Recall how suddenly the Negro spirituals revealed themselves; suppressed for generations under the stereotypes of Wesleyan hymn harmony, secretive, half-ashamed, until the courage of being natural brought them out and behold, there was folk-music. Similarly the mind of the Negro seems suddenly to have slipped from under the tyranny of social intimidation and to be shaking off the psychology of imitation and implied inferiority. By shedding the old chrysalis of the Negro problem we are achieving something like a spiritual emancipation. Until recently, lacking self-understanding, we have been almost as much of a problem to ourselves as we still are to others. But the decade that found us with a problem has left us with only a task. The multitude perhaps feels as yet only a strange relief and a new vague urge, but the thinking few know that in the reaction the vital inner grip of prejudice has been broken.

With this renewed self-respect and self-dependence, the life of the Negro community is bound to enter a new dynamic phase, the buoyancy from within compensating for whatever pressure there may be of conditions from without. The migrant masses, shifting from countryside to city, hurdle several generations of experience at a leap, but more important, the same thing happens spiritually in the life-attitudes and self-expression of the Young Negro, in his poetry, his art, his education and his new outlook, with the additional advantage, of course, of the poise and greater certainty of knowing what it is all about. From this comes the promise and warrant of a new leadership. As one of them has discerningly put it:

> We have tomorrow
> Bright before us
> Like a flame.
> Yesterday, a night-gone thing
> A sun-down name.
> And dawn today
> Broad arch above the road we came.
> We march!

This is what, even more than any "most creditable record of fifty years of freedom," requires that the Negro of today be seen through other than the dusty spectacles of past controversy. The day of "aunties," "uncles" and "mammies" is equally gone. Uncle Tom and Sambo have passed on, and even the "Colonel" and "George" play barnstorm roles from which they escape with relief when the public spotlight is off. The popular melodrama has about played itself out, and it is time to scrap the fictions, garret the bogeys and settle down to a realistic facing of facts.

First we must observe some of the changes which since the traditional lines of opinion were drawn have rendered these quite obsolete. A main change has been, of course, that shifting of the Negro population which has made the Negro problem no longer exclusively or even predominantly Southern. Why should our minds remain sectionalized, when the problem itself no longer is? Then the trend of migration has not only been toward the North and the Central Midwest, but city-ward and to the great centers of industry the problems of adjustment are new, practical, local and not peculiarly racial. Rather they are an integral part of the large industrial and social problems of our present-day democracy. And finally, with the Negro rapidly in process of class differentiation, if it ever was warrantable to regard and treat the Negro en masse it is becoming with every day less possible, more unjust and more ridiculous.

The Negro too, for his part, has idols of the tribe to smash. If on the one hand the white man has erred in making the Negro appear to be that which would excuse or extenuate his treatment of him, the Negro, in turn, has too often unnecessarily excused himself because of the way he has been treated. The intelligent Negro of today is resolved not to make discrimination an extenuation for his shortcomings in performance, individual or collective; he is trying to hold himself at par, neither inflated by sentimental allowances nor depreciated by current social discounts. For this he must know himself and be known for precisely what he is, and for that reason he welcomes the new scientific rather than the old sentimental interest. Sentimental interest in the Negro has ebbed. We used to lament this as the falling off of our friends; now we rejoice and pray to be delivered both from self-pity and condescension. The mind of each racial group has had a bitter weaning, apathy or hatred on one side matching disillusionment or resentment on the other; but they face each other today with the possibility at least of entirely new mutual attitudes.

It does not follow that if the Negro were better known, he would be better liked or better treated. But mutual understanding is basic for any subsequent cooperation and adjustment. The effort toward this will at least have the effect of remedying in large part what has been the most unsatisfactory feature of our present stage of race relationships in America, namely the fact that the more intelligent and representative elements of the two race groups have at so many points got quite out of vital touch with one another.

The fiction is that the life of the races is separate and increasingly so. The fact is that they have touched too closely at the unfavorable and too lightly at the favorable levels.

While inter-racial councils have sprung up in the South, drawing on forward elements of both races, in the Northern cities manual laborers may brush elbows in their everyday work, but the community and business leaders have experienced no such interplay or far too little of it. These segments must achieve contact or the race situation in America becomes desperate. Fortunately this is happening. There is a growing realization that in social effort the cooperative basis must supplant long-distance philanthropy, and that the only safeguard for mass relations in the future must be provided in the carefully maintained contacts of the enlightened minorities of both race groups. In the intellectual realm a renewed and keen curiosity is replacing the recent apathy; the Negro is being carefully studied, not just talked about and discussed. In art and letters, instead of being wholly caricatured, he is being seriously portrayed and painted.

To all of this the New Negro is keenly responsive as an augury of a new democracy in American culture. He is contributing his share to the new social understanding. But the desire to be understood would never in itself have been sufficient to have opened so completely the protectively closed portals of the thinking Negro's mind. There is still too much possibility of being snubbed or patronized for that. It was rather the necessity for fuller, truer, self-expression, the realization of the unwisdom of allowing social discrimination to segregate him mentally, and a counter-attitude to cramp and fetter his own living and so the "spite-wall" that the intellectuals built over the "color-line" has happily been taken down. Much of this reopening of intellectual contacts has entered in New York and has been richly fruitful not merely in the enlarging of personal experience, but in the definite enrichment of American art and letters and in the clarifying of our common vision of the social tasks ahead.

The particular significance in the reestablishment of contact between the more advanced and representative classes is that it promises to offset some of the unfavorable reactions of the past, or at least to resurface race contacts somewhat for the future. Subtly the conditions that are moulding a New Negro are moulding a new American attitude.

However, this new phase of things is delicate; it will call for less charity but more justice; less help, but infinitely closer understanding. This is indeed a critical stage of race relationships because of the likelihood, if the new temper is not understood, of engendering sharp group antagonism and a second crop of more calculated prejudice. In some quarters, it has already done so. Having weaned the Negro, public opinion cannot continue to paternalize. The Negro today is inevitably moving forward under the control largely of his own objectives. What are these objectives? Those of his outer life are happily already well and finally formulated, for they are none other than the ideals of American institutions and democracy. Those of his inner life are yet in process of formation, for the new psychology at present is more of a consensus of feeling than of opinion, of attitude rather than of program. Still some points seem to have crystallized.

Up to the present one may adequately describe the Negro's "inner objectives" as an attempt to repair a damaged group psychology and reshape a warped social perspective. Their realization has required a new mentality for the American Negro. And as it matures we begin to see its effects; at first, negative, iconoclastic, and then positive and constructive. In this new group psychology we note the lapse of sentimental appeal, then the development of a more positive self-respect and self-reliance; the repudiation of social dependence, and then the gradual recovery from hyper-sensitiveness and "touchy" nerves, the repudiation of the double standard of judgment with its special philanthropic allowances and then the sturdier desire for objective and scientific appraisal; and finally the rise from social disillusionment to race pride, from the sense of social debt to the responsibilities of social contribution, and offsetting the necessary working and commonsense acceptance of restricted conditions, the belief in ultimate esteem and recognition. Therefore the Negro today wishes to be known for what he is, even in his faults and shortcomings, and scorns a craven and precarious survival at the price of seeming to be what he is not. He resents being spoken for as a social ward or minor, even by his own, and to being regarded a chronic patient for the sociological clinic, the sick man of American Democracy. For the same reasons he himself is through with those social nostrums and panaceas, the so-called "solutions" of his "problem," with which he and the country have been so liberally dosed in the past. Religion, freedom, education, money in turn, he has ardently hoped for and peculiarly trusted these things; he still believes in them, but not in blind trust that they alone will solve his life-problem.

Each generation, however, will have its creed and that of the present is the belief in the efficacy of collective efforts in race cooperation. This deep feeling of race is at present the mainspring of Negro life. It seems to be the outcome of the reaction to proscription and prejudice; an attempt, fairly successful on the whole, to convert a defensive into an offensive position, a handicap into an incentive. It is radical in tone, but not in purpose and only the most stupid forms of opposition, misunderstanding or persecution could make it otherwise. Of course, the thinking Negro has shifted a little toward the left with the world-trend, and there is an increasing group who affiliate with radical and liberal movements. But fundamentally for the present the Negro is radical on race matters, conservative on others, in other words, a "forced radical," a social protestant rather than a genuine radical. Yet under further pressure and injustice iconoclastic thought and motives will inevitably increase. Harlem's quixotic radicalisms call for their ounce of democracy today lest tomorrow they be beyond cure.

The Negro mind reaches out as yet to nothing but American wants, American ideas. But this forced attempt to build his Americanism on race values is a unique social experiment, and its ultimate success is impossible except through the fullest sharing of American culture and institutions. There should be no delusion about this. American nerves in sections unstrung with race hysteria are often fed the opiate that the trend of Negro advance is wholly separatist, and that the effect of its operation will be to encyst the Negro as a benign foreign body in the body politic. This cannot be even if it were desirable. The racialism of the Negro is no limitation or reservation with respect to American life; it is only a constructive effort to build the obstructions in the stream of his progress into an efficient dam of social energy and power. Democracy itself is obstructed and stagnated to the extent that any of its channels are closed. Indeed they cannot be selectively closed. So the choice is not between one way for the Negro and another way for the rest, but between American institutions frustrated on the one hand and American ideals progressively fulfilled and realized on the other.

There is, of course, a warrantably comfortable feeling in being on the right side of the country's professed ideals. We realize that we cannot be undone without America's undoing. It is within the gamut of this attitude that the thinking Negro faces America, but the variations of mood in connection with it are if anything more significant than the attitude itself. Sometimes we have it taken with the defiant ironic challenge of McKay:

> Mine is the future grinding down today
> Like a great landslip moving to the sea,
> Bearing its freight of debris far away
> Where the green hungry waters restlessly
> Heave mammoth pyramids and break and roar
> Their eerie challenge to the crumbling shore.

Sometimes, perhaps more frequently as yet, in the fervent and almost filial appeal and counsel of Weldon Johnson's:

> O Southland, dear Southland!
> Then why do you still cling
> To an idle age and a musty page,
> To a dead and useless thing.

But between defiance and appeal, midway almost between cynicism and hope, the prevailing mind stands in the mood of the same author's To America, an attitude of sober query and stoical challenge:

> How would you have us, as we are?
> Or sinking heath the load we bear,
> Our eyes fixed forward on a star,
> Or gazing empty at despair?
> Rising or falling? Men or things?
> With dragging pace or footsteps fleet?
> Strong, willing sinews in your wings,
> Or tightening chains about your feet?

More and more, however, an intelligent realization of the great discrepancy between the American social creed and the American social practice forces upon the Negro the taking of the moral advantage that is his. Only the steadying and sobering effect of a truly characteristic gentleness of spirit prevents the rapid rise of a definite cynicism and counter-hate and a defiant superiority feeling. Human as this reaction would be, the majority still deprecate its advent, and would gladly see it forestalled by the speedy amelioration of its causes. We wish our race pride to be a healthier, more positive achievement than a feeling based upon a realization of the shortcomings of others. But all paths toward the attainment of a sound social attitude have been difficult; only a relatively few enlightened minds have been able as the phrase puts it "to rise above" prejudice. The ordinary man has had until recently only a hard choice between the alternatives of supine and humiliating submission and stimulating but hurtful counter-prejudice. Fortunately from some inner, desperate resourcefulness has recently sprung up the simple expedient of fighting prejudice by mental passive resistance, in other words by trying to ignore it. For the few, this manna may perhaps be effective, but the masses cannot thrive on it.

Fortunately there are constructive channels opening out into which the balked social feelings of the American Negro can flow freely.

Without them there would be much more pressure and danger than there is. These compensating interests are racial but in a new and enlarged way. One is the consciousness of acting as the advance-guard of the African peoples in their contact with Twentieth Century civilization; the other, the sense of a mission of rehabilitating the race in world esteem from that loss of prestige for which the fate and conditions of slavery have so largely been responsible. Harlem, as we shall see, is the center of both these movements; she is the home of the Negro's "Zionism." The pulse of the Negro world has begun to beat in Harlem. A Negro newspaper carrying news material in English, French and Spanish, gathered from all quarters of America, the West Indies and Africa has maintained itself in Harlem for over five years. Two important magazines, both edited from New York, maintain their news and circulation consistently on a cosmopolitan scale. Under American auspices and backing, three pan-African congresses have been held abroad for the discussion of common interests, colonial questions and the future cooperative development of Africa. In terms of the race question as a world problem, the Negro mind has leapt, so to speak, upon the parapets of prejudice and extended its cramped horizons. In so doing it has linked up with the growing group consciousness of the dark-peoples and is gradually learning their common interests. As one of our writers has recently put it: "It is imperative that we understand the white world in its relations to the nonwhite world." As with the Jew, persecution is making the Negro international.

As a world phenomenon this wider race consciousness is a different thing from the much asserted rising tide of color. Its inevitable causes are not of our making. The consequences are not necessarily damaging to the best interests of civilization. Whether it actually brings into being new Armadas of conflict or argosies of cultural exchange and enlightenment can only be decided by the attitude of the dominant races in an era of critical change. With the American Negro his new internationalism is primarily an effort to recapture contact with the scattered peoples of African derivation. Garveyism may be a transient, if spectacular, phenomenon, but the possible role of the American Negro in the future development of Africa is one of the most constructive and universally helpful missions that any modern people can lay claim to.

Constructive participation in such causes cannot help giving the Negro valuable group incentives, as well as increased prestige at home and abroad. Our greatest rehabilitation may possibly come through such channels, but for the present, more immediate hope rests in the revaluation by white and black alike of the Negro in terms of his artistic endowments and cultural contributions, past and prospective. It must be increasingly recognized that the Negro has already made very substantial contributions, not only in his folk-art, music especially, which has always found appreciation, but in larger, though humbler and less acknowledged ways. For generations the Negro has been the peasant matrix of that section of America which has most undervalued him, and here he has contributed not only materially in labor and in social patience, but spiritually as well. The South has unconsciously absorbed the gift of his folk-temperament. In less than half a generation it will be easier to recognize this, but the fact remains that a leaven of humor, sentiment, imagination and tropic nonchalance has gone into the making of the South from a humble, unacknowledged source. A second crop of the Negro's gifts promises still more largely. He now becomes a conscious contributor and lays aside the status of a beneficiary and ward for that of a collaborator and participant in American civilization. The great social gain in this is the releasing of our talented group from the arid fields of controversy and debate to the productive fields of creative expression. The especially cultural recognition they win should in turn prove the key to that revaluation of the Negro which must precede or accompany any considerable further betterment of race relationships. But whatever the general effect, the present generation will have added the motives of self-expression and spiritual development to the old and still unfinished task of making material headway and progress. No one who understandingly faces the situation with its substantial accomplishment or views the new scene with its still more abundant promise can be entirely without hope. And certainly, if in our lifetime the Negro should not be able to celebrate his full initiation into American democracy, he can at least, on the warrant of these things, celebrate the attainment of a significant and satisfying new phase of group development, and with it a spiritual Coming of Age.

"Harlem is more than a Negro community; it is a large scale laboratory experiment in the race problem."

Overview

The 1920s witnessed a virtual explosion of African American artistic expression of all kinds, which centered in Harlem on New York's Upper West Side. More popularly known as the Harlem Renaissance, this cultural movement attracted many of the most accomplished black writers, artists, actors, and musicians of the early twentieth century. James Weldon Johnson was one of the movement's most respected contributors and, in the eyes of many, its godfather and most illustrious statesman. Like thousands of other black Americans who moved to Harlem from the South during the three decades prior to the Great Depression, Johnson was optimistic that "Black Manhattan" would offer economic, cultural, and racial liberation for himself and others. Indeed, Johnson viewed Harlem as a model for black advancement that could be achieved with unprecedented speed and with a minimum of racial tension. His essay "Harlem: The Culture Capital" was included in Professor Alain Locke's famous 1925 anthology, The New Negro, which served to introduce some young black authors but also featured the work of older and better-known writers like Johnson. An illustrated draft of Johnson's essay had also appeared in the limited circulation magazine Survey Graphic earlier that year. In 1930 he completed his much-anticipated book on the full history of African Americans in New York, called Black Manhattan, which was built around both versions of this article.

Context

The migration of hundreds of thousands of African Americans from the mostly rural South to northern industrial centers in the two decades before World War I helped change in dramatic ways the black experience in American life. It began as early as the 1890s, with a trickle of black families seeking better economic conditions, and reached flood tide with World War I and the subsequent restrictions on immigration, which would create job opportunities in unprecedented numbers. Some families simply relocated to cities in the South, but many, especially those from the Southeast, chose to move northward to Philadelphia, New York, and Boston. Those further west, in states like Arkansas and Tennessee, were more likely to find new homes in Chicago, Detroit, or Cleveland. But the most spectacular growth in black urban populations occurred in New York City in Harlem. By 1905 there were already sixty thousand African Americans in the city, and most of them were in the crowded neighborhoods of San Juan Hill and the Tenderloin in west-central Manhattan. Five years later, they were the majority in the once solidly middle-class white Harlem, north of 130th Street. Just before the outbreak of World War I, the black population of Harlem alone had surpassed fifty thousand.

In the 1920s, thousands more southern blacks and significant numbers from the West Indies would eventually extend black Harlem from 115th Street north to 155th Street, between the Harlem River and Amsterdam Avenue. Just before the beginning of the Great Depression, Harlem's black population was almost one hundred seventy thousand, making it, in James Weldon Johnson's words, "the most important black city in the world."

Population growth in Harlem was only part of the story. Black restaurants, speakeasies, jazz clubs, cabarets, stores, and churches quickly followed. The Harlem branch of the New York Public Library had a black staff, and the Harlem Young Men's Christian Association was one of the few branches that catered to African Americans. Even many police officers walking their beats were black. The newly formed National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) established its headquarters nearby in lower Manhattan, and so did the National Urban League. Harlem was also the home of the most influential black labor union, the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, led by the young Socialist A. Philip Randolph. The black nationalist and Pan-Africanist Marcus Garvey relocated his United Negro Improvement Association from Jamaica to Harlem, where it startled everyone with its appeal to working class blacks.

In little more than a decade, Harlem had clearly become the showcase for the "new Negro." The young Langston Hughes spoke for many new arrivals in Harlem when he expressed amazement at just how black Harlem was when he first emerged from the subway station at 135th Street and Lenox Avenue in 1921. As Hughes soon learned, however, whites still owned the most important stores and shops, and most of the clerks who worked in them were white as well. Even more disappointing was that some of the jazz clubs were white owned and catered to segregated audiences composed of whites who were eager to sample the mysteries of Harlem life. Still, it was a heady experience for Hughes and other recent arrivals to find for the first time a city of black people within a city controlled by whites.

Hughes was only one of many young black writers and artists attracted to the cultural excitement of Harlem. Between World War I and the Great Depression, Claude McKay, Zora Neale Hurston, Aaron Douglas, Wallace Thurman, Duke Ellington, and others added to the artistic flowering that came to be known as the Harlem Renaissance. Johnson was older than all of them, and his ties to Harlem were much deeper.

By the time Langston Hughes arrived in Harlem, it had been the city of residence for James Weldon Johnson for several years. Almost a generation older than Hughes, Johnson had visited New York from his native Florida as early as 1884, but his adult association with the city began in the late 1890s as a fledgling musician who, with his brother, hoped to establish himself as a songwriter. Johnson became a full-time resident in 1902. As a poet, journalist, and civil rights activist, he emerged as a dapper, sophisticated, and popular member of Harlem's intellectual elite.

Thus, it was altogether fitting, and perhaps strategically astute, that Alain Locke included Johnson's essay in The New Negro. In fact, "Harlem: The Culture Capital" helped set the tone of literary legitimacy for a group of younger black writers who had not yet established their own careers. Johnson was always willing to encourage young artists personally. He also used his influence as the executive secretary of the NAACP in the 1920s to advance the cause of the black artistic community generally.

About the Author

James Weldon Johnson, poet, novelist, essayist, anthologist, lyricist, diplomat, civil rights activist, and educator, was born in Jacksonville, Florida, in 1871 to Helen Louise Diller, a native of the Bahamas, and James Johnson. He was educated in the segregated public schools of Jacksonville and graduated from Georgia's Atlanta University in 1894 with a degree in music. At age twenty-three he became the principal of his former school in Jacksonville, while he simultaneously pursued careers as a journalist and lawyer. He was the first African American admitted to the Florida bar.

But his first love proved to be songwriting, often in collaboration with his brother Rosamond. Together the Johnson brothers visited New York several times in the late 1890s in an effort to market their songs and musical productions. They enjoyed modest commercial successes (as when their "Under the Bamboo Tree" sold four hundred thousand copies), but they are perhaps best remembered for the lyrics (by James) and the music (by Rosamond) of the Negro national anthem, "Lift Every Voice and Sing," which they wrote for a school celebration of Abraham Lincoln's birthday.

Johnson's musical career inevitably led him to become a permanent resident of New York City, where he stayed for the next thirty years, except for a brief stint as a U.S. consul, first in Venezuela and then in Nicaragua, from 1906 through 1912. While on diplomatic assignment he also wrote his only novel, The Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man, which received mostly positive reviews. In 1910, while on leave in New York from the consular service, he married Grace Nail, the daughter of John B. Nail, a pioneering African American entrepreneur in Manhattan, whose son, John E. Nail, would be among the first black investors in Harlem real estate. In 1912, Johnson took an official leave from his consular post, to which he never returned. Johnson and his wife split time between New York and Jacksonville, Florida, during 1913, finally settling in Harlem in 1914. During this time, he wrote tightly reasoned editorials often on racial issues for the black newspaper the New York Age and dabbled in local Republican politics. But Johnson was also an accomplished poet whose work had been published several times and appeared most dramatically on the New York Times editorial page in 1913 on the fiftieth anniversary of the Emancipation Proclamation, in the form of a forty-one-stanza poem, "Fifty Years," that garnered rave reviews from, among others, the African American novelist Charles Chesnutt. Johnson would later author several volumes of his own poetry and edit a handful of others.

Johnson, whose career had often been identified with Booker T. Washington, surprised some by joining the NAACP in 1916 and was shortly thereafter elected the president of the New York City chapter. His association with this organization brought him into close contact with such civil rights luminaries as the mercurial W. E. B. Du Bois and the obstinate Oswald Villard, who eventually helped persuade Johnson to be the NAACP's field secretary. In 1920 he was chosen the organization's first black executive secretary, a post that he held for the next decade. Johnson proved to be a brilliantly effective administrator who instinctively understood how to deal with an organization full of strong-willed personalities and to reach an institutional consensus among competing strategies and agendas. Nowhere were his administrative and diplomatic talents more evident than in using the NAACP to encourage young African American writers and artists whose maverick personalities sometimes made them difficult to deal with. A 1924 banquet at the integrated Civic Club in Manhattan brought together black writers and white publishers in an event that was legendary in the history of the Harlem Renaissance and inspired the publication of Alain Locke's anthology of black poetry and prose, The New Negro, in 1925. Johnson's essay on Harlem appeared in that anthology.

Johnson's tenure at the NAACP came at a crucial moment in the civil rights movement. He took an active role in its unsuccessful initiative to pressure Congress into passing an antilynching bill and was also an outspoken critic of racial violence and prejudice of all kinds. On his watch, the NAACP expanded its chapter base into the South and West and became the premier civil rights advocacy group in the world. Johnson resigned from the NAACP in 1930 to become a professor of literature at Fisk University in Nashville, Tennessee, but found opportunities to return to his beloved New York on many occasions. Explanation and Analysis of the Document

In "Harlem: The Culture Capital," Johnson describes the past, present, and what he envisions as the future of the New York City neighborhood that black intellectuals considered the black capital. His observations chronicle the transitions in the ethnic makeup of Harlem and the migration of blacks from other parts of the city, in search of economic opportunity and financial security. Johnson closes with an optimistic vision of Harlem's prospects for ongoing prosperity and stability.

In the first two paragraphs of his essay, Johnson sounds a glowingly optimistic note about the brief past and promising future of black Harlem, which he describes as the "great Mecca" for the curious and enterprising who have in a very short period of time come from all parts of the United States and even from Africa and the Caribbean Islands. He points out at some length that although Harlem is heavily populated by blacks, it is not a ghetto or a slum but rather a "city within a city," where the quality of housing and high levels of commercial activity are virtually identical to the districts mostly white that lie immediately to its south and north. For Johnson, this curious circumstance of a neighborhood that is identified only by the skin color of its residents and not by the condition of its streets or the appearance of its buildings makes Harlem a unique experiment in racial uplift.

Johnson is careful to set Harlem apart in at least two ways from other neighborhoods in New York and elsewhere where blacks may live but where there is less potential for racial advancement. First, because blacks moved into Harlem while it was still thoroughly middle class, there was no inherited legacy of poverty, squalor, or urban decay. Second, unlike other urban black districts, Harlem had an unusually large critical mass of blacks who sought the same goals and had the same ambitions as other racial and ethnic groups. Johnson's upbeat appraisal of Harlem has not been supported by recent scholarship. Most historians today would point out that statistical evidence some of which would not have been readily available to Johnson in the 1920s suggests that if Harlem was not a ghetto in 1920 or even 1925, it was getting dangerously close by 1930 and beyond. Johnson's glowing account was, however, not necessarily the product of undiluted racial boosterism but more likely a reflection of his conviction that racial progress was inevitable and well under way in the Harlem he describes here.

The third and fourth paragraphs offer a brief and informative history of black residential patterns on Manhattan's West Side in the pre-Harlem years of the very late nineteenth century, a history in which Johnson himself had participated as a young aspiring musician and lyricist. It is important to note that in this and other sections of his essay Johnson is both historian and autobiographer, a chronicler of important developments but also a participant in the events he describes. Johnson accurately points out that the move northward by black residents of Manhattan was slow but inexorable. By 1890 the center of the black district on Manhattan's West Side had moved as far north as 30th Street; by 1900 roughly when Johnson first came to New York the northward migration had reached 53rd Street, and there were already obvious stirrings of black culture, especially in music and theater. Johnson himself regularly patronized the Marshall Hotel on 53rd Street and was among the regular celebrity figures there. (His reference to Cole and Johnson, for example, is to himself and Bob Cole, with whom he teamed to write songs.) At least in terms of popular stage and music, it is clear that there was a significant artistic movement under way in midtown Manhattan twenty years before the center of Negro culture moved to Harlem.

◆ Paragraphs 5–7

In the next three paragraphs, Johnson accurately, though without much detail, describes the initial movement of black people from the midtown Manhattan on the West Side to Harlem. He is correct in asserting that the initial wave of blacks to Harlem in the first decade of the twentieth century was in response to cheaper and better housing that was available in upper Harlem because that district had been hopelessly overbuilt by real estate investors hoping to sell to middle-class white residents. Not mentioned in Johnson's account (but discussed briefly in his autobiography) was the influence of the 1900 riots in midtown Manhattan, which also encouraged African Americans to look elsewhere for housing. Black real estate entrepreneurs (his example being Philip Payton, an aggressive investor) were important brokers in helping to find black tenants for available rental properties near 135th Street, east of Lenox Avenue (today known as Malcolm X Boulevard), an arrangement that initially created very little attention. But the eventual spread of the black migration west of Lenox Avenue and ultimately farther south and north encountered intermittent white resistance, mostly through property owners' associations that attempted to block the proliferation of black residential growth through evictions and collusion with lending institutions. For their part, black investors formed their own associations to facilitate the purchase and rental of Harlem property; Johnson's in-laws, his wife's father (J. B. Nail) and brother (J. E. Nail), were early investors in Harlem real estate.

Harlem River, which separates the Bronx from Manhattan, in the first decade of the twentieth century (Library of

◆ Paragraphs 8 and 9

For Johnson, the real stimulus for black interest in Harlem came as a result of the labor shortage created by World War I and the subsequent decline in immigration. In his account, government and private labor contractors descended on the South in search of willing workers to replace those displaced by military service. Newspaper editorials and advertisements in black northern newspapers like the Chicago Defender are not mentioned in Johnson's account but were also influential in stimulating interest in this steady northern migration of southern blacks, known as the Great Migration. Johnson's description of this phenomenon is predictably optimistic, almost charming at times, as he portrays the migrants, laden with baggage and full of hope for a better life. He compares them to immigrants from Europe, who also sought the promise of a better life in New York. Johnson, however, virtually ignores the large numbers of blacks who came from the South but wound up in other cities, like Chicago, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, and Detroit, which many scholars are beginning to discover had their own versions of Harlem. Johnson is also careful to point out that Harlem-bound black migrants found well-paying jobs in abundance and used their newfound affluence to buy property in unprecedented numbers. His account of "Pig Foot Mary," who sold soul food on Lenox Avenue and saved enough money to buy a five-story apartment house on 137th Street, is legendary in Harlem lore.

Johnson's argument in these two paragraphs is not simply that Harlem offered jobs and economic progress to thousands but also that it helped create a nascent black middle class that embraced the American dream of property ownership and financial security. His assertion that "today Negro Harlem is practically owned by Negroes" is only partially correct, however. His statistics about black property ownership are accurate enough, but most modern historians would be skeptical about his suggestion that Harlem blacks owned Harlem, especially in the 1920s and 1930s. The Harlem riots of 1935, which Johnson would not have known about or anticipated in 1925, are a telling reminder of just how fragile economic prosperity could be for many African Americans in Harlem and elsewhere. The riots, which began as protests over charges of police brutality and were fueled by frustrations about widespread unemployment in Harlem, quickly turned violent and helped focus public attention on the deteriorating economy of the entire area.

These four paragraphs are devoted to the future of Harlem, which, in Johnson's mind at least, is bright indeed. He turns first to the question of whether "Negroes are going to be able to hold Harlem." His answer is succinct and optimistic: It is unlikely, he believes, that there would be a large-scale black migration from such a prosperous area. But if blacks were to leave Harlem, it would be because their property became so valuable that they could sell at a profit and not because they were forced out as undesirable residents or because their property had lost its value. In short, property in Harlem, often purchased by Negroes at discounted prices, would be a springboard for prosperity even if they left. Such a circumstance, Johnson argues, would actually mean that black property owners had reached the happy position of owning land "so valuable they can no longer afford to live on it." But, he asks rhetorically, is it likely that Harlem property owners could, in an economic downturn, be unable to keep the property he thinks is vital to their long-term security? With equal conviction he insists that Harlem blacks, thanks to their diversified and entrepreneurial economy, are much better protected from catastrophic loss than are African Americans in other urban areas. In fact, Johnson maintains, Harlem's unique makeup of cultural, financial, and religious institutions makes it the most stable black community in the world. For Johnson, Harlem is not another ethnic quarter whose ties to the larger metropolitan center are vague and weak; rather, Harlem "is not alien… ; it is not Italian or Yiddish; it is English. Harlem talks American, reads American, thinks American."

Johnson's last three paragraphs are devoted to his conclusion that Harlem is best seen not as a Negro residential area but rather as a "large scale laboratory experiment in the race problem." In his mind, there is very little chance that Harlem will be a source of racial tension because whites and blacks have learned to live and work together in ways that do not exist elsewhere in New York or anywhere in the United States, for that matter. The old friction between white residents and Negro intruders is a thing of the past for Johnson. Moreover, he insists that the record of crime in Harlem is the lowest of virtually any area in New York. Put simply, Johnson is convinced that "the Negro's advantages and opportunities are greater in Harlem than in any other place in the country."

Part of Johnson's optimism about Harlem stems from his upbeat personality and his own background of personal success. As one of the most accomplished African Americans of his time — in many ways more talented and certainly more versatile than the great Du Bois himself — it was simply not in his nature to be skeptical about the progress of his race. He was a modern man to be sure, but he was also of the old school of civil rights advocates who believed that once black people had demonstrated that they were the intellectual, artistic, commercial, and athletic equal of whites, their day in the sun would quickly follow. In 1925, when he wrote "Harlem: The Culture Capital," he thought that African Americans were very close to achieving that goal and that Harlem would be the crucible of their final and most glorious achievement. For him Harlem was his beloved home, but more important, he hoped it would be the birthplace of the "new Negro."

Audience

James Weldon Johnson's essay was written originally for a special edition of a limited-circulation artistic magazine, Survey Graphic, in 1925, but it was revised for publication in the famous and influential anthology of black literature entitled The New Negro later that same year. Some of Johnson's audience was undoubtedly black, but The New Negro was also intended to convince white readers (and publishers) that the rumors of black literary talent (and black progress generally) centered in Harlem were based on fact. Johnson had cultivated white audiences of various kinds for years; he knew how to reach them, and he understood what many of them wanted to hear. As a longtime resident of Harlem and as a leader of its intellectual elite, he also believed every word he wrote. He was only one of the contributors to The New Negro, but he may have been its most reassuring voice.

Impact

Johnson was one of the most respected black leaders of his time and arguably the most universally talented. The fact that his essay was included in the Survey Graphic issue as well as in The New Negro is testimony to his influence and skill as an author and a civil rights activist. It also sent a clear message to younger authors that he was a reliable source of aid and encouragement. Johnson had an impressive ability to find common ground among diverse constituencies. He was among the few who could maintain cordial relationships between such adversaries as Booker T. Washington and W. E. B. Du Bois, and he saw no contradiction in advancing his own optimistic views of black progress while encouraging more skeptical writers like Claude McKay and Langston Hughes to find their literary voices. His accomplishments were prodigious, and his faith that others could do the same was lifelong. Today, against the backdrop of modern historical scholarship, he is easily read as naive in his hope for black progress and unrealistic in his conviction that it could be achieved in the same way that other ethnic groups had won respect. Almost a century later, it is clear that Harlem never really came close to Johnson's ideal, but in the 1920s his positive and disarming message was comforting to many. For that reason, his essay was widely read and admired, as was his longer history of blacks in New York, entitled Black Manhattan, published in 1930.

Questions for Further Study

1. Johnson's essay invites comparison with Alain Locke's essay "Enter the New Negro" and, in fact, was published in Locke's 1925 anthology, The New Negro. What different perspectives do the two writers take on the Harlem Renaissance?

2. Describe the social and economic factors that gave rise to the Harlem Renaissance.

3. In Johnson's view, what distinguished Harlem from other neighborhoods in which African Americans lived? Why were these differences important?

4. Why, in Johnson's view, was Harlem a "large scale laboratory experiment in the race problem"? What did he mean by this expression? In your opinion, was he correct?

5. In your opinion, was Johnson perhaps naive and unrealistic about the future of the black community? Why or why not?

James Weldon Johnson's "Harlem: The Culture Capital"

In the history of New York, the significance of the name Harlem has changed from Dutch to Irish to Jewish to Negro. Of these changes, the last has come most swiftly, throughout colored America, from Massachusetts to Mississippi, and across the continent to Los Angeles and Seattle, its name, which as late as fifteen years ago had scarcely been heard, now stands for the Negro metropolis. Harlem is indeed the great Mecca for the sight-seer, the pleasure-seeker, the curious, the adventurous, the enterprising, the ambitious and the talented of the whole Negro world; for the lure of it has reached down to every island of the Carib Sea and has penetrated even into Africa.

In the make-up of New York, Harlem is not merely a Negro colony or community, it is a city within a city, the greatest Negro city in the world. It is not a slum or a fringe, it is located in the heart of Manhattan and occupies one of the most beautiful and healthful sections of the city. It is not a "quarter" of dilapidated tenements, but is made up of new-law apartments and handsome dwellings, with well-paved and well-lighted streets. It has its own churches, social and civic centers, shops, theaters and other places of amusement. And it contains more Negroes to the square mile than any other spot on earth. A stranger who rides up magnificent Seventh Avenue on a bus or in an automobile must be struck with surprise at the transformation which takes place after he crosses One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street. Beginning there, the population suddenly darkens and he rides through twenty-five solid blocks where the passers-by, the shoppers, those sitting in restaurants, coming out of theaters, standing in doorways and looking out of windows are practically all Negroes: and then he emerges where the population as suddenly becomes white again. There is nothing just like it in any other city in the country, for there is no preparation for it; no change in the character of the houses and streets: no change, indeed, in the appearance of the people, except their color.

