressed to their legislatures. What, if anything, changed between 1874 and 1901? Did the two speakers make similar arguments?

2. Describe the circumstances that led to the passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1875. What protections did the act afford that were not afforded by earlier legislation and the Civil Rights Amendments to the Constitution?

3. What were the chief arguments made against passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1875? How did Cain respond to these arguments?

4. What role did party politics play in the passage of the Civil Rights Act and in subsequent events? What were the origins of these party allegiances?

5. In the Civil Rights Cases of 1883, the U.S. Supreme Court declared the Civil Rights Act unconstitutional. Consult that document. On what basis did the Court reach its decision? How do you think Cain would have responded to the Court's reasoning?

Document Text

Richard Harvey Cain's "All That We Ask Is Equal Laws, Equal Legislation, and Equal Rights"

Mr. Cain. Mr. Speaker, I feel called upon more particularly by the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Vance] on civil rights to express my views. For a number of days this question has been discussed, and various have been the opinions expressed as to whether or not the pending bill should be passed in its present form or whether it should be modified to meet the objections entertained by a number of gentlemen whose duty it will be to give their votes for or against its passage. It has been assumed that to pass this bill in its present form Congress would manifest a tendency to override the Constitution of the country and violate the rights of the States.

Whether it be true or false is yet to be seen. I take it, so far as the constitutional question is concerned, if the colored people under the law, under the amendments to the Constitution, have become invested with all the rights of citizenship, then they carry with them all rights and immunities accruing to and belonging to a citizen of the United States. If four, or nearly five, million people have been lifted from the thralldom of slavery and made free; if the Government by its amendments to the Constitution has guaranteed to them all rights and immunities, as to other citizens, they must necessarily therefore carry along with them all the privileges enjoyed by all other citizens of the Republic.

Sir, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Vance] who spoke on the question stated some objections, to which I desire to address a few words of reply. He said it would enforce social rights, and therefore would be detrimental to the interests of both the whites and the blacks of the country. My conception of the effect of this bill, if it be passed into a law, will be simply to place the colored men of this country upon the same footing with every other citizen under the law, and will not at all enforce social relationship with any other class of persons in the country whatsoever. It is merely a matter of law. What we desire is that our civil rights shall be guaranteed by law as they are guaranteed to every other class of persons; and when that is done all other things will come in as a necessary sequence, the enforcement of the rights following the enactment of the law.

Sir, social equality is a right which every man, every woman, and every class of persons have within their own control. They have a right to form their own acquaintances, to establish their own social relationships. Its establishment and regulation is not within the province of legislation. No laws enacted by legislators can compel social equality. Now, what is it we desire? What we desire is this: inasmuch as we have been raised to the dignity, to the honor, to the position of our manhood, we ask that the laws of this country should guarantee all the rights and immunities belonging to that proud position, to be enforced all over this broad land.

Sir, the gentleman states that in the State of North Carolina the colored people enjoy all their rights as far as the highways are concerned; that in the hotels, and in the railroad cars, and in the various public places of resort, they have all the rights and all the immunities accorded to any other class of citizens of the United States. Now, it may not have come under his observation, but it has under mine, that such really is not the case; and the reason why I know and feel it more than he does is because my face is painted black and his is painted white. We who have the color—I may say the objectionable color—know and feel all this. A few days ago, in passing from South Carolina to this city, I entered a place of public resort where hungry men are fed, but I did not dare—I could not without trouble—sit down to the table. I could not sit down at Wilmington or at Weldon without entering into a contest, which I did not desire to do. My colleague, the gentleman who so eloquently spoke on this subject the other day, [Mr. Elliott,] a few months ago entered a restaurant at Wilmington and sat down to be served, and while there a gentleman stepped up to him and said, "You cannot eat here." All the other gentlemen upon the railroad as passengers were eating there; he had only twenty minutes, and was compelled to leave the restaurant or have a fight for it. He showed fight, however, and got his dinner; but he has never been back there since. Coming here last week I felt we did not desire to draw revolvers and present the bold front of warriors, and therefore we ordered our dinners to be brought into the cars, but even there we found the existence of this feeling; for, although we had paid a dollar apiece for our meals, to be brought by the servants into the cars, still there was objection on the part of the railroad people to our eating our meals in the cars, because they said we were putting on airs. They refused us in the restaurant, and then did not desire that we should eat our meals in the cars, although we paid for them. Yet this was in the noble State of North Carolina.

Mr. Speaker, the colored men of the South do not want the adoption of any force measure. No; they do not want anything by force. All they ask is that you will give them, by statutory enactment under the fundamental law, the right to enjoy precisely the same privileges accorded to every other class of citizens.

The gentleman, moreover, has told us that if we pass this civil-rights bill we will thereby rob the colored men of the South of the friendship of the whites. Now, I am at a loss to see how the friendship of our white friends can be lost to us by simply saying we should be permitted to enjoy the rights enjoyed by other citizens. I have a higher opinion of the friendship of the southern men than to suppose any such thing. I know them too well. I know their friendship will not be lost by the passage of this bill. For eight years I have been in South Carolina, and I have found this to be the fact, that the higher class, comprising gentlemen of learning and refinement, are less opposed to this measure than are those who do not occupy so high a position in the social scale.

Sir, I think that there will be no difficulty. But I do think this that there will be more trouble if we do not have those rights. I regard it important, therefore, that we should make the law so strong that no man can infringe those rights.

But, says the gentleman from North Carolina, some ambitious colored man will, when this law is passed, enter a hotel or railroad car, and thus create disturbance. If it be his right, then there is no vaulting ambition in his enjoying that right. And if he can pay for his seat in a first-class car or his room in a hotel, I see no objection to his enjoying it. But the gentleman says more. He cited, on the school question, the evidence of South Carolina, and says the South Carolina University has been destroyed by virtue of bringing into contact the white students with the colored. I think not. It is true that a small number of students left the institution, but the institution still remains. The buildings are there as erect as ever; the faculty are there as attentive to their duties as ever they were; the students are coming in as they did before. It is true, sir, that there is a mixture of students now; that there are colored and white students of law and medicine sitting side by side; it is true, sir, that the prejudice of some of the professors was so strong that it drove them out of the institution; but the philanthropy and good sense of others were such that they remained; and thus we have still the institution going on, and because some students have left, it cannot be reasonably argued that the usefulness of the institution has been destroyed. The University of South Carolina has not been destroyed.

But the gentleman says more. The colored man cannot stand, he says, where this antagonism exists, and he deprecates the idea of antagonizing the races. The gentleman says there is no antagonism on his part. I think there is no antagonism so far as the country is concerned. So far as my observation extends, it goes to prove this: that there is a general acceptance upon the part of the larger and better class of the whites of the South of the situation, and that they regard the education and the development of the colored people as essential to their welfare, and the peace, happiness, and prosperity of the whole country. Many of them, including the best minds of the South, are earnestly engaged in seeking to make this great system of education permanent in all the States. I do not believe, therefore, that it is possible there can be such an antagonism. Why, sir, in Massachusetts there is no such antagonism. There the colored and the white children go to school side by side. In Rhode Island there is not that antagonism. There they are educated side by side in the high schools. In New York, in the highest schools, are to be found, of late, colored men and colored women. Even old democratic New York does not refuse to give the colored people their rights, and there is no antagonism. A few days ago, when in New York, I made it my business to find out what was the position of matters there in this respect. I ascertained that there are, I think, seven colored ladies in the highest school in New York, and I believe they stand No. 1 in their class, side by side with members of the best and most refined families of the citizens of New York, and without any objection to their presence.

I cannot understand how it is that our southern friends, or a certain class of them, always bring back this old ghost of prejudice and of antagonism. There was a time, not very far distant in the past, when this antagonism was not recognized, when a feeling of fraternization between the white and the colored races existed, that made them kindred to each other. But since our emancipation, since liberty has come, and only since—only since we have stood up clothed in our manhood, only since we have proceeded to take hold and help advance the civilization of this nation—it is only since then that this bugbear is brought up against us again. Sir, the progress of the age demands that the colored man of this country shall be lifted by law into the enjoyment of every right, and that every appliance which is accorded to the German, to the Irishman, to the Englishman, and every foreigner, shall be given to him; and I shall give some reasons why I demand this in the name of justice.

Document Text

For two hundred years the colored men of this nation have assisted in building up its commercial interests. There are in this country nearly five millions of us, and for a space of two hundred and forty-seven years we have been hewers of wood and drawers of water; but we have been with you in promoting all the interests of the country. My distinguished colleague, who defended the civil rights of our race the other day on this floor, set this forth so clearly that I need not dwell upon it at, this time.

I propose to state just this: that we have been identified with the interests of this country from its very foundation. The cotton crop of this country has been raised and its rice-fields have been tilled by the hands of our race. All along as the march of progress, as the march of commerce, as the development of your resources has been widening and expanding and spreading, as your vessels have gone on every sea, with the stars and stripes waving over them, and carried your, commerce everywhere, there the black man's labor has gone to enrich your country and to augment the grandeur of your nationality. This was done in the time of slavery. And if, for the space of time I have noted, we have been hewers of wood and drawers of water; if we have made your cotton-fields blossom as the rose; if we have made your rice-fields wave with luxuriant harvests; if we have made your corn-fields rejoice; if we have sweated and toiled to build up the prosperity of the whole country by the productions of our labor, I submit, now that the war has made a change, now that we are free—I submit to the nation whether it is not fair and right that we should come in and enjoy to the fullest extent our freedom and liberty.

A word now as to the question of education. Sir, I know that, indeed, some of our republican friends are even a little weak on the school clause of this bill; but, sir, the education of the race, the education of the nation, is paramount to all other considerations. I regard it important, therefore, that the colored people should take place in the educational march of this nation, and I would suggest that there should be no discrimination. It is against discrimination in this particular that we complain.

Sir, if you look over the reports of superintendents of schools in the several States, you will find, I think, evidences sufficient to warrant Congress in passing the civil-rights bill as it now stands. The report of the commissioner of education of California shows that, under the operation of law and of prejudice, the colored children of that State are practically excluded from schooling. Here is a case where a large class of children are growing up in our midst in a state of ignorance and semi-barbarism. Take the report of the superintendent of education of Indiana, and you will find that while efforts have been made in some places to educate the colored children, yet the prejudice is so great that it debars the colored children from enjoying all the rights which they ought to enjoy under the law. In Illinois, too, the superintendent of education makes this statement: that, while the law guarantees education to every child, yet such are the operations among the school trustees that they almost ignore, in some places, the education of colored children.

All we ask is that you, the legislators of the nation, shall pass a law so strong and so powerful that no one shall be able to elude it and destroy our rights under the Constitution and laws of our country. That is all we ask.

But, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Vance] asks that the colored man shall place himself in an attitude to receive his rights. I ask, what attitude can we assume? We have tilled your soil, and during the rude shock of war, until our hour came, we were docile during that long, dark night, waiting patiently the coming day. In the Southern States during that war our men and women stood behind their masters; they tilled the soil, and there were no insurrections in all the broad lands of the South; the wives and daughters of the slaveholders were as sacred then as they were before; and the history of the war does not record a single event, a single instance, in which the colored people were unfaithful, even in slavery; nor does the history of the war record the fact that on the other side, on the side of the Union, there were any colored men who were not willing at all times to give their lives for their country. Sir, upon both sides we waited patiently. I was a student at Wilberforce University, in Ohio, when the tocsin of war was sounded, when Fort Sumter was fired upon, and I never shall forget the thrill that ran through my soul when I thought of the coming consequences of that shot. There were one hundred and fifteen of us, students at that university, who, anxious to vindicate the stars and stripes, made up a company, and offered our services to the governor of Ohio; and, sir, we were told that this was a white man's war and that the negro had nothing to do with it. Sir, we returned—docile, patient, waiting, casting our eyes to the heavens whence help always comes. We knew that there would come a period in the history of this nation when our strong black arms would be needed. We waited patiently; we waited until Massachusetts, through her noble governor, sounded the alarm, and we hastened then to hear the summons and obey it.

Sir, as I before remarked, we were peaceful on both sides. When the call was made on the side of the Union we were ready; when the call was made for us to obey orders on the other side, in the confederacy, we humbly performed our tasks, and waited patiently. But, sir, the time came when we were called for; and, I ask, who can say that when that call was made, the colored men did not respond as readily and as rapidly as did any other class of your citizens. Sir, I need not speak of the history of this bloody war. It will carry down to coming generations the valor of our soldiers on the battle-field. Fort Wagner will stand forever as a monument of that valor, and until Vicksburgh shall be wiped from the galaxy of battles in the great contest for human liberty that valor will be recognized.

And for what, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen was the great war made! The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Vance] announced before he sat down, in answer to an interrogatory by a gentleman on this side of the House, that they went into the war conscientiously before God. So be it. Then we simply come and plead conscientiously before God that those are our rights, and we want them. We plead conscientiously before God, believing that these are our rights by inheritance, and by the inexorable decree of Almighty God.

We believe in the Declaration of Independence, that all men are born free and equal, and are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. And we further believe that to secure those rights governments are instituted. And we further believe that when governments cease to subserve those ends the people should change them.

I have been astonished at the course which gentlemen on the other side have taken in discussing this bill. They plant themselves right behind the Constitution, and declare that the rights of the State ought not to be invaded. Now, if you will take the history of the war of the rebellion, as published by the Clerk of this House, you will see that in 1860 the whole country, each side, was earnest in seeking to make such amendments to the Constitution as would forever secure slavery and keep the Union together under the circumstances. The resolutions passed, and the sentiments expressed in speeches at that time, if examined by gentlemen, will be found to bear out all that I have indicated. It was felt in 1860 that anything that would keep the "wayward sisters" from going astray was desirable. They were then ready and willing to make any amendments.

And now, when the civil rights of our race are hanging upon the issue, they on the other side are not willing to concede to us such amendments as will guarantee them; indeed, they seek to impair the force of existing amendments to the Constitution of the United States, which would carry out the purpose.

I think it is proper and just that the civil-rights bill should be passed. Some think it would be better to modify it, to strike out the school clause, or to so modify it that some of the State constitutions should not be infringed. I regard it essential to us and the people of this country that we should be secured in this if in nothing else. I cannot regard that our rights will be secured until the jury-box and the school-room, these great palladiums of our liberty, shall have been opened to us. Then we will be willing to take our chances with other men.

We do not want any discriminations to be made. If discriminations are made in regard to schools, then there will be accomplished just what we are fighting against. If you say that the schools in the State of Georgia, for instance, shall be allowed to discriminate against colored people, then you will have discriminations made against us. We do not want any discriminations. I do not ask any legislation for the colored people of this country that is not applied to the white people. All that we ask is equal laws, equal legislation, and equal rights throughout the length and breadth of this land.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Vance] also says that the colored men should not come here begging at the doors of Congress for their rights. I agree with him. I want to say that we do not come here begging for our rights. We come here clothed in the garb of American citizenship. We come demanding our rights in the name of justice. We come, with no arrogance on our part, asking that this great nation, which laid the foundations of civilization and progress more deeply and more securely than any other nation on the face of the earth, guarantee us protection from outrage. We come here, five millions of people—more than composed this whole nation when it had its great tea-party in Boston Harbor, and demanded its rights at the point of the bayonet—asking that unjust discriminations against us be forbidden. We come here in the name of justice, equity, and law, in the name of our children, in the name of our country, petitioning for our rights.

Our rights will yet be accorded to us, I believe, from the feeling that has been exhibited on this floor of the growing sentiment of the country. Rapid as the weaver's shuttle, swift as the lightning's flash, such progress is being made that our rights will be accorded to us ere long. I believe the nation is perfectly willing to accord this measure of Justice, if only those who represent the people here would say the word. Let it be proclaimed that henceforth all the children of this land shall be free; that the stars and stripes, waving over all, shall secure to every one equal rights, and the nation will say "amen."

Document Text

Let the civil-rights bill be passed this day, and five million black men, women, and children, all over the land, will begin a new song of rejoicing, and the thirty-five millions of noble-hearted Anglo-Saxons will join in the shout of joy. Thus will the great mission be fulfilled of giving to all the people equal rights.

Inasmuch as we have toiled with you in building up this nation; inasmuch as we have suffered side by side with you in the war; inasmuch as we have together passed through affliction and pestilence, let there be now a fulfillment of the sublime thought of our fathers—let all men enjoy equal liberty and equal rights.

In this hour, when you are about to put the capstone on the mighty structure of government, I ask you to grant us this measure, because it is right. Grant this, and we shall go home with our hearts filled with gladness. I want to "shake hands over the bloody chasm." The gentleman from North Carolina has said he desires to have forever buried the memory of the recent war. I agree with him. Representing a South Carolina constituency, I desire to bury forever the tomahawk. I have voted in this House with a free heart to declare universal amnesty. Inasmuch as general amnesty has been proclaimed, I would hardly have expected there would be any objection on this floor to the civil-rights bill, giving to all men the equal rights of citizens. There should be no more contest. Amnesty and civil rights should go together. Gentlemen on the other side will admit that we have been faithful; and now, when we propose to bury the hatchet, let us shake hands upon this measure of justice; and if heretofore we have been enemies, let us be friends now and forever.

Our wives and our children have high hopes and aspirations; their longings for manhood and womanhood are equal to those of any other race. The same sentiment of patriotism and of gratitude, the same spirit of national pride that animates the hearts of other citizens, animates theirs. In the name of the dead soldiers of our race, whose bodies lie at Petersburgh and on other battle-fields of the South; in the name of the widows and orphans they have left behind; in the name of the widows of the confederate soldiers who fell upon the same fields, I conjure you let this righteous act be done. I appeal to you in the name of God and humanity to give us our rights, for we ask nothing more.

Glossary

Anglo-Saxons	the early Germanic tribes that subdued the British Isles; used loosely to refer to white northern Europeans
Fort Sumter	a fort in South Carolina, site of the opening hostilities of the Civil War in 1861
Fort Wagner	a fort in South Carolina, the scene of an assault in 1863 led by the Fifty-fourth Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, one of the Union's first black units
immunities	in constitutional law, the concept that a person in one state enjoys the same legal protections in other states when he or she crosses the border
Mr. Elliott	Robert Brown Elliott, a congressional representative from South Carolina
Mr. Vance	Democratic congressman Robert B. Vance of North Carolina
Petersburgh	Petersburg, a city in Virginia, scene of one of the final campaigns of the Civil War stars and stripes	the U.S. flag tea-party in Boston Harbor	reference to an event that took place on December 16, 1773, when American colonists protested British taxation by boarding three British ships and dumping their cargos of tea into the harbor
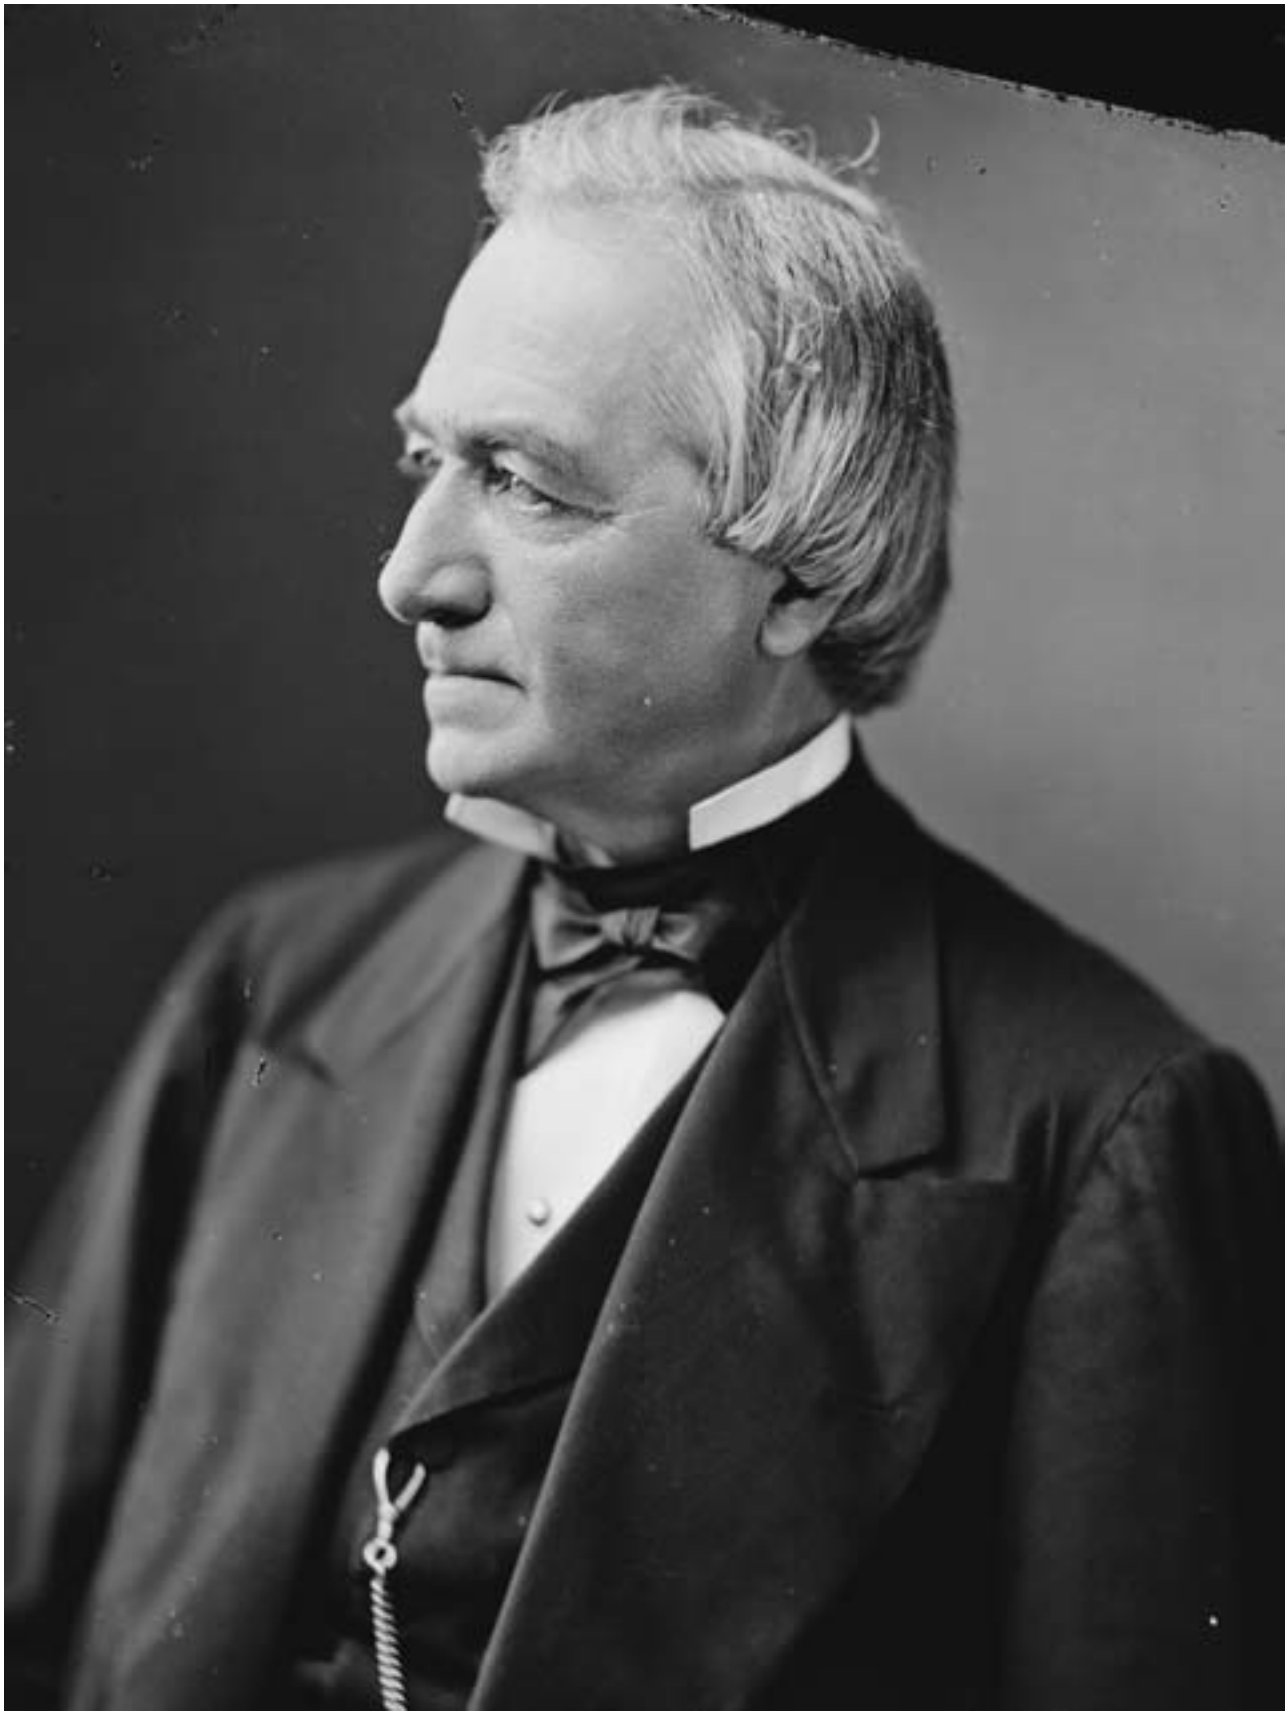
tocsin	a warning bell
Vicksburgh	Vicksburg, a city in Mississippi, the site of a major Civil War battle in 1863



Joseph P. Bradley (Library of Congress)

Civil Rights Cases

1883

"It is … scarcely just to say that the colored race has been the special favorite of the laws."

Overview

In the Civil Rights Cases decision of 1883, the U.S. Supreme Court limited the powers of Congress with its finding that the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment did not pertain to actions involving private parties. This case decided five similar discrimination cases that had been grouped together as the Civil Rights Cases when they were heard by the Supreme Court. These cases involved African Americans who had been denied access to whites-only facilities in railroads, hotels, and theaters. All five cases were related to the Civil Rights Act of 1875, which the majority of justices declared unconstitutional in the Civil Rights Cases decision. Nearly ninety years later, Congress would revive that legislation with the enactment of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. One of the most frequently examined decisions of the nineteenth century, the Civil Rights Cases decision dealt a dramatic blow to African Americans because it significantly narrowed the legal reach of the pivotal Fourteenth Amendment, which had provided for equal protection under the Constitution for African Americans.

Context

The American Civil War freed nearly four million slaves. While historians continue to debate the causes of the war, as President Abraham Lincoln made clear in his Second Inaugural Address, "These slaves constituted a peculiar and powerful interest. All knew that this interest was somehow the cause of the war." Eleven southern states seceded from the Union to form the Confederate States of America, nominally to protect "states' rights" but more specifically to preserve the institution of slavery. Even after four years of bloodshed, Confederate defeat, and the ratification of the Thirteenth Amendment abolishing slavery, southern states stubbornly resisted northern attempts to grant blacks civil, political, and social rights. Throughout the period known as Reconstruction (until the mid-1870s Republicans in Congress passed a great deal of legislation, and two more amendments to the Constitution (the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments), all with an eye toward expanding American citizenship to include former slaves. Of these many initiatives, none has had more positive or lasting effect than the Fourteenth Amendment, the five sections of which are notable for providing the "due process" and "equal protection" clauses that serve as the basis for over two-thirds of all cases that go before the Supreme Court today.

Under the leadership of such Radical Republicans from the Midwest and New England as John Bingham, Charles Sumner, and Thaddeus Stevens, Congress had passed the Civil Rights Act of 1866, which reversed the Supreme Court's decision in 1857 in Dred Scott v. Sandford, in which the Court had ruled that African Americans could not be considered citizens of the United States. The Civil Rights Act of 1866 deemed "all persons born in the United States" to be American citizens. Congress then established constitutional protection of that act with the Fourteenth Amendment, the ratification of which Congress demanded of former Confederate states before they could be readmitted to the Union. The equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment's vital first section—"no state shall … deny to any person within its jurisdiction equal protection of the laws"—enforced the Declaration of Independence's principle that "all men are created equal." The Fourteenth Amendment extended legal protection to African Americans and ensured both equality and protection of all U.S. citizens, although the meaning of the terms equality and protection would soon prove to be the focus of considerable debate.

The Civil Rights Act of 1875 was controversial from the moment Senator Charles Sumner of Massachusetts first proposed it in 1870. The original bill had attempted to eliminate all forms of segregation, which Sumner viewed as inherently discriminatory. Sumner's proposed legislation also sought to redefine what most Americans took to be "social rights" as civil rights. The concept that Congress could regulate the actions of individuals or privately held companies proved to be especially contentious; Democrats and Republicans alike insisted that such provisions were unconstitutional and would never be upheld by the Supreme Court. Many legislators objected to the bill's initial provisions for desegregation in schools, churches, and cemeteries, all of which were omitted from the final version passed by the lame-duck second session of the Forty-third Congress.

Time Line

1857

■ March 6
The Supreme Court hands down its decision in Dred Scott v. Sandford, ruling that African Americans could not be considered citizens of the United States.

1865

■ December 6
The Thirteenth Amendment, which abolishes slavery, is ratified.

1866

■ April 9
Over the veto of President Andrew Johnson, Congress passes the Civil Rights Act of 1866, which makes "all persons born in the United States" American citizens.

1868

■ July 9
The Fourteenth Amendment is ratified, extending citizenship and guaranteeing legal equal protection to all persons born or naturalized in the United States, including African Americans who formerly were slaves.

1875

■ March 1
Congress passes the Civil Rights Act of 1875, barring racial discrimination in "public accommodations."

1883

■ October 15
The Supreme Court issues the Civil Rights Cases decision, ruling the Civil Rights Act of 1875 unconstitutional.

1964

■ July 2
President Lyndon B. Johnson signs the Civil Rights Act into law.

The Civil Rights Act of 1875 met with mixed treatment from federal circuit courts prior to being ruled unconstitutional by the Supreme Court in 1883. During the late 1870s and early 1880s, as many as one hundred cases related to the act's provisions were tried and appealed before federal judges in Pennsylvania, Texas, Maryland, and Kentucky—all of which ruled the act constitutional. Divided federal courts in New York, Tennessee, Missouri, Kansas, and other states referred issues arising from the act to the Supreme Court. Although the Supreme Court had already considered the meaning of equal protection in three jury cases of 1880, it was not until the Civil Rights Cases ruling that the Court put forth the critically important doctrine of "state action," which limited federal guarantees of equal protection in favor of the laws and customs of individual states.

About the Author

All of the Supreme Court justices who heard the Civil Rights Cases had been appointed and confirmed under Republican presidential administrations. Two of Lincoln's appointees, Samuel Freeman Miller and Stephen Johnson Field, remained on the Court in 1883. Miller was the only Democrat on the nation's highest bench. Justice John Marshall Harlan had been a Democrat before the Civil War but had become a Republican during Reconstruction. The other judges included Chief Justice Morrison Remick Waite and, in order of seniority, William Burnham Woods, Stanley Matthews, Horace Gray, and Samuel Blatchford. Joseph P. Bradley wrote the majority opinion in the Civil Rights Cases decision, while Justice Harlan offered the lone dissent.

Joseph P. Bradley was born on March 14, 1813, in Berne, New York. He studied at Rutgers University before taking up the practice of law through various apprenticeships in Newark, New Jersey, where he passed the bar in 1839. Bradley married Mary Hornblower, the daughter of the chief justice of the New Jersey Supreme Court, and soon became a prominent patent and commercial lawyer. In 1862 he waged an unsuccessful campaign for Congress as a conservative Republican who refused to support either emancipation or civil rights for blacks, despite his aversion to slavery. While there was reason to suspect Bradley's views before his appointment to the Supreme Court under President Ulysses S. Grant in 1870, few could have anticipated the many anti–civil rights decisions in which Bradley's reasoning would prevail. By joining the majority, Bradley attacked the Enforcement Act of 1870 (which protected black voters) in United States v. Reese (1875) and United States v. Cruikshank (1876). In United States v. Harris (1883), Bradley again joined the Court's majority limiting the scope of the Ku Klux Klan Act of 1871, an attempt by Congress to outlaw conspiracies against African Americans. In his majority opinion for the Civil Rights Cases, Bradley pronounced the Civil Rights Act of 1875 unconstitutional. Bradley died on January 22, 1892.

John Marshall Harlan was born on June 1, 1833, into a Kentucky slaveholding family. In 1852 he graduated from Centre College in Danville and joined his father's law practice and then, in 1853, graduated from Transylvania University's law school in Lexington. Harlan was elected county judge of Franklin County, Kentucky, in 1858. In 1861, when the Civil War broke out, he enlisted in the Union army, rising to the rank of colonel. Leaving the army on the death of his father, Harlan took the post of attorney general of Kentucky. In 1877 he was appointed to the Supreme Court by President Rutherford B. Hayes and, because of his antebellum career as a border-state Democrat (though he had become a Republican in 1868), he endured a heated six-week confirmation process in Congress. Harlan, despite his Kentucky plantation heritage and antebellum opposition to emancipation, soon metamorphosed into the Court's chief opponent of compromise on civil rights. He stood out among the justices as the most resolute voice on behalf of blacks. Refusing to join the majority of justices in the United States v. Harris decision, Harlan argued instead for stronger federal enforcement of the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments. In his dissent for Plessy v. Ferguson in 1896, which echoed his dissent in the Civil Rights Cases, Harlan famously insisted: "Our Constitution is color-blind.… In respect of civil rights, all citizens are equal before the law." While Harlan supported the legal equality of African Americans, he never abandoned prejudiced assumptions about racial difference. Harlan served on the nation's highest bench for thirty-four years. Besides his strong stances on civil rights, he was also a proponent of governmental regulation of the economy during a period when the Court began to develop a broader constitutional focus on matters of law and public policy. Harlan died on October 14, 1911.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

The five cases consolidated in the Civil Rights Cases were United States v. Stanley, United States v. Ryan, United States v. Nichols, United States v. Singleton, and Robinson &Wife v. Memphis and Charleston Railroad Company. The Stanley and Nichols cases concerned indictments for denying access to inns or hotels; the Ryan and Singleton cases addressed access to theaters, one in San Francisco and the other in New York City. The Robinson case had originally been brought in Tennessee and involved the refusal of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad Company to allow Mrs. Robinson to travel in a ladies' train car. U.S. Solicitor General Samuel F. Phillips submitted all but the Robinson case as a group on November 7, 1882; briefs regarding the Robinson case were submitted on March 29, 1883.

The five related lawsuits in the Civil Rights Cases all had to do with Section 1 of the Civil Rights Act of 1875, which stated:

> All persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances on land or water, theaters, or other places of public amusement; subject only to the conditions and limitations established by law, and applicable alike to citizens of every race and color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude.

Section 2 of the act stipulated:

> Any person who shall violate [Section 1] … shall … forfeit and pay the sum of five hundred dollars to the person aggrieved thereby … and shall also, for every such offense, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than five hundred nor more than one thousand dollars, or shall be imprisoned not less than thirty days nor more than one year.

Senator Charles Sumner (Library of Congress)

♦ "Majority Opinion"

Writing for the majority of justices, Justice Bradley no longer argued for a broad view of the Fourteenth Amendment, which he had proposed in previous cases. With the Civil Rights Cases majority opinion, Bradley echoed the narrow position of the Slaughter-House Cases (1873) majority opinion, which held that state authority was primary and national authority was secondary or "corrective." He rejected the radical pro-nationalist, expansive-rights view and contended instead that the Civil Rights Act of 1875 was an impermissible attempt by Congress to regulate the private conduct of individuals with respect to racial discrimination. The act, Bradley wrote, "does not profess to be corrective of any constitutional wrong committed by the States." Regarding Section 4 of the act, he held that even private interference with such rights as voting, jury service, or appearing as witnesses in state court were not within Congress's control. Anyone faced with such interference had to look to state courts for relief.

The Court had two important missions in issuing this ruling: to contain the power of Congress in enacting

Essential Quotes

"It would be running the slavery argument into the ground to make it apply to every act of discrimination which a person may see fit to make as to guests he will entertain, or as to the people he will take into his coach or cab or car, or admit to his concert or theatre, or deal with in other matters of intercourse or business."

("Majority Opinion")

"It is, I submit, scarcely just to say that the colored race has been the special favorite of the laws."

("Dissenting Opinion")

"The one underlying purpose of congressional legislation has been to enable the black race to take the rank of mere citizens. The difficulty has been to compel a recognition of the legal right of the black race to take the rank of citizens, and to secure the enjoyment of privileges belonging, under the law, to them as a component part of the people for whose welfare and happiness government is ordained."

("Dissenting Opinion")

legislation and to safeguard states' rights. The first became a prerequisite for the second. With respect to the first, Bradley stipulated: "Legislation which Congress is authorized to adopt … is not general … but corrective legislation." To emphasize this point, Bradley repeated the word corrective ten more times. As for the second objective, Bradley almost buried the following point in the opinion's text: "Legislation cannot properly cover the whole domain of rights appertaining to life, liberty, and property, defining them and providing for their vindication.… It would be to make Congress take the place of the State legislatures and to supersede them." Federal limitation of state authority through acts of Congress was what the Court most wanted to prevent. While the Court's majority did not challenge the Fourteenth Amendment's applicability to state laws and actions, it also did not tolerate congressional oversight of what it considered private actions regulated under state laws.

Bradley argued that while private actors broke laws, their actions could not destroy civil rights; only states could do that. In other words, "civil rights … cannot be impaired by the wrongful acts of individuals, unsupported by state authority in the shape of laws, customs, or judicial or executive proceedings. The wrongful act of an individual … is simply a private wrong, or a crime of that individual." According to this reasoning, demonstrations of white supremacy and incidents of segregation and violence against blacks were wrongful private acts and did not generate anything akin to a state action, that is, the denial of civil rights, which could be remedied only by a corrective governmental action.

In the event confusion might persist on the distinction between wrongful private acts and deprivation of civil rights, Bradley provided several specific examples:

> An individual cannot deprive a man of his right to vote, to hold property, to buy and sell, to sue in the courts, or to be a witness or a juror; he may, by force or fraud, interfere with the enjoyment of the right in a particular case; he may commit an assault against the person, or commit murder, or use ruffian violence at the polls, or slander the good name of a fellow citizen; but, unless protected in these wrongful acts by some shield of State law or State authority, he cannot destroy or injure the right; he will only render himself amenable to satisfaction or punishment … [according to] the laws of the State where the wrongful acts are committed.

In sum, an individual's civil rights could not be destroyed by the acts of others. Any damage done had to be handled as a crime by the state where the offense had occurred.

Bradley also rejected the argument that the Thirteenth Amendment allowed Congress to pass the Civil Rights Act, since denial of access to public accommodations did not constitute slavery. According to the Court, such a broad construction of the Thirteenth Amendment would run "the slavery argument into the ground to make it apply to every act of discrimination." Bradley then went on to assert:

> When a man has emerged from slavery, and by the aid of beneficent legislation has shaken off the inseparable concomitants of that state, there must be some stage in the progress of his elevation when he takes the rank of a mere citizen, and ceases to be the special favorite of the laws, and when his rights as a citizen, or a man, are to be protected in the ordinary modes by which other men's rights are protected.

Gone from the Civil Rights Cases majority opinion was the generous spirit of Bradley's circuit-court opinion in an antecedent to the Slaughter-House Cases. In 1870, three years before the Supreme Court struck down the privileges and immunities clause of the Fourteenth Amendment in the Slaughter-House Cases ruling, Bradley had issued judicial relief for a "flagrant case of violation of the fundamental rights of labor" in Livestock Dealers' & Butchers Association v. Crescent City Live-Stock Landing & Slaughterhouse Co., et al., often called the Crescent City Case. Here he had reasoned that where the Constitution "has provided a remedy, we ought not to shrink from granting the appropriate relief." Gone, too, was Bradley's earlier view that Congress had been authorized to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment with "appropriate legislation." Gone was the perception that "those who framed the article were not themselves aware" of its breadth. Gone was the belief that the Fourteenth Amendment went beyond the "privileges and immunities" of the original Constitution and embraced potentially far more. Gone was the principle that "the privileges and immunities of all citizens shall be absolutely unabridged, unimpaired." Gone as well was the conviction of Bradley's opinion in United States v. Cruikshank, which stated "that Congress has the power to secure [the rights of blacks] not only as against the unfriendly operation of state laws, but against outrage … on the part of individuals, irrespective of state laws."

♦ "Dissenting Opinion"

Justice John Marshall Harlan was the sole justice who dissented from the majority opinion. Although Justice Bradley had forsaken the pro–civil rights stance of his Crescent City Case opinion and Slaughter-House Cases dissent, Justice Harlan used Bradley's reasoning in those cases as a starting point for his dissent in the Civil Rights Cases. While by the 1880s many Republicans had abandoned Radical Reconstruction and the extension of civil rights, Harlan had grown more committed to alleviating the plight of African Americans. Few, if any, nineteenth-century Supreme Court opinions have proved to be more prescient or memorable than Harlan's dissent in the Civil Rights Cases.

With a cherished pen and inkwell, the same pen that Chief Justice Roger Taney had used to write the majority opinion in Dred Scott v. Sandford, Harlan composed his dissent in the Civil Rights Cases. He forcefully rejected the majority opinion as "entirely too narrow and artificial," protesting that the Thirteenth Amendment gave Congress sufficient power to legislate beyond matters of bondage to address all "badges of slavery." At thirty-six pages and considerably longer than the majority opinion, Harlan's dissent characterized the Civil Rights Cases decision as at best tepid jurisprudential progress.

Harlan took aim at the Court majority's tandem mission with two goals of his own: a detailed critique of the view of congressional authority as "corrective" and recognition of "the enlarged powers conferred by the recent amendments upon the general government." He began his dissent with the observation that the Court had, in effect, sacrificed the recent Reconstruction Amendments (the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments) to the Constitution and concluded, among other important points, that "the rights which Congress, by the act of 1875, endeavored to secure and protect are legal, not social rights."

Harlan stressed a number of Court decisions that conflicted with the majority opinion, particularly with respect to the Court's authority to overturn congressional legislation. In Fletcher v. Peck, the Court had maintained that to determine whether Congress had transgressed its constitutional power was "a question of much delicacy, which ought seldom, if ever, to be decided in the affirmative." In the Sinking Fund Cases—where railroad companies challenged a lower court injunction against them for trying to pay a stock dividend in alleged violation of recent legislation—the Court had held that declaring an act of Congress void "should never be made except in a clear case" and "every possible presumption is in favor of the validity of a statute." The Court's decision in Prigg v. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania held that "when the end is required the means are given" to Congress, though in that case "the end" had meant support for slavery and slaveholders. In Ableman v. Booth, the Court had sustained the constitutionality of the Fugitive Slave Act of 1850 "upon the implied power of Congress to enforce" the property claims of slaveholders. Harlan's point was that when slaveholders controlled the federal government, the Court had sustained the authority of Congress to legislate in favor of slavery; however, when it came to enforcement of the Constitution and civil rights in the years after Reconstruction, the Court was doing just the opposite—ruling to impede the legislative authority of Congress.

Perhaps the Court was at least a little embarrassed to be blocking civil rights legislation, especially once Harlan pointed out the litany of recent rulings that appeared to contradict the majority opinion. According to the Court in Strauder v. West Virginia and Ex parte Virginia, the purpose of the Reconstruction Amendments "was to raise the colored race from that condition of inferiority … into perfect equality of civil rights." In both United States v. Cruikshank and United States v. Reese, the Court had held that the Fifteenth Amendment "invested the citizens of the United States with a new constitutional right, which is exemption from discrimination" and that "the right to vote comes from the States; but the right of exemption from the prohibited discrimination comes from the United States."

According to Harlan, "exemption from discrimination … is a new constitutional right" conferred by the nation; Congress shall provide for the "form and manner" of protecting this right. Overwhelmed by the Court's contradictions and conservatism, Harlan posed this question: "Are the powers of the national legislature to be restrained in proportion as the rights and privileges, derived from the nation, are valuable?" One can sense Harlan's extreme frustration with the Court in his concluding comment:

> The one underlying purpose of congressional legislation has been to enable the black race to take the rank of mere citizens. The difficulty has been to compel a recognition of the legal right of the black race to take the rank of citizens, and to secure the enjoyment of privileges belonging, under the law, to them as a component part of the people for whose welfare and happiness government is ordained.

If the Court had wanted to protect civil rights, legal precedent already existed. In his presentation to the justices, Solicitor General Phillips brought up Munn v. Illinois (1876), in which the Court had held that government regulation of privately owned grain elevators was "necessary for the public good" and had also affirmed broad police powers for government: "Under the powers inherent in every sovereignty, a government may regulate the conduct of its citizens toward each other." In his Civil Rights Cases dissent, Justice Harlan likewise observed that in Munn v. Illinois the Court had ruled that private property is no longer only a private concern when it becomes "affected with a public interest." Accordingly, the Court might well have viewed inns and railroads as public enterprises and thus under the purview of Congress.

Moreover, the Court could have looked to the commerce clause of the Constitution (Article I, Section 8). Justice Harlan noted just that regarding the Robinson case: "Might not the act of 1875 be maintained in that case, as applicable at least to commerce between the States, notwithstanding [that] it does not … profess to have been passed … to regulate commerce?" When Salmon Chase was chief justice from 1864 to 1873, the Court did not alter the interpretation of the commerce clause. In the Civil Rights Cases majority opinion, Justice Bradley acknowledged that "Congress is clothed with direct and plenary powers of legislation" under the commerce clause. However, he did not appear to accept that the three Reconstruction Amendments bolstered Congress's legislative plenary powers. Thus, Bradley dismissed whether inns and public conveyances were encompassed under Congress's legislative authority under the commerce clause as "a question which is not now before us." Nevertheless, the Court could have found the Civil Rights Act of 1875 constitutional under the commerce clause, especially in light of its Munn v. Illinois ruling.

That Bradley interpreted the Fourteenth Amendment as merely "corrective" elicited Harlan's harshest criticism. Harlan observed that the entire amendment hardly assumed what Bradley claimed was an exclusively negative or "corrective" form simply because of the clause in Section 1 beginning with "no state shall." The historian Carter Woodson offered this candid assessment: "The court was too evasive or too stupid to observe that the first clause of this amendment was an affirmative.… Such sophistry deserves the condemnation of all fair-minded people." The Court also might have interpreted the Civil Rights Act and the Reconstruction Amendments in light of factors such as history and legislative intent. Or as Harlan put it, borrowing from an old adage: "It is not the words of the law but the internal sense of it that makes the law; the letter of the law is the body; the sense and reason of the law is the soul."

Audience

As with most Supreme Court decisions, the justices' audience included not only lawyers, lower court judges, and legislators at all levels but also in fact all Americans. The Civil Rights Cases decision had political significance for both the Republican and Democratic parties. Given the number of black lynchings in America throughout the late-nineteenth and early-twentieth centuries, it seems likely that groups such as the Ku Klux Klan interpreted the Civil Rights Cases decision as tacitly allowing local instances of racist mob rule.

Impact

The Civil Rights Cases decision closed the first chapter of the civil rights struggle in the United States. The majority ruling negated Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment, which had mandated Congress to enforce the amendment with "appropriate legislation." Yet again, the Court abrogated Congress's ability to protect and enforce civil liberties, as it had already previously ruled in the Reese, Cruikshank, and Harris cases. This ruling was as much a setback for Congress as it was for African Americans. With this fierce gesture, the Court applied the brakes on the development of national government and the extension of civil rights.

News of the Court's decision elicited a mixture of smugness and indifference to the principle of equal protection. The Atlanta Constitution reported:

> We do not hope to compass with words the deep and perfect satisfaction with which the decision of the United States Supreme Court on the Civil-Rights Bill will > be received throughout the South.… It was against the mischievous intrusion of the negro into places set apart for white people that we protested.

Frederick Douglass saw the mischief elsewhere: "The decision is to the direction and interest of the Old Calhoun doctrine of State rights as against Federal authority.… The decision has resulted largely from confusing social with civil rights." The Chicago Tribune agreed with Douglass: "The Constitution in its present shape does not warrant Congressional regulation of social affairs … which individuals regulate to suit themselves." The Washington Post published statements attributed to Lee Nance, "an intelligent and well-informed colored resident of this city," who was quoted as having said, "'I would say that I am bothered more about where and how I can get enough money with which to pay for a good, square meal, than I am about where I will eat it.'" The Post then editorialized that "there are other issues of more concern to the colored people … than the social and sentimental questions passed upon by the court." While acknowledging the existence of prejudice against African Americans, Harper's Weekly maintained: "Colored citizens … need not regret the fate of the Civil Rights Bill. The wrongs under which they suffer are not to be remedied by law."

From the perspective of more than one well-respected editor, the Civil Rights Act of 1875 never had a chance. The Nation under the editor E. L. Godkin had championed civil rights for African Americans, but by 1883 Godkin, like much of the rest of America, had grown weary of the fight. On October 18, 1883, the magazine published this assessment:

> The Act was forced through Congress.… It was as clear then as it is now to almost every candid-minded man, that the Fourteenth Amendment, on which the promoters of the Act professed to base it, was really directed against State legislation, and not against the acts of individuals.… The Civil Rights Act was really rather an admonition, or statement of moral obligation, than a legal command. Probably nine-tenths of those who voted for it knew very well that whenever it came before the Supreme Court it would be torn to pieces.

The Cleveland Gazette perhaps offered the most succinct, if solemn, pronouncement: The Civil Rights Bill "lingered unconsciously nearly nine years and died on the 15th of October, 1883."

The Court's narrow reading of the Fourteenth Amendment in the Civil Rights Cases decision destroyed movements toward integration and helped usher in racial segregation that would continue through the post–World War II years in much of the United States. That Justice Bradley and his colleagues did not view segregation as a "badge of slavery" brings up the question that if segregation is not such a badge, what is? The Court's ruling erased civil rights enforcement from the Republican agenda and mandated federal withdrawal from civil rights enforcement, a policy that would not begin to be reversed until well after World War II. Interestingly, when framing the Civil Rights Act of 1964, Congress relied on its powers under the commerce clause of the Constitution—one of the same arguments brought up by Justice Harlan in his famous dissent in the Civil Rights Cases. In passing the Civil Rights Act of 1964,

Questions for Further Study

1. In what ways did the Court's decision in the Civil Rights Cases undermine the protections the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution afforded African Americans?

2. Using this document alongside the Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, the Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, the Ku Klux Klan Act, and United States v. Cruikshank, prepare a time line of fifteen key events from 1865 to 1883 that affected African Americans. Be prepared to defend your choices.

3. What was the basis of the Court's reasoning in ruling as it did in the Civil Rights Cases?

4. On what basis did John Marshall Harlan dissent from the majority opinion in the Civil Rights Cases? Select five sentences that you believe express the core of his analysis.

5. What factors in the social, economic, or political environment might have led the Supreme Court to rule as it did in the Civil Rights Cases?

Congress circumvented not only the legal precedent of the Civil Rights Cases decision but also the Supreme Court's limitation on congressional power to enforce "equal protection" under the law.

See also Prigg v. Pennsylvania (1841); Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Black Code of Mississippi (1865); Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1865); Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1868); Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1870).

Further Reading

■ Articles

Frantz, Laurent B. "Congressional Power to Enforce the Fourteenth Amendment against Private Acts." Yale Law Journal 73, no. 8 (July 1964): 1353–1384.

Hartz, Louis. "John M. Harlan in Kentucky, 1855–1877: The Story of His Pre-Court Career." Filson Club History Quarterly 14 (January 1940): 17–40.

Lado, Marianne L. Engelman. "A Question of Justice: African-American Legal Perspectives on the 1883 Civil Rights Cases." Chicago-Kent Law Review 70 (1995): 1123–1195.

McPherson, James M. "Abolitionists and the Civil Rights Act of 1875." Journal of American History 52, no. 3 (December 1965): 493–510.

Scott, John Anthony. "Justice Bradley's Evolving Concept of the Fourteenth Amendment from the Slaughterhouse Cases to the Civil Rights Cases." Rutgers Law Review 25 (Summer 1971): 552–569.

Woodson, Carter. "Fifty Years of Negro Citizenship as Qualified by the United States Supreme Court." Journal of Negro History 6, no. 1 (January 1921): 1–53.

■ Books

Beatty, Jack. Age of Betrayal: The Triumph of Money in America, 1865–1900. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2007.

Elliott, Mark. Color-Blind Justice: Albion Tourgée and the Quest for Racial Equality from the Civil War to Plessy v. Ferguson. New York: Oxford University Press, 2006.

Garraty, John A., ed. Quarrels That Have Shaped the Constitution. New York: Harper & Row, 1964.

Miller, Loren. The Petitioners: The Story of the Supreme Court of the United States and the Negro. New York: Pantheon Books, 1966.

Urofsky, Melvin I., and Paul Finkelman. A March of Liberty: A Constitutional History of the United States. Vol. 1: From the Founding to 1890. 2nd ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.

—R. Owen Williams

Document Text

Civil Rights Cases

Majority Opinion

Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court. After stating the facts in the above language, he continued:

It is obvious that the primary and important question in all the cases is the constitutionality of the law, for if the law is unconstitutional, none of the prosecutions can stand.

The sections of the law referred to provide as follows:

Sec. 1. That all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances on land or water, theatres, and other places of public amusement, subject only to the conditions and limitations established by law and applicable alike to citizens of every race and color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude.

Sec. 2. That any person who shall violate the foregoing section by denying to any citizen, except for reasons by law applicable to citizens of every race and color, and regardless of any previous condition of servitude, the full enjoyment of any of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, or privileges in said section enumerated, or by aiding or inciting such denial, shall for every such offence, forfeit and pay the sum of five hundred dollars to the person aggrieved thereby, to be recovered in an action of debt, with full costs, and shall also, for every such offence, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than five hundred nor more than one thousand dollars, or shall be imprisoned not less than thirty days nor more than one year, Provided, That all persons may elect to sue for the penalty aforesaid, or to proceed under their rights at common law and by State statutes, and having so elected to proceed in the one mode or the other, their right to proceed in the other jurisdiction shall be barred. But this provision shall not apply to criminal proceedings, either under this act or the criminal law of any State; and provided further, that a judgment for the penalty in favor of the party aggrieved, or a judgment upon an indictment, shall be a bar to either prosecution respectively.

Are these sections constitutional? The first section, which is the principal one, cannot be fairly understood without attending to the last clause, which qualifies the preceding part.

The essence of the law is not to declare broadly that all persons shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances, and theatres, but that such enjoyment shall not be subject to any conditions applicable only to citizens of a particular race or color, or who had been in a previous condition of servitude. In other words, it is the purpose of the law to declare that, in the enjoyment of the accommodations and privileges of inns, public conveyances, theatres, and other places of public amusement, no distinction shall be made between citizens of different race or color or between those who have, and those who have not, been slaves. Its effect is to declare that, in all inns, public conveyances, and places of amusement, colored citizens, whether formerly slaves or not, and citizens of other races, shall have the same accommodations and privileges in all inns, public conveyances, and places of amusement as are enjoyed by white citizens, and vice versa. The second section makes it a penal offence in any person to deny to any citizen of any race or color, regardless of previous servitude, any of the accommodations or privileges mentioned in the first section.

Has Congress constitutional power to make such a law? Of course, no one will contend that the power to pass it was contained in the Constitution before the adoption of the last three amendments. The power is sought, first, in the Fourteenth Amendment, and the views and arguments of distinguished Senators, advanced whilst the law was under consideration, claiming authority to pass it by virtue of that amendment, are the principal arguments adduced in favor of the power. We have carefully considered those arguments, as was due to the eminent ability of those who put them forward, and have felt, in all its force, the weight of authority which always invests a law that Congress deems itself competent to pass. But the responsibility of an independent judgment is now thrown upon this court, and we are bound to exercise it according to the best lights we have.

The first section of the Fourteenth Amendment (which is the one relied on), after declaring who shall be citizens of the United States, and of the several States, is prohibitory in its character, and prohibitory upon the States. It declares that:

Document Text

> No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

It is State action of a particular character that is prohibited. Individual invasion of individual rights is not the subject matter of the amendment. It has a deeper and broader scope. It nullifies and makes void all State legislation, and State action of every kind, which impairs the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States or which injures them in life, liberty or property without due process of law, or which denies to any of them the equal protection of the laws. It not only does this, but, in order that the national will, thus declared, may not be a mere brutum fulmen, the last section of the amendment invests Congress with power to enforce it by appropriate legislation. To enforce what? To enforce the prohibition. To adopt appropriate legislation for correcting the effects of such prohibited State laws and State acts, and thus to render them effectually null, void, and innocuous. This is the legislative power conferred upon Congress, and this is the whole of it. It does not invest Congress with power to legislate upon subjects which are within the domain of State legislation, but to provide modes of relief against State legislation, or State action, of the kind referred to. It does not authorize Congress to create a code of municipal law for the regulation of private rights, but to provide modes of redress against the operation of State laws and the action of State officers executive or judicial when these are subversive of the fundamental rights specified in the amendment. Positive rights and privileges are undoubtedly secured by the Fourteenth Amendment, but they are secured by way of prohibition against State laws and State proceedings affecting those rights and privileges, and by power given to Congress to legislate for the purpose of carrying such prohibition into effect, and such legislation must necessarily be predicated upon such supposed State laws or State proceedings, and be directed to the correction of their operation and effect. A quite full discussion of this aspect of the amendment may be found in United Sates v. Cruikshank, … Virginia v. Rives, … and Ex parte Virginia….

An apt illustration of this distinction may be found in some of the provisions of the original Constitution. Take the subject of contracts, for example. The Constitution prohibited the States from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts. This did not give to Congress power to provide laws for the general enforcement of contracts, nor power to invest the courts of the United States with jurisdiction over contracts, so as to enable parties to sue upon them in those courts. It did, however, give the power to provide remedies by which the impairment of contracts by State legislation might be counteracted and corrected, and this power was exercised. The remedy which Congress actually provided was that contained in the 25th section of the Judiciary Act of 1789, 1 Stat. 8, giving to the Supreme Court of the United States jurisdiction by writ of error to review the final decisions of State courts whenever they should sustain the validity of a State statute or authority alleged to be repugnant to the Constitution or laws of the United States. By this means, if a State law was passed impairing the obligation of a contract and the State tribunals sustained the validity of the law, the mischief could be corrected in this court. The legislation of Congress, and the proceedings provided for under it, were corrective in their character. No attempt was made to draw into the United States courts the litigation of contracts generally, and no such attempt would have been sustained. We do not say that the remedy provided was the only one that might have been provided in that case. Probably Congress had power to pass a law giving to the courts of the United States direct jurisdiction over contracts alleged to be impaired by a State law, and under the broad provisions of the act of March 3d 1875, ch. 137, 18 Stat. 470, giving to the circuit courts jurisdiction of all cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, it is possible that such jurisdiction now exists. But under that, or any other law, it must appear as well by allegation, as proof at the trial, that the Constitution had been violated by the action of the State legislature. Some obnoxious State law passed, or that might be passed, is necessary to be assumed in order to lay the foundation of any federal remedy in the case, and for the very sufficient reason that the constitutional prohibition is against State laws impairing the obligation of contracts.

And so, in the present case, until some State law has been passed, or some State action through its officers or agents has been taken, adverse to the rights of citizens sought to be protected by the Fourteenth Amendment, no legislation of the United States under said amendment, nor any proceeding under such legislation, can be called into activity, for the prohibitions of the amendment are against State laws and acts done under State authority. Of course, legislation may, and should, be provided in advance to meet the exigency when it arises, but it should be adapted to the mischief and wrong which the amendment was intended to provide against, and that is State laws, or State action of some kind, adverse to the rights of the citizen secured by the amendment. Such legislation cannot properly cover the whole domain of rights appertaining to life, liberty and property, defining them and providing for their vindication. That would be to establish a code of municipal law regulative of all private rights between man and man in society. It would be to make Congress take the place of the State legislatures and to supersede them. It is absurd to affirm that, because the rights of life, liberty, and property (which include all civil rights that men have) are, by the amendment, sought to be protected against invasion on the part of the State without due process of law, Congress may therefore provide due process of law for their vindication in every case, and that, because the denial by a State to any persons of the equal protection of the laws is prohibited by the amendment, therefore Congress may establish laws for their equal protection. In fine, the legislation which Congress is authorized to adopt in this behalf is not general legislation upon the rights of the citizen, but corrective legislation, that is, such as may be necessary and proper for counteracting such laws as the States may adopt or enforce, and which, by the amendment, they are prohibited from making or enforcing, or such acts and proceedings as the States may commit or take, and which, by the amendment, they are prohibited from committing or taking. It is not necessary for us to state, if we could, what legislation would be proper for Congress to adopt. It is sufficient for us to examine whether the law in question is of that character.

Document Text

An inspection of the law shows that it makes no reference whatever to any supposed or apprehended violation of the Fourteenth Amendment on the part of the States. It is not predicated on any such view. It proceeds ex directo to declare that certain acts committed by individuals shall be deemed offences, and shall be prosecuted and punished by proceedings in the courts of the United States. It does not profess to be corrective of any constitutional wrong committed by the States; it does not make its operation to depend upon any such wrong committed. It applies equally to cases arising in States which have the justest laws respecting the personal rights of citizens, and whose authorities are ever ready to enforce such laws, as to those which arise in States that may have violated the prohibition of the amendment. In other words, it steps into the domain of local jurisprudence, and lays down rules for the conduct of individuals in society towards each other, and imposes sanctions for the enforcement of those rules, without referring in any manner to any supposed action of the State or its authorities.

If this legislation is appropriate for enforcing the prohibitions of the amendment, it is difficult to see where it is to stop. Why may not Congress, with equal show of authority, enact a code of laws for the enforcement and vindication of all rights of life, liberty, and property? If it is supposable that the States may deprive persons of life, liberty, and property without due process of law (and the amendment itself does suppose this), why should not Congress proceed at once to prescribe due process of law for the protection of every one of these fundamental rights, in every possible case, as well as to prescribe equal privileges in inns, public conveyances, and theatres? The truth is that the implication of a power to legislate in this manner is based upon the assumption that, if the States are forbidden to legislate or act in a particular way on a particular subject, and power is conferred upon Congress to enforce the prohibition, this gives Congress power to legislate generally upon that subject, and not merely power to provide modes of redress against such State legislation or action. The assumption is certainly unsound. It is repugnant to the Tenth Amendment of the Constitution, which declares that powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people.

We have not overlooked the fact that the fourth section of the act now under consideration has been held by this court to be constitutional. That section declares that no citizen, possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law, shall be disqualified for service as grand or petit juror in any court of the United States, or of any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and any officer or other person charged with any duty in the selection or summoning of jurors who shall exclude or fail to summon any citizen for the cause aforesaid, shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined not more than five thousand dollars.

Document Text

In Ex parte Virginia, … it was held that an indictment against a State officer under this section for excluding persons of color from the jury list is sustainable. But a moment's attention to its terms will show that the section is entirely corrective in its character. Disqualifications for service on juries are only created by the law, and the first part of the section is aimed at certain disqualifying laws, namely, those which make mere race or color a disqualification, and the second clause is directed against those who, assuming to use the authority of the State government, carry into effect such a rule of disqualification. In the Virginia case, the State, through its officer, enforced a rule of disqualification which the law was intended to abrogate and counteract. Whether the statute book of the State actually laid down any such rule of disqualification or not, the State, through its officer, enforced such a rule, and it is against such State action, through its officers and agents, that the last clause of the section is directed. This aspect of the law was deemed sufficient to divest it of any unconstitutional character, and makes it differ widely from the first and second sections of the same act which we are now considering.

These sections, in the objectionable features before referred to, are different also from the law ordinarily called the "Civil Rights Bill," originally passed April 9th, 1866, 14 Stat. 27, ch. 31, and reenacted with some modifications in sections 16, 17, 18, of the Enforcement Act, passed May 31st, 1870, 16 Stat. 140, ch. 114. That law, as reenacted, after declaring that all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall have the same right in every State and Territory to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, give evidence, and to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of persons and property as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, penalties, taxes, licenses and exactions of every kind, and none other, any law, statute, ordinance, regulation or custom to the contrary notwithstanding, proceeds to enact that any person who, under color of any law, statute, ordinance, regulation or custom, shall subject, or cause to be subjected, any inhabitant of any State or Territory to the deprivation of any rights secured or protected by the preceding section (above quoted), or to different punishment, pains, or penalties, on account of such person's being an alien, or by reason of his color or race, than is prescribed for the punishment of citizens, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and subject to fine and imprisonment as specified in the act. This law is clearly corrective in its character, intended to counteract and furnish redress against State laws and proceedings, and customs having the force of law, which sanction the wrongful acts specified. In the Revised Statutes, it is true, a very important clause, to-wit, the words "any law, statute, ordinance, regulation or custom to the contrary notwithstanding," which gave the declaratory section its point and effect, are omitted; but the penal part, by which the declaration is enforced, and which is really the effective part of the law, retains the reference to State laws by making the penalty apply only to those who should subject parties to a deprivation of their rights under color of any statute, ordinance, custom, etc., of any State or Territory, thus preserving the corrective character of the legislation.… The Civil Rights Bill here referred to is analogous in its character to what a law would have been under the original Constitution, declaring that the validity of contracts should not be impaired, and that, if any person bound by a contract should refuse to comply with it, under color or pretence that it had been rendered void or invalid by a State law, he should be liable to an action upon it in the courts of the United States, with the addition of a penalty for setting up such an unjust and unconstitutional defence.

In this connection, it is proper to state that civil rights, such as are guaranteed by the Constitution against State aggression, cannot be impaired by the wrongful acts of individuals, unsupported by State authority in the shape of laws, customs, or judicial or executive proceedings. The wrongful act of an individual, unsupported by any such authority, is simply a private wrong, or a crime of that individual; an invasion of the rights of the injured party, it is true, whether they affect his person, his property, or his reputation; but if not sanctioned in some way by the State, or not done under State authority, his rights remain in full force, and may presumably be vindicated by resort to the laws of the State for redress. An individual cannot deprive a man of his right to vote, to hold property, to buy and sell, to sue in the courts, or to be a witness or a juror; he may, by force or fraud, interfere with the enjoyment of the right in a particular case; he may commit an assault against the person, or commit murder, or use ruffian violence at the polls, or slander the good name of a fellow citizen; but, unless protected in these wrongful acts by some shield of State law or State authority, he cannot destroy or injure the right; he will only render himself amenable to satisfaction or punishment, and amenable therefor to the laws of the State where the wrongful acts are committed. Hence, in all those cases where the Constitution seeks to protect the rights of the citizen against discriminative and unjust laws of the State by prohibiting such laws, it is not individual offences, but abrogation and denial of rights, which it denounces and for which it clothes the Congress with power to provide a remedy. This abrogation and denial of rights for which the States alone were or could be responsible was the great seminal and fundamental wrong which was intended to be remedied. And the remedy to be provided must necessarily be predicated upon that wrong. It must assume that, in the cases provided for, the evil or wrong actually committed rests upon some State law or State authority for its excuse and perpetration.

Document Text

Of course, these remarks do not apply to those cases in which Congress is clothed with direct and plenary powers of legislation over the whole subject, accompanied with an express or implied denial of such power to the States, as in the regulation of commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes, the coining of money, the establishment of post offices and post roads, the declaring of war, etc. In these cases, Congress has power to pass laws for regulating the subjects specified in every detail, and the conduct and transactions of individuals in respect thereof. But where a subject is not submitted to the general legislative power of Congress, but is only submitted thereto for the purpose of rendering effective some prohibition against particular State legislation or State action in reference to that subject, the power given is limited by its object, and any legislation by Congress in the matter must necessarily be corrective in its character, adapted to counteract and redress the operation of such prohibited State laws or proceedings of State officers.

If the principles of interpretation which we have laid down are correct, as we deem them to be (and they are in accord with the principles laid down in the cases before referred to, as well as in the recent case of United States v. Harris …), it is clear that the law in question cannot be sustained by any grant of legislative power made to Congress by the Fourteenth Amendment. That amendment prohibits the States from denying to any person the equal protection of the laws, and declares that Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of the amendment. The law in question, without any reference to adverse State legislation on the subject, declares that all persons shall be entitled to equal accommodations and privileges of inns, public conveyances, and places of public amusement, and imposes a penalty upon any individual who shall deny to any citizen such equal accommodations and privileges. This is not corrective legislation; it is primary and direct; it takes immediate and absolute possession of the subject of the right of admission to inns, public conveyances, and places of amusement. It supersedes and displaces State legislation on the same subject, or only allows it permissive force. It ignores such legislation, and assumes that the matter is one that belongs to the domain of national regulation. Whether it would not have been a more effective protection of the rights of citizens to have clothed Congress with plenary power over the whole subject is not now the question. What we have to decide is whether such plenary power has been conferred upon Congress by the Fourteenth Amendment, and, in our judgment, it has not.

We have discussed the question presented by the law on the assumption that a right to enjoy equal accommodation and privileges in all inns, public conveyances, and places of public amusement is one of the essential rights of the citizen which no State can abridge or interfere with. Whether it is such a right or not is a different question which, in the view we have taken of the validity of the law on the ground already stated, it is not necessary to examine.

We have also discussed the validity of the law in reference to cases arising in the States only, and not in reference to cases arising in the Territories or the District of Columbia, which are subject to the plenary legislation of Congress in every branch of municipal regulation. Whether the law would be a valid one as applied to the Territories and the District is not a question for consideration in the cases before us, they all being cases arising within the limits of States. And whether Congress, in the exercise of its power to regulate commerce amongst the several States, might or might not pass a law regulating rights in public conveyances passing from one State to another is also a question which is not now before us, as the sections in question are not conceived in any such view.

But the power of Congress to adopt direct and primary, as distinguished from corrective, legislation on the subject in hand is sought, in the second place, from the Thirteenth Amendment, which abolishes slavery. This amendment declares that neither slavery, nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction, and it gives Congress power to enforce the amendment by appropriate legislation.

Document Text

This amendment, as well as the Fourteenth, is undoubtedly self-executing, without any ancillary legislation, so far as its terms are applicable to any existing state of circumstances. By its own unaided force and effect, it abolished slavery and established universal freedom. Still, legislation may be necessary and proper to meet all the various cases and circumstances to be affected by it, and to prescribe proper modes of redress for its violation in letter or spirit. And such legislation may be primary and direct in its character, for the amendment is not a mere prohibition of State laws establishing or upholding slavery, but an absolute declaration that slavery or involuntary servitude shall not exist in any part of the United States.

It is true that slavery cannot exist without law, any more than property in lands and goods can exist without law, and, therefore, the Thirteenth Amendment may be regarded as nullifying all State laws which establish or uphold slavery. But it has a reflex character also, establishing and decreeing universal civil and political freedom throughout the United States, and it is assumed that the power vested in Congress to enforce the article by appropriate legislation clothes Congress with power to pass all laws necessary and proper for abolishing all badges and incidents of slavery in the United States, and, upon this assumption, it is claimed that this is sufficient authority for declaring by law that all persons shall have equal accommodations and privileges in all inns, public conveyances, and places of amusement, the argument being that the denial of such equal accommodations and privileges is, in itself, a subjection to a species of servitude within the meaning of the amendment. Conceding the major proposition to be true, that Congress has a right to enact all necessary and proper laws for the obliteration and prevention of slavery with all its badges and incidents, is the minor proposition also true, that the denial to any person of admission to the accommodations and privileges of an inn, a public conveyance, or a theatre does subject that person to any form of servitude, or tend to fasten upon him any badge of slavery? If it does not, then power to pass the law is not found in the Thirteenth Amendment.

In a very able and learned presentation of the cognate question as to the extent of the rights, privileges and immunities of citizens which cannot rightfully be abridged by state laws under the Fourteenth Amendment, made in a former case, a long list of burdens and disabilities of a servile character, incident to feudal vassalage in France, and which were abolished by the decrees of the National Assembly, was presented for the purpose of showing that all inequalities and observances exacted by one man from another were servitudes or badges of slavery which a great nation, in its effort to establish universal liberty, made haste to wipe out and destroy. But these were servitudes imposed by the old law, or by long custom, which had the force of law, and exacted by one man from another without the latter's consent. Should any such servitudes be imposed by a state law, there can be no doubt that the law would be repugnant to the Fourteenth, no less than to the Thirteenth, Amendment, nor any greater doubt that Congress has adequate power to forbid any such servitude from being exacted.

But is there any similarity between such servitudes and a denial by the owner of an inn, a public conveyance, or a theatre of its accommodations and privileges to an individual, even though the denial be founded on the race or color of that individual? Where does any slavery or servitude, or badge of either, arise from such an act of denial? Whether it might not be a denial of a right which, if sanctioned by the state law, would be obnoxious to the prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment is another question. But what has it to do with the question of slavery?

It may be that, by the Black Code (as it was called), in the times when slavery prevailed, the proprietors of inns and public conveyances were forbidden to receive persons of the African race because it might assist slaves to escape from the control of their masters. This was merely a means of preventing such escapes, and was no part of the servitude itself. A law of that kind could not have any such object now, however justly it might be deemed an invasion of the party's legal right as a citizen, and amenable to the prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The long existence of African slavery in this country gave us very distinct notions of what it was and what were its necessary incidents. Compulsory service of the slave for the benefit of the master, restraint of his movements except by the master's will, disability to hold property, to make contracts, to have a standing in court, to be a witness against a white person, and such like burdens and incapacities were the inseparable incidents of the institution. Severer punishments for crimes were imposed on the slave than on free persons guilty of the same offences. Congress, as we have seen, by the Civil Rights Bill of 1866, passed in view of the Thirteenth Amendment before the Fourteenth was adopted, undertook to wipe out these burdens and disabilities, the necessary incidents of slavery constituting its substance and visible form, and to secure to all citizens of every race and color, and without regard to previous servitude, those fundamental rights which are the essence of civil freedom, namely, the same right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, give evidence, and to inherit, purchase, lease, sell and convey property as is enjoyed by white citizens. Whether this legislation was fully authorized by the Thirteenth Amendment alone, without the support which it afterward received from the Fourteenth Amendment, after the adoption of which it was reenacted with some additions, it is not necessary to inquire. It is referred to for the purpose of showing that, at that time (in 1866), Congress did not assume, under the authority given by the Thirteenth Amendment, to adjust what may be called the social rights of men and races in the community, but only to declare and vindicate those fundamental rights which appertain to the essence of citizenship, and the enjoyment or deprivation of which constitutes the essential distinction between freedom and slavery.

Document Text

We must not forget that the province and scope of the Thirteenth and Fourteenth amendments are different: the former simply abolished slavery; the latter prohibited the States from abridging the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, from depriving them of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, and from denying to any the equal protection of the laws. The amendments are different, and the powers of Congress under them are different. What Congress has power to do under one it may not have power to do under the other. Under the Thirteenth Amendment, it has only to do with slavery and its incidents. Under the Fourteenth Amendment, it has power to counteract and render nugatory all State laws and proceedings which have the effect to abridge any of the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, or to deprive them of life, liberty or property without due process of law, or to deny to any of them the equal protection of the laws. Under the Thirteenth Amendment, the legislation, so far as necessary or proper to eradicate all forms and incidents of slavery and involuntary servitude, may be direct and primary, operating upon the acts of individuals, whether sanctioned by State legislation or not; under the Fourteenth, as we have already shown, it must necessarily be, and can only be, corrective in its character, addressed to counteract and afford relief against State regulations or proceedings.

The only question under the present head, therefore, is whether the refusal to any persons of the accommodations of an inn or a public conveyance or a place of public amusement by an individual, and without any sanction or support from any State law or regulation, does inflict upon such persons any manner of servitude or form of slavery as those terms are understood in this country? Many wrongs may be obnoxious to the prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment which are not, in any just sense, incidents or elements of slavery. Such, for example, would be the taking of private property without due process of law, or allowing persons who have committed certain crimes (horse stealing, for example) to be seized and hung by the posse comitatus without regular trial, or denying to any person, or class of persons, the right to pursue any peaceful avocations allowed to others. What is called class legislation would belong to this category, and would be obnoxious to the prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment, but would not necessarily be so to the Thirteenth, when not involving the idea of any subjection of one man to another. The Thirteenth Amendment has respect not to distinctions of race or class or color, but to slavery. The Fourteenth Amendment extends its protection to races and classes, and prohibits any State legislation which has the effect of denying to any race or class, or to any individual, the equal protection of the laws.

Now, conceding for the sake of the argument that the admission to an inn, a public conveyance, or a place of public amusement on equal terms with all other citizens is the right of every man and all classes of men, is it any more than one of those rights which the states, by the Fourteenth Amendment, are forbidden to deny to any person? And is the Constitution violated until the denial of the right has some State sanction or authority? Can the act of a mere individual, the owner of the inn, the public conveyance or place of amusement, refusing the accommodation, be justly regarded as imposing any badge of slavery or servitude upon the applicant, or only as inflicting an ordinary civil injury, properly cognizable by the laws of the State and presumably subject to redress by those laws until the contrary appears?

After giving to these questions all the consideration which their importance demands, we are forced to the conclusion that such an act of refusal has nothing to do with slavery or involuntary servitude, and that, if it is violative of any right of the party, his redress is to be sought under the laws of the State, or, if those laws are adverse to his rights and do not protect him, his remedy will be found in the corrective legislation which Congress has adopted, or may adopt, for counteracting the effect of State laws or State action prohibited by the Fourteenth Amendment. It would be running the slavery argument into the ground to make it apply to every act of discrimination which a person may see fit to make as to the guests he will entertain, or as to the people he will take into his coach or cab or car, or admit to his concert or theatre, or deal with in other matters of intercourse or business. Innkeepers and public carriers, by the laws of all the States, so far as we are aware, are bound, to the extent of their facilities, to furnish proper accommodation to all unobjectionable persons who in good faith apply for them. If the laws themselves make any unjust discrimination amenable to the prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment, Congress has full power to afford a remedy under that amendment and in accordance with it.

When a man has emerged from slavery, and, by the aid of beneficent legislation, has shaken off the inseparable concomitants of that state, there must be some stage in the progress of his elevation when he takes the rank of a mere citizen and ceases to be the special favorite of the laws, and when his rights as a citizen or a man are to be protected in the ordinary modes by which other men's rights are protected. There were thousands of free colored people in this country before the abolition of slavery, enjoying all the essential rights of life, liberty and property the same as white citizens, yet no one at that time thought that it was any invasion of his personal status as a freeman because he was not admitted to all the privileges enjoyed by white citizens, or because he was subjected to discriminations in the enjoyment of accommodations in inns, public conveyances and places of amusement. Mere discriminations on account of race or color were not regarded as badges of slavery. If, since that time, the enjoyment of equal rights in all these respects has become established by constitutional enactment, it is not by force of the Thirteenth Amendment (which merely abolishes slavery), but by force of the Thirteenth and Fifteenth Amendments.

On the whole, we are of opinion that no countenance of authority for the passage of the law in question can be found in either the Thirteenth or Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution, and no other ground of authority for its passage being suggested, it must necessarily be declared void, at least so far as its operation in the several States is concerned.

This conclusion disposes of the cases now under consideration. In the cases of the United States v. Michael Ryan, and of Richard A. Robinson and Wife v. The Memphis & Charleston Railroad Company, the judgments must be affirmed. In the other cases, the answer to be given will be that the first and second sections of the act of Congress of March 1st, 1875, entitled "An Act to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights," are unconstitutional and void, and that judgment should be rendered upon the several indictments in those cases accordingly.

And it is so ordered.

Dissenting Opinion

Mr. Justice Harlan dissenting.

The opinion in these cases proceeds, it seems to me, upon grounds entirely too narrow and artificial. I cannot resist the conclusion that the substance and spirit of the recent amendments of the Constitution have been sacrificed by a subtle and ingenious verbal criticism.

It is not the words of the law, but the internal sense of it that makes the law; the letter of the law is the body; the sense and reason of the law is the soul.

Constitutional provisions, adopted in the interest of liberty and for the purpose of securing, through national legislation, if need be, rights inhering in a state of freedom and belonging to American citizenship have been so construed as to defeat the ends the people desired to accomplish, which they attempted to accomplish, and which they supposed they had accomplished by changes in their fundamental law. By this I do not mean that the determination of these cases should have been materially controlled by considerations of mere expediency or policy. I mean only, in this form, to express an earnest conviction that the court has departed from the familiar rule requiring, in the interpretation of constitutional provisions, that full effect be given to the intent with which they were adopted.

The purpose of the first section of the act of Congress of March 1, 1875, was to prevent race discrimination in respect of the accommodations and facilities of inns, public conveyances, and places of public amusement. It does not assume to define the general conditions and limitations under which inns, public conveyances, and places of public amusement may be conducted, but only declares that such conditions and limitations, whatever they may be, shall not be applied so as to work a discrimination solely because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. The second section provides a penalty against anyone denying, or aiding or inciting the denial, of any citizen, of that equality of right given by the first section except for reasons by law applicable to citizens of every race or color and regardless of any previous condition of servitude.

There seems to be no substantial difference between my brethren and myself as to the purpose of Congress, for they say that the essence of the law is not to declare broadly that all persons shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances, and theatres, but that such enjoyment shall not be subject to conditions applicable only to citizens of a particular race or color, or who had been in a previous condition of servitude. The effect of the statute, the court says, is that colored citizens, whether formerly slaves or not, and citizens of other races shall have the same accommodations and privileges in all inns, public conveyances, and places of amusement as are enjoyed by white persons, and vice versa.

Document Text

The court adjudges, I think erroneously, that Congress is without power, under either the Thirteenth or Fourteenth Amendment, to establish such regulations, and that the first and second sections of the statute are, in all their parts, unconstitutional and void.

Whether the legislative department of the government has transcended the limits of its constitutional powers, "is at all times," said this court in Fletcher v. Peck, … a question of much delicacy which ought seldom, if ever, to be decided in the affirmative in a doubtful case.… The opposition between the Constitution and the law should be such that the judge feels a clear and strong conviction of their incompatibility with each other.

More recently, in Sinking Fund Cases, … we said:

It is our duty, when required in the regular course of judicial proceedings, to declare an act of Congress void if not within the legislative power of the United States, but this declaration should never be made except in a clear case. Every possible presumption is in favor of the validity of a statute, and this continues until the contrary is shown beyond a rational doubt. One branch of the government cannot encroach on the domain of another without danger. The safety of our institutions depends in no small degree on a strict observance of this salutary rule.

Before considering the language and scope of these amendments, it will be proper to recall the relations subsisting, prior to their adoption, between the national government and the institution of slavery, as indicated by the provisions of the Constitution, the legislation of Congress, and the decisions of this court. In this mode, we may obtain keys with which to open the mind of the people and discover the thought intended to be expressed.

In section 2 of article IV of the Constitution, it was provided that no person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due.

Under the authority of this clause, Congress passed the Fugitive Slave Law of 1793, establishing a mode for the recovery of fugitive slaves and prescribing a penalty against any person who should knowingly and willingly obstruct or hinder the master, his agent, or attorney in seizing, arresting, and recovering the fugitive, or who should rescue the fugitive from him, or who should harbor or conceal the slave after notice that he was a fugitive.

In Prigg v. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, … this court had occasion to define the powers and duties of Congress in reference to fugitives from labor. Speaking by Mr. Justice Story, it laid down these propositions:

> That a clause of the Constitution conferring a right should not be so construed as to make it shadowy or unsubstantial, or leave the citizen without a remedial power adequate for its protection when another construction equally accordant with the words and the sense in which they were used would enforce and protect the right granted;
>
> That Congress is not restricted to legislation for the execution of its expressly granted powers, but, for the protection of rights guaranteed by the Constitution, may employ such means, not prohibited, as are necessary and proper, or such as are appropriate, to attain the ends proposed;
>
> That the Constitution recognized the master's right of property in his fugitive slave, and, as incidental thereto, the right of seizing and recovering him, regardless of any State law or regulation or local custom whatsoever; and,
>
> That the right of the master to have his slave, thus escaping, delivered up on claim, being guaranteed by the Constitution, the fair implication was that the national government was clothed with appropriate authority and functions to enforce it.
>
> The court said
>
> The fundamental principle, applicable to all cases of this sort, would seem to be that, when the end is required the means are given, and when the duty is enjoined, the ability to perform it is contemplated to exist on the part of the functionary to whom it is entrusted.

Again,

> It would be a strange anomaly and forced construction to suppose that the national government meant to rely for the due fulfillment of its own proper duties, and the rights which it intended to secure, upon State legislation, and not upon that of the Union. A fortiori, it would be more objectionable to suppose that a power which was to be the same throughout the Union should be confided to State sovereignty, which could not rightfully act beyond its own territorial limits.

The act of 1793 was, upon these grounds, adjudged to be a constitutional exercise of the powers of Congress.

It is to be observed from the report of Priggs' case that Pennsylvania, by her attorney general, pressed the argument that the obligation to surrender fugitive slaves was on the States and for the States, subject to the restriction that they should not pass laws or establish regulations liberating such fugitives; that the Constitution did not take from the States the right to determine the status of all persons within their respective jurisdictions; that it was for the State in which the alleged fugitive was found to determine, through her courts or in such modes as she prescribed, whether the person arrested was, in fact, a freeman or a fugitive slave; that the sole power of the general government in the premises was, by judicial instrumentality, to restrain and correct, not to forbid and prevent in the absence of hostile State action, and that, for the general government to assume primary authority to legislate on the subject of fugitive slaves, to the exclusion of the States, would be a dangerous encroachment on State sovereignty. But to such suggestions, this court turned a deaf ear, and adjudged that primary legislation by Congress to enforce the master's right was authorized by the Constitution.

We next come to the Fugitive Slave Act of 1850, the constitutionality of which rested, as did that of 1793, solely upon the implied power of Congress to enforce the master's rights. The provisions of that act were far in advance of previous legislation. They placed at the disposal of the master seeking to recover his fugitive slave substantially the whole power of the nation. It invested commissioners, appointed under the act, with power to summon the posse comitatus for the enforcement of its provisions, and commanded all good citizens to assist in its prompt and efficient execution whenever their services were required as part of the posse comitatus. Without going into the details of that act, it is sufficient to say that Congress omitted from it nothing which the utmost ingenuity could suggest as essential to the successful enforcement of the master's claim to recover his fugitive slave. And this court, in Ableman v. Booth, … adjudged it to be "in all of its provisions, fully authorized by the Constitution of the United States."

The only other case, prior to the adoption of the recent amendments, to which reference will be made, is that of Dred Scott v. Sanford.… That case was instituted in a circuit court of the United States by Dred Scott, claiming to be a citizen of Missouri, the defendant being a citizen of another State. Its object was to assert the title of himself and family to freedom. The defendant pleaded in abatement that Scott—being of African descent, whose ancestors, of pure African blood, were brought into this country and sold as slaves—was not a citizen. The only matter in issue, said the court, was whether the descendants of slaves thus imported and sold, when they should be emancipated, or who were born of parents who had become free before their birth, are citizens of a State in the sense in which the word "citizen" is used in the Constitution of the United States.

In determining that question, the court instituted an inquiry as to who were citizens of the several States at the adoption of the Constitution and who at that time were recognized as the people whose rights and liberties had been violated by the British government. The result was a declaration by this court, speaking by Chief Justice Taney, that the legislation and histories of the times, and the language used in the Declaration of Independence, showed that neither the class of persons who had been imported as slaves nor their descendants, whether they had become free or not, were then acknowledged as a part of the people, nor intended to be included in the general words used in that instrument; that they had for more than a century before been regarded as beings of an inferior race, and altogether unfit to associate with the white race either in social or political relations, and so far inferior that they had no rights which the white man was bound to respect, and that the negro might justly and lawfully be reduced to slavery for his benefit; that he was "bought and sold, and treated as an ordinary article of merchandise and traffic, whenever a profit could be made by it;" and, that this opinion was at that time fixed and universal in the civilized portion of the white race. It was regarded as an axiom in morals, as well as in politics, which no one thought of disputing, or supposed to be open to dispute, and men in every grade and position in society daily and habitually acted upon it in their private pursuits, as well as in matters of public concern, without for a moment doubting the correctness of this opinion.

Document Text

The judgment of the court was that the words "people of the United States" and "citizens" meant the same thing, both describing the political body who, according to our republican institutions, form the sovereignty and hold the power and conduct the government through their representatives; that they are what we familiarly call the "sovereign people," and every citizen is one of this people and a constituent member of this sovereignty; but that the class of persons described in the plea in abatement did not compose a portion of this people, were not "included, and were not intended to be included, under the word 'citizens' in the Constitution;" that, therefore, they could "claim none of the rights and privileges which that instrument provides for and secures to citizens of the United States;" that, on the contrary, they were at that time considered as a subordinate and inferior class of beings who had been subjugated by the dominant race and, whether emancipated or not, yet remained subject to their authority, and had no rights or privileges but such as those who held the power and the government might choose to grant them.

Such were the relations which formerly existed between the government, whether national or state, and the descendants, whether free or in bondage, of those of African blood who had been imported into this country and sold as slaves.

The first section of the Thirteenth Amendment provides that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

Its second section declares that "Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation." This amendment was followed by the Civil Rights Act of April 9, 1866, which, among other things, provided that all persons born in the United States, and not subject to any foreign power, excluding Indians not taxed, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States.… The power of Congress, in this mode, to elevate the enfranchised race to national citizenship was maintained by the supporters of the act of 1866 to be as full and complete as its power, by general statute, to make the children, being of full age, of persons naturalized in this country, citizens of the United States without going through the process of naturalization. The act of 1866 in this respect was also likened to that of 1843, in which Congress declared that the Stockbridge tribe of Indians, and each and every one of them, shall be deemed to be and are hereby declared to be, citizens of the United States to all intents and purposes, and shall be entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of such citizens, and shall in all respects be subject to the laws of the United States.

If the act of 1866 was valid in conferring national citizenship upon all embraced by its terms, then the colored race, enfranchised by the Thirteenth Amendment, became citizens of the United States prior to the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment. But, in the view which I take of the present case, it is not necessary to examine this question.

The terms of the Thirteenth Amendment are absolute and universal. They embrace every race which then was, or might thereafter be, within the United States. No race, as such, can be excluded from the benefits or rights thereby conferred. Yet it is historically true that that amendment was suggested by the condition, in this country, of that race which had been declared by this court to have had—according to the opinion entertained by the most civilized portion of the white race at the time of the adoption of the Constitution—"no rights which the white man was bound to respect," none of the privileges or immunities secured by that instrument to citizens of the United States. It had reference, in peculiar sense, to a people which (although the larger part of them were in slavery) had been invited by an act of Congress to aid in saving from overthrow a government which, theretofore, by all of its departments, had treated them as an inferior race, with no legal rights or privileges except such as the white race might choose to grant them.

These are the circumstances under which the Thirteenth Amendment was proposed for adoption. They are now recalled only that we may better understand what was in the minds of the people when that amendment was considered, and what were the mischiefs to be remedied and the grievances to be redressed by its adoption.

We have seen that the power of Congress, by legislation, to enforce the master's right to have his slave delivered up on claim was implied from the recognition of that right in the national Constitution. But the power conferred by the Thirteenth Amendment does not rest upon implication or inference. Those who framed it were not ignorant of the discussion, covering many years of our country's history, as to the constitutional power of Congress to enact the Fugitive Slave Laws of 1793 and 1850. When, therefore, it was determined, by a change in the fundamental law, to uproot the institution of slavery wherever it existed in the land and to establish universal freedom, there was a fixed purpose to place the authority of Congress in the premises beyond the possibility of a doubt. Therefore, ex industria, power to enforce the Thirteenth Amendment by appropriate legislation was expressly granted. Legislation for that purpose, my brethren concede, may be direct and primary. But to what specific ends may it be directed? This court has uniformly held that the national government has the power, whether expressly given or not, to secure and protect rights conferred or guaranteed by the Constitution. United States v. Reese, … Strauder v. West Virginia.... That doctrine ought not now to be abandoned when the inquiry is not as to an implied power to protect the master's rights, but what may Congress, under powers expressly granted, do for the protection of freedom and the rights necessarily inhering in a state of freedom.

The Thirteenth Amendment, it is conceded, did something more than to prohibit slavery as an institution resting upon distinctions of race and upheld by positive law. My brethren admit that it established and decreed universal civil freedom throughout the United States. But did the freedom thus established involve nothing more than exemption from actual slavery? Was nothing more intended than to forbid one man from owning another as property? Was it the purpose of the nation simply to destroy the institution, and then remit the race, theretofore held in bondage, to the several States for such protection, in their civil rights, necessarily growing out of freedom, as those States, in their discretion, might choose to provide? Were the States against whose protest the institution was destroyed to be left free, so far as national interference was concerned, to make or allow discriminations against that race, as such, in the enjoyment of those fundamental rights which, by universal concession, inhere in a state of freedom? Had the Thirteenth Amendment stopped with the sweeping declaration in its first section against the existence of slavery and involuntary servitude except for crime, Congress would have had the power, by implication, according to the doctrines of Prigg v. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, repeated in Strauder v. West Virginia, to protect the freedom established, and consequently, to secure the enjoyment of such civil rights as were fundamental in freedom. That it can exert its authority to that extent is made clear, and was intended to be made clear, by the express grant of power contained in the second section of the Amendment.

That there are burdens and disabilities which constitute badges of slavery and servitude, and that the power to enforce by appropriate legislation the Thirteenth Amendment may be exerted by legislation of a direct and primary character for the eradication not simply of the institution, but of its badges and incidents, are propositions which ought to be deemed indisputable. They lie at the foundation of the Civil Rights Act of 1866. Whether that act was authorized by the Thirteenth Amendment alone, without the support which it subsequently received from the Fourteenth Amendment, after the adoption of which it was reenacted with some additions, my brethren do not consider it necessary to inquire. But I submit, with all respect to them, that its constitutionality is conclusively shown by their opinion. They admit, as I have said, that the Thirteenth Amendment established freedom; that there are burdens and disabilities, the necessary incidents of slavery, which constitute its substance and visible form; that Congress, by the act of 1866, passed in view of the Thirteenth Amendment, before the Fourteenth was adopted, undertook to remove certain burdens and disabilities, the necessary incidents of slavery, and to secure to all citizens of every race and color, and without regard to previous servitude, those fundamental rights which are the essence of civil freedom, namely, the same right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, give evidence, and to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, and convey property as is enjoyed by white citizens; that, under the Thirteenth Amendment, Congress has to do with slavery and its incidents, and that legislation, so far as necessary or proper to eradicate all forms and incidents of slaver and involuntary servitude, may be direct and primary, operating upon the acts of individuals, whether sanctioned by State legislation or not. These propositions being conceded, it is impossible, as it seems to me, to question the constitutional validity of the Civil Rights Act of 1866. I do not contend that the Thirteenth Amendment invests Congress with authority, by legislation, to define and regulate the entire body of the civil rights which citizens enjoy, or may enjoy, in the several States. But I hold that, since slavery, as the court has repeatedly declared, Slaughterhouse Cases, … Strauder West Virginia, … was the moving or principal cause of the adoption of that amendment, and since that institution rested wholly upon the inferiority, as a race, of those held in bondage, their freedom necessarily involved immunity from, and protection against, all discrimination against them, because of their race, in respect of such civil rights as belong to freemen of other races. Congress, therefore, under its express power to enforce that amendment by appropriate legislation, may enact laws to protect that people against the deprivation, because of their race, of any civil rights granted to other freemen in the same State, and such legislation may be of a direct and primary character, operating upon States, their officers and agents, and also upon at least such individuals and corporations as exercise public functions and wield power and authority under the State.

Document Text

To test the correctness of this position, let us suppose that, prior to the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, a State had passed a statute denying to freemen of African descent, resident within its limits, the same right which was accorded to white persons of making and enforcing contracts and of inheriting, purchasing, leasing, selling and conveying property; or a statute subjecting colored people to severer punishment for particular offences than was prescribed for white persons, or excluding that race from the benefit of the laws exempting homesteads from execution. Recall the legislation of 1865–1866 in some of the States, of which this court in the Slaughterhouse Cases said that it imposed upon the colored race onerous disabilities and burdens; curtailed their rights in the pursuit of life, liberty and property to such an extent that their freedom was of little value; forbade them to appear in the towns in any other character than menial servants; required them to reside on and cultivate the soil, without the right to purchase or own it; excluded them from many occupations of gain, and denied them the privilege of giving testimony in the courts where a white man was a party.… Can there be any doubt that all such enactments might have been reached by direct legislation upon the part of Congress under its express power to enforce the Thirteenth Amendment? Would any court have hesitated to declare that such legislation imposed badges of servitude in conflict with the civil freedom ordained by that amendment? That it would have been also in conflict with the Fourteenth Amendment because inconsistent with the fundamental rights of American citizenship does not prove that it would have been consistent with the Thirteenth Amendment.

What has been said is sufficient to show that the power of Congress under the Thirteenth Amendment is not necessarily restricted to legislation against slavery as an institution upheld by positive law, but may be exerted to the extent, at least, of protecting the liberated race against discrimination in respect of legal rights belonging to freemen where such discrimination is based upon race.

It remains now to inquire what are the legal rights of colored persons in respect of the accommodations, privileges and facilities of public conveyances, inns, and places of public amusement?

First, as to public conveyances on land and water. In New Jersey Steam Navigation Co. v. Merchants' Bank, … this court, speaking by Mr. Justice Nelson, said that a common carrier is in the exercise of a sort of public office, and has public duties to perform, from which he should not be permitted to exonerate himself without the assent of the parties concerned.

To the same effect is Munn v. Illinois.… In Olcott v. Supervisor, … it was ruled that railroads are public highways, established by authority of the State for the public use; that they are nonetheless public highways because controlled and owned by private corporations; that it is a part of the function of government to make and maintain highways for the convenience of the public; that no matter who is the agent, or what is the agency, the function performed is that of the State; that, although the owners may be private companies, they may be compelled to permit the public to use these works in the manner in which they can be used; that, upon these grounds alone have the courts sustained the investiture of railroad corporations with the State's right of eminent domain, or the right of municipal corporations, under legislative authority, to assess, levy and collect taxes to aid in the construction of railroads. So in Township of Queensbury v. Culver, … it was said that a municipal subscription of railroad stock was in aid of the construction and maintenance of a public highway, and for the promotion of a public use. Again, in Township of Pine Grove v. Talcott… : "Though the corporation [railroad] was private, its work was public, as much so as if it were to be constructed by the State." To the like effect are numerous adjudications in this and the State courts with which the profession is familiar. The Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, in Inhabitants of Worcester v. The Western R.R. Corporation, … said in reference to a railroad:

> The establishment of that great thoroughfare is regarded as a public work, established by public authority, intended for the public use and benefit, the use of which is secured to the whole community, and constitutes, therefore, like a canal, turnpike, or highway, a public easement.… It is true that the real and personal property, necessary to the establishment and management of the railroad is vested in the corporation, but it is in trust for the public.

In Erie, Etc., R.R. Co. v. Casey, … the court, referring to an act repealing the charter of a railroad, and under which the State took possession of the road, said:

> It is a public highway, solemnly devoted to public use. When the lands were taken, it was for such use, or they could not have been taken at all.… Railroads established upon land taken by the right of eminent domain by authority of the commonwealth, created by her laws as thoroughfares for commerce, are her highways. No corporation has property in them, though it may have franchises annexed to and exercisable within them.

In many courts it has been held that, because of the public interest in such a corporation, the land of a railroad company cannot be levied on and sold under execution by a creditor. The sum of the adjudged cases is that a railroad corporation is a governmental agency, created primarily for public purposes and subject to be controlled for the public benefit. Upon this ground, the State, when unfettered by contract, may regulate, in its discretion, the rates of fares of passengers and freight. And upon this ground, too, the State may regulate the entire management of railroads in all matters affecting the convenience and safety of the public, as, for example, by regulating speed, compelling stops of prescribed length at stations, and prohibiting discriminations and favoritism. If the corporation neglect or refuse to discharge its duties to the public, it may be coerced to do so by appropriate proceedings in the name or in behalf of the State.

Such being the relations these corporations hold to the public, it would seem that the right of a colored person to use an improved public highway upon the terms accorded to freemen of other races is as fundamental, in the state of freedom established in this country, as are any of the rights which my brethren concede to be so far fundamental as to be deemed the essence of civil freedom. "Personal liberty consists," says Blackstone, in the power of locomotion, of changing situation, or removing one's person to whatever places one's own inclination may direct, without restraint unless by due course of law.

But of what value is this right of locomotion if it may be clogged by such burdens as Congress intended by the act of 1875 to remove? They are burdens which lay at the very foundation of the institution of slavery as it once existed. They are not to be sustained except upon the assumption that there is, in this land of universal liberty, a class which may still be discriminated against, even in respect of rights of a character so necessary and supreme that, deprived of their enjoyment in common with others, a freeman is not only branded as one inferior and infected, but, in the competitions of life, is robbed of some of the most essential means of existence, and all this solely because they belong to a particular race which the nation has liberated. The Thirteenth Amendment alone obliterated the race line so far as all rights fundamental in a state of freedom are concerned.

Second, as to inns. The same general observations which have been made as to railroads are applicable to inns. The word "inn" has a technical legal signification. It means, in the act of 1875, just what it meant at common law. A mere private boarding house is not an inn, nor is its keeper subject to the responsibilities, or entitled to the privileges, of a common innkeeper.

To constitute one an innkeeper within the legal force of that term, he must keep a house of entertainment or lodging for all travelers or wayfarers who might choose to accept the same, being of good character or conduct.

Redfield on Carriers, etc., §7. Says Judge Story:

> An innkeeper may be defined to be the keeper of a common inn for the lodging and entertainment of travelers and passengers, their horses and attendants. An innkeeper is bound to take in all travelers and wayfaring persons, and to entertain them, if he can accommodate them, for a reasonable compensation, and he must guard their goods with proper diligence.… If an innkeeper improperly refuses to receive or provide for a guest, he is liable to be indicted therefor.… They (carriers of passengers) are no more at liberty to refuse a passenger, if they have sufficient room and accommodations, than an innkeeper is to refuse suitable room and accommodations to a guest.
>
> Story on Bailments §§475–476.

In Rex v. Ivens, 7 Carrington & Payne 213, 32 E.C.L. 49, the court, speaking by Mr. Justice Coleridge, said:

> An indictment lies against an innkeeper who refuses to receive a guest, he having at the time room in his house and either the price of the guest's entertainment being tendered to him or such circumstances occurring as will dispense with that tender.

Document Text

> This law is founded in good sense. The innkeeper is not to select his guest. He has no right to say to one, you shall come to my inn, and to another, you shall not, as everyone coming and conducting himself in a proper manner has a right to be received, and, for this purpose innkeepers are a sort of public servants, they having, in return a kind of privilege of entertaining travelers and supplying them with what they want.
>
> These authorities are sufficient to show that a keeper of an inn is in the exercise of a quasi-public employment. The law gives him special privileges. and he is charged with certain duties and responsibilities to the public. The public nature of his employment forbids him from discriminating against any person asking admission as a guest on account of the race or color of that person.

Third. As to places of public amusement. It may be argued that the managers of such places have no duties to perform with which the public are, in any legal sense, concerned, or with which the public have any right to interfere, and that the exclusion of a black man from a place of public amusement on account of his race, or the denial to him on that ground of equal accommodations at such places, violates no legal right for the vindication of which he may invoke the aid of the courts. My answer is that places of public amusement, within the meaning of the act of 1875, are such as are established and maintained under direct license of the law. The authority to establish and maintain them comes from the public. The colored race is a part of that public. The local government granting the license represents them as well as all other races within its jurisdiction. A license from the public to establish a place of public amusement imports in law equality of right at such places among all the members of that public. This must be so unless it be—which I deny—that the common municipal government of all the people may, in the exertion of its powers, conferred for the benefit of all, discriminate or authorize discrimination against a particular race solely because of its former condition of servitude.

I also submit, whether it can be said—in view of the doctrines of this court as announced in Munn v. State of Illinois, … and reaffirmed in Peik v. Chicago & N.W. Railway Co., … that the management of places of public amusement is a purely private matter, with which government has no rightful concern? In the Munn case, the question was whether the State of Illinois could fix, by law, the maximum of charges for the storage of grain in certain warehouses in that State—the private property of individual citizens. After quoting a remark attributed to Lord Chief Justice Hale, to the effect that, when private property is "affected with a public interest, it ceases to be *juris privati*only," the court says:

> Property does become clothed with a public interest when used in a manner to make it of public consequence and affect the community at large. When, therefore, one devotes his property to a use in which the public has an interest, he, in effect, grants to the public an interest in that use, and must submit to be controlled by the public for the common good to the extent of the interest he has thus created. He may withdraw his grant by discontinuing the use, but, so long as he maintains the use, he must submit to the control.

The doctrines of Munn v. Illinois have never been modified by this court, and I am justified upon the authority of that case in saying that places of public amusement, conducted under the authority of the law, are clothed with a public interest because used in a manner to make them of public consequence and to affect the community at large. The law may therefore regulate, to some extent, the mode in which they shall be conducted, and, consequently, the public have rights in respect of such places which may be vindicated by the law. It is consequently not a matter purely of private concern.

Congress has not, in these matters, entered the domain of State control and supervision. It does not, as I have said, assume to prescribe the general conditions and limitations under which inns, public conveyances, and places of public amusement shall be conducted or managed. It simply declares, in effect, that, since the nation has established universal freedom in this country for all time, there shall be no discrimination, based merely upon race or color, in respect of the accommodations and advantages of public conveyances, inns, and places of public amusement.

I am of the opinion that such discrimination practised by corporations and individuals in the exercise of their public or quasi-public functions is a badge of servitude the imposition of which Congress may prevent under its power, by appropriate legislation, to enforce the Thirteenth Amendment; and consequently, without reference to its enlarged power under the Fourteenth Amendment, the act of March 1, 1875, is not, in my judgment, repugnant to the Constitution.

Document Text

It remains now to consider these cases with reference to the power Congress has possessed since the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment. Much that has been said as to the power of Congress under the Thirteenth Amendment is applicable to this branch of the discussion, and will not be repeated.

Before the adoption of the recent amendments, it had become, as we have seen, the established doctrine of this court that negroes, whose ancestors had been imported and sold as slaves, could not become citizens of a State, or even of the United States, with the rights and privileges guaranteed to citizens by the national Constitution; further, that one might have all the rights and privileges of a citizen of a State without being a citizen in the sense in which that word was used in the national Constitution, and without being entitled to the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States. Still further, between the adoption of the Thirteenth Amendment and the proposal by Congress of the Fourteenth Amendment, on June 16, 1866, the statute books of several of the States, as we have seen, had become loaded down with enactments which, under the guise of Apprentice, Vagrant, and contract regulations, sought to keep the colored race in a condition, practically, of servitude. It was openly announced that whatever might be the rights which persons of that race had as freemen, under the guarantees of the national Constitution, they could not become citizens of a State, with the privileges belonging to citizens, except by the consent of such State; consequently, that their civil rights as citizens of the State depended entirely upon State legislation. To meet this new peril to the black race, that the purposes of the nation might not be doubted or defeated, and by way of further enlargement of the power of Congress, the Fourteenth Amendment was proposed for adoption.

Remembering that this court, in the Slaughter-house Cases, declared that the one pervading purpose found in all the recent amendments, lying at the foundation of each and without which none of them would have been suggested, was the freedom of the slave race, the security and firm establishment of that freedom, and the protection of the newly made freeman and citizen from the oppression of those who had formerly exercised unlimited dominion over him—that each amendment was addressed primarily to the grievances of that race—let us proceed to consider the language of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Its first and fifth sections are in these words:

> Sec. 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.…
>
> Sec. 5. That Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

It was adjudged in Strauder v. West Virginia, … and Ex parte Virginia, … and my brethren concede, that positive rights and privileges were intended to be secured, and are, in fact, secured, by the Fourteenth Amendment.

But when, under what circumstances, and to what extent may Congress, by means of legislation, exert its power to enforce the provisions of this amendment? The theory of the opinion of the majority of the court—the foundation upon which their reasoning seems to rest—is that the general government cannot, in advance of hostile State laws or hostile State proceedings, actively interfere for the protection of my of the rights, privileges, and immunities secured by the Fourteenth Amendment. It is said that such rights, privileges, and immunities are secured by way of prohibition against State laws and State proceedings affecting such rights and privileges, and by power given to Congress to legislate for the purpose of carrying such prohibition into effect; also, that congressional legislation must necessarily be predicated upon such supposed State laws or State proceedings, and be directed to the correction of their operation and effect.

In illustration of its position, the court refers to the clause of the Constitution forbidding the passage by a State of any law impairing the obligation of contracts. That clause does not, I submit, furnish a proper illustration of the scope and effect of the fifth section of the Fourteenth Amendment. No express power is given Congress to enforce, by primary direct legislation, the prohibition upon State laws impairing the obligation of contracts. Authority is, indeed, conferred to enact all necessary and proper laws for carrying into execution the enumerated powers of Congress and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof. And, as heretofore shown, there is also, by necessary implication, power in Congress, by legislation, to protect a right derived from the national Constitution. But a prohibition upon a State is not a power in Congress or in the national government. It is simply a denial of power to the State. And the only mode in which the inhibition upon State laws impairing the obligation of contracts can be enforced is indirectly, through the courts in suits where the parties raise some question as to the constitutional validity of such laws. The judicial power of the United States extends to such suits for the reason that they are suits arising under the Constitution. The Fourteenth Amendment presents the first instance in our history of the investiture of Congress with affirmative power, by legislation, to enforce an express prohibition upon the States. It is not said that the judicial power of the nation may be exerted for the enforcement of that amendment. No enlargement of the judicial power was required, for it is clear that, had the fifth section of the Fourteenth Amendment been entirely omitted, the judiciary could have stricken down all State laws and nullified all State proceedings in hostility to rights and privileges secured or recognized by that amendment. The power given is, in terms, by congressional legislation, to enforce the provisions of the amendment.

Document Text

The assumption that this amendment consists wholly of prohibitions upon State laws and State proceedings in hostility to its provisions is unauthorized by its language. The first clause of the first section——is of a distinctly affirmative character. In its application to the colored race, previously liberated, it created and granted as well citizenship of the United States as citizenship of the State in which they respectively resided. It introduced all of that race whose ancestors had been imported and sold as slaves at once into the political community known as the "People of the United States." They became instantly citizens of the United States and of their respective States. Further, they were brought by this supreme act of the nation within the direct operation of that provision of the Constitution which declares that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." …

> All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States, and of the State wherein they reside

The citizenship thus acquired by that race in virtue of an affirmative grant from the nation may be protected not alone by the judicial branch of the government, but by congressional legislation of a primary direct character, this because the power of Congress is not restricted to the enforcement of prohibitions upon State laws or State action. It is, in terms distinct and positive, to enforce "the provisions of this article" of amendment; not simply those of a prohibitive character, but the provisions—all of the provisions—affirmative and prohibitive, of the amendment. It is, therefore, a grave misconception to suppose that the fifth section of the amendment has reference exclusively to express prohibitions upon State laws or State action. If any right was created by that amendment, the grant of power through appropriate legislation to enforce its provisions authorizes Congress, by means of legislation operating throughout the entire Union, to guard, secure, and protect that right.

It is therefore an essential inquiry what, if any, right, privilege or immunity was given, by the nation to colored persons when they were made citizens of the State in which they reside? Did the constitutional grant of State citizenship to that race, of its own force, invest them with any rights, privileges and immunities whatever? That they became entitled, upon the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, "to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States," within the meaning of section 2 of article 4 of the Constitution, no one, I suppose, will for a moment question. What are the privileges and immunities to which, by that clause of the Constitution, they became entitled? To this it may be answered generally, upon the authority of the adjudged cases, that they are those which are fundamental in citizenship in a free republican government, such as are "common to the citizens in the latter States under their constitutions and laws by virtue of their being citizens." Of that provision it has been said, with the approval of this court, that no other one in the Constitution has tended so strongly to constitute the citizens of the United States one people. Ward v. Maryland, … Corfield v. Coryell, … Paul v. Virginia, … Slaughterhouse Cases.…

Although this court has wisely forborne any attempt by a comprehensive definition to indicate all of the privileges and immunities to which the citizen of a State is entitled of right when within the jurisdiction of other States, I hazard nothing, in view of former adjudications, in saying that no State can sustain her denial to colored citizens of other States, while within her limits, of privileges or immunities fundamental in republican citizenship upon the ground that she accords such privileges and immunities only to her white citizens, and withholds them from her colored citizens. The colored citizens of other States, within the jurisdiction of that State, could claim, in virtue of section 2 of article 4 of the Constitution, every privilege and immunity which that State secures to her white citizens. Otherwise it would be in the power of any State, by discriminating class legislation against its own citizens of a particular race or color, to withhold from citizens of other States belonging to that proscribed race, when within her limits, privileges and immunities of the character regarded by all courts as fundamental in citizenship, and that too when the constitutional guaranty is that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to "all privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States." No State may, by discrimination against a portion of its own citizens of a particular race, in respect of privileges and immunities fundamental in citizenship, impair the constitutional right of citizens of other States, of whatever race, to enjoy in that State all such privileges and immunities as are there accorded to her most favored citizens. A colored citizen of Ohio or Indiana, while in the jurisdiction of Tennessee, is entitled to enjoy any privilege or immunity, fundamental in citizenship, which is given to citizens of the white race in the latter State. It is not to be supposed that anyone will controvert this proposition.

But what was secured to colored citizens of the United States—as between them and their respective States—by the national grant to them of State citizenship? With what rights, privileges, or immunities did this grant invest them? There is one, if there be no other—exemption from race discrimination in respect of any civil right belonging to citizens of the white race in the same State. That, surely, is their constitutional privilege when within the jurisdiction of other States. And such must be their constitutional right in their own State, unless the recent amendments be splendid baubles thrown out to delude those who deserved fair and generous treatment at the hands of the nation. Citizenship in this country necessarily imports at least equality of civil rights among citizens of every race in the same State. It is fundamental in American citizenship that, in respect of such rights, there shall be no discrimination by the State, or its officers, or by individuals or corporations exercising public functions or authority, against any citizen because of his race or previous condition of servitude. In United States v. Cruikshank, … it was said at page 555, that the rights of life and personal liberty are natural rights of man, and that "the equality of the rights of citizens is a principle of republicanism." And in Ex parte Virginia, … the emphatic language of this court is that one great purpose of these amendments was to raise the colored race from that condition of inferiority and servitude in which most of them had previously stood into perfect equality of civil rights with all other persons within the jurisdiction of the States.

So, in Strauder v. West Virginia, … the court, alluding to the Fourteenth Amendment, said:

> This is one of a series of constitutional provisions having a common purpose, namely, securing to a race recently emancipated, a race that, through many generations, had been held in slavery, all the civil rights that the superior race enjoy.

Again, in Neal v. Delaware, … it was ruled that this amendment was designed primarily to secure to the colored race, thereby invested with the rights, privileges, and responsibilities of citizenship, the enjoyment of all the civil rights that, under the law, are enjoyed by white persons.

The language of this court with reference to the Fifteenth Amendment adds to the force of this view. In United States v. Cruikshank, it was said:

> In United States v. Reese, … we held that the Fifteenth Amendment has invested the citizens of the United States with a new constitutional right, which is exemption from discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. From this it appears that the right of suffrage is not a necessary attribute of national citizenship, but that exemption from discrimination in the exercise of that right on account of race, &c., is. The right to vote in the States comes from the States, but the right of exemption from the prohibited discrimination comes from the United States. The first has not been granted or secured by the Constitution of the United States, but the last has been.

Here, in language at once clear and forcible, is stated the principle for which I contend. It can scarcely be claimed that exemption from race discrimination, in respect of civil rights, against those to whom State citizenship was granted by the nation, is any less, for the colored race, a new constitutional right, derived from and secured by the national Constitution, than is exemption from such discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise. It cannot be that the latter is an attribute of national citizenship, while the other is not essential in national citizenship or fundamental in State citizenship.

If, then, exemption from discrimination in respect of civil rights is a new constitutional right, secured by the grant of State citizenship to colored citizens of the United States—and I do not see how this can now be questioned—why may not the nation, by means of its own legislation of a primary direct character, guard, protect, and enforce that right? It is a right and privilege which the nation conferred. It did not come from the States in which those colored citizens reside. It has been the established doctrine of this court during all its history, accepted as essential to the national supremacy, that Congress, in the absence of a positive delegation of power to the State legislatures, may, by its own legislation, enforce and protect any right derived from or created by the national Constitution. It was so declared in Prigg v. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. It was reiterated in United States v. Reese, … where the court said that rights and immunities created by and dependent upon the Constitution of the United States can be protected by Congress. The form and manner of the protection may be such as Congress, in the legitimate exercise of its discretion, shall provide. These may be varied to meet the necessities of the particular right to be protected.

It was distinctly reaffirmed in Strauder v. West Virginia, … where we said that a right or immunity created by the Constitution or only guaranteed by it, even without any express delegation of power, may be protected by Congress.

How then can it be claimed, in view of the declarations of this court in former cases, that exemption of colored citizens, within their States, from race discrimination in respect of the civil rights of citizens is not an immunity created or derived from the national Constitution?

This court has always given a broad and liberal construction to the Constitution, so as to enable Congress, by legislation, to enforce rights secured by that instrument. The legislation which Congress may enact in execution of its power to enforce the provisions of this amendment is such as may be appropriate to protect the right granted. The word appropriate was undoubtedly used with reference to its meaning, as established by repeated decisions of this court. Under given circumstances, that which the court characterizes as corrective legislation might be deemed by Congress appropriate and entirely sufficient. Under other circumstances, primary direct legislation may be required. But it is for Congress, not the judiciary, to say that legislation is appropriate—that is, best adapted to the end to be attained. The judiciary may not, with safety to our institutions, enter the domain of legislative discretion and dictate the means which Congress shall employ in the exercise of its granted powers. That would be sheer usurpation of the functions of a coordinate department, which, if often repeated, and permanently acquiesced in, would work a radical change in our system of government. In United States v. Fisher, … the court said that Congress must possess the choice of means, and must be empowered to use any means which are, in fact, conducive to the exercise of a power granted by the Constitution.… The sound construction of the Constitution, said Chief Justice Marshall, must allow to the national legislature that discretion, with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional. McCulloch v. Maryland.…

Must these rules of construction be now abandoned? Are the powers of the national legislature to be restrained in proportion as the rights and privileges, derived from the nation, are valuable? Are constitutional provisions, enacted to secure the dearest rights of freemen and citizens, to be subjected to that rule of construction, applicable to private instruments, which requires that the words to be interpreted must be taken most strongly against those who employ them? Or shall it be remembered that a constitution of government, founded by the people for themselves and their posterity and for objects of the most momentous nature—for perpetual union, for the establishment of justice, for the general welfare, and for a perpetuation of the blessings of liberty—necessarily requires that every interpretation of its powers should have a constant reference to these objects? No interpretation of the words in which those powers are granted can be a sound one which narrows down their ordinary import so as to defeat those objects.

Story Const. §422.

The opinion of the court, as I have said, proceeds upon the ground that the power of Congress to legislate for the protection of the rights and privileges secured by the Fourteenth Amendment cannot be brought into activity except with the view, and as it may become necessary, to correct and annul State laws and State proceedings in hostility to such rights and privileges. In the absence of State laws or State action adverse to such rights and privileges, the nation may not actively interfere for their protection and security, even against corporations and individuals exercising public or quasi-public functions. Such I understand to be the position of my brethren. If the grant to colored citizens of the United States of citizenship in their respective States imports exemption from race discrimination in their States in respect of such civil rights as belong to citizenship, then to hold that the amendment remits that right to the States for their protection, primarily, and stays the hands of the nation until it is assailed by State laws or State proceedings is to adjudge that the amendment, so far from enlarging the powers of Congress—as we have heretofore said it did—not only curtails them, but reverses the policy which the general government has pursued from its very organization. Such an interpretation of the amendment is a denial to Congress of the power, by appropriate legislation, to enforce one of its provisions. In view of the circumstances under which the recent amendments were incorporated into the Constitution, and especially in view of the peculiar character of the new rights they created and secured, it ought not to be presumed that the general government has abdicated its authority, by national legislation, direct and primary in its character, to guard and protect privileges and immunities secured by that instrument. Such an interpretation of the Constitution ought not to be accepted if it be possible to avoid it. Its acceptance would lead to this anomalous result: that, whereas, prior to the amendments, Congress, with the sanction of this court, passed the most stringent laws—operating directly and primarily upon States and their officers and agents, as well as upon individuals—in vindication of slavery and the right of the master, it may not now, by legislation of a like primary and direct character, guard, protect, and secure the freedom established, and the most essential right of the citizenship granted, by the constitutional amendments. With all respect for the opinion of others, I insist that the national legislature may, without transcending the limits of the Constitution, do for human liberty and the fundamental rights of American citizenship what it did, with the sanction of this court, for the protection of slavery and the rights of the masters of fugitive slaves. If fugitive slave laws, providing modes and prescribing penalties whereby the master could seize and recover his fugitive slave, were legitimate exercises of an implied power to protect and enforce a right recognized by the Constitution, why shall the hands of Congress be tied so that—under an express power, by appropriate legislation, to enforce a constitutional provision granting citizenship—it may not, by means of direct legislation, bring the whole power of this nation to bear upon States and their officers and upon such individuals and corporations exercising public functions as assume to abridge, impair, or deny rights confessedly secured by the supreme law of the land?

It does not seem to me that the fact that, by the second clause of the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment, the States are expressly prohibited from making or enforcing laws abridging the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States furnishes any sufficient reason for holding or maintaining that the amendment was intended to deny Congress the power, by general, primary, and direct legislation, of protecting citizens of the several States, being also citizens of the United States, against all discrimination in respect of their rights as citizens which is founded on race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Such an interpretation of the amendment is plainly repugnant to its fifth section, conferring upon Congress power, by appropriate legislation, to enforce not merely the provisions containing prohibitions upon the States, but all of the provisions of the amendment, including the provisions, express and implied, in the first clause of the first section of the article granting citizenship. This alone is sufficient for holding that Congress is not restricted to the enactment of laws adapted to counteract and redress the operation of State legislation, or the action of State officers, of the character prohibited by the amendment. It was perfectly well known that the great danger to the equal enjoyment by citizens of their rights as citizens was to be apprehended not altogether from unfriendly State legislation, but from the hostile action of corporations and individuals in the States. And it is to be presumed that it was intended by that section to clothe Congress with power and authority to meet that danger. If the rights intended to be secured by the act of 1875 are such as belong to the citizen in common or equally with other citizens in the same State, then it is not to be denied that such legislation is peculiarly appropriate to the end which Congress is authorized to accomplish, viz., to protect the citizen, in respect of such rights, against discrimination on account of his race. Recurring to the specific prohibition in the Fourteenth Amendment upon the making or enforcing of State laws abridging the privileges of citizens of the United States, I remark that if, as held in the Slaughterhouse Cases, the privileges here referred to were those which belonged to citizenship of the United States, as distinguished from those belonging to State citizenship, it was impossible for any State prior to the adoption of that amendment to have enforced laws of that character. The judiciary could have annulled all such legislation under the provision that the Constitution shall be the supreme law of the land, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding. The States were already under an implied prohibition not to abridge any privilege or immunity belonging to citizens of the United States as such. Consequently, the prohibition upon State laws in hostility to rights belonging to citizens of the United States was intended—in view of the introduction into the body of citizens of a race formerly denied the essential rights of citizenship—only as an express limitation on the powers of the States, and was not intended to diminish in the slightest degree the authority which the nation has always exercised of protecting, by means of its own direct legislation, rights created or secured by the Constitution. Any purpose to diminish the national authority in respect of privileges derived from the nation is distinctly negatived by the express grant of power by legislation to enforce every provision of the amendment, including that which, by the grant of citizenship in the State, secures exemption from race discrimination in respect of the civil rights of citizens.