Negro Harlem is practically a development of the past decade, but the story behind it goes back a long way. There have always been colored people in New York. In the middle of the last century they lived in the vicinity of Lispenard, Broome and Spring Streets. When Washington Square and lower Fifth Avenue were the center of aristocratic life, the colored people, whose chief occupation was domestic service in the homes of the rich, lived in a fringe and were scattered in nests to the south, east and west of the square. As late as the 80's the major part of the colored population lived in Sullivan, Thompson, Bleecker, Grove, Minetta Lane and adjacent streets. It is curious to note that some of these nests still persist. In a number of the blocks of Greenwich Village and Little Italy may be found small groups of Negroes who have never lived in any other section of the city. By about 1890 the center of colored population had shifted to the upper Twenties and lower Thirties west of Sixth Avenue. Ten years later another considerable shift northward had been made to West Fifty-third Street.

The West Fifty-third Street settlement deserves some special mention because it ushered in a new phase of life among colored New Yorkers. Three rather well appointed hotels were opened in the street and they quickly became the centers of a sort of fashionable life that hitherto had not existed. On Sunday evenings these hotels served dinner to music and attracted crowds of well dressed diners. One of these hotels, the Marshall, became famous as the headquarters of Negro talent. There gathered the actors, the musicians, the composers, the writers, the singers, dancers and vaudevillians. There one went to get a close up of Williams and Walker, Cole and Johnson, Ernest Hogan, Will Marion Cook, Jim Europe, Alda Overton, and of others equally and less known. Paul Laurence Dunbar was frequently there whenever he was in New York. Numbers of those who love to shine by the light reflected from celebrities were always to be found. The first modern jazz band ever heard in New York, or perhaps anywhere, was organized at the Marshall. It was a playing-singing-dancing orchestra, making the first dominant use of banjos, saxophones, clarinets and trap drums in combination, and was called the Memphis Students. Jim Europe was a member of that band, and out of it grew the famous Clef Club, of which he was the noted leader, and which for a long time monopolized the business of "entertaining" private parties and furnishing music for the new dance craze. Also in the Clef Club was "Buddy" Gilmore, who originated trap drumming as it is now practiced, and set hundreds of white men to juggling their sticks and doing acrobatic stunts while they manipulated a dozen other noise making devices aside from their drums. A good many well-known white performers frequented the Marshall and for seven or eight years the place was one of the sights of New York.

The move to Fifty-third Street was the result of the opportunity to get into newer and better houses. About 1900 the move to Harlem began, and for the same reason. Harlem had been overbuilt with large, new law apartment houses, but rapid transportation to that section was very inadequate the Lenox Avenue Subway had not yet been built and landlords were finding difficulty in keeping houses on the east side of the section filled. Residents along and near Seventh Avenue were fairly well served by the Eighth Avenue Elevated. A colored man in the real estate business at this time, Philip A. Payton, approached several of these landlords with the proposition that he would fill their empty or partially empty houses with steady colored tenants. The suggestion was accepted, and one or two houses on One Hundred and Thirty-fourth Street east of Lenox Avenue were taken over. Gradually other houses were filled. The whites paid little attention to the movement until it began to spread west of Lenox Avenue; they then took steps to check it. They proposed through a financial organization, the Hudson Realty Company, to buy all properties occupied by colored people and evict the tenants. The Negroes countered by similar methods. Payton formed the Afro-American Realty Company, a Negro corporation organized for the purpose of buying and leasing houses for occupancy by colored people. Under this counter stroke the opposition subsided for several years.

But the continually increasing pressure of colored people in the west over the Lenox Avenue dead line caused the opposition to break out again, but in a new and more menacing form. Several white men undertook to organize all the white people of the community for the purpose of inducing financial institutions not to lend money or renew mortgages on properties occupied by colored people. In this effort they had considerable success, and created a situation which has not yet been completely overcome, a situation which is one of the hardest and most unjustifiable the Negro property owner in Harlem has to contend with. The Afro-American Realty Company was now defunct, but two or three colored men of means stepped into the breach. Philip A. Payton and J. C Thomas bought two five-story apartments, dispossessed the white tenants and put in colored. J. B. Nail bought a row of five apartments and did the same thing. St. Philip's Church bought a row of thirteen apartment houses on One Hundred and Thirty-fifth Street, running from Seventh Avenue almost to Lenox.

The situation now resolved itself into an actual contest. Negroes not only continued to occupy available apartment houses, but began to purchase private dwellings between Lenox and Seventh Avenues. Then the whole movement, in the eyes of the whites, took on the aspect of an "Invasion"; they became panic-stricken and began fleeing as from a plague. The presence of one colored family in a block, no matter how well bred and orderly, was sufficient to precipitate a flight. House after house and block after block was actually deserted. It was a great demonstration of human beings running amuck. None of them stopped to reason why they were doing it or what would happen if they didn't. The banks and lending companies holding mortgages on these deserted houses were compelled to take them over. For some time they held these houses vacant, preferring to do that and carry the charges than to rent or sell them to colored people. But values dropped and continued to drop until at the outbreak of the war in Europe[;] property in the northern part of Harlem had reached the nadir.

In the meantime the Negro colony was becoming more stable; the churches were being moved from the lower part of the city; social and civic centers were being formed, and gradually a community was being evolved. Following the outbreak of the war in Europe, Negro Harlem received a new and tremendous impetus. Because of the war thousands of aliens in the United States rushed back to their native lands to join the colors and immigration practically ceased. The result was a critical shortage in labor. This shortage was rapidly increased as the United States went more and more largely into the business of furnishing munitions and supplies to the warring countries. To help meet this shortage of common labor, Negroes were brought up from the South. The government itself took the first steps, following the practice in vogue in Germany of shifting labor according to the supply and demand in various parts of the country. The example of the government was promptly taken up by the big industrial concerns, which sent hundreds, perhaps thousands, of labor agents into the South, who recruited Negroes by wholesale. I was in Jacksonville, Fla., for a while at that time, and I sat one day and watched the stream of migrants passing to take the train. For hours they passed steadily, carrying flimsy suit cases, new and shiny, rusty old ones, bursting at the seams, boxes and bundles and impedimenta of all sorts, including banjos, guitars, birds in cages and what not. Similar scenes were being enacted in cities and towns all over that region. The first wave of the great exodus of Negroes from the South was on. Great numbers of these migrants headed for New York or eventually got there, and naturally the majority went up into Harlem. But the Negro population of Harlem was not swollen by migrants from the South alone; the opportunity for Negro labor exerted its pull upon the Negroes of the West Indies, and those islanders in the course of time poured into Harlem to the number of twenty-five thousand or more.

These new-comers did not have to look for work; work looked for them, and at wages of which they had never even dreamed. And here is where the unlooked for, the unprecedented, the miraculous happened. According to all preconceived notions, these Negroes suddenly earning large sums of money for the first time in their lives should have had their heads turned; they should have squandered it in the most silly and absurd manners imaginable. Later, after the United States had entered the war and even Negroes in the South were making money fast, many stories in accord with the tradition came out of that section. There was the one about the colored man who went into a general store and on hearing a phonograph for the first time promptly ordered six of them, one for each child in the house. I shall not stop to discuss whether Negroes in the South did that sort of thing or not, but I do know that those who got to New York didn't. The Negroes of Harlem, for the greater part, worked and saved their money. Nobody knew how much they had saved until congestion made expansion necessary for tenants and ownership profitable for landlords, and they began to buy property. Persons who would never be suspected of having money bought property. The Rev. W. W. Brown, pastor of the Metropolitan Baptist Church, repeatedly made "Buy Property" the text of his sermons. A large part of his congregation carried out the injunction. The church itself set an example by purchasing a magnificent brownstone church building on Seventh Avenue from a white congregation. Buying property became a fever. At the height of this activity, that is, 1920 21, it was not an uncommon thing for a colored washerwoman or cook to go into a real estate office and lay down from one thousand to five thousand dollars on a house. "Pig Foot Mary" is a character in Harlem. Everybody who knows the corner of Lenox Avenue and One Hundred and Thirty-fifth Street knows "Mary" and her stand, and has been tempted by the smell of her pigsfeet, fried chicken and hot corn, even if he has not been a customer. "Mary," whose real name is Mrs. Mary Dean, bought the five-story apartment house at the corner of Seventh Avenue and One Hundred and Thirty-seventh Street at a price of $42,000. Later she sold it to the Y.W.C.A. for dormitory purposes. The Y.W.C.A. sold it recently to Adolph Howell, a leading colored undertaker, the price given being $72,000. Often companies of a half dozen men combined to buy a house these combinations were and still are generally made up of West Indians and would produce five or ten thousand dollars to put through the deal.

When the buying activity began to make itself felt, the lending companies that had been holding vacant the handsome dwellings on and abutting Seventh Avenue decided to put them on the market. The values on these houses had dropped to the lowest mark possible and they were put up at astonishingly low prices. Houses that had been bought at from $15,000 to $20,000 were sold at one third those figures. They were quickly gobbled up. The Equitable Life Assurance Company held 106 model private houses that were designed by Stanford White. They are built with courts running straight through the block and closed off by wrought iron gates. Every one of these houses was sold within eleven months at an aggregate price of about two million dollars. Today they are probably worth about 100 per cent more. And not only have private dwellings and similar apartments been bought but big elevator apartments have been taken over. Corporations have been organized for this purpose. Two of these, the Antillian Realty Company, composed of West Indian Negroes, and the Sphinx Securities Company, composed of American and West Indian Negroes, represent holdings amounting to approximately $750,000. Individual Negroes and companies in the South have invested in Harlem real estate. About two years ago a Negro institution of Savannah, Ga., bought a parcel for $115,000 which it sold a month or so ago at a profit of $110,000.

I am informed by John E. Nail, a successful colored real estate dealer of Harlem and a reliable authority, that the total value of property in Harlem owned and controlled by colored people would at a conservative estimate amount to more than sixty million dollars. These figures are amazing, especially when we take into account the short time in which they have been piled up. Twenty years ago Negroes were begging for the privilege of renting a flat in Harlem. Fifteen years ago barely a half dozen colored men owned real property in all Manhattan. And down to ten years ago the amount that had been acquired in Harlem was comparatively negligible. Today Negro Harlem is practically owned by Negroes.

The question naturally arises, "Are the Negroes going to be able to hold Harlem?" If they have been steadily driven northward for the past hundred years and out of less desirable sections, can they hold this choice bit of Manhattan Island? It is hardly probable that Negroes will hold Harlem indefinitely, but when they are forced out it will not be for the same reasons that forced them out of former quarters in New York City. The situation is entirely different and without precedent. When colored people do leave Harlem, their homes, their churches, their investments and their businesses, it will be because the land has become so valuable they can no longer afford to live on it. But the date of another move northward is very far in the future. What will Harlem be and become in the meantime? Is there danger that the Negro may lose his economic status in New York and be unable to hold his property? Will Harlem become merely a famous ghetto, or will it be a center of intellectual, cultural and economic forces exerting an influence throughout the world, especially upon Negro peoples? Will it become a point of friction between the races in New York?

I think there is less danger to the Negroes of New York of losing out economically and industrially than to the Negroes of any large city in the North. In most of the big industrial centers Negroes are engaged in gang labor. They are employed by thousands in the stockyards in Chicago, by thousands in the automobile plants in Detroit, and in those cities they are likely to be the first to be let go, and in thousands, with every business depression. In New York there is hardly such a thing as gang labor among Negroes, except among the longshoremen, and it is in the longshoremen's unions, above all others, that Negroes stand on an equal footing. Employment among Negroes in New York is highly diversified: in the main they are employed more as individuals than as nonintegral parts of a gang. Furthermore, Harlem is gradually becoming more and more a self-supporting community. Negroes there are steadily branching out into new businesses and enterprises in which Negroes are employed. So the danger of great numbers of Negroes being thrown out of work at once, with a resulting economic crisis among them, is less in New York than in most of the large cities of the North to which Southern migrants have come.

These facts have an effect which goes beyond the economic and industrial situation. They have a direct bearing on the future character of Harlem and on the question as to whether Harlem will be a point of friction between the races in New York. It is true that Harlem is a Negro community, well defined and stable; anchored to its fixed homes, churches, institutions, business and amusement places; basing its own working, business and professional classes. It is experiencing a constant growth of group consciousness and community feeling. Harlem is, therefore, in many respects, typically Negro. It has many unique characteristics. It has movement, color, gayety, singing, dancing, boisterous laughter and loud talk. One of its outstanding features is brass band parades. Hardly a Sunday passes but that there are several of these parades of which many are gorgeous with regalia and insignia. Almost any excuse will do the death of an humble member of the Elks, the laying of a cornerstone, the "turning out" of the order of this or that. In many of these characteristics it is similar to the Italian colony. But withal, Harlem grows more metropolitan and more a part of New York all the while, why is it then that its tendency is not to become a mere "quarter"?

I shall give three reasons that seem to me to be important in their order. First, the language of Harlem is not alien; it is not Italian or Yiddish; it is English. Harlem talks American, reads American, thinks American, Second, Harlem is not physically a "quarter." It is not a section cut off. It is merely a zone through which four main arteries of the city run. Third, the fact that there is little or no gang labor gives Harlem Negroes the opportunity for individual expansion and individual contacts with the life and spirit of New York. A thousand Negroes from Mississippi put to work as a gang in a Pittsburgh steel mill will for a long time remain a thousand Negroes from Mississippi. Under the conditions that prevail in New York they would all within six months become New Yorkers. The rapidity with which Negroes become good New Yorkers is one of the marvels to observers.

These three reasons form a single reason why there is small probability that Harlem will ever be a point of race friction between the races in New York. One of the principal factors in the race riot in Chicago in 1919 was the fact that at that time there were 12,000 Negroes employed in gangs in the stockyards. There was considerable race feeling in Harlem at the time of the hegira of white residents due to the "invasion," but that feeling, of course, is no more. Indeed, a number of the old white residents who didn't go or could not get away before the housing shortage struck New York are now living peacefully side by side with colored residents. In fact, in some cases white and colored tenants occupy apartments in the same house. Many white merchants still do business in thickest Harlem. On the whole, I know of no place in the country where the feeling between the races is so cordial and at the same time so matter-of-fact and taken for granted. One of the surest safeguards against an outbreak in New York such as took place in so many Northern cities in the summer of 1919 is the large proportion of Negro police on duty in Harlem.

To my mind, Harlem is more than a Negro community; it is a large scale laboratory experiment in the race problem. The statement has often been made that if Negroes were transported to the North in large numbers the race problem with all or its acuteness and with new aspects would be transferred with them. Well, 175,000 Negroes live closely together in Harlem, in the heart of New York 75,000 more than live in any Southern city and do so without any race friction. Nor is there any unusual record of crime. I once heard a captain of the 38th Police Precinct (the Harlem precinct) say that on the whole it was the most law abiding precinct in the city. New York guarantees its Negro citizens the fundamental rights of American citizenship and protects them in the exercise of those rights. In return the Negro loves New York and is proud of it, and contributes in his way to its greatness. He still meets with discriminations, but possessing the basic rights, he knows that these discriminations will be abolished.

I believe that the Negro's advantages and opportunities are greater in Harlem than in any other place in the country, and that Harlem will become the intellectual, the cultural and financial center for Negroes of the United States, and will exert a vital influence upon all Negro peoples.

Alice Moore Dunbar-Nelson: "The Negro Woman and the Ballot"

"When she got the ballot she slipped quietly ... into the political party of her male relatives."

Overview

In 1927 the writer, educator, and activist Alice Moore Dunbar-Nelson published an article titled "The Negro Woman and the Ballot" in the African American magazine The Messenger, in which she posed the question What have black women done with their vote? Dunbar-Nelson believed that black women had accomplished not nearly enough as a result of their enfranchisement in 1920, and she encouraged them to start exercising their power as voters without bowing to pressure from their male peers or loyalty to the Republican Party. She noted that African American women had already demonstrated their power as a group in the congressional elections of 1922, in which their votes had helped oust Republican legislators in Delaware, New Jersey, and Michigan who had failed to support the antilynching legislation known as the Dyer bill. Dunbar-Nelson concluded her article by positing that when black women have realized that their children's futures could be helped or hindered by the way they voted, perhaps they would set aside allegiance to the Republican Party and use their ballot power to better the condition of all African Americans.

Context

Women in the United States had been agitating for the right to vote since the early nineteenth century. By mid-century, Lucretia Mott, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony, and others had emerged as leading advocates for women's suffrage. In their nationwide movement, suffragists marched and picketed, gave lectures, published articles, submitted petitions, faced verbal and physical abuse, and sometimes even went to prison. In 1870 the Fifteenth Amendment to the Constitution extended the right to vote to African American men but not to women of any race. Women would still have to wait and work toward their enfranchisement. And work they did, although different factions went about it in different ways. Some worked for state voting rights, while others pressed for a national constitutional amendment. By 1918, fifteen states, most of them in the West, had granted women full suffrage (the right to vote in all elections), and women had limited voting rights in about two dozen other states. However, by this time most national women's suffrage organizations had become united behind the push for a constitutional amendment that would grant full suffrage to women.

When President Woodrow Wilson changed his stance and announced his support of the women's suffrage amendment in early 1918, the political atmosphere began to shift. In 1919 Congress passed the Nineteenth Amendment, which granted full suffrage to women. In August 1920 Tennessee became the thirty-sixth and final state needed to ratify the amendment. On August 26, Secretary of State Bainbridge Colby certified the amendment's adoption. Finally, women had been granted the right to vote in all elections nationwide.

In the congressional elections of 1922, women were given the opportunity to make a broad-based statement in support of the Dyer bill, the first piece of antilynching legislation ever to have reached the Senate for a vote. After the Civil War, white supremacists had sought ways to infringe upon the newly won rights of African Americans. Lynching had existed since the days of British rule, and its victims had included many white people and Native Americans. In the South during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, lynching became one of the cruelest and more frequent forms of violence practiced against African Americans, who comprised the majority of its victims. In April 1918, Leonidas C. Dyer, a Republican congressman from Missouri, introduced a bill in the House of Representatives that would prohibit lynching and make it a federal offense. He was motivated by the horrible riots including lynching and other violent acts that took place in July of 1917 in East St. Louis, Illinois directly across the Mississippi River from Dyer's district in St. Louis. The Dyer bill was sponsored by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). Despite bitter opposition, the House passed a somewhat modified form of the Dyer bill by a substantial majority on January 26, 1922, and it moved on to the Senate for consideration.

A women's organization called the Anti-Lynching Crusaders was founded in the late spring of 1922, and that summer it launched a national campaign that pressed for passage of the Dyer bill in the Senate. The Anti-Lynching

Crusaders set forth to raise money for its parent organization, the NAACP, and to educate the American public about the horrific practice of lynching. The campaign was to be completed on or before January 1, 1923. The organization was headed by the president of the National Association of Colored Women, Mary B. Talbert (referred to as "Mrs. Mary B. Talbot" in "The Negro Woman and the Ballot"). Although the Anti-Lynching Crusaders consisted largely of African American women, white women were encouraged to join, and some worked for the cause. At the end of a five-month campaign, all funds were turned over to the NAACP.

Because of the inaction of Republican senators and a filibuster by Democratic Senate minority leader Oscar W. Underwood of Alabama, the Senate did not vote on the Dyer bill in 1922. Congressman Dyer reintroduced the bill in the House of Representatives in 1923 and again in every succeeding congressional session in the 1920s but failed to gain congressional support. Further interest in antilynching legislation had to wait until the 1930s. But the Republican failure to secure passage of the Dyer bill in the Senate had not come without a political price.

In the early 1920s, most African American voters still were members of the Republican Party, the party of Abraham Lincoln, who had issued the Emancipation Proclamation in 1863. Because Lincoln, the first Republican president, had taken up the cause of emancipation, many African Americans felt they owed allegiance to his party. During Reconstruction some black Republicans were voted into Congress. The Republican Party also kept blacks' allegiance because Republicans seemed to be the only ones who cared anything for African American issues or helping to secure their rights, especially through the Civil Rights Act of 1875. However, the seeming indifference of Republican politicians toward the fate of the Dyer bill in the Senate disheartened many African Americans. The filibuster by a southern Democrat had not been surprising, since many politicians from the Deep South touted white-supremacist views.

Many African American women, as Dunbar-Nelson noted in "The Negro Woman and the Ballot," made their disappointment known in the congressional elections of 1922, especially in Delaware, New Jersey, and Michigan, by voting down those Republican legislators who had let the Dyer bill fade away. Indeed, Republican apathy about the Dyer bill caused many African Americans, a good number of them women, to switch their support to the Democratic Party, which at the national level had begun to embrace progressive values regardless of the views of some reactionary Democrats, mostly from the South. Dunbar-Nelson freely admitted that her own disappointment in her Republican congressional representatives had caused her to become a Democrat.

Women, both white and black, had worked tirelessly for the right to vote, and black women in particular had urged the passage of antilynching legislation. After the failure of the Dyer bill in the Senate, women proved that their vote counted when those legislators seen as careless with the power vested in them by their constituents were sent home.

Several years later in "The Negro Woman and the Ballot," Dunbar-Nelson examined what she thought it would take for African American women to build upon their display of political strength in 1922.

About the Author

Alice Moore Dunbar-Nelson was born Alice Ruth Moore, on July 19, 1875, in New Orleans, Louisiana. Her father, Joseph Moore, was a seaman who had some white ancestry. Her mother, Patricia Wright, a former slave turned seamstress, had Native American and African American blood. In Creole society, the light skin and reddish hair that Alice had inherited helped her socially and allowed her sometimes to pass for white when she desired to partake of the activities of high culture limited to whites.

After Dunbar-Nelson graduated from a two-year teaching program at Straight College (now Dillard University) in 1892, she taught at a New Orleans elementary school. In 1895, when she was just twenty, she published her first book, a collection of poetry, short stories, reviews, and essays titled Violets and Other Tales. Poetry from this book, along with her picture, was featured in the Boston Monthly Review, a literary magazine, and attracted the attention of the prominent African American poet Paul Laurence Dunbar. At first the two maintained an epistolary relationship, but they finally met in person in 1897. They were wed in March 1898 in New York City.

The Dunbars moved to Washington, D.C., where they became a celebrated literary couple. In 1899, Dunbar-Nelson published another collection of short fiction, The Goodness of St. Rocque and Other Stories, as the companion volume to her husband's Poems of Cabin and Field. In 1902 the couple separated after four tumultuous years. Because Paul Dunbar suffered from medically induced alcoholism and drug addiction, he occasionally flew into rages during which he physically abused his wife. That Dunbar-Nelson sometimes critiqued her husband's poetry written in African American dialect hardly eased tensions between the two. Four years after his separation from his wife, Dunbar died of tuberculosis. While Dunbar-Nelson's relationship with her husband at his death was not amicable, she would be honored for the rest of her life as the widow of Paul Dunbar.

After Dunbar-Nelson separated from her husband, she moved to Wilmington, Delaware, where she was joined by her mother, sister, and her sister's children. She started teaching at Howard High School, and in addition to teaching and administrative duties there, she studied at Cornell University, Columbia University, and the University of Pennsylvania. She edited two works, Masterpieces of Negro Eloquence (1914) and The Dunbar Speaker and Entertainer (1920). During these years, Dunbar-Nelson was involved in several relationships, including one with the principal of Howard High School, Edwina B. Kruse, and a secret marriage to fellow teacher Henry Arthur Callis on January 19, 1910. Callis was younger than Dunbar-Nelson by twelve years, and the marriage did not last long.

In 1916 Dunbar-Nelson married the journalist Robert J. Nelson. This union would last for the rest of her life, even though she would continue to have romantic affairs with both women and men. Dunbar-Nelson became even more of a political and social activist after she married Nelson. She participated in the movement for women's suffrage and World War I relief efforts. Together, the couple published the Wilmington Advocate, a liberal black newspaper, from 1920 to 1922. During this period, Dunbar-Nelson was also a member of the State Republican Committee of Delaware, and she chaired the Delaware branch of the Anti-Lynching Crusaders. She also became active in the Federation of Colored Women's Clubs. After the demise of the Dyer bill in the Senate, Dunbar-Nelson switched her allegiance to the Democratic Party and encouraged other African Americans to do the same. Beginning in 1924, she started to organize Democratic black women voters.

Dunbar-Nelson cofounded the Industrial School for Colored Girls in Marshallton, Delaware, where from 1924 to 1928 she served on the staff. From 1926 to 1930 she wrote columns regularly for various newspapers. Instead of the society gossip typical of female columnists of that time, Dunbar-Nelson wrote incisive pieces that addressed politics and cultural issues. She also traveled extensively as a public speaker, in part because of her position as executive secretary from 1928 to 1931 of the American Friends Inter-Racial Peace Committee.

In 1928 Dunbar-Nelson, along with many other middle-class African American women who previously had been Republicans, worked for the nomination of Alfred E. Smith as the Democratic presidential candidate. She gave speeches in support of Smith, whom she saw as the best presidential candidate for African Americans. One can only wonder how she must have viewed the victory of the Republican candidate Herbert Hoover that November.

In 1921 and again from 1926 to 1931, Dunbar-Nelson kept a diary in which she expressed her frustration with her literary career and other matters. She continued to write poetry and short fiction and completed two novels, and she was welcomed into the circle of Harlem Renaissance writers; however, she never found the success as an author that she had achieved as a journalist. In her diary she also gave voice to her concerns about personal financial instability. In 1932 Robert Nelson obtained a political appointment to the Pennsylvania Athletic Commission, a position that offered him a more steady income. The couple moved to Pennsylvania, where Dunbar-Nelson, finally living comfortably, continued to be active socially and politically. Her health, however, began to fail, and she died of a heart condition on September 18, 1935, at the University of Pennsylvania Hospital.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

In late August 1920, the Nineteenth Amendment to the Constitution, which gave women the right to vote, was ratified. In the first paragraph of "The Negro Woman and the

Suffragists march on Pennsylvania Avenue in Washington, D.C., in March 1913. (Library of Congress)

Ballot," Dunbar-Nelson puts forth the question that "friend and foe alike are asking": What has the African American woman done with her right to vote in the six years she has had it? Dunbar-Nelson's aim in posing this question was to encourage African American women not to waste this right by being "just another vote" for the Republicans without evaluating issues and candidates for themselves. Blind Republican faith, according to her, was not the way to go.

In paragraph 2, Dunbar-Nelson acknowledges that "six years is a very short time in which to ask for results from any measure or condition, no matter how simple." She gives the examples of how at six a human being is still a mere child and how structures meant to last centuries could rarely be finished within six years. Likewise, she notes that most trees would not reach anything approaching their potential size in six years and that a nation only six years old stands for "but the beginnings of an idea." Was it fair, then, Dunbar-Nelson asks, to expect much of the African American woman in the six years she has been able to vote? Regardless of the question's fairness, people have persisted in asking it, and Dunbar-Nelson therefore offers an answer.

Before proceeding to her answer, Dunbar-Nelson in paragraph 4 asks what African American women who worked to gain the vote thought would be achieved by having this right. Dunbar-Nelson says that for these women "it seemed as if the ballot would be the great objective of life." All their social, economic, and racial troubles stemming from political decisions made for them by men would be overcome by gaining the right to vote. They would "step into the dominant place, politically, of the race" and rectify the injustices that African American men had allowed to stand. According to Dunbar-Nelson, African American men had given up their political power in return for "cheap political office and little political preferment," while the "great issues affecting the race" had taken a backseat. Women, it would seem, would not let this happen if they got the vote.

In paragraph 6, Dunbar-Nelson observes that as a rule black men had not wanted black women to have the vote. Although she is unsure exactly why, she accuses the black man of having hidden "behind the grandiloquent platitude of his white political boss." If black men had been thinking about the progress of African Americans, surely they would not have kept half of their race from voting. This was not the point, though, says Dunbar-Nelson. The point was that women, both white and black, had been given the franchise. Here she revisits a facet of her original question: How has the African American woman exercised her right to vote such that she has made an "appreciable difference" in bettering the situation of all African Americans? In paragraph 7, Dunbar-Nelson recalls that ideally the African American woman, when she got the vote, should not have been swayed in ways that the black man had been. She would be "independent," since she had come "into the political game with a clean slate." She would not allow Republican political pressure to influence her vote, since gratitude to Abraham Lincoln did not require "blind G.O.P. allegiance." Unquestioning loyalty to the Republican Party, according to Dunbar-Nelson, was what had made African American men's votes "a joke" instead of a bastion of political strength and had led everyone to believe all black men were Republicans by default.

Nevertheless, many African American women, like their male peers, became Republicans. As Dunbar-Nelson eloquently puts it in paragraph 8, they "slipped quietly, safely, easily, and conservatively into the political party of [their] male relatives." In the next paragraph, Dunbar-Nelson names only black women in New York City and "a sporadic break here and there" by voters elsewhere as exceptions. However, she notes that the flavor of Republicanism of many black women was often not particularly conservative. Dunbar-Nelson uses the word conservative to mean "restrained." Rather than restrained, these women were often "zealous," "virulent," and even "vituperative" when they expressed their political views. Some even might have forsaken a friendship over a difference of political opinion. These observations notwithstanding, Dunbar-Nelson states in paragraph 10 that the answer to her opening question as to what African American women have done with their right to vote must be that thus far their voting record has "by and large been a disappointment." Their votes in accordance with the Republican Party's policies may even have contributed to the problems facing their communities.

Still, Dunbar-Nelson maintains that there was room for hope in the form of "two bright lights." One of them, the brightest by far, was the ballot power demonstrated by African American women during the congressional elections of 1922. Dunbar-Nelson claims that their votes helped decide the outcome of elections in New Jersey, Delaware, and Michigan, in which legislators who had not actively supported the Dyer bill failed to be reelected. The other "bright light" Dunbar-Nelson characterizes as dim in comparison with the show of strength in the 1922 congressional elections support for school bond measures. In elections involving school bond measures, many African American women had voted for what was best for their communities and had not allowed party pressure to sway them. However, Dunbar-Nelson observes, "the ripple" resulting from these elections was "so slight" that it barely stirred up discontent with the Republican Party.

In paragraph 13, Dunbar-Nelson laments that all too often young voters have submitted to the political status quo in exchange for preferred places in their communities and "easy social relations." Quite pointedly, she observes that "we still persecute socially those who disagree with us politically." Dunbar-Nelson views this as having been as true of women as of men and hardly limited to African Americans. As she notes, young women living with fathers, brothers, and uncles tended to defer to their political preferences. In the following paragraph, she adds that women's deference to men's political views was often true for older voters as well, judging by her encounters with hundreds of women across the United States. She blames men for having repeatedly mocked women's ideas, hopes, and "high ideals."

Essential Quotes

"It has been six years since the franchise as a national measure has been granted to women. The Negro woman has had the ballot in conjunction with her white sister, and friend and foe alike are asking the question, What has she done with it?"

(Paragraph 1)

"To those colored women who worked, fought, spoke, sacrificed, traveled, pleaded, wept, cajoled, all but died for the right of suffrage for themselves and their peers, it seemed as if the ballot would be the great objective of life.… That with the granting of the ballot the women would step into the dominant place, politically, of the race. That all the mistakes which men had made would be rectified."

"The Negro woman was going to be independent.… The name of Abraham Lincoln was not synonymous with … blind G.O.P. allegiance.… She would break up the tradition that one could tell a black man's politics by the color of his skin."

(Paragraph 7)

"And when she got the ballot she slipped quietly, safely, easily, and conservatively into the political party of her male relatives. Which is to say, that with the exception of New York City, and a sporadic break here and there, she became a Republican."

(Paragraphs 8 and 9)

"When the Negro woman finds that the future of her children lies in her own hands—if she can be made to see this—she will strike off the political shackles she has allowed to be hung upon her, and win the economic freedom of her race. Perhaps some Joan of Arc will lead the way."

Nevertheless, Dunbar-Nelson in paragraph 15 expresses hope that African American women might break out of the confines of party allegiance and male influence and vote for what they believe, particularly if something "near and dear" to them were to be threatened. Blind party allegiance could not help African Americans, and the ballot was one of the few instruments by which they could assert their power: "Whatever the Negro may hope to gain …

must be won at the ballot box." Dunbar-Nelson states that once black women have realized that with their votes they might control the future of their children, they would cast votes in the best interest of their families and communities.

In her concluding paragraph, Dunbar-Nelson calls for "some Joan of Arc" to "lead the way." In other words, she was hoping for a leader like the "Maid of Orléans" the peasant girl Joan of Arc, who, in the early fifteenth century, led the French army to several important victories during the Hundred Years' War, thus contributing to the coronation of Charles VII. Perhaps a woman of courage and divine inspiration would come forth to lead African American women in their struggle for economic freedom and political empowerment.

Audience

Dunbar-Nelson's article primarily targeted African American women. The magazine in which it was published, The Messenger, supported writers of the Harlem Renaissance and published literature, articles on political issues, and commentary on black theater. Although The Messenger was not as widely read as some African American periodicals of the 1920s, it had a national circulation and featured pieces by famous poets and writers as well as those new literary voices.

The issues that Dunbar-Nelson brought up in "The Negro Woman and the Ballot" without doubt reflected the content of the speeches she delivered when she campaigned for Alfred E. Smith, the Democratic Party's presidential candidate in 1928. Certainly, she would have spoken to her audiences about supporting "men and measures, not parties" and how important it was for a young woman not to allow a "father, sweetheart, brother, or uncle" to influence her vote. The ideas that Dunbar-Nelson expressed in her article in The Messenger found a wider audience through her speeches on behalf of Smith's campaign.

Impact

Dunbar-Nelson's work, although popular among African American publishers at the time, did not attract the attention of white publishers. Nonetheless, Dunbar-Nelson became one of the older and more traditional voices of the Harlem Renaissance of the 1920s and 1930s. She also is considered one of the founders of the African American short-story tradition. Her contributions to literature and journalism as well as education, politics, and social activism continue to attest to the varied abilities and achievements of educated African American women and men during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

Questions for Further Study

1. According to Dunbar-Nelson, "what have Negro women done with the vote?"

2. What impact did the fate of the Dyer bill, proposed to combat lynching, have on the voting patterns of women and on the Republican Party?

3. What was Dunbar-Nelson's attitude toward the Republican Party? Was she opposed to the party? Explain her views on party allegiance.

4. Dunbar-Nelson was concerned not only with suffrage issues but gender issues as well. What can we learn from this essay about her views on gender relations? Do you think that her personal life contributed in any way to her views on gender?

5. In the 2008 presidential election, the voter turnout rate among eligible black women was 68.8 percent, up from 63.7 percent in 2004 (according to Pew Research). Additionally, this turnout rate in 2008 was the highest of any demographic group. What do you think Dunbar-Nelson's reaction to these statistics, in both years, would have been?

Alice Moore Dunbar-Nelson: "The Negro Woman and the Ballot"

It has been six years since the franchise as a national measure has been granted women. The Negro woman has had the ballot in conjunction with her white sister, and friend and foe alike are asking the question, What has she done with it?

Six years is a very short time in which to ask for results from any measure or condition, no matter how simple. In six years a human being is barely able to make itself intelligible to listeners; is a feeble, puny thing at best, with undeveloped understanding, no power of reasoning, with a slight contributory value to the human race, except in a sentimental fashion. Nations in six years are but the beginnings of an idea. It is barely possible to erect a structure of any permanent value in six years, and only the most ephemeral trees have reached any size in six years.

So perhaps it is hardly fair to ask with a cynic's sneer, What has the Negro woman done with the ballot since she has had it? But, since the question continues to be hurled at the woman, she must needs be nettled into reply.

To those colored women who worked, fought, spoke, sacrificed, traveled, pleaded, wept, cajoled, all but died for the right of suffrage for themselves and their peers, it seemed as if the ballot would be the great objective of life. That with its granting, all the economic, political, and social problems to which the race had been subject would be solved. They did not hesitate to say those militantly gentle workers for the vote that with the granting of the ballot the women would step into the dominant place, politically, of the race. That all the mistakes which the men had made would be rectified. The men have sold their birthright for a mess of pottage, said the women. Cheap political office and little political preferment had dazzled their eyes so that they could not see the great issues affecting the race. They had been fooled by specious lies, fair promises and large-sounding words. Pre-election promises had inflated their chests, so that they could not see the post-election failures at their feet.

And thus on and on during all the bitter campaign of votes for women.

One of the strange phases of the situation was the rather violent objection of the Negro man to the Negro woman's having the vote. Just what his objection racially was, he did not say, preferring to hide behind the grandiloquent platitude of his white political boss. He had probably not thought the matter through; if he had, remembering how precious the ballot was to the race, he would have hesitated at withholding its privilege from another one of his own people.

But all that is neither here nor there. The Negro woman got the vote along with some tens of million other women in the country. And has it made any appreciable difference in the status of the race? … The Negro woman was going to be independent, she had averred. She came into the political game with a clean slate. No Civil War memories for her, and no deadening sense of gratitude to influence her vote. She would vote men and measures, not parties. She could scan each candidate's record and give him her support according to how he had stood in the past on the question of race. She owed no party allegiance. The name of Abraham Lincoln was not synonymous with her for blind G.O.P. allegiance. She would show the Negro man how to make his vote a power, and not a joke. She would break up the tradition that one could tell a black man's politics by the color of his skin.

And when she got the ballot she slipped quietly, safely, easily, and conservatively into the political party of her male relatives.

Which is to say, that with the exception of New York City, and a sporadic break here and there, she became a Republican. Not a conservative one, however. She was virulent and zealous. Prone to stop speaking to her friends who might disagree with her findings on the political issue, and vituperative in campaigns.

In other words the Negro woman has by and large been a disappointment in her handling of the ballot. She has added to the overhead charges of the political machinery, without solving racial problems.

One of two bright lights in the story hearten the reader. In the congressional campaign of 1922 the Negro woman cut adrift from party allegiance and took up the cudgel (if one may mix metaphors) for the cause of the Dyer Bill. The Anti-Lynching Crusaders, led by Mrs. Mary B. Talbot, found in several states New Jersey, Delaware, and Michigan particularly that its cause was involved in the congressional election. Sundry gentlemen had voted against the Dyer Bill in the House and had come up for re-election. They were properly castigated by being kept at home. The women's votes unquestionably had the deciding influence in the three states mentioned and the campaign conducted by them was of a most commendable kind.

School bond issues here and there have been decided by the colored woman's votes but so slight is the ripple on the smooth surface of conservatism that it has attracted no attention from the deadly monotony of the blind faith in the "Party of Massa Linkun."

As the younger generation becomes of age it is apt to be independent in thought and in act. But it is soon whipped into line by the elders, and by the promise of plums of preferment or of an amicable position in the community or of easy social relations for we still persecute socially those who disagree with us politically. What is true of the men is true of the women. The very young is apt to let father, sweetheart, brother, or uncle decide her vote.…

Whether women have been influenced and corrupted by their male relatives and friends is a moot question. Were I to judge by my personal experience I would say unquestionably so, I mean a personal experience with some hundreds of women in the North Atlantic, Middle Atlantic, and Middle Western States. High ideals are laughed at, and women confess with drooping wings how they have been scoffed at for working for nothing, for voting for nothing, for supporting a candidate before having first been "seen." In the face of this sinister influence it is difficult to see how the Negro woman could have been anything else but "just another vote."

All this is rather a gloomy presentment of a well-known situation. But it is not altogether hopeless. The fact that the Negro woman CAN be roused when something near and dear to her is touched and threatened is cheering. Then she throws off the influence of her male companion and strikes out for herself. Whatever the Negro may hope to gain for himself must be won at the ballot box, and quiet "going along" will never gain his end. When the Negro woman finds that the future of her children lies in her own hands if she can be made to see this she will strike off the political shackles she has allowed to be hung upon her, and win the economic freedom of her race.

Perhaps some Joan of Arc will lead the way.

"On every hand the New Deal has used slogans for the same raw deal."

Overview

John Preston Davis's essay "A Black Inventory of the New Deal" is a scathing indictment of President Franklin Delano Roosevelt's early programs to combat the economic woes of the Great Depression. Published in May of 1935 in The Crisis, the magazine of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), this essay challenged African Americans to create their own solutions to their dire economic situation rather than relying on a government that had systematically failed to come through for them.

Davis's essay was published at the time of a conference held at Howard University in Washington, D.C., titled "The Position of the Negro in Our National Economic Crisis." The conference was organized by Davis and Ralph Bunche, who was a professor of political science at Howard University and would later become a key architect of the United Nations. Like Davis, most of the participants in the conference were highly critical of Roosevelt's New Deal, noting that the government programs had severely negative impacts on African Americans. "A Black Inventory of the New Deal" serves as a reminder that oft-celebrated historical achievements have not always included all Americans.

In November 1932 Americans elected Franklin Delano Roosevelt as their new president. The nation was in the grip of the Great Depression, and former President Herbert Hoover's strategy for turning the economy around seemed one of complete failure. As America anxiously watched the new administration form its own ideas for bringing the nation back to financial health, most felt a renewed sense of optimism.

Living in a segregated society in the Jim Crow South and many places in the North, African Americans suffered immensely during the depression. Black tenant farmers in the South languished as crop prices fell, and black workers in the industrial North were the first to be let go as the unemployment rate climbed. Although most black voters had supported the Republican Party in the 1932 election, Roosevelt's Democratic administration showed signs of promise for the plight of African Americans. In the summer of 1933, Roosevelt created a position for a special adviser on "the economic status of negroes" to serve under the secretary of the Department of the Interior, Harold Ickes. Roosevelt would go on in later years to create what became known as the "Black Cabinet," an advisory group of prominent African American community leaders who counseled his administration regarding the concerns of black Americans. In a more direct show of support, for the first time, the government initiated programs to provide direct relief to the public. Two of these important programs were initiated, respectively, by the Agricultural Adjustment Act (AAA) and the National Industrial Recovery Act (NIRA), both passed in 1933. These sweeping initiatives were intended to help farmers and industrial workers through government intervention.

Not long after their creation, however, it became apparent that these two programs had considerable flaws. One component of the NIRA was to develop industry-specific standards that would govern competition, pricing, wages, and work hours in each industry. The idea was to promote efficiency and fairness in practices and to provide workers with a minimum wage and maximum work period for every given job category. However, as business leaders worked with government representatives to develop these industrial codes, it became clear that African Americans were being systematically discriminated against, especially in the South. Black workers in Atlanta, Georgia, protested against the industrial codes in August of 1933, but, despite such protests, southern business interests won concessions from the government that perpetuated racial discrimination.

Similarly, the AAA resulted in appalling consequences for black farmers, because many did not own their land but farmed as tenants, or sharecroppers. In order to increase farmers' income, the government paid farmers incentives to leave land fallow. Unfortunately, southern landowners fired their black tenant farmers first, as fewer crops grown meant fewer farmers needed. Just as black workers in the North protested against the NIRA, tenant farmers in the South, black and white, joined together to form the Southern Tenant Farmers Union in 1934, bringing the plight of African American farmers to the public's attention.

In 1935 economic recovery in the United States seemed nowhere in sight. Unemployment was a staggering 20 percent, and the promises of the Roosevelt administration appeared unfulfilled. Still, African Americans remained loyal to the Democratic Party; in the 1934 midterm elections, Democrats won formerly Republican seats largely because of the increase in black voters. In Chicago, Arthur W. Mitchell became the first black Democrat ever elected to Congress. Nevertheless, while African Americans might have supported Roosevelt and his party, many were growing more and more disillusioned with the administration's unproductive policies. John P. Davis's "A Black Inventory of the New Deal" gave voice to the increasingly urgent demand from the black community for tangible strides to be made in America's move toward racial equality.

About the Author

John Preston Davis was born on January 19, 1905, and grew up in Washington, D.C., where his father worked in the office of the secretary of war during the administration of the Democratic president Woodrow Wilson, who served as chief executive from 1913 to 1921. Young Davis attended Paul Laurence Dunbar High School, a prestigious school for blacks, and graduated from Bates College in Maine in 1926, where he was nominated for a Rhodes Scholarship. Davis participated in the artistic and literary movement known as the Harlem Renaissance, replacing W. E. B. Du Bois as editor of The Crisis magazine. Along with Langston Hughes, Zora Neale Hurston, and Wallace Thurman, the leading black authors living in New York City at the time, he produced Fire!!, a publication dedicated to showcasing the works of young African American writers. Davis received a master's degree in journalism from Harvard University in 1927 and served as Fisk University's director of publicity until 1928. He went on to earn a law degree from Harvard in 1933.

Davis and several of his peers at Harvard, including Robert Weaver, grew increasingly concerned with the U.S. government's response to the deepening economic crisis that was the Great Depression. In the summer of 1933 Davis and Weaver traveled back to their hometown of Washington, D.C., in order to give voice to the plight of African Americans. The two men created the Negro Industrial League to call attention to the need for equitable treatment of black Americans in New Deal programs. Davis and Weaver's example led many civil rights organizations to form the Joint Committee on National Recovery, an organization dedicated to exposing racial injustice in the implementation of federal programs. In 1934 the NAACP sent Davis to the South to interview black farmers, an experience that exposed Davis to the inequalities of the New Deal program that resulted from the AAA.

In 1935, Davis became executive secretary of the National Negro Congress, which he had helped found. The organization sought to unite African Americans across class lines and involved the support of the Communist Party.

This affiliation became a political liability following the Nazi-Soviet Nonaggression Pact of 1939, and more conservative organizations withdrew from the National Negro Congress. Davis remained its executive secretary until 1942. The next year he filed the first lawsuit in Washington, D.C., to challenge the district's segregated school system. Davis sued on behalf of his five year-old son, Michael, who was refused admittance by Noyes Elementary School. In response to the suit, Congress appropriated funds to build a new black school across the street from Davis's house. Later in life, Davis turned to the literary world once again, founding Our World a magazine dedicated to the African American community in 1946, and publishing The American Negro Reference Book in 1964. He died on September 11, 1973.

Davis was an outspoken critic of the New Deal programs put forward by Franklin Roosevelt to ameliorate the effects of the Great Depression. In his article "A Black Inventory of the New Deal," he surveys two years of New Deal efforts and their effects on black Americans.

Davis sets the tone in the very first paragraph, stating clearly that his goal is to assess the impact that the Roosevelt administration's early New Deal policies have had on African Americans. He then systematically evaluates key measures enacted by the government, showing how, in fact, they have had mostly negative effects on black Americans. Davis next cites government statistics demonstrating that the number of black families receiving aid increased during Roosevelt's time in office. He argues that this is evidence that the administration's policies have created more poverty among African Americans. The increase in the number of people receiving public assistance is not, in Davis's eyes, a sign of growing government concern for the poor but rather the direct result of failed policy, particularly those programs aimed at relief for the rural poor.

Davis then turns to a lengthy discussion of the National Recovery Administration. The NIRA generated a wide range of programs aimed at providing direct relief to the public and stimulating the economy. The legislation had the support of many industrial leaders, including Gerard Swope, the president of General Electric, who helped to draft it. The National Recovery Administration, an administrative body created by the NIRA, monitored each industry's development of standardized codes for wage rates, prices, and work hours. The idea behind the codes was that workers would achieve better wages and job security, while manufacturers within each industry would be able to compete fairly against each other.

Davis states in paragraphs 3 and 4 that the National Recovery Administration as yet failed to live up to its promises. He specifically mentions problems with the "code-making process." During the 1933 code hearings in Washington, D.C., which Davis attended, it became clear that companies in the South were excluding black workers from the protective features of the labor codes. Southern manufacturers relied upon a racially based wage system, where black workers were paid less than white laborers for comparable work. Therefore, they vigorously fought the idea of national wage standards. As Davis points out, southern companies employed a variety of tactics to evade the codes. One early argument was for the existence of "occupational and geographical differentials"; southern interests used a vast array of statistics and figures to "prove" that black workers were less efficient than whites and that equal wages would result in massive layoffs and plant closures. Sometimes employers changed the job categories of black workers so that they were not covered by the codes. As Davis points out, these maneuvers were effective; the National Recovery Administration approved regional wage differentials in the codes, and because enforcement occurred at the local level, code violators often went unpunished even when they were caught. Thus, while the federal intent behind the codes was to eliminate racial bias in wages and hours for each industry, its implementation resulted in the continuation of "the inferior status of the Negro."

The problem was not just with the implementation of the law, however. Davis notes that even with an increased wage rate, African American workers were still disproportionately affected by layoffs or the reduction of work hours. He cites the case of longshoremen, who might earn a high hourly wage but work very infrequently. Davis also comments on the problem of the rising cost of living; one of the by-products of the codes was that the prices for food and other necessities were set above market value. This increase in the cost of living disproportionately affected poor Americans, including African Americans. Davis also comments in paragraph 4 on the practices of "speed-up and stretch-out" in assembly-line manufacturing. Speeding up the line involved increasing the rate at which parts moved past a worker (forcing the individual to work more quickly), while stretching out called for assigning more tasks or machines to a given worker, thus adding to his responsibilities (and thus his output) while keeping his pay the same. Because both

"speed-up" and "stretch-out" increased the productivity of workers, they reduced the number of workers needed; as Davis notes, African American employees were always the first to be let go. Thus the promises of gains for workers under the NIRA went unfulfilled for black Americans.

Davis next turns his attention to the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, another government agency created during Roosevelt's early New Deal legislation. Just as the NIRA created a new government entity, the National Recovery Administration, the AAA created the Agricultural Adjustment Administration to implement the policies outlined in the legislation. The act gave the government substantial authority over agricultural production and prices. For example, it allowed the secretary of agriculture to reduce the production of a given commodity or to remove acreage from production altogether, through the use of incentives. The goal of the program was to prop up the prices of agricultural products and thus help raise the income and buying power of farmers.

The vast majority of black farmers were sharecroppers, or tenant farmers who did not own their land but rather paid rent to the landowner. Sharecroppers would pay their rent either with proceeds from the sale of the crops they raised or with crop liens loans against the value of future crops. The Great Depression brought sharply lower prices for most commodities, which translated into drastically lower income for these farmers, many of whom could no longer meet their rent obligations. As Davis points out, although the Agricultural Adjustment Administration's goal was to improve the lot of farmers, it actually worsened their plight. The crop reduction program was a particular problem. Under the administration, the government paid incentives to farmers to keep part of their land idle. As Davis remarks in paragraph 5, "Although the contract with the government provided that the land owner[s] should not reduce [their] number of … tenants" under this program, many of them did. Uncultivated land meant fewer farmers were needed to tend to crops, and black sharecroppers were the first to be turned out.

Just as there were problems with local enforcement of the National Recovery Administration codes, corruption was rampant in the South in terms of implementing AAA policies. The government mandated that landowners pay a portion of the government incentive for crop reduction to its tenants, but many landowners simply kept all of the money for themselves. Local authorities refused to enforce the law, as Davis explains. This widespread abuse was one of the primary motivators behind the creation of the Southern Tenant Farmers Union, an organization of sharecroppers in Arkansas that sought to change government policies and step up enforcement. Davis uses an old frontier-era phrase, "root hog or die," which means, in essence, that one must either work or starve.

Davis then takes up the Public Works Administration (PWA), which was also created by the NIRA. The PWA was a job-creation program designed to put people to work building roads, dams, bridges, and other infrastructure. The program was headed by the secretary of the Department of the Interior, Harold Ickes, an advocate of racial equality. Ickes ordered that all PWA contracts include a nondiscrimination clause. However, just as was the case with the codes, southern interests found ways to circumvent the contractual language. Robert C. Weaver, one of Davis's peers at Harvard and a member of Ickes's staff, developed a quota system to aid in enforcement. PWA contract recipients would be required to hire a minimum percentage of black skilled workers based on the proportion of such workers in the local population. Davis notes several problems with this idea, including the tensions placed on unions. This was a significant problem; blacks were excluded from many of the skilled trade unions, and the government had to negotiate with local unions as well as individual contractors who employed black workers.

The PWA and other New Deal programs also funded public housing. Unfortunately, most of these housing projects were segregated, upholding the status quo of racial inequality in America. Davis criticizes two specific programs: the Subsistence Homestead projects and the Tennessee Valley Authority model towns. Part of the NIRA, the Subsistence Homesteads were designed to be communities based on the older American idea of the family subsistence farm, where families grew enough to sustain themselves but not to bring cash crops to market. Roosevelt's version, however, located these communities near urban centers, so that homesteaders of the 1930s could hold a part-time job in the city while living in a modern home in a rural environment. Aimed at poor rural families, the homestead project had much to offer African Americans. However, the earliest communities were designated for whites only, angering many black activists. In particular, the Arthurdale project in West Virginia, mentioned by Davis in paragraph 11, aroused virulent protest from civil rights activists. Under pressure from Ickes and others, the administration developed several black homestead projects. Thus, as Davis notes, the Subsistence Homestead program perpetuated the Jim Crow segregation of the South.

Similarly, the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA) built segregated communities, including the model towns of Norris, Tennessee, and Dayton, Ohio. Roosevelt created the TVA to devise a regional development program for flood control and power supply in the Tennessee River basin. Part of the TVA's development program included the creation of housing in planned communities based on a social vision similar to that of the Subsistence Homestead program. The TVA model communities were to be examples of self-contained, self-sustaining rural towns tied to cooperative industries. Norris, Tennessee, was one such community. As Davis notes, Norris functioned more as a "company town" for workers building the Norris Dam; the government supplied housing and power, ran the town store, and controlled all aspects of town life, not to mention providing the monthly paycheck. While the all-black Dayton communities were "ghettoes," Norris was "lily-white," designated as a whites-only town. To make matters worse, Davis remarks, the TVA hired relatively few blacks and had no plan for ameliorating the conditions of African Americans in the region. The TVA's planned communities, to Davis, were examples of "utter planlessness."

In early 1935 Congress began to consider various options for a federal program of unemployment insurance and old-age pension, which would eventually become the Social Security Act of 1935. Davis refers to this debate, commenting that members of the Roosevelt administration proposed to exempt domestic and agricultural workers from the program. Treasury secretary Henry Morgenthau suggested excluding these workers in order to prevent the Social Security program from being underfunded. Because Roosevelt had insisted that the plan finance itself, this provision was included in the initial Social Security Act. As a result, vast numbers of African Americans were excluded from one of the most sweeping reforms in American history.

Following his dissection of the impact of New Deal programs on black Americans, Davis discusses how the black community has responded to this litany of injustice. In paragraph 16, he references the "Don't Buy Where You Can't Work" campaigns, which began in Chicago in 1929 but spread to many cities by the mid-1930s. These campaigns encouraged African Americans to boycott establishments that refused to hire blacks and generated public protests on the streets of many cities. The Garvey Movement, as embodied in the Universal Negro Improvement Association, had been around since World War I. One of the first organizations involved in black rights, the Universal Negro Improvement Association emphasized pride in African heritage and roots under the leadership of the Jamaican immigrant and activist Marcus Garvey. By the depression, Garvey's organization had lost much of its popularity, but its message of racial pride found receptive ears in the mid-1930s. The National Movement for Establishment of a 49th State was a movement to create a separate, black state within the United States. Davis brings up these examples to show that African Americans were exerting their power and becoming increasingly intolerant of discrimination.

"A worker cannot eat a wage rate."

(Paragraph 4)

"The fairest summary that can be made of T.V.A. is that for a year or so it has furnished bread to a few thousand Negro workers. Beyond that everything is conjecture which is most unpleasant because of the utter planlessness of those in charge of the project."

(Paragraph 14)

"On every hand the New Deal has used slogans for the same raw deal."

(Paragraph 15)

"On the problem of relief of Negroes from poverty there is little room for disagreement. The important thing is that throughout America as never before Negroes awake to the need for a unity of action on vital economic problems which perplex us."

(Paragraph 21)

"One thing is certain: the Negro may stand still but the depression will not. And unless there is concerted action of Negroes throughout the nation the next two years will bring even greater misery to the millions of underprivileged Negro toilers in the nation."

(Paragraph 22)

Having emphasized black separatism in paragraph 16, Davis goes on to highlight interracial protests. As the depression deepened in the 1930s, the Communist Party organized the growing masses of jobless Americans into Unemployed Councils, radical groups that employed a variety of tactics to demand relief. Bread riots, street demonstrations, and rent strikes were commonplace in cities such as New York and Detroit. These protestors were of various ethnicities, including Jewish immigrants as well as black Americans. Davis mentions the sharecroppers unions, specifically the Southern Tenant Farmers Union, an interracial group that had thirty thousand members by 1937. He also notes the interracial nature of labor activism. In the years leading up to the publication of "A Black Inventory of the New Deal," labor unrest had been increasing. In 1934 alone, two men were killed in the Electric Auto-Lite strike in Toledo, Ohio, a massive strike that left three dead, and the West Coast Longshoremen's strike resulted in the killing of four strikers. As Davis points out, many of these struggles involved black and white workers fighting on the same side.

At the end of his essay, Davis points to the future. He comments on the upcoming (May 18 20, 1935) conference at Howard University but indicates that the conference cannot act by itself. One can see the seeds of the National Negro Congress in Davis's call for existing organizations from a variety of sectors ("church, civic, fraternal, professional and trade union") to come together as a "mighty arm of protest." He uses the All India Congress as an example of such an organization. The All India Congress Committee arose out of nineteenth-century calls for home rule in India and the later nonviolent protests and Indian independence movement led by the activist Mahatma Gandhi. Divided by caste and religious differences, India overcame such differences to achieve independence and serve as a model for other repressed groups. Davis pointedly states that African Americans are responsible for overcoming their own divisions and must take responsibility for solving the economic and social problems that face them.

Audience

Davis's piece was published in The Crisis, the magazine of the NAACP. Founded in 1910, The Crisis was one of the oldest publications dedicated to advancing the cause of black civil rights in America. At the time of Davis's article, the magazine had recently experienced a change in editorial oversight. W. E. B. Du Bois, founder of The Crisis, had resigned over differences of opinion with the NAACP's vision for the black rights movement; Du Bois advocated a separatist position, while the NAACP favored integration. The new editors, George Streator and Roy Wilkins, gave more editorial room to young authors such as Davis. However, The Crisis continued to be read widely by both white and black audiences interested in issues of racial justice. The publication's circulation vastly exceeded the NAACP's membership.

Although segregation was ingrained in American society during the depression years, there was a vibrant and active movement comprising liberal progressive whites and activist African Americans dedicated to moving the nation forward in terms of racial justice. Organizations such as the National Urban League aimed at aiding the status of black Americans, and the Commission on Interracial Cooperation in Atlanta sought to bring black and white community leaders together in dialogue. By the 1930s, there was a growing cadre of educated, progressive-minded black and white people who were eager to address the myriad problems facing the African American community. These people would likely have read Davis's article, as well as similar pieces in magazines such as Opportunity, published by the Urban League, and The Journal of Negro Life.

Impact

Davis's critique of Roosevelt's New Deal programs gained him increased recognition as a black activist and leader. It also positioned him at odds with the more conservative African American figures who sought to work within the Roosevelt administration to effect change, such as Robert C. Weaver. Davis and Bunche, along with A. Philip Randolph, head of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters union, formed the National Negro Congress based on the vision Davis outlined in his essay. The congress hoped to forge a union that crossed boundaries of class and partisanship. Its increasingly leftist bent alienated many of its more moderate members, and cold war politics led to its demise in 1947.

Davis's position outside the political mainstream translated into his having little direct impact on the electoral landscape in his time. Despite the very real deficiencies of Roosevelt's policies, African American voters overwhelmingly supported the president in the 1936 election. In 1932 a majority of blacks had voted for the Republican candidate, Herbert Hoover, but four years later the Democratic Party could claim the allegiance of most black voters. Despite the racial inequities of the New Deal, African Americans saw in Roosevelt a president who cared about them.

It is with historical hindsight that Davis's essay has become important for a wider American audience. This

John P. Davis: "A Black Inventory of the New Deal"

It is highly important for the Negro citizen of America to take inventory of the gains and losses which have come to him under the "New Deal." The Roosevelt administration has now had two years in which to unfold itself. Its portents are reasonably clear to anyone who seriously studies the varied activities of its recovery program. We can now state with reasonable certainty what the "New Deal" means for the Negro.

At once the most striking and irrefutable indication of the effect of the New Deal on the Negro can be gleaned from relief figures furnished by the government itself. In October, 1933, six months after the present administration took office, 2,117,000 Negroes were in families receiving relief in the United States. These represented 17.8 per cent of the total Negro population as of the 1930 census. In January, 1935, after nearly two years of recovery measures, 3,500,000 Negroes were in families receiving relief, or 29 per cent of our 1930 population. Certainly only a slight portion of the large increase in the number of impoverished Negro families can be explained away by the charitable, on the grounds that relief administration has become more humane. As a matter of fact federal relief officials themselves admit that grave abuses exist in the administration of rural relief to Negroes. And this is reliably borne out by the disproportionate increase in the number of urban Negro families on relief to the number of rural Negro families on relief. Thus the increase in the number of Negroes in relief families is an accurate indication of the deepening of the economic crisis for black America.

The promise of N.R.A. to bring higher wages and increased employment to industrial workers has glimmered away, In the code-making process occupational and geographical differentials at first were used as devices to exclude from the operation of minimum wages and maximum hours the bulk of the Negro workers. Later, clauses basing code wage rates on the previously existing wage differential between Negro and white workers tended to continue the inferior status of the Negro. For the particular firms, for whom none of these devices served as an effective means of keeping down Negro wages, there is an easy way out through the securing of an exemption specifically relating to the Negro worker in the plant. Such exemptions are becoming more numerous as time goes on. Thus from the beginning relatively few Negro workers were even theoretically covered by N.R.A. labor provisions.

But employers did not have to rely on the code-making process. The Negro worker not already discriminated against through code provisions had many other gauntlets to run. The question of importance to him as to all workers was, "as a result of all of N.R.A.'s maneuvers will I be able to buy more?" The answer has been "No." A worker cannot eat a wage rate. To determine what this wage rate means to him we must determine a number of other factors. Thus rates for longshoremen seem relatively high. But when we realize that the average amount of work a longshoreman receives during the year is from ten to fifteen weeks, the wage rate loses much of its significance. When we add to that fact the increase in the cost of living as high as 40 per cent in many cases the wage rate becomes even more chimerical. For other groups of industrial workers increases in cost of living, coupled with the part time and irregular nature of the work, make the results of N.R.A. negligible. In highly mechanized industries speed-up and stretch-out nullify the promised result of N.R.A. to bring increased employment through shorter hours. For the workers are now producing more in their shorter work periods than in the longer periods before N.R.A. There is less employment. The first sufferer from fewer jobs is the Negro worker. Finally the complete break-down of compliance machinery in the South has cancelled the last minute advantage to Negro workers which N.R.A.'s enthusiasts may have claimed.

The Agricultural Adjustment Administration has used cruder methods in enforcing poverty on the Negro farm population. It has made violations of the rights of tenants under crop reduction contracts easy; it has rendered enforcement of these rights impossible. The reduction of the acreage under cultivation through the government rental agreement rendered unnecessary large numbers of tenants and farm laborers. Although the contract with the government provided that the land owner should not reduce the number of his tenants, he did so. The federal courts have now refused to allow tenants to enjoin such evictions. Faced with this Dred Scott decision against farm tenants, the A.A.A. has remained discreetly silent. Farm laborers are now jobless by the hundreds of thousands, the conservative government estimate of the decline in agricultural employment for the year 1934 alone being a quarter of a million. The larger portion of these are unskilled Negro agricultural workers now without income and unable to secure work or relief.

But the unemployment and tenant evictions occasioned by the crop reduction policies of the A.A.A. is not all. For the tenants and sharecroppers who were retained on the plantations the government's agricultural program meant reduced income. Wholesale fraud on tenants in the payment of parity checks occurred. Tenants complaining to the Department of Agriculture in Washington have their letters referred back to the locality in which they live and trouble of serious nature often results. Even when this does not happen, the tenant fails to get his check. The remainder of the land he tills on shares with his landlord brings him only the most meagre necessities during the crop season varying from three to five months. The rest of the period for him and his family is one of "root hog or die."

The past year has seen an extension of poverty even to the small percentage (a little more than 20 per cent) of Negro farmers who own their own land. For them compulsory reduction of acreage for cotton and tobacco crops, with the quantum of such reduction controlled and regulated by local boards on which they have no representation, has meant drastic reduction of their already low income. Wholesale confiscation of the income of the Negro cotton and tobacco farmer is being made by prejudiced local boards in the South under the very nose of the federal government. In the wake of such confiscation has come a tremendous increase in land tenantry as a result of foreclosures on Negro-owned farm properties.

Nor has the vast public works program, designed to give increased employment to workers in the building trades, been free from prejudice. State officials in the South are in many cases in open rebellion against the ruling of P.W.A. that the same wage scales must be paid to Negro and white labor. Compliance with this paper ruling is enforced in only rare cases. The majority of the instances of violation of this rule are unremedied. Only unskilled work is given Negroes on public works projects in most instances. And even here discrimination in employment is notorious. Such is bound to be the case when we realize that there are only a handful of investigators available to seek enforcement.

Recently a move has been made by Negro officials in the administration to effect larger employment of Negro skilled and unskilled workers on public works projects by specifying that failure of a contractor to pay a certain percentage of his payroll to Negro artisans will be evidence of racial discrimination. Without doubting the good intentions of the sponsors of this ingenious scheme, it must nevertheless be pointed out that it fails to meet the problem in a number of vital particulars. It has yet to face a test in the courts, even if one is willing to suppose that P.W.A. high officials will bring it to a test. Percentages thus far experimented with are far too low and the number of such experiments far too few to make an effective dent in the unemployment conditions of Negro construction industry workers. Moreover the scheme gives aid and comfort to employer-advocates of strike-breaking and the open shop; and, while offering, perhaps, some temporary relief to a few hundred Negro workers, it establishes a dangerous precedent which throws back the labor movement and the organization of Negro workers to a considerable degree. The scheme, whatever its Negro sponsors may hope to contrary, becomes therefore only another excuse for their white superiors maintaining a "do-nothing" policy with regard to discrimination against Negroes in the Public Works Administration.

The Negro has no pleasanter outlook in the long term social planning ventures of the new administration. Planning for subsistence homesteads for industrially stranded workers has been muddled enough even without consideration of the problem of integrating Negroes into such plans. Subsistence Homesteads projects are overburdened with profiteering prices for the homesteads and foredoomed to failure by the lack of planning for adequate and permanent incomes for prospective homesteaders.

In callous disregard of the interdiction in the constitution of the United States against use of federal funds for projects which discriminate against applicants solely on the ground of color, subsistence homesteads have been planned on a strictly "lily-white" basis. The more than 200 Negro applicants for the first project at Arthurdale, West Virginia were not even considered, Mr. Bushrod Grimes (then in charge of the project) announcing that the project was to be open only to "native white stock." As far north as Dayton, Ohio, where state laws prohibit any type of segregation against Negroes, the federal government has extended its "lily-white" policy. Recently it has established two Jim-Crow projects for Negroes. Thus the new administration seeks in its program of social planning to perpetuate ghettoes of Negroes for fifty years to come.

An even more blatant example of this policy of "lily-white" reconstruction is apparent in the planning of the model town of Norris, Tennessee, by the Tennessee Valley Authority. This town of 450 model homes is intended for the permanent workers on Norris Dam. The homes are rented by the federal government, which at all times maintains title to the land and dwellings and has complete control of the town management. Yet officials at T.V.A. openly admit that no Negroes are allowed at Norris.

T.V.A. has other objectionable features. While Negro employment now approaches an equitable proportion of total employment, the payroll of Negro workers remains disproportionately lower than that of whites. While the government has maintained a trade school to train workers on the project, no Negro trainees have been admitted. Nor have any meaningful plans matured for the future of the several thousand Negro workers who in another year or so will be left without employment, following completion of work on the dams being built by T.V.A.

None of the officials of T.V.A. seems to have the remotest idea of how Negroes in the Tennessee Valley will be able to buy the cheap electricity which T.V.A. is designed to produce. They admit that standards of living of the Negro population are low, that the introduction of industry into the Valley is at present only a nebulous dream, that even if this eventuates there is no assurance that Negro employment will result. The fairest summary that can be made of T.V.A. is that for a year or so it has furnished bread to a few thousand Negro workers. Beyond that everything is conjecture which is most unpleasant because of the utter planlessness of those in charge of the project.

Recovery legislation of the present session of Congress reveals the same fatal flaws which have been noted in the operation of previous recovery ventures. Thus, for example, instead of genuine unemployment insurance we have the leaders of the administration proposing to exclude from their plans domestic and agricultural workers, in which classes are to be found 15 out of every 23 Negro workers. On every hand the New Deal has used slogans for the same raw deal.

The sharpening of the crisis for Negroes has not found them unresponsive. Two years of increasing hardship has seen strange movement among the masses. In Chicago, New York, Washington and Baltimore the struggle for jobs has given rise to action on the part of a number of groups seeking to boycott white employers who refuse to employ Negroes. "Don't Buy Where You Can't Work" campaigns are springing up everywhere. The crisis has furnished renewed vigor to the Garvey Movement. And proposals for a 49th State are being seriously considered by various groups.

In sharp contrast with these strictly racial approaches to the problem, have been a number of interracial approaches. Increasing numbers of unemployed groups have been organized under radical leadership and have picketed relief stations for bread. Sharecroppers unions, under Socialist leadership in Arkansas, have shaken America into a consciousness of the growing resentment of southern farm tenants and the joint determination of the Negro and white tenants to do something about their intolerable condition.

In every major strike in this country Negro union members have fought with their white fellow workers in a struggle for economic survival. The bodies of ten Negro strikers killed in such strike struggles offer mute testimony to this fact. Even the vicious policies of the leaders of the A. F. of L. in discrimination against Negro workers is breaking down under the pressure for solidarity from the ranks of whites.

This heightening of spirit among all elements of black America and the seriousness of the crisis for them make doubly necessary the consideration of the social and economic condition of the Negro at this time. It was a realization of these conditions which gave rise to the proposal to hold a national conference on the economic status of Negroes under the New Deal at Howard University in Washington, D.C., on May 18, 19 and 20. At this conference, sponsored by the Social Science Division of Howard University and the Joint Committee on National Recovery, a candid and intelligent survey of the social and economic condition of the Negro will be made. Unlike most conference it will not be a talk-rest. For months nationally known economists and other technicians have been working on papers to be presented. Unlike other conferences it will not be a one-sided affair. Ample opportunity will be afforded for high government officials to present their views of the "New Deal." Others not connected with the government, including representatives of radical political parties, will also appear to present their conclusions. Not the least important phase will be the appearance on the platform of Negro workers and farmers themselves to offer their own experience under the New Deal. Out of such a conference can and will come a clear-cut analysis of the problems faced by Negroes and the nation.

But a word of caution ought to be expressed with regard to this significant conference. In the final analysis it cannot and does not claim to be representative of the mass opinion of Negro citizen[s] in America. All it can claim for itself is that it will bring together on a non-representative basis well informed Negro and white technicians to discuss the momentous problem it has chosen as its topic. It can furnish a base for action for any organization which chooses to avail itself of the information developed by it. It cannot act itself.

Thus looking beyond such a conference one cannot fail to hope that it will furnish impetus to a national expression of black America demanding a tolerable solution to the economic evils which it suffers. Perhaps it is not too much to hope that public opinion may be moulded by this conference to such an extent that already existing church, civic, fraternal, professional and trade union organizations will see the necessity for concerted effort in forging a mighty arm of protest against injustice suffered by the Negro. It is not necessary that such organizations agree on every issue. On the problem of relief of Negroes from poverty there is little room for disagreement. The important thing is that throughout America as never before Negroes awake to the need for a unity of action on vital economic problems which perplex us.

Such a hope is not lacking in foundation upon solid ground. Such an instance as the All India Congress of British India furnishes an example of what repressed groups can do to better their social and economic status. Perhaps a "National Negro Congress" of delegates from thousands of Negro organizations (and white organizations willing to recognize their unity of interest) will furnish a vehicle for channeling public opinion of black America. One thing is certain: the Negro may stand still but the depression will not. And unless there is concerted action of Negroes throughout the nation the next two years will bring even greater misery to the millions of underprivileged Negro toilers in the nation.

"The present economic position of the colored citizen was not created by recent legislation alone."

Overview

Robert Clifton Weaver's article "The New Deal and the Negro: A Look at the Facts" is a spirited defense of President Franklin Delano Roosevelt's New Deal programs in the face of mounting criticism from the African American community. Published in the July 1935 issue of Opportunity Journal, the oldest official magazine of the National Urban League, Weaver's essay acknowledged problems of discrimination in some of the Great Depression era relief efforts, yet argued that these efforts had, in fact, greatly alleviated the economic woes facing the black community.