Document Text

It is said that any interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment different from that adopted by the majority of the court would imply that Congress had authority to enact a municipal code for all the States covering every matter affecting the life, liberty, and property of the citizens of the several States. Not so. Prior to the adoption of that amendment, the constitutions of the several States, without perhaps an exception, secured all persons against deprivation of life, liberty, or property otherwise than by due process of law, and, in some form, recognized the right of all persons to the equal protection of the laws. Those rights therefore existed before that amendment was proposed or adopted, and were not created by it. If, by reason of that fact, it be assumed that protection in these rights of persons still rests primarily with the States, and that Congress may not interfere except to enforce, by means of corrective legislation, the prohibitions upon State laws or State proceedings inconsistent with those rights, it does not at all follow that privileges which have been granted by the nation may not be protected by primary legislation upon the part of Congress. The personal rights and immunities recognized in the prohibitive clauses of the amendment were, prior to its adoption, under the protection, primarily, of the States, while rights, created by or derived from the United States have always been and, in the nature of things, should always be, primarily under the protection of the general government. Exemption from race discrimination in respect of the civil rights which are fundamental in citizenship in a republican government, is, as we have seen, a new right, created by the nation, with express power in Congress, by legislation, to enforce the constitutional provision from which it is derived. If, in some sense, such race discrimination is, within the letter of the last clause of the first section, a denial of that equal protection of the laws which is secured against State denial to all persons, whether citizens or not, it cannot be possible that a mere prohibition upon such State denial, or a prohibition upon State laws abridging the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, takes from the nation the power which it has uniformly exercised of protecting, by direct primary legislation, those privileges and immunities which existed under the Constitution before the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment or have been created by that amendment in behalf of those thereby made citizens of their respective States.

This construction does not in any degree intrench upon the just rights of the States in the control of their domestic affairs. It simply recognizes the enlarged powers conferred by the recent amendments upon the general government. In the view which I take of those amendments, the States possess the same authority which they have always had to define and regulate the civil rights which their own people, in virtue of State citizenship, may enjoy within their respective limits, except that its exercise is now subject to the expressly granted power of Congress, by legislation, to enforce the provisions of such amendments—a power which necessarily carries with it authority, by national legislation, to protect and secure the privileges and immunities which are created by or are derived from those amendments. That exemption of citizens from discrimination based on race or color, in respect of civil rights, is one of those privileges or immunities can no longer be deemed an open question in this court.

It was said of the case of Dred Scott v. Sandford that this court there overruled the action of two generations, virtually inserted a new clause in the Constitution, changed its character, and made a new departure in the workings of the federal government. I may be permitted to say that, if the recent amendments are so construed that Congress may not, in its own discretion and independently of the action or nonaction of the States, provide by legislation of a direct character for the security of rights created by the national Constitution, if it be adjudged that the obligation to protect the fundamental privileges and immunities granted by the Fourteenth Amendment to citizens residing in the several States rests primarily not on the nation, but on the States, if it be further adjudged that individuals and corporations exercising public functions or wielding power under public authority may, without liability to direct primary legislation on the part of Congress, make the race of citizens the ground for denying them that equality of civil rights which the Constitution ordains as a principle of republican citizenship, then not only the foundations upon which the national supremacy has always securely rested will be materially disturbed, but we shall enter upon an era of constitutional law when the rights of freedom and American citizenship cannot receive from the nation that efficient protection which heretofore was unhesitatingly accorded to slavery and the rights of the master.

Document Text

But if it were conceded that the power of Congress could not be brought into activity until the rights specified in the act of 1875 had been abridged or denied by some State law or State action, I maintain that the decision of the court is erroneous. There has been adverse State action within the Fourteenth Amendment as heretofore interpreted by this court. I allude to Ex parte Virginia, supra. It appears in that case that one Cole, judge of a county court, was charged with the duty by the laws of Virginia of selecting grand and petit jurors. The law of the State did not authorize or permit him, in making such selections, to discriminate against colored citizens because of their race. But he was indicted in the federal court, under the act of 1875, for making such discriminations. The attorney general of Virginia contended before us that the State had done its duty, and had not authorized or directed that county judge to do what he was charged with having done; that the State had not denied to the colored race the equal protection of the laws, and that consequently the act of Cole must be deemed his individual act, in contravention of the will of the State. Plausible as this argument was, it failed to convince this court, and after saying that the Fourteenth Amendment had reference to the political body denominated a State "by whatever instruments or in whatever modes that action may be taken," and that a State acts by its legislative, executive, and judicial authorities, and can act in no other way, we proceeded:

> The constitutional provision, therefore, must mean that no agency of the State or of the officers

Glossary

a fortiori	Latin for "with even stronger reason"
act of 1875	the Civil Rights Act of 1875
Black Code	any state or local law or set of laws intended to limit the rights or liberties of African Americans
Blackstone	Sir William Blackstone, a preeminent jurist in eighteenth-century England and the author of Commentaries on the Laws of England
brutum fulmen	Latin for "inert thunder," meaning an empty threat or display of force
Chief Justice Marshall	John Marshall, chief justice of the United States in the early nineteenth century, best known for his decisions strengthening the power of the federal government
Chief Justice Taney	Roger Taney, chief justice of the United States remembered primarily for delivering the majority opinion in Dred Scott v. Sandford
ex directo	a Latin expression meaning literally "from the direct"; directly, immediately
ex parte	Latin for "by (or for) one party," used in the law to refer to a legal proceeding brought by one party without the presence of the other being required feudal vassalage	the state of being a serf, owing allegiance to a lord, under the medieval feudal system or agents by whom its powers are exerted shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. Whoever, by virtue of public position under a State government, deprives another of property, life, or liberty without due process of law, or denies or takes away the equal protection of the laws, violates the constitutional inhibition; and, as he acts under the name and for the State, and is clothed with the State's power, his act is that of the State. This must be so, or the constitutional prohibition has no meaning. Then the State has clothed one of its agents with power to annul or evade it. But the constitutional amendment was ordained for a purpose. It was to secure equal rights to all persons, and, to insure to all persons the enjoyment of such rights, power was given to Congress to enforce its provisions by appropriate legislation. Such legislation must act upon persons, not upon the abstract thing denominated a State, but upon the persons who are the agents of the State in the denial of the rights which were intended to be secured. Ex parte Virginia….

Document Text

In every material sense applicable to the practical enforcement of the Fourteenth Amendment, railroad corporations, keepers of inns, and managers of places of public amusement are agents or instrumentalities of the State, because they are charged with duties to the public and are amenable, in respect of their duties and functions, to governmental regulation. It seems to me that, within the principle settled in Ex parte Virginia, a denial by these instrumentalities of the State to the citizen, because of his race, of that equality of civil rights secured to him by law is a denial by the State within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment. If it be not, then that race is left, in respect of the civil rights in question, practically at the mercy of corporations and individuals wielding power under the States.

But the court says that Congress did not, in the act of 1866, assume, under the authority given by the Thirteenth Amendment, to adjust what may be called the social rights of men and races in the community. I agree that government has nothing to do with social, as distinguished from technically legal, rights of individuals. No government ever has brought, or ever can bring, its people into social intercourse against their wishes. Whether one person will permit or maintain social relations with another is a matter with which government has no concern. I agree

Glossary

Judge Story	Joseph Story, an early-nineteenth-century U.S. Supreme Court justice and author of the legal treatise Commentaries on the Law of Bailments
juris private	Latin for "of private right" (as opposed to public right)
Lord Chief Justice Hale	Matthew Hale, Lord Chief Justice of England in the seventeenth century
Mr. Justice Coleridge	John Coleridge, the Lord Chief Justice of England in the late eighteenth century
"no rights which the white man was bound to respect"	an oft-quoted line from the Supreme Court's decision in Dred Scott v. Sandford
nugatory	of no value, trifling, ineffective
posse comitatus	Latin for "power of the county" and referring to a municipality's power to form a temporary police force, commonly called a posse
self-executing	a law that takes effect immediately under given conditions, without the need for any intervening court action
Territories	the western lands that would later become U.S. states
viz.	abbreviation of the Latin word videlicet, meaning "that is"
writ of error	a judicial writ from an appellate court ordering the court of record to produce the records of trial; an appeal that, if one citizen chooses not to hold social intercourse with another, he is not and cannot be made amenable to the law for his conduct in that regard, for even upon grounds of race, no legal right of a citizen is violated by the refusal of others to maintain merely social relations with him. What I affirm is that no State, nor the officers of any State, nor any corporation or individual wielding power under State authority for the public benefit or the public convenience, can, consistently either with the freedom established by the fundamental law or with that equality of civil rights which now belongs to every citizen, discriminate against freemen or citizens in those rights because of their race, or because they once labored under the disabilities of slavery imposed upon them as a race. The rights which Congress, by the act of 1875, endeavored to secure and protect are legal, not social, rights. The right, for instance, of a colored citizen to use the accommodations of a public highway upon the same terms as are permitted to white citizens is no more a social right than his right under the law to use the public streets of a city or a town, or a turnpike road, or a public market, or a post office, or his right to sit in a public building with others, of whatever race, for the purpose of hearing the political questions of the day discussed. Scarcely a day passes without our seeing in this courtroom citizens of the white and black races sitting side by side, watching the progress of our business. It would never occur to anyone that the presence of a colored citizen in a courthouse, or courtroom, was an invasion of the social rights of white persons who may frequent such places. And yet such a suggestion would be quite as sound in law—I say it with all respect—as is the suggestion that the claim of a colored citizen to use, upon the same terms as is permitted to white citizens, the accommodations of public highways, or public inns, or places of public amusement, established under the license of the law, is an invasion of the social rights of the white race.

The court, in its opinion, reserves the question whether Congress, in the exercise of its power to regulate commerce amongst the several States, might or might not pass a law regulating rights in public conveyances passing from one State to another. I beg to suggest that that precise question was substantially presented here in the only one of these cases relating to railroads—Robinson and Wife v. Memphis & Charleston Railroad Company. In that case, it appears that Mrs. Robinson, a citizen of Mississippi, purchased a railroad ticket entitling her to be carried from Grand Junction, Tennessee, to Lynchburg, Virginia. Might not the act of 1875 be maintained in that case as applicable at least to commerce between the States, notwithstanding it does not, upon its face, profess to have been passed in pursuance of the power of Congress to regulate commerce? Has it ever been held that the judiciary should overturn a statute because the legislative department did not accurately recite therein the particular provision of the Constitution authorizing its enactment? We have often enforced municipal bonds in aid of railroad subscriptions where they failed to recite the statute authorizing their issue, but recited one which did not sustain their validity. The inquiry in such cases has been was there, in any statute, authority for the execution of the bonds? Upon this branch of the case, it may be remarked that the State of Louisiana, in 1869, passed a statute giving to passengers, without regard to race or color, equality of right in the accommodations of railroad and street cars, steamboats or other watercrafts, stage coaches, omnibuses, or other vehicles. But in Hall v. De Cuir, … that act was pronounced unconstitutional so far as it related to commerce between the States, this court saying that, "if the public good requires such legislation, it must come from Congress, and not from the States." I suggest, that it may become a pertinent inquiry whether Congress may, in the exertion of its power to regulate commerce among the States, enforce among passengers on public conveyances equality of right, without regard to race, color or previous condition of servitude, if it be true—which I do not admit—that such legislation would be an interference by government with the social rights of the people.

My brethren say that, when a man has emerged from slavery, and by the aid of beneficent legislation has shaken off the inseparable concomitants of that state, there must be some stage in the progress of his elevation when he takes the rank of a mere citizen, and ceases to be the special favorite of the laws, and when his rights as a citizen or a man are to be protected in the ordinary modes by which other men's rights are protected. It is, I submit, scarcely just to say that the colored race has been the special favorite of the laws. The statute of 1875, now adjudged to be unconstitutional, is for the benefit of citizens of every race and color. What the nation, through Congress, has sought to accomplish in reference to that race is what had already been done in every State of the Union for the white race—to secure and protect rights belonging to them as freemen and citizens, nothing more. It was not deemed enough "to help the feeble up, but to support him after." The one underlying purpose of congressional legislation has been to enable the black race to take the rank of mere citizens. The difficulty has been to compel a recognition of the legal right of the black race to take the rank of citizens, and to secure the enjoyment of privileges belonging, under the law, to them as a component part of the people for whose welfare and happiness government is ordained. At every step in this direction, the nation has been confronted with class tyranny, which a contemporary English historian says is, of all tyrannies, the most intolerable, for it is ubiquitous in its operation and weighs perhaps most heavily on those whose obscurity or distance would withdraw them from the notice of a single despot.

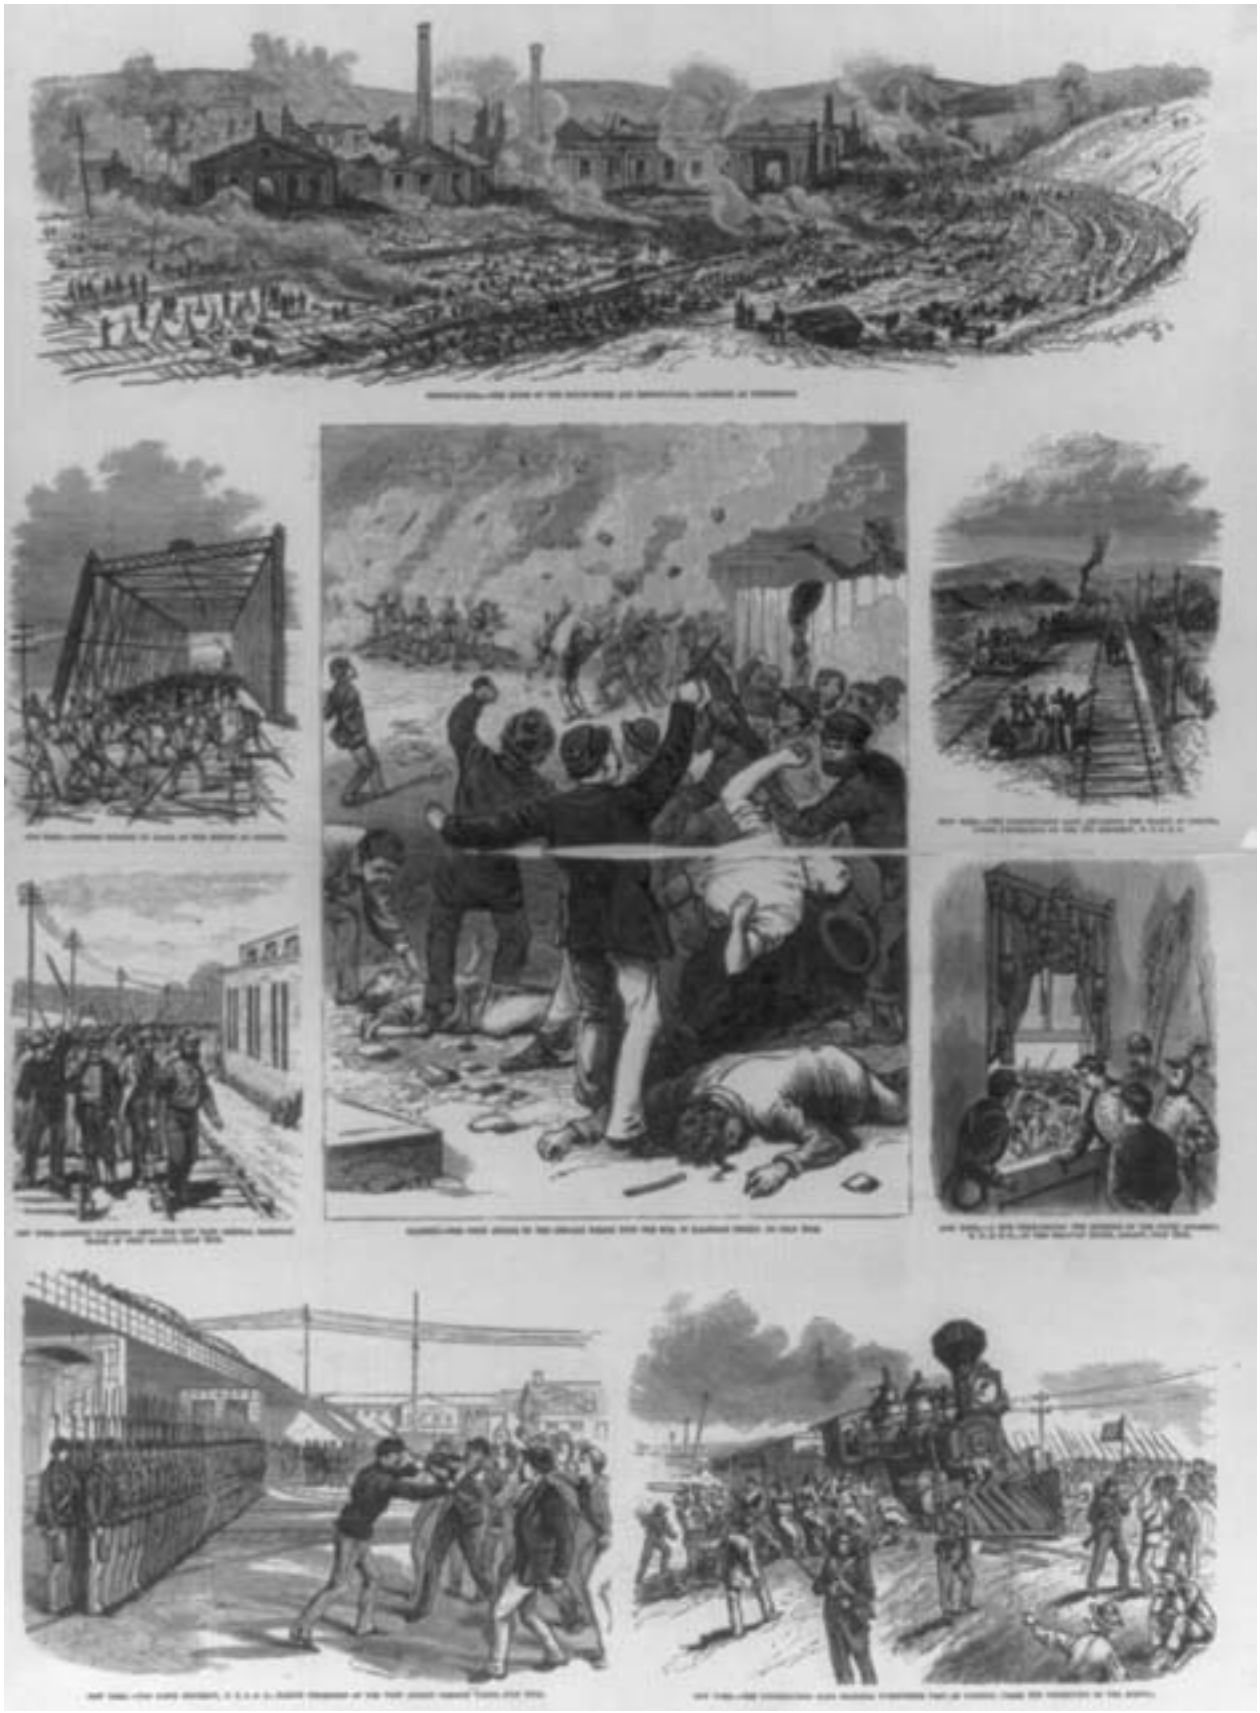
Today it is the colored race which is denied, by corporations and individuals wielding public authority, rights fundamental in their freedom and citizenship. At some future time, it may be that some other race will fall under the ban of race discrimination. If the constitutional amendments be enforced according to the intent with which, as I conceive, they were adopted, there cannot be, in this republic, any class of human beings in practical subjection to another class with power in the latter to dole out to the former just such privileges as they may choose to grant. The supreme law of the land has decreed that no authority shall be exercised in this country upon the basis of discrimination, in respect of civil rights, against freemen and citizens because of their race, color, or previous condition of servitude. To that decree—for the due enforcement of which, by appropriate legislation, Congress has been invested with express power—everyone must bow, whatever may have been, or whatever now are, his individual views as to the wisdom or policy either of the recent changes in the fundamental law or of the legislation which has been enacted to give them effect.

For the reasons stated, I feel constrained to withhold my assent to the opinion of the court.



Scenes of the 1877 railroad strike, from Chicago, Illinois; Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania; and Corning and Albany, New York (Library of Congress)

T. Thomas Fortune: "The Present Relations of Labor and Capital"

1886

"I abhor injustice and oppression wherever they are to be found."

Overview

T. Thomas Fortune's speech "The Present Relations of Labor and Capital" was an important statement of economic radicalism by a leading black writer, newspaper editor, and political activist of the late nineteenth century. The speech was given on April 20, 1886, and then first appeared in print on May 1—May Day—in Fortune's newspaper, the New York Freeman. Fortune was one of the few high-profile black leaders of the era to voice his support for the labor movement and to embrace Socialist principles. Fortune believed that industrial labor unions, concentrated in northern cities and western mining towns, ought to ally themselves with southern black agricultural laborers in common cause against monopolists of wealth and property. Fortune's position put him outside the mainstream political discourse, and he echoed some of the most radical elements of the labor movement.

Context

When the Civil War ended in 1865, Fortune was just eight years old. The Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution, ratified later that year, permanently abolished slavery in the United States and marked the beginning of a new era. Fortune's generation of African Americans would be the first to grow up in the United States without the institution, and the next fifteen years would be characterized by political strife over the rights of former slaves. The policy of Reconstruction in the former slave states, directed by the Republican Party leaders in Congress, brought new constitutional rights for black Americans, including the guarantee of equality before the law, the rights to hold political office and serve on juries, and the right to manhood suffrage. The majority of white southerners vigorously opposed these policies, and some resorted to organized violence and terrorism to deprive blacks of their rights, joining shadowy groups like the Ku Klux Klan. While Republicans held on to power in the South for as long as fifteen years in some places, the white-supremacist-dominated Democratic Party gained control of the governments in all the southern states by the late 1870s. The 1880s would be a period of transition in which white landowners would tighten their control over black laborers in the South while still professing to recognize their basic right to political and civil equality—though in practice many blacks were unable to exercise their rights freely.

Despite its downfall, Reconstruction brought new opportunities and aspirations for upward mobility to former slaves. Whereas slaves had been forbidden by law to be literate in the antebellum South, the post–Civil War South witnessed the rapid proliferation of schools for African Americans. Republican rule in the South during Reconstruction ushered in a new era of taxpayer-supported public schools and privately supported institutions of higher education, established by northern philanthropists and religious organizations. By the 1870s, a college-educated class of black leaders was emerging from the ranks of former slaves and their families. Newspapers owned and operated by African Americans also proliferated as black literacy grew and black political leadership established itself in the Reconstruction era. Since white-owned newspapers rarely spoke to the issues of the black community, black editors became natural leaders of their own community, addressing pressing issues and shaping public opinion.

African Americans suffered many bitter disappointments and frustrations through the resurgence of racial oppression and economic exploitation that prevailed in the South with the downfall of Reconstruction. Economically, the transition from slavery to a strictly capitalist economy stalled as the South failed to break up the cash-crop plantation system. The wealthiest landowners continued to invest in raising large crops of cotton, tobacco, and sugar—primarily cotton—despite overproduction that glutted the market and caused prices to fall. Black workers, meanwhile, continued to dominate the southern agricultural workforce, as they had as slaves, receiving now a share of the crop in lieu of wages. Because of falling prices, workers and often landowners as well found themselves falling further and further into debt. For blacks, the consequences of becoming debt ridden were dire, leaving them at the mercy of the landowners and merchants on whom they depended for credit. Debt-ridden blacks were tied to the land, forced to

Time Line

1884

■ October
The Federation of Organized Trades and Labor Unions declares that May 1, 1886, will be the beginning of the eight-hour workday and that May Day will be an International Workers' Day.

■ December
Having published Black and White: Land, Labor, and Politics in the South earlier in the year, Fortune starts the New York Freeman newspaper.

1885

■ Fortune publishes the pamphlet "The Negro in Politics."

1886

■ April 20
Fortune delivers his speech "The Present Relations of Labor and Capital" to the Brooklyn Literary Union, in New York.

■ May 1
"The Present Relations of Labor and Capital" is published in the New York Freeman. Hundreds of thousands of workers across the country demonstrate for an eight-hour workday.

■ May 4
The demonstrations grow deadly in Chicago's Haymarket Square when a bomb explodes, sparking a riot and leading to the deaths of workers and police.

1887

■ Fortune resigns as editor of the New York Freeman and launches the New York Age.

1890

■ The National Afro-American League is formed in Chicago.

1895

■ September 18
Booker T. Washington gives his Atlanta Exposition Address.

1900

■ Fortune supports Booker T. Washington in the formation of the National Negro Business League and ghostwrites A New Negro for a New Century in Washington's name.

continue raising cash crops under increasingly harsh conditions while surrendering their shares to cover their debts.

While black southerners were fast becoming a landless peasantry in the South with no avenue for upward mobility, white and black laborers alike in the industrial North and West found themselves at the mercy of corporate monopolies. The financial depression of the mid-1870s rocked the country as a whole, leaving millions out of work and depleting the savings of the working classes through the bank failures of 1873–1874—including that of the Freedman's Saving and Trust Company, which lost millions of dollars saved by former slaves when the institution became insolvent in 1874. In 1877, the severe conditions led to a massive strike against the monopolistic railroad companies that were slashing wages repeatedly in the face of declining profits. Although it was violently repressed by federal and state troops, the great railroad strike of 1877 launched a national labor movement and convinced many reformers that an impending new "civil war" between labor and capital was imminent.

In the 1880s labor organizations of all stripes grew in strength and number across the nation. The Knights of Labor emerged as the most powerful national organization devoted to the issues of the working classes. The group sought to organize all workers—skilled and unskilled, men and women, white and black. By 1886, the Knights boasted over seven hundred thousand members. Although they predominantly focused on industrial labor, the Knights were willing to organize black agricultural laborers, making inroads among sugar plantation workers in Louisiana in the late 1880s. Calls for an eight-hour workday were among the most popular of their demands, but the Knights also opposed the convict-lease system, which addressed one of the most important issues facing the black community in the South. Blacks made up a disproportionately high number of the incarcerated population in the South, which state governments had begun to use as a source of cheap labor by leasing them to work for corporations and thus depressing both wages and the labor market. While progress toward an interracial movement was still embryonic, there was some reason for hope that the interests of African Americans would not be completely excluded in the industrial labor movement.

"The Present Relations of Labor and Capital" was given as a speech on April 20, 1886, and subsequently appeared in print on the significant date of May 1, 1886, in Fortune's newspaper, the New York Freeman. In 1884, the Federation of Organized Trades and Labor Unions had called for a shorter, eight-hour workday, to commence on May 1, 1886. Heeding this call, hundreds of thousands of workers across the country instituted a work stoppage on May 1, 1886, to demand an eight-hour workday and celebrate May Day as an International Workers' Day. In Chicago, over forty thousand workers went on strike that day, and over the next two days an even greater number of strikers joined the ranks. A clash between strikers and police in Haymarket Square on May 4 turned violent when a bomb exploded, killing a police officer. In retaliation, many workers in the crowd were shot and beaten by the police, who also accidentally fired upon each other; in the course of what became known as the Haymarket Riot, seven additional policemen and an unknown number of civilians were killed, and many more were wounded. After eight anarchists were put on trial for plotting the bomb attack, public opinion turned decisively against the strikers and the trade unions. Eventually, four men were executed for the bombing, and the Socialist ideas they represented received a devastating blow. May 1, 1886, was the apex of the nineteenth-century labor movement in America before its precipitous decline.

About the Author

T. Thomas Fortune was one of the leading black editors of the late nineteenth century, with a reputation for militancy and independence from major political parties. He was born a slave on October 3, 1856, in Marianna, Florida. During Reconstruction, his family moved to Jacksonville, Florida, in the wake of growing threats by the Ku Klux Klan. Fortune's father, Emanuel Fortune, was very active in Reconstruction politics and served as a Republican congressman in Florida's House of Representatives.

Fortune began working at newspapers as a printer's apprentice when he was still a teenager. In 1876 he briefly attended Howard University in Washington, D.C, but left for financial reasons. After marrying Carrie Smiley in 1877, he returned to Florida and taught school. The Fortunes moved to New York City in 1878, and Fortune began working for the Weekly Witness. Fortune then founded the New York Globe, which he edited from 1881 to 1884. When the Globe ceased publication, Fortune founded the New York Freeman, a newspaper that was published until 1887, when it became the New York Age. In the 1890s, the New York Age became perhaps the most distinguished and widely read black newspaper in the country.

In 1884 Fortune published his most important work, Black and White: Land, Labor, and Politics in the South, an influential volume that looked at the problems facing African Americans in the South. Receiving wide attention in the press, the book launched Fortune's career as a spokesperson for African American rights and an early civil rights activist. In The Negro in Politics (1885), Fortune split with the Republican Party, which he felt had abandoned blacks, and declared that blacks must not subordinate the interests of their race to those of any party. In 1888 he openly campaigned for the Democratic candidate Grover Cleveland, to the horror of many black leaders who remained loyal to the party of Abraham Lincoln and the Emancipation Proclamation—and who regarded the Democrats as the party of the Confederacy and the Ku Klux Klan. Later, Fortune begrudgingly rejoined the Republican Party after acknowledging the extent of Democratic support for white supremacy.

In the late 1880s, Fortune organized a national civil rights organization that became the National Afro-American League in 1890. He strongly supported the term Afro-American over other labels of identity, such as Negro or colored, as a term for Americans of African descent. In the 1890s, Fortune notably supported Ida B. Wells's antilynching campaign, publishing her articles in the Age, and he also sued and won an antidiscrimination case against a hotel for denying him service.

Time Line

1907	■ Fortune ghostwrites The Negro in Business for Washington but then breaks with Washington later that year.
1923	■ Fortune becomes the editor of Negro World, Marcus Garvey's newspaper.
1928	■ June 2 Fortune dies in Philadelphia at the age of seventy-one.

According to the historian John H. Bracey, Jr., there were three main phases of Fortune's ideological development. During the early phase, in which he wrote Black and White and "The Present Relations of Labor and Capital," Fortune tended to view the problems of African Americans in the South through the lens of radical labor theory. He retreated from this position by the mid-1890s, aligning himself, in Bracey's words, with "the group economic development or bourgeois nationalism of Booker T. Washington." Fortune often served as a ghostwriter for Washington and received substantial financial support in exchange. Finally breaking with Washington in 1907, Fortune turned toward militant black nationalism and became the editor of Marcus Garvey's Negro World in the last years of his life. Fortune died on June 2, 1928, in Philadelphia.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

In "The Present Relations of Labor and Capital," Fortune echoes the primary Socialist argument of the 1880s: The consolidation of capital and land in the hands of the few is the root problem of modern society and the source of all conflict. In his 1884 book Black and White, Fortune looked at the oppression of African Americans in the South through the dual lens of race and class, contending that white racism and an exploitative economic system acted together to subjugate blacks. Two years later in this speech, he focused exclusively on the common plight of the laboring poor, regardless of their nationality or race. The discussion of white racism that informed Black and White was missing altogether from this piece, as Fortune emphasized the common oppression of workers across the world.

Very quickly in "The Present Relations of Labor and Capital," the reader understands that Fortune is making a fundamentally Socialist argument. He starts the essay by stating that the inequalities between rich and poor have led to global unrest. He is not limiting his scope to African Americans or even to poor Americans. He speaks for all oppressed people, regardless of nation, creed, or race, and he warns that if there is not a return to egalitarian principles across the "civilized" world, violent upheaval will come about.

At the tenth annual convention of the Knights of Labor, 1886, a black delegate (Frank J. Farrell) introduces the Knights leader, Terence Powderly. (Library of Congress)

Stepping back from this apocalyptic warning, Fortune lays out the very basic needs that all people share: for food, water, clothing, shelter, and air. These needs are, as Fortune argues, "self evident" and not the subject of debate. He points to both early human history and the current practices of "savage people" to show that, in fact, these are natural rights. And yet, in the modern world, in "civilized" countries, these natural rights have been upended, as laws and practices conspire to place "the prime elements of human existence" into the hands of a fortunate few. Housing, food, and even freedom are doled out to the working masses sparingly, if at all, by the small wealthy minority. Fortune argues that society is organized, and its very laws orchestrated, for the sole purpose of maintaining and supplementing the wealth of a few at the expense of the majority. Implicit in his argument that the governments and laws of modern cultures are designed to continually repress the rights of workers is a call to action and rebellion. There can be no working within the system to achieve change if the system is corrupt.

This argument is made explicit when Fortune turns next to an analysis of the French Revolution. The rallying cry of the French Revolution (1789–1799) was "Liberté, Egalité, Fraternité" (Liberty, Equality, Brotherhood), and in this revolution that led to the overthrow of the monarchy, Fortune sees the "most memorable check" to the type of oppression that the working masses endure. In other words, it took a bloody revolution and the complete overthrow of the social order to shift the balance of power from the haves to the have-nots. The French Revolution also conjures images of the guillotine and the beheadings of many members of the French aristocracy, bringing home Fortune's opening point that if the economic and cultural system remains unchanged, the masses should be expected to revolt, and to revolt with violence.

Fortune next cites the slave rebellion in Haiti of 1791–1804, drawing a line from the ideals espoused in the French Revolution to this revolt. By doing so, he compares rebelling against slavery to rebelling against other forms of oppression; he places the slave revolt in Haiti in the same context as uprisings of white peasants, serfs, and the working poor. Fortune is implicitly arguing that whether agricultural laborers or factory workers, white or black, enslaved or free, the working masses should stand in solidarity against their oppressors—the landowners, the slave owners, the wealthy elite.

The slave revolt in Haiti, like the French Revolution, was known both for its extreme violence and for its success. The slaves secured their freedom and established the first black-ruled republic. Fortune references the Haitian leaders by name in the speech. Toussaint-Louverture, who had been born a slave in Saint Domingue (called Haiti after the revolt), was a free coachman when he became the leader of the revolt. Later, he established Haiti's constitution and was named governor-general for life. Fortune also names the "bloody Dessalines" and the "courtly Christophe." Jean-Jacques Dessalines, who was one of Toussaint-Louverture's lieutenants, eventually betrayed the revolutionary and named himself emperor of Haiti in 1805. He was assassinated in 1806. Henri Christophe, who plotted against Dessalines, was later the president and the king of Haiti. While these Haitian leaders, along with the leaders of the French Revolution, did not stay true to the Socialist principles that Fortune believes they originally stood for, they were notably successful at overthrowing entrenched social systems. These leaders emerged when their countries hit crises—when the slaves of Saint Domingue and the peasants of France could no longer tolerate the gulf between their conditions and those of the landed class. Their rebellions were bloody and ultimately short lived. In referring to these particular revolutions, Fortune is warning that another crisis has been reached, and he points to where the crisis might lead.

Fortune also cites the American Revolution as a crisis point and notes that the primary complaint then was against undue taxation. He believes that "bread and butter" were at the heart of the problem in all three of these revolutions and are at the heart of every crisis. Until there is balance between those who labor, those who supervise the laborers, and those who control the wealth (capital) that the laborers create, unrest and revolution are inevitable. Under the current system, Fortune believes that in this "trinity," laborers are unfairly denied their rightful share of the wealth their sweat produces. And yet, without laborers, there can be no wealth. Fortune argues that if wealth itself is destroyed, it can and will be rebuilt through the work of laborers. The reverse is not true. Destroy the laborers, and no wealth can be produced.

Illustration of the Haymarket Riot, with portraits of seven policemen (Library of Congress)

Given this situation, Fortune argues, should we be surprised that labor is no longer satisfied? Modern culture has served to democratize and educate the masses, and they are no longer willing to sit silently as they are deprived while others amass fortunes. Fortune declares that the new crop of millionaires created in the past few decades offers more evidence that the system of laws is designed to create a minority of winners at the expense of the majority. These are the conditions that have led to the rising discontent of the working classes in America and Europe.

Fortune clearly states his own beliefs in equal rights for all men, regardless of their "caste or class." He believes that the laws that skew the division of wealth so unequally run counter to the laws of God. Divine law does not dictate that some men prosper while others suffer; the laws of man alone are responsible for inequity. By pointing to the example of miners in Siberia and poor black rice workers in the Carolinas, Fortune again implies that the working poor share a common oppression and should share common goals.

Fortune ends his piece by restating that the rising conflict between labor and capital is not new but has been ongoing for centuries. What has changed is that labor is rising and may now be in a position to meaningfully change a system that he sees as fundamentally oppressive. He points to England, where the monarchy has lost the absolute power it held in the time of Queen Elizabeth I, to show that the balance of power can change, if slowly. Equality for all may be possible.

Audience

As a speech, "The Present Relations of Labor and Capital" was given on April 20, 1886, to the Brooklyn Literary Union in Brooklyn, New York. This organization was originally founded by abolitionists as a youth self-help organization for African Americans. Established to promote literacy and spread knowledge, the group sought to be informed about the important literary and social issues of the day. Fortune printed his speech in his newspaper, the New York Freeman, on May 1, 1886. As with the literary union, the audience of the Freeman would have been an almost exclusively black audience. In both cases, Fortune conveyed a fairly straightforward Socialist analysis of labor and capital to an audience that probably had little familiarity with the works of Karl Marx and other Socialist thinkers.

Essential Quotes

"From the institution of feudalism to the present time the inspiration of all conflict has been that of capitalist, landowner and hereditary aristocracy against the larger masses of society the untitled, the disinherited proletariat of the world."

(Paragraph 6)

"Should we, therefore, be surprised that with the constantly growing intelligence and democratization of mankind labor should have grown discontented at the systematic robbery practiced upon it for centuries, and should now clamor for a more equitable basis of adjustment of the wealth it produces?"

(Paragraph 9)

Impact

The impact of Fortune's speech is difficult to determine. Many editorials and speeches like it were given on May 1, 1886, in the white newspapers, and they cumulatively inspired workers to demonstrate in New York and elsewhere on that day. Perhaps the Socialist militancy of these speeches also spread fear among opponents of the labor movement and heightened the fury of reactionaries. Since the Haymarket Riot occurred only days after "The Present Relations of Labor and Capital" was printed, the temper of the times subsequently changed drastically, and the essay's influence was short lived. Socialist ideas that might have been tolerated by many Americans in the days before Haymarket became intolerable afterward. The crackdown against labor radicals silenced many Socialists and drove opinions like those expressed in Fortune's speech underground. Fortune himself did not express Socialist views thereafter, turning his energies instead toward the founding of a black civil rights organization devoted to the protection of political and civil rights.

Within a few years of the Haymarket Riot, the Knights of Labor went defunct. Because the Knights had been one of the sponsors of the worker demonstration in Haymarket Square, the organization was unfairly depicted as a haven for Socialists, anarchists, and Communists who preached violent revolution—despite the fact that none of those accused of the bombing were members of the organization. Soon, the labor movement would be purged of its radical elements, and the more conservative American Federation of Labor—which excluded women, blacks, and unskilled labor—would become the mainstream voice of labor in the United States.

In general, black leaders turned away from radical ideas and civil rights protest movements by the mid-1890s. Concern for the labor movement was eclipsed by the rise of Jim Crow segregation as a new wave of white supremacist politics swept over the South in the 1890s. Partly in response to the growth of black agricultural labor organizations, a movement began among southern whites to legally disenfranchise African Americans and thus deprive them of power at the ballot box. This movement coincided with new segregation laws that enforced the separation of blacks and whites in public spaces and also with an outbreak of lynch mobs that victimized hundreds of southern blacks during this time. Confronted by this new tide of oppression, many black leaders sought a "truce" with white extremists by renouncing political agitation for equal rights.

Booker T. Washington epitomized what historians have called the "accommodationist" strategy in his speech before the Cotton States and International Exposition in Atlanta, Georgia, on September 18, 1895. Addressing an audience of white southerners—including political leaders—he suggested that racial harmony could be achieved if whites employed blacks as a faithful laboring class and blacks accepted a position of social inferiority for the time being. He proposed that blacks could improve themselves through hard work and financial thrift and eventually achieve middle-class status (though never social integration with whites). By accommodating white supremacy, Washington hoped to create economic opportunities that would enable blacks to build an independent economic base. In 1900 he founded the National Negro Business League, which promoted investment in black-owned businesses and sought to expand the black professional class of doctors, lawyers, and businessmen. By this time, Fortune was a supporter of Washington and was likewise urging the development of a black middle class.

Washington exerted a powerful influence in the years following his Atlanta speech. Enjoying extensive financial backing—especially by whites—he gained a following by bestowing patronage on individuals and institutions that supported his views. Many blacks hoped that Washington's work would stem the tide of white violence and dampen white fears about black revolution. But critics of Washington's work within the black community increased their objections as lynch mobs and white oppression failed to abate. By 1903 opponents of Washington began to be heard. In 1905, W. E. B. Du Bois and William Monroe Trotter established the Niagara Movement, which openly rejected the "accommodationist" strategy and announced a return to agitation for equal rights for blacks.

See also Emancipation Proclamation (1863); Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1865); Booker T. Washington's Atlanta Exposition Address (1895); Niagara Movement Declaration of Principles (1905).

Further Reading

■ Books

Alexander, Shawn Leigh, ed. T. Thomas Fortune, the Afro-American Agitator: A Collection of Writings, 1880–1928. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2008.

Bracey, John H., Jr. Foreword to Black and White: Land, Labor, and Politics in the South, by T. Thomas Fortune. Chicago: Johnson Publishing, 1970.

Fortune, T. Thomas. Black and White: Land, Labor, and Politics in the South. 1884. Reprint. New York: Washington Square Press, 2007.

———. The Negro in Politics. N.p.: Ogilvie & Rowntree, 1885.

———. Dreams of Life: Miscellaneous Poems. 1905. Reprint. Miami: Mnemosyne Publishing, 1969.

Franklin, John Hope. From Slavery to Freedom: A History of American Negroes. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1947.

Franklin, John Hope, and August Meier, eds. Black Leaders of the Twentieth Century. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1981.

Marable, Manning, and Leith Mullings, eds. Let Nobody Turn Us Around: Voices of Resistance, Reform, and Renewal; An African American Anthology. Lanham, Md.: Rowman & Littlefield, 2000.

Smock, Raymond W. Booker T. Washington: Black Leadership in the Age of Jim Crow. Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 2009.

Thornbrough, Emma Lou. T. Thomas Fortune: Militant Journalist. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1972.

■ Web Sites

"The Booker T. Washington Papers." History Cooperative Web site, University of Illinois Press.
http://www.historycooperative.org/btw/index.html.

—Mark Elliott

Questions for Further Study

1. In what sense were Fortune's views considered "radical" in the late nineteenth century?

2. Describe the economic circumstances of black southern sharecroppers that impeded their economic development and that led to the kinds of views Fortune expressed.

3. Fortune did not restrict his analysis to black workers; his critique applied to workers of whatever race or color. Explain how Fortune's views transcended racial barriers.

4. Why do you believe Fortune and others who expressed similar views declined in popular acceptance in the late nineteenth and on into the twentieth centuries?

5. Compare this document with Booker T. Washington's Atlanta Exposition Address (1895). How did the economic views of the two writers differ?

Document Text

T. Thomas Fortune: "The Present Relations of Labor and Capital"

I do not exaggerate the gravity of the subject when I say that it is now the very first in importance not only in the United States but in every country in Europe. Indeed the wall of industrial discontent encircles the civilized globe.

The iniquity of privileged class and concentrated wealth has become so glaring and grievous to be borne that a thorough agitation and an early readjustment of the relation which they sustain to labor can no longer be delayed with safety to society.

It does not admit of argument that every man born into the world is justly entitled to so much of the produce of nature as will satisfy his physical necessities; it does not admit of argument that every man, by reason of his being, is justly entitled to the air he must breathe, the water he must drink, the food he must eat and the covering he must have to shield him from the inclemency of the weather. These are self evident propositions, not disputed by the most orthodox advocate of excessive wealth on the one hand and excessive poverty on the other. That nature intended these as the necessary correlations of physical being is abundantly proved in the primitive history of mankind and in the freedom and commonality of possession which now obtain everywhere among savage people. The moment you deny to a man the unrestricted enjoyment of all the elements upon which the breath he draws is dependent, that moment you deny to him the inheritance to which he was born.

I maintain that organized society, as it obtains today, based as it is upon feudal conditions, is an outrageous engine of torture and an odious tyranny; that it places in the hands of a few the prime elements of human existence, regardless of the great mass of mankind; that the whole aim and necessity of the extensive and costly machinery of the law we are compelled to maintain grows out of the fact that this fortunate or favored minority would otherwise be powerless to practice upon the masses of society the gross injustice which everywhere prevails.

For centuries the aim and scope of all law have been to more securely hedge about the capitalist and the landowner and to repress labor within a condition wherein bare subsistence was the point aimed at.

From the institution of feudalism to the present time the inspiration of all conflict has been that of capitalist, landowner and hereditary aristocracy against the larger masses of society the untitled, the disinherited proletariat of the world.

This species of oppression received its most memorable check in the great French Revolution, wherein a new doctrine became firmly rooted in the philosophy of civil government that is, that the toiling masses of society possessed certain inherent rights which kingcraft, hereditary aristocracy, landlordism and usury mongers must respect. As a result of the doctrine studiously inculcated by the philosophers of the French Revolution we had the revolt of the blacks of Haiti, under the heroic Toussaint L'Ouverture, the bloody Dessalines and the suave, diplomatic and courtly Christophe, by which the blacks secured forever their freedom as free men and their independence as a people; and our own great Revolution, wherein the leading complaint was taxation by the British government of the American colonies without conceding them proportionate representation. At bottom in each case, bread and butter was the main issue. So it has always been. So it will continue to be, until the scales of justice are made to strike a true balance between labor on the one hand and the interest on capital invested and the wages of superintendence on the other. Heretofore the interest on capital and the wages of superintendence have absorbed so much of the wealth produced as to leave barely nothing to the share of labor.

It should be borne in mind that of this trinity labor is the supreme potentiality. Capital, in the first instance, is the product of labor. If there had never been any labor there would not now be any capital to invest. Again, if a bonfire were made of all the so called wealth of the world it would only require a few years for labor to reproduce it; but destroy the brawn and muscle of the world and it could not be reproduced by all the gold ever delved from the mines of California and Australia and the fabulous gems from the diamond fields of Africa. In short, labor has been and is the producing agency, while capital has been and is the absorbing or parasitical agency.

Should we, therefore, be surprised that with the constantly growing intelligence and democratization of mankind labor should have grown discontented at the systematic robbery practiced upon it for centuries, and should now clamor for a more equitable basis of adjustment of the wealth it produces?

Document Text

I could name you a dozen men who have in the last forty or fifty years amassed among them a billion dollars, so that a millionaire has become as common a thing almost as a pauper. How came they by their millions? Is it possible for a man in his lifetime, under the most favorable circumstances, to amass a million dollars? Not at all! The constitution of our laws must be such that they favor one as against the other to permit of such a glaring disparity.

I have outlined for you the past and present relations of capital and labor. The widespread discontent of the labor classes in our own country and in Europe gives emphasis to the position here taken.

I abhor injustice and oppression wherever they are to be found, and my best sympathies go out freely to the struggling poor and the tyranny ridden of all races and lands. I believe in the divine right of man, not of caste or class, and I believe that any law made to perpetuate or to give immunity to these as against the masses of mankind is an infamous and not to be borne infringement of the just laws of the Creator, who sends each of us into the world as naked as a newly fledged jay bird and crumbles us back into the elements of Mother Earth by the same processes of mutation and final dissolution.

The social and material differences which obtain in the relations of mankind are the creations of man, not of God. God never made such a spook as a king or a duke; he never made such an economic monstrosity as a millionaire; he never gave John Jones the right to own a thousand or a hundred thousand acres of land, with their complement of air and water. These are the conditions of man, who has sold his birthright to the Shylocks of the world and received not even a mess of pottage for his inheritance. The thing would really be laughable, if countless millions from the rice swamps of the Carolinas to the delvers in the mines of Russian Siberia, were not ground to powder to make a holiday for some selfish idler.

Everywhere labor and capital are in deadly conflict. The battle has been raging for centuries, but the opposing forces are just now in a position for that death struggle which it was inevitable must come before the end was. Nor is it within the scope of finite intelligence to forecast the lines upon which the settlement will be made. Capital is entrenched behind ten centuries of law and conservatism, and controlled withal by the wisest and coolest heads in the world. The inequality of the forces joined will appear very obvious. Yet the potentiality of labor will be able to force concessions from time to time, even as the commoners of England have through centuries been able to force from royalty relinquishment of prerogative after prerogative, until, from having been among the most despotic of governments under Elizabeth, the England of today under Queen Victoria is but a royal shadow. So the time may come when the forces of labor will stand upon absolute equality with those of capital, and that harmony between them obtain which has been sought for by wise men and fools for a thousand years.

Glossary

the bloody Dessalines	Jean-Jacques Dessalines, one of Toussaint-Louverture's lieutenants who eventually betrayed him and named himself emperor of Haiti
Christophe	Henri Christophe, who plotted against Dessalines and was later president and then king of Haiti
Elizabeth	Queen Elizabeth I of England
mess of pottage	something of little value; a reference to Genesis 25:29–34, in which Esau sells his birthright to his brother, Jacob, for a meal of lentil stew
Shylocks of the world	a reference to the fictional character Shylock, a moneylender, in Shakespeare's play The Merchant of Venice
Toussaint L'Ouverture	Toussaint-Louverture, leader of the successful Haitian Revolution (1791–1803) who became governor-general of Haiti

A 2009 postage stamp honoring Anna Julia Cooper (AP/Wide World Photos)

Anna Julia Cooper's "Womanhood: A Vital Element in the Regeneration and Progress of a Race"

1886

"'I am my Sister's keeper!' should be the hearty response of every man and woman of the race."

Overview

Taken from Anna Julia Cooper's essay collection A Voice from the South (1892), the speech "Womanhood: A Vital Element in the Regeneration and Progress of a Race" sums up the main arguments of one of the most important black feminists of the late nineteenth century. A former slave, Cooper attained advanced education–eventually earning a doctorate in Paris–and spoke in favor of women's empowerment in the field of education, the church, and the home. Her book successfully engaged the white public dialogue on race and gender in the later nineteenth century and testified to the social advancement of black women in the South.

Context

Most feminists of the nineteenth century believed that men and women had different "natures" and inherent qualities that best suited each gender to "separate spheres" in society. For women, these qualities included a heightened sympathy, purity, religiosity, a capacity for moral instruction, and a devotion to child rearing. Sometimes dubbed the cult of "true womanhood," these qualities were expected of all "true" women. This concept of "womanhood" or femininity was most influential among the northern white middle classes. Although they accepted the notions of "true womanhood," feminists broke from mainstream views about "women's sphere" in arguing that women's roles in society were as important as men's. Rejecting claims of women's inferiority, they insisted that women were the intellectual equals of men and argued for an "expanded women's sphere" that included a greater role in public life, higher education for women, greater professional roles in "feminine" fields such as education and nursing, and the right to vote. On the issue of suffrage, feminists argued that women's greater capacity for morality and virtue demanded that they have a voice in politics (albeit a passive one as voters, not leaders).

For black women, the ideology of "separate spheres" and "true womanhood" was fraught with complications. White abolitionists drew upon these ideas to criticize the institution of slavery before the Civil War. They argued that slavery corrupted both the white and black household by subverting the family and proper gender roles. Enslaved men were unable to perform the role of proper husbands to enslaved women, whose white masters provided for their sustenance and often exerted authority over their sexual life and relationships. The large numbers of children born to enslaved mothers whose fathers were unknown to them (often the children of white men) provided abolitionists with evidence of the damaging effects of slavery on "womanhood" and the family. In this scenario, the woman's purity was violated, the role of husband forsaken, and capacity of the mother to instill moral virtue compromised. Thus, while indicting slavery, abolitionists also brought attention to enslaved black women's inability to achieve the white middle-class ideal of womanhood.

During Reconstruction, in the aftermath of emancipation, white religious missionaries and teachers poured into the South to help former slaves establish schools and churches. These Protestant reformers preached the ideas of separate spheres and "true womanhood," and their ideas often received a warm reception among black women. Many black women felt that their dignity and self-worth, their relationships with men, and the sanctity of their home life would be protected by adherence to the principles of "true womanhood." They entered into teaching in large numbers and became active members of Protestant churches during this time. For many, the spread of "true womanhood" among black women became a measure of progress from the days of slavery and a means to counter negative racial stereotypes. By the late nineteenth century, it became common for black leaders to speak of the need for "uplift" of the black community into middle-class respectability.

Black women organized women's clubs to combat lynching and racism in the 1890s, just as white middle-class women organized reform groups to support causes such as suffrage and temperance. One factor in organizing their own clubs was that black women found themselves increasingly excluded from white women's organizations. Mary Church Terrell, who was a classmate of Anna Julia Cooper's at Oberlin College, established the National Association of Colored Women's Clubs in 1896, an umbrella organization

Time Line

1858

- Anna Julia Cooper is born.

1868

- Cooper attends Saint Augustine's Normal School and Collegiate Institute, fighting and winning the right to take the more rigorous classical coursework reserved for male students.

1883

- Dr. Alexander Crummell, an influential Episcopal priest, publishes the pamphlet The Black Woman of the South, Her Neglects and Needs.

1884

- Cooper earns her BA degree from Oberlin College.

1886

- Cooper gives a lecture titled "Womanhood: A Vital Element in the Regeneration and Progress of a Race" to a group of black clergymen of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Washington, D.C.

1887

- Cooper earns an MA degree in mathematics from Oberlin.
- Cooper begins teaching at the M Street High School in Washington, D.C., the nation's first public high school for African Americans.

1892

- A Voice from the South is published and includes the 1886 lecture "Womanhood."
- June
  Cooper is a cofounder of the Colored Woman's League of Washington, D.C.

1893

- May 18
  Cooper delivers a talk titled "Women's Cause Is One and Universal" during the World's Congress of Representative Women in Chicago, held in conjunction with the Columbian Exposition.

for black women's clubs, whose official slogan was "Lifting as We Climb." Of the many mutual benefit societies, settlement houses, and schools dominated by black women, the vast majority were associated with Protestant churches such as the Baptists, Methodists, and Congregationalists. These organizations straddled the line between women's and men's "spheres," because they were unapologetically political while at the same time remaining within the accepted woman's realm of religion and moral improvement.

Anna Julia Cooper's 1892 collection of essays, A Voice from the South, gave expression to the most progressive form of "true womanhood" ideology among southern black women of the time. The sociologist Charles Lemert remarks in chapter 1 of his edition of her selected writing, "Cooper's ideas, though simply put, were an important link in the more-than-a-century-long evolution of black feminist social theory from Sojourner Truth's legendary 'Arn't I a Woman' speech in the mid-nineteenth century to the full expression of black feminist thought in the 1980s."

About the Author

Born a slave in 1858 in North Carolina to Hannah Haywood and her slave owner, Anna Julia Cooper became one of the most prominent African American educators of her time. She received an elite classical education, first at Saint Augustine's Normal School and Collegiate Institute, an Episcopal school in Raleigh, North Carolina, of which she is critical in "Womanhood: A Vital Element in the Regeneration and Progress of a Race." She married George Cooper at age nineteen but was widowed two years later. Soon after her husband's death, she applied to Oberlin College in Ohio and was one of three black women to graduate from that school in 1884. After returning to teach at Saint Augustine's, she earned her master's degree in mathematics from Oberlin in 1887. During this time, she made the address titled "Womanhood" to the black clergy of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Washington, D.C.

In 1887, Cooper began teaching at M Street High School in Washington, D.C., eventually rising to the post of principal. She was dismissed from this post in 1906 amid scandalous allegations that played out in the Washington press, in which she was accused of having an improper relationship with a younger teacher and her former ward, John Love. The rumor was not substantiated, and historians have posited that Cooper's dismissal was political, related to the fact that she was a strong proponent of a rigorous curriculum that emphasized college preparedness rather than vocational training. In any case, Cooper eventually returned to M Street as a teacher in 1910.

In the late nineteenth century and early twentieth century, Cooper was very active in promoting the cause of African Americans, first with the publication of the landmark Voice from the South, of which "Womanhood" is part, and later through speeches around the world. She, along with W. E. B. Du Bois, was one of a few African Americans present at the first Pan-African Conference in London. Devoted to education, Cooper also helped found organizations that helped further the education of African Americans, including the Colored Settlement House in Washington, D.C., and the D.C. branch of the Colored Young Women's Christian Association. In 1930 she became president of Frelinghuysen University, a black university in D.C.

Cooper is also notable as the fourth African-American woman to receive a doctorate. At the age of sixty-five, she earned her doctorate from the Sorbonne in Paris. Her dissertation examined French attitudes toward slavery. Cooper died in 1964 at the age of 105, having lived from the time of slavery to the height of the civil rights movement.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

In "Womanhood: A Vital Element in the Regeneration and Progress of a Race," Anna Julia Cooper argues that black women are the key to the future success of African Americans, both male and female. Invoking the Victorian ideal of "true womanhood," Cooper stresses that women can exert influence through the home and that the most stable and progressive cultures share common values where women and home life are venerated. Originally delivered to an all-male audience of black clergy, this speech (later the first chapter in Cooper's book Voice from the South) is a call for support of African American women and the importance of their education.

♦ Opening

Cooper begins her essay by pointing to Christianity and the feudal system as the sources for the "noble and ennobling ideal of woman" that provides women with the agency to make a positive difference in their society. She contrasts this ideal of womanhood with the state of women in non-Western civilizations where women are oppressed. Cooper cites the state of women in China and under Muslim rule to make her point, arguing that a Chinese woman's spirit is as crushed as her foot (referring to the tradition of foot binding in China). Cooper is more expansive on the problems she sees with the state of Muslim women. Arguing that the home and home life lends strength to a people and society, Cooper decries the custom of the harem and quotes a writer who calls the "private life of the Turk … vilest of the vile, unprogressive, unambitious, and inconceivably low." In thriving societies, Cooper believes, women are revered as wives, mothers, and sisters, and in her view, in the East, "the homelife is impure."

Cooper moves quickly from her condemnation of the state of women in the East and the weakness of Eastern society to a celebration of Western civilization in Europe and America. While Cooper believes that America has yet to fulfill its promise, she has confidence that society is moving in the correct direction. Cooper's optimism for America rests on the "homelife and the influence of good women in those homes" who serve as a moral guide for the family. Positing the importance of home life, Cooper makes the argument for women's centrality to the success of a society.

Time Line

1894
- An important realization of Cooper's call for women's leadership, the Woman's Era is launched as the official organ of the National Association of Colored Women, with Josephine St. Pierre Ruffin as editor.

1895
- Cooper is active in the first meeting of the National Conference of Colored Women.

1900
- Cooper delivers an address, "The Negro Problem in America," at the Pan-African Conference in London, England.

1906
- Cooper is forced to resign as principal of M Street High School in Washington, D.C., in part because of her insistence on an academically rigorous curriculum as opposed to vocational training.

♦ Woman's Influence on Society

A good portion of Cooper's text is devoted to surveying the progress of women in Europe and describing the role of Christianity and feudal society in advancing women. Cooper was classically educated, and she supports her argument by citing an ancient Roman historian (Tacitus), an eminent nineteenth-century British historian and statesman (Thomas Macaulay), and a nineteenth-century American philosopher (Ralph Waldo Emerson). She is echoing their perspective that, as Macaulay wrote (and Cooper quotes), "You may judge a nation's rank in the scale of civilization from the way they treat their women."

The chivalry that sprouted from feudal society, Cooper explains, was significant in defining the idealized perspective of women. However, chivalry had its limits. Too often, Cooper argues, chivalry meant that men respected only the "elect few" among whom they might expect to socialize or marry. Cooper fears that this limitation still exists. Greater respect for women—respect that transcends class and culture—can be found in Christianity, though Cooper notes that the Christian church has also been limited. She points specifically to problems with the Catholic Church's treatment of women in the Middle Ages and the sexual transgressions of priests. However, Christianity, if not always the formal practices of religion, has led to the betterment of women's condition. Specifically, Cooper points to Christ's teaching that imparted the same ethical code and standards for both men and women. In her reading of the tenets of

Essential Quotes

"Now the fundamental agency under God in the regeneration, the retraining of the race, as well as the ground work and starting point of its progress upward, must be the black woman."

(Vital Agency of Womanhood in the Regeneration and Progress of a Race)

"Only the Black Woman can say 'when and where I enter, in the quiet, undisputed dignity of my womanhood, without violence and without suing or special patronage, then and there the whole Negro race enters with me.'"

(Vital Agency of Womanhood in the Regeneration and Progress of a Race)

*"'I am my Sister's keeper!' should be the hearty response of every man and woman of the race, and this conviction should purify and exalt the narrow, selfish and petty personal aims of life into a noble and sacred purpose."*

(The Role for the Protestant Episcopal Church)

Christianity, men and women are equals, with the same moral responsibilities.

Cooper ends the first part of her argument by stating that now that she has shown examples from history that societies which venerate women are the same societies that have made the most advances, it is fair to state that "the position of woman in society determines the vital elements of its regeneration and progress." She then addresses women directly, emphasizing the importance of their position and the extent of their responsibility. The future of civilization rests on women's shoulders, and their education must be taken seriously.

♦ Vital Agency of Womanhood in the Regeneration and Progress of a Race

After making her historical survey and tracing the importance of women to the development of Western civilization, Cooper turns to the specific importance of her theory on African Americans. The address is being made to black clergymen, and Cooper explains that she is not simply engaging in an intellectual exercise. Rather, she is advocating for the better education of black women because in their social progress lies the progress of all African Americans. Cooper states that her task is doubly difficult both because her argument is obvious and because she is not the first to raise these points. Cooper acknowledges that her topic has been addressed previously by Dr. Alexander Crummell, a black Episcopal pastor who wrote a pamphlet, The Black Woman in the South, that argued that the plight of black women under slavery was worse than that of men and called for the education and training of the newly freed black women in the rural South. Crummell was extremely influential in his time—Cooper refers to him as the "king." If such an influential black clergyman has not succeeded in raising the urgency of bettering black women, Cooper demurs, what chance does she have?

To Crummell's argument, Cooper also wishes to advocate for black girls of the South. These girls are at special risk because they often have no father or brother to protect them. Cooper herself never knew her white father, who had been her mother's owner during slavery. Without protectors, black girls are at risk of sexual exploitation by white men. These girls need to be "saved" and educated because they represent the "foundation stones of our future as a race." Cooper is unimpressed by the growing number of professional black men, because black women and girls are "subject to taint and corruption in the enemy's camp." In other words, black women will foster the future success of African Americans, but not if they are exploited, dismissed, and left uneducated.

Cooper was writing twenty-one years after the end of slavery. In her view, slavery caused two centuries of "compression and degradation" of African Americans. Any "weaknesses" evident in African Americans, Cooper says, are attributable to slavery. However, in a hundred years' time, she believes that any "weaknesses" will lie solely as the fault of African Americans. To make sure that African Americans are strong and productive in the future, Cooper turns again to the importance of educating black women. To judge the race as a whole, she argues, one must look at the strength of black families and not at the accomplishments of individuals. The achievement of one man does not speak to the success of his race. It is not until the "homes, average homes, homes of the rank and file" are "lighted and cheered by the good, the beautiful, and the true" that the African-American race will "be lifted into the sunlight."

In the most-quoted passage from this piece, Cooper asserts: "Only the Black Woman can say 'when and where I enter, in the quiet, undisputed dignity of my womanhood, without violence and without suing or special patronage, then and there the whole Negro race enters with me.'" In other words, when black women are assured of their rightful role without argument, then the entire race will be assured in its progress and development.

♦ The Role for the Protestant Episcopal Church

After describing the importance of black women to the future of the African American race, Cooper points to some direct action that the Protestant Episcopal Church, whose clergy she was addressing, could take to improve the lives of black women in the South. Cooper, who was educated by the Protestant Episcopal Church, was a strong critic of its limitations and what she saw as a retreat from what should be its mission in the South.

She turns first to an example of the opportunities that exist for her white counterparts. White girls are supported, are free from racial prejudice, and can look to organizations such as the White Cross League in England, says Cooper. This reference is important because the White Cross League, founded by the Christian feminist Jane Ellice Hopkins, was specifically established as a "social purity" organization for working-class girls. Cooper also looks to ways in which the English Anglican Church (of which the Episcopal Church in the United States is an offshoot) supports their "wronged sisters"—fallen women. Cooper in her veiled references to the "snares and traps" waiting for black girls in the South, is speaking directly to the need both for protecting the virginity of these girls and for sustaining black women who have "fallen."

Cooper thinks that the Protestant Episcopal Church needs to "missionize" black southerners. The Episcopal Church makes a poor showing in the South and among blacks. Methodists, Baptists, and Congregationalists are active in the South, whereas the Episcopalians can boast of only one black congregation in the South and less than two dozen black clergy in the entire country. Younger black Christians who might naturally be Episcopalians are finding a calling instead among different sects.

The fault lies, Cooper believes, in the fact that the Episcopal Church has not rightly respected black men. When gathering to discuss the best ways to further the development of African Americans, the church has neglected to invite black men to participate as equal partners. Second, and more directly to the point of Cooper's larger argument, the church has not worked directly to develop black women or seen the possibilities of using black women to draw others to the church. The church, Cooper believes, is out of touch with the daily lives of black Americans and until it "provides a clergy that can come in touch with our life and have a fellow feeling for our woes … the good bishops are likely to continue 'perplexed' by the sparsity of colored Episcopalians." Cooper here gives an example of race prejudice still evident in the church—one black priest was asked by his bishop to sit in the back of a convention so as not to disturb the white clergymen.

Cooper is also disappointed that Dr. Alexander Crummell's call in his pamphlet for the formation of organizations specific to the education and training of black women was not heeded by the Episcopal Church and that no effort toward the establishment of church sisterhoods has been made. Other religions have gone further—founding colleges and universities, including Fisk, Hampton, Atlanta University, and Tuskegee. Cooper contrasts these schools with Saint Augustine's, the school she attended before moving to Oberlin, and the institution where the Episcopal "Church in the South … mainly looks for the training of her colored clergy and for help of the 'Black Woman' and 'Colored Girl' of the South." Rather than producing a crop of "missionaries" to evangelize their fellow southern blacks, as have Fisk, Hampton, Atlanta, and Tuskegee, Saint Augustine's has managed to graduate only five women since its founding in 1868. Young men are being trained by Saint Augustine's, but poor women are simply not being trained and supported in meaningful numbers. Rather, the school educates primarily women who can pay their own way. The Episcopal Church, Cooper believes, is neglecting its duty to prepare girls "for the duties and responsibilities that await the intelligent wife, the Christian mother, the earnest, virtuous, helpful woman, at once the lever and the fulcrum for uplifting the race."

Cooper ends the speech with a direct call to her audience to take up the work of educating and supporting women: "Is it too much to ask you to step forward and direct the work for your race along those lines which you know to be of first and vital importance?" In this piece, Cooper grows ever more specific, moving from the importance of women to the advance of civilization, to the importance of black women to the progress of the African American race, to the importance of black women to the vitality of the Episcopal Church in the South. Cooper places black women in a continuum with white women of Europe and America, articulating that the treatment of women defines a society, a race, and a religion.

Audience

Originally delivered as a speech to the all-male black clergy of the Protestant Episcopal Church, this article often speaks specifically to the failings of the Episcopal Church in offering opportunities to women. Later, when it was republished as the first chapter of A Voice from the South, Cooper aimed to reach a much broader audience by using it to frame a book-length analysis of race and gender in the South. Her book addresses both black and white intellectuals and engages in a broad national dialogue.

Impact

A Voice from the South is considered by critics today to be a foundational text of modern black feminism. Many of Cooper's insights into the nexus of race and gender have been elaborated upon by later writers. In its own time, the book also drew wide attention and praise. Charles Lemert quotes the author of The Work of the Afro-American Woman (1894), Gertrude Bustill Mossell, who called Cooper's book A Voice from the South "one of the strongest pleas for the race and sex of the writer that ha[d] ever appeared."

Cooper and other feminist black writers were ignored by their male counterparts: The year that A Voice from the South was published (1892) the former slave and antislavery advocate Frederick Douglass was asked to provide the names of important black women for inclusion in an anthology of black writing, and he replied, "I have thus far seen no book of importance written by a negro woman and I know of no one among us who can appropriately be called famous." Within a short time, however, Cooper would leap to the front ranks of black leadership. In 1900, she spoke along with the civil rights activist W. E. B. Du Bois at the Pan-African Congress in London as representatives of the United States. However, her legacy was forgotten for many years and not resurrected until the 1980s. A Voice from the South was republished in 1990.

See also Josephine St. Pierre Ruffin's "Address to the First National Conference of Colored Women" (1895); Mary Church Terrell: "The Progress of Colored Women" (1898).

Further Reading

■ Books

Carby, Hazel. Reconstructing Womanhood: The Emergence of the Afro-American Woman Novelist. New York: Oxford University Press, 1987.

Collins, Patricia Hill. Black Feminist Thought: Knowledge, Consciousness, and the Politics of Empowerment. 2nd ed. New York: Routledge, 2000.

Cooper, Anna Julia. A Voice from the South, ed. Mary Helen Washington. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.

Questions for Further Study

1. How do Cooper and her work illustrate the intersections of race, gender, and social class in late-nineteenth-century America?

2. In what ways does Cooper's essay prefigure more modern feminist thought, particularly black feminist thought?

3. Many prominent black writers and leaders tended to be pessimistic about American society because of its legacy of slavery and ongoing racism. Did Cooper share that pessimism? Why or why not?

4. Cooper wrote, "But weaknesses and malformations, which to-day are attributable to a vicious schoolmaster and a pernicious system, will a century hence be rightly regarded as proofs of innate corruptness and radical incurability." Focusing on her use of the word rightly, what do you believe Cooper's reaction to racial realities would have been at the end of the twentieth century and in the first years of the twenty-first?

5. Compare this document with one or more written by other prominent black women during this era; possibilities include Josephine St. Pierre Ruffin's "Address to the First National Conference of Colored Women" (1895); Mary Church Terrell's "The Progress of Colored Women" (1898); and Mary McLeod Bethune's "What Does American Democracy Mean to Me?" What similar arguments do the writers make? How are their views different?

Giddings, Paula. When and Where I Enter: The Impact of Black Women on Race and Sex in America. New York: Bantam, 1984.

Lemert, Charles, and Esme Bhan, eds. The Voice of Anna Julia Cooper. Lanham, Md.: Rowman and Littlefield, 1998.

Johnson, Karen A. Uplifting the Women and the Race: The Lives, Educational Philosophies, and Social Activism of Anna Julia Cooper and Nannie Helen Burroughs. New York: Garland, 2000.

■ Web Sites

"African American Women." Duke University Library "Digitized Collections" Web site.
http://library.duke.edu/specialcollections/collections/digitized/african-american-women/.

African American Women Writers of the 19th Century Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture's "Digitial Schomburg African American Women Writers of the 19th Century" Web site.
http://digital.nypl.org/schomburg/writers_aa19/toc.html.

—Mark Elliott

Document Text

Anna Julia Cooper's "Womanhood: A Vital Element in the Regeneration and Progress of a Race"

The two sources from which, perhaps, modern civilization has derived its noble and ennobling ideal of woman are Christianity and the Feudal System.

In Oriental countries woman has been uniformly devoted to a life of ignorance, infamy, and complete stagnation. The Chinese shoe of to-day does not more entirely dwarf, cramp, and destroy her physical powers, than have the customs, laws, and social instincts, which from remotest ages have governed our Sister of the East, enervated and blighted her mental and moral life.

Mahomet makes no account of woman whatever in his polity. The Koran, which, unlike our Bible, was a product and not a growth, tried to address itself to the needs of Arabian civilization as Mahomet with his circumscribed powers saw them. The Arab was a nomad. Home to him meant his present camping place. That deity who, according to our western ideals, makes and sanctifies the home, was to him a transient bauble to be toyed with so long as it gave pleasure and then to be thrown aside for a new one. As a personality, an individual soul, capable of eternal growth and unlimited development, and destined to mould and shape the civilization of the future to an incalculable extent, Mahomet did not know woman. There was no hereafter, no paradise for her. The heaven of the Mussulman is peopled and made gladsome not by the departed wife, or sister, or mother, but by houri—a figment of Mahomet's brain, partaking of the ethereal qualities of angels, yet imbued with all the vices and inanity of Oriental women. The harem here, and—"dust to dust" hereafter, this was the hope, the inspiration, the summum bonum of the Eastern woman's life! With what result on the life of the nation, the "Unspeakable Turk," the "sick man" of modern Europe can to-day exemplify.

Says a certain writer: "The private life of the Turk is vilest of the vile, unprogressive, unambitious, and inconceivably low." And yet Turkey is not without her great men. She has produced most brilliant minds; men skilled in all the intricacies of diplomacy and statesmanship; men whose intellects could grapple with the deep problems of empire and manipulate the subtle agencies which check-mate kings. But these minds were not the normal outgrowth of a healthy trunk. They seemed rather ephemeral excrescencies which shoot far out with all the vigor and promise, apparently, of strong branches; but soon alas fall into decay and ugliness because there is no soundness in the root, no life-giving sap, permeating, strengthening and perpetuating the whole. There is a worm at the core! The homelife is impure! and when we look for fruit, like apples of Sodom, it crumbles within our grasp into dust and ashes.

It is pleasing to turn from this effete and immobile civilization to a society still fresh and vigorous, whose seed is in itself, and whose very name is synonymous with all that is progressive, elevating and inspiring, viz., the European bud and the American flower of modern civilization.

And here let me say parenthetically that our satisfaction in American institutions rests not on the fruition we now enjoy, but springs rather from the possibilities and promise that are inherent in the system, though as yet, perhaps, far in the future.

"Happiness," says Madame de Stael, "consists not in perfections attained, but in a sense of progress, the result of our own endeavor under conspiring circumstances toward a goal which continually advances and broadens and deepens till it is swallowed up in the Infinite." Such conditions in embryo are all that we claim for the land of the West. We have not yet reached our ideal in American civilization. The pessimists even declare that we are not marching in that direction. But there can be no doubt that here in America is the arena in which the next triumph of civilization is to be won; and here too we find promise abundant and possibilities infinite.

Now let us see on what basis this hope for our country primarily and fundamentally rests. Can any one doubt that it is chiefly on the homelife and on the influence of good women in those homes? Says Macaulay: "You may judge a nation's rank in the scale of civilization from the way they treat their women." And Emerson, "I have thought that a sufficient measure of civilization is the influence of good women." Now this high regard for woman, this germ of a prolific idea which in our own day is bearing such rich and varied fruit, was ingrafted into European civilization, we have said, from two sources, the Christian Church and the Feudal System. For although the Feudal System can in no sense be said to have originated the idea, yet there can be no doubt that the habits of life and modes of thought to which Feudalism gave rise, materially fostered and developed it; for they gave us chivalry, than which no institution has more sensibly magnified and elevated woman's position in society.

Tacitus dwells on the tender regard for woman entertained by these rugged barbarians before they left their northern homes to overrun Europe. Old Norse legends too, and primitive poems, all breathe the same spirit of love of home and veneration for the pure and noble influence there presiding—the wife, the sister, the mother.

And when later on we see the settled life of the Middle Ages "oozing out," as M. Guizot expresses it, from the plundering and pillaging life of barbarism and crystallizing into the Feudal System, the tiger of the field is brought once more within the charmed circle of the goddesses of his castle, and his imagination weaves around them a halo whose reflection possibly has not yet altogether vanished.

It is true the spirit of Christianity had not yet put the seal of catholicity on this sentiment. Chivalry, according to Bascom, was but the toning down and softening of a rough and lawless period. It gave a roseate glow to a bitter winter's day. Those who looked out from castle windows revelled in its "amethyst tints." But God's poor, the weak, the unlovely, the commonplace were still freezing and starving none the less, in unpitied, unrelieved loneliness.

Respect for woman, the much lauded chivalry of the Middle Ages, meant what I fear it still means to some men in our own day—respect for the elect few among whom they expect to consort.

The idea of the radical amelioration of womankind, reverence for woman as woman regardless of rank, wealth, or culture, was to come from that rich and bounteous fountain from which flow all our liberal and universal ideas—the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

And yet the Christian Church at the time of which we have been speaking would seem to have been doing even less to protect and elevate woman than the little done by secular society. The Church as an organization committed a double offense against woman in the Middle Ages. Making of marriage a sacrament and at the same time insisting on the celibacy of the clergy and other religious orders, she gave an inferior if not an impure character to the marriage relation, especially fitted to reflect discredit on woman. Would this were all or the worst! but the Church by the licentiousness of its chosen servants invaded the household and established too often as vicious connections those relations which it forbade to assume openly and in good faith. "Thus," to use the words of our authority, "the religious corps became as numerous, as searching, and as unclean as the frogs of Egypt, which penetrated into all quarters, into the ovens and kneading troughs, leaving their filthy trail wherever they went." Says Chaucer with characteristic satire, speaking of the Friars:

Women may now go safely up and doun,
In every bush, and under every tree,
Ther is non other incubus but he,
And he ne will don hem no dishonor.

It may help us under some of the perplexities which beset our way in "the one Catholic and Apostolic Church" to-day, to recall some of the corruptions and incongruities against which the Bride of Christ has had to struggle in her past history and in spite of which she has kept, through many vicissitudes, the faith once delivered to the saints. Individuals, organizations, whole sections of the Church militant may outrage the Christ whom they profess, may ruthlessly trample under foot both the spirit and the letter of his precepts, yet not till we hear the voices audibly saying "Come let us depart hence," shall we cease to believe and cling to the promise, "I am with you to the end of the world."

"Yet saints their watch are keeping,
The cry goes up 'How long!'
And soon the night of weeping
Shall be the morn of song."

However much then the facts of any particular period of history may seem to deny it, I for one do not doubt that the source of the vitalizing principle of woman's development and amelioration is the Christian Church, so far as that church is coincident with Christianity.

Christ gave ideals not formulae. The Gospel is a germ requiring millennia for its growth and ripening. It needs and at the same time helps to form around itself a soil enriched in civilization, and perfected in culture and insight without which the embryo can neither be unfolded or comprehended. With all the strides our civilization has made from the first to the nineteenth century, we can boast not an idea, not a principle of action, not a progressive social force but was already mutely foreshadowed, or directly enjoined in that simple tale of a meek and lowly life. The quiet face of the Nazarene is ever seen a little way ahead, never too far to come down to and touch the life of the lowest in days the darkest, yet ever leading onward, still onward, the tottering childish feet of our strangely boastful civilization.

By laying down for woman the same code of morality, the same standard of purity, as for man; by refusing to countenance the shameless and equally guilty monsters who were gloating over her fall,—graciously stooping in all the majesty of his own spotlessness to wipe away the filth and grime of her guilty past and bid her go in peace and sin no more; and again in the moments of his own careworn and footsore dejection, turning trustfully and lovingly, away from the heartless snubbing and sneers, away from the cruel malignity of mobs and prelates in the dusty marts of Jerusalem to the ready sympathy, loving appreciation and unfaltering friendship of that quiet home at Bethany; and even at the last, by his dying bequest to the disciple whom he loved, signifying the protection and tender regard to be extended to that sorrowing mother and ever afterward to the sex she represented;—throughout his life and in his death he has given to men a rule and guide for the estimation of woman as an equal, as a helper, as a friend, and as a sacred charge to be sheltered and cared for with a brother's love and sympathy, lessons which nineteen centuries' gigantic strides in knowledge, arts, and sciences, in social and ethical principles have not been able to probe to their depth or to exhaust in practice.

It seems not too much to say then of the vitalizing, regenerating, and progressive influence of womanhood on the civilization of today, that, while it was foreshadowed among Germanic nations in the far away dawn of their history as a narrow, sickly and stunted growth, it yet owes its catholicity and power, the deepening of its roots and broadening of its branches to Christianity.

The union of these two forces, the Barbaric and the Christian, was not long delayed after the Fall of the Empire. The Church, which fell with Rome, finding herself in danger of being swallowed up by barbarism, with characteristic vigor and fertility of resources, addressed herself immediately to the task of conquering her conquerers. The means chosen does credit to her power of penetration and adaptability, as well as to her profound, unerring, all-compassing diplomacy; and makes us even now wonder if aught human can successfully and ultimately withstand her far-seeing designs and brilliant policy, or gainsay her well-earned claim to the word Catholic.

She saw the barbarian, little more developed than a wild beast. She forbore to antagonize and mystify his warlike nature by a full blaze of the heart searching and humanizing tenets of her great Head. She said little of the rule "If thy brother smite thee on one cheek, turn to him the other also;" but thought it sufficient for the needs of those times, to establish the so-called "Truce of God" under which men were bound to abstain from butchering one another for three days of each week and on Church festivals. In other words, she respected their individuality: nonresistance pure and simple being for them an utter impossibility, she contented herself with less radical measures calculated to lead up finally to the full measure of the benevolence of Christ.

Next she took advantage of the barbarian's sensuous love of gaudy display and put all her magnificent garments on. She could not capture him by physical force, she would dazzle him by gorgeous spectacles. It is said that Romanism gained more in pomp and ritual during this trying period of the Dark Ages than throughout all her former history.

The result was she carried her point. Once more Rome laid her ambitions hand on the temporal power, and allied with Charlemagne, aspired to rule the world through a civilization dominated by Christianity and permeated by the traditions and instincts of those sturdy barbarians.

Here was the confluence of the two streams we have been tracing, which, united now, stretch before us as a broad majestic river. In regard to woman it was the meeting of two noble and ennobling forces, two kindred ideas the resultant of which, we doubt not, is destined to be a potent force in the betterment of the world.

Now after our appeal to history comparing nations destitute of this force and so destitute also of the principle of progress, with other nations among whom the influence of woman is prominent coupled with a brisk, progressive, satisfying civilization,—if in addition we find this strong presumptive evidence corroborated by reason and experience, we may conclude that these two equally varying concomitants are linked as cause and effect; in other words, that the position of woman in society determines the vital elements of its regeneration and progress.

Now that this is so on a priori grounds all must admit. And this not because woman is better or stronger or wiser than man, but from the nature of the case, because it is she who must first form the man by directing the earliest impulses of his character.

Document Text

Byron and Wordsworth were both geniuses and would have stamped themselves on the thought of their age under any circumstances; and yet we find the one a savor of life unto life, the other of death unto death. "Byron, like a rocket, shot his way upward with scorn and repulsion, flamed out in wild, explosive, brilliant excesses and disappeared in darkness made all the more palpable."

Wordsworth lent of his gifts to reinforce that "power in the Universe which makes for righteousness" by taking the harp handed him from Heaven and using it to swell the strains of angelic choirs. Two locomotives equally mighty stand facing opposite tracks; the one to rush headlong to destruction with all its precious freight, the other to toil grandly and gloriously up the steep embattlements to Heaven and to God. Who—who can say what a world of consequences hung on the first placing and starting of these enormous forces!

Woman, Mother,—your responsibility is one that might make angels tremble and fear to take hold! To trifle with it, to ignore or misuse it, is to treat lightly the most sacred and solemn trust ever confided by God to human kind. The training of children is a task on which an infinity of weal or woe depends. Who does not covet it? Yet who does not stand awestruck before its momentous issues! It is a matter of small moment, it seems to me, whether that lovely girl in whose accomplishments you take such pride and delight, can enter the gay and crowded salon with the ease and elegance of this or that French or English gentlewoman, compared with the decision as to whether her individuality is going to reinforce the good or the evil elements of the world. The lace and the diamonds, the dance and the theater, gain a new significance when scanned in their bearings on such issues. Their influence on the individual personality, and through her on the society and civilization which she vitalizes and inspires—all this and more must be weighed in the balance before the jury call return a just and intelligent verdict as to the innocence or banefulness of these apparently simple amusements.

Now the fact of woman's influence on society being granted, what are its practical bearings on the work which brought together this conference of colored clergy and laymen in Washington? "We come not here to talk." Life is too busy, too pregnant with meaning and far reaching consequences to allow you to come this far for mere intellectual entertainment.

The vital agency of womanhood in the regeneration and progress of a race, as a general question, is conceded almost before it is fairly stated. I confess one of the difficulties for me in the subject assigned lay in its obviousness. The plea is taken away by the opposite attorney's granting the whole question.

"Woman's influence on social progress"—who in Christendom doubts or questions it? One may as well be called on to prove that, the sun is the source of light and heat and energy to this many-sided little world.

Nor, on the other hand, could it have been intended that I should apply the position when taken and proven, to the needs and responsibilities of the women of our race in the South. For is it not written, "Cursed is he that cometh after the king?" and has not the King already preceded me in "The Black Woman of the South"?

They have had both Moses and the Prophets in Dr. Crummell and if they hear not him, neither would they be persuaded though one came up from the South.

I would beg, however, with the Doctor's permission, to add my plea for the Colored Girls of the South:—that large, bright, promising fatally beautiful class that stand shivering like a delicate plantlet before the fury of tempestuous elements, so full of promise and possibilities, yet so sure of destruction; often without a father to whom they dare apply the loving term, often without a stronger brother to espouse their cause and defend their honor with his life's blood; in the midst of pitfalls and snares, waylaid by the lower classes of white men, with no shelter, no protection nearer than the great blue vault above, which half conceals and half reveals the one Care-Taker they know so little of. Oh, save them, help them, shield, train, develop, teach, inspire them! Snatch them, in God's name, as brands from the burning! There is material in them well worth your while, the hope in germ of a staunch, helpful, regenerating womanhood on which, primarily, rests the foundation stones of our future as a race.

It is absurd to quote statistics showing the Negro's bank account and rent rolls, to point to the hundreds of newspapers edited by colored men and lists of lawyers, doctors, professors, D. D's, LL D's, etc., etc., etc., while the source from which the life-blood of the race is to flow is subject to taint and corruption in the enemy's camp.

True progress is never made by spasms. Real progress is growth. It must begin in the seed. Then, "first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear." There is something to encourage and inspire us in the advancement of individuals since their emancipation from slavery. It at least proves that there is nothing irretrievably wrong in the shape of the black man's skull, and that under given circumstances his development, downward or upward, will be similar to that of other average human beings.

But there is no time to be wasted in mere felicitation. That the Negro has his niche in the infinite purposes of the Eternal, no one who has studied the history of the last fifty years in America will deny. That much depends on his own right comprehension of his responsibility and rising to the demands of the hour, it will be good for him to see; and how best to use his present so that the structure of the future shall be stronger and higher and brighter and nobler and holier than that of the past, is a question to be decided each day by every one of us.

The race is just twenty-one years removed from the conception and experience of a chattel, just at the age of ruddy manhood. It is well enough to pause a moment for retrospection, introspection, and prospection. We look back, not to become inflated with conceit because of the depths from which we have arisen, but that we may learn wisdom from experience. We look within that we may gather together once more our forces, and, by improved and more practical methods, address ourselves to the tasks before us. We look forward with hope and trust that the same God whose guiding hand led our fathers through and out of the gall and bitterness of oppression, will still lead and direct their children, to the honor of His name, and for their ultimate salvation.

But this survey of the failures or achievements of the past, the difficulties and embarrassments of the present, and the mingled hopes and fears for the future, must not degenerate into mere dreaming nor consume the time which belongs to the practical and effective handling of the crucial questions of the hour; and there can be no issue more vital and momentous than this of the womanhood of the race.

Here is the vulnerable point, not in the heel, but at the heart of the young Achilles; and here must the defenses be strengthened and the watch redoubled.

We are the heirs of a past which was not our fathers' moulding. "Every man the arbiter of his own destiny" was not true for the American Negro of the past: and it is no fault of his that he finds himself to-day the inheritor of a manhood and womanhood impoverished and debased by two centuries and more of compression and degradation.

But weaknesses and malformations, which to-day are attributable to a vicious schoolmaster and a pernicious system, will a century hence be rightly regarded as proofs of innate corruptness and radical incurability.

Now the fundamental agency under God in the regeneration, the re-training of the race, as well as the ground work and starting point of its progress upward, must be the black woman.

With all the wrongs and neglects of her past, with all the weakness, the debasement, the moral thralldom of her present, the black woman of to-day stands mute and wondering at the Herculean task devolving around her. But the cycles wait for her. No other hand can move the lever. She must be loosed from her bands and set to work.

Our meager and superficial results from past efforts prove their futility; and every effort to elevate the Negro, whether undertaken by himself or through the philanthropy of others, cannot but prove abortive unless so directed as to utilize the indispensable agency of an elevated and trained womanhood.

A race cannot be purified from without. Preachers and teachers are helps, and stimulants and conditions as necessary as the gracious rain and sunshine are to plant growth. But what are rain and dew and sunshine and cloud if there be no life in the plant germ? We must go to the root and see that it is sound and healthy and vigorous; and not deceive ourselves with waxen flowers and painted leaves of mock chlorophyll.

We too often mistake individuals' honor for race development and so are ready to substitute pretty accomplishments for sound sense and earnest purpose.

A stream cannot rise higher than its source. The atmosphere of homes is no rarer and purer and sweeter than are the mothers in those homes. A race is but a total of families. The nation is the aggregate of its homes. As the whole is sum of all its parts, so the character of the parts will determine the characteristics of the whole. These are all axioms and so evident that it seems gratuitous to remark it; and yet, unless I am greatly mistaken, most of the unsatisfaction from our past results arises from just such a radical and palpable error, as much almost on our own part as on that of our benevolent white friends.

The Negro is constitutionally hopeful and proverbially irrepressible; and naturally stands in danger of being dazzled by the shimmer and tinsel of superficials. We often mistake foliage for fruit and overestimate or wrongly estimate brilliant results.

The late Martin R. Delany, who was an unadulterated black man, used to say when honors of state fell upon him, that when he entered the council of kings the black race entered with him; meaning, I suppose, that there was no discounting his race identity and attributing his achievements to some admixture of Saxon blood. But our present record of eminent men, when placed beside the actual status of the race in America to-day, proves that no man can represent the race. Whatever the attainments of the individual may be, unless his home has moved on pari passu, he can never be regarded as identical with or representative of the whole.

Not by pointing to sun-bathed mountain tops do we prove that Phoebus warms the valleys. We must point to homes, average homes, homes of the rank and file of horny handed toiling men and women of the South (where the masses are) lighted and cheered by the good, the beautiful, and the true,—then and not till then will the whole plateau be lifted into the sunlight.

Only the Black Woman can say "when and where I enter, in the quiet, undisputed dignity of my womanhood, without violence and without suing or special patronage, then and there the whole Negro race enters with me." Is it not evident then that as individual workers for this race we must address ourselves with no half-hearted zeal to this feature of our mission. The need is felt and must be recognized by all. There is a call for workers, for missionaries, for men and women with the double consecration of a fundamental love of humanity and a desire for its melioration through the Gospel; but superadded to this we demand an intelligent and sympathetic comprehension of the interests and special needs of the Negro.

I see not why there should not be an organized effort for the protection and elevation of our girls such as the White Cross League in England. English women are strengthened and protected by more than twelve centuries of Christian influences, freedom and civilization; English girls are dispirited and crushed down by no such all-levelling prejudice as that supercilious caste spirit in America which cynically assumes "A Negro woman cannot be a lady." English womanhood is beset by no such snares and traps as betray the unprotected, untrained colored girl of the South, whose only crime and dire destruction often is her unconscious and marvelous beauty. Surely then if English indignation is aroused and English manhood thrilled under the leadership of a Bishop of the English church to build up bulwarks around their wronged sisters, Negro sentiment cannot remain callous and Negro effort nerveless in view of the imminent peril of the mothers of the next generation. "I am my Sister's keeper!" should be the hearty response of every man and woman of the race, and this conviction should purify and exalt the narrow, selfish and petty personal aims of life into a noble and sacred purpose.

We need men who can let their interest and gallantry extend outside the circle of their aesthetic appreciation; men who can be a father, a brother, a friend to every weak, struggling unshielded girl. We need women who are so sure of their own social footing that they need not fear leaning to lend a hand to a fallen or falling sister. We need men and women who do not exhaust their genius splitting hairs on aristocratic distinctions and thanking God they are not as others; but earnest, unselfish souls, who can go into the highways and byways, lifting up and leading, advising and encouraging with the truly catholic benevolence of the Gospel of Christ.

As Church workers we must confess our path of duty is less obvious; or rather our ability to adapt our machinery to our conception of the peculiar exigencies of this work as taught by experience and our own consciousness of the needs of the Negro, is as yet not demonstrable. Flexibility and aggressiveness are not such strong characteristics of the Church to-day as in the Dark Ages.

As a Mission field for the Church the Southern Negro is in some aspects most promising; in others, perplexing. Aliens neither in language and customs, nor in associations and sympathies, naturally of deeply rooted religious instincts and taking most readily and kindly to the worship and teachings of the Church, surely the task of proselytizing the American Negro is infinitely less formidable than that which confronted the Church in the Barbarians of Europe. Besides, this people already look to the Church as the hope of their race. Thinking colored men almost uniformly admit that the Protestant Episcopal Church with its quiet, chaste dignity and decorous solemnity, its instructive and elevating ritual, its bright chanting and joyous hymning, is eminently fitted to correct the peculiar faults of worship—the rank exuberance and often ludicrous demonstrativeness of their people. Yet, strange to say, the Church, claiming to be missionary and Catholic, urging that schism is sin and denominationalism inexcusable, has made in all these years almost no inroads upon this semi-civilized religionism.

Harvests from this over ripe field of home missions have been gathered in by Methodists, Baptists, and not least by Congregationalists, who were unknown to the Freedmen before their emancipation.

Document Text

Our clergy numbers less than two dozen priests of Negro, blood and we have hardly more than one self-supporting colored congregation in the entire Southland. While the organization known as the A. M. E. Church has 14,063 ministers, itinerant and local, 4,069 self-supporting churches, churches, 4,2754,275 Sunday-schools, with property valued at $7,772,284, raising yearly for church purposes $1,427,000.

Stranger and more significant than all, the leading men of this race (I do not mean demagogues and politicians, but men of intellect, heart, and race devotion, men to whom the elevation of their people means more than personal ambition and sordid gain—and the men of that stamp have not all died yet) the Christian workers for the race, of younger and more cultured growth, are noticeably drifting into sectarian churches, many of them declaring all the time that they acknowledge the historic claims of the Church, believe her apostolicity, and would experience greater personal comfort, spiritual and intellectual, in her revered communion. It is a fact which any one may verify for himself, that representative colored men, professing that in their heart of hearts they are Episcopalians, are actually working in Methodist and Baptist pulpits; while the ranks of the Episcopal clergy are left to be filled largely by men who certainly suggest the propriety of a "perpetual Diaconate" if they cannot be said to have created the necessity for it.

Now where is the trouble? Something must be wrong. What is it?

A certain Southern Bishop of our Church reviewing the situation, whether in Godly anxiety or in "Gothic antipathy" I know not, deprecates the fact that the colored people do not seem drawn to the Episcopal Church, and comes to the sage conclusion that the Church is not adapted to the rude untutored minds of the Freedmen, and that they may be left to go to the Methodists and Baptists whither their racial proclivities undeniably tend. How the good Bishop can agree that all-foreseeing Wisdom, and Catholic Love would have framed his Church as typified in his seamless garment and unbroken body, and yet not leave it broad enough and deep enough and loving enough to seek and save and hold seven millions of God's poor, I cannot see.

But the doctors while discussing their scientifically conclusive diagnosis of the disease, will perhaps not think it presumptuous in the patient if he dares to suggest where at least the pain is. If this be allowed, a Black woman of the South would beg to point out two possible oversights in this southern work which may indicate in part both a cause and a remedy for some failure. The first is not calculating for the Black man's personality; not having respect, if I may so express it, to his manhood or deferring at all to his conceptions of the needs of his people. When colored persons have been employed it was too often as machines or as manikins. There has been no disposition, generally, to get the black man's ideal or to let his individuality work by its own gravity, as it were. A conference of earnest Christian men have met at regular intervals for some years past to discuss the best methods of promoting the welfare and development of colored people in this country. Yet, strange as it may seem, they have never invited a colored man or even intimated that one would be welcome to take part in their deliberations. Their remedial contrivances are purely theoretical or empirical, therefore, and the whole machinery devoid of soul.

The second important oversight in my judgment is closely allied to this and probably grows out of it, and that is not developing Negro womanhood as an essential fundamental for the elevation of the race, and utilizing this agency in extending the work of the Church.

Of the first I have possibly already presumed to say too much since it does not strictly come within the province of my subject. However, Macaulay somewhere criticises the Church of England as not knowing how to use fanatics, and declares that had Ignatius Loyola been in the Anglican instead of the Roman communion, the Jesuits would have been schismatics instead of Catholics; and if the religious awakenings of the Wesleys had been in Rome, she would have shaven their heads, tied ropes around their waists, and sent them out under her own banner and blessing. Whether this be true or not, there is certainly a vast amount of force potential for Negro evangelization rendered latent, or worse, antagonistic by the halting, uncertain, I had almost said, trimming policy of the Church in the South. This may sound both presumptuous and ungrateful. It is mortifying, I know, to benevolent wisdom, after having spent itself in the execution of well conned theories for the ideal development of a particular work, to hear perhaps the weakest and humblest element of that work: asking "what doest thou?"

Yet so it will be in life. The "thus far and no farther" pattern cannot be fitted to any growth in God's kingdom. The universal law of development is "onward and upward." It is God-given and inviolable. From the unfolding of the germ in the acorn to reach the sturdy oak, to the growth of a human soul into the full knowledge and likeness of its Creator, the breadth and scope of the movement in each and all are too grand, too mysterious, too like God himself, to be encompassed and locked down in human molds.

After all the Southern slave owners were right: either the very alphabet of intellectual growth must be forbidden and the Negro dealt with absolutely as a chattel having neither rights nor sensibilities; or else the clamps and irons of mental and moral, as well as civil compression must be riven asunder and the truly enfranchised soul led to the entrance of that boundless vista through which it is to toil upwards to its beckoning God as the buried seed germ, to meet the sun.

A perpetual colored diaconate, carefully and kindly superintended by the white clergy; congregations of shiny faced peasants with their clean white aprons and sunbonnets catechised at regular intervals and taught to recite the creed, the Lord's prayer and the ten commandments—duty towards God and duty towards neighbor, surely such well tended sheep ought to be grateful to their shepherds and content in that station of life to which it pleased God to call them. True, like the old professor lecturing to his solitary student, we make no provision here for irregularities. "Questions must be kept till after class," or dispensed with altogether. That some do ask questions and insist on answers, in class too, must be both impertinent and annoying. Let not our spiritual pastors and masters however be grieved at such self-assertion as merely signifies we have a destiny to fulfill and as men and women we must be about our Father's business.

It is a mistake to suppose that the Negro is prejudiced against a white ministry. Naturally there is not a more kindly and implicit follower of a white man's guidance than the average colored peasant. What would to others be an ordinary act of friendly or pastoral interest he would be more inclined to regard gratefully as a condescension. And he never forgets such kindness.

Could the Negro be brought near to his white priest or bishop, he is not suspicious. He is not only willing but often longs to unburden his soul to this intelligent guide. There are no reservations when he is convinced that you are his friend. It is a saddening satire on American history and manners that it takes something to convince him.That our people are not "drawn" to a Church whose chief dignitaries they see only in the chancel, and whom they reverence as they would a painting or an angel, whose life never comes down to and touches theirs with the inspiration of an objective reality, may be "perplexing" truly (American caste and American Christianity both being facts) but it need not be surprising. There must be something of human nature in it, the same as that which brought about that "the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us" that He might "draw" us towards God.

Men are not "drawn" by abstractions. Only sympathy and love can draw, and until our Church in America realizes this and provides a clergy that can come in touch with our life and have a fellow feeling for our woes, without being imbedded and frozen up in their "Gothic antipathies," the good bishops are likely to continue "perplexed" by the sparsity of colored Episcopalians.

A colored priest of my acquaintance recently related to me, with tears in his eyes, how his reverend Father in God, the Bishop who had ordained him, had met him on the cars on his way to the diocesan convention and warned him, not unkindly, not to take a seat in the body of the convention with the white clergy. To avoid disturbance of their godly placidity he would of course please sit back and somewhat apart. I do not imagine that that clergyman had very much heart for the Christly (!) deliberations of that convention.

To return, however, it is not on this broader view of Church work, which I mentioned as a primary cause of its halting progress with the colored people, that I am to speak. My proper theme is the second oversight of which in my judgment our Christian propagandists have been guilty: or, the necessity of church training, protecting and uplifting our colored womanhood as indispensable to the evangelization of the race.

Apelles did not disdain even that criticism of his lofty art which came from an uncouth cobbler; and may I not hope that the writer's oneness with her subject both in feeling and in being may palliate undue obtrusiveness of opinions here. That the race cannot be effectually lifted up till its women are truly elevated we take as proven. It is not for us to dwell on the needs, the neglects, and the ways of succor, pertaining to the black woman of the South. The ground has been ably discussed and an admirable and practical plan proposed by the oldest Negro priest in America, advising and urging that special organizations such as Church Sisterhoods and industrial schools be devised to meet her pressing needs in the Southland. That some such movements are vital to the life of this people and the extension of the Church among them, is not hard to see. Yet the pamphlet fell still-born from the press. So far as I am informed the Church has made no motion towards carrying out Dr. Crummell's suggestion.

Document Text

The denomination which comes next our own in opposing the proverbial emotionalism of Negro worship in the South, and which in consequence like ours receives the cold shoulder from the old heads, resting as we do under the charge of not "having religion" and not believing in conversion—the Congregationalists—have quietly gone to work on the young, have established industrial and training schools, and now almost every community in the South is yearly enriched by a fresh infusion of vigorous young hearts, cultivated heads, and helpful hands that have been trained at Fisk, at Hampton, in Atlanta University, and in Tuskegee, Alabama.

These young people are missionaries actual or virtual both here and in Africa. They have learned to love the methods and doctrines of the Church which trained and educated them; and so Congregationalism surely and steadily progresses.

Need I compare these well known facts with results shown by the Church in the same field and during the same or even a longer time.

The institution of the Church in the South to which she mainly looks for the training of her colored clergy and for the help of the "Black Woman" and "Colored Girl" of the South, has graduated since the year 1868, when the school was founded, five young women; and while yearly numerous young men have been kept and trained for the ministry by the charities of the Church, the number of indigent females who have here been supported, sheltered and trained, is phenomenally small. Indeed, to my mind, the attitude of the Church toward this feature of her work, is as if the solution of the problem of Negro missions depended solely on sending a quota of deacons and priests into the field, girls being a sort of tertium quid whose development may be promoted if they can pay their way and fall in with the plans mapped out for the training of the other sex.

Now I would ask in all earnestness, does not this force potential deserve by education and stimulus to be made dynamic? Is it not a solemn duty incumbent on all colored churchmen to make it so? Will not the aid of the Church be given to prepare our girls in head, heart, and hand for the duties and responsibilities that await the intelligent wife, the Christian

Glossary

Achilles	a hero of the ancient Trojan War
A. M. E. Church	the African Methodist Episcopal Church
Apelles	an ancient Greek painter
Bascom	probably Henry Bidleman Bascom, an early-nineteenth-century American Congregationalist minister
Bethany	a biblical village near Jerusalem
Byron and Wordsworth	George Gordon, Lord Byron and William Wordsworth, prominent English Romantic poets in the early nineteenth century
"Byron, like a rocket, shot his way upward …"	from Henry Bidleman Bascom's Lectures on Mental and Moral Philosophy
Catholic	traditionally, a reference to the universality of the Christian church, not to the Catholic denomination
Charlemagne	king of France and Holy Roman Emperor during the eighth and ninth centuries
Chaucer	Geoffrey Chaucer, a fourteenth-century British poet, author of The Canterbury Tales; the quotation is from the "Wife of Bath's Tale."
Chinese shoe	the Chinese practice of binding the feet of girls to prevent the feet from growing
Dr. Crummell	Alexander Crummell, a nineteenth-century pastor and abolitionist mother, the earnest, virtuous, helpful woman, at once both the lever and the fulcrum for uplifting the race.

Document Text

As Negroes and churchmen we cannot be indifferent to these questions. They touch us most vitally on both sides. We believe in the Holy Catholic Church. We believe that however gigantic and apparently remote the consummation, the Church will go on conquering and to conquer till the kingdoms of this world, not excepting the black man and the black woman of the South, shall have become the kingdoms of the Lord and of his Christ.

That past work in this direction has been unsatisfactory we must admit. That without a change of policy results in the future will be as meagre, we greatly fear. Our life as a race is at stake. The dearest interests of our hearts are in the scales. We must either break away from dear old landmarks and plunge out in any line and every line that enables us to meet the pressing need of our people, or we must ask the Church to allow and help us, untrammelled by the prejudices and theories of individuals, to work aggressively under her direction as we alone can, with God's help, for the salvation of our people.

The time is ripe for action. Self-seeking and ambition must be laid on the altar. The battle is one of sacrifice and hardship, but our duty is plain. We have been recipients of missionary bounty in some sort for twenty-one years. Not even the senseless vegetable is content to be a mere reservoir. Receiving without giving is an anomaly in nature. Nature's cells are all little workshops for manufacturing sunbeams, the product to be given out to earth's inhabitants in warmth, energy, thought, action. Inanimate creation always pays back an equivalent.

Now, How much owest thou my Lord? Will his account be overdrawn if he call for singleness of purpose and self-sacrificing labor for your brethren? Having passed through your drill school, will you refuse a general's commission even if it entail responsibility, risk and anxiety, with possibly some adverse criticism? Is it too much to ask you to step forward and direct the work for your race along those lines which you know to be of first and vital importance?

Will you allow these words of Ralph Waldo Emerson? "In ordinary," says he, "we have a snappish criticism which watches and contradicts the opposite party. We want the will which advances and dictates

Glossary

Emerson	Ralph Waldo Emerson, nineteenth-century American essayist and poet
Feudal System	the medieval social and economic system based on the relationship between landowners and their vassals
"first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear"	from the biblical book of Mark, chapter 4, verse 28
houri	beautiful maidens who, in Islamic belief, live in Paradise
"How much owest thou my Lord?"	from the biblical book of Luke, chapter 16, verse 5
"I am with you to the end of the world"	loosely quoted from the biblical book of Matthew, chapter 28, verse 20
"If thy brother smite thee on one cheek …"	from the biblical book of Matthew, chapter 5, verse 39
Ignatius Loyola	sixteenth-century Spanish saint and founder of the Jesuit order of Catholic priests
"In ordinary …"	from Ralph Waldo Emerson's 1870 essay "Courage"
Koran	the sacred scripture of Islam; often spelled Qur'an
M. Guizot	François Guizot, a nineteenth-century French historian; "M" means "monsieur"

Document Text

[acts]. Nature has made up her mind that what cannot defend itself, shall not be defended. Complaining never so loud and with never so much reason, is of no use. What cannot stand must fall; and the measure of our sincerity and therefore of the respect of men is the amount of health and wealth we will hazard in the defense of our right."

Glossary

Macaulay	Thomas Babington Macaulay, a nineteenth-century British historian
Madame de Stael	a Swiss author who lived in Paris and had a marked influence on French literature at the turn of the nineteenth century
Mahomet	an antique spelling of Muhammad, the prophet of Islam
Martin R. Delany	a black military officer in the Civil War
Mussulman	an antique variant of Muslim
Nazarene	Jesus Christ, from his birthplace at Nazareth pari passu	Latin for "with equal step," often used to mean "hand in hand" or "part and parcel"
Phoebus	the sun
Sodom	an ancient biblical city believed to have been destroyed by God; often used as a metaphor for vice summum bonum	Latin for "highest good"
Tacitus	Publius Cornelius Tacitus, an ancient Roman senator and historian
Wesleys	John and Charles Wesley, founders of Methodism in the eighteenth century
"Yet saints their watch are keeping …"	from a hymn by Samuel John Stone

Illustration of Jim Crow (Library of Congress)

John Edward Bruce's "Organized Resistance Is Our Best Remedy"

1889

"There is no just reason why manly men of any race should allow themselves to be continually outraged and oppressed by their equals."

Overview

"Organized Resistance Is Our Best Remedy" may not be one of John Edward Bruce's most recognized works, but it is considered his most militant. The speech, which was delivered to an all-black audience on October 5, 1889, in Washington, D.C., directly addresses the violence against African Americans that was rampant in the southern United States in the late nineteenth century. Bruce, a longtime journalist and black rights activist, took it upon himself to directly confront the issues of racial inequality and violence facing African Americans.

Bruce's "Organized Resistance" speech identifies aggression and force against African Americans as the white solution to the so-called Negro problem. He argues that the only way African Americans can combat southern white aggression is with organized resistance. The address was given in the fall of 1889 in the nation's capital, but little else is known about its origins. Bruce's speech stands alone as a work of confrontational oratory, calling upon those in the African American community to assert themselves and defend their basic human rights against the violence inflicted by whites in the South. "Organized Resistance Is Our Best Remedy" is part of a collection of Bruce's manuscripts housed at the New York Public Library's Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture.

Context

The end of the nineteenth century was a time of heightened racial tensions between blacks and whites, especially in the southern United States. Violence against African Americans was a daily occurrence, and the overwhelming tone of the time was for blacks to adopt an accommodationist philosophy, that is, to accept their fate as second-class citizens, learn to live with it, and find a way to fit into a white society. The four decades prior to 1889 set the stage for increased racial animosity and in turn paved the way for African American activists such as Bruce to empower the black community and promote racial pride.

By the middle of the nineteenth century, the United States was teetering on the brink of civil war. The Mexican-American War, fought between 1846 and 1848, had ended with the acquisition of a large amount of land by the United States. The North and the South clashed over whether the new land should outlaw slavery or allow it. Staunch opposition by the South to the exclusion of slavery in new territories led to the Compromise of 1850, which established something of a middle ground on the slavery issue and delayed the war between the states for another decade. The legislation bundled into the Compromise of 1850 allowed California to enter the Union as a free state and ended the slave trade in Washington, D.C. To pacify the South, however, the compromise left the decision on whether to allow slavery in the territory that would later become the states of New Mexico, Nevada, Arizona, and Utah to the people who lived there. Another attempt to appease the southern states was the passage of the Fugitive Slave Act as part of the Compromise of 1850. The Fugitive Slave Act required the return of runaway slaves to their owners and imposed stiff punishments on antislavery advocates who harbored or assisted fugitives.

In 1852 the white abolitionist Harriet Beecher Stowe published her controversial novel Uncle Tom's Cabin, which promoted abolitionist thought, primarily in the North, and angered supporters of slavery in the South. The book only increased tensions between the two regions, adding momentum to the conflict that would ultimately become the Civil War. Two years later, in May 1854, the Kansas-Nebraska Act was passed. Similar in spirit to parts of the Compromise of 1850, the act allowed popular sovereignty to determine whether or not a territory would allow the practice of slavery within its borders. Settlers flooded the territories to sway the vote, and violence ensued. The decision for Kansas to be admitted to the Union as a free state did not come easily. The North and antislavery supporters were desperate to keep slavery out of any new states, while the South was determined to expand slavery north of the 40th parallel (previously considered, by the repealed Missouri Compromise, a border that slavery could not cross). At least three elections took place to determine the fate of Kansas. The first election was won by proslavery supporters, but the election was considered fraudulent by antislavery advocates. Antislavery supporters called for another election, again with no viable

Time Line

1850

■ September
The Compromise of 1850 is passed in the hope of quelling tensions between the North and the South.

1852

■ Harriet Beecher Stowe publishes Uncle Tom's Cabin, an antislavery novel that helps bring the abolitionist movement to the forefront of American society.

1854

■ May 30
The Kansas-Nebraska Act is passed by Congress, allowing settlers to decide by popular vote if a territory is to allow slavery within its borders.

1856

■ February 22
John Edward Bruce is born to slave parents in Maryland.

1857

■ March 6
The decision in Dred Scott v. Sandford is handed down by the U.S. Supreme Court, stating that slaves are not citizens and therefore are not guaranteed any freedoms or protection under the Constitution.

1861

■ April 12
The first shots of the Civil War ring out over Fort Sumter at Charleston Harbor, South Carolina, signaling the start of a war that will have lasting effects on African American rights in the United States.

1865

■ January 31
The Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution is passed by Congress, outlawing slavery in the United States; however, it is not ratified by all the states until December 6.

■ April 9
The Civil War ends with Confederate general Robert E. Lee's surrender to General Ulysses S. Grant at Appomattox Court House, Virginia.

outcome as no proslavery supporters voted. Another election was called, ending much like the first; it was not until 1861 that an antislavery population became the majority in the territory, admitting Kansas as a free state. Nebraska would not be admitted into the Union as a free state until after the close of the Civil War. The Kansas-Nebraska Act exacerbated the increasingly growing split between the supporters of abolition and the proponents of slavery.

Throughout the mid-1800s the rights of African Americans were hazy at best. On March 6, 1857, the questionable status of blacks in the United States was clarified temporarily by U.S. Chief Justice Roger Taney's decision in the case of Dred Scott v. Sandford—a decision that served as a major setback for every person of color living in the United States at the time. Dred Scott was a slave who had traveled extensively with his owner and lived for nine years in free territory. Scott argued that his freedom was ensured throughout the country, even in slave states, after those nine years, based on the "once free, always free" philosophy. Much to the dismay of antislavery advocates throughout the nation, Taney declared that Scott had never been free and that he was not and never would be a citizen of the United States; thus, he had no protection under federal law. The opinion further stated that Congress did not have the power to outlaw slavery in newly acquired American territories.

It is important to note that Chief Justice Taney was a former slaveholder from Maryland and that five of the nine justices on the Supreme Court in 1857 were slave owners. Following Taney's decision, abolitionist sentiment swelled. Northerners questioned the validity of a decision handed down by a predominantly southern court said to represent the entire United States. The majority of Americans at the time lived in the northern states and territories, but the Supreme Court's decision makers hailed mainly from the South. Taney's opinion sparked public outcries against the Supreme Court and called into question the constitutionality of decisions made by a court that represented the interests of the minority in America at the time—the slaveholders. Many historians consider Dred Scott v. Sandford a pivotal case in race relations that virtually guaranteed the outbreak of the Civil War four years later.

The Civil War was among the bloodiest wars in American history, with enormous losses on both sides. In all, more than two hundred thousand soldiers died in combat; another four hundred thousand lost their lives to disease. The postwar South was devastated both by battle and by the realization that slavery was no longer an acceptable practice for the Union. Southern states that had originally seceded from the Union were required to create new state constitutions in order to qualify for readmission. The new constitutions mandated, among other things, clauses granting civil liberties to former slaves. John Edward Bruce made his "Organized Resistance Is Our Best Remedy" speech in 1889, nearly twenty-five years after the Civil War ended. By that time, the decision in Dred Scott v. Sandford had been overturned by the passage of the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution. The former, passed in 1865, made slavery illegal in the United States; the latter, ratified in 1868, guaranteed that any person born in the United States, regardless of color, was a natural American citizen whose rights could not be taken away—meaning that individual states in the South could no longer deny African Americans their freedom. Although the basic rights of freedom and citizenship seemed to be spelled out by these amendments, their impact was minimal.

The Reconstruction era, which lasted from the end of the war until 1877, brought several changes to the postwar South, including organizations such as the Freedmen's Bureau, with the intention of bettering the situation of formerly enslaved African Americans by providing basic necessities, health care, education, and work opportunities. Reconstruction was a relatively brief era in American history, and its conclusion was disastrous for African Americans, as it signaled the end of many social, political, and economic gains made by the black community. The presence of northern troops in the South after the Civil War was commonplace. It was the duty of Union troops to protect the rights of newly freed blacks and to suppress violence against blacks when local authorities failed to act.

In 1870 the Fifteenth Amendment was ratified, granting all men, regardless of race, the right to vote. Unfortunately, by the late 1890s states like Louisiana had created grandfather clauses that took away the voting rights of blacks who were not lineal descendants of men who had voting rights prior to 1867. The rights of blacks would experience another blow with the abolishment of the Freedmen's Bureau in 1872 and again five years later when federal troops began their withdrawal from the South. With the departure of northern troops, freed men and women no longer had federal protection of their civil rights or protection from race-motivated violence. With the exit of the last Union troops from the South, white supremacist leaders began their ruinous rise, taking over key political positions and influencing southern policies. It appeared as though the stigma of Dred Scott v. Sandford lingered in the South despite the passage of constitutional amendments to the contrary

The year 1877 ushered in the era of Jim Crow in the South, which would last until the 1960s. Jim Crow laws made up a discriminatory social code, backed up by legislation, through which blacks were deemed second-class citizens and racial segregation was considered necessary to maintain order. By the early 1880s documented violence against African Americans was becoming common, as Jim Crow laws were generally enforced by violence or the threat thereof by white authorities. Lynchings, burnings, and other random acts of terror were perpetrated against African Americans, and the number of these documented attacks increased into the twentieth century, with many more abuses never reported. It was against this backdrop of seemingly dashed hopes that John Edward Bruce gave his "Organized Resistance Is Our Best Remedy" speech. His goal was to rally African Americans toward self-defense and dispel the notion that people of color would always be second-class citizens in the United States.

Time Line

1868

■ July 9
The Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution declares anyone of any color born in the United States to be an American citizen; along with the Thirteenth Amendment, this reverses the decision in the Dred Scott case.

1889

■ October 5
Bruce gives his speech "Organized Resistance Is Our Best Remedy" in Washington, D.C.

1897

■ March 5
Bruce cofounds the American Negro Academy (ANA) to protest accommodationism.

1901

■ Bruce publishes The Blood Red Record: A Review of the Horrible Lynchings and Burning of Negroes by Civilized White Men in the United States.

1911

■ In his greatest and most lasting achievement, Bruce cofounds the Negro Society for Historical Research with Arthur Schomburg.

1916

■ The Jamaican activist Marcus Garvey moves to the United States and establishes the Back to Africa movement and the Universal Negro Improvement Association; Bruce soon becomes one of Garvey's closest followers.

1924

■ August 7
Bruce dies.

About the Author

John Edward Bruce was born a slave on a plantation in Piscataway, Maryland, on February 22, 1856. His parents, Martha and Robert Bruce, were both slaves, and Robert was sold off to another owner when John was just a toddler, leaving a void in his son's life. Young Bruce, his mother, and his brother remained in bondage until 1861, when they moved to Washington, D.C. His brother died shortly thereafter. Bruce and his mother then lived for a short time in Politicians forcing slavery down the throat of a Free-Soiler (Library of Congress)

Connecticut, where Bruce attended an integrated school for approximately two years. The two returned to Washington sometime between 1867 and 1868. Upon their return, Bruce attended the Free Library School and other schools funded by two post–Civil War agencies: the Freedman's Aid Society and the Freedmen's Bureau. While in Washington, Bruce took on odd jobs to help support his mother. He worked variously in a café, as a doorman, and as a utility worker for the father-in-law of the Union general Ulysses S. Grant. It was in Washington that Bruce first developed his hatred of racism and condemned those who failed to confront the problem directly.

In 1874 Bruce began his journalism career as a messenger at the Washington, D.C., bureau of the New York Times. A year later he published his first piece in Progressive American. Between 1879 and 1882, Bruce started up a number of newspapers, including the Argus Weekly, the Sunday Item, and the Republican. Throughout his fifty-year-long career as a journalist, he wrote for more than forty periodicals; he also served as editor of the Baltimore, Maryland–based newspaper the Commonwealth. The influential black civil rights activist and New York Globe editor Timothy Thomas Fortune gave him the nickname "Bruce Grit" because of the tenacity and courage displayed in his writings. The new pen name stuck, and as "Bruce Grit," Bruce contributed a regular column to Fortune's Globe and in 1887 became a special correspondent for a later incarnation of the Globe called the New York Age.

Throughout his adult life Bruce Grit used his writings to advance African American interests; he also joined organizations—the first Afro-American League, founded by Fortune in 1887, among them—that promoted the interests of black Americans. Unable to agree with the widely circulated stance of accommodation (a philosophy advocating patience with the very slow and gradual assimilation of free black Americans into the white world rather than overt resistance to racial oppression), Bruce often found himself in opposition to other leading African American activists of the time, including Booker T. Washington, the renowned black educator and founder of Alabama's Tuskegee Institute.

In the fall of 1889 Bruce delivered the speech "Organized Resistance Is Our Best Remedy" to an unknown audience in Washington, D.C. A little more than two decades later, in 1911, Bruce and his close friend Arthur Schomburg established the Negro Society for Historical Research in Bruce's New York home. Bruce and Schomburg's goal for the society was to promote African achievement and create an intellectual center for African Americans.

Bruce's belief and zeal in improving the lives of blacks led him to follow the ideas of the Jamaican-born black activist Marcus Garvey. Although he was at first apprehensive regarding Garvey's true motives for settling in the United States, Bruce was swayed by a 1919 speech Garvey gave in Harlem, a predominantly black section of New York City known for its vibrant literary, artistic, and intellectual atmosphere. Bruce be-

Essential Quotes

"Agitation is a good thing, organization is a better thing."

(Paragraph 1)

"The man who will not fight for the protection of his wife and children is a coward and deserves to be ill treated. The man who takes his life in his hand and stands up for what he knows to be right will always command the respect of his enemy."

(Paragraph 1)

"Submission to the dicta of the Southern bulldozers is the basest cowardice, and there is no just reason why manly men of any race should allow themselves to be continually outraged and oppressed by their equals before the law."

(Paragraph 2)

"The Negro must not be rash and indiscreet either in action or in words but he must be very determined and terribly in earnest, and of one mind to bring order out of chaos and to convince Southern rowdies and cutthroats that more than two can play at the game with which they have amused their fellow conspirators in crime for nearly a quarter of a century."

(Paragraph 4)

"Organized resistance to organized resistance is the best remedy for the solution of the vexed problem of the century."

(Paragraph 4)

came a part of the Garvey movement and later became known by Garveyites as the "Duke of Uganda." The title was given to Bruce by Garvey, who had referred to himself within his own movement as "President" and gave titles to those who were closest to the inner workings of the movement and those he felt made worthy contributions to furthering the black race. Garvey is probably best known for establishing the Back to Africa movement and founding the Universal Negro Improvement Association; Bruce aligned himself with both and remained an active supporter of Garvey until his death in 1924. Upon his death, the Universal Negro Improvement Association honored Bruce for his contributions to their cause by knighting him the Duke of Uganda. Bruce's funeral consisted of three ceremonies and was attended by over five thousand people, including Garvey, who gave the eulogy.

A militant African American journalist, Bruce left his mark on the literary world with his sharp, direct, and unapologetic writings and speeches on race in America. However, few people know about his speech titled "Organized Resistance Is Our Best Remedy"; it was delivered at an unspecified location in Washington, D.C., to what is believed to have been an all-black audience.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

The speech "Organized Resistance Is Our Best Remedy" is brief but powerful. Historians note that Bruce's ideas on the practice of self-defense by African Americans were well thought out and his vocabulary carefully chosen. Delivered on October 5, 1889, at an unknown venue in Washington, D.C., the speech directly identifies the problem of violence against African Americans by southern aggressors and encourages the black community to fight organized resistance with organized resistance. Bruce acknowledges that there is strength in numbers among African Americans and foresees tangible progress in the movement for self-defense under the proper leadership. After arguing that force is a justified method of defense under ancient law, Bruce concludes his speech with great sincerity, stepping back from his impassioned plea to his audience and closing instead with a simple appeal to their rational side: "I submit this view of the question, ladies and gentleman, for your careful consideration."