As a member of the Roosevelt administration, Weaver sought to improve the status of African Americans through government programs rather than by more radical means. Not everyone in the black community agreed, however; by 1935 the deepening problems of unemployment, racial tensions evidenced by a riot in Harlem in March, and growing rural poverty in the South led many black leaders to conclude that the U.S. government was incapable of coming to the aid of African Americans. "The New Deal and the Negro: A Look at the Facts" is a statistics-filled plea to logic in an emotional era.

Context

When U.S. president Franklin Delano Roosevelt took the oath of office in 1933, the nation was in the depths of the Great Depression. Unemployment figures were staggering, reaching nearly 50 percent in urban areas such as Chicago, Illinois, and Detroit, Michigan, and as high as 90 percent in Gary, Indiana. In the South, farmers faced continued crop price deterioration; following the stock market crash of 1929, cotton prices slipped from eighteen to six cents per pound. While all Americans were affected by the depression, African Americans suffered substantially for a variety of reasons. Employed primarily as domestic and agricultural workers, blacks were the first to be laid off when jobs were cut, as these positions were either temporary or expendable in a weak economy. White workers crowded out black workers for increasingly scarce jobs. By 1932 urban black unemployment was over 50 percent, and tenant farmers in the South found themselves increasingly without any means of earning a living.

At the same time, the black intellectual class spawned by the Harlem Renaissance movement began to exert its influence in the political sphere in new ways. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), a prominent civil rights organization, began to turn its focus from fighting for rights within the court system to working with the federal government for more direct intervention to help the public. The incoming Roosevelt administration signaled that it was interested in addressing the concerns of the African American community. In 1933 Roosevelt began to bring in a series of black advisers to his cabinet to provide him with guidance regarding the status of African Americans. Robert Weaver was one such adviser, hired to serve as a member of the Department of the Interior's staff. These and other key appointments, later known as Roosevelt's "Black Cabinet," led many observers to believe that this administration would not forget the plight of the African American.

In the early years of his presidency, Roosevelt enacted a wide range of relief programs aimed at countering the effects of the Great Depression. These included direct relief payments to the public through federal grants to states, work programs designed to create jobs, farm subsidies and land-use reforms, rural development and housing projects, and plans for industrial organization and control to instill order on wages, prices, and competitive practices. Many of these programs held out particular promise for African Americans locked in rural poverty, unemployed owing to patterns of segregation and exclusion from certain job categories, or suffering from wage discrimination if employed.

The increasing prominence of black intellectuals and like-minded white progressives turned the public spotlight on Roosevelt's New Deal programs. The black community itself was involved in a very heated debate over the direction of the civil rights movement, notably the issue of segregation. African American journals such as The Crisis and Opportunity carried numerous articles about segregation. The black scholar, editor, and civil rights activist W. E. B. Du Bois of the NAACP advocated a position of voluntary segregation for blacks, stating that desegregation would not become a reality for a long time. In the meantime, argued Du Bois, blacks should gain the resources they needed in order to unite and have power in the present. Others in the NAACP, including Walter White, took the opposite position, stating that succumbing to segregation was a mistake that only perpetuated the legacy of Jim Crow "separate but equal" discrimination in the South as well as continued segregation in areas of the North.

As African Americans within the Roosevelt administration and in outside organizations evaluated the impacts of various New Deal programs, it became apparent that there were some glaring problems with the implementation and, in some cases, design, of the recovery efforts. African Americans were excluded from certain relief programs entirely, prevented from legitimately claiming benefits in certain cases, and actually grew worse off because of the ways in which various New Deal programs were implemented. Some black intellectuals became increasingly disaffected with the Roosevelt administration. In May 1935 black activists held a conference at Howard University in Washington, D.C., during which most presenters attacked New Deal programs for their negative impacts on African Americans. For instance, Weaver's longtime friend and fellow Harvard graduate John P. Davis a black activist, lawyer, and founding member of the National Negro Congress had penned a sharp condemnation of the Roosevelt administration's representation of blacks in New Deal recovery programs. Titled "A Black Inventory of the New Deal," Davis's article, which was published in the May 1935 issue of The Crisis, argued that the relief efforts under President Roosevelt had actually worsened the plight of the African American community. In addition, frustrated blacks in Harlem had rioted in March of the same year, signaling the growing dissatisfaction with government's ability to deal with the problem of African American poverty. In this tension-filled environment, Robert C. Weaver served as a public spokesperson for the White House, writing articles such as "The New Deal and the Negro: A Look at the Facts" to both champion and reveal the inadequacies of the New Deal programs with which he was personally involved.

About the Author

Robert Clifton Weaver was born December 29, 1907, and raised in Washington, D.C., where his father worked for the U.S. Postal Service. He attended the prestigious Paul Laurence Dunbar High School, an elite black school in the nation's segregated capital. Weaver went on to Harvard University, completing his PhD in economics in 1934. In 1933 he joined the incoming Roosevelt administration as part of the Department of the Interior, where he worked on Secretary Harold Ickes's staff. In that capacity, Weaver was instrumental in ensuring that blacks were placed in supervisory roles in the Civilian Conservation Corps, a New Deal program that provided job training and relief for unemployed workers. Weaver also developed an antidiscrimination policy for the Public Works Administration (PWA), which required a minimum number of skilled black workers on federal projects overseen by this agency. In 1938 Weaver became special assistant in charge of race relations to Nathan Straus, the director of the U.S. Housing Authority. He continued to fight discrimination against African Americans, securing language prohibiting discrimination on the basis of race in PWA housing contracts.

As an increasingly prominent member of the Roosevelt administration, Weaver functioned as a leader in the president's "Black Cabinet." This group of African American advisers gained much publicity (both negative and positive) during the New Deal years, and by the beginning of World War II, Weaver and the other black intellectuals working in Washington had become well known. In 1940, as the United States began to inch its way toward involvement in the war, Weaver was named special administrative assistant on race relations to the Labor Division of the National Defense Advisory Commission, where he worked on the integration of black workers into the war effort. One of the by-products of segregation was the inferior education and job training afforded African Americans, a problem that made it difficult to integrate blacks into the military. On April 11, 1941, Weaver was named chief of the Negro Employment and Training Branch of the Labor Division in order to begin redressing this issue. From 1942 to 1944, he served as chief of the Minority Groups Service in the War Manpower Commission. Weaver retired from federal service on May 1, 1944.

After World War II, Weaver taught at several institutions and was New York's rent commissioner from 1955 to 1959. By 1960 he was a nationally recognized expert in public housing. The following year President John F. Kennedy appointed him administrator of the Housing and Home Finance Agency. Weaver became the first black member of a presidential cabinet when President Lyndon B. Johnson, Kennedy's successor, named him secretary of the newly created Department of Housing and Urban Development in 1966. Weaver retired from government service in 1968 and later served as president of Bernard Baruch College and professor of urban affairs at Hunter College, both in New York City. He died on July 17, 1997.

Weaver opens "The New Deal and the Negro: A Look at the Facts" by stating that an intelligent assessment of the New Deal is impossible without considering conditions that existed before its programs were implemented. If, as some argued, the New Deal made matters worse for black Americans, that would require showing that they were better off before the government initiated its relief efforts.

In paragraphs 2 4, Weaver addresses his first subject: unemployment. One of the complaints against Roosevelt's direct relief program, the Federal Emergency Relief Agency (FERA), was that it created a huge mass of black Americans who were barely surviving on government assistance. FERA was established in May 1933, disbursing federal funds to the states for food, child care, blankets, and other forms of direct relief. With so many African Americans receiving this public assistance, some black leaders worried that government policies were contributing to the development of a permanent black underclass. Weaver argues that the chronic unemployment problem among African Americans was not the result of government policy but of demographic factors. Long-standing practices of segregation and discrimination meant that blacks were primarily employed in farming or domestic service (janitorial work for men and housekeeping for women). Once the economy began to deteriorate, workers in these industries were among the first to be idled, as Weaver notes. Worse yet, recovery in domestic service jobs typically lagged behind other types of work, as employers waited to rehire workers until they were certain of their own financial status.

Weaver shows how government policies have helped and would continue to help black Americans who were disproportionately affected by the depression. Although he states that a general recovery will eventually result in increased demand for domestic workers, he places more emphasis in paragraph 5 on the "creation of direct employment opportunities" for those on relief, which includes agricultural and other workers. FERA included a federal jobs program; Harry Hopkins, head of FERA, was adamant that the government not merely hand out money to those in need but allow Americans to feel that they were earning their government assistance. This philosophy of maintaining the spirit of a work ethic dominated most New Deal programs. Weaver's comments reflect this sentiment as well; using labor union statistics in paragraph 6, he emphasizes the successful reduction in the unemployment rate that federal relief provided, illustrating that many Americans found gainful employment as a result of government programs. Direct aid to the large numbers of blacks on assistance, he says, is a necessary by-product of the economic situation.

In paragraph 7, Weaver acknowledges the existence of "many abuses under the relief set-up." Because FERA gave the states the authority to distribute funds, many states in the segregated South funneled aid only to white recipients. One program, in particular, discriminated against African Americans when it was implemented: the National Recovery Administration (NRA). Created in June 1933, the NRA sought to bring government and industry together to develop guidelines for American manufacturers. The goal was to ensure protection for workers in the form of minimum wages and maximum hours as well as to create conditions that would favor fair competition within industries. Although the majority of black Americans worked in agricultural and domestic jobs, which were excluded from the NRA, some two million black workers stood to benefit from the provisions of the NRA. Unfortunately, as southern manufacturers participated in the hearings to develop wage codes and production standards, many of them argued that the NRA codes should allow for regional differences, such as the lower cost of living in their area. In effect, this allowed southern manufacturers to exempt black workers from the codes even though this was not explicitly stated in racial terms. Weaver and fellow Harvard graduate John P. Davis attended many of the NRA hearings in Washington to testify on behalf of black workers. The NAACP and other black rights organizations soon after joined to protect the interests of African Americans in the implementation of the NRA.

In paragraph 8, Weaver points out that the plight of African Americans in the South is particularly troublesome. He notes that just as there were structural problems with respect to domestic workers before the depression, there were inherent problems with the agricultural system in the South before the beginning of the New Deal. Tenant farming, or sharecropping, was a long-standing institution in the rural South. Sharecroppers would rent land from the owner, making payments by using the proceeds from whatever crop they grew or from liens against future crop sales. As agricultural prices fell in the 1920s, sharecroppers either could not make enough money from their crop sales or were simply told by the landowner not to grow anything and leave. As Weaver points out, tenant farmers in the South were already in trouble before the depression.

Although Weaver acknowledges that the problems faced by black farmers in the South arose before the New Deal, he states in paragraph 9 that certain elements of the administration's policies have exacerbated these problems. Specifically, Weaver mentions the crop-reduction programs that were part of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration (AAA). In an effort to boost sagging crop prices and thus help farmers, the Roosevelt administration paid farmers not to grow crops on part of their land. The resulting reduction in the supply of a given crop would, it was hoped, raise the price, allowing farmers to earn more money per acre of crop produced. The problem was that tenant farmers suffered immensely: White landowners simply fired them in order to reduce their crop production. Furthermore, although landowners were required by AAA policy to share their incentive payments with their tenant farmers, few white landowners did so, keeping the money for themselves instead. Weaver remarks that these kinds of abuses were indicative of a resistance "as old as the system," a resistance that reflects the history of slavery and Jim Crow segregation in the South. He uses another example of abuse of a federal assistance program: Following a massive flood of the Mississippi River in 1927, the government provided federal loans to southern farmers to purchase feed, seed, and fertilizer in order to get back on their feet. According to Weaver, similar violations of the law existed then, reflecting a larger problem than the AAA itself.

Weaver argues in paragraph 10 that the solution to the problems facing black tenant farmers in the South lies in changing the sharecropping system itself by providing African Americans with broader opportunities for land ownership. Until the cycle of dependency was broken, Weaver states, government aid programs would not be successful. He mentions "the new program for land utilization, rural rehabilitation, and spreading land ownership" as a possible first step in the right direction. The Roosevelt administration initiated a number of programs aimed at reforming land use and ownership. The National Industrial Recovery Act of 1933 set aside twenty-five million dollars for developing "subsistence homesteads," which were family farms located near urban centers. Specifically designed not to compete with commercial agricultural enterprises, these homesteads were intended to allow workers to produce enough to feed themselves and their families while finding part-time employment in a nearby industrial center. The subsistence homestead was one New Deal approach to ending the cycle of rural poverty in the South.

In 1934 FERA created its Submarginal Land Purchase Program. Under this aid program, the federal government would help farmers who were living on poor-quality land to relocate, allowing the government to retire land that was no longer productive for agricultural purposes. Another program was the Tennessee Valley Authority, created to bring a number of improvements to the Tennessee River valley area, including flood control and electrical power for the region. In addition to these infrastructure projects, the Tennessee Valley Authority set aside funds for building planned communities that were envisioned as being self-sustaining through a mix of agricultural and industrial production.

The "new program" to which Weaver refers is the Emergency Relief Appropriations Act, passed in March 1935. This law created the Resettlement Administration, a new agency that took over the Subsistence Homestead program, FERA's and AAA's land use functions, and other programs related to rural rehabilitation and land distribution. Weaver comments that these programs would help African Americans only if they could sidestep the kind of systemic patterns of discrimination historically experienced by other such reforms. In fact, the Resettlement Administration became highly controversial by 1936, as charges of government efforts to socialize land distribution led the agency to abandon many of its more ambitious efforts to change patterns of land ownership in the South.

Weaver then states in paragraph 11 that the New Deal benefited African Americans in three key areas: housing, employment, and education. The first agency he singles out as an example of success is the PWA, created in 1933 as part of the National Industrial Recovery Act. The PWA invested federal funds in infrastructure projects, such as road and bridge building, in order to create jobs for unemployed urban Americans. Another important component of the program was its development of public housing. As Weaver notes in paragraphs 12 and 13, several of these housing developments were targeted for poor urban black communities. Weaver's statements regarding the planned projects illustrate the segregated nature of American society during the 1930s. The first federal housing projects in the nation were developed in Atlanta. The University project, located near Spelman and Morehouse colleges, was designated for black residents only. At this point in the article, Weaver does not mention Techwood, which was a whites-only project built at the same time. Thurman Street was another blacks-only project located in Alabama. Some black activists, notably John P. Davis, criticized the PWA for perpetuating segregation in the South through these kinds of housing projects.

As a Department of the Interior employee, Weaver was actively involved in devising policies related to the implementation of PWA programs. Largely as a result of his efforts, PWA housing contracts were modified to include the clause he describes in paragraph 14, which required that these contracts employ a certain percentage of black skilled workers. The percentage for each contract was based on the percentage of African Americans who belonged to a given occupational category in the 1930 census. Weaver and his staff calculated the required quota for each contract based on the census data for a given community and monitored contractors to ensure compliance. Weaver's efforts were highly successful, allowing African Americans to have access to union jobs that had formerly remained closed to them. Here, he uses the Techwood development, the all-white housing project in Atlanta, as a case study. Even though the project employed a significant number of black workers, it failed to mirror the actual proportion of skilled black workers in the area. Still, Weaver remains positive in his assessment of his efforts to promote what later became known as affirmative action.

Beginning with paragraph 15, Weaver addresses the second of the key benefits of New Deal programs for African Americans: education. FERA included funding for an Emergency Education Program aimed at helping unemployed teachers. Like many New Deal benefits, this program sought to provide alternative work opportunities rather than direct financial aid. The program reemployed teachers in a number of areas, including literacy education, vocational training, and general education courses for adults in a wide variety of subjects that might help them develop outside interests or new skills. Some of the funds, however, were used as direct aid in the form of emergency salaries to particularly impoverished rural communities. These communities were predominantly populated by African Americans. Weaver notes that government spending on emergency aid in these rural southern areas breaks the trend seen in other New Deal programs, where the "status quo," the result of the legacies of slavery and Jim Crow segregation, led to abuse and discrimination. The fact that the South spent proportionately more on this type of assistance than the percentage of blacks in the population shows Weaver that, at least in the area of education, southern states saw the need for overcoming these legacies.

In paragraph 16, Weaver mentions the FERA college scholarship program, which made funds available to employ some 10 percent of students part time at public universities. These funds were administered by each university's administration and allowed many students who could otherwise not afford to attend college to do so. He states that black and white students appear to have benefited equally from this particular program.

Last, Weaver turns to New Deal programs designed to spur employment. In paragraph 17, he reiterates many of his earlier arguments, returning to his case for structural forces causing the economic woes facing African Americans; in his words, "the New Deal has been more helpful than harmful to Negroes." Weaver changes the tenor of his argument in the latter part of his essay; he states that African Americans have found jobs within the Roosevelt administration, making the point that the New Deal programs themselves have created new and lucrative positions for African Americans like himself. He notes the fifteen jobs created by his own Department of the Interior and the PWA and then extends his evidence to include the various staffers and clerical workers in the White House. Weaver was also concerned with providing benefits to black professionals through his role with the Department of the Interior and the PWA. He comments that federal housing projects have included the services of black architects and technicians, arguing that the New Deal programs have increased employment opportunities for professional blacks. Weaver closes with a claim of the promises of the New Deal to help African Americans and calls for an "intelligent appraisal" of the facts in order to accurately assess the recovery plan's efficacy as well as the areas for improvement.

Audience

Weaver's essay was published in the July 1935 issue of Opportunity, the journal of the National Urban League. The magazine was one of several mainstream publications targeting black readers, but white liberals interested in fighting discrimination also read it. Opportunity and the other journals, including The Crisis, had published a number of articles critical of President Roosevelt's New Deal programs. Weaver wrote his essay in part to counter these negative portrayals of the administration's policies.

Weaver's audience was educated, politically progressive, and reform minded. The fact-driven nature of his essay reflects his understanding of this audience; Weaver assumed that readers of Opportunity would want to see detailed evidence supporting his assertions that government programs were, in fact, helping to alleviate the problems facing black Americans. He also acknowledges that an "intelligent appraisal" of these programs would improve their implementation in many respects. This type of measured assessment, which draws on evidence rather than emotional appeal, would have appealed to the journal's readers.

Impact

Weaver wrote numerous articles that were published in prominent black magazines such as The Crisis and Opportunity, as well as pieces for scholarly publications such as the Journal of Education. As an insider in the Roosevelt administration, he wrote as an advocate of the president's New Deal programs, but he also pointed out their flaws. In this essay and others, Weaver was careful not only to demonstrate the positive attributes of recovery initiatives but also to indicate where improvements were already being made and could be made in the future.

Weaver's essay provided an effective counter to the more critical articles on the New Deal appearing in black periodicals during the 1930s. African Americans shifted their electoral support to the Democratic Party in 1936, voting overwhelmingly for Roosevelt in that year's presidential election, despite having voted primarily Republican just four years earlier. Many historians believe that even with the criticisms of Roosevelt's New Deal in The Crisis and Opportunity, African Americans believed, for the most part, that the recovery programs had helped them. Articles such as Weaver's, showing the tangible benefits of New Deal programs as well as the reality of their flaws and limitations, helped to maintain Roosevelt's overwhelmingly positive image in the black community.

Questions for Further Study

1. Summarize the events and economic developments that gave rise to Weaver's "The New Deal and the Negro: A Look at the Facts."

2. In the 1930s a number of observers referred to the New Deal as a "raw deal" for African Americans. On what basis did they make that judgment? How and why did the Great Depression disproportionately affect African Americans?

3. Compare this document with John P. Davis's "A Black Inventory of the New Deal," written the same year. To what extent do the two writers' positions differ? Are their arguments similar in any significant ways? Explain.

4. In the modern era, African Americans have tended to heavily support Democrats for high office, particularly the presidency. Why did African American allegiance shift from the Republican Party ("the party of Lincoln") to the Democrats during the 1930s?

5. Using this document and the events surrounding it alongside Davis's "A Black Inventory of the New Deal" and A. Philip Randolph's "Call to Negro America to March on Washington for Jobs and Equal Participation in National Defense" (1941), prepare a time line of key economic events that affected African Americans (and all Americans) throughout the 1930s and 1940s.

Robert Clifton Weaver: "The New Deal and the Negro: A Look at the Facts"

It is impossible to discuss intelligently the New Deal and the Negro without considering the status of the Negro prior to the advent of the Recovery Program. The present economic position of the colored citizen was not created by recent legislation alone. Rather, it is the result of the impact of a new program upon an economic and social situation.

Much has been said recently about the occupational distribution of Negroes. Over a half of the gainfully employed colored Americans are concentrated in domestic service and farming. The workers in these two pursuits are the most casual and unstable in the modern economic world. This follows from the fact that neither of them requires any great capital outlay to buy necessary equipment. Thus, when there is a decline in trade, the unemployment of workers in these fields does not necessitate idle plants, large depreciation costs, or mounting overhead charges. In such a situation, the employer has every incentive to dismiss his workers; thus, these two classes are fired early in a depression.

The domestic worker has loomed large among the unemployed since the beginning of the current trade decline. This situation has persisted throughout the depression and is reflected in the relief figures for urban communities where 20 per cent of the employables on relief were formerly attached to personal and domestic service. Among Negroes the relative number of domestics and servants on relief is even greater.…

In … [a sample of 30 American] cities, 43.4 per cent of the Negroes on relief May 1, 1934, were usually employed as domestics. The demand for servants is a derived one; it is dependent upon the income and employment of other persons in the community. Thus, domestics are among the last rehired in a period of recovery.

The new work program of the Federal Government will attack this problem of the domestic worker from two angles. Insofar as it accelerates recovery by restoring incomes, it will tend to increase the demand for servants. More important, however, will be its creation of direct employment opportunities for all occupational classes of those on relief.

Although it is regrettable that the economic depression has led to the unemployment of so many Negroes and has threatened the creation of a large segment of the Negro population as a chronic relief load, one is forced to admit that Federal relief has been a godsend to the unemployed. The number of unemployed in this country was growing in 1933. According to the statistics of the American Federation of Labor, the number of unemployed increased from 3,216,000 in January, 1930, to 13,689,000 in March, 1933. In November, 1934, the number was about 10,500,000, and although there are no comparable current data available, estimates indicate that current unemployment is less than that of last November. Local relief monies were shrinking; and need and starvation were facing those unable to find an opportunity to work. A Federal relief program was the only possible aid in this situation. Insofar as the Negro was greatly victimized by the economic developments, he was in a position to benefit from a program which provided adequate funds for relief.

It is admitted that there were many abuses under the relief set-up. Such situations should be brought to light and fought. In the case of Negroes, these abuses undoubtedly existed and do exist. We should extend every effort to uncover and correct them. We can admit that we have gained from the relief program and still fight to receive greater and more equitable benefits from it.…

The recent depression has been extremely severe in its effects upon the South. The rural Negro poor before the period of trade decline was rendered even more needy after 1929. Many tenants found it impossible to obtain a contract for a crop, and scores of Negro farm owners lost their properties. The displacement of Negro tenants (as was the case for whites) began before, and grew throughout the depression. Thus, at the time of the announcement of the New Deal, there were many families without arrangements for a crop an appreciable number without shelter.…

The problems facing the Negro farmer of the South are not new. They have been accentuated by the crop reduction program. They are, for the most part, problems of a system, and their resistance to reform is as old as the system. This was well illustrated by the abuses in the administration of the Federal feed, seed, and fertilizer laws in 1928 1929. These abuses were of the same nature as those which confront the A.A.A. [the Agricultural Adjustment Administration] in its dealings with Negro tenants.

The southern farm tenant is in such a position that he cannot receive any appreciable gains from a program until steps are taken to change his position of absolute economic dependence upon the landlord. Until some effective measure for rehabilitating him is discovered, there is no hope. The new program for land utilization, rural rehabilitation, and spreading land ownership may be able to effect such a change. Insofar as it takes a step in that direction, it will be advantageous to the Negro farmer. The degree to which it aids him will depend upon the temper of its administration and the extent to which it is able to break away from the status quo.

In listing some of the gains which have accrued to Negroes under the New Deal, there will be a discussion of three lines of activity: housing, employment, and emergency education. These are chosen for discussion because each is significant in itself, and all represent a definite break from the status quo in governmental activity, method, and policy. They do not give a complete picture; but rather, supply interesting examples of what is, and can be, done for Negroes.

The Housing Division of the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works has planned 60 Federal housing projects to be under construction by December 31, 1935. Of these, 28 are to be developed in Negro slum areas and will be tenanted predominantly or wholly by Negroes. Eight additional projects will provide for an appreciable degree of Negro occupancy. These 36 projects will afford approximately 74,664 rooms and should offer accommodations for about 23,000 low income colored families. The estimated total cost of these housing developments will be $64,428,000, and they represent about 29 per cent of the funds devoted to Federal slum clearance developments under the present allotments.

Projects in Negro areas have been announced in seven cities: Atlanta, Cleveland, Detroit, Indianapolis, Montgomery, Chicago, and Nashville. These will cost about $33,232,000, and will contain about 20,000 rooms. Two of these projects, the University development at Atlanta and the Thurman Street development in Montgomery, are under construction. These are among the earliest Federal housing projects to be initiated by the P.W.A.

After a series of conferences and a period of experience under the P.W.A., it was decided to include a clause in P.W.A. housing contracts requiring the payment to Negro mechanics of a given percentage of the payroll going to skilled workers. The first project to be affected by such a contractual clause was the Techwood development in Atlanta, Georgia. On this project, most of the labor employed on demolition was composed of unskilled Negro workers. About 90 per cent of the unskilled workers employed laying the foundation for the Techwood project were Negroes, and, for the first two-month construction period, February and March, 12.7 per cent of the wages paid [to] skilled workers was earned by Negro artisans.…

Under the educational program of the F.E.R.A., out of a total of 17,879 teachers employed in 13 southern states, 5,476 or 30.6 per cent were Negro. Out of a total of 570,794 enrolled in emergency classes, 217,000 or 38 per cent were Negro. Out of a total of $886,300 expended in a month (either February or March, 1935) for the program, Negroes received $231,320 or 26.1 per cent. These southern states in which 26.1 per cent of all emergency salaries were paid to Negro teachers, ordinarily allot only 11.7 per cent of all public school salaries to Negro teachers. The situation may be summarized as follows: Six of the 13 states are spending for Negro salaries a proportion of their emergency education funds larger than the percentage of Negroes in those states. The area as a whole is spending for Negro salaries a proportion of its funds slightly in excess of the percentage of Negroes in the population. This development is an example of Government activity breaking away from the status quo in race relations.

There is one Government expenditure in education in reference to which there has been general agreement that equity has been established. That is the F.E.R.A. college scholarship program. Each college or university not operated for profit, received $20 monthly per student as aid for 12 per cent of its college enrollment. Negro and white institutions have benefited alike under this program.

In the execution of some phases of the Recovery Program, there have been difficulties, and the maximum results have not been received by the Negroes. But, given the economic situation of 1932, the New Deal has been more helpful than harmful to Negroes. We had unemployment in 1932. Jobs were being lost by Negroes, and they were in need. Many would have starved had there been no Federal relief program. As undesirable as is the large relief load among Negroes, the F.E.R.A. has meant much to them. In most of the New Deal set-ups, there has been some Negro representation by competent Negroes. The Department of the Interior and the P.W.A. have appointed some fifteen Negroes to jobs of responsibility which pay good salaries. These persons have secretarial and clerical staffs attached to their offices. In addition to these new jobs, there are the colored messengers, who number around 100, and the elevator operators for the Government buildings, of whom there are several hundred. This is not, of course, adequate representation; but it represents a step in the desired direction and is greater recognition than has been given Negroes in the Federal Government during the last 20 years. Or again, in the Nashville housing project, a Negro architectural firm is a consultant; for the Southwest side housing project in Chicago, a Negro is an associate architect. One of the proposed projects will have two Negro principal architects, a Negro consultant architect, and a technical staff of about six Negro technicians. In other cities competent colored architects will be used to design housing projects.

This analysis is intended to indicate some advantages accruing to the Negro under the Recovery Program, and to point out that the New Deal, insofar as it represents an extension of governmental activity into the economic sphere, is a departure which can do much to reach the Negro citizens. In many instances it has availed itself of these opportunities. An intelligent appraisal of its operation is necessary to assure greater benefits to colored citizens.

"The ultimate objective of the association is the abolition of all forms of segregation in public education."

Overview

In October 1935 Charles Hamilton Houston published "Educational Inequalities Must Go!" in The Crisis, the official publication of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). His purpose was to announce the long-range, carefully orchestrated legal strategy that would culminate with the U.S. Supreme Court's 1954 ruling in Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, which held that segregation in public education was unconstitutional. The NAACP had been established in 1909 to fight for equal rights for African Americans. During the first twenty-five years of its operations, it relied on lobbying, demonstrations, and public education to promote its objectives. Litigation was deployed on a case-by-case basis, and some significant victories were won.

In the early 1930s, the NAACP embarked on a dramatic change in direction. The organization's leaders decided to launch a legal campaign in which court cases would be used systematically to attack segregation. The organization hired Houston, who was then the dean of Howard University's law school, to lead the campaign in 1935. In "Educational Inequalities Must Go!" Houston announced the beginning of the legal campaign.

Context

In 1896 the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in Plessy v. Ferguson that laws requiring segregation in public transportation did not violate the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution as long as the separate facilities provided for blacks were equal to those available to whites. By the 1930s segregation was firmly entrenched, especially in the South, where schools, restaurants, hotels, theaters, and public transportation were segregated. Elevators, parks, public restrooms, hospitals, drinking fountains, prisons, and places of worship were also segregated. Whites and blacks were born in separate hospitals, educated in separate schools, and buried in segregated graveyards.

Segregation was codified in state and local laws, and lynching and other forms of racial violence were routine. There were, in effect, two criminal justice systems: one for whites and another for blacks. In the North, African Americans resided in segregated neighborhoods that were perpetuated by "redlining" (the practice of drawing a red line on a map around black neighborhoods) and racially restrictive covenants that prohibited white homeowners from selling their homes to blacks. There were "black jobs" and "white jobs," with African Americans confined to the lowest-paying and least desirable occupations.

In 1922 Charles Garland, the son of a Boston millionaire, donated $800,000 to establish a fund to support radical causes. The Garland Fund, as it became known, was administered by a group of liberal activists that included James Weldon Johnson, the executive secretary of the NAACP, and Roger Baldwin, the founder of the American Civil Liberties Union, as well as the civil liberties lawyer and free speech advocate Morris Ernest, the New York Herald columnist Lewis Gannett, and the Socialist Party leader Norman Thomas. Garland turned over his inheritance with a request that it be given away as quickly as possible to unpopular causes, without regard to race, creed, or color. A Committee on Negro Work was formed, and it recommended that the fund award a grant of $100,000 to the NAACP to carry out a large-scale legal campaign to secure the constitutional rights of southern blacks. The grant was announced with an explanation that it would be used to defend civil liberties and assist in campaigns against specific handicaps facing African Americans, including the unequal apportionment of school funds, the barring of blacks from juries, Jim Crow laws, racially restrictive covenants, and disenfranchisement. The NAACP indicated that it would find a lawyer to review the relevant legal authorities, develop an overall strategy, and supervise the handling of the cases that would be filed.

The NAACP hired a recent Harvard graduate, Nathan Margold, to survey the laws requiring segregation and to recommend how a legal challenge might be mounted. The Margold Report, as it became known, contained a comprehensive analysis of laws and applicable legal precedents beginning with Plessy v. Ferguson. After analyzing the post-Plessy decisions, the report worked its way through the laws governing segregation up to the 1930s. Despite the weight of legal precedent supporting segregation, Margold suggested a means by which the legal obstacles might be overcome. He concluded that the "separate but equal" doctrine as practiced was unconstitutional. In the case of public schools, for example, conspicuous inequalities existed in the resources allocated to white schools compared with those provided to schools that served black students. However, there were Supreme Court decisions holding that absolute equality in funding was not required as long as some provision was made for both races. Margold's main conclusion was that segregation as practiced was unconstitutional under the rationale in Plessy. The system was, in reality, separation and discrimination, for the facilities provided for blacks were always separate but never equal. Margold contended that segregation coupled with discrimination resulting from governmental actions was as much a denial of equal protection of the laws as was segregation coupled with discrimination required by an explicit statutory enactment.

Margold took a job with the U.S. Department of the Interior in 1933, so the NAACP began searching for a full-time attorney to conduct the campaign. After considering several candidates, Walter White, the NAACP's executive director, chose Charles Houston as the ideal candidate for the position. Houston concluded that Margold's legal analysis was sound, but the 1930s courts were not prepared to respond favorably to a direct challenge to Plessy; consequently, a different legal strategy was devised, one that would be far more gradual and methodical than the direct challenge Margold proposed. Thus, the strategy that was adopted was not to ask the courts to overturn Plessy but to insist that blacks be treated equally with whites.

A few months before he joined the NAACP, Houston prepared a memorandum for the Garland Fund and the NAACP in which he outlined the equalization strategy. By this time, it was known that only $10,000 of the original $100,000 grant would be forthcoming, based on losses that had occurred during the Great Depression. With this tiny budget, Houston set out to transform the foundations of the American legal system.

Because of the diminished grant funds, the NAACP lowered its sights to legal challenges against discrimination in education and public transportation. After considering what the legal campaign would entail, however, Houston recommended an even narrower focus. He noted in a memorandum that a budget of $10,000 would make it exceedingly difficult to execute an effective program on a national scale on both issues. Although resources would be severely limited, Houston predicted that carefully targeted suits would stimulate public interest and encourage the affected communities of African Americans to continue the fight for equal rights after the NAACP led the way with test cases.

Houston presented two separate budget proposals. One was based on an assumption that the entire effort would focus on education cases. The second proposed an equal division of the funds between education and transportation litigation. Houston believed that education was the more important goal because of the immediate benefits the black community would receive. He thus recommended a two-pronged attack: The first involved the unequal apportionment of school funds. The second focused on disparities in teacher salaries. Houston explained that his goal was to work out model procedures that the local communities could apply to similar cases in the future.

About the Author

Charles Hamilton Houston was born in Washington, D.C., on September 3, 1895. His father, William Houston, was a lawyer who had obtained a law degree from Howard University, while his mother, Mary Houston, was a hairdresser. Houston attended segregated public schools in Washington before enrolling at Amherst College in Massachusetts in 1911. He was elected to Phi Beta Kappa during his senior year, and he delivered one of the commencement addresses. After graduating in 1915, Houston returned to Washington without any specific plans for a career. When the United States entered World War I, Houston decided to join the military. He enlisted in the segregated officers training corps that was established in Fort Des Moines, Iowa. In October 1917, Houston was among the 440 African Americans who received commissions as officers in the U.S. Army. At Fort Meade, Houston and the other black officers were harassed, humiliated, and subjected to the army's institutionalized racism, which continued after they were shipped to France.

Houston was almost lynched in France when he and a companion stumbled upon a heated dispute between a black serviceman and a group of white American soldiers. Houston and his companion found themselves surrounded by an angry mob of soldiers who shouted racial epithets and threats. The hostilities ended only after a military policeman intervened and restored order. Houston never forgot the incident and pledged at that point never to be caught again without knowing his rights. He would study law and fight for the rights of African Americans.

After his tour of duty, Houston enrolled in Harvard Law School in 1919. During his first year he joined the staff of the prestigious Harvard Law Review, an honor accorded to a limited number of students who receive the highest grades. Houston's performance on the Law Review staff resulted in his election to the editorial board, making him the first African American student to serve in that capacity.

In 1922 Houston graduated cum laude. The following fall he became a candidate for the advanced degree of doctor of juridical science. He received that degree in 1923 and was awarded a Sheldon Traveling Fellowship, which he used to study law at the University of Madrid in Spain through 1924. In addition to studying international law, Houston used the time abroad to travel in Europe and North Africa. He returned to Washington, was admitted to practice in the District of Columbia, and joined his father's law firm as well as the faculty at Howard Law School.

Houston was appointed resident vice dean in charge of the law school on July 1, 1929. He began almost immediately to upgrade the facility's quality of instruction. By late 1930 the law school employed four full-time professors and one full-time librarian, had developed a library of ten thousand volumes, and was fully accredited by the American Bar Association. In 1931 the school was elected to membership by the American Association of Law Schools. Houston's plans went beyond improving legal education for African American students. He intended to train a generation of black lawyers who would serve on the front lines in the war against discrimination. He urged his students to become highly skilled social engineers with a strong commitment to social justice and to use the Constitution as an engine of progress. Under Houston's leadership, the Howard Law School became the West Point of the civil rights movement.

Houston applied for a leave of absence from Howard and moved to New York in 1935 to join the NAACP, where he developed the legal strategy that would be used to attack the "separate but equal" doctrine in higher education. In this position, he was intimately involved with several landmark cases that chipped away at the doctrine. He died on April 22, 1950, before his efforts could bear full fruit in the Supreme Court decision in Brown v. Board of Education.

In this 1935 article published in The Crisis, Houston announces what would become the NAACP's legal strategy. The approach was carried out over several years in hundreds of cases and ultimately resulted in the reversal of the Plessy doctrine and the end of formal segregation. Focusing on inequalities in education, Houston proposes that a series of suits be filed demanding that states comply with the letter of Plessy by providing equal allocations of financial and other resources for black students in segregated schools.

Houston's essay is relative simple and uncomplicated. In the opening sentence, he vigorously announces the NAACP's intention: "The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People is launching an active campaign against race discrimination in public education." He explains that the NAACP's campaign would encompass all levels of education, from elementary school to graduate school, and he notes that the organization had already begun legal action to have African American students admitted to graduate schools in Maryland and Virginia efforts that would culminate in such cases as Pearson v. Murray in 1936. The goal was to end segregation in education but, failing that, to ensure that black schools were made equal to those attended by white students in terms of facilities, funding, and faculty. This was what was meant by the equalization strategy using the "separate but equal" doctrine of the Plessy case against itself by demanding the "equal" part of "separate but equal."

◆ "Linked to Other Objectives"

In this section, Houston notes that the NAACP's campaign was one component of a wider effort to dismantle the Jim Crow system the formal and informal system of segregation and discrimination that had been in place since the late nineteenth century. He states, "It ties in with the antilynching fight because there is no use educating boys and girls if their function in life is to be the playthings of murderous mobs." Houston continues by pointing out that educational improvements had to be part of a broader effort to improve all aspects of blacks' lives, and he regrets the impact of the Great Depression of the 1930s on skilled black workers, who often lost their jobs first because they had been the ones most recently hired.

◆ "Specific Objectives"

In this section, Houston specifies the NAACP's plan of attack, including the objective of equality in school terms, payment of teachers, transportation of students, buildings and equipment, per capita spending for students, and graduate and professional training. He goes on to explain that inequalities existed in both segregated and nonsegregated schools. Even in those schools that were integrated, African American teachers encountered professional obstacles, and black students were often, for example, denied access to extracurricular activities. At the graduate school level, segregation was largely confined to the South. He concludes this section of the article by arguing that the U.S. Supreme Court had supported this uneven system in ruling that "separate but equal" schools did not violate the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, citing indirectly the 1896 case of Plessy v. Ferguson. In the decades that followed, this landmark case played a key role in maintaining the Jim Crow system that reduced African Americans to second-class status.

◆ "Inequalities Glaring"

In "Inequalities Glaring," Houston cites examples of educational inequities, often by referring to the findings of other researchers. He notes in particular the "glaring" imbalance in funding for white and black schools. The disparities were bad enough in 1900, but by the time Houston was writing, they had worsened sometimes by a factor of twenty. In the mid-1930s, as many as 230 U.S. counties made no provision for educating African American students of high school age.

Federal employees waiting for treatment at a Public Health Service dispensary with clearly marked waiting rooms for blacks and whites (Library of Congress)

◆ "No Graduate Training"

In "No Graduate Training," Houston observes that in seventeen southern states, black students had no opportunities for professional or graduate study, though some states did provide scholarship funds, often inadequate, to send black students to other states willing to admit them. This problem, in Houston's view, was easy to attack from a legal perspective. In the South, certain states provided separate elementary schools, high schools, and colleges for black and white students, but difficulties arose in comparing the extent to which facilities were or were not truly equal. When a state funded white graduate students but provided no funding for black students, the inequality was clear and easier to confront. For this reason, the NAACP's immediate focus would be on graduate education.

◆ "Unwise Attempt"

In this section, Houston describes one such case, that involving a young black woman trying to gain admission to graduate school at the University of Virginia. He quotes Virginia newspapers that conceded that the student had an "abstract" right to attend the university, but they questioned why she would want to attend school where she was "not wanted." Houston asserts that because the university was a public institution, this question was irrelevant. Further, he responds to the notion that attending a school where they were not wanted could damage black students' "self-respect," noting that students could retain their self-respect by asserting their constitutional rights. They might have to endure "snubs and insults," but they had to do so in other settings throughout the South all the time. Houston concludes this section by leveling criticism at white southern "liberals" who paid "lip service" to equal rights; these same southerners expressed concern that the NAACP's actions would disturb "amicable race relations" and thus took no action to ensure that "amicable" relations are based on equal rights.

◆ "Cannot Surrender Rights"

The final section of Houston's article picks up the theme of "amicable race relations" by suggesting that the goal of the NAACP was to ensure that everyone be treated equally under the law and enjoy equality of opportunity. He says that the issue was not whether blacks and whites could get along when blacks are subordinated but rather whether they could get along when blacks "insist on sharing with whites the rights and advantages to which they are lawfully entitled." Amicable race relations have to be founded on "dignity and self-respect," not on the surrender of constitutional rights. Houston concludes by reassuring readers that the NAACP was not a "special pleader" in the long fight ahead; it was merely insisting that the Supreme Court enforce the Constitution.

Audience

The Crisis magazine was delivered each month to members of the NAACP and circulated widely in African American communities throughout the nation. The audience for "Educational Inequalities Must Go!" included members of the NAACP and their supporters. It was directed to a lay audience, written in a straightforward manner, and did not include any legal jargon.

Impact

As a result of Houston's article, the NAACP and its supporters were girded for battle. Not long after Houston joined the NAACP, one of his most significant cases began to unfold in Baltimore, Maryland. Donald Gaines Murray applied for admission to the law school at the University of Maryland in 1935, but fifteen years earlier Maryland had approved legislation that required racially segregated schools. Thus, he was rejected because of his race. The facilities provided for Maryland's black students were far below the standards of those provided for white students. University officials suggested that Murray apply to the all-black Princess Anne Academy, but it had limited facilities for college training and no facilities of any sort for graduate training.

One of Houston's former students, Thurgood Marshall, had established a law practice in Baltimore. After he became aware of efforts to desegregate the University of Maryland campus, Marshall wrote to Houston and asked whether the NAACP would be interested in the case. Donald Murray, the prospective black law student, was the ideal candidate to bring a legal case, for he was articulate and had strong educational credentials. Houston decided to take the case.

Houston filed a civil action in Baltimore City Court against the University of Maryland. Houston and Marshall handled the trial. At the conclusion of the proceedings, the judge held that Maryland had a legal obligation to provide the same educational opportunities for black students as those available to white students. Because the state had failed to comply with its constitutional obligation, the judge issued an order compelling the University of Maryland to admit Murray. The decision was affirmed by the Maryland Court of Appeals in Murray v. Pearson in 1936.

A similar case, Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, was filed in Missouri. Initially, at the state court level, Houston lost; the court held that Missouri's out-of-state scholarships for black students satisfied its obligation under Plessy. On appeal, though, the U.S. Supreme Court held in 1938 that the scholarships did not meet the state's constitutional obligation and ordered the admission of the black student.

With the U.S. entry into World War II in 1941, the NAACP's attention was diverted to other matters, including teacher salary cases and the defense of African Americans serving in the military. When the war ended in 1945, the focus returned to education. By this time, Thurgood Marshall had succeeded Houston at the NAACP. Houston was practicing law in Washington, but he handled several civil rights cases and continued to provide guidance and direction to Marshall. In 1946 the NAACP filed suit against the University of Oklahoma. In 1948 in Sipuel v. Board of Regents, the U.S. Supreme Court held that Oklahoma, which did not have a law school for black students, was obligated to provide legal instruction to them. A similar case, Sweatt v. Painter, was filed in Texas, and another case, McLaurin v. Board of Regents, was brought in Oklahoma in response to the treatment black students endured after Sipuel. The Supreme Court issued decisions in both cases on the same day in 1950.

In McLaurin, the Court ruled that separate seating in classrooms and separate libraries and other facilities violated the Fourteenth Amendment because these arrangements "handicapped" black students in their efforts to pursue their studies. In Sweatt v. Painter, the Court held that a separate law school established in Houston for black students was not equal to the University of Texas Law School in Austin. Intangible features such as reputation of the school and interactions of students could not be replicated in a separate school, so the Court ordered the admission of Heman M. Sweatt, the African American applicant named as the plaintiff in the case. As the NAACP lawyers hoped, these opinions acknowledged the stigmatic and other intangible injuries that segregation caused, but they stopped short of reversing Plessy.

After the rulings in Sweatt and McLaurin, the NAACP lawyers decided that an adequate foundation for a direct challenge to Plessy had been established and that it was time to abandon the "equalization" approach. Six cases were filed in five jurisdictions: Brown v. Board of Education in Topeka, Kansas; Briggs v. Elliott in South Carolina; Davis v. County School Board of Prince Edward County in Virginia; Bolling v. Sharpe in the District of Columbia; and Gebhart v. Belton, which had been consolidated with Bulah v. Gebhart, both in Delaware. Houston initially handled Bolling v. Sharpe, but ill health prevented him from completing the case before his death in 1950.

Four of the six cases were consolidated as Brown v. Board of Education in the U.S. Supreme Court and argued in December 1952. The case was held over and reargued in December 1953. The decision in Brown was announced on

In the early 1930s, Houston had predicted that successful lawsuits would stimulate public interest and encourage the affected communities to continue the fight for equality after the NAACP lawyers led the way with test cases. This finally happened with Brown, which sparked an era of unprecedented civil rights activism, including the Montgomery bus boycott in Alabama; the emergence of Martin Luther King, Jr., as the nation's preeminent civil rights leader; and the student sit-ins in Greensboro, North Carolina. Mass marches, boycotts, and other forms of protests were held in cities and towns across the South. The 1963 March on Washington was organized by a group of civil rights, labor, and religious organizations. On August 28, 1963, approximately 250,000 protestors conducted a day of peaceful demonstration that began at the Washington Monument and ended at the Lincoln Memorial. King delivered his "I Have a Dream" speech at this event. These activities spurred the enactment of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Voting Rights Act of 1965, and the Fair Housing Act of 1968 laws that ended the era of state-sponsored segregation and discrimination in the United States. Such victories would not have occurred without the litigation campaign Charles H. Houston announced in "Educational Inequalities Must Go!"

Questions for Further Study

1. What was the legal strategy of the NAACP for breaking down segregation during this period? Why did the organization adopt this strategy? What role did the Great Depression play in motivating this strategy?

2. Using this document in conjunction with the circumstances surrounding Sweatt v. Painter and Brown v. Board of Education, prepare a time line of the key events in the history of desegregation from 1935 to 1954. Be prepared to explain why each event was important.

3. What were some of the common inequalities in black and white schools during this era? What types of specific changes in the educational system did Houston propose?

4. Houston saw educational inequalities as bound up with other inequalities. What were these inequalities, and what bearing did they have on the issue of education?

5. Much of the NAACP's attention was focused on graduate school education, including, for example, law schools. Why do you think the organization made this segment of the education system its focus.

Charles Hamilton Houston's "Educational Inequalities Must Go!"

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People is launching an active campaign against race discrimination in public education. The campaign will reach all levels of public education from the nursery school through the university. The ultimate objective of the association is the abolition of all forms of segregation in public education, whether in the admission or activities of students, the appointment or advancement of teachers, or administrative control. The association will resist any attempt to extend segregated schools. Where possible it will attack segregation in schools. Where segregation is so firmly entrenched by law that a frontal attack cannot be made, the association will throw its immediate force toward bringing Negro schools up to an absolute equality with white schools. If the white South insists upon its separate schools, it must not squeeze the Negro schools to pay for them.

It is not the purpose or the function of the national office of the N.A.A.C.P. to force a school fight upon any community. Its function is primarily to expose the rotten conditions of segregation, to point out the evil consequences of discrimination and injustice to both Negroes and whites, and to map out ways and means by which these evils may be corrected. The decision for action rests with the local community itself. If the local community decides to act and asks the N.A.A.C.P. for aid, the N.A.A.C.P. stands ready with advice and assistance.

The N.A.A.C.P. proposes to use every legitimate means at its disposal to accomplish actual equality of educational opportunity for Negroes. A legislative program is being formulated. Court action has already begun in Maryland to compel the University of Maryland to admit a qualified Negro boy to the law school of the university. Court action is imminent in Virginia to compel the University of Virginia to admit a qualified Negro girl in the graduate department of that university. Activity in politics will be fostered due to the political set-up of and control over public school systems. The press and the public forum will be enlisted to explain to the public the issues involved and to make both whites and Negroes realize the blight which inferior education throws over them, their children and their communities.

Linked to Other Objectives

This campaign for equality of educational opportunity is indissolubly linked with all the other major activities of the association. It ties in with the anti-lynching fight because there is no use educating boys and girls if their function in life is to be the playthings of murderous mobs. It connects up with the association's new economic program because Negro boys and girls must be provided with work opportunities commensurate with their education when they leave school. One of the greatest tragedies of the depression has been the humiliation and suffering which public authorities have inflicted upon trained Negroes, denying them employment at their trades on public works and forcing them to accept menial low-pay jobs as an alternative to starvation. Civil rights, including the right of suffrage, free speech, jury service, and equal facilities of transportation, are directly involved. The N.A.A.C.P. recognizes the fact that the discriminations which the Negro suffers in education are merely part of the general pattern of race prejudice in American life, and it knows that no attack on discrimination in education can have any far reaching effect unless it is bound to a general attack on discrimination and segregation in all phases of American life.

Specific Objectives

At the present time the N.A.A.C.P. educational program has six specific objectives for its immediate efforts:

(a) equality of school terms;

(b) equality of pay for Negro teachers having the same qualifications and doing the same work as white teachers;

(c) equality of transportation for Negro school children at public expense;

(d) equality of buildings and equipment;

(e) equality of per capita expenditure for education of Negroes:

(f) equality in graduate and professional training.

The first five objectives relate to segregated and separate school systems. Equality of educational opportunity in separate school systems is the greatest immediate educational problem of the Negro masses. But the problem of Negro education would not stand completely solved even if segregated schools were suddenly abolished. There would still be the question of the Negro's position in the unified system. At the present time Negro children and white children attend the same schools in the North, but Negroes suffer bitterly from prejudice in many northern schools. Negro students are frequently excluded from extra-curricular activities; they are kept out of class offices; cases are known where the white teacher has actively tried to discourage the Negro pupils from even attending the school. It is difficult for a Negro teacher to obtain placement in a nonsegregated school system; more difficult for a Negro teacher to rise to an administrative position in such a system; and apparently impossible for a Negro, regardless of merit, to become head of any public school system segregated or nonsegregated. The N.A.A.C.P. expects to fight race prejudice in nonsegregated school systems just as hard as it fights for equality in separate school systems.

The sixth objective: equality in graduate and professional training, is essentially a problem of the South. In the North Negroes are freely admitted to the state universities for graduate and professional training, except in some instances in medicine. The established policy of the South is segregated schools. The United States supreme court has endorsed this policy to the extent of saying that segregated schools do not violate the guaranties of equal protection of the law under the Constitution of the United States provided equal facilities are offered to each race in the segregated system.

Inequalities Glaring

The South has never even made a serious effort to obey the mandate of the supreme court that the schools may be separate but they must be equal. The Commission on Interracial Cooperation in the fourth edition of its Recent Trends in Race Relations (revised May, 1935) states:

"In his excellent study, 'Financing Schools in the South in 1930,' Prof. Fred McCuistion shows that in the eleven Southern States in which separate records are kept, the public school outlay averaged $44.31 for the white and $12.57 for the colored child enrolled, or nearly four to one against the group most completely dependent upon public funds for its educational opportunity. In South Carolina the respective figures were $56.06 and $7.84; in Mississippi they were $45.34 and $5.45.

"But even these figures do not tell the worst. Within these averages there are unbelievable extremes. In Alabama, for example, where the averages for the State were $36.43 for the white child and $10.09 for the colored, there is one county in which the figures were found to be $75.50 for the white child and $1.82 for the Negro. In hundreds of counties in many of the states the proportion runs as high as ten to one, or twenty to one, in favor of the white child."

The Journal of Negro Education published by Howard University (4th Yearbook Number, July, 1935, p. 290) shows that

"in 1900 the discrimination in per capita expenditure for white and Negro children was 60 per cent in favor of the white; by 1930, this discrimination had increased to 253 per cent. Again, despite the fact that the training of Negro teachers, today, more nearly approximates that of the white teachers, the discrimination in salaries of white and Negro teachers increased from 52.8 per cent in 1900 to 113 per cent in 1930."

Ambrose Caliver, Senior Specialist in the Education of Negroes, the United States Office of Education, reports in the National Survey of Secondary Education that "in the 15 states comprising this investigation, 230 counties, with a Negro population of 12½ per cent or more of the total, are without high-school facilities for colored children. These counties contain 1,397,304 colored people, 158,939 of whom arc 15 to 19 years of age. These young people represent 16.5 per cent of all Negroes between the ages of 15 and 19 in the 15 Southern States represented."

Yet every one of the 230 counties provided high school facilities for its white children.

No Graduate Training

Although the southern states provide a measure of undergraduate instruction for Negroes on the college level, not one of them provides any graduate or professional training for Negroes. The Journal of Negro Education above cited found that "… there is not a single state-supported institution of higher learning in any one of 17 of the 19 states which require separation by law, to which a Negro may go to pursue graduate and professional education. On the other hand in 1930, some 11,037 white students were enrolled in publicly-supported higher institutions in 15 of these states, pursuing graduate and professional training."

West Virginia, Missouri, and this year Maryland provide certain scholarship money for their respective Negro students who desire graduate and professional training, toward their tuition fees in universities outside the state which will enroll them as students. But these scholarship grants do not include the differential in travel expense between the fare from the student's home to the state university which will not admit him, and his fare to the university outside the state which will. They do not include any differential in case of increased living expenses outside the state, and are frequently subject to conditions and restrictions not imposed upon white students taking the same work in the state university. In Maryland there was not even enough money to pay tuition fees for all the qualified Negro students who applied for scholarships.

For purely technical reasons the first problem the association attacked in court was the exclusion of qualified Negroes from graduate or professional training in state-supported universities, solely on account of race or color. The legal problem was simpler; and since much of its educational program will involve pioneer work the association began with the simpler problem first. As regards primary, secondary and collegiate education in the South, there is a system, albeit inadequate, of separate primary and secondary schools and colleges for Negroes supported from public funds. A challenge to the inadequacies of these primary, secondary schools and colleges would raise the question whether the facilities offered by them are equal to the facilities offered in similar schools to whites. This would involve complex problems of comparative budget analyses, faculty qualifications, and other facts. But in the case of the graduate or professional training there are no facilities whatsoever provided for Negroes by the state, and the question narrows down to a simple proposition of law: whether the state can appropriate public money for graduate and professional education for white students exclusively. The Baltimore City Court in the case of Donald Gaines Murray vs. Raymond A. Pearson, president of the University of Maryland, et al., has answered that this could not be done, and on June 25, 1935, issued its writ of mandamus commanding the officers of the university to admit Murray into the first year class of the law school. The university has appealed, and the case will be argued before the Court of Appeals of Maryland early this fall.

Investigations are in progress covering the exclusion of qualified Negro students from the universities of Missouri, Virginia, North Carolina and other southern states. A qualified Negro girl has applied for admission to the graduate department of the University of Virginia, and her application is now pending before the Rector and Board of Visitors of the university.

Unwise Attempt

The reactions of the white press of Virginia to this heretical attempt of a Negro girl to enter the graduate department of the University of Virginia are indicative of the opposition which the N.A.A.C.P. will face when its general educational program gets well under way. The editors admit the young woman has the legal right to attend the university, but urge her and the N.A.A.C.P. not to force the issue. Sample editorials state "it is inexpedient, ill-advised, and heavily charged with potential injury to the cause which the Association is designed to advance" (Norfolk Ledger-Dispatch). "The question here, it seems to us, is not what the Negro has an abstract right to do, but what it is wise to attempt" (Richmond Times-Dispatch). "Law bears on the question from one side; custom from another" (Newport News Daily Press). "The question instantly arises why any educated person should wish to impose his or her presence upon an institution where they are not wanted and where they could not possibly remain in justice to their own self-respect or to their hope of achievement" (Northern Virginia Daily).

White Virginians evidently cannot bring themselves to admit that the University of Virginia is a public institution, and not their own private property. It is a public institution, so the question put by the Northern Virginia Daily as to whether a Negro student "is wanted" at the university is beside the point. A Negro student can preserve her self-respect much more by standing up for her constitutional rights and facing the snubs and insults of the white students with calm and dignity than by supinely yielding up her constitutional rights. Unless the white students offer her actual physical violence, they cannot snub or insult her any worse than the white men students snubbed and insulted the first white woman student who dared enter the University of Virginia.

Insults and snubs will not deter Negro students from insisting on their right to graduate and professional study. Since the daily portion of Negroes in American life is snubs and insults, regardless how submissive they are, Negro students can afford to face a few more snubs and insults temporarily in defense of their constitutional rights to equal educational opportunities, until the white students and white authorities become reconciled to allowing them to pursue their education in peace. As a matter of fact, the voting southern white students have not been heard from; but there are indications that there is a growing sentiment among them for recognition of the Negro as a real human being and citizen entitled to all the legal rights and public benefits as such.

Another point that the older white Virginians make is that any attempt to force the university issue will disturb "amicable race relations" in Virginia. It seems strange that white people always use "amicable race relations" as an excuse to discourage the Negro from insisting on his rights. The slaveholders told the abolitionists the same thing before the Civil War. If the "liberal" white Virginians would just manifest a little courage, and take a few chances with their own comfort and social position in a firm stand for real equality of opportunity between the races, there would be no occasion for "amicable race relations" to be disturbed. The difficulty is that white southern liberals give lip-service to equality before the law; but except in rare instances their qualms of conscience do not spur them into action.

Cannot Surrender Rights

It may be that the white Virginians and the N.A.A.C.P. mean different things by "amicable race relations." To the N.A.A.C.P. "amicable race relations" means mutual helpfulness in promoting the common welfare allowing to everybody concerned the full benefit of the law and equality of opportunity. The test of "amicable race relations" is not whether whites and Negroes can remain friends while the Negro is at the little end of the horn, but whether they can remain friends when Negroes insist on sharing with whites the rights and advantages to which they are lawfully entitled and which the whites have illegally appropriated to themselves all these years.

The N.A.A.C.P. and all Negroes desire to live at peace with their white fellow citizens. They crave amicable race relations, but they want them founded on dignity and self-respect. Real amicable race relations cannot be purchased by the surrender of fundamental constitutional rights.

The N.A.A.C.P. appreciates the magnitude of the task ahead of it. but it has its duty to its constituency and to the America of the future. It conceives that in equalizing educational opportunities for Negroes it raises the whole standard of American citizenship, and stimulates white Americans as well as black. Fundamentally the N.A.A.C.P. is not a special pleader; it merely insists that the United States respect its own Constitution and its own laws.

"The attorney general continues his offensive against crime except crimes involving the deprivation of life and liberty and citizenship to Negroes."

Overview

During the 1920s and 1930s, Walter White published dozens of essays to rally public opposition to lynching, including the 1935 article "U.S. Department of (White) Justice." As the executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), White called on the federal government to enact laws to prevent mob violence and punish its perpetrators. Published in The Crisis, the NAACP's monthly journal, this particular essay focused on the reluctance of federal law enforcement officials to intervene in southern lynching cases.

The antilynching movement was one of the first civil rights causes to emerge on the national political scene. Walter White and the NAACP spearheaded a diverse alliance of churchwomen, labor unions, progressive activists, and southern liberals united in their opposition to lynching. Their crusade forced a showdown with southern politicians, who resisted any effort by the federal government to intervene in their affairs. While the national crusade against mob violence failed to enact federal antilynching laws, White's efforts to publicize the horrors of lynching were a crucial step in the emergence of civil rights as a national issue.

By the 1930s American lynch mobs had murdered nearly five thousand documented victims since the end of Reconstruction. Lynchings had occurred across the country during the late nineteenth century, claiming men and women of various racial and ethnic backgrounds. Yet as mob violence peaked at the turn of the century, lynching became an increasingly regional and racial phenomenon. From 1890 to 1910, southern legislatures enacted laws to segregate African Americans and strip them of their civil rights. Mob violence was an instrumental component of these white supremacy campaigns. White supremacists condoned or explicitly endorsed vigilante violence as a means of discouraging black political participation and resisting any semblance of racial equality. By the early twentieth century, the vast majority of lynchings occurred in the South, and nearly all the victims were black. While lynching is often associated with hanging, vigilantes frequently shot, stabbed, burned, and tortured their victims as well.

After an upsurge in mob violence during and immediately after World War I, the number of lynchings declined steadily throughout the 1920s. But as the United States sunk into the Great Depression at the end of the decade, racial tension and mob violence erupted across the South. There had been an average of ten lynchings per year in the late 1920s, yet thirty occurred in the first nine months of 1930 alone. Civil rights activists like Walter White blamed the resurgence on the economic crisis, arguing that southern whites had resorted to desperate measures to control black labor.

As lynchings surged in the early 1930s, the antilynching movement gained momentum. The NAACP had led the charge in this fight since its founding in 1909. During World War I the organization spearheaded a protest parade down Fifth Avenue in New York City. As many as ten thousand African Americans marched silently to the beat of muffled drums, carrying banners reading "Thou Shalt Not Kill" and "Give Us a Chance to Live." Behind the scenes, the organization lobbied congressmen to enact federal protections against mob violence. In 1918 Republican congressman Leonidas Dyer sponsored the first antilynching bill in American history. Four years later, the House of Representatives passed the Dyer bill despite the nearly unanimous opposition of its southern members.

That antilynching bill made it through the House, but it could not survive a Senate filibuster. After southern senators blocked the passage of the Dyer bill in 1922, Congress did not take up antilynching legislation again until 1934. While some African American activists hoped that the 1932 election of Franklin Delano Roosevelt as president signaled a new era for civil rights, the new president was reluctant to endorse the antilynching crusade. In a 1934 meeting at the White House, Roosevelt informed Walter White that he could not endorse any legislation that would alienate southern Democrats. "If I come out for the anti-lynching bill now," Roosevelt admitted, as recalled by White in A Man Called White, "they will block every bill I ask Congress to pass to keep America from collapsing. I just can't take that risk."

Roosevelt's unwillingness to publicly support antilynching legislation encouraged widespread apathy toward mob violence within the federal government. With Roosevelt reluctant to offend his southern white supporters, federal agencies took no steps to intervene in southern lynching cases. Civil rights laws passed during Reconstruction ostensibly protected southern African Americans from racial violence, but the Department of Justice made no attempts to prevent lynchings or prosecute mob members. The department's chief law-enforcement agency, the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), did not assist in a single lynching investigation during the 1930s.

Despite White's and others' mounting frustration with the federal government, the antilynching movement was gaining momentum by 1935, as the NAACP was working alongside civil rights groups, organized labor, and white southern women to rally public opposition to lynching. In early 1935 the organization sponsored "An Art Commentary on Lynching" at a New York City gallery. Gruesome exposés and scholarly studies of lynching fed public indignation. Contemporary polls revealed that even a significant percentage of white southerners favored legislation to stamp out lynching. But such promising shifts in public attitudes were meaningless without government action. By publishing articles like "U.S. Department of (White) Justice," Walter White hoped to spotlight governmental apathy and pressure federal authorities to stamp out lynching once and for all.

About the Author

Walter White was an influential journalist and civil rights activist who led the NAACP from 1929 until his death in 1955. Born on July 1, 1893, to a light-skinned Atlanta mail collector and his equally fair-complexioned wife, White enjoyed a relatively privileged upbringing among the city's black middle class. But this did not shield White from the racial violence that swept Atlanta in 1906. During the three-day race riot, White watched as marauding whites assaulted hundreds of African Americans and destroyed black property.

White never forgot that mob. After graduating from Atlanta University in 1916, the young insurance salesman threw himself into a local campaign to increase funding for black schools. Later that year, White wrote directly to the national headquarters of the NAACP, asking for its help in organizing an Atlanta chapter. Impressed by the young leader's energy and organizing skills, the NAACP executive secretary James Weldon Johnson invited White to join the national staff.

Thanks to his blond hair, blue eyes, and remarkable courage, White became the NAACP's secret weapon in its antilynching campaign. Less than two weeks after moving to New York to work at the national headquarters, White traveled south to investigate a lynching firsthand. Posing as a traveling salesman, White gathered gruesome details from local whites who had no idea they were speaking with a man of African ancestry. Over the next decade, White investigated dozens of lynchings and race riots at great personal risk. By the late 1920s he was one of the country's foremost authorities on lynching. He recounted his investigations in northern newspapers and national magazines. An active figure in the Harlem Renaissance, White published a novel, The Fire in the Flint (1924), and a nonfiction book, Rope and Faggot (1929), both based on his firsthand investigations of southern lynchings.

When Johnson retired from the NAACP in 1929, White assumed leadership of the organization as acting secretary. Two years later the NAACP made White's promotion permanent. During his long tenure as executive secretary, White enlisted powerful allies in NAACP campaigns against racial violence, discrimination, and segregation. The antilynching campaign was always close to White's heart, and he spent much of the 1930s lobbying Congress and federal officials to take action against mob violence. White died on March 21, 1955, after leading the NAACP for nearly three decades.

White opens "U.S. Department of (White) Justice" by stating that the Department of Justice has absolutely failed to protect African Americans from violence and discrimination. He argues that this negligence is not confined to lynching cases but is a much broader pattern of disregard for the plight of African Americans. White briefly mentions the refusal of the Department of Justice to intervene on behalf of southern blacks who could not vote because of discriminatory laws and intimidation tactics. During the 1930s southern blacks faced numerous obstacles at the ballot box, including literacy tests, understanding clauses, and poll taxes. White contends that federal agencies are moving slowly on civil rights because the Roosevelt administration is unwilling to do anything that would offend its white southern supporters. While White sees disfranchisement and segregation as part of the NAACP's broader civil rights campaign, he contends that the federal government has shown a particularly lax attitude toward mob violence in the South.

In the second paragraph, White reveals his journalistic skill and his experience as a lynching investigator. There was probably no one in the country more familiar with the patterns of mob violence in the South than Walter White. He believed that one of the most valuable weapons in the fight against lynching was to expose the harsh reality of southern lynchings. By revealing the gruesome details, the motives behind the murders, and the generally callous attitude of local authorities toward the killings, White hoped to convince the American public and federal officials that outside intervention was necessary to eliminate lynching.

The Tuscaloosa case that White describes reveals that local law enforcement officials played a part, perhaps knowingly, in the lynching. Typically, in the wake of a lynching, southern policemen would claim that they had done everything they could to prevent mob violence. They usually reported that the lynch mob had overpowered them, stolen the prisoners, and then left them tied up and blindfolded. But White points out that the police officers in Tuscaloosa showed callous disregard for the safety of the prisoner and played right into the hands of the waiting mob. The federal antilynching legislation that White and his allies demanded would have imposed stiff penalties on local law enforcement and government officials who failed to adequately protect prisoners from mobs. Therefore, it was very important that White point out instances where local authorities demonstrated negligence or even complicity in a lynching.

In paragraphs 3 and 4, White reveals that he and fellow activists have repeatedly lobbied the Department of Justice

1934

- December 13 NAACP members picket the National Crime Conference, sponsored by the Department of Justice, for refusing to place lynching on the agenda.

1935

- February 15 NAACP sponsors "An Art Commentary on Lynching" exhibit at a New York City gallery; the exhibit runs to March 2.
- March 12 A mob abducts Ab Young in southwestern Tennessee and lynches him in Slayden, Mississippi.
- October The Crisis, the NAACP's official monthly magazine, publishes Walter White's "U.S. Department of (White) Justice."

- February 21 Southern senators end a thirty-day filibuster of the Wagner–Van Nuys antilynching bill after its supporters agree to shelve the bill. It is the longest filibuster since 1893.

- January The new attorney general, Frank Murphy, establishes a Civil Liberties Unit within the U.S. Department of Justice. Two years later it is renamed the Civil Rights Section.

to investigate lynchings. By the 1930s White was the most recognizable black activist in Washington, D.C. He had enlisted the support of numerous congressmen and government officials in the antilynching campaign, but he had less success at the Department of Justice. Although federal statutes already existed that allowed the attorney general to prosecute the Tuscaloosa sheriff, White could not persuade a Justice Department official to meet with his delegation. Undeterred, White and his colleagues refused to leave the building until officials escorted them to see the attorney general in person. Yet they left with no commitment and waited months to hear back from the Department of Justice about their demands.

The fifth paragraph reveals the ingenuity and persistence of antilynching activists in using the legal system to their advantage. With no antilynching legislation on the books, the only way to justify federal prosecution of mob violence was to cite other laws that lynch mobs had violated. White had hoped that a revised version of a federal interstate kidnapping law would be broad enough to cover lynchings in which a mob carried a victim across state lines. This federal kidnapping law was named after the infant son of the aviator Charles Lindbergh, who had been kidnapped and murdered in early 1932. In paragraphs 6 10, White reveals that the same attorney general who had refused to investigate the Tuscaloosa lynching had agreed in principle to broader laws against interstate kidnapping. But when civil rights activists cited this revised law to urge the Department of Justice to investigate lynchings, the attorney general once again refused to take action.

White's discussion of the Lindbergh kidnapping law reveals the importance of litigation in the NAACP's civil rights activism. Before, during, and after White's tenure as executive secretary, the organization pursued a strategy that was primarily legal, focusing on laws and litigation to force government action on civil rights. Through a succession of lawsuits in the 1930s and 1940s, the NAACP won a series of school segregation cases that led to Brown v. Board of Education in 1954. The NAACP also used this strategy to combat disfranchisement laws and other discriminatory practices. The organization's antilynching campaign employed legal strategies as well. By using test cases, like the Curtis James lynching described in paragraph 12, the NAACP hoped to force the federal government to apply existing laws to civil rights violations.

In paragraphs 11 14, White describes how the Department of Justice evaded the NAACP's claim that the James lynching violated the expanded language of the recently revised Lindbergh law. White uses the department's own words to highlight the lengths that federal authorities are willing to go to avoid any involvement in a southern lynching case. White argues that Department of Justice officials are willfully misrepresenting existing laws and making excuses to justify their inaction. He points out that the Department of Justice is asking the NAACP to perform the duties that should be the responsibility of its own Federal Bureau of Investigation to gather facts in order to establish the basis for prosecution.

In paragraph 15, White mentions the lynching of Claude Neal. This particularly brutal incident made headlines across the country. The Neal lynching harked back to earlier decades, when local newspapers announced lynchings in advance and huge crowds turned out to watch. Local authorities had arrested Neal for raping and murdering a white woman and had carried him to an Alabama jail. A white mob abducted Neal and held him in an undisclosed location for two days, while newspapers in Alabama and Florida announced the upcoming lynching. On October 26, 1934, a crowd of three thousand gathered at a farm owned by the murdered woman's family. Much to their dismay, the mob killed Neal with a shotgun in a nearby forest after hours of torture. They then took Neal to the farm, where the gathered crowd defiled his body. Finally, the mob brought Neal's remains into Marianna and hung the body from a downtown tree.

This brutal and brazen incident made national headlines, and White saw an opportunity to rally public support for the antilynching campaign. But he also recognized that the Neal lynching was an ideal test case for the interstate kidnapping law. Authorities had apprehended the suspect in Florida and carried him to Alabama. The lynch mob had then kidnapped him and carried him back to the scene of his alleged crime in Florida. But before the NAACP could even request a federal investigation, the Department of Justice announced publicly that the Lindbergh law did not apply to lynching cases.