By this time in his journalistic career, Bruce was well aware of the influence he wielded in the African American community. In the opening of his "Organized Resistance" speech, he tries to prepare his audience for the bold and shocking nature of what he is about to propose. He explains that the use of force, or "organized resistance," is justified in light of the white response to the "Negro problem." The term Negro problem refers to the dehumanizing and degrading view of freed blacks as nothing more than an ongoing source of difficulty for whites—a view shared by many of the nation's southern whites after the Civil War. Antiblack sentiment festered among parts of the white population in the South, leading especially violent whites to "deal" with the "Negro problem" by launching unprovoked attacks on African Americans. Barbaric terrorist tactics such as burnings and lynchings were continually perpetrated against black Americans to keep them from asserting their rights as full citizens of the United States. Bruce would take on the subject of lynching in his book The Blood Red Record: A Review of the Horrible Lynchings and Burning of Negroes by Civilized White Men in the United States, published in 1901.

Bruce anticipates opposition to his ideas by the audience. He notes that slaves were trained to be submissive; consequently, they often gave in to oppression from their owners, hoping for the situation to resolve itself. To these people, Bruce argues that African Americans have already tried the patient approach, to no avail. He then unveils his plan of organized resistance based on the concept of strength in numbers, pointing out that there must be millions of African Americans across the South, some known by government record and some unknown, since the southern states did not keep careful records of the numbers of African Americans within their borders. If millions of African Americans could be brought together under strong, well-directed leadership, explains Bruce, then black organized force against white organized force would produce "most beneficial results" for African Americans.

Beginning with the end of the first paragraph, Bruce addresses any naysayers opposed to the idea of using force to assert the natural rights of African Americans. Using language that almost chastises those who would fail to stand tall against their southern white aggressors, he states that those who are not willing to fight for their families are "cowards" who deserve harsh treatment. Bruce then appeals to the pride and honor of the men to whom he is speaking, stating that those who are willing to risk their lives for their beliefs will undoubtedly be respected. Bruce is calling upon blacks to stand united against southern hostilities, to risk death for their natural rights, and to bravely oppose their aggressors. This position is in direct defiance to the accommodationist stance taken by other African American activists of the time, most notably Booker T. Washington. Bruce is promoting aggressive action to achieve racial respect, rather than the widely circulated notion of merely accepting the circumstances that African Americans were forced to live with at this point in history.

The following two shorter paragraphs continue to provide justification for organized force as the only remaining option for African Americans. Bruce refers to the perpetrators of white oppression as "bulldozers" who use their self-proclaimed edicts to mow down people of color. He asserts that the very idea of African Americans being intimidated by southern attempts at coercion are ludicrous and reminds the audience that blacks and whites are equals under the law. The speech takes on a religious tone when Bruce states that "salvation" will be found only when African Americans come to terms with the idea of resistance. He notes that prospective leaders of the organized resistance must be "wise and discreet" and refers to the body of African Americans as one person, most likely to emphasize the unity inherent in an organized resistance movement.

In the last paragraph of the speech, Bruce gives his most tangible advice on implementing the call for resistance and provokes the audience with a plea for immediacy. Once again he emphasizes that African Americans must think and act as one in order to accomplish this most serious task of organized force. He also refers to the white antagonists in the speech as "rowdies and cutthroats." There is no doubt that these adjectives were chosen specifically to incite fury and disdain among the members of the audience, especially those who had been directly affected by white brutality. Bruce empowers his listeners by arguing that an organized African American resistance would be a formidable opponent to southern white aggressors who resort to terror and violence against law-abiding blacks.

Bruce includes additional justification in this last paragraph for the use of force against force. He cites the precedent of the biblical law of retribution, "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth," stating that these laws were used in similar circumstances throughout history. It is at this point in the speech that Bruce's militant ideals become undeniable. According to Bruce, African Americans should demand equal justice for every wrong southern whites inflict upon them. The speech reaches its climax when he asserts that his formula for resistance will no doubt result in some bloodshed. Bruce then concludes "Organized Resistance Is Our Best Remedy" by asking his audience to carefully consider his proposition.

Audience

Bruce's speech was delivered to an unidentified audience—most likely all African American and predominantly male—at an undisclosed meeting place in the nation's capital. In keeping with the majority of his writings, the speech was geared solely toward the black community in an effort to discourage their acceptance of accommodationist thought. It is likely that some members of the audience were former slaves who had been inculcated with the notion that they would never be able to reach social equality with whites and instead should be content to be tolerated by the white world. Bruce's message was that oppression and violence against African Americans could no longer be tolerated in the United States and that it was up to the black community to assert itself through organized resistance against southern whites.

Impact

Bruce's speech did not have a direct or immediate documented impact at the time it was delivered; however, it stands as a testament to the fearlessness the speaker exemplified in his pursuit of African American interests. He did not cower at the notion of resistance against brutality; rather, he brought the reality of white oppression and violence against African Americans to the fore. Shortly after this speech, Bruce published The Blood Red Record, a pamphlet providing detailed accounts of brutality against African Americans, including names of lynching victims and the methods of violence used against them. Some historians argue that Bruce's writings were overlooked because he did not write for the white community; his works, it has been noted, had "little to do with white history." This is quite evident in Bruce's speech: He clearly addresses the issue of violence against African Americans, but he acknowledges the "white" southerner only at the very end of his speech. By minimizing the use of the word white and making the role of the white southerner secondary, Bruce does indeed keep his speech out of "white history." His revolutionary call to resistance can be viewed as an inspiration to future black activists and as a precursor to the civil rights movement that began in the United States in the mid-1950s.

See also Slavery Clauses in the U.S. Constitution (1787); Fugitive Slave Act of 1850; Dred Scott v. Sandford (1857); Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1865); Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1868); Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1870).

Further Reading

■ Books

Foner, Philip S., and Robert J. Branham, eds. Lift Every Voice: African American Oratory, 1787–1900. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1998.

Gilbert, Peter. The Selected Writings of John Edward Bruce: Militant Black Journalist. New York: Arno Press, 1971.

Seraile, William. Bruce Grit: The Black Nationalist Writings of John Edward Bruce. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 2003.

■ Web Sites

"Compromise of 1850." National Archives "Our Documents" Web site. http://www.ourdocuments.gov/doc.php?doc=27.

Questions for Further Study

1. Compare Bruce's proposals with the outlooks expressed by other African American writers of this era, such as Booker T. Washington, T. Thomas Fortune, John L. Moore, and, at the turn of the twentieth century, W. E. B. Du Bois.

2. Compare this document with the entry titled Ku Klux Klan Act. In what ways does the latter document reinforce Bruce's views?

3. In what ways did Bruce's speech foreshadow black militancy and the Black Power movement of the 1960s and 1970s (as represented, for example, by Stokely Carmichael's speech on Black Power at Berkeley or Eldridge Cleaver's "Education and Revolution")? What goals and methods did the movement share with Bruce?

"Dred Scott v. Sanford (1857)." National Archives "Our Documents" Web site.
http://www.ourdocuments.gov/doc.php?flash=false&doc=29.

"Kansas-Nebraska Act." National Archives "Our Documents" Web site.
http://www.ourdocuments.gov/doc.php?flash=false&doc=28.

—Kimberly R. Cook

Document Text

John Edward Bruce's "Organized Resistance Is Our Best Remedy"

I fully realize the delicacy of the position I occupy in this discussion and know too well that those who are to follow me will largely benefit by what I shall have to say in respect to the application of force as one of the means to the solution of the problem known as the Negro problem. I am not unmindful of that fact that there are those living who have faith in the efficacy of submission, who are impregnated with the slavish fear which had its origin in oppression and the peculiar environments of the slave period. Those who are thus minded will advise a pacific policy in order, as they believe, to effect a settlement of this question, with which the statesmanship of a century has grappled without any particularly gratifying results. Agitation is a good thing, organization is a better thing. The million Negro voters of Georgia, and the undiscovered millions in other Southern states—undiscovered so far as our knowledge of their number exists—could with proper organization and intelligent leadership meet force with force with most beneficial results. The issue upon us cannot be misunderstood by those who are watching current events.… The man who will not fight for the protection of his wife and children is a coward and deserves to be ill treated. The man who takes his life in his hand and stands up for what he knows to be right will always command the respect of his enemy.

Submission to the dicta of the Southern bulldozers is the basest cowardice, and there is no just reason why manly men of any race should allow themselves to be continually outraged and oppressed by their equals before the law.…

Under the present conditions of affairs the only hope, the only salvation for the Negro is to be found in a resort to force under wise and discreet leaders. He must sooner or later come to this in order to set at rest for all time to come the charge that he is a moral coward ….

The Negro must not be rash and indiscreet either in action or in words but he must be very determined and terribly in earnest, and of one mind to bring order out of chaos and to convince Southern rowdies and cutthroats that more than two can play at the game with which they have amused their fellow conspirators in crime for nearly a quarter of a century. Under the Mosaic dispensation it was the custom to require an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth under no less barbarous civilization than that which existed at that period of the world's history; let the Negro require at the hands of every white murderer in the South or elsewhere a life for a life. If they burn our houses, burn theirs, if they kill our wives and children, kill theirs, pursue them relentlessly, meet force with force everywhere it is offered. If they demand blood, exchange it with them, until they are satiated. By a vigorous adherence to this course the shedding of human blood by white men will soon become a thing of the past. Wherever and whenever the Negro shows himself to be a man he can always command the respect even of a cutthroat. Organized resistance to organized resistance is the best remedy for the solution of the vexed problem of the century, which to me seems practical and feasible, and I submit this view of the question, ladies and gentleman, for your careful consideration.

Glossary

Mosaic dispensation	the law of Moses

A caricature of Henry Cabot Lodge as a hedgehog with swords and bayonets labeled "U.S." replacing some of his bristles. (Library of Congress)

John L. Moore's "In the Lion's Mouth"

1891

"We want protection at the ballot box, so that the laboring man may have an equal showing."

Overview

A letter to the editor written by the Reverend John L. Moore of the Colored Farmers' National Alliance and Cooperative Union appeared in the National Economist newspaper, published in Washington, D.C., on March 7, 1891. It was reprinted from a newspaper in Jacksonville, Florida, that had featured an attack on leaders of the Colored Farmers' National Alliance for its support of the Lodge election bill—a proposed congressional bill that would provide for the federal supervision of elections in the South. Moore's letter is a testament to independent black leadership in the South during the post-Reconstruction period, a period often portrayed as a time of political inaction among southern African Americans. The letter, referred to here as "In the Lion's Mouth" (usually noted as simply "Moore's letter" in documents), is in reference to a metaphor used by Moore in which he saw African Americans and white independents increasingly placing themselves in a politically vulnerable situation by allowing professional politicians to represent their interests instead of fielding candidates of their own.

On June 26, 1890, the U.S. representative Henry Cabot Lodge of Massachusetts had introduced into Congress a federal elections bill that detractors quickly called the "force bill." Lodge's proposed legislation would allow federal authorities to oversee national elections if, in a district with at least five hundred people, fifty people signed a petition attesting to electoral fraud—such as tampering of ballot boxes, deliberately miscounting votes, or adding the votes of fictitious persons—all strategies regularly employed by officials to favor Democratic outcomes. Although the legislation technically applied only to federal elections, the bill would have also impinged upon state and local election practices. Given the history of Reconstruction in the South—in particular the strong federal control that white southerners felt they had been subjected to during that period of political and social recovery from the Civil War—the Lodge bill ignited fierce opposition among southern white Democrats, those most threatened by such federal supervision. Political opposition to the proposed bill included the Jacksonville newspaper editor to whom Moore addressed his letter. The House of Representatives passed the bill on July 2, 1890, but Democrats in the U.S. Senate, along with eight Republicans, would wind up defeating it the following year.

Context

The end of Reconstruction in 1877, marked by the withdrawal of a federal military presence in the South, saw black and white Republican legislators and officeholders systematically, sometimes brutally removed from office by white Democrats who sought to "redeem" the South from Republican authority. These "Redeemers," as they came to be known, also terrorized local black populations through paramilitary organizations such as the White Leagues and the Red Shirts, which served as adjuncts of the Democratic Party. Led by white planters, Democrats took office and reasserted their antebellum privileges and prerogatives. They would do so as the "Southern Democracy"—the network of courts, militias, sheriffs, and newspapers supporting redemption. Helping to ensure their control over black labor and much of the southern political economy was the system of sharecropping, a new economic arrangement in the region. Under this system, sharecroppers owed a share of their crop to landlords after each harvest, although cash rents were sometimes collected; in practice, the system led to debt peonage, de facto forced labor owing to the exorbitant interest rates applied to loans made by landowners to sharecroppers and tenants.

African Americans in the South would respond to their economic plight in various ways. Some sought to migrate to the West in search of new opportunities, while others attempted to fight back politically. Between 1886 and 1900—within a decade following the end of Reconstruction and before the consolidation of Jim Crow laws, which disenfranchised and segregated African Americans—tens of thousands of black farmers, sharecroppers, and agrarian workers mobilized to action. They demanded higher wages, debt relief, government regulation of railroads, a farmer subsidy program, the protection of civil and political rights, and electoral reform. The movement grew out

Time Line

1877

- Reconstruction ends with the removal from the South of the last federal troops stationed to enforce the era's legislation.

1883

- The Civil Rights Act of 1875, which guaranteed equal treatment in public accommodations, is ruled unconstitutional by the U.S. Supreme Court.

1886

- The Colored Farmers' National Alliance and Cooperative Union is formed in Houston County, Texas.

1890

- Several prolabor and profarmer Populist-oriented parties are established in the nation to compete against one or both of the major parties.
- July 2
  The Lodge election bill is passed in the House of Representatives.

1891

- January
  The Lodge bill is defeated in the Senate after a southern Democratic filibuster.
- March 7
  The National Economist reprints a letter from the Reverend John L. Moore to the editor of a newspaper in Jacksonville, Florida, in which he responds to criticisms of the Colored Farmers' National; Alliance for its support of federal oversight of national elections.

1892

- November
  In the presidential election, the People's (or Populist) Party candidate James B. Weaver receives over one million votes.

1894

- A Republican-Populist coalition wins control of the North Carolina state legislature.

of established networks of black benevolent associations, fraternal orders, and churches that served as centers for the recruitment, education, and leadership training of African Americans in the years following Reconstruction. Black Populism—a broad-based independent political movement that took shape to combat Jim Crow—gained more definitive organizational form with the creation of various mutual aid societies and labor unions, including the Colored Agricultural Wheels, the Knights of Labor, the Cooperative Workers of America, the Farmers Union, and the Colored Farmers' National Alliance.

In 1890 the movement began to shift toward the electoral arena as it became clear that electoral action was necessary to make the policy changes that were sought. African Americans helped to establish and then grow the People's (or Populist) Party in coalition with white independents in order to challenge Democratic Party domination in the South. African Americans also ran insurgent and independent candidates for office and participated in "fusion" campaigns with the Republican Party, whereby two parties would share a slate of candidates. Most African Americans were loyal to the Republican Party at this time; it was Abraham Lincoln's party, the party of emancipation. Some candidates backed by Black Populists won; certain concessions and reforms were even briefly put into place, including election reforms and greater funding for public education, as in North Carolina and eastern Texas.

Lodge, a conservative northern Republican, saw federal election oversight as a way for Republicans to compete more effectively against Democrats in the South. Leaders of the Colored Farmers' National Alliance saw the bill as an important way for African Americans to regain a political voice in the South. The National Economist, interested in disseminating reform-oriented press by republishing articles that appeared in newspapers with smaller circulations or by highlighting certain articles, would help spread one among these black leaders' views on the importance of the bill.

About the Author

The Reverend John L. Moore was an African Methodist Episcopal minister from Crescent City, in Putnam County, northern Florida. While Moore's date of birth is unknown, he states in his letter to the editor that he had lived in various parts of the South since 1863. He may have come from the North as a young man as part of Union army efforts to defeat the Confederacy during the Civil War. Moore may have been named after the American Revolutionary War veteran John Moore, who served as skipper of the sloop Roebuck. The skipper famously struck a British officer for insolent treatment and, as a result, served an eighteen-month prison sentence. The Black Populist Moore may have captured some of this same rebellious spirit in his letter.

Moore eventually settled in Crescent City, about sixty miles south of Jacksonville, where his letter first appeared. Crescent

City is notable for being the birthplace of the well-known black labor organizer and civil rights leader A. Philip Randolph, founder of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters—the first African American union chartered by the American Federation of Labor. Given the small size of the Crescent City black community, it is likely that Moore personally knew Randolph's parents and extended family. According to census records, there were 554 people living in Crescent City in 1890. Of the city's total population, over one-third, or approximately 190 people, were African American.

Like other key black leaders of the era, Moore cultivated his skills as an organizer, orator, and writer via the black church. Southern black churches not only served as seedbeds of African American political activity from the antebellum era through Reconstruction but also provided much of the organizational impetus and leadership training in political movements thereafter. In his time, Moore was joined by a number of other black ministers in the Black Populist movement, including the Reverends Walter A. Pattillo of North Carolina, Henry S. Doyle of Georgia, and John B. Rayner of Texas. Moore thus formed part of a post-Reconstruction black leadership that continued the struggle for black civil and political rights that had begun with the dispersion of Africans to North America since the early seventeenth century.

Moore was elected superintendent of the Putnam County Colored Farmers' Alliance in 1889, became a member of the Florida People's Party statewide executive committee, and served as a national delegate to the series of conventions leading up to the formation of the national People's Party in July 1892. As late as 1899, Moore served as secretary of the African Methodist Episcopal Church's conference held in Orlando, Florida. His political activities following the collapse of Black Populism and the advent of Jim Crow are unknown.

Time Line

1896	■ May 18 The U.S. Supreme Court ruling in Plessy v. Ferguson establishes the "separate but equal" doctrine.
1898	■ November 10 In the Wilmington Insurrection, the North Carolina legislature is overtaken by white supremacist Democrats; other attacks of blacks by whites follow.
1900	■ Jim Crow policies are put into effect across much of the South to legally disfranchise and segregate African Americans.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

In this letter to the editor, Moore expresses his indignation at an electoral process in the South so fraudulent that federal supervision of elections is necessary. The proposed Lodge bill strongly united African Americans—black leaders of the Colored Farmers' National Alliance in particular—in opposition to southern Democrats, who largely controlled the electoral process in the region.

♦ Paragraph 1

Moore rejects the idea that the Colored Farmers' National Alliance (known as the "black Alliance") is seeking to perpetuate national "Republican rule"; rather, he emphasizes the need for election supervision across the nation. Moore uses an example provided by the national executive committee member Alonzo Wardall of the South Dakota white-led Southern Farmers' Alliance (termed the "white Alliance"). Wardall reported to the Colored Farmers' National Alliance at the separate meetings of black and white Alliances held in Ocala, Florida, in December 1890 on the kinds of election fraud taking place in his Republican-majority state. If the Republicans, Moore suggests, were willing to carry out such egregious forms of vote miscounting in South Dakota with the advent of the People's Party (an excess of ten thousand votes counted in favor of Republicans over the number of people actually registered in the state), what kind of fraud would the Democratic Party commit in the South? Moore notes specific kinds of election manipulation already used by Democrats in the South, including the refusal by party-appointed election registrars to permit the inspection of ballot boxes and the notorious "eight-ballot box system," which required separately marked ballot boxes at the polls for each office. The eight-box law was designed to induce illiterate voters to cast their ballots incorrectly, thereby providing a legal pretext for invalidating many black votes.

Moore goes on to challenge the idea that federal supervision would not benefit African Americans. While he makes clear that the proposed bill is "not satisfactory to us throughout as it reads," he also asserts that black leaders are seeking "something guaranteeing every man a free vote and an honest count." Alliance delegates unanimously supported the bill at their Ocala conference. Meanwhile, Southern Farmers' Alliance delegates went on record strongly opposing the proposed bill. It was ultimately defeated in the Senate in January 1891.

♦ Paragraph 2

Moore raises an objection to the characterization that the Colored Farmers' National Alliance's support for the Lodge bill is an instance of their "antagonizing the races"—that is, creating animosity between black and white people. Here Moore turns the tables on white newspaper editors and accuses them of not speaking out against the provocative actions of southern white people who seek to create discord among black and white people: "I never hear you, Mr.

Thomas E. Watson of Georgia (Library of Congress)

Editor, nor any of the other leading journals, once criticise their action." Contrary to the accusation that he and other black leaders were provoking discord, Moore had actually been making overtures to white alliance delegates on the basis of shared economic concerns. As the minister notes, "We are aware of the fact that the laboring colored man's interests and the laboring white man's interests are one and the same." Black and white farmers shared concerns over high interest rates and transportation costs, while black and white agrarian laborers shared concerns over low wages.

The theme of shared economic interests between black and white southerners expressed by Colored Farmers' National Alliance leaders such as Moore prefigured the famous statement made by the white Georgia Populist Thomas E. Watson regarding the shared plight of black and white farmers. In October 1892 Watson would publish in the progressive monthly Arena an article titled "The Negro Question in the South," in which he declared, "You are kept apart that you may be separately fleeced of your earnings. You are made to hate each other because upon that hatred is rested the keystone of the arch of financial despotism which enslaves you both."

Making note of the significant number of African Americans who constitute the nation's workforce, especially those involved in "agricultural pursuits," Moore offers an independent political perspective, one which is distinctly nonpartisan: Black Populists will vote for whoever will advance the interests of farmers and laborers, be they Republicans, Democrats, or People's Party candidates. He offers here a substantially nuanced view of black political intent and action, one which runs counter to the notion that African Americans solely supported Republican candidates. It is a more tactically sophisticated view than the one presupposed of African Americans reflexively following the Republican Party.

♦ Paragraph 3

In this paragraph Moore locates the contemporary struggles of African Americans within the larger historical framework. He notes the long struggle for black liberation, reminding his readers that Africans were initially brought to North America as slaves in the early seventeenth century, but is careful not to speak of violent forms of resistance to slavery. Instead, he uses more passive language and phrasing, stating, for instance, how four million African Americans were freed from the "yoke of bondage" by 1865, and discusses the ways in which black men and women cared for white southerners during the course of the Civil War. His emphasis is on African Americans' seeking or exercising their rights as citizens, and he takes a jab at those who labeled African Americans who asserted their rights during Reconstruction "desperadoes"—that is, criminals.

While Moore states that Reconstruction was a failure, he does so not merely for pragmatic purposes—to appeal to delicate southern white sensibilities—but to make the point that in Reconstruction's wake African Americans have become fully capable of the duties and responsibilities that come with rights such as to vote and to hold public office. In other words, Moore is not just appealing to white readers by calling Reconstruction a failure; he is pointing to the subsequent progress made by African Americans through black churches and education toward the end of creating an independent citizenry. He underscores the fact that "political advantages"—such as the privilege to vote—count for little "where the ballot is unprotected." In making this last point, he demonstrates the often fine line southern black leaders had to navigate between two very different worlds: one black and poor, the other white and rich.

♦ Paragraph 4

Moore's reference to Governor Benjamin Tillman of South Carolina speaks to the often contradictory position that black leaders of the Colored Farmers' National Alliance faced in dealing with political forces in the South. Although Tillman was an open opponent of black political rights—having himself led physical attacks on African Americans during Reconstruction—he nevertheless publicly spoke out against the lynching of African Americans in 1890. For this public condemnation of lynching, the Colored Farmers' National Alliance in South Carolina endorsed his gubernatorial candidacy, even as they sought other electoral options. Tillman won the election that year with the black Alliance's support; for a time, the governor even used his authority to curb lynching. However, as Moore notes, Tillman also spoke of the "natural and inevitable" nature of white supremacist violence.

Almost as a way of assuaging white fears of potential black interest in social equality, Moore makes plain that "we are not clamoring for social relations with the whites either. We do not want to eat at their tables, sleep in their beds, neither ride in the cars with them; but we do want as good fare as the whites receive for the same consideration." In other words, the minister, reflecting the wider views of Black Populists, sought political equality while leaving social equality aside.

Moore proceeds to present the words of the Missouri white Alliance leader R. M. Hawley to articulate the shared position between the Colored Farmers' National Alliance and the midwestern white Alliance on issues of election reform. The abolishment of party primaries was viewed as a key way of ridding "politics of party strife and all its concomitant evils" in order to "let in the clear light of the science of economical government." The language highlights the need to move toward a more transparent system of elections, one that not only accurately represents voters' interests but also poses a more efficient way of governing. For Moore, "non-partisanism"—where neither "party favorites" are protected nor "secret caucuses by members of Congress or members of the legislatures" permitted—was, in essence, the "natural" goal.

♦ Paragraph 5

Moore's religious outlook explicitly fuses with political commentary in the penultimate paragraph of his letter with his metaphor of "the lion's mouth." The reference is a biblical one, to the pastoral epistles. These epistles are addressed to the disciples and helpers of Paul, in this case, Timothy. The passage in question (2 Timothy 4:17–18) deals with the running of the Christian church and the care of the religion's faithful. Here, Paul conveys to Timothy that one should hold firmly to one's faith in order to endure suffering—to be "rescued from the lion's mouth" by the Lord.

While the metaphor Moore uses is directed at the Southern Farmers' Alliance's intransigence—specifically, their allowing exiting politicians to speak on behalf of the alliances (a form of political co-optation on the part of the major parties)—he is also warning of what could happen if reformers do not carve out a more independent political path. By conceding further to the Democratic Party in the South, in particular, Moore suggests, political reformers and their vision of a more democratic electoral process are likely to be destroyed.

♦ Paragraph 6

The final paragraph is a call for unity with those white Alliance members who may be open to working in political cooperation with Black Populists. Moore notes the numeric strength of the Colored Farmers' National Alliance in the South and its potential force at the ballot box should it be joined with the votes of white independents. Moore's tone turns decidedly reconciliatory here as he writes, "We are willing and ready to lay down the past." He ends by invoking a sweeping image of political reform for those across not only the South but the North and West as well. For Moore, at stake is nothing short of a more participatory and representative electoral process in the South and in the nation as a whole. Only with such an open and equitable system can African Americans ultimately enjoy the achievement of "equal rights to all and special privileges to none"—that is, not only as a motto but, indeed, as a reality.

Henry Cabot Lodge (Library of Congress)

Audience

Moore's letter to the editor reached both black and white reading and listening audiences (as newspapers were often read aloud in both black and white communities for the benefit of the illiterate). The letter was circulated first through the Jacksonville newspaper in which it originally appeared and then through the more widely circulating National Economist, which variously featured articles written by Black Populist leaders. Sections of the letter were then picked up by other publications, including in book form, as in the chapter "The Race Problem" by J. H. Turner, the national secretary and treasurer of the National Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union, in The Farmers' Alliance History and Agricultural Digest, edited by Nelson A. Dunning. It is likely that parts of Moore's letter were also published in one or more of the Colored Farmers' Alliance's newspapers, including the Texas National Alliance, the South Carolina Alliance Light, or the North Carolina Alliance Advocate. However, none of these local papers has survived.

Essential Quotes

"In all the discussions of the whites … I never hear you, Mr. Editor, nor any of the other leading journals, once criticise their action or say they are antagonizing the races …. But let the negro speak once, and what do we hear? Antagonizing races, negro uprising, negro domination, etc. Anything to keep the reading public hostile toward the negro."

(Paragraph 2)

"As members of the Colored Farmers Alliance we avowed that we were going to vote with and for the man or party that will secure for the farmer or laboring man his just rights.… We want protection at the ballot box, so that the laboring man may have an equal showing.… We are aware of the fact that the laboring colored man's interests and the laboring white man's interests are one and the same."

(Paragraph 2)

"I for one have fully decided to vote with and work for that party, or those who favor the workingmen, let them belong to the Democratic or Republican, or the People's party. I know I speak the sentiment of that convention, representing as we do one-fifth of the laborers of this country, seven-eighths of our race in this country being engaged in agricultural pursuits."

(Paragraph 2)

"We know and you know that neither of the now existing parties is going to legislate in the interest of the farmers or laboring men except so far as it does not conflict with their interest to do so."

(Paragraph 2)

"The action of the Alliance in this reminds me of the man who first put his hand in the lion's mouth and the lion finally bit it off; and then he changed to make the matter better and put his head in the lion's mouth, and, therefore, lost his head. Now, the farmers and laboring men … lost their hands, so to speak; now organized in one body or head, if they give themselves over to the same power that took their hand, it will likewise take their head."

(Paragraph 5)

Impact

While it is unclear the extent to which Moore's letter had an impact on political circumstances at the time, his letter is an indication of the kind of forthright support that existed among African Americans for the Lodge bill. The Colored Farmers' National Alliance's support for the bill may have swayed some northern white Alliance members to lend their endorsement to the bill, while it likely antagonized southern white Alliance members further, as the latter came out strongly against endorsing the bill. Outside black and white Alliance circles, the letter may be best seen as one among a number of voices for and against the notion of federal supervision of elections in the South. Not until the Voting Rights Act of 1965 would such a federal measure be enacted.

Moore's letter demonstrates how African Americans demanded civil and political rights in the decades following the collapse of Reconstruction; it also shows the ways in which Black Populists reached out to their white counterparts based on mutual economic and political interests to carve out an independent political course of action. In the final decade of the nineteenth century, by voting for third-party candidates or insurgent candidates or by supporting individual independent candidates, Black Populists challenged political convention, which looked at African Americans in the South as passive bystanders or victims of white men (either white Democrats or white independents) struggling among themselves to gain or retain power in the region.

Moore's letter to the editor was expressive of, if not a key factor in, African Americans' continuing to build a movement of their own—that is, one separate yet tactically connected to the white-led Populist movement. Moore was among several leading Black Populists, including Pattillo of North Carolina, Doyle of Georgia, Rayner of Texas, and William H. Warwick of Virginia, who figured prominently in establishing and helping to advance an independent political strategy. The concept of a national people's party had been forged at a meeting of black and white Alliances in St. Louis in December 1889. A series of national meetings followed over the next two and a half years, which included a number of reform-oriented and labor organizations. Meetings, most of which were attended by Moore, were held in Ocala in December 1890 as well as in Washington, D.C., in January 1891; Cincinnati, Ohio, in May 1891; and St. Louis again in February 1892. The series culminated in a national nominating convention for the newly established People's Party held in Omaha, Nebraska, on July 4, 1892.

Although historians have tended to view African Americans as a subcomponent of the white-led Populist movement of the same era, there is increasing consensus that black leaders formed their own movement, with its own organizations, particular tactics, and leadership, coming out of the experiences of African Americans in postemancipation society. However, by the late 1890s, and mostly under Democratic-led attacks—from propaganda campaigns that warned of "negro domination," as noted in Moore's letter to the editor, to outright physical attacks on and murder of black leaders—Black Populism would collapse. Among scholars of Populism, Moore's letter to the editor was initially seen (if at all) as an instance of African Americans' complaining about their mistreatment, albeit with an eye toward alliance making; it is now more readily seen as a letter that establishes the extent to which black leaders asserted their own independent voices in promoting the interests of African Americans in the South.

See also Plessy v. Ferguson (1896).

Questions for Further Study

1. Why were southern Democrats so vehemently opposed to the election bill introduced by Henry Cabot Lodge?

2. Summarize the conflict between Democrats and Republicans in the post-Reconstruction era. What impact did this conflict have on African Americans?

3. How did African Americans respond to the economic difficulties they faced in the post-Reconstruction era? What specific actions did they take? What role did the Colored Farmers' National Alliance play in fostering African American aspirations?

4. Moore wrote: "We are aware of the fact that the laboring colored man's interests and the laboring white man's interests are one and the same." To what extent is this view similar to that expressed by T. Thomas Fortune in "The Present Relations of Labor and Capital" (1886)? Do the views of the two writers differ in any significant ways?

5. Why did the Colored Farmers' National Alliance support the candidacy of Benjamin Tillman as governor of South Carolina despite Tillman's open racism?

Further Reading

■ Articles

Abramowitz, Jack. "The Negro in the Populist Movement." Journal of Negro History 38, no. 3 (July 1953): 257–289.

Watson, Thomas E. "The Negro Question in the South." Arena 6 (October 1892): 540–550.

■ Books

Ali, Omar H. In the Lion's Mouth: Black Populism in the New South, 1886–1900. (In press)

Gaither, Gerald H. Blacks and the Populist Movement: Ballots and Bigotry in the New South. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 2005.

Humphrey, Richard M. "History of the Colored Farmers' National Alliance and Co operative Union." In The Farmers' Alliance History and Agricultural Digest, ed. Nelson A. Dunning. Washington, D.C.: Alliance Publishing Co., 1891.

Postel, Charles. The Populist Vision. New York: Oxford University Press, 2007.

■ Web Sites

"Black Populism in the New South." Towson University Web site. http://pages.towson.edu/oali/black_populism_in_the_new_south.htm.

—Omar H. Ali

Document Text

John L. Moore's "In the Lion's Mouth"

March 7, 1891

Upon perusing said article I found it to be an attack upon the National Colored Farmers Alliance and Co-operative Union on their action while in session at Ocala, Fla., in passing resolutions asking Congress to pass the federal election bill now pending before the Senate of the United States. Now, as I was a member of that body, and you have taken us to task because of our action, I hereby reply and only ask that you will do me the kindness of publishing my reply, as it may be the means of you and others seeing us just as we are. I notice you, as others, call it the force bill, and you remarked, "How the force bill could benefit the negro even in the slightest degree passes comprehension. All its advocates expect of it is to help perpetuate Republican rule in this country." I can say you or any one else are sadly mistaken if you think the object of the National Colored Farmers Alliance was to perpetuate Republican rule in this country if that rule is to be as it has been in this county for several years. But our object was to have protection of the ballot boxes, because none sees the need of reform more than we do. How is that reform to be brought about while the present parties have control of the ballot boxes (unless it comes through the now existing parties, which is not likely if their past history argues anything)? The Hon. Alonzo Wardall, of Huron, South Dakota, informed us while at Ocala, that in his State the Republicans were 22,000 majority, but when the independent party sprang up and votes were counted at the last election there were 10,000 more votes than registered voters, which, of course, called for a contest, and when a contest comes up under those circumstances those who are in sympathy with their kind, and the other fellows must stay out. That was in a State largely Republican; and should the reformist begin to operate in our own sunny land of flowers, or in any State that can boast of her Democratic fidelity, they would meet with the eight-ballot box system and tickets spread on top at their proper places for the Democratic voters, and the other fellows would have to do the best they could; and if they voted right they would not be allowed a chance as inspectors at the ballot box, and the result would be increased Democratic majorities. And while the federal election bill is not satisfactory to us throughout as it reads, yet we want something guaranteeing every man a free vote and an honest count. The federal election bill being the only thing that ever emanated from our halls of legislation that pointed in that direction, we, in body assembled as representatives of our race, asked Congress to pass it.

In all the discussions of the whites in all the various meetings they attend and the different resolutions, remarks and speeches they make against the negro, I never hear you, Mr. Editor, nor any of the other leading journals, once criticise their action or say they are antagonizing the races, neither do you ever call a halt. But let the negro speak once, and what do we hear? Antagonizing races, negro uprising, negro domination, etc. Anything to keep the reading public hostile toward the negro, not allowing him the privilege to speak his opinion, and if that opinion be wrong show him by argument, and not at once make it a race issue. As to the race question, I do not care a fig. I work and attend to my own business. I desire, with the rest of my race who do the same, to have some rule to go upon (and I am quite colored), which is something many of my white brethren can not say, to which my race can easily testify from the number of tramps of the dominant race that frequent our doors. I can not say if many of the Republican members of Congress may be expecting to perpetuate their rule; we do not know; but as members of the Colored Farmers Alliance we avowed that we were going to vote with and for the man or party that will secure for the farmer or laboring man his just rights and privileges, and in order that he may enjoy them without experiencing a burden. We want protection at the ballot box, so that the laboring man may have an equal showing, and the various labor organizations to secure their just rights, we will join hands with them irrespective of party, "and those fellows will have to walk." We are aware of the fact that the laboring colored man's interests and the laboring white man's interests are one and the same. Especially is this true at the South. Anything that can be brought about to benefit the workingman, will also benefit the negro more than any other legislation that can be enacted. The Democratic party may get in power; the negroes may all vote with them; they may mete out to them offices according to representation (which I know they would not do). The educated and better living among the colored class would not only get favors (this would be right, as an ignoramus, white or black, has no business with an office). The majority would not be benefited. Or, if the Republican party remains in power and should come to do the same (which they never have, and I know never will do), the result would be the same. So I for one have fully decided to vote with and work for that party, or those who favor the workingmen, let them belong to the Democratic or Republican, or the People's party. I know I speak the sentiment of that convention, representing as we do one-fifth of the laborers of this country, seven-eighths of our race in this country being engaged in agricultural pursuits. Can you wonder why we have turned our attention from the few pitful offices a few of our members could secure, and turned our attention toward benefiting the mass of our race, and why we are willing to join our forces with those who are willing to legislate that this mass may be benefited? And we ask Congress to protect the ballot-box, so they may be justly dealt with in their effort to gain that power. We know and you know that neither of the now existing parties is going to legislate in the interest of the farmers or laboring men except so far as it does not conflict with their interest to do so.

I see, Mr. Editor, where you speak of negro domination in our Southland. I can say that I have been in the South for twenty-eight years and have lived in six different Southern States, and I have never found the negro in the majority, but the same docile creature, ready to bow to his old master under most every circumstance. The few who did claim rights as citizens of the United States under existing laws, were treated by the Southern white and the Northern white men who settled in the South, in too many instances, as desperadoes. Another question many Southern white men are forever agitating is that their wives and daughters are in danger in the South among the negroes. To this I say, Bah! Who looked after the white man's family in the South before the war when he was absent? Who was left at home to raise the product, do the affairs of the home and look after the families, while the master senior or master junior were battling to hold those rights which entitled them to keep those same obedient servants as bondsmen, to educate their children, cultivate their land, and do their bidding? Look, for instance, we were brought here. I want you to mark that point. "Brought here," never came of ourselves. In 1620 made slaves, and continued in that condition without a stroke of national legislation against it until 1863, and when the matter was finally settled in 1865 there were 4,000,000 of us turned loose from under the yoke of bondage, for which we give God praise. Yet we acknowledge that the reconstruction act was a failure. You might ask, why do I say so? Simply because it brought about an unnatural condition of things. Political influence placed weakness on the top of power, and power did what it always will do-shook it off. Now, we are procee[d]ing the right way. Starting at the bottom, we are laying a foundation in moral, intellectual and financial strength, and so sure as God is God and law is law—I mean natural law—whenever these come to the top we will have come to stay. According to my observation the church and the schoolhouse have the true solution of the destiny of our people, at least for present. There is never any trouble about recognizing and respecting those who, by proper acts, command recognition and respect. However long it requires to do this, it is the only way out of the difficulty. Political advantages can not count for much when the people are weak and dependent, and where the ballot is unprotected.

As to Governor Tillman's inaugural address, to which you referred, we have heard the like for years; yet we find the party in sympathy with the negroes from both parties always ends with the last sound of the inaugural address, while the hostile portion always remains in force. You further quoted Governor Tillman as saying, "retaliation and injustice had been practiced on the blacks by the whites; but said it was natural and inevitable," and that is the expression of our white brethren everywhere. Whatever is done to the negro is "natural and inevitable." Again in your editorial of the same issue headed, "The Last Struggle," your quotation reads: "The negroes North and South should be taught that this is always to be a country ruled by white men." We will never have anything against the white men for that; for according to our privileges I think we have helped the white men all they could expect under our condition; and we are not clamoring for social relations with the whites either. We do not want to eat at their tables, sleep in their beds, neither ride in the cars with them; but we do want as good fare as the whites receive for the same consideration. As to the Alliance, in the language of Hon. R. M. Hawley, of Missouri, we believe this to be its mission:

"No protection to party favorites; no force bills to keep up party and sectional prejudices; no secret caucuses by members of Congress or members of the legislatures to consider matters of legislation. Let these be abolished by law. Also abolish all party primary elections and party conventions for nominating candidates, and provide for a people's primary election, where every voter can write on his ticket the name of any person he prefers for any office from president down to constable. Let the proper county. State, and national officers, who shall be designated by law, receive the returns, count up and authorize the result, which shall be that the candidate receiving the highest number of votes and the one receiving the next highest number for each office shall be declared the contending candidates for final election. This would empty politics of party strife and all its concomitant evils, and lead to the representation of the leading industry of each district in Congress, and county in the State legislatures. Party blindness would be removed and let in the clear light of the science of economical government. I believe that nonpartisanism will not reach its full and natural results till these things are accomplished; and this I believe to be the mission of the Alliance."

Document Text

But, Mr. Editor, can we do anything while the present parties have control of the ballot box, and we (the Alliance) have no protection? The greatest mistake, I see, the farmers are now making, is this: The wily politicians see and know that they have to do something, therefore they are slipping into the Alliance, and the farmers, in many instances, are accepting them as leaders; and if we are to have the same leaders, we need not expect anything else but the same results. The action of the Alliance in this reminds me of the man who first put his hand in the lion's mouth and the lion finally bit it off; and then he changed to make the matter better and put his head in the lion's mouth, and, therefore, lost his head. Now, the farmers and laboring men know in the manner they were standing before they organized; they lost their hands, so to speak; now organized in one body or head, if they give themselves over to the same power that took their hand, it will likewise take their head.

Now, Mr. Editor, I wish to say, if the laboring men of the United States will lay down party issues and combine to enact laws for the benefit of the laboring man, I, as county superintendent of Putman county colored Farmers' Alliance, and member of the National Colored Farmers, know that I voice the sentiment of that body, representing as we did 750,000 votes, when I say we are willing and ready to lay down the past, take hold with them irrespective of party, race, or creed, until the cry shall be heard from the Heights of Abraham of the North, to the Everglades of Florida, and from the rock-bound coast of the East, to the Golden Eldorado of the West, that we can heartily endorse the motto, "Equal rights to all and special privileges to none."

Glossary

Golden Eldorado of the West	a metaphor for a place where wealth, such as gold, could be acquired easily and quickly
Governor Tillman	Benjamin Tillman, the openly racist governor of South Carolina in the early 1890s and, later, a U.S. senator
Heights of Abraham of the North	a landform near Quebec, Canada
Hon. Alonzo Wardall	a member of the National Executive Committee of the Farmers' Alliance
"in the lion's mouth"	an allusion to 2 Timothy 4:17–18, where Paul conveys to Timothy that one should hold firmly to one's faith in order to endure suffering—to be "rescued from the lion's mouth" by the Lord
People's party	also known as the Populist Party, a short-lived political party in the late nineteenth century

Josephine St. Pierre Ruffin's "Address to the First National Conference of Colored Women"

1895

"We are women, American women, as intensely interested in all that pertains to us as such as all other American women."

Overview

Josephine St. Pierre Ruffin's "Address to the First National Conference of Colored Women" opened the proceedings for a group of one hundred African American women who met in Boston at the Charles Street African Methodist Episcopal Church in July 1895. Ruffin was the president of the Women's Era Club in Boston, founded two years previously, and it was her work with this group that inspired her to found the National Federation of Afro-American Women. She organized and convened the Boston conference with a view to bringing together African American club women from across the nation to join with her in that effort. Attending the conference as representatives from clubs around the nation, the participants convened to assert their position as a critical component of the women's movement, to discuss the issues and challenges facing black women, and to debate how best to move forward in light of those challenges. The "Address to the First National Conference of Colored Women" was a call to action. Ruffin's remarks were brief, but they served to inspire a generation of African American women to active involvement in the women's movement and as a challenge to women everywhere to "bring in a new era to the colored women of America."

Context

The decades following the Civil War were a time of major social transformation. This was the period of the labor movement, rapid industrialization, large influxes of immigrants from Europe and Asia, and sweeping sentiments for social reforms. The U.S. government had devised a plan for "reconstructing" the South that set in motion a series of events that would propagate segregation for another hundred years. Women saw an opportunity to continue the work of the 1848 Seneca Falls Convention for women's rights, and, in doing so, African American women saw their chance to improve their own condition. It was against this backdrop that Josephine St. Pierre Ruffin spoke to the National Conference of Colored Women.

The U.S. government's Reconstruction program created policies and procedures intended to rebuild a bitterly divided nation. These policies addressed reintegrating southern states into the political system, dealing with former Confederate leaders, and, most important, defining the status of millions of newly freed slaves. Opinions varied on how best to resolve these matters. Abraham Lincoln had favored a policy of conciliation with the defeated South, but strong dissent arose during the troubled administration of Andrew Johnson (1865–1869), and the policies of the ensuing administration of Ulysses S. Grant (1869–1887) were dominated by the Radical Republican faction that stood for strong military enforcement of equal rights for the former slaves. These "radical" policies allowed for the passage of the Thirteenth (1865), Fourteenth (1868), and Fifteenth (1870) Amendments to the U.S. Constitution and created military jurisdictions over former Confederate states. With full citizenship, African Americans during this period began participating in the political process, ushering in a few years of widespread black representation, including fifteen representatives and two senators in Congress. However, Reconstruction met with a backlash in the South, as political parties fractured, white supremacy grew, and federal military power was gradually withdrawn. Reconstruction was dealt a fatal blow with the election of Rutherford B. Hayes in 1876, whose hands-off policy included the withdrawal of federal troops from the South. Reconstruction and the progress made for African Americans had ended.

As the postwar economy improved, a period of rapid industrialization, fueled by the growing numbers of immigrants, served as the catalyst for the growth of the labor movement. Advances in iron and steel production, the invention of the Morse telegraph (1837) and the telephone (1876), and the completion of the transcontinental railroad (1869) improved the nation's infrastructure and connected distant parts of the country. The growing immigrant population found work in many of these industries. Between the 1840s and World War I, approximately thirty-seven million people migrated to the United States in search of land, fortune, and opportunity. As immigrant populations soared, cities and factories became overcrowded, and living and working conditions grew dire. The Progressive movement of the 1890s and early 1900s sought to improve these con-

Time Line

1869

■ November
The American Woman Suffrage Association is founded in Boston as a result of a schism in the equal rights movement over the proposal to include woman suffrage in the proposed Fifteenth Amendment.

1875

■ March 1
The Civil Rights Act of 1875 grants everyone the same treatment in public accommodations, regardless of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

1883

■ October 15
The Supreme Court declares the Civil Rights Act of 1875 unconstitutional on the grounds that Congress lacks the authority to legislate in issues relating to racial discrimination at the state level.

1884

■ Josephine St. Pierre Ruffin founds Women's Era, the first newspaper of its kind published by and for African American women.

1895

■ July 29
Ruffin offers the opening address at the First National Conference of Colored Women, where the National Federation of Afro-American Women is born.

1896

■ The National Federation of Afro-American Women merges with the Colored Women's League of Washington to form the National Association of Colored Women (later the National Association of Colored Women's Clubs).

■ May 18
In Plessy v. Ferguson the Supreme Court effectively legitimizes racial segregation under the doctrine of "separate but equal" treatment.

ditions as well as to break up corrupt political machines. The labor movement also saw rapid expansion at this time, as unions fought for improved working conditions, regulation of work hours and pay, and prohibition of child labor.

This swell of sentiment for social reform was also taken up by the emerging women's movement. After the 1848 Seneca Falls (New York) Convention, the movement grew in supporters, strength, and influence. Women like Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony, and Lucretia Mott were speaking, writing, and engaging people in conversation to further equality for women in education, employment, family life, religion, and public life. By 1869 the American Woman Suffrage Association had begun to include black women in the conversation, including Josephine St. Pierre Ruffin, an early member in Boston. When the Civil Rights Act passed in 1875, preventing discrimination in "public accommodation" on the basis of "race, color, or previous condition of servitude"—with no mention of gender—women in the club movement began to fragment. A division formed in the suffrage community, with many women refusing to support black men's voting rights at the expense of their own and preferring instead to focus solely on voting rights for women. Feeling isolated by this position from the white women's club movement, African American women formed their own clubs, such as the National Federation of Afro-American Women (1895) and, later, the National Association of Colored Women (NACW, 1896). African American women's clubs worked not only for women's rights but also for the rights and welfare of black men and children. The desire for social reform that characterized the Progressive era helped further the influence of many of these clubs, as they sought political gain and a general improvement of black women's social standing.

About the Author

Josephine St. Pierre was born on August 31, 1842, in Boston, to well-to-do parents of (white) English and Martinican-African descent. Her parents were highly respected in the African American community. Because they opposed Boston's segregated school system, they sent their daughter to several schools during her childhood, two just outside Boston and one in New York City. She completed her education at the Bowdoin School, a coeducational institution then located on Derne Street in the Beacon Hill section of Boston.

In 1858, at the age of sixteen, Josephine St. Pierre married George Lewis Ruffin, a prominent attorney from Richmond, Virginia, and the first African American to graduate from Harvard Law School. George Ruffin, the first African American man elected to Boston's City Council, also served in the Massachusetts state legislature during the early 1870s. In 1883 he would became the first black judge in the United States. The Ruffins settled in the elite Beacon Hill neighborhood and eventually had five children. During the Civil War, they participated in the war effort, serving with the Sanitary Commission. It was during this period that Josephine became involved with suffrage and the women's movement.

After the war, St. Pierre Ruffin began working with several leaders of the suffrage movement, including Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony, and Julia Ward Howe. In 1869, together with Howe and Lucy Stone, she helped form the American Women Suffrage Association. By this time, she had begun writing for the black weekly newspaper in Boston, the Courant, which involved her in another organization, the New England Women's Press Association. Later, Ruffin integrated the New England Women's Club, and in 1894 she organized the Women's Era Club, specifically for African American women. Her work in these clubs focused specifically on how African American women could work to improve the conditions of all African Americans.

When George Ruffin died in 1886, Josephine's experience at the Courant prompted her to start her own newspaper with money from her husband's estate. The Women's Era newspaper became the first paper published for and by African American women. Financial stability allowed her to increase her involvement with the women's club movement, and in 1895 Ruffin organized the First National Conference of Colored Women, with a view to forming a national organization to unite the African American women's clubs of America. Delegates from clubs all across the United States attended. It was to these women that Ruffin spoke. Within the year, the National Federation of Afro-American Women was a reality and, in 1896, merged with the Colored Women's League of Washington to form the NACW, an organization that is still active today as the National Association of Colored Women's Clubs. Ruffin continued in community service and was especially involved in advancing African American women's rights. By 1910 she had helped to found the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Upon her death on March 13, 1924, Josephine St. Pierre Ruffin was widely honored for her skills as a journalist, activist, and pioneer in the African American women's rights movement.

Time Line

1900

■ June 4–9
Ruffin, representing three separate organizations, is denied admittance to the General Federation of Women's Clubs' national meeting in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, because one of the groups (the New Era Club) is all black.

1918

■ Membership in the NACW numbers almost one hundred thousand.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

Although the "Address to the First National Conference of Colored Women" is quite short, it had a resounding impact on the future of the African American women's movement. The address had one primary purpose: to convince black women of the necessity of creating their own national organization. Ruffin saw an opportunity for black women's groups to coalesce in the hope of creating a strong national voice for women everywhere. It is this point that makes Ruffin's address singular: She spoke not only to African American women but also to black men and white women. It was her hope to improve the lives of African Americans through their own efforts and through the efforts of white people as well. Ruffin's speech was widely celebrated, and only a year later Ruffin and Mary Church Terrell, founder of the Colored Women's League of Washington and a well-known suffragist and journalist, combined their organizations to form the NACW.

Ruffin's address falls into three distinct sections. The first paragraph concerns the meeting itself—how the various groups came together, the rise of women's clubs, and the message that such a meeting would send to society. The main section (paragraphs 2–5) deals with the reasons for holding the conference. This is the lengthiest section, and it is where the heart of her argument lies. The last section is a very brief call to action, wherein Ruffin firmly states "the absolute necessity of a national organization of our women."

Ruffin opens by citing the need for black women to meet for a "good talk." With no national organization representing black women, this would be the opportunity to come together, regardless of geography, and discuss important issues. To Ruffin, the particular situation of black women, the hardships they faced, and the deprivations they endured because of their race and gender spoke to this need. Although the conference was put together rather rapidly, the leaders had been thinking for some time about convening all the regional women's clubs. Such clubs had been appearing all across the country, for both white and black women. Ruffin credits their work as the inspiration for the conference and for the desired creation of a national organization. Five years prior to the conference, there had been no clubs for African American women. By 1895 representatives from twenty such clubs were in attendance. Ruffin cites their history and their willingness to do their part as evidence that they, too, are "truly American women."

Ruffin turns next to the reasons for convening. First, she mentions how much courage and inspiration would be drawn from women meeting other women who shared the same goals. Next, she lays out the practical matters they should discuss, including the education of their children, the mental and intellectual elevation of all black people, and the ways in which to make the best of their situations, given their limited resources and social standing. Ruffin also speaks of the need to discuss the issues of the day, such as temperance, higher education, and domesticity. The end of the second paragraph sums up these initial reasons for meeting: "Surely we, with everything to pull us back, to hinder us in developing, need to take every opportunity and means for the thoughtful consideration which shall lead to wise action."

Julia Ward Howe (Library of Congress)

Ruffin then notes the unfortunate prevailing belief regarding the general nature of black women, which, she says, is that they are "for the most part, ignorant and immoral, some exceptions, of course, but these don't count." She considers this attitude—that progressive black women of considerable talent, morals, education, and skill were being regarded nationwide as second-rate—to be the strongest reason for coming together. Women's opportunities were limited, even foreclosed, by this blatant racism. If such women were given even a small chance to improve the conditions of their lives, Ruffin believed they could create improvements in the lives of all other African Americans.

How, then, could this small chance be created? Ruffin's answer in paragraph 4 is one of the most passionate sections of her address. She understood that the women to whom she was speaking were some of the most affluent, educated, and privileged African Americans in the country. The changes Ruffin here envisions for African Americans were already in progress among her peers. It was for those less fortunate—the large body of African Americans—that opportunities needed to be created. To Ruffin, the issues were not merely improved education, rewarding employment, and the chance to travel. She viewed the matter in broader terms: The dignity of the race demanded that she and women like her "stand forth and declare ourselves and our principles." To be seen as good, intelligent, hardworking people, these women had to show the world collective, and not merely individual, action. This was a platform from which black women could act as paragons, opening the eyes of the world to their shining example.

Central to this argument is a point that provides a good deal of insight into the mind-set from which these women were operating. Ruffin implies that up to this point black women had fallen silent when bearing witness to the hardships they all faced. They were also silent in the face of the "unholy charges" made against them. Her call to speak out represented a tangible shift in policy for African American social action. Ruffin admits that she herself had yielded to prevailing attitudes, first by publicly accepting her circumstances and then by simply joining individual women's clubs and attempting to leverage their resources to make headway. However, as the larger women's movement increasingly came to focus on the issue of suffrage, the unfortunate side effect was neglect for the broader rights of African American women. Black women like Ruffin therefore began to push for their own representation, their own groups. The 1895 Boston conference declared that black women, at the expense of their dignity, could no longer accept this disparity of treatment. However, in stepping into the public forum, these women recognized that their actions, words, and deeds would be scrutinized. As Ruffin put it, "Now with an army of organized women standing for purity and mental worth, we … open the eyes of the world." Serving as the standard for all African Americans weighed heavily on their minds, and this understanding informed the decisions and actions of the expanding African American women's club movement. Certainly the importance of their decisions was apparent throughout Ruffin's address.

At this point in her speech, Ruffin makes some interesting rhetorical choices, which for modern readers should serve as clues to the particular circumstances of black women at the time. The first is her refusal to discuss certain claims made against African American women by the white women's organizations. She alludes to situations where southern women had protested the admission of black women into historically white women's clubs, thus propagating racist stereotypes of the "immoral" black woman. Yet Ruffin declines to mention any of these protestations specifically. She says, in paragraph 4, that many of the claims of white women were so humiliating that they moved black women to "mortified silence." Her refusal to discuss this slander in her address points to the degrading nature of the allegations as well as to a desire to elevate the discourse above nasty rhetoric. By meeting the protestations with dignity and respect, Ruffin hoped that the character of these African American club women would attest to their virtue. In what would henceforth become the tone of the language of African American women's clubs, the struggle to overcome humiliation and exclusion would always depend on virtue and strength of character.

The second rhetorical choice that Ruffin makes in this latter part of her address is to assign the challenge specifically to black women: "For many and apparent reasons it is especially fitting that the women of the race take the lead in this movement." Nothing further needed to be said for those present that afternoon, but modern readers may benefit from a brief discussion of her remarks. Ruffin's choice relates to the complete subjugation of African American males during this period. Black males were seen by much of the white population in terms of stereotypes—"lazy," "violent," "insolent," and "stupid." This was the period when lynchings were becoming a common response to any black assertiveness. While black women were not much better off than their men folk, they were more able to step onto a public platform without being perceived as a threat to the structure of white society.

Ruffin makes it clear that it would be African American women's strength of character that would help all African Americans persevere and flourish, and this sentiment pervades the end of the address. Her closing words are poignant. Here she moves beyond the bounds of the room and addresses the wider women's movement. She acknowledges the desire to include women and men, regardless of color. The idea of creating a universal movement had divided white women working toward suffrage in the 1870s. But for Ruffin, a movement for one was already a movement for all. She demonstrated her commitment to this universal principle at the conference most clearly at the start of her final paragraph, which she begins by calling for "union and earnestness."

In her final paragraph, Ruffin lays out her paramount hope for the outcome of the conference: to see the creation of a national all-black women's organization. She believed that in order for African American women to achieve the hoped-for change, women from all areas of the country, in all walks of life, would have to band together: "From this will spring an organization that will in truth bring in a new era to the colored woman of America."

General Federation of Women's Clubs headquarters
(Library of Congress)

Audience

Josephine St. Pierre Ruffin's address was given in front of a group of one hundred African American women who wanted to come together as a strong voice of encouragement, inspiration, and guidance to the country and yet were deliberately excluded from the national scene of white women's clubs specifically because of their race. These women were an elite group, highly educated and fairly well off, being the wives and daughters of some of the most prominent men in the black community. In addition to this immediate audience, Ruffin addressed both black men and white women, asking that everyone avoid drawing the color line, an indication that she recognized the importance of working together to effect change.

Impact

The impact of Ruffin's address was felt immediately by the African American community. Her newly established National Federation of Afro-American Women was paralleled by organizations such as the Colored Women's League of Washington, which had been founded two years earlier by Helen Cook.The year following the conference saw the organization of the NACW, which merged Ruffin's federation and the Colored Women's League of Washington. It became clear after this address that the only way African American women were going to be able to achieve any measure of standing was by banding together as one cohesive group. Indeed, the 1933 publication of Lifting as They Climb by the NACW member Elizabeth Lindsay Davis included a direct reprinting of the "Call to Conference," the list of attendees, the conference program schedule, and Ruffin's address in their entirety, owing to their significance in the formation of the first national club for African American women.

In the years and months after her remarks, Ruffin held the position of vice president of the NACW while maintaining her membership in the New England Women's Club and the New Era Club, desegregating both clubs. In 1900 Ruffin attended a meeting of the General Federation of Women's Clubs, where she was denied a seat on the floor after refusing to renounce her membership in the NACW. Ruffin was promptly excused from the meeting proceedings. This event became known as the "Ruffin incident," gaining national notoriety for both Ruffin and the NACW national.

Not all African Americans were pleased with this attention. Several well-respected people offered Ruffin their support following the incident, but the black orator Booker

Essential Quotes

"Five years ago we had no colored women's club outside of those formed for special work; today, with little over a month's notice, we are able to call representatives from more than twenty clubs. It is a good showing. It stands for much. It shows that we are truly American women, with all the adaptability, readiness to seize and possess our opportunities, willingness to do our part for good as other American women."

(Paragraph 1)

"For the sake of our own dignity, the dignity of our race, and the future good name of our children, it is 'mete, right and our bounden duty' to stand forth and declare ourselves and principles, to teach an ignorant and suspicious world that our aims and interests are identical with those of all good aspiring women."

(Paragraph 4)

"It is to break this silence, not by noisy protestations of what we are not, but by a dignified showing of what we are and hope to become that we are impelled to take this step, to make of this gathering an object lesson to the world."

(Paragraph 4)

"We want, we ask the active interest of our men, and, too, we are not drawing the color line; we are women, American women, as intensely interested in all that pertains to us as such as all other American women; we are not alienating or withdrawing, we are only coming to the front, willing to join any others in the same work and cordially inviting and welcoming any others to join us."

(Paragraph 5)

T. Washington was not one of them. In September of 1895, speaking just a few months after Ruffin gave her address, the Tuskegee Institute educator addressed an audience at the Cotton States and International Exposition in Atlanta, Georgia. Recognizing the social realities of his day, Washington felt that the only way for African Americans to succeed was through accommodation and industrial education, instead of focusing on immediately achieving civil rights. In his Atlanta Exposition Address, he proposed a compromise between asking for civil rights and receiving education and skills.

The differing viewpoints within the African American community began to come to a head, with those advocating for equality and civil rights and those advocating accommodation standing in stark contrast to each other. A few years later, an organization arose to work for civil rights and justice for all people of color. Founded in 1909, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, headed by the Harvard-trained historian and sociologist, W. E. B. Du Bois, was formed in opposition to the accommodationist viewpoints of Washington. Josephine St. Pierre Ruffin was an early member and leader within this organization.

See also Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1865); Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1868); Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1870); Booker T. Washington's Atlanta Exposition Address (1895); Plessy v. Ferguson (1896); Mary Church Terrell: "The Progress of Colored Women" (1898); W. E. B. Du Bois: The Souls of Black Folk (1903).

Further Reading

■ Articles

Jones, Beverly W. "Mary Church Terrell and the National Association of Colored Women, 1896–1901." Journal of Negro History 67, no. 1 (Spring 1982): 20–33.

Lerner, Gerda. "Early Community Work of Black Club Women." Journal of Negro History 59, no. 2 (April 1974): 158–167.

■ Books

Davis, Elizabeth Lindsay. Lifting as They Climb, ed. Henry Louis Gates, Jr. New York: G. K. Hall, 1996.

Foner, Philip S., and Robert James Branham, eds. Lift Every Voice: African-American Oratory 1787–1900. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1998.

Streitmatter, Rodger. "Josephine St. Pierre Ruffin: A Nineteenth-Century Journalist of Boston's Black Elite Class." In Women of the Commonwealth: Work, Family, and Social Change in Nineteenth-Century Massachusetts, ed. Susan L. Porter. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1996.

———. Raising Her Voice: African-American Journalists Who Changed History. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 2009.

■ Web Sites

"History of the National Association of Colored Women's Clubs, Inc." National Association of Colored Women's Clubs Web Site.
http://www.nacwc.org/about/history.php.

"Josephine St. Pierre Ruffin." MassHumanities Statehouse Women's Leadership Project Web Site.
http://www.masshumanities.org/shwlp/honorees/ruffin.html.

"Josephine St. Pierre Ruffin." National Women's Hall of Fame "Women of the Hall" Web Site.
http://www.greatwomen.org/women.php?action=viewone&id=132.

—Katherine M. Johnson

Questions for Further Study

1. What factors caused the women's movement to fragment in the later decades of the nineteenth century?

2. Ruffin's address bears obvious comparison with Mary Church Terrell's address "The Progress of Colored Women," delivered three years later. How were the women's backgrounds similar? What vision did the two share? Were there any marked differences in their views or outlook?

3. During the last decade of the nineteenth century, there was a flurry of activity by women that bore on women's rights and on the condition of African Americans. What social, economic, and political developments do you think may have contributed to this swell of activity?

4. In what ways, if any, do you think the women's club movement of the late nineteenth century was a precursor of the modern feminist movement?

5. What was the "Ruffin incident," and what implications did it have for African Americans at the time? How did others respond to the incident?

Josephine St. Pierre Ruffin's "Address to the First National Conference of Colored Women"

It is with especial joy and pride that I welcome you all to this, our first conference. It is only recently that women have waked up to the importance of meeting in council, and great as has been the advantage to women generally, and important as it is and has been that they should confer, the necessity has not been nearly so great, matters at stake not nearly so vital, as that we, bearing peculiar blunders, suffering under especial hardships, enduring peculiar privations, should meet for a "good talk" among ourselves. Although rather hastily called, you as well as I can testify how long and how earnestly a conference has been thought of and hoped for and even prepared for. These women's clubs, which have sprung up all over the country, built and run upon broad and strong lines, have all been a preparation, small conferences in themselves, and their spontaneous birth and enthusiastic support have been little less than inspirational on the part of our women and a general preparation for a large union such as it is hoped this conference will lead to. Five years ago we had no colored women's clubs outside of those formed for special work; today, with little over a month's notice, we are able to call representatives from more than twenty clubs. It is a good showing. It stands for much. It shows that we are truly American women, with all the adaptability, readiness to seize and possess our opportunities, willingness to do our part for good as other American women.

The reasons why we should confer are so apparent that it would seem hardly necessary to enumerate them, and yet there are none of them but demand our serious consideration. In the first place we need to feel the cheer and inspiration of meeting each other; we need to gain the courage and fresh life that comes from the mingling of congenial souls, of those working for the same ends. Next, we need to talk over those things that are of especial interest to us as colored women, the training of our children, openings for our boys and girls, how they can be prepared for occupations and occupations may be found or opened for them, what we especially can do in the moral education and physical development, the home training it is necessary to give our children in order to prepare them to meet the peculiar conditions in which they shall find themselves, how to make the most of our own, to some extent, limited opportunities. Besides these are the general questions of the day, which we cannot afford to be indifferent to: temperance, morality, the higher education, hygienic and domestic questions. If these things need the serious consideration of women more advantageously placed by reason of all the aid to right thinking and living with which they are surrounded, surely we, with everything to pull us back, to hinder us in developing, need to take every opportunity and means for the thoughtful consideration which shall lead to wise action.

I have left the strongest reason for our conferring together until the last. All over America there is to be found a large and growing class of earnest, intelligent, progressive colored women, women who, if not leading full, useful lives, are only waiting for the opportunity to do so, many of them warped and cramped for lack of opportunity, not only to do more but to be more; and yet, if an estimate of the colored women of America is called for, the inevitable reply, glibly given is, "For the most part ignorant and immoral, some exceptions of course, but these don't count."

Now for the sake of the thousands of self-sacrificing young women teaching and preaching in lonely southern backwoods for the noble army of mothers who have given birth to these girls, mothers whose intelligence is only limited by their opportunity to get at books, for the sake of the fine cultured women who have carried off the honors in school here and often abroad, for the sake of our own dignity, the dignity of our race, and the future good name of our children, it is "meet, right and our bounden duty" to stand forth and declare ourselves and principles, to teach an ignorant and suspicious world that our aims and interests are identical with those of all good aspiring women. Too long have we been silent under unjust and unholy charges; we cannot expect to have them removed until we disprove them through ourselves. It is not enough to try to disprove unjust charges through individual effort, that never goes any further. Year after year southern women have protested against the admission of colored women into any national organization on the ground of the immorality of these women, and because all refutation has only been tried by individual work the charge has never been crushed, as it could and should have been at the first. Now with an army of organized women standing for purity and mental worth, we in ourselves deny the charge and open the eyes of the world to a state of affairs to which they have been blind, often willfully so, and the very fact that the charges, audaciously and flippantly made, as they often are, are of so humiliating and delicate a nature, serves to protect the accuser by driving the helpless accused into mortified silence. It is to break this silence, not by noisy protestations of what we are not, but by a dignified showing of what we are and hope to become that we are impelled to take this step, to make of this gathering an object lesson to the world. For many and apparent reasons it is especially fitting that the women of the race take the lead in this movement, but for all this we recognize the necessity of the sympathy of our husbands, brothers and fathers.

Document Text

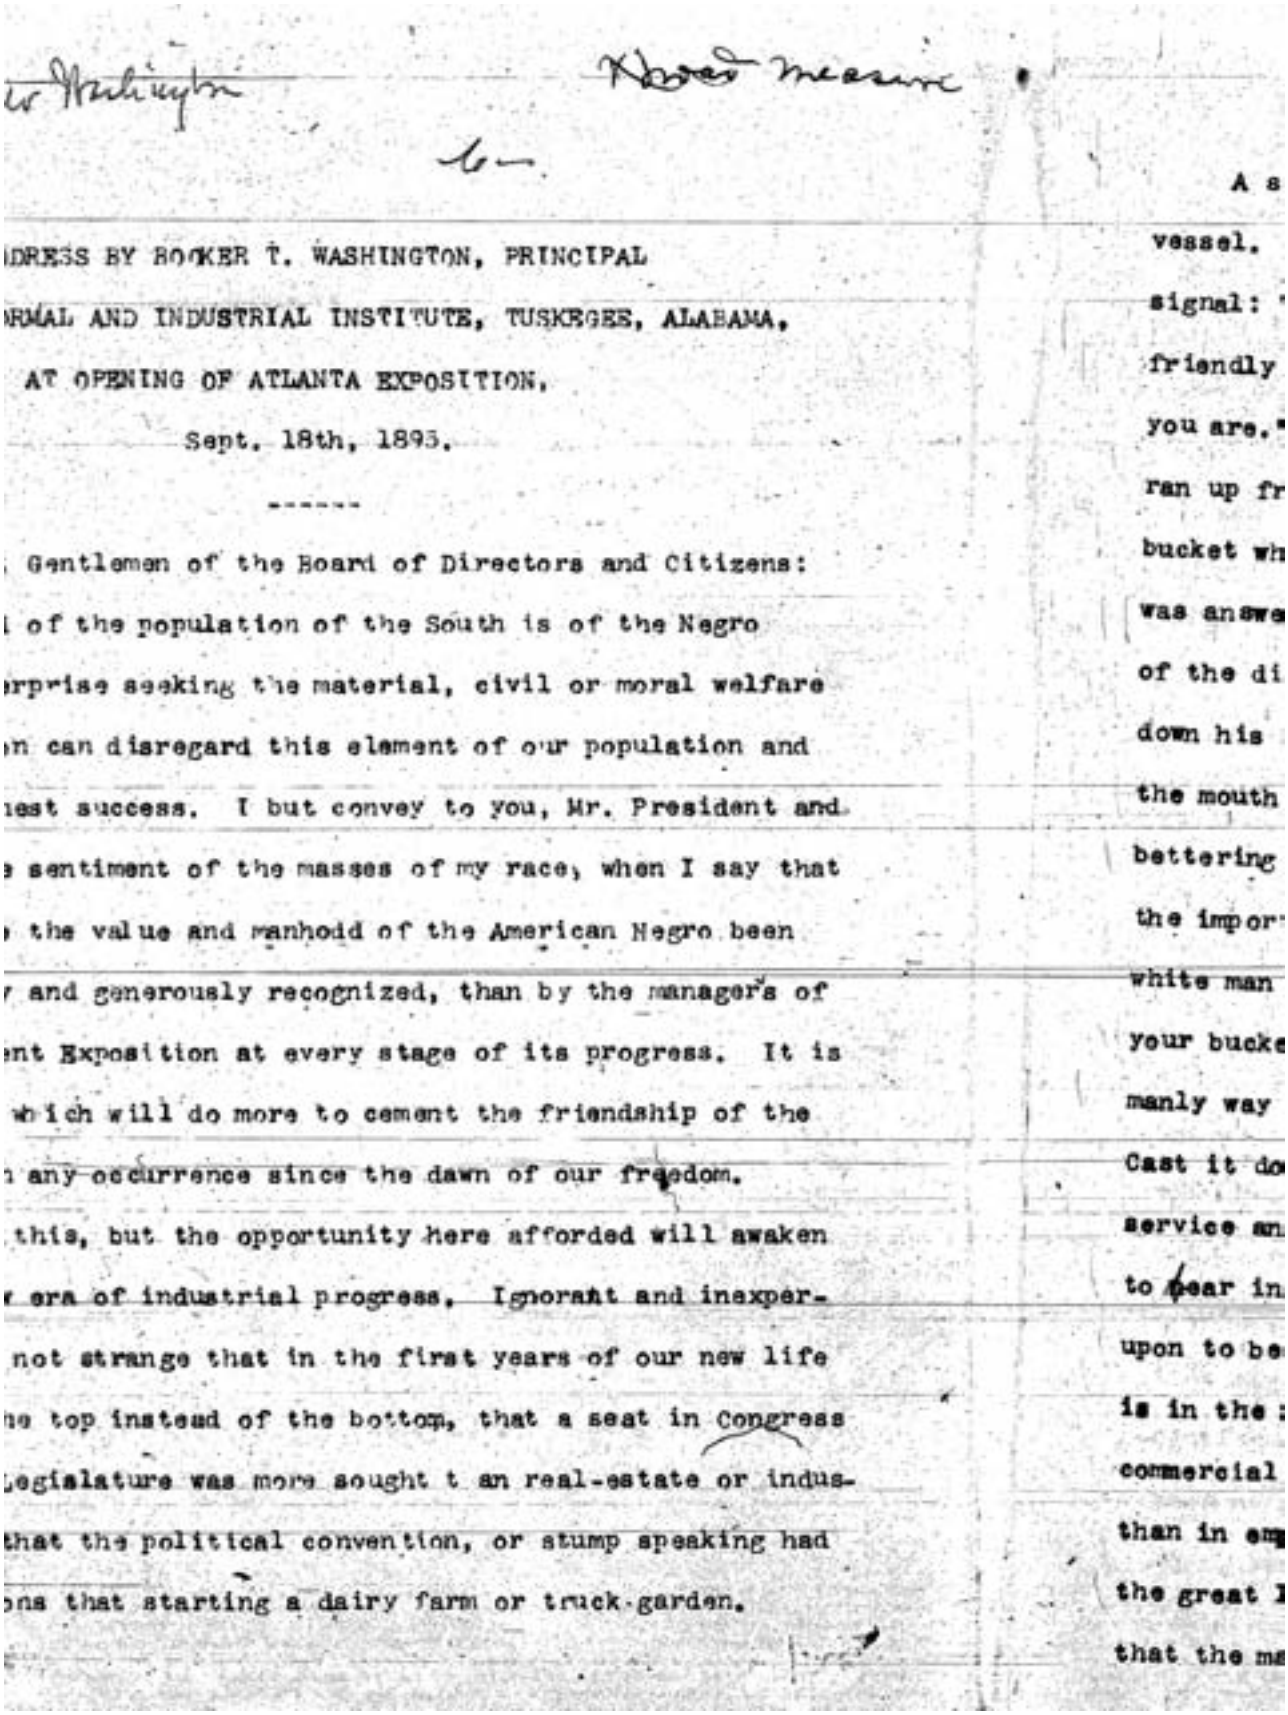
Our woman's movement is woman's movement in that it is led and directed by women for the good of women and men, for the benefit of all humanity, which is more than any one branch or section of it. We want, we ask the active interest of our men, and, too, we are not drawing the color line; we are women, American women, as intensely interested in all that pertains to us as such as all other American women; we are not alienating or withdrawing, we are only coming to the front, willing to join any others in the same work and cordially inviting and welcoming any others to join us.

If there is any one thing I would especially enjoin upon this conference it is union and earnestness. The questions that are to come before us are of too much import to be weakened by any trivialities or personalities. If any differences arise let them be quickly settled, with the feeling that we are all workers to the same end, to elevate and dignify colored American womanhood. This conference will not be what I expect if it does not show the wisdom, indeed the absolute necessity of a national organization of our women. Every year new questions coming up will prove it to us. This hurried, almost informal convention does not begin to meet our needs, it is only a beginning, made here in dear old Boston, where the scales of justice and generosity hang evenly balanced, and where the people "dare be true" to their best instincts and stand ready to lend aid and sympathy to worthy struggles. It is hoped and believed that from this will spring an organization that will in truth bring in a new era to the colored women of America.

Glossary

"meet, right and our bounden duty" a quote from a Christian prayer, "It is very meet, right, and our bounden duty, that we should at all times, and in all places, give thanks unto thee, O Lord, Holy Father, Almighty, Everlasting God."



DRESS BY BOOKER T. WASHINGTON, PRINCIPAL
RMAL AND INDUSTRIAL INSTITUTE, TUSKEGEE, ALABAMA, AT OPENING OF ATLANTA EXPOSITION,
Sept. 18th, 1895.

Gentlemen of the Board of Directors and Citizens: of the population of the South is of the Negro rprise seeking the material, civil or moral welfare n can disregard this element of our population and iest success. I but convey to you, Mr. President and sentiment of the masses of my race, when I say that the value and manhood of the American Negro been and generously recognized, than by the managers of nt Exposition at every stage of its progress. It is which will do more to cement the friendship of the any occurrence since the dawn of our freedom.
this, but the opportunity here afforded will awaken era of industrial progress. Ignorant and inexpernot strange that in the first years of our new life he top instead of the bottom, that a seat in Congress Legislature was more sought t an real-estate or indus-that the political convention, or stump speaking had ons that starting a dairy farm or truck-garden.

vessel, signal:
friendly you are."
ran up fr bucket wh was answe of the di down his the mouth bettering the impor
white man your bucke manly way Cast it do service an to bear in upon to be is in the commercial than in em the great that the ma

Booker T. Washington's Speech at the Atlanta Exposition (Library of Congress)

Booker T. Washington's Atlanta Exposition Address

1895

"In all things that are purely social we can be as separate as the fingers, yet one as the hand in all things essential to mutual progress."

Overview

Late on an unseasonably hot mid-September afternoon in 1895, Booker T. Washington delivered a short speech to a standing-room-only crowd packed into the auditorium in Atlanta's Exposition Park during the opening ceremonies of the Cotton States and International Exposition. The address, which ran a little over ten minutes, propelled the previously unknown principal of Tuskegee Institute, a small black college in rural Alabama, into the national spotlight. By almost any measure, it (along with Martin Luther King, Jr.'s, 1963 "I Have a Dream" Speech) was one of the most important speeches presented by an African American. The immediate response, both in Atlanta and across the country, was overwhelmingly positive, but over time both Washington and his address have been sharply criticized, especially by other African American intellectuals and leaders. These critics termed the Atlanta address the "Atlanta Compromise" and made Washington a symbol of accommodation and acquiescence to southern racism, segregation, and the political disenfranchisement of African Americans. Throughout much of the twentieth century Washington and his famous (or infamous) address were a defining element in the African American political debate.

The assessment of Washington's Atlanta Exposition Address is clouded by the problem that Washington's actual words are less known than the responses and the analysis of those words by Washington's allies and especially by his opponents. As soon as the news of Washington's triumph at Atlanta spread across the country, friends and foes began to dissect his words and to interpret various phrases or images that he utilized. As a result, the speech itself quickly faded from memory, while discrete segments of the speech became permanently imbedded in American racial discourse, both within the African American community and among white Americans. The original context of the address, as well as its complex and nuanced arguments, gave way to the overly simplified and largely inaccurate view that Washington had surrendered the rights that African Americans had won during the Civil War and Reconstruction. By the time of Washington's death twenty years later, African American leadership was divided into Bookerite (pro-Washington) and anti-Bookerite factions, and Washington's opponents increasingly dominated the debate.

Context

The 1890s was a difficult decade for African Americans. Many of the gains they had achieved in securing their political and civil rights and in attaining a measure of physical security gave way to an assault on their rights as citizens and on their personal safety. During Reconstruction three constitutional amendments (the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments) and the Civil Rights Acts of 1866 and 1875 had secured African American freedom and equal rights. The military occupation of the former Confederate States and federal legislation like the Civil Rights Act of 1871 (also known as the Ku Klux Klan Act) greatly diminished organized violence against blacks and their white political allies. In the late 1870s and 1880s these gains began to unravel. In the aftermath of the disputed presidential election of 1876, the last federal troops were withdrawn from the South. In 1883 the Supreme Court ruled in the Civil Rights Cases that the Fourteenth Amendment did not protect against discrimination by individuals or businesses, and three years later, for the first time in U.S. history, more blacks than whites were the victims of lynching.

In the 1890s racial conditions in the United States continued to deteriorate. In Plessy v. Ferguson, the Supreme Court legitimized state-sponsored segregation as long as "separate but equal" facilities were provided for blacks, and in 1898 the Court ruled that literacy tests and other similar methods of restricting the right to vote did not violate the Fifteenth Amendment. The 1890s witnessed more lynchings of blacks than any other decade in U.S. history. As the decade came to an end, race riots broke out in Wilmington, North Carolina (1898); New Orleans, Louisiana (1900); and New York (1900) as violence against blacks escalated. African Americans struggled to respond to this new wave of discrimination and violence without much success. The federal government, on which African Americans had depended during Reconstruction, was no longer a reliable ally. The Democrats had regained control of southern state

Time Line

1856

■ April 5
Booker T. Washington is born into slavery on the farm of James Burroughs near Hale's Ford in the foothills of the Blue Ridge Mountains in Franklin County, Virginia.

1865

■ August
Freed by the defeat of the South in the Civil War, Washington and his family move to Malden, West Virginia.

1872

■ October 5
Washington leaves home and enrolls in Hampton Institute.

1881

■ July 4
Washington opens the Tuskegee Institute in Tuskegee, Alabama, modeling the school's curriculum on that of the Hampton Institute.

1895

■ February 20
Frederick Douglass, the most prominent African American leader of his generation, dies in Washington, D.C.

■ September 18
Washington delivers his Atlanta Exposition Address during the opening ceremonies of the Cotton States and International Exposition.

1896

■ May 18
In Plessy v. Ferguson, the Supreme Court rules that a Louisiana law segregating passengers on railroads is legal because it provides "separate but equal" facilities; this ruling validates a number of laws that segregate African Americans.

1898

■ April 25
In Williams v. State of Mississippi, the Supreme Court rules that a Mississippi law allowing poll taxes and literacy tests to be used as voter qualifications is legal, legitimizing the tactics used by southern states to deny African Americans the right to vote.

governments in the 1870s and won the presidency in 1884 and again in 1892. The Republican Party's commitment to civil rights also had waned. Frederick Douglass, who led the struggle against slavery and was an outspoken advocate of equal rights, died in February 1895, depriving African Americans of their best-known and most effective leader at this very crucial time.

Against this background Atlanta businessmen conceived of an international exposition, a small-scale world's fair, which would highlight the emergence of a "New South," promote the city and the entire region as a progressive area, and attract new business and investment capital. They hoped to capture some of the positive press coverage and economic benefits that Chicago had received with the 1893 Columbian Exposition. In the spring of 1894 Washington and several other African Americans were asked to join a delegation of prominent southerners to lobby Congress for an appropriation to support the Atlanta Exposition. Congress appropriated the funding, and as planning for the event proceeded, Washington was consulted again on the issue of the "Negro" exhibits. At some point, and after some controversy, exposition officials decided to involve African Americans in the opening ceremonies. On August 23, 1895, about three weeks before opening day, organizers of the exposition asked Washington to represent African Americans at this event.

The decision to involve African Americans so prominently in the exposition was interesting. Two years earlier black leaders had been unhappy with the way they were treated at the World's Columbian Exposition in Chicago. Their exhibits were segregated in Negro buildings, and blacks felt that as exhibitors at and visitors to the fair they had faced broken promises and discrimination. Consequently, a number of African American leaders were reluctant to support the Negro exhibits at this much smaller provincial event. Washington, however, cooperated with the organizers and urged others to do likewise, even though blacks had to fund their own exhibits and these exhibits would be housed in a separate building. Appreciation of Washington's assistance with Congress and his support of the event brought him to the podium on opening day.

About the Author

Booker Taliaferro Washington was born on a farm near Hale's Ford in the foothills of the Blue Ridge Mountains in Franklin County, Virginia. While his exact birth date is not clear, most authorities place it on April 5, 1856. Washington spent the first eight years of his childhood as a slave. Following emancipation he moved with his mother, brother, and sister to join his stepfather, who had found employment in the saltworks in Malden, West Virginia. Emancipation did not significantly raise the economic well-being of the family. The young Washington alternated between working in the saltworks and attending school. In 1867 his situation improved dramatically when he took a job in the home of General Lewis Ruffner, one of Malden's wealthiest citizens, serving as houseboy and companion for Viola Ruffner, the general's New England wife. Washington later credited Mrs. Ruffner for much of his early education and especially with preparing him for college.

At age sixteen Washington left home to further his education at Hampton Institute, which allowed impoverished black students to work at the school to pay the costs of their education. Three years later he graduated as one of its top students. After a short stint as a schoolteacher in Malden, he returned to Hampton to teach and to acquire additional education. During his time as a student and then as a teacher at Hampton, Washington became a protégé of General Samuel C. Armstrong and a student of Armstrong's theory of industrial education. In May 1881 the board of a recently authorized Alabama state normal school for black students asked Armstrong to recommend a white educator to serve as its principal. Armstrong recommended his prize student. After hesitation and with reluctance, the board accepted Washington to head the school.

When Washington arrived in Tuskegee, he discovered that the school existed only on paper—he had to find land, build buildings, and recruit faculty. It is to Washington's credit that despite his youth and inexperience, he mastered the political, administrative, and financial skills he needed to create a black institution in the inhospitable hills of northern Alabama. By the early 1890s Tuskegee had become a success, and Washington was beginning to address the broader political and economic issues that confronted African Americans.

The Atlanta Exposition Address transformed Washington from a southern educator to the most influential and powerful African American in the United States. He consulted with presidents and corporate leaders, and headed a political machine that dispersed funds from white philanthropists and political patronage throughout the black community. In the early twentieth century opposition to Washington's leadership increased, especially that organized around Du Bois. The founding of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in 1910 and Du Bois's prominent role in that organization deflected some white support from Washington. During the last years of Washington's life the African American leadership was increasingly divided into pro-Washington and pro–Du Bois/National Association for the Advancement of Colored People camps. Nevertheless, at the time of his death in November 1915, Washington was still the most widely known and respected African American leader in the United States.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

Washington's Atlanta Exposition Address was presented in the auditorium on the exposition grounds. The auditorium was packed, mostly with whites, but there was also a segregated Negro section. Washington was one of two blacks seated on the stage, but he was the only one to speak. The speech itself was brief. In written form it is eleven paragraphs; Washington delivered it in about ten minutes.

Time Line

1901

- March Washington publishes his best-known autobiography, Up from Slavery.
- July 16 Controversy arises after Washington dines at the White House while consulting President Theodore Roosevelt about political appointments in the South.

1903

- April 18 W. E. B. Du Bois begins his criticism of Washington's leadership with the publication of the essay "Of Mr. Booker T. Washington and Others" in his book The Souls of Black Folk.

1905

- July 10 Twenty-nine African Americans, including Du Bois, meet in Fort Erie, Ontario, to create a civil rights organization. The resulting Niagara Movement directly challenges Washington's leadership and policies.

1910

- May 14 The biracial National Negro Conference officially gives birth to the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the oldest civil rights organization in the United States.

1915

- November 14 Washington dies at home in Tuskegee.

In the first paragraph Washington notes the significance of the occasion. First, he emphasizes the significance of African Americans to the South—"One-third of the population of the South is of the Negro race"—and observes that no enterprise for the development of the South that ignores that element of the population will "reach the highest success." In this sentence, Washington introduces the major theme of his address: that the destinies and well-being of African American southerners and white southerners are inextricably linked. He returns to this theme again and again. Washington concludes this paragraph by praising the leaders of the exposition for recognizing the "value and manhood of the American Negro" throughout the planning and staging of the event. This statement is often viewed as obsequious; however, the role afforded African Americans, from the lobbying efforts, the planning of the black exhibits, and Washington's participation in the opening ceremonies, contrasted considerably with blacks' roles in the World's Columbian Exposition of 1893 as well as other previous expositions.

Booker T. Washington (Library of Congress)

The second paragraph contains the type of language that most irritated Washington's critics. After the rather serious opening, Washington feeds negative racial stereotypes when he essentially apologizes for the ignorance and inexperience that led newly emancipated blacks to make unwise choices, seeking political office rather than land or industrial skills and prizing political activity over entrepreneurship. Critics cite this paragraph as evidence that Washington acquiesced to white efforts to deprive blacks of their political rights. In truth, Washington consistently opposed both publicly and privately the disenfranchisement of southern blacks. However, Washington did feel that blacks should place greater emphasis on their economic betterment.

The third paragraph centers on one of Washington's best-known homilies. This is the story of the ship lost at sea, its crew dying of thirst and sending out a desperate cry for water, only to be told, "Cast down your bucket where you are." Washington uses this story to admonish the blacks in his audience to "cast down your bucket where you are," that is, to remain in the South rather than attempt to better their condition in a "foreign land." Washington consistently advised African Americans not to follow the Exodusters west, join the trickle to northern cities that twenty years later became the black migration, or follow those who advocated immigration to a black-governed country, such as Haiti or Liberia. As discrimination and racial violence intensified, many considered Washington's advice to be misguided, binding blacks to a new slavery. Washington, however, argued that African Americans must work with their white neighbors—but without surrendering their dignity: "'Cast down your bucket where you are'—cast it down in making friends in every manly way of all the people of all races by whom we are surrounded" (emphasis added).

The next paragraph continues this argument. Still addressing the African Americans in the audience, Washington continues: "Cast it down in agriculture, mechanics, in commerce, in domestic service, and in the professions." Here Washington is laying out his economic agenda. While he is usually cited for promoting only low-skilled, working-class, and agricultural labor for blacks, here he is quite specific—his list of occupations includes commerce and the professions. Washington acknowledges that initially, lacking skills, capital, and education, most blacks will survive by the labor "of [their] hands," and he warns blacks not to denigrate the dignity and importance of this type of work. He also warns blacks not to sacrifice the habits of thrift and the accumulation of property and real wealth by conspicuous consumption and the superficial trappings of opulence. He notes that "there is as much dignity in tilling a field as in writing a poem," not to criticize poets but to recognize the importance of farmers. Finally, he warns blacks not to let discrimination and injustice blind them to the opportunities that surround them. In other words, if they focus only on their victimization, they will not succeed.

In paragraph 5, Washington shifts his focus to the white portion of his audience. Very carefully he lays out what white southerners must do, always recognizing that if he pushes too hard or too far he will fail and that failure would jeopardize Tuskegee and possibly his own safety. He begins with the very gentle phrase, "were I permitted I would repeat what I say to my own race"; then he tells white southerners to "'Cast down your bucket where you are.' Cast it down among the eight millions of Negroes whose habits you know, whose fidelity and love you have tested in days when to have proved treacherous meant the ruin of your firesides." Washington is telling white southerners to employ African Americans, not the immigrants who are pouring into the country from southern and eastern Europe; his reference to "strikes and labour wars" refers to the turmoil of recent clashes between unions and factory owners, such as the Homestead strike (1892) among steelworkers and the Pullman strike (1894) of factory workers. In his reference to the testing of black fidelity and love, he is referring to the Civil War and reminding whites that at the time they were most vulnerable, with most men off at war, blacks did not strike down the families they left behind. In discussing the contributions of blacks to the development of the South, Washington refers to both tilling the fields and building the cities, and for the future he depicts blacks buying land, making waste areas blossom, and running factories. Throughout this section Washington softens his message with references to the African American people as law-abiding, unresentful, loyal, and faithful, and he reminds his audience that blacks have nursed whites' children, cared for their aged, and mourned their dead.

The Cotton States and International Exposition (Library of Congress)

Washington concludes paragraph 5 with his most famous statement: "In all things that are purely social we can be as separate as the fingers, yet one as the hand in all things essential to mutual progress." This sentence is at the heart of the criticism of Washington and the Atlanta Exposition Address. Looked at out of context, it seems to acquiesce to "separate but equal" segregation. However, the sentence was spoken in a context that leaves the meaning less clear. Immediately preceding it, Washington spoke of blacks "interlacing our industrial, commercial, civil, and religious life with yours in a way that shall make the interests of both races one," picking up the theme introduced in the first paragraph that the destinies of black and white southerners are intertwined.

In the very short sixth paragraph, Washington continues to discuss the connectedness of blacks and whites, observing that the security of both races requires the "highest intelligence and development of all" and urging whites to invest in the advancement of African Americans for the betterment of all.

In paragraph 7, Washington breaks the narrative and quotes from the poem "At Port Royal," written by the abolitionist poet John Greenleaf Whittier in 1862 to celebrate the November 1861 Union victory over the South and the occupation of the Port Royal area on the Georgia and South Carolina coasts. This battle was significant because the Union army liberated a number of slaves. It was one of the earliest steps toward emancipation. Quoting the most celebrated abolitionist poet to a largely white audience in Atlanta was very daring of Washington. Washington's message is one of oppressor and oppressed, bound together,

Essential Quotes

"'Cast down your bucket where you are.' Cast it down among the eight millions of Negroes whose habits you know, whose fidelity and love you have tested in days when to have proved treacherous meant the ruin of your firesides."

(Paragraph 5)

"In all things that are purely social we can be as separate as the fingers, yet one as the hand in all things essential to mutual progress."

(Paragraph 5)

"We shall contribute one-third to the business and industrial prosperity of the South, or we shall prove a veritable body of death, stagnating, depressing, retarding every effort to advance the body politic."

(Paragraph 8)

"The wisest among my race understand that the agitation of questions of social equality is the extremest folly, and that progress in the enjoyment of all the privileges that will come to us must be the result of severe and constant struggle rather than of artificial forcing."

(Paragraph 10)

"No race that has anything to contribute to the markets of the world is long in any degree ostracized."

(Paragraph 10)

"The opportunity to earn a dollar in a factory just now is worth infinitely more than the opportunity to spend a dollar in an opera-house."

(Paragraph 10)

confronting one fate. It is very likely that most whites in the audience knew the poem.

For those in the audience who might not know the poem or understand its message, Washington repeats it in very clear, unambiguous language in paragraph 8. Either blacks and whites cooperate for the betterment of the South, or blacks will work against whites and retard progress; either blacks will constitute one-third of the South's "intelligence and progress" and one-third of its "business and industrial prosperity," or "we shall prove a veritable body of death, stagnating, depressing, retarding every effort to advance the body politic." Washington threatens white southerners with economic and social catastrophe unless they are willing to work with blacks and allow blacks to share appropriately in southern progress and development.

After stating this grim warning, Washington turns to humor to defuse the tension. He begins paragraph 9 with a reference that caters to the white stereotype of blacks as petty thieves—much to the dismay of his critics. The rest of the paragraph is conciliatory. Washington describes the advances and accomplishments that African Americans had made in the thirty years since emancipation and the assistance from southern states and northern philanthropists that made this progress possible.

Paragraph 10 consists of three often-quoted sentences. In the first Washington asserts that "agitation of questions of social equality is the extremest folly" but that progress toward equality will result from "severe and constant struggle" rather than from "artificial forcing." Here again Washington is ambiguous, on the one hand denouncing agitation and on the other advocating prolonged struggle. The difference may lie in the term social equality, which some scholars suggest southerners equated with intermarriage. The second sentence reflects Washington's conviction that economic prosperity would erase racial prejudice. Washington ends this paragraph by asserting that at the current time, it is more important that blacks achieve the right to work in a factory than to buy a seat in the opera house. Again Washington expresses his belief that in the short term, economic prosperity should be the highest priority for African Americans. His critics accused him of again accepting segregation.

In the final paragraph, Washington ends where he began, praising the organizers of the exhibition and observing the tremendous progress blacks and whites have made, the former starting as slaves with nothing and the latter coming out of a war in which they lost everything. He again links the destiny of the two races and adds a religious component. It is God who has laid before the South the task of creating a just society, free of "sectional differences and racial animosities and suspicions." If whites, with the support of blacks, resolve this problem, they will bring into the South a "new heaven and a new earth," a reference drawn from Revelation 21:1. Left unspoken is the alternative described in Revelation 21:8 and known to most listeners. The failure to create a just society (a new heaven and a new earth) will be a fate shared by all southerners—the "lake which burneth with fire and brimstone: which is the second death."

Audience

The initial audience that Washington addressed was a few thousand southerners gathered in Atlanta for the opening of the exposition. Louis Harlan, Washington's principal biographer, describes the auditorium as "packed with humanity from bottom to top"; outside were "thousands more … unable to get in." Still, this was a relatively small but important audience. The majority were white southerners, a very difficult audience for Washington to face. In 1895 few white southerners would have tolerated being lectured to by a black man. Washington had to make his points both gently and diplomatically without surrendering his dignity or his convictions. Also present in the audience were black southerners, fewer in number, attracted to the auditorium by the unusual opportunity to see a black man address an audience of prominent whites. Washington could also expect that his words, at least in part, would be reported throughout the black community. What Washington did not anticipate was the much larger national audience that his speech would reach. Within a few days his Atlanta Exposition Address was reported in whole or in part in newspapers across the land. Washington would quickly become the most widely known African American in the country, and passages from his speech would become fixed in popular culture and American memory.

Impact

The immediate response to the speech was phenomenal. In the auditorium the audience burst into thunderous applause the moment Washington finished speaking; the former governor of Georgia, who had presided over the proceedings, rushed forward to congratulate Washington. Newspapers around the country reported the address and reprinted the speech. Perhaps none did so as effusively as Joseph Pulitzer's New York World, with headlines announcing that "A Negro Moses Spoke for a Race." The reporter described Washington facing the crowd with the sun in his eyes, his "whole face lit up with the fire of prophecy.… It electrified the audience, and the response was as if it had come from the throat of a whirlwind." Within days, letters and telegrams poured in praising Washington and his speech, anointing Washington as the successor to the recently deceased Frederick Douglass, and comparing the speech to Lincoln's Gettysburg Address. One who sent his congratulations was Du Bois, who telegraphed, "Let me heartily congratulate you on your phenomenal success in Atlanta—it was a word fitly spoken." He followed it up with a letter to the New York Age, praising the Atlanta speech as a basis for a real settlement of the racial problems in the South. There was also some opposition, especially among northern blacks. The Washington Bee published a very critical editorial depicting the speech as a surrender to whites. Others rejected the comparison of Washington to Douglass, while still others cringed at Washington's use of stereotyped images of blacks as a source of humor. On the whole, however, public comment, black and white, was very favorable. The real criticism would come later.

The Atlanta Exposition Address made Washington a national figure and the most influential and powerful African American in the United States. In 1898 President William McKinley visited Tuskegee, affirming Washington's new prominence, and in 1901 Washington dined with President Roosevelt in the White House. Less publicly but even more significantly, President McKinley, President Roosevelt, and President William Taft regularly consulted with Washington on issues of significance to African Americans and on their appointments of both blacks and many white southerners to federal positions. Washington, in turn, developed a powerful political machine with allies among most prominent black Republicans and many black newspaper editors. Parallel to his expanding political power, Washington established close contacts among many of the most powerful white business leaders. In the process, he expanded his already effective fund-raising operation for Tuskegee into an economic machine that effectively controlled the distribution of white philanthropy into the black community.

History, however, has not been kind to Washington or his Atlanta address. By 1910 Du Bois and most northern black intellectuals either viewed the Atlanta speech as a surrender to white racism or blamed Washington and the policies enunciated in Atlanta for the deterioration of African American rights and the rise in racial violence. Within the black community this negative view persisted throughout most of the twentieth century. Finally, the Atlanta address, accurately or inaccurately, has become a symbol of a dichotomy in African American political thought—the division between those advocating a nonconfrontational economic and community-building approach to America's racial problems and those who push a more militant program of integration and immediate civil and political rights.

See also Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1865); Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1868); Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1870); Ku Klux Klan Act (1871); Civil Rights Cases (1883); Plessy v. Ferguson (1896); Martin Luther King, Jr.: "I Have a Dream" (1963).

Further Reading

■ Books

Brundage, W. Fitzhugh, ed. Booker T. Washington and Black Progress: Up from Slavery 100 Years Later. Gainesville: University of Florida Press, 2003.

Harlan, Louis R. Booker T. Washington: The Making of a Black Leader, 1856–1901. New York: Oxford University Press, 1972.

———. Booker T. Washington: The Wizard of Tuskegee, 1901–1915. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.

———, et al., eds. The Booker T. Washington Papers. 14 vols. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1972–1989.

Meier, August. Negro Thought in America, 1880–1915: Racial Ideologies in the Age of Booker T. Washington. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1968.

Questions for Further Study

1. Critics of Washington and his Atlanta Exposition Address have accused him of betraying African Americans by giving in to southern perceptions of the racial inferiority of African Americans and accepting segregation and the loss of the African American political rights and the right to vote. To what extent is this criticism valid? To what extent is it not valid?

2. What rights does Washington assert for African Americans in the Atlanta address? How do these rights differ from those championed by the organizers of the Niagara Movement in their 1905 Declaration of Principles?

3. Washington delivered this speech in Atlanta, Georgia, in 1895. How did the location of the speech affect what Washington said? How might the speech have been different had Washington delivered it in New York rather than Atlanta?

4. One theme that Washington develops in this speech is the concept that the destinies of black southerners and white southerners are intertwined. How does Washington argue this point? What is the significance of this argument? Explain whether this argument is an effective basis for resolving racial problems in the South.

Moore, Jacqueline H. Booker T. Washington, W. E. B. Du Bois, and the Struggle for Racial Uplift. Wilmington, Del.: Scholarly Resources, 2003.

Washington, Booker T. An Autobiography: The Story of My Life and Work. Chicago: J. L. Nichols, 1900.

———. Up from Slavery: An Autobiography. New York: Doubleday, 1901.

West, Michael Rudolph. The Education of Booker T. Washington: American Democracy and the Idea of Race Relations. New York: Columbia University Press, 2006.

Wolters, Raymond. Du Bois and His Rivals. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2002.

Web Sites

"The Booker T. Washington Papers." University of Illinois Press Web site.
http://www.historycooperative.org/btw/info.html.

"South's New Epoch." New York World, September 19, 1895. University of Illinois Press Web site.
http://www.historycooperative.org/btw/Vol.4/html/3.html.

—Cary D. Wintz

Document Text

Booker T. Washington's Atlanta Exposition Address

Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Board of Directors and Citizens:

One-third of the population of the South is of the Negro race. No enterprise seeking the material, civil, or moral welfare of this section can disregard this element of our population and reach the highest success. I but convey to you, Mr. President and Directors, the sentiment of the masses of my race when I say that in no way have the value and manhood of the American Negro been more fittingly and generously recognized than by the managers of this magnificent Exposition at every stage of its progress. It is a recognition that will do more to cement the friendship of the two races than any occurrence since the dawn of our freedom.

Not only this, but the opportunity here afforded will awaken among us a new era of industrial progress. Ignorant and inexperienced, it is not strange that in the first years of our new life we began at the top instead of at the bottom; that a seat in Congress or the state legislature was more sought than real estate or industrial skill; that the political convention or stump speaking had more attractions than starting a dairy farm or truck garden.

A ship lost at sea for many days suddenly sighted a friendly vessel. From the mast of the unfortunate vessel was seen a signal, "Water, water; we die of thirst!" The answer from the friendly vessel at once came back, "Cast down your bucket where you are." A second time the signal, "Water, water; send us water!" ran up from the distressed vessel, and was answered, "Cast down your bucket where you are." And a third and fourth signal for water was answered, "Cast down your bucket where you are." The captain of the distressed vessel, at last heeding the injunction, cast down his bucket, and it came up full of fresh, sparkling water from the mouth of the Amazon River. To those of my race who depend on bettering their condition in a foreign land or who underestimate the importance of cultivating friendly relations with the Southern white man, who is their next-door neighbor, I would say: "Cast down your bucket where you are"—cast it down in making friends in every manly way of the people of all races by whom we are surrounded.

Cast it down in agriculture, mechanics, in commerce, in domestic service, and in the professions. And in this connection it is well to bear in mind that whatever other sins the South may be called to bear, when it comes to business, pure and simple, it is in the South that the Negro is given a man's chance in the commercial world, and in nothing is this Exposition more eloquent than in emphasizing this chance. Our greatest danger is that in the great leap from slavery to freedom we may overlook the fact that the masses of us are to live by the productions of our hands, and fail to keep in mind that we shall prosper in proportion as we learn to dignify and glorify common labour, and put brains and skill into the common occupations of life; shall prosper in proportion as we learn to draw the line between the superficial and the substantial, the ornamental gewgaws of life and the useful. No race can prosper till it learns that there is as much dignity in tilling a field as in writing a poem. It is at the bottom of life we must begin, and not at the top. Nor should we permit our grievances to overshadow our opportunities.

To those of the white race who look to the incoming of those of foreign birth and strange tongue and habits for the prosperity of the South, were I permitted I would repeat what I say to my own race, "Cast down your bucket where you are." Cast it down among the eight millions of Negroes whose habits you know, whose fidelity and love you have tested in days when to have proved treacherous meant the ruin of your firesides. Cast down your bucket among these people who have, without strikes and labour wars, tilled your fields, cleared your forests, builded your railroads and cities, and brought forth treasures from the bowels of the earth, and helped make possible this magnificent representation of the progress of the South. Casting down your bucket among my people, helping and encouraging them as you are doing on these grounds, and to education of head, hand, and heart, you will find that they will buy your surplus land, make blossom the waste places in your fields, and run your factories. While doing this, you can be sure in the future, as in the past, that you and your families will be surrounded by the most patient, faithful, law-abiding, and unresentful people that the world has seen. As we have proved our loyalty to you in the past, in nursing your children, watching by the sick-bed of your mothers and fathers, and often following them with tear-dimmed eyes to their graves, so in the future, in our humble way, we shall stand by you with a devotion that no foreigner can approach, ready to lay down our lives, if need be, in defense of yours, interlacing our industrial, commercial, civil, and religious life with yours in a way that shall make the interests of both races one. In all things that are purely social we can be as separate as the fingers, yet one as the hand in all things essential to mutual progress.

Document Text

There is no defense or security for any of us except in the highest intelligence and development of all. If anywhere there are efforts tending to curtail the fullest growth of the Negro, let these efforts be turned into stimulating, encouraging, and making him the most useful and intelligent citizen. Effort or means so invested will pay a thousand per cent interest. These efforts will be twice blessed—blessing him that gives and him that takes. There is no escape through law of man or God from the inevitable:

> The laws of changeless justice bind
> Oppressor with oppressed;
> And close as sin and suffering joined
> We march to fate abreast...

Nearly sixteen millions of hands will aid you in pulling the load upward, or they will pull against you the load downward. We shall constitute one-third and more of the ignorance and crime of the South, or one-third [of] its intelligence and progress; we shall contribute one-third to the business and industrial prosperity of the South, or we shall prove a veritable body of death, stagnating, depressing, retarding every effort to advance the body politic.

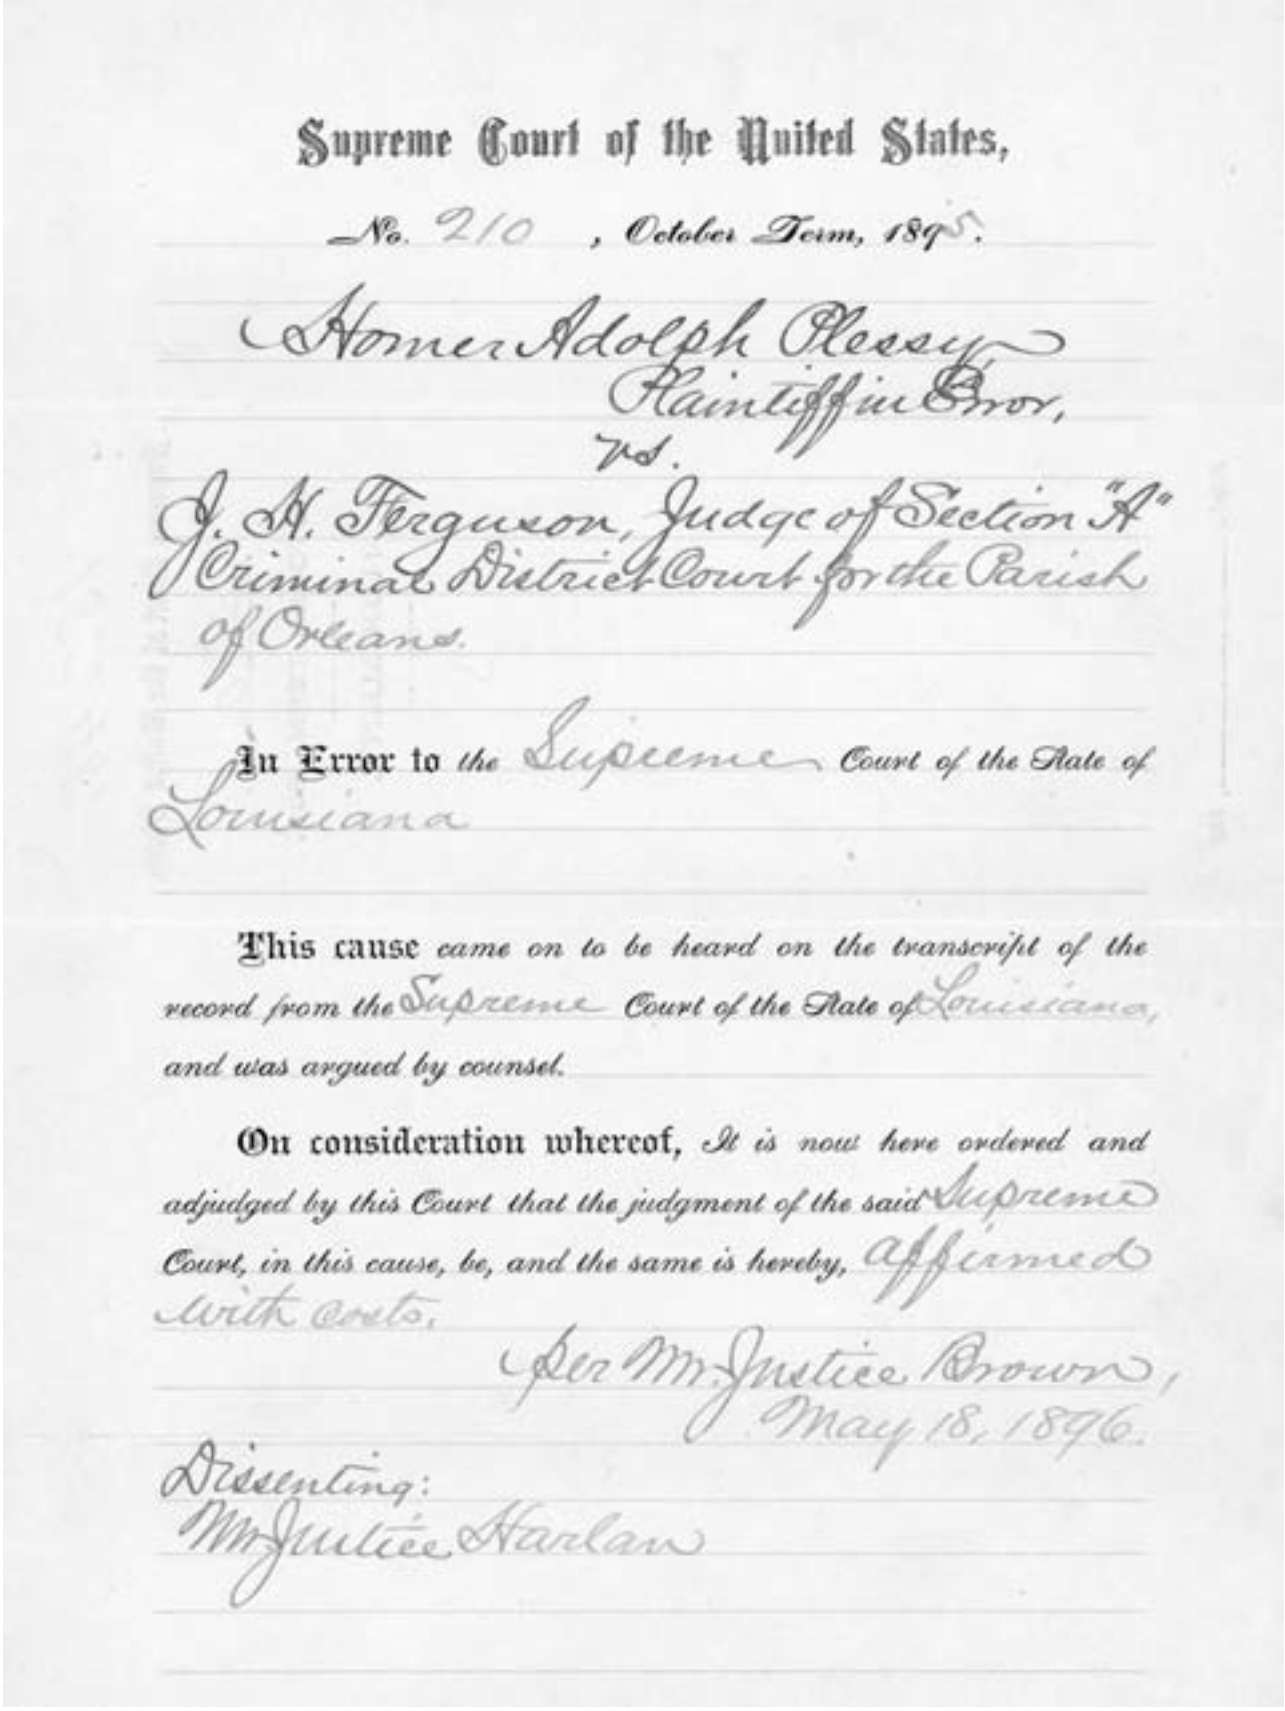
Gentlemen of the Exposition, as we present to you our humble effort at an exhibition of our progress, you must not expect overmuch. Starting thirty years ago with ownership here and there in a few quilts and pumpkins and chickens (gathered from miscellaneous sources), remember the path that has led from these to the inventions and production of agricultural implements, buggies, steam-engines, newspapers, books, statuary, carving, paintings, the management of drug stores and banks, has not been trodden without contact with thorns and thistles. While we take pride in what we exhibit as a result of our independent efforts, we do not for a moment forget that our part in this exhibition would fall far short of your expectations but for the constant help that has come to our educational life, not only from the Southern states, but especially from Northern philanthropists, who have made their gifts a constant stream of blessing and encouragement.

The wisest among my race understand that the agitation of questions of social equality is the extremest folly, and that progress in the enjoyment of all the privileges that will come to us must be the result of severe and constant struggle rather than of artificial forcing. No race that has anything to contribute to the markets of the world is long in any degree ostracized. It is important and right that all privileges of the law be ours, but it is vastly more important that we be prepared for the exercise of these privileges. The opportunity to earn a dollar in a factory just now is worth infinitely more than the opportunity to spend a dollar in an opera-house.

In conclusion, may I repeat that nothing in thirty years has given us more hope and encouragement, and drawn us so near to you of the white race, as this opportunity offered by the Exposition; and here bending, as it were, over the altar that represents the results of the struggles of your race and mine, both starting practically empty-handed three decades ago, I pledge that in your effort to work out the great and intricate problem which God has laid at the doors of the South, you shall have at all times the patient, sympathetic help of my race; only let this be constantly in mind, that, while from representations in these buildings of the product of field, of forest, of mine, of factory, letters, and art, much good will come, yet far above and beyond material benefits will be that higher good, that, let us pray God, will come, in a blotting out of sectional differences and racial animosities and suspicions, in a determination to administer absolute justice, in a willing obedience among all classes to the mandates of law. This, coupled with our material prosperity, will bring into our beloved South a new heaven and a new earth.

Glossary

body politic	the people as a whole in a state or a nation
letters	literature
mandates	authoritative demands or requirements
sectional	related to one part or state of a country over another



Supreme Court of the United States,

No. 210, October Term, 1895.

Homer Adolph Plessy Plaintiff in Error, vs.
J. H. Ferguson, Judge of Section "A" Criminal District Court for the Parish of Orleans.

In Error to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record from the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana, and was argued by counsel.

On consideration whereof, It is now here ordered and adjudged by this Court that the judgment of the said Supreme Court, in this cause, be, and the same is hereby, Affirmed with costs.

Per Mr. Justice Brown,
May 18, 1896.

Dissenting:
Mr. Justice Harlan

Plessy v. Ferguson (National Archieves and Records Administration)

Plessy v. Ferguson

1896

"If one race be inferior to the other socially, the constitution of the United States cannot put them upon the same plane."

Overview

Plessy v. Ferguson, argued on April 13, 1896, and decided on May 18, 1896, is probably best known for giving the United States the "separate but equal" doctrine. The case probably ranks close to Dred Scott v. Sandford (1857) as one of the most influential and thoroughly repudiated cases the Supreme Court has ever decided. The majority opinion was written by Justice Henry Billings Brown of Massachusetts, and it gained the assent of six additional justices. That opinion provided a legal imprimatur to segregation and the Jim Crow system of laws that flourished from the late nineteenth century through much of the twentieth century. Plessy held that notwithstanding the Reconstruction Amendments (the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments), which were passed in the wake of the Civil War to grant equal citizenship to African Americans and promised the equal protection of the laws to all persons, the United States Constitution allowed states to segregate their black and white citizens when traveling on intrastate railroads. The separate but equal doctrine was applied to more than just railroads and supported segregation until it was largely repudiated, though not explicitly overruled, in Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka (1954).

Justice John Marshall Harlan of Kentucky wrote the sole dissent in Plessy, which provided much of the rhetorical support for the twentieth-century civil rights movement. Justice Harlan argued that the Reconstruction Amendments' guarantees of equality were so incompatible with segregation that segregation was unconstitutional. Justice David Brewer did not participate in the case.

Context

Although the Civil War ended just over thirty years before Plessy v. Ferguson was decided, the case was yet a result of the lingering conflict that existed after the war. During the decade following the Civil War, known as the Reconstruction era, America was a place of great change with respect to race relations. During the five years following the end of the war, the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments (collectively known as the Civil War or Reconstruction Amendments) were passed. The Thirteenth Amendment outlawed slavery. The Fourteenth Amendment was passed after it became clear that the Thirteenth Amendment could not guarantee that individual states would grant the full equality that many had believed would result from the end of slavery. The Fifteenth Amendment, which stated that voting rights could not be abridged based on race, color, or previous condition of servitude, was ratified to guarantee political equality for African American men. Taken together, these amendments were designed to make African Americans (former slaves and free blacks) full and equal participants in American society. In addition, Congress passed a number of laws designed to protect the newly won civil rights of black citizens and allow the full enjoyment of equal citizenship. For example, Congress passed the Civil Rights Act of 1875, which required that black citizens be provided the same access to public accommodations, such as railroads, theaters, and inns, as white citizens.

Although race relations were hardly smooth after the Civil War, Congress made clear that equality under the law was to be the order of the day. However, the presidential election of 1876 changed the course of the country. Rutherford Hayes and Samuel Tilden ran a very close election that had to be decided in the House of Representatives. In exchange for support to become president, Hayes agreed to end the Reconstruction era in the South and withdraw the remaining federal troops there. The withdrawal of troops signaled the psychological end to Reconstruction and the coming of a Jim Crow society based on racial separation and racial caste.

Louisiana's story tracks that of the South, though New Orleans had always enjoyed more racial mixing than other parts of the South. For example, just after the end of the Civil War, Louisiana enacted its Black Code. However, in 1868 Louisiana ratified a state constitution that provided equal rights to African Americans. Around this time, Louisiana also desegregated its schools. As with the rest of the South, however, the end of Reconstruction triggered the arrival of Jim Crow laws. Both Louisiana and New Orleans slid toward state-mandated segregation.

The segregationists consolidated power through the 1870s and the 1880s. In the 1880s many southern states

Time Line

1875

■ March 1
The Civil Rights Act of 1875 is passed, barring racial discrimination in public accommodations, including public conveyances.

1877

■ The Compromise of 1877 allows Rutherford B. Hayes to become president on the condition that Hayes remove remaining federal troops from the South.

1880s

■ Some southern states begin to require segregated railroad cars.

1883

■ October 16
The Supreme Court decides that the Civil Rights Cases deeming the Civil Rights Act of 1875 unconstitutional are outside congressional scope of power.

1890s

■ Southern states revise constitutions in large part to disenfranchise African Americans and limit other civil rights.

1890

■ The Supreme Court decides Louisville, New Orleans & Texas Railway Co. v. Mississippi, which denies an interstate commerce–based challenge to Mississippi's Separate Car Act.

■ July 10
Louisiana passes the Separate Car Act, which Home Plessy eventually challenges.

1892

■ June 7
Homer Plessy is arrested after boarding a train and refusing to sit in the car assigned for colored people.

1893

■ The Panic of 1893 triggers an economic depression in the United States.

1895

■ September 18
Booker T. Washington gives his Atlanta Exposition Address, arguing for accommodation to segregation and urging focus on economic self-determination rather than on integration.

began to pass laws requiring the segregation of railroad cars. In 1890 Louisiana joined those states in passing the Separate Car Act of 1890. As a result of the legislation, a number of African Americans created the Citizens' Committee to Test the Constitutionality of the Separate Car Act to challenge the law and to attempt to protect the gains won for African Americans during the Reconstruction era. Homer Plessy's case was a test case designed specifically to challenge the Separate Car Act and the coming of the Jim Crow laws. The case had the potential to either stem the tide of racial separatism or drive a nail in the coffin of racial equality and reconciliation.

About the Author

Justice Henry Billings Brown wrote the majority opinion in Plessy v. Ferguson. Brown was born on March 2, 1836, in South Lee, Massachusetts. After graduating from Yale College, he studied law at Yale Law School and Harvard Law School. He served as a U.S. deputy marshal, assistant U.S. attorney, and federal judge of the Eastern District of Michigan for fifteen years before being confirmed to the U.S. Supreme Court in 1890. He retired from the Court in 1906 and died on September 4, 1913.

Justice John Marshall Harlan wrote the sole dissenting opinion in Plessy v. Ferguson. Harlan was born on June 1, 1833, in Boyle County, Kentucky. After graduating from Centre College, he studied law at Transylvania University. Although he was a former slaveholder, Harlan fought for the Union army in the Civil War. Harlan opposed abolition before the war and full equality for blacks just after the war. However, in the wake of the Civil War, Harlan joined the Republican Party and reversed his view of slavery and many racial equality issues. Harlan was confirmed to the Court on November 29, 1877. In addition to the Plessy dissent, he dissented in the Civil Rights Cases (1883), arguing that the Civil Rights Act of 1875 was constitutional and should have been held to legally require equal public accommodations for those of all races. Harlan served on the Court until his death on October 14, 1911.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

♦ Statement of the Case

The case begins with a recitation of the facts of the case and its legal posture. On June 7, 1892, Plessy, the defendant also known as the plaintiff in error, paid for a first-class train ticket on the East Louisiana Railway headed from New Orleans to Covington, Louisiana, and sat down in an empty seat in the railroad car reserved for whites. He was "of seven-eighths Caucasian and one-eighth African blood" and had such a light complexion that one could not tell that he had any African ancestry. However, Plessy had already decided to challenge the law before boarding the train. Thus, after sitting down, Plessy informed the conductor that he was of mixed blood. He was told he had to move to the section for nonwhites or get off the train. Plessy was "forcibly ejected from said coach" and taken to jail after he refused to move.

Plessy was charged with violating an act of the Louisiana legislature commonly known as the Separate Car Act of 1890. In response to the charge, Plessy asserted that the act violated the U.S. Constitution. The Louisiana trial court disagreed and, according to the statement of the case as noted in the Plessy decision, stated that unless "the judge of the said court be enjoined by a writ of prohibition from further proceeding in such case, the court will proceed to fine and sentence petitioner to imprisonment." Plessy sought a writ of prohibition that would stop the court from enforcing the act. The Louisiana Supreme Court determined that the Separate Car Act was constitutional and denied the writ of prohibition. Consequently, Plessy "prayed for a writ of error from this court" and the case came to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Time Line

1896	■ May 18 Plessy v. Ferguson is decided.
1897	■ January 11 Plessy pleads guilty to violating the Separate Car Act and pays a $25 fine.
1898	■ Louisiana holds a constitutional convention that effectively disenfranchises its African American citizens.
1909	■ February 12 The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People is formed.

♦ Majority Opinion of Justice Henry Billings Brown

Brown's opinion for the Court follows the recitation of facts. It begins by noting that the key issue is "the constitutionality of an act of the general assembly of the state of Louisiana, passed in 1890, providing for separate railway carriages for the white and colored races." The opinion then describes the content of the statute. The first section of the statute requires that railway companies other than street railroads provide "equal but separate accommodations for the white, and colored races," either by providing separate train cars or by erecting partitions in a single railcar that separates the races. The second section of the statute requires that the companies segregate their passengers by race. Train conductors and other company employees were required to assign passengers to respective accommodations by race. Passengers who refused to go to their assigned accommodations and train employees who intentionally assigned passengers to the wrong accommodations were liable for a fine of $25 or up to twenty days in jail. A railway company could refuse to carry a passenger who refused to sit in his or her assigned car, and no damages would arise based on the refusal. The third section of the act provides penalties for employees of the railway company who refuse to comply with the act, but it excepts "nurses attending children of the other race." According to Brown, the fourth section of the act is immaterial.