In paragraphs 16 22, White describes the NAACP's reaction to a highly publicized crime conference sponsored by the Department of Justice. Despite White's intensive lobbying and the upsurge in lynchings during the early 1930s, the Department of Justice refused to include mob violence on the agenda. Moreover, conference planners failed to invite representatives of any civil rights organizations to the conference to discuss their concerns. Even with the highly publicized lynching cases of recent years, conference participants seemed more concerned with gangsters and kidnappers.

Despite the cold shoulder from conference organizers, White notes a hopeful sign on the first night of the conference. In his keynote speech, President Roosevelt spoke out forcefully against lynching. Just a few months earlier, he had confided to White that he could not support antilynching legislation without offending his southern supporters. Faced with mounting pressure from antilynching activists, the president could not ignore lynching altogether. As Roosevelt rallied support for his New Deal programs, he walked a fine line between alienating his powerful southern allies and offending his growing number of African American supporters. His lynching statement at the crime conference was intended to reassure his black supporters without committing himself to any actions that would anger southern Democrats.

Despite the president's condemnation of lynching on the opening night of the conference, conference organizers continued to deny NAACP requests to put lynching on the agenda. White and his allies would not give up without a fight. When the Department of Justice denied repeated requests to address the lynching problem, civil rights activists took to the streets. The local NAACP prepared signs and started a picket line outside the Justice building. Local police responded by arresting the picketers, but the protest yielded tangible results. The attorney general invited African American representatives to participate in the conference and suggested that they could bring up lynching during an informal discussion session. When the conference coordinators backed off this promise, the local NAACP resumed its protest outside of the conference.

The willingness of the NAACP to stage peaceful protests reveals another dimension to the antilynching campaign. Decades before nonviolent protests hit the television screens, civil rights activists employed nonviolent measures to publicize their cause. In the antilynching protests outside the 1934 crime conference, activists carefully planned a public action that would dramatize the lynching problem. Because policemen had arrested early picketers under sign and parade laws, the second round of protestors planned a perfectly legal public action. Standing silently with lynching ropes looped around their necks and small signs pinned to their chests, the protestors forced the conference delegates to confront the reality of lynching even if they refused to discuss it. The protest stumped the local police and department officials, who could find no grounds on which to arrest the sixty protestors standing outside the conference. The spectacle finally forced the conference participants to adopt a vague resolution that did not name lynching specifically but conceded that racial violence was illegal and wrong.

In the closing three paragraphs, White makes clear that the moral victory at the crime conference did little to ease the bitterness and frustration of the antilynching movement. Less than three months after the conference, another lynching occurred that involved an interstate abduction. Vigilantes in southwestern Tennessee abducted Ab Young for killing a white highway worker. After crossing the border into Mississippi, they hanged him from a tree and riddled his body with bullets. The lynch mob tipped off a Memphis newspaper, which dispatched a reporter and photographer to the scene. Despite the well-documented mob murder, local authorities ruled that Young had died by hanging yet named no suspects. One local attorney even claimed that Young had hanged himself.

Essential Quotes

"The Department of Justice in Washington may lay claim to a 100 per cent performance in at least one branch of its activities—the evasion of cases involving burning questions of Negro rights."

(Paragraph 1)

"The crime of lynching was not even within the range of the department's vision."

"The attorney general continues his offensive against crime—except crimes involving the deprivation of life and liberty and citizenship to Negroes."

The phrase "at the hands of parties unknown" was a common one in southern lynching cases. Most southern whites refused to incriminate fellow whites for participating in mob violence. Even if they opposed lynchings and took steps to prevent mob violence in their communities, local authorities stopped short of singling out their friends and neighbors for punishment. White worked for years to expose this culture of secrecy and complicity, but southern whites continued to close ranks when outsiders criticized their handling of lynching cases.

White responded to the latest lynching by firing off yet another investigation request to both the Department of Justice and the White House. The NAACP received no reply. Despite years of relentless pressure to publicize lynchings and force a response from the federal government, White concludes his article with the bitter admission that the Department of Justice remained reluctant to use its enforcement powers to protect African Americans from mob violence.

Audience

Walter White wrote this article for publication in The Crisis, the NAACP's official monthly magazine. His immediate audience was the membership and supporters of the NAACP, including northern white liberals and other progressive allies. While this particular article appeared in an African American publication, White knew that it would also be quoted or reprinted in other newspapers and magazines. Earlier in his career, many white publications had refused to publish White's articles on lynching. But by 1935 White had recruited influential white allies. Mainstream newspapers and magazines followed suit, publishing articles similar to this one.

Throughout his antilynching work, White firmly believed in the power of publicity and exposure. He hoped that his writing would rally African Americans to the antilynching crusade and shock the white majority out of its complacency. He also hoped that the article would cross the desks of government officials who, either out of embarrassment or goodwill, might take steps to force action on lynching.

Impact

White was clearly skeptical that the Department of Justice would suddenly reverse its stance on lynching, but he firmly believed that the campaign against mob violence depended on publicity and propaganda. Every piece of literature he produced was meant to turn up the heat on government officials by increasing the public outcry against lynching. By the end of the 1930s, this undeniable public indignation forced antilynching legislation onto the congressional agenda despite President Roosevelt's ambivalence and southern politicians' opposition. Yet while public attitudes toward lynching had changed dramatically, powerful opposition to federal legislation remained; despite the intensive antilynching campaign waged by the NAACP, southern senators remained opposed to a federal antilynching law. When the Democratic senators Frederick Van Nuys and Robert Wagner introduced a new bill in January 1938, southern senators filibustered for nearly seven weeks straight. Like every antilynching bill before and since, the Wagner Van Nuys bill failed in the face of southern opposition.

While Congress never passed an antilynching bill, the spotlight that White and his allies fixed on the problem of mob violence yielded tangible results. In addition to mobilizing public sentiment against lynching, White's relentless pressure forced government officials to take their first halting steps toward combating racial violence. In 1939 the Department of Justice set up a Civil Liberties Unit, which was renamed the Civil Rights Section two years later. In 1942 the Federal Bureau of Investigation for the first time dispatched agents to the site of a lynching that of Cleo Wright in Sikeston, Missouri. Roosevelt's successor, Harry Truman, believed that lynching was not only a moral outrage but also a diplomatic nightmare for the United States. Convinced that racial violence weakened the country's prestige and influence in the world, Truman made the elimination of lynching a cornerstone of his unprecedented civil rights program in 1948. Southern senators continued to thwart such legislation, but the isolated lynchings of the 1950s and 1960s drew global condemnation and even resulted in a few federally assisted criminal convictions. Walter White did more than any other activist to bring about this slow but significant transformation in public attitudes toward mob violence. No single person was more influential in making lynching a national political issue, and articles like "U.S. Department of (White) Justice" were a crucial part of White's crusade.

Questions for Further Study

1. Using this document in combination with John Edward Bruce's "Organized Resistance Is Our Best Remedy," Ida B. Wells-Barnett's "Lynch Law in America," and Haywood Patterson and Earl Conrad's Scottsboro Boy, summarize the history of lynching and other forms of violence against African Americans in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

2. What economic conditions factored into the upsurge in lynchings and violence against African Americans in the 1930s?

3. What political circumstances prevented President Franklin D. Roosevelt from lending his full support to an antilynching law?

4. If lynching is murder, why were laws against murder inadequate in dealing with the problem of lynching? Put differently, what specific tools would a federal antilynching law have put into the hands of law-enforcement officials?

5. In light of the fact that no federal antilynching bill was ever passed, do you believe that White's essay, along with similar documents by other writers, ultimately had an effect? Explain.

Walter F. White's "U.S. Department of (White) Justice"

The Department of Justice in Washington may lay claim to a 100 per cent performance in at least one branch of its activities the evasion of cases involving burning questions of Negro rights. It sidestepped the issue of the exclusion of Negroes from southern elections on the ground that it was loaded with political dynamite. Other legalistic reasons were later added but the first orders to "Go Slow" were placed on purely political grounds. On the lynching issue the department has set a new record for its ability to dodge from one excuse to another.

On June 6, 1933, a white girl was murdered near Tuscaloosa, Alabama, and shortly thereafter three Negro boys were thrown in jail on suspicion of the murder. On August 12, 1933, the sheriff of Tuscaloosa county unlawfully under color of authority took it upon himself to order their removal from Tuscaloosa to Birmingham "for safekeeping." The sheriff's deputies started at night for Birmingham in two automobiles: two deputies and the boys in the leading car, and a car full of deputies trailing behind. The sheriff ordered the convoy to take a back road because, as the deputies later testified, he did not want to risk the convoy being overtaken by a mob on the highway. When the convoy reached the Tuscaloosa county line, the trailing car turned back, leaving the first car with the boys in it to make the rest of the journey alone. Two miles across the county line the car with the boys in it was met, not overtaken, by other cars full of masked men. The boys were taken out, riddled with bullets, and two of them killed. The Southern Association for the Prevention of Lynching made an investigation which found the sheriff culpable.

A delegation made up of representatives from several national organizations on August 24 called at the Department of Justice pursuant to [an] appointment made with William Stanley, executive assistant to Attorney General Homer S. Cummings, who had promised to receive it in the absence of the attorney general, to request the department to investigate the lynching and prosecute the offending sheriff under Revised Statutes 5510 which makes it a federal offense to deprive an inhabitant of any state of any rights, privileges or immunities secured or protected by the federal Constitution under color of law or custom. But although Stanley had made the appointment himself, when the delegation arrived at the department, Stanley was not present, had sent no excuse for his absence, and investigation disclosed that he had not even entered the appointment on his calendar pad.

The delegation was so indignant that the officials of the department four hours later carried them in to see the attorney general himself. The attorney general was suave; he would make no commitment; he called for a brief. Accordingly a thorough brief was filed with the department October 13, 1933, and Stanley stated that he would let the delegation know the decision of the department by November 1. Actually he kept the delegation in suspense until March 5, 1934, although months before both he and the attorney general had told Roger N. Baldwin of the American Civil Liberties Union that the department did not intend to take any action in the case.

In the meanwhile a bill amending the original Lindbergh kidnaping law of 1932 had been introduced in Congress. The 1932 act had made kidnaping a federal offense where the kidnaped person was knowingly transported in interstate or foreign commerce and "held for ransom or reward." The amendment to the 1932 act proposed to broaden the scope of federal jurisdiction and make kidnaping a federal offense when the person kidnaped was knowingly transported in interstate or foreign commerce and "held for ransom or reward or otherwise" (italics ours). It also proposed that there should be a prima facie presumption that the person kidnaped had been carried across the state line unless released within three days.

While the bill was before the Senate judiciary committee the attorney general submitted a memorandum to the committee in support of the amendment as follows:

"This amendment adds thereto (to the Lindbergh Act of 1932) the word 'otherwise'.... The object of the word 'otherwise' is to extend the jurisdiction of this act to persons who have been kidnaped and held, not only for reward but for any other reason.

"In addition this bill adds a proviso to the Lindbergh Act that in the absence of the return of the person kidnaped ... during a period of three days the presumption arises that such person has been transported in interstate or foreign commerce, but such presumption is not conclusive.

"I believe that this is a sound amendment which will clear up border line cases, justifying federal investigation in most of such cases and assuring the validity of federal prosecution in numerous instances in which such prosecution would be questionable under the present form of this act" (italics ours).

In other words, at this stage the attorney general placed the Department of Justice squarely behind the amendment, giving to its provisions the broadest possible interpretation. But as soon as questions of lynching were raised, the attorney general abandoned his broad construction and began hopping from one position to another to avoid taking jurisdiction.

The bill passed Congress and became enacted into law June 22, 1934, with all the provisions of the amendment adopted except that the time within which a kidnaped person had to be held for presumption of an interstate transportation to arise was increased from three days to seven; and certain other changes not here material.

On October 4, 1934, one Curtis James' house was broken into near Darien, Georgia, about fifty miles from the Florida line, and James, a Negro, shot and abducted by a mob. In spite of an intensive search he was not found. After waiting more than the seven days provided by the amended Lindbergh law, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People on October 15 wrote the Department of Justice asking whether the abductors of James could not be prosecuted under the amended Lindbergh law. Under date of October 20 the department replied:

"… there is nothing to indicate that the person alleged to have been kidnaped was transported in interstate commerce and was held for ransom, reward or otherwise. In the absence of these facts establishing these elements it would seem that the matter would be one entirely for the authorities of the State of Georgia…"

It is interesting that in the James case the Department of Justice recognized that a lynching case might be covered under the words "or otherwise" of the amended Lindbergh act, but it dodged jurisdiction by repudiating the presumption. In short the department deliberately ignored the fact that not returning James within seven days created a presumption that there had been an interstate kidnaping, and thereby gave the federal government jurisdiction over the crime. It demanded that the N.A.A.C.P. substitute itself for the department's own Bureau of Investigation and produce the facts establishing an interstate kidnaping.

Then on October 26, 1934, a Negro named Claude Neal was kidnaped from the jail in Brewton, Alabama, by a mob which came to the scene in automobiles bearing Florida licenses. Neal was transported across the Alabama line into Florida, held for fifteen hours and then murdered after unspeakable barbarities near Marianna, Florida. The N.A.A.C.P. felt that at last it had a perfect case for federal prosecution, but before it could even get a letter to the Department of Justice requesting an investigation, the department had issued a public statement that the words "or otherwise" in the amended Lindbergh law did not cover the case of lynching. Faced by the indisputable fact of an interstate kidnaping, the department was forced to the position that the amend[ed] Lindbergh law covered kidnaping for purposes of gain, but not for purposes of murder.

With loud fan-fare and carefully staged publicity, on November 7, 1934, the attorney general announced to the country a National Crime Conference called by him in Washington, December 10-13, 1934, "to give broad and practical consideration to the problem of crime" including causes and prevention of crime; investigation; detection and apprehension of crime and criminals. A comprehensive and distinguished list of delegates, including bar associations, was invited; but no Negro associations. On November 9 the N.A.A.C.P. wrote the attorney general asking whether lynching would be placed on the conference agendum. On November 16 the department replied:

"… the program for the conference has not as yet been completed, obviously it will be impossible to cover all the phases of the crime problem in the short space of three days. No definite decision has been made with reference to the subject of lynching. I wish to thank you, however, for bringing this matter to our attention."

The crime of lynching was not even within the range of the department's vision.

No word came from the department concerning its decision whether to place lynching on the conference agendum, so on November 22 the N.A.A.C.P. wired the attorney general inquiring whether the decision had been made, and what. The department replied November 27 that "it was not probable that the subject of lynching will be given place on program of Crime Conference." Repeated efforts were made by local representatives of N.A.A.C.P. to see the Department of Justice in an attempt to obtain a reconsideration of the decision not to place lynching on the agendum, but the department remained unmoved.

Finally on the opening night of the conference when President Roosevelt made his key-note speech and roundly denounced lynching as one of the major crimes confronting this country, another wire was sent the attorney general asking in view of the President's pronouncement whether he would not at that date place lynching on the agendum. No reply was received the following morning, so at 12:30 P. M. that day the District of Columbia branch of the N.A.A.C.P. began to picket the Crime Conference.

The pickets were arrested almost as soon as they appeared and charged with violation of the District of Columbia sign law and parading without a permit. But that afternoon at 2:25 P. M. the branch received a telegram from the attorney general stating that although there was no room for a discussion of lynching on the formal agendum of the conference, there was a discussion period after each session and that if a discussion period were free, he hoped that the subject of lynching would be taken up on the floor. He further invited a delegation consisting of representatives of the local colored bar association to membership in the conference.

In spite of this action by the attorney general however, the chairman of the conference announced that the discussion period would be limited to the papers read on the formal agendum at the particular session. Under the circumstances the District of Columbia branch of the N.A.A.C.P. decided to resume the picketing.

On the last day of the conference, December 13, just before the morning session adjourned, about sixty pickets suddenly appeared on the sidewalk in front of the convention hall, and silently took up prearranged stations about ten feet apart, stretching all the way from the entrance of the hall about three squares along the street the delegates had to use in leaving the conference. To avoid the sign law which prohibited signs twelve inches or over, the pickets carried signs across their breasts eleven inches wide. Ropes were looped around their necks to symbolize lynching. To avoid the charge of parading, each picket remained silent and stationary. The police were taken completely by surprise. To add to the confusion of the police the pickets were provided with a mimeographed sheet of instructions, one of which read that if anybody bothered them they were to call on the police for protection, as the police would not arrest them if they were not violating any law, since to do so would subject the police to an action for damages. The police fumed; an attorney for the Department of Justice hurriedly left to consult the law and find grounds for arresting the pickets, but never returned. That afternoon the conference, smoked out beyond the point of endurance, adopted a completely inane and harmless resolution condemning the use of illegal means in disposing of matters arousing racial antagonisms. The attorney general held both his peace and his hand.

Finally March 12, 1935, a Negro, Ab Young, was lynched near Slayden, Mississippi, allegedly for shooting a white man. Young had been seized in Tennessee, and taken across the line into Mississippi for the ceremonies. Memphis news reporters were on hand either by accident or previous notice.

The N.A.A.C.P. telegraphed both the attorney general and the President of the United States asking for investigation and prosecution under the amended Lindbergh law. To date it is still awaiting a reply. The coroner's jury returned a verdict that Young had died at the hands of parties unknown.

The attorney general continues his offensive against crime except crimes involving the deprivation of life and liberty and citizenship to Negroes.

Mary McLeod Bethune's "What Does American Democracy Mean to Me?"

"The democratic doors of equal opportunity have not been opened wide to Negroes."

Overview

On the evening of November 23, 1939, Mary McLeod Bethune was part of a panel discussion on America's Town Meeting of the Air, a weekly public affairs broadcast on NBC Radio one of the nation's first "talk radio" programs revolving around the title question "What Does American Democracy Mean to Me?" Bethune was eminently qualified to join the panel that evening. She was the founder of a school that evolved into the modern-day Bethune-Cookman University. She was a past president of the National Association of Colored Women and the founder of the National Council of Negro Women. She was also a key figure in the Black Cabinet, or, more formally, the Federal Council on Negro Affairs, an advisory group that kept the administration of President Franklin Roosevelt apprised of the concerns of the black community. She delivered her remarks during what would prove to be the tail end of the Great Depression, a time when African American workers faced enormous challenges. Looming on the horizon was American entry into World War II, which had started less than three months earlier with the German invasion of Poland. As Americans vigorously discussed issues involving the direction the country should take, both economically and militarily, the topic of the panel that evening was particularly timely.

Two major historical developments formed the cultural backdrop for Bethune's speech (which was less a speech and more a sort of script for her remarks as part of the broadcast panel). One was the ongoing Great Depression; the other was the threat of American involvement in war, a threat that would materialize when the United States entered World War II after the bombing of the U.S. Navy base at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, in December 1941.

The Great Depression began in 1929, marking the end of the Roaring Twenties, a decade of prosperity in the United States. Through the 1930s, the nation's income dropped by half, while unemployment was a major scourge: At the height of the depression, some 25 percent of the total labor force was unemployed, but among black Americans the figure was as high as 50 percent, particularly in urban areas. During the depression, it was almost impossible for black Americans to find work. Many southern blacks had been able to squeeze out a living as sharecroppers, but when the price of cotton dropped from eighteen cents per pound in the late 1920s to six cents per pound in 1933, many sharecroppers were forced off their land. Worse, mechanical cotton pickers were replacing black labor. Many displaced black agricultural workers took refuge in cities, where they faced animosity from the white labor forces and labor unions, which saw the influx of blacks as a threat to whatever few job opportunities existed.

African Americans were initially suspicious of President Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal, a package of legislation whose goal was to put Americans to work in an assortment of federal agencies. Indeed, provisions in these agencies perpetuated a pattern of discrimination against black workers, leading many to refer to Roosevelt's New Deal as a "raw deal." A good example of a measure that hurt African American interests was the 1933 Agricultural Adjustment Act. At the time, most black farmers did not own their land but farmed as tenants, or sharecroppers. As a way of increasing farm income, the government paid farmers incentives to leave land fallow, which would decrease crop supplies and presumably drive up prices. Accordingly, southern landowners fired their black tenant farmers, as fewer crops meant that fewer farmers were needed. These kinds of problems led John Preston Davis to write "A Black Inventory of the New Deal," a scathing indictment of Roosevelt's programs published in May 1935 in The Crisis, the magazine of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). His essay called on African Americans to forge their own solutions to their economic condition rather than relying on a government that had failed to help them. That month, disaffected black intellectuals and activists held a conference at Howard University, in Washington, D.C., during which most presenters attacked New Deal programs for their adverse impacts on African Americans. Frustrated blacks in Harlem had rioted in March that year, indicating growing dissatisfaction with the government's ability to deal with African American poverty. In response to this sort of societal alarm, Robert Clifton Weaver, one of Bethune's colleagues on Roosevelt's

By 1939, the year of Bethune's radio remarks, African Americans were beginning to benefit somewhat from New Deal programs. Their income from public sector employment, for example, was almost as large as their income in the private sector. Some of this modest growth in black income came at the hands of the union movement. The chief obstacle for black workers had been the American Federation of Labor, which had supported discriminatory practices in the labor unions that were part of the federation. In 1935 the American Federation of Labor did grant a charter to the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, a union made up almost entirely of blacks founded by A. Philip Randolph a decade earlier. But in 1936 a rival group, soon known as the Congress of Industrial Organizations, was formed, in part, to organize black as well as white workers. Aided by such organizations as the National Urban League and the NAACP, the Congress of Industrial Organizations organized new unions, such as the Packinghouse Workers Organizing Committee, the United Automobile Workers, and the Steel Workers Organizing Committee. Meanwhile, in 1937 the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters reached a landmark agreement with the Pullman Company, which operated the railway coaches on which black porters and maids worked.

African American workers and civil rights organizations took additional steps to improve the plight of black workers. The Urban League and the NAACP, for example, played a key role in the formation of the Joint Committee on National Recovery in 1933. The committee's goal was to bring inequities in New Deal programs to the public's attention, for example, by spearheading "Don't Buy Where You Can't Work" campaigns to boycott businesses that operated in black communities but would not employ black workers in any but menial jobs. Pressure from the Citizens' League for Fair Play forced the New York City Chamber of Commerce and other citywide organizations to promote the hiring of blacks in higher-paying retail jobs. In the rural South, black workers were joining such organizations as the Southern Tenant Farmers Union, a Socialist group, and the Alabama Sharecroppers Union, a Communist one. In Birmingham, Alabama, black workers were drawn to the League of Struggle for Negro Rights.

On the political front, African Americans were changing party allegiance. Traditionally they had supported the Republican Party, the party of Abraham Lincoln and emancipation. But during the Great Depression, black political affiliation began to shift as the Democratic Roosevelt administration appointed dozens of blacks to New Deal agencies. Many of these people joined to create the Federal Council on Negro Affairs, known informally as the Black Cabinet. As a member of the Black Cabinet, Bethune, who herself had been a Republican, championed Roosevelt's programs. In 1935 hundreds of civil rights leaders joined to form the National Negro Congress with the goal of uniting some six hundred fraternal, civil rights, and church organizations under a single umbrella to improve the economic and social position of African Americans.

Despite some progress, the position of unemployed African American workers in the late 1930s remained tenuous. The nation was emerging from the depression, in part because of increased defense spending, which allowed white workers to return to full-time employment, but black workers were continuing to rely on public sector jobs and relief programs.

Equally important, though, were the war clouds gathering over the horizon. For several years Americans had been watching with unease certain developments in Europe as well as the Far East. One was the rise of Adolf Hitler, who seized power in 1933 as Germany's chancellor. In the months and years that followed, Hitler consolidated his power. The Reichstag Fire Decree curtailed civil liberties; the Law against the Establishment of Parties made Nazi Germany a one-party state. Hitler eliminated his rivals within the Nazi Party during the "Night of the Long Knives" at the end of June 1934. Through these years, Hitler and his supporters launched their persecution of Jews, Communists, trade unionists, and political opponents. In defiance of the Treaty of Versailles, which ended Germany's participation in World War I, Hitler remilitarized the nation. He formed alliances with the Soviet Union, led by Joseph Stalin; Fascist Italy, which invaded Ethiopia in 1935; and imperialist Japan, which was flexing its muscles in the Pacific and invaded China in 1937. China fought back against Japan with help from the United States and the Soviet Union, which in turn joined the Allies in the fight against Germany. Hitler, in the meantime, merged German-speaking Austria with Germany and grabbed the German-speaking Sudetenland region of Czechoslovakia. Few were surprised when he launched World War II in Europe with the invasion of Poland on September 1, 1939.

Americans vigorously debated the question of American participation in the war. Isolationists and antiwar activists argued that the war was Europe's war, and the United States had no business taking part. Others, including Roosevelt himself, knew that American entry into the war was inevitable. At the same time, Americans watched the rise of Communism in the Soviet Union. Many American intellectuals, disgusted with the apparent failures of capitalism that had led to the Great Depression, were drawn to the ideology of Communism and the Soviet Union. Prominent among them were black intellectuals such as W. E. B. Du Bois and Paul Robeson, who traveled to the Soviet Union and came to believe that the Communist state did not carry the same burden of racism that the United States did. Mainstream Americans, however, regarded Communism as an alien ideology and were growing to fear the might and influence of the Soviets.

Thus, when the panel of participants was formed to address the personal question "What does American democracy mean to me?" the overarching universal questions of American democracy regarding its origins, its role in the world, its ideological underpinnings, its response to Fascism and Communism, and its future were already topics of intense discussion throughout the nation. Mary McLeod Bethune articulated a response to this question from an African American perspective.

About the Author

Mary Jane McLeod was born near Mayesville, South Carolina, on July 10, 1875. She was the fifteenth of seventeen children born to Samuel and Patsy McLeod, both former slaves; most of her siblings had been born into slavery. Her mother worked for her former owner, while her father worked on a nearby cotton plantation. From an early age, Mary exhibited a desire to learn to read and go to school. One of her earliest formative experiences was an encounter with a white girl who commanded her, "Put down that book. You can't read." Determined to prove the girl wrong, she enrolled at the one-room Trinity Mission School, run by the Presbyterian Church, when it opened. At the urging of her teacher, she enrolled at Scotia Seminary (now Barber-Scotia College) in Concord, North Carolina, in 1888. After completing her degree in 1894, McLeod moved to Chicago to attend Dwight Moody's Institute for Home and Foreign Missions (now Moody Bible College). Her earliest goal was to become a missionary in Africa, but after being told that there was no call for black missionaries there, she decided to embark on a teaching career, which included stints at the school she had attended as a child; at the Haines Normal and Industrial Institute in Augusta, Georgia; and at the Kindell Institute in Sumter, South Carolina. In 1898 she married Albertus Bethune, who left her in 1907 and died in 1918.

In 1899 Bethune was persuaded to relocate to Florida to run a mission school. During this time she supplemented her income by selling life insurance. But in 1904 she launched efforts to establish her own school for girls. She rented a house (for ten dollars a month), gathered discarded and donated materials, built desks out of old packing crates, and formed the Educational and Industrial Training School for Negro Girls in Daytona Beach, initially with six students and cash on hand of one dollar and fifty cents. She continued to scrounge for donations, securing a substantial grant from the industrialist John D. Rockefeller, and she persuaded prominent white men in the bustling economic climate of Daytona Beach to sit on the school's board of directors. The school had over a hundred students by 1910 and more than three hundred by 1920. In 1923 the school, now called the Daytona Normal and Industrial Institute for Negro Girls, completed the process of merging with the Cookman Institute for Men of Jacksonville to become the Daytona-Cookman Collegiate Institute. In 1929 the coeducational institution was renamed Bethune-Cookman College. Bethune served as president of the college until 1942. As of the twenty-first century, the school, which achieved university status in 2007, has some four thousand students on a seventy-acre campus and an operating budget of $50 million.

Bethune's career continued to evolve after the establishment of Bethune-Cookman College. From 1917 to 1925 she served as the Florida chapter president of the National Association of Colored Women, using her position to register black voters. She also served as the president of the Southeastern Federation of Colored Women's Clubs from 1920 to 1925. With these positions on her résumé, she was named national president of the National Association of Colored Women in 1924. Then, in 1935, Bethune founded the National Council of Negro Women in New York City. The council brought together twenty-eight organizations to form a united voice that would work to improve the quality of life for women and their communities. In 1936 Bethune earned a position in the National Youth Administration, a New Deal agency in Franklin Roosevelt's administration whose goal was to increase educational and occupational opportunities for young people. Two years later, in 1938, she was appointed director of the administration's Division of Negro Affairs, making her the first black woman to head a federal agency. Also that year, Bethune's National Council of Negro Women played host to the White House Conference on Negro Women and Children. The goal of the conference was to highlight the democratic roles of black women, which would later include providing opportunities for black women as officers in the Women's Army Corps during World War II.

Bethune was a close friend to President Franklin Roosevelt and, particularly, First Lady Eleanor Roosevelt. This friendship gave her access to the White House, and she used that access to help form the Federal Council on Negro Affairs, commonly known as the Black Cabinet. This was an informal group made up primarily of a number of prominent African Americans who worked in various federal government agencies. The Black Cabinet's role was to function in an advisory capacity, keeping the administration informed about the concerns of black Americans while at the same time demonstrating to African American voters that the Roosevelt administration heard those concerns. Late in her life Bethune wrote weekly editorial columns for black newspapers such as the Chicago Defender and the Pittsburgh Courier.

Bethune was known almost as much for her personal manner as for her achievements. On the Black Cabinet she was referred to affectionately as "Ma Bethune." A matronly figure even in her thirties, she took to walking with a cane not because she needed it but because, she said, it gave her "swank." She was a teetotaler one who does not consume alcohol and often approached drunken men in the street to chastise them. Her peers said that she was able to assume a kind of feminine helplessness that concealed a ruthlessness about getting what she wanted. She also possessed an uncanny knack for bringing blacks and whites together. One noteworthy example was her investment in a stretch of private beach in Daytona Beach, where blacks barred from other beaches mingled with whites.

Bethune was the recipient of numerous honors, including the Spingarn Medal, an award given by the NAACP for outstanding achievement. She was the only black woman present at the founding of the United Nations in 1948, co-representing the NAACP. After her death on May 18, 1955, she was inducted into the National Women's Hall of Fame in 1973. Numerous schools throughout the United States are named in her honor.

At under six hundred words, Bethune's remarks were appropriately brief for a radio audience. She begins by saying that for the nation's twelve million blacks, democracy remained a goal, not something that had been fully achieved. (The total population then was just under 132 million.) She cites her Christian faith, which told her that African Americans were "rising out of the darkness of slavery into the light of freedom." She points out that progress has been made; dramatically more African Americans were literate, and significant numbers owned and operated their own farms. She notes that blacks had moved from being "chattels" that is, property to full contributors to American culture. In the second paragraph she cites some prominent African American artists and intellectuals, including Paul Laurence Dunbar, perhaps the first black American poet to achieve national recognition; Booker T. Washington, the founder of the Tuskegee Institute in Alabama; the singer Marian Anderson, who, with the backing of Eleanor Roosevelt, gave an open-air concert on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial in Washington, D.C., on Easter Sunday that year (having been refused access to Constitution Hall by the Daughters of the American Revolution); and George Washington Carver, a scientist and educator who was a model of the kind of frugality and humanitarianism that Bethune preached as an educator.

In the third paragraph, Bethune points to some of the inequalities that remained. She notes, for example, that in the South black youth lacked the same educational opportunities afforded to white youth. An examination of spending patterns of that era shows that per-student budgets for black schools were actually worse than Bethune indicates: as little as one-twentieth of those for white schools. She also points out that blacks were often barred from labor unions and forced to accept the most poorly paid menial work. Additionally, blacks continued to be denied civil rights, including the right to vote. They too often lived in squalid housing, and they continued to fear the lynch mob.

In paragraph 4, Bethune acknowledges that the black community had sometimes been slow to assume the burdens of civic responsibility, but she notes, too, that it had done so because it had been denied full equality. Perhaps making reference to the growing threat of war, she asserts that "we have always been loyal when the ideals of American democracy have been attacked." As an example she cites Crispus Attucks, a man of African and Native American descent who was slain in the Boston Massacre. And, in a reference to World War I, she comments that blacks had shed blood on the battlefields of France. Part of the fight, however, had been for civil liberties, particularly the right to vote. She alludes to the Declaration of Independence when she states, "We have fought to preserve one nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal." According to Bethune, America had imperfections, yet African Americans always fought for what they knew the nation could become. She stresses this point in the final paragraph, where she looks forward to a time when blacks and whites could work shoulder to shoulder for "a new birth of freedom" in the hope "that government of the people, for the people and by the people shall not perish from the earth" words of Abraham Lincoln from the Gettysburg Address of 1863.

Audience

Bethune's address was aired live on NBC Radio, a broadcasting company that had emerged out of a complex set of business relationships and a period of vigorous competition involving the Radio Corporation of America (known as RCA), Westinghouse Electric, American Telephone & Telegraph, and various independent radio stations as well as other corporations. As early as the 1920s NBC Radio, originally seen as a marketing device for RCA's radio equipment, was attracting a huge listening audience with its serial programming, including the mass hit Amos 'n' Andy. The Great Depression boosted demand for radio, which provided people with an inexpensive form of entertainment. NBC Radio emerged as the industry leader by compiling a lineup of highly popular performers, including Al Jolson, Jack Benny, Edgar Bergen, Fred Allen, and Bob Hope. NBC Radio also helped created the NBC Symphony Orchestra under the direction of the famed musician Arturo Toscanini. Popular programs during the depression era included Fibber McGee and Molly, One Man's Family, Ma Perkins, and Death Valley Days. Because NBC affiliate stations were often the most powerful in their markets, they reached broad audiences, particularly at night, when their signals traveled thousands of miles farther than they did during the day.

Thus, a program such as America's Town Meeting of the Air, on which Bethune delivered her remarks, reached a large coast-to-coast audience. That program, one of America's first talk-radio shows, had been launched on May 30, 1935; its topic that night was "Which Way America: Fascism, Communism, Socialism or Democracy?" The program's format was to assemble a group of experts to discuss a topic selected by the moderator George V. Denny, Jr., the executive director of the League for Political Education, which produced the program. The goal of the program was to use modern technology to recreate the feel of a town meeting for a scattered audience, in this way involving a variety of citizens from across the nation in discussion of important public issues. Always present in the studio for the program was a live audience, which alternately cheered or booed in reaction to the speakers. Audience members were also allowed to ask questions; many openly challenged the viewpoints of the panelists and even mocked them or called them names. By 1936 listeners were able to call into the show, and they, too, often responded to what they were hearing with great vigor, sometimes expressing highly inflammatory views.

Impact

One measure of the popularity of America's Town Meeting of the Air was the amount of fan mail its host, Denny, received generally about two thousand to four thousand letters per week, a remarkable number for a political program at that time. Also, throughout the country, many people formed "listener clubs": People would gather to listen to the broadcast and then discuss the topic among themselves. Yet another measure of the show's popularity was civics teachers' interest in using the program's content in their classes; for this reason, Denny condensed what panelists said into pamphlet form and distributed the pamphlets to teachers. In sum, America's Town Meeting of the Air was a popular and widespread part of the nation's political discourse when Bethune delivered her remarks in 1939, and many thousands of people likely heard them.

To assess any particular impact borne by Bethune's remarks, of course, would be difficult. But her eloquent and inspired voice was part of a swelling chorus of African American voices in this era that were calling for a nationwide reappraisal of segregation and discrimination. Journalists and authors such as Walter White were documenting the often-oppressive circumstances of African Americans. Charles Hamilton Houston, as special counsel for the NAACP, was launching a legal campaign to end discrimination and inequity in the nation's schools. A. Philip Randolph, president of the National Negro Congress and head of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters labor union, was lobbying for access for African Americans to jobs in the growing defense industry. These and other prominent public figures were impressing on the Roosevelt administration the need to take steps to end segregation, and their efforts began to bear fruit. In 1941 Roosevelt issued Executive Order 8802, banning discrimination in hiring by the federal government and in the defense industries. His successor, President Harry S. Truman, ended segregation in the armed forces with Executive Order 9981, issued in 1948. The far-reaching educational and political efforts of Mary McLeod Bethune contributed significantly to the progress of African Americans through the World War II era and beyond.

Questions for Further Study

1. What international events might have made the topic of Bethune's remarks of particular interest to her radio listeners?