The opinion repeats facts from the statement of the case: that Plessy was of seven-eighths Caucasian and one-eighth African blood, that one could not tell that he was part African by looking at him, that he sat down in a vacant seat in the coach assigned for whites, that he did not move when he was told to move, that he was removed from the train, and that he was taken to the parish jail. Brown notes that Plessy claims that the Separate Car Act is unconstitutional under both the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments. Brown quickly addresses the Thirteenth Amendment claim and then spends the rest of the opinion addressing the Fourteenth Amendment claim.

Brown explains that the Thirteenth Amendment addresses slavery and like conditions such as "Mexican peonage or the Chinese coolie trade." In addition, the amendment applies to attempts to place people into involuntary servitude or to place badges of slavery on former slaves. However, says Brown, the Thirteenth Amendment is not applicable to this case. The statute at issue makes a distinction between the races based on color but does not seek to "destroy the legal equality of the two races, or re-establish a state of involuntary servitude." Brown notes that in cases like this one where a law allows or requires discrimination, if any amendment were to apply, it would be the Fourteenth, not the Thirteenth. This is because the Fourteenth Amendment was passed to address race-based distinctions that some believed effectively devalued the freedom given by the Thirteenth Amendment.

Brown begins his explanation of the applicability of the Fourteenth Amendment with an elucidation of its scope and limitations. He notes that the purpose of the amendment is "to establish the citizenship of the negro, to given definitions of citizenship of the United States and of the states, and to protect from the hostile legislation of the states the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, as distinguished from those of citizens of the states." Simply, the amendment provides equality of the races before the law. Equality before the law is not necessarily inconsistent with making race-based distinctions or even segregating the races, however. Brown notes that school segregation was allowed even in jurisdictions that scrupulously provided equal political rights between the races, citing Justice Lemuel Shaw's opinion in the 1849 case Roberts v. City of Boston. Although that case was decided before the Civil War and the passage of the Fourteenth Amendment and could not be deemed binding on any construction of the Fourteenth Amendment, Brown's point appears to be that there is a distinction between requiring equality before the law and requiring what he believes constituted social equality. In making his point, Brown previews an argument, which he would use later in the opinion, that enforced separation of the races does not suggest the inferiority of either race.

Supreme Court Justices in 1896 (Library of Congress)

Brown argues that the Fourteenth Amendment is a limitation on states when political or civil equality is at stake, rather than a mandate to allow Congress to grant positive rights to support notions of equality. For example, the Fourteenth Amendment requires that blacks and whites be treated equally when civil rights such as the ability to serve on a jury are at issue. Conversely, when social equality issues are at stake, such as conditions of travel, the Fourteenth Amendment leaves those matters to the states to regulate so long as no other constitutional provisions are violated. For example, when Louisiana sought to regulate racial aspects of how passengers were to be treated when traveling through the state in interstate travel, it would have been able to do so had the law not been related to interstate commerce, the regulation of which is left to Congress under the Constitution. That the Fourteenth Amendment generally leaves state prerogatives to regulate intact was made clear when the Court passed on the Civil Rights Act of 1875 in the Civil Rights Cases. There, the Court indicated that the Fourteenth Amendment does not give Congress the power to pass legislation that provides positive rights in areas of state prerogative such as the public accommodation of the races with respect to private businesses. Simply, the Fourteenth Amendment does not provide positive rights; it merely limits the kind of legislation states can pass.

Brown then directly addresses the constitutionality of the Separate Car Act. Although the act forced segregation, Brown finds that it does not harm the rights of African Americans because it "neither abridges the privileges or immunities of the colored man, deprives him of his property without due process of law, nor denies him the equal protection of the laws, within the meaning of the fourteenth amendment." The act had the potential to harm the rights of whites, however. If, as Plessy argues in the claim, the reputation of being a white person in a mixed-race community is like property, the act may have gone too far in protecting a conductor who improperly assigns whites to the black car and therefore damages the property value of the white person. Brown notes that this problem is of no moment to Plessy's claim, because a black man like Plessy loses no property value in his reputation by being improperly categorized as a white person.

In response to the argument that allowing racial separation opens the door to allowing the state to create other arbitrary distinctions based on race, Brown answers that the exercise of the state's police power itself has to be reasonable. The question is whether the Separate Car Act is reasonable based on "the established usages, customs, and traditions of the people, and with a view to the promotion of their comfort, and the preservation of the public peace and good order." Based on that standard, it is unclear that the segregation here is any worse than school segregation that, according to Brown, most courts appear to agree is constitutional.

After determining that the act is constitutional, Brown attempts to explain why the rule itself treats the races equally. He reprises his argument that forced segregation does not suggest the inferiority of either race and states that any inferiority that black citizens may feel comes from the spin blacks give to the act and not from the act itself. Indeed, he suggests that if a majority-black legislature had passed the act, whites would not feel inferior to blacks. Oddly, Brown then explains that voluntary mingling between the races is acceptable, but forced mingling by the state is not required. Given that the statute at issue stops voluntary mingling, Brown's argument is somewhat nonsensical. Brown ends the argument by suggesting that formal civil and political equality is as far as the Constitution does and can go. If the races are social unequals, the Constitution cannot remedy that situation. Brown ends his opinion by noting that it is unclear how much African blood makes one black for purposes of segregation statutes, but he leaves that issue to the individual states to decide.

♦ Dissenting Opinion of Justice John Marshall Harlan

Harlan begins by highlighting a few of the statute's salient points. He notes that the statute requires strict separation of the races with the exception of a nurse caring for a child of a different race. Indeed, a personal attendant could not attend to the needs of her employer if the attendant and employer were of different races unless the attendant wished to be held criminally liable. However, he notes, regardless of the fairness of the statute, the question for the Court is whether the statute's explicit regulation based on race is constitutional.

Essential Quotes

"We consider the underlying fallacy of the plaintiff's argument to consist in the assumption that the enforced separation of the two races stamps the colored race with a badge of inferiority. If this be so, it is not by reason of anything found in the act, but solely because the colored race chooses to put that construction upon it."

(Justice Henry Billings Brown, Majority Opinion)

"If the two races are to meet upon terms of social equality, it must be the result of natural affinities, a mutual appreciation of each other's merits, and a voluntary consent of individuals."

(Justice Henry Billings Brown, Majority Opinion)

"If the civil and political rights of both races be equal, one cannot be inferior to the other civilly or politically. If one race be inferior to the other socially, the constitution of the United States cannot put them upon the same plane."

(Justice Henry Billings Brown, Majority Opinion)

"The white race deems itself to be the dominant race in this country. And so it is, in prestige, in achievements, in education, in wealth, and in power. So, I doubt not, it will continue to be for all time.… But in view of the constitution, in the eye of the law, there is in this country no superior, dominant, ruling class of citizens.… Our constitution is color-blind, and neither knows nor tolerates classes among citizens."

(Justice John Marshall Harlan, Dissenting Opinion)

"In my opinion, the judgment this day rendered will, in time, prove to be quite as pernicious as the decision made by this tribunal in the Dred Scott Case."

(Justice John Marshall Harlan, Dissenting Opinion)

"What can more certainly arouse race hate … than state enactments which, in fact, proceed on the ground that colored citizens are so inferior and degraded that they cannot be allowed to sit in public coaches occupied by white citizens?"

(Justice John Marshall Harlan, Dissenting Opinion)

Harlan provides the general structure of his argument. The civil rights of all citizens are to be protected equally. Consequently, there is no reason for the government to consider the race of any person when regulating civil rights. When a government considers race when legislating regarding civil rights, not only does it improperly provide civil rights, it also improperly affects the liberty of all U.S. residents.

Harlan then indicates the purpose of the Reconstruction Amendments The Reconstruction Amendments provide a broad protection for the rights of all citizens. The Thirteenth Amendment abolishes slavery, "prevents the imposition of any burdens or disabilities that constitute badges of slavery or servitude," and "decreed universal civil freedom in this country." But the Thirteenth Amendment was not strong enough to fully protect the rights of former slaves. Consequently, the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified to ensure that the freedom provided by the Thirteenth Amendment could be fully exercised. By explicitly making African Americans citizens and by stopping states from regulating rights based on race, the Fourteenth Amendment "added greatly to the dignity and glory of American citizenship, and to the security of personal liberty." In combination, the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments were supposed to guarantee that "all the civil rights that pertain to freedom and citizenship" would be protected. The Fifteenth Amendment, which states that the right to vote is not provided on the basis of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, was added to guarantee that all citizens could participate "in the political control of his country." As a group, the Reconstruction Amendments were designed to guarantee that African Americans enjoyed the same rights as whites in the eyes of the law.

The Reconstruction Amendments were meant to ensure that blacks and former slaves were to be equal with whites and would enjoy the same rights. Even though the Fourteenth Amendment does not give positive rights, it does stop state governments from treating blacks badly merely because of their skin color. Indeed, the Supreme Court has made clear that with respect to civil and political rights, "all citizens are equal before the law." In concrete terms, this means that blacks cannot, for example, be kept from serving on juries. Harlan notes that the Supreme Court had decided so in Strauder v. West Virginia (1880)

Harlan then begins his attack on the majority's opinion by noting that the statute is clearly designed to keep blacks away from whites and that anyone who claims otherwise is lacking in candor. Then, rather than focusing directly on the equality issue, he suggests that the statute imperils liberty interests. That is, if people of different races want to sit together on a train, they are not allowed to do so under the statute without breaking the law. Harlan next suggests that allowing the law to stand could lead to ludicrous results, such as requiring that blacks use one side of the street and whites use the other side or requiring that blacks use one side of the courtroom and whites use the other side. Harlan's suggestion that blacks and whites might be segregated in the jury box is particularly biting, given that the Court had made clear in prior cases that blacks had a right to serve on integrated juries. How an integrated jury in a segregated jury box might work is anyone's guess.

Harlan then challenges the majority's notion that reasonableness is a ground on which to determine the constitutionality of a statute. He suggests that reasonableness is an issue for the legislature when passing a law. Constitutionality is an issue for the Court when reviewing legislation. It may be acceptable to consider reasonableness when determining how a statute will be interpreted consistent with legislative intent, but it is not acceptable to consider it when determining whether the legislature is allowed to pass a certain statute under the Constitution.

Harlan next begins a discussion that, through the years, would overtake the majority opinion in significance. First, he asserts that the Constitution is color-blind. Harlan, making his point in terms that are harsh to twenty-first-century ears, notes that the white race is dominant in America and that it likely would continue to be so. However, he states that the dominance of the white race does not mean that there is a caste system in America. Indeed, he argues that notwithstanding the relative position of the races, individuals must be treated as equals under the law. He states that the most powerful has no greater rights than the least powerful has and that the Court does a disservice when it claims otherwise. Harlan suggests, in fact, that the Court's vision is so troubling and antithetical to equality that the Plessy decision would become as nettlesome as the Dred Scott decision.

The effect of the Plessy decision, so suggests Harlan, would be to encourage some to create a caste system that would be antithetical to the Reconstruction Amendments. The decision is likely to cause great harm, given that blacks and whites need to learn to live together. Harlan suggests that laws like Louisiana's, which imply that blacks are "so inferior and degraded that they cannot be allowed to sit in public coaches occupied by white citizens," would elicit discord, distrust, and hate between the races.

Harlan then attacks the notion that the case is about social equality. The statute at issue relates to allowing people to sit in the same train car. Social equality is no more relevant to that issue than it is to the issue of having citizens of different races share the same street, share the same ballot box, or stand together at a political assembly. Indeed, Harlan notes, it is odd that one would raise the social equality issue in this context, given that the Chinese are considered so different from Americans that they are not allowed to become citizens. Although the Chinese cannot become citizens, they are allowed to ride in the same car as whites. Given that blacks are supposed to have equal rights as citizens, that they have fought in wars to preserve the Union, and that they have the right to share political control of the country, it is odd that they would not be allowed to share the same railway car with whites. In fact, Harlan argues, "the arbitrary separation of citizens, on the basis of race, while they are on a public highway, is a badge of servitude wholly inconsistent with the civil freedom and the equality before the law established by the constitution. It cannot be justified upon any legal grounds."

Harlan suggests that any harm that might come from having blacks and whites share railcars pales in comparison to the problems that would arise from denying civil rights by separating the races. If separation is appropriate, it is unclear why separation would not be appropriate when blacks are exercising rights that the Court agrees they must be allowed to exercise. He again suggests that, under the reasoning of Plessy, there would be nothing unconstitutional in a state's forcing jury boxes to be partitioned on the basis of race.

As he moves toward the conclusion of the dissent, Harlan argues that the cases that Brown cites to support segregation are from a bygone, pre–Civil War era during which inequality and slavery ruled. Given the mind-set of those who passed the laws and the absence of the Reconstruction Amendments, such cases are inapplicable to this situation and should be ignored. The question is not how to think about rights in an era of admitted inequality but what to do in an era when free blacks and former slaves are citizens and must be provided equal rights.

Harlan finishes by arguing that the law at issue is an affront to the liberty of all citizens and is inconsistent with the Constitution. He notes that if similar laws were passed by states and localities, trouble would ensue. Last, he indicates that if the right to provide rights unequally to citizens is allowed, black citizens who are full members in society would be placed "in a condition of legal inferiority." For the aforementioned reasons, Harlan notes, he is required to dissent.

Audience

Although the Plessy opinion was of particular use to Congress and the state legislatures that were beginning to impose the Jim Crow laws, the intended audience for the case was the country as a whole. Given that this was a decision of the Supreme Court, it is unclear that it should be taken as a call to action. Rather, it can be taken as an exposition on the meaning of the U.S. Constitution that might have the effect of emboldening state legislatures or cowing Congress but probably not as a case that was intended to have that effect.

Impact

The effect of Plessy v. Ferguson on the first half of the twentieth century cannot be overstated. Although the Plessy Court was not the first Court to provide a cramped reading of the Fourteenth Amendment, the context in which the reading occurred was important. Before Plessy, the Supreme Court decided that the Reconstruction Amendments could not be used to allow Congress to provide many positive rights to African Americans, notwithstanding the enforcement power provided to Congress in Section 5 of the amendment. However, Plessy limited the use of the Reconstruction Amendments by the courts to block state legislation that provided unequal rights to African Americans. Given the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection clause, the blocking function was arguably the narrowest and most essential function the Reconstruction Amendments could have had. Without the broad availability of the Reconstruction Amendments to stop attempts to limit participation of African Americans in as much of American life as possible, the proponents of Jim Crow laws had a largely open field. Plessy simply helped extend and legitimize the Jim Crow era, during which blacks would lose many of the gains made in the South since the end of the Civil War. It allowed for years of poor treatment of blacks at the hands of state legislatures rather than merely at the hands of private actors.

The separate but equal doctrine was the Plessy Court's lasting legacy. The doctrine was simple and effective. It provided segregationists with a simple tool and a constitutional imprimatur to regulate out of existence many rights thought to be protected by the Fourteenth Amendment. That doctrine provided constitutional protection to those who sought to limit the equality of African Americans. Segregationists were not simply allowed to make black citizens somewhat invisible through segregation; they were also emboldened to push the envelope of disenfranchisement and inequality as far as possible, knowing that the Supreme Court likely would not act to protect the equality of African Americans. Indeed, a number of southern states, including Louisiana, reworked their constitutions in the late nineteenth century to implicitly or explicitly take rights away from African Americans. Although some of these attempts predated Plessy, the results of some of those actions were effectively immunized by Plessy. Plessy simply made a caste system legally enforceable under a Constitution that guaranteed due process and equal protection.

Plessy was not a radical decision that took the country in a shockingly new direction. However, it did confirm a type of legislation that had been of questionable constitutionality in light of the Fourteenth Amendment. At the time of its passage, Plessy was not overly controversial to any of the justices save Harlan and possibly Brewer, who took no part in the decision. Indeed, the decision was not a widely cited constitutional case at its time or for a number of ensuing decades. Until the notion of separate but equal was challenged through cases brought by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and others, Plessy was standard constitutional law fare.

Over time, the majority opinion in Plessy fell out of favor, though many held on to the notion that separate but equal was a reasonable goal. The doctrine was the touchstone for segregationists for years. Segregationists, however, tended to adhere to the separate part of the doctrine but not the equal part. The claims of separate but equal facilities rang hollow when various groups documented the separate and unequal conditions that tended to exist in the South. The arguments eventually became too strong for the doctrine to resist. The doctrine was discarded in a string of Supreme Court cases throughout the middle part of the twentieth century, including Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka.

The eventual discarding of the majority opinion means that Harlan's dissent is far more well known and arguably more important than the majority opinion is today. The dissent not only predicted the racial discord that would follow Plessy; it also gave us the notion of a color-blind Constitution. The phrase color-blind Constitution was a slogan used to argue for an end to segregation and other racist laws. However, it has been used recently by some to argue that affirmative action and other race-conscious laws and remedies are inconsistent with constitutional doctrine. That battle continues to rage and is unlikely to be resolved any time soon.

See also Roberts v. City of Boston (1850); Dred Scott v. Sandford (1857); Black Code of Mississippi (1865); Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1865); Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1868); Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1870); Civil Rights Cases (1883); Brown v. Board of Education (1954).

Further Reading

■ Books

Fireside, Harvey. Separate and Unequal: Homer Plessy and the Supreme Court Decision That Legalized Racism. New York: Carroll & Graf, 2004.

Klarman, Michael J. From Jim Crow to Civil Rights: The Supreme Court and the Struggle for Racial Equality. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004.

Lofgren, Charles A. The Plessy Case: A Legal-Historical Interpretation. New York: Oxford University Press, 1987.

Medley, Keith Weldon. We as Freemen: Plessy v. Ferguson. Gretna, La.: Pelican, 2003.

Meyer, Howard N. The Amendment That Refused to Die: Equality and Justice Deferred, A History of the Fourteenth Amendment. Lanham, Md.: Madison Books, 2000.

Patrick, John J. The Young Oxford Companion to the Supreme Court of the United States. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Woodward, C. Vann. "The Case of the Louisiana Traveler." In Quarrels That Have Shaped the Constitution ed. John A. Garraty. New York: Harper & Row, 1987.

—Henry L. Chambers, Jr.

Questions for Further Study

1. Compare the majority opinions in Plessy v. Ferguson and Dred Scott v. Sandford. Many claim that both were riddled with factual and logical errors. However, taking the facts as the authors of the majority opinions claimed them to be, were either, both, or neither consistent with the Constitution as it was then written?

2. Compare Plessy v. Ferguson with Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka. Is the key distinction between them that the Brown Court took the harms of segregation seriously while the Plessy Court did not, or are there other distinctions that explain why the cases were decided so differently? How could each opinion have garnered such large majorities of the Court's justices? How could both cases be consistent with the Constitution?

3. Did Plessy v. Ferguson effectively gut the Reconstruction Amendments in general or the Fourteenth Amendment in particular?

4. Should the legacy of Jim Crow laws be placed at Justice Brown's feet, as he was the writer of the Plessy v. Ferguson majority opinion?

5. What would a world governed by Harlan's dissent in Plessy v. Ferguson have looked like twenty years after the case was decided?

Document Text

Plessy v. Ferguson

This was a petition for writs of prohibition and certiorari originally filed in the supreme court of the state by Plessy, the plaintiff in error, against the Hon. John H. Ferguson, judge of the criminal district court for the parish of Orleans, and setting forth, in substance, the following facts:

That petitioner was a citizen of the United States and a resident of the state of Louisiana, of mixed descent, in the proportion of seven-eighths Caucasian and one-eighth African blood; that the mixture of colored blood was not discernible in him, and that he was entitled to every recognition, right, privilege, and immunity secured to the citizens of the United States of the white race by its constitution and laws; that on June 7, 1892, he engaged and paid for a first-class passage on the East Louisiana Railway, from New Orleans to Covington, in the same state, and thereupon entered a passenger train, and took possession of a vacant seat in a coach where passengers of the white race were accommodated; that such railroad company was incorporated by the laws of Louisiana as a common carrier, and was not authorized to distinguish between citizens according to their race, but, notwithstanding this, petitioner was required by the conductor, under penalty of ejection from said train and imprisonment, to vacate said coach, and occupy another seat, in a coach assigned by said company for persons not of the white race, and for no other reason than that petitioner was of the colored race; that, upon petitioner's refusal to comply with such order, he was, with the aid of a police officer, forcibly ejected from said coach, and hurried off to, and imprisoned in, the parish jail of New Orleans, and there held to answer a charge made by such officer to the effect that he was guilty of having criminally violated an act of the general assembly of the state, approved July 10, 1890, in such case made and provided.

The petitioner was subsequently brought before the recorder of the city for preliminary examination, and committed for trial to the criminal district court for the parish of Orleans, where an information was filed against him in the matter above set forth, for a violation of the above act, which act the petitioner affirmed to be null and void, because in conflict with the constitution of the United States; that petitioner interposed a plea to such information, based upon the unconstitutionality of the act of the general assembly, to which the district attorney, on behalf of the state, filed a demurrer; that, upon issue being joined upon such demurrer and plea, the court sustained the demurrer, overruled the plea, and ordered petitioner to plead over to the facts set forth in the information, and that, unless the judge of the said court be enjoined by a writ of prohibition from further proceeding in such case, the court will proceed to fine and sentence petitioner to imprisonment, and thus deprive him of his constitutional rights set forth in his said plea, notwithstanding the unconstitutionality of the act under which he was being prosecuted; that no appeal lay from such sentence, and petitioner was without relief or remedy except by writs of prohibition and certiorari. Copies of the information and other proceedings in the criminal district court were annexed to the petition as an exhibit.

Upon the filing of this petition, an order was issued upon the respondent to show cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue, and be made perpetual, and a further order that the record of the proceedings had in the criminal cause be certified and transmitted to the supreme court.

To this order the respondent made answer, transmitting a certified copy of the proceedings, asserting the constitutionality of the law, and averring that, instead of pleading or admitting that he belonged to the colored race, the said Plessy declined and refused, either by pleading or otherwise, to admit that he was in any sense or in any proportion a colored man.

The case coming on for hearing before the supreme court, that court was of opinion that the law under which the prosecution was had was constitutional and denied the relief prayed for by the petitioner (Ex parte Plessy, 45 La. Ann. 80, 11 South. 948); whereupon petitioner prayed for a writ of error from this court, which was allowed by the chief justice of the supreme court of Louisiana.

Mr. Justice Harlan dissenting.

A. W. Tourgee and S. F. Phillips, for plaintiff in error.

Alex. Porter Morse, for defendant in error.

Justice Brown's Opinion of the Court

This case turns upon the constitutionality of an act of the general assembly of the state of Louisiana, passed in 1890, providing for separate railway carriages for the white and colored races. Acts 1890, No. 111, p. 152.

The first section of the statute enacts "that all railway companies carrying passengers in their coaches in this state, shall provide equal but separate accommodations for the white, and colored races, by providing two or more passenger coaches for each passenger train, or by dividing the passenger coaches by a partition so as to secure separate accommodations: provided, that this section shall not be construed to apply to street railroads. No person or persons shall be permitted to occupy seats in coaches, other than the ones assigned to them, on account of the race they belong to."

By the second section it was enacted "that the officers of such passenger trains shall have power and are hereby required to assign each passenger to the coach or compartment used for the race to which such passenger belongs; any passenger insisting on going into a coach or compartment to which by race he does not belong, shall be liable to a fine of twenty-five dollars, or in lieu thereof to imprisonment for a period of not more than twenty days in the parish prison, and any officer of any railroad insisting on assigning a passenger to a coach or compartment other than the one set aside for the race to which said passenger belongs, shall be liable to a fine of twenty-five dollars, or in lieu thereof to imprisonment for a period of not more than twenty days in the parish prison; and should any passenger refuse to occupy the coach or compartment to which he or she is assigned by the officer of such railway, said officer shall have power to refuse to carry such passenger on his train, and for such refusal neither he nor the railway company which he represents shall be liable for damages in any of the courts of this state."

The third section provides penalties for the refusal or neglect of the officers, directors, conductors, and employees of railway companies to comply with the act, with a proviso that "nothing in this act shall be construed as applying to nurses attending children of the other race." The fourth section is immaterial.

The information filed in the criminal district court charged, in substance, that Plessy, being a passenger between two stations within the state of Louisiana, was assigned by officers of the company to the coach used for the race to which he belonged, but he insisted upon going into a coach used by the race to which he did not belong. Neither in the information nor plea was his particular race or color averred.

The petition for the writ of prohibition averred that petitioner was seven-eighths Caucasian and one-eighth African blood; that the mixture of colored blood was not discernible in him; and that he was entitled to every right, privilege, and immunity secured to citizens of the United States of the white race; and that, upon such theory, he took possession of a vacant seat in a coach where passengers of the white race were accommodated, and was ordered by the conductor to vacate said coach, and take a seat in another, assigned to persons of the colored race, and, having refused to comply with such demand, he was forcibly ejected, with the aid of a police officer, and imprisoned in the parish jail to answer a charge of having violated the above act.

The constitutionality of this act is attacked upon the ground that it conflicts both with the thirteenth amendment of the constitution, abolishing slavery, and the fourteenth amendment, which prohibits certain restrictive legislation on the part of the states.

1. That it does not conflict with the thirteenth amendment, which abolished slavery and involuntary servitude, except a punishment for crime, is too clear for argument. Slavery implies involuntary servitude, a state of bondage; the ownership of mankind as a chattel, or, at least, the control of the labor and services of one man for the benefit of another, and the absence of a legal right to the disposal of his own person, property, and services. This amendment was said in the Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, to have been intended primarily to abolish slavery, as it had been previously known in this country, and that it equally forbade Mexican peonage or the Chinese coolie trade, when they amounted to slavery or involuntary servitude, and that the use of the word "servitude" was intended to prohibit the use of all forms of involuntary slavery, of whatever class or name. It was intimated, however, in that case, that this amendment was regarded by the statesmen of that day as insufficient to protect the colored race from certain laws which had been enacted in the Southern states, imposing upon the colored race onerous disabilities and burdens, and curtailing their rights in the pursuit of life, liberty, and property to such an extent that their freedom was of little value; and that the fourteenth amendment was devised to meet this exigency.

So, too, in the Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3, 3 Sup. Ct. 18, it was said that the act of a mere individual, the owner of an inn, a public conveyance or place of amusement, refusing accommodations to colored people, cannot be justly regarded as imposing any badge of slavery or servitude upon the applicant, but only as involving an ordinary civil injury, properly cognizable by the laws of the state, and presumably subject to redress by those laws until the contrary appears. "It would be running the slavery question into the ground," said Mr. Justice Bradley, "to make it apply to every act of discrimination which a person may see fit to make as to the guests he will entertain, or as to the people he will take into his coach or cab or car, or admit to his concert or theater, or deal with in other matters of intercourse or business."

A statute which implies merely a legal distinction between the white and colored races—a distinction which is founded in the color of the two races, and which must always exist so long as white men are distinguished from the other race by color—has no tendency to destroy the legal equality of the two races, or re-establish a state of involuntary servitude. Indeed, we do not understand that the thirteenth amendment is strenuously relied upon by the plaintiff in error in this connection.

2. By the fourteenth amendment, all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are made citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside; and the states are forbidden from making or enforcing any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, or shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or deny to any person within their jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

The proper construction of this amendment was first called to the attention of this court in the Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, which involved, however, not a question of race, but one of exclusive privileges. The case did not call for any expression of opinion as to the exact rights it was intended to secure to the colored race, but it was said generally that its main purpose was to establish the citizenship of the negro, to give definitions of citizenship of the United States and of the states, and to protect from the hostile legislation of the states the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, as distinguished from those of citizens of the states. The object of the amendment was undoubtedly to enforce the absolute equality of the two races before the law, but, in the nature of things, it could not have been intended to abolish distinctions based upon color, or to enforce social, as distinguished from political, equality, or a commingling of the two races upon terms unsatisfactory to either. Laws permitting, and even requiring, their separation, in places where they are liable to be brought into contact, do not necessarily imply the inferiority of either race to the other, and have been generally, if not universally, recognized as within the competency of the state legislatures in the exercise of their police power. The most common instance of this is connected with the establishment of separate schools for white and colored children, which have been held to be a valid exercise of the legislative power even by courts of states where the political rights of the colored race have been longest and most earnestly enforced.

One of the earliest of these cases is that of Roberts v. City of Boston, 5 Cush. 198, in which the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts held that the general school committee of Boston had power to make provision for the instruction of colored children in separate schools established exclusively for them, and to prohibit their attendance upon the other schools. "The great principle," said Chief Justice Shaw, "advanced by the learned and eloquent advocate for the plaintiff [Mr. Charles Sumner], is that, by the constitution and laws of Massachusetts, all persons, without distinction of age or sex, birth or color, origin or condition, are equal before the law.… But, when this great principle comes to be applied to the actual and various conditions of persons in society, it will not warrant the assertion that men and women are legally clothed with the same civil and political powers, and that children and adults are legally to have the same functions and be subject to the same treatment; but only that the rights of all, as they are settled and regulated by law, are equally entitled to the paternal consideration and protection of the law for their maintenance and security." It was held that the powers of the committee extended to the establishment of separate schools for children of different ages, sexes and colors, and that they might also establish special schools for poor and neglected children, who have become too old to attend the primary school, and yet have not acquired the rudiments of learning, to enable them to enter the ordinary schools. Similar laws have been enacted by congress under its general power of legislation over the District of Columbia (sections 281–283, 310, 319, Rev. St. D. C.), as well as by the legislatures of many of the states, and have been generally, if not uniformly, sustained by the courts. State v. McCann, 21 Ohio St. 210; Lehew v. Brummell (Mo. Sup.) 15 S. W. 765; Ward v. Flood, 48 Cal. 36; Bertonneau v. Directors of City Schools, 3 Woods, 177, Fed. Cas. No. 1,361; People v. Gallagher, 93 N. Y. 438; Cory v. Carter, 48 Ind. 337; Dawson v. Lee, 83 Ky. 49.

Laws forbidding the intermarriage of the two races may be said in a technical sense to interfere with the freedom of contract, and yet have been universally recognized as within the police power of the state. State v. Gibson, 36 Ind. 389.

The distinction between laws interfering with the political equality of the negro and those requiring the separation of the two races in schools, theaters, and railway carriages has been frequently drawn by this court. Thus, in Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U.S. 303, it was held that a law of West Virginia limiting to white male persons 21 years of age, and citizens of the state, the right to sit upon juries, was a discrimination which implied a legal inferiority in civil society, which lessened the security of the right of the colored race, and was a step towards reducing them to a condition of servility. Indeed, the right of a colored man that, in the selection of jurors to pass upon his life, liberty, and property, there shall be no exclusion of his race, and no discrimination against them because of color, has been asserted in a number of cases. Virginia v. Rivers, 100 U.S. 313; Neal v. Delaware, 103 U.S. 370; Bush v. Com., 107 U.S. 110, 1 Sup. Ct. 625; Gibson v. Mississippi, 162 U.S. 565, 16 Sup. Ct. 904. So, where the laws of a particular locality or the charter of a particular railway corporation has provided that no person shall be excluded from the cars on account of color, we have held that this meant that persons of color should travel in the same car as white ones, and that the enactment was not satisfied by the company providing cars assigned exclusively to people of color, though they were as good as those which they assigned exclusively to white persons. Railroad Co. v. Brown, 17 Wall. 445.

Upon the other hand, where a statute of Louisiana required those engaged in the transportation of passengers among the states to give to all persons traveling within that state, upon vessels employed in that business, equal rights and privileges in all parts of the vessel, without distinction on account of race or color, and subjected to an action for damages the owner of such a vessel who excluded colored passengers on account of their color from the cabin set aside by him for the use of whites, it was held to be, so far as it applied to interstate commerce, unconstitutional and void. Hall v. De Cuir, 95 U.S. 485. The court in this case, however, expressly disclaimed that it had anything whatever to do with the statute as a regulation of internal commerce, or affecting anything else than commerce among the states.

In the Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3, 3 Sup. Ct. 18, it was held that an act of congress entitling all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances, on land or water, theaters, and other places of public amusement, and made applicable to citizens of every race and color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude, was unconstitutional and void, upon the ground that the fourteenth amendment was prohibitory upon the states only, and the legislation authorized to be adopted by congress for enforcing it was not direct legislation on matters respecting which the states were prohibited from making or enforcing certain laws, or doing certain acts, but was corrective legislation, such as might be necessary or proper for counter-acting and redressing the effect of such laws or acts. In delivering the opinion of the court, Mr. Justice Bradley observed that the fourteenth amendment "does not invest congress with power to legislate upon subjects that are within the domain of state legislation, but to provide modes of relief against state legislation or state action of the kind referred to. It does not authorize congress to create a code of municipal law for the regulation of private rights, but to provide modes of redress against the operation of state laws, and the action of state officers, executive or judicial, when these are subversive of the fundamental rights specified in the amendment. Positive rights and privileges are undoubtedly secured by the fourteenth amendment; but they are secured by way of prohibition against state laws and state proceedings affecting those rights and privileges, and by power given to congress to legislate for the purpose of carrying such prohibition into effect; and such legislation must necessarily be predicated upon such supposed state laws or state proceedings, and be directed to the correction of their operation and effect."

Much nearer, and, indeed, almost directly in point, is the case of the Louisville, N. O. & T. Ry. Co. v. State, 133 U.S. 587, 10 Sup. Ct. 348, wherein the railway company was indicted for a violation of a statute of Mississippi, enacting that all railroads carrying passengers should provide equal, but separate, accommodations for the white and colored races, by providing two or more passenger cars for each passenger train, or by dividing the passenger cars by a partition, so as to secure separate accommodations. The case was presented in a different aspect from the one under consideration, inasmuch as it was an indictment against the railway company for failing to provide the separate accommodations, but the question considered was the constitutionality of the law. In that case, the supreme court of Mississippi (66 Miss. 662, 6 South. 203) had held that the statute applied solely to commerce within the state, and, that being the construction of the state statute by its highest court, was accepted as conclusive. "If it be a matter," said the court (page 591, 133 U. S., and page 348, 10 Sup. Ct.), "respecting commerce wholly within a state, and not interfering with commerce between the states, then, obviously, there is no violation of the commerce clause of the federal constitution. ... No question arises under this section as to the power of the state to separate in different compartments interstate passengers, or affect, in any manner, the privileges and rights of such passengers. All that we can consider is whether the state has the power to require that railroad trains within her limits shall have separate accommodations for the two races. That affecting only commerce within the state is no invasion of the power given to congress by the commerce clause."

A like course of reasoning applies to the case under consideration, since the supreme court of Louisiana, in the case of State v. Judge, 44 La. Ann. 770, 11 South. 74, held that the statute in question did not apply to interstate passengers, but was confined in its application to passengers traveling exclusively within the borders of the state. The case was decided largely upon the authority of Louisville, N. O. & T. Ry. Co. v. State, 66 Miss. 662, 6 South, 203, and affirmed by this court in 133 U.S. 587, 10 Sup. Ct. 348. In the present case no question of interference with interstate commerce can possibly arise, since the East Louisiana Railway appears to have been purely a local line, with both its termini within the state of Louisiana. Similar statutes for the separation of the two races upon public conveyances were held to be constitutional in Railroad v. Miles, 55 Pa. St. 209; Day v. Owen 5 Mich. 520; Railway Co. v. Williams, 55 Ill. 185; Railroad Co. v. Wells, 85 Tenn. 613; 4 S. W. 5; Railroad Co. v. Benson, 85 Tenn. 627, 4 S. W. 5; The Sue, 22 Fed. 843; Logwood v. Railroad Co., 23 Fed. 318; McGuinn v. Forbes, 37 Fed. 639; People v. King (N. Y. App.) 18 N. E. 245; Houck v. Railway Co., 38 Fed. 226; Heard v. Railroad Co., 3 Inter St. Commerce Com. R. 111, 1 Inter St. Commerce Com. R. 428.

While we think the enforced separation of the races, as applied to the internal commerce of the state, neither abridges the privileges or immunities of the colored man, deprives him of his property without due process of law, nor denies him the equal protection of the laws, within the meaning of the fourteenth amendment, we are not prepared to say that the conductor, in assigning passengers to the coaches according to their race, does not act at his peril, or that the provision of the second section of the act that denies to the passenger compensation in damages for a refusal to receive him into the coach in which he properly belongs is a valid exercise of the legislative power. Indeed, we understand it to be conceded by the state's attorney that such part of the act as exempts from liability the railway company and its officers is unconstitutional. The power to assign to a particular coach obviously implies the power to determine to which race the passenger belongs, as well as the power to determine who, under the laws of the particular state, is to be deemed a white, and who a colored, person. This question, though indicated in the brief of the plaintiff in error, does not properly arise upon the record in this case, since the only issue made is as to the unconstitutionality of the act, so far as it requires the railway to provide separate accommodations, and the conductor to assign passengers according to their race.

It is claimed by the plaintiff in error that, in an mixed community, the reputation of belonging to the dominant race, in this instance the white race, is "property," in the same sense that a right of action or of inheritance is property. Conceding this to be so, for the purposes of this case, we are unable to see how this statute deprives him of, or in any way affects his right to, such property. If he be a white man, and assigned to a colored coach, he may have his action for damages against the company for being deprived of his so-called "property." Upon the other hand, if he be a colored man, and be so assigned, he has been deprived of no property, since he is not lawfully entitled to the reputation of being a white man.

In this connection, it is also suggested by the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error that the same argument that will justify the state legislature in requiring railways to provide separate accommodations for the two races will also authorize them to require separate cars to be provided for people whose hair is of a certain color, or who are aliens, or who belong to certain nationalities, or to enact laws requiring colored people to walk upon one side of the street, and white people upon the other, or requiring white men's houses to be painted white, and colored men's black, or their vehicles or business signs to be of different colors, upon the theory that one side of the street is as good as the other, or that a house or vehicle of one color is as good as one of another color. The reply to all this is that every exercise of the police power must be reasonable, and extend only to such laws as are enacted in good faith for the promotion of the public good, and not for the annoyance or oppression of a particular class. Thus, in Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356, 6 Sup. Ct. 1064, it was held by this court that a municipal ordinance of the city of San Francisco, to regulate the carrying on of public laundries within the limits of the municipality, violated the provisions of the constitution of the United States, if it conferred upon the municipal authorities arbitrary power, at their own will, and without regard to discretion, in the legal sense of the term, to give or withhold consent as to persons or places, without regard to the competency of the persons applying or the propriety of the places selected for the carrying on of the business. It was held to be a covert attempt on the part of the municipality to make an arbitrary and unjust discrimination against the Chinese race. While this was the case of a municipal ordinance, a like principle has been held to apply to acts of a state legislature passed in the exercise of the police power. Railroad Co. v. Husen, 95 U.S. 465; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Kentucky, 161 U.S. 677, 16 Sup. Ct. 714, and cases cited on page 700, 161 U. S., and page 714, 16 Sup. Ct.; Daggett v. Hudson, 43 Ohio St. 548, 3 N. E. 538; Capen v. Foster, 12 Pick. 485; State v. Baker, 38 Wis. 71; Monroe v. Collins, 17 Ohio St. 665; Hulseman v. Rems, 41 Pa. St. 396; Osman v. Riley, 15 Cal. 48.

So far, then, as a conflict with the fourteenth amendment is concerned, the case reduces itself to the question whether the statute of Louisiana is a reasonable regulation, and with respect to this there must necessarily be a large discretion on the part of the legislature. In determining the question of reasonableness, it is at liberty to act with reference to the established usages, customs, and traditions of the people, and with a view to the promotion of their comfort, and the preservation of the public peace and good order. Gauged by this standard, we cannot say that a law which authorizes or even requires the separation of the two races in public conveyances is unreasonable, or more obnoxious to the fourteenth amendment than the acts of congress requiring separate schools for colored children in the District of Columbia, the constitutionality of which does not seem to have been questioned, or the corresponding acts of state legislatures.

We consider the underlying fallacy of the plaintiff's argument to consist in the assumption that the enforced separation of the two races stamps the colored race with a badge of inferiority. If this be so, it is not by reason of anything found in the act, but solely because the colored race chooses to put that construction upon it. The argument necessarily assumes that if, as has been more than once the case, and is not unlikely to be so again, the colored race should become the dominant power in the state legislature, and should enact a law in precisely similar terms, it would thereby relegate the white race to an inferior position. We imagine that the white race, at least, would not acquiesce in this assumption. The argument also assumes that social prejudices may be overcome by legislation, and that equal rights cannot be secured to the negro except by an enforced commingling of the two races. We cannot accept this proposition. If the two races are to meet upon terms of social equality, it must be the result of natural affinities, a mutual appreciation of each other's merits, and a voluntary consent of individuals. As was said by the court of appeals of New York in People v. Gallagher, 93 N. Y. 438, 448: "This end can neither be accomplished nor promoted by laws which conflict with the general sentiment of the community upon whom they are designed to operate. When the government, therefore, has secured to each of its citizens equal rights before the law, and equal opportunities for improvement and progress, it has accomplished the end for which it was organized, and performed all of the functions respecting social advantages with which it is endowed." Legislation is powerless to eradicate racial instincts, or to abolish distinctions based upon physical differences, and the attempt to do so can only result in accentuating the difficulties of the present situation. If the civil and political rights of both races be equal, one cannot be inferior to the other civilly or politically. If one race be inferior to the other socially, the constitution of the United States cannot put them upon the same plane.

It is true that the question of the proportion of colored blood necessary to constitute a colored person, as distinguished from a white person, is one upon which there is a difference of opinion in the different states; some holding that any visible admixture of black blood stamps the person as belonging to the colored race (State v. Chavers, 5 Jones [N. C.] 1); others, that it depends upon the preponderance of blood (Gray v. State, 4 Ohio, 354; Monroe v. Collins, 17 Ohio St. 665); and still others, that the predominance of white blood must only be in the proportion of three-fourths (People v. Dean, 14 Mich. 406; Jones v. Com., 80 Va. 544). But these are questions to be determined under the laws of each state, and are not properly put in issue in this case. Under the allegations of his petition, it may undoubtedly become a question of importance whether, under the laws of Louisiana, the petitioner belongs to the white or colored race.

The judgment of the court below is therefore affirmed.

Mr. Justice BREWER did not hear the argument or participate in the decision of this case.

Mr. Justice Harlan Dissenting

By the Louisiana statute the validity of which is here involved, all railway companies (other than street-railroad companies) that carry passengers in that state are required to have separate but equal accommodations for white and colored persons, "by providing two or more passenger coaches for each passenger train, or by dividing the passenger coaches by a partition so as to secure separate accommodations." Under this statute, no colored person is permitted to occupy a seat in a coach assigned to white persons; nor any white person to occupy a seat in a coach assigned to colored persons. The managers of the railroad are not allowed to exercise any discretion in the premises, but are required to assign each passenger to some coach or compartment set apart for the exclusive use of is race. If a passenger insists upon going into a coach or compartment not set apart for persons of his race, he is subject to be fined, or to be imprisoned in the parish jail. Penalties are prescribed for the refusal or neglect of the officers, directors, conductors, and employees of railroad companies to comply with the provisions of the act.

Only "nurses attending children of the other race" are excepted from the operation of the statute. No exception is made of colored attendants traveling with adults. A white man is not permitted to have his colored servant with him in the same coach, even if his condition of health requires the constant personal assistance of such servant. If a colored maid insists upon riding in the same coach with a white woman whom she has been employed to serve, and who may need her personal attention while traveling, she is subject to be fined or imprisoned for such an exhibition of zeal in the discharge of duty.

While there may be in Louisiana persons of different races who are not citizens of the United States, the words in the act "white and colored races" necessarily include all citizens of the United States of both races residing in that state. So that we have before us a state enactment that compels, under penalties, the separation of the two races in railroad passenger coaches, and makes it a crime for a citizen of either race to enter a coach that has been assigned to citizens of the other race.

Thus, the state regulates the use of a public highway by citizens of the United States solely upon the basis of race.

However apparent the injustice of such legislation may be, we have only to consider whether it is consistent with the constitution of the United States.

That a railroad is a public highway, and that the corporation which owns or operates it is in the exercise of public functions, is not, at this day, to be disputed. Mr. Justice Nelson, speaking for this court in New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. 344, 382, said that a common carrier was in the exercise "of a sort of public office, and has public duties to perform, from which he should not be permitted to exonerate himself without the assent of the parties concerned." Mr. Justice Strong, delivering the judgment of this court in Olcott v. Supervisors, 16 Wall. 678, 694, said: "That railroads, though constructed by private corporations, and owned by them, are public highways, has been the doctrine of nearly all the courts ever since such conveniences for passage and transportation have had any existence. Very early the question arose whether a state's right of eminent domain could be exercised by a private corporation created for the purpose of constructing a railroad. Clearly, it could not, unless taking land for such a purpose by such an agency is taking land for public use. The right of eminent domain nowhere justifies taking property for a private use. Yet it is a doctrine universally accepted that a state legislature may authorize a private corporation to take land for the construction of such a road, making compensation to the owner. What else does this doctrine mean if not that building a railroad, though it be built by a private corporation, is an act done for a public use?" So, in Township of Pine Grove v. Talcott, 19 Wall. 666, 676: "Though the corporation [a railroad company] was private, its work was public, as much so as if it were to be constructed by the state." So, in Inhabitants of Worcester v. Western R. Corp., 4 Metc. (Mass.) 564: "The establishment of that great thoroughfare is regarded as a public work, established by public authority, intended for the public use and benefit, the use of which is secured to the whole community, and constitutes, therefore, like a canal, turnpike, or highway, a public easement." "It is true that the real and personal property, necessary to the establishment and management of the railroad, is vested in the corporation; but it is in trust for the public."

In respect of civil rghts, common to all citizens, the constitution of the United States does not, I think, permit any public authority to know the race of those entitled to be protected in the enjoyment of such rights. Every true man has pride of race, and under appropriate circumstances, when the rights of others, his equals before the law, are not to be affected, it is his privilege to express such pride and to take such action based upon it as to him seems proper. But I deny that any legislative body or judicial tribunal may have regard to the race of citizens when the civil rights of those citizens are involved. Indeed, such legislation as that here in question is inconsistent not only with that equality of rights which pertains to citizenship, national and state, but with the personal liberty enjoyed by every one within the United States.

The thirteenth amendment does not permit the withholding or the deprivation of any right necessarily inhering in freedom. It not only struck down the institution of slavery as previously existing in the United States, but it prevents the imposition of any burdens or disabilities that constitute badges of slavery or servitude. It decreed universal civil freedom in this country. This court has so adjudged. But, that amendment having been found inadequate to the protection of the rights of those who had been in slavery, it was followed by the fourteenth amendment, which added greatly to the dignity and glory of American citizenship, and to the security of personal liberty, by declaring that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside," and that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." These two amendments, if enforced according to their true intent and meaning, will protect all the civil rights that pertain to freedom and citizenship. Finally, and to the end that no citizen should be denied, on account of his race, the privilege of participating in the political control of his country, it was declared by the fifteenth amendment that "the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude."

These notable additions to the fundamental law were welcomed by the friends of liberty throughout the world. They removed the race line from our governmental systems. They had, as this court has said, a common purpose, namely, to secure "to a race recently emancipated, a race that through many generations have been held in slavery, all the civil rights that the superior race enjoy." They declared, in legal effect, this court has further said, "that the law in the states shall be the same for the black as for the white; that all persons, whether colored or white, shall stand equal before the laws of the states; and in regard to the colored race, for whose protection the amendment was primarily designed, that no discrimination shall be made against them by law because of their color." We also said: "The words of the amendment, it is true, are prohibitory, but they contain a necessary implication of a positive immunity or right, most valuable to the colored race, the right to exemption from unfriendly legislation against them distinctively as colored; exemption from legal discriminations, implying inferiority in civil society, lessening the security of their enjoyment of the rights which others enjoy; and discriminations which are steps towards reducing them to the condition of a subject race." It was, consequently, adjudged that a state law that excluded citizens of the colored race from juries, because of their race, however well qualified in other respects to discharge the duties of jurymen, was repugnant to the fourteenth amendment. Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U.S. 303, 306, 307 S.; Virginia v. Rives, Id. 313; Ex parte Virginia, Id. 339; Neal v. Delaware, 103 U.S. 370, 386; Bush v. Com., 107 U.S. 110, 116, 1 S. Sup. Ct. 625. At the present term, referring to the previous adjudications, this court declared that "underlying all of those decisions is the principle that the constitution of the United States, in its present form, forbids, so far as civil and political rights are concerned, discrimination by the general government or the states against any citizen because of his race. All citizens are equal before the law." Gibson v. State, 162 U.S. 565, 16 Sup. Ct. 904.

The decisions referred to show the scope of the recent amendments of the constitution. They also show that it is not within the power of a state to prohibit colored citizens, because of their race, from participating as jurors in the administration of justice.

It was said in argument that the statute of Louisiana does not discriminate against either race, but prescribes a rule applicable alike to white and colored citizens. But this argument does not meet the difficulty. Every one knows that the statute in question had its origin in the purpose, not so much to exclude white persons from railroad cars occupied by blacks, as to exclude colored people from coaches occupied by or assigned to white persons. Railroad corporations of Louisiana did not make discrimination among whites in the matter of acommodation for travelers. The thing to accomplish was, under the guise of giving equal accommodation for whites and blacks, to compel the latter to keep to themselves while traveling in railroad passenger coaches. No one would be so wanting in candor as to assert the contrary. The fundamental objection, therefore, to the statute, is that it interferes with the personal freedom of citizens. "Personal liberty," it has been well said, "consists in the power of locomotion, of changing situation, or removing one's person to whatsoever places one's own inclination may direct, without imprisonment or restraint, unless by due course of law." 1 Bl. Comm. 134. If a white man and a black man choose to occupy the same public conveyance on a public highway, it is their right to do so; and no government, proceeding alone on grounds of race, can prevent it without infringing the personal liberty of each.

It is one thing for railroad carriers to furnish, or to be required by law to furnish, equal accommodations for all whom they are under a legal duty to carry. It is quite another thing for government to forbid citizens of the white and black races from traveling in the same public conveyance, and to punish officers of railroad companies for permitting persons of the two races to occupy the same passenger coach. If a state can prescribe, as a rule of civil conduct, that whites and blacks shall not travel as passengers in the same railroad coach, why may it not so regulate the use of the streets of its cities and towns as to compel white citizens to keep on one side of a street, and black citizens to keep on the other? Why may it not, upon like grounds, punish whites and blacks who ride together in street cars or in open vehicles on a public road or street? Why may it not require sheriffs to assign whites to one side of a court room, and blacks to the other? And why may it not also prohibit the commingling of the two races in the galleries of legislative halls or in public assemblages convened for the consideration of the political questions of the day? Further, if this statute of Louisiana is consistent with the personal liberty of citizens, why may not the state require the separation in railroad coaches of native and naturalized citizens of the United States, or of Protestants and Roman Catholics?

The answer given at the argument to these questions was that regulations of the kind they suggest would be unreasonable, and could not, therefore, stand before the law. Is it meant that the determination of questions of legislative power depends upon the inquiry whether the statute whose validity is questioned is, in the judgment of the courts, a reasonable one, taking all the circumstances into consideration? A statute may be unreasonable merely because a sound public policy forbade its enactment. But I do not understand that the courts have anything to do with the policy or expediency of legislation. A statute may be valid, and yet, upon grounds of public policy, may well be characterized as unreasonable. Mr. Sedgwick correctly states the rule when he says that, the legislative intention being clearly ascertained, "the courts have no other duty to perform than to execute the legislative will, without any regard to their views as to the wisdom or justice of the particular enactment." Sedg. St. & Const. Law, 324. There is a dangerous tendency in these latter days to enlarge the functions of the courts, by means of judicial interference with the will of the people as expressed by the legislature. Our institutions have the distinguishing characteristic that the three departments of government are co-ordinate and separate. Each must keep within the limits defined by the constitution. And the courts best discharge their duty by executing the will of the law-making power, constitutionally expressed, leaving the results of legislation to be dealt with by the people through their representatives. Statutes must always have a reasonable construction. Sometimes they are to be construed strictly, sometimes literally, in order to carry out the legislative will. But, however construed, the intent of the legislature is to be respected if the particular statute in question is valid, although the courts, looking at the public interests, may conceive the statute to be both unreasonable and impolitic. If the power exists to enact a statute, that ends the matter so far as the courts are concerned. The adjudged cases in which statutes have been held to be void, because unreasonable, are those in which the means employed by the legislature were not at all germane to the end to which the legislature was competent.

The white race deems itself to be the dominant race in this country. And so it is, in prestige, in achievements, in education, in wealth, and in power. So, I doubt not, it will continue to be for all time, if it remains true to its great heritage, and holds fast to the principles of constitutional liberty. But in view of the constitution, in the eye of the law, there is in this country no superior, dominant, ruling class of citizens. There is no caste here. Our constitution is color-blind, and neither knows nor tolerates classes among citizens. In respect of civil rights, all citizens are equal before the law. The humblest is the peer of the most powerful. The law regards man as man, and takes no account of his surroundings or of his color when his civil rights as guaranteed by the supreme law of the land are involved. It is therefore to be regretted that this high tribunal, the final expositor of the fundamental law of the land, has reached the conclusion that it is competent for a state to regulate the enjoyment by citizens of their civil rights solely upon the basis of race.

Document Text

In my opinion, the judgment this day rendered will, in time, prove to be quite as pernicious as the decision made by this tribunal in the Dred Scott Case.

It was adjudged in that case that the descendants of Africans who were imported into this country, and sold as slaves, were not included nor intended to be included under the word "citizens" in the constitution, and could not claim any of the rights and privileges which that instrument provided for and secured to citizens of the United States; that, at time of the adoption of the constitution, they were "considered as a subordinate and inferior class of beings, who had been subjugated by the dominant race, and, whether emancipated or not, yet remained subject to their authority, and had no rights or privileges but such as those who held the power and the government might choose to grant them." 17 How. 393, 404. The recent amendments of the constitution, it was supposed, had eradicated these principles from our institutions. But it seems that we have yet, in some of the states, a dominant race—a superior class of citizens—which assumes to regulate the enjoyment of civil rights, common to all citizens, upon the basis of race. The present decision, it may well be apprehended, will not only stimulate aggressions, more or less brutal and irritating, upon the admitted rights of colored citizens, but will encourage the belief that it is possible, by means of state enactments, to defeat the beneficent purposes which the people of the United States had in view when they adopted the recent amendments of the constitution, by one of which the blacks of this country were made citizens of the United States and of the states in which they respectively reside, and whose privileges and immunities, as citizens, the states are forbidden to abridge. Sixty millions of whites are in no danger from the presence here of eight millions of blacks. The destinies of the two races, in this country, are indissolubly linked together, and the interests of both require that the common government of all shall not permit the seeds of race hate to be planted under the sanction of law. What can more certainly arouse race hate, what more certainly create and perpetuate a feeling of distrust between these races, than state enactments which, in fact, proceed on the ground that colored citizens are so inferior and degraded that they cannot be allowed to sit in public coaches occupied by white citizens? That, as all will admit, is the real meaning of such legislation as was enacted in Louisiana.

The sure guaranty of the peace and security of each race is the clear, distinct, unconditional recognition by our governments, national and state, of every right that inheres in civil freedom, and of the equality before the law of all citizens of the United States,

Glossary

averring	asserting
chattel	property
coolie	manual laborer, usually of Chinese descent, who was brought to United States to help build railroads (now considered a racial slur) damages	monies paid for harm caused defendant in error	the party that is defending the lower court's ruling
demurrer	contention by the defendant that although the facts put forward by the plaintiff may be true, they do not entitle the plaintiff to prevail in the lawsuit
due process	the appropriate procedures that are necessary to affect a person's right to life, liberty, or property eminent domain	the right of a jurisdiction to take property for a public purpose if adequate compensation is paid equal protection of the laws	the requirement that all persons be provided the same rights under the law and be granted equal treatment by the laws without regard to race. State enactments regulating the enjoyment of civil rights upon the basis of race, and cunningly devised to defeat legitimate results of the war, under the pretense of recognizing equality of rights, can have no other result than to render permanent peace impossible, and to keep alive a conflict of races, the continuance of which must do harm to all concerned. This question is not met by the suggestion that social equality cannot exist between the white and black races in this country. That argument, if it can be properly regarded as one, is scarcely worthy of consideration; for social equality no more exists between two races when traveling in a passenger coach or a public highway than when members of the same races sit by each other in a street car or in the jury box, or stand or sit with each other in a political assembly, or when they use in common the streets of a city or town, or when they are in the same room for the purpose of having their names placed on the registry of voters, or when they approach the ballot box in order to exercise the high privilege of voting.

Document Text

There is a race so different from our own that we do not permit those belonging to it to become citizens of the United States. Persons belonging to it are, with few exceptions, absolutely excluded from our country. I allude to the Chinese race. But, by the statute in question, a Chinaman can ride in the same passenger coach with white citizens of the United States, while citizens of the black race in Louisiana, many of whom, perhaps, risked their lives for the preservation of the Union, who are entitled, by law, to participate in the political control of the state and nation, who are not excluded, by law or by reason of their race, from public stations of any kind, and who have all the legal rights that belong to white citizens, are yet declared to be criminals, liable to imprisonment, if they ride in a public coach occupied by citizens of the white race. It is scarcely just to say that a colored citizen should not object to occupying a public coach assigned to his own race. He does not object, nor, perhaps, would he object to separate coaches for his race if his rights under the law were recognized. But he does object, and he ought never to cease objecting, that citizens of the white and black races can be adjudged criminals because they sit, or claim the right to sit, in the same public coach on a public highway. The arbitrary separation of citizens, on the basis of race, while they are on a public highway, is a badge of servitude wholly inconsistent with the civil freedom and the equality before the law established by the constitution. It cannot be justified upon any legal grounds.

If evils will result from the commingling of the two races upon public highways established for the

Glossary

immunity	exemption
information	a substitute for a grand jury indictment issued directly by a prosecutor intermarriage	interracial marriage
liability	responsibility for causing harm
naturalized	made a citizen without being born a citizen parish	in some regions, a political subdivision or county peonage	a style of forced labor generally associated with Mexico
petitioner	the party filing for relief in court plaintiff in error	the party that has appealed a lower court's ruling prayed	asked
respondent	party defending against a suit writ of error	an order of an appellate court requesting the records of a lower court so the appellate court can examine the record for mistakes that may affect the lower court's judgment writ of prohibition	an order from a court directing a lower court to refrain from prosecuting a case benefit of all, they will be infinitely less than those that will surely come from state legislation regulating the enjoyment of civil rights upon the basis of race. We boast of the freedom enjoyed by our people above all other peoples. But it is difficult to reconcile that boast with a state of the law which, practically, puts the brand of servitude and degradation upon a large class of our fellow citizens, our equals before the law. The thin disguise of "equal" accommodations for passengers in railroad coaches will not mislead any one, nor atone for the wrong this day done.

The result of the whole matter is that while this court has frequently adjudged, and at the present term has recognized the doctrine, that a state cannot, consistently with the constitution of the United States, prevent white and black citizens, having the required qualifications for jury service, from sitting in the same jury box, it is now solemnly held that a state may prohibit white and black citizens from sitting in the same passenger coach on a public highway, or may require that they be separated by a "partition" when in the same passenger coach. May it not now be reasonably expected that astute men of the dominant race, who affect to be disturbed at the possibility that the integrity of the white race may be corrupted, or that its supremacy will be imperiled, by contact on public highways with black people, will endeavor to procure statutes requiring white and black jurors to be separated in the jury box by a "partition," and that, upon retiring from the court room to consult as to their verdict, such partition, if it be a movable one, shall be taken to their consultation room, and set up in such way as to prevent black jurors from coming too close to their brother jurors of the white race. If the "partition" used in the court room happens to be stationary, provision could be made for screens with openings through which jurors of the two races could confer as to their verdict without coming into personal contact with each other. I cannot see but that, according to the principles this day announced, such state legislation, although conceived in hostility to, and enacted for the purpose of humiliating, citizens of the United States of a particular race, would be held to be consistent with the constitution.

I do not deem it necessary to review the decisions of state courts to which reference was made in argument. Some, and the most important, of them, are wholly inapplicable, because rendered prior to the adoption of the last amendments of the constitution, when colored people had very few rights which the dominant race felt obliged to respect. Others were made at a time when public opinion, in many localities, was dominated by the institution of slavery; when it would not have been safe to do justice to the black man; and when, so far as the rights of blacks were concerned, race prejudice was, practically, the supreme law of the land. Those decisions cannot be guides in the era introduced by the recent amendments of the supreme law, which established universal civil freedom, gave citizenship to all born or naturalized in the United States, and residing here, obliterated the race line from our systems of governments, national and state, and placed our free institutions upon the broad and sure foundation of the equality of all men before the law.

I am of opinion that the [law of the] state of Louisiana is inconsistent with the personal liberty of citizens, white and black, in that state, and hostile to both the spirit and letter of the constitution of the United States. If laws of like character should be enacted in the several states of the Union, the effect would be in the highest degree mischievous. Slavery, as an institution tolerated by law, would, it is true, have disappeared from our country; but there would remain a power in the states, by sinister legislation, to interfere with the full enjoyment of the blessings of freedom, to regulate civil rights, common to all citizens, upon the basis of race, and to place in a condition of legal inferiority a large body of American citizens, now constituting a part of the political community, called the "People of the United States," for whom, and by whom through representatives, our government is administered. Such a system is inconsistent with the guaranty given by the constitution to each state of a republican form of government, and may be stricken down by congressional action, or by the courts in the discharge of their solemn duty to maintain the supreme law of the land, anything in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding.

For the reason stated, I am constrained to withhold my assent from the opinion and judgment of the majority.

Phillis Wheatley (Library of Congress)

Mary Church Terrell: "The Progress of Colored Women"

1898

"Colored women ... are everywhere baffled and mocked on account of their race."

Overview

On February 18, 1898, at a meeting of the National American Woman Suffrage Association (NAWSA), Mary Church Terrell delivered an address titled "The Progress of Colored Women." She states in the address that the occasion marks the fiftieth anniversary of the NAWSA, but this is only partly true. This meeting of the association was held in conjunction with the fiftieth anniversary of the Seneca Falls Convention of 1848 in New York, which many historians regard as the official start of the women's suffrage movement in the United States. In part as a result of the Seneca Falls Convention, various suffrage organizations were formed, including the National Woman Suffrage Association and the American Woman Suffrage Association. The NAWSA in turn had been formed in 1890 as a merger of the two organizations. Terrell, one of the nation's first African American women to earn a college degree, was active in the NAWSA and numerous other organizations. In 1896, for example, she had cofounded the National Association of College Women, which later became the National Association of University Women, an organization that has continued to this day. That year, too, she was named as the first president of the National Association of Colored Women's Clubs (NACWC). This group, known more simply as the National Association of Colored Women (the name Terrell uses in her address), united the National Federation of Afro-American Women, the Women's Era Club of Boston, and the Colored Women's League of Washington, D.C., as well as other groups that had taken part in the African American women's club movement. Thus, she was eminently qualified to speak about the status of African American women, and her speech was later published as a pamphlet.

Context

In the early decades of the nineteenth century, the issue of slavery dominated political discussion. While entrenched economic interests in the South labored to preserve the institution of slavery, numerous abolitionist organizations arose, primarily in the North, with the goal of driving a stake through the heart of the slave system. At the same time, the issue of rights for women, particularly the right to vote, began to simmer, especially after the Seneca Falls Convention, held in 1848 in upstate New York, published its Declaration of Sentiments, which called for equal rights for women. The women's rights and antislavery movements had overlapping concerns. Both represented a class of Americans who were being denied fundamental civil rights, and both believed that there was a synergy in the two movements that was mutually beneficial.

The Civil War put an end to the issue of slavery but not to the issue of equal rights for African Americans. At the same time, women were still denied the right to vote. In response to these concerns, Susan B. Anthony, Lucy Stone, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, and others formed the American Equal Rights Association in 1866, believing that such an organization could harness the energies of both the women's suffrage movement and the abolitionist movement. Almost immediately, though, tensions began to surface in the association. Those whose primary concern was women's suffrage were coming to reject the American political party system, believing that neither Democrats nor Republicans were interested in women's issues. In contrast, those whose primary concern was equal rights for African Americans were coming to ally themselves more firmly with the Republican Party, the party of Abraham Lincoln and the Emancipation Proclamation and also the party that was enforcing Reconstruction in the South after the war. Suffragist leaders were hopeful that the Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, which granted voting rights to African Americans, would extend the same rights to women—and were bitterly disappointed that it did not. Lucretia Mott, in particular, was outspoken about her resentment that black men were getting the vote but white women were not. She expressed the belief that black men would be every bit as oppressive in their attitudes toward women as white men were.

The result of these tensions was a split in the association in 1869. Those who supported the Fifteenth Amendment, believing that it would not be ratified if it included a provision for universal suffrage, formed the American Woman Suffrage Association under the leadership of Lucy Stone. This organization would continue to focus its energies en-

Time Line

1863

■ September 23
Mary Eliza Church, known after her marriage to Robert Terrell in 1891 as Mary Church Terrell, is born in Memphis, Tennessee.

1866

■ May 10
Susan B. Anthony, Lucy Stone, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, and others form the American Equal Rights Association.

1869

■ May 15
Susan B. Anthony and Elizabeth Cady Stanton found the National Woman Suffrage Association.

■ November
Lucy Stone and Henry Blackwell found the American Woman Suffrage Association.

1884

■ Terrell earns a bachelor's degree from Oberlin College in Ohio, one of the first African American women to earn a college degree.

1888

■ Terrell earns a master's degree from Oberlin College.

1890

■ The National American Woman Suffrage Association is formed from a merger of the National Woman Suffrage Organization and the American Woman Suffrage Association.

1896

■ Terrell becomes the first president of the National Association of Colored Women's Clubs; that same year, she also cofounds the National Association of College Women, later known as the National Association of University Women.

1897

■ February 17
The National Congress of Mothers, forerunner of the Parent-Teacher Association, is founded.

1898

■ February 18
Terrell delivers the address "The Progress of Colored Women" at a meeting of the National American Woman Suffrage Association.

tirely on the issue of women's suffrage. Anthony and Stanton, dubbed the "irreconcilables," opposed the Fifteenth Amendment precisely because it did not provide universal suffrage. They formed the more militant National Woman Suffrage Association, which, unlike the American Woman Suffrage Association, admitted only women and focused attention on other social issues—though even this was a source of some tension, for Anthony wanted to focus entirely on women's suffrage while others in the organization preferred to devote attention to other issues affecting women.

Throughout the 1870s and 1880s, the two rival organizations worked separately and often at cross-purposes. During the 1880s, however, it was becoming apparent to both organizations that a united front would be more effective. After protracted negotiations, the two organizations merged in 1890 to form the NAWSA. For the next two decades, the NAWSA was the preeminent women's rights organization in the country. The efforts of this and other organizations finally bore fruit in 1920 with the ratification of the Nineteenth Amendment, which extended suffrage to women.

Mary Church Terrell, as an African American woman, in effect bridged the concerns of the two streams of thought. Although she had enjoyed a comfortable, affluent upbringing, she came of age at the end of the Reconstruction era and was witness to the collapse of the hopes of African Americans after the Civil War as the Democratic Party regained ascendancy in the South, the Civil Rights Act of 1875 was declared unconstitutional, and state legislatures passed Jim Crow laws mandating segregation. Just two years before her speech, in 1896, the U.S. Supreme Court had issued its landmark ruling in Plessy v. Ferguson, which entrenched racial segregation by establishing the separate-but-equal doctrine. African American women were in a double bind, for they experienced discrimination and slights because of both their race and gender.

Terrell had come to believe that the best hope for progress among African American women was the women's club movement, particularly because of the emergence of a black middle class that had acquired some measure of education and wealth and thus was able to help the less fortunate. In 1893 the journalist and antilynching activist Ida B. Wells-Barnett formed one of the first such clubs. During the years from 1890 to 1920 the number of these clubs exploded; Chicago, for example, was home to over one hundred fifty black women's clubs. Throughout the nation African American women's clubs established kindergartens, day nurseries, reading rooms, settlement houses, youth clubs, children's camps, and homes for dependent and orphaned children, the elderly, and young working women. For example, in 1890 Emma Frances Grayson Merritt established the first U.S. kindergarten for African American students, and that same year Janie Porter Barrett founded the Locust Street Settlement House in Hampton, Virginia. In alliance with other black community institutions, African American clubwomen were deeply involved in politics and municipal reform. Women's clubs pressed for women's suffrage, fought discrimination in movie theaters and other public facilities, and promoted the passage of antilynching laws. They also raised money to support community institutions by sponsoring theatrical presentations, concerts, picnics, raffles, charity balls, and dances. It was from this background that Mary Church Terrell rose to address the NAWSA on "The Progress of Colored Women" in 1898.

About the Author

Mary Eliza Church was born in Memphis, Tennessee, on September 23, 1863. Her mother was Louisa Ayres Church; her father was Robert Church. Both were former slaves, but in the years after the Civil War the family was upwardly mobile. Robert Church was the owner of a successful saloon, and in the late 1870s he purchased enough land and property to become the first black millionaire in Memphis. Meanwhile, Louisa Church operated a successful hair salon. Although the couple divorced when Mary was three years old, her father continued to support the family and worked to ensure that Mary received the best education possible for a black girl at that time. She attended Antioch College's Model School in Yellow Springs, Ohio, and then went on to earn a bachelor's degree in 1884 from Ohio's Oberlin College, an institution that had been in the forefront of the abolition movement and had admitted African Americans as far back as 1835.

At Oberlin, she refused to take what was often called the "ladies' course," a two-year degree in literary studies. Instead, she opted for the more challenging classical or "gentlemen's course," that is, a four-year degree. In 1885 she taught at Wilberforce College (now Wilberforce University) in Ohio, and in 1886 she taught at what was then called M Street High School, or the Preparatory High School for Colored Youth (now Dunbar High School), in Washington, D.C. During this period she also fulfilled the master of arts requirements for Oberlin College, earning the degree in 1888. She then went on a two-year tour from 1888 to 1890, during which she visited major European cities. While in Europe, she became fluent in German, Italian, and French; her language skills would later enable her to speak at European suffrage meetings. In 1891 Church married Robert Terrell, a lawyer she had met while teaching at M Street High School who would become the first black judge for the District of Columbia. They had one surviving child, Phillis, whom they named after the eighteenth-century poet Phillis Wheatley. At the time of her marriage, she had considered abandoning social activism. It was her good friend Frederick Douglass who persuaded her otherwise.

In the 1890s Terrell started a lifelong career as a social activist. In 1895 she was appointed to the board of education in the District of Columbia, the first African American woman to hold such as position. In 1895 she was one of the founding members of the National Federation of Afro-American Women, an umbrella organization for black women's clubs. In 1896 the federation merged with the Women's Era Club of Boston, the Colored Women's League of Washington, D.C., and several other groups to form the NACWC, and Terrell served as that organization's first president. That same year, she also cofounded the National Association of College Women (later renamed the National Association of University Women). Additionally, she pursued a career as a journalist, writing under the pen name Euphemia Kirk for a number of newspapers, both white and black, about the African American women's club movement. Later, in 1909, she was one of only two black women asked to sign the "Call" inviting people to take part in the organizational meeting of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, making her a founding member of that organization.

Time Line

1909	■ Terrell takes part in the organizational meeting that leads to the founding of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People on February 12.
1954	■ July 24 Terrell dies in Annapolis, Maryland.

For the next forty years, Terrell remained active in the fight for justice and equality. She published her autobiography, A Colored Woman in a White World, in 1940. In 1950 she led a successful effort to desegregate restaurants and retail stores in the District of Columbia, working in tandem with a group that had mounted a legal challenge forcing the district to enforce antidiscrimination laws. Even past the age of eighty, she continued to take part in boycotts, picket lines, and sit-ins to protest segregation. She died on July 24, 1954, after having lived just long enough to witness the U.S. Supreme Court's landmark ruling in Brown v. Board of Education just two months earlier.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

Terrell begins by noting that fifty years earlier, at the time of the Seneca Falls Convention, it would have been regarded as an impossibility that a national women's organization would convene in the nation's capital, let alone that someone such as she, the descendant of a former slave, would be addressing the gathering. She looks forward not only to the enfranchisement of women but also to the emancipation of her race through the efforts of such notables in the women's rights movement as Ernestine Rose, Lucretia Mott, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Lucy Stone, and, of course, Susan B. Anthony. Terrell makes reference to the opening of colleges to women who, earlier in their lives, lived under a system where in many states it had been a crime to teach a black person to read. She points to the many ways in which blacks and women were fettered, unable to own property and lacking any control over their own bodies. She calls attention, though, to the number of African American women who have been able to surmount such obstacles through education, despite the "cruel, unreasonable prejudice which neither their merit nor their necessity seems able to subdue." She notes that the number of professional avocations open to African American women have remained few, and those that have been open paid low wages because of the sheer number of people competing for similar or the same jobs. In spite of these obstacles, women have made "herculean" efforts that have led to progress. She pays tribute to her alma mater, Oberlin College in north-central Ohio, the first college to admit African Americans. She also pays tribute to eastern women's colleges such as Vassar and Wellesley as well as to Cornell University and the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor (called Ann Arbor in the address). During the late nineteenth century, the University of Chicago (called Chicago University in the address) was in the forefront of providing opportunities in higher education to African Americans.

Elizabeth Cady Stanton (seated) and Susan B. Anthony (standing) (Library of Congress)

With the second paragraph, Terrell turns to the efforts of black women's clubs born of an "ardent desire to do good in the world." Many African American women who have been able to ameliorate their condition through education, she says, have "hastened to dispense these blessings to the less fortunate of their race." She notes that probably 90 percent of the teachers of black youth are women. It is noteworthy that Terrell emphasizes morality as much as education as a path to elevation of the race. She makes reference to the NACWC, pointing out that "homes, more homes, better homes, purer homes is the text upon which our sermons have been and will be preached." She then states that one of the most useful activities of the NACWC has been instruction in the art of raising children. She makes reference to the "Mothers' Congress"—that is, the National Congress of Mothers. This organization, formed in 1897, would later become the Parent-Teacher Association, commonly referred to by the initials PTA.

In the third paragraph, Terrell begins to point to specific examples of the work of women. She refers to the Tuskegee, Alabama, branch of the NACWC, where, in the shadow of Booker T. Washington's Tuskegee Institute, "the work of bringing the light of knowledge and the gospel of cleanliness to their benighted sisters on the plantations has been conducted with signal success." In the fourth paragraph, she turns to the matter of domestic arts, noting that NACWC clubs have been teaching women to maintain standards of cleanliness and have also sponsored "talks on social purity and the proper method of rearing children." She notes that the crowded conditions of African American homes have made "maidenly youth and innocence" difficult, but she also argues that statistics have shown immorality among African American women to have been less prevalent than among women of various European countries.

With the fifth paragraph, Terrell becomes even more specific, pointing to a mission that had been established in New York City and was offering a kindergarten, classes for women, meetings for mothers as well as for men, and manual training for boys. She also points to similar successful organizations in Washington, D.C., Kansas City, Missouri, and Boston. She praises the contributions of the Phyllis Wheatley Club in New Orleans, named in honor of the eighteenth-century slave poet, Phillis Wheatley (Phyllis is a common misspelling of the name; later in the address, Terrell makes specific reference to Wheatley and her 1773 book of poems). In fact, there were numerous Phyllis Wheatley Clubs throughout the United States. The one in New Orleans operated a sanatorium and a training school for nurses.

In the sixth paragraph Terrell describes some of the successes of the medical facilities in New Orleans, which provided treatment for poor people and whose nurses had been in constant requisition during a yellow fever epidemic the year before. (Yellow fever had been a scourge throughout the nineteenth century, killing up to one hundred fifty thousand Americans.) In light of today's onerous health care costs, it is striking that this facility in New Orleans could operate for its first eight months on donations amounting to $1,000 and an appropriation from the city of $240. Terrell goes on to call attention to other charitable organizations throughout the country in such places as Montgomery, Alabama; Atlanta, Covington, and Augusta, Georgia; Boston; Memphis, Tennessee; and Lexington, Kentucky. In the seventh paragraph, Terrell calls attention to another example of an organization working to improve the lives of African Americans, the Mount Meigs Institute in rural Alabama. The Mount Meigs Institute was founded in 1888 by E. N. Pierce, of Plainfield, Connecticut. He had acquired a large plantation in Alabama and wanted to provide a school for blacks. He contacted Booker T. Washington at the nearby Tuskegee Institute and asked him to recommend a teacher. Washington recommended Cornelia Bowen, who formerly had taught at the Tuskegee Institute—the "one good woman" to whom Terrell refers.

Essential Quotes

"Nothing, in short, that could degrade or brutalize the womanhood of the race was lacking in that system from which colored women then had little hope of escape."

(Paragraph 1)

"Not only are colored women with ambition and aspiration handicapped on account of their sex, but they are everywhere baffled and mocked on account of their race."

(Paragraph 1)

"With tireless energy and eager zeal, colored women have, since their emancipation, been continuously prosecuting the work of educating and elevating their race, as though upon themselves alone devolved the accomplishment of this great task."

(Paragraph 2)

"Homes, more homes, better homes, purer homes is the text upon which our sermons have been and will be preached."

(Paragraph 2)

"And so, lifting as we climb, onward and upward we go, struggling and striving, and hoping that the buds and blossoms of our desires will burst into glorious fruition ere long.… Seeking no favors because of our color, nor patronage because of our needs, we knock at the bar of justice, asking an equal chance."

(Paragraph 11)

Terrell touches on the legal status of African Americans in the eighth paragraph. She notes that women's clubs have petitioned state legislatures to repeal "Jim Crow Car" laws, which required separate passenger cars for blacks and whites on railroads. Additionally, she observes that black women have tried to end the "Convict Lease System" in Georgia, a program by which the state of Georgia leased out prisoners, most of them black, to perform labor for private companies. At the same time, black women have been active in the cause of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, an organization whose goal was to moderate the use of alcohol.

In addition to efforts on the legal front, black women have enjoyed successes in business. Terrell cites the example of a "milling and cotton business" in Alabama that was owned by a black woman and employed seventy-five men. Similarly in the arts, black women had been gaining respect. She makes reference to a black sculptor, though it is unclear whom she means. One possibility was Edmonia Lewis, an artist of African American and Native American descent who achieved considerable prominence as a sculptor in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. She refers to the sculptor as "Bougerean's pupil." Bougerean is a misspelling of the name of Adolphe-William Bouguereau, a French academic painter (that is, a traditionalist rather than an innovator). Bouguereau took on numerous American students during his career.

Terrell then turns to education, particularly to the need for kindergartens, many of which already had been established to "counteract baleful influences on innocent victims." She notes the high incidence of crime in black communities and attributes it to poverty, lack of positive role models, ignorance, and the "pernicious example" of elders. Indeed, Terrell makes an impassioned argument for early childhood education and states that the "special mission" of the NACWC was to be the establishment of kindergartens. Terrell ends her speech on a note of soaring rhetoric. "Lifting as we climb, onward and upward we go." She looks forward with optimism to the day when "our desires will burst into glorious fruition." Black women, she says, seek neither special favors nor patronage but they "knock at the bar of justice, asking an equal chance."

Audience

The audience for "The Progress of Colored Women" consisted of those attending the meeting of the NAWSA held at the Columbia Theatre in Washington, D.C., from February 13 to 19, 1898. In attendance would have been such luminaries of the women's suffrage movement as the NAWSA's honorary president, Elizabeth Cady Stanton; its president, Susan B. Anthony; its vice president, the Reverend Anna Howard Shaw; various state presidents, who had come from as far away as California; and others who chaired or worked with the organization's various committees, most notably Carrie Chapman Catt. The conference included reports from various organizational officials on concerns such as the progress of legislative efforts to achieve suffrage both on the federal and state levels, civil rights, the economic status of women, marriage, fund-raising, and the progress of women in such fields as law and the church. Terrell was scheduled to give her address sometime after eight o'clock in the evening on February 18. In the NAWSA's published proceedings, the following notice was included:

> "The Progress of Colored Women" was set forth in an eloquent address by Mary Church Terrell, of the District, the President of the National Association of Colored Women. Mrs. Terrell has the orator's gift and interested her audience deeply. Though so impassioned in manner, the matter of her address was temperate and kindly in spirit.

Impact

Gauging the impact of a particular speech given to an audience of like-minded people is a difficult undertaking. Terrell's address to the NAWSA is of interest less for any particular impact it had at the time and more for the window it opens into race relations and racial progress at the end of the nineteenth century. On the one hand, while Terrell was the daughter of former slaves, she herself had grown up in affluent surroundings, received a college education, and continued to enjoy a comfortable life in Washington, D.C., with her attorney husband, who himself had graduated from the prestigious Groton Academy, Harvard University, and the Howard University Law School, where he had been class valedictorian. She had come to know the abolitionist Frederick Douglass largely because they both had summer homes in Highland Beach, Maryland, and were neighbors there. Thus, Terrell had not experienced firsthand the privations to which many African Americans had been subjected. On the other hand, she used her talents and time to work tirelessly to improve the condition of women and African Americans. For her efforts, she was the recipient of many awards, including an honorary doctorate in 1948 from Oberlin College, which named her one of the college's one hundred most distinguished alumni. Her house in the nation's capital was named a National Historic Landmark in 1975, and as recently as 2009 she was one of just twelve civil rights pioneers featured on a series of U.S. Postal Service stamps.

Terrell's viewpoint was very much in the tradition of Booker T. Washington, whom she knew personally. Washington's stance on the advancement of African Americans presented a sharp contrast with that of W. E. B. Du Bois, whose landmark book, The Souls of Black Folk, would come out just five years after her address. During these years, differing strains of the early civil rights movement contended for the soul of African Americans. At the Tuskegee Institute, which he founded, Washington developed a program emphasizing industrial education. He trained brick masons, carpenters, and other artisans, who constructed several of Tuskegee's buildings while they were still students. Women were trained in the domestic arts. Tuskegee's program was based on Washington's belief that black students would be served best by training for vocations rather than professions, a view that he expressed in his famous and controversial Atlanta Exposition Address in 1895. On the other side of the divide was Du Bois, who argued that Washington's program amounted to submission and, in essence, accepted that blacks were inferior. Washington, in Du Bois's view, had abrogated the demands of African Americans for equality as citizens, political power, civil rights, and higher education to instead concentrate on industrial education and the accumulation of wealth. The third chapter of Du Bois's The Souls of Black Folk was given over to a refutation of Washington's views.

Terrell's address steered clear of these political considerations, yet it was clear that she was less interested in the political abstractions of Du Bois, the intellectual, and more interested in the day-to-day lives of African American women. She hoped that these women would be able, through their own efforts, to ameliorate their condition. In her address, she expressed this hope in her statement that "colored women are everywhere reaching out after the waifs and strays, who without their aid may be doomed to lives of evil and shame." While Du Bois was interested in universities, Terrell was interested in kindergartens, as well as "waifs and strays." Du Bois's approach was one of manly assertion of rights, while Terrell worked for women's suffrage. While Du Bois was interested in abstract political rights, Terrell was content with concrete steps along the path of advancement, such as the Mount Meigs Institute in Alabama, where "instruction … is of the kind best suited to the needs of those people for whom it was established. Along with their scholastic training, girls are taught everything pertaining to the management of a home, while boys learn practical farming, carpentering, wheel-wrighting, blacksmithing, and have some military training." Both Terrell and Du Bois had an impact on the early civil rights movement, and both were founding members of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, which suggests that the tent was big enough for widely differing views and approaches to issues of importance to African Americans.

See also Emancipation Proclamation (1863); Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1870); Booker T. Washington's Atlanta Exposition Address (1895); Plessy v. Ferguson (1896); Ida B. Wells-Barnett's "Lynch Law in America" (1900); W. E. B. Du Bois: The Souls of Black Folk (1903); Brown v. Board of Education (1954).

Further Reading

■ Articles

Jones, Beverly Washington. "Mary Church Terrell and the National Association of Colored Women: 1986–1901." Journal of Negro History 67 (1982): 20–33.

Nash, Margaret A. "'Patient Persistence': The Political and Educational Values of Anna Julia Cooper and Mary Church Terrell." Educational Studies 35 (April 2004): 122–136.

■ Books

Fradin, Dennis B., and Judith Bloom Fradin. Fight On! Mary Church Terrell's Battle for Integration. New York: Clarion Books, 2003.

Jones, Beverly Washington. Quest for Equality: The Life and Writings of Mary Eliza Church Terrell, 1863–1954. New York: Carlson Publishing, 1990.

Proceedings of the Thirtieth Annual Convention of the National American Woman Suffrage Association. Philadelphia: Alfred J. Harris, 1898.

Sterling, Dorothy. Black Foremothers: Three Lives. 2nd ed. New York: Feminist Press, 1988.

Terrell, Mary Church. A Colored Woman in a White World. New York: G. K. Hall, 1996.

■ Web Sites

Jones, Beverley W. "Mary Eliza Church Terrell, 1863–1954." Tennessee Encyclopedia of History and Culture Web site. http://tennesseeencyclopedia.net/imagegallery.php?EntryID=T081.

—Michael J. O'Neal

Questions for Further Study

1. The abolitionist movement and the women's rights movement at times collaborated and at other times were at odds with each other. What goals did the two movements share? Why did the movements fall out with each other after the Civil War?

2. Shirley Chisholm, who in 1968 became the first African American woman elected to Congress, was known to say that she experienced more discrimination from being a woman than from being black. Do you think that Terrell would have agreed? Why or why not?

3. What was the women's club movement? What were its goals? How successful do you imagine the club movement was?

4. Read the excerpt from W. E. B. Du Bois: The Souls of Black Folk. Now imagine a meeting between Terrell and Du Bois, perhaps over a cup of coffee, at the organizational meeting that led to the founding of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in 1909. Script an imaginary conversation that you think might have taken place.

5. Terrell came from a comfortable, even affluent background. She was a college graduate, and her attorney husband was a graduate of Harvard University. Comment on how you think these factors may have influenced Terrell's thinking about the issues she discussed. Do you think they may have somehow disqualified her to discuss the poverty of black communities? Explain.

Document Text

Mary Church Terrell: "The Progress of Colored Women"

Fifty years ago a meeting such as this, planned, conducted and addressed by women would have been an impossibility. Less than forty years ago, few sane men would have predicted that either a slave or one of his descendants would in this century at least, address such an audience in the Nation's Capital at the invitation of women representing the highest, broadest, best type of womanhood, that can be found anywhere in the world. Thus to me this semi-centennial of the National American Woman Suffrage Association is a double jubilee, rejoicing as I do, not only in the prospective enfranchisement of my sex but in the emancipation of my race. When Ernestine Rose, Lucretia Mott, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Lucy Stone and Susan B. Anthony began that agitation by which colleges were opened to women and the numerous reforms inaugurated for the amelioration of their condition along all lines, their sisters who groaned in bondage had little reason to hope that these blessings would ever brighten their crushed and blighted lives, for during those days of oppression and despair, colored women were not only refused admittance to institutions of learning, but the law of the States in which the majority lived made it a crime to teach them to read. Not only could they possess no property, but even their bodies were not their own. Nothing, in short, that could degrade or brutalize the womanhood of the race was lacking in that system from which colored women then had little hope of escape. So gloomy were their prospects, so fatal the laws, so pernicious the customs, only fifty years ago. But, from the day their fetters were broken and their minds released from the darkness of ignorance to which for more than two hundred years they had been doomed, from the day they could stand erect in the dignity of womanhood, no longer bond but free, till tonight, colored women have forged steadily ahead in the acquisition of knowledge and in the cultivation of those virtues which make for good. To use a thought of the illustrious Frederick Douglass, if judged by the depths from which they have come, rather than by the heights to which those blessed with centuries of opportunities have attained, colored women need not hang their heads in shame. Consider if you will, the almost insurmountable obstacles which have confronted colored women in their efforts to educate and cultivate themselves since their emancipation, and I dare assert, not boastfully, but with pardonable pride, I hope, that the progress they have made and the work they have accomplished, will bear a favorable comparison at least with that of their more fortunate sisters, from whom the opportunity of acquiring knowledge and the means of self-culture have never been entirely withheld. For, not only are colored women with ambition and aspiration handicapped on account of their sex, but they are everywhere baffled and mocked on account of their race. Desperately and continuously they are forced to fight that opposition, born of a cruel, unreasonable prejudice which neither their merit nor their necessity seems able to subdue. Not only because they are women, but because they are colored women, are discouragement and disappointment meeting them at every turn. Avocations opened and opportunities offered to their more favored sisters have been and are tonight closed and barred against them. While those of the dominant race have a variety of trades and pursuits from which they may choose, the woman through whose veins one drop of African blood is known to flow is limited to a pitiful few. So overcrowded are the avocations in which colored women may engage and so poor is the pay in consequence, that only the barest livelihood can be eked out by the rank and file. And yet, in spite of the opposition encountered, and the obstacles opposed to their acquisition of knowledge and their accumulation of property, the progress made by colored women along these lines has never been surpassed by that of any people in the history of the world. Though the slaves were liberated less than forty years ago, penniless, and ignorant, with neither shelter nor food, so great was their thirst for knowledge and so herculean were their efforts to secure it, that there are today hundreds of negroes, many of them women, who are graduates, some of them having taken degrees from the best institutions of the land. From Oberlin, that friend of the oppressed, Oberlin, my dear alma mater, whose name will always be loved and whose praise will ever be sung as the first college in the country which was just, broad and benevolent enough to open its doors to negroes and to women on an equal footing with men; from Wellesley and Vassar, from Cornell and Ann Arbor, from the best high schools throughout the North, East and West, colored girls have been graduated with honors, and have thus forever settled the question of their capacity and worth. But a few years ago in an examination in which a large number of young women and men competed for a scholarship, entitling the successful competitor to an entire course through the Chicago University, the only colored girl among them stood first and captured this great prize. And so, wherever colored girls have studied, their instructors bear testimony to their intelligence, diligence and success.

With this increase of wisdom there has sprung up in the hearts of colored women an ardent desire to do good in the world. No sooner had the favored few availed themselves of such advantages as they could secure than they hastened to dispense these blessings to the less fortunate of their race. With tireless energy and eager zeal, colored women have, since their emancipation, been continuously prosecuting the work of educating and elevating their race, as though upon themselves alone devolved the accomplishment of this great task. Of the teachers engaged in instructing colored youth, it is perhaps no exaggeration to say that fully ninety per cent are women. In the back-woods, remote from the civilization and comforts of the city and town, on the plantations, reeking with ignorance and vice, our colored women may be found battling with evils which such conditions always entail. Many a heroine, of whom the world will never hear, has thus sacrificed her life to her race, amid surroundings and in the face of privations which only martyrs can tolerate and bear. Shirking responsibility has never been a fault with which colored women might be truthfully charged. Indefatigably and conscientiously, in public work of all kinds they engage, that they may benefit and elevate their race. The result of this labor has been prodigious indeed. By banding themselves together in the interest of education and morality, by adopting the most practical and useful means to this end, colored women have in thirty short years become a great power for good. Through the National Association of Colored Women, which was formed by the union of two large organizations in July, 1896, and which is now the only national body among colored women, much good has been done in the past, and more will be accomplished in the future, we hope. Believing that it is only through the home that a people can become really good and truly great, the National Association of Colored Women has entered that sacred domain. Homes, more homes, better homes, purer homes is the text upon which our sermons have been and will be preached. Through mothers' meetings, which are a special feature of the work planned by the Association, much useful information in everything pertaining to the home will be disseminated. We would have heart-to-heart talks with our women, that we may strike at the root of evils, many of which lie, alas, at the fireside. If the women of the dominant race with all the centuries of education, culture and refinement back of them, with all their wealth of opportunity ever present with them—if these women feel the need of a Mothers' Congress that they may be enlightened as to the best methods of rearing children and conducting their homes, how much more do our women, from whom shackles have but yesterday fallen, need information on the same vital subjects? And so throughout the country we are working vigorously and conscientiously to establish Mothers' Congresses in every community in which our women may be found.

Under the direction of the Tuskegee, Alabama branch of the National Association, the work of bringing the light of knowledge and the gospel of cleanliness to their benighted sisters on the plantations has been conducted with signal success. Their efforts have thus far been confined to four estates, comprising thousands of acres of land, on which live hundreds of colored people, yet in the darkness of ignorance and the grip of sin, miles away from churches and schools. Under the evil influences of plantation owners, and through no fault of their own, the condition of the colored people is, in some sections to-day no better than it was at the close of the war. Feeling the great responsibility resting upon them, therefore, colored women, both in organizations under the National Association, and as individuals are working with might and main to afford their unfortunate sisters opportunities of civilization and education, which without them, they would be unable to secure.

By the Tuskegee club and many others all over the country, object lessons are given in the best way to sweep, dust, cook, wash and iron, together with other information concerning household affairs. Talks on social purity and the proper method of rearing children are made for the benefit of those mothers, who in many instances fall short of their duty, not because they are vicious and depraved, but because they are ignorant and poor. Against the one-room cabin so common in the rural settlements in the South, we have inaugurated a vigorous crusade. When families of eight or ten, consisting of men, women and children, are all huddled together in a single apartment, a condition of things found not only in the South, but among our poor all over the land, there is little hope of inculcating morality or modesty. And yet, in spite of these environments which are so destructive of virtue, and though the safeguards usually thrown around maidenly youth and innocence are in some sections withheld from colored girls, statistics compiled by men, not inclined to falsify in favor of my race, show that immorality among colored women is not so great as among women in countries like Austria, Italy, Germany, Sweden and France.

Document Text

In New York City a mission has been established and is entirely supported by colored women under supervision of the New York City Board. It has in operation a kindergarten, classes in cooking and sewing, mothers' meetings, mens' meetings, a reading circle and a manual training school for boys. Much the same kind of work is done by the Colored Woman's League and the Ladies Auxiliary of this city, the Kansas City League of Missouri, the Woman's Era Club of Boston, the Woman's Loyal Union of New York, and other organizations representing almost every State in the Union. The Phyllis Wheatley Club of New Orleans, another daughter of the National Association, has in two short years succeeded in establishing a Sanatorium and a Training School for nurses. The conditions which caused the colored women of New Orleans to choose this special field in which to operate are such as exist in many other sections of our land. From the city hospitals colored doctors are excluded altogether, not even being allowed to practice in the colored wards, and colored patients—no matter how wealthy they are—are not received at all, unless they are willing to go into the charity wards. Thus the establishment of a Sanatorium answers a variety of purposes. It affords colored medical students an opportunity of gaining a practical knowledge of their profession, and it furnishes a well-equipped establishment for colored patients who do not care to go into the charity wards of the public hospitals.

The daily clinics have been a great blessing to the colored poor. In the operating department, supplied with all the modern appliances, two hundred operations have been performed, all of which have resulted successfully under the colored surgeon-in-chief. Of the eight nurses who have registered, one has already passed an examination before the State Medical Board of Louisiana, and is now practicing her profession. During the yellow fever epidemic in New Orleans last summer, there was a constant demand for Phyllis Wheatley nurses. By indefatigable energy and heroic sacrifice of both money and time, these noble women raised nearly one thousand dollars, with which to defray the expenses of the Sanatorium for the first eight months of its existence. They have recently succeeded in securing from the city of New Orleans an annual appropriation of two hundred and forty dollars, which they hope will soon be

Glossary

Ann Arbor	the University of Michigan in the city of Ann Arbor
Bougerean	a misspelling of the name of Adolphe-William Bouguereau, a French painter who took on numerous American students during his career
Convict Lease System	a program by which the state of Georgia leased out prisoners, most of them black, to perform labor for private companies
Ernestine Rose, Lucretia Mott, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Lucy Stone and Susan B. Anthony	all prominent leaders of the women's rights and women's suffragist movement; Stanton was the NAWSA's honorary president, and Anthony was president.
Frederick Douglass	a former slave and the most prominent nineteenth-century American abolitionist
Great Teacher	Jesus Christ
"Jim Crow Car" laws	laws that required separate passenger cars for blacks and whites on railroads
Mothers' Congress	the National Congress of Mothers, the organization formed in 1897 that would later become the Parent-Teacher Association, or PTA increased. Dotted all over the country are charitable organizations for the aged, orphaned and poor, which have been established by colored women; just how many, it is difficult to state. Since there is such an imperative need of statistics, bearing on the progress, possessions, and prowess of colored women, the National Association has undertaken to secure this data of such value and importance to the race. Among the charitable institutions, either founded, conducted or supported by colored women, may be mentioned the Hale Infirmary of Montgomery, Alabama; the Carrie Steel Orphanage of Atlanta; the Reed Orphan Home of Covington; the Haines Industrial School of Augusta in the State of Georgia; a Home for the Aged of both races at New Bedford and St. Monica's Home of Boston in Massachusetts; Old Folks' Home of Memphis, Tenn.; Colored Orphan's Home, Lexington, Ky., together with others of which time forbids me to speak.

Document Text

Mt. Meigs Institute is an excellent example of a work originated and carried into successful execution by a colored woman. The school was established for the benefit of colored people on the plantations in the black belt of Alabama, because of the 700,000 negroes living in that State, probably 90 per cent are outside of the cities; and Waugh was selected because in the township of Mt. Meigs, the population is practically all colored. Instruction given in this school is of the kind best suited to the needs of those people for whom it was established. Along with their scholastic training, girls are taught everything pertaining to the management of a home, while boys learn practical farming, carpentering, wheel-wrighting, blacksmithing, and have some military training. Having started with almost nothing, only eight years ago, the trustees of the school now own nine acres of land, and five buildings, in which two thousand pupils have received instruction—all through the courage, the industry and sacrifice of one good woman. The Chicago clubs and several others engage in rescue work among fallen women and tempted girls.

Questions affecting our legal status as a race are also constantly agitated by our women. In Louisiana and Tennessee, colored women have several times petitioned the legislatures of their respective States to repeal the obnoxious "Jim Crow Car" laws, nor will any stone be left unturned until this iniquitous and unjust enactment against respectable American citizens be forever wiped from the statutes of the South. Against the barbarous Convict Lease System of Georgia, of which negroes, especially the female prisoners, are the principal victims, colored women are waging a ceaseless war. By two lecturers, each of whom, under the Woman's Christian Temperance Union has been National Superintendent of work among colored people, the cause of temperance has for many years been eloquently espoused.

Glossary

Mt. Meigs Institute	a school for blacks in Alabama founded in 1888 by E. N. Pierce, of Plainfield, Connecticut
National Association of Colored Women	more formally, the National Association of Colored Women's Clubs
Oberlin	Oberlin College in north-central Ohio, the first college to admit African Americans one good woman	Cornelia Bowen, who taught at Booker T. Washington's Tuskegee Institute before joining Mount Meigs Institute
Phyllis Wheatley	Phillis Wheatley, a Boston slave who published Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral in 1773
semi-centennial of the National American Woman Suffrage Association	a reference to the fiftieth anniversary of the Seneca Falls Convention of 1848 in New York; the National American Woman Suffrage Association was formed from the merger of the National Woman Suffrage Association and the American Woman Suffrage Association in 1890
woman upon whose chisel	possibly Edmonia Lewis, a prominent sculptor of African American and Native American descent in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries
Woman's Christian Temperance Union	an organization whose goal was to moderate the consumption of alcohol

Document Text

In business, colored women have had signal success. There is in Alabama a large milling and cotton business belonging to and controlled entirely by a colored woman who has sometimes as many as seventy-five men in her employ. In Halifax, Nova Scotia, the principal ice plant of the city is owned and managed by one of our women. In the professions we have dentists and doctors, whose practice is lucrative and large. Ever since the publication, in 1773, of a book entitled "Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral," by Phyllis Wheatley, negro servant of Mr. John Wheatley of Boston, colored women have from time to time given abundant evidence of literary ability. In sculpture we are represented by a woman upon whose chisel Italy has set her seal of approval; in painting, by Bougerean's pupil, whose work was exhibited in the last Paris Salon, and in Music by young women holding diplomas from the first conservatories in the land.

And, finally, as an organization of women nothing lies nearer the heart of the National Association than the children, many of whose lives, so sad and dark, we might brighten and bless. It is the kindergarten we need. Free kindergartens in every city and hamlet of this broad land we must have, if the children are to receive from us what it is our duty to give. Already during the past year kindergartens have been established and successfully maintained by several organizations, from which most encouraging reports have come. May their worthy example be emulated, till in no branch of the Association shall the children of the poor, at least, be deprived of the blessings which flow from the kindergarten alone. The more unfavorable the environments of children, the more necessary is it that steps be taken to counteract baleful influences on innocent victims. How imperative is it then that as colored women, we inculcate correct principles and set good examples for our own youth, whose little feet will have so many thorny paths of prejudice temptation, and injustice to tread. The colored youth is vicious we are told, and statistics showing the multitudes of our boys and girls who crowd the penitentiaries and fill the jails appall and dishearten us. But side by side with these facts and figures of crime I would have presented and pictured the miserable hovels from which these youthful criminals come. Make a tour of the settlements of colored people, who in many cities are relegated to the most noisome sections permitted by the municipal government, and behold the mites of humanity who infest them. Here are our little ones, the future representatives of the race, fairly drinking in the pernicious example of their elders, coming in contact with nothing but ignorance and vice, till at the age of six, evil habits are formed which no amount of civilizing or Christianizing can ever completely break. Listen to the cry of our children. In imitation of the example set by the Great Teacher of men, who could not offer himself as a sacrifice, until he had made an eternal plea for the innocence and helplessness of childhood, colored women are everywhere reaching out after the waifs and strays, who without their aid may be doomed to lives of evil and shame. As an organization, the National Association of Colored Women feels that the establishment of kindergartens is the special mission which we are called to fulfill. So keenly alive are we to the necessity of rescuing our little ones, whose noble qualities are deadened and dwarfed by the very atmosphere which they breathe, that the officers of the Association are now trying to secure means by which to send out a kindergarten organizer, whose duty it shall be both to arouse the conscience of our women, and to establish kindergartens, wherever the means therefore can be secured.

And so, lifting as we climb, onward and upward we go, struggling and striving, and hoping that the buds and blossoms of our desires will burst into glorious fruition ere long. With courage, born of success achieved in the past, with a keen sense of the responsibility which we shall continue to assume, we look forward to a future large with promise and hope. Seeking no favors because of our color, nor patronage because of our needs, we knock at the bar of justice, asking an equal chance.

An illustration showing a man representing the White League shaking hands with a Ku Klux Klan member over an African American couple with a dead baby. In the background, a lynched man hangs from tree. (Library of Congress)

Ida B. Wells-Barnett's "Lynch Law in America"

1900

"Brave men do not gather by thousands to torture and murder a single individual."

Overview

"Lynch Law in America" appeared in the January 1900 issue of Arena, a Boston-based magazine with a broad audience of white Progressives and former abolitionists. "Lynch Law in America" sums up the arguments of the nation's leading antilynching activist of the late nineteenth century, Ida B. Wells-Barnett. In this article, she discusses the misinformation about lynching that has deceived the public, and she provides counterevidence that reveals the real motivations and gruesome practices that lynching entails. Her article makes an urgent appeal for white Americans to reassess the wave of antiblack violence across the country and consider its implications for America's international standing and devotion to the rule of law.

Context

Organized white violence against African Americans has had a long history in the United States. Slavery involved systematic violence against blacks on many levels. During the era of slavery, nonslaveholding whites often belonged to "slave patrols" that were called out to track down fugitive slaves and put down slave revolts. Organized like militias, these patrols fostered white solidarity and maintained the institution of slavery through community action. Community participation in slave patrols was a precursor to the organized violence against blacks in the postslavery period.

At the same time, white mob violence was also common in northern cities, particularly in the form of antiabolitionist riots. Mobs that attacked abolitionists and broke up abolitionist meetings beginning in the 1830s often targeted blacks individually. It was not uncommon for northern whites to lynch or beat an innocent African American to death. One of the worst incidents of U.S. racial violence came during the Civil War, when draft riots broke out in 1863 in northern cities, including New York, and turned into race riots, with dozens of blacks being murdered in the streets.

With emancipation, a new era of racial violence was inaugurated. The congressional policy of Reconstruction of the former Confederate states instituted new constitutional rights for black Americans, including the guarantee of equality before the law and the rights to hold political office, to serve on juries, and to vote. The majority of white southerners vigorously opposed these policies, and some resorted to organized violence and terrorism to prevent blacks from exercising them. White militias were formed—such as the Red Shirts of South Carolina or the White Leagues of Louisiana and Mississippi—and used force and intimidation to prevent blacks from voting or attending political meetings. These groups were often responsible for atrocities like the slaughter of between seventy and one hundred fifty black men, women, and children in Colfax, Louisiana, in 1873. Secret societies like the Ku Klux Klan and the Knights of the White Camellia pursued similar goals but operated in disguise and undertook a variety of misdeeds under the cover of darkness. Mutilation, torture, and sexual assault were common by such groups. Over four hundred lynchings of blacks in the South are estimated to have occurred between 1868 and 1871 alone.

With the collapse of the Reconstruction governments in the late 1870s, the political incentive for white violence diminished, but the violence itself persisted, taking on new forms. White supremacist governments were firmly entrenched in each of the former Confederate states, and relatively few blacks attempted to exercise political power in the post-Reconstruction period. Southern white violence against blacks began to fade as an issue of national concern, with major incidents becoming less frequent for a few years. Incidents of white mob lynchings of individual black victims, however, began to rise again steadily in the mid- to late 1880s. The word lynching itself, which once had no racial connotations, began to refer strictly to white mob actions directed against blacks. Prior to the late 1880s, lynching had usually been practiced as a form of vigilante justice in isolated, typically rural regions of the country against accused criminals of all races. In these cases, victims most often stood accused of a serious crime, especially rape or murder, that had aroused the ire of the community. Community anger, coupled with isolation from legal institutions, overrode the constitutional rights of the accused to a fair trial. But 1885 was the last year in which more whites than blacks were executed by lynch mobs. After that, the "lynch law" came to apply primarily against blacks accused of a

Time Line

1862

■ July 16
Ida Bell Wells is born in Holly Springs, Mississippi.

1866

■ The Ku Klux Klan is formed in Tennessee and begins its campaign of political violence against blacks in the former Confederate states.

1868

■ The Fourteenth Amendment is ratified, guaranteeing all citizens, regardless of race, equal protection of the laws and the right to due process.

1870

■ The Fifteenth Amendment is ratified, guaranteeing that the right to vote will not be infringed because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

1884

■ Wells sues a Tennessee railroad company for denying her service in the "Ladies Car" and wins (but the Tennessee Supreme Court later overturns the decision).

1888

■ The white radical Albion W. Tourgée begins to address the crime of lynching in his weekly editorial for the white-owned Radical Republican newspaper Chicago Daily Inter-Ocean.

1889

■ Wells becomes co-owner and editor of the Memphis Free Speech and Headlight.

1892

■ Three of Wells's close friends are murdered by a white mob, and she is forced to flee Memphis after publishing an editorial titled "Eight Men Lynched."

■ Wells publishes a series of articles about lynching in the New York Age and a pamphlet titled Southern Horrors: Lynch Law in All Its Phases.

crime in the South, and these incidents occurred often with the approval and assistance of police and legal authorities.

The peak year for lynchings in the United States came in 1892, with over 230 incidents documented nationwide, 161 of which involved black victims. The lynching of blacks also took on increasingly ritualized, predictable forms. Once a lynch mob was raised, police authorities would hand the accused over to the mob and disclaim responsibility for the victim's fate. The victim would often be tortured and mutilated—castration was common—before being shot or hung. The body was often burned, and pieces were taken as souvenirs. Authorities never brought charges against participants in lynch mobs, and these murders were invariably classified as having been carried out "by persons unknown."

At first, there was little outcry over these acts and scant press coverage. It was widely rumored that such acts were done exclusively in response to the crime of rape, or attempted rape, of white women by black men (although, in fact, these accusations were present in only one-quarter of all cases of lynching). Because of the sensitive nature of rape—euphemistically known as the "nameless" or "unspeakable" crime—few black leaders or newspaper editors were willing to defend the victims who had been accused of it. Beginning in 1889, however, a white novelist and Radical Republican, Albion W. Tourgée, began denouncing lynchings in his weekly column in the Chicago Daily Inter-Ocean, and he detailed incidents of lynchings in which rape was not an issue and the "crimes" of the accused were based on flimsy accusations. The journalist Ida B. Wells-Barnett became the first black writer to systematically address the issue of lynching, in her articles for the New York Age in 1892.

Led by Wells, the campaign against lynching grew in prominence in the 1890s. Antilynching activists demanded that due process and the right to a fair trial be respected, no matter what the nature of the crimes alleged. Beginning in 1896 in Ohio, a few states began to adopt antilynching laws that brought punishment to the perpetrators of lynchings and the communities in which they occurred. Nevertheless, lynching continued to occur with impunity, especially in the southern states, and this became a major factor in the "great migration" of blacks out of the South beginning in the 1890s.

After the Plessy v. Ferguson case of 1896, in which the U.S. Supreme Court ruled segregation to be consistent with the Fourteenth Amendment and the U.S. Constitution generally, the movement for protection of African American rights suffered a devastating setback. The decade that followed has been described by historians as the "nadir" of the black experience in America because of the sense of hopelessness and despair. In 1898 the whites of Wilmington, North Carolina, massacred black leaders and publicists in a violent overthrow of the local government that had previously respected black voting rights. Allegations that black leaders had encouraged the rape of white women served as the primary cause for the white violence. Everywhere in the South, whites moved to disenfranchise black voters by law or by force. Some black leaders, such as Booker T. Washington, appeared ready to give up on political protest in favor of equal rights, while others, such as Wells-Barnett, continued the struggle.

In 1908 a bloody race riot in Springfield, Illinois, began when a police sheriff refused to turn over two black prisoners to a lynch mob. The event became the catalyst for a new civil rights organization: An alliance of black and white radicals—including Wells-Barnett—formed the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) with a mission to reverse the spread of racism and antiblack violence in the country.

In 1919 the NAACP published Thirty Years of Lynching in the United States, 1889–1918, which publicized many incidents of lynching and investigated the truth behind them. The NAACP also sponsored a national antilynching law—the Dyer bill—that would make lynching a federal crime and allow federal investigation and prosecution of its perpetrators. Although the Dyer bill was blocked by filibuster in the Senate, its proposal marked the beginning of a sharp decline in lynching across the nation. Total national lynchings dropped into the single digits, with eight incidents in 1936, and remained at that level for the next thirty years. Effective publication and condemnation of the practice by the NAACP and other groups were a major factor in turning the tide.

About the Author

Ida B. Wells was born in 1862 in Holly Springs, Mississippi, to a carpenter, James Wells, and a cook, Elizabeth Wells. Her parents were active supporters of the Republican Party during Reconstruction in Mississippi. When she was sixteen, her parents and a younger sibling died in an epidemic of yellow fever that swept through the community. To prevent the breakup of her remaining family, Wells dropped out of school to obtain a teaching position and became the primary provider for her five younger siblings.

In 1880, Wells accepted an aunt's invitation and moved to Memphis, Tennessee, with two of her younger sisters. Continuing to work as a schoolteacher, she became involved in politics after she was forcibly removed from the "Ladies Car" on a Tennessee rail line and was ordered to move to the smoking car. She sued the company and wrote her first newspaper editorial, for the Living Way, about her case, which she won in the local court. The Tennessee Supreme Court later overturned the ruling. Wells soon published a regular column in the Living Way under the pen name "Iola." In 1889 she launched her own newspaper, which she edited and co-owned, titled the Memphis Free Speech and Headlight.

On March 9, 1892, Wells's life changed dramatically when three of her close friends were found murdered, rumored to be the victims of a lynch mob. Wells was shocked when she determined that the cause of their murder derived from the business rivalry between a white-owned grocery store and the store jointly owned by the three black murder victims. She began to publish investigative journalist articles about the causes of lynching. Her editorial of May 21, 1892, titled "Eight Men Lynched," prompted angry whites to attack her newspaper office and destroy her printing equipment. Wells learned of the attack and of a threat made on her life while she was out of town on business, and she determined never to return to Memphis.

In New York, Wells was hired to write editorials for T. Thomas Fortune's New York Age, the leading black newspaper of the day. Her sensational antilynching editorials led to a pamphlet, Southern Horrors: Lynch Law in All of Its Phases, published later in 1892. A testimonial dinner was held in her honor in June, announcing her arrival as a leading national voice for civil rights.

In 1893, Wells joined with Frederick Douglass and other prominent leaders to protest the exclusion and demeaning portrayal of blacks at the Chicago World's Fair. Wells took the lead in preparing a pamphlet titled Why the Colored American

Time Line

1893
- Wells undertakes a speaking tour of Great Britain and joins with Frederick Douglass in a protest against the exclusion of blacks from the Chicago World's Fair.

1894
- Wells undertakes a second speaking tour of Great Britain and publishes a serial account of her trip in the Chicago Daily Inter-Ocean.

1895
- Wells publishes A Red Record and marries the Chicago Conservator editor, Ferdinand L. Barnett.

1900
- January Wells-Barnett publishes "Lynch Law in America" in the journal Arena and later in her pamphlet Mob Rule in New Orleans.

1909
- Wells-Barnett is a founding member of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP).

1931
- March 25 Wells-Barnett dies in Chicago.

1970
Wells-Barnett's autobiography, A Crusade for Justice: The Autobiography of Ida B. Wells, is published posthumously by her daughter Alfreda M. Duster.

An African-American orphanage is destroyed in the New York draft riots of 1863 (AP/Wide World Photos)

Is Not in the World's Columbian Exposition, which discussed a variety of racial injustices facing black Americans, from lynching to convict labor. Two thousand copies of the pamphlet were distributed at the fair. That same year, Wells received an invitation from British activists to speak on the subject of lynching in Great Britain. Her first tour brought international pressure upon the white community of the South, particularly in Memphis, where white newspapers were forced to respond to Wells's accusations and disclaim the practice of lynching. A second tour of Great Britain in 1894 was sponsored by the Chicago Daily Inter-Ocean, a leading Republican newspaper, which published Wells's accounts of her stay in a regular column titled "Ida B. Wells Abroad." By enlisting the international community to condemn lynching, Wells helped bring about a more honest public discourse on lynching in America, and her claims began to be taken more seriously.

In 1895, Wells married the Chicago lawyer and newspaper editor Ferdinand L. Barnett. Wells made the bold and unusual decision to keep her maiden name but to hyphenate it with Barnett's. The newly rechristened "Wells-Barnett" and her husband had four children; like her decision about her name, her approach to motherhood was equally unusual for the time: She continued to work and often brought her children along on speaking engagements. Wells-Barnett also became deeply involved in editing and writing for Barnett's paper, the Chicago Conservator. Wells-Barnett published two more antilynching pamphlets: A Red Record (1895) and Mob Rule in New Orleans (1900). She was also active in many civil rights organizations and women's clubs. The Ida B. Wells Club, for women, was named in her honor in Chicago in 1893. In 1909 she became a founding member of the NAACP. Her antilynching work continued for the rest of her life. She left an autobiography incomplete at her death in 1931, which her daughter later edited and published posthumously.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

In "Lynch Law in America," Wells-Barnett declares that lynching has become a national crime to which all sections of the country have contributed and must bear responsibility. She begins the article by discussing the origin and evolution of lynching in the United States and the transformation of the practice into a tool of racist terror in the South. She describes the current situation with respect to the widespread incidents of lynching and the various excuses offered for it. Finally, she urges Americans to take action against the crime of lynching.

Lynching, according to Wells-Barnett, began in the far West, where settlers had no access to courts or the legal system. She refers to the communal justice of the frontier as following the "unwritten law." This custom, as she describes it, was harsh and severe and usually resulted in immediate hanging from the nearest tree. Facing hardships of a rough existence, there was little time to give prison-

Essential Quotes

"The negro has suffered far more from the commission of this crime [rape] against the women of his race by white men than the white race has ever suffered through his crimes. Very scant notice is taken of the matter when this is the condition of affairs. What becomes a crime deserving capital punishment when the tables are turned is a matter of small moment when the negro woman is the accusing party."

(Paragraph 13)

"Our watchword has been 'the land of the free and the home of the brave.' Brave men do not gather by thousands to torture and murder a single individual, so gagged and bound he cannot make even feeble resistance or defense."

(Paragraph 15)

ers constitutionally guaranteed rights, such as trial by jury, sworn testimony, right to a defense, or the right of appeal. Verdicts were immediately carried out (for the lack of jails perhaps), and judgments were final. But as "civilization spread into the Territories," and the apparatus of administered law became available, the practice of lynching "gradually disappeared from the West."

In its next phase, Wells-Barnett argues, the practice of lynching arose in the southern states and reflected a spirit of lawlessness that infected southerners during Reconstruction. When the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments conferred equal citizenship and the right of suffrage on the former slaves in the South, many white southerners refused to accept those changes. In defiance of the law, and the constitutional rights of blacks, unreconstructed Confederates began to form into vigilante groups. Secret societies such as the Red Shirts and the Ku Klux Klan inaugurated a campaign of violence that aimed to "beat, exile, and kill negroes" in opposition to the Reconstruction laws. The excuse for this outbreak of racist violence was that black suffrage would result in "negro domination"—a term that southerners used to refer to a government in which blacks made up an important constituency of the majority party and thus possessed political power. During this time, the excuse for killing blacks derived from the assertion of their rights, whether voting rights or contract rights or the right of self-defense.

After Reconstruction collapsed in the face of white violence, a new excuse for antiblack violence in the South appeared: the protection of white women. Wells-Barnett calls this justification a new "statute in the unwritten law." Wells-Barnett argues that when a white women accuses a black man of improper behavior toward her, including a mere insult, it has become accepted that a white mob must be raised and the man put to death. Unlike the violence of the Ku Klux Klan during Reconstruction, the practice of lynching has achieved, as Wells-Barnett shows, universal acceptance and approval by whites throughout the country. The theory that white womanhood is in imminent danger from the uncontrollable urges of black men is an unproven accusation, in Wells-Barnett's estimation, since it has not been subjected to the rule of law or proper criminal investigation. By connecting the "justified" racist violence of lynching to the widely reviled, politically motivated violence of Reconstruction, Wells-Barnett not only shows the continuity of this behavior of white southerners but also casts suspicion on the new excuse for it.

Wells-Barnett goes on to describe the kinds of violence that have become ritually incorporated into the act of "lynching." Great publicity and offers of rewards usually precede the act itself. When the accused is caught, a public ceremony is held. A holiday is sometimes declared by local authorities so that schoolchildren can witness the event and onlookers from afar can be given time to travel by rail to it. Without any trial or testimony, the accused is tortured and often burned alive. Dismemberment of the body is common, with the mob taking home souvenirs in the form of fingers, toes, and ears. Wells-Barnett compares these barbarities to the tortures of the Middle Ages and the Spanish Inquisition. The word lynching hardly encompasses all of the kinds of violence perpetrated by white mobs in these brutal events.

In the next section of the article, Wells-Barnett discusses some of the misconceptions about lynching and points to facts about the accused that have been ignored. First, she says that lynching has not been confined to the southern states but that it has begun to spread into the North and West as well. Second, she remarks that the widespread belief that lynchings have been enacted only in cases of threats or assaults on white women is untrue. Less than one-third of all cases of lynching involved accusations by white women against black men. In many of those cases, the accusations were later recanted or shown to have no merit. Some cases involved the lynching of women and children, rather than men. Statistics also show that a wide variety of accused crimes have resulted in lynchings, and, in some cases, no accusation at all had been leveled at the victims. Wells-Barnett cites the case of Sam Hose, who was burned alive in Georgia. The charge of rape was falsely proclaimed in the press in the days leading up to the lynching, but afterward it was shown to have been an unfounded rumor and that Hose's "crime" was, in fact, an act of self-defense against his employer.

Wells-Barnett concludes her article by offering four reasons to oppose the practice of lynching: consistency, economy, national honor, and patriotism. Her four reasons have a common theme: Each refers to America's reputation in the eyes of the world. First, she points out that the practice of lynching conflicts with the democratic traditions of the nation. Throughout the article, she has referred to the violation of the rule of law and the Constitution. She goes further and alludes to the fact that the United States has presented itself to the world as a beacon of freedom. Indeed, Americans have denounced the injustices of other nations around the world to their oppressed minorities. She cites Turkish oppression of the Armenian Christians, Russian oppression of the Jews, English oppression of the Irish, Indian oppression of women, and Spanish oppression of Cubans as examples of causes Americans have taken up. Unless Americans confront their own oppression of blacks in tolerating the practice of lynching, she suggests, their criticism of other nations will appear as rank hypocrisy to the rest of the world.

Second, she points out that several instances of foreign nationals being lynched have caused the United States to pay hefty indemnities to other nations. By admitting that the U.S. government cannot protect "said subjects" of other nations or bring the participants of a mob to justice, these payments are "humiliating in the extreme." Third, and related to this point, America's inability to maintain the rule of law puts its government on a par with the least "civilized" and respected nations of the world. She compares the triumph of "savagery" in the American South with the cannibalism of the South Sea Islands and the brutality of American Indian warriors. Their acts, Wells-Barnett suggests, can be explained by the lack of familiarity of these nations with Christianity, but the United States cannot use that excuse. National honor, therefore, demands that America reject lynching so as to live up to its own laws and moral principles.

Finally, Wells-Barnett appeals to American patriotism. If the world does not respect the United States, no American citizen can expect to travel abroad or participate in discussions on international affairs without inviting ridicule. The pride of the country is at stake, she implies. She concludes by citing a French newspaper that scoffed at American criticism of the French judicial system (which had been criticized widely for anti-Semitism in the treason case of Captain Alfred Dreyfus) by suggesting that Americans attend to their own lynching problem before criticizing others.

Perhaps the most interesting aspect of Wells-Barnett's article is her use of the concept of "civilization" and her invocation of world opinion and America's international standing to support her case. In her use of "civilization," Wells-Barnett turns the tables on racists who insist upon the "savagery" of black men. Control of primal urges (sexual ones especially) were considered a mark of "civilized" people in the nineteenth century. White women were in peril, supposedly, because black men could not control their sexual urges. Wells-Barnett, however, points out that white men have sexually transgressed the color line far more often than black men. But the crime of rape or sexual assault against a black woman by a white man has never been punished. Furthermore, the orgy of blood and murder that she describes in the practice of lynching suggests that white men have given in to the most primal forms of bloodlust and revenge. By the standards of "civilization," southern whites have more to answer for than blacks, as they seem unable to control their basest passions.

In 1893 and 1894, Wells-Barnett had undertaken two speaking tours of the British Isles to publicize her investigations into the practice of lynching. These extremely successful tours managed to create greater international awareness of the situation for southern blacks and initiate an international dialogue about it. British criticism stung Americans and put apologists for lynching on the defensive in the United States. Wells-Barnett clearly intends to press this strategy in the conclusion of "Lynch Law in America." By emphasizing the negative consequences of lynching on America's reputation on the world stage, she hits upon an effective strategy that puts pressure on white Americans regardless of their sympathy for black victims of lynching. It is in America's best interest to curb these embarrassing episodes and to follow the rule of law for all citizens, regardless of race, she maintains. Wells-Barnett takes every opportunity to remind her readers that America's response to lynching is being observed from abroad.

Audience

Wells-Barnett published "Lynch Law in America" in the January 1900 issue of Arena, a Progressive Boston-based magazine devoted to raising awareness of injustices against the poor and powerless. Through this magazine she reached an influential white audience that was not likely to read her pamphlets or newspaper articles.