2. What was the Black Cabinet? What role did it play in the administration of President Franklin Roosevelt?

3. Read this document in conjunction with Marian Anderson's My Lord, What a Morning. Imagine a discussion between Bethune and Anderson about the position and progress of African Americans in the 1930s. Would they have seen matters in the same way? How might their views have differed?

4. Imagine that Bethune was in a position to defend the viewpoints either of John P. Davis in "A Black Inventory of the New Deal" or of Robert Clifton Weaver in "The New Deal and the Negro: A Look at the Facts." Which side of the debate would she most likely have supported? Why?

5. Imagine that you attend a school where you are required to use desks made of old packing crates, similar to the kinds of facilities Bethune had when she formed the Educational and Industrial Training School for Negro Girls. What would your reaction be? What do you think the reaction of your parents or guardians would be? What lessons can be learned today about school funding as well as about the deep desire for education a century or more ago?

Democracy is for me, and for 12 million black Americans, a goal towards which our nation is marching. It is a dream and an ideal in whose ultimate realization we have a deep and abiding faith. For me, it is based on Christianity, in which we confidently entrust our destiny as a people. Under God's guidance in this great democracy, we are rising out of the darkness of slavery into the light of freedom. Here my race has been afforded [the] opportunity to advance from a people 80 percent illiterate to a people 80 percent literate; from abject poverty to the ownership and operation of a million farms and 750,000 homes; from total disfranchisement to participation in government; from the status of chattels to recognized contributors to the American culture.

As we have been extended a measure of democracy, we have brought to the nation rich gifts. We have helped to build America with our labor, strengthened it with our faith and enriched it with our song. We have given you Paul Laurence Dunbar, Booker T. Washington, Marian Anderson and George Washington Carver. But even these are only the first fruits of a rich harvest, which will be reaped when new and wider fields are opened to us.

The democratic doors of equal opportunity have not been opened wide to Negroes. In the Deep South, Negro youth is offered only one-fifteenth of the educational opportunity of the average American child. The great masses of Negro workers are depressed and unprotected in the lowest levels of agriculture and domestic service, while the black workers in industry are barred from certain unions and generally assigned to the more laborious and poorly paid work. Their housing and living conditions are sordid and unhealthy. They live too often in terror of the lynch mob; are deprived too often of the Constitutional right of suffrage; and are humiliated too often by the denial of civil liberties. We do not believe that justice and common decency will allow these conditions to continue.

Our faith in visions of fundamental change as mutual respect and understanding between our races come in the path of spiritual awakening. Certainly there have been times when we may have delayed this mutual understanding by being slow to assume a fuller share of our national responsibility because of the denial of full equality. And yet, we have always been loyal when the ideals of American democracy have been attacked. We have given our blood in its defense from Crispus Attucks on Boston Commons to the battlefields of France. We have fought for the democratic principles of equality under the law, equality of opportunity, equality at the ballot box, for the guarantees of life, liberty and the pursuit of hap-

"If American democracy will not insure equality of opportunity, freedom and justice to its citizens, black and white, it is a hollow mockery."

Overview

In the May 1941 issue of Black Worker, A. Philip Randolph, a prominent civil rights leader in his capacity as president of the National Negro Congress and head of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters labor union, issued a call for African Americans to march on Washington, D.C., to demand an end to discrimination in the defense industry and in the military. His call, made in cooperation with the civil rights leaders Bayard Rustin and A. J. Muste, initiated the March on Washington Movement, which lasted until 1947. This movement influenced future civil rights leaders such as Martin Luther King, Jr., who joined with Randolph in 1963 to organize the historic March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom (where King made his famous "I Have a Dream" speech). Randolph's "call to Negro America" took place in the context of America's transition from the Great Depression of the 1930s to the wartime economy that would employ millions of industrial workers during World War II.

Ultimately, the march Randolph envisioned never took place. Under pressure from civil rights leaders and out of his recognition that the United States would need all the manpower it could muster in the coming years, President Franklin Delano Roosevelt issued an executive order banning racial discrimination in the defense industries and in the federal government. Accordingly, the number of African Americans employed in defense industries and government swelled, although the armed forces remained segregated throughout World War II. It would fall to Roosevelt's successor, President Harry S. Truman, to desegregate the military by executive order in 1948 in large part because of the efforts of the Committee against Jim Crow in Military Service and Training, which Randolph founded.

Context

The Great Depression, which began in 1929, marked the end of an era of prosperity in the United States. Throughout the 1930s, the nation's income dropped by half. At the height of the depression, an estimated 25 percent of the total labor force was unemployed, but among black Americans the figure was as high as 50 percent, especially in urban areas. For most of the decade, it was nearly impossible for black Americans to find work. In the South, where many African Americans had been able to scratch out a living as sharecroppers, the price of cotton dropped from eighteen cents a pound in the late 1920s to six cents a pound in 1933, forcing many sharecroppers off their land. Making matters worse was the introduction of mechanical cotton pickers, which replaced a significant segment of black labor. As displaced black agricultural workers took refuge in cities, they met with hostility from the white labor force and labor unions, both of which saw the influx of blacks as a threat to whatever few job opportunities existed.

African Americans were initially skeptical of President Franklin Roosevelt's "New Deal," a package of legislation designed to provide relief for suffering Americans by putting them to work in an assortment of federal agencies. Various provisions in these laws and the agencies they created continued a pattern of discrimination against African Americans, leading many to refer to Roosevelt's New Deal as a "raw deal." Over the course of the decade, though, some progress was made. By 1939 African Americans were beginning to benefit from New Deal programs, and their income from public sector employment was almost as large as their income in the private sector. Helping to spur this modest growth in black income was the union movement. For years, the American Federation of Labor had supported discriminatory practices in the labor unions that were part of the federation. But in 1935 the Congress of Industrial Organizations was formed with the goal, in part, of organizing black as well as white workers. With the help of such organizations as the Urban League and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Congress of Industrial Organizations organized new unions, including the Packinghouse Workers Organizing Committee, the United Automobile Workers, and the Steel Workers Organizing Committee. In the face of competition from the Congress of Industrial Organizations, in 1935 the American Federation of Labor granted a charter to the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, the union A. Philip Randolph had founded a decade earlier. In 1937 the union finally signed an agreement with the Pullman Company, which operated the railway coaches on which black porters and maids worked.

Black workers and civil rights organizations took additional steps to improve the plight of African American workers. In 1933, for example, the Urban League and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People were instrumental in forming the Joint Committee on National Recovery. The organization's goal was to bring inequities in New Deal programs to the public's attention. The committee also spearheaded "Don't Buy Where You Can't Work" campaigns to boycott businesses that served black communities but refused to hire black workers in any but menial jobs. In New York City, pressure from the Citizens League for Fair Play forced the local chamber of commerce and other citywide organizations to promote the hiring of blacks in higher paying retail jobs. Meanwhile, in the rural South, black workers were joining such organizations as the Socialist Southern Tenant Farmers Union and the Communist Alabama Sharecroppers Union. In Birmingham, Alabama, black workers were drawn to the League of Struggle for Negro Rights.

Efforts were also made on the political front. Historically, African Americans had supported the Republican Party, the party of Abraham Lincoln and emancipation. Throughout the 1930s, though, black political affiliation began to shift as the Democratic Roosevelt administration appointed dozens of blacks to New Deal agencies, forming what came to be called Roosevelt's Black Cabinet. Among these politically powerful African Americans were Mary McLeod Bethune, the founder of Bethune-Cookman College, and Howard University professor Ralph Bunche. In 1936 hundreds of civil rights leaders came together to form the National Negro Congress, electing Randolph as the organization's first president. The goal of the congress was to unite some six hundred fraternal, civil rights, and church organizations under a single umbrella to improve the economic and social position of African Americans.

Despite some progress, the position of unemployed African American workers in the late 1930s remained dire. As the nation was emerging from the depression, white workers were able to return to full-time employment, but black workers continued to rely on relief programs and public sector jobs, primarily in construction and infrastructure building. However, war clouds were gathering over the horizon. On September 1, 1939, World War II began in Europe when Nazi Germany invaded Poland. In 1940, Belgium, Denmark, France, the Netherlands, and Norway fell to the Nazis. In preparation for the possibility of war, the United States instituted a peacetime draft, and under the Lend-Lease program, begun in 1941, the U.S. government began sending military supplies to England, China, Russia, and Brazil.

As the nation mobilized for the possibility of war, the unemployment rate fell below 10 percent for the first time since 1932. Industrial output was up, as exemplified by an increase in production in the shipbuilding industry: From 1930 to 1936, U.S. shipbuilders had produced only seventy-one ships; however, in 1936 a New Deal agency called the U.S. Maritime Commission was formed to revive the shipbuilding industry with great success, as 106 new ships were built from 1938 to 1940, and in 1941 nearly as many more were produced. African Americans, however, were getting only a handful of the new jobs being created. Accordingly, on January 15, 1941, Randolph issued a press release in which he called on African Americans to protest this inequity by marching on Washington. His March on Washington Movement had previously announced its goals, among them:

> We demand, in the interest of national unity, the abrogation of every law which makes a distinction in treatment between citizens based on religion, creed, color, or national origin. This means an end to Jim Crow in education, in housing, in transportation and in every other social, economic, and political privilege. Especially, we demand, in the capital of the nation, an end to all segregation in public places and in public institutions.

The date of the proposed march was to be July 1, 1941. The Roosevelt administration, alarmed by the prospect of tens of thousands of protesters descending on the nation's capital, tried to dissuade Randolph from this course of action and call off the march. Randolph, however, remained steadfast, and in May of that year he redoubled his efforts with his "Call to Negro America to March on Washington for Jobs and Equal Participation in National Defense," published in the journal Black Worker.

About the Author

Asa Philip Randolph was born on April 15, 1889, in Crescent City, Florida, the son of a Methodist minister. After graduating as valedictorian of his high school class in 1907, he moved to New York City with the early goal of becoming an actor; in Harlem, he organized a Shakespearean society and performed the lead role in several of Shakespeare's plays. During the 1910s he became a Socialist and began his earliest involvement in trade unionism. Along with his close friend and collaborator, Chandler Owen, he founded and edited The Messenger, a radical journal that espoused Socialism and trade unionism and urged African Americans to resist the military draft after the United States entered World War I.

During the 1920s Randolph's involvement in trade unionism intensified, and in 1925 he organized the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, the first black trade union. By the mid-1930s the union had over seven thousand members. For a decade Randolph and the union carried on bitter negotiations with the Pullman Company, which operated the sleeping and dining railroad cars on which black porters and maids worked often for low wages, with no overtime pay. Finally, in 1935, the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters was certified as the union that would represent the Pullman employees. Two years later the union reached an agreement with Pullman that provided workers with significant wage increases, overtime pay, and a shorter work week. Meanwhile, in 1936, Randolph was named the first president of the National Negro Congress.

In January 1941, as U.S. industrial output was increasing with the growing threat of American involvement in World War II, Randolph issued a call for a march on Washington, D.C., to demand equality of opportunity in the defense industries and in the U.S. military. He met with President Franklin Roosevelt in June of that year; as a result of that meeting, Roosevelt issued Executive Order 8802, which desegregated the defense industries and the federal government. After the war, Randolph, in concert with other black leaders, established the Committee against Jim Crow in Military Service and Training. In large part as a result of Randolph's efforts, in 1948 President Harry Truman issued Executive Order 9981, desegregating the military. In 1950 Randolph founded the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, one of the nation's leading civil rights organizations. Later, in 1963, he was instrumental in organizing the March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom. With his velvety baritone voice, Randolph was often the voice of black America on television and the radio as the struggle for civil rights continued throughout the 1960s. History came full circle when Amtrak, the organization that operates the U.S. passenger rail system, named one of its deluxe sleeping cars in Randolph's honor. Randolph died at the age of ninety on May 16, 1979, in New York City.

Randolph's "Call to Negro America to March on Washington for Jobs and Equal Participation in National Defense" is a highly rhetorical document consisting of a large number of short paragraphs and sentences that make his purpose absolutely clear. He sweeps his reader along with repetition and exclamations ("What a dilemma! What a runaround! What a disgrace!") and such literary devices as alliteration ("deepest disappointments and direst defeats … dreadful days of destruction and disaster to democracy") all perhaps reflecting his early theatrical background. He announces his purpose in the opening paragraph of his address, where he says, "We call upon you to fight for jobs in National Defense. We call upon you to struggle for the integration of Negroes in the armed forces." He then condemns "Jim-Crowism," a reference to the pattern of discrimination and segregation that had existed since the nineteenth century and that kept African Americans in inferior social and economic positions; the phrase Jim Crow was taken from the name of a character in a popular nineteenth-century minstrel show.

Randolph stresses his view of the black employment situation as a "crisis," indeed, a "crisis of democracy." He goes on to note that African Americans are being systematically denied employment in the defense industries and that they are segregated in the U.S. military. Randolph was, of course, correct. In the early decades of the twentieth century, African Americans served primarily in menial and service jobs in the military. In the U.S. Navy and Marine Corps, for example, African Americans were pushed into the Steward's Branch, where they worked as cooks and waiters in officers' mess halls. During World War II they fought in segregated units; the few black officers commanded segregated African American units. Many military officers argued that integrating units, and thus having blacks and whites serve side by side, would result in conflict and low morale. Randolph then goes on to point out that African American workers were caught on the horns of a dilemma: They could not get jobs because there were not members of unions, and they could not gain union membership because they were without jobs.

Midway into the essay, Randolph begins to express hope that the situation can be remedied; he foresees black Americans rising from their current position to new heights of achievement in the "struggle for freedom and justice in Government, in industry, in labor unions, education, social service, religion, and culture." He then asserts that African Americans, through "their own power for self-liberation," can break down "barriers of discrimination" and slay the "deadly serpent of race hatred" in the military, government, labor unions, and industry. Here, Randolph calls for efforts to provide unskilled African American workers with job training that will enable them to make a contribution.

Randolph then makes explicit what he wants: not just an end to discrimination but, more specifically, an executive order from the president that will put an end to discrimination in the defense industry and the military. In the following brief paragraphs, he notes that efforts on the part of the black community to gain jobs will not be easy and will require money and sacrifice. He calls on African Americans to take action, urging them to "build a mammoth machine of mass action" and to "harness and hitch" their power. He then arrives at his key goal: the organization of a march on Washington to demand economic equality. Randolph asserts that such a march will "shake up white America" and "shake up official Washington." Further, the massing of thousands of black demonstrators will give encouragement not only to African Americans but also to "our white friends" who fight for justice by the side of African Americans.

Randolph next takes up a potential objection to the proposed march on Washington. Critics would argue that such a march at such a time, with war looming, might affect national unity. Randolph rejects this argument, arguing instead that "we believe in national unity which recognizes equal opportunity of black and white citizens." The paragraph goes on to reject all forms of dictatorship, including Fascism, Nazism, and Communism, and to emphasize that African Americans are "loyal, patriotic Americans all." Interestingly, early in his career, during World War I, Randolph had been arrested for breaking the 1917 Espionage Act because of the left-wing Socialist ideals he espoused in the journal he founded, The Messenger. By the late 1930s Randolph was muting his Socialist beliefs, and here he makes clear that he regards the Communist Soviet Union as a dictatorship.

In the final paragraphs Randolph sums up his views. He states that American democracy would be a "hollow mockery" if it failed to protect its protectors and to extend equality of opportunity to all citizens, black and white. He again calls on President Roosevelt to end "Jim-Crowism" in the military and in the defense industry and closes by stating that if the federal government is guilty of discrimination, it has forfeited the right to take industry and the labor unions to task for the same discrimination.

Audience

The audience for Randolph's "Call to Negro America to March on Washington for Jobs and Equal Participation in National Defense" was clear. The document was addressed to African Americans, in particular African American workers, urging them to participate in a march on Washington, D.C., to demand equality in the defense industries and in the military. Clearly, too, the audience for the document was the federal government, in particular, President Franklin Roosevelt, as part of a campaign to pressure him to take steps to end segregation in the defense industries and in the military. Roosevelt heard the message: Just a month after the document appeared in Black Worker (a journal Randolph founded and that was in essence a continuation of the earlier journal The Messenger), the president agreed to meet with Randolph to discuss the proposed march on Washington.

Impact

Randolph's "Call to Negro America to March on Washington for Jobs and Equal Participation in National Defense," in combination with the creation of March on Washington Movement committees formed in various cities to organize the proposed march, had a significant impact. President Roosevelt, with his wife, Eleanor Roosevelt, was troubled by the prospect of large numbers of protesters descending on the capital, and they tried to persuade black leaders to cancel the event. Randolph, however, remained firm, so the president decided to meet with him.

The meeting took place on June 18, 1941, with the proposed march scheduled for July 1. Roosevelt was unable to persuade Randolph to back down and realized that the only way he could forestall the march was to issue an order that Randolph and the black leadership would find acceptable. Roosevelt had resisted such civil rights initiatives, including backing any bill against lynching, because he did not want to alienate southern Democrats, who formed a significant part of his political base. Motivated, perhaps, by a combination of the justice of the cause, the need for labor as the country prepared for war, and the fact that, having just been elected to a third term, he did not have to be concerned about appeasing his political base, Roosevelt acceded. On June 25, 1941, he issued Executive Order 8802, which stated: "As a prerequisite to the successful conduct of our national defense production effort, I do hereby reaffirm the policy of the United States that there shall be no discrimination in the employment of workers in defense industries or government because of race, creed, color, or national origin." To implement the order, Roosevelt created the Fair Employment Practices Commission (FEPC).

In response to Roosevelt's pledge to issue the order, Randolph and his associates did, in fact, cancel the march. Randolph was the target of considerable criticism for doing so, for the executive order failed to desegregate the military, so some black activists accused Randolph of selling out. Nonetheless, Randolph recognized that Roosevelt had taken a significant step, at potentially great political cost to himself, in civil rights. Accordingly, he saved the issue of desegregating the military for another day.

Still, the FEPC lacked teeth. Both the staff and the agency's annual budget were small, and the agency did not have the authority to subpoena, fine, or jail those who ignored its directives. Further, it could not regulate the hiring procedures of private employers or the membership practices of labor unions. To remedy these weaknesses, Roosevelt announced on July 30, 1942, that the War Manpower Commission would take over the administration of the FEPC. This move, however, made matters worse, for the commission's head, the former Indiana governor Paul V. McNutt, had little sympathy for the FEPC, cut its budget, and generally impeded its efforts. After the resignation of three key members of the FEPC's staff, the agency's future looked grim, prompting Randolph to revive the March on Washington Movement. President Roosevelt once again bowed to pressure and on May 27, 1943, issued Executive Order 9346, strengthening and reorganizing the FEPC and placing it under the direction of Monsignor Francis J. Hass, a Catholic priest. Within months, the agency had set up nine regional offices and three satellite offices.

Scholars continue to debate the question of whether the FEPC was effective. Some argue that whatever gains black workers made would have occurred without the FEPC, for the pressure of war created a manpower shortage in industry that would have provided jobs for African Americans. Others argue that were it not for the FEPC, gains would not have been made in such industries as utilities, shipbuilding, steel mills, and public transportation. The facts, though, are indisputable. Between 1941 and 1945, 1.5 million minority workers gained employment in the defense industries; after 1942 the share of African Americans who held jobs in the defense industries more than tripled and by 1944 had risen from 2.5 percent to 8.3 percent. Additionally, another two hundred thousand to three hundred thousand minorities were employed by the federal government.

The final item on Randolph's agenda was desegregation of the military. In 1947 Randolph founded the Committee against Jim Crow in Military Service and Training. He and other black American leaders threatened to urge black workers to go on strike, which would have exacerbated the economic disruptions caused by the nation's conversion to a peacetime economy. Moreover, the widespread destruction of World War II, with the denial of human rights by Nazi Germany and the expansionist Japanese empire, focused attention on human rights throughout the world. African American soldiers who continued to serve in Europe in the years after the war found greater acceptance there, and they demanded this same acceptance from white American society. In this climate, Roosevelt's successor, President Harry Truman, created the President's Commission on Civil Rights. In 1947 the commission issued its final report, To Secure These Rights, recommending specific ways to protect the civil rights of African Americans and other minority groups. Truman faced resistance, particularly from southern senators, so he took the issue of civil rights into his own hands. On July 26, 1948, he issued Executive Order 9981, which desegregated the U.S. military. Although the military services initially resisted his order (believing they were already in compliance with earlier directives), eventually they complied, and in 1954 the U.S. Department of Defense was able to announce that the last racially segregated armed forces unit had been abolished. The second major goal of Randolph's "Call to Negro America" was finally realized.

Questions for Further Study

1. What impact did the advent of World War II have on the U.S. economy?

2. What impact, if any, did the labor union movement have on African Americans in the 1930s and early 1940s?

3. Randolph's march on Washington never took place. Does this mean that his "call" was unsuccessful? Why or why not?

4. Randolph's article is in no sense a sober, academic-sounding call to the African American community. What rhetorical devices did Randolph use to spur African Americans to action? To what extent do you believe that Randolph's early career as an actor may have contributed to his writing style?

5. Randolph wrote that "we believe in national unity which recognizes equal opportunity of black and white citizens." Compare this document with William Pickens's "The Kind of Democracy the Negro Expects" (1918). To what extent do the two writers make similar arguments, each in the context of world war?

A. Philip Randolph's "Call to Negro America to March on Washington"

We call upon you to fight for jobs in National Defense.

We call upon you to struggle for the integration of Negroes in the armed forces.…

We call upon you to demonstrate for the abolition of Jim-Crowism in all Government departments and defense employment.

This is an hour of crisis. It is a crisis of democracy. It is a crisis of minority groups. It is a crisis of Negro Americans.

What is this crisis?

To American Negroes, it is the denial of jobs in Government defense projects. It is racial discrimination in Government departments. It is widespread Jim-Crowism in the armed forces of the Nation.

While billions of the taxpayers' money are being spent for war weapons, Negro workers are finally being turned away from the gates of factories, mines and mills being flatly told, "Nothing Doing." Some employers refuse to give Negroes jobs when they are without "union cards," and some unions refuse Negro workers union cards when they are "without jobs."

What shall we do?
What a dilemma!
What a runaround!
What a disgrace!
What a blow below the belt!

Though dark, doubtful and discouraging, all is not lost, all is not hopeless. Though battered and bruised, we are not beaten, broken, or bewildered.

Verily, the Negroes' deepest disappointments and direst defeats, their tragic trials and outrageous oppressions in these dreadful days of destruction and disaster to democracy and freedom, and the rights of minority peoples, and the dignity and independence of the human spirit, is the Negroes' greatest opportunity to rise to the highest heights of struggle for freedom and justice in Government, in industry, in labor unions, education, social service, religion, and culture.

With faith and confidence of the Negro people in their own power for self-liberation, Negroes can break down the barriers of discrimination against employment in National Defense. Negroes can kill the deadly serpent of race hatred in the Army, Navy, Air and Marine Corps, and smash through and blast the Government, business and labor-union red tape to win the right to equal opportunity in vocational training and re-training in defense employment.

Most important and vital of all, Negroes, by the mobilization and coordination of their mass power, can cause President Roosevelt to Issue an Executive Order Abolishing Discriminations in All Government Department, Army, Navy, Air Corps and National Defense Jobs.

Of course, the task is not easy. In very truth, it is big, tremendous and difficult.

It will cost money.

It will require sacrifice.

It will tax the Negroes' courage, determination and will to struggle. But we can, must and will triumph.

The Negroes' stake in national defense is big. It consists of jobs, thousands of jobs. It may represent millions, yes, hundreds of millions of dollars in wages. It consists of new industrial opportunities and hope. This is worth fighting for.

But to win our stakes, it will require an "all-out," bold and total effort and demonstration of colossal proportions.

Negroes can build a mammoth machine of mass action with a terrific and tremendous driving and striking power that can shatter and crush the evil fortress of race prejudice and hate, if they will only resolve to do so and never stop, until victory comes.

Dear fellow Negro Americans, be not dismayed by these terrible times. You possess power, great power. Our problem is to harness and hitch it up for action on the broadest, daring and most gigantic scale.

In this period of power politics, nothing counts but pressure, more pressure, and still more pressure, through the tactic and strategy of broad, organized, aggressive mass action behind the vital and important issues of the Negro. To this end, we propose that ten thousand Negroes MARCH ON WASHINGTON FOR JOBS IN NATIONAL DEFENSE AND EQUAL INTEGRATION IN THE FIGHTING FORCES OF THE UNITED STATES.

An "all-out" thundering march on Washington, ending in a monster and huge demonstration at Lincoln's Monument will shake up white America.

It will shake up official Washington.

It will give encouragement to our white friends to fight all the harder by our side, with us, for our righteous cause.

It will gain respect for the Negro people.

It will create a new sense of self-respect among Negroes.

But what of national unity?

We believe in national unity which recognizes equal opportunity of black and white citizens to jobs in national defense and the armed forces, and in all other institutions and endeavors in America. We condemn all dictatorships, Fascist, Nazi and Communist. We are loyal, patriotic Americans all.

But if American democracy will not defend its defenders; if American democracy will not protect its protectors; if American democracy will not give jobs to its toilers because of race or color; if American democracy will not insure equality of opportunity, freedom and justice to its citizens, black and white, it is a hollow mockery and belies the principles for which it is supposed to stand.…

Today we call on President Roosevelt, a great humanitarian and idealist, to … free American Negro citizens of the stigma, humiliation and insult of discrimination and Jim-Crowism in Government departments and national defense.

The Federal Government cannot with clear conscience call upon private industry and labor unions to abolish discrimination based on race and color as long as it practices discrimination itself against Negro Americans.

To Secure These Rights

"The only aristocracy that is consistent with the free way of life is an aristocracy of talent and achievement."

Overview

Drafted by President Harry S. Truman's Committee on Civil Rights in 1947, To Secure These Rights (subtitled "The Report of the President's Committee on Civil Rights") remains one of the most important federal civil rights reports in United States history. Issued on the heels of World War II, To Secure These Rights identified remarkable disparities in racial treatment in both the North and the South and called for a series of measures to improve race relations in the United States. Among them were police professionalization, federal protection of black voting rights, enforcement of antilynching laws, and an end to segregation in schools, housing, and public accommodations.

Although President Truman refrained from addressing many of the committee's recommendations, he did order the desegregation of the armed forces in 1948 with Executive Order 9981, signaling the beginning of the federal government's push for desegregation generally. Outraged at Truman's commitment to civil rights, southerners like then governor of South Carolina Strom Thurmond abandoned the Democratic Party, formed the Dixiecrats, and initiated a realignment of America's political landscape that is still discernible today. Long before the U.S. Supreme Court's desegregation decision in Brown v. Board of Education (1954) or the student sit-ins of the 1960s, To Secure These Rights introduced a blueprint for the civil rights movement.

To Secure These Rights emerged out of the immediate political context of World War II. During the war, almost one million African Americans left the South for work in military-related industries in the North and West. Once there, African Americans formed powerful political blocs in urban areas important for both state and national elections, New York, Chicago, and Detroit among them. Yet African American voters did not completely abandon the Republican Party, many still remaining loyal to the legacy of Abraham Lincoln. Eager to continue his predecessor's success at winning over black voters, Harry S. Truman made civil rights an important component of his domestic platform.

Although the Supreme Court had indicated as early as 1937 that the federal government might be constitutionally authorized to protect civil rights abuses against the states, Truman was arguably the first federal official to truly embrace such a vision. His first statement to this effect occurred during his State of the Union address before Congress on January 6, 1947, when he invoked "the will to fight" crimes against blacks and lobbied to extend "the limit of federal power to protect the civil rights of the American people." Truman reiterated this interest during an organizational meeting of the Civil Rights Committee at the White House, requesting that the committee inform him of "exactly how far" his attorney general could go in enforcing civil rights at the state and local levels.

On December 5, 1946, Truman issued Executive Order 9808, establishing a committee to investigate civil rights abuses and recommend possible solutions. Issued on the heels of World War II, Truman's order drew a direct line between civil rights and World War II. "Freedom from Fear" one of Franklin Delano Roosevelt's Four Freedoms as articulated in January 1941 at the outset of the war had come "under attack," Truman declared in this order, by individuals willing to "take the law into their own hands" and target African American "ex-servicemen." Of particular concern to Truman were stories of white violence against black soldiers in the American South, including the murder of a black soldier and his wife in Georgia in July 1946 and the blinding of a black sergeant in South Carolina in February of that year. Truman confronted the fallout of such events personally when the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People picketed the White House in late July and sent a delegation to confront him directly in September 1946, prompting him to write Attorney General Tom Clark immediately to request that "some sort of policy" be implemented to prevent future violence.

That Truman ultimately decided to issue an executive order was not unprecedented. Truman's predecessor, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, had also responded to pressure from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People by issuing an executive order favoring civil rights in 1941, ultimately leading to the creation of the Fair Employment Practices Commission. Yet Roosevelt's decision shared the support of organized labor, muting its potentially radical, racial effect.

Truman faced more complex problems. Suffering low approval ratings in the polls, he risked losing even more support by coming out in favor of black rights, particularly among powerful southern contingents in the Senate and House of Representatives. However, he also confronted an embarrassing string of democratic losses in the congressional elections of 1946, alerting him to the possible abandonment of the Democratic Party by black voters in the North. Eager to assuage blacks without forcing an open confrontation with southern whites, Truman followed Roosevelt's use of the executive order, a move that could be funded out of his own discretionary accounts independent of congressional approval. To build public support for such an initiative, Truman warned of an impending wave of racial hysteria akin to that which followed World War I "when organized groups fanned hatred and intolerance," as he put it in his instructions to the civil rights committee. Incidentally, one such organized group, the Ku Klux Klan, had become particularly repugnant to Truman, smearing him as a Jew (which he was not) during his race for county judge in 1922.

Global concerns also haunted Truman's thoughts in late 1946, possibly pushing him to align America's domestic treatment of minorities with its foreign policy. For example, he expressed open support for his predecessor's emphasis on the Four Freedoms (freedom of speech and expression, freedom of religion, freedom from want, and freedom from fear) and embraced America's new role as leader of the free world. Indeed, Truman hosted former British Prime Minister Winston Churchill in Fulton, Missouri, on March 5, 1946, applauding as Churchill delivered a rousing alarm that the Soviet Union had erected an "iron curtain" across Europe threatening "freedom and democracy" the world over. Exactly one year later, Truman articulated his bold, interventionist policy of containment, the now famous Truman Doctrine. Although the Truman Doctrine did not have an overt tie to civil rights, Truman did realize that at least part of America's struggle against the Soviet Union and China was ideological and that glaring examples of persistent, state-sanctioned racism undermined America's cold war image. Truman also rankled at the irony of black soldiers being ordered to fight racism in Nazi Germany, only to then suffer domestic abuses once they returned home, an eventuality that pressed him to establish a federal committee dedicated to investigating civil rights.

About the Author

A committee of fifteen prominent citizens drafted To Secure These Rights. Hoping for balance, Truman appointed two women, two southerners, two business leaders, and two labor leaders. General Electric president Charles E. Wilson agreed to chair, while Rabbi Roland B. Gittelsohn, Catholic bishop Francis J. Haas, Episcopal bishop Henry Knox Sherrill, and Methodist official M. E. Tilley provided religious diversity. Labor's representatives included Boris Shishkin of the American Federation of Labor, and James B. Carey of the Congress of Industrial Organizations. University of North Carolina president Frank P. Graham and Dartmouth president John S. Dickey provided an academic aspect, while Morris L. Ernst, Francis P. Matthews, Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., and Dr. Channing H. Tobias represented the public and nonprofit sectors. Perhaps most notably, the civil rights lawyer Sadie Tanner Alexander was the committee's only African American.

Alexander wrote Truman on December 9, 1946, that the committee's work was "the greatest venture in the protection of civil liberty officially undertaken by the government since reconstruction." Holding a PhD in economics, Alexander had served on the board of directors of the National Urban League, worked with National Council of Negro Women president Mary McLeod Bethune, and practiced law in Philadelphia. Her presence went far toward establishing the committee's credibility in civil rights circles.

With Truman's blessing, the committee decided not simply to focus on the most "flagrant outrages" against minorities but to look more "broadly" at civil rights generally. To aid its inquiry, the fifteen-person group devised four baseline questions, each of which warranted its own, individual section in the body's final report. The questions were these: "What is the historic civil rights goal of the American people?" "In what ways does our present record fall short of the goal?" "What is government's responsibility for the achievement of the goal?" "What further steps does the nation now need to take to reach this goal?"

Conceding that the term civil rights "has with great wisdom been used flexibly in American history," the committee dedicated its first section to identifying which rights, precisely, needed to be secured. In so doing, it went a long way toward framing the civil rights debate for decades to come, drawing not simply from the Bill of Rights but also from the Declaration of Independence, President Roosevelt's Four Freedoms, and its own conceptions of what the federal government should protect. Out of this democratic assortment of legal and nonlegal sources, the committee identified four primary rights: "the right to safety and security of the person," "the right to citizenship and its privileges," "the right to freedom of conscience and expression," and, perhaps most notably, "the right to equality of opportunity."

On the first, the committee noted that freedom was meaningless so long as citizens were subject to "bondage, lawless violence, and arbitrary arrest and punishment," warranting the need for federal protection of the "due process of law" against any "threat of violence by private persons or mobs." At least part of this "security" right rested on firm legal footing, particularly the due process rights of the Fifth and Fourteenth amendments as well as the procedural protections of the Fourth, Sixth, and Eighth amendments though they had yet to be incorporated to the states. However, the committee's concern for mob violence indicated a departure from written law, especially the Constitution's focus on state actors. Even the Fourteenth Amendment, for example, did not protect citizens from abuses by "private persons" and "mobs," a point made clear by the Supreme Court in United States v. Cruikshank in 1876. The committee's rejection of this opinion would be one of several remarkable innovations in the conception of rights that it devised.

The second innovation that the committee devised emerged in tandem with its second right: the "right to citizenship and its privileges." Clearly based on the Fourteenth Amendment, the right to citizenship adhered to "every mature and responsible person," who in turn deserved "an equal voice in his government." With an eye to disfranchisement in the South, the committee noted that participation in the political process could not be limited to individuals of a particular "race, color, creed, … or national origin." Then, in a move that went decidedly off the Fourteenth Amendment, the committee included the right to military combat as a core civil right, noting that all citizens "must enjoy the right to serve the nation and the cause of freedom in time of war." Those who did not enjoy such a right, noted the committee in an allusion to the Supreme Court's infamous 1896 decision in Plessy v. Ferguson, suffered a "badge of inferiority." Precisely because Plessy sanctioned racial segregation, not combat service, the committee's invocation of a right to combat played fast and loose with legal doctrine, essentially creating a new civil right out of whole cloth. Even the most militia-friendly reading of the Second Amendment, which was arguably the only constitutional protection applicable to military service, did not indicate that citizens had the constitutional right to join a militia.

Third on the committee's list of vital rights was the "right to freedom of conscience and expression," perhaps the only right firmly grounded in legal doctrine. Paraphrasing the First Amendment, the committee denounced the suppression of private "arguments, viewpoints, or opinions" meanwhile recognizing Oliver Wendell Holmes's "clear and present danger" qualification as articulated in Schenck v. United States (1919). "Complete religious liberty" also struck the committee as a central right, except when "pleaded as an excuse for criminal or clearly anti-social conduct."

If the committee's third right was the most doctrinaire, then its final right proved to be its most unmoored. Abandoning both written and unwritten law, the committee called for federal protection of "the right to equality of opportunity." Observing that it was "not enough" that citizens were guaranteed political participation, the committee also judged the federal government responsible for providing citizens with the "right to enjoy the benefits of society." This included the right to "obtain useful employment" as well as the right to "have access to services in the fields of education, housing, health, recreation and transportation" independent of "race, color, creed, and national origin." While the eradication of racial and national animus anticipated the Supreme Court's equal protection jurisprudence in the 1950s, the committee's interest in equality of opportunity marked a relatively radical departure from anything mentioned in the Constitution or subsequent Supreme Court jurisprudence. Even Plessy v. Ferguson, which held that separate public accommodations like streetcars needed to be equal, did not provide any indication that such equality extended to opportunity. Nor did Thomas Jefferson's invocation of the right to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" in the Declaration of Independence necessarily mean that the government was obligated to provide equal access to private employment. Here, the committee's work truly forged new ground, setting the stage not only for the establishment of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission in 1965 but also for the Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967, the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, and the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990.