Impact

Although she was one of the few black leaders who made lynching a top focus for concern in the 1890s—a decade in which blacks also faced the imposition of disenfranchisement and Jim Crow segregation—Wells-Barnett's antilynching campaign succeeded in bringing the issue to national attention. Heightened awareness outside the South about the pervasiveness of this practice and the dubiousness of the public excuses for it eventually flowered into broad public disapproval. The response to mob violence in Springfield, Illinois, in 1908 that launched the NAACP reflected a changed opinion among Progressive northerners, who saw the spread of lynching as a moral concern of the first order. No doubt Wells-Barnett's campaign deserves a great deal of credit for this change in opinion.

See also Emancipation Proclamation (1863); Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1868); Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1870); Plessy v. Ferguson (1896); Walter F. White: "The Eruption of Tulsa" (1921).

Further Reading

■ Articles

Karcher, Carolyn L. "Ida B. Wells and Her Allies against Lynching: A Transnational Perspective." Comparative American Studies 3, no. 2 (June 2005): 131–151.

———. "The White 'Bystander' and the Black Journalist 'Abroad:'" Albion W. Tourgée and Ida B. Wells as Allies against Lynching." Prospects 29 (October 2005): 85–119.

■ Books

Bay, Mia. To Tell the Truth Freely: The Life of Ida B. Wells. New York: Hill and Wang, 2009.

Davidson, James West. "They Say": Ida B. Wells and the Reconstruction of Race. New York: Oxford University Press, 2007.

Giddings, Paula J. Ida: A Sword among Lions. New York: HarperCollins/Amistad, 2008.

Hendricks, W. A. Gender, Race, and Politics in the Midwest. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1998.

McMurry, Linda O. To Keep the Waters Troubled: The Life of Ida B. Wells. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Schechter, Patricia A. Ida B. Wells-Barnett and American Reform, 1880–1930. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2001.

Wells, Ida B. Southern Horrors and Other Writings: The Anti-Lynching Campaign of Ida B. Wells, 1892–1900, ed. Jacqueline Jones Royster. New York: Bedford Books, 1997.

■ Web Sites

"Behind the Veil: Documenting African American Life in the Jim Crow South." Center for Documentary Studies at Duke University Web site.
http://cds.aas.duke.edu/btv/index.html.

PBS's "The Rise and Fall of Jim Crow" Web site.
http://www.pbs.org/wnet/jimcrow/index.html.

—Mark Elliott

Questions for Further Study

1. To what extent did the conditions Wells-Barnett described contribute to the race riot in Tulsa, Oklahoma, detailed in Walter White's "The Eruption of Tulsa"?

2. Summarize the arguments Wells-Barnett makes in opposition to lynching. How, in her view, did it conflict with Christianity and with the democratic traditions of the country? What impact did the prevalence of lynching have on America's reputation abroad?

3. In the decades that followed, efforts to pass a federal antilynching bill were unsuccessful. Does this mean that Wells-Barnett's article was in some sense a failure by not influencing public opinion?

4. What role did the Ku Klux Klan and other white supremacist and paramilitary organizations play in the growth of lynching?

5. In what way did her personal experience contribute to Wells-Barnett's campaign against lynching?

Document Text

Ida B. Wells-Barnett's "Lynch Law in America"

Our country's national crime is lynching. It is not the creature of an hour, the sudden outburst of uncontrolled fury, or the unspeakable brutality of an insane mob. It represents the cool, calculating deliberation of intelligent people who openly avow that there is an "unwritten law" that justifies them in putting human beings to death without complaint under oath, without trial by jury, without opportunity to make defense, and without right of appeal. The "unwritten law" first found excuse with the rough, rugged, and determined man who left the civilized centers of eastern States to seek for quick returns in the gold-fields of the far West. Following in uncertain pursuit of continually eluding fortune, they dared the savagery of the Indians, the hardships of mountain travel, and the constant terror of border State outlaws. Naturally, they felt slight toleration for traitors in their own ranks. It was enough to fight the enemies from without; woe to the foe within! Far removed from and entirely without protection of the courts of civilized life, these fortune-seekers made laws to meet their varying emergencies. The thief who stole a horse, the bully who "jumped" a claim, was a common enemy. If caught he was promptly tried, and if found guilty was hanged to the tree under which the court convened.

Those were busy days of busy men. They had no time to give the prisoner a bill of exception or stay of execution. The only way a man had to secure a stay of execution was to behave himself. Judge Lynch was original in methods but exceedingly effective in procedure. He made the charge, impaneled the jurors, and directed the execution. When the court adjourned, the prisoner was dead. Thus lynch law held sway in the far West until civilization spread into the Territories and the orderly processes of law took its place. The emergency no longer existing, lynching gradually disappeared from the West.

But the spirit of mob procedure seemed to have fastened itself upon the lawless classes, and the grim process that at first was invoked to declare justice was made the excuse to wreak vengeance and cover crime. It next appeared in the South, where centuries of Anglo-Saxon civilization had made effective all the safeguards of court procedure. No emergency called for lynch law. It asserted its sway in defiance of law and in favor of anarchy. There it has flourished ever since, marking the thirty years of its existence with the inhuman butchery of more than ten thousand men, women, and children by shooting, drowning, hanging, and burning them alive. Not only this, but so potent is the force of example that the lynching mania has spread throughout the North and middle West. It is now no uncommon thing to read of lynchings north of Mason and Dixon's line, and those most responsible for this fashion gleefully point to these instances and assert that the North is no better than the South.

This is the work of the "unwritten law" about which so much is said, and in whose behest butchery is made a pastime and national savagery condoned. The first statute of this "unwritten law" was written in the blood of thousands of brave men who thought that a government that was good enough to create a citizenship was strong enough to protect it. Under the authority of a national law that gave every citizen the right to vote, the newly-made citizens chose to exercise their suffrage. But the reign of the national law was short-lived and illusionary. Hardly had the sentences dried upon the statute-books before one Southern State after another raised the cry against "negro domination" and proclaimed there was an "unwritten law" that justified any means to resist it.

The method then inaugurated was the outrages by the "red-shirt" bands of Louisiana, South Carolina, and other Southern States, which were succeeded by the Ku-Klux Klans. These advocates of the "unwritten law" boldly avowed their purpose to intimidate, suppress, and nullify the negro's right to vote. In support of its plans the Ku-Klux Klans, the "red-shirt" and similar organizations proceeded to beat, exile, and kill negroes until the purpose of their organization was accomplished and the supremacy of the "unwritten law" was effected. Thus lynchings began in the South, rapidly spreading into the various States until the national law was nullified and the reign of the "unwritten law" was supreme. Men were taken from their homes by "red-shirt" bands and stripped, beaten, and exiled; others were assassinated when their political prominence made them obnoxious to their political opponents; while the Ku-Klux barbarism of election days, reveling in the butchery of thousands of colored voters, furnished records in Congressional investigations that are a disgrace to civilization.

Document Text

The alleged menace of universal suffrage having been avoided by the absolute suppression of the negro vote, the spirit of mob murder should have been satisfied and the butchery of negroes should have ceased. But men, women, and children were the victims of murder by individuals and murder by mobs, just as they had been when killed at the demands of the "unwritten law" to prevent "negro domination." Negroes were killed for disputing over terms of contracts with their employers. If a few barns were burned some colored man was killed to stop it. If a colored man resented the imposition of a white man and the two came to blows, the colored man had to die, either at the hands of the white man then and there or later at the hands of a mob that speedily gathered. If he showed a spirit of courageous manhood he was hanged for his pains, and the killing was justified by the declaration that he was a "saucy nigger." Colored women have been murdered because they refused to tell the mobs where relatives could be found for "lynching bees." Boys of fourteen years have been lynched by white representatives of American civilization. In fact, for all kinds of offenses—and, for no offenses—from murders to misdemeanors, men and women are put to death without judge or jury; so that, although the political excuse was no longer necessary, the wholesale murder of human beings went on just the same. A new name was given to the killings and a new excuse was invented for so doing.

Again the aid of the "unwritten law" is invoked, and again it comes to the rescue. During the last ten years a new statute has been added to the "unwritten law." This statute proclaims that for certain crimes or alleged crimes no negro shall be allowed a trial; that no white woman shall be compelled to charge an assault under oath or to submit any such charge to the investigation of a court of law. The result is that many men have been put to death whose innocence was afterward established; and to-day, under this reign of the "unwritten law," no colored man, no matter what his reputation, is safe from lynching if a white woman, no matter what her standing or motive, cares to charge him with insult or assault.

It is considered a sufficient excuse and reasonable justification to put a prisoner to death under this "unwritten law" for the frequently repeated charge that these lynching horrors are necessary to prevent crimes against women. The sentiment of the country has been appealed to, in describing the isolated condition of white families in thickly populated negro districts; and the charge is made that these homes are in as great danger as if they were surrounded by wild beasts. And the world has accepted this theory without let or hindrance. In many cases there has been open expression that the fate meted out to the victim was only what he deserved. In many other instances there has been a silence that says more forcibly than words can proclaim it that it is right and proper that a human being should be seized by a mob and burned to death upon the unsworn and the uncorroborated charge of his accuser. No matter that our laws presume every man innocent until he is proved guilty; no matter that it leaves a certain class of individuals completely at the mercy of another class; no matter that it encourages those criminally disposed to blacken their faces and commit any crime in the calendar so long as they can throw suspicion on some negro, as is frequently done, and then lead a mob to take his life; no matter that mobs make a farce of the law and a mockery of justice; no matter that hundreds of boys are being hardened in crime and schooled in vice by the repetition of such scenes before their eyes—if a white woman declares herself insulted or assaulted, some life must pay the penalty, with all the horrors of the Spanish Inquisition and all the barbarism of the Middle Ages. The world looks on and says it is well.

Not only are two hundred men and women put to death annually, on the average, in this country by mobs, but these lives are taken with the greatest publicity. In many instances the leading citizens aid and abet by their presence when they do not participate, and the leading journals inflame the public mind to the lynching point with scare-head articles and offers of rewards. Whenever a burning is advertised to take place, the railroads run excursions, photographs are taken, and the same jubilee is indulged in that characterized the public hangings of one hundred years ago. There is, however, this difference: in those old days the multitude that stood by was permitted only to guy or jeer. The nineteenth century lynching mob cuts off ears, toes, and fingers, strips off flesh, and distributes portions of the body as souvenirs among the crowd. If the leaders of the mob are so minded, coal-oil is poured over the body and the victim is then roasted to death. This has been done in Texarkana and Paris, Tex., in Bardswell, Ky., and in Newman, Ga. In Paris the officers of the law delivered the prisoner to the mob. The mayor gave the school children a holiday and the railroads ran excursion trains so that the people might see a human being burned to death. In Texarkana, the year before, men and boys amused themselves by cutting off strips of flesh and thrusting knives into their helpless victim. At Newman, Ga., of the present year, the mob tried every conceivable torture to compel the victim to cry out and confess, before they set fire to the faggots that burned him. But their trouble was all in vain—he never uttered a cry, and they could not make him confess.

Document Text

This condition of affairs were brutal enough and horrible enough if it were true that lynchings occurred only because of the commission of crimes against women—as is constantly declared by ministers, editors, lawyers, teachers, statesmen, and even by women themselves. It has been to the interest of those who did the lynching to blacken the good name of the helpless and defenseless victims of their hate. For this reason they publish at every possible opportunity this excuse for lynching, hoping thereby not only to palliate their own crime but at the same time to prove the negro a moral monster and unworthy of the respect and sympathy of the civilized world. But this alleged reason adds to the deliberate injustice of the mob's work. Instead of lynchings being caused by assaults upon women, the statistics show that not one-third of the victims of lynchings are even charged with such crimes. The Chicago Tribune, which publishes annually lynching statistics, is authority for the following:

In 1892, when lynching reached high-water mark, there were 241 persons lynched. The entire number is divided among the following States:

Alabama: 22
Arkansas: 25
California: 3
Florida: 11
Georgia: 17
Idaho: 8
Illinois: 1
Kansas: 3
Kentucky: 9
Louisiana: 29
Maryland: 1
Mississippi: 16
Missouri: 6
Montana: 4
New York: 1
North Carolina: 5
North Dakota: 1
Ohio: 3
South Carolina: 5
Tennessee: 28
Texas: 15
Virginia: 7
West Virginia: 5
Wyoming: 9
Arizona Ter[ritory]: 3
Oklahoma: 2

Of this number, 160 were of negro descent. Four of them were lynched in New York, Ohio, and Kansas; the remainder were murdered in the South. Five of this number were females. The charges for which they were lynched cover a wide range. They are as follows:

Rape: 46
Murder: 58
Rioting: 3
Race Prejudice: 6
No cause given: 4
Incendiarism: 6
Robbery: 6
Assault and battery: 1
Attempted rape: 11
Suspected robbery: 4
Larceny: 1
Self-defense: 1
Insulting women: 2
Desperadoes: 6
Fraud: 1
Attempted murder: 2
No offense stated, boy and girl: 4

In the case of the boy and girl above referred to, their father, named Hastings, was accused of the murder of a white man. His fourteen-year-old daughter and sixteen-year-old son were hanged and their bodies filled with bullets; then the father was also lynched. This occurred in November, 1892, at Jonesville, La.

Indeed, the record for the last twenty years shows exactly the same or a smaller proportion who have been charged with this horrible crime. Quite a number of the one-third alleged cases of assault that have been personally investigated by the writer have shown that there was no foundation in fact for the charges; yet the claim is not made that there were no real culprits among them. The negro has been too long associated with the white man not to have copied his vices as well as his virtues. But the negro resents and utterly repudiates the efforts to blacken his good name by asserting that assaults upon women are peculiar to his race. The negro has suffered far more from the commission of this crime against the women of his race by white men than the white race has ever suffered through his crimes. Very scant notice is taken of the matter when this is the condition of affairs. What becomes a crime deserving capital punishment when the tables are turned is a matter of small moment when the negro woman is the accusing party.

Document Text

But since the world has accepted this false and unjust statement, and the burden of proof has been placed upon the negro to vindicate his race, he is taking steps to do so. The Anti-Lynching Bureau of the National Afro-American Council is arranging to have every lynching investigated and publish the facts to the world, as has been done in the case of Sam Hose, who was burned alive last April at Newman, Ga. The detective's report showed that Hose killed Cranford, his employer, in self-defense, and that, while a mob was organizing to hunt Hose to punish him for killing a white man, not till twenty-four hours after the murder was the charge of rape, embellished with psychological and physical impossibilities, circulated. That gave an impetus to the hunt, and the Atlanta Constitution's reward of $500 keyed the mob to the necessary burning and roasting pitch. Of five hundred newspaper clippings of that horrible affair, nine-tenths of them assumed Hose's guilt—simply because his murderers said so, and because it is the fashion to believe the negro peculiarly addicted to this species of crime. All the negro asks is justice—a fair and impartial trial in the courts of the country. That given, he will abide the result.

But this question affects the entire American nation, and from several points of view: First, on the ground of consistency. Our watchword has been "the land of the free and the home of the brave." Brave men do not gather by thousands to torture and murder a single individual, so gagged and bound he cannot make even feeble resistance or defense. Neither do brave men or women stand by and see such things done without compunction of conscience, nor read of them without protest. Our nation has been active and outspoken in its endeavors to right the wrongs of the Armenian Christian, the Russian Jew, the Irish Home Ruler, the native women of India, the Siberian exile, and the Cuban patriot. Surely it should be the nation's duty to correct its own evils!

Second, on the ground of economy. To those who fail to be convinced from any other point of view touching this momentous question, a consideration of the economic phase might not be amiss. It is generally known that mobs in Louisiana, Colorado, Wyoming, and other States have lynched subjects of other countries. When their different governments demanded satisfaction, our country was forced to confess her inability to protect said subjects in the several States because of our State-rights doctrines, or in turn demand punishment of the lynchers. This confession, while humiliating in the extreme, was not satisfactory; and, while the United States cannot protect, she can pay. This she has done, and it is certain will have to do again in the case of the recent lynching of Italians in Louisiana. The United States already has paid in indemnities for lynching nearly a half million dollars, as follows:

Paid China for Rock Springs (Wyo.) massacre: $147,748.74
Paid China for outrages on Pacific Coast: 276,619.75
Paid Italy for massacre of Italian prisoners at New Orleans: 24,330.90
Paid Italy for lynchings at Walsenburg, Col[orado]: 10,000.00
Paid Great Britain for outrages on James Bain and Frederick Dawson: 2,800.00

Third, for the honor of Anglo-Saxon civilization. No scoffer at our boasted American civilization could say anything more harsh of it than does the American white man himself who says he is unable to protect the honor of his women without resort to such brutal, inhuman, and degrading exhibitions as characterize "lynching bees." The cannibals of the South Sea Islands roast human beings alive to satisfy hunger. The red Indian of the Western plains tied his prisoner to the stake, tortured him, and danced in fiendish glee while his victim writhed in the flames. His savage, untutored mind suggested no better way than that of wreaking vengeance upon those who had wronged him. These people knew nothing about Christianity and did not profess to follow its teachings; but such primary laws as they had they lived up to. No nation, savage or civilized, save only the United States of America, has confessed its inability to protect its women save by hanging, shooting, and burning alleged offenders.

Finally, for love of country. No American travels abroad without blushing for shame for his country on this subject. And whatever the excuse that passes current in the United States, it avails nothing abroad. With all the powers of government in control; with all laws made by white men, administered by white judges, jurors, prosecuting attorneys, and sheriffs; with every office of the executive department filled by white men—no excuse can be offered for exchanging the orderly administration of justice for barbarous lynchings and "unwritten laws." Our country should be placed speedily above the plane of confessing herself a failure at self-government. This cannot be until Americans of every section, of broadest patriotism and best and wisest citizenship, not only see the defect in our country's armor but take the necessary steps to remedy it. Although lynchings have steadily increased in number and barbarity during the last twenty years, there has been no single effort put forth by the many moral and philanthropic forces of the country to put a stop to this wholesale slaughter. Indeed, the silence and seeming condonation grow more marked as the years go by.

Document Text

A few months ago the conscience of this country was shocked because, after a two-weeks trial, a French judicial tribunal pronounced Captain Dreyfus guilty. And yet, in our own land and under our own flag, the writer can give day and detail of one thousand men, women, and children who during the last six years were put to death without trial before any tribunal on earth. Humiliating indeed, but altogether unanswerable, was the reply of the French press to our protest: "Stop your lynchings at home before you send your protests abroad."

Glossary

Anglo-Saxon	a reference to the Germanic tribes that invaded and settled Great Britain; more generally, Anglo-American civilization
Captain Dreyfus	Alfred Dreyfus, a Jewish French military officer who was at the center of a scandal that divided France in the 1890s after he was falsely convicted of treason
Irish Home Ruler	an Irish person who wanted an Ireland independent from the United Kingdom
"jumped" a claim	the practice of stealing someone's mining property
Mason and Dixon's line	a line surveyed in the eighteenth century to settle border disputes in the American colonies, more generally referring to the boundary between the North and the South in the United States
Spanish Inquisition	a tribunal established in fifteenth-century Spain to enforce Catholic orthodoxy; used often as a symbol of cruelty because of its use of torture and extreme punishments

1901 - 1964

George H. White's Farewell Address to Congress

1901

"You may tie us and then taunt us for a lack of bravery, but one day we will break the bonds."

Overview

George Henry White's Farewell Address to Congress was delivered to the House of Representatives on January 29, 1901. White was a two-term Republican congressman from North Carolina's Second Congressional District (known as the Black Second because of its large African American majority). During his years in the Fifty-fifth and Fifty-sixth Congresses, he had been the only black man among 357 representatives and 84 senators from 42 states. On the day White spoke, his legislative service was drawing to a close because he had chosen not to run for a third term in the November 1900 election, a decision he had made known in a speech on June 30 of that year. In consequence, he would leave the House of Representatives on March 4, 1901, the last African American to serve in Congress in the three and a half decades following the Civil War. Because of changes in the southern political landscape, there was little likelihood that another African American would soon succeed him.

White was a proud and stubborn man, and his four years in the House had been contentious and far from satisfying. He was the twenty-second African American since 1870 to hold congressional office, and like most of his predecessors (nineteen of them in the House, two in the Senate, and all of them Republicans), he was subjected to the institutional bias of white representatives and senators, who openly denigrated African Americans as ignorant, inferior, and incompetent; mocked them with "darky stories"; and mimicked them with an affected "plantation" dialect. In the weeks before his farewell speech, White had attempted on several occasions to call his white colleagues to account for such behavior but had been denied the opportunity. His efforts, for example, to introduce legislation on behalf of African Americans who, in the late 1890s, faced disenfranchisement by state legislatures and mob violence from white supremacy groups, brought immediate objection from southern Democrats that effectively left his proposals stillborn. When he boldly proposed reducing southern representation in Congress proportionate to the number of African Americans denied the vote, Democratic newspapers in North Carolina accused him of inciting racial unrest. These were matters that weighed heavily on White's mind as he prepared his valedictory address.

Context

White was the last of twenty African Americans elected to the House of Representatives in the nineteenth century, who collectively served thirty-eight two-year terms between 1870 and 1901. (The two African Americans elected to the Senate in the 1870s served a total of seven years.) They were all among the most visible beneficiaries of Radical Reconstruction policies that extended the suffrage to black males and other civil rights to the African American population in the South in the aftermath of the Civil War. That extension of rights generated opposition from powerful forces in the defeated South, and by the end of the century the personal freedoms of African Americans had been reduced or replaced by Jim Crow laws that, in turn, created a harsh segregated world in the American South.

The Civil War ended with the question of how to return the southern states to the Union unresolved and a matter of some confusion as a result of President Abraham Lincoln's assassination. Lincoln in 1862 had used his executive authority to appoint provisional military governors for the southern states recaptured by the Union army. His plan for Reconstruction was simplicity itself: States would be readmitted when at least 10 percent of the voters in 1860 took an oath of allegiance to the United States. After Lincoln's death, a struggle emerged in Congress between those who urged a continuation of the 10 percent plan and the antislavery wing of the Republican Party, who demanded a program of black civil rights to protect African Americans throughout the South. The Radicals, as they came to be known, gained control of the Congress and immediately clashed with President Andrew Johnson, whose policies seemed to support white supremacy.

In the 1866 congressional elections the Radical Republicans gained two-thirds of the seats in Congress and immediately passed, over President Johnson's veto, the Reconstruction Acts of 1867 that divided the old Confederacy into five military districts. To secure readmission, each state had to accept the Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution, which outlawed slavery, and the Fourteenth Amendment, which extended a broad range of civil and political rights to African Americans. A key provision required the states to revise their constitutions to include

Time Line

1852

- December 18
  George Herbert White is born in Rosindale, North Carolina.

1865

- December 6
  The Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution ends slavery.

1868

- April
  North Carolina voters approve the constitution of 1868, which grants African Americans the right to vote.
- July 9
  The Fourteenth Amendment grants African Americans full citizenship in the United States.

1869

- November
  Voters in Tennessee replace their Republican biracial Reconstruction state government with a white-only Democratic "redeemer" government.

1870

- February 3
  The Fifteenth Amendment gives the vote to African American males.
- February 25
  Hiram Rhodes Revels, Republican of Mississippi, is elected by the state legislature to fill a one-year vacancy in the U.S. Senate, becoming the first African American to serve in Congress.
- December 12
  Joseph Rainey, Republican from South Carolina, becomes the first African American to serve in the U.S. House of Representatives.

1877

- March 4
  Rutherford B. Hayes is inaugurated president of the United States following a disputed election, settled by the Compromise of 1877.

extending the vote to black males. The Freedmen's Bureau was authorized to oversee the implementation of the new laws and ensure that the rights of African Americans were protected. In 1868 most of southern states revised their constitutions to include, among other rights, the franchise (the vote) for blacks. They eliminated the earlier legislatures' Black Codes, which restricted or denied the postwar civil rights of the newly freed African Americans and controlled a broad range of personal freedoms, including employment, education, housing, and the right to move about freely after dark. In the fall elections Republican-dominated legislatures comprising a loose coalition of African Americans and whites emerged. The whites, if from the North, were called carpetbaggers, and if from the South they were labeled scalawags by their Democratic opposition. In due course they enacted major civil rights programs in their states, including universal public education and revisions to the judicial system that included placing blacks on trial juries.

Beginning in 1870, Congress passed the Enforcement Acts, a series of laws that protected black voting rights, office holding, and jury service and (in 1871) outlawed the Ku Klux Klan, which had waged a campaign of violence and death against African Americans in the rural South. (Although the Klan disbanded in 1872 to be revived in 1915 white violence in the form of lynchings continued against blacks through the remainder of the nineteenth century and into the next.) The Radical Republicans passed the Civil Rights Act of 1875, prohibiting discrimination in hotels, trains, and other public spaces. By then, there was a growing movement among southern whites opposed to racial equality that sought to restore southern white rule in the old Confederacy. Known as the "Redeemers," they enjoyed a major success with the election of Wade Hampton, a former Confederate general dedicated to white supremacy, to the governorship of South Carolina in 1876. Another victory came with the formal end of Reconstruction starting in April 1877 with the withdrawal of federal troops from South Carolina and Louisiana, fulfilling the terms of the Compromise of 1877 that settled the disputed presidential election of 1876. In that election the winner of the popular vote, Samuel J. Tilden, a Democrat, fell one vote short of a majority in the Electoral College because of confusing ballot counts from three southern states. After days of wrangling, the Democrats in Congress (most of them southerners) agreed to make the Republican Rutherford B. Hayes president. In return, Hayes promised to restore civilian rule in the two states still under military control. Shortly after his swearing-in, Hayes ordered all remaining federal troops out of the South.

During the next two decades, the largely Democratic Redeemers replaced the biracial Republican governments throughout the South and gradually stripped away the hard-won rights of African Americans. In consequence, Jim Crow laws, which in time denied blacks access to transportation, housing, employment, recreation, and education, created a racially segregated society that lasted until the middle of the next century. The laws were given legal sanction by the U.S.

Supreme Court in 1883 when it declared the Civil Rights Act of 1875 unconstitutional on the ground that Congress did not have the power to regulate the conduct and transactions of individuals. In 1896 the Court gave racial segregation constitutional standing in Plessy v. Ferguson.

The final assault by southern whites on African American empowerment began with the Mississippi Plan in 1890. Developed in the state's constitutional convention, the plan was manifested in a "purity" clause that expressly stated in the constitution that "blacks must no longer be allowed to vote." The means of enforcement (in order to circumvent the Fifteenth Amendment) was to apply a property requirement and a poll tax or a literacy test or both as a basis for voting. The literacy test over time evolved into an "understanding" test, in which the would-be voter would be required to interpret a passage from the state's constitution. The Mississippi Plan spread through the South and by 1910 had been adopted in seven states. Its constitutionality was affirmed by the Supreme Court in 1898 in Williams v. Mississippi. That same year the Louisiana legislature provided the last refinement to eliminating the black vote by adding a grandfather clause to the state constitution specifically exempting from the property, poll tax, and literacy tests "any individuals whose fathers or grandfathers were legally entitled to vote prior to January 1, 1867." No African American, of course, could meet that requirement. With variations in the date, the clause was soon added to other state constitutions in the South.

Most of these limitations on African Americans were in place in North Carolina in time for the fall election in 1900. Added to them were the internal political conflicts that divided the Democratic majority in the state from the once-dominant Republicans. Examining the possibility of his winning a third term in Congress and well aware of the defeats he had met in the House his antilynching bill had died in the Judiciary Committee George White decided not to seek reelection.

About the Author

George Henry White was born on December 18, 1852, in Rosindale, North Carolina, to Wiley F. White, a free African American farmer, and his wife, Mary, a slave. (Under North Carolina law George White was free at birth because of his father's status.) Wiley White could read and write and apparently passed those skills on to his son, who at the end of the Civil War attended black public schools in nearby Columbus county. In 1873 he entered Howard University in Washington, D.C., earning a normal school (teaching) certificate in 1877. White qualified for the North Carolina bar in 1879 and practiced law while serving as the principal of several public schools, including the New Bern normal school for training black teachers. He gradually assumed leadership roles in the communities where he taught and became in time a respected public official.

White entered politics in 1880 when he was elected as a Republican to the first of two terms in the lower house of

Time Line

1880

- November
  At age twenty-eight, White is elected to the North Carolina General Assembly—his first political office.

1890

- August 12
  The Mississippi constitutional convention systematically disenfranchises African Americans by imposing a poll tax requirement and literacy tests for voters.

1896

- May 18
  In Plessy v. Ferguson the Supreme Court rules that segregation by race is constitutional.

1897

- March 15
  White takes his seat as a Republican in the Fifty-fifth Congress of the United States.

1898

- May 12
  Louisiana amends its state constitution with a grandfather clause that effectively limits the franchise to white males having the vote prior to January 1, 1867, and their descendants, a provision adopted by six other southern states by 1910.
- August 12
  In Williams v. Mississippi the Supreme Court upholds the constitutionality of the Mississippi Plan's poll taxes and literacy tests for voters.

1899

- March 4
  White begins his second term as the only African American in the Fifty-sixth Congress of the United States.

1900

- August
  North Carolina voters approve by a wide margin a constitution that "grandfathers" illiterate whites but effectively bars all African Americans from voting.

Time Line

1901

- January 29
  White delivers his Farewell Address to Congress.

1928

- November 6
  Oscar Stanton De Preist, Republican from Illinois, is the first African American elected to serve in the U.S. House of Representatives in the twentieth century.

1964

- January 24
  The Twenty-fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution prohibits the use of poll taxes in national elections.

1965

- August 6
  The Voting Rights Act enforces the Fifteenth Amendment and outlaws literary tests as a prerequisite for voting.

1966

- March 24
  In Harper v. Virginia State Board of Elections, the U.S. Supreme Court declares the use of a poll tax in state and local elections is unconstitutional.

2009

- September 26
  President Barack Obama invokes George White's Farewell Address during brief remarks delivered at the Congressional Black Caucus Foundation's annual Phoenix Awards Dinner in Washington, D.C.

the North Carolina General Assembly. As a member of the legislature's Education Committee, he proposed improvements in teacher training, mandatory schooling for the young, and increased funding for white and black public schools. He took on important duties in the county Republican Party, served in the upper house of the General Assembly, and was a delegate to several Republican National Conventions. In 1886, White was elected to the prestigious and politically powerful position of solicitor (public prosecutor) for the Second Judicial District, thereby setting the stage for his entrance onto the national scene. Possessing a shrewd political mind, he bided his time for a decade, building public support in the predominantly African American "Black Second" congressional district, which elected him to the House of Representatives in 1896 the lone African American in the Fifty-fifth Congress but a part of the Republican majority brought into office with the winning Republican presidential candidate, William McKinley.

White was assigned to the House Agriculture Committee. He supported most Republican-backed foreign policy measures. His major focus, however, during his four years in Congress was on civil rights for African Americans. He was unsuccessful in both terms in securing federal action against the southern states' continuing disenfranchisement of black voters. Reelected to the House in 1898, White continued on the Agriculture Committee and served as well on the District of Columbia Committee, which oversaw Washington's municipal government. In his second term he repeatedly sought antilynching legislation that would make mob violence a potential capital offense, but found little support from either the president or his fellow Republicans.

Although White considered himself a national spokesperson for African Americans (and the black newspapers seemed to agree), his positions were increasingly viewed as too radical by his House colleagues and by Republicans in his home district, where changes in the election law in his second term denied the ballot to many of his black supporters. In 1900 he made it known he would not run for reelection. In interviews with northern newspapers, he said that he could not live in North Carolina and be treated as a man, and he urged his black constituents to emigrate to the North or to the West in search of a better life.

Following his dramatic and powerful Farewell Address and his retirement from Congress in March 1901, White opened a successful private law practice in Washington, D.C., moving his office to Philadelphia four years later. As an entrepreneur, he developed Whitesboro, a town for African Americans on the New Jersey shore at Cape May, and established the People's Savings Bank in Philadelphia to provide banking services, including home and business loans, to the city's African Americans. In the summer of 1917, after the People's Savings Bank became insolvent and closed its doors, White was appointed assistant city solicitor, his first public position since his years in Congress. He died in his sleep on December 28, 1918, ten days after his sixty-sixth birthday.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

The document reproduced here is the speech George H. White delivered on the floor of the U.S. House of Representatives on January 29, 1901, now known as his Farewell Address. The topic before the House that day was the annual appropriation bill of the House Agriculture Committee, a bill that included the continuation of a free seed program to the nation's farmers and payment of the salaries of scientists and other experts in the Department of Agriculture. Given the complexity and importance of the bill (H.R. 13801), the House was sitting as a Committee of the Whole, which means, in parliamentary terms, that the usual rules of procedure for legislative action are suspended, allowing any member of the House, who chooses to attend, to speak freely. A chairman chosen from the majority presides (rather than the speaker), and any vote is by a simple majority (rather than a specified quorum). The House in regular session may vote to overturn any decisions made in this way.

Because the House was meeting on January 29, 1901, as a Committee of the Whole, White was free to ignore H.R. 13801 and turn, if he wished, to more personal concerns. In his opening remarks, which are not included here, White acknowledged the importance of the bill's contents and then boldly seized the opportunity to deliver a strong defense of his African American constituents and offer a profoundly moving farewell to the Congress he has faithfully served for four years.

White's eloquent opening sentences in paragraph 1 are among the best-known lines in his address. They provide a powerful introduction to the reasons he is ignoring the bill before the House and introduce his indictment of his colleagues, who have consistently slandered his race by linking "the unfortunate few" who commit crimes or lead less than exemplary lives to the majority of hard-working, responsible African Americans. Their calumnies intensified during the last weeks of the Fifty-sixth Congress as the House took up the reapportionment bill, which would increase the size of the House in 1903 by twenty-nine seats, bringing the chamber's total membership to 386 from 357. The debate gave White an opportunity to urge Congress to overturn the disenfranchisement provisions that several southern states had added to their constitutions or their election laws, thereby removing African Americans from the voting roles. White points out that because of parliamentary rulings he was denied the opportunity during the debate to respond to his white southern colleagues' demeaning statements.

White in paragraph 2 singles out his fellow representative from North Carolina, William W. Kitchin, a Democrat and a long-time political rival, as a particular scourge of African Americans, whose right to vote has been stripped away through a state constitutional amendment in August 1900. White deplores the unfairness of the amendment, which permits illiterate white men to vote if they register before 1908 and their ancestors were qualified to vote in 1867 or earlier, a qualification that is denied to African Americans, who are subject to a literacy test (including an interpretation of the state constitution) and a poll tax.

In paragraphs 3 and 4, White announces that he will leave the House in the next five weeks. He explains that William Kitchin's younger brother, Claude, would succeed him as a result of questionable vote counts. White carefully avoids charging fraud and says only that the returns went unchallenged in North Carolina's general election in August 1900.

In paragraphs 6 through 10 White directs his audience's attention to Stanyarne Wilson, a Democrat from South Carolina, who earlier took a leading role in the debate on reapportionment and disenfranchisement in the southern states. An example of White's biting wit is in paragraph 6, where he neatly insults his colleague without openly breaking the House rule that requires the chamber's members to treat each other with courtesy and respect. The veiled insult continues in paragraph 7 as White seems to accept Wilson's assertions that the Reconstruction government in South Carolina was corrupt and ineffective because of its Republican, biracial composition. What White is saying, however, is that if corruption existed (he concedes there may have been a few ignorant and gullible blacks in the legislature), it was not due to the African Americans in the legislature but to the work of unscrupulous whites from the North (carpetbaggers) who exploited the unstable institutions of the postwar South and then retreated to their northern homes or, White says in a witty aside, remained in the South and became Democrats.

White continues his assault on Wilson's argument in paragraph 8. He suggests that Wilson is probably correct in saying that southern whites are working to lift southern blacks and that he is grateful, but he quickly points out that it is black laborers who make it possible for their white "friends" to contribute the "stinty [limited or meager] pittance " that supports black education. White adds in paragraph 9 that for all the self-congratulation implicit in the Democrats' asserting that they are aiding African Americans to help themselves, statistics show that far greater sums are spent per capita on white schools than on black schools in South Carolina.

As he continues to rebut Wilson in paragraph 10, White's initial reference to "the musty records of 1868" is to the records of the several state constitutional conventions that year called to organize new governments during Reconstruction. Most of those constitutions provided universal education, suffrage to all males over twenty-one, and the right to hold public office regardless of race. The opponents of such measures then and in subsequent years argued that African Americans were unprepared for such responsibilities. In their view, most blacks were and continued to be ignorant, illiterate, or indolent, a caricature White rejects out of hand. He pointedly suggests that the condition of the freed slaves and of African Americans generally has changed significantly in the thirty-two years since the state constitutions were written. In paragraphs 10 and 11, he catalogs the advances that the race, despite obstacles imposed by the white world, have achieved in every area of life. It should be noted that the property values and other monetary references are in line with American averages in the nineteenth century.

Paragraphs 12 and 13 provide a stirring challenge to Congress and to white America to understand who African Americans are by moving past skin color and race to see them as human beings like themselves. White's language and his argument here are crystal clear: African Americans want what all Americans want: freedom, equality, family, and work. (The federation of labor White refers to in the last line of paragraph 12 is the recently organized American Federation of Labor, which was a cooperative composed of many independent trades, some of them identified as black or colored unions of, say, carpenters or plumbers, that united in the federation to seek common wages, rights, and protections.) Paragraph 13 carries White's defense of his people into the social and civic world, arguing that African Americans are denied full participation there not because of their own indifference but rather because of white prejudice and race hatred.

Governor Wade Hampton (Library of Congress)

Paragraph 14 is White's eloquent valedictory. His first sentence is a bold prediction that references the phoenix, the fabulous bird of ancient myth that is eternally renewed through death. The second offers in a dozen or so words his brilliant refutation of white America's hate-filled stereotypes of African Americans. Together they make up the most quoted passage from the speech in the twentieth century and, to many African Americans, the most memorable.

The anecdote that White relates in paragraphs 15 and 16 a transition to his concluding remark never happened. The English philosopher Sir Francis Bacon's bribery trial took place in 1621; he was found guilty, removed from office as attorney general, and fined. The English courtier and navigator Sir Walter Raleigh was executed in 1618 for disobeying King James I's orders not to invade Spanish territory in North America. In his first trial for treason in 1603, Raleigh, defending himself, unsuccessfully pleaded with the court to have his accusers brought to face him because "I am here for my life!"

White's speech comes full circle in paragraph 17 in a single-sentence summary of his argument, echoing the opening lines and reiterating his term-long struggle to get the House to respond to both the white supremacy violence and the disenfranchisement of African Americans in the southern states.

Audience

There were 357 congressmen from forty-five states in the Fifty-sixth Congress. The division of the House was 187 Republicans, 161 Democrats, 5 Populists, and 4 members of splinter parties. Since the measure before the House of Representatives was the annual agricultural appropriation bill under the existing rules the House was sitting as a Committee of the Whole, and members could choose not to attend it is likely that not all of the members were present. An unknown number of spectators were in the galleries, but because White was known to be speaking that day, a goodly number of African Americans were probably present. (A gifted and forceful speaker, White had drawn such an audience on past occasions.)

White's full speech was printed twice in 1901: in the Congressional Record (56th Congress, 2nd session, volume 34, part 2) and as a stand-alone fourteen-page booklet entitled Defense of the Negro Race Charges Answered. Speech of Hon. George H. White, of North Carolina, in the House of Representatives, January 29, 1901. According to White's biographer, Benjamin H. Jutesen, portions of the Farewell Address were reprinted in such contemporary African American newspapers as the Washington, D.C. Colored American, the Cleveland Gazette, and the New York Age, the most widely read black paper in the country. The address later appeared in several anthologies of black writing, giving it wide circulation well into the twentieth century. Its closing words particularly "Phoenix-like he will rise up some day and come again" resonated among African Americans for the next fifty years.

Impact

Because White had already forgone the 1900 election and thus given up his seat in the House, his Farewell Address had little impact on Congress not that day or in the years following. His words did nothing to lessen the institutional racism that he and his African American predecessors had experienced in the House and Senate, and Congress failed to halt the southern states' violations of the Fifteenth Amendment that denied the vote to generations of African Americans until the 1960s. As for White himself, the southern Democrats were happy to be rid of him, as were many Republicans, who had been uncomfortable with the North Carolinian's outspoken and unapologetic ways. Congressmen of both parties from the North and West well into the twentieth century remained indifferent to the second-class status of African Americans, 90 percent of whom lived in the South in 1901.

White continued in the House without incident for another month and quietly withdrew into his Washington home on March 3, 1901, in advance of the swearing-in of his successor from North Carolina, a white man who had been the beneficiary of the state's changed voting standards that barred most African Americans from voting. The next day, at noon on March 4, both houses of the North Carolina legislature marked the official end of White's term in

Essential Quotes

"You may tie us and then taunt us for a lack of bravery, but one day we will break the bonds."

(Paragraph 11)

"This, Mr. Chairman, is perhaps the negroes' temporary farewell to the American Congress; but let me say, Phoenix-like he will rise up some day and come again."

(Paragraph 14)

"I am pleading for the life, the liberty, the future happiness, and manhood suffrage for one-eighth of the entire population of the United States."

(Paragraph 17)

office by passing resolutions of thanksgiving that heralded a new era in which no black man would be serving in the U.S. Congress. The principal newspaper in the state hailed the departure of its "insolent negro" as a blessing not only to the state but to the nation as well.

For nearly three decades there were no African Americans in Congress until, as a consequence of the Great Migration of thousands of black men and women out of the South to the North, Oscar Stanton De Priest, a Republican from the South Side of Chicago, entered the Seventy-first Congress in March 1929 the first African American elected to the House of Representatives in the twentieth century. Through the following years the number of black men and women in Congress increased, especially in the years after 1950. In the 1960s, as a result of peaceful demonstrations by black students and others throughout the South, the barriers that had prevented African Americans from voting (and that had discouraged George White from seeking reelection in 1890) were removed. In January 1964 the Twenty-fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution barred the use of a poll tax as a prerequisite to voting in national elections. The use of a poll tax in state and local elections was declared unconstitutional by the U.S. Supreme Court in March 1966 in Harper v. Virginia State Board of Elections. President Lyndon Johnson signed the historic Voting Rights Act in August 1965, outlawing the use of literacy tests in voter registration and providing the federal government with powers to enforce the Fifteenth Amendment.

Additional milestones are worth noting: In November 1968 Edward W. Brooke, a Republican from Massachusetts, was elected to the Ninetieth Congress and served two terms in the U.S. Senate the first African American elected to that chamber in eighty-five years. And in 1973 Andrew Young, Democrat of Georgia, and Barbara Jordan, Democrat of Texas, entered the Ninety-third Congress as the first African Americans from the Deep South to be elected to the House since White bid the chamber farewell in 1901. Since 1870 a total of 119 African Americans have been elected to the House, six to the Senate. When the 111th Congress convened in January 2009, there were forty-one African Americans in the House of Representatives and one in the Senate, and Barack Obama was president of the United States. Nine months later, speaking at the Congressional Black Caucus Foundation's annual Phoenix Awards Dinner in Washington, D.C., President Obama saluted his audience, telling them that they were the fulfillment of White's prophecy that "Phoenix-like," African American men and women would "rise up and come again" to serve the nation in the national government.

See also Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1865); Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1868); Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1870); Civil Rights Cases (1883); Plessy v. Ferguson (1896).

Further Reading

Articles

"Southern Negro's Plaint." New York Times, August 26, 1900.

Books

Anderson, Eric. Race and Politics in North Carolina, 1872 1901: The Black Second. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1981.

Dray, Philip. Capitol Men: The Epic Story of Reconstruction through the Lives of Black Congressmen. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 2008.

Hahn, Steven. A Nation Under Our Feet: Black Political Struggles in the Rural South, from Slavery to the Great Migration. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 2003.

Jutesen, Benjamin R. George Henry White: An Even Chance in the Race of Life. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 2001.

White, George Henry. In His Own Words: The Writings, Speeches, and Letters of George Henry White, ed. Benjamin R. Jutesen. Lincoln, Nebr.: iUniverse, Inc., 2004.

■ Web Sites

"Black Americans in Congress." Web site of the Office of the Clerk of the U.S. House of Representatives.
http://baic.house.gov/.

"Defense of the Negro Race Charges Answered." Documenting the American South Web site.
http://docsouth.unc.edu/nc/whitegh/whitegh.html.

"North Carolina History Project." John Locke Foundation Web site.
http://www.northcarolinahistory.org/.

Allan L. Damon

Questions for Further Study

1. In the years after the Civil War, a number of African Americans served in the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives. Why did their numbers dwindle until White was the last one before the 1960s?

2. Define "Radical Republicans." In what sense were they "radical"? What impact did they have on the Reconstruction period following the Civil War?

3. Trace the history of black voting rights in the post–Civil War decades. What specific events led to White's decision not to run again in North Carolina?

4. W. E. B. Du Bois's The Souls of Black Folk appeared just two years after White's address. Compare the two documents. To what extent do both make similar arguments and express similar hopes?

5. What were "carpetbaggers"? What role did they play in the political landscape of the post–Civil War South?

Document Text

George H. White's Farewell Address to Congress

I want to enter a plea for the colored man, the colored woman, the colored boy, and the colored girl of this country. I would not thus digress from the question at issue and detain the House in a discussion of the interests of this particular people at this time but for the constant and the persistent efforts of certain gentlemen upon this floor to mold and rivet public sentiment against us as a people and to lose no opportunity to hold up the unfortunate few who commit crimes and depredations and lead lives of infamy and shame, as other races do, as fair specimens of representatives of the entire colored race. And at no time, perhaps, during the Fifty-sixth Congress were these charges and countercharges, containing, as they do, slanderous statements, more persistently magnified and pressed upon the attention of the nation than during the consideration of the recent reapportionment bill, which is now a law. As stated some days ago on this floor by me, I then sought diligently to obtain an opportunity to answer some of the statements made by gentlemen from different States, but the privilege was denied me; and I therefore must embrace this opportunity to say, out of season, perhaps, that which I was not permitted to say in season.

In the catalogue of members of Congress in this House perhaps none have been more persistent in their determination to bring the black man into disrepute and, with a labored effort, to show that he was unworthy of the right of citizenship than my colleague from North Carolina, Mr. Kitchin. During the first session of this Congress, while the Constitutional amendment was pending in North Carolina, he labored long and hard to show that the white race was at all times and under all circumstances superior to the Negro by inheritance if not otherwise, and the excuse for his party supporting that amendment, which has since been adopted, was that an illiterate Negro was unfit to participate in making the laws of a sovereign State and the administration and execution of them; but an illiterate white man living by his side, with no more or perhaps not as much property, with no more exalted character, no higher thoughts of civilization, no more knowledge of the handicraft of government, had by birth, because he was white, inherited some peculiar qualification, clear, I presume, only in the mind of the gentleman who endeavored to impress it upon others, that entitled him to vote, though he knew nothing whatever of letters. It is true, in my opinion, that men brood over things at times which they would have exist until they fool themselves and actually, sometimes honestly, believe that such things do exist.…

I might state as a further general fact that the Democrats of North Carolina got possession of the state and local government since my last election in 1898, and that I bid adieu to these historic walls on the 4th day of next March, and that the brother of Mr. Kitchin will succeed me. Comment is unnecessary. In the town where this young gentleman was born, at the general election last August for … state and county officers, Scotland Neck had a registered white vote of 395, most of whom of course were Democrats, and a registered colored vote of 534, virtually if not all of whom were Republicans, and so voted. When the count was announced, however, there were 831 Democrats to 75 Republicans; but in the town of Halifax, same county, the result was much more pronounced.

In that town the registered Republican vote was 345, and the total registered vote of the township was 539, but when the count was announced it stood 990 Democrats to 41 Republicans, or 492 more Democratic votes counted than were registered votes in the township. Comment here is unnecessary.…

It would be unfair, however, for me to leave the inference upon the minds of those who hear me that all of the white people of the State of North Carolina hold views with Mr. Kitchin and think as he does. Thank God there are many noble exceptions to the example he sets, that, too, in the Democratic party; men who have never been afraid that one uneducated, poor, depressed Negro could put to flight and chase into degradation two educated, wealthy, thrifty white men. There never has been, nor ever will be, any Negro domination in that state, and no one knows it any better than the Democratic party. It is a convenient howl, however, often resorted to in order to consummate a diabolical purpose by scaring the weak and gullible whites into support of measures and men suitable to the demagogue and the ambitious office seeker, whose crave for office overshadows and puts to flight all other considerations, fair or unfair.…

Document Text

I trust I will be pardoned for making a passing reference to one more gentleman Mr. Wilson of South Carolina who, in the early part of this month, made a speech, some parts of which did great credit to him, showing, as it did, capacity for collating, arranging, and advancing thoughts of others and of making a pretty strong argument out of a very poor case.

If he had stopped there, while not agreeing with him, many of us would have been forced to admit that he had done well. But his purpose was incomplete until he dragged in the reconstruction days and held up to scorn and ridicule the few ignorant, gullible, and perhaps purchasable negroes who served in the State legislature of South Carolina over thirty years ago. Not a word did he say about the unscrupulous white men, in the main bummers who followed in the wake of the Federal Army and settled themselves in the Southern States, and preyed upon the ignorant and unskilled minds of the colored people, looted the States of their wealth, brought into lowest disrepute the ignorant colored people, then hied away to their Northern homes for ease and comfort the balance of their lives, or joined the Democratic party to obtain social recognition, and have greatly aided in depressing and further degrading those whom they had used as easy tools to accomplish a diabolical purpose.

These few ignorant men who chanced at that time to hold office are given as a reason why the black man should not be permitted to participate in the affairs of the government which he is forced to pay taxes to support. He insists that they, the Southern whites, are the black man's best friend, and that they are taking him by the hand and trying to lift him up; that they are educating him. For all that he and all Southern people have done in this regard, I wish in behalf of the colored people of the South to extend our thanks. We are not ungrateful to friends, but feel that our toil has made our friends able to contribute the stinty pittance which we have received at their hands.

I read in a Democratic paper a few days ago, the Washington Times, an extract taken from a South Carolina paper, which was intended to exhibit the eagerness with which the Negro is grasping every opportunity for educating himself. The clipping showed that the money for each white child in the State ranged from three to five times as much per capita as was given to each colored child. This is helping us some, but not to the extent that one would infer from the gentleman's speech.

If the gentleman to whom I have referred will pardon me, I would like to advance the statement that the musty records of 1868, filed away in the archives of Southern capitols, as to what the Negro was thirty-two years ago, is not a proper standard by which the Negro living on the threshold of the twentieth century should be measured. Since that time we have reduced the illiteracy of the race at least 45 percent. We have written and published nearly 500 books. We have nearly 800 newspapers, three of which are dailies. We have now in practice over 2,000 lawyers, and a corresponding number of doctors. We have accumulated over $12,000,000 worth of school property and about $40,000,000 worth of church property. We have about 140,000 farms and homes, valued in the neighborhood of $750,000,000, and personal property valued about $170,000,000. We have raised about $11,000,000 for educational purposes, and the property per-capita for every colored man, woman and child in the United States is estimated at $75.

We are operating successfully several banks, commercial enterprises among our people in the South land, including one silk mill and one cotton factory. We have 32,000 teachers in the schools of the country; we have built, with the aid of our friends, about 20,000 churches, and support 7 colleges, 17 academies, 50 high schools, 5 law schools, 5 medical schools and 25 theological seminaries. We have over 600,000 acres of land in the South alone. The cotton produced, mainly by black labor, has increased from 4,669,770 bales in 1860 to 11,235,000 in 1899. All this was done under the most adverse circumstances. We have done it in the face of lynching, burning at the stake, with the humiliation of "Jim Crow" laws, the disfranchisement of our male citizens, slander and degradation of our women, with the factories closed against us, no Negro permitted to be conductor on the railway cars, whether run through the streets of our cities or across the prairies of our great country, no Negro permitted to run as engineer on a locomotive, most of the mines closed against us. Labor unions carpenters, painters, brick masons, machinists, hackmen and those supplying nearly every conceivable avocation for livelihood have banded themselves together to better their condition, but, with few exceptions, the black face has been left out. The Negroes are seldom employed in our mercantile stores. At this we do not wonder. Some day we hope to have them employed in our own stores. With all these odds against us, we are forging our way ahead, slowly, perhaps, but surely, You may tie us and then taunt us for a lack of bravery, but one day we will break the bonds. You may use our labor for two and a half centuries and then taunt us for our poverty, but let me remind you we will not always remain poor! You may withhold even the knowledge of how to read God's word and learn the way from earth to glory and then taunt us for our ignorance, but we would remind you that there is plenty of room at the top, and we are climbing.…

Document Text

Mr. Chairman, before concluding my remarks I want to submit a brief recipe for the solution of the so-called "American Negro problem." He asks no special favors, but simply demands that he be given the same chance for existence, for earning a livelihood, for raising himself in the scales of manhood and womanhood, that are accorded to kindred nationalities. Treat him as a man; go into his home and learn of his social conditions; learn of his cares, his troubles, and his hopes for the future; gain his confidence; open the doors of industry to him; let the word "Negro," "colored," and "black" be stricken from all the organizations enumerated in the federation of labor.

Help him to overcome his weaknesses, punish the crime-committing class by the courts of the land, measure the standard of the race by its best material, cease to mold prejudicial and unjust public sentiment against him, and … he will learn to support … and join in with that political party, that institution, whether secular or religious, in every community where he lives, which is destined to do the greatest good for the greatest number. Obliterate race hatred, party prejudice, and help us to achieve nobler ends, greater results and become satisfactory citizens to our brother in white.

This, Mr. Chairman, is perhaps the negroes' temporary farewell to the American Congress; but let me say, Phoenix-like he will rise up some day and come again. These parting words are in behalf of an outraged, heart-broken, bruised, and bleeding, but God-fearing people, faithful, industrious, loyal people rising people, full of potential force.

Mr. Chairman, in the trial of Lord Bacon, when the court disturbed the counsel for the defendant, Sir Walter Raleigh raised himself up to his full height and, addressing the court, said:

Sir, I am pleading for the life of a human being.

The only apology that I have to make for the earnestness with which I have spoken is that I am pleading for the life, the liberty, the future happiness, and manhood suffrage for one-eighth of the entire population of the United States.

Glossary

bummers	foragers or marauders during the Civil War
Fifty-sixth Congress	the congressional term from 1899 to 1901, following the practice of numbering two-year congressional terms
hackmen	the drivers of hacks, or cabs
Jim Crow	the informal term used to designate laws and social customs that deprived African Americans of their liberties and rights
Lord Bacon	Francis Bacon, seventeenth-century scientist, jurist, statesman, and philosopher, tried by Parliament for corruption
Mr. Kitchin	William W. Kitchin, White's political rival, whose younger brother, Claude, would succeed White in office
Mr. Wilson	Stanyarne Wilson, a U.S. congressional representative from South Carolina musty records of 1868	the records of the state constitutional conventions during Reconstruction
Phoenix	a legendary Arabian bird that was said to burn itself to death and then rise from the ashes
Sir Walter Raleigh	an English aristocrat and courtier of the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries who was a favorite of Queen Elizabeth I

W. E. B. Du Bois (Library of Congress)

W. E. B. Du Bois: The Souls of Black Folk

1903

"[Booker T.] Washington represents in Negro thought the old attitude of adjustment and submission."

Overview

In 1903, W. E. B. Du Bois published the classic book for which he is most remembered, The Souls of Black Folk: Essays and Sketches. A groundbreaking study of the African American community from a sociological perspective, the book outlines for both black and white readers the position of African Americans at the turn of the twentieth century. The Souls of Black Folk was in large part a repudiation of the views of Booker T. Washington, the black leader who urged other blacks to pursue economic equality before trying to gain political and social equality. Du Bois, in contrast, urged African Americans to develop a "black consciousness" based on an appreciation of their own unique art, culture, religious views, and history and to continue to pursue civil rights. In Chapter III, "Of Mr. Booker T. Washington and Others," Du Bois takes on the rift between Washington's accommodationist views and a more assertive, militant view of African American aspirations. The Souls of Black Folk was a key early doctrine of the Harlem Renaissance, the flowering of black culture and art that centered on the Harlem district of Manhattan in New York City, and it remains a central document in the seismic shift of African American consciousness at the start of the twentieth century.

Context

Du Bois came of age during the Reconstruction era that followed the Civil War, "Reconstruction" referring to the political process of reintegrating the rebellious Confederate states into the Union. Confederate soldiers returning to ruined homes found themselves in tenuous financial and political circumstances. The defeated South entered a period of economic chaos. In the midst of this postwar turmoil, the U.S. Congress, led by the Radical Republicans (the loose faction of the Republican Party that before the war opposed slavery and after the war defended the rights of African Americans and wanted to impose harsh terms on the rebellious South), enacted the Thirteenth Amendment, which abolished slavery and other forms of involuntary servitude throughout the United States.

What followed was a flood of legislation and constitutional amendments designed to reshape the racial landscape of the United States. The Civil Rights Act of 1866 gave blacks the right to buy and sell property and to make and enforce contracts to the same extent as white citizens. The Fourteenth Amendment, which was ratified in 1868, affirmed the citizenship rights of former slaves and guaranteed "due process" and "equal protection" to all citizens under the law. The four Reconstruction Acts (1867 1868) created military districts in the South to ensure order during the states' return to the Union, required congressional approval for new state constitutions (a requirement for Confederate states to rejoin the Union), gave voting rights to all men in the former Confederacy, and stipulated that Confederate states had to ratify the Fourteenth Amendment. The Fifteenth Amendment, which took effect in 1870, guaranteed the voting rights of all citizens. The Ku Klux Klan Act of 1871 gave the U.S. president sweeping powers to combat the Klan and similar organizations in the South that were using violence and intimidation to deprive African Americans of their rights and that often directed their violence against white Republicans who supported equal rights for blacks. The Civil Rights Act of 1875 made it unlawful for inns, restaurants, theaters, and other public facilities to deny access to any individual based on race.

The Hayes-Tilden Compromise of 1877 represented the turning point in the fate of black Americans in the South. The most disputed presidential election in American history took place in 1876. After the votes were counted, Democrat Samuel Tilden held a narrow lead in both the popular vote and in the Electoral College over Republican Rutherford B. Hayes, but a number of electoral votes were in dispute. In the Compromise of 1877, Democrats (whose stronghold was in the South) agreed to recognize Hayes as president on the condition that he withdraw federal troops from Florida, South Carolina, and Louisiana, the only three southern states where postwar troops remained. This event marked the end of the Reconstruction era and allowed whites to reassert their dominance using violence, intimidation, and fraud.

Matters worsened in the years that followed. A series of U.S. Supreme Court cases undermined the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments. In the 1876 case United States v.

Time Line

1868

- February 23
  William Edward Burghardt Du Bois is born in Great Barrington, Massachusetts.

1885

- Du Bois enrolls at Fisk University in Nashville, Tennessee.

1888

- Du Bois enrolls at Harvard University and receives a bachelor's degree in 1890.

1895

- Du Bois receives a PhD in history from Harvard.
- September 18
  Booker T. Washington delivers his "Atlanta Compromise" speech at the Atlanta Cotton States and International Exposition.

1897

- Du Bois begins teaching at Atlanta University, where he remains until 1910.

1903

- Du Bois's controversial essay collection The Souls of Black Folk is published.

1905

- July
  Du Bois cofounds the Niagara Movement.

1910

- Du Bois becomes director of publicity and research and a member of the board of directors of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP); he also founds and edits The Crisis, the association's official periodical.

1915

- November 14
  Booker T. Washington dies in Tuskegee, Alabama.

1934

- Du Bois resigns from the NAACP and returns to Atlanta University as chair of the Department of Sociology.

Reese, the Court rejected an African American's challenge to a poll tax, holding that the Fifteenth Amendment did not affirmatively assure the right to vote and that the poll tax was racially neutral. United States v. Cruikshank, decided the same year, involved an action against a group of whites who used lethal force to break up a political rally that blacks had organized. The Court held that the blacks who brought the case had not established that they were denied any rights based on their color. In the Civil Rights Cases of 1883, which was a consolidation of several cases that presented similar issues, the Court declared that the 1875 Civil Rights Act was unconstitutional. The decision established the "state action" doctrine by holding that Congress did not have the authority to regulate private acts of discrimination. In 1896 segregation was affirmed when the Supreme Court ruled in Plessy v. Ferguson that laws requiring segregation in public transportation did not violate the Fourteenth Amendment as long as the separate facilities provided for blacks were equal to those available to whites. Yet another case upheld the outcome of Mississippi's 1890 state constitutional convention, which had the express purpose of disenfranchising black voters. In Williams v. Mississippi, the Supreme Court held in 1898 that because Mississippi's voter registration laws were not explicitly discriminatory, they did not violate the Fourteenth Amendment.

In The Souls of Black Folk, Du Bois reacted to the rising tide of segregation and racial subordination and established himself as one of the most prominent African American intellectuals and leaders of the early twentieth century. It also set off a heated debate that still reverberates in some circles. A few years before the book was published, the white South found what it believed would be a resolution of the still unsettled question of the status of the black population. The answer to the dilemma came from an unlikely source, a former slave who became perhaps the most powerful person of color in the history of the Republic. The bearer of this solution, Booker T. Washington, spent his childhood in Virginia assisting his family in a series of menial jobs. After he graduated from Hampton Normal and Agricultural Institute (now Hampton University), Washington received an offer to establish a school in rural Alabama. At what became the Tuskegee Institute, Washington developed a program emphasizing industrial education. He trained brick masons, carpenters, and other student artisans who constructed several of Tuskegee's buildings. Women were taught the domestic arts. Tuskegee's program was based on Washington's belief that black students would be served best by training for vocations in the industrial sphere rather than for professions.

In 1895 Washington delivered a historic speech in Atlanta, Georgia, before a large and mainly white audience the so-called "Atlanta Compromise" speech. Invoking a metaphor that would be seen as the solution for race relations, Washington, in a statement Du Bois quotes in Chapter III of The Souls of Black Folk, held out one hand and said, "In all things purely social we can be as separate as the fingers, yet as one hand in all things essential to mutual progress." He then closed his fingers into a fist to buttress his point. The implication of Washington's words was clear: African Americans would be trained to be obedient and reliable workers who would not challenge white supremacy. The speech received national acclaim and made Washington the preeminent leader of black America, particularly among white Americans but among many black Americans as well.

Despite his success, there was much about Washington's philosophy that rankled many African Americans. In addition to preaching accommodation, Washington's speeches included numerous references to the shortcoming of blacks. These comments were often couched in humorous anecdotes that delighted his white audiences but were demeaning to blacks. Washington ridiculed classical education as "sheer folly" because it would not prepare African Americans for practical occupations.

The lines were drawn. Largely in response to Washington's popularity, Du Bois wrote The Souls of Black Folk, a collection of incisive essays, several of which had been previously published in the Atlantic magazine.

About the Author

William Edward Burghardt Du Bois was born on February 23, 1868, in Great Barrington, Massachusetts, where he was raised by his mother, Mary Silvina Burghardt, whose English roots could be traced back to the American Revolution. She raised her son after his father, Alfred Du Bois, deserted the family when William was two years old. After completing public schooling in Great Barrington, Du Bois enrolled at Fisk University in Nashville, Tennessee, in 1885. He graduated in 1888 and was admitted to Harvard University as a junior.

After earning a bachelor's degree at Harvard, Du Bois remained to pursue graduate studies. He also studied at the University of Berlin and traveled extensively across Europe. He returned to the United States in 1894 and taught briefly at Wilberforce University in Ohio and then at Atlanta University until 1910. Du Bois helped organize the Niagara Movement in 1905 and was one of the founding members of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), which was established in 1909. He also edited the organization's journal, The Crisis, until his departure in 1934.

Du Bois returned to Atlanta University as the head of the sociology department, but in 1944 he rejoined the NAACP as director of publicity and research. His increasing impatience with the lagging advancement of African American rights and ideals, however, alienated his colleagues at the NAACP, and in 1948 he was discharged from his position. During this period Du Bois associated with a number of left-wing organizations. From 1949 to 1955 he was vice chair of the Council on African Affairs, which was cited by the U.S. attorney general as a "subversive" organization. In 1950 he became the chair of the Peace Information Center in New York City. That year, at the age of eighty-two, he ran unsuccessfully for the U.S. Senate as the Progressive Party's candidate.

Time Line

1944	■ Du Bois returns to the NAACP as director of publicity and research but is dismissed in 1948.
1950	■ Du Bois runs for the U.S. Senate in New York on the Progressive Party ticket.
1951	■ Du Bois is indicted, tried, and acquitted on a charge of failing to register as a foreign agent.
1961	■ Du Bois becomes a member of the American Communist Party and is invited to Ghana by President Kwame Nkrumah.
1963	■ Du Bois becomes a citizen of Ghana and dies there on August 27.

In the 1950s the United States was in the midst of the cold war. Fears of espionage and Communist influence abounded. The infamous McCarthy hearings, led by Wisconsin senator Joseph McCarthy, were held to root out suspected Communists in the government and elsewhere. Du Bois's association with leftist groups made him suspect, and NAACP officials distanced themselves from him. In 1951 Du Bois was indicted and tried on the charge of failing to register as a foreign agent. Although he was acquitted, he remained in the eye of government agencies, and the State Department revoked his passport. Du Bois officially joined the American Communist Party in 1961. That year, the president of Ghana, Kwame Nkrumah, invited him to visit Africa and edit the Encyclopedia Africana. Du Bois accepted and later became a citizen of Ghana, where he died on August 27, 1963, at the age of ninety-five.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

The Souls of Black Folk advances the thesis that "the problem of the Twentieth Century is the problem of the color-line." Du Bois traces what he calls the "double-consciousness" of African Americans, the "sense of always looking at one's self through the eyes of others." The book assesses the progress of blacks, the obstacles that blacks face, and the possibilities for progress in the future. Chapter III, "Of Mr. Booker T. Washington and Others," directly addresses Washington's assimilationist views. The cleavage between Washington and Du Bois is one that still reverberates in American race relations.

◆ The Ascendancy of Mr. Booker T. Washington

In the first eight paragraphs of Chapter III, Du Bois outlines the rise of Booker T. Washington to prominence. He points to the growth and industrial development of the United States, what other authors have called the "Gilded Age," when business was expanding and fortunes were being made in the decades following the Civil War. He notes that in the antebellum years, efforts to provide blacks with industrial training had taken place under the auspices of organizations such as the American Missionary Association and individuals such as William G. Price, an African American educator whose career mirrored that of Washington. Du Bois refers to these efforts at industrial education as a "by-path" that Washington was able to turn into a "Way of Life." Du Bois continues by noting that Washington's program won applause in the South and admiration in the North, though not necessarily among blacks.

Du Bois then goes into more detail about Washington and his program. He refers to Washington's efforts in creating Tuskegee Institute and cites the "Atlanta Compromise" speech of 1895, where Washington advocated (to a largely white audience) that blacks abandon the quest for social and political equality until they have achieved economic equality. Many blacks saw the speech as a surrender, but many whites applauded it, making Washington in the words of Du Bois the "most distinguished Southerner since Jefferson Davis," the president of the Confederate States of America during the Civil War. In paragraph 4, Du Bois begins his critique of Washington by suggesting that he had "grasped the spirit of the age which was dominating the North" and that he had learned the speech of "triumphant commercialism," where manual skills were more important than something as presumably esoteric as French grammar. In paragraph 5, Du Bois ironically refers to Washington as a "successful man" in gathering a "cult" of followers, but he also indicates that the time has come to point out Washington's mistakes and shortcomings.

Du Bois hints at the nature of the criticism that Washington has encountered. In his position, Washington has had to "walk warily" to avoid offending his patrons and the South in general. Du Bois notes that at the National Peace Jubilee at the end of the Spanish-American War, Washington alluded to racial prejudice, and he appears to have done so at a White House dinner he had with President Theodore Roosevelt in 1901 a highly publicized and controversial event. These events attracted some criticism, but Washington has generally managed adroitly to avoid giving offense, says Du Bois. In paragraph 7, Du Bois asserts that Washington has encountered opposition, some of it bitter, among his own people, particularly "educated and thoughtful colored men." While these men might admire Washington's honest efforts to do something positive, they feel "deep regret, sorrow, and apprehension" because of the popularity of Washington's views. Paragraph 8 notes, however, that people are hesitant to criticize Washington openly. This, says Du Bois, is "dangerous," and he raises the question of whether African Americans are submitting to a leader who has been imposed on them by external pressure.

◆ The History of the American Black Leadership

Paragraph 9 begins to examine the history of leadership in the African American community. Du Bois observes that these leaders emerge from the environment in which the people lived, and when that environment consists of "sticks and stones and beasts," people will oppose it. Thus, in paragraph 10, he discusses black leadership before 1750. He makes reference to the "Maroons," the name given to escaped slaves in Haiti and throughout the Caribbean who formed gangs that lived in the forests. These gangs, which were generally small but sometimes grew to thousands of men, repeatedly attacked French plantations. "Danish blacks" refers to a group of slaves who, in 1723, gained control of Saint John in the Virgin Islands (then the Danish West Indies) for six months. Cato of Stono is a reference to the Stono Rebellion of 1739 (also called Cato's Rebellion), a slave revolt in South Carolina. By the end of the century, however, it was thought that "kindlier relations" would replace rebellion, as exemplified in the poetry of "Phyllis" (that is, Phillis Wheatley) and the heroism of blacks such as Crispus Attucks, Peter Salem, and Salem Poor during the Revolutionary War. James Durham was the first African American doctor in the colonies, and Benjamin Banneker was an accomplished scientist, mathematician, and surveyor who helped lay out Washington, D.C. "Cuffes" is a reference to Paul Cuffe and his followers, who wanted to establish a free colony in West Africa.

Du Bois then turns to the worsening condition of American slaves in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth century. Notable events included the revolt in Haiti led by Toussaint-Louverture that resulted in an independent Haiti in 1803. Back in the United States, significant slave revolts were headed by Gabriel Prosser in Virginia in 1800, Denmark Vesey in South Carolina in 1822, and Nat Turner in Virginia in 1831. Meanwhile, in the North, African Americans were segregating themselves in black churches at a time when white mainstream churches were ignoring their needs. Paragraph 12 alludes to David Walker's highly influential Appeal to the Coloured Citizens of the World, written in 1829. Du Bois goes on to point out instances of prominent northern men who "sought assimilation and amalgamation with the nation on the same terms with other men," but says that they continued to be regarded as "despised blacks."

Accordingly, during the abolition era prior to the Civil War, numerous black leaders, including Charles Lenox Remond, William Cooper Nell, William Wells Brown, and Frederick Douglass, launched a new period of self-assertion. The logic of self-assertion reached its extreme with John Brown's raid on Harpers Ferry, Virginia, in 1859. After the Civil War, leadership in the African American community passed to Douglass and several others: Robert Brown Elliott, a black congressman; Blanche Kelso Bruce, the first black senator to serve a full term; Charles Langston, a black activist (and grandfather of the poet Langston Hughes); Alexander Crummell, an abolitionist and pan-Africanist; and Daniel Payne, a bishop in the African Methodist Episcopal Church and one of the founders of Wilberforce

A* Harper's Weekly *cartoon representing Republican disaffection with the Compromise of 1877, suggesting that Democrats were coercing and not compromising (Library of Congress)

University, where he became the first African American college president in the nation's history.

In paragraph 14, Du Bois uses the term "Revolution" to refer to the disputed presidential election of 1876, which led to the end of the Reconstruction era. In the post-Reconstruction climate, Douglass and Bruce carried on, but Bruce died in 1898 and Douglass was aging. Booker T. Washington arose to fill the vacuum they left, becoming the leader not of one race but of two, both blacks and whites. Some blacks resented Washington's ascendancy, but their criticisms were hushed because of the potential of economic gains as northern businesses were investing in southern enterprises. All were weary of the race problem, and Washington's views seemed to provide a way out.

◆ The Old Attitude of Adjustment and Submission

Beginning with paragraph 15, Du Bois takes on Washington directly. He describes Washington's program as one of "adjustment and submission" and one that "practically accepts the alleged inferiority of the Negro races." Washington "withdraws" the demands of African Americans for equality as citizens. He calls for African Americans to surrender political power, civil rights, and higher education and instead to "concentrate all their energies on industrial education, and accumulation of wealth, and the conciliation of the South." The result, however, has been the "disfranchisement" (usually spelled "disenfranchisement") of blacks, legalized civil inferiority, and loss of opportunities for higher education. In paragraph 17, Du Bois asks whether it is even possible for blacks to achieve economic equality when they have been denied political power, civil rights, and access to education. He then goes on to point out the paradoxes: that black artisans and workingmen cannot defend their rights without the vote, that submission will "sap" the manhood of any race, and that an institution like Tuskegee itself could not remain open without a class of African Americans who have pursued higher education. The result of these paradoxes has been the creation of two classes of blacks: those who "represent the attitude of revolt and revenge" and those who disagree with Washington but cannot say so. These people, according to Du Bois, are obligated to demand of the nation the right to vote, civic equality, and access to education. In paragraph 20, Du Bois acknowledges that the "low social level" of many African Americans leads to discrimination, but he also argues that "relentless color-prejudice is more often a cause than a result of the Negro's degradation." He insists that there is a demand for educational institutions to provide training for African American teachers, professionals, and leaders.

Du Bois continues in paragraph 21 by obliquely criticizing those, particularly blacks, who accept Washington and his views. He acknowledges that they see in Washington an effort to conciliate the South, no easy task. But he also insists that the issue is one that has to be approached honestly. They recognize that the right to vote, civic rights, and the right to be educated will not come easily, and that the prejudice of the past will not disappear overnight. But they also know that the path to progress will not open by throwing away rights; a people cannot gain respect by "continually belittling and ridiculing themselves."

◆ The Thinking Classes of American Negroes

With paragraph 22, Du Bois begins to build toward a conclusion. He insists that "the thinking classes of American Negroes" are obliged to oppose Washington. While acknowledging that there has been some progress in relations between North and South after the Civil War, he states that if reconciliation has to be bought at the price of "industrial slavery and civic death" or by "inferiority," then patriotism and loyalty demands disagreement with Washington. He maintains that it is necessary to judge the South with discrimination, to recognize that it is a place in ferment and undergoing social change. He concedes in paragraph 24 that the attitude toward blacks in the South is not uniform; ignorant people want to disenfranchise blacks, but not all southerners are ignorant. Among those who are ignorant, he mentions North Carolina governor Charles Aycock, a white supremacist; Thomas Nelson Page, who wrote sentimental novels idealizing pre Civil War plantation life; and Ben Tillman, an open racist who fought Republican government in South Carolina as a member of a paramilitary group known as the Red Shirts.

Du Bois acknowledges that Washington has opposed injustice to people of color. Nevertheless, he calls Washington's views "propaganda" that justifies the South in its attitude toward African Americans, that blacks are responsible for their own degraded condition, and that only through their own efforts can blacks rise in the future. Du Bois counters these "half-truths" by arguing that race prejudice is still a potent force in the South, that earlier systems of education could not succeed without a class of educated blacks, and that blacks can rise only if the culture at large encourages and arouses this effort. The key mistake Washington makes is to impose the burden of the "Negro problem" on blacks without recognizing that it is a national problem, one that it will take the united efforts of North and South to solve. Indeed, says Du Bois, industrial training, along with virtues such as thrift and patience, are to the good, but without fighting for the right and duty to vote, eliminating the "emasculating effects of caste distinctions," and striving for higher education, the promise of the Founding Fathers that "all men are created equal" will never be realized.

Audience

The audience for The Souls of Black Folk was broad. Several of the essays had already appeared in the Atlantic magazine, one of the nation's leading mainstream publications. Accordingly, the book attracted attention from both the black and the white intelligentsia and went through several editions. The author's purposes were to convince white readers of the essential humanity of African Americans and to promote among black readers a new consciousness. Virtually any writer, white or black, writing on race issues during the early decades of the twentieth century would have read and paid tribute to Du Bois and his book, and even in the twenty-first century the book is still regarded as a classic and its ideas are still debated.

Impact

In The Souls of Black Folk, Du Bois boldly challenged Booker T. Washington and his accommodationist approach to race relations. Du Bois emphasized the need to develop a "Talented Tenth" an educated vanguard that would serve as the teachers and leaders in the black community. Demanding political and civil rights for Americans, in 1905 he organized the Niagara Movement, a group of black militants who were adamantly opposed to segregation. Regarded as a forerunner of the NAACP, the nation's oldest, most influential, and highly venerable civil rights organization, the Niagara Movement met annually in Buffalo, New York, through 1909. Around this time, the philosophical differences between Washington and Du Bois grew into a bitter personal animosity. Washington used his influence to block financial support for Atlanta University, and he intimated to the university's president that further support would not be forthcoming as long as Du Bois remained on the faculty. Consequently, Du Bois and Atlanta University parted company in 1910.

Du Bois went on to pursue a career as a distinguished activist, editor, and scholar. As one of the cofounders of the NAACP, he fought unceasingly for social change. The formation of the NAACP was fueled in part by a 1908 race riot in Springfield, Illinois. Violence of this sort was not new, as the lynching of African Americans had been increasing with alarming frequency throughout the late nineteenth century. The riot in Springfield was one of several episodes of brutality inflicted by white mobs against black communities. What was alarming about the Springfield riots was that they erupted outside the South in the birthplace of Abraham Lincoln. Many worried that the "race war" in the South would be transported to northern cities.

These events spurred Mary Ovington, a social worker who had been active in the Niagara Movement, to contact William English Walling, a Socialist who supported progressive causes, and Dr. Henry Moskowitz, another well-known progressive. The group issued a call for the formation of a political movement that would develop a program aimed at securing racial equality. A conference of the newly formed NAACP was held on May 12 14, 1910, in New York City, where the organization outlined its goals. In The Souls of Black Folk, Du Bois had insisted on voting rights, civic equality, and access to higher education. These principles were incorporated into the fledgling organization's mission, which was to ensure the political, educational, social, and economic equality of people of color and to

Essential Quotes

"Mr. Washington represents in Negro thought the old attitude of adjustment and submission."

(Paragraph 15)

"Is it possible, and probable, that nine millions of men can make effective progress in economic lines if they are deprived of political rights, made a servile caste, and allowed only the most meagre chance for developing their exceptional men? If history and reason give any distinct answer to these questions, it is an emphatic No."

(Paragraph 17)

"[Washington's] doctrine has tended to make the whites, North and South, shift the burden of the Negro problem to the Negro's shoulders and stand aside as critical and rather pessimistic spectators; when in fact the burden belongs to the nation, and the hands of none of us are clean if we bend not our energies to righting these great wrongs."

(Paragraph 26)

"But so far as Mr. Washington apologizes for injustice, North or South, does not rightly value the privilege and duty of voting, belittles the emasculating effects of caste distinctions, and opposes the higher training and ambition of our brighter minds,—so far as he, the South, or the Nation, does this,—we must unceasingly and firmly oppose them."

(Paragraph 28)

eliminate racial prejudice. Du Bois was appointed director of publicity and research for the NAACP.

By November 1911 a sixteen-page magazine under Du Bois's editorship was ready for distribution. For a title, Du Bois settled on The Crisis: A Record of the Darker Races. A thousand copies were printed, and the magazine was immediately successful. After The Crisis was established as the voice of the NAACP, Du Bois's stature rose rapidly. Within a short period of time, the magazine's circulation reached a thousand issues per month. As the periodical's reputation grew, Du Bois became the most well-known black intellectual of his time. When Booker T. Washington died in 1915, the power of the Tuskegee machine faded rapidly. Its influence was replaced by the NAACP, which by 1919 had more than eighty-eight thousand members.

Over the next decade the NAACP continued its fight against segregation, using lobbying, public education, and demonstrations as its primary tools. Between 1918 and 1922, the NAACP campaigned for the adoption of antilynching laws by Congress. Such legislative measures failed to gain ground, however, even when argued on the basis of the fundamental Fourteenth Amendment right to due process. Du Bois viewed this and other barriers to equality for blacks as reprehensible, and he began to rethink the integrationist goals of the NAACP. In 1934 controversy erupted over an editorial Du Bois authored that argued that African Americans should adopt a program of self-segregation in which black-owned economic institutions would be encouraged and developed. Frustrated with the NAACP's inability to make progress toward eliminating segregation, Du Bois contended that integration would likely take a long time to achieve. During the interim, instead of focusing all of its energies on demands for integration, the black community would be better served by developing and relying on its own institutions.

Du Bois's editorial was perceived as acquiescing to continued segregation. A vigorous debate ensued. To many observers, Du Bois appeared to be advocating a return to Washington's philosophy. Du Bois's editorial independence was tolerated as long as The Crisis was self-supporting. But during the Great Depression years of 1930s, the publication lost money. In the wake of the controversy, the NAACP's board of directors took steps to rein in Du Bois by adopting a formal resolution requiring editorials to reflect the NAACP's institutional views and requiring advance approval by the board. This was more than Du Bois could take. In June 1934 he announced his resignation.

See also Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1868); Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1870); Ku Klux Klan Act (1871); United States v. Cruikshank (1876); Civil Rights Cases (1883); Booker T. Washington's Atlanta Exposition Address (1895); Plessy v. Ferguson (1896); Niagara Movement Declaration of Principles (1905).

Further Reading

Books

Crouch, Stanley, and Playthell Benjamin. Reconsidering the Souls of Black Folk: Thoughts on the Groundbreaking Classic Work of W. E. B. Du Bois. Philadelphia: Running Press, 2002.

Du Bois, W. E. B. Dusk of Dawn: An Essay toward an Autobiography of a Race Concept. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1940.

. The Autobiography of W. E. B. Du Bois: A Soliloquy on Viewing My Life from the Decade of Its First Century. New York: International Publishers, 1969.

Lewis, David Levering. W. E. B. Du Bois: Biography of a Race, 1868 1919. New York: Henry Holt, 1993.

. W. E. B. Du Bois: The Fight for Equality and the American Century: 1919 1963. New York: Henry Holt, 2009.

Marable, Manning. W. E. B. Du Bois: Black Radical Democrat. Boston: Twayne, 1986.

Rampersad, Arnold. The Art and Imagination of W. E. B. Du Bois. New York: Schocken Books, 1990.

Web Sites

"About the NAACP History." NAACP Web site. http://www.naacp.org/about/history.

"W. E. B. Du Bois: Online Resources." Library of Congress Web site. http://www.loc.gov/rr/program/bib/dubois.

Leland Ware and Michael J. O'Neal

Questions for Further Study

1. What role did Du Bois play early on in the Harlem Renaissance? In what way did he help create a climate of thought that led to the renaissance?

2. Du Bois and Booker T. Washington are often thought of as representing the opposite poles of black thought during this era. See Booker T. Washington's Atlanta Exposition Address (1895) and summarize the points of view of each figure. Explain how their views were in opposition to each other.

3. What did Du Bois mean by the "double-consciousness" of African Americans? How did he attempt to overcome that double consciousness?

4. Du Bois used expressions such as "the thinking classes of American Negroes." He was, in fact, highly educated and by any measure an intellectual. Do you think that Du Bois was an elitist? Did he look down on classes of blacks who, presumably, were not "thinking"? Do you think you would have enjoyed sitting down to have lunch with a figure such as Du Bois?

5. Read this document in conjunction with the Niagara Movement Declaration of Principles (1905). To what extent did the latter document, written just two years later, embody principles that Du Bois articulated in The Souls of Black Folk?

Document Text

W. E. B. Du Bois: The Souls of Black Folk

III. Of Mr. Booker T. Washington and Others

> From birth till death enslaved; in word, in deed, unmanned!
> * * * * * * * * * *
> Hereditary bondsmen! Know ye not
> Who would be free themselves must strike the blow?
>
> Byron

Easily the most striking thing in the history of the American Negro since 1876 is the ascendancy of Mr. Booker T. Washington. It began at the time when war memories and ideals were rapidly passing; a day of astonishing commercial development was dawning; a sense of doubt and hesitation overtook the freedmen's sons, then it was that his leading began. Mr. Washington came, with a simple definite programme, at the psychological moment when the nation was a little ashamed of having bestowed so much sentiment on Negroes, and was concentrating its energies on Dollars. His programme of industrial education, conciliation of the South, and submission and silence as to civil and political rights, was not wholly original; the Free Negroes from 1830 up to war-time had striven to build industrial schools, and the American Missionary Association had from the first taught various trades; and Price and others had sought a way of honorable alliance with the best of the Southerners. But Mr. Washington first indissolubly linked these things; he put enthusiasm, unlimited energy, and perfect faith into his programme, and changed it from a by-path into a veritable Way of Life. And the tale of the methods by which he did this is a fascinating study of human life.

It startled the nation to hear a Negro advocating such a programme after many decades of bitter complaint; it startled and won the applause of the South, it interested and won the admiration of the North; and after a confused murmur of protest, it silenced if it did not convert the Negroes themselves.

To gain the sympathy and cooperation of the various elements comprising the white South was Mr. Washington's first task; and this, at the time Tuskegee was founded, seemed, for a black man, well-nigh impossible. And yet ten years later it was done in the word spoken at Atlanta: "In all things purely social we can be as separate as the five fingers, and yet one as the hand in all things essential to mutual progress." This "Atlanta Compromise" is by all odds the most notable thing in Mr. Washington's career. The South interpreted it in different ways: the radicals received it as a complete surrender of the demand for civil and political equality; the conservatives, as a generously conceived working basis for mutual understanding. So both approved it, and to-day its author is certainly the most distinguished Southerner since Jefferson Davis, and the one with the largest personal following.

Next to this achievement comes Mr. Washington's work in gaining place and consideration in the North. Others less shrewd and tactful had formerly essayed to sit on these two stools and had fallen between them; but as Mr. Washington knew the heart of the South from birth and training, so by singular insight he intuitively grasped the spirit of the age which was dominating the North. And so thoroughly did he learn the speech and thought of triumphant commercialism, and the ideals of material prosperity, that the picture of a lone black boy poring over a French grammar amid the weeds and dirt of a neglected home soon seemed to him the acme of absurdities. One wonders what Socrates and St. Francis of Assisi would say to this.

And yet this very singleness of vision and thorough oneness with his age is a mark of the successful man. It is as though Nature must needs make men narrow in order to give them force. So Mr. Washington's cult has gained unquestioning followers, his work has wonderfully prospered, his friends are legion, and his enemies are confounded. To-day he stands as the one recognized spokesman of his ten million fellows, and one of the most notable figures in a nation of seventy millions. One hesitates, therefore, to criticise a life which, beginning with so little, has done so much. And yet the time is come when one may speak in all sincerity and utter courtesy of the mistakes and shortcomings of Mr. Washington's career, as well as of his triumphs, without being thought captious or envious, and without forgetting that it is easier to do ill than well in the world.

The criticism that has hitherto met Mr. Washington has not always been of this broad character. In the South especially has he had to walk warily to avoid the harshest judgments, and naturally so, for he is dealing with the one subject of deepest sensitiveness to that section. Twice once when at the Chicago celebration of the Spanish-American War he alluded to the color-prejudice that is "eating away the vitals of the South," and once when he dined with President Roosevelt has the resulting Southern criticism been violent enough to threaten seriously his popularity. In the North the feeling has several times forced itself into words, that Mr. Washington's counsels of submission overlooked certain elements of true manhood, and that his educational programme was unnecessarily narrow. Usually, however, such criticism has not found open expression, although, too, the spiritual sons of the Abolitionists have not been prepared to acknowledge that the schools founded before Tuskegee, by men of broad ideals and self-sacrificing spirit, were wholly failures or worthy of ridicule. While, then, criticism has not failed to follow Mr. Washington, yet the prevailing public opinion of the land has been but too willing to deliver the solution of a wearisome problem into his hands, and say, "If that is all you and your race ask, take it."

Among his own people, however, Mr. Washington has encountered the strongest and most lasting opposition, amounting at times to bitterness, and even today continuing strong and insistent even though largely silenced in outward expression by the public opinion of the nation. Some of this opposition is, of course, mere envy; the disappointment of displaced demagogues and the spite of narrow minds. But aside from this, there is among educated and thoughtful colored men in all parts of the land a feeling of deep regret, sorrow, and apprehension at the wide currency and ascendancy which some of Mr. Washington's theories have gained. These same men admire his sincerity of purpose, and are willing to forgive much to honest endeavor which is doing something worth the doing. They cooperate with Mr. Washington as far as they conscientiously can; and, indeed, it is no ordinary tribute to this man's tact and power that, steering as he must between so many diverse interests and opinions, he so largely retains the respect of all.

But the hushing of the criticism of honest opponents is a dangerous thing. It leads some of the best of the critics to unfortunate silence and paralysis of effort, and others to burst into speech so passionately and intemperately as to lose listeners. Honest and earnest criticism from those whose interests are most nearly touched, criticism of writers by readers, this is the soul of democracy and the safeguard of modern society. If the best of the American Negroes receive by outer pressure a leader whom they had not recognized before, manifestly there is here a certain palpable gain. Yet there is also irreparable loss, a loss of that peculiarly valuable education which a group receives when by search and criticism it finds and commissions its own leaders. The way in which this is done is at once the most elementary and the nicest problem of social growth. History is but the record of such group-leadership; and yet how infinitely changeful is its type and character! And of all types and kinds, what can be more instructive than the leadership of a group within a group? that curious double movement where real progress may be negative and actual advance be relative retrogression. All this is the social student's inspiration and despair.

Now in the past the American Negro has had instructive experience in the choosing of group leaders, founding thus a peculiar dynasty which in the light of present conditions is worth while studying. When sticks and stones and beasts form the sole environment of a people, their attitude is largely one of determined opposition to and conquest of natural forces. But when to earth and brute is added an environment of men and ideas, then the attitude of the imprisoned group may take three main forms, a feeling of revolt and revenge; an attempt to adjust all thought and action to the will of the greater group; or, finally, a determined effort at self-realization and self-development despite environing opinion. The influence of all of these attitudes at various times can be traced in the history of the American Negro, and in the evolution of his successive leaders.

Before 1750, while the fire of African freedom still burned in the veins of the slaves, there was in all leadership or attempted leadership but the one motive of revolt and revenge, typified in the terrible Maroons, the Danish blacks, and Cato of Stono, and veiling all the Americas in fear of insurrection. The liberalizing tendencies of the latter half of the eighteenth century brought, along with kindlier relations between black and white, thoughts of ultimate adjustment and assimilation. Such aspiration was especially voiced in the earnest songs of Phyllis, in the martyrdom of Attucks, the fighting of Salem and Poor, the intellectual accomplishments of Banneker and Derham, and the political demands of the Cuffes.

Stern financial and social stress after the war cooled much of the previous humanitarian ardor. The disappointment and impatience of the Negroes at the persistence of slavery and serfdom voiced itself in two movements. The slaves in the South, aroused undoubtedly by vague rumors of the Haytian revolt, made three fierce attempts at insurrection, in 1800 under Gabriel in Virginia, in 1822 under Vesey in Carolina, and in 1831 again in Virginia under the terrible Nat Turner. In the Free States, on the other hand, a new and curious attempt at self-development was made. In Philadelphia and New York color-prescription led to a withdrawal of Negro communicants from white churches and the formation of a peculiar socio-religious institution among the Negroes known as the African Church, an organization still living and controlling in its various branches over a million of men.

Document Text

Walker's wild appeal against the trend of the times showed how the world was changing after the coming of the cotton-gin. By 1830 slavery seemed hopelessly fastened on the South, and the slaves thoroughly cowed into submission. The free Negroes of the North, inspired by the mulatto immigrants from the West Indies, began to change the basis of their demands; they recognized the slavery of slaves, but insisted that they themselves were freemen, and sought assimilation and amalgamation with the nation on the same terms with other men. Thus, Forten and Purvis of Philadelphia, Shad of Wilmington, Du Bois of New Haven, Barbadoes of Boston, and others, strove singly and together as men, they said, not as slaves; as "people of color," not as "Negroes." The trend of the times, however, refused them recognition save in individual and exceptional cases, considered them as one with all the despised blacks, and they soon found themselves striving to keep even the rights they formerly had of voting and working and moving as freemen. Schemes of migration and colonization arose among them; but these they refused to entertain, and they eventually turned to the Abolition movement as a final refuge.

Here, led by Remond, Nell, Wells-Brown, and Douglass, a new period of self-assertion and self-development dawned. To be sure, ultimate freedom and assimilation was the ideal before the leaders, but the assertion of the manhood rights of the Negro by himself was the main reliance, and John Brown's raid was the extreme of its logic. After the war and emancipation, the great form of Frederick Douglass, the greatest of American Negro leaders, still led the host. Self-assertion, especially in political lines, was the main programme, and behind Douglass came Elliot, Bruce, and Langston, and the Reconstruction politicians, and, less conspicuous but of greater social significance, Alexander Crummell and Bishop Daniel Payne.

Then came the Revolution of 1876, the suppression of the Negro votes, the changing and shifting of ideals, and the seeking of new lights in the great night. Douglass, in his old age, still bravely stood for the ideals of his early manhood, ultimate assimilation through self-assertion, and on no other terms. For a time Price arose as a new leader, destined, it seemed, not to give up, but to re-state the old ideals in a form less repugnant to the white South. But he passed away in his prime. Then came the new leader. Nearly all the former ones had become leaders by the silent suffrage of their fellows, had sought to lead their own people alone, and were usually, save Douglass, little known outside their race. But Booker T. Washington arose as essentially the leader not of one race but of two, a compromiser between the South, the North, and the Negro. Naturally the Negroes resented, at first bitterly, signs of compromise which surrendered their civil and political rights, even though this was to be exchanged for larger chances of economic development. The rich and dominating North, however, was not only weary of the race problem, but was investing largely in Southern enterprises, and welcomed any method of peaceful cooperation. Thus, by national opinion, the Negroes began to recognize Mr. Washington's leadership; and the voice of criticism was hushed.

Mr. Washington represents in Negro thought the old attitude of adjustment and submission; but adjustment at such a peculiar time as to make his programme unique. This is an age of unusual economic development, and Mr. Washington's programme naturally takes an economic cast, becoming a gospel of Work and Money to such an extent as apparently almost completely to overshadow the higher aims of life. Moreover, this is an age when the more advanced races are coming in closer contact with the less developed races, and the race-feeling is therefore intensified; and Mr. Washington's programme practically accepts the alleged inferiority of the Negro races. Again, in our own land, the reaction from the sentiment of war time has given impetus to race-prejudice against Negroes, and Mr. Washington withdraws many of the high demands of Negroes as men and American citizens. In other periods of intensified prejudice all the Negro's tendency to self-assertion has been called forth; at this period a policy of submission is advocated. In the history of nearly all other races and peoples the doctrine preached at such crises has been that manly self-respect is worth more than lands and houses, and that a people who voluntarily surrender such respect, or cease striving for it, are not worth civilizing.

Document Text

In answer to this, it has been claimed that the Negro can survive only through submission. Mr. Washington distinctly asks that black people give up, at least for the present, three things,

First, political power,
Second, insistence on civil rights,
Third, higher education of Negro youth, and concentrate all their energies on industrial education, and accumulation of wealth, and the conciliation of the South. This policy has been courageously and insistently advocated for over fifteen years, and has been triumphant for perhaps ten years. As a result of this tender of the palm-branch, what has been the return? In these years there have occurred:

1. The disfranchisement of the Negro.
2. The legal creation of a distinct status of civil inferiority for the Negro.
3. The steady withdrawal of aid from institutions for the higher training of the Negro.

These movements are not, to be sure, direct results of Mr. Washington's teachings; but his propaganda has, without a shadow of doubt, helped their speedier accomplishment. The question then comes: Is it possible, and probable, that nine millions of men can make effective progress in economic lines if they are deprived of political rights, made a servile caste, and allowed only the most meagre chance for developing their exceptional men? If history and reason give any distinct answer to these questions, it is an emphatic No. And Mr. Washington thus faces the triple paradox of his career:

1. He is striving nobly to make Negro artisans business men and property-owners; but it is utterly impossible, under modern competitive methods, for workingmen and property-owners to defend their rights and exist without the right of suffrage.
2. He insists on thrift and self-respect, but at the same time counsels a silent submission to civic inferiority such as is bound to sap the manhood of any race in the long run.
3. He advocates common-school and industrial training, and depreciates institutions of higher learning; but neither the Negro common-schools, nor Tuskegee itself, could remain open a day were it not for teachers trained in Negro colleges, or trained by their graduates.

This triple paradox in Mr. Washington's position is the object of criticism by two classes of colored Americans. One class is spiritually descended from Toussaint the Savior, through Gabriel, Vesey, and Turner, and they represent the attitude of revolt and revenge; they hate the white South blindly and distrust the white race generally, and so far as they agree on definite action, think that the Negro's only hope lies in emigration beyond the borders of the United States. And yet, by the irony of fate, nothing has more effectually made this programme seem hopeless than the recent course of the United States toward weaker and darker peoples in the West Indies, Hawaii, and the Philippines, for where in the world may we go and be safe from lying and brute force?

The other class of Negroes who cannot agree with Mr. Washington has hitherto said little aloud. They deprecate the sight of scattered counsels, of internal disagreement; and especially they dislike making their just criticism of a useful and earnest man an excuse for a general discharge of venom from small-minded opponents. Nevertheless, the questions involved are so fundamental and serious that it is difficult to see how men like the Grimkes, Kelly Miller, J. W. E. Bowen, and other representatives of this group, can much longer be silent. Such men feel in conscience bound to ask of this nation three things:

1. The right to vote.
2. Civic equality.
3. The education of youth according to ability.

They acknowledge Mr. Washington's invaluable service in counselling patience and courtesy in such demands; they do not ask that ignorant black men vote when ignorant whites are debarred, or that any reasonable restrictions in the suffrage should not be applied; they know that the low social level of the mass of the race is responsible for much discrimination against it, but they also know, and the nation knows, that relentless color-prejudice is more often a cause than a result of the Negro's degradation; they seek the abatement of this relic of barbarism, and not its systematic encouragement and pampering by all agencies of social power from the Associated Press to the Church of Christ. They advocate, with Mr. Washington, a broad system of Negro common schools supplemented by thorough industrial training; but they are surprised that a man of Mr. Washington's insight cannot see that no such educational system ever has rested or can rest on any other basis than that of the well-equipped college and university, and they insist that there is a demand for a few such institutions throughout the South to train the best of the Negro youth as teachers, professional men, and leaders.

Document Text

This group of men honor Mr. Washington for his attitude of conciliation toward the white South; they accept the "Atlanta Compromise" in its broadest interpretation; they recognize, with him, many signs of promise, many men of high purpose and fair judgment, in this section; they know that no easy task has been laid upon a region already tottering under heavy burdens. But, nevertheless, they insist that the way to truth and right lies in straightforward honesty, not in indiscriminate flattery; in praising those of the South who do well and criticising uncompromisingly those who do ill; in taking advantage of the opportunities at hand and urging their fellows to do the same, but at the same time in remembering that only a firm adherence to their higher ideals and aspirations will ever keep those ideals within the realm of possibility. They do not expect that the free right to vote, to enjoy civic rights, and to be educated, will come in a moment; they do not expect to see the bias and prejudices of years disappear at the blast of a trumpet; but they are absolutely certain that the way for a people to gain their reasonable rights is not by voluntarily throwing them away and insisting that they do not want them; that the way for a people to gain respect is not by continually belittling and ridiculing themselves; that, on the contrary, Negroes must insist continually, in season and out of season, that voting is necessary to modern manhood, that color discrimination is barbarism, and that black boys need education as well as white boys.

In failing thus to state plainly and unequivocally the legitimate demands of their people, even at the

Glossary

"Atlanta Compromise"	the informal name of a speech given by Booker T. Washington in 1895
Attucks, Salem, and Poor	African Americans Crispus Attucks, Peter Salem, and Salem Poor, who fought in the Revolutionary War
Aycock	North Carolina governor Charles Aycock, a white supremacist
Banneker	Benjamin Banneker, an accomplished African American scientist, mathematician, and surveyor who helped lay out Washington, D.C.
Barbadoes	James G. Barbadoes, one of the founders of the American Anti-Slavery Society
Ben Tillman	an open racist who fought Republican government in South Carolina as a member of a paramilitary group known as the Red Shirts
Bruce	Blanche Kelso Bruce, the first black U.S. senator to serve a full term
Byron	George Gordon Lord Byron, a prominent British Romantic poet of the early nineteenth century; the quotation is from his long narrative poem Childe Harold's Pilgrimage
Cato of Stono	a reference to the Stono Rebellion of 1739 (also called Cato's Rebellion), a slave revolt in South Carolina
Crummell	Alexander Crummell, a prominent abolitionist and pan-Africanist
Cuffes	a reference to Paul Cuffe and his followers, who wanted to establish a free colony in West Africa
Danish blacks	a group of slaves who, in 1723, gained control of Saint John in the Virgin Islands (then the Danish West Indies) for six months
Derham	James Derham, the first African American doctor in the colonies
Douglass	Frederick Douglass, the preeminent abolitionist of the nineteenth century cost of opposing an honored leader, the thinking classes of American Negroes would shirk a heavy responsibility, a responsibility to themselves, a responsibility to the struggling masses, a responsibility to the darker races of men whose future depends so largely on this American experiment, but especially a responsibility to this nation, this common Fatherland. It is wrong to encourage a man or a people in evil-doing; it is wrong to aid and abet a national crime simply because it is unpopular not to do so. The growing spirit of kindliness and reconciliation between the North and South after the frightful difference of a generation ago ought to be a source of deep congratulation to all, and especially to those whose mistreatment caused the war; but if that reconciliation is to be marked by the industrial slavery and civic death of those same black men, with permanent legislation into a position of inferiority, then those black men, if they are really men, are called upon by every consideration of patriotism and loyalty to oppose such a course by all civilized methods, even though such opposition involves disagreement with Mr. Booker T. Washington. We have no right to sit silently by while the inevitable seeds are sown for a harvest of disaster to our children, black and white.

Document Text

First, it is the duty of black men to judge the South discriminatingly. The present generation of Southerners are not responsible for the past, and they should not be blindly hated or blamed for it. Furthermore, to no class is the indiscriminate endorsement of the recent course of the South toward Negroes more nauseating than to the best thought of the South. The South is not "solid"; it is a land in the ferment of social change, wherein forces of all kinds are fighting for supremacy; and to praise the ill the South is today perpetrating is just as wrong as to condemn the good. Discriminating and broad-minded criticism is what the South needs,

Glossary

Du Bois of New Haven	probably a reference to Du Bois's ancestor, Alexander Du Bois, who was disowned by his family because his mother was a black Haitian
Elliott	Robert Brown Elliott, a black congressman
Forten	James Forten, an early abolitionist and businessman
Gabriel	Gabriel Prosser, who led a slave revolt in Virginia in 1800
Grimkes	a reference to the half-brothers of prominent white abolitionists Sarah and Angelina Grimke, born of their father's liaison with a slave woman
Haytian revolt	the revolution that led to a free Haiti in 1803
J. W. E. Bowen	John Wesley Edward Bowen, a Methodist clergyman, university educator, one of the first African Americans to earn a Ph.D. degree in the United States, and the first African American to receive a Ph.D. from Boston University
Jefferson Davis	the president of the Confederate States of America during the Civil War
Joshua	in the Old Testament, the leader of the Israelites after the death of Moses
Kelly Miller	a scientist, mathematician, essayist, and newspaper columnist; the first black admitted to The Johns Hopkins University
Langston	Charles Langston, a black activist and grandfather of the poet Langston Hughes
Maroons	escaped slaves in Haiti and throughout the Caribbean who formed gangs that lived in the forests and attacked French plantations
Nat Turner	leader of a slave rebellion in Virginia in 1831
Nell	William Cooper Nell, an abolitionist, author, journalist, and civil servant
Payne	Daniel Payne, a bishop in the African Methodist Episcopal Church and one of the founders of Wilberforce University needs it for the sake of her own white sons and daughters, and for the insurance of robust, healthy mental and moral development.

Document Text

Today even the attitude of the Southern whites toward the blacks is not, as so many assume, in all cases the same; the ignorant Southerner hates the Negro, the workingmen fear his competition, the money-makers wish to use him as a laborer, some of the educated see a menace in his upward development, while others usually the sons of the masters wish to help him to rise. National opinion has enabled this last class to maintain the Negro common schools, and to protect the Negro partially in property, life, and limb. Through the pressure of the money-makers, the Negro is in danger of being reduced to semi-slavery, especially in the country districts; the workingmen, and those of the educated who fear the Negro, have united to disfranchise him, and some have urged his deportation; while the passions of the ignorant are easily aroused to lynch and abuse any black man. To praise this intricate whirl of thought and prejudice is nonsense; to inveigh indiscriminately against "the South" is unjust; but to use the same breath in praising Governor Aycock, exposing Senator Morgan, arguing with Mr. Thomas Nelson Page, and denouncing Senator Ben Tillman, is not only sane, but the imperative duty of thinking black men.

It would be unjust to Mr. Washington not to acknowledge that in several instances he has opposed movements in the South which were unjust to the Negro; he sent memorials to the Louisiana and Alabama constitutional conventions, he has spoken against lynching, and in other ways has openly or silently set his influence against sinister schemes and unfortunate happenings. Notwithstanding this, it is equally true to assert that on the whole the distinct impression left by Mr. Washing-

Glossary

Phyllis	Phillis Wheatley, an eighteenth-century slave poet
President Roosevelt	Theodore Roosevelt, who earlier had led forces in the Spanish-American War
Price	William G. Price, an African American educator
Purvis	Robert Purvis, a nineteenth-century abolitionist who was three quarters white but chose to identify with the black community
Remond	Charles Lenox Remond, an orator and abolitionist
Revolution of 1876	a reference to the disputed presidential election of 1876, which led to the end of the Reconstruction era
Senator Morgan	John Tyler Morgan, a segregationist Alabama senator after the Civil War
Shad	probably a reference to Abraham Shadd, a free black who opposed African colonization by U.S. blacks
Socrates	an ancient Greek philosopher
St. Francis of Assisi	a Catholic saint who founded the Franciscan order of priests
Thomas Nelson Page	an author of sentimental novels idealizing pre–Civil War plantation life
Toussaint	Toussaint L'Ouverture, the leader of the Haitian Revolution
Tuskegee	Tuskegee Institute, the educational institution, stressing occupational skills, founded by Booker T. Washington
Vesey	Denmark Vesey, who led a slave revolt in South Carolina in 1822
Walker's wild appeal	David Walker's influential Appeal to the Coloured Citizens of the World
Wells-Brown	William Wells Brown, a prominent historian, lecturer, playwright, and novelist

ton's propaganda is, first, that the South is justified in its present attitude toward the Negro because of the Negro's degradation; secondly, that the prime cause of the Negro's failure to rise more quickly is his wrong education in the past; and, thirdly, that his future rise depends primarily on his own efforts. Each of these propositions is a dangerous half-truth. The supplementary truths must never be lost sight of: first, slavery and race-prejudice are potent if not sufficient causes of the Negro's position; second, industrial and common-school training were necessarily slow in planting because they had to await the black teachers trained by higher institutions, it being extremely doubtful if any essentially different development was possible, and certainly a Tuskegee was unthinkable before 1880; and, third, while it is a great truth to say that the Negro must strive and strive mightily to help himself, it is equally true that unless his striving be not simply seconded, but rather aroused and encouraged, by the initiative of the richer and wiser environing group, he cannot hope for great success.

In his failure to realize and impress this last point, Mr. Washington is especially to be criticised. His doctrine has tended to make the whites, North and South, shift the burden of the Negro problem to the Negro's shoulders and stand aside as critical and rather pessimistic spectators; when in fact the burden belongs to the nation, and the hands of none of us are clean if we bend not our energies to righting these great wrongs.

The South ought to be led, by candid and honest criticism, to assert her better self and do her full duty to the race she has cruelly wronged and is still wronging. The North her co-partner in guilt cannot salve her conscience by plastering it with gold. We cannot settle this problem by diplomacy and suaveness, by "policy" alone. If worse come to worst, can the moral fibre of this country survive the slow throttling and murder of nine millions of men?

The black men of America have a duty to perform, a duty stern and delicate, a forward movement to oppose a part of the work of their greatest leader. So far as Mr. Washington preaches Thrift, Patience, and Industrial Training for the masses, we must hold up his hands and strive with him, rejoicing in his honors and glorying in the strength of this Joshua called of God and of man to lead the headless host. But so far as Mr. Washington apologizes for injustice, North or South, does not rightly value the privilege and duty of voting, belittles the emasculating effects of caste distinctions, and opposes the higher training and ambition of our brighter minds, so far as he, the South, or the Nation, does this, we must unceasingly and firmly oppose them. By every civilized and peaceful method we must strive for the rights which the world accords to men, clinging unwaveringly to those great words which the sons of the Fathers would fain forget: "We hold these truths to be self-evident: That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

Niagara Movement Declaration of Principles

1905

"Any discrimination based simply on race or color is barbarous."

Overview

The Niagara Movement Declaration of Principles outlined a philosophy and political program designed to address racial inequality in the United States. It had its origin on July 11, 1905, when twenty-nine African American men began deliberations at the Erie Beach Hotel in Fort Erie, Ontario, just across the border from Buffalo and Niagara, New York. When they adjourned three days later, the Niagara Movement had been born. The Niagara Movement had a limited impact on race relations in the United States. Within five years it would cease to exist, and in the history of the struggle for equal rights it has long been overshadowed by the more successful, long-lived, biracial National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). Nevertheless, the Niagara Movement was an important landmark in U.S. and African American history.

Several factors distinguish the movement. First, it was a purely African American effort to address discrimination and racial inequality. No whites were involved in its creation, organization, or operation. Second, it enunciated a clearly defined philosophy and political program, embodied in the Declaration of Principles that was drafted and approved at the 1905 meeting. While rephrased and modified somewhat, the sentiments and tone of the Declaration of Principles would outlive the Niagara Movement and help define the agenda of the NAACP and the civil rights movement of the 1950s and early 1960s. Finally, the gathering in Fort Erie pointedly excluded the most prominent African American leader of the day, Booker T. Washington, as well as anyone perceived to be allied with him. In addition to confronting American racism, the Niagara Movement and its Declaration of Principles were also a challenge to Booker T. Washington's leadership and his program for the advancement of African Americans.

Context

There is no question that the racial situation in the United States in the first decade of the twentieth century called out for a strong and assertive civil rights organization. Race relations in the country had deteriorated steadily since the end of Reconstruction following the Civil War. By the turn of the century the promise of equality incorporated in the Reconstruction Amendments to the U.S. Constitution and the Civil Rights Acts of 1866 and 1875 had been undone by state action and by the U.S. Supreme Court. A series of state laws and local ordinances segregating blacks and whites received sanction in the Supreme Court, culminating with the Plessy v. Ferguson decision in 1896. In this case the Supreme Court legitimized "separate but equal facilities" and provided the legal basis for segregation for the next half-century. At the same time, southern states began to place limits on the right of African Americans to vote, using tactics such as the grandfather clause, white primaries, literacy tests, residency requirements, and poll taxes to prevent blacks from voting. In 1898 the Supreme Court upheld so-called race-neutral restrictions on black suffrage in Williams v. Mississippi. The effect was virtually to eliminate black voting in the states of the South. African Americans did not fare much better in the North, where segregation, if not disenfranchisement, grew increasingly common.

Accompanying segregation and disenfranchisement was a resurgence in racial violence. While the Reconstruction Ku Klux Klan had been effectively suppressed by the mid-1870s, the late nineteenth century and early twentieth century experienced an unprecedented wave of racially motivated lynchings and riots. During the first decade of the twentieth century, between fifty-seven and 105 African Americans were lynched by white mobs each year. Lynch mobs targeted blacks almost exclusively, and any pretense of legalism and due process vanished. Furthermore, blacks increasingly became victims of the more generalized racial violence of race riots. Race riots during this period typically involved whites rioting against blacks. Some, such as the 1898 riot in Wilmington, North Carolina, were linked to political efforts to stir up racial hostility as part of a campaign to disenfranchise blacks; others, such as the New York race riot of 1900 and the Atlanta race riot of 1906, grew out of resentment of the presence of blacks. To the degree that the rage they unleashed had an objective, it was to destroy the black community and put blacks in "their place."

As the racial scene deteriorated, African Americans faced a transition in leadership. Frederick Douglass, who had symbolized the African American struggle against slav-

Time Line

1895

- February 20
  Frederick Douglass dies at his home in Washington, D.C.
- September 18
  Washington delivers his Atlanta Exposition Address during the opening ceremonies of the Cotton States and International Exposition, which in the eyes of most Americans elevates him to the leadership of the African American community.

1896

- May 18
  In Plessy v. Ferguson, the Supreme Court rules that a Louisiana law segregating passengers on railroads was legal because it provided "separate but equal" facilities; this became the legal basis for the segregation of African Americans.

1898

- April 25
  In Williams v. State of Mississippi, the Supreme Court rules that a Mississippi law that allowed poll taxes and literacy tests to be used as voter qualifications is legal, legitimizing the efforts of southern states to deny African Americans the right to vote.
- November 10
  A race riot erupts in Wilmington, North Carolina, following a local election, as Democrats force blacks and Republicans to resign from their elected offices. A confirmed fourteen blacks are killed, although estimated deaths were several times that many; a number of leading black citizens are banished from the town.

1900

- August 15
  White mobs, with the support of police, attack blacks in the Tenderloin district of New York City. Scores of blacks are beaten, with many requiring hospitalization.

ery and had been an outspoken advocate for equal rights in the post Civil War period, died in 1895. That same year Booker T. Washington rose to national prominence with his speech at the Cotton States and International Exposition in Atlanta. The southern-based Washington focused on the economic development of African Americans as the surest road to equality, and while he opposed segregation and black disenfranchisement, he eschewed militant rhetoric and direct confrontation. Washington essentially believed that rational argument and an appeal to southerners' self-interest would defeat prejudice. As time passed and the racial situation worsened, many blacks, especially college-educated northerners, grew impatient with Washington's leadership. By the early twentieth century, such critics as the Boston newspaper editor William Monroe Trotter had become increasingly outspoken about Washington's failures. After 1903 W. E. B. Du Bois emerged as the most respected opponent of Washington and his Tuskegee political machine, the loose coalition of friends and allies through which Washington exercised his political influence on the African American community.

About the Author

Most people assume that W. E. B. Du Bois was the author of the Declaration of Principles. Actually the authorship is not that simple or clear. The final form of the document would be approved by the twenty-nine delegates at the Fort Erie meeting. The actual drafting of the declaration was a collaboration between Du Bois and William Monroe Trotter.

W. E. B. Du Bois was born February 23, 1868, in Great Barrington, Massachusetts, and raised by his mother in an environment characterized by varying degrees of poverty. Despite these limitations, Du Bois excelled in school and achieved one of the most impressive educations of his generation. He took bachelor degrees at Fisk and then Harvard, pursued graduate work at Harvard and the University of Berlin, and earned his Ph.D. in history from Harvard in 1895. He held faculty positions at Wilberforce University and then Atlanta University and spent a year working for the University of Pennsylvania on a study of blacks in Philadelphia. In 1903 he published The Souls of Black Folk, his third book and the one that propelled him to the forefront of African American intellectuals; shortly thereafter he emerged as the most respected critic of Booker T. Washington. In 1905 he made his first major foray into racial politics when he assumed a major role in the creation and operation of the Niagara Movement.

William Monroe Trotter was born on April 7, 1872, in Chillicothe, Ohio, but was raised in Boston among the city's black elite. He attended Harvard, where he met Du Bois. After graduating Phi Beta Kappa, he worked in insurance and real estate. In 1901 he cofounded and became editor of the Guardian, a Boston newspaper noted for its militant, uncompromising, and often intemperate support of African American civil rights and racial justice and for its criticism and attacks on Booker T. Washington. In July 1903 he was the principal organizer of the "Boston riot," when he and his allies disrupted a Booker T. Washington speech at the Columbus Avenue AME Zion Church. He was sentenced to thirty days in jail for provoking the incident. While Du Bois was the leading African American intellectual of his day, Trotter was the race's most outspoken polemicist.

Although they were of different temperaments, Du Bois and Trotter worked well together on the Declaration of Principles. The document combined Du Bois's more scholarly approach with Trotter's more polemical style. The partnership did not last long. The two clashed over leadership issues, especially the role that whites should play in the Niagara Movement. Trotter withdrew from the organization and founded the National Equal Rights League in 1908. Although he participated in the creation of the NAACP, he objected to the dominant roles whites played in the organization. He continued to agitate for racial equality and publish the Guardian until his death in 1934. Du Bois assumed a major role in the NAACP, especially as editor of The Crisis from its founding in 1910 until he returned to Atlanta University in 1934. Du Bois was the premier African American intellectual of the twentieth century as well as a civil rights advocate and an advocate of pan-Africanism. He died in Ghana in 1963.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

The Declaration of Principles was approved by the assembly of African American men who met July 11 13, 1905, in Fort Erie, Ontario. The document drafted by W. E. B. Du Bois and William Monroe Trotter contains eighteen short paragraphs, each raising and briefly addressing a specific issue. The style of the declaration is that of a list or an outline rather than an analytical discussion of the status of African Americans. The first seventeen paragraphs contain a manifesto of grievances and demands; the eighteenth is a list of duties. Together they summarize the issues confronting African Americans in the early twentieth century and define the purpose and agenda of the Niagara Movement.

The first section of the declaration, "Progress," comments on the gathering of the Niagara Movement and congratulates African Americans on the progress they had achieved in the preceding ten years. These ten years essentially covered the time period since the death of Frederick Douglass and the rise to power of Booker T. Washington, and the Niagarites viewed this as a period of failed leadership and a decline in the rights of African Americans. The progress cited the increase in intelligence and in the acquisition of property and the creation of successful institutions omits reference to the political and civil rights of African Americans.

◆ "Suffrage," "Civil Liberty," and "Economic Opportunity"

The next three paragraphs address in sequence "Suffrage," "Civil Liberty," and "Economic Opportunity" areas in which African Americans faced clear and increasing discrimination. Here the declaration lists grievances for the

Time Line

1901

- November 9
  The Guardian (Boston) debuts under the editorship of William Monroe Trotter. The paper quickly becomes recognized for its radical support for equal rights and its attacks, often personal in nature, on the leadership of Booker T. Washington.

1903

- April 18
  W. E. B. Du Bois emerges as a major African American leader with the publication of The Souls of Black Folk. In this book Du Bois initiates his criticism of Washington's leadership with the chapter "Of Mr. Booker T. Washington and Others."
- July 30
  William Monroe Trotter and his allies disrupt a Booker T. Washington speech at the Columbus Avenue AME Zion Church in Boston. In the ensuing melee Trotter and one of his associates are arrested for inciting a riot. The incident deepens the rift between Washington and Du Bois.

1905

- July 11
  Twenty-nine African Americans, including W. E. B. Du Bois, meet in Fort Erie, Ontario, for three days to organize the Niagara Movement. Their Declaration of Principles outlines a new civil rights agenda.

1906

- September 22–25
  Atlanta race riot erupts as white mobs attack blacks and black neighborhoods, resulting in the deaths of at least ten blacks and leaving scores injured.

1908

- August 14
  A race riot erupts in Springfield, Illinois, as a white mob attacks, beats, and lynches blacks and burns black residences. The violence lasts two days, leaving two blacks dead and forty black families homeless. Sporadic violence against blacks continues for several weeks.

Time Line

1909

- May 31
  A biracial committee, dominated by white liberals, meets in New York City and establishes the Negro National Committee to address racial violence and civil rights. Du Bois plays a major role in this meeting and the new organization.

1910

- May 12–14
  The Negro National Committee meets again in New York and reorganizes itself as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Du Bois is the only black on the board of directors and also assumes the paid position of director of publications and research.
- November
  Du Bois publishes the inaugural issue of The Crisis, the NAACP's monthly journal. Du Bois will serve as editor of The Crisis for twenty-four years.

1915

- November 14
  Booker T. Washington dies at his home in Tuskegee, Alabama.

1916

- August 24–26
  Amenia Conference, hosted by the NAACP president Joel E. Spingarn, brings together fifty prominent white and African American civil rights leaders in an effort to heal the breach between the followers of the late Booker T. Washington and W. E. B. Du Bois.

first time and evokes protest as an appropriate response to these grievances. The declaration asserts the importance of manhood suffrage and then notes that black political rights have been curtailed and that blacks cannot afford to place their political fate in the hands of others. This argument did not address the specifics of the strategies used to disenfranchise blacks literacy tests, the grandfather clause, or similar practices. Instead, it asserted that all men deserve the right to vote. This approach distinguished the Niagarites from Booker T. Washington, who supported suffrage and attacked disenfranchisement on the basis that it treated blacks differently than whites. The declaration sees universal manhood suffrage as a fundamental right of all men and calls on blacks to protest "empathically and continually" as long as their political rights are violated. This introduces a theme that runs through the declaration: that discrimination is a violation of the rights of African Americans and that the response to these violations must be agitation and protest (not negotiation and patience).

The declaration continues this argument in its examination of civil liberty. It defines civil liberty as civil rights rights shared equally by all citizens. It broadens the concept to include the right to "equal treatment in places of public entertainment," that is, restaurants, theaters, hotels, and other places of public accommodation. Exclusion from such places must not be based on race or color but instead on the individual's behavior and demeanor. The declaration demands equal access not to residences or other private spaces but to places open to the public, the same places blacks finally achieved access to in the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Furthermore, to gain their civil rights, blacks must be willing to protest.

As it turns to economic opportunity, the Declaration of Principles directly confronts the heart of Washington's program for African American advancement. Washington believed that the acquisition of property and prosperity would earn blacks the respect of whites and equal rights and that this prosperity could most easily be achieved in the South. The declaration rejects this, noting that African Americans are denied equal economic opportunity in the South and that prejudice and inequity in the law in that region undermine black economic efforts. Specifically, it protests the spread of peonage that has returned blacks to virtual slavery in large areas of the rural South and the practice of discrimination in hiring, wages, and credit that has "crushed" black labor and small businesses.

◆ "Education"

Education was a key issue for the Niagara Movement. Most of the delegates who attended the gathering were from the college-educated black elite, the group that Du Bois termed the "Talented Tenth" and the group that most Niagarites believed would provide the leadership for African American advancement. Generally, this group denigrated Booker T. Washington and his Tuskegee Institute for their focus on job training and practical education. However, the section on education in the Declaration of Principles recognizes the need for all forms of education in the African American community. It focuses its complaints on the lack of equal access to education for blacks, especially in the South. Specifically, it calls for "common" schools (basically elementary schools) to be free and compulsory for all children, regardless of race. It also calls for blacks to have access to high schools, colleges and universities, and trade and technical schools, and it calls for the U.S. government to aid common-school education, especially in the South.

What is striking about the statement on education is that it does not call for the desegregation of education. It specifically asks for an increase in the number of public high schools in the South, where blacks rarely had access to them, and it requests white philanthropists to provide adequate endowments for black institutions of higher education. The focus is clearly on improving black access to educational facilities of all types and at all levels. The language of this section is also much more conciliatory; agitation is suggested only to pressure the U.S. government to provide aid to black common schools. To understand this, it is important to remember that public school systems did not appear in most southern states prior to the period of Reconstruction, and in 1905 schools throughout the South were very poorly funded. Educational facilities for African Americans received significantly less support than did those for white students.

Tuskegee Institute students in mattress-making class (1902) (Library of Congress)

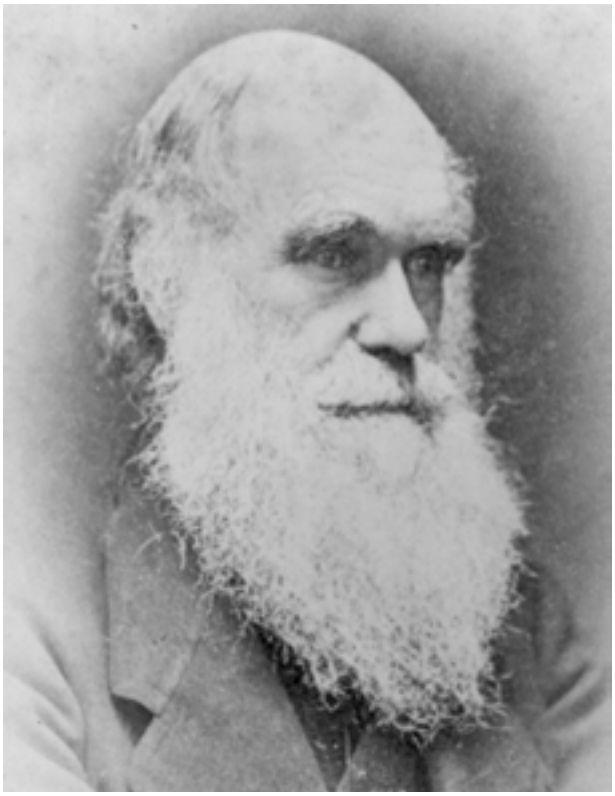
◆ "Courts," "Public Opinion," and "Health"

The next three paragraphs address three seemingly unrelated topics. The statement on courts begins with a "demand" for fair and honest judges, the inclusion without discrimination of blacks on juries, and fair and equitable sentencing procedures. It then lists additional needed reforms ranging from social service institutions such as orphanages and reformatories and an end to the convict-lease system. In contrast, the statement on health begins, "We plead for health for an opportunity to live in decent houses and localities." There was a connection between the two issues, although it was somewhat tenuous. Bringing justice to the criminal justice system extended to providing a decent environment for orphans, dependent children, and children in the court system; health was extended to include a healthy environment, both physically and morally, in which to raise children. While these concerns were not always at the forefront of civil rights agitation, these issues, especially those that relate to child welfare, reflected the social agenda voiced by white progressive reformers in the early years of the century.

The paragraph on public opinion introduces a new concern, a perceived shift away from the ideals of democracy that were voiced in the eighteenth century by the Founding Fathers. The last sentence, with its reference to "all men … created free and equal" and "unalienable rights," echoes the language of the Declaration of Independence. The Niagara delegates were not ignorant of the slavery and racial prejudice that were central to the founding of the



Charles Darwin, whose ideas about the "survival of the fittest" underpinned "scientific racism" (Library of Congress)

United States, but their alarm over the "retrogression" was justified. Racial violence was rampant; democracy seemed challenged by labor wars and fears of unrestricted immigration; and the arts, sciences, and social sciences embraced a new scientific racism that was based on the application of Charles Darwin's "survival of the fittest" to efforts to categorize and rank human races.

◆ "Employers and Labor Unions"

The declaration's earlier discussion of economic opportunity focuses completely on conditions in the South. Here it turns to economic opportunity in the North, especially the abuses blacks suffered at the hands of racially prejudiced labor unions and the exploitation of blacks by white employers in using them as strike breakers. This situation, and especially the restrictive behavior of white labor unions, characterized the African American experience with organized labor throughout much of the twentieth century. It ran counter to the belief of many progressives and Socialists that class unity would defeat racial prejudice. The declaration denounces the practices of both employers and unions in strong terms and blames them for contributing to class warfare.

◆ "Protest"

Protest, along with agitation, were central tenets of the Niagara Movement's strategy for achieving racial justice, and both terms appear frequently in the Declaration of Principles. In contrast to Booker T. Washington's Atlanta Exposition Address, with its ambiguity on the effectiveness of agitation, the Declaration of Principles is crystal clear protest and agitation are necessary tools to combat injustice. However, the language and tone in the section specifically discussing protest are exceptionally mild. The term agitation is not used, and the word protest is used only once. The argument is that blacks must not "allow the impression to remain" that they assented to inferiority, were "submissive" to oppression, or were "apologetic" when faced with insults, and the argument is worded to suggest that Washington was both apologetic and submissive. But there is little power or threat in this language beyond the assurance that although blacks may of necessity submit to oppression, they must continue to raise their voices in protest.

◆ "Color-Line"

Beginning with this paragraph the Declaration of Principles returns to the issue of discrimination and its impact on African Americans. "Color-Line" discusses legitimate and illegitimate discrimination. The former included discrimination based on intelligence, immorality, and disease (for example, quarantining someone with a highly infectious disease to protect public health). In contrast, discrimination based on physical conditions such as place of birth (immigrants) and race was never justified. The color line segregation and discrimination based on race or skin color or both is described in harsh terms, as barbarous and as a relic of unreasoning human savagery. According to the Declaration of Principles, the fact that the color line is sanctioned by law, custom, or community standards does nothing to legitimize it or to diminish the evil and injustice that it manifests.

◆ "'Jim Crow' Cars," "Soldiers," and "War Amendments"

These three paragraphs briefly address three specific issues related to discrimination. "'Jim Crow' cars" refers to the segregation of African Americans on railroads. This issue had both practical and symbolic importance. Railroads were by far the chief means of intercity transportation at the beginning of the twentieth century. Policies that restricted black passengers to overcrowded, rowdy Jim Crow cars affected all black passengers, especially women and the black elite. Virtually every African American who traveled through the South suffered this indignity. Du Bois himself had been victimized by this practice and sought Washington's help in an unsuccessful effort to seek redress from the Southern Railway Company. The issue of Jim Crow segregation on railroads was the subject of the Plessy v. Ferguson case; the Supreme Court ruling legitimizing separate-but-equal segregation provided the legal basis for segregation in schools, parks, public accommodations, and almost all areas of life. The Declaration of Principles condemns Jim Crow cars as effectively crucifying "wantonly our manhood, womanhood and self-respect."

"Soldiers" puts the Niagara Movement on record protesting the inequity experienced by African Americans serving in the armed forces. This issue took on additional meaning a year later as blacks reacted to the harsh treatment of the black soldiers following a racial clash with local civilians in the so-called Brownsville incident in Brownsville, Texas, and it was revived again during World War I as black troops suffered from systematic discrimination and mistreatment.

One of the most frustrating issues facing African Americans was that along with abolishing slavery, the three Civil War Amendments wrote civil rights and voting rights into the U.S. Constitution. The Fourteenth Amendment guaranteed all citizens, including blacks, equal protection under the law and equal rights and privileges; the Fifteenth Amendment provided that no citizen could be denied the right to vote "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." What the declaration calls for is legislation from Congress to enforce these provisions.

◆ "Oppression" and "The Church"

In examining the broad issue of oppression, the declaration presents a litany of crimes perpetrated on African Americans, from their kidnapping in Africa to their ravishment and degradation in America; as they have struggled to advance themselves, again and again they have encountered criticism, hindrance, and violence. In a thinly veiled attack on Booker T. Washington, the Niagarites also place blame on African American leadership for providing in the face of oppression only cowardice and apology, essentially leaving it to the oppressor to define the rights of the oppressed. Finally, in the brief paragraph "The Church," the declaration charges churches and organized religion with acquiescence to racial oppression and condemns them as "wrong, unchristian and disgraceful."

◆ "Agitation"

Following this litany of grievances, the Declaration of Principles reaffirms its commitment to protest and agitation. The delegates vow to voice their grievances "loudly and insistently" and note that "manly agitation is the way to liberty." As in the section on "Protest," the language is clear but measured and temperate rather than threatening.

◆ "Help" and "Duties"

The Declaration of Principles concludes with a section recognizing with gratitude the valuable assistance that African Americans had received throughout their history from their white friends and allies. It then lists eight duties that it expects blacks to follow as they pursue their rights. These duties include civic responsibilities, such as the duty to vote, work, and obey the law, as well as personal obligations, such as the duty to be clean and orderly and to educate their children. These last two sections softened the impact of the declaration and were intended to assure whites that the Niagara Movement was neither revolutionary nor antiwhite. Ironically, the tone of these concluding paragraphs is more that of Booker T. Washington than W. E. B. Du Bois. The final sentence of the declaration notes that the document, characterized as a "statement, complaint and prayer," is being submitted to the American people and to God.

Taken as a whole, the Declaration of Principles is both an interesting and a compelling document. It is a comprehensive list of issues, concepts, grievances, and statements about the conditions confronting blacks at the beginning of the last century. What is compelling is that this was the most successful effort to date to express all of this in one place and do so in language that was pointed and uncompromising yet restrained. At the same time, the declaration is interesting for what it did not say. By the standards of the twenty-first century it is not a particularly radical document. Although the Niagara Movement was an all-black organization, there is no hint of black nationalism or separatism in its Declaration of Principles. Rather, it serves as a restrained, moderate document outlining a program of desegregation, equal rights, and racial justice. It praises white friends and allies for their support, and it reminds blacks that they have the duty and responsibility to be hardworking and law-abiding citizens who embody the values and habits of middle-class America. Despite the anti Booker T. Washington nature of the Niagara Movement and its members and Washington's open hostility to both the Niagara Movement and its Declaration of Principles, there is little in the document with which the Tuskegeean could take issue.

Audience

The authors of the Declaration of Principles concluded by submitting the document to the American people. While this may have represented the wishes of the group assembled at Fort Erie, the actual audience was much more modest. The initial audience for the document was that group of twenty-nine men assembled at the inaugural meeting of the Niagara Movement. The secondary audience was the four hundred or so men and women who would join the Niagara Movement before its demise in 1909. Of course, the intended audience was much larger. It included the African American community, especially in the North, and the intention was that blacks from all parts of the United States would hear about and read the document and join the Niagara Movement. The document was also crafted for a white audience. The language and moderate tone, as well as the specific statement of appreciation to white friends and allies, were intended to attract financial and political support for the agenda and the movement and convince progressive whites that they offered a realistic and palatable alternative to the racial agenda of Booker T. Washington.

In the short term the audience was quite small, as press coverage of the Fort Erie meeting and the Declaration of Principles was limited. It is not clear how much coverage a small meeting of African Americans in Ontario would receive in the white press in ordinary circumstances, but in July 1905 a very effective campaign by the Tuskegee machine kept press coverage to a minimum. News of the Fort Erie events was kept out of most of the white press when a Washington ally went to the Buffalo Associated Press office and persuaded it not to forward the news of the Fort Erie meeting. There was some reporting in the African American press,

Essential Quotes

"Any discrimination based simply on race or color is barbarous, we care not how hallowed it be by custom, expediency or prejudice."

(Color-Line)

"The Negro race in America stolen, ravished and degraded, struggling up through difficulties and oppression, needs sympathy and receives criticism; needs help and is given hindrance, needs protection and is given mob-violence, needs justice and is given charity, needs leadership and is given cowardice and apology, needs bread and is given a stone."

(Oppression)

"Of the above grievances we do not hesitate to complain, and to complain loudly and insistently. To ignore, overlook, or apologize for these wrongs is to prove ourselves unworthy of freedom."

(Agitation)

especially in Atlanta and Washington, where there was widespread support for the Niagarites, and, of course, in Boston, where Trotter's Guardian pushed the story. But on the whole the black press remained loyal to Washington and withheld news of the meeting. Eventually the audience grew significantly. The Declaration of Principles and much of the agenda of the Niagara Movement were picked up by the NAACP and influenced its approach to civil rights.

Impact

Much like its audience, the impact of the Declaration of Principles grew over time. Initially, the influence of the Niagara Movement and its Declaration of Principles was limited. Membership never exceeded about four hundred, and the dream of a vibrant organization with chapters nationwide was never realized. Feuding leadership and the failure to secure adequate funding doomed the organization, and membership and attendance at its annual meeting began to decline. The Niagara Movement shut down following its 1909 meeting. During its short life the declaration accomplished one thing: It defined the terms of the Du Bois Washington debate. As the writer and civil rights activist James Weldon Johnson noted, the animosity between these two factions reached an intensity that is difficult to comprehend today.

The principal impact of the document followed the demise of the Niagara Movement, when it essentially set the agenda of the NAACP. The focus of the Declaration of Principles on voting rights and discrimination and segregation were also the focus of the NAACP for its first fifty years; protest and agitation were its tools. Perhaps the clearest example of this impact is the use of the declaration's statement on the Civil War Amendments and its call for Congress to enforce the provisions of these amendments. This is exactly what the NAACP did, using the courts instead of Congress. In 1915 the NAACP scored one of its first major victories when it filed a brief in Guinn v. United States, the case in which the Supreme Court overturned Oklahoma's use of the grandfather clause to restrict black suffrage. In the 1930s the NAACP launched its legal assault on the continuing restrictions on black suffrage, provisions that kept blacks from serving on juries, and segregation, especially in public and higher education. Ultimately, this campaign led to the reversal of Plessy v. Ferguson and separate-but-equal segregation. In the 1950s and 1960s the civil rights movement used the declaration strategy by successfully lobbying for a series of civil rights acts, finally enforcing provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment to attack segregation, and enacting the Voting Rights Act to enforce the Fifteenth Amendment.

See also Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1868); Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1870); Ku Klux Klan Act (1871); Booker T. Washington's Atlanta Exposition Address (1895); Plessy v. Ferguson (1896); Monroe Trotter's Protest to Woodrow Wilson (1914).

Further Reading

Books

Fox, Stephen R. The Guardian of Boston: William Monroe Trotter. New York: Atheneum, 1970.

Harlan, Louis R. Booker T. Washington: The Wizard of Tuskegee, 1901 1915. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.

Lewis, David Levering. W. E. B. Du Bois: Biography of a Race, 1868 1919. New York: Henry Holt, 1993.

Marable, Manning. W. E. B. Du Bois: Black Radical Democrat. Boston: Twayne, 1986.

Meier, August. Negro Thought in America, 1880 1915. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1968.

Moore, Jacqueline M. Booker T. Washington, W. E. B. Du Bois, and the Struggle for Racial Uplift. Wilmington, Del.: Scholarly Resources, 2003.

Rampersad, Arnold. The Art and Imagination of W. E. B. Du Bois. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1976.

Rudwick, Elliott M. W. E. B. Du Bois: Propagandist of the Negro Protest. New York: Atheneum, 1969.

Wolters, Raymond. Du Bois and His Rivals. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2002.

Web Sites

Du Bois, W. E. B. "Address to the Nation." Wake Forest University Web site.
http://www.wfu.edu/~zulick/341/niagara.html.

. "Chapter III. Of Mr. Booker T. Washington and Others." In The Souls of Black Folk.
http://etext.virginia.edu/etcbin/toccer-new2?id=DubSoul.sgm&images=images/modeng&data=/texts/english/modeng/parsed&tag=public&part=3&division=div1.

. "The Talented Tenth (Excerpts)." The Gilder Lehrman Center for the Study of Slavery, Resistance, and Abolition at Yale University.
http://www.yale.edu/glc/archive/1148.htm.

Manly, Howard. "Black History: The Niagara Movement." Boston-Bay State Banner Web site.
http://www.baystate-banner.com/issues/2007/10/11/news/local 10110711.htm.

"The Niagara Movement." African American History of Western New York Web site.
http://www.math.buffalo.edu/~sww/0history/hwny-niagara-movement.html.

Cary D. Wintz

Questions for Further Study

1. In what ways did the Declaration of Principles represent a new and different African American approach to prejudice, discrimination, and racism? Explain exactly what was new and different and what was not.

2. Was the Declaration of Principles a radical or a conservative document? Explain your answer both in the context of 1905 and in terms of concepts of radical and conservative and civil rights today.

3. What is the difference between the Niagara Movement and the NAACP? Explain how the Declaration of Principles relates to each of these organizations.

4. The Declaration of Principles called upon Congress for the "enactment of appropriate legislation for securing the proper enforcement of those articles of freedom, the thirteenth, fourteenth and fifteenth amendments of the Constitution of the United States." In what sense were these three amendments "articles of freedom"? What freedoms did they guarantee? To what extent had they not been enforced? Since Congress had initially approved these amendments, why had they not been enforced?

5. "Agitation" and "protest" are recurring themes in the Declaration of Principles. What did the Niagara Movement mean by these terms? What did most Americans at the time think about African American agitation and protest? Explain how the Niagara Movement and later the NAACP utilized agitation and protest.

Document Text

Niagara Movement Declaration of Principles

Progress: The members of the conference, known as the Niagara Movement, assembled in annual meeting at Buffalo, July 11th, 12th and 13th, 1905, congratulate the Negro-Americans on certain undoubted evidences of progress in the last decade, particularly the increase of intelligence, the buying of property, the checking of crime, the uplift in home life, the advance in literature and art, and the demonstration of constructive and executive ability in the conduct of great religious, economic and educational institutions.

Suffrage: At the same time, we believe that this class of American citizens should protest emphatically and continually against the curtailment of their political rights. We believe in manhood suffrage; we believe that no man is so good, intelligent or wealthy as to be entrusted wholly with the welfare of his neighbor.

Civil Liberty: We believe also in protest against the curtailment of our civil rights. All American citizens have the right to equal treatment in places of public entertainment according to their behavior and deserts.

Economic Opportunity: We especially complain against the denial of equal opportunities to us in economic life; in the rural districts of the South this amounts to peonage and virtual slavery; all over the South it tends to crush labor and small business enterprises; and everywhere American prejudice, helped often by iniquitous laws, is making it more difficult for Negro-Americans to earn a decent living.

Education: Common school education should be free to all American children and compulsory. High school training should be adequately provided for all, and college training should be the monopoly of no class or race in any section of our common country. We believe that, in defense of our own institutions, the United States should aid common school education, particularly in the South, and we especially recommend concerted agitation to this end. We urge an increase in public high school facilities in the South, where the Negro-Americans are almost wholly without such provisions. We favor well-equipped trade and technical schools for the training of artisans, and the need of adequate and liberal endowment for a few institutions of higher education must be patent to sincere well-wishers of the race.

Courts: We demand upright judges in courts, juries selected without discrimination on account of color and the same measure of punishment and the same efforts at reformation for black as for white offenders. We need orphanages and farm schools for dependent children, juvenile reformatories for delinquents, and the abolition of the dehumanizing convict-lease system.

Public Opinion: We note with alarm the evident retrogression in this land of sound public opinion on the subject of manhood rights, republican government and human brotherhood, and we pray God that this nation will not degenerate into a mob of boasters and oppressors, but rather will return to the faith of the fathers, that all men were created free and equal, with certain unalienable rights.

Health: We plead for health for an opportunity to live in decent houses and localities, for a chance to rear our children in physical and moral cleanliness.

Employers and Labor Unions: We hold up for public execration the conduct of two opposite classes of men: The practice among employers of importing ignorant Negro-American laborers in emergencies, and then affording them neither protection nor permanent employment; and the practice of labor unions in proscribing and boycotting and oppressing thousands of their fellow-toilers, simply because they are black. These methods have accentuated and will accentuate the war of labor and capital, and they are disgraceful to both sides.

Protest: We refuse to allow the impression to remain that the Negro-American assents to inferiority, is submissive under oppression and apologetic before insults. Through helplessness we may submit, but the voice of protest of ten million Americans must never cease to assail the ears of their fellows, so long as America is unjust.

Color-Line: Any discrimination based simply on race or color is barbarous, we care not how hallowed it be by custom, expediency or prejudice. Differences made on account of ignorance, immorality, or disease are legitimate methods of fighting evil, and against them we have no word of protest; but discriminations based simply and solely on physical peculiarities, place of birth, color of skin, are relics of that unreasoning human savagery of which the world is and ought to be thoroughly ashamed.

Document Text

"Jim Crow" Cars: We protest against the "Jim Crow" car, since its effect is and must be to make us pay first-class fare for third-class accommodations, render us open to insults and discomfort and to crucify wantonly our manhood, womanhood and self-respect.

Soldiers: We regret that this nation has never seen fit adequately to reward the black soldiers who, in its five wars, have defended their country with their blood, and yet have been systematically denied the promotions which their abilities deserve. And we regard as unjust, the exclusion of black boys from the military and naval training schools.

War Amendments: We urge upon Congress the enactment of appropriate legislation for securing the proper enforcement of those articles of freedom, the thirteenth, fourteenth and fifteenth amendments of the Constitution of the United States.

Oppression: We repudiate the monstrous doctrine that the oppressor should be the sole authority as to the rights of the oppressed. The Negro race in America stolen, ravished and degraded, struggling up through difficulties and oppression, needs sympathy and receives criticism; needs help and is given hindrance, needs protection and is given mob-violence, needs justice and is given charity, needs leadership and is given cowardice and apology, needs bread and is given a stone. This nation will never stand justified before God until these things are changed.

The Church: Especially are we surprised and astonished at the recent attitude of the church of Christ of an increase of a desire to bow to racial prejudice, to narrow the bounds of human brotherhood, and to segregate black men to some outer sanctuary. This is wrong, unchristian and disgraceful to the twentieth century civilization.

Agitation: Of the above grievances we do not hesitate to complain, and to complain loudly and insistently. To ignore, overlook, or apologize for these wrongs is to prove ourselves unworthy of freedom. Persistent manly agitation is the way to liberty, and toward this goal the Niagara Movement has started and asks the cooperation of all men of all races.

Help: At the same time we want to acknowledge with deep thankfulness the help of our fellowmen from the Abolitionist down to those who today still stand for equal opportunity and who have given and still give of their wealth and of their poverty for our advancement.

Duties: And while we are demanding, and ought to demand, and will continue to demand the rights

Glossary

Abolitionist	a person who advocated the complete, immediate, and unconditional abolition of slavery, especially in the United States, prior to and during the Civil War artisans	skilled craftsmen or workers
civil rights	rights guaranteed to all citizens by law or the Constitution regardless of such differences as race
common school	a free public elementary school convict-lease system	a system of labor in which prisoners are leased to an employer by the court or the prison system
execration	vehement denunciation
hallowed	sacred; respected; venerated beyond question
iniquitous	unjust
"Jim Crow" car	a segregated railroad coach, usually of inferior quality, set aside for African Americans
peonage	a system of agricultural labor in which workers are bound to their job, often against their will, by economic debt or other means; virtual bondage
retrogression	a reversal in development of condition; moving backward or becoming worse suffrage	the right to vote enumerated above, God forbid that we should ever forget to urge corresponding duties upon our people:

The duty to vote.
The duty to respect the rights of others.
The duty to work.
The duty to obey the laws.
The duty to be clean and orderly.
The duty to send our children to school.
The duty to respect ourselves, even as we respect others.

This statement, complaint and prayer we submit to the American people, and Almighty God.

Theodore Roosevelt (Library of Congress)

Theodore Roosevelt's Brownsville Legacy Special Message to the Senate

1906

"The act was one of horrible atrocity, and ... unparalleled for infamy in the annals of the United States Army."

Overview

President Theodore Roosevelt's Special Message to the U.S. Senate of December 19, 1906, explained his summary dismissal of 167 members of the segregated Twenty-fifth Infantry Regiment from the U.S. Army. The dismissals resulted from charges that the soldiers had engaged in a conspiracy of silence after some members of their regiment had attacked the Mexican-border city of Brownsville, Texas, on the night of August 13, 1906. Reported shootings by the military took the life of a civilian and seriously wounded a police officer. The message was a response to two Senate information-gathering resolutions that had been submitted to Secretary of War William Howard Taft, and it was presented together with several documents, including a letter from General A. B. Nettleton and memoranda demonstrating precedents for the summary discharges. The dismissals involved virtually all members of Companies B, C, and D (the only companies of the regiment that went to Brownsville); they also led to the expulsion of black troops from Texas and the heightening of racial tension in the United States.

The president's Special Message caused a heated controversy within the government and across the nation. Republican Senator Joseph B. Foraker of Ohio, who perhaps was eyeing a presidential campaign, argued the innocence of the accused on the chamber floor as well as in public speeches and magazine articles. A report released in March 1908 by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, however, supported Roosevelt's action, although a supplementary report recommended a policy of leniency toward the men that would allow them to reenlist, which the president himself had also urged earlier. With respect to the possibility that certain townspeople might have staged the attack on Brownsville and framed the regiment, Senator Foraker was able to obtain the support of only Senator Morgan G. Bulkeley of Connecticut. The perceived image of black soldiers attacking a town embittered racial relations in many garrison towns. It would not be until 1970 that the regiment's innocence would be reconsidered in a scathing study by the historian John D. Weaver that condemned Roosevelt's handling of the Brownsville affray. That book prompted California Democratic Representative Augustus Hawkins to introduce legislation signed by President Richard M. Nixon in 1972 that granted honorable discharges, nearly all of them posthumous, to the 153 cashiered servicemen who had not been allowed to reenlist.

Context

The Twenty-fifth Infantry was one of six African American U.S. Army regiments organized by Congress in July of 1866 (two cavalry and four infantry). These regiments served in Texas and other western frontier areas for much of the late nineteenth century. They were often assigned frontier duty because of the need for security in the West and the Great Plains; furthermore, many military towns in the East were reticent about welcoming black soldiers. In the West, African American regiments not only offered protection to often ungrateful civilians from attacks by outlaws and Native Americans but also performed more mundane operations, such as stringing and maintaining telegraph lines, building roads, aiding travelers, delivering federal mail, performing agricultural experiments, and compiling weather records. Black soldiers patrolled reservations to ensure that Native Americans stayed on them. They also protected reservation residents from white intruders, occasionally arrested white buffalo hunters, and acted as translators and even agents for some tribes. For these services, Native Americans gave them a respected name, "Buffalo Soldiers."

From the outset, African American soldiers had to confront racial prejudice along with other obstacles. Customary indignities and occasional violence directed toward troops seldom drew retaliation. Two incidents, however, broke the sullen calm of garrison towns in the 1880s. At San Angelo, Texas, white citizens shot to death two Tenth Cavalry soldiers stationed at Fort Concho within ten days. Irate troopers scattered handbills around the community, protesting the unpunished murders and threatening to mete out justice. Some soldiers unleashed a volley of gunfire toward a suspected culprit, an act that prompted intervention by the Texas Rangers, punishment of the soldiers, and removal of the companies from Fort Concho. A similar incident played out at Sturgis City, Dakota Territory, in August 1885. The lynching of a black soldier provoked members of the Twenty-fifth Infantry from Fort Meade to

Time Line

1866

- July 28
  By act of Congress, six black regiments are established.

1867–1881

- African American troops, dubbed "Buffalo Soldiers" by the Plains Indians, serve in Texas, generally without incident.

1899

- October 18
  Members of the Tenth Cavalry attack a Laredo peace officer after complaints of abuse.
- November 20
  Members of the Ninth Cavalry fire on Rio Grande City, allegedly to repel an attack on Fort Ringgold.

1900

- February 7
  An El Paso lawman is killed when soldiers of the Twenty-fifth Infantry attempt to free a jailed comrade.

1906

- July 28
  Companies B, C, and D of the Twenty-fifth Infantry arrive at Fort Brown, Texas, along the Mexican border.
- August 13
  Around midnight, shots ring out in the town of Brownsville and the neighboring garrison, resulting in one death and two injuries.
- November 4
  Following several military investigations into the Brownsville raid, President Theodore Roosevelt summarily dismisses 167 members of the regiment from the military for having refused to provide information about the alleged instigators of the incident.
- December 3
  Senator Joseph B. Foraker of Ohio introduces a resolution for a Senate investigation of the Brownsville raid.

fire into a saloon, killing a customer. In this instance the War Department resisted public demands to remove the troops after having charged four soldiers with the shooting.

Black troops faced both indifference from town officials toward enforcing their safety and swift reprisals from the military for alleged transgressions. White officers, frequently hoping for a fast track to promotion, commanded the soldiers; indeed, West Point graduated only three African Americans over the course of the nineteenth century. Post commanders keenly felt the obligation to maintain good relationships with the citizenry of garrison towns, and the army never considered itself a laboratory for social experimentation. Whether the military meted out harsher justice for black troops than white troops in similar circumstances is a matter of debate among historians, but African Americans clearly worked under more difficult conditions, often in areas such as Texas, which once had been part of the Confederacy.

The transfer of black troops to the South after the Spanish-American War in 1898 sparked more frequent racial clashes between forts and towns than in preceding years. The higher incidence of conflict derived from opposing movements that had gained momentum after the war: an attempt in the southern states to further isolate blacks and remove them entirely from political participation and a determination on the part of black soldiers, many of whom had received commendations for valor in the recent war, to validate their constitutional rights. Partly as a reaction to the Populist movement, which threatened the establishment and brought whites and blacks together tentatively during political campaigns of the 1890s, southern legislatures enacted laws that stipulated stricter property qualifications and literacy tests for African American voters. Many southern states, including Texas, also required poll taxes for black voters and established all-white Democratic primaries. After the Supreme Court's Plessy v. Ferguson ruling (1896), many communities began to enforce segregationist practices even more strictly, such as requiring separate seating on newly introduced electric streetcars. Incidents of lynching reached an all-time high in the South in the early 1900s, with Texas ranking third in frequency, and black community groups complained of excessive use of force by police.

Members of all the African American regiments encountered hostility from whites after the end of the Spanish-American War. A group of Floridians booed the soldiers while cheering their Spanish military prisoners. Snipers fired at troop trains passing through Alabama and departing from Houston, Texas. National Guardsmen scuffled with black soldiers at Huntsville, Alabama. A constable in Texarkana, Texas, almost provoked retaliation when he attempted to arrest a soldier on a troop train after a disturbance at a local brothel. Some of the soldier's comrades, unaware of the circumstances, silently drew weapons at the sight of an armed civilian accosting a member of their unit. Their reaction allowed the soldier to disappear aboard the train, escaping arrest and identification. The most serious clashes, however, awaited the troops' arrival at their Texas posts in 1899.

Prior to the Brownsville affray, Texas clashes between soldiers and townspeople, often law officers, had erupted at Laredo, Rio Grande City, and El Paso. The events preceding these conflicts bore a dismal similarity to conditions in Brownsville. Predominantly Hispanic populations, governed by a white political and business establishment, greeted the arriving troops with suspicion followed by minor disturbances. Soldiers complained of discrimination and price gouging from the business community as well as harassment by local police. Some civilians plainly hoped that the War Department could be persuaded to remove the black troops and replace them with white units a virtual impossibility in light of the strained resources of the military command. At Fort McIntosh, Laredo, Company D of the Twenty-fifth Infantry felt victimized by a local peace officer. Mistaking another officer for the man, a number of enlisted men assaulted him with rifle butts and then fired their arms in the streets. The mayor protested to the governor, who strongly supported the stance of the local official. The War Department resolved the matter by evacuating the post.

Almost simultaneously, another incident broke the peace at Fort Ringgold, Rio Grande City, a hundred miles to the south. After a ruckus in a gambling hall involving the citizenry and members of Troop D, Ninth Cavalry, rumors reached the post of an impending attack from the town. The disabled post commander gave credence to his men's reports of snipers by allowing the firing of a Gatling gun toward Rio Grande City. Mercifully, there were no casualties, but a major row ensued between officials of the town and the fort over culpability, each claiming attack by the other. Texas governor Joseph D. Sayers involved himself in the controversy, engaging in a dispute with the army over legal jurisdiction. The matter dissipated when an angry grand jury failed to return indictments against any soldier.

In the most serious civilian-military rift before Brownsville, a sergeant from Company A of the Twenty-fifth Infantry was charged with murder in 1900 for having led a group of soldiers to the El Paso jail to release a jailed comrade, who they believed had been unjustly detained. In the scuffle a popular lawman received fatal wounds. Because of heated emotions in El Paso, a change of venue was ordered for the ensuing trial. A Dallas court sentenced Sergeant John Kipper to fifty years at hard labor, further embittering race relations between the military and civilians in the state.

Only the magnitude of the controversy that surrounded the Brownsville incident separated it from its lesser-known predecessors. The Twenty-fifth Infantry passed a productive six years abroad and stateside after its partial involvement in the Rio Grande City imbroglio. After the outbreak of the Philippine insurrection in 1899, all of the regiment's companies were shipped to the islands within one year. The regiment demonstrated the same combat efficiency in the Pacific as it had in Cuba, drawing accolades from Brigadier General A. S. Burt. Filipinos themselves praised the troops' decorum. These same heroics failed to impress Brownsville residents, who for whatever reasons refused to accept the troops, regardless of their stellar military campaign record. Among those who objected to the troops' presence were outright bigots, residents with an antimilitary bias, Latinos challenged by a new minority group, and the lawless. The highly publicized murder at El Paso had also promoted a feeling of apprehension among some of the citizenry. Disappointing news from Austin, Texas, elicited resentment from the soldiers as well; the War Department rescinded the regiment's participation in maneuvers at Camp Mabry after Texas National Guardsmen threatened the black soldiers with violence if they were to appear.

Tensions at Brownsville quickly mounted. Some residents wired Washington, D.C., to complain about the First Battalion even before it was garrisoned at Fort Brown on July 28. Departing white troops acknowledged that they had heard threats against the incoming blacks. Although the city administration sought to maintain a constructive relationship with the army for defensive and financial reasons, federal authorities showed no concern. Fred Tate, a customs inspector, clubbed Private James W. Newton for supposedly jostling Tate's wife and another white woman on a sidewalk. Another customs officer, A. Y. Baker, pushed Private Oscar W. Reed into the Rio Grande. Baker claimed that he was trying to quiet the soldier, who allegedly had returned from Matamoras, Mexico, drunk and boisterous. Locals voiced racial slurs at the soldiers on the streets. Payday, August 11, passed without the confrontation that some had feared, but the following night a report of an attack on a white woman by a black soldier jolted the community. Mrs. Lon Evans, who lived near the red-light district, complained that a uniformed black man had grabbed her hair and thrown her to the ground. The incident had caused Mrs. Evans little physical pain, and she could not swear that her assailant had worn a military uniform. Nev-

Time Line

1906

- December 19
  President Roosevelt issues a Special Message to the Senate about the Brownsville raid, in which he justifies his dismissal of the soldiers.

1908

- March 11
  The Senate Committee on Military Affairs issues a report on the Brownsville raid and dismissals; the committee supports the presidential decision by a vote of nine to four.

1972

- September 28
  President Richard M. Nixon issues honorable discharges and pensions to the dismissed soldiers, following a resolution by Democratic California representative Augustus Hawkins.

ertheless, claims of blacks assaulting white women were known to incite lynch mobs. Accordingly, Mayor Frederick J. Combe and post commander Major Charles W. Penrose hastily met to defuse the situation. Penrose subsequently imposed an eight o'clock curfew on his men.

Around midnight shots rang out near the garrison wall separating the town from the fort. Various Brownsville residents later testified that they saw a shadowy group of nine to twenty persons who divided into two groups and charged up an alley toward town, firing several hundred shots at random into lighted areas. The shooters killed the bartender, Frank Natus, and shattered the arm of M. Y. Dominguez, a police lieutenant, necessitating its amputation. Alleged witnesses never were able to identify the culprits and insisted that the raiders had worn military uniforms or that the shots had emanated from military rifles. Daylight searches located spent army-type cartridges in the streets. Soldiers, contrarily, protested their innocence until the death of the last surviving serviceman over seventy years later. Major Penrose echoed the sentinel's belief that the post had been under attack, particularly after a roll call found all servicemen present or accounted for and a weapons and ammunition inspection revealed none missing. A morning visit from Mayor Combe, brandishing empty cartridges from the streets, convinced the commanding officer of the garrison's guilt, a view quickly adopted by Brownsville residents, newspapers, Texas congressmen, and Governor S. W. T. Lanham, who demanded removal of all African American soldiers from the state.

After an initial investigation, the U.S. government accepted the widely held conviction of the soldiers' guilt. President Roosevelt sent Major General Augustus P. Blocksom to Brownsville several days after the raid. Eleven days later he submitted a report to the White House that differed from the view of the black regiment's guilt only in his conclusion that both sides had exaggerated the facts, that Tate probably had overreacted in his beating of Private Newton, and that some of the citizenry were racially prejudiced. Stating that black soldiers had adopted an aggressive stance, Blocksom posited a scenario in which some soldiers began firing between barracks and the wall, others fired into the air to create an alarm, and nine to fifteen men scaled the wall and rushed through an alley into the streets. The attackers subsequently returned to camp to clean and reassemble their weapons while duping their officers into believing they had not left the garrison. Blocksom also noted that the men's motivation for the raid was questionable, since some bars had served the soldiers and Natus had never quarreled with the troops. Nevertheless, he considered the accusers' testimony as more reliable than that of the soldiers. Blocksom also declared that the discovery of the empty cartridges, which did not fit the recently assigned Springfield rifles, was not pertinent to his decision. He recommended the discharge of every man in the battalion. Each soldier would be granted the option to reenlist only if he identified the guilty by a date determined by the War Department. Roosevelt, adhering to the demands of Texas officials and press, ordered the transfer of the First Battalion to Fort Reno, Oklahoma, except for those held as suspects involved in the raid. Captain William J. "Bill" McDonald of the Texas Rangers and Major Penrose settled on a dozen defendants, based strictly on conjecture, who were grudgingly not indicted by the Cameron County grand jury for lack of evidence. The War Department scheduled Fort Brown for temporary closure.

Determined to uncover the guilty, Roosevelt sent Brigadier General Ernest A. Garlington, inspector general of the U.S. Army, to Fort Reno and Fort Sam Houston in San Antonio, Texas, to interrogate the suspects. Following Blocksom's suggestion, the president instructed Garlington to threaten all members of the battalion with dismissal without honor. When the mere threat proved ineffective, Garlington urged Roosevelt to proceed with its execution. Roosevelt complied on November 4 with War Department Special Order No. 266, an edict that escalated the Texas controversy to national stature and sparked criticism from African Americans and some whites. The Richmond Planet and Atlanta Independent accused Roosevelt of having delayed until after the congressional elections to assure a black Republican vote in key northern states. Black ministers joined the fray, and the scholar-activist W. E. B. Du Bois urged his followers to vote Democratic in the 1908 elections. Booker T. Washington, the widely publicized White House guest and administration patron to the African American constituency, continued to support Roosevelt and took his own share of criticism together with the chief executive and Secretary of War Taft, the front-runner for the Republican presidential nomination in 1908. An interracial organization, the Constitutional League, raised the argument of the troops' innocence. The director of the league, John Milholland, a white Progressive, assailed the reports of Blocksom and Garlington for racism, haste, and inconsistencies. Republican senator Joseph B. Foraker took up the argument and carried it to a larger stage.

Ordinarily the most stalwart of conservatives, Foraker may have acted from principle, presidential ambitions, or personal dislike of Roosevelt. In any case, he became the cashiered soldiers' most celebrated advocate. His Senate resolution called for an investigation of the raid and summoned the War Department to provide the evidence it had used in its decision. On December 19, Roosevelt countered with a Special Message defending the summary dismissals.

About the Author

Theodore Roosevelt, the twenty-sixth president of the United States, was born October 27, 1858, to a wealthy family in Oyster Bay, New York. The second of four children, Roosevelt was a sickly child and required homeschooling. A voracious reader and experienced world traveler even as a boy, Roosevelt entered Harvard at age eighteen. He excelled with the Harvard boxing team, among other sporting endeavors, and graduated in 1880. He ranched for several years in the Dakota Territory, where he built up his physique and developed a lifelong passion for nature.

Roosevelt served two years in the New York State Assembly, unsuccessfully campaigned for mayor of New York City, served on the U.S. Civil Service Commission, became president of the New York City Board of Police Commissioners, and accepted an appointment as assistant secretary of the U.S. Navy. In all of these positions he displayed a marked enthusiasm for efficiency and public service. Along the way he wrote several books, including The Naval War of 1812 (1882) and the four-volume series The Winning of the West (1889 1896).

The Spanish-American War of 1898 defined Roosevelt for many Americans. His war plan dispatched Commodore George Dewey to a victory over the Spanish navy in the Philippines. At the start of the war, Roosevelt accepted the commission of lieutenant colonel and led the flamboyant "Rough Riders," or the First U.S. Volunteer Cavalry, to fame in Cuba. The forty-year-old Roosevelt emerged from the war as "the Hero of San Juan Hill," where he had fought alongside troops that had included African Americans from the Twenty-fourth Infantry Regiment. For his heroism, he was posthumously awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor in 2001. Roosevelt's popularity brought the governorship of New York within his grasp; he easily won election and instituted several policies of reform during his two-year term. In 1900 he received the Republican vice presidential nomination. The assassination of William McKinley only six months into his second term catapulted Roosevelt to the presidency. At the time he was only forty-two, the youngest man ever to have become president of the United States.

Roosevelt's presidency brought Progressivism to the national scene. He articulated a philosophy of a strong presidency as he took the lead in conservation and labor-management relations. He signed into law many pieces of reform legislation, such as the Hepburn Act, which strengthened the Interstate Commerce Commission Act, the Meat Inspection Act, and the Pure Food and Drug Act. In an unusual display of racial tolerance for the period, the president hosted the African American leader Booker T. Washington at a White House luncheon. He pursued a strong foreign policy, including intervention in the Panamanian insurrection against Colombia, which facilitated the construction of the Panama Canal. In a more diplomatic fashion, he arranged debt payments by the Dominican Republic to European creditor nations and won the Nobel Peace Prize in 1906 for his moderation of the Portsmouth Peace Conference in 1905, which had brought the Russo-Japanese War to an end.

In 1908 Roosevelt denied himself renomination as the Republican presidential candidate and appeared to have left the political arena once his chosen successor, William Howard Taft, won the election. However, he grew impatient with Taft's apparent caution and mounted a third-party campaign against him in 1912, running on the Progressive Party ticket. The division of the vote between Taft and Roosevelt assured the victory of Democrat Woodrow Wilson. Roosevelt then devoted much of his time to travel and writing until World War I. Frustrated in his attempts to strengthen American policy against Germany and, later, to revive his military career, Roosevelt died in his sleep on January 6, 1919.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

President Roosevelt addresses Senate inquiries to him and Secretary of War William Howard Taft in his Special Message of December 19, 1906. In addition to his defense of his summary dismissal of almost all members of Companies B, C, and D of the Twenty-fifth Infantry, Roosevelt also submitted a Department of War report, a letter from General A. B. Nettleton, a memorandum on precedents supporting the action, and other documents. In his message, the president calls attention to his constitutional power as commander in chief of the armed forces, evidence of the guilt of the unit members, and the existence of a conspiracy of silence among the men to protect the known guilty. Roosevelt denies color as having been a factor in his decision and cites precedents that upheld the dismissals.

Obviously sensitive to the allegation of racial discrimination, Roosevelt defends the record of his investigators in the opening paragraphs of his message and his own record in his conclusion. The president attacks the premise that General Garlington had acted as a southerner; he also emphasizes that Lieutenant Colonel Leonard A. Lovering was a native of New Hampshire, while Major Blocksom had been born in Ohio and General Nettleton in Illinois. He notes that Blocksom had judged the men guilty in his report, while Garlington had acted to protect the innocent from the guilty soldiers. (Garlington and Roosevelt's views were that the guilty soldiers would be named by the innocent soldiers and escape dismissal. The townspeople considered all the soldiers guilty. The soldiers considered none of them guilty.)

He dismisses the notion of birthplace as having played any role in the investigation; all those involved had displayed professional honor and loyalty to the flag and the service. On his own behalf, Roosevelt recalls his condemnation of lynching in his message to the opening session of Congress, his appointment of African Americans to federal offices in both the North and South, and a determined policy to treat people as individuals, regardless of race.

Roosevelt emphasizes that the evidence, reports of federal investigators, and sworn testimony determined his decision, which was corroborated by the discovery of ammunition and other items in the streets of Brownsville. In taking this position, the president skirts the observation that some of the discovered military equipment was not of the type used by the army at that time; he also appears to give more credence to testimony of the Brownsville residents than that of the soldiers. In Roosevelt's view, the most trustworthy reports, of course, came from his appointed investigators. He acknowledges previous incidents that had involved the members of the Twenty-fifth Infantry, ascribing blame to both the soldiers and Brownsville civilians, but he denies any possible justification for the attack on the town. Roosevelt considers the testimony of civilians as consistent except for minor details and dismisses the possibility of collusion on their part. He also rejects as absurd the claim that townsmen shot one another to frame the soldiers; later studies, however, would propose the likelihood of that scenario. In Roosevelt's view, nine to twenty soldiers climbed over the fort's walls, hurried through an area near the fort, and shot at whomever they saw entering lighted buildings or otherwise moving about. Policemen, the target of fire, identified the shooters as soldiers. The culprits returned the short distance to the barracks, which was not more than 350 yards, within less than ten minutes and thus escaped discovery. Officers, believing the fort was under siege, became aware of the situation only several hours later, which gave the shooters sufficient time to return to their routines. Roosevelt oversaw the War Department's investigation of the white officers, which recommended that two be court-martialed.

Buffalo soldiers on the western frontier (Library of Congress)

The president focuses his frustration and anger on the noncommissioned officers, all of them African Americans, whom he considered the leaders of the alleged cover-up. He saw them as responsible primarily for the discipline and good conduct of the men. They held the keys to the arms room and must have known the whereabouts of the soldiers and suspected their guilt. Roosevelt felt no sympathy for the dismissal of the most senior noncommissioned officers, since supposedly they should have acted to prevent mutiny and murder. He left no room for the possibility of ignorance on the part of any of the dismissed soldiers. They were warned to separate themselves from the guilty or face expulsion from the army with no opportunity for future government employment. Roosevelt denied, however, that dismissal constituted punishment, for the proper punishment for murder was death.

Almost one quarter of President Roosevelt's message is devoted to precedents supporting his action, and he repeatedly denies that race had been a factor in reaching his decision. He cites a district attorney's letter about cases that had involved misconduct by white soldiers; every member of those units had cooperated in the investigations, which ended in findings of guilt for some soldiers and innocence for others. The Civil War presented numerous instances of summary dismissals for misconduct or desertion. In one case, General Ulysses S. Grant mustered two officers out of the service and forced the other brigade members to repay the loss of money to the victim of an unsolved robbery. Roosevelt observes that in the 1906 fiscal year the War Department had discharged 352 enlisted men for misconduct without trial or court martial. He reserves the concluding paragraph to recount his record as an advocate of racial equality in matters of education, opportunity, and employment.

Audience

Roosevelt's immediate audience was the U.S. Senate, which had requested information supporting his decision of November 4, 1906, to summarily discharge 167 members of the First Battalion of the Twenty-fifth Infantry. However, because of the public controversy waged in the media, he was also addressing a national audience. Aside from African Americans and a few sympathetic whites, most of the nation plainly agreed with the president's position and explanation.

Impact

The Senate Committee on Military Affairs, on which Joseph Foraker served, conducted hearings on the Brownsville incident between February 1907 and March 1908. The sessions followed speeches by Foraker, who denounced the absence of trials and suggested that outside forces had raided Brownsville. Despite popularizing the controversy, Foraker's crusade on behalf of the soldiers met the same dismal fate as his campaign for the Republican presidential nomination. By a vote of nine to four, the committee sustained Roosevelt's action, with all five Democrats and four Republican members affirming it. A supplementary report signed by four senators provided for the reenlistment of men who had proved their innocence, a motion supported by Roosevelt. Senator Nathan B. Scott of West Virginia wrote a report that was signed by three other Republican members, including Foraker, which stated that the government had not proved its case. Foraker, in turn, issued a report with Senator Morgan Bulkeley of Connecticut that maintained the men's innocence since they lacked a motive for the crime. On a note to be echoed six decades later, Foraker and Bulkeley asserted that members of the citizenry stood to gain from the soldiers' disgrace and removal. Foraker continued his assault on the decision in an article in the North American Review one year later.

The government investigations resulted in courts-martial of two officers of the First Battalion. Major Penrose and Captain Edgar Macklin were tried for dereliction of duty but found not guilty. The War Department permitted fourteen of the cashiered soldiers to reenlist in 1910 but never stated its criteria for that determination. Although no new evidence had come to light, the First Battalion was exonerated more than a half century later. President Richard Nixon, acting on the proposal of Democratic Representative August Hawkins

Essential Quotes

"The act was one of horrible atrocity, and as far as I am aware, unparalleled for infamy in the annals of the United States Army."

"It has been supplemented by another, only less black, in the shape of a successful conspiracy of silence for the purpose of shielding those who took part in the original conspiracy of murder."

of California, granted an honorable discharge and a pension of $25,000 to each of the 153 dismissed servicemen in 1972, without ascribing any blame for the Brownsville attack. Nixon's decision came two years after the publication of a history of the incident, The Brownsville Raid by John D. Weaver, which convincingly presented Foraker's argument of innocence. Only one member of the battalion, Dorsey Willis, had survived to receive the pardon. Willis had continued to maintain the innocence of all the soldiers and their lack of knowledge about the raid. Most historians today believe that justice was not served in Roosevelt's action from the lack of due process, the absence of certain evidence, or the likelihood of a conspiracy against the black soldiers.

Further Reading

Articles

Tinsley, James A. "Roosevelt, Foraker, and the Brownsville Affray." Journal of Negro History 41 (January 1956): 43 65.

Books

Christian, Garna L. Black Soldiers in Jim Crow Texas, 1899 1917. College Station: Texas A&M University Press, 1995.

Hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate, concerning the Affair at Brownsville, Tex., on the Night of August 13 and 14, 1906. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1907.

Lane, Ann J. The Brownsville Affair: National Crisis and Black Reaction. Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat Press, 1971.

Weaver, John D. The Brownsville Raid. New York: W. W. Norton, 1970.

Garna L. Christian

Questions for Further Study

1. Using this document and Thomas Morris Chester's Civil War Dispatches (1864), trace the history of African American participation in the military during the late nineteenth century.

2. Summarize the events surrounding the Brownsville disturbance. Why was it so difficult at the time to affix blame where it belonged?

3. Theodore Roosevelt was a military commander during the Spanish-American War, in which black soldiers and units acquitted themselves with valor. Yet Roosevelt defended his dismissal of the African American troops. Why?

4. Why were the dismissed soldiers exonerated in 1972?

5. How did the incident at Brownsville illustrate the Jim Crow system in the South—and, indeed, throughout much of the country—at the turn of the twentieth century?

Theodore Roosevelt's Brownsville Legacy Special Message to the Senate

To the Senate:

In response to Senate resolution of December 6 addressed to me, and to the two Senate resolutions addressed to him, the Secretary of War has, by my direction, submitted to me a report which I herewith send to the Senate, together with several documents, including a letter of General Nettleton and memoranda as to precedents for the summary discharge or mustering out of regiments or companies, some or all of the members of which had been guilty of misconduct.

I ordered the discharge of nearly all the members of Companies B, C, and D of the Twenty-fifth Infantry by name, in the exercise of my constitutional power and in pursuance of what, after full consideration, I found to be my constitutional duty as Commander in Chief of the United States Army. I am glad to avail myself of the opportunity afforded by these resolutions to lay before the Senate the following facts as to the murderous conduct of certain members of the companies in question and as to the conspiracy by which many of the other members of these companies saved the criminals from justice, to the disgrace of the United States uniform.

I call your attention to the accompanying reports of Maj. Augustus P. Blocksom, of Lieut. Col. Leonard A. Lovering, and of Brig. Gen. Ernest A. Garlington, the Inspector-General of the United States Army, of their investigation into the conduct of the troops in question. An effort has been made to discredit the fairness of the investigation into the conduct of these colored troops by pointing out that General Garlington is a Southerner. Precisely the same action would have been taken had the troops been white indeed, the discharge would probably have been made in more summary fashion. General Garlington is a native of South Carolina; Lieutenant-Colonel Lovering is a native of New Hampshire; Major Blocksom is a native of Ohio. As it happens, the disclosure of the guilt of the troops was made in the report of the officer who comes from Ohio, and the efforts of the officer who comes from South Carolina were confined to the endeavor to shield the innocent men of the companies in question, if any such there were, by securing information which would enable us adequately to punish the guilty. But I wish it distinctly understood that the fact of the birthplace of either officer is one which I absolutely refuse to consider. The standard of professional honor and of loyalty to the flag and the service is the same for all officers and all enlisted men of the United States Army, and I resent with the keenest indignation any effort to draw any line among them based upon birthplace, creed, or any other consideration of the kind. I should put the same entire faith in these reports if it had happened that they were all made by men coming from some one State, whether in the South or the North, the East or the West, as I now do, when, as it happens, they were made by officers born in different States.

Major Blocksom's report is most careful, is based upon the testimony of scores of eye-witnesses testimony which conflicted only in non-essentials and which established the essential facts beyond chance of successful contradiction. Not only has no successful effort been made to traverse his findings in any essential particular, but, as a matter of fact, every trustworthy report from outsiders amply corroborates them, by far the best of these outside reports being that of Gen. A. B. Nettleton, made in a letter to the Secretary of War, which I herewith append; General Nettleton being an ex-Union soldier, a consistent friend of the colored man throughout his life, a lifelong Republican, a citizen of Illinois, and Assistant Secretary of the Treasury under President Harrison.

It appears that in Brownsville, the city immediately beside which Fort Brown is situated, there had been considerable feeling between the citizens and the colored troops of the garrison companies. Difficulties had occurred, there being a conflict of evidence as to whether the citizens or the colored troops were to blame. My impression is that, as a matter of fact, in these difficulties there was blame attached to both sides; but this is a wholly unimportant matter for our present purpose, as nothing that occurred offered in any shape or way an excuse or justification for the atrocious conduct of the troops when, in lawless and murderous spirit, and under cover of the night, they made their attack upon the citizens.

The attack was made near midnight on August 13. The following facts as to this attack are made clear by Major Blocksom's investigation and have not been, and, in my judgment, can not be, successfully controverted. From 9 to 15 or 20 of the colored soldiers took part in the attack. They leaped over the walls from the barracks and hurried through the town. They shot at whomever they saw moving, and they shot into houses where they saw lights. In some of these houses there were women and children, as the would-be murderers must have known. In one house in which there were two women and five children some ten shots went through at a height of about 4 1/2 feet above the floor, one putting out the lamp upon the table. The lieutenant of police of the town heard the firing and rode toward it. He met the raiders, who, as he stated, were about 15 colored soldiers. They instantly started firing upon him. He turned and rode off, and they continued firing upon him until they had killed his horse. They shot him in the right arm (it was afterwards amputated above the elbow). A number of shots were also fired at two other policemen. The raiders fired several times into a hotel, some of the shots being aimed at a guest sitting by a window. They shot into a saloon, killing the bartender and wounding another man. At the same time other raiders fired into another house in which women and children were sleeping, two of the shots going through the mosquito bar over the bed in which the mistress of the house and her two children were lying. Several other houses were struck by bullets. It was at night, and the streets of the town are poorly lighted, so that none of the individual raiders were recognized; but the evidence of many witnesses of all classes was conclusive to the effect that the raiders were negro soldiers. The shattered bullets, shells, and clips of the Government rifles, which were found on the ground, are merely corroborative. So are the bullet holes in the houses; some of which it appears must, from the direction, have been fired from the fort just at the moment when the soldiers left it. Not a bullet hole appears in any of the structures of the fort.

Document Text

The townspeople were completely surprised by the unprovoked and murderous savagery of the attack. The soldiers were the aggressors from start to finish. They met with no substantial resistance, and one and all who took part in that raid stand as deliberate murderers, who did murder one man, who tried to murder others, and who tried to murder women and children. The act was one of horrible atrocity, and so far as I am aware, unparalleled for infamy in the annals of the United States Army.

The white officers of the companies were completely taken by surprise, and at first evidently believed that the firing meant that the townspeople were attacking the soldiers. It was not until 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning that any of them became aware of the truth. I have directed a careful investigation into the conduct of the officers, to see if any of them were blameworthy, and I have approved the recommendation of the War Department that two be brought before a court-martial.

As to the noncommissioned officers and enlisted men, there can be no doubt whatever that many were necessarily privy, after if not before the attack, to the conduct of those who took actual part in this murderous riot. I refer to Major Blocksom's report for proof of the fact that certainly some and probably all of the noncommissioned officers in charge of quarters who were responsible for the gun-racks and had keys thereto in their personal possession knew what men were engaged in the attack.

Major Penrose, in command of the post, in his letter (included in the Appendix) gives the reasons why he was reluctantly convinced that some of the men under him as he thinks, from 7 to 10 got their rifles, slipped out of quarters to do the shooting, and returned to the barracks without being discovered, the shooting all occurring within two and a half short blocks of the barracks. It was possible for the raiders to go from the fort to the farthest point of firing and return in less than ten minutes, for the distance did not exceed 350 yards.

Such are the facts of this case. General Nettleton, in his letter herewith appended, states that next door to where he is writing in Brownsville is a small cottage where a children's party had just broken up before the house was riddled by United States bullets, fired by United States troops, from United States Springfield rifles, at close range, with the purpose of killing or maiming the inmates, including the parents and children who were still in the well-lighted house, and whose escape from death under such circumstances was astonishing. He states that on another street he daily looks upon fresh bullet scars where a volley from similar Government rifles was fired into the side and windows of a hotel occupied at the time by sleeping or frightened guests from abroad who could not possibly have given any offense to the assailants. He writes that the chief of the Brownsville police is again on duty from hospital, and carries an empty sleeve because he was shot by Federal soldiers from the adjacent garrison in the course of their murderous foray; and not far away is the fresh grave of an unoffending citizen of the place, a boy in years, who was wantonly shot down by these United States soldiers while unarmed and attempting to escape.

Document Text

The effort to confute this testimony so far has consisted in the assertion or implication that the townspeople shot one another in order to discredit the soldiers an absurdity too gross to need discussion, and unsupported by a shred of evidence. There is no question as to the murder and the attempted murders; there is no question that some of the soldiers were guilty thereof; there is no question that many of their comrades privy to the deed have combined to shelter the criminals from justice. These comrades of the murderers, by their own action, have rendered it necessary either to leave all the men, including the murderers, in the Army, or to turn them all out; and under such circumstances there was no alternative, for the usefulness of the Army would be at an end were we to permit such an outrage to be committed with impunity.

In short, the evidence proves conclusively that a number of the soldiers engaged in a deliberate and concerted attack, as cold blooded as it was cowardly; the purpose being to terrorize the community, and to kill or injure men, women, and children in their homes and beds or on the streets, and this at an hour of the night when concerted or effective resistance or defense was out of the question, and when detection by identification of the criminals in the United States uniform was well-nigh impossible. So much for the original crime. A blacker [crime] never stained the annals of our Army. It has been supplemented by another, only less black, in the shape of a successful conspiracy of silence for the purpose of shielding those who took part in the original conspiracy of murder. These soldiers were not school boys on a frolic. They were full-grown men, in the uniform of the United States Army, armed with deadly weapons, sworn to uphold the laws of the United States, and under every obligation of oath and honor not merely to refrain from criminality, but with the sturdiest rigor to hunt down criminality; and the crime they committed or connived at was murder. They perverted the power put into their hands to sustain the law into the most deadly violation of the law. The noncommissioned officers are primarily responsible for the discipline and good conduct of the men; they are appointed to their positions for the very purpose of preserving this discipline and good conduct, and of detecting and securing the punishment of every enlisted man who does what is wrong. They fill, with reference to the discipline, a part that the commissioned officers are of course unable to fill, although the ultimate responsibility for the discipline can never be shifted from the shoulders of the latter. Under any ordinary circumstances the first duty of the noncommissioned officers, as of the commissioned officers, is to train the private in the ranks so that he may be an efficient fighting man against a foreign foe. But there is an even higher duty, so obvious that it is not under ordinary circumstances necessary so much as to allude to it the duty of training the soldier so that he shall be a protection and not a menace to his peaceful fellow-citizens, and above all to the women and children of the nation. Unless this duty is well performed, the Army becomes a mere dangerous mob; and if conduct such as that of the murderers in question is not, where possible, punished, and, where this is not possible, unless the chance of its repetition is guarded against in the most thoroughgoing fashion, it would be better that the entire Army should be disbanded. It is vital for the Army to be imbued with the spirit which will make every man in it, and above all, the officers and non-commissioned officers, feel it a matter of highest obligation to discover and punish, and not to shield, the criminal in uniform.

Yet some of the noncommissioned officers and many of the men of the three companies in question have banded together in a conspiracy to protect the assassins and would-be assassins who have disgraced their uniform by the conduct above related. Many of these non-commissioned officers and men must have known, and all of them may have known, circumstances which would have led to the conviction of those engaged in the murderous assault. They have stolidly and as one man broken their oaths of enlistment and refused to help discover the criminals.

By my direction every effort was made to persuade those innocent of murder among them to separate themselves from the guilty by helping bring the criminals to justice. They were warned that if they did not take advantage of the offer they would all be discharged from the service and forbidden again to enter the employ of the Government. They refused to profit by the warning. I accordingly had them discharged. If any organization of troops in the service, white or black, is guilty of similar conduct in the future I shall follow precisely the same course. Under no circumstances will I consent to keep in the service bodies of men whom the circumstances show to be a menace to the country. Incidentally I may add that the soldiers of longest service and highest position who suffered because of the order, so far from being those who deserve most sympathy, deserve least, for they are the very men upon whom we should be able especially to rely to prevent mutiny and murder.

Document Text

People have spoken as if this discharge from the service was a punishment. I deny emphatically that such is the case, because as punishment it is utterly inadequate. The punishment meet for mutineers and murderers such as those guilty of the Brownsville assault is death; and a punishment only less severe ought to be meted out to those who have aided and abetted mutiny and murder and treason by refusing to help in their detection. I would that it were possible for me to have punished the guilty men. I regret most keenly that I have not been able to do so.

Be it remembered always that these men were all in the service of the United States under contracts of enlistment, which by their terms and by statute were terminable by my direction as Commander in Chief of the Army. It was my clear duty to terminate those contracts when the public interest demanded it; and it would have been a betrayal of the public interest on my part not to terminate the contracts which were keeping in the service of the United States a body of mutineers and murderers.

Any assertion that these men were dealt with harshly because they were colored men is utterly without foundation. Officers or enlisted men, white men or colored men, who were guilty of such conduct, would have been treated in precisely the same way; for there can be nothing more important than for the United States Army, in all its membership, to understand that its arms cannot be turned with impunity against the peace and order of the civil community.

There are plenty of precedents for the action taken. I call your attention to the memoranda herewith submitted from The Military Secretary's office of the War Department, and a memorandum from The Military Secretary enclosing a piece by ex-Corporal Hesse, now chief of division in The Military Secretary's office, together with a letter from District Attorney James Wilkinson, of New Orleans. The district attorney's letter recites several cases in which white United States soldiers, being arrested for crime, were tried, and every soldier and employee of the regiment, or in the fort at which the soldier was stationed, volunteered all they knew, both before and at the trial, so as to secure justice. In one case the soldier was acquitted. In another case the soldier was convicted of murder, the conviction resulting from the fact that every soldier, from the commanding officer to the humblest private, united in securing all the evidence in their power about the crime. In other cases, for less offense, soldiers were convicted purely because their comrades in arms, in a spirit of fine loyalty to the honor of the service, at once told the whole story of the troubles and declined to identify themselves with the criminals.

During the civil war numerous precedents for the action taken by me occurred in the shape of the summary discharge of regiments or companies because of misconduct on the part of some or all of their members. The Sixtieth Ohio was summarily discharged, on the ground that the regiment was disorganized, mutinous, and worthless. The Eleventh New York was discharged by reason of general demoralization and numerous desertions. Three companies of the Fifth Missouri Cavalry and one company of the Fourth Missouri Cavalry were mustered out of the service of the United States without trial by court-martial by reason of mutinous conduct and disaffection of the majority of the members of these companies (an almost exact parallel to my action). Another Missouri regiment was mustered out of service because it was in a state bordering closely on mutiny. Other examples, including New Jersey, Maryland, and other organizations, are given in the enclosed papers.

I call your particular attention to the special field order of Brig. Gen. U. S. Grant, issued from the headquarters of the Thirteenth Army Corps on November 16, 1862, in reference to the Twentieth Illinois. Members of this regiment had broken into a store and taken goods to the value of some $1,240, and the rest of the regiment, including especially two officers, failed, in the words of General Grant, to "exercise their authority to ferret out the men guilty of the offenses." General Grant accordingly mustered out of the service of the United States the two officers in question, and assessed the sum of $1,240 against the said regiment as a whole, officers and men to be assessed pro rata on their pay. In its essence this action is precisely similar to that I have taken; although the offense was of course trivial compared to the offense with which I had to deal.

Ex-Corporal Hesse recites what occurred in a United States regular regiment in the spring of 1860. (Corporal Hesse subsequently, when the regiment was surrendered to the Confederates by General Twiggs, saved the regimental colors by wrapping them about his body, under his clothing, and brought them north in safety, receiving a medal of honor for his action.) It appears that certain members of the regiment lynched a barkeeper who had killed one of the soldiers. Being unable to discover the culprits, Col. Robert E. Lee, then in command of the Department of Texas, ordered the company to be disbanded and the members transferred to other companies and discharged at the end of their enlistment, without honor. Owing to the outbreak of the Civil War, and the consequent loss of records and confusion, it is not possible to say what finally became of this case.

Document Text

When General Lee was in command of the Army of Northern Virginia, as will appear from the enclosed clipping from the Charlotte Observer, he issued an order in October, 1864, disbanding a certain battalion for cowardly conduct, stating at the time his regret that there were some officers and men belonging to the organization who, although not deserving it, were obliged to share in the common disgrace because the good of the service demanded it.

In addition to the discharges of organizations, which are of course infrequent, there are continual cases of the discharge of individual enlisted men without honor and without trial by court-martial. The official record shows that during the fiscal year ending June 30, last, such discharges were issued by the War Department without trial by court-martial in the cases of 352 enlisted men of the Regular Army, 35 of them being on account of "having become disqualified for service through own misconduct." Moreover, in addition to the discharges without honor ordered by the War Department, there were a considerable number of discharges without honor issued by subordinate military authorities under paragraph 148 of the Army Regulations, "where the service has not been honest and faithful that is, where the service does not warrant reenlistment."

So much for the military side of the case. But I wish to say something additional, from the standpoint of the race question. In my message at the opening of the Congress I discussed the matter of lynching. In it I gave utterance to the abhorrence which all decent citizens should feel for the deeds of the men (in almost all cases white men) who take part in lynchings and at the same time I condemned, as all decent men of any color should condemn, the action of those colored men who actively or passively shield the colored criminal from the law. In the case of these companies we had to deal with men who in the first place were guilty of what is practically the worst possible form of lynching for a lynching is in its essence lawless and murderous vengeance taken by an armed mob for real or fancied wrongs and who in the second place covered up the crime of lynching by standing with a vicious solidarity to protect the criminals.

It is of the utmost importance to all our people that we shall deal with each man on his merits as a man, and not deal with him merely as a member of a given race; that we shall judge each man by his conduct and not his color. This is important for the white man, and it is far more important for the colored man. More evil and sinister counsel never was given to any people than that given to colored men by those advisers, whether black or white, who, by apology and condonation, encourage conduct such as that of the three companies in question. If the colored men elect to stand by criminals of their own race because they are of their own race, they assuredly lay up for themselves the most dreadful day of reckoning. Every farsighted friend of the colored race in its efforts to strive onward and upward, should teach first, as the most important lesson, alike to the white man and the black, the duty of treating the individual man strictly on his worth as he shows it. Any conduct by colored people which tends to substitute for this rule the rule of standing

Glossary

Col. Robert E. Lee	later a general who commanded the Army of Northern Virginia during the Civil War disaffection	disloyalty to the government
Judge Jones	U.S. District Court Judge Thomas Goode Jones, who heard a number of peonage cases in 1903
Judge Speer	Emory Speer, a judge in Georgia who ruled against the use of chain gangs and upheld the constitutionality of laws against peonage noncommissioned officers	those of the rank of sergeant who command troops but are not commissioned as lieutenants, captains, and the like peonage	the practice of requiring a debtor to work for his creditor until the debt is discharged

Document Text

by and shielding an evil doer because he is a member of their race, means the inevitable degradation of the colored race. It may and probably does mean damage to the white race, but it means ruin to the black race.

Throughout my term of service in the Presidency I have acted on the principle thus advocated. In the North as in the South I have appointed colored men of high character to office, utterly disregarding the protests of those who would have kept them out of office because they were colored men. So far as was in my power, I have sought to secure for the colored people all their rights under the law. I have done all I could to secure them equal school training when young, equal opportunity to earn their livelihood, and achieve their happiness when old. I have striven to break up peonage; I have upheld the hands of those who, like Judge Jones and Judge Speer, have warred against this peonage, because I would hold myself unfit to be President if I did not feel the same revolt at wrong done a colored man as I feel at wrong done a white man. I have condemned in unstinted terms the crime of lynching perpetrated by white men, and I should take instant advantage of any opportunity whereby I could bring to justice a mob of lynchers. In precisely the same spirit I have now acted with reference to these colored men who have been guilty of a black and dastardly crime. In one policy, as in the other, I do not claim as a favor, but I challenge as a right, the support of every citizen of this country, whatever his color, provided only he has in him the spirit of genuine and farsighted patriotism.

Theodore Roosevelt

Poster of African American soldiers fighting German soldiers in World War I, with portrait of Abraham Lincoln above (Library of Congress)

Act in Relation to the Organization of a Colored Regiment in the City of New York

1913

"The adjutant general shall organize and equip a colored regiment of infantry in the city of New York."

Overview

In 1913 the New York State Legislature passed An Act to Amend the Military Law, in Relation to the Organization and Equipment of a Colored Regiment of Infantry in the City of New York, creating an African American National Guard unit, later known as the "Harlem Hell Fighters." The regiment played a crucial role in World War I. During the German spring offensive of 1918, the Harlem Hell Fighters were often the only regiment between the Germans and Paris, France. The New York law was a key legislative milestone in the struggle for African Americans to have equal opportunities to serve in the armed forces.

Article XI of New York's fourth constitution, passed in 1894, required that the state maintain a military force of "not less than ten thousand enlisted men, fully uniformed, armed, equipped, disciplined and ready for active service." In response to an incursion into New Mexico by the renegade Mexican revolutionary general Pancho Villa in March 1916, almost all of New York's military forces were mustered into federal service and started leaving the state in June. Governor Charles Whitman realized that New York would thus be left with fewer soldiers than the constitutional requirement. Whitman; his military secretary, Lorillard Spencer; and the public service commissioner, William Hayward, a long-time Whitman associate, discussed the options for increasing the state's troop strength. Spencer had recently discovered the 1913 law authorizing an African American regiment for New York's National Guard. Whitman decided to create the regiment after the federal War Department requested that the state provide more troops. Whitman appointed Hayward as colonel and commander of the regiment and directed him to organize it immediately.

Context

African Americans have served in every American war. In wars against the Indians in the early eighteenth century, blacks fought along with white militiamen in defending colonial settlements. During the French and Indian War (1754 1763), African Americans again provided a significant number of soldiers and support troops. Many enslaved blacks in the northern states achieved their freedom through military service during those times. At the battles of Lexington and Concord, the first military engagements of the American Revolution (1775 1783), there were African Americans among the minutemen who fought the British. But early in the American Revolution there was also resistance among many slave owners, including George Washington, to arming blacks because they feared an armed slave revolt. Ironically, the British offered freedom and land to any slave who fought on the British side. Although the British lost the war, they honored their commitment and settled their black soldiers and families on land grants in Nova Scotia (today, a province in Canada). In the War of 1812 (lasting until 1815), African Americans fought in the Battle of New Orleans. In 1815, two battalions of blacks helped inflict the worst defeat ever experienced by the British Army.

The Civil War (1861 1865) brought thousands of African Americans into the Union army. In Massachusetts, Fredrick Douglass, an escaped slave who became a famous orator and writer, was involved in organizing and recruiting for a volunteer regiment of African Americans (led by white officers), the Fifty-fourth Massachusetts Volunteer Regiment. Douglass's two sons joined that regiment. Following the Civil War, an act of congress made four African American regiments two cavalry and two infantry a permanent part of the regular army. During the Spanish-American War (1898), many African Americans joined volunteer regiments and were accepted into the army. Despite forgotten promises, these former soldiers remembered their service with great pride. So it was that African Americans came to view military service as a right and an obligation of American citizens, allowing visible recognition of their participation as full members of society. Several states, including Massachusetts, Maryland, Tennessee, and Ohio, as well as the District of Columbia, had organized all-black militia and National Guard units; Illinois had an African American regiment based in Chicago. These units traced their beginnings to volunteer units that had fought in the Civil War. Despite the large number of African Americans from New York City who served in the Civil War and, later, the Spanish-American War, the city had no black militia or National Guard unit.

Early in 1911, a group of influential African American business and social leaders known as the Equity Congress

Time Line

1913

- March 28
  The state senator Henry Salant introduces a bill for a "colored battalion of infantry in the city of New York."
- April 1
  The assemblyman Thomas Kane submits a bill for a full "colored regiment of infantry in the city of New York."
- June 2
  Governor William Sulzer signs the Colored Regiment of Infantry Act into law, consolidating the two related bills to call for an African American regiment of infantry in New York City.

1914

- August 1
  Following the assassination of the Austrian archduke Franz Ferdinand on June 28, Germany declares war on Russia. Because of a series of complex mutual defense treaties, most European nations joined the war on one side or another.
- August 4
  President Woodrow Wilson declares the United States to be a neutral nation.

1916

- June 16
  Governor Charles Whitman appoints William Hayward as colonel of the Fifteenth Infantry Regiment, with orders to organize the regiment and begin recruiting.
- October 1
  Whitman presents the regimental colors to the Fifteenth Infantry in a ceremony at the Union League Club in New York City.

1917

- April 6
  The United States declares war on Germany.
- July 25
  The Fifteenth Infantry Regiment enters active federal service.

decided to actively encourage the formation of an African American militia regiment in New York City. However, creating a new militia unit would require an act of the New York legislature. Pending such action, the Equity Congress supported organizing a provisional regiment. In April 1911, Louis Cuvillier, a white New York assemblyman whose district included a large African American population, introduced a bill in the New York Assembly to authorize "a colored regiment of infantry in the city of New York." The state adjutant general strongly opposed the bill and was quoted in the New York Times of February 8, 1911, as saying "that it would take $50,000 to equip the regiment, $20,000 a year to support it, and that there would be prejudice in the guard against it." The bill was very detailed and specified the organization of the regiment down to the level of providing a precise number of officers, but it was not well structured. It repeated entire sections of existing law verbatim. Nonetheless, the bill was approved by both houses of the legislature and, in late July, was sent to Governor John Dix to be signed into law. Dix, however, did not approve the bill. In July, the New York Times reported that the bill's opponents in the legislature considered it to be "so loosely and badly drawn that the high hopes entertained by the colored men whose political influence won votes for it are sure to be disappointed." Cuvillier was aware of the opposition within the governor's staff and told the Equity Congress that the bill had failed because of the adjutant general's opposition.

The assemblyman Dean Nelson introduced a less specific bill on January 18, 1912. According to the Assembly Introductory Number Record, it was amended with minor revisions but was then sent back to the Military Affairs Committee. The assembly record shows that the bill was not reported out of the committee. There was no further action taken to establish an African American regiment until 1913, after Dix was defeated in his bid for a second term as governor of New York in the 1912 election. William Sulzer, a Democratic congressman from New York City, became governor in January 1913. The state senator Henry Salant then introduced a bill on March 28, 1913, to authorize "the organization and equipment of a colored battalion of infantry in the city of New York." On April 1, Thomas Kane, a Democrat who had defeated Nelson in the 1912 election, introduced another bill with wording similar to Salant's, but rather than calling for a battalion, the bill specified organizing a full regiment. (At the time, a regiment in the New York National Guard comprised three battalions.) Salant's bill also provided funding for an armory, while Kane's bill did not. In committee, the two bills were resolved into one that authorized a regiment but provided no funding.

The amended bill was passed by the assembly on April 29, 1913, and by the senate on May 2. The bill went to Sulzer for signature on May 7, and he signed the bill into law on June 2. That law required the New York adjutant general to organize and equip the regiment no later than three months after the effective date of the act. Although the law specified that it was to take effect immediately, Sulzer was impeached and removed from office before the law could be implemented. Finally, in 1916, Governor Charles Whitman ordered the regiment to be formed and designated it the Fifteenth Infantry Regiment, New York National Guard. In 1918, while the unit was assigned to the French Army, the War Department changed its designation to the 369th Infantry Regiment.

Time Line

1917

- August 5
  The entire New York National Guard is mustered into the U.S. Army.

1918

- March 1
  The Fifteenth Infantry is designated the 369th Infantry Regiment and assigned to the French Sixteenth Division for training and service before being sent to the front lines for two years.
- July 15–18
  The 369th Infantry reverses a German attack and becomes known as the Harlem Hell Fighters.
- November 11
  The armistice ends the war at 11:00 AM.
- December 13
  The Croix de Guerre is pinned to the colors of the 369th, awarding the decoration to every member.

1919

- February 17
  Soon after returning to New York, the 369th marches down Fifth Avenue in its own victory parade.

About the Author

The legislation creating New York City's African American infantry regiment was first introduced in both houses of the New York State Legislature. These two bills, differing slightly, were ultimately consolidated into a single bill, signed by Governor Sulzer. Thomas Kane introduced the bill in the New York State Assembly. Kane had immigrated to the United States from Ireland in 1887 when he was nineteen years old. He was a skilled amateur athlete who was president of the Clipper Athletic Club for seven years and worked in industrial marketing. He was one of the first to support building public playgrounds in New York City. With support from Tammany Hall, he defeated the Republican incumbent Dean Nelson by a 25 percent margin in the 1912 election. Henry Salant introduced similar legislation in the New York State Senate. He was a native New Yorker who ran as a National Progressive in the 1912 election. Salant had been a very successful real estate lawyer in New York City. He was removed from office in late April 1913 following an election protest and ballot recount. Afterward Salant continued his active law practice and appeared as counsel in a number of important cases. He remained active in New York Republican Party politics through the 1920s but held no further significant political office.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

Although legislation intended to create an African American regiment for New York City had been introduced and passed by the legislature before, first in 1911 and again in 1912, the governor did not sign those bills into law. On June 2, 1913, the newly elected Governor Sulzer signed into law the Colored Regiment of Infantry Act.

The 1913 act amended Article 2 of Chapter 41, "Military Law," of the 1909 laws of New York State, which defined the command, organization, and administration of the state National Guard. Legislation similar to the enacted bill had been proposed in 1911, but that bill contained additional language that duplicated provisions in the existing military law. In 1912 a much shorter version of the 1911 bill was proposed, but that bill also contained redundant language. The final bill was pared down to the language essential to require the adjutant general the senior New York State military administrative authority to create a regiment no later than three months after the bill became law. However, the law inadvertently contained a provision that allowed the adjutant general to delay creation of the regiment: It required the officers of the regiment to be commissioned according to the military law provisions for eligibility and examination. The adjutant general interpreted the law to require that the regiment's officers be black, but black officers of the provisional regiment did not have sufficient military education to pass the examinations.

Audience

There were two main audiences for the law. First, the New York State adjutant general and the New York National Guard were responsible for executing its provisions. Second, and perhaps politically more important, were the African American community in New York City and the politically active Equity Congress, backers of the provisional regiment.

Impact

Despite the law's provision that the African American regiment be created within three months, the adjutant general and other state authorities took no action. There were conflicting loyalties among those political appointees who owed allegiance to Tammany Hall and those who supported Governor Sulzer. Tammany Hall was the name given to the political organization that dominated the Democratic Party in New York State and New York City during the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Originally it had dominated Irish American politics but in the late nineteenth century encompassed the larger immigrant community. In the early twentieth century, it worked to divert African Americans from their traditional support of the Republican Party. Tammany maintained its control through a system of patronage appointments, illegal payments and kickbacks, and generally corrupt political practice. Sulzer had received political support from Tammany Hall for a large part of his career, but when he became governor, he refused to follow Tammany instructions for political appointments. In October 1913, Tammany Hall politicians whom Sulzer had opposed started impeachment proceedings, alleging he had misappropriated campaign funds; he was forced out of office in 1913. Lieutenant Governor Martin H. Glynn, who supported the Tammany Hall political machine, then became governor. Glynn had no interest in pursuing the formation of an African American regiment and took no action despite inquiries from the black community.

William Hayward (Library of Congress)

The New York Times reported on May 11, 1914, that "C. Franklin Carr of New York, a candidate for Colonel of the negro regiment" had written a letter to the state's adjutant general on May 1 expressing the provisional regiment's impatience with the delay in mustering the unit into the New York National Guard. The letter continued to state that if an interpretation of the authorization law meant that the regiment would need to have white officers, the regiment would be willing to accept that condition. On May 9, an assistant to the adjutant general replied that since "not a sufficient number of officers succeeded in passing the prescribed examination to officer one company, the organization of the colored regiment has been temporarily postponed." The Annual Report of the Adjutant General of the State of New York covering the year 1914 states that fifty-seven candidates for commissions were tested: "The result was so disappointing as to make it obviously improper to expend public funds any further in the attempt to comply with the act." The same report mentions that the state had thirteen regiments, four more than the War Department required with the implication that forming a new regiment would drain scarce funds from the rest of the state's National Guard. The adjutant general, in sum, was not favorably disposed toward the creation of a new black regiment; no further action was taken for almost two more years.

When Charles Whitman defeated Glynn in New York's 1914 gubernatorial election, the U.S. government was cautiously watching events in Europe. The previous August, Germany had declared war on Russia and France, followed by Great Britain's declaration of war on Germany. In Mexico, the revolutionary Pancho Villa was waging war for control of the Mexican government. Villa saw the U.S. government's transition of support from him to his opponent, Venustiano Carranza, as a betrayal and a personal affront. Consequently, in March 1916, Villa crossed the border into New Mexico and killed seventeen citizens in the town of Columbus. In April, the War Department mobilized the National Guard in response to Villa's attack, and almost all of the New York National Guard entered federal service. When the New York National Guard was mobilized, it fielded an entire division.

On June 16, 1916, Governor Whitman appointed William Hayward as colonel in the New York National Guard with orders to start organizing and recruiting for the new African American unit, named the Fifteenth Infantry Regiment. Many wondered why Hayward was selected to command the Fifteenth rather than Charles Fillmore, who was the acting colonel of the provisional regiment; it is probable that Hayward's appointment was a political reward from Whitman, as was the appointment of Lorillard Spencer as the adjutant of the regiment. Both Hayward and Spencer were close to the governor and had previously been provided with political appointments. Spencer held the rank of captain in the New York National Guard Coast Artillery Corp but was promoted to major when he became Whitman's military secretary. Conveniently, Hayward, who had been public service commissioner, still held the rank of colonel in the Nebraska National Guard, albeit on the excess inactive list; it was thus a simple administrative act to have him transferred to the New York National Guard's excess inactive list and then detailed to active service.

In the first weeks of their efforts, Colonel Hayward and his adjutant, Major Spencer, ran into great difficulties finding recruits in New York's African American community. Although they were pleased to finally have the regiment, they were especially concerned that it might have only white officers. Hayward advertised that the color line would not be drawn in the Fifteenth Infantry and that colored men who qualified would be commissioned as officers. He opened the doors to the Fifteenth Infantry Regiment's first recruiting office on June 27, 1916. A few prospective recruits came by, and several were enlisted that night. Later in the week the New York Age, a popular African American weekly newspaper in New York City, printed two related articles on its front page: one about the heroic actions of the all-black Tenth Cavalry Regiment in Mexico and the other on the recruiting efforts for New York's Fifteenth Infantry. Those two articles brought hundreds of recruits into the regiment; by the middle of July, the first battalion had been filled.

Essential Quotes

"The adjutant-general shall organize and equip a colored regiment of infantry in the city of New York."

"Such regiment when organized and equipped shall become a part of the national guard of the state of New York, and subject to all the statutes, rules and regulations governing such national guard."

While the regiment continued to attract a number of highly qualified African Americans, there were not enough to fill the large number of officer positions, and Hayward was indeed forced to bring in a number of white officers. Hamilton Fish III, a New York assemblyman and well-connected socialite, was appointed a captain, as was Arthur Little, a well-known insurance broker. Most of the enlisted personnel came from Harlem, the Bronx, and Brooklyn; Hayward recruited and formed one battalion in each of the three locations. For the most part, the men he recruited were ordinary laborers, such as porters, doormen, and the like. Needham Roberts, a former bellhop, had tried to enlist in the navy but had been turned down. Henry Johnson had been a railroad porter in Albany, New York, but went to New York City to enlist. Horace Pippin had been a metalworker, a molder in a brake-shoe foundry. He had shown some artistic talent as a child, and his war diary is illustrated with his drawings. In the 1930s Pippin gained fame as one the leading American "naive" artists of the century.

Another enlistee was James Reese Europe, who joined New York's Fifteenth on September 18, 1916, and recruited his friend and colleague Noble Sissle to join ten days later. Europe was a famous bandleader whose music was well known across the country. He joined the regiment to be a soldier, not a musician, but when Hayward was having problems recruiting, he turned to Europe to form a band that would bring in men to join the regiment. Europe scoured New York for skilled musicians; when he exhausted the supply, he went to Chicago to recruit Frank DeBroit, a famous black cornet player. Because there was a shortage of clarinet and saxophone players at the time, Europe persuaded Hayward to fund a trip to Puerto Rico. Europe returned with a group of eighteen highly skilled musicians he had somehow persuaded to enlist and go to New York.

The Fifteenth New York was mobilized into federal service on July 25, 1917. On August 5, along with all the other units of the National Guard of the United States, the Fifteenth New York entered the U.S. Army. After two months of guard duty in the New York area, the regiment was sent to Camp Wadsworth in Spartanburg, South Carolina, for additional training. Race relations at Camp Wadsworth were extremely tense, and there were a number of violent incidents. The commander of Camp Wadsworth, Brigadier General Charles Phillips, believed the situation to be so critical that he arranged a private meeting between Colonel Hayward and Secretary of War Newton Baker on October 22, just seven days after the regiment had arrived there. Two days later, the regiment left Spartanburg by train for New York to await transportation by ship to France in November. After a number of mishaps, including a return to New York for engine repair, the regiment landed in Brest, France, on December 27, 1917.

Rather than being sent into combat training as they had expected, the regiment was unceremoniously boarded onto freight cars and sent to Saint-Nazaire to be a labor and construction unit. While the rest of the regiment was building railroads and unloading cargo, the regimental band directed by Europe was sent on a tour across France. A visiting American theatrical producer, Winthrop Ames, and the Broadway actor E. H. Sothern had been touring France to find entertainment for American troops when they heard Europe's band. In their opinion, it was the best band they had ever heard. It may have been their recommendation that led the army to order the band to play at a rest and recuperation area at Aix-les-Bains, a resort area near the French Alps. On February 12, 1918, the band boarded a train and played their way across the southeastern quarter of France; everywhere the train stopped, the band played. The French had never heard a jazz band before and embraced the music with great enthusiasm.

General John J. Pershing, the commanding general of the American Expeditionary Force, was then being pressured by the French and British commanders to assign American forces to fill in losses in both armies. Pershing adamantly refused, insisting that Americans command Americans. When Germany launched its spring offensive in March 1918, Pershing made an exception to his policy and agreed to loan three regular U.S. Army divisions and two National Guard regiments to back up the French and British forces. The German offensive stalled, and the American units were never assigned except for the Fifteenth New York, which was given to the French Fourth Army; Pershing had no confidence in the combat skills of African Americans but had found a way to satisfy French requests for American units and get rid of what he saw as a problem. Under French leadership, Pershing's African American "problem" became one of the most decorated American regiments in the war.

When the regiment reported for duty with the French Army, it learned it had been designated as the "369th Infantry Regiment." Because the regiment was to be part of the French Army, it had to exchange American equipment for French-issued items. They were given the distinctive helmet worn by the French soldiers, with a crest that ran from front to back, as well as French leather belts and strappings to hold their ammunition, gas masks, and grenade bags. They were armed with the same rifles as were the other French troops deployed in the same sector. After three weeks' training with French infantry weapons and tactics, the regiment was assigned to a 2.8-mile sector of frontline trenches. The 369th Infantry Regiment's first combat experience occurred late on April 14 when the regiment came under a German artillery attack. The shelling lasted only a short time, and there were no casualties. The 369th commanded the frontline trenches from April 29 until July 4, when it was relieved and sent to the second-line trenches.

In mid-July, the last phase of the German spring offensive began in the Champagne-Ardenne, as the Germans attempted to widen their front on the Marne River. After helping stop the German attack, the French attached the 369th to the 161st Division, which had been pushed back from its frontline trenches by the German attack. The 369th counterattacked on July 18 and recaptured the frontline trenches. Portions of the regiment were then parceled out to support other French units from July 21 through August 19. Once the sector was quiet and the regiment was reunited, it resumed training. The regiment was permanently reassigned to the 161st Division on September 9, prior to the French Fourth Army's Meuse-Argonne offensive, started on September 26. That day the 369th, assigned to support the French attack, discovered a gap in the front lines and advanced to capture the town of Ripont. The following day they advanced about three-quarters of a mile. While the rest of the 161st was being delayed by German resistance, the regiment captured Séchault and advanced three-quarters of a mile further. After the heavy fighting abated and the front was consolidated, the 161st Division, including the 369th, was relieved and returned to a rehabilitation area around October 8. On October 14 the regiment, as part of the 161st, began occupation of the Thur sector, northeast of Belfort. Because of their remarkable record in combat, the men of the 369th were accorded the honor of being the first American troops to cross the Rhine into Germany.

Despite the regiment's accomplishments, once the 369th was reassigned from the French Army back to the U.S. Army, it once again faced racial prejudices. The U.S.

Questions for Further Study

1. Compare this document with Thomas Morris Chester's Civil War Dispatches (1864). What do you think Chester's reaction to the new law would have been?

2. Using this document in conjunction with Chester's Civil War Dispatches and Harry Truman's Executive Order 9981 desegregating the military in 1948, trace the history of African American involvement in the military and efforts to desegregate it.

3. Describe the role that the Harlem Hell Fighters played in World War I.

4. What role did local politics have in the formation of the Colored Regiment of Infantry Act and in delays in its implementation?

5. In the twentieth century numerous African American leaders called on black men to resist the military draft. See, for example, Stokely Carmichael's "Black Power" (1966). What changed in attitudes toward the military between the early twentieth century and the later decades of the century?

Army refused to allow the Harlem Hell Fighters to march in the Paris victory parade and quickly shipped them back to New York. Yet Colonel Hayward promised his men a victory parade of their own and, using his many political connections, arranged a remarkable event. On February 17, 1919, the Harlem Hell Fighters, led by Europe and the regimental band, marched down Fifth Avenue from the victory arch being built at 24th and Broadway to Harlem.

In a larger sense, the full impact of the 369th Harlem Hell Fighters and other black regiments' service in World War I was not realized until President Harry S. Truman integrated the U.S. military forces in 1948. Starting with the Korean War, as African Americans began to be accepted into the military on an equal basis with whites and other races, a renewed consciousness emerged of a uniquely black military heritage of service. That heritage, service despite racial prejudice and inequality, is a heritage of honor, courage, and sacrifice that continues to inspire African American youth.

See also Executive Order 9981 (1948).

Further Reading

Articles

"Against Negro Regiment: Adjt. Gen. Verbeck Says One in Brooklyn Would Be Costly." New York Times, February 8, 1911.

"Colored Regiment to Wait: Not Enough Candidates Have Passed to Officer Provisional Infantry." New York Times, May 11, 1914.

"Topics of the Times." New York Times, July 13, 1911.

Books

Annual Report of the Adjutant General of the State of New York for the Year 1914. Albany, N.Y.: J. B. Lyon, 1915.

Barbeau, Arthur E., and Florette Henri. The Unknown Soldiers: Black American Troops in World War I. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1974.

Foner, Jack D. Blacks and the Military in American History: A New Perspective. New York: Praeger, 1974.

Harris, Stephen L. Harlem's Hell Fighters: The African-American 369th Infantry in World War I. Washington, D.C.: Potomac Books, 2003.

Kennedy, David M. Over Here: The First World War and American Society. New York: Oxford University Press, 1980.

Little, Arthur W. From Harlem to the Rhine: The Story of New York's Colored Volunteers. New York: Covici, Friede, 1936.

Slotkin, Richard. Lost Battalions: The Great War and the Crisis of American Nationality. New York: Henry Holt, 2005.

Whitman, Charles. Public Papers of Charles Seymour Whitman, Governor: 1915. Albany, N.Y.: J. B. Lyon, 1916.

. Public Papers of Charles Seymour Whitman, Governor: 1916. Albany, N.Y.: J. B. Lyon, 1919.

Web Sites

"Integration of the Armed Forces." Redstone Arsenal Web site. http://web.archive.org/web/20070203164944/www.redstone.army.mil/history/integrate/welcome.html.

"Horace Pippin's Autobiography, First World War, ca. 1921." Smithsonian Institution "Archives of American Art" Web site. http://www.aaa.si.edu/collections/searchimages/images/item_7434.htm.

"93d Division Summary of Operations in the World War." U.S. Army Center of Military History Web site. http://www.history.army.mil/topics/afam/93div.htm.

"WWI African American Soldiers." New York State Archives "Remembering World War I, 1914 1918" Web site. http://iarchives.nysed.gov/Gallery/gallery.jsp?id=147&ss=WWI.

William S. Pettit

Document Text

Act in Relation to the Organization of a Colored Regiment in the City of New York

Became a law June 2, 1913, with the approval of the Governor. Passed, three-fifths being present.

The People of the State of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

Section 1. Article two of chapter forty-one of the laws of nineteen hundred and nine, entitled "An act in relation to the militia, constituting chapter thirty-six of the consolidated laws," is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof a new section, to be section forty, to read as follows:

§40. Colored regiment of infantry. Within three months after this section takes effect, the adjutant-general shall organize and equip a colored regiment of infantry in the city of New York. Such regiment when organized and equipped shall become a part of the national guard of the state of New York, and subject to all the statutes, rules and regulations governing such national guard. The officers of such regiment shall be commissioned by the governor, subject to the provisions of this chapter, in relation to eligibility and examination. The armory board of the city of New York shall provide quarters for such regiment.

§2. This act shall take effect immediately.

Woodrow Wilson (Library of Congress)

Monroe Trotter's Protest to Woodrow Wilson

1914

"As equal citizens and by virtue of your public promises we are entitled at your hands to freedom from discrimination."

Overview

As a candidate for the presidency of the United States in 1912, Woodrow Wilson proposed a platform based on what he characterized as "new freedom." In doing so, Wilson made promises to African Americans that he could be counted on to provide fairness if elected. However, upon his election, Wilson reneged on his original promise and instituted a policy of racial segregation in both the Department of the Treasury and the Post Office Department. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), the leading civil rights group in the nation at that time, forwarded a letter of protest to Wilson, but their efforts were ignored. On November 6, 1913, and again on November 12, 1914, President Wilson met with a delegation of African American leaders from the National Independent Equal Rights League. Their spokesman, the uncompromising Boston Guardian editor William Monroe Trotter, challenged Wilson in his opening remarks at the second meeting to live up to his promises to provide equality for African Americans. Trotter's message was characteristically direct, even blunt. It led to a tense encounter that garnered much public attention.

Context

The 1910s were a time of racial volatility in the United States, evidenced by numerous urban race riots, notably in East St. Louis and Chicago. The historian Rayford Logan has characterized this period as the nadir of race relations in America. Terrifying violence against African Americans included numerous lynchings and other hostile attacks. Racial segregation had become entrenched in American life. The doctrine of "separate but equal" had even obtained legal status in the Supreme Court's Plessy v. Ferguson decision of 1896, and in his famous Atlanta Exposition Address in 1895 the most prominent black leader of the day, Booker T. Washington, advocated a "gradualist" program of self-improvement that other African Americans came to consider inadequate to the troubled times. The Niagara Movement and the subsequent founding of the NAACP in 1909 represented a more activist response. A broader effect of southern violence was the northward migration of black Americans. Beginning in earnest in 1910, this persistent shift saw millions of African Americans move to the industrial north in search of jobs and, they hoped, a better life. To assist in meeting the numerous social, economic, cultural, and political challenges posed by the recently arriving black southerners, the National Urban League was formed in New York City in 1910.

The death of Frederick Douglass in 1895 left Booker T. Washington as the most prominent representative of national black leadership. Washington, a former slave, was known for his gradualism, a strategy of improving poor southern blacks' conditions through industrial education and hard work. His status as the first president of the influential Tuskegee Institute in Alabama, his prominent Atlanta address, and his recognition by several U.S. presidents cemented Washington's image as the nation's foremost African American. However, a number of northern blacks, including Monroe Trotter's camp of radical intellectuals, took a more assertive stance and waged an intense public and private debate with the "Bookerites." This ideological struggle came to a head on July 30, 1903, when Washington spoke at an event sponsored by the National Negro Business League at the Columbus Avenue African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church in Boston. Trotter and several of his associates protested so vigorously that they were ejected and arrested. Also in 1903, W. E. B. Du Bois published The Souls of Black Folk, with a chapter, "Of Mr. Booker T. Washington and Others," that represented an additional challenge to the "Tuskegee Machine" and its hold on black leadership. Washington died in 1915, a year after Trotter's confrontation with President Wilson, leaving a leadership vacuum that Du Bois, Trotter, and others intended to fill.

In 1912, Woodrow Wilson, a Democrat, had appealed to blacks (who were mainly Republicans) for their votes, offering promises of equal treatment should he be elected president. Frustrated with the incursion of segregation into the federal bureaucracy, Trotter requested meetings with Wilson in November 1913 and again in November 1914. In this time of great travail, the election of Wilson to the presidency of the United States offered hope for African Americans. In fact, a number of black leaders, including Trotter,

Time Line

1895	■ Frederick Douglass dies, and Booker T. Washington delivers his Atlanta Exposition Address.
1896	■ May 18 The Supreme Court's Plessy v. Ferguson decision legitimates racial segregation in American life, law, and culture.
1898	■ November 10 A race riot occurs in Wilmington, North Carolina.
1903	■ The historian W. E. B. Du Bois publishes The Souls of Black Folk.
1905	■ The Niagara Movement is founded in Niagara Falls, Ontario, in call for opposition to racial segregation and disenfranchisement as well as policies of accommodation.
1906	■ Racial disturbances and riots occur in Brownsville, Texas, and Atlanta, Georgia.
1908	■ August 14–15 A race riot occurs in Springfield, Illinois.
1909	■ February 12 The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People is founded.
1910	■ The National Urban League is founded in New York City.
1912	■ Monroe Trotter, Du Bois, and other black leaders endorse Woodrow Wilson for president.

publicly supported Wilson's candidacy, breaking with their traditional Republican allegiance. Wilson was known in many circles as a progressive, but his concerns did not extend to African Americans and their condition. Like his early foreign policy, Wilson's approach to African American demands for equality could well be described as noninterventionist. Adding to the tensions that flared in the meeting, Wilson was still grieving at the time over the death of his wife, Ellen Axson Wilson, on August 6.

About the Author

William Monroe Trotter, son of the noted Union army soldier and activist James Monroe Trotter, was born on April 7, 1872, at his grandparents' farm in Springfield Township, Ohio, and raised in a middle-class neighborhood in Boston. He graduated from Harvard with Phi Beta Kappa honors in 1895 and earned his master's there the following year. Primarily known as a journalist, he served in various activist organizations and, in 1901, founded (along with George W. Forbes) the influential newspaper the Boston Guardian, which served as an important news vehicle promoting equal rights for African Americans. Defiant and uncompromising on issues of race, he went on to become a militant civil rights advocate and one of the most influential African American leaders of the early twentieth century. He accomplished much in his career before the age of forty.

Along with W. E. B. Du Bois, Trotter also played a leading role in the founding of the Niagara Movement in 1905, serving as head of the Press and Public Opinion Committee. Du Bois and Trotter together drafted the organization's radical "Declaration of Principles," which was supported by the movement membership. Trotter also played a leading role in the NAACP, attending the founding meeting in 1909 and maintaining contact with the group until disputes occurred with leaders such as Oswald Garrison Villard and Du Bois. During these years, Trotter was also an important figure in the National Independent Equal Rights League. Both Trotter and Du Bois endorsed Woodrow Wilson for president in 1912. However, they soon realized that the new president was less supportive of equal rights for African Americans than he had promised to be as a candidate. Wilson's actions, such as outright rejection of black advisers, support of segregation in federal office buildings, and exclusion of blacks from important civil service posts, garnered a sharp response from notable black leaders, including Trotter.

Trotter opposed D. W. Griffith's film The Birth of a Nation (based on Thomas Dixon's novel and play The Clansman), which was shown at the White House in 1915. President Wilson praised the film, while Trotter stridently opposed the film's glorification of the Ku Klux Klan. Indeed, Trotter was arrested, with others, while picketing the stage production in Boston, which eventually was forced to close. The film was banned in Ohio, Chicago, St. Louis, and some areas of Massachusetts but continued to be shown in a number of Boston theaters for several months. Trotter's death is still somewhat of a mystery. On his sixty-second birthday, he reportedly fell (or, some say, jumped) from a window of his home to his death.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

In the first paragraph, Trotter reminds the president that, a year earlier, he and other black leaders had presented a petition, signed by persons from thirty-eight states, "protesting against segregation of employees of the National government whose ancestry could be traced in whole or in part to Africa." The focus of the group's concerns was the U.S. Treasury and Post Office, where "all the forms of segregation … are still practiced." Trotter reminds Wilson that the group had urged him to undo this racial segregation and that "there could be no freedom, no respect from others, and no equality of citizenship under segregation for races," particularly when such segregation was so rampant in the federal bureaucracy. Trotter highlights the social, political, and personal damage of such an arrangement, noting how the implied labeling of African Americans as "a lower order of beings" consigned them to an "inferiority of status." Trotter then proceeds to list the segregated areas of the federal government, drawing specific attention to facilities for dining, dressing, and washing. The effect of this policy, he says, is "a public humiliation and degradation" that has far-reaching consequences. He calls this continued segregation "a gratuitous blow" against those who had supported Wilson's candidacy to lead America for all Americans.

Trotter next reminds Wilson of his promise to investigate these conditions himself. One year later, he notes that segregation persists in all the areas of initial concern and has, in fact, spread to other federal buildings. Obviously, this finding greatly alarmed Trotter and the delegation, as they had invested much public capital in supporting Wilson. In part, therefore, the occasion represented an opportunity for Trotter and other leaders to save face among skeptical African Americans. More centrally, his words represent genuine frustration and anger at the turn of events.

In the third paragraph, Trotter details the specifics of racial segregation in federal government buildings. Segregated facilities then existed in the Treasury Department, the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and the Navy Department for dressing rooms, working positions, eating arrangements, and even lavatories. The repetition of this last word, mentioned eleven times in this paragraph alone, illustrates the level of humiliation and dehumanization to which African Americans were being subjected.

That such high hopes were followed by such worsening outcomes a year later was too much for the delegation, especially Trotter, to stomach. To the fiery activist it was unbearable that African American employees who dared to use the public facilities on the floors where they worked would be accused of "insubordination." In one particularly ridiculous case, African Americans were forbidden from even entering an adjoining room occupied by white clerks. Black men working on the sixth floor were forced to use public facilities on the eighth floor. In Trotter's mind there seemed to be no rational or substantial explanation for such debased and mortifying treatment for any human beings, especially for African Americans who had staunchly pledged their support for the nation, and (in many cases) for Wilson himself, at the behest of Trotter. As he puts it (in paragraph 9), "Consider that any passerby on the streets of the national capital, whether he be black or white, can enter and use the public lavatories in government buildings while citizens of color who do the work of the government are excluded."

Time Line

1914
- November 12 Trotter and other African American leaders meet with President Wilson in the White House, where Trotter delivers his protest concerning segregation; their acrimonious confrontation is widely reported the following day.

1915
- Booker T. Washington dies.
- Trotter campaigns to have D. W. Griffith's film The Birth of a Nation (praised by President Wilson) banned in Boston for its positive portrayal of the Ku Klux Klan.

1916
- Woodrow Wilson is reelected president.

1917
- Race riots occur in East St. Louis, Illinois, and Houston, Texas.

1918
- November 11 The Armistice brings World War I to an end.

1919
- Race riots occur in Chicago, Illinois, and Elaine, Arkansas.

1921
- Massive rioting in Tulsa, Oklahoma, destroys the city's black neighborhood.

1934
- Trotter dies in Boston.

Charles Evans Hughes (standing center), Republican Party presidential candidate campaigning in New York City
(Library of Congress)

Such matters were not petty for Trotter. The overt and underlying message they sent to African Americans all around the country was indicative of the value that their federal government placed on them. Black citizens were already devastated by the degree to which the party of Abraham Lincoln had abandoned its forthright championing of the interests of African Americans for nearly two decades, even while African Americans remained loyal to the Republicans. Now, searching for some sense of hope in Wilson as emblematic of a new Democratic Party, black people were intensely disappointed. That African Americans were undergoing one of the worst periods in their history at this time, owing to the rampant harassment, violence, and lynchings, made the added insult of toilet segregation too much to bear.

Trotter unequivocally states, in paragraph 4, that the delegation has come to "renew the protest," asking the president once again to "abolish segregation of Afro-American employees in the executive department." Striking here, in addition to the use of the term Afro-American, is his inclusive concern for African American women and men. (Trotter opposed use of the term Negro, choosing instead to use terms such as Colored American and Afro-American.) In both these instances, Trotter was ahead of his time, indicating a truly progressive character to his leadership and personality.

In paragraph 5, Trotter makes one of his most poignant statements, one that had overarching and far-reaching implications for African Americans for the remainder of the century and beyond. Trotter predicts that if the government of the United States of America can be allowed to segregate African Americans, it will encourage the rest of the nation to continue to do the same, permitting segregation to spread from the White House to every part of the nation. Inaction on the part of Wilson was sending a disturbing message to every African American citizen and potentially giving whites a license to continue their inhumane treatment of blacks. In this policy Trotter foresaw danger for the entire nation, potentially leading to its unraveling. American citizenship thus would become extremely precarious, even to the point of placing into question the promises of the founding documents and the structure of American democracy itself. This point was a prophetic warning from Trotter that would soon possess clear meaning as the United States entered World War I in 1917 to make the world "safe for democracy," in Wilson's words.

Trotter, a master strategist, proceeds in paragraph 6 to recount the delegation's strategy to date, reminding Wilson of the serious and organized manner of their protest. That protest had graduated from the national antisegregation petition offered in 1913 to protests at the voting polls whereby African Americans, as a sign of their heightened disdain for inaction, voted "against every Democratic candidate save those outspoken against segregation." Trotter noted that David Walsh of Massachusetts, the only Democrat elected governor in the eastern part of the country, had publicly appealed to Wilson to end segregation. Mere lip service or empty promises could not allay the frustrations of African Americans. Only tangible, concerted actions by governmental leaders would do that. The clear message to the president was that he should reverse course and make good on his promise or else potentially face the same fate as many of his Democratic colleagues around the nation. With the next presidential election just two years away, this message was no idle threat. Just as we publicly supported you, we can also publicly denounce you, Trotter and the delegation seem to imply, unless you end segregation in the federal bureaucracy once and for all.

Trotter underscores the power of the African American vote in the recent shift of black political allegiance that helped to elect Wilson. This historic shift away from the Republican Party resulted from the Republicans' disregard for African American concerns at a crucial period of the nation's history. Here the race leader demonstrates that the shift was not a matter that blacks took lightly. African Americans were not wedded to Wilson or the Democrats any more than they were to the Republican Party, should either turn its back on African American efforts for equality. Wilson may have been touted as the "second Lincoln," says Trotter, but his actions and inactions placed African American representatives, like Trotter himself, in the compromising position of being labeled as false leaders and race traitors. This was not the kind of change that African Americans could believe in or had hoped for when voting for Wilson.

In the final sections of his address, Trotter, using Wilson's own words, reminds the president of the promise he made to African American people. Then, in paragraph 9, comes an argument linking fellow citizenship with "congregation," by which he means a united community, one that is subverted by segregation.

As "equal citizens and by virtue of your public promises," African Americans are "entitled" to "freedom from discrimination, restriction, imputation and insult in government employ." The parting shot that surely rang throughout the entire room asks if Wilson had instituted a "new freedom for white Americans and new slavery for your Afro-American fellow citizens." Trotter concludes with the delegation's specific policy proposal: that the president issue an executive order banning all racial segregation of government employees on account of race. "We await your reply." According to an article published that day in the Philadelphia Evening Ledger, Wilson reportedly replied to Trotter that he had spoken "as no other man has spoken since I assumed the Presidency" and said that he would no longer receive him as part of a future delegation.

Much has been made of Trotter's militant tone during this meeting. However, this opening statement to the president evidences a degree of decorum and respect. He maintains a reasonable attitude in expressing the hope that Wilson will be a man of his word. But Trotter and the delegation also offered a warning that the people whom they represented were greatly alarmed at the lack of progress, especially the further encroachment upon their movement for equality. Furthermore, the symbolism of the president of the United States seeming to condone racial segregation in the very citadel of democracy could not go unchallenged. Neither could Wilson's professed dedication to making the world "safe for democracy" while he directly and indirectly denied African Americans their rights and full citizenship.

Audience

William Monroe Trotter delivered this address directly to Woodrow Wilson in the White House on November 12, 1914. It was the second meeting for the two men. In attendance were Trotter and a number of other black leaders from the National Independent Equal Rights League. The spirited and heated discussion lasted for forty-five minutes, before Wilson ordered the delegation to leave. News of the controversial meeting was featured in various newspapers including the Philadelphia Evening Ledger, the New York Times, the Boston Evening Transcript, and the African American newspaper the New York Age. Copies of the opening address were reprinted in numerous newspapers, including the black press. The president himself was the direct focus of frustration and criticism, since his reneging on campaign pledges had angered and embarrassed his black supporters out of hand.

Impact

The meetings of November 1913 and November 1914 demonstrated the serious difficulties African Americans had with the administration of Woodrow Wilson, in particular with the president himself. At the time of the second meeting, Wilson was undergoing severe strain and grief owing to the tragic death of his wife of thirty years. Considering the commensurate strain felt by Trotter, the delegation, and African American people across the country, this meeting had the makings of a truly volatile encounter, which ended with Wilson's ordering Trotter and the delegation out of his office. The second exchange was characterized as a confrontation by the White House, dismissing any idea that the meeting held any level of civility at all. Trotter's anger at Wilson and the Democrats did not subside after the meeting. In protest, he left the Democratic Party in 1916 and supported the Republican candidate, Charles Evans Hughes. At the same time, Trotter maintained his vigilant struggle for African Americans' equal rights.

A huge cloud of protest resulted from the confrontation between Trotter and Wilson. The national mainstream press was highly critical of Wilson. The Nation characterized racial segregation as "a sad blot upon the Wilson administration." The New Republic chided Wilson for confirming the emptiness of his pre-election promises to African Americans. The black press was even more critical of the government tolerance for racial segregation. Still, in the pages of the New York Age the writer and civil rights advocate James Weldon Johnson considered a moderate

Essential Quotes

"Such segregation was a public humiliation and degradation, entirely unmerited and far-reaching in its injurious effects, a gratuitous blow against ever-loyal citizens and against those many of whom aided and supported your elevation to the presidency of our common country."

(Paragraph 1)

"Because we cannot believe you capable of any disregard of your pledges we have been sent by the alarmed American citizens of color. They realize that if they can be segregated and thus humiliated by the national government at the national capital the beginning is made for the spread of that persecution and prosecution which makes property and life itself insecure in the South, the foundation of the whole fabric of their citizenship is unsettled."

(Paragraph 5)

"Fellow citizenship means congregation. Segregation destroys fellowship and citizenship."

(Paragraph 9)

"As equal citizens and by virtue of your public promises we are entitled at your hands to freedom from discrimination, restriction, imputation and insult in government employ. Have you a 'new freedom' for white Americans and a new slavery for your Afro-American fellow citizens? God forbid!"

(Paragraph 10)

on issues of racial justice who worked actively within the "system" to achieve justice and equality for African Americans praised Trotter's stance in principle while disagreeing with his particular tactics. Although segregation continued in the departments of the federal government, scholars credit Trotter with blunting its spread in bringing national attention to the subject. The Wilson administration retreated in the encounter's aftermath.

Although no substantial change in federal segregation policy occurred in the immediate aftermath of the meeting, it was evident that a clear message had been sent to the White House. The Wilson administration, in the period following the meeting, recoiled regarding matters of race, while the black press focused less and less on the subject for about two years. The race question slipped into the background in the years leading up to World War I, as African Americans hoped that their support for America's participation in the war would demonstrate their patriotism and win for them equality and acceptance. In the interim, Booker T. Washington died in 1915, leaving somewhat of a leadership vacuum in black America. Then, by 1916, the United States was drawing closer to the ongoing European war, reopening national discussion regarding race matters and American citizenship.

See also Booker T. Washington's Atlanta Exposition Address (1895); Plessy v. Ferguson (1896); W. E. B. Du Bois: The Souls of Black Folk (1903); Niagara Movement Declaration of Principles (1905).

Further Reading

Articles

Lunardini, Christine. "Standing Firm: William Monroe Trotter's Meetings with Woodrow Wilson, 1913 1914." Journal of Negro History 64, no. 3 (Summer 1979): 244 264.

"President Resents Negro's Criticism." New York Times, November 13, 1914, p. 11. Available online. New York Times Web site. http://query.nytimes.com/gst/abstract.html?res=9C01E0DC1738E633A25750C1A9679D946596D6CF.

Books

Bartlett, Bruce. Wrong on Race: The Democratic Party's Buried Past. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2008.

Bennett, Lerone, Jr. Pioneers in Protest. Baltimore, Md.: Penguin, 1969.

Cooper, John Milton. Reconsidering Woodrow Wilson: Progressivism, Internationalism, War, and Peace. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2008.

. Woodrow Wilson: A Biography. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2009.

Fox, Stephen R. The Guardian of Boston: William Monroe Trotter. New York: Atheneum, 1970.

. "William Monroe Trotter." In Dictionary of American Negro Biography, ed. Rayford W. Logan and Michael R. Winston. New York: W. W. Norton, 1982.

Logan, Rayford W. The Betrayal of the Negro: From Rutherford B. Hayes to Woodrow Wilson. New York: Da Capo Press, 1997.

Maynard, William Barksdale. Woodrow Wilson: Princeton to the Presidency. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2008.

Smith, Jessie Carney. "William Monroe Trotter." In Notable Black American Men. Detroit: Gale Research, 1999.

Zachery Williams

Questions for Further Study

1. What circumstances do you think might have led to so much racial unrest during the 1910s? Why do some historians regard this decade as among the worst in the nation's history with regard to race?

2. Describe the ideological struggle between such figures as Booker T. Washington and William Monroe Trotter. What was the source of this struggle? What impact did it have on African Americans?

3. Historians regard Woodrow Wilson as a "progressive" president, but his progressivism did not appear to extend to issues of race. What do you think might explain that? What would make a "progressive" president praise a movie glorifying the Ku Klux Klan?

4. A century-plus earlier, another African American leader directly challenged his president. Compare this document to Benjamin Banneker's Letter to Thomas Jefferson, written in 1791. What do you think Banneker's attitude toward Trotter's protest would have been? What differing tactics did the two writers use in addressing their presidents?

5. In what ways did World War I complicate race relations in the United States? How might these complications have influenced both Trotter and Wilson in their meetings?

Document Text

Monroe Trotter's Protest to Woodrow Wilson

One year ago we presented a national petition, signed by Afro-Americans in thirty-eight states, protesting against the segregation of employees of the National government whose ancestry could be traced in whole or in part to Africa, as instituted under your administration in the treasury and post-office departments. We then appealed to you to undo this race segregation in accord with your duty as president and with your pre-election pledges. We stated that there could be no freedom, no respect from others, and no equality of citizenship under segregation for races, especially when applied to but one of many racial elements in the government employ. For such placement of employes means a charge by the government of physical indecency or infection, or of being a lower order of beings, or a subjection to the prejudices of other citizens, which constitutes inferiority of status. We protested such segregation as to working conditions, eating tables, dressing rooms, rest rooms, lockers and especially public toilets in government buildings. We stated that such segregation was a public humiliation and degradation, entirely unmerited and far-reaching in its injurious effects, a gratuitous blow against ever-loyal citizens and against those many of whom aided and supported your elevation to the presidency of our common country.

At that time you stated you would investigate conditions for yourself. Now, after the lapse of a year, we have come back having found that all the forms of segregation of government employes of African extraction are still practiced in the treasury and postoffice department buildings, and to a certain extent have spread into other government buildings.

Under the treasury department, in the bureau of engraving and printing there is segregation not only in dressing rooms, but in working positions, Afro-American employes being herded at separate tables, in eating, and in toilets. In the navy department there is herding at desks and separation in lavatories. In the postoffice department there is separation in work for Afro-American women in the alcove on the eighth floor, of Afro-American men in rooms on the seventh floor, with forbidding even of entrance into an adjoining room occupied by white clerks on the seventh floor, and of Afro-American men in separate rooms just instituted on the sixth floor, with separate lavatories for Afro-American men on the eighth floor; in the main treasury building in separate lavatories in the basement; in the interior department separate lavatories, which were specifically pointed out to you at our first hearing; in the state and other departments separate lavatories; in marine hospital service building in separate lavatories, though there is but one Afro-American clerk to use it; in the war department in separate lavatories in the postoffice department building separate lavatories; in the sewing and bindery divisions of the government printing office on the fifth floor there is herding at working positions of Afro-American women and separation in lavatories, and new segregation instituted by the division chief since our first audience with you This lavatory segregation is the most degrading, most insulting of all. Afro-American employes who use the regular public lavatories on the floors where they work are cautioned and are then warned by superior officers against insubordination.

We have come by vote of this league to set before you this definite continuance of race segregation and to renew the protest and to ask you to abolish segregation of Afro-American employes in the executive department.

Because we cannot believe you capable of any disregard of your pledges we have been sent by the alarmed American citizens of color. They realize that if they can be segregated and thus humiliated by the national government at the national capital the beginning is made for the spread of that persecution and prosecution which makes property and life itself insecure in the South, the foundation of the whole fabric of their citizenship is unsettled.

They have made plain enough to you their opposition to segregation last year by a national anti-segregation petition, this year by a protest registered at the polls, voting against every Democratic candidate save those outspoken against segregation. The only Democrat elected governor in the eastern states, was Governor Walsh of Massachusetts, who appealed to you by letter to stop segregation. Thus have the Afro-Americans shown how they detest segregation.

In fact, so intense is their resentment that the movement to divide this solid race vote and make peace with the national Democracy, so suspiciously revived when you ran for the presidency, and which some of our families for two generations have been risking all to promote, bids fair to be undone.

Document Text

Only two years ago you were heralded as perhaps the second Lincoln, and now the Afro-American leaders who supported you are hounded as false leaders and traitors to their race. What a change segregation has wrought!

You said that your "Colored fellow citizens could depend upon you for everything which would assist in advancing the interests of their race in the United States." Consider this pledge in the face of the continued color segregation! Fellow citizenship means congregation. Segregation destroys fellowship and citizenship. Consider that any passerby on the streets of the national capital, whether he be black or white, can enter and use the public lavatories in government buildings while citizens of color who do the work of the government are excluded.

As equal citizens and by virtue of your public promises we are entitled at your hands to freedom from discrimination, restriction, imputation and insult in government employ. Have you a "new freedom" for white Americans and a new slavery for your Afro-American fellow citizens? God forbid!

We have been delegated to ask you to issue an executive order against any and all segregation of government employes because of race and color, and to ask whether you will do so. We await your reply, that we may give it to the waiting citizens of the United States of African extraction.

Glossary

bureau of engraving and printing	a federal agency, part of the Treasury Department, that produces paper currency, government bonds, postage stamps, and various other official documents
Governor Walsh	David Ignatius Walsh, the isolationist governor of Massachusetts who argued for film censorship in his state in response to The Birth of a Nation, a film glorifying the Ku Klux Klan that Wilson had approved of this league	the National Independent Equal Rights League

Edward White (AP/Wide World Photos)

Guinn v. United States

1915

"While ... the [Fifteenth] Amendment gives no right of suffrage, ... its prohibition might measurably have that effect."

Overview

In the 1915 Supreme Court case Frank Guinn and J. J. Beal v. United States, Chief Justice Edward White held that the grandfather clause, an amendment to Oklahoma's constitution, limited black suffrage and was therefore invalid. The case also applied to Maryland's constitution, which had a similar clause. The grandfather clause worked in conjunction with a literacy test to deprive African Americans of the right to vote. The literacy test stipulated that all voters be able to read, but the grandfather clause lifted literacy test requirements for anyone who was otherwise qualified to vote anywhere in the United States on January 1, 1866. The clause was particularly galling to African Americans in Oklahoma, as that state had not even existed in 1866. The literacy test additionally discriminated against African Americans, since it was very subjective and was applied by white southern registrars.

The U.S. Supreme Court held that Oklahoma's grandfather clause was unconstitutional, because it violated the spirit of the Fifteenth Amendment, ratified in 1870, which granted former slaves the right to vote. The Court's ruling had little direct effect on the extension of voting rights to African Americans in Oklahoma, however: The state simply passed a new statute, disenfranchising all those who did not register to vote during a brief, two-week window in 1916, except those who had voted in 1914. Thus, all voting whites could still vote, but all of the previously disenfranchised blacks were still disenfranchised, unless they had been able to work their way through the system in a two-week period.

Context

The Guinn case was one of the first major court cases in which the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) played a role, filing a brief, and represented one of the few times in the early twentieth century when the federal government appeared on the side of African Americans in a legal battle. Guinn was also one of the first challenges to discriminatory voting laws, which had been restricting voting rights to certain segments of American society for more than forty years. The first such laws appeared in the post Civil War Reconstruction period. African Americans and poor whites gained allies in the White House when the Republican Party the party of Abraham Lincoln took power in 1860; meanwhile, southern Democrats supporters of segregationist policies at that time vowed to wrest their power back using any and all means to achieve their ends. Despite the fact that the ratification of the Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution in the spring of 1870 had granted all male citizens the right to vote regardless of race, color, or prior slave status, violence and threats of violence were often used and suggested by Democrats over the next decade to keep Republicans, particularly black Republicans, from voting. As a result, all of the southern states had Democratic legislatures by the late 1870s.

Efforts continued in subsequent years to eliminate all African Americans and many poor whites from the voting ranks, leading to the growth of the Populist movement. This biracial groundswell stemmed from a financial crisis and labor unrest in the United States that resulted in the failure of businesses throughout the country, particularly many small farms in the South and the West. Channeling the anger of America's small farmers and other laborers who wanted reform, the Populist movement pushed for policy changes that would empower the nation's workers, both black and white, and protect small businesses from corrupt corporate interests. Reform and Fusion tickets won often in the South (and the West) in the early 1890s. Fusion politics refers to the combined power of the Republican and Populist parties at the end of the nineteenth century. In response, wealthy whites interested in seeing a resurgence of the Democratic Party organized mobs to drive African Americans from the polls. Many states adopted constitutional amendments in the late 1890s and early 1900s designed specifically to disenfranchise blacks and to limit the voting of poor whites. All of the previous restrictions on voting rights were retained and even more were added.

It was in the midst of this political clash that Oklahoma became the forty-sixth state in the Union in late 1907. The region came late into statehood, because much of its land had been set aside for Native American reservations until the 1890s. In 1910 Oklahoma adopted a constitutional amendment that tied the voting rights of its citizens to the

Time Line

1860

- November 6
  Abraham Lincoln is the first Republican to be elected president of the United States.

1865

- The end of the Civil War leads to Reconstruction in the American South.

1870

- Spring
  The Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution is ratified, giving all male citizens the right to vote regardless of race, color, or previous slave status; most African American men are able to vote for a time.

1877

- The Compromise of 1877 removes federal troops from the South and ends any chance that African Americans will receive fair treatment; the South effectively becomes a one-party state, with the Democratic Party being fully behind white supremacy.

1896

- May 18
  In its decision in the case of Plessy v. Ferguson, the U.S. Supreme Court upholds the legality of "separate but equal" segregation adopted throughout the South.

1898

- April 25
  In the case of Williams v. Mississippi, the U.S. Supreme Court upholds literacy and understanding qualifications established by some states to determine voter eligibility, because on their face the clauses do not discriminate against African Americans.

1907

- November 16
  Oklahoma becomes a state.

1910

- Although the Fifteenth Amendment guarantees all black men the right to vote, an amendment to the Oklahoma constitution effectively bars African Americans from voting in that state.

successful completion of a literacy test. However, certain individuals almost always whites were able to circumvent the literacy test requirement because of an exception known as the grandfather clause, which guaranteed descendants of eligible voters the right to vote without question. The amendment used a date of January 1 of the year after the end of the Civil War as the date for which a voter was required to prove that an ancestor presumably a grandfather was qualified to vote. Prospective voters who were unable to satisfy the terms of the grandfather clause were forced to prove their literacy. Maryland's grandfather clause, tested also in the case of Guinn v. United States, was adopted in 1908, just a couple of years before Oklahoma's.

The grandfather clause had little effect on the right to vote for most whites, but it served as a barrier to the ballot box for African American voters. Freedmen and all men of color were not guaranteed the right to vote until the passage of the Fifteenth Amendment in 1870 four years after the date specified in the grandfather clause. The Oklahoma state government claimed that the clause did not discriminate against voters on the basis of their race; the term race was not even mentioned in the text. Clearly, however, the voting rights of African Americans, not whites, were most threatened by the terms of the statute. In fact, the grandfather clause and similar voting restrictions generally had loopholes to protect white voters. Typically, a person who owned property or paid sufficient taxes was considered exempt from the clause; because the rate of property ownership was higher among whites than blacks, this exception adversely affected potential black voters.

It should be noted, however, that the grandfather clause (and the literacy test used in Oklahoma) were not the only methods employed to disenfranchise blacks. Among other techniques was the poll tax, an annual per-person fee that had to be paid before a ballot could be cast in any election. In effect, the poll tax added an economic dimension to the social inequities encountered by African Americans seeking to exercise their right to vote. At about a dollar per person, the tax placed a financial burden on a segment of the population with little or no money to spare. In addition to making the payment, voters were required to prove that they had paid the tax each year for as long as they had resided in the state; however, records and receipts for those members of the black community who managed to pay the poll tax were often lost or never entered in official logs. Taken together, these provisions effectively denied the right of suffrage to African Americans in the South.

It was in this context that the case of Guinn v. United States came to the Supreme Court. Black citizens of Oklahoma had voiced complaints to the U.S. Justice Department concerning the enormous amount of racial violence surrounding the Oklahoma elections of 1910, which served to discourage blacks from voting. In light of the brutal and discriminatory atmosphere of the elections, U.S. Attorney John Embry, along with fellow U.S. Attorney William R. Gregg, indicted two Oklahoma elections officials, J. J. Beal and Frank Guinn, on criminal charges of depriving people of their rights under the Constitution and federal law. Contrary to most expectations, the officials were convicted of civil rights violations on September 29, 1911 despite the fact that they had been enforcing an amendment to the Oklahoma state constitution. The two officials took the case to the U.S. Court of Appeals, claiming that they should not be prosecuted for upholding the law of their state. The Court of Appeals sent the case on to the Supreme Court in 1913, and it was decided on June 21, 1915.

About the Author

Chief Justice Edward Douglass White, Jr., was born November 3, 1845, in Louisiana and served in the Confederate army during the Civil War. After that service, he returned to his parents' sugarcane plantation and began to study law. Practicing in Louisiana after joining the bar in 1868, he briefly served in the state senate and then on the Louisiana Supreme Court before returning to his legal practice in 1880. In 1891, White was elected to the U.S. Senate; three years later he was appointed to the U.S. Supreme Court, and in 1910 he became the Court's chief justice. A southern Democrat, White was the second Catholic to serve as a Supreme Court justice.

Although White had sided with the majority in the 1896 case of Plessy v. Ferguson, which upheld segregation in public transportation and in general by establishing the "separate but equal" clause, he went on to author the Guinn v. United States decision in 1915. In 1917, White agreed with the majority in Buchanan v. Warley, a decision that held a residential segregation law in Louisville, Kentucky, illegal. The common thread between the latter two cases, and the difference between them and Plessy, is that the law in the cases of both Buchanan and Guinn directly and clearly discriminated against African Americans, whereas in Plessy the law was explained away by the majority as being unbiased on its face. After Guinn, White served as chief justice for another six years. He died on May 19, 1921.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

At issue in the U.S. Supreme Court case of Guinn v. United States was whether grandfather clauses had been deliberately enacted by state governments to deny African Americans their right to vote. Two Oklahoma election officials, Frank Guinn and J. J. Beal, had been charged with violating federal law by conspiring to deprive black Oklahomans of their voting rights in a general election held in 1910. Following the convictions of both men by a jury in an Oklahoma district court a year later, the Guinn case was brought before the Supreme Court on appeal in 1913. Guinn v. United States forced the highest court in the nation to examine the combined use of grandfather clauses and literacy tests as prerequisites to voting; specifically, the application of such tests in Oklahoma and Maryland was analyzed for fairness amid charges that black voters had been subjected to racial discrimination at the ballot box.

Time Line

1915

- June 21
  In Guinn v. United States, the Supreme Court voids the grandfather clause as a violation of the Fifteenth Amendment.

1916

- Oklahoma gets around the meaning of the Guinn decision by allowing all people who voted in 1914 to be automatically reregistered, while forcing all who had not—namely, African Americans—to register within a two-week window or face a permanent bar to the registration process.

1944

- April 3
  In one of the first voting rights victories since the Guinn case, the Supreme Court, in Smith v. Allwright, strikes down the whites-only primary in Texas, which had made blacks ineligible to vote for the nomination of Democratic Party candidates for the U.S. Senate, the House of Representatives, and the office of governor.

1964

- January 23
  The passage of the Twenty-fourth Amendment leads to the end of the poll tax in federal elections.
- July 2
  The Civil Rights Act of 1964 is signed by President Lyndon Baines Johnson.

1965

- August 6
  The Voting Rights Act of 1965 is passed to enforce the Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

1966

- March 24
  The Supreme Court, endorsing a sweeping view of federal power in Harper v. Virginia Board of Elections, holds that the poll tax at the state level violates the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Before voting, a black voter had to prove his literacy to the satisfaction of a white registrar. Whites were generally exempt from the test by the grandfather clause, which waived the need for a voter to display his literacy if his grandfather had been eligible to vote in 1866. African American voters could not satisfy this requirement because suffrage had not yet been granted to freedmen in 1866. And so blacks, at the discretion of a white registrar, might be asked to read a book in Greek or submit to a general knowledge test about a provision in either the state's constitution or the U.S. Constitution. In some southern states, general knowledge provisions were imposed by election officials, with registrars asking prospective voters such questions as "How many bubbles are there in a bar of soap?" The adequacy of a black voter's response to such questions was determined solely by the registrar.

Before the text of Chief Justice Edward White's opinion in Guinn v. United States is a syllabus summarizing the key points of the lower court's decision. Justice White then quotes the laws backing up the Fifteenth Amendment, discusses the election officials' trial, reiterates the jury instructions given at that trial, and lays out the responsibility of the Supreme Court in the case: "Let us at once consider and sift the propositions of the United States, on the one hand, and of the plaintiffs in error, on the other, in order to reach with precision the real and final question to be considered." That question, according to White, boils down to whether or not the state amendment creating the grandfather clause was valid and whether the law itself was invalid because it violated the Fifteenth Amendment. White examines the arguments on each side of the case and ends with justifications for his conclusions.

Justice White's opinion begins by noting that two election officials were charged with violating the federal law by denying "certain negro citizens" the right to vote based on the color of their skin. The Thirteenth Amendment, passed in late 1865, had abolished slavery in the United States, but the South's refusal to guarantee basic human rights to emancipated slaves forced the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, granting citizenship to all freedmen. Abuses continued, however, and the Republican Party in the South was seriously weakened because its large African American voting base was being denied the right to vote on a variety of technicalities. The Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution was designed to further safeguard the rights of newly freed slaves by removing obstacles to their voting. The chief justice quotes the language of the Fifteenth Amendment, which was ratified soon after the end of the Civil War: "The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." Black suffrage seems to be spelled out quite clearly by the text of this amendment, but that was not the case. Guinn v. United States tested the power of the Fifteenth Amendment against the rights of states to establish their own standards for suffrage.

After stating the law, the Court then looks back at the claims of each side represented in the original case. Representing the United States was U.S. solicitor general John Davis, who appeared before the Court to challenge the Oklahoma amendment. Davis argued that Oklahoma's provision had the effect of denying the right to vote based on race and should be struck down as a violation of the Fifteenth Amendment, regardless of whether the law was explicitly in violation of that constitutional provision. The defense, however, argued for state sovereignty not state sovereignty in terms of states being allowed to ignore the Fifteenth Amendment, but sovereignty in terms of their being able to set their own qualifications for voting. As the law in question did not specifically use race as a standard, the state contended that it should be allowed. The federal government, the defendants argued, should not be able to read a motive into the act or state that the effect of the law made an otherwise lawful act invalid. The defendants also claimed that the fact that no blacks qualified to vote under the law was not due to the law but due to their inability to read. It should be noted that no defense was noted by the Supreme Court as to why a date of January 1, 1866, was picked if the point were not to force all black voters to take the test.

The Supreme Court argues here that suffrage and qualifications put upon suffrage were state issues and that their position in this case did not limit that state power in any way. Of course, state regulations like this one that blatantly violated the Fifteenth Amendment were still being challenged, but otherwise the federal government left most decisions to the states alone. The Court then considers the literacy test, stating that it would not challenge the state's right to administer such a test. The only challenge was the use of the law to try to bypass the intended meaning of the Fifteenth Amendment.

Justice White continues his opinion with the enumeration of three key questions: Did the grandfather clause law violate the Fifteenth Amendment? Did the amendment, choosing January 1, 1866 as the date to use for the grandfather clause, mean what the government said it did? And would the striking down of the grandfather clause make the rest of the literacy test invalid? The rest of Justice White's opinion sought to answer to those questions.

The Court, in answering the first question, notes that the Fifteenth Amendment still allows room for the state to manage the business of voting; state-imposed literacy tests, then, remain lawful. It is important to evaluate this decision in the proper context: It embodies an era during which states wielded great power. The reach of the Fourteenth Amendment to prohibit racial bias at the state level was still very limited, and the use of the amendment to curtail the actions of state legislatures, unless they were directly and blatantly biased, did not occur for another three decades, when the Supreme Court decided Shelley v. Kraemer (1948), holding that courts could not enforce racially based private restrictive covenants.

In his explanation of what the Fifteenth Amendment says about suffrage, White holds that the state still has full power over suffrage qualifications, with the exception of those qualifications based on "race, color, or previous condition of servitude." He goes on to say that while no right to vote is directly created by the amendment, that right might still result when discriminatory rules are struck down by the amendment, which the Court held to be self-executing. White takes exception to the intent of Oklahoma's grandfather clause, pointing out that for a brief period of time prior to the adoption of the clause the hurdles to African American suffrage, while still present, were actually lower. According to White, there was no doubt that the statute had been adopted as an attempt to get around the Fifteenth Amendment. For that reason, the amendment to the Oklahoma constitution ran into direct conflict with the federal constitutional amendment.

Commemorative print marking the enactment on March 30, 1870, of the Fifteenth Amendment (Library of Congress)

Regarding the date the amendment to the Oklahoma Constitution was adopted, White again theorizes that the only possible reason for using the date of January 1, 1866, was to bypass the rights implied in the Fifteenth Amendment. Although the language of the grandfather clause does not refer to skin color or prior slave status, its clear purpose was to avoid granting suffrage to former slaves. As White puts it, the very use of that date shows a "direct and positive disregard of the 15th Amendment." The Court also considered whether anything had occurred in 1866 other than the granting of the right to vote to blacks in some areas (and throughout the nation four years later with the passage of the Fifteenth Amendment) that would cause a state to return its voting status to a time prior to that date. In other words, the opinion states that there was no legal change to suffrage in 1866 other than granting slaves the right to vote. If the date had been based on some other, potentially more reasonable (in the eyes of the Court) state intention, the Court might still have considered the grandfather clause law valid. No such reason was found, however.

Finally the Court examined the literacy test, but not to determine whether it disparately affected African Americans, as that was not a concern of the court at the time. Actually, at this point in history, the Court also ignored laws that produced obvious disadvantages for black voters, such as the white primary created in Texas and other states. There, the Democratic Party was by far the majority party, and so the primary to nominate party candidates was even more important than the election, in which candidates from the various parties squared off against each other. In other decisions, the

Essential Quotes

"The suffrage and literacy tests in the amendment of 1910 to the constitution of Oklahoma are so connected with each other that the unconstitutionality of the former renders the whole amendment invalid."

"Beyond doubt the Amendment does not take away from the state governments in a general sense the power over suffrage which has belonged to those governments from the beginning.… In fact, the very command of the Amendment recognizes the possession of the general power by the state, since the Amendment seeks to regulate its exercise as to the particular subject with which it deals."

"While in the true sense, therefore, the [Fifteenth] Amendment gives no right of suffrage, it was long ago recognized that in operation its prohibition might measurably have that effect."

"We seek in vain for any ground which would sustain any other interpretation but that the provision … [makes the date of 1866] the basis of the right to suffrage conferred in direct and positive disregard of the 15th Amendment."

Supreme Court allowed the Democratic Party to limit primary voting to whites and ignored the connection of the party to the state. It was not until 1944 that the white primary was finally struck down. Thus, the court's decision here to consider the literacy test in the abstract is not surprising.

In Guinn v. United States, the literacy test used in Oklahoma was directly intertwined with the state's grandfather clause, and so the question was whether the grandfather clause could be struck down while allowing the literacy test to still operate. Justice White states that, in general, the Court would rely on state court decisions in areas like this, but he also points out that no such decision had yet been made. He asks what the impact of the decision already announced striking down the grandfather clause would be on the literacy test. The Court holds that the statute contradicted itself once the grandfather clause was removed, as without the grandfather clause all people would be subjected to the literacy test, which was the exact opposite of the stated goal of the legislation. The stated goal of the legislation was to limit the number of people who had to take the literacy test, and the elimination of the grandfather clause would have once again forced everyone to take the literacy test. Thus, since the legislation, as necessarily amended by the Supreme Court decision, contradicted itself, it must be struck down as a whole, even though literacy tests generally would be allowed.

Literacy tests were used to deprive African Americans of their right to suffrage through the early 1960s, as were comprehension tests covering the federal and state constitutions. Employed unfairly and disproportionately against blacks but rarely given to whites, these tests swayed the results of elections for decades. A half century after the 1915 decision in Guinn v. United States, the Voting Rights Act of 1965 did away with impediments to voting by allowing the federal government to appoint registrars in any state where a significant racial disparity in voting registration existed. After the passage of this law, millions more African Americans registered to vote. In 1915, though, such advances were still fifty years in the future.

At the end of his opinion, Justice White addresses an objection made by the defendants to the charge made against them in court. This argument basically states that since the charge had presumed that the suffrage amendment to the Oklahoma constitution was unconstitutional, it should be thrown out because it had presumed their guilt. However, the Supreme Court replies that since the Fifteenth Amendment was self-executing and clearly in conflict with the suffrage amendment to the Oklahoma constitution, the charge would be allowed. The final complaint was against a conspiracy statute under which the men were arrested. However, that same day the U.S. Supreme Court had upheld the same statute in another case dealing with Oklahoma one concerning election officials who refused to count the votes cast by African Americans. The officials were convicted, and the conviction was upheld, which in turn meant that the statute was acceptable; therefore, the conviction of the defendants in the Guinn case was also upheld. It should be noted that the aforementioned cases involving Oklahoma election officials were rooted somewhat in political considerations. The Republican Party was losing political ground, so party officials pushed for the thorough investigation of alleged voting rights abuses. By the end of the nineteenth century, the Republican Party had practically died out throughout the South; the adoption of new constitutions by some southern states around 1900 compounded the party's woes and proved that their concern was not an idle one. Whether motivated by the fear of the party's demise or by a real concern for the rights of those not being allowed to vote, the Republican Party's escalation of suffrage cases to the U.S. Supreme Court was a necessary step in black enfranchisement.

Audience

There are several different audiences for this Supreme Court decision, the most obvious being the parties involved: the U.S. government and the two Oklahoma election officials named in the case, Frank Guinn and J. J. Beal, who had been convicted of civil rights violations. A broader audience was the South as a whole as well as the state of Maryland, which also had a grandfather clause. The nation's black community and the lawyers and members of the NAACP (who, as noted, had filed a brief) were no doubt interested parties, and this case stands as the first twentieth-century victory for African Americans at the Supreme Court level. Historians, scholars, and students of African American culture represent a modern-day audience, one that can see how the nation took its first halting steps toward equality and how limited those steps really were.

Impact

The decision in the case of Guinn v. United States had a limited impact on black voting rights at the time it was handed down. Only a few states had such grandfather clauses, as most preferred to restrict African American suffrage more subtly. Even national leaders who supported segregation were opposed to these clauses owing to their deliberate disregard for the spirit of the law. The voters in Oklahoma were not affected by the decision; the Oklahoma state government simply adopted a law allowing all people who had voted in 1914 to vote again, along with whoever could survive a rigorous registration process that was open for only two weeks. Those states with literacy tests could breathe a sigh of relief as well, since the Supreme Court refused to challenge them directly and generally granted full rights to the state to create their own standards for suffrage, as long as they did not blatantly challenge the Fifteenth Amendment.

The more important effect was a long-term one, as the NAACP and others saw that they could win at the Supreme Court level and so continued to press cases to the highest court. Guinn also saw the first brief filed by the NAACP, which helped to validate the group's efforts. The NAACP would come to be the premier organization fighting for African Americans' rights through the court system.

Questions for Further Study

1. What is a grandfather clause as it pertains to voting rights, and how did grandfather clauses interfere with the voting rights of African Americans? What was particularly unfair about Oklahoma's grandfather clause?

2. What methods besides grandfather clauses were used to interfere with black voting rights during this era and beyond?

3. On what basis did the U.S. Supreme Court find the Oklahoma statute in question unconstitutional?

4. What was the short-term effect of the Court's decision? What, if any, was the long-term effect?

5. What role, if any, did party politics play in the events surrounding Guinn v. United States. Consider not only the Republican and Democratic parties but the Populist Party as well.

See also Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1865); Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1868); Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1870); Plessy v. Ferguson (1896); Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Further Reading

■ Books

Kotz, Nick. Judgment Days: Lyndon Baines Johnson, Martin Luther King, Jr., and the Laws That Changed America. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 2005.

Pratt, Walter F., Jr. The Supreme Court under Edward Douglass White, 1910 1921. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1999.

Rush, Mark E., ed. Voting Rights and Redistricting in the United States. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 1998.

Shoemaker, Rebecca S. The White Court: Justices, Rulings, and Legacy. Santa Barbara, Calif.: ABC-CLIO, 2004.

Valley, Richard M. The Two Reconstructions: The Struggle for Black Enfranchisement. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2004.

Zelden, Charles. Voting Rights on Trial. Indianapolis, Ind.: Hackett, 2004.

Scott A. Merriman

Document Text

GUINN V. UNITED STATES

Syllabus

The so-called Grandfather Clause of the amendment to the constitution of Oklahoma of 1910 is void because it violates the Fifteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The Grandfather Clause being unconstitutional, and not being separable from the remainder of the amendment to the constitution of Oklahoma of 1910, that amendment as a whole is invalid.

The Fifteenth Amendment does not, in a general sense, take from the States the power over suffrage possessed by the States from the beginning, but it does restrict the power of the United States or the States to abridge or deny the right of a citizen of the United States to vote on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude. While the Fifteenth Amendment gives no right of suffrage, as its command is self-executing, rights of suffrage may be enjoyed by reason of the striking out of discriminations against the exercise of the right.

A provision in a state constitution recurring to conditions existing before the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment and the continuance of which conditions that amendment prohibited, and making those conditions the test of the right to the suffrage, is in conflict with, and void under, the Fifteenth Amendment.

The establishment of a literacy test for exercising the suffrage is an exercise by the State of a lawful power vested in it not subject to the supervision of the Federal courts.

Whether a provision in a suffrage statute may be valid under the Federal Constitution if it is so connected with other provisions that are invalid as to make the whole statute unconstitutional is a question of state law, but, in the absence of any decision by the state court, this court may, in a case coming from the Federal courts, determine it for itself.

The suffrage and literacy tests in the amendment of 1910 to the constitution of Oklahoma are so connected with each other that the unconstitutionality of the former renders the whole amendment invalid.

The facts, which involve the constitutionality under the Fifteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States of the suffrage amendment to the constitution of Oklahoma, known as the Grandfather Clause, and the responsibility of election officers under § 5508, Rev.Stat., and § 19 of the Penal Code for preventing people from voting who have the right to vote, are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Chief Justice White delivered the opinion of the court

This case is before us on a certificate drawn by the court below as the basis of two questions which are submitted for our solution in order to enable the court correctly to decide issues in a case which it has under consideration. Those issues arose from an indictment and conviction of certain election officers of the State of Oklahoma (the plaintiffs in error) of the crime of having conspired unlawfully, willfully and fraudulently to deprive certain negro citizens, on account of their race and color, of a right to vote at a general election held in that State in 1910, they being entitled to vote under the state law and which right was secured to them by the Fifteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The prosecution was directly concerned with §5508, Rev.Stat., now §19 of the Penal Code which is as follows:

"If two or more persons conspire to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen in the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States, or because of his having so exercised the same, or if two or more persons go in disguise on the highway, or on the premises of another, with intent to prevent or hinder his free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege so secured, they shall be fined not more than five thousand dollars and imprisoned not more than ten years, and shall, moreover, be thereafter ineligible to any office or place of honor, profit, or trust created by the Constitution or laws of the United States."

We concentrate and state from the certificate only matters which we deem essential to dispose of the questions asked.

Suffrage in Oklahoma was regulated by §1, Article III of the Constitution under which the State was admitted into the Union. Shortly after the admission, there was submitted an amendment to the Constitution making a radical change in that article which was adopted prior to November 8, 1910. At an election for members of Congress which followed the adoption of this Amendment, certain election officers, in enforcing its provisions, refused to allow certain negro citizens to vote who were clearly entitled to vote under the provision of the Constitution under which the State was admitted, that is, before the amendment, and who, it is equally clear, were not entitled to vote under the provision of the suffrage amendment if that amendment governed. The persons so excluded based their claim of right to vote upon the original Constitution and upon the assertion that the suffrage amendment was void because in conflict with the prohibitions of the Fifteenth Amendment, and therefore afforded no basis for denying them the right guaranteed and protected by that Amendment. And upon the assumption that this claim was justified and that the election officers had violated the Fifteenth Amendment in denying the right to vote, this prosecution, as we have said, was commenced. At the trial, the court instructed that, by the Fifteenth Amendment, the States were prohibited from discriminating as to suffrage because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and that Congress, in pursuance of the authority which was conferred upon it by the very terms of the Amendment to enforce its provisions, had enacted the following (Rev.Stat., §2004):

"All citizens of the United States who are otherwise qualified by law to vote at any election by the people of any State, Territory, district, … municipality, … or other territorial subdivision, shall be entitled and allowed to vote at all such elections, without distinction of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; any constitution, law, custom, usage, or regulation of any State or Territory, or by or under its authority to the contrary notwithstanding."

It then instructed as follows:

"The State amendment which imposes the test of reading and writing any section of the State constitution as a condition to voting to persons not on or prior to January 1, 1866, entitled to vote under some form of government, or then resident in some foreign nation, or a lineal descendant of such person, is not valid, but you may consider it insofar as it was in good faith relied and acted upon by the defendants in ascertaining their intent and motive. If you believe from the evidence that the defendants formed a common design and cooperated in denying the colored voters of Union Township precinct, or any of them, entitled to vote, the privilege of voting, but this was due to a mistaken belief sincerely entertained by the defendants as to the qualifications of the voters that is, if the motive actuating the defendants was honest, and they simply erred in the conception of their duty then the criminal intent requisite to their guilt is wanting, and they cannot be convicted. On the other hand, if they knew or believed these colored persons were entitled to vote, and their purpose was to unfairly and fraudulently deny the right of suffrage to them, or any of them entitled thereto, on account of their race and color, then their purpose was a corrupt one, and they cannot be shielded by their official positions."

The questions which the court below asks are these:

"1. Was the amendment to the constitution of Oklahoma, heretofore set forth, valid?"

"2. Was that amendment void insofar as it attempted to debar from the right or privilege of voting for a qualified candidate for a Member of Congress in Oklahoma, unless they were able to read and write any section of the constitution of Oklahoma, negro citizens of the United States who were otherwise qualified to vote for a qualified candidate for a Member of Congress in that State, but who were not, and none of whose lineal ancestors was entitled to vote under any form of government on January 1, 1866, or at any time prior thereto, because they were then slaves?"

As these questions obviously relate to the provisions concerning suffrage in the original constitution and the amendment to those provisions which forms the basis of the controversy, we state the text of both. The original clause, so far as material, was this:

"The qualified electors of the State shall be male citizens of the United States, male citizens of the State, and male persons of Indian descent native of the United States, who are over the age of twenty-one years, who have resided in the State one year, in the county six months, and in the election precinct thirty days, next preceding the election at which any such elector offers to vote."

And this is the amendment:

"No person shall be registered as an elector of this State or be allowed to vote in any election herein, unless he be able to read and write any section of the constitution of the State of Oklahoma; but no person who was, on January 1, 1866, or at any time prior thereto, entitled to vote under any form of government, or who at that time resided in some foreign nation, and no lineal descendant of such person, shall be denied the right to register and vote because of his inability to so read and write sections of such constitution. Precinct election inspectors having in charge the registration of electors shall enforce the provisions of this section at the time of registration, provided registration be required. Should registration be dispensed with, the provisions of this section shall be enforced by the precinct election officer when electors apply for ballots to vote."

Document Text

Considering the questions in the right of the text of the suffrage amendment, it is apparent that they are two-fold, because of the two-fold character of the provisions as to suffrage which the amendment contains. The first question is concerned with that provision of the amendment which fixes a standard by which the right to vote is given upon conditions existing on January 1, 1866, and relieves those coming within that standard from the standard based on a literacy test which is established by the other provision of the amendment. The second question asks as to the validity of the literacy test and how far, if intrinsically valid, it would continue to exist and be operative in the event the standard based upon January 1, 1866, should be held to be illegal as violative of the Fifteenth Amendment.

To avoid that which is unnecessary, let us at once consider and sift the propositions of the United States, on the one hand, and of the plaintiffs in error, on the other, in order to reach with precision the real and final question to be considered. The United States insists that the provision of the amendment which fixes a standard based upon January 1, 1866, is repugnant to the prohibitions of the Fifteenth Amendment because, in substance and effect, that provision, if not an express, is certainly an open, repudiation of the Fifteenth Amendment, and hence the provision in question was stricken with nullity in its inception by the self-operative force of the Amendment, and, as the result of the same power, was at all subsequent times devoid of any vitality whatever.

For the plaintiffs in error, on the other hand, it is said the States have the power to fix standards for suffrage, and that power was not taken away by the Fifteenth Amendment, but only limited to the extent of the prohibitions which that Amendment established. This being true, as the standard fixed does not in terms make any discrimination on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, since all, whether negro or white, who come within its requirements enjoy the privilege of voting, there is no ground upon which to rest the contention that the provision violates the Fifteenth Amendment. This, it is insisted, must be the case unless it is intended to expressly deny the State's right to provide a standard for suffrage, or, what is equivalent thereto, to assert: a, that the judgment of the State exercised in the exertion of that power is subject to Federal judicial review or supervision, or b, that it may be questioned and be brought within the prohibitions of the Amendment by attributing to the legislative authority an occult motive to violate the Amendment or by assuming that an exercise of the otherwise lawful power may be invalidated because of conclusions concerning its operation in practical execution and resulting discrimination arising therefrom, albeit such discrimination was not expressed in the standard fixed or fairly to be implied, but simply arose from inequalities naturally inhering in those who must come within the standard in order to enjoy the right to vote.

On the other hand, the United States denies the relevancy of these contentions. It says state power to provide for suffrage is not disputed, although, of course, the authority of the Fifteenth Amendment and the limit on that power which it imposes is insisted upon. Hence, no assertion denying the right of a State to exert judgment and discretion in fixing the qualification of suffrage is advanced, and no right to question the motive of the State in establishing a standard as to such subjects under such circumstances or to review or supervise the same is relied upon, and no power to destroy an otherwise valid exertion of authority upon the mere ultimate operation of the power exercised is asserted. And, applying these principles to the very case in hand, the argument of the Government, in substance, says: no question is raised by the Government concerning the validity of the literacy test provided for in the amendment under consideration as an independent standard, since the conclusion is plain that that test rests on the exercise of state judgment, and therefore cannot be here assailed either by disregarding the State's power to judge on the subject or by testing its motive in enacting the provision. The real question involved, so the argument of the Government insists, is the repugnancy of the standard which the amendment makes, based upon the conditions existing on January 1, 1866, because, on its face and inherently, considering the substance of things, that standard is a mere denial of the restrictions imposed by the prohibitions of the Fifteenth Amendment, and by necessary result, recreates and perpetuates the very conditions which the Amendment was intended to destroy.

From this, it is urged that no legitimate discretion could have entered into the fixing of such standard which involved only the determination to directly set at naught or by indirection avoid the commands of the Amendment. And it is insisted that nothing contrary to these propositions is involved in the contention of the Government that, if the standard which the suffrage amendment fixes based upon the conditions existing on January 1, 1866, be found to be void for the reasons urged, the other and literacy test is also void, since that contention rests not upon any assertion on the part of the Government of any abstract repugnancy of the literacy test to the prohibitions of the Fifteenth Amendment, but upon the relation between that test and the other as formulated in the suffrage amendment, and the inevitable result which it is deemed must follow from holding it to be void if the other is so declared to be.

Looking comprehensively at these contentions of the parties, it plainly results that the conflict between them is much narrower than it would seem to be because the premise which the arguments of the plaintiffs in error attribute to the propositions of the United States is by it denied. On the very face of things, it is clear that the United States disclaims the gloss put upon its contentions by limiting them to the propositions which we have hitherto pointed out, since it rests the contentions which it makes as to the assailed provision of the suffrage amendment solely upon the ground that it involves an unmistakable, although it may be a somewhat disguised, refusal to give effect to the prohibitions of the Fifteenth Amendment by creating a standard which it is repeated, but calls to life the very conditions which that Amendment was adopted to destroy and which it had destroyed.

The questions then are: (1) giving to the propositions of the Government the interpretation which the Government puts upon them and assuming that the suffrage provision has the significance which the Government assumes it to have, is that provision, as a matter of law, repugnant to the Fifteenth Amendment? which leads us, of course, to consider the operation and effect of the Fifteenth Amendment. (2) If yes, has the assailed amendment, insofar as it fixes a standard for voting as of January 1, 1866, the meaning which the Government attributes to it? which leads us to analyze and interpret that provision of the amendment. (3) If the investigation as to the two prior subjects establishes that the standard fixed as of January 1, 1866, is void, what, if any, effect does that conclusion have upon the literacy standard otherwise established by the amendment? which involves determining whether that standard, if legal, may survive the recognition of the fact that the other or 1866 standard has not, and never had, any legal existence. Let us consider these subjects under separate headings.

1. The operation and effect of the Fifteenth Amendment. This is its text:

"Section 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

"Section 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

(a) Beyond doubt, the Amendment does not take away from the state governments in a general sense the power over suffrage which has belonged to those governments from the beginning, and without the possession of which power the whole fabric upon which the division of state and national authority under the Constitution and the organization of both governments rest would be without support and both the authority of the nation and the State would fall to the ground. In fact, the very command of the Amendment recognizes the possession of the general power by the State, since the Amendment seeks to regulate its exercise as to the particular subject with which it deals.

(b) But it is equally beyond the possibility of question that the Amendment, in express terms, restricts the power of the United States or the States to abridge or deny the right of a citizen of the United States to vote on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude. The restriction is coincident with the power, and prevents its exertion in disregard of the command of the Amendment.

But, while this is true, it is true also that the Amendment does not change, modify or deprive the States of their full power as to suffrage except, of course, as to the subject with which the Amendment deals and to the extent that obedience to its command is necessary. Thus, the authority over suffrage which the States possess and the limitation which the Amendment imposes are coordinate, and one may not destroy the other without bringing about the destruction of both.

(c) While, in the true sense, therefore, the Amendment gives no right of suffrage, it was long ago recognized that, in operation, its prohibition might measurably have that effect; that is to say, that, as the command of the Amendment was self-executing and reached without legislative action the conditions of discrimination against which it was aimed, the result might arise that as a consequence of the striking down of a discriminating clause a right of suffrage would be enjoyed by reason of the generic character of the provision which would remain after the discrimination was stricken out. Ex parte Yarbrough; Neal v. Delaware. A familiar illustration of this doctrine resulted from the effect of the adoption of the Amendment on state constitutions in which, at the time of the adoption of the Amendment, the right of suffrage was conferred on all white male citizens, since, by the inherent power of the Amendment, the word white disappeared, and therefore all male citizens, without discrimination on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude, came under the generic grant of suffrage made by the State.

Document Text

With these principles before us, how can there be room for any serious dispute concerning the repugnancy of the standard based upon January 1, 1866 (a date which preceded the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment), if the suffrage provision fixing that standard is susceptible of the significance which the Government attributes to it? Indeed, there seems no escape from the conclusion that to hold that there was even possibility for dispute on the subject would be but to declare that the Fifteenth Amendment not only had not the self-executing power which it has been recognized to have from the beginning, but that its provisions were wholly inoperative, because susceptible of being rendered inapplicable by mere forms of expression embodying no exercise of judgment and resting upon no discernible reason other than the purpose to disregard the prohibitions of the Amendment by creating a standard of voting which on its face was, in substance, but a revitalization of conditions which, when they prevailed in the past, had been destroyed by the self-operative force of the Amendment.

2. The standard of January 1, 1866, fixed in the suffrage amendment and its significance.

The inquiry, of course, here is, does the amendment as to the particular standard which this heading embraces involve the mere refusal to comply with the commands of the Fifteenth Amendment as previously stated? This leads us for the purpose of the analysis to recur to the text of the suffrage amendment. Its opening sentence fixes the literacy standard, which is all-inclusive, since it is general in its expression and contains no word of discrimination on account of race or color or any other reason. This, however, is immediately followed by the provisions creating the standard based upon the condition existing on January 1, 1866, and carving out those coming under that standard from the inclusion in the literacy test which would have controlled them but for the exclusion thus expressly provided for. The provision is this:

"But no person who was, on January 1, 1866, or at any time prior thereto, entitled to vote under any form of government, or who at that time resided in some foreign nation, and no lineal descendant of such person, shall be denied the right to register and vote because of his inability to so read and write sections of such constitution."

We have difficulty in finding words to more clearly demonstrate the conviction we entertain that this standard has the characteristics which the Government attributes to it than does the mere statement of the text. It is true it contains no express words of an exclusion from the standard which it establishes of any person on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude prohibited by the Fifteenth Amendment, but the standard itself inherently brings that result into existence, since it is based purely upon a period of time before the enactment of the Fifteenth Amendment, and makes that period the controlling and dominant test of the right of suffrage. In other words, we seek in vain for any ground which would sustain any other interpretation but that the provision, recurring to the conditions existing before the Fifteenth Amendment was adopted and the continuance of which the Fifteenth Amendment prohibited, proposed by, in substance and effect, lifting those conditions over to a period of time after the Amendment to make them the basis of the right to suffrage conferred in direct and positive disregard of the Fifteenth Amendment. And the same result, we are of opinion, is demonstrated by considering whether it is possible to discover any basis of reason for the standard thus fixed other than the purpose above stated. We say this because we are unable to discover how, unless the prohibitions of the Fifteenth Amendment were considered, the slightest reason was afforded for basing the classification upon a period of time prior to the Fifteenth Amendment. Certainly it cannot be said that there was any peculiar necromancy in the time named which engendered attributes affecting the qualification to vote which would not exist at another and different period unless the Fifteenth Amendment was in view.

While these considerations establish that the standard fixed on the basis of the 1866 test is void, they do not enable us to reply even to the first question asked by the court below, since, to do so, we must consider the literacy standard established by the suffrage amendment and the possibility of its surviving the determination of the fact that the 1866 standard never took life, since it was void from the beginning because of the operation upon it of the prohibitions of the Fifteenth Amendment. And this brings us to the last heading:

Document Text

3. The determination of the validity of the literacy test and the possibility of its surviving the disappearance of the 1866 standard with which it is associated in the suffrage amendment.

No time need be spent on the question of the validity of the literacy test, considered alone, since, as we have seen, its establishment was but the exercise by the State of a lawful power vested in it not subject to our supervision, and, indeed, its validity is admitted. Whether this test is so connected with the other one relating to the situation on January 1, 1866, that the invalidity of the latter requires the rejection of the former, is really a question of state law, but, in the absence of any decision on the subject by the Supreme Court of the State, we must determine it for ourselves. We are of opinion that neither forms of classification nor methods of enumeration should be made the basis of striking down a provision which was independently legal, and therefore was lawfully enacted because of the removal of an illegal provision with which the legal provision or provisions may have been associated. We state what we hold to be the rule thus strongly because we are of opinion that, on a subject like the one under consideration, involving the establishment of a right whose exercise lies at the very basis of government, a much more exacting standard is required than would ordinarily obtain where the influence of the declared unconstitutionality of one provision of a statute upon another and constitutional provision is required to be fixed. Of course, rigorous as is this rule and imperative as is the duty not to violate it, it does not mean that it applies in a case where it expressly appears that a contrary conclusion must be reached if the plain letter and necessary intendment of the provision under consideration so compels, or where such a result is rendered necessary because to follow the contrary course would give rise to such an extreme and anomalous situation as would cause it to be impossible to conclude that it could have been upon any hypothesis whatever within the mind of the lawmaking power.

Does the general rule here govern, or is the case controlled by one or the other of the exceptional conditions which we have just stated, is then the remaining question to be decided. Coming to solve it, we are of opinion that, by a consideration of the text of the suffrage amendment insofar as it deals with the literacy test, and to the extent that it creates the standard based upon conditions existing on January 1, 1866, the case is taken out of the general rule and brought under the first of the exceptions stated. We say this because, in our opinion, the very language of the suffrage amendment expresses, not by implication nor by forms of classification nor by the order in which they are made, but by direct and positive language, the command that the persons embraced in the 1866 standard should not be under any conditions subjected to the literacy test, a command which would be virtually set at naught if on the obliteration of the one standard by the force of the Fifteenth Amendment the other standard should be held to continue in force.

The reasons previously stated dispose of the case and make it plain that it is our duty to answer the first question No, and the second Yes; but before we

Glossary

Ex parte	a Latin term referring to a legal proceeding in which only one party is represented
necromancy	sorcery, usually involving the dead
nullity	the condition of being void
occult	secret or hidden plaintiff in error	the plaintiff in a case on appeal, who may or may not be the plaintiff in the lower court case whose decision is being appealed self-executing	a law that does not require further legislative or court action to take effect
Syllabus	the portion of a Supreme Court decision that summarizes the key findings and rulings

Document Text

direct the entry of an order to that effect, we come briefly to dispose of an issue the consideration of which we have hitherto postponed from a desire not to break the continuity of discussion as to the general and important subject before us.

In various forms of statement not challenging the instructions given by the trial court, concretely considered, concerning the liability of the election officers for their official conduct, it is insisted that as, in connection with the instructions, the jury was charged that the suffrage amendment was unconstitutional because of its repugnancy to the Fifteenth Amendment, therefore, taken as a whole, the charge was erroneous. But we are of opinion that this contention is without merit, especially in view of the doctrine long since settled concerning the self-executing power of the Fifteenth Amendment, and of what we have held to be the nature and character of the suffrage amendment in question. The contention concerning the inapplicability of §5508, Rev.Stat., now §19 of the Penal Code, or of its repeal by implication, is fully answered by the ruling this day made in United States v. Mosley, No. 180, post.

We answer the first question, No, and the second question, Yes.

And it will be so certified.

William Pickens: "The Kind of Democracy the Negro Expects"

1918

"There should be no 'colored' wages and no 'white' wages."

Overview

"The Kind of Democracy the Negro Expects" is a speech that was first given by the activist William Pickens in 1918 and on a number of occasions in the years immediately after World War I. The entry of the United States into the World War I in April 1917 presented a number of challenges for civil rights organizations like the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). Many African Americans had little enthusiasm for the war effort. They were forced to make use of inferior, segregated facilities and subjected to the wholesale denial of their political and civil rights across most of the South, and the war at best seemed far removed from their daily concerns. At worst, the rhetoric of President Woodrow Wilson, that the conflict was a war for democracy to free oppressed peoples overseas, could be seen as little more than hypocrisy, given the way African Americans were treated at home. Moreover, America's wartime allies, such as Britain, France, and Belgium, had imposed colonial rule on nonwhite countries across Africa and Asia, with little concern or respect for the democratic rights of the indigenous peoples.

Given this environment, civil rights campaigners had to maintain a careful balance, drawing attention to the grievances of African Americans but without appearing unpatriotic. Pickens, an African American educator, civil rights activist, and future field secretary of the NAACP, attempted to reconcile these competing objectives in "The Kind of Democracy the Negro Expects." Seeking to promote black support for the war, he suggested that this backing was also conditional. In the postwar world, African Americans would expect to enjoy the same democratic rights enjoyed by other Americans, and such rights also had to be extended to other nonwhite populations around the world.

Context

At the turn of the twentieth century, the best-known African American spokesperson in the United States was Booker T. Washington. Born a slave in 1856, Washington sought to avoid confrontation with southern whites over issues of civil and political rights by arguing for economic self-help as the most effective form of racial uplift for African Americans. In 1881 he founded Tuskegee Institute in Alabama, which promoted a curriculum of industrial education with an emphasis on training in practical vocational skills, such as building and woodworking, as opposed to academic subjects like English literature or history.

Washington's philosophy reflected not just his own beliefs but also the social and racial climate of his day. The last decades of the nineteenth century and early years of the twentieth century were a time of worsening race relations in the United States, with the political disfranchisement of African Americans and segregation in almost all aspects of daily life becoming commonplace across the South. Black southerners enjoyed little protection under the law, and as late as World War I an average of one African American a week was killed by white lynch mobs in the region, often under horrifying circumstances.

Arguably, Washington achieved the best that was possible under such conditions. Even so, by the early years of the twentieth century a growing number of African Americans in the North began to question his leadership. In particular, the Massachusetts-born educator, scholar, and civil rights advocate W. E. B. Du Bois argued that Washington's program of industrial education condemned African Americans to second-class citizenship as servants and menial laborers. Instead, the most able black students needed to have access to higher education to be trained for careers in law, medicine, teaching, and other professions. Collectively such individuals would be a "talented tenth" (about one-tenth of the population), becoming the leaders of African American communities at national, state, and local levels.

In July 1905 Du Bois and a small group of like-minded individuals formed the Niagara Movement to voice their opposition to Washington. An all-black organization, the movement also sought to protest the denial of black civil and political rights in the United States. From the start, the Niagara group struggled to achieve its objectives because of internal divisions within the movement, the ambitious nature of its program, and the hostility of Washington and his allies. In 1909 the movement folded, but it was succeeded by a new biracial civil rights organization, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Supported by influential liberal whites, like the New

Time Line

1905

- July
  The Niagara Movement, an African American civil rights protest organization and forerunner of the NAACP, is formed.

1908

- August 14
  Race riots take place in Springfield, Illinois.
- September 3
  William Walling publishes an article on the riots, "The Race War in the North," and calls for a new biracial organization to address America's racial problems.

1909

- February 12
  The National Negro Committee, forerunner of the NAACP, is formed in New York City in response to Walling's call.

1910

- May 30
  The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People is chosen as the name for the new organization.

1910–1930

- During this period, known as the Great Migration, 1.25 million African Americans leave the South, mostly to seek employment in cities of the North, like Chicago, Detroit, New York, and Pittsburgh.

1912

- November
  Woodrow Wilson is elected president of the United States.

1914

- August
  World War I breaks out.

1915

- November
  Booker T. Washington, the most influential African American spokesperson in the United States since the death of Frederick Douglass in 1895, dies.

York newspaper proprietor Oswald Garrison Villard, the association grew steadily over the next decade. This growth reflected the fact that by this time increasing numbers of African Americans had begun to see Washington's leadership as outdated and overly accommodating to the views of white southerners.

World War I (1914 1918) brought further evidence of this mood of increased black assertiveness, a climate that can be attributed to a number of factors. The death of Booker T. Washington in 1915 resulted in the breakup of his network of advisers and supporters known as the Tuskegee Machine. In 1916 the Amenia Conference, held to reconcile Tuskegee supporters with the NAACP, led a number of Washington's allies to join the association. The years from 1910 to 1930 saw the onset and development of what became known as the Great Migration. During this time, some 1.25 million African Americans left the South for the factories of the North, to take advantage of employment opportunities created by the effective end to immigration from Europe in the war years. The migration can also be seen as a sign of generational change, as younger African Americans, further removed from slavery, sought to escape the repressive living conditions of the South in favor of the comparatively more enlightened pattern of race relations that existed in the North.

The war also prompted greater awareness by African Americans of the importance of racial issues in an international context. More than four hundred thousand black Americans enlisted in the U.S. armed forces during the war, many of whom served overseas, mostly in France. Du Bois played a leading role in the organization of four Pan-African Congresses in 1919, 1921, 1923, and 1927. The congress movement sought to work with European imperial powers to improve the economic and political rights of colonial peoples. More controversially, the Universal Negro Improvement Association of Marcus Garvey campaigned for the establishment of an independent black state in Africa, with the implicit threat of the use of force to expel European colonial powers from the continent if necessary. First organized in the United States in 1917, the Universal Negro Improvement Association rapidly gathered support in African American communities, achieving a following of around a million at its peak in the early 1920s, as well as establishing branches in Africa, Latin America, and the Caribbean.

About the Author

William Pickens was born in Anderson County, South Carolina, on January 5, 1881. Both his parents were former slaves. From 1899 to 1902 he attended Talladega College, an African American educational institution in Alabama run by the American Missionary Association. The predominantly white faculty at Talladega sought to instill Christian values in students and trained them to be leaders in racial uplift in the black community. After going on to study the classics at Yale University from 1902 to 1904, Pickens returned to Talladega to take up a teaching post. At this stage he supported the teachings of Booker T. Washington.

In July 1905 the formation of the Niagara Movement reflected growing opposition to Washington's program by some members of the African American community, particularly in the North. Although he never joined the movement, Pickens was increasingly drawn to the ideas put forward by the new radicals. In doing so, he incurred the displeasure of Washington. The influence of the latter, combined with Pickens's mounting disagreements with what he saw as the excessive paternalism of some white teachers at Talladega, led to his being dismissed from Talladega in 1914.

In June 1915 Pickens secured a position as dean at Morgan College, a Methodist Episcopal Church run school for African Americans in Baltimore. There he became increasingly associated with the NAACP, the biracial civil rights organization that succeeded the Niagara Movement in 1909. In these years Pickens developed a growing reputation as a speaker on civil rights issues. He first delivered "The Kind of Democracy the Negro Expects" in 1918 and gave the speech again on a number of occasions in the early postwar years."

In 1920 Pickens left Morgan to take up a post first as assistant field secretary and later as full field secretary in the NAACP, with responsibility for maintaining and expanding the association's membership. His oratorical skills made him well suited to this position. At the same time, he experienced ongoing difficulties in his relationship with the NAACP's board of directors. He felt he was underpaid and the importance of his work undervalued. This contributed to his briefly considering taking a position with the rival Universal Negro Improvement Association of Marcus Garvey.

Such tensions notwithstanding, Pickens remained with the NAACP until April 1941, when he accepted a temporary position in the U.S. Treasury Department to promote the sale of government bonds to African Americans during World War II. He never returned to the NAACP. Pickens's personal differences with the association's national secretary, Walter White, together with his disagreement with the association's opposition to the establishment of a segregated air base for African American pilots at Tuskegee, Alabama, led the board of directors to terminate his employment with the NAACP in June 1942. Pickens remained with the Treasury Department until his retirement in December 1950. He was buried at sea on April 6, 1954, after suffering a fatal heart attack returning from a holiday cruise to Latin America and the Caribbean on the SS Mauritania.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

In this speech Pickens seeks to explain what African Americans, who had collectively fought for the United States in World War I, had come to expect in a democratic society. In the introduction he considers the term democracy and notes that it can mean different things to different groups and individuals. The main body of the speech is divided into five sections: "Democracy in Education," "Democracy in

Time Line

1916

- November
  Wilson is reelected as president.

1917

- April 6
  The United States enters World War I.
- May
  A segregated African American officer training camp is established in Des Moines, Iowa.
- October 5
  Emmett J. Scott, former personal secretary to Booker T. Washington, is appointed as special assistant to the secretary of war, to advise on race-related issues.

1918

- Pickens first delivers his speech "The Kind of Democracy the Negro Expects."
- July
  W. E. B. Du Bois, NAACP director of publicity and research, publishes "Close Ranks," an editorial in the association journal, The Crisis, calling on African Americans to support the U.S. war effort.
- November 11
  World War I ends.

1919

- May
  Du Bois publishes "Returning Soldiers," an editorial in The Crisis, urging African American servicemen returning home from Europe to fight racism in the United States as vigorously as they had fought imperialism abroad.
- June–December
  A series of race riots, dubbed the Red Summer by NAACP field secretary James Weldon Johnson, takes place in some twenty-five cities across the United States.

1920

- August 26
  Certification of the Nineteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution gives equal voting rights to women.

Industry," "Democracy in State," "Democracy without Sexpreferment," and "Democracy in Church." In two concluding paragraphs he discusses the contradictions between democracy and racial segregation and the need to view the "Negro question" in the American South in a global context.

◆ Introduction

Pickens reflects on the widespread use of the term democracy in the first paragraph. He notes that "by the extraordinary weight of the presidency of the United States many undemocratic people have had this word forced upon their lips." This is a reference to the stated war aims of President Woodrow Wilson. In his war message to Congress in April 1917, Wilson asked the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives to support his call for a declaration of war against Germany and its allies. He used idealistic language to justify this request. The conflict would be more than just a military struggle. It would bring about a new world order based on peace, freedom, and democracy. He frequently repeated such claims during both the course of the war and the negotiations for the Versailles peace settlement in 1919.

The "undemocratic people" who "have not yet had the right ideal forced upon their hearts" might at first sight be taken as a reference to the governments of Germany and its recently defeated military allies. However, Pickens makes clear that this description also applies to groups and individuals closer to home, referring to an American woman whom he recently heard expressing "alarm" at the thought that democracy might mean that "colored women would have the right to take any vacant seat or space on a street car." Such a person is someone who "believes in a democracy of me-and-my kind, which is no democracy." The phrase of me-and-my kind can be seen as a critical observation by Pickens on the campaign for the passage of the Nineteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution in 1919 1920, giving women equal voting rights. Some supporters of the amendment argued for white women to be given the vote, while ignoring the rights of their African American counterparts.

This kind of conduct is not only inconsistent but is indeed similar to the values of the German aristocracy, the "Prussian junker" who "has no doubt that he and the other junkers should be free and equal" but denies these rights to others. Pickens thus restates his earlier suggestion that Americans who oppose democratic rights for African Americans at home are no better than the autocratic German regime that the United States has been striving to overthrow.

In a short second paragraph, Pickens reminds his listeners of the loyal support of African Americans for the war effort by referring to the kind of democracy "he is fighting for." This language also conveys the idea that the African American struggle for democracy within the United States is comparable to the struggle for democracy overseas in the war against Germany.

◆ "First: Democracy in Education"

In his first point, Pickens highlights the importance of "equal right and opportunity" in education for all. These rights are the "foundation stones of democracy." "How can we ever hope for democracy," he argues, "if men are artificially differentiated at the beginning, if we try to educate a 'working class' and a 'ruling class,' forcing different race groups into different lines without regard to individual fitness?" This can be seen as a criticism of the industrial education movement associated with Booker T. Washington. At Tuskegee Institute in Alabama, Washington promoted the teaching of practical skills and trades, such as carpentry and bricklaying for male students and cookery and sewing for women. This contrasted with the teaching of traditional academic subjects, such as languages and the humanities, as was practiced at other institutions, like Talladega College, Alabama, attended by Pickens himself. Washington believed industrial education provided the majority of African Americans with the immediate vocational skills they needed to prosper in life. However, this viewpoint was criticized by Pickens and others for neglecting the need to train black students for careers in higher professions, such as law and medicine.

◆ "Second: Democracy in Industry"

Pickens then turns his attention to industry. From around 1910 onward, increasing numbers of African Americans left the South as part of the Great Migration to take advantage of employment opportunities in the factories of the North. Before the war such options had been severely limited because of racial prejudice on the part of both employers and trade unions and competition from large-scale immigration from southern and eastern Europe. Where African Americans were able to get factory jobs, it was often only as strikebreakers or at lower rates of pay than those of white workers. Pickens's comments in this section reflect his concern that such practices must not be allowed to return now that the war is over: "There should be no 'colored' wages and no 'white' wages; no 'man's' wage and no 'woman's' wage."

He argues that the right to equal employment opportunities is not just a matter of fairness but also is in the national interest: "For every man to serve where he is most able to serve is public economy and is to the best interest of the state." He cites Mississippi as an example of a region where this right does not exist. In the Magnolia State, "a caste system" holds African Americans, "the majority of the population," in the "triple chains of ignorance, semi-serfdom and poverty." This is a reference to the sharecropping system, which was widely used in agriculture across the South at this time. Large landowners or planters provided tenant farmers, or sharecroppers, with land for cultivation, together with food and accommodation throughout the year until their crops, usually cotton, were harvested and sold. In theory, landlord and tenant then shared the profits realized. In reality, the high markup and interest rates charged by planters for goods and services meant that tenants typically received little or no reward. In many instances they were compelled to enter into further sharecropping agreements with planters for the following year, in a vain attempt to pay off debts they still owed. Over time this meant that share-croppers, for the most part African Americans but also including poor whites, became trapped in peonage, or "semi-serfdom" of the kind that Pickens describes.

African American infantry unit marching northwest of Verdun, France, in World War I (Library of Congress)

Pickens suggests that such unjust labor practices damage the economic well-being of the United States. If allowed to prevail throughout the country, these practices would result in the nation's being either "the unwilling prey or the golden goose for the Prussian." He thus implies that the actions of southern planters are not only unjust but also unpatriotic. Similarly, the personal fortunes amassed by wealthy industrialists in the North at the expense of low-paid workers is a form of "industrial junkerism," comparable to the excesses of the Prussian aristocracy.

◆ "Third: Democracy in State"

Here Pickens links the civil rights struggle of African Americans in the United States with that of colonial populations around the world. Equality before the law is "as much for South Africa as for South Carolina." In this section's second paragraph he argues that the denial of civil and political equality is not only wrong but also encourages "other evils," for "discriminating laws are the mother of the mob spirit." This is an obvious reference to the practice of lynching, the unlawful killing of a person by parties unknown. For much of the nineteenth century, lynching was associated with a form of rough justice meted out on the western frontier. From the 1880s onward, it became a crime increasingly confined to the southern states, with the large majority of lynch victims being African Americans.

On July 26, 1918, President Wilson publicly spoke out against "mob actions." At the same time he presided over the spread of segregation in the federal government bureaucracy and the introduction of new measures that required civil service applicants to provide information on their racial ancestry. During Wilson's two terms of office, from 1913 to1921, there was a marked fall in the number of African Americans employed by the civil service. Pickens observes that "if being a Negro unfits a man for holding a government office for which he is otherwise fit," then in the eyes of "an ignorant white man in Tennessee" it also "unfits the same man for claiming a 'white man's' chance in the courts." In making this observation, he tacitly accuses

Essential Quotes

"There should be no 'colored' wages and no 'white' wages; no 'man's' wage and no 'woman's' wage."

("Second: Democracy in Industry")

"The Negro cannot consistently oppose color discrimination and support sex discrimination in democratic government."

("Fourth: Democracy without Sex-preferment")

"Like many other questions our domestic race question, instead of being settled by Mississippi and South Carolina, will now seek its settlement largely on the battlefields of Europe."

("Finally")

the Wilson administration of hypocrisy by suggesting that there is a link between this trend and the persistence of lynching, or "mob actions," in the South.

◆ "Fourth: Democracy without Sex-preferment"

Pickens next declares his support for women's rights, noting that "the Negro cannot consistently oppose color discrimination and support sex discrimination in democratic government." He cites the example of the nineteenth-century African American leader Frederick Douglass. A former slave, Douglass consistently campaigned both for the abolition of slavery and in support of women's rights.

Pursuing a by now familiar theme, Pickens continues to link the African American civil rights struggle with high-profile democratic causes of the day. He thus concludes that "the argument against the participation of colored men and of women in self-government is practically one argument." By logical implication, campaigners who favor equal voting rights for women must also support political equality for African Americans.

◆ "Fifth: Democracy in Church"

Turning to religion, Pickens warns that the Christian church is "no place for the caste spirit or for snobs." This concern reflects Pickens's own life experience as both a student and a teacher in church-funded schools and colleges for African Americans. During his time as a teacher at Talladega College, Alabama, he supported a 1914 strike by African American students against the perceived patronizing attitudes of some white teachers employed by the American Missionary Association. Referring to church missionary work overseas, he implicitly questions the ability of the American churches to win new nonwhite converts when their congregations at home are segregated along racial lines. Simply put, "colored races the world over will have even more doubt in the future than they have had in the past of the real Christianity of any church which holds out to them the prospect of being united in heaven after being separated on earth."

◆ "Finally"

In a concluding section, Pickens develops his attack on racial segregation, or "Jim-Crowing." Held to be lawful under the Constitution by the U.S. Supreme Court in the 1896 landmark ruling of Plessy v. Ferguson, by this time the use of segregated facilities in public transport and accommodations was widespread across the South. The wartime influx of African American migrants prompted the further spread of segregationist practices to cities of the North.

In the final paragraph Pickens reminds his audience of the patriotism of African Americans during the war. He also returns to the theme of internationalism that runs throughout the speech, arguing that the "Negro question" in the southern United States is part of a wider "world question."

Audience

The speech was intended to simultaneously convey a variety of messages to different audiences. In addressing African Americans, Pickens sought to promote patriotic support for the nation's war effort by stressing that this support was conditional on more respect for the democratic rights of African Americans, and of nonwhite peoples globally, when the conflict ended. With respect to the Wilson administration, the speech highlighted that emphasis on democratic freedoms for oppressed peoples overseas had to be matched by greater concern for the rights of persecuted minorities at home. Speaking to whites who are working for the advancement of African Americans, Pickens aimed to point out that such endeavors had to be undertaken in a spirit of genuine equality, rather than one of patronizing condescension. For present-day audiences, the document serves as a timeless reminder to the governments and peoples of all democratic societies that involvement in any war or conflict must be undertaken in a way that is consistent with their core ideals and values.

Impact

Pickens's speech had limited impact in its day. The return to peacetime conditions at the end of 1918 saw few gains for African Americans as a result of their support for the war effort. A southerner with conservative views on race relations, Woodrow Wilson made no effort to secure greater civil and political rights for African Americans. In the South, inferior, segregated schooling continued to be the norm for African Americans until May 1954, when the U.S. Supreme Court ruled it unconstitutional in the Brown v. Board of Education decision. In the cities of the North, the growing numbers of African Americans living there as a result of the Great Migration led to increased racial tensions and the spread of segregationist practices. Although women secured equal voting rights in the United States with the passage of the Nineteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution in 1920, this advance can be attributed to factors other than the efforts of Pickens and the NAACP.

In the longer term, the speech has taken on greater significance. During World War II, from 1939 to 1945, memories of the painful experiences of World War I contributed to a greater sense of militancy in many African American communities. This new mood was encapsulated in the Double V campaign promoted by the NAACP during the war. First popularized by the African American newspaper the Pittsburgh Courier, the slogan called on black communities to fight against both Nazism abroad and racial injustice at home.

Viewed in historical perspective, the document is important as a sign of an increased assertiveness on the part of African American civil rights campaigners during and immediately after World War I. The continuing work of Pickens and other NAACP activists in the interwar years sowed the seeds for the later successes of the civil rights movement in the 1950s and 1960s. The document is also ahead of its time in depicting the campaign for black civil rights within the United States as part of the wider global struggle for independence and equality by nonwhite colonial populations.

See also Niagara Movement Declaration of Principles (1905); Plessy v. Ferguson (1896); Brown v. Board of Education (1954).

Questions for Further Study

1. Why were African Americans in general indifferent to American participation in World War I? To what extent would that same indifference arise in connection with the Vietnam War, as reflected in Stokely Carmichael's "Black Power" (1966)?

2. What impact did the Great Migration of the early twentieth century have on race relations? To what extent did the migration contribute to the social, political, and intellectual climate that gave rise to Pickens's speech?

3. Pickens tried to walk a fine line between asserting the goals of African Americans for democracy at home without appearing to be unpatriotic. Did he accomplish this goal? If so, how?

4. Pickens places emphasis on democracy in education and on equal rights for women. Compare his views on these issues with those expressed in W. E. B. Du Bois's The Souls of Black Folk (1903) and Anna Julia Cooper's "Womanhood: A Vital Element in the Regeneration and Progress of a Race" (1892).

5. Using this document in conjunction with Thomas Morris Chester's Civil War Dispatches (1864) and the events surrounding A. Philip Randolph's "Call to Negro America to March on Washington" (1941), prepare a time line of events bearing on segregation and finally integration of the U.S. armed forces.

Further Reading

Books

Avery, Sheldon. Up from Washington: William Pickens and the Negro Struggle for Equality, 1900 1954. Newark: University of Delaware Press, 1989.

Barbeau, Arthur E., and Florette Henri. The Unknown Soldiers: Black American Troops in World War I. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1974.

Ellis, Mark. Race, War, and Surveillance: African Americans and the United States Government during World War I. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2001.

Kornweibel, Theodore. "Investigate Everything": Federal Efforts to Ensure Black Loyalty during World War I. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2002.

Lewis, David L. W. E. B. Du Bois: Biography of a Race, 1868 1919. New York: Henry Holt, 1993.

Patler, Nicholas. Jim Crow and the Wilson Administration: Protesting Federal Segregation in the Early Twentieth Century. Boulder: University of Colorado Press, 2004.

Sullivan, Patricia. Lift Every Voice: The NAACP and the Making of the Civil Rights Movement. New York: New Press, 2009.

Web Sites

"African-American Soldiers in World War I: The 92nd and 93rd Divisions." National Endowment for the Humanities EDSITEment Web site.
http://edsitement.neh.gov/view_lesson_plan.asp?id=497.

Kevern J. Verney

Document Text

William Pickens: "The Kind of Democracy the Negro Expects"

Democracy is the most used term in the world today. But some of its uses are abuses. Everybody says "Democracy"! But everybody has his own definition. By the extraordinary weight of the presidency of the United States many undemocratic people have had this word forced upon their lips but have not yet had the right ideal forced upon their hearts. I have heard of one woman who wondered with alarm whether "democracy" would mean that colored women would have the right to take any vacant seat or space on a street car, even if they had paid for it. That such a question should be asked, shows how many different meanings men may attach to the one word Democracy. This woman doubtless believes in a democracy of me-and-my-kind, which is no democracy. The most autocratic and the worst caste systems could call themselves democratic by that definition. Even the Prussian junker believes in that type of democracy; he has no doubt that he and the other junkers should be free and equal in rights and privileges. Many have accepted the word Democracy merely as the current password to respectability in political thinking. The spirit of the times is demanding democracy; it is the tune of the age; it is the song to sing. But some are like that man who belonged to one of the greatest political parties: after hearing convincing arguments by the stump-speaker of the opposite party, he exclaimed: "Wa-al, that fellow has convinced my judgment, but I'll be d d if he can Change My Vote!"

It is in order, therefore, for the Negro to state clearly what he means by democracy and what he is fighting for.

First. Democracy in Education. This is fundamental. No other democracy is practicable unless all of the people have equal right and opportunity to develop according to their individual endowments. There can be no real democracy between two natural groups, if one represents the extreme of ignorance and the other the best of intelligence. The common public school and the state university should be the foundation stones of democracy. If men are artificially differentiated at the beginning, if we try to educate a "working class" and a "ruling class," forcing different race groups into different lines without regard to individual fitness, how can we ever hope for democracy in the other relations of these groups? Individuals will differ, but in democracy of education peoples living on the same soil should not be widely diverged in their training on mere racial lines. This would be illogical, since they are to be measured by the same standards of life. Of course, a group that is to live in Florida should be differently trained from a group that is to live in Alaska; but that is geography and general environment, and not color or caste. The Negro believes in democracy of education as first and fundamental: that the distinction should be made between individual talents and not between color and castes.

Second. Democracy in Industry. The right to work in any line for which the individual is best prepared, and to be paid the standard wage. This is also fundamental. In the last analysis there could be very little democracy between multi-millionaires and the abject poor. There must be a more just and fair distribution of wealth in a democracy. And certainly this is not possible unless men work at the occupations for which they are endowed and best prepared. There should be no "colored" wages and no "white" wages; no "man's" wage and no "woman's" wage. Wages should be paid for the work done, measured as much as possible by its productiveness. No door of opportunity should be closed to a man on any other ground than that of his individual unfitness. The cruelest and most undemocratic thing in the world is to require of the individual man that his whole race be fit before he can be regarded as fit for a certain privilege or responsibility. That rule, strictly applied, would exclude any man of any race from any position. For every man to serve where he is most able to serve is public economy and is to the best interest of the state. This lamentable war that was forced upon us should make that plain to the dullest of us. Suppose that, when this war broke out, our whole country had been like Mississippi (and I refer to geography unvidiously), suppose our whole country had been like Mississippi, where a caste system was holding the majority of the population in the triple chains of ignorance, semi-serfdom and poverty. Our nation would be now either the unwilling prey or the golden goose for the Prussian. The long-headed thing for any state is to let every man do his best all of the time. But some people are so short-sighted that [they] only see what is thrust against their noses. The Negro asks American labor in the name of democracy to get rid of its color caste and industrial junkerism.

Document Text

Third. Democracy in State. A political democracy in which all are equal before the laws; where there is one standard of justice, written and unwritten; where all men and women may be citizens by the same qualifications, agreed upon and specified. We believe in this as much for South Africa as for South Carolina, and we hope that our American nation will not agree with any government, ally or envy, that is willing to make a peace that will bind the Africa[n] Negro to political slavery and exploitation.

Many other evils grow out of political inequality. Discriminating laws are the mother of the mob spirit. The political philosopher in Washington, after publishing his opinion that a Negro by the fault of being a Negro is unfit to be a member of Congress, cannot expect an ignorant white man in Tennessee to believe that the same Negro is, nevertheless, fit to have a fair and impartial trial in a Tennessee court. Ignorance is too logical for that. I disagree with the premises but I agree with the reasoning of the Tennesseean: that if being a Negro unfits a man for holding a government office for which he is otherwise fit, it unfits the same man for claiming a "white man's" chance in the courts. The first move therefore against mob violence and injustice in the petty courts is to wipe out discriminating laws and practices in the higher circles of government. The ignorant man in Tennessee will not rise in ideal above the intelligent man in Washington.

Fourth. Democracy without Sex-preferment. The Negro cannot consistently oppose color discrimination and support sex discrimination in democratic government. This happened to be the opinion also of the First Man of the Negro race in America, Frederick Douglass. The handicap is nothing more nor less than a presumption in the mind of the physically dominant element of the universal inferiority of the weaker or subject element. It is so easy to prove that the man who is down and under, deserves to be down and under. In the first place, he is down there, isn't he? And that is three-fourths of the argument to the ordinary mind; for the ordinary mind does not seek ultimate causes. The argument against the participation of colored men and of women in self-government is practically one argument. Somebody spoke to the Creator about both of these classes and learned that they were "created" for inferior roles. Enfranchisement would spoil a good field-hand, or a good cook. Black men were once ignorant, women were once ignorant. Negroes had no political experience women had no such experience. The argument forgets that people do not get experience on the outside. But the American Negro expects a democracy that will accord the right to vote to a sensible industrious woman rather than to a male tramp.

Fifth. Democracy in Church. The preachings and the practices of Jesus of Nazareth are perhaps the greatest influence in the production of modern democratic ideas. The Christian church is, therefore, no place for the caste spirit or for snobs. And the colored races the world over will have even more doubt in the future than they have had in the past of the real Christianity of any church which holds out to them the prospect of being united in heaven after being separated on earth.

Finally. The great colored races will in the future not be kinder to a sham democracy than to a "scrap-of-paper" autocracy. The private home, private right

Glossary

Prussia	now part of Germany, a formerly independent kingdom with a reputation for a strong militaristic ethos
junker	a member of the Prussian aristocracy
Frederick Douglass	a prominent nineteenth-century African American author, speaker, and abolitionist
"scrap-of-paper" autocracy	probably a reference to the common notion that the Axis powers before and during World War I created governments ruled by one man by routinely invalidating treaties with other nations
Jim-Crowing	a reference to "Jim Crow," the name given to laws and social customs that kept African Americans in inferior segregated positions and private opinion must remain inviolate; but the commonwealth, the public place and public property must not be appropriated to the better use of any group by "Jim-Crowing" and segregating any other group. By the endowments of God and nature there are individual "spheres"; but there are no such widely different racial "spheres." Jesus' estimate of the individual soul is the taproot of democracy, and any system which discourages the men of any race from individual achievement, is no democracy. To fix the status of a human soul on earth according to the physical group in which it was born, is the gang spirit of the savage which protects its own members and outlaws all others.

Document Text

For real democracy the American Negro will live and die. His loyalty is always above suspicion, but his extraordinary spirit in the present war is born of his faith that on the side of his country and her allies is the best hope for such democracy. And he welcomes, too, the opportunity to lift the "Negro question" out of the narrow confines of the Southern United States and make it a world question. Like many other questions our domestic race question, instead of being settled by Mississippi and South Carolina, will now seek its settlement largely on the battlefields of Europe.

Moorfield Storey, first president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (Library of Congress)

Thirty Years of Lynching in the United States, 1889–1918

1919

"The United States has for long been the only advanced nation whose government has tolerated lynching."

Overview

The unlawful killing of a person or persons by parties unknown, lynching reputedly had its origins in the American Revolution when Charles Lynch of Bedford County, Virginia, formed a vigilante association to rid the region of Tories, or British sympathizers. For much of the nineteenth century it was seen as a form of rough justice meted out to outlaws in frontier communities in the absence of effective legal authorities. Between 1889 and 1918 at least 3,224 people were killed by lynch mobs in the United States; 2,522 were black and 702 white.

After reaching a peak in the late 1880s and early 1890s, the number of lynchings began to decline. At the same time, the lynchings became increasingly shocking in nature, with victims often subjected to prolonged torture before being put to death. One of the most horrifying of such incidents was the 1916 lynching of Jesse Washington in Texas. A mentally impaired African American teenager, Washington was mutilated and burned to death over several hours. The "Waco Horror," as it became known, prompted the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) to set up a committee to initiate an antilynching campaign. NAACP staffers were given the task of collecting details on all reported lynchings since 1889 with a view to book publication. The resulting work, Thirty Years of Lynching in the United States, 1889 1918, was intended to provide statistical and factual information to support the association's campaign.

Context

The period 1889 1918 is commonly viewed by scholars as the nadir in the history of U.S. race relations since the end of the Civil War in 1865. In the last decades of the nineteenth century, African Americans lost many of the rights they had secured in the early Reconstruction era, 1865 1877. During this time the passage of the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth amendments to the U.S. Constitution, in 1865, 1868, and 1870, respectively, had confirmed the abolition of slavery and sought to secure equal citizenship and voting rights for former slaves, or freedmen as they were known. Such safeguards proved ineffective.

By 1877 the white-dominated Democratic Party had regained political power across the South. State Republican Party administrations composed of northern whites, called "carpetbaggers"; southern white unionists, called "scalawags"; and African Americans were ousted at the polls by a combination of fraud, intimidation, and violence. Southern Democrats cited the ignorance and corruption of Republican incumbents as justification for such actions. Although there was only limited substance to such claims, successive Republican administrations from 1877 to 1885 chose not to intervene at the federal level.

Beginning in the late 1880s and early 1890s southern Democrats sought to exclude African Americans from political life on a permanent basis through the passage of new state election laws. Although the Fifteenth Amendment prevented U.S. citizens from being denied the vote on account of "race, color or previous condition of servitude," Democratic state governments found ways to get around such provisions. Instead, they passed laws requiring prospective voters to pass literacy tests or demonstrate a "good understanding" of selected passages from state constitutions. In the case of Williams v. Mississippi (1898) the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that such measures were lawful under the Constitution, as they supposedly applied to all voters. In practice, the new laws were used almost exclusively against black voters, and as a result the large majority of African Americans in the South were disfranchised until as late as the early 1960s.

In a previous ruling, Plessy v. Ferguson (1896), the Supreme Court had approved state laws requiring racial segregation. Using the concept of "separate but equal," it held that such measures did not violate the equal citizenship rights guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment. The reality was very different. The Plessy ruling effectively condemned African Americans in the South to greatly inferior facilities and services in almost every aspect of daily life, including schools, theaters, hospitals, public transportation, and even cemeteries.

By this time the economic opportunities open to African Americans in the region were also severely restricted, largely through the widespread use of the sharecropping system in southern agriculture. First introduced in the early postwar years, sharecropping was ostensibly a market compro-

Time Line

1892

- Southern Horrors: Lynch Law in All Its Phases is published by the African American antilynching campaigner Ida B. Wells. This and her later booklet, A Red Record (1895), are among the first works to draw public attention to the issue of lynching.

1908

- August 14
  Race riots in Springfield, Illinois, result in seven deaths, including the lynching of two black men.
- September 3
  William Walling publishes an article on the riots, "The Race War in the North," and calls for a new biracial organization to address America's racial problems.

1909

- February 12
  The National Negro Committee is formed in New York City in response to Walling's call.

1910

- May 30
  The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) is chosen as the name for the new organization.

1915

- D. W. Griffith's epic film The Birth of a Nation is released and enjoys extraordinary popularity. Scenes depicting an African American being put to death by the Ku Klux Klan for the attempted rape of a white woman evoke black protests. The NAACP joins a nationwide campaign to have the film banned or censored but achieves only partial success.

1916

- July
  The lynching of Jesse Washington in Texas prompts formation of an NAACP antilynching committee.

mise between freed slaves and the former slave-owning planter aristocracy. Lacking the financial resources to hire wage laborers, planters instead provided plots of land for cultivation to freedmen together with food and accommodation over the course of the year. This was on the understanding that when the crops, almost invariably cotton, were harvested, landowner and tenant would divide the proceeds. In practice, the high markups and interest rates charged by planters for the goods supplied meant that black sharecroppers were by then so deeply in debt that they received no share of the profits at all. Worse, money still owed meant they were obliged to continue working for the same landlord in the forthcoming year in a vain attempt to clear their account. By this means large numbers of black farmers in the South became trapped into a permanent system of debt peonage under which they were little better off than in their former slave condition.

The deteriorating status of African Americans was reflected in changing white racial attitudes. Although white southerners had always viewed African Americans as racially inferior, during slavery they were also widely perceived as faithful family retainers. In the early postwar years southern mythology depicted slaves as loyal protectors of the families of planters when the male members of the household were absent in the service of the Confederacy. During the 1880s and 1890s this image began to change. In southern white popular culture African Americans were increasingly depicted as less than human, even bestial in nature. Black men were portrayed as vicious sexual predators, intent on forcing their attentions on white women. This image hardened into the potent myth of the black rapist. Across the South, white communities became increasingly obsessed by the need to protect women from such a threat by any means necessary. It was in this context that a sharp rise in the number of lynchings occurred in the region in the late 1880s and early 1890s.

About the Author

The book has no single author but is rather a digest of factual information and statistical data collected by NAACP researchers on all lynchings in the United States between 1889 and 1918. One of the prime movers of this initiative was John R. Shillady, who became national secretary of the NAACP in January 1918. Born in 1875, the middle-aged Shillady was a veteran social worker and administrator when he joined the association. In addition to experience, he brought considerable energy and enthusiasm to his new job, increasing branch memberships from nine thousand to forty thousand within a year. He took particular interest in the NAACP's antilynching campaign and wrote the foreword for Thirty Years of Lynching.

Within a year of the book's publication Shillady narrowly avoided becoming a lynch victim himself. During a visit to Texas in August 1920 he was badly beaten by a white mob. Although Shillady managed to escape, he never fully recovered from the physical and mental trauma. Within months he resigned his position with the NAACP, despairing of the prospects for any meaningful advance in the nation's troubled race relations. He died in 1943. Shillady was succeeded as national secretary by James Weldon Johnson, the first African American to occupy the position on a permanent full-time basis.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

The document extract is made up of three parts: a foreword by NAACP secretary John R. Shillady; a "Summation of the Facts Disclosed in Tables," providing a brief overview of the statistical data on lynching in the United States, 1889 1918; and "The Story of One Hundred Lynchings." Not reprinted here are two appendixes: "Analysis of Number of Persons Lynched" and "Chronological List of Persons Lynched in United States 1889 to 1918, Inclusive, Arranged by States." (The various tables referred to in the pamphlet are also not reproduced.) Most of the book thus takes the form of the presentation of statistical information together with press accounts or reports by NAACP researchers on individual lynchings. There is little analytical commentary. A conscious decision was taken to present the information in this way, so as to let the facts speak for themselves.

◆ Foreword

Shillady sets out the moral case against lynching in his foreword. He notes that the United States is the only advanced modern country that tolerates the crime and stresses the need for the rule of law. Such arguments provide strong justification for the NAACP's antilynching campaign.

Shillady concentrates on the case against lynching rather than suggesting measures to solve the problem. This is because any such discussion would have raised difficult legal and political issues. Many Americans shared Shillady's views on lynching, but the NAACP's preferred solution, the passage of a federal antilynching law, was controversial. Some legislators, whose support the association needed, were reluctant to endorse such a measure. These legislators included Republican William Borah of Idaho, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. Borah believed that a federal antilynching law would be unconstitutional. Legal experts consulted by the NAACP expressed similar doubts. This view was initially shared by Moorfield Storey, the first president of the biracial association and a leading constitutional lawyer.

Although Storey ultimately overcame his misgivings and came to support such a law, others did not. Under the U.S. Constitution, murder is a state, rather than a federal, crime. A federal antilynching law could thus be seen as a violation of state sovereignty. Moreover, at this time the new medium of radio was in its infancy and the introduction of television almost three decades in the future. Many Americans perceived their national political leaders as comparatively remote figures. Before America's experience of the New Deal in the 1930s and World War II (1941 1945), there was an expectation that the federal

Time Line

1917

- July 28
  The NAACP sponsors a silent parade against lynching in New York City. Up to fifteen thousand people take part.

1918

- January
  John R. Shillady is appointed NAACP national secretary.
- April
  The Dyer bill introduced in the U.S. House of Representatives attempts to make lynching a federal crime. The NAACP makes repeated unsuccessful attempts to secure the passage of a federal antilynching law.
- July 26
  President Woodrow Wilson publicly speaks out against mob actions.

1919

- April
  Thirty Years of Lynching in the United States is published.

1920

- August 20
  John Shillady is badly beaten by a white mob in Austin, Texas, and never fully recovers.

1923

- In the case of Moore v. Dempsey the U.S. Supreme Court rules that federal courts can intervene to protect the procedural rights of defendants tried and convicted in mob-dominated areas.

1929

- Rope and Faggot: A Biography of Judge Lynch by NAACP assistant secretary Walter White is published. The book is one of the first scholarly studies on the causes of lynching.

1930

- November 1
  The Association of Southern Women for the Prevention of Lynching, headed by Jessie Daniel Ames, holds its first meeting in Atlanta, Georgia.

government would exercise only limited authority over Americans' daily lives. A federal antilynching law, in this view, would have set a dangerous precedent for the creeping centralization of political power.

Shillady is careful to avoid such issues. In the third paragraph he thus cites President Woodrow Wilson's public condemnation of mob actions as support for the NAACP's position. Significantly, however, Wilson here stresses that it is the responsibility of state governors, law-enforcement officers, and local communities to put an end to such actions. He does not endorse the idea of a federal antilynching law.

Wilson, himself a southerner, differed from members of the NAACP on race relations. One of the founding principles of the association was its opposition to racial segregation and a commitment to reversing the 1896 Plessy decision. Wilson, in contrast, believed segregation to be a positive good, as did leading members of his administration. He actually presided over the introduction of segregationist practices in the civil service during his two terms of office (1913 1921).

Although educated white southerners like Wilson opposed lynching, they did not support the passage of an antilynching law, which they feared would be but a first step toward further federal intervention to regulate the daily life of citizens in the South. Over time such actions might interfere with other established customs of the region, most notably the system of racial segregation. The Wilsonian alternative to federal action was for southern states themselves to accept responsibility for the suppression of lynching. Unfortunately, as Shillady points out, there was little evidence that this would be effective. In 1918 alone sixty-three African Americans and four whites were lynched in the United States, yet not a single member of any of the lynch mobs was convicted. In only two instances did cases even go to trial, one of which involved the lynching of a white man in the northern state of Illinois.

The principal reason for this failure to prosecute was that many white southerners tacitly supported the actions of lynch mobs. Even in cases of extreme violence, they were unwilling, as witnesses or jurors, to assist in the conviction of a white defendant for the murder of an African American. Shillady notes that lynching still has its apologists. Although they are perhaps less numerous and less vocal than in recent years, he says, they are to be found in all sections of southern society and include individuals held in the highest esteem in the community. James Vardaman, governor of Mississippi (1904 1908), had stated that "if it is necessary every Negro in the state will be lynched; it will be done to maintain white supremacy." Similarly, the renowned Atlanta newspaper publisher John Temple Graves proclaimed before a University of Chicago audience that a lynch mob was an "engine of vengeance, monstrous, lawless, deplorable, but under the uncured defects of the law the fiery terror of the criminal and the chief defense of woman."

This last comment reflects the fact that the most common justification put forward by apologists for lynchings was the need to protect white women from sexual assault by African American men. By this logic, the lynch mob was preferable to a formal trial, where the rape victim would have to relive the horror of her ordeal in court. Moreover, the time-consuming nature of the legal process meant that the conviction and hanging of a rapist was a less effective deterrent to such outrages than the summary public retribution meted out by a lynching party.

◆ Summation of the Facts Disclosed in Tables

The Summation in Thirty Years of Lynching highlights key findings from detailed statistical tables contained in the first appendix. These statistics show that in the period 1889 1918, at least 3,224 people were killed by lynch mobs in the United States, of which 2,522, or 78.2 percent, were African Americans. The footnotes (omitted here) point out that a further 181 probable victims have been excluded from this total because of the limited data available on them. This can be seen as an attempt by the authors of the document to avoid allegations of exaggeration or sensationalism. All information provided is based on verifiable fact.

Distribution of the Lynchings This section notes that most lynchings occurred in the South. The facts are presented with little comment. Readers are left to draw their own conclusions. However, this information, together with that already provided on the racial background of lynch victims, dispels any notion that lynching is predominantly a form of rough justice associated with western frontier states. Similarly, the fact that fifty lynch victims were African American women may cast some doubt on any suggestion that nearly all lynchings in the South were related to the crime of rape. The decline in the incidence of lynching from 1914 to 1918, most notably in northern and western states, reinforces the fact that it is now almost exclusively a racially motivated crime confined to the southern states.

Decrease in Lynching during Past Thirty Years This section seems designed to suggest that as of 1919, lynching is regarded as unacceptable by the vast majority of Americans and that, compared with the rest of the nation, the South is lacking in respect for the rule of law and recognition of what constitutes acceptable behavior in a civilized modern society. The numbers of Mexican lynch victims cited for Texas highlights the extent to which other nonwhite groups were vulnerable to the crime. By implication, not just African Americans but also other ethnic minorities could become a potential target for lynch mobs.

Alleged Offenses Which Appear as "Causes" for the Lynchings The statistics show that most lynchings are for alleged offenses other than rape. Moreover, even in the rape-related cases the evidence is weak. Although southern apologists for lynching, like Graves and Vardaman, are not mentioned by name, the arguments put forward by such leaders are here effectively discredited.

◆ The Story of One Hundred Lynchings

The narratives here act to counterbalance the impersonal analysis of the summation by providing details on the suffering of lynch victims. They remind readers that the numerical data on lynching represent more than just statistical information. Every lynching reported is also a personal tragedy for the victim and his or her family.

Cartoon depicting "Judge Lynch" (Library of Congress)

All cases are well documented. For the most part the information provided is in the form of accounts of lynching as reported in respected newspapers and journals. These accounts often reveal shocking details of individual lynchings. Nonetheless, with the exception of two brief introductory paragraphs that "give concreteness and make vivid the facts of lynching," they are presented without any accompanying commentary expressing horror or moral outrage. The NAACP editors are again careful to avoid any suggestions of bias or sensationalism. In any case, no additional comments are needed. The reports in themselves provide the most compelling testimony for the Association's anti-lynching campaign.

The first introductory paragraph refers to the "lynching sport." The justification for this description is borne out by the accounts that follow, which show that many lynchings clearly occurred with the approval and even active participation of much of the local white community. Lynchings were often public spectacles of entertainment, with large crowds of up to fifteen thousand in attendance (Georgia, 1899; South Carolina, 1911; Texas, 1912; Texas, 1916; Tennessee, 1917; Tennessee, 1918).

In the South Carolina lynching of Will Jackson (1911), the white mob was led by Joshua W. Ashleigh, a local member of the state legislature. Victor B. Chesire published a special edition of the local newspaper he edited, The Intelligencer, to provide coverage of the event. He admits that he "went out to see the fun without the least objection to being a party to help lynch the brute." In the 1912 lynching of Dan Davis in Texas, "the crowd jeered the dying man and uttered shocking comments suggestive of a cannibalistic spirit." Some spectators "danced and sang to testify to their enjoyment of the occasion." At the 1917 burning to death of Ell Person in Memphis, Tennessee, the fifteen thousand onlookers included "women, even little children," who "cheered as they poured the gasoline on the axe fiend and struck the match." The mob "fought and screamed and crowded to get a glimpse of him." When the victim died sooner than expected, a "complaint on all sides" went around that "they burned him too quick! They burned him too quick!"

The use of language in the reports is often matter of fact, with no expressions of disapproval or a sense that what has taken place is in any way unusual or wrong. This is despite the fact that lynchings often involved prolonged, sadistic torture. Victims were frequently burned alive and suffered physical mutilation, such as castration and the cutting off of ears, fingers, and toes (Texas, 1897; Georgia,

Essential Quotes

"The United States has for long been the only advanced nation whose government has tolerated lynching. The facts are well known to students of public affairs. It is high time that they became the common property, since they are the common shame, of all Americans."

(Foreword)

"Lynching has had, and to some degree still has, its apologists, who have alleged one or another excuse for it in given cases. But, none of the several pleas which has been made to explain or excuse it can stand the light of reason or find the slightest real justification in a nation governed by law."

(Foreword)

1899; Delaware, 1903; Mississippi, 1904; Georgia, 1904; Texas, 1912; Texas, 1916; Tennessee, 1917; Tennessee, 1918; Georgia, 1918). Neither the journalistic reports nor the crowds of onlookers at lynchings showed any compassion for the suffering of victims. The reporting of phrases such as "slowly roasting" (Tennessee, 1918) and "meat on a hot frying pan" (Tennessee, 1917) has the effect of dramatizing the dehumanization of the victims. After death, their remains were afforded no respect, with body parts being cut off and taken as souvenirs (Georgia, 1899; South Carolina, 1911; Texas, 1916; Tennessee, 1917).

Although some lynch victims stood accused of rape, or attempted rape (Texas, 1897; Georgia, 1899; Delaware, 1903; West Virginia, 1912; Texas, 1912; Texas, 1916), most were alleged to have committed other crimes. A number of these crimes were minor and even trivial offenses. In Louisiana (1901), Louis Thomas was lynched because he "stole six bottles of soda pop" and then struck his white accuser. Five years later, also in Louisiana, William Carr was hanged for "killing a white man's cow," while in 1911 in Georgia another African American was killed for "loitering in a suspicious manner."

Sometimes, lynch victims were either innocent third parties or clearly not guilty of the crimes they were alleged to have committed (Tennessee, 1901; Mississippi, 1904; West Virginia, 1912). Female victims were shown no more compassion than their male counterparts. Mary Turner (Georgia, 1918) and Alma Howze (Mississippi, 1918) were both lynched even though they were both clearly pregnant. In Oklahoma in 1911, Laura Nelson was "raped by members of the mob" before being hanged. Although the members of the lynch mobs were commonly referred to in the press as "parties unknown," it is clear that in many cases they were well-known figures in the community. Still, the account contains only one case, in North Carolina in 1918, where any members of the mob were brought to trial and convicted for their actions.

Audience

Thirty Years of Lynching was widely distributed and addressed all law-abiding Americans, in the North and in the South, in the hope that it would generate public support for the NAACP's antilynching campaign. More specifically, it was aimed at winning the support of members of the United States Senate and House of Representatives for the passage of a federal antilynching law. Within the South it sought to influence moderate political leaders and law-enforcement officers to make greater efforts to reduce the incidence of lynching and to make members of lynch mobs subject to punishment before the law. It provided accurate factual and statistical information for use by NAACP activists at the national, state, and local level and served as a counter to the propaganda disseminated by apologists for lynching.

Impact

The book failed to achieve its immediate objectives. Despite a prolonged campaign by the NAACP for most of the 1920s and 1930s, the passage of a federal antilynching law was never achieved. In the South it continued to be the exception rather than the rule for participants in lynch mobs to be brought to justice before state courts. In other respects, however, Thirty Years of Lynching was more successful. Together with the efforts of campaigning groups like the Association of Southern Women for the Prevention of Lynching, founded in 1930, and the NAACP itself, the book helped change public attitudes. By the end of the 1930s the number of lynchings had dramatically declined, and the crime was increasingly seen as unacceptable in a civilized society. At the state level, southern political leaders and law-enforcement officers made greater efforts to prevent lynchings. Although they were still unlikely to face legal sanctions, members of lynch mobs could no longer take it for granted that they would enjoy community approval for their actions.

Today documented instances of lynching in the United States are rare, but occasional cases are still reported. The perpetrators of such crimes are invariably subject to the full force of the law. In this context the NAACP book is more than just testimony to the memory and suffering of lynch victims of the past. It also serves as a reminder of the potential consequences of extralegal actions by vigilante groups in any society at any time.

See also Emancipation Proclamation (1863); Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1865); Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1868); Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution (1870); Plessy v. Ferguson (1896); Ida B. Wells-Barnett's "Lynch Law in America" (1900).

Further Reading

Books

Allen, James. Without Sanctuary: Lynching Photography in America. Santa Fe, N.M.: Twin Palms, 2000.

Bernstein, Patricia. The First Waco Horror: The Lynching of Jesse Washington and the Rise of the NAACP. College Station: Texas A&M University Press, 2005.

Brundage, William F. Lynching in the New South: Georgia and Virginia, 1880 1930. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1993.

Dray, Philip. At the Hands of Persons Unknown: The Lynching of Black America. New York: Random House, 2002.

Hall, Jacquelyn D. Revolt against Chivalry: Jessie Daniel Ames and the Women's Campaign against Lynching. New York: Columbia University Press, 1979.

Litwack, Leon F. Trouble in Mind: Black Southerners in the Age of Jim Crow. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1998.

Pfeifer, Michael J. Rough Justice: Lynching and American Society, 1874 1947. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2004.

Sullivan, Patricia. Lift Every Voice: The NAACP and the Making of the Civil Rights Movement. New York: New Press, 2009.

Tolnay, Stewart E., and E. M. Beck. A Festival of Violence: An Analysis of Southern Lynchings, 1882 1930. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1995.

Waldrep, Christopher. The Many Faces of Judge Lynch: Extralegal Violence and Punishment in America. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002.

White, Walter. Rope and Faggot: A Biography of Judge Lynch. Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 2001.

Zangrando, Robert L. The NAACP Crusade against Lynching, 1909 1950. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1980.

Kevern J. Verney

Questions for Further Study

1. Compare this document with Ida B. Wells-Barnett's "Lynch Law in America" (1900). To what extent do the two documents share similar views? How do the documents differ in the way the authors make their cases?

2. Why did many people during this era want to see Congress pass a federal antilynching bill? Why were state laws against murder regarded as inadequate to stop lynching? Why were some people simultaneously horrified by lynching and yet opposed to the passage of such a bill?

3. What conditions led to the emergence and, later, the reemergence of the Ku Klux Klan? For insight, see the entry on the Ku Klux Klan Act (1871).

4. What role did the NAACP play in the campaign against lynching, other than preparation of this document?

5. Woodrow Wilson is often regarded as a progressive president, yet he opposed passage of a federal antilynching bill. What political considerations did Wilson face that led him to take this position?

Document Text

Thirty Years of Lynching in the United States, 1889–1918

Foreword

Until the recent outbreaks in Germany, where, under revolutionary conditions, a few lynchings have taken place, the United States has for long been the only advanced nation whose government has tolerated lynching. The facts are well known to students of public affairs. It is high time that they became the common property, since they are the common shame, of all Americans.

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, within the limits of its financial resources, has been carrying on an educational and publicity campaign in the public press, through its own pamphlet publications and the columns of The Crisis, and through public meetings, to bring home to the American people their responsibility for the persistence of this monstrous blot upon America's honor. Lynching has had, and to some degree still has, its apologists, who have alleged one and another excuse for it in given cases. But, none of the several pleas which has been made to explain or excuse it can stand the light of reason or find the slightest real justification in a nation governed by law, which has found ample means to cope with lawlessness whenever and wherever the public authorities have taken seriously their oaths of office.

On July 26, 1918, when the nation was at war with the Central Powers, President Wilson appealed to "the governors of all the states, the law officers of every community and, above all, the men and women of every community in the United States, all who revere America and wish to keep her name without stain or reproach, to cooperate, not passively merely, but actively and watchfully, to make an end of this disgraceful evil," saying, "It cannot live where the community does not countenance it."

Despite President Wilson's earnest appeal, made under such extraordinary circumstances, lynchings continued during the remaining period of the war with unabated fury. Sixty-three Negroes, five of them women, and four white men fell victims to mob ruthlessness during 1918 and in no case was any member of the mobs convicted in any court and in only two instances were trials held. In both of these instances the mob members were acquitted. One case was that of the lynchers of the white man, Robert P. Praeger, in Illinois, the other that of the lynchers of a Negro, Will Bird, in Alabama.

The present publication, "Thirty Years of Lynching in the United States, 1889 1918," sums up the facts for this period. It is believed that more persons have been lynched than those whose names are given in Appendix II following. Only such cases have been included as were authenticated by such evidence as was given credence by a recognized newspaper or confirmed by a responsible investigator.

In presenting this material we have refrained from editorial comment, restricting our text to a brief summary of the facts which are more fully illustrated in the tables printed in Appendix I. In addition to the two appendices named, and to the summary of the facts disclosed in the tables, we have included a short summary of the actual happenings in the cases of one hundred persons lynched, as taken from press accounts and, in a few cases, from the reports of our own investigators. These data appear under the heading, The Story of One Hundred Lynchings.

Acknowledgment is made to Miss Martha Gruening and to Miss Helen Boardman, who assisted her, for work done in examining the files of leading newspapers and other records for a period of thirty years and in compiling data from which The Story of One Hundred Lynchings has been taken.

John R. Shillady, Secretary.

National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Summation of the Facts Disclosed in Tables

More or less accurate records of lynchings have been kept by the Chicago Tribune, Tuskegee Institute and, since 1912, The Crisis and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. These records go back to 1885. In the present study of the subject, we have confined ourselves to the story of the past thirty years, from 1889 to 1918 inclusive. During these years 3,224 persons have been killed by lynching mobs. Seven hundred and two white persons and 2,522 Negroes have been victims. Of the whites lynched, 691 have been men and 11 women; of the colored, 2,472 were men and 50 were women. For the whole period, 78.2 per cent, of the victims were Negroes and 21.8 per cent, white persons.

Distribution of the Lynchings

For the thirty years' period as a whole, the North has had 219 victims, the South, 2,834, the West, 156, and Alaska and unknown localities, 15 victims. An examination of Table No. 3 will show that the eight South Atlantic States are responsible for 862 of the total of 2,834 for the South as a whole; the four East South Central States have had 1,014 victims, and the four West South Central States 958. Georgia leads in this unholy ascendancy with 386 victims, followed closely by Mississippi with 373 victims, Texas with 335, Louisiana with 313, Alabama with 276, Arkansas with 214, Tennessee with 196, Florida with 178 and Kentucky with 169. The nine states above named are those which, for the thirty years' period, have each a percentage of the total number of lynchings in excess of five per cent.

Fifty colored women and 11 white women were lynched in 14 states. Thirteen of the 14 states in which women fell victims to mobs were Southern states, Nebraska being the only state outside the South which lynched women.…

While in all sections of the country there has been a progressive decrease in the number of lynchings at each of the five years' periods, this decrease in the North and West has far outrun the decrease in the South. The North and West together have lynched 21 persons during the last five years' period, whereas during the same time 304 persons were lynched in the South.

Georgia began the first five years' period with 61 lynchings and ended the last five years' period with exactly the same number. This number, by the way, was the lowest, with one exception, which Georgia reached during the thirty years. Alabama, on the contrary, began with 84, a number one-third greater than Georgia's, which had been reduced during the last five years' period to 19. Mississippi began with 91 for the first period and ended with 28 in the latter five years' period. Georgia and Texas alone, of all the states, have made no proportionate decrease in the number of lynchings during the thirty years' period. Texas shows an increase during the last five years over her record for three preceding five years' periods.

In considering these facts it should be borne in mind that the number of lynchings has steadily been decreasing. When, therefore. Georgia and Texas show no decrease in the former state and only a small decrease in the latter state, it means that relative to the country as a whole, lynchings have been on the increase in these two states.

Decrease in Lynching during Past Thirty Years

Table No. 8 shows the percentage of decrease in the number of persons lynched during each five years' period. Comparing the five years, 1914 1918, with the five years, 1889 1893, the table shows a decrease of 61.3 per cent, in the total number of persons lynched. The percentage of decrease in the number of whites lynched was 77.6 and of colored, 54.4. Since 1903 the number of whites lynched has been decreasing steadily. The increase for the period 1914 1918 to 61 white persons lynched is largely accounted for by the fact that in 1915, 43 whites were lynched. Twenty-seven of these were Mexicans who were lynched in the state of Texas. Many citizens of Texas look upon Mexicans in somewhat the same way as they look upon Negroes (alas for democracy), so that the lynching of this number of Mexicans would not be regarded by them in the same light as would the lynching of so many white Texans or other white citizens of the United States.

Except in 1915 and in 1909 and 1910, the number of whites lynched in any year since 1903 has been less than ten. The percentage of whites lynched in the first ten years' period of our study was 30 per cent; in the second ten years' period, 12.4 per cent, and in the third ten years' period, 15 per cent.

Alleged Offenses which Appear as "Causes" for the Lynchings

Table No. 6 sums up the known facts regarding the alleged offenses committed by the men and women lynched. It is to be remembered that the alleged offenses given are pretty loose descriptions of the crimes charged against the mob victims, where actual crime was committed. Of the whites lynched, nearly 46 per cent were accused of murder; a little more than 18 per cent were accused of what have been classified as miscellaneous crimes, i.e., all crimes not otherwise classified; 17.4 per cent were said to have committed crimes against property; 8.7 per cent crimes against the person, other than rape,

"attacks upon women," and murder; while 8.4 per cent were accused of rape and "attacks upon women."

Among colored victims, 35.8 per cent were accused of murder; 28.4 per cent of rape and "attacks upon women" (19 per cent of rape and 9.4 per cent of "attacks upon women"); 17.8 per cent of crimes against the person (other than those already mentioned) and against property; 12 per cent were charged with miscellaneous crimes and in 5.6 per cent of cases no crime at all was charged. The 5.6 per cent, classified under "Absence of Crime" does not include a number of cases in which crime was alleged but in which it was afterwards shown conclusively that no crime had been committed. Further, it may fairly be pointed out that in a number of cases where Negroes have been lynched for rape and "attacks upon white women," the alleged attacks rest upon no stronger evidence than "entering the room of a woman" or brushing against her. In such cases as these latter the victims and their friends have often asserted that there was no intention on the part of the victim to attack a white woman or to commit rape. In many cases, of course, the evidence points to bona fide attacks upon women.

An examination of Table No. 7 shows that the decreases in succeeding five years' periods in the number of victims charged with rape and "attacks upon women" have been more pronounced than for any other alleged cause.…

It is apparent that lynchings of Negroes for other causes than the so-called "one crime" have for the whole period been a large majority of all lynchings and that for the past five years, less than one in five of the colored victims have been accused of rape or "attacks upon women" (rape, 11 per cent; attacks upon women, 8.8 per cent; total, 19.8 per cent).

The Story of One Hundred Lynchings

To give concreteness and to make vivid the facts of lynching in the United States, we give below in chronological order an account of one hundred lynchings which have occurred in the period from 1894 to 1918. These "stories," as they are technically described in newspaper parlance, have been taken from press accounts and, in a few cases, from the reports of investigations made by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Covering twenty-five years of American history, these accounts serve to present a characteristic picture of the lynching sport, as it was picturesquely defined by Henry Watterson.

The last of the "stories" describes one of the rare events in connection with lynchings, that of the conviction of members of a mob involved in such affairs. In this case no lynching was consummated, it having been prevented by the prompt and public-spirited action of the mayor of the city (Winston-Salem, North Carolina), and members of the "Home Guard" and Federal troops who defended the jail against a mob.

Alabama, 1894

Three Negroes, Tom Black, Johnson Williams and Tony Johnston, were lynched at Tuscumbia, Alabama. They were in the local jail, awaiting trial on the charge of having burnt a barn. A mob of two hundred masked men entered the jail. after having enticed away the jailer with a false message, took the keys from the jailer's wife and secured the three prisoners. They were carried to a near-by bridge. Here a rope was placed around the neck of each victim, the other end being tied to the timbers of the bridge, and they were compelled to jump.

New York Tribune, April 23, 1894.…

Texas, 1897

Robert Henson Hilliard, a Negro, for a murder to which he confessed and for alleged rape, was burned to death by a mob at Tyler, Texas. Hilliard confessed the murder but stated that he killed his victim because he had unwittingly frightened her and feared that he would be killed.

A report of the crime and its punishment was written by an eye-witness and printed by a local publishing house. It ended as follows:

"Note: Hilliard's power of endurance was the most wonderful thing on record. His lower limbs burned off before he became unconscious and his body looked to be burned to the hollow. Was it decreed by an avenging God as well as an avenging people that his sufferings should be prolonged beyond the ordinary endurance of mortals?"

The End

"We have sixteen large views under powerful magnifying lenses now on exhibition. These views are true to life and show the Negro's attack, the scuffle, the murder, the body as found, etc. With eight views of the trial and burning. For place of exhibit see street bills. Don't fail to see this."

Breckenridge-Scruggs Co.

Document Text

No indictments were found against any of the mob's members.

Georgia, 1899

Sam Hose, a Negro farm laborer, was accused of murdering his employer in a quarrel over wages. He escaped. Several days later, while he was being bunted unsuccessfully, the charge was added that he raped his employer's wife. He confessed the murder, but refused, even under duress, to confess the other crime.

The following account of the lynching is taken from the New York Tribune for April 24, 1899.

"In the presence of nearly 2,000 people, who sent aloft yells of defiance and shouts of joy, Sam Hose (a Negro who committed two of the basest acts known to crime) was burned at the stake in a public road, one and a half miles from here. Before the torch was applied to the pyre, the Negro was deprived of his ears, fingers and other portions of his body with surprising fortitude. Before the body was cool, it was cut to pieces, the bones were crushed into small bits and even the tree upon which the wretch met his fate was torn up and disposed of as souvenirs."

"The Negro's heart was cut in several pieces, as was also his liver. Those unable to obtain the ghastly relics directly, paid more fortunate possessors extravagant sums for them. Small pieces of bone went for 25 cents and a bit of the liver, crisply cooked, for 10 cents."

No indictments were ever found against any of the lynchers.…

Tennessee, 1901

Ballie Crutchfield, a colored woman, was lynched by a mob at Rome, Tennessee, because her brother stole a purse.

The mob took Crutchfield from the custody of the sheriff, and started with him for the place of execution, when he broke from them and escaped.

"This," says the despatch, "so enraged the mob, that they suspected Crutchfield's sister of being implicated in the theft and last night's work was the culmination of that suspicion."

The Coroner's jury found the usual verdict that the woman came to her death at the hands of parties unknown.

New York Tribune, March 16, 1901.

Louisiana, 1901

Louis Thomas, at Girard, La., a Negro, broke into a local store and stole six bottles of soda-pop. He was later found by a white man named Brown, disposing of its contents, and on being accused of theft, struck his accuser. Brown procured a rifle and shot the Negro twice through the body, but as neither wound proved fatal, a mob of white men took the Negro from the house where he lay wounded and strung him up.

New York Tribune, July 16, 1901.…

Delaware, 1903

George White, a Negro, accused of rape and murder, was taken out of jail at Wilmington, Del., dragged to the scene of his alleged crime and forced to confess. He was tied to a stake, burned and riddled with bullets, even as he was being burned. The Chamber of Commerce of Wilmington, which met a few days later, refused to pass a resolution condemning the lynching but passed one against forest fires.

New York Tribune, June 23, 24, 1903.…

Mississippi, 1904

Luther Holbert, a Doddsville Negro, and his wife were burned at the stake for the murder of James Eastland, a white planter, and John Carr, a Negro, The planter was killed in a quarrel which arose when he came to Carr's cabin, where he found Holbert, and ordered him to leave the plantation. Carr and a Negro, named Winters, were also killed.

Holbert and his wife fled the plantation but were brought back and burned at the stake in the presence of a thousand people. Two innocent Negros had been shot previous to this by a posse looking for Holbert, because one of them, who resembled Holbert, refused to surrender when ordered to do so. There is nothing in the story to indicate that Holbert's wife had any part in the crime.

New York Tribune, February 8, 1904.…

Georgia, 1904

For the brutal murder of a white family (the Hodges family) at Statesboro', Georgia, two Negroes, Paul Reed and Will Cato, were burned alive in the presence of a large crowd. They had been duly convicted and sentenced, when the mob broke into the courtroom and carried them away, in spite of the plea of a brother of the murdered man, who was present in the court, that the law be allowed to take its course. None of the lynchers were ever indicted.

Ray Stannard Baker, "Following the Color Line," Chicago Tribune, December 31, 1904.

Georgia, 1904

Because of the race prejudice growing out of the Hodges murder by Reed and Cato and their lynching, Albert Roger and his son were lynched at Statesboro', Ga., August 17, for being Negroes. A number of other Negroes were whipped for no other offense.

Ray Stannard Baker, "Following the Color Line," Chicago Tribune, December 31, 1904.

Georgia, 1904

On account of the race riots which grew out of the above murder (Hodges) and lynching, McBride, a respectable Negro of Portal, Ga., was beaten, kicked and shot to death for trying to defend his wife, who was confined with a baby, three days old, from a whipping at the hands of a crowd of white men.

Ray Stannard Baker, "Following the Color Line," Chicago Tribune, December 31, 1904.…

Louisiana, 1906

For the crime of killing a white man's cow, William Carr, a Negro, was killed at Planquemines, Louisiana. The lynching was conducted in a most orderly manner, Carr being taken from the Sheriff without resistance by a mob of thirty masked men, hurried to the nearest railroad bridge and hanged without Ceremony.

Despatch to New York Tribune, March 18, 1906.…

Oklahoma, 1911

At Okemah, Oklahoma, Laura Nelson, a colored woman, accused of murdering a deputy sheriff who had discovered stolen goods in her house, was lynched together with her son, a boy about fifteen. The woman and her son were taken from the jail, dragged about six miles to the Canadian River, and hanged from a bridge. The woman was raped by members of the mob before she was hanged.

The Crisis, July, 1911.…

South Carolina, 1911

Will Jackson was lynched at Honeapath, S. C., for an alleged attack on a white child. He was hanged to a tree by his feet and his body riddled with bullets. His fingers were cut off for souvenirs. The mob was led by Joshua W. Ashleigh, a local member of the State Legislature, and his son, while Victor B. Chesire, editor of a local newspaper, The Intelligencer, after taking part in the lynching, got out a special edition telling about it in the following words: "The Intelligencer man went out to see the fun without the least objection to being a party to help lynch the brute." The then Governor of the State, Cole Blease, absolutely refused to use the power of his office to bring the lynchers to justice, and the Coroner's jury found that the Negro came to his death "at the hands of parties unknown."

The Crisis, December, 1911.

Georgia, 1911

Two colored men, Allen and Watts, were lynched in Monroe, Georgia, one for an alleged attack on a white woman, the other for "loitering in a suspicious manner." Judge Chas. H. Brand ordered Allen brought to Monroe for trial although it was known that the citizens had organized a mob to lynch him. The Judge was offered troops by the Governor to protect the prisoner but refused. Allen was sent to Monroe in charge of two officers. The train was stopped and he was taken off and shot. The mob then proceeded to Monroe where they stormed the jail, took out Watts and hanged and shot him. The same Judge had refused to ask for troops on a previous occasion, saying that he "would not imperil the life of one man to save the lives of a hundred Negroes."

No indictments were found against the lynchers.

The Crisis, August, 1911.…

Georgia, 1911

T. W. Walker, a colored man of Washington, Ga., killed C. S. Hollinshead, a wealthy planter of the same place. It was stated that there was no apparent cause for the crime, but a Northern colored paper published the charge that Walker killed Hollinshead for attacking his wife and an Atlanta paper reprinted it. A crowd of white men tried to lynch Walker, who had been sentenced to death, but were so drunk that he succeeded in escaping. He was caught and resentenced to instant execution. Before he could be taken from the court room, a brother of Hollinshead shot and severely wounded him. He was then taken out and hanged, the court announcing that the brother would not be prosecuted. The only arrest made in connection with the affair was that of the Negro editor who published the charge against Hollinshead.

The Crisis, January, 1912.…

West Virginia, 1912

In Bluefield, W. Va., September 4, 1912, Robert Johnson was lynched for attempted rape. When he was accused he gave an alibi and proved every statement that he made. He was taken before the girl who had been attacked and she failed to identify him. She had previously described very minutely the clothes her assailant wore. When she failed to identify Johnson in the clothes he had, the Bluefield police dressed him to fit the description and again took him before her. This time she screamed on seeing him, "That's the man." Her father had also failed to identify him but now he declared himself positive that he recognized Johnson as the guilty man. Thereupon Johnson was dragged out by a mob, protesting his innocence, and after being severely abused, was hung to a telegraph pole. Later his innocence was conclusively established.

"The Lynching of Robert Johnson," James Oppenheim in The Independent, October 10, 1912.…

Texas, 1912

Dan Davis, a Negro, was burned at the stake at Tyler, Texas, for the crime of attempted rape, May 25, 1912.

There was some disappointment in the crowd and criticism of those who had bossed the arrangements, because the fire was so slow in reaching the Negro. It was really only ten minutes after the fire was started that smoking shoe soles and twitching of the Negro's feet indicated that his lower extremities were burning, but the time seemed much longer. The spectators had waited so long to see him tortured that they begrudged the ten minutes before his suffering really began.

The Negro had uttered but few words. When he was led to where he was to be burned he said quite calmly, "I wish some of you gentlemen would be Christian enough to cut my throat," but nobody responded. When the fire started, he screamed "Lord, have mercy on my soul," and that was the last word he spoke, though he was conscious for fully twenty minutes after that. His exhibition of nerve aroused the admiration even of his torturers.

A slight hitch in the proceedings occurred when the Negro was about half burned. His clothing had been stripped off and burned to ashes by the flames and his black body hung nude in the gray dawn light. The flesh had been burned from his legs as high as the knees when it was seen that the wood supply was running short. None of the men or boys were willing to miss an incident of the torture. All feared something of more than usual interest might happen, and it would be embarrassing to admit later on not having seen it on account of being absent after more wood.

Something had to be done, however, and a few men from the edge of the crowd, ran after more dry-goods boxes, and by reason of this "public service" gained standing room in the inner circle after having delivered the fuel. Meanwhile the crowd jeered the dying man and uttered shocking comments suggestive of a cannibalistic spirit. Some danced and sang to testify to their enjoyment of the occasion.

Special correspondence of the St. Louis Post-Despatch. The Crisis, June, September, 1912.…

Texas, 1916

Jesse Washington, a defective Negro boy, of about nineteen, unable to read and write, was employed as farm hand in Robinson, a small town near Waco, Texas. One day, the wife of his employer found fault with him, whereupon he struck her on the head with a hammer and killed her. There is some, but not conclusive, evidence that he raped her. He was arrested, tried, found guilty and sentenced to death by hanging within ten days of the commission of the crime. As the sentence was pronounced, a mob of fifteen hundred white men, who feared the law's delays, broke into the courtroom and seized the prisoner. He was dragged through the streets, stabbed, mutilated and finally burned to death in the presence of a crowd of 15,000 men, women and children. The Mayor and Chief of Police of Waco also witnessed the lynching.

After death what was left of his body was dragged through the streets and parts of it sold as souvenirs. His teeth brought $5 apiece and the chain that had bound him 25 cents a link. No one was ever indicted for participating in the lynching.

Investigation by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.…

Tennessee, 1917

On April 30, Antoinette Rappal, a sixteen-year-old white girl, living on the outskirts of Memphis, disappeared on her way to school. On May third her body was found in a river, her head severed from it. On May 6 a Negro wood chopper, Ell Person, was arrested on suspicion. Under third degree methods he confessed to the crime of murder. The Grand Jury of Shelby County immediately indicted him for murder in the first degree.

The prisoner was taken secretly to the State penitentiary at Nashville. It was known that he would be brought back for trial to Memphis. Each incoming train was searched, and arrangements were made for a lynching.

On May 15 the sheriff disappeared from Memphis. He returned on May 18, announcing that he was informed that several mobs were between Arlington and Memphis. The men were reported to be drinking. "I didn't want to hurt anybody and I didn't want to get hurt," he said, "so I went South into Mississippi."

The press did nothing to quell the mob spirit, and on May 21 announced that Ell Person would be brought to Memphis that night. Thousands of persons on foot and in automobiles went to the place that had been prepared for the lynching.

With a knowledge of these conditions, Person was brought back from Nashville, guarded only by two deputies. Without difficulty he was taken from the train, placed in an automobile, and driven to the spot prepared for his death.

The Memphis Press reported the lynching in full. We give a few of its statements.

"Fifteen thousand of them men, women, even little children, and in their midst the black-clothed figure of Antoinette Rappal's mother cheered as they poured the gasoline on the axe fiend and struck the match.

"They fought and screamed and crowded to get a glimpse of him, and the mob closed in and struggled about the fire as the flames flared high and the smoke rolled about their heads. Two of them hacked off his ears as he burned; another tried to cut off a toe but they stopped him.

"The Negro lay in the flames, his hands crossed on his chest. If he spoke no one ever heard him over the shouts of the crowd. He died quickly, though fifteen minutes later excitable persons still shouted that he lived when they saw the charred remains move as does meat on a hot frying pan.

"'They burned him too quick! They burned him too quick!' was the complaint on all sides."

Investigation of the burning of Ell Person at Memphis, by James Weldon Johnson. Published by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Tennessee, 1918

Jim McIlherron was prosperous in a small way. He was a Negro who resented the slights and insults of white men. He went armed and the sheriff feared him. On February 8 he got into a quarrel with three young white men who insulted him. Threats were made and McIlherron fired six shots, killing two of the men.

He fled to the home of a colored clergyman who aided him to escape, and was afterwards shot and killed by a mob. McIlherron was captured and full arrangements made for a lynching. Men, women and children started into the town of Estill Springs from a radius of fifty miles. A spot was chosen for the burning. McIlherron was chained to a hickory tree while the mob howled about him. A fire was built a few feet away and the torture began. Bars of iron were heated and the mob amused itself by putting them close to the victim, at first without touching him. One bar he grasped and as it was jerked from his grasp all the inside of his hand came with it. Then the real torturing began, lasting for twenty minutes.

During that time, while his flesh was slowly roasting, the Negro never lost his nerve. He cursed those who tortured him and almost to the last breath derided the attempts of the mob to break his spirit.

Walter F. White, in The Crisis, May, 1918.

Georgia, 1918

Hampton Smith, a white farmer, had the reputation of ill treating his Negro employees. Among those whom he abused was Sidney Johnson, a Negro peon, whose fine of thirty dollars he had paid when he was up before the court for gaming. After having been beaten and abused, the Negro shot and killed Smith as he sat in his window at home. He also shot and wounded Smith's wife.

Document Text

For this murder a mob of white men of Georgia for a week, May 17 to 24, engaged in a hunt for the guilty man, and in the meantime lynched the following innocent persons: Will Head, Will Thompson, Hayes Turner, Mary Turner, his wife, for loudly proclaiming her husband's innocence, Chime Riley and four unidentified Negroes. Mary Turner was pregnant and was hung by her feet. Gasoline was thrown on her clothing and it was set on fire. Her body was cut open and her infant fell to the ground with a little cry, to be crushed to death by the heel of one of the white men present. The mother's body was then riddled with bullets. The murderer, Sidney Johnson, was at length located in a house at Valdosta.

The house was surrounded by a posse headed by the Chief of Police and Johnson, who was known to be armed, fired until his shot gave out, wounding the Chief. The house was entered and Johnson found dead. His body was mutilated. After the lynching more than 500 Negroes left the vicinity of Valdosta, leaving hundreds of acres of untilled land behind them.

The Lynchings of May, 1918, in Brooks and Lowndes Counties, Georgia, by Walter F. White. Published by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Mississippi, 1918

On Friday night, December 20, 1918, four Negroes, Andrew Clark, age 15; Major Clark, age 20; Maggie Howze, age 20; and Alma Howze, age 16, were taken from the little jail at Shubuta and lynched on a bridge over the Chickasawha River. They were suspected of having murdered a Dr. E. L. Johnston, a dentist.

An investigation disclosed the following facts: That Dr. Johnston was living in illicit relations with Maggie Howze and Alma Howze. That Major Clark, a youth working on Johnston's plantation wished to marry Maggie. That Dr. Johnston went to Clark and told him to leave his woman alone. That this led to a quarrel, made the more bitter when it was found that Maggie was to have a child by Dr. Johnston; and that the younger sister was also pregnant, said to be by Dr. Johnston.

Shortly after this Johnston was mysteriously murdered. There were two theories as to his death; one that he was killed by Clark, the other that he was killed by a white man who had accused him of seducing a white woman. It was generally admitted that Johnston was a loose character.

Alma Howze was so near to motherhood when lynched that it was said by an eye-witness at her burial on the second day following, that the movements of her unborn child could be detected.

Investigation by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

North Carolina, 1918

Mob Leaders Go To Prison

Realizing that if a lyncher is permitted to remain unpunished the decency of the community is greatly endangered, Judge B. F. Long of the Superior Court sentenced fifteen white men, indicted for participa-

Glossary

"at the hands of parties unknown"	a phrase the authorities commonly used in investigations of lynchings to avoid assigning guilt bona fide	Latin for "in good faith"; authentic or genuine
Central Powers	in World War I, the German Empire, the Austro-Hungarian Empire, Bulgaria, and the Ottoman Empire
Henry Watterson	a late-nineteenth to early-twentieth-century journalist, editor of the Louisville Courier-Journal, and opponent of lynching
posse	from the Latin phrase posse comitatus, meaning "power of the county," used to refer to a temporary police force but often associated with mob violence

Document Text

tion in a riot in Winston-Salem, Nov. 17, to serve from fourteen months to six years in prison. The men were found guilty of attempting to lynch Russell High, a prisoner in the city jail.

The fifteen men were a part of a mob that for a night and morning terrorized Winston-Salem, and in their efforts to lynch a black man, innocent of the crime of assault for which he had been arrested on suspicion, put life and property in peril and incidentally killed four people, one a little white girl. The Mayor of the city acted with promptitude and courage, railing out the Home Guards and the fire department which played water on the mob. Nearly every policeman was hurt. The Governor rushed troops from Camp Green at Charlotte. For many days cannon guarded the streets. "We don't mean to be sentimental on this matter," a prominent business man is quoted as saying, "but we aren't going to have our city's good name spoilt by a lynching."

Condensed from reports of the North Carolina press.

Cyril Briggs's Summary of the Program and Aims of the African Blood Brotherhood

1920

"The Negroes in the United States ... are destined to play a vital part in a powerful world movement for Negro liberation."

Overview

The 1920 Summary of the Program and Aims of the African Blood Brotherhood remains one of the first documents to successfully merge black nationalism and international Communism, making it a key document in the history of both African Americans and the Left. Written by a West Indian immigrant named Cyril V. Briggs, the Summary enumerates eight goals for the African Blood Brotherhood for African Liberation and Redemption (ABB), a secret, all-black society founded by Briggs to unite people of African descent and counter what Briggs perceived to be the menacing forces of capitalism and white racism.

In his Summary, Briggs argues for united opposition of diverging black organizations against lynching and the Ku Klux Klan (KKK), both treacherous outgrowths of white racism in the United States. He also suggests that black children be educated in black history, outlining an early approach to an Afrocentric black studies curriculum. Essential to this project was an emphasis on recovering the history of Africa, even showing how African civilizations rivaled if not surpassed those of Europe.

In addition, Briggs calls for the organization of labor against unfettered, free-market capitalism. Here, however, he suspends his emphasis on race to include white Communists. Briggs's affinity for white Communists led him to break from the other most notable proponent of black nationalism at the time, Marcus Garvey, and forge his unique brand of race-based, class-oriented politics. Briggs's Summary of the Program and Aims of the African Blood Brotherhood thus serves as both a thematic link to other insurgent nationalist movements at the time, including Ireland's struggle for independence from Britain in the Irish Easter Rising, and a bold response to white Anglo-Saxon Protestant nativism, embodied most forcefully in the resurgence of the notorious white supremacist group the KKK during World War I.

Context

Issued in 1920, the Summary of the Program and Aims of the African Blood Brotherhood came on the heels of one of the most violent years of racial conflict in the United States. Following the end of World War I, returning black soldiers confronted remarkable levels of white violence, all sparked by war-related fears. One such fear was that African American soldiers might upset white political rule in the American South, no longer subordinating themselves to the humiliations of Jim Crow segregation. Partly owing to such fears, more than thirty riots all instigated by whites broke out against blacks in what became known as Red Summer, while lynchings of individual blacks spread across the South.

Another fear that influenced racial politics at the time, one that was more prominent in the North, was that African Americans might steal white jobs. In the second two decades of the nineteenth century, upwards of five hundred thousand African Americans left the South in what has since been termed the Great Migration, seeking jobs. Once white soldiers returned from Europe, however, the black newcomers employed in northern factories were viewed as unwanted intruders who threatened to permanently displace the returning GIs. Not surprisingly, blacks became the target of white working-class violence as early as 1917, when a white mob killed more than two hundred African American workers in East St. Louis, Illinois. Two years later, white mobs attacked African Americans in Chicago after a black swimmer wandered onto a white beach; the incident resulted in over thirty deaths and five hundred injuries.

Compounding racial violence in the Midwest was a surge in nativist sentiment nationally, spearheaded by rural whites fearful of alien immigration. Prior to the 1890s, most immigrants to the United States hailed from northern Europe, a region tending to be Nordic, Protestant, and otherwise culturally similar to the English and Scotch-Irish settlers of the colonial era. Beginning in 1891, however, immigration patterns shifted toward non-Protestant, southern Europeans, including Catholics and Jews from Italy, Poland, Russia, Hungary, and Greece. Afraid of such aliens, a group of Harvard University alumni formed the Immigration Restriction League in 1894, lobbying successfully for quotas on all immigrants to the United States.

Perhaps the most extreme anti-immigrant group in the United States at the time of Cyril Briggs's Summary was

Time Line

1914

- July 28
  World War I officially begins with Austria-Hungary's declaration of war against Serbia.

1916

- April 24
  Irish Republicans in Dublin seek independence for Ireland, beginning a weeklong rebellion against British oppression known as the Easter Rising.

1917

- November
  Eight months after the overthrow of the Russian czar, the Communist Party gains control of the former empire in the Russian Revolution.

1918

- January 8
  U.S. President Woodrow Wilson unveils his Fourteen Points.
- September
  Cyril Briggs founds The Crusader.
- November 11
  World War I ends as Germany signs an armistice with the Allied forces.

1919

- Briggs founds a secret society called the African Blood Brotherhood for African Liberation and Redemption.
- March
  The Communist International (Comintern) forms in Moscow.

1920

- Briggs issues his Summary of the Program and Aims of the African Blood Brotherhood.

1921

- Congress passes the first Emergency Quota Act.

1922

- Claude McKay travels to Russia to address the Fourth Comintern.

1925

- The Ku Klux Klan reaches the height of its influence.

the KKK. First organized by Confederate officers intent on restoring white rule to the South after the Civil War, the Klan lost support after the collapse of Reconstruction, only to regain backing in 1915. That year, a group of white southerners angry over the alleged 1914 rape of a white girl by a Jewish pencil factory manager named Leo Frank, and inspired by a romantic movie about the first Klan entitled Birth of a Nation, met at Stone Mountain, Georgia, to resurrect the second KKK. Under the leadership of a Texas dentist named Hiram W. Evans, the Klan expanded its target list to include not just African Americans but Jews, Catholics, and immigrants in general. Declared an imperial wizard in 1922, Evans made the Klan's motto "100 per cent Americanism," actively working to cull recruits not simply from the South but from the Midwest and the West. During his tenure, the KKK became a powerful force of hatred in the state politics of Georgia, Texas, Indiana, Colorado, and Oregon. Klansmen even made it to the 1924 Democratic National Convention, forming the extreme right wing of the Democratic Party at the time.

At least some of the Klan's violence stemmed from fears that the white race, and specifically Anglo-Saxon Protestants, risked extinction; this phobia was encouraged by academics who espoused what quickly came to be known as scientific racism. Perhaps foremost among them was Madison Grant, a conservationist who worked to save the redwoods of the Pacific Northwest at the same time that he worked to save the Anglo-Saxon Protestants of the Atlantic Northeast, both groups facing what Grant believed to be impending extinction. The popularity of Grant's book The Passing of the Great Race, a celebration of Anglo-Saxon achievements published in 1916, convinced some that the United States would never, in fact, achieve true assimilation. The cultural theorist Randolph S. Bourne penned an essay in 1916 entitled "Trans-National America," arguing that even European immigrants from places like Germany, Scandinavia, and Poland were not assimilating into American society, but rather clinging to older, Continental identities. For Bourne, such reluctance indicated a problem with prevailing notions of America as a liberal, democratic nation-state based not on ethnic or racial identity but on democratic idealism. Such idealism was precisely what President Woodrow Wilson endorsed during his administration, using it to rationalize American involvement in World War I. Bourne opposed American entry into the war and countered Wilsonian idealism with pluralism, or the acceptance and appreciation of ethnic and cultural differences, an idea that also appealed to Cyril Briggs.

Even though Briggs joined Bourne in failing to see an American melting pot, he did see hope for cross-cultural alliances under Communism. The Russian Revolution of 1917 convinced many, including Briggs, that Communism was a viable political alternative to free-market capitalism. After deposing the Russian czar, Communist revolutionaries pulled Russia out of World War I designating it a capitalist war and immediately went about establishing an egalitarian, antiproperty state. By the end of 1919, the newly formed Soviet government established the Communist International, or Comintern, an agency dedicated to spreading Communist ideals of revolution worldwide. That same year, the American Communist Party formed, inspiring Briggs to synthesize Communist theory with his own interests in racial pluralism and, more specifically, black nationalism. Although he was hardly the first person of color to be inspired by Communism in the United States, Briggs forged a critical link between Communism and black nationalist thought at a moment when most white Communists did not recognize the salience of racial allegiance or racial difference.

Conversely, Briggs's interest in Communism separated him from other proponents of black separatism in the 1920s, perhaps the best known of whom was Marcus Garvey, the father of the Back to Africa movement. In 1922 the African American writer Claude McKay took Briggs's ideas with him to the Soviet Union, addressing the Fourth Comintern in Moscow and initiating the beginnings of a formal relationship between the Soviet Union and the black Left. Raised on black-majority islands and schooled in European political thought, West Indian immigrants to places like Harlem brought with them a militant class politics that coincided with the New Negro Movement, a domestic campaign challenging white cultural hegemony that would absorb some but not all West Indian immigrant intellectuals. In the aftermath of the Russian Revolution of 1917, black West Indians in Harlem joined together to form leftist political groups that would serve as the foundation for a much more radical, Communist-oriented West Indian culture in New York. Briggs saw great potential in coupling the struggle for equality in the United States with the revolutionary spirit of Communism. The idea of black liberation as a global effort informs his Summary of the Program and Aims of the African Blood Brotherhood.

About the Author

Born on the small Caribbean island of Nevis on May 28, 1888, Cyril V. Briggs personally confronted many of the same tensions that drove anticolonialist sentiment in the first half of the twentieth century. The illegitimate son of a woman of color and a white overseer, Briggs was dark skinned enough to be rejected from Caribbean white society, yet light skinned enough to earn the description "Angry Blond Negro," noted Mark Solomon in The Cry Was Unity: Communists and African Americans, 1917 1936. Frustrated by a lack of opportunity on his home island, Briggs immigrated to the United States in 1905 and settled in New York City, gravitating toward Harlem's growing West Indian community. There, he found others who had grown up in the West Indies with a deep resentment toward European and particularly British imperialism, factors that contributed to an emerging politics of racial solidarity and anticapitalism.

In 1912, Briggs landed a job with the New York Amsterdam News, a weekly periodical devoted to issues of interest among the city's African Americans. He took heart in President Woodrow Wilson's Fourteen Points plan issued in January 1918, particularly the promise that colonized peoples be granted "a voice in their own government." That September, Briggs founded The Crusader, a magazine dedicated, in Briggs's words, to promoting "Negro power and culture throughout the world," including the idea that human civilization began in Africa, that black achievements were underemphasized in American schools, and that African Americans would be better served by an "independent, separate existence" from whites.

Inspired by the success of The Crusader and disappointed in Wilson's failure to work actively for colonial independence, Briggs abandoned hope in traditional struggles for civil rights and social equality, taking inspiration instead from global outbreaks of racial and ethnic nationalism, most notably the Irish Easter Rising of 1916. To Briggs, Ireland's attempt to free itself from British oppression in the Easter Rising indicated that ethnic and racial nationalism was, in fact, a logical strategy for black advancement. He shared this sentiment with Marcus Garvey, a Jamaican stonemason who immigrated to the United States in 1916 and quickly established one of the most dynamic black organizations in American history, the Universal Negro Improvement Association. Both Garvey and Briggs took the Easter Rising to mean that a possible answer to racial injustice in the United States was black nationalism, a position that Briggs articulated forthrightly in 1917, when he identified African Americans as nothing less than a "nation within a nation."

While Garvey adopted a view of black nationalism similar to the one held by Briggs, Briggs differed from Garvey in that he also took an interest in the Russian Revolution, finding Soviet internationalism an attractive model upon which to build his own version of black transnationalism. Briggs attempted to fuse Communism with black nationalism by founding a secret society called the African Blood Brotherhood for African Liberation and Redemption in 1919. Garvey, on the other hand, rejected Communism in favor of black capitalism, which led to a rift between the two activists.

In defiance of Garvey, Briggs joined the Communist Party in 1921, and the ABB merged with the party in 1925, becoming the American Negro Labor Congress. By 1929, Briggs himself was elevated to the central executive committee of the Communist Party of the United States. Though expelled for his black nationalist views, Briggs continued to side with Communist policies, eventually rejoining the Communist Party of the United States in 1948. He died on October 18, 1966.

Explanation and Analysis of Document

The Summary of the Program and Aims of the African Blood Brotherhood by Cyril V. Briggs can be viewed as an attempt to rethink the concept of nationhood itself, suggesting that nations need not be bounded by language or geography but can be formed around a shared past or experience. Issued at its first conference in 1920, the Summary outlines the goals of the self-declared secret brotherhood. The document itself is a relatively short list that enumerates nine political objectives, the first of which declares the need for a "liberated race" free from "alien political rule." Here, alien political rule implies both rule by whites over blacks in the United States and rule by colonial powers over the colonized generally. Indeed, one of the more remarkable attributes of the Summary is that it foreshadowed the Trinidadian-born activist Stokely Carmichael's Black Power thesis declaring that African Americans lived in what was essentially a domestic colony in 1967. Almost half a century earlier, Briggs had implied as much, drawing a not-so-subtle connection between imperial rule over blacks in the West Indies Briggs's home and white rule over blacks in the United States.

Barricades in Petrograd, Russia, during the Russian Revolution (Library of Congress)

Like Carmichael, Briggs focuses on economic inequality or, as he puts it, the "crushing weight of exploitation." Although Jim Crow segregation might easily have been included in this section, the Summary concentrates more on economic inequality, or that which keeps "the many in degrading poverty" so that others presumably white elites can "wallow in stolen wealth." Continued poverty in the otherwise wealthy United States, implies the Summary, ties American blacks to blacks around the world. In an interesting refusal to distinguish between, on the one hand, African Americans who could trace their lineage to slavery and recent West Indian immigrants on the other, Briggs notes in his first point that blacks in America, "both native and foreign born," are particularly well suited to play a "vital part" in a larger, global "movement for Negro liberation." Briggs's merger of black natives and immigrants here reflects a larger pan-African sensibility, one that does not place reparations for domestic slavery any higher than general redress for wrongs done to people of African descent generally. Unlike the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, in other words, Briggs does not see a domestic struggle for civil rights to be as important as a larger, global struggle to achieve a free America and a "free Africa." Although it is subtle, this distinction is important, as it demonstrates a strategic advance in the direction of a true but fledgling black nationalism, one that did not differentiate between blacks from one country or another but rather viewed all people of African descent as comprising their own country.

To make the claim that all people of African descent essentially belonged to the same oppressed nation, Briggs necessarily had to occlude any mention of divisions that existed and had existed over time between African peoples, along with discrimination and injustice imposed by Africans against other Africans. Indeed, implicit in Briggs's claims of black subjugation at the hands of Europeans was a profound de-emphasis on the importance of history in the determination of events particularly any mention of the longstanding role that slavery had played in African societies. That large West African empires like Asante and Dahomey owed their existence to slavery was ignored, as was the fact that African slavery predated slavery in the New World.

The second point of the Summary demands racial equality in the political, social, and economic realms. Briggs does not elaborate on whether economic equality means equality of opportunity or result, but given his Socialist leanings the latter was probably the more likely. For political equality, Briggs could have meant equal access to the vote, a right that eluded African Americans in the South, or he might have been referencing the U.S. Supreme Court's distinction between social and political equality, a differentiation it made in Plessy v. Ferguson in 1896. In that case, the Court declared that while the Constitution protected political equality, such as the right to vote, it did not guarantee social equality meaning that state laws requiring racial segregation in public places were entirely legal. Of course, such laws did not exist in the northeastern United States, where segregation tended to be de facto (discrimination that occurred in real-life situations) rather than de jure (discrimination stipulated by law), but Briggs's reference to them indicates that he envisioned African Americans in the South eventually joining his Brotherhood.

The third objective of the Summary calls for the "fostering of racial self-respect" through increased awareness of the contribution that blacks had made both to "modern civilization" and to the ancient world. Briggs had discussed such contributions at length in The Crusader, including notions that Africa was the cradle of civilization and that African people, including Egyptians, had inspired the Greeks. Although Briggs does not elaborate more in his Summary, his was clearly a call for Afrocentrism in education, a prescient move, given that black studies departments would not be formed until the late 1960s. Closely tied to this emphasis on education is the eighth point of the Summary, which declares that "knowledge is power" and concedes that no racial advancement can occur without overcoming "ignorance." To further the ends of black education, Briggs proposes to send lecturers "throughout America," teaching African Americans, establishing forums, and publishing newspapers.

Even as blacks needed to strive for education, maintains Briggs, so too did they need to unite against the KKK, a white supremacist group that blamed white America's economic and employment woes on the various waves of immigrants among them blacks, Jews, and European Catholics to the United States. Both points 4 and 5 of the Summary reference the need to counter the Klan, as the terrorist organization experienced a resurgence upon the return of black soldiers to the United States following World War I. The KKK eschewed cities like New York, opting instead to focus its efforts on rural America, where segregationist sentiment had gone wild. But just as Briggs indicates an interest in ending segregation in the American South (for its denial of social equality), so too does he seem interested in aiding African Americans battling the Klan in the Midwest and West.

To fight the Klan, Briggs advocates organizing the "Negro masses" and establishing a federation of black groups capable of presenting a united front. What precisely Briggs thought this united front might do is unclear, though he does indicate an interest in reaching out to other groups targeted by the KKK, particularly Catholics and Jews. Here, Briggs makes sure to emphasize that any potential alliance between blacks, Catholics, and Jews does not necessarily have to compromise his earlier interest in black nationalism, nor, as he points out in the fifth objective of the Summary, would it have to compromise black "identity" or "autonomy." Indeed, "not love or hatred," argues Briggs in point 4, "but IDENTITY OF INTERESTS AT THE MOMENT," warranted reaching across racial lines and bringing in white minorities suffering from violence and discrimination.

Although he is adamant that black/white alliances would not compromise the essentially nationalist character of the ABB, Briggs indicates a much greater interest in reaching out to whites than his stated emphasis on Afrocentrism seems to indicate. In the ninth section of the Summary, for example, Briggs calls both for "fellowship and coordination" with "other dark races," presumably people of Asian and South American descent, as well as with "truly class-conscious white workers." Here, Briggs's Communism arguably shines through his racial nationalism, indicating a potentially subversive aspect of his ABB agenda. While it is couched in nationalist terms of blood that might have attracted Garveyites, Briggs's Summary could easily have been an attempt to rob Garvey of support, diverting his sheep into the Communist fold. Only white Communists, after all, would be "truly class-conscious," a perspective that Garvey, a black capitalist, did not value.

Further indication of Briggs's dissatisfaction with Garvey was his notion that political struggles and business ventures needed to be kept separate. In objective 6 of the Summary, Briggs makes it clear that "individual and corporation enterprises" should not be joined with "mass movements." In all likelihood this was an allusion to Garvey's Black Star Line of ships, funded through the donations of poor black Harlemites, with the ultimate goal of linking blacks throughout the Atlantic world. Ruined by mismanagement and inadequate funding, Garvey's cruise line probably disturbed Briggs, both for its reliance on the meager funds of the black poor and its similarity to a capitalist business venture. Instead, Briggs advocated the endorsement of "cooperative enterprises" not large-scale business ventures, but grassroots organizations that directly benefited the participants.

For blacks caught up in big business, Briggs recommends "industrial unionism," another indication of his Communist leanings. Well aware of the discrimination that black workers suffered at the hands of white-dominated unions, Briggs calls not for the formation of separate, black unions, but rather for the reform of white unions corrupted by greedy, manipulative employers. In point 7, Briggs alludes to a potential alliance between blacks and whites, particularly those "radical and progressive" white union leaders who promised to lead the charge in labor reform.

Audience

The Summary of the Program and Aims of the African Blood Brotherhood targeted several audiences. First, it

Essential Quotes

"The Negroes in the United States—both native and foreign born—are destined to play a vital part in a powerful world movement for Negro liberation."

(1)

"Not love or hatred, but IDENTITY OF INTERESTS AT THE MOMENT, dictates the tactics of practical people."

(4)

"For the purpose of waging an effective struggle and weakening our enemies wherever possible, we must (a) establish fellowship and coordination of action within the darker masses and (b) between these masses and the truly class-conscious White Workers who seek the abolition of human exploitation."

(9)

sought to sway African Americans in the urban North, the very same blacks who might be tempted to join Marcus Garvey's Universal Negro Improvement Association. Although Briggs and Garvey had not finalized their ideological split by 1920, Briggs's criticism of merging protest with business, something that Garvey succeeded in doing with his Black Star Line, indicates that Briggs hoped to siphon support from Garvey's political machine. Even if blacks did not quit the Universal Negro Improvement Association, for example, they could still work to nudge it away from capitalism and toward Briggs's Socialist nationalism. Only later would Briggs and Garvey become open enemies, decrying one another in the public sphere.

Other targets of Briggs included African Americans in the South and the West. The Summary's opposition to lynching a largely southern phenomenon promised to win support from African Americans in the South, even as Briggs's opposition to the KKK promised to extend the reach of the ABB to the Midwest and West, particularly as the Klan spread its membership to western states like Oregon.

Finally, Briggs's Summary appealed to Communists. Although he was interested in black nationalism, Briggs made it clear that an interracial alliance between blacks and "truly class-conscious White Workers" would only help black interests, an appeal that inspired young, black Communists like the writer Claude McKay to merge racial nationalism with Soviet internationalism. Anyone interested in rethinking the boundaries of nationhood, in de-coupling them from geography and linking them to ethnic or racial identity, joined the intended audience of Briggs's Summary of the Program and Aims of the African Blood Brotherhood.

Impact

One of the first documents to articulate a pan-African national identity, Cyril Briggs's Summary of the Program and Aims of the African Blood Brotherhood had a profound, if subtle, effect on theories of race formation in twentieth-century America. To take just a few examples, Briggs did much to inspire the Communist position that African Americans should form their own nation in the Deep South, a surprising position that became official Soviet policy in 1928. Soviets learned of Briggs's views thanks to the Harlem Renaissance poet Claude McKay, a black Communist who joined the ABB before traveling to Moscow in 1922. Inspired by Briggs, McKay used his position as a reporter for the radical newspaper The Liberator to arrange interviews between Briggs and white Communists in New York, hoping to cobble together an interracial Left. When McKay arrived in the Soviet Union in 1922, he was hailed as a hero, toasted by Russian Communist leader Leon Trotsky, and made an honorary member of the Moscow government hierarchy. From this position, McKay successfully spread Briggs's views to the highest echelons of Soviet leadership.

While protégés like McKay spread his views abroad, Briggs's ideas also prefigured black politics at home. Writing at the same time as many of the luminaries of the Harlem Renaissance, Briggs contributed to the then-radical notion that African American culture was unique and valuable and that African civilization itself predated and in many cases prefigured European civilization. Such claims not only coincided with the New Negro Movement but also foreshadowed the explosion of Afrocentrism that would emerge in the United States following the devolution of the civil rights movement in the 1960s.

Briggs's emphasis on the distinctive nature and contribution of black culture to Western civilization would become a core axiom of black nationalism, foreshadowing the formation of African American studies departments at colleges across the United States in the 1960s and 1970s. By the close of the twentieth century, prominent black scholars such as Cornel West were advocating a merger of black culture and Socialism reminiscent of Briggs, while scholars such as Paul Gilroy were reframing the concept of black studies around a transnational, diasporic portrait of people of African descent across the Atlantic world, much like Briggs had advocated. Even Briggs's emphasis on the African roots of Western civilization reemerged as a topic of intense scholarly debate in the 1980s and 1990s, following the publication of Cornell University historian Martin Bernal's book Black Athena. Although it was criticized by some, the book presented a case very similar to the one that Briggs had endorsed in 1920, suggesting that much of Greek culture came from Egypt.

See also Plessy v. Ferguson (1896); Marcus Garvey: "The Principles of the Universal Negro Improvement Association" (1922); Alain Locke's "Enter the New Negro" (1925); Stokely Carmichael's "Black Power" (1966).

Further Reading

Articles

Bourne, Randolph S. "Trans-National America." Atlantic Monthly 118, no. 1 (July 1916): 86 97.

Briggs, Cyril. "The American Race Problem." The Crusader 1, nos. 1 4 (September December 1918). Available online. Marxists Internet Archive. http://www.marxists.org/history/usa/groups/abb/1918/0900-briggs-amraceproblem.pdf.

Guterl, Matthew Pratt. "The New Race Consciousness: Race, Nation, and Empire in American Culture, 1910 1925." Journal of World History 10, no. 307 (1999): 307 352.

Stephens, Michelle A. "Black Transnationalism and the Politics of National Identity: West Indian Intellectuals in Harlem in the Age of War and Revolution." American Quarterly 50, no. 3 (September 1998): 592 608.

Books

Gilroy, Paul. The Black Atlantic: Modernity and Double Consciousness. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1993.

Grant, Madison. The Passing of the Great Race; or, The Racial Basis of European History. New York: Scribner's, 1921.

Maxwell, William J. New Negro, Old Left: African American Writing and Communism between the Wars. New York: Columbia University Press, 1999.

Solomon, Mark. The Cry Was Unity: Communists and African Americans, 1917 1936. Oxford: University of Mississippi Press, 1998.

Questions for Further Study

1. To what extent would Cyril Briggs have approved of Eldridge Cleaver's "Education and Revolution," written in 1969?

2. Using this document in connection with Martin R. Delany's The Condition, Elevation, Emigration, and Destiny of the Colored People of the United States (1852) and such documents as Malcolm X's "After the Bombing" speech (1965) and Stokely Carmichael's "Black Power" (1967), trace the history of black nationalism in the United States. Do you believe that black nationalism is still a potent force in the twenty-first century? Why or why not?

3. What impact did the events surrounding World War I have on Briggs and on the black nationalist movement?

4. What objections did Briggs and the African Blood Brotherhood have to capitalism? What was the appeal of Communism to the brotherhood?

5. What do you think the attitude of W. E. B. Du Bois (The Souls of Black Folk) and Alain Locke ("Enter the New Negro") would have been to Briggs's Summary? Why?

Van Deburg, William L., ed. Modern Black Nationalism: From Marcus Garvey to Louis Farrakhan. New York: New York University Press, 1997.

West, Cornel. "Marxist Theory and the Specificity of Afro-American Oppression." In Marxism and the Interpretation of Culture, ed. Cary Nelson and Lawrence Grossberg, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1988.

■ Web Sites

"Early American Marxism." marxisthistory.org Web site. http://www.marxisthistory.org/subject/usa/eam/index.html.

Anders Walker

Document Text

Cyril Briggs's Summary of the Program and Aims of the African Blood Brotherhood

1) A Liberated Race in the United States, Africa, and elsewhere. Liberated not merely from alien political rule, but also from the crushing weight of exploitation, which keeps the many in degrading poverty that the few may wallow in stolen wealth. The Negroes in the United States both native and foreign born are destined to play a vital part in a powerful world movement for Negro liberation. Just as the Negro in the United States can never hope to win genuine equality with his white neighbors under the system of exploitation, so, too, a free Africa is impossible until commercial exploitation is abolished. The ABB proposes (1) to develop and organize the political and economic strength of the Negro in the North for the purpose of eliminating peonage, disfranchisement, etc., in the South and raising the status of the Negro in that section of the country, and (2) to organize the national strength of the entire Negro group in America for the purpose of extending moral and financial aid and, where necessary, leadership to our blood-brothers on the continent of Africa and in Haiti and the West Indies in their struggle against white capitalist exploitation.

2) Absolute Race Equality. In this question are inextricably bound the issues of Political Equality, Social Equality, and Economic Equality. Let one be denied and the whole principle of racial equality is denied.

3) The Fostering of Racial Self-Respect by the dissemination of the true facts concerning the Negro's contributions to modern civilization and the predominant party played in the ancient world by the African peoples.

4) Organized and Uncompromising Opposition to the Ku Klux Klan and all other movements or tendencies inimical to the true interests of the Negro masses. To effectively oppose the bigotry and prejudice of the Ku Klux Klan we must (a) organize the Negro masses; (b) create a strong Negro Federation out of the existing organizations that we may present a United Front; and (c) for the purpose of fighting the Klan ally ourselves with all groups opposed to its vicious activities, viz: the workers, particularly the Jewish workers and the Catholic workers, at whom, with the Negro, the Klan's activities are especially directed. As for the purpose of throwing off our oppression, the enemies of the Imperialist system are our natural allies by virtue of being in the same camp and opposed to the same enemy, so the enemies of the Klan are our friends in that they fight the foe we fight. The Negro masses must get out of their minds the stupid idea that it is necessary for two groups to love each other before they can enter into an alliance against their common enemy. Not love or hatred, but IDENTITY OF INTERESTS AT THE MOMENT, dictates the tactics of practical people.

5) A United Negro Front with which to oppose the Ku Klux Klan and all other organizations and tendencies antagonistic to the Negro. This can be done only by bringing all Negro organizations into a Federation with a program to which any serious and intelligent Negro organization could subscribe. Their identity would not be lost. Their autonomy practically unimpaired. And the race organized and effective for the first time in its history.

6) Industrial Development along genuine cooperative lines whereby the benefits will be equally distributed among the masses participating, and not appropriated by a few big stockholders and dishonest and inefficient officials drawing exorbitant salaries. The ABB is sternly opposed to the foisting of individual and corporation enterprises upon mass movements for the reason that (a) such procedure is manifestly dishonest and misleading. Enterprises supported by mass movements should be of such a nature as to equally benefit everyone in the movement, not merely a handful of officials; (b) the ABB does not consider any commercial enterprise good enough to base the sacred Liberation Movement upon the mere chances of success or failure. No movement so based can long survive the collapse of its commercial enterprises. We believe in fostering and encouraging cooperative enterprises that will benefit the many rather than the few, but without basing the movement upon them.

7) Higher Wages for Negro Labor, Shorter Hours, and Better Living Conditions. To gain for Negro Labor the full reward of its toil and to prevent exploitation either on the job or at the source of supplies we must encourage industrial unionism among our people and at the same time fight to break down the prejudice in the unions which is stimulated and encouraged by the employers. This prejudice is already meeting the attack of the radical and progressive element among white union men and must eventually give way before the united onslaught of Black and White Workers. Wherever it is found impossible to enter the existing labor unions, independent unions should be formed, that Negro labor be enabled to protect its interests.

Document Text

8) Education. That "Knowledge is Power" was never more true than today when on every hand it is being demonstrated that races or groups advance by virtue of their acquirement of knowledge or lag behind because of their failure to overcome ignorance. The ABB proposes to send lecturers throughout America, establish forums, newspapers, etc., etc.

9) Cooperation with Other Darker Races and with the Class-Conscious White Workers. For the purpose of waging an effective struggle and weakening our enemies wherever possible, we must (a) establish fellowship and coordination of action within the darker masses and (b) between these masses and the truly class-conscious White Workers who seek the abolition of human exploitation.

The ABB submits the above summary of its program and aims, confident that it will receive the earnest attention of the race and that it will earn their active support.

Glossary

Ku Klux Klan	formed in the wake of the Civil War, a group that promoted white supremacy through lynching, violence, and intimidation
peonage	a system by which debtors can pay off their debt by working for their creditors

A Ku Klux Klan parade down Pennsylvania Avenue in Washington, D.C., in the mid-1920s (Library of Congress)

Walter F. White: "The Eruption of Tulsa"

1921

"All that was lacking to make the scene a replica of modern 'Christian' warfare was poison gas."

Overview

The race riot in Tulsa, Oklahoma, of May 31 June 1, 1921, "the night Tulsa died," stands as one of the more disgraceful episodes in American history. Among its first chroniclers was Walter F. White, whose article "The Eruption of Tulsa" appeared in The Nation magazine on July 29 that year. The riot was sparked by a rumor of a sexual assault that was picked up by a city newspaper. Events quickly spiraled out of control as mobs gathered. On the night of May 31 and continuing until noon the following day, gangs of white and black citizens waged open warfare on one another, with white gangs shooting black citizens in public and torching and vandalizing homes and businesses in Tulsa's black Greenwood district. Roughly thirty-five blocks in Greenwood, including more than twelve hundred homes and numerous businesses, were destroyed by fire, and some ten thousand people were left homeless. Although the official death toll was put at thirty-nine, few who have studied the event, including White, believe this figure. According to an American Red Cross investigation, the number was at least three hundred, and some investigators place the number much higher, perhaps in the thousands. Suspicions remain that many of those killed in the rioting were buried in mass graves.

Context

The broad context for the Tulsa race riot was the legacy of slavery in the United States and the complex racial politics of the post Civil War era, when so-called Black Codes enforced racial segregation and a crucial U.S. Supreme Court case, Plessy v. Ferguson (1896), provided legal justification for segregation. But in the early years of the twentieth century, several more specific developments conspired to create the conditions that would erupt in violence in Tulsa. White alludes to many of these conditions in his article.

One development was the reemergence of the Ku Klux Klan. The Klan had been formed in 1866 in Tennessee and in the ensuing years opposed Reconstruction in the South and launched efforts to deny African Americans their rights under the Civil Rights Act of 1866 and other legislation. The Klan's power ebbed in later decades as many of its leaders were arrested, tried, and convicted for crimes against African Americans. The Klan experienced a rebirth after 1915, however, in part because of the enormous popularity of D. W. Griffith's film The Birth of a Nation, based on a 1905 book by Thomas Dixon titled The Clansman. The movie, still considered a classic for its technical brilliance if not its message, romanticized the Klan by depicting its members as defenders of a white American way of life and portraying African Americans as drunkards and rapists.

By the early 1920s the Klan had some three million members, many of them prominent representatives of the middle class, and the group successfully influenced the election of public officials in Indiana, Oregon, and other states, including Oklahoma. In Tulsa, numerous judges, lawyers, doctors, teachers, entertainers, bankers, and businessmen were Klan members. The Klan and its sympathizers enforced their views through violence and intimidation, particularly lynching. The actions of lynch mobs are often thought of as spontaneous outbreaks of violence, but in fact many were planned events, with newspapers announcing their time and place, agents selling train tickets to the sites, and families packing picnic lunches to watch the gruesome spectacles. This lynch-mob mentality would play a major role in the Tulsa riot.

A second development was the newfound voice of the African American community. In 1905 black leaders began the Niagara Movement to combat segregation, disenfranchisement, and lynchings. The movement gained prominence in 1908 after a race riot broke out in Springfield, Illinois, when a white woman claimed that a black man had tried to rape her a charge she later recanted. These and other events led to the formation of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) in 1909. At roughly the same time, Marcus Garvey, a black nationalist, was gaining prominence as the founder of the Universal Negro Improvement Association, which by the early 1920s boasted nearly a million members and was the largest nonreligious black organization in the United States. Garvey's central message was one of black pride and self-help the belief that only blacks could improve their own condition through enterprise. Then, in 1919, the African Blood Brotherhood, a black liberation and self-

Time Line

1901

- Oil is first discovered near Tulsa, Oklahoma, laying the foundation for black economic prosperity.

1908

- August
  Racial violence erupts in Springfield, Illinois, after a white woman claims that she was raped by a black man.

1909

- February 12
  The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People is formed in part as a response to the Springfield riot.

1917

- April 6
  The United States declares war on Germany, entering World War I; four hundred thousand African Americans serve in the military during the war.

1918

- November 11
  The armistice ending hostilities of World War I is signed.

1919

- May 10
  Racial violence breaks out in Charleston, South Carolina, beginning the "Red Summer" of 1919; racial riots erupt in numerous U.S. cities into October.

1921

- May 31
  The Tulsa race riot erupts, continuing into June 1.
- July 29
  Walter F. White publishes "The Eruption of Tulsa" in The Nation.

1997

- April
  Oklahoma House Joint Resolution 1035 creates the Oklahoma Commission to Study the Tulsa Race Riot of 1921.

defense organization with ties to the Communist Party, was formed. Many white Americans looked on these developments with trepidation.

This emphasis on black economic development would play a role in the Tulsa riot. Many African Americans were leaving the Deep South to find greater economic opportunity in the North and Midwest, often placing themselves in competition with whites for jobs at a time when the nation was experiencing unemployment, inflation, and a sharp economic downturn. (The U.S. gross domestic product the total value of goods and services was just shy of $90 billion in 1920; in 1921 the figure was down to $74 billion.) Many black Oklahomans were enjoying some measure of prosperity because of the state's oil boom, which had begun in 1901 with the discovery of oil in the state, accelerated after 1905 with further oil strikes, and in the span of just two decades turned Tulsa from a backwater village into a thriving city. The Greenwood section of northeast Tulsa was a prosperous black commercial and residential district so prosperous that the black leader Booker T. Washington called it the "Negro Wall Street." The relative affluence in Tulsa's black district, with its groceries, restaurants, shops, professional offices, newspapers, churches, hospitals, a library, and even a few millionaires, was a source of racial tension born of jealousy and a belief among many whites that African Americans living in Tulsa's "Little Africa" did not know their "proper" place.

A third development was World War I. After the United States declared war on Germany in April 1917, the administration of President Woodrow Wilson did a masterly job of convincing Americans that war was the only option. They responded enthusiastically to his calls for sacrifice. But one of the side effects of the war was an exaggerated patriotism. Anyone who looked different, spoke with an accent, or had a German name was looked on with suspicion. The wave of immigration to the United States that preceded the war immigration from such places as Italy, eastern Europe, and Russia contributed to a growing sense that America was being "overrun" by potentially subversive elements. The Russian Revolution of 1917 did not help, for many Americans feared that Communists were infiltrating the United States. Labor unrest in the years immediately after World War I was ascribed to Jews, Bolsheviks (Communists), and people who were not white and not Protestant; radical labor organizations often targeted disaffected African Americans for recruitment. In this climate, Tulsa's African American community was barely tolerated prior to the night of May 31, 1921.

Adding to the resentment and climate of hostility was the large number of race riots that had taken place in the war's immediate aftermath when some blacks were lynched while still wearing their military uniforms and ships bearing blacks returning from the war were attacked by mobs. Tensions ran particularly high in 1919. Between May and October, racial violence broke out in at least thirty-four American cities a period that the African American author and NAACP director James Weldon Johnson called the Red Summer of 1919. Many of these riots were relatively small in scale, but others in Charleston, South Carolina; Longview, Texas; Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; Washington, D.C.; Knoxville, Tennessee; Norfolk, Virginia; Omaha, Nebraska; Chicago, Illinois; and Elaine, Arkansas were major events, with loss of life and widespread property damage. These events, combined with labor agitation and bombings perpetrated by Communists and anarchists, fueled a climate of fear and suspicion that could erupt in violence anywhere.

The fuse in Tulsa was lit on the late afternoon of May 30. A nineteen-year-old shoe shiner named Dick Rowland needed to use a restroom. The only one available for a "colored" person was on the top floor of the nearby Drexel Building in downtown Tulsa. He entered an elevator operated by seventeen-year-old Sarah Page, who was white. It is unclear what exactly happened in the elevator, for no copy of Page's statement to the police exists, but it appears that Rowland may have tripped upon entering the elevator or may have accidentally stepped on Page's foot and in an effort to regain his balance, he threw out his hand and grabbed her arm. Another version of the story is that Page somehow slipped, and Rowland reached out to steady her. In either case, Page apparently cried out. A clerk in a clothing store on the first floor of the building heard the cry, saw a young black man hurriedly leaving the building, found Page in a distraught frame of mind, and summoned the police. The police did not regard the incident as serious, but the following morning they pursued Rowland to his mother's home in Greenwood and took him to the Tulsa County Courthouse for questioning.

Matters might have ended there, but in its afternoon edition of May 31 the Tulsa Tribune ran a story with the headline "Nab Negro for Attacking Girl in an Elevator." The incident, thus, tapped into the "rape myth," common at the time, which perpetuated the notion that white women needed to be protected from black sexual predators. Additionally, the paper ran a second story claiming that a lynch mob was forming, though it is unknown what the paper's source of information was. Interestingly, the second story was removed from the paper's later edition and then removed from its archives; no copy of the story has been found. In response, a crowd of white people began gathering at the courthouse. Many were just curious onlookers, but many others were outraged at what they believed had been an assault on a white woman by a black man. By early evening the growing crowd had all the earmarks of a lynch mob.

Over the next several hours, white and black citizens began arming themselves. Small teams of armed blacks appeared at the courthouse and in the surrounding area, offering to help the sheriff protect Rowland from the mob, but they were turned away. In response to what appeared to be a "Negro uprising," bands of whites took up arms, and the size of the crowd around the courthouse swelled to perhaps two thousand. Sometime after 10:00 PM a shot rang out, sparking gunfire that left several whites and blacks dead on the streets. Matters escalated as bands of whites pursued blacks to the Greenwood section, looting stores for guns and ammunition along the way and attempting to seize weapons from the National Guard armory. Meanwhile, Greenwood's residents were panicking, either gathering weapons or fleeing north away from the city. Throughout the night, groups of whites and blacks fired on each other across the railroad tracks that separated Greenwood from the white part of town. Fires were set in two dozen black-owned businesses at the edge of Greenwood. Some white and Hispanic Tulsans took up arms to come to the defense of the black community, but the sheer number of rioters overwhelmed them.

Matters escalated again after sunup at about 5:00 AM on June 1. White gangs gathered to launch an all-out assault on Greenwood, firing indiscriminately on any blacks who had not yet fled. There were reports that planes were dropping firebombs into the community, and throughout the early morning, fires spread throughout Greenwood. Meanwhile, African Americans, many of them injured, were being held at detention centers, and local hospitals treated some eight hundred people who were injured in the rioting, near-

Time Line

2000

- February 5
  The Oklahoma Commission recommends that reparations be paid to the survivors of the Tulsa race riot.

2001

- February 28
  The Oklahoma Commission issues its report, Tulsa Race Riot: A Report by the Oklahoma Commission to Study the Tulsa Race Riot of 1921.
- April 7
  The Tulsa Reparations Commission is formed.

2003

- April 28
  A lawsuit on behalf of the survivors of the Tulsa riot is filed in U.S. District Court; the case is dismissed in 2004.

2004

- June 21
  The U.S. Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals hears an appeal of the 2003 lawsuit; on September 8 the court rules that the statute of limitations has passed.

2009

- The John Hope Franklin Tulsa-Greenwood Race Riot Claims Accountability bill is introduced to the U.S. Congress.

ly all of them white. People in the city's white section were threatened with violence and vandalism if they did not turn over black cooks and housekeepers to the rioters.

Finally, at about 9:00 AM on June 1, Oklahoma National Guard troops began arriving from Oklahoma City. Tulsa was placed under martial law, and by noon the violence had come to an end. Greenwood, though, was a smoking war zone. On June 7, the Tulsa City Commission passed a fire ordinance saying that the Greenwood commercial district could not be rebuilt, but the district was, in fact, later rebuilt. A grand jury was convened with a view to charging the perpetrators of the riot, but, as quoted in the "Tulsa Race Riot" Web site by Scott Ellsworth, the grand jury concluded that "there was no mob spirit among the whites, no talk of lynching and no arms. The assembly was quiet until the arrival of armed Negroes, which precipitated and was the direct cause of the entire affair." Many white Tulsans were horrified by what had been wrought in their city and opened their homes to homeless blacks, and the American Red Cross provided food and tents for the homeless. But a sense of shame settled over the city, and the Tulsa riot became a largely forgotten event until the 1990s.

About the Author

Walter Francis White, one of the most prominent civil rights leaders of the first half of the twentieth century, was born on July 1, 1893, in Atlanta, Georgia. After graduating from Atlanta University in 1916, he joined the staff of the NAACP in New York City in 1918. He worked under James Weldon Johnson as the NAACP's assistant national secretary until 1931, when he became the executive director a position he held until his death. Throughout his career, he led the NAACP's fight against discrimination, lynching, disenfranchisement, and segregation. He was instrumental in creating the organization's Legal Defense Fund, which sought equal justice in the courts. He was the motivating force behind President Harry Truman's order to desegregate the military after World War II, and under his direction the Legal Defense Fund led the efforts to erase segregated schooling that culminated in the 1954 U.S. Supreme Court case Brown v. Board of Education.

White was the author of numerous essays that appeared in national magazines. During his early years in the NAACP, he investigated lynchings and riots, often traveling incognito to the sites of these events and putting himself in great personal danger in the process, though his ability to "pass" as white because of his light complexion helped gain him access to the police, politicians, and others. In 1919, for example, he traveled to Arkansas to investigate the riot that had taken place in Elaine in October of that year and fled the town in the face of threats. Seventy-nine African Americans were arrested, tried, and convicted for their role in that riot. As a result of White's efforts, the U.S. Supreme Court eventually overturned the convictions on the ground that armed observers in the courtroom and an armed mob outside the courthouse had a tendency to intimidate the jury.

White was also a prominent figure in the Harlem Renaissance, the flowering of black culture and art that was centered in the Harlem neighborhood of New York City in the 1920s and 1930s. He was the author of several books, including Fire in the Flint (1924), Flight (1926), Rope and Faggot (1929), A Rising Wind (1945), and How Far the Promised Land (1955). His autobiography, A Man Called White, was published in 1948. A novel titled Blackjack was left unfinished when he died on March 21, 1955, in New York City.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

White begins his article by sketching in broad strokes the events that happened in Tulsa. He notes that the incident was sparked by the report of a "hysterical white girl" and suggests that her account of what happened in the elevator was dubious, given that she was of "doubtful reputation" and that the alleged attack occurred in "open daylight" in a city of one hundred thousand people (though he later acknowledges the 1920 U.S. Census figure of seventy-two thousand). White ironically refers to "100-per-cent Americans" who acted on the report without bothering to verify it, causing death and destruction. In the second paragraph, White laments the "grip" that mob violence can have on the "throat of America," where that violence can break out anywhere and at any time.

Beginning with the third paragraph, White traces the backdrop for the event. He provides statistics on Tulsa, including its dramatic population growth and its prosperity as a result of the state's oil boom. In the fifth paragraph he notes that African Americans had shared in the prosperity, to the "bitter resentment" of "the lower order of whites," who believed that the city's African Americans were "presumptuous" in their prosperity. Many of these whites, immigrants from southern states, were themselves "lethargic and unprogressive by nature." White then proceeds to detail that prosperity, noting that Tulsa was home to at least three black millionaires and several others with substantial assets. Because of changes in the value of the dollar from inflation, $25,000 in 1921 is equivalent to about $287,000 today.

White goes on to discuss the supposed "radical" views of Tulsa's black population and dismisses this belief by noting that the community simply wanted an end to "'Jim-Crow' [railroad] cars, lynching, peonage." "Jim Crow" is the informal name given to laws designed to keep African Americans in subservient positions, such as laws requiring them to ride in separate railroad cars. "Peonage" refers to a system that requires debtors to work for their creditors until the debt is discharged. Although White provides no particulars about peonage, it was well known at the time that many blacks in the surrounding area and throughout Oklahoma were virtual slaves on their own land because of debts owed to the white establishment. White asserts that black efforts to emancipate themselves from these conditions fostered resentment on the part of whites.

The seventh paragraph details the rough-and-tumble nature of life in Tulsa at that time, where justice was as likely to be enacted at the end of a gun or noose as in the courtroom. White notes that corruption and vice permeated the city and that large numbers of people were interested not in the community's civic life but in making money and getting away with illegal activities. He claims that 6 percent of the county's residents were under indictment, with little likelihood that their cases would ever come to trial. White provides further startling facts in the eighth paragraph. When a white man charged with murder was lynched, the police directed traffic so that onlookers could get a view of the event. Insurance companies refused to do business in Tulsa because the risk was too great. All of this, in White's view, fostered disrespect for the law among both blacks and whites.

Black detainees are led to the Convention Hall following the race riot in Tulsa, Oklahoma. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Paragraphs 9 through 12 detail the events of the riot: the incident in the elevator, the newspaper account of the alleged assault, the gathering of a lynch mob and the fears in the black community that Rowland would fall into the hands of the mob, and the escalating violence. White repeats the claim that airplanes were used to drop incendiary bombs on the Greenwood community, a charge that would later be investigated and found to likely have been true. White makes his account more graphic and dramatic by focusing on the fates of individuals, such as an aged couple who were shot in their home and a prominent doctor who was shot to death while being taken to a detention center. This man had been described by the "Mayo brothers" (Charles and William Mayo, famous as the founders of the Mayo Clinics) as "the most able Negro surgeon in America."

In the thirteenth paragraph, White addresses the number of casualties. He rejects the official body count and calls attention to the activities of gravediggers, which suggest that the death toll was much greater than that given by the authorities. He notes that at least some victims of the riot were "incinerated" in their homes and that there were reports of truckloads of bodies being dumped in the nearby Arkansas River, though he acknowledges that this rumor could not be confirmed. In more recent years, the charge that the dead were hastily buried in mass graves has been raised. Some efforts have been made to investigate the matter using archaeological methods, but no systematic search for these graves has been made, and the results have been inconclusive.

In the final paragraph White grows more rhetorical. He refers to the riot's "horrible carnage" and suggests that it was worse than the crimes being ascribed to the "Bolsheviki," or Bolsheviks, referring to the political party in Russia regarded as synonymous with Communism. He uses the word "pogroms," referring to organized or spontaneous rioting directed against a religious or ethnic group and again associated with Russia. White concludes by noting the willingness of Tulsa's black population (which he asserts to be fifteen thousand but which most sources put at ten or eleven thousand) to come to the defense of Dick Rowland, and he suggests that a "nationwide Tulsa" might be necessary to "wake" the United States to racial injustice.

Audience

White's account was published in The Nation, which had been founded in 1865 and, in the twenty-first century, remains the oldest continuously published weekly magazine in America. It was founded in New York City at the end of the Civil War to celebrate the North's victory, and throughout its history the magazine has espoused liberal and progressive causes. Thus, White's article would have been read by Americans who likely sympathized with the magazine's stand on such issues as civil rights, imperialism,

Essential Quotes

"[Tulsa's] reign of terror stands as a grim reminder of the grip mob violence has on the throat of America, and the ever-present possibility of devastating race conflicts where least expected."

(Paragraph 2)

"The Negroes of Tulsa and other Oklahoma cities are pioneers; men and women who have dared, men and women who have had the initiative and the courage to pull up stakes in other less-favored States and face hardship in a newer one for the sake of greater eventual progress. That type is ever less ready to submit to insult."

(Paragraph 6)

"All that was lacking to make the scene a replica of modern 'Christian' warfare was poison gas."

(Paragraph 11)

"One story was told me by an eye-witness of five colored men trapped in a burning house. Four burned to death. A fifth attempted to flee, was shot to death as he emerged from the burning structure, and his body was thrown back into the flames. There was an unconfirmed rumor afloat in Tulsa of two truck loads of dead Negroes being dumped into the Arkansas River, but that story could not be confirmed."

(Paragraph 13)

"There is a lesson in the Tulsa affair for every American who fatuously believes that Negroes will always be the meek and submissive creatures that circumstances have forced them to be during the past three hundred years."

(Paragraph 14)

war, trade unionism, and other issues of concern to liberals and progressives. During its history, most of its editors have drawn the attention of the FBI and other authorities, who have suspected the magazine of subversive tendencies. It is noteworthy that an African American was able to publish his article in a "white" magazine at a time when the work of African American writers usually appeared in organs published by and for African Americans.

Impact

It is difficult to assess any particular impact that White's article had at the time. The article was one of a flurry of reports about the events in Tulsa, and it was one small piece of the mosaic of efforts on the part of White, the NAACP, and other African American leaders to call the nation's attention to violence and injustice against their race. Ultimately, White's article, along with oral histories of the riot and other documents, would have an effect. For decades, the riot had merited barely a mention in history books, and in Oklahoma the event was seemingly purged from the state's collective memory. Few efforts were made at an official level to right the wrongs done in 1921. Although Greenwood was rebuilt (and became a thriving center for jazz music), most of the African Americans who had lived there fled. In the shadow of the event's utter shamefulness, the riot was forgotten, at least as far as any official commemoration was concerned. But as the seventy-fifth anniversary of the riot approached in 1996, many Oklahomans came to believe that it was time to document the riot and set the record straight. The goal was to improve race relations and, possibly, provide reparations for the riot's survivors and the descendants of those who lost their lives. Approximately 124 survivors were known at that time, 45 of them living in Tulsa. Many of them had been young boys who had passed ammunition to adults attempting to fend off the assaults.

In April 1997, Oklahoma House Joint Resolution 1035 created the Oklahoma Commission to Study the Tulsa Race Riot of 1921. On February 28, 2001, the commission delivered its report, Tulsa Race Riot: A Report by the Oklahoma Commission to Study the Tulsa Race Riot of 1921. On one level, the report achieved its aim. The state legislature went on record as accepting moral responsibility for the Tulsa riot. The report created a comprehensive record of the riot, and, in connection with the commission's investigation, numerous books were published, Web sites and physical exhibits about the riot were created, a documentary film titled Before They Die! was produced, and the occurrence of the riot was brought to the nation's attention through television and newspaper reports, news radio stories, magazine articles, talk shows, and other documentaries.

The Oklahoma legislature, however, declined to pay reparations. While deploring the events, members of the legislature argued that the state's taxpayers should not be forced to pay reparations for events they did not cause. They further argued that the riot was not the result of government action. Although the sheriff, other local authorities, and the National Guard may have been culpable in failing to prevent the riot or may have been slow to respond, the rioters, the legislature argued, were private citizens, not government actors. In this way they distinguished the matter from the government's payment of reparations to the survivors of the Japanese internment during World War II, an action of the federal government.

The Tulsa Reparations Commission, formed shortly after the report was released in 2001, thought differently. In 2003 the new commission filed suit in U.S. District Court, asking for reparations and naming the city of Tulsa, its police chief and police department, and the state of Oklahoma as defendants. In March 2004, U.S. District Court Judge James O. Ellison dismissed the suit, ruling that the statute of limitations had long passed. Ellison made clear that the event was a horrible tragedy and indicated that he was not happy about his ruling, but the law, he said, gave him no choice. The plaintiffs in the case, led by Harvard lawyer Charles J. Ogletree, Jr., argued that the statute of limitations should run from the time the commission issued its report. Most of the riot's survivors were unaware of the full scope of the riot and had been barred from pursuing legal claims in the past. Ellison rejected this argument.

In response to the district court's ruling, the plaintiffs appealed to the U.S. Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals. The court heard the appeal on June 21, 2004, and issued its ruling on September 8 of that year. The court affirmed the district court's ruling, holding that while the statute of limitations can be recalibrated under extraordinary circumstances, such conditions did not exist in this case. On March 9, 2005, the plaintiffs petitioned the U.S. Supreme Court to hear the case on appeal, but the Court declined to do so. In 2007 the

Questions for Further Study

1. Summarize the social, economic, and political events that laid the foundation for the eruption of violence in Tulsa, Oklahoma.

2. Racial violence was sometimes sparked by competition for jobs, particularly during tough economic times. To what extent were the concerns of labor, sometimes expressed by the radical labor movement, involved in the violence that erupted in Tulsa?

3. Why do you think people in the state of Oklahoma decided to revisit the Tulsa race riot after so many years? Do you believe that doing so was a positive step, or did it just reopen old wounds?

4. What is your position on the issue of paying reparations to the survivors of those affected by the Tulsa riot?

5. Why do you believe that so much racial violence erupted in the wake of World War I?

Tulsa-Greenwood Race Riot Claims Accountability bill was submitted to the U.S. House of Representatives with a view to providing legislative relief to the survivors. After the death of John Hope Franklin, a prominent black historian and the son of one of the riot's survivors, the bill was renamed the John Hope Franklin Tulsa-Greenwood Race Riot Claims Accountability bill of 2009. As of 2010, the bill was in committee in the House of Representatives. Walter F. White's dramatic account of the events in Tulsa became part of the historical record in efforts to heal the wounds the riot opened nearly a century ago.

See also Niagara Movement Declaration of Principles (1905); Plessy v. Ferguson (1896); Brown v. Board of Education (1954).

Further Reading

Books

Brophy, Alfred L. Reconstructing the Dreamland: The Tulsa Race Riot of 1921: Race, Reparations, and Reconciliation. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.

Ellsworth, Scott. Death in a Promised Land: The Tulsa Race Riot of 1921. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1982.

Halliburton, R. The Tulsa Race War of 1921. San Francisco: R and E Research Associates, 1975.

Hirsch, James S. Riot and Remembrance: The Tulsa Race War and Its Legacy. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 2002.

Hower, Bob, and Maurice Willows. 1921 Tulsa Race Riot and the American Red Cross, "Angels of Mercy." Tulsa, Okla.: Homestead Press, 1993.

Johnson, Hannibal B. Black Wall Street: From Riot to Renaissance in Tulsa's Historic Greenwood District. Austin, Tex.: Eakin Press, 1998.

Madigan, Tim. The Burning: Massacre, Destruction, and the Tulsa Race Riot of 1921. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2001.

Parrish, Mary E. Jones. Race Riot 1921: Events of the Tulsa Disaster. Tulsa, Okla.: Out on a Limb Publishers, 1998.

Williams, Lee E., and Lee E. Williams II. Anatomy of Four Race Riots: Racial Conflict in Knoxville, Elaine (Arkansas), Tulsa, and Chicago, 1919 1921. Hattiesburg: University and College Press of Mississippi, 1972.

Web Sites

Ellsworth, Scott. "The Tulsa Race Riot." Tulsa Reparations Coalition Web site.
http://www.tulsareparations.org/TulsaRiot.htm.

"Tulsa Race Riot." Oklahoma Historical Society "Encyclopedia of Oklahoma History and Culture" Web site.
http://digital.library.okstate.edu/encyclopedia/entries/T/TU013.html.

University of Tulsa, McFarlin Library, "Tulsa Race Riot of 1921 Archive Photographs" Web site.
http://www.lib.utulsa.edu/Speccoll/collections/RaceRiot/indexphotos.htm.

Michael J. O'Neal

Document Text

Walter F. White: "The Eruption of Tulsa"

A hysterical white girl related that a nineteen-year-old colored boy attempted to assault her in the public elevator of a public office building of a thriving town of 100,000 in open daylight. Without pausing to find whether or not the story was true, without bothering with the slight detail of investigating the character of the woman who made the outcry (as a matter of fact, she was of exceedingly doubtful reputation), a mob of 100-per-cent Americans set forth on a wild rampage that cost the lives of fifty white men; of between 150 and 200 colored men, women and children; the destruction by fire of $1,500,000 worth of property; the looting of many homes; and everlasting damage to the reputation of the city of Tulsa and the State of Oklahoma.

This, in brief, is the story of the eruption of Tulsa on the night of May 31 and the morning of June 1. One could travel far and find few cities where the likelihood of trouble between the races was as little thought of as in Tulsa. Her reign of terror stands as a grim reminder of the grip mob violence has on the throat of America, and the ever-present possibility of devastating race conflicts where least expected.

Tulsa is a thriving, bustling, enormously wealthy town of between 90,000 and 100,000. In 1910 it was the home of 18,182 souls, a dead and hopeless outlook ahead. Then oil was discovered. The town grew amazingly. On December 29, 1920, it had bank deposits totaling $65,449,985.90; almost $1,000 per capita when compared with the Federal Census figures of 1920, which gave Tulsa 72,076. The town lies in the center of the oil region and many are the stories told of the making of fabulous fortunes by men who were operating on a shoe-string. Some of the stories rival those of the "forty-niners" in California. The town has a number of modern office buildings, many beautiful homes, miles of clean, well-paved streets, and aggressive and progressive business men who well exemplify Tulsa's motto of "The City with a Personality."

So much for the setting. What are the causes of the race riot that occurred in such a place?

First, the Negro in Oklahoma has shared in the sudden prosperity that has come to many of his white brothers, and there are some colored men there who are wealthy. This fact has caused a bitter resentment on the part of the lower order of whites, who feel that these colored men, members of an "inferior race," are exceedingly presumptuous in achieving greater economic prosperity than they who are members of a divinely ordered superior race. There are at least three colored persons in Oklahoma who are worth a million dollars each; J. W. Thompson of Clearview is worth $500,000; there are a number of men and women worth $100,000; and many whose possessions are valued at $25,000 and $50,000 each. This was particularly true of Tulsa, where there were two colored men worth $150,000 each; two worth $100,000; three $50,000; and four who were assessed at $25,000. In one case where a colored man owned and operated a printing plant with $25,000 worth of printing machinery in it, the leader of the mob that set fire to and destroyed the plant was a linotype operator employed for years by the colored owner at $48 per week. The white man was killed while attacking the plant. Oklahoma is largely populated by pioneers from other States. Some of the white pioneers are former residents of Mississippi, Georgia, Tennessee, Texas, and other States more typically southern than Oklahoma. These have brought with them their anti-Negro prejudices. Lethargic and unprogressive by nature, it sorely irks them to see Negroes making greater progress than they themselves are achieving.

One of the charges made against the colored men in Tulsa is that they were "radical." Questioning the whites more closely regarding the nature of this radicalism, I found it means that Negroes were uncompromisingly denouncing "Jim-Crow" [railroad] cars, lynching, peonage; in short, were asking that the Federal constitutional guaranties of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" be given regardless of color. The Negroes of Tulsa and other Oklahoma cities are pioneers; men and women who have dared, men and women who have had the initiative and the courage to pull up stakes in other less-favored States and face hardship in a newer one for the sake of greater eventual progress. That type is ever less ready to submit to insult. Those of the whites who seek to maintain the old white group control naturally do not relish seeing Negroes emancipating themselves from the old system.

A third cause was the rotten political conditions in Tulsa. A vice ring was in control of the city, allowing open operation of houses of ill fame, of gambling joints, the illegal sale of whiskey, the robbing of banks and stores, with hardly a slight possibility of the arrest of the criminals, and even less of their conviction. For fourteen years Tulsa has been in the absolute control of this element. Most of the better element, and there is a large percentage of Tulsans who can properly be classed as such, are interested solely in making money and getting away. They have taken little or no interest in the election of city or county officials, leaving it to those whose interest it was to secure officials who would protect them in their vice operations. About two months ago the State legislature assigned two additional judges to Tulsa County to aid the present two in clearing the badly clogged dockets. These judges found more than six thousand cases awaiting trial. Thus in a county of approximately 100,000 population, six out of every one hundred citizens were under indictment for some sort of crime, with little likelihood of trial in any of them.

Last July a white man by the name of Roy Belton, accused of murdering a taxicab driver, was taken from the county jail and lynched. According to the statements of many prominent Tulsans, local police officers directed traffic at the scene of the lynching, trying to afford every person present an equal chance to view the event. Insurance companies refuse to give Tulsa merchants insurance on their stocks; the risk is too great. There have been so many automobile thefts that a number of companies have canceled all policies on care in Tulsa. The net result of these conditions was that practically none of the citizens of the town, white or colored, had very much respect for the law.

So much for the general causes. What was the spark that set off the blaze? On Monday, May 30, a white girl by the name of Sarah Page, operating an elevator in the Drexel Building, stated that Dick Rowland, a nineteen-year-old colored boy, had attempted criminally to assault her. Her second story was that the boy had seized her arm as he entered the elevator. She screamed. He ran. It was found afterwards that the boy had stepped by accident on her foot. It seems never to have occurred to the citizens of Tulsa that any sane person attempting criminally to assault a woman would have picked any place in the world rather than an open elevator in a public building with scores of people within calling distance. The story of the alleged assault was published Tuesday afternoon by the Tulsa Tribune, one of the two local newspapers. At four o'clock Commissioner of Police J. M. Adkison reported to Sheriff [Willard] McCullough that there was talk of lynching Rowland that night. Chief of Police John A. Gustafson, Captain Wilkerson of the Police Department, Edwin F. Barnett, managing editor of the Tulsa Tribune, and numerous other citizens all stated that there was talk Tuesday of lynching the boy.

In the meantime the news of the threatened lynching reached the colored settlement where Tulsa's 15,000 colored citizens lived. Remembering how a white man had been lynched after being taken from the same jail where the colored boy was now confined, they feared that Rowland was in danger. A group of colored men telephoned the sheriff and proffered their services in protecting the jail from attack. The sheriff told them that they would be called upon if needed. About nine o'clock that night a crowd of white men gathered around the jail, numbering about 400 according to Sheriff McCullough. At 9:15 [PM] the report reached "Little Africa" that the mob had stormed the jail. A crowd of twenty-five armed Negroes set out immediately, but on reaching the jail found the report untrue. The sheriff talked with them, assured them that the boy would not be harmed, and urged them to return to their homes. They left, later returning, 75 strong. The sheriff persuaded them to leave. As they complied, a white man attempted to disarm one of the colored men. A shot was fired, and then in the words of the sheriff "all hell broke loose." There was a fusillade of shots from both sides and twelve men fell dead two of them colored, ten white. The fighting continued until midnight when the colored men, greatly outnumbered, were forced back to their section of the town.

Around five o'clock Wednesday morning the [white] mob, now numbering more than 10,000, made a mass attack on Little Africa. Machine-guns were brought into use; eight aeroplanes were employed to spy on the movements of the Negroes and according to some were used in bombing the colored section. All that was lacking to make the scene a replica of modern "Christian" warfare was poison gas. The colored men and women fought gamely in defense of their homes, but the odds were too great. According to the statements of onlookers, men in uniform, either home guards or ex-service men or both, carried cans of oil into Little Africa, and, after looting the homes, set fire to them. Many are the stories of horror told to me not by colored people but by white residents. One was that of an aged colored couple, saying their evening prayers before retiring in their little home on Greenwood Avenue. A mob broke into the house, shot both of the old people in the backs of their heads, blowing their brains out and spattering them over the bed, pillaged the home, and then set fire to it.

Document Text

Another was that of the death of Dr. A. C. Jackson, a colored physician. Dr. Jackson was worth $100,000; had been described by the Mayo brothers "the most able Negro surgeon in America"; was respected by white and colored people alike, and was in every sense a good citizen. A mob attacked Dr. Jackson's home. He fought in defense of it, his wife and children and himself. An officer of the home guards who knew Dr. Jackson came up at that time and assured him that if he would surrender he would be protected. This Dr. Jackson did. The officer sent him under guard to Convention Hall, where colored people were being placed for protection. En route to the hall, disarmed, Dr. Jackson was shot and killed in cold blood. The officer who had assured Dr. Jackson of protection stated to me, "Dr. Jackson was an able, clean-cut man. He did only what any red-blooded man would have done under similar circumstances in defending his home. Dr. Jackson was murdered by white ruffians."

It is highly doubtful if the exact number of casualties will ever be known. The figures originally given in the press estimate the number at 100. The number buried by local undertakers and given out by city officials is ten white and twenty-one colored. For obvious reasons these officials wish to keep the number published as low as possible, but the figures obtained in Tulsa are far higher. Fifty whites and between 150 and 200 Negroes is much nearer the actual number of deaths. Ten whites were killed during the first hour of fighting on Tuesday night. Six white men drove into the colored section in a car on Wednesday morning and never came out. Thirteen whites were killed between 5:30 AM and 6:30 AM Wednesday. O. T. Johnson, commandant of the Tulsa Citadel of the Salvation Army, stated that on Wednesday and Thursday the Salvation Army fed thirty-seven Negroes employed as grave diggers and twenty on Friday and Saturday. During the first two days these men dug 120 graves in each of which a dead Negro was buried. No coffins were used. The bodies were dumped into the holes and covered over with dirt. Added to the number accounted for were numbers of others men, women, and children who were incinerated in the burning houses in the Negro settlement. One story was told me by an eyewitness of five colored men trapped in a burning house. Four burned to death. A fifth attempted to flee, was shot to death as he emerged from the burning structure, and his body was thrown back into the flames. There was an unconfirmed rumor afloat in Tulsa of two truck loads of dead Negroes being dumped into the Arkansas River, but that story could not be confirmed.

What is America going to do after such a horrible carnage one that for sheer brutality and murderous anarchy cannot be surpassed by any of the crimes now being charged to the Bolsheviki in Russia? How much longer will America allow these pogroms to continue unchecked? There is a lesson in the Tulsa affair for every American who fatuously believes that Negroes will always be the meek and submissive creatures that circumstances have forced them to be during the past three hundred years. Dick Rowland was only an ordinary bootblack with no standing in the community. But when his life was threatened by a mob of whites, every one of the 15,000 Negroes of Tulsa, rich and poor, educated and illiterate, was willing to die to protect Dick Rowland. Perhaps America is waiting for a nationwide Tulsa to wake her. Who knows?

Glossary

Bolsheviki	usually spelled Bolsheviks, referring to the political party in Russia regarded as synonymous with Communism
Citadel	the name given to any church building used by the Salvation Army
forty-niners	gold prospectors who migrated to California during the gold rush of 1849
Mayo brothers	Charles and William Mayo, famous as the founders of the Mayo Clinic
peonage	a system that requires debtors to work for their creditors until the debt is discharged
pogroms	organized or spontaneous rioting directed against a religious or ethnic group, usually associated with Communist Russia

Marcus Garvey (Library of Congress)

Marcus Garvey: "The Principles of the Universal Negro Improvement Association"

1922

"We represent a new line of thought among Negroes."

Overview

Long before the term Black Power became a rallying cry for dispossessed communities throughout the African diaspora, the noted Jamaican activist Marcus Mosiah Garvey gained international recognition for opposing power arrangements that adversely affected the life chances and experiences of African-descended peoples. Presenting universal truths that transcended geographical, class, and national boundaries, Garvey built a global, Pan-African movement that galvanized blacks from the dirt roads of Clarksdale, Mississippi, to the impoverished streets of Kingston, Jamaica. No small factor in Garvey's massive appeal was the self-determinist impulse, a dominant theme in his classic 1922 speech "The Principles of the Universal Negro Improvement Association" (UNIA). Over the course of this energetic and impassioned address, which Garvey delivered in New York City on November 25, 1922, the UNIA leader assails the arrogance of white privilege, decries those who embrace a politics of apathy, and reminds his followers of the transformative power of self-love and self-respect. Three important aspects of the UNIA political agenda can be gauged from this text: the strong emphasis Garvey placed on the need for blacks both to pursue a political agenda independent of whites and to engage in the politics of statecraft and nation building and the strong humanist impulse undergirding the Garvey movement.

Context

Commonly referred to as the New Negro era, the 1920s was a time of great political and cultural upheaval in black America. The massive migration of southern blacks to the urban North, the explosion of artistic expression associated with the Harlem Renaissance, and the meteoric rise of Marcus Garvey's UNIA transformed the contours of black political thought, as well as African Americans' and West Indians' expectations of what was politically possible in the contemporary world. No leader benefited more from the growing militancy of African Americans than Marcus Garvey. To capture the attention of black Americans disgruntled that their sacrifices during World War I had not brought racial democracy to the United States or the rest of the West, Garvey preached a message of race pride, Pan-African unity, and self-determination. Transformative change for people of African descent, he regularly informed his followers, could be achieved only through their own initiatives. "It is of no use for the Negro," Garvey once remarked (as quoted in Marcus Garvey Papers), "to continue to depend on the good graces of the other races of the world, because we are living in a selfish, material age, when each and every race is looking out for itself." Toward the goal of empowering his race, Garvey organized the UNIA, formed various economic cooperatives and initiatives, hosted international conventions, and started a newspaper, The Negro World, with a large readership that spanned the globe. Such endeavors gave Garvey a huge following, particularly in the United States, where hundreds of thousands of African Americans and West Indians championed his program.

Garvey's message, though, was not entirely new. In the nineteenth century, one of the earliest proponents of black nationalism was Henry Highland Garnett, an abolitionist and orator who supported the emigration of African Americans to Mexico, the West Indies, or the African nation of Liberia. At about the same time, Edward Wilmot Blyden, an educator, writer, and diplomat, traveled to Liberia, where he came to believe that the only hope for African Americans was for them to return to Africa. One of the most prominent black nationalists from the same time period was Martin R. Delany. Delany, born in Virginia in 1812, pursued numerous careers throughout his life: physician, educator, political candidate, journalist, author, and African explorer. He edited one of the earliest African American newspapers, The Mystery, and worked briefly alongside Frederick Douglass on The North Star newspaper. Early on he adopted Douglass's integrationist approach, but he later broke with Douglass by proposing a program of black separatism and black emigration, most of these views developed in his 1852 book The Condition, Elevation, Emigration, and Destiny of the Colored People of the United States, Politically Considered. Later, after the Civil War, Henry McNeal Turner, a bishop in the African Episcopal Methodist Church, faced entrenched racism in his native Georgia. He and a number of other African Americans were elected to the Georgia legislature in 1868.

Time Line

1887

- August 17
  Malchus Mosiah Garvey, Jr., is born in St. Ann's Bay, Jamaica.

1914

- August
  Garvey founds the Universal Negro Improvement Association (UNIA).

1917

- May
  Garvey founds the New York division of the UNIA.

1919

- June 27
  The Black Star Line is incorporated by the members of the UNIA with Garvey as president.
- November
  The Bureau of Investigation, forerunner of the FBI, launches an investigation of Garvey and UNIA.

1922

- January 12
  Garvey, along with other Black Star Line officials, is arrested on mail fraud charges.
- November 25
  Garvey delivers his address "The Principles of the Universal Negro Improvement Association" to an audience in Liberty Hall in New York City.

1923

- June 23
  Garvey is sentenced to five years in prison for using the mails to deceive the public.

1925

- February 8
  Garvey begins serving a five-year sentence in the Atlanta Federal Penitentiary.

1927

- November
  President Calvin Coolidge commutes Garvey's sentence, and he is released from prison and deported to Jamaica.

Initially, the legislature refused to seat them, backing down only under protests from Washington, D.C. Turner became so discouraged about the lack of racial progress that he supported the Back to Africa movement and black nationalism. He often shocked listeners with his fiery oratory and his belief that God was black.

Thus, when Marcus Garvey created the UNIA in Jamaica in 1914 (under the name Universal Negro Improvement and Conservation Association and African Communities League), the foundations for the black nationalism he espoused had already been laid. He returned to New York City to create the New York division of the UNIA, which originally had just thirteen members. Three months later the organization had 3,500 members. On August 17, 1918, Garvey founded The Negro World, a weekly newspaper that published articles of interest not only to African Americans but to members of the African diaspora around the world. By 1920 the organization had more than eleven hundred divisions in at least forty countries and claimed four million members. On August 13, 1920, at the organization's first convention, it published the "Declaration of Rights of the Negro Peoples of the World."

Garvey was of the opinion that the political and economic freedom of blacks in the West depended on their connection to an African nation-state with the political leverage to protect the rights of African-descended peoples regardless of their nationality. Accordingly, he directed his attention to helping Liberia develop into a world power. Late in the spring of 1920, he dispatched Elie Garcia, the auditor-general of the UNIA, to Monrovia, Liberia, where he communicated the organization's Pan-African goals to government officials, queried about the possibility of forming a UNIA colony on unsettled land, and stated the association's willingness to lend financial support to the country. Liberia's secretary of state, Edwin Barclay, informed Garcia of the government's interest in giving the association facilities for promoting industry, agriculture, and business projects.

The Liberian agenda, however, proved to be problematic. Even though the country had its share of financial and political problems, Garvey had faith that Liberia could develop into a world power if its leaders embraced a partnership with the UNIA. To realize his agenda, Garvey created the Liberian Construction Loan in the fall of 1920 with the purpose of building colleges, universities, industrial plants, railroad tracks, and roads and to provide opportunities for artisans and craftsmen to develop industries. An industrially developed Liberia, Garvey believed, would give men and women who wanted to start off independently the opportunity to build fortunes. Many women and men in the UNIA were interested in leaving the United States for Liberia, but several things stood in their way. The UNIA lacked the resources to facilitate the migration of interested parties to Liberia.

By 1921, Garvey's Black Star Line (BSL), a steamship line, faced serious financial trouble owing to the postwar recession, its ships' constant mechanical troubles, and administrative ineptitude. Even if the BSL had the capital to purchase vessels capable of making trips from the United States to West Africa, the UNIA would have still had problems overcoming certain diplomatic concerns. Garvey's Pan-African vision included not only a more economically and politically stable Liberia but also a continent loosened from England's and France's colonial yoke. As was to be expected, France and England saw Garvey's political agenda as antithetical to their imperialistic designs and activities. Not wishing to provoke these powers, Liberia's president, C. D. B. King, protected his country's national interest by gradually disassociating itself from the UNIA. Nevertheless, Garvey continued to place Liberia at the center of his political program, spreading his Pan-African message as he toured various sections of the United States.

Garvey also met with resistance from elements of the black American community, some of whom dismissed him as a racist demagogue and were contemptuous of his political style, approach, and plans. W. E. B. Du Bois, James Weldon Johnson, and A. Philip Randolph, among other leaders, dismissed his program as impractical, impossible, and detrimental to the black liberation struggle in America. In their writings and in their speeches, these leaders attacked Garvey's physical characteristics, his Jamaican background, and his working-class followers. On rare occasions, some critics managed to speak honestly about Garvey's strengths and weaknesses. Garvey's goals, Du Bois admitted in 1921, were feasible, but his methods according to Du Bois were wasteful, ineffective, and possibly illegal. So disturbed were some black activists by Garvey's political agenda, his focus on race pride, and his ruminations on color divisions within the black community that they happily assisted the federal government in its effort to have Garvey deported after he was convicted of mail fraud.

Garvey delivered many of his orations at Liberty Hall in New York City; the UNIA required each branch of the organization to maintain a "Liberty Hall" for its members so that by 1927 there were some fourteen hundred Liberty Halls throughout the world. Garvey delivered his address to UNIA members on November 25, 1922, in an effort to boost the spirits and determination of the UNIA.

About the Author

Garvey was born Malchus Mosiah Garvey on August 17, 1887, in St. Ann's Bay, Jamaica, where he excelled as a student at the local Anglican Church school. Not until the age of fourteen did Garvey begin to view the world in black and white. One of his closest playmates had been a white girl. Her parents, according to Garvey, sent her to Edinburgh and informed their daughter that she was never to communicate with Garvey because of his race.

Garvey moved to Kingston, Jamaica, in 1906. Over the next four years, he gained invaluable political experience as vice president of the Kingston Typographical Union, publisher of Garvey's Watchman, and assistant secretary of the National Club. These activities fed his desire to explore the world, so he followed a path trodden by many West Indians by embarking for Latin America. There he labored as a timekeeper on a banana plantation in Costa Rica, started two newspapers, and stayed abreast of the condition of Jamaican workers. Further travel would enrich Garvey's Pan-African consciousness. A brief return to Jamaica in 1911 was followed by a two-year stay in London, where he attended classes at Birkbeck College, formed a relationship with the noted Pan-Africanist Duse Muhammad Ali, and built contacts with West African students. As Garvey traveled and engaged the world, he increasingly envisioned himself as the one who could lead his people toward the path of true liberation and freedom.

Upon his return to Jamaica, Garvey and his future wife, Amy Ashwood, formed the UNIA with the express purpose of improving the material and educational conditions of blacks in Jamaica and the world over. Foremost on their agenda was creating an industrial school in Kingston in the vein of Booker T. Washington's Tuskegee Institute. Unable to persuade locals to aid his endeavor, Garvey departed for the United States in 1916 in the hope of raising funds for the UNIA's proposed industrial school. Two months after settling in New York, he embarked on an extensive tour of black communities in various parts of the country. Nothing impressed him more than African Americans' entrepreneurial accomplishments in the face of Jim Crow segregation and economic hardships. After a year on the road, Garvey returned to Harlem in May 1917. After his return, he concentrated less on the development of an industrial school in Jamaica and more on building an international movement with the economic and political capacity to lift African-descended peoples the world over.

Garvey incorporated the New York chapter of the UNIA in June 1918. Two months later he launched the organization's official organ, The Negro World, one of the most successful papers in the black world, with subscribers in the United States, the West Indies, Latin America, and Africa. Garvey was a powerful speaker, as his listeners learned when he delivered "The Principles of the Universal Negro Improvement Association" in 1922. He had less success as a business entrepreneur. In 1919 he started the BSL, but the company was plagued by problems that eventually led to his indictment and conviction for mail fraud in 1923. According to U.S. law, any immigrant convicted of criminal activity could be immediately deported to his or her country of origin. So starting in 1919, the Justice Department planted agents in the New York UNIA and in other major divisions and branches across the

Time Line

1929

- September
  Garvey founds the People's Political Party, the first modern political party in Jamaica.

1940

- June 10
  Garvey dies in London after having two strokes.

country in order to uncover any criminal activity committed by Garvey. Because of the UNIA's shoddy bookkeeping practices, Bureau of Investigation assistant director J. Edgar Hoover and his associates focused on the BSL's promotional practices. On January 12, 1922, Garvey, along with other BSL officials, was arrested on mail fraud charges for allegedly advertising and selling stock in a nonexistent ship supposedly purchased to transport prospective colonists to Liberia. Garvey vehemently denied cheating his people, but he was nevertheless convicted in 1923.

In 1925 Garvey began serving a five-year prison sentence, but President Calvin Coolidge commuted his sentence in 1927 and he was deported to Jamaica. Over the next decade Garvey continued to travel, speak, and write, and he attained elective office in Jamaica. He returned to London in 1935, where he lived and worked until his death on June 10, 1940.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

Garvey's address gives voice to the deep humanism that pervaded his political ideas. Contrary to the opinion of his opponents, Garvey asserts that his message of race pride should not be interpreted as antiwhite. One of his first points of emphasis is that the UNIA aims not simply to improve the life chances and experiences of African-descended peoples but also to create a more humane and just world. He notes in the first paragraph that the "association adopts an attitude not of hostility to other races and peoples of the world, but an attitude of self respect, of manhood rights on behalf of 400,000,000 Negroes of the world." He goes on to emphasize this message in the second paragraph, stating that "we represent peace, harmony, love, human sympathy, human rights and human justice, and that is why we fight so much." Here Garvey lends support to such contemporary writers as Anthony Bogues, Tony Martin, and Sylvia Winters, who argue that one of the central elements of the black radical tradition has been its deep humanism, that is, its focus on eliminating all forms of human oppression.

In the second paragraph, Garvey also highlights the fact that people of African descent fought in the Revolutionary War, the Civil War, the Spanish American War, and World War I, thereby reminding his audience that African Americans have long been loyal Americans, willing to fight and even die for their country. He makes reference to the "heights of Mesopotamia," a region that corresponds roughly to modern-day Iraq, but it is unclear what precise location he means. The region had not been called Mesopotamia for centuries, so perhaps he is referring to the struggles for ascendancy in the region in the early medieval period. More likely, he is thinking of the efforts of black soldiers in the Middle East during World War I, using "Mesopotamia" as a kind of figure of speech for the region. He regards the fight for emancipation of the race as analogous to these conflicts.

In the third paragraph, Garvey suggests that recent expressions of African consciousness represent a "new line of thought." He continues by saying that it does not make any difference whether this line of thought is seen as "reactionary" or "advanced," for in either case it represents a quest for liberty and freedom. Again, he stresses that the organization's goal is uplift for all people, yet he acknowledges that the role of government, in his view, is to "place race in control, even as other races are in control of their own governments." In the fourth paragraph, he suggests that this goal is by no means unreasonable. It was not unreasonable for George Washington or for the "Liberals of France," a reference to the French Revolution in the late eighteenth century. Nor was it unreasonable for the people of Russia, led in part by Leo Tolstoy, one of czarist Russia's greatest novelists and a prominent proponent of anarchism, to "sound the call of liberty" in their nation. In paragraph 5, Garvey seems to momentarily digress by noting that the UNIA does not promote church building or building new social institutions (such as the Young Men's Christian Association or the Young Women's Christian Association), noting that these institutions already exist. Further, he states that the UNIA has little interest in politics, observing that already there are enough politicians. Rather, he says, the UNIA is "engaged in nation building."

In paragraph 6, Garvey returns to the theme of human rights. He states that "misunderstanding" has arisen about the goals and aims of the UNIA. He emphasizes that the organization believes in the rights not only of the "brown race" but of all races, and he stresses that the rights of whites, the yellow race (Asians), and others are worthy of consideration. He goes on, though, to suggest that the other races have denied those of African descent their proper place in the civilizations of the world. The UNIA's goal is not to disrupt existing societies or governments but to "free our motherland from the grasp of the invader," leading to "industrial, political, social and religious emancipation." To that end, the organization aims to unite the world's 400,000,000 blacks a figure that he uses repeatedly in the speech to enable them "to give expression to their own feeling." He stresses that a key goal is political freedom in Africa.

In paragraph 8, Garvey turns to the distinction between the UNIA and other black movements. The UNIA, he says, seeks "independence of government." Other organizations "seek to make the Negro a secondary part of existing governments." He argues that these other movements would leave blacks in a secondary position, without constitutional rights. Having lived in London, he is equipped to talk about British institutions that claim to be trying to improve the condition of blacks, but he asserts that equality will never be achieved until a black has the same chance as any other person to become a president or premier or to become a street cleaner.

Here he lays out why the New Negro must be concerned with nation building: "You and I can live in the United States of America for 100 more years," he explains to the audience, "and our generations may live for 200 years or for 5000 more years, and so long as there is a black and white population, when the majority is on the side of white race, you and I will never get political justice or get political equality in this country." Consequently, he maintained that the UNIA would focus its attention on nation-building in Africa: "The U.N.I.A. refuses to recognize any political or social system in Africa except that which we are about to establish for ourselves."

Garvey reiterates that he is not preaching a message of hate, what he calls in paragraph 9 "propaganda of hate." He even goes so far as to say "we love the white man" and that "we love all humanity." He acknowledges that just as Africa has things that Europeans want, so too does Europe have things that Africans want. Garvey wants to ensure, though, that if Africa sells its oil, diamonds, precious metals, and rubber to Europeans, it does so under the terms of a fair deal, not colonial exploitation. In paragraph 10, he emphasizes that if it takes power, scientific intelligence, and education to "redeem a race," then the world's 400 million blacks have what it takes for that redemption.

In paragraph 11, Garvey turns to a martial metaphor. Again he refers to the sacrifices of blood that blacks have offered "fighting for the white man." He asserts that blacks will make similar sacrifices to fight for a free Africa under the UNIA's Pan-African flag whose colors were red, black, and green. He continues the martial metaphor in paragraphs 12 and 13, where he insists that blacks will "march out" to redeem their motherland. African Americans, he says, will not forget the blessings of America and those of civilization. He alludes to the nation's history of slavery, with its "bloody carnage and massacre," but he insists that a united black race will now be able to defend itself. He concludes with a cry to the people of Africa, telling them to "hold the fort, for we are coming."

Edwin Barclay, president of Liberia (Library of Congress)

Audience

Written during a period of great upheaval for the UNIA, which had seen its primary economic venture, the Black Star Line, collapse in April of 1922, Garvey's address was designed to lift the spirits of the UNIA's loyal rank and file. Times had been extremely rough for the UNIA in recent months. Combined with the BSL's collapse, Garvey had been arrested for mail fraud, the UNIA's Liberian plans had been suspended, and the organization's 1922 convention had been rife with internal debates. Thus, in addition to clarifying the UNIA's political agenda, Garvey was attempting to rally his troops. "We should say to the millions who are in Africa to hold the fort," he thundered in the concluding paragraph, "for we are coming 400,000,000 strong."

Impact

Garvey's followers fed off his determined spirit, whose essence is captured in this 1922 speech. Notwithstanding various trials and tribulations, the Garvey movement remained strong for the remainder of the decade. Vibrant chapters were formed throughout the United States, making the UNIA the most visible and active organization of the New Negro era. To many of his enemies Garvey was a racist demagogue who profited from the emotions and ignorance of his people, but for many women and men suffering under an oppressive and unyielding order Garvey was a divinely chosen leader whose racial program blazed a path toward political freedom and self-consciousness.

Long after Garvey's address and his 1927 deportation from the United States, his influence still bore an imprint on African American political culture. Supporters followed Garvey's activities in Jamaica and then London through careful reading of The Negro World and Garvey's second paper, The Blackman. Finding an audience receptive to a race-first analysis proved difficult for Garvey during the Great Depression years as more blacks shifted toward the left of the political spectrum, but Garvey's ideas enjoyed a revival as decolonization, civil rights, and Black Power struggles intensified in the 1950s and 1960s. Now claiming their native son, Jamaica celebrated the UNIA leader as a national hero who raised the consciousness of African people. Noted Pan-Africanist and Ghanaian president Kwame Nkrumah named the nation's first fleet of ships after Garvey's Black Star Line. A profound love and appreciation for Garvey's life, work, and dedication was also evident in black communities across the United States as his influence surfaced in the activities of Elijah Muhammad's Nation of Islam, in the political rhetoric of Malcolm X, and in the nationalist lyrics of hip-hop

Essential Quotes

"We represent peace, harmony, love, human sympathy, human rights and human justice, and that is why we fight so much."

(Paragraph 2)

"We represent a new line of thought among Negroes. Whether you call it advanced thought or reactionary thought, I do not care. If it is reactionary for people to seek independence in government, then we are reactionary. If it is advanced thought for people to seek liberty and freedom, then we represent the advanced school of thought among the Negroes of this country."

(Paragraph 3)

"The Universal Negro Improvement Association stands for the Bigger Brotherhood; the Universal Negro Improvement Association stands for human rights, not only for Negroes, but for all races. The Universal Negro Improvement Association believes in the rights of not only the black race, but the white race, the yellow race and the brown race."

(Paragraph 6)

"We are not preaching a propaganda of hate against anybody. We love the white man; we love all humanity, because we feel that we cannot live without the other. The white man is as necessary to the existence of the Negro as the Negro is as necessary to his existence. There is a common relationship that we cannot escape."

(Paragraph 9)

activists like Public Enemy and the aptly named group Black Star (comprised of Mos Def and Talib Kweli). Popular black bookstores in New York, Atlanta, Philadelphia, Washington, D.C., and other metropolises sell hundreds of Garvey books and posters to black women and men, young and old, who still carry and hold on to his vision of a world in which the children of Africa will one day experience complete political, social, and economic freedom.

See also Henry Highland Garnet's Address to the Slaves of the United States of America (1843); Martin R. Delany: The Condition, Elevation, Emigration, and Destiny of the Colored People of the United States (1852); Henry McNeal Turner's Speech on His Expulsion from the Georgia Legislature (1868).

Further Reading

Books

Garvey, Amy Jacques. Garvey and Garveyism. New York: Collier, 1970.

Grant, Colin. Negro with a Hat: The Rise and Fall of Marcus Garvey and His Dream of Mother Africa. London: Jonathan Cape, 2008.

Hill, Robert A., ed. Marcus Garvey, Life and Lessons: A Centennial Companion to the Marcus Garvey and Universal Negro Improvement Association Papers. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.

. The Marcus Garvey and Universal Negro Improvement Association Papers. Vols. 1 10. Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1983 2006.

Lewis, Rupert, and Patrick Bryan, eds. Garvey: His Work and Impact. Mona, Jamaica: Institute of Social and Economic Research and Department of Extra-Mural Studies, University of the West Indies, 1988.

Martin, Tony. Race First: The Ideological and Organizational Struggles of Marcus Garvey and the Universal Negro Improvement Association. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1976.

Stein, Judith. The World of Marcus Garvey: Race and Class in Modern Society. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1986.

Web Sites

"Garvey, Marcus (1887 1940)." BlackPast.org Web site. http://www.blackpast.org/?q=aah/garvey-marcus-1887-1940.

Claudrena N. Harold

Questions for Further Study

1. Describe the social, economic, and political circumstances that gave rise to Garvey and the UNIA.

2. Summarize the intellectual foundations of the black nationalist movement that were in place by the time Garvey delivered his address. Who were some of Garvey's predecessors in espousing black nationalism?

3. Why do you think that prominent African Americans such as W. E. B. Du Bois, A. Philip Randolph, and James Weldon Johnson opposed Garvey? What strain of thinking did Garvey represent that was opposed to that of these other figures?

4. Garvey was known as a highly flamboyant figure who, for example, affected military uniforms. He was also convicted of mail fraud. To what extent do you believe these personal factors undermined his message? Do you believe that Garvey was a serious figure or a gadfly?

5. How did the UNIA resemble—or differ from—other African American organizations such as the NAACP? What goals did the UNIA pursue that Garvey may have felt were not being pursued by other black organizations?

Document Text

Marcus Garvey: "The Principles of the Universal Negro Improvement Association"

Over five years ago the Universal Negro Improvement Association placed itself before the world as the movement through which the new and rising Negro would give expression of his feelings. This Association adopts an attitude not of hostility to other races and peoples of the world, but an attitude of self respect, of manhood rights on behalf of 400,000,000 Negroes of the world.

We represent peace, harmony, love, human sympathy, human rights and human justice, and that is why we fight so much. Wheresoever human rights are denied to any group, wheresoever justice is denied to any group, there the U.N.I.A. finds a cause. And at this time among all the peoples of the world, the group that suffers most from injustice, the group that is denied most of those rights that belong to all humanity, is the black group of 400,000,000. Because of that injustice, because of that denial of our rights, we go forth under the leadership of the One who is always on the side of right to fight the common cause of humanity; to fight as we fought in the Revolutionary War, as we fought in the Civil War, as we fought in the Spanish American War, and as we fought in the war between 1914 18 on the battle plains of France and of Flanders. As we fought on the heights of Mesopotamia; even so under the leadership of the U.N.I.A., we are marshaling the 400,000,000 Negroes of the world to fight for the emancipation of the race and of the redemption of the country of our fathers.

We represent a new line of thought among Negroes. Whether you call it advanced thought or reactionary thought, I do not care. If it is reactionary for people to seek independence in government, then we are reactionary. If it is advanced thought for people to seek liberty and freedom, then we represent the advanced school of thought among the Negroes of this country. We of the U.N.I.A. believe that what is good for the other folks is good for us. If government is something that is worthwhile; if government is something that is appreciable and helpful and protective to others, then we also want to experiment in government. We do not mean a government that will make us citizens without rights or subjects with no consideration. We mean a kind of government that will place race in control, even as other races are in control of their own governments.

That does not suggest anything that is unreasonable. It was not unreasonable for George Washington, the great hero and father of the country, to have fought for the freedom of America giving to this great republic and this great democracy; it was not unreasonable for the Liberals of France to have fought against the anarchy to give to the world French Democracy and French Republicanism; it was no unrighteous cause that led Tolstoi to sound the call of liberty in Russia, which has ended in giving to the world the social democracy of Russia, an experiment that will probably prove to be a boon and a blessing to mankind. If it was not an unrighteous cause that led Washington to fight for the independence of this country, and led the Liberals of France to establish the Republic, it is therefore not an unrighteous cause for the U.N.I.A. to lead 400,000,000 Negroes all over the world to fight the liberation of our country.

Therefore the U.N.I.A. is not advocating the cause of church building, because we have a sufficiently large number of churches among us to minister to the spiritual needs of the people, and we are not going to compete with those who are engaged in so splendid a work; we are not engaged in building any new social institutions, and Y.M.C.A.'s or Y.W.C.A.'s, because there are enough social workers engaged in those praise-worthy efforts. We are not engaged in politics because we have enough local politicians, Democrats, Socialists, Soviets, etc., and the political situation is well taken care of. We are not engaged in domestic politics, in church building or in social uplift work, but we are engaged in nation building.…

I desire to remove the misunderstanding that has been created in the minds of millions of peoples throughout the world in their relationship to the organization. The Universal Negro Improvement Association stands for the Bigger Brotherhood; the Universal Negro Improvement Association stands for human rights, not only for Negroes, but for all races. The Universal Negro Improvement Association believes in the rights of not only the black race, but the white race, the yellow race and the brown race. The Universal Negro Improvement Association believes that the white man has as much right to be considered, the yellow man has as much right to be considered, the brown man has as much right to be considered as well as the black man of Africa. In view of the fact that the black man of Africa has contributed as much to the world as the white man of Europe, and the brown man and yellow man of Asia, we of the Universal Negro Improvement Association demand that the white, yellow and brown races give to the black man his place in the civilization of the world. We ask for nothing more than the rights of 400,000,000 Negroes. We are not seeking, as I said before, to destroy or disrupt the society or the government of other races, but we are determined that 400,000,000 of us shall unite ourselves to free our motherland from the grasp of the invader. We of the Universal Negro Improvement Association are determined to unite 400,000,000 Negroes for their own industrial, political, social and religious emancipation.

Document Text

We of the Universal Negro Improvement Association are determined to unite the 400,000,000 Negroes of the world to give expression to their own feeling; we are determined to unite the 400,000,000 Negroes of the world for the purpose of building a civilization of their own. And in that effort we desire to bring together the 15,000,000 of the United States, the 180,000,000 in Asia, the West Indies and Central and South America, and the 200,000,000 in Africa. We are looking toward political freedom on the continent of Africa, the land of our fathers.…

The difference between the Universal Negro Improvement Association and the other movements of this country, and probably the world, is that the Universal Negro Improvement Association seeks independence of government, while the other organizations seek to make the Negro a secondary part of existing governments. We differ from the organizations in America because they seek to subordinate the Negro as a secondary consideration in a great civilization, knowing that in America the Negro will never reach his highest ambition, knowing that the Negro in America will never get his constitutional rights. All those organizations which are fostering the improvement of Negroes in the British Empire know that the Negro in the British Empire will never reach the height of his constitutional rights. What do I mean by constitutional rights in America? If the black man is to reach the height of his ambition in this country if the black man is to get all of his constitutional rights in America then the black man should have the same chance in the nation as any other man to become president of the nation, or a street cleaner in New York. If [the] black man in the British Empire is to have all his constitutional rights it means that the Negro in the British Empire should have at least the same right to become premier of Great Britain as he has to become [a] street cleaner in the city of London. Are they prepared to give us such political equality? You and I can live in the United States of America for 100 more years, and our generations may live for 200 years or for 5000 more years, and so long as there is a black and white population, when the majority is on the side of white race, you and I will never get political justice or get political equality in this country. Then why should a black man with rising ambition, after preparing himself in every possible way to give expression to that highest ambition, allow himself to be kept down by racial prejudice within a country? If I am as educated as the next man, if I am as prepared as the next man, if I have passed through the best schools and colleges and universities as the other fellow, why should I not have a fair chance to compete with the other fellow for the biggest position in the nation? I have feelings, I have blood, I have senses like the other fellow; I have ambition, I have hope. Why should he, because of some racial prejudice, keep me down and why should I concede to him the right to rise above me and to establish himself as my permanent master? That is where the U.N.I.A. differs from other organizations. I refuse to stultify my ambition, and every true Negro refuses to stultify his ambition to suit any one, and therefore the U.N.I.A. decides if America is not big enough for two presidents, if England is not big enough for two kings, then we are not going to quarrel over the matter; we will leave one president in America, we will leave one king in England, we will leave one president in France and we will have one president in Africa. Hence, the Universal Negro Improvement Association does not seek to interfere with the social and political systems of France, but by the arrangement of things today the U.N.I.A. refuses to recognize any political or social system in Africa except that which we are about to establish for ourselves.

We are not preaching a propaganda of hate against anybody. We love the white man; we love all humanity, because we feel that we cannot live without the other. The white man is as necessary to the existence of the Negro as the Negro is as necessary to his existence. There is a common relationship that we cannot escape. Africa has certain things that Europe wants, and Europe has certain things that Africa wants, and if a fair and square deal must bring white and black with each other, it is impossible for us to escape it. Africa has oil, diamonds, copper, gold and rubber and all the minerals that Europe wants, and there must be some kind of relationship between

Document Text

Africa and Europe for a fair exchange, so we cannot afford to hate anybody.…

The question often asked is what does it require to redeem a race and free a country? If it takes man power, if it takes scientific intelligence, if it takes education of any kind, or if it takes blood, then the 400,000,000 Negroes of the world have it.…

If we have been liberal minded enough to give our life's blood in France, in Mesopotamia and elsewhere, fighting for the white man, whom we have always assisted, surely we have not forgotten to fight for ourselves, and when the time comes that the world will again give Africa an opportunity for freedom, surely 400,000,000 black men will march out on the battle plains of Africa, under the colors of the red, the black and the green.

We shall march out, yes, as black American citizens, as black British subjects, as black French citizens, as black Italians or as black Spaniards, but we shall march out with a greater loyalty, the loyalty of race. We shall march out in answer to the cry of our fathers, who cry out to us for the redemption of our own country, our motherland, Africa.

We shall march out, not forgetting the blessings of America. We shall march out, not forgetting the blessings of civilization. We shall march out with a history of peace before and behind us, and surely that history shall be our breastplate, for how can man fight better than knowing that the cause for which he fights is righteous? How can man fight more gloriously than by knowing that behind him is a history of slavery, a history of bloody carnage and massacre inflicted upon a race because of its inability to protect itself and fight? Shall we not fight for the glorious opportunity of protecting and forever more establishing ourselves as a mighty race and nation, never more to be disrespected by men? Glorious shall be the battle when the time comes to fight for our people and our race.

We should say to the millions who are in Africa to hold the fort, for we are coming 400,000,000 strong.

Glossary

breastplate	a piece of armor that covers and protects the chest
Liberals of France	the leaders of the late-eighteenth-century French Revolution
Mesopotamia	a region in the Middle East that corresponds roughly with modern-day Iraq
Tolstoi	Leo Tolstoy, a nineteenth-century Russian novelist and anarchist
West Indies	the islands of the Caribbean
Y.M.C.A.	Young Men's Christian Association
Y.W.C.A.	Young Women's Christian Association

A band at the Savoy Ballroom (Library of Congress)

Alain Locke's "Enter the New Negro"

1925

"The intelligent Negro of today is resolved not to make discrimination an extenuation for his shortcomings in performance, individual or collective."

Overview

In March 1925, Alain Locke edited "Harlem: Mecca of the New Negro," a special issue of the journal Survey Graphic. In addition to work by a number of prominent African American writers, the issue contained his own essay "Enter the New Negro," which highlighted the social, cultural, and artistic growth of African Americans, urged black artists and writers to look to African and African American history for inspiration, and expressed his belief that art and literature could break down racial barriers. Locke was eminently qualified to speak to this subject. He was America's first black Rhodes Scholar and later earned a PhD in philosophy from Harvard University. In 1925 Locke was early in a long and distinguished career as a professor at Howard University, and he would go on to write several highly regarded books and scholarly articles about African American culture and art. He was one of the leading figures in the Harlem Renaissance, the term given to the flourishing of African American culture in the 1920s and 1930s, much of it centered in the Harlem district of Manhattan in New York City and, in fact, he is often referred to as the "Father of the Harlem Renaissance." His passion and profound intellect contributed significantly to the vitality of the movement.

Locke's essay is not to be confused with his book The New Negro, which was also published in 1925. This anthology, an expansion of the Survey Graphic issue, included literary works by writers such as Jean Toomer, Zora Neale Hurston, Countee Cullen, Langston Hughes, and Claude McKay. Additionally, it included political and social analysis by James Weldon Johnson, E. Franklin Frazier, Walter White, and W. E. B. Du Bois. Because of Locke's essay and anthology expounding the achievements and aspirations of the "New Negro," the Harlem Renaissance is sometimes referred to as the New Negro Movement.

Context

Two major developments in African American history formed the backdrop for Locke's essay. One was the Great Migration, the term given to the movement of African Americans to northern and midwestern cities during the 1910s and 1920s, in part to escape the entrenched racism in the South, in part to seek employment in burgeoning industrial cities. During the Civil War, only about 8 percent of blacks lived in the North or Midwest. In 1900 still only about 10 percent lived in states that were not formerly slave states. That would change dramatically in the first decades of the new century. From 1910 to 1920, for example, the black population of Chicago grew from 44,000 to 110,000. In 1914 the black population of New York City was 50,000; in 1930 it was 165,000. In 1910 the black population of Detroit was 6,000; by 1929 the figure was 120,000. Cleveland, Boston, Baltimore, Cincinnati, Indianapolis, and other major cities experienced similarly rapid black population growth; so did smaller cities such as Dayton and Toledo in Ohio; Omaha, Nebraska; and Flint, Michigan. This growth was part of a national urbanizing trend and a corresponding decline in the rural population. In 1910 the majority of Americans lived in rural areas, defined at the time as communities with populations under 2,500. Thus, 49.9 million people lived in rural areas, while 42 million lived in urban areas; by 1920 the balance had shifted, with 54.1 million living in urban areas and 51.5 million living in rural areas. This trend continued throughout the 1920s so that by 1930, 68.9 million lived in urban areas to just 53.8 million in rural areas.

Typifying this urbanization was a city like Tulsa, Oklahoma. When Oklahoma achieved statehood in 1907, the city's population was a mere 7,000; by 1920 the city's population had increased more than tenfold, to 72,000. Included in that population were 11,000 African Americans, who were enjoying some measure of prosperity because of the state's oil boom. The black section of Tulsa, called the Greenwood district, was so prosperous that the black leader Booker T. Washington called its commercial district, with its restaurants, groceries, stores, professional offices, newspapers, churches, hospitals, and a library, the "Negro Wall Street."

Oil contributed to Tulsa's growth, but a number of other factors conspired to shift the nation's black population northward and westward. In the late 1910s, for example, a boll weevil infestation devastated southern cotton crops, forcing many black sharecroppers off their land. Then the outbreak of World War I opened large numbers of jobs in

Time Line

1885

- September 13
  Alain Locke is born in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

1910

- The Great Migration begins; in time, over four million African Americans would leave the South for the North and Midwest.

1904

- Large numbers of African Americans begin moving to Harlem in New York City.

1909

- February 12
  The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People is formed.

1913

- The building that would become the Apollo Theater is built in Harlem.

1917

- April 6
  The United States declares war on Germany, entering World War I; four hundred thousand African Americans serve in the military during the war.

1918

- Locke joins the philosophy faculty of Howard University in Washington, D.C.
- November 11
  The armistice ending World War I is signed.

1919

- Race riots plague numerous American cities, including Cleveland, Ohio; Omaha, Nebraska; and Elaine, Arkansas.

1922

- Claude McKay publishes Harlem Shadows, a poetry collection regarded as among the first major literary productions of the Harlem Renaissance.

1923

- Blues singer Bessie Smith revives the failing Columbia Record Company with her album Down Hearted Blues; Club De Luxe in Harlem reopens as the Cotton Club.

northern defense industry plants. The war, plus the Immigration Act of 1924, curtailed the flow of immigrants to the United States, increasing the demand for labor in northern factories. In 1927 major flooding in Mississippi again forced many southern blacks off their land. Often, black families heading north simply purchased the cheapest available train ticket, explaining why, for example, many Mississippians ended up in Chicago. In all, from 1910 to 1930 about 4.1 million African Americans left the South for opportunities in the North and Midwest.

The result of the Great Migration was the urban concentration of African Americans who had previously lived in relative isolation from one another in rural areas. Many who migrated were by definition ambitious and energetic, looking for a better life for themselves and their families. In their new communities, they formed a critical mass of culture in the broadest sense of the term: art, literature, music, church life, and dance as well as political and social awareness. Organizations such as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and Marcus Garvey's Universal Negro Improvement Association, along with new periodicals such as Opportunity: A Journal of Negro Life, were giving voice to the aspirations of African Americans. The new communities provided an audience for African American achievement. The result was the emergence of a black artistic and intellectual class under the leadership not only of Locke but also of W. E. B. Du Bois, James Weldon Johnson, and Walter White. In addition to a flowering of poetry and fiction by such writers as Langston Hughes, Jean Toomer, Countee Cullen, Zora Neale Hurston, Claude McKay, Arna Bontemps, and numerous others more popular forms of black culture flourished, led by a roster of black jazz and blues singers and musicians whose names are still recognized today: Billie Holiday, Duke Ellington, Count Basie, Louis Armstrong, Eubie Blake, Fats Waller, Josephine Baker, Billy Strayhorn, Lena Horne, and dozens more. Much of this popular culture was centered in New York City's Harlem neighborhood, the site of such cultural magnets as the Apollo Theater, the Savoy Ballroom, and the Cotton Club. Black Swan Records recorded the work of numerous black musicians.

Ironically, Harlem, with its stately homes and facilities such as the Polo Grounds (home of the New York Giants) and an opera house, had been a bedroom community for Manhattan's white upper class in the nineteenth century. It became a largely black community after a financial crash caused real estate values in Harlem to plummet and Philip Payton, Jr., the owner of the Afro-American Realty Company, opened the district to black tenants. Some white property barons resisted this demographic shift by buying up apartment buildings and evicting black tenants; Payton and others retaliated by buying up buildings of their own and evicting whites.

The Harlem Renaissance was by no means a unified movement with a manifesto and shared aims. On the one hand, the Harlem Renaissance encompassed those who were drawn to popular forms of entertainment and culture and who sought patrons exclusively among the emerging black middle class. More conservative elements, though, wanted to see greater integration of black culture with mainstream white culture and sought white patrons for their work; one of the key events in the Harlem Renaissance was a 1924 gathering hosted by the journal Opportunity that included a number of white publishers who were taking an interest in black literature and wanted to publish it. The conservative element feared that a great deal of black popular literature and entertainment played into stereotypes about African Americans. They were also troubled by the militancy of many blacks, especially those who espoused the doctrines of Socialism and Communism. This tension between the black intelligentsia and those who preferred "Stompin' at the Savoy" (the name of a 1930s big-band hit song), rather than undermining the movement, contributed to its vitality, for the spirit of the Harlem Renaissance reached throughout the entire black community, from the Harvard-trained professional to the factory worker though that spirit would be dampened by the onset of the Great Depression in 1929.

Such a movement demanded intellectual underpinnings. These underpinnings were provided by such writers as Du Bois, the author of the 1903 book The Souls of Black Folk, and, later, Alain Locke. "Enter the New Negro," along with The New Negro, was a key document in the flowering of black culture during the 1920s. The essay was published in the same year as other important events affecting African Americans. That year, A. Philip Randolph organized the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, the first largely African American labor union; Cullen, one of the finest black poets in this era, published his first collection, Color; and the singer and dancer Josephine Baker performed overseas in La revue nègre, expanding the audience for African American artists to France, where she was wildly popular.

About the Author

Alain Locke was born on September 13, 1885, in Philadelphia. His given name was Allen, but he changed it to the French "Alain" because of his love of French literature. His father had earned a law degree at Howard University but worked as a postal clerk in the city; his mother was a schoolteacher. He was raised in a cultured environment and as a child attended the progressive Ethical Cultural School and then graduated second in his class from Philadelphia's Central High School. An early bout with rheumatic fever left him with heart damage, so he spent much of his time in sedentary activities such as reading and playing the violin and piano.

After studying at the Philadelphia School of Pedagogy, Locke entered Harvard University, graduating magna cum laude in just three years. At Harvard he was a member of Phi Beta Kappa, a prestigious national honorary society for top students, and won the Bowdoin Prize for the best essay in English. He did not feel much of a connection with other African American students at Harvard. Biographers Leonard Harris and Charles Molesworth report that in a letter to his mother he said that he could not understand how they could "come up here in a broad-minded place like this and stick together like they were in the heart of Africa." He also wrote that he found his black peers "coarse." It was this separateness that would motivate him to stress America's multiculturalism and come to regard art as a way of dissolving racial barriers.

Time Line

1925

- March Locke publishes "Enter the New Negro" in the journal Survey Graphic.
- Locke publishes The New Negro, an anthology of work by African American writers.

1954

- June 9 Alain Locke dies in New York City.

In 1907 Locke became the first African American Rhodes Scholar, a prestigious award that entitles the recipient to study at England's Oxford University. At Oxford's Hertford College the only one that would accept a black student he studied literature, Greek, Latin, and philosophy and earned a bachelor's degree in literature in 1910. Afterward he studied philosophy for a year at the University of Berlin in Germany. In 1912 he took a position teaching literature at Howard University, but in 1916 he returned to Harvard to study philosophy, completing a PhD in 1918. He returned to Howard, where he was appointed chair of the philosophy department and remained there until 1953.

During his distinguished career at Howard, Locke was the author of numerous books and journal articles whose topics broadly spanned philosophy, art, and cultural studies. Among them were The New Negro, as well as Negro Art: Past and Present and The Negro and His Music (both 1936). He also edited The Negro in Art: A Pictorial Record of the Negro Artist and of the Negro Theme in Art (1940). In 1942 he published a pioneering social sciences anthology, When Peoples Meet: A Study in Race and Culture Contacts, which he coedited with Bernhard Stern. Throughout the late 1940s and early 1950s he was in high demand as a visiting scholar until he retired in 1953 but not before he was able to secure a chapter of Phi Beta Kappa at Howard. After his retirement, he moved to New York City to finish what was to have been his major work, The Negro in American Culture. Unfortunately, the heart problems that had plagued him as a child recurred, and before he could finish the book, he died on June 9, 1954.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

"Enter the New Negro" is a sophisticated, densely written analysis of the "New Negro," the African American who is shedding the cultural stereotypes and limitations of the past and asserting a new identity not just in the political and social spheres but in art and literature as well. It draws heavily on Locke's background as a student of both literature and philosophy. It was not in any sense a strident "call to arms" but rather a closely reasoned appeal to African Americans and to white Americans to recognize the fundamental change that was taking place in African American culture and in the psychology of the black community.

◆ Paragraphs 1–6

Locke begins by asserting that a change has taken place in the life of the American Negro. He refers to the sociologist, the philanthropist, and the race leader as the three "norns" who have traditionally examined issues surrounding blacks; the reference is to the three goddesses in Norse mythology who presided over human destiny. He argues that a transformation is taking place that the "norns" cannot account for. He then argues in paragraph 2 that the "New Negro" is not really new, that the "Old Negro" was more a creature of myth, a "historical fiction" and that the Old Negro contributed to this myth by "social mimicry," or trying to fit in. He refers to the Old Negro as a "formula" who was regarded as someone to be defended, kept down, helped up, or kept in his place. Locke maintains that even the "thinking Negro" has fallen into the trap of this kind of stereotyping, which leads to "little true social or self-understanding." In paragraph 3 he notes that the focus of attention in race issues has been on the Civil War and Reconstruction; that focus on the North-South axis has blinded people to the East, with its implications of a new day dawning.

In the fourth paragraph, Locke cites the example of the Negro spiritual. He argues that formerly this form of music was limited by the "stereotypes of Wesleyan hymn harmony," a reference to John Wesley, the founder of Methodism in the eighteenth century. Now, though, Negro spirituals have come out of hiding and are regarded as folk music, a significant form of cultural expression. In the same way, African Americans have emerged from the "tyranny of social intimidation" and are undergoing "something like a spiritual emancipation" through self-understanding. Thus, says Locke, African American life is entering a "new dynamic phase." He alludes to the growing urbanization of the nation and with it the growth of the "Young Negro's" greater opportunities for art and self-expression. As an example he incorporates a quotation from "Youth," a poem by Langston Hughes whose imagery again suggests the dawn of a new day. Locke concludes this section by stating that the New Negro can no longer be seen through the "dusty spectacles" of past controversies the black "mammy," the "Uncle Tom" of Harriet Beecher Stowe's novel Uncle Tom's Cabin, and "Sambo," a name that during the Civil War era became a racial slur. Locke maintains that it is time to put aside these and other stereotypes, to "scrap the fictions" and "garret the bogeys" (that is, to consign them to the attic), and face a new reality.

◆ Paragraphs 7–14

Locke next outlines some of the specific changes that have rendered old conceptions of African Americans obsolete. Again he refers to the Great Migration of blacks to the North and Midwest and their centers of industry, so the issues, he says, are no longer sectional. He suggests that the problems faced by blacks in their new surroundings are not entirely racial. Finally, he points to "class differentiation" in the black community, making it "ridiculous" to regard the black population "en masse," that is, as a homogeneous whole. In paragraph 8, Locke goes on to point out that "the Negro too, for his part, has idols of the tribe to smash," meaning that certain cherished views have to be cast aside. While it may be true, Locke says, that the white population denigrated blacks to excuse its treatment of them, blacks have too often excused themselves because of this treatment. The "intelligent Negro" does not use discrimination as an excuse for his shortcomings and wants to be seen as an equal, not an object of sentiment or "social discounts" or a victim of "self-pity." He refers to changes in attitude as a "bitter weaning" but one that will allow both black and white to see each other with "new mutual attitudes." In paragraph 10, Locke concedes that greater knowledge will not necessarily lead to greater liking or treatment, but an effort of will is needed on the part of the "more intelligent" people of both races, who, in Locke's view, are out of touch with one another.

Thus, in paragraph 10, Locke begins to argue that the notion that the lives of blacks and whites are separate is increasingly a fiction. In paragraph 11 he cites the example of interracial councils in the South there were some eight hundred local councils under the auspices of the Commission on Interracial Cooperation based in Atlanta yet he notes that in the North, black laborers have little "interplay" with their communities and the white business community. Locke calls for this to change but observes that it already is changing, that close cooperation is replacing "long-distance philanthropy," at least among "enlightened minorities of both race groups." In paragraph 12 he says that the New Negro is responding to this new democratic element in American culture and is no longer allowing discrimination in the social sphere to fetter him. Locke then specifically refers to New York as a center where intellectual contacts have been made, in large part through the "enrichment of American art and letters." In paragraph 13 he comments on the importance of this cultural contact as a way of offsetting the past. The conditions, he says, that are "moulding a New Negro are moulding a new American attitude." In the concluding paragraph of this section, Locke cautions that the new condition is "delicate" and runs the risk of engendering antagonism and prejudice. Now that the Negro has been "weaned," it is important for the public not to treat him paternalistically. Although the New Negro's outer life, where he participates in American institutions and democracy, is "well and finally formulated," his inner life and psychology are still undergoing formation.

◆ Paragraphs 15–21

Locke explores the psychology of the New Negro. At first that psychology was based on a "warped social perspective," but Locke believes that he is witnessing "the development of a more positive self-respect and self-reliance" that is, a "race pride." His overall theme here is that African Americans are evolving past sentimental stereotypes and the need to be a "ward" of others. In paragraph 16, he expresses the hope that the prejudice of the past will convert from a handicap to an incentive. He notes that many African Americans, in adopting a newly militant posture, are turning leftward in their politics, that is, to Socialism and radicalism. In paragraph 17 he turns to the issue of separatism, such as that advocated by figures such as Marcus Garvey (sponsor of the Back to Africa movement), and characterizes such separatism as undesirable. He illustrates the tensions in African Americans' views of themselves through current poetry. Claude McKay's poem "To the Intrenched Classes" serves as an example of "defiant ironic challenge," referring to McKay's vision of a future of eroding possibilities. In contrast, he quotes from James Weldon Johnson's "O Southland!" as an example of "appeal" to the South to shed its historical limitations with regard to African Americans. Between these two extremes of "defiance and appeal" is Johnson's poem "To America." Locke's appeal is for African Americans to adopt this middle ground between "cynicism and hope."

Flood waters fill the streets of Greenville, Mississippi, in April 1927. (AP/Wide World Photos)

◆ Paragraphs 22–25

Locke concludes his essay with an appeal to African American writers to follow "constructive channels." In paragraph 23 he urges these writers to serve as an "advance-guard" for Africa in its contact with the twentieth century and charges them with "rehabilitating the race." He goes on specifically to refer to the events taking place in Harlem, the home of African Americans' "Zionism." He uses this word as a figure of speech, comparing the African American's search for a home to that of the Jews. Later, in paragraph 24, he asserts that "the future development of Africa is one of the most constructive and universally helpful missions that any modern people can lay claim to." He notes some of the cultural developments taking place in Harlem and the neighborhood's ability to attract people from all over the world. All of these social and cultural achievements are creating a "group consciousness" that is healthy for the black community.

Paragraph 25 concludes the essay with a further appeal. He states that the black race can rehabilitate itself through its "artistic endowments and cultural contributions, past and prospective." He points out that African Americans have already made significant contributions to the nation's cultural life. He wants the African American to no longer be a "beneficiary and ward" and instead become a "conscious contributor." Locke expresses hope that the New Negro will in time "celebrate his full initiation into American democracy," but if he does not, he will at least take pride in his own "Coming of Age."

Essential Quotes

"The mind of the Negro seems suddenly to have slipped from under the tyranny of social intimidation and to be shaking off the psychology of imitation and implied inferiority. By shedding the old chrysalis of the Negro problem we are achieving something like a spiritual emancipation."

(Paragraph 4)

"The day of 'aunties,' 'uncles' and 'mammies' is equally gone. Uncle Tom and Sambo have passed on."

(Paragraph 6)

"The intelligent Negro of today is resolved not to make discrimination an extenuation for his shortcomings in performance, individual or collective; he is trying to hold himself at par, neither inflated by sentimental allowances nor depreciated by current social discounts."

(Paragraph 8)

"[The New Negro] resents being spoken for as a social ward or minor, even by his own, and to being regarded a chronic patient for the sociological clinic, the sick man of American Democracy."

(Paragraph 15)

"It must be increasingly recognized that the Negro has already made very substantial contributions, not only in his folk-art, music especially, which has always found appreciation, but in larger, though humbler and less acknowledged ways. For generations the Negro has been the peasant matrix of that section of America which has most undervalued him, and here he has contributed not only materially in labor and in social patience, but spiritually as well."

(Paragraph 25)

Audience

"Enter the New Negro" was published in a special issue of Survey Graphic. The nonprofit, mainstream journal was launched in 1921, and through 1932 it was the illustrated supplement to The Survey, the nation's premier social work journal. In 1933 it became a separate publication and survived until 1952. Survey Graphic published articles on a host of contemporary issues, including trade unionism, anti-Semitism, the rise of Fascism, poverty, and political and education reform. The roots of the journal were progressive, and it was never shy about taking on controversial issues. Its emphasis was on the role that government played in shaping the lives of individuals. Its audience, which was relatively small compared with that of other mainstream publications, consisted primarily of middle-class professionals who took an interest in issues pertaining to social welfare and who themselves were in a position to make decisions that affected the lives of all Americans. Later, during the 1930s, the journal played an important role in visually documenting the hardships of the Great Depression.

Impact

It is difficult to trace the immediate impact of a single article or book announcing the views of a movement such as the Harlem Renaissance. "Enter the New Negro" was part of a welter of books and articles examining the issue of race before, during, and after the 1920s. The climate for these publications was ripe. The nation had put aside the hardships and privations of World War I. In 1919 women were granted the right to vote, bringing the issue of civil rights to the national consciousness. But that year, too, numerous race riots plagued American cities; in some instances, blacks were attacked or lynched while still wearing their military uniforms. At the same time, the Progressive movement was still making its influence felt. Trade unionism, for example, was gaining more traction at a time when American workers were competing for jobs and there was considerable labor unrest. The 1920s, often called the Roaring Twenties, was a time of growing prosperity and seemingly endless possibilities. In this climate of growing freedom, of the casting off of old traditions and old ways of thinking, African American writers were determined to find a place in American culture and society. Writers such as Alain Locke were showing them how, and why. His work helped launch the careers of writers such as Zora Neale Hurston, whose short story "Spunk" appeared in the anthology.

In a sense, Locke's work lit a fire under other African American writers. Fire!! was a black literary magazine launched in 1926 by a group of African American writers who defiantly called themselves the Niggerati (a play on the word literati): Wallace Thurman, Zora Neale Hurston, Aaron Douglas, John P. Davis, Richard Bruce Nugent, Gwendolyn Bennett, Countee Cullen, and Langston Hughes. Hughes explained the title by saying that it conveyed the desire to burn up old, conventional ideas and showcase the talent of younger writers. The magazine, which its founders said was inspired by Locke's work, lasted for only a single issue, and critical reaction to it exemplified differing views about the role of African American literature. While some critics applauded the magazine for its unique perspective, others, particularly some members of the black intelligentsia (Du Bois's "Talented Tenth") found some of its topics, such as homosexuality, vulgar and were troubled by what they regarded as the stereotyped use of southern vernacular. Despite differing views about the merits of any particular writer's work, in the years following the publication of Locke's essay, a tidal wave of fiction, poetry, and drama flowed from the pens of African American writers. No longer was American literature the sole province of New England's white middle and upper classes. African American literature was now part of the national cultural landscape.

See also Marcus Garvey: "The Principles of the Universal Negro Improvement Association" (1922); James Weldon Johnson's "Harlem: The Culture Capital" (1925).

Questions for Further Study

1. Describe the demographic trends in the United States that contributed to the Harlem Renaissance.

2. According to Locke, what is "the New Negro"? What does he mean by this term? What characteristics describe the African American community during this era?

3. Describe some of the racial stereotypes and racial attitudes that Locke believes have to be overcome.

4. Locke and W. E. B. Du Bois were arguably the two foremost African American intellectuals in the early decades of the twentieth century. Compare this document with Du Bois's The Souls of Black Folk (1903). Do they make any arguments that are similar? Do the two documents have different emphases? Explain.

5. Similarly, compare this document with James Weldon Johnson's "Harlem: The Culture Capital." Do the two writers express attitudes toward the Harlem Renaissance that are fundamentally the same or different? Explain.

6. Just three years earlier, Marcus Garvey published "The Principles of the Universal Negro Improvement Association." What do you think Locke's reaction to those principles was?

Further Reading

Articles

Holmes, Eugene C. "Alain Leroy Locke: A Sketch." Phylon Quarterly 20, no. 1 (1959): 82 89.

. "Alain Locke and the New Negro Movement." Negro American Literature Forum 2, no. 3 (1968): 60 68.

Books

Eze, Chielozona. The Dilemma of Ethnic Identity: Alain Locke's Vision of Transcultural Societies. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 2005.

Grossman, James R. Land of Hope: Chicago, Black Southerners, and the Great Migration. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.

Harris, Leonard, and Charles Molesworth. Alain Locke: Biography of a Philosopher. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2008.

Huggins, Nathan. Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1973.

Lemann, Nicholas. The Promised Land: The Great Black Migration and How It Changed America. New York: Vintage, 1991.

Linnemann, Russell J., ed. Alain Locke: Reflections on a Modern Renaissance Man. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1982.

Washington, Johnny. Alain Locke and Philosophy: A Quest for Cultural Pluralism. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1986.

. A Journey into the Philosophy of Alain Locke. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1994.

Watson, Steven. The Harlem Renaissance: Hub of African-American Culture, 1920 1930. New York: Pantheon, 1995.

Wintz, Cary D. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. Houston, Tex.: Rice University Press, 1988.

. Harlem Speaks: A Living History of the Harlem Renaissance. Naperville, Ill.: Sourcebooks, 2007.

Web Sites

"The Survey Graphic Harlem Number." University of Virginia Library Electronic Text Center Web site.
http://etext.virginia.edu/harlem/contents.html.

Michael J. O'Neal

Document Text

Alain Locke's "Enter the New Negro"

In the last decade something beyond the watch and guard of statistics has happened in the life of the American Negro and the three norns who have traditionally presided over the Negro problem have a changeling in their laps. The Sociologist, The Philanthropist, the Race-leader are not unaware of the New Negro but they are at a loss to account for him. He simply cannot be swathed in their formulae. For the younger generation is vibrant with a new psychology; the new spirit is awake in the masses, and under the very eyes of the professional observers is transforming what has been a perennial problem into the progressive phases of contemporary Negro life.

Could such a metamorphosis have taken place as suddenly as it has appeared to? The answer is no; not because the New Negro is not here, but because the Old Negro had long become more of a myth than a man. The Old Negro, we must remember, was a creature of moral debate and historical controversy. His has been a stock figure perpetuated as an historical fiction partly in innocent sentimentalism, partly in deliberate reactionism. The Negro himself has contributed his share to this through a sort of protective social mimicry forced upon him by the adverse circumstances of dependence. So for generations in the mind of America, the Negro has been more of a formula than a human being a something to be argued about, condemned or defended, to be "kept down," or "in his place," or "helped up," to be worried with or worried over, harassed or patronized, a social bogey or a social burden. The thinking Negro even has been induced to share this same general attitude, to focus his attention on controversial issues, to see himself in the distorted perspective of a social problem. His shadow, so to speak, has been more real to him than his personality. Through having had to appeal from the unjust stereotypes of his oppressors and traducers to those of his liberators, friends and benefactors he has subscribed to the traditional positions from which his case has been viewed. Little true social or self-understanding has or could come from such a situation.

We have not been watching in the right direction; set North and South on a sectional axis, we have not noticed the East till the sun has us blinking.