Prescient in scope, the committee also proved persuasive in fact, as illustrated in the second section of its report, titled "The Condition of Our Rights," which built the case for unprecedented federal intervention in state affairs by recounting a parade of shocking abuses at the local level, many in the South. Included in the first part of this section were shocking depictions of lynchings coupled with the observation that "communities in which lynchings occur tend to condone the crime." Also in this section are discussions of police brutality, "unwarranted arrests, unduly prolonged detention[s] before arraignment, and abuse[s] of the search and seizure power," all recognizable targets of the Warren Court over a decade later. Recognizing the close ties between police and local majorities, the committee identified one of the core issues that would come to plague police departments for the next half century, namely the plight of "unpopular racial or religious minorities" in the face of "prejudices of the region or of dominant local groups."

Perhaps even more problematic were lapses in the administration of justice. Again focusing on the South, the committee found shocking evidence of confessions resulting from torture; incompetent, even nonexistent counsel; and use of the "fee system" by which judges were paid based on the number of "fines levied." Exacerbating such travesties were even more alarming cases of forced labor, both against employees who owed debts and prisoners who endured false convictions only to be hired out by sheriffs to "local entrepreneurs."

As the committee unearthed clear infringements on the "right to security," so too did it uncover alarming violations of the right to citizenship, many leveled at Asian immigrants on the West Coast and African Americans in the South. In states like California, for example, natives of Japan and Korea were "forbidden an opportunity to attain citizenship status" and also barred from owning land. Meanwhile, blacks in the American South confronted myriad "qualifications" standards, among them requests to read and interpret the Constitution, pay exorbitant poll taxes, and even endure outright physical violence.

Convinced that combat duty was also a right of citizenship, the committee exposed numerous discrepancies in the treatment of white and black soldiers. Enrollment in officer candidate schools for all four branches was generally restricted to whites; meanwhile, "cooks, stewards, and steward's mates," tended overwhelmingly to be black. Further, the armed forces enjoyed relatively little success in eliminating discrimination from admission to the military academies, further ensuring that blacks did not occupy positions of rank in the armed forces.

As for the right to freedom of conscience and expression, the committee did not focus on race so much as political affiliation, particularly individuals suspected of being Communists. Conceding that Communists were "hostile to the American heritage of freedom and equality," the committee still opposed "any attempt to impose special limitations on the rights of these people to speak and assemble." Predicting the national backlash against Senator Joseph McCarthy (who led a Senate investigation of supposed Communist infiltration of government) almost a decade later, the committee observed that "public excitement about 'Communists'" exceeded both "good judgment" and "calmness."

Finally, the committee considered the right to equal opportunity in employment, schools, housing, and health care. Noting that World War II had actually triggered a "marked advance both in hiring policies and in the removal of on-the-job discriminatory practices," the committee still recognized that discrepancies remained. Particularly vulnerable were "minority group members," including African Americans, Mexicans, and Jews. To illustrate, the committee cited a 1946 survey of private employment agencies in over one hundred major cities, concluding that "89 percent" of the agencies polled "included questions covering religion on their registration forms." In Chicago alone, "60 percent of the executive jobs" and "50 percent of the sales executive jobs" were closed to Jews.

African Americans also tended to suffer considerable employment discrimination. A poll of government employees indicated that while whites tended to enjoy a promotion once every two years, African Americans could expect to be promoted once every fourteen years. Even greater obstacles existed to union membership as organized labor proved less willing to end discrimination than "private industry." Despite such disparities, however, only six states boasted "laws directed against discrimination in private employment."

Perhaps surprisingly, discrimination in schools occupied a relatively small portion of the committee's findings, even though it did focus those findings on the South. Stating that the South boasted only "one-fifth of the taxpaying wealth of the nation," the committee framed the region's decision to "maintain two sets of public schools, one for whites and one for Negroes," economic folly. Exacerbating this folly was the unconscionable "difference in quality" between schools for whites and schools for blacks, black schools suffering significantly lower rates of "expenditure per pupil, teachers' salaries, the number of pupils per teacher, transportation of students, adequacy of school buildings and educational equipment, length of school term," and "extent of curriculum." Yet, despite the region's "considerable progress in the last decade in narrowing the gap" between white and black schools, the committee doubted that the South could ever achieve true parity without "federal financial assistance."

Although the committee was dubious of southern commitment to funding black schools, it did not make the argument that the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People would eventually make in Brown v. Board of Education, namely, that segregated schools were inherently discriminatory because they negatively affected the psychological development of African American children. The absence of such a critique indicates that even as late as 1947 school integration was not viewed in quite the same way as it was in 1954 and may, in fact, have been less important than the problem of disparate funding.

By contrast, the committee successfully foreshadowed Supreme Court jurisprudence in the realm of housing, targeting the restrictive covenant as an impermissible means of discrimination against minorities, including "Armenians, Jews, Negroes, Mexicans, Syrians, Japanese, Chinese and Indians." Noting that such covenants were essentially private, the committee nevertheless documented their remarkable affect on America's urban landscape, noting that the "amount of land covered by racial restrictions in Chicago has been estimated at 80 percent." Identifying covenants as a handmaiden of the ghetto, the committee advanced what was at that point a relatively novel interpretation of state action, remarking that deed restrictions could be enforced only by "obtaining court orders," thereby making covenants a kind of state action precisely because they placed "the power of the state behind the enforcement of the private agreement." Knowing full well that recasting legally enforceable private agreements essentially contracts as state action boasted little precedent in American law, the committee cited a Canadian court ruling to defend its position, marking yet another innovative act of rights creation.

Perhaps the most stunning act of rights creation engaged in by the committee emerged in the realm of health care, where the committee identified a "right to health service." Well aware that no doctrinal support existed for such a right, the committee simply cited data indicating "discrepancies between the health of the majority and the minorities," caused by factors such as "crowded, dirty" living conditions; segregated health facilities; and a lack of minority health care professionals. "In 1937" alone, said the committee, "only 35 percent of southern Negro babies were delivered by doctors, as compared to 90 percent of northern babies of both races." Further, black life expectancies were considerably lower than those for whites, with black males and females expecting to live fifty-two and fifty-five years, respectively, while their white counterparts expected to live at least a decade longer. Part of the explanation for these disparities, continued the committee, was "the discriminatory policy of our medical schools in admitting minority students" as well as the "refusal of some medical societies to admit Negro physicians."

Audience

The primary audience for To Secure These Rights was the black community, particularly that portion of the community living in the urban North. There, African Americans found themselves numerous enough to tip the scales in favor of Democrats or Republicans in state and national elections. Afraid that blacks might return to the Republican Party after supporting Democrats during the New Deal, Truman viewed his platform on civil rights to be vital to consolidating the Democratic Party's liberal, New Deal coalition.

Truman also recognized that America's racial politics possessed an international component. Acutely conscious of the need to cobble together a political rationale for containment, Truman continued President Woodrow Wilson's emphasis on ideals, even to the point of justifying the cold war as a struggle not simply for resources or territorial control but also for much more abstract concepts like liberty and democracy. White recriminations against African American soldiers returning home from the war shocked Truman, alerting him to the need for measures aimed at improving America's international reputation for democracy and freedom.

With a right to health care providing the best example, the committee's enumeration of what civil rights, precisely, needed to be secured amounted to nothing less than a dramatic act of rights prioritization, if not outright creation. Ignoring traditional rights like freedom of contract and property, the committee did much to set the agenda for the modern civil rights movement, establishing equality of access to the political process, equality of opportunity in employment, and procedural due process protections against police as central to America's post World War II constitutional project. Further, the committee expanded the reach of the Constitution to protect citizens against discriminatory private actions, particularly in the housing context, prefiguring the Supreme Court's turn against restrictive covenants in Shelley v. Kraemer in 1948.

Perhaps the most interesting aspect of the committee's report was its treatment of racial segregation. Initially reluctant to claim that segregated schools harmed black children, the committee revisited the topic in a separate section, flagging Jim Crow as a "complex" system that attempted to recognize African Americans as "citizens" but ultimately branded them as inferior beings not fit to associate with white people. Although the report had little substantive impact on schools, it did the important work of publicly stating that segregation had, in fact, evolved into a complex structure of discrimination. Moreover, evidence that the abolition of such a system would not lead to interracial violence emerged in army units during World War II, where white soldiers who found themselves fighting side by side with blacks indicated that their feelings toward their black colleagues had changed after serving with them in combat. Such findings led Truman to desegregate the armed forces with confidence in 1948.

Based on its observations of the evils of Jim Crow, coupled with its discovery of rampant racial discrimination in the realms of health care, employment, voting, and criminal justice, the committee concluded that the "Government of the United States" needed to lead the effort of safeguarding the civil rights of all Americans, even those who were harmed by "private persons or groups." Traditional conceptions of states' rights factored negligibly, if at all, in the committee's solution, which counseled in favor of encouraging "the local community" to "set its own house in order." Animating such a move was a sense that isolated lynchings did not affect simply local norms but also the entire nation, potentially even echoing "from one end of the globe to the other." Indeed, America's foreign policy objectives could be jeopardized unless it brought racial transgressors to heel, since "an American diplomat cannot forcefully argue for free elections in foreign lands without meeting the challenge that in many sections of America qualified voters do not have free access to the polls." Here was a direct link between American foreign policy and domestic civil rights, almost a decade before Brown. Here, too, was an indication that despite its awareness that "the American people are loyal to the institutions of local government," foreign affairs warranted a larger role for the federal government in protecting citizens from both public and private abuses.

In the final section of its report, the committee set forth recommendations for how each of its enumerated rights might be secured, beginning with the overarching need to professionalize state and local law enforcement, expand the scope and reach of the Civil Rights Section of the Department of Justice, and establish a special unit within the Federal Bureau of Investigation to investigate civil rights abuses. Once such institutional needs were met, the committee went on to propose that the right to security be bolstered by the enactment of a congressional antilynching act, the right to citizenship be reinforced by legislation ending poll taxes, and the right to equality of opportunity be encouraged by the "elimination of segregation." Although other recommendations were issued as well, this last suggestion was perhaps the committee's boldest one that included no precise directives on how Jim Crow was, in fact, to be abolished. Perhaps the only indication that the committee made of a possible solution was its mention of money, noting that "federal aid to the states for education, health, research, and other public benefits should be granted provided that the states do not discriminate." Rather than wait for courts to get involved, the committee recommended that "independent administrative commissions" be created to "consider complaints and hold hearings to review them."

Although federal commissions like the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission would not be created until 1965, the committee essentially identified all of the major fronts upon which the civil rights battles of the 1950s and 1960s would be fought. Indeed, it might even be said that even though few of the committee's recommendations were enacted into law immediately, the report nevertheless succeeded in framing the core issues of the civil rights movement. For black civil rights activists like Walter White, To Secure These Rights represented "the most courageous and specific document of its kind in American history."

Not surprisingly, the report triggered a backlash in the South. Newspapers protested, state officials balked, and angry letters poured into the White House, yet Truman remained undeterred. Inspired by his committee's findings, the president made it a point to emphasize the need for federal leadership on civil rights during his State of the Union Address on January 7, 1948. "Our first goal," announced Truman, "is to secure fully the essential human rights of our citizens." Less than a month later, Truman reiterated this point, remarking that "all men are created equal" and that "basic civil rights" were the "source and the support of our democracy." To support this point, he introduced into Congress a ten-point proposal that included the creation of a permanent Commission on Civil Rights, increased support for "existing civil rights statutes," "federal protection against lynching," and heightened protections of "the right to vote."

Enraged, southern delegates to the Democratic National Convention in July 1948 bolted from the party only two days after Truman won the Democratic nomination, forming their own "Dixiecrat" bloc. This schism would fundamentally alter the course of Democratic politics in America, robbing the Democrats of their most conservative element and ultimately leading many of their once loyal southerners into the hands of the Republican Party in protest in the 1970s and 1980s. In the meantime, Truman forged ahead, desegregating both the federal government and the armed forces and setting in motion forces of racial progress that would build through the end of the twentieth century. Although the report was often eclipsed by more sensational flashpoints like Brown v. Board of Education and the 1964 Civil Rights Act, To Secure These Rights not only set the tone for racial reform in the post World War II era but also framed the terms upon which that reform would take place.

Questions for Further Study

1. In what ways can To Secure These Rights be considered a "blueprint" for the civil rights movement in the 1950s and 1960s?

2. What impact did the Great Depression, World War II, and the cold war have on the issue of civil rights during the 1940s and beyond?

3. Examine this document in light of the events surrounding A. Philip Randolph's "Call to Negro America to March on Washington" in 1941. To what extent did the later document embody views that Randolph and others expressed at that time?

4. Refer to the events surrounding the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Sweatt v. Painter, issued in 1950. To what extent did the executive branch under President Harry Truman and the judicial branch led by the Supreme Court work hand in hand to dismantle segregation during this period?

5. What impact did To Secure These Rights have on the U.S. political landscape?

To Secure These Rights

The Report of the President's Committee on Civil Rights …

Mr. President:

This is the report which we have prepared in accordance with the instructions which you gave to us in your statement and Executive Order on December 5, 1946: …

The Committee's first task was the interpretation of its assignment. We were not asked to evaluate the extent to which civil rights have been achieved in our country. We did not, therefore, devote ourselves to the construction of a balance sheet which would properly assess the great progress which the nation has made, as well as the shortcomings in the record. Instead, we have almost exclusively focused our attention on the bad side of our record on what might be called the civil rights frontier.…

At an early point in our work we decided to define our task broadly, to go beyond the specific flagrant outrages to which the President referred in his statement to the Committee. We have done this because these individual instances are only reflections of deeper maladies. We believe we must cure the disease as well as treat its symptoms. Moreover, we are convinced that the term "civil rights" itself has with great wisdom been used flexibly in American history.…

From all of this and our own discussions and deliberations we have sought answers to the following:

(1) What is the historic civil rights goal of the American people?

(2) In what ways does our present record fall short of the goal?

(3) What is government's responsibility for the achievement of the goal?

(4) What further steps does the nation now need to take to reach the goal?

Our report which follows is divided into four sections which provide our answers to these questions.…

The Ideal of Freedom and Equality

The central theme of our American heritage is the importance of the individual person. From the earliest moment of our history we have believed that every human being has an essential dignity and integrity which must be respected and safeguarded. Moreover, we believe the welfare of the individual is the final goal of group life. Our American heritage further teaches that to be secure in the rights he wishes for himself, each man must be willing to respect the rights of other men. This is the conscious recognition of a basic moral principle: all men are created equal as well as free. Stemming from this principle is the obligation to build social institutions that will guarantee equality of opportunity to all men. Without this equality freedom becomes an illusion. Thus the only aristocracy that is consistent with the free way of life is an aristocracy of talent and achievement. The grounds on which our society accords respect, influence or reward to each of its citizens must be limited to the quality of his personal character and of his social contribution.

The Essential Rights

The rights essential to the citizen in a free society can be described in different words and in varying orders. The three great rights of the Declaration of Independence have just been mentioned. Another noble statement is made in the Bill of Rights of our Constitution. A more recent formulation is found in the Four Freedoms.

Four basic rights have seemed important to this Committee and have influenced its labors. We believe that each of these rights is essential to the well-being of the individual and to the progress of society.

1. The Right to Safety and Security of the Person. Freedom can exist only where the citizen is assured that his person is secure against bondage, lawless violence, and arbitrary arrest and punishment. Freedom from slavery in all its forms is clearly necessary if all men are to have equal opportunity to use their talents and to lead worthwhile lives. Moreover, to be free, men must be subject to discipline by society only for commission of offenses clearly defined by law and only after trial by due process of law. Where the administration of justice is discriminatory, no man can be sure of security. Where the threat of violence by private persons or mobs exists, a cruel inhibition of the sense of freedom of activity and security of the person inevitably results. Where a society permits private and arbitrary violence to be done to its members, its own integrity is inevitably corrupted. It cannot permit human beings to be imprisoned or killed in the absence of due process of law without degrading its entire fabric.

2. The Right to Citizenship and its Privileges. Since it is a purpose of government in a democracy to regulate the activity of each man in the interest of all men, it follows that every mature and responsible person must be able to enjoy full citizenship and have an equal voice in his government. Because the right to participate in the political process is customarily limited to citizens there can be no denial of access to citizenship based upon race, color, creed, … or national origin. Denial of citizenship for these reasons cheapens the personality of those who are confined to this inferior status and endangers the whole concept of a democratic society.

To deny qualified citizens the right to vote while others exercise it is to do violence to the principle of freedom and equality. Without the right to vote, the individual loses his voice in the group effort and is subjected to rule by a body from which he has been excluded. Likewise, the right of the individual to vote is important to the group itself. Democracy assumes that the majority is more likely as a general rule to make decisions which are wise and desirable from the point of view of the interests of the whole society than is any minority. Every time a qualified person is denied a voice in public affairs, one of the components of a potential majority is lost, and the formation of a sound public policy is endangered.

To the citizen in a democracy, freedom is a precious possession. Accordingly, all able-bodied citizens must enjoy the right to serve the nation and the cause of freedom in time of war. Any attempt to curb the right to fight in its defense can only lead the citizen to question the worth of the society in which he lives. A sense of frustration is created which is wholly alien to the normal emotions of a free man. In particular, any discrimination which, while imposing an obligation, prevents members of minority groups from rendering full military service in defense of their country is for them a peculiarly humiliating badge of inferiority. The nation also suffers a loss of manpower and is unable to marshal maximum strength at a moment when such strength is most needed.

3. The Right to Freedom of Conscience and Expression. In a free society there is faith in the ability of the people to make sound, rational judgments. But such judgments are possible only where the people have access to all relevant facts and to all prevailing interpretations of the facts. How can such judgments be formed on a sound basis if arguments, viewpoints, or opinions are arbitrarily suppressed? How can the concept of the marketplace of thought in which truth ultimately prevails retain its validity if the thought of certain individuals is denied the right of circulation? The Committee reaffirms our tradition that freedom of expression may be curbed by law only where the danger to the well-being of society is clear and present.

Our forefathers fought bloody wars and suffered torture and death for the right to worship God according to the varied dictates of conscience. Complete religious liberty has been accepted as an unquestioned personal freedom since our Bill of Rights was adopted. We have insisted only that religious freedom may not be pleaded as an excuse for criminal or clearly anti-social conduct.

4. The Right to Equality of Opportunity. It is not enough that full and equal membership in society entitles the individual to an equal voice in the control of his government; it must also give him the right to enjoy the benefits of society and to contribute to its progress. The opportunity of each individual to obtain useful employment, and to have access to services in the fields of education, housing, health, recreation and transportation, whether available free or at a price, must be provided with complete disregard for race, color, creed, and national origin. Without this equality of opportunity the individual is deprived of the chance to develop his potentialities and to share the fruits of society. The group also suffers through the loss of the contributions which might have been made by persons excluded from the main channels of social and economic activity.

The Condition of Our Rights

1. The Right to Safety and Security of the Person. Vital to the integrity of the individual and to the stability of a democratic society is the right of each individual to physical freedom, to security against illegal violence, and to fair, orderly legal process. Most Americans enjoy this right, but it is not yet secure for all. Too many of our people still live under the harrowing fear of violence or death at the hands of a mob or of brutal treatment by police officers. Many fear entanglement with the law because of the knowledge that the justice rendered in some courts is not equal for all persons. In a few areas the freedom to move about and choose one's job is endangered by attempts to hold workers in peonage or other forms of involuntary servitude.

THE CRIME OF LYNCHING. In 1946 at least six persons in the United States were lynched by mobs. Three of them had not been charged, either by the police or anyone else, with an offense. Of the three that had been charged, one had been accused of stealing a saddle. (The real thieves were discovered after the lynching.) Another was said to have broken into a house. A third was charged with stabbing a man. All were Negroes. During the same year, mobs were prevented from lynching 22 persons, of whom 21 were Negroes, 1 white.…

The communities in which lynchings occur tend to condone the crime. Punishment of lynchers is not accepted as the responsibility of state or local governments in these communities. Frequently, state officials participate in the crime, actively or passively. Federal efforts to punish the crime are resisted. Condemnation of lynching is indicated by the failure of some local law enforcement officials to make adequate efforts to break up a mob. It is further shown by failure in most cases to make any real effort to apprehend or try those guilty. If the federal government enters a case, local officials sometimes actively resist the federal investigation. Local citizens often combine to impede the effort to apprehend the criminals by convenient "loss of memory"; grand juries refuse to indict; trial juries acquit in the face of overwhelming proof of guilt.…

POLICE BRUTALITY. We have reported the failure of some public officials to fulfill their most elementary duty the protection of persons against mob violence. We must also report more widespread and varied forms of official misconduct. These include violent physical attacks by police officers on members of minority groups, the use of third degree methods to extort confessions, and brutality against prisoners. Civil rights violations of this kind are by no means universal and many law enforcement agencies have gone far in recent years toward stamping out these evils.

In various localities, scattered throughout the country, unprofessional or undisciplined police, while avoiding brutality, fail to recognize and to safeguard the civil rights of the citizenry. Insensitive to the necessary limits of police authority, untrained officers frequently overstep the bounds of their proper duties. At times this appears in unwarranted arrests, unduly prolonged detention before arraignment, and abuse of the search and seizure power. Cases involving these breaches of civil rights constantly come before the courts. The frequency with which such cases arise is proof that improper police conduct is still widespread, for it must be assumed that there are many instances of the abuse of police power which do not reach the courts. Most of the victims of such abuses are ignorant, friendless persons, unaware of their rights, and without the means of challenging those who have violated those rights.

Where lawless police forces exist, their activities may impair the civil rights of any citizen. In one place the brunt of illegal police activity may fall on suspected vagrants, in another on union organizers, and in another on unpopular racial or religious minorities, such as Negroes, Mexicans, or Jehovah's Witnesses. But wherever unfettered police lawlessness exists, civil rights may be vulnerable to the prejudices of the region or of dominant local groups, and to the caprice of individual policemen. Unpopular, weak, or defenseless groups are most apt to suffer.…

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE. In addition to the treatment experienced by the weak and friendless person at the hands of police officers, he sometimes finds that the judicial process itself does not give him full and equal justice. This may appear in unfair and perfunctory trials, or in fines and prison sentences that are heavier than those imposed on other members of the community guilty of the same offenses.

In part, the inability of the Negro, Mexican, or Indian to obtain equal justice may be attributed to extrajudicial factors. The low income of a member of any one of these minorities may prevent him from securing competent counsel to defend his rights. It may prevent him from posting bail or bond to secure his release from jail during trial. It may predetermine his choice, upon conviction, of paying a fine or going to jail. But these facts should not obscure or condone the extent to which the judicial system itself is responsible for the less-than-equal justice meted out to members of certain minority groups.

The United States Supreme Court in a number of recent decisions has censured state courts for accepting evidence procured by third-degree methods, for failing to provide accused persons with adequate legal counsel, and for excluding Negroes from jury lists. For example, in one of these cases, Chambers v. Florida, the Supreme Court, in 1940, set aside the conviction by the state court of four young Negroes on the ground that it should have rejected confessions extorted from the accused by the use of third-degree methods. The Court referred to the basic principle that "all people must stand on an equality before the bar of justice in each American court." …

The use of the fee system in many communities where court officials are paid in whole or in part from the fines levied also sometimes stimulates arbitrary arrests and encourages unjust convictions. It is the unpopular minorities again that suffer most from this system, since it is relatively easy for unscrupulous, fee-seeking officers to "railroad" such persons to jail. The existence of the fee system and the frontier conditions in certain areas of Alaska contribute to discrimination against Indians and Eskimos in the administration of justice there. The situation is such that federal officials are seriously considering a proposal made by the Governor of Alaska to appoint a public defender for those groups.

The different standards of justice which we have allowed to exist in our country have had further repercussions. In certain states, the white population can threaten and do violence to the minority member with little or no fear of legal reprisal. Minority groups are sometimes convinced that they cannot expect fair treatment from the legal machinery. Because of this belief they may harbor and protect any of their members accused of crime. Their experience does not lead them to look upon the courts as "havens of refuge" for the victims of prejudice and public excitement.

Involuntary Servitude. Slavery was abolished in this country nearly a century ago, and in its traditional form has disappeared. But the temptation to force poor and defenseless persons, by one device or another, into a condition of virtual slavery, still exists. As recently as 1944, in the case of Pollock v. Williams, the Supreme Court struck down as a violation of the Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution an Alabama statute which enabled employers to force employees, in debt on account of advanced wage payments, to continue to work for them under threat of criminal punishment. This is one of the more subtle devices for securing forced labor. More direct is the practice whereby sheriffs in some areas free prisoners into the custody of local entrepreneurs who pay fines or post bonds. The prisoners then work for their "benefactors" under threat of returning to jail. Sometimes the original charge against the prisoners is trumped up for the purpose of securing labor by this means. In still other instances persons have been held in peonage by sheer force or by threats of prosecution for debt.

2. The Right to Citizenship and Its Privileges. The status of citizenship is basic to the enjoyment of many of the rights discussed in this report. First of all one must be a citizen in order to participate fully in the political process of the United States. Only citizens of the United States are accorded the right to vote. Only citizens may hold public office.…

In granting citizenship by naturalization, a democracy may establish reasonable tests of the individual alien's eligibility for citizenship. But some of the standards of eligibility in our naturalization laws have nothing to do with a person's fitness to become a citizen. These standards are based solely on race or national origins, and penalize some residents who may otherwise have all the attributes necessary for American citizenship. The largest group of American residents presently subject to this discrimination are those born in Japan. Residents of Korean origins, as well as persons born in certain other Asiatic countries and Pacific Island areas, are also denied citizenship status. Although many of these people have lived in this country for decades, will probably remain here until they die, have raised families of native-born American citizens, and are devoted to American principles, they are forbidden an opportunity to attain the citizenship status to which their children are born.…

In addition to the disabilities suffered by ineligible aliens at the hands of private persons in employment, housing, etc. they are singled out for additional discrimination under the law. Arizona, California, Idaho, Kansas, Louisiana, Montana, New Mexico, and Oregon forbid or severely restrict land ownership by ineligible aliens.…

The Right to Bear Arms. Underlying the theory of compulsory wartime military service in a democratic state is the principle that every citizen, regardless of his station in life, must assist in the defense of the nation when its security is threatened. Despite the discrimination which they encounter in so many fields, minority group members have time and again met this responsibility. Moreover, since equality in military service assumes great importance as a symbol of democratic goals, minorities have regarded it not only as a duty but as a right.

Yet the record shows that the members of several minorities, fighting and dying for the survival of the nation in which they met bitter prejudice, found that there was discrimination against them even as they fell in battle. Prejudice in any area is an ugly, undemocratic phenomenon; in the armed services, where all men run the risk of death, it is particularly repugnant.…

tion. In the Army, less than one Negro in 70 is commissioned, while there is one white officer for approximately every seven white enlisted men. In the Navy, there are only two Negro officers in a ratio of less than one to 10,000 Negro enlisted men; there are 58,571 white officers, or one for every seven enlisted whites. The Marine Corps has 7,798 officers, none of whom is a Negro, though there are 2,190 Negro enlisted men. Out of 2,981 Coast Guard officers, one is a Negro; there are 910 Negro enlisted men. The ratio of white Coast Guard commissioned to enlisted personnel is approximately one to six.

Similarly, in the enlisted grades, there is an exceedingly high concentration of Negroes in the lowest ratings, particularly in the Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard. Almost 80 percent of the Negro sailors are serving as cooks, stewards, and steward's mates; less than two percent of the whites are assigned to duty in the same capacity. Almost 15 percent of all white enlisted marines are in the three highest grades; less than 2½ percent of the Negro marines fall in the same category. The disparities in the Coast Guard are similarly great. The difference in the Army is somewhat smaller, but still significant: Less than nine percent of the Negro personnel are in the first three grades, while almost 16 percent of the whites hold these ranks.

Many factors other than discrimination contribute to this result. However, it is clear that discrimination is one of the major elements which keeps the services from attaining the objectives which they have set for themselves.…

3. The Right to Freedom of Conscience and Expression … At the present time, in our opinion, the most immediate threat to the right to freedom of opinion and expression is indirect. It comes from efforts to deal with those few people in our midst who would destroy democracy. There are two groups whose refusal to accept and abide by the democratic process is all too clear. The first are the Communists whose counterparts in many countries have proved, by their treatment of those with whom they disagree, that their ideology does not include a belief in universal civil rights. The second are the native Fascists. Their statements and their actions as well as those of their foreign counterparts prove them to be equally hostile to the American heritage of freedom and equality.

It is natural and proper for good citizens to worry about the activities of these groups. Every member of this Committee shares that concern. Communists and Fascists may assert different objectives. This does not obscure the identity of the means which both are willing to use to further themselves. Both often use the words and symbols of democracy to mask their totalitarian tactics. But their concern for civil rights is always limited to themselves. Both are willing to lie about their political views when it is convenient. They feel no obligation to come before the public openly and say who they are and what they really want.

This Committee unqualifiedly opposes any attempt to impose special limitations on the rights of these people to speak and assemble. Our national past offers us two great touchstones to resolve the dilemma of maintaining the right to free expression and yet protecting our democracy against its enemies. One was offered by Jefferson in his first inaugural address: "If there be any among us who wish to dissolve the Union, or to change its republican form, let them stand undisturbed as monuments of the safety with which error of opinion may be tolerated where reason is left free to combat it." The second is the doctrine of "clear and present danger." This was laid down as a working principle by the Supreme Court in 1919 in Schenck v. United States in an opinion written by Justice Holmes. It says that no limitation of freedom of expression shall be made unless "the words are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent." The next year in a dissenting opinion in Schaefer v. United States Justice Brandeis added this invaluable word of advice about the application of the doctrine: "Like many other rules for human conduct, it can be applied correctly only by the exercise of good judgment, and in the exercise of good judgment, calmness is, in time of deep feeling and on subjects which excite passion, as essential as fearlessness and honesty."

It is our feeling that the present threat to freedom of opinion grows out of the failure of some private and public persons to apply these standards. Specifically, public excitement about "Communists" has gone far beyond the dictates of the "good judgment" and "calmness" of which [justices] Holmes and Brandeis spoke. A state of near hysteria now threatens to inhibit the freedom of genuine democrats.

At the same time we are afraid that the "reason" upon which Jefferson relied to combat error is hampered by the successful effort of some totalitarians to conceal their true nature. To expect people to reject totalitarians, when we do not provide mechanisms to guarantee that essential information is available, is foolhardy. These two concerns go together. If we fall back upon hysteria and repression as our weapons against totalitarians, we will defeat ourselves. Communists want nothing more than to be lumped with freedom-loving non-Communists. This simply makes it easier for them to conceal their true nature and to allege that the term "Communist" is "meaningless." Irresponsible opportunists who make it a practice to attack every person or group with whom they disagree as "Communists" have thereby actually aided their supposed "enemies." At the same time we cannot let these abuses deter us from the legitimate exposing of real Communists and real Fascists. Moreover, the same zeal must be shown in defending our democracy against one group as against the other.…

4. The Right to Equality of Opportunity.

THE RIGHT TO EMPLOYMENT. A man's right to an equal chance to utilize fully his skills and knowledge is essential. The meaning of a job goes far beyond the paycheck. Good workers have a pride in the organization for which they work and feel satisfaction in the jobs they are doing. A witness before a congressional committee has recently said:

> Discrimination in employment damages lives, both the bodies and the minds, of those discriminated against and those who discriminate. It blights and perverts that healthy ambition to improve one's standard of living which we like to say is peculiarly American. It generates insecurity, fear, resentment, division and tension in our society.

In private business, in government, and in labor unions, the war years saw a marked advance both in hiring policies and in the removal of on-the-job discriminatory practices. Several factors contributed to this progress. The short labor market, the sense of unity among the people, and the leadership provided by the government all helped bring about a lessening of unfair employment practices. Yet we did not eliminate discrimination in employment. The Final Report of the federal Fair Employment Practice Committee, established in 1941 by President Roosevelt to eliminate discrimination in both government and private employment related to the war effort, makes this clear.

Four out of five cases which arose during the life of the Committee, concerned Negroes. However, many other minorities have suffered from discriminatory employment practices. The FEPC reports show that eight percent of the Committee's docket involved complaints of discrimination because of creed, and 70 percent of these concerned Jews. It should be noted that FEPC jurisdiction did not extend to financial institutions and the professions, where discrimination against Jews is especially prevalent. Witnesses before this Committee, representing still other minority groups, testified as follows:

The Japanese Americans: "We know, too, what discrimination in employment is. We know what it means to be unacceptable to union membership; what it means to be the last hired and first fired; what it means to have to work harder and longer for less wages. We know these things because we have been forced to experience them."

The Mexican Americans: "We opened an employment bureau (to help Mexican Americans) in our office last year for San Antonio. We wrote to business firms throughout the city, most of whom didn't answer. We would call certain firms and say that we heard they had an opening for a person in a stock room or some other type of work; or I would go myself. But thinking I was the same in prejudice as they, they would say, 'You know we never hire Mexicans.'"

The American Indians: "As with the Negroes, Indians are employed readily when there is a shortage of labor and they can't get anyone else. When times get better, they are the first ones to be released."

Discriminatory hiring practices. Discrimination is most acutely felt by minority group members in their inability to get a job suited to their qualifications. Exclusions of Negroes, Jews, or Mexicans in the process of hiring is effected in various ways by newspaper advertisements requesting only whites or gentiles to apply, by registration or application blanks on which a space is reserved for "race" or "religion," by discriminatory job orders placed with employment agencies, or by the arbitrary policy of a company official in charge of hiring.

A survey conducted by the United States Employment Service and contained in the Final Report of the Fair Employment Practice Committee reveals that of the total job orders received by USES offices in 11 selected areas during the period of February 1 15, 1946, 24 percent of the orders were discriminatory. Of 38,195 orders received, 9,171 included specifications with regard to race, citizenship, religion, or some combination of these factors.

The National Community Relations Advisory Council has studied hiring practices since V-J Day. A 1946 survey of the practices of 134 private employment agencies in 10 cities (Boston, Chicago, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Detroit, Kansas City, Milwaukee, Philadelphia, St. Louis, and San Francisco) disclosed that 89 percent of these agencies included questions covering religion on their registration forms. In Chicago, a statistical count of discriminatory job orders was made by one of the largest commercial agencies in the city. This revealed that 60 percent of the executive jobs, 50 percent of the sales executive jobs, and 41 percent of the male clerical openings, and 24 percent of the female clerical openings were closed to Jews. Fully 83 percent of all orders placed with the agency carried discriminatory specifications. A companion study of help-wanted ads conducted in eight major cities during corresponding weeks in 1945 and 1946 showed that while the total volume of help-wanted advertising had declined, there was an over-all increase of 195 percent in discriminatory ads for 1946 over 1945.

The minority job seeker often finds that there are fields of employment where application is futile no matter how able or well-trained he is. Many northern business concerns have an unwritten rule against appointing Jews to executive positions; railroad management and unions discourage the employment of Negroes as engineers or conductors.…

There are six states which have laws directed against discrimination in private employment. The New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, and Connecticut statutes have strong enforcement provisions. In general, the statutes in these four states make it unlawful for employers to discriminate in hiring, firing, or conditions of employment, or for labor unions to exclude, expel, or discriminate, because of race, color, creed, or national origin. They also prohibit the use of discriminatory help wanted ads and job applications by employers and employment agencies. State commissions are empowered to investigate complaints, to hold hearings, to attempt to conciliate, to issue cease-and-desist orders, and finally, to seek court enforcement of these orders. Indiana and Wisconsin have antidiscrimination statutes without enforcement provisions. The commissions in these two states serve therefore as educational and advisory agencies.…

THE RIGHT TO EDUCATION. The United States has made remarkable progress toward the goal of universal education for its people. The number and variety of its schools and colleges are greater than ever before. Student bodies have become increasingly representative of all the different peoples who make up our population. Yet we have not finally eliminated prejudice and discrimination from the operation of either our public or our private schools and colleges. Two inadequacies are extremely serious. We have failed to provide Negroes and, to a lesser extent, other minority group members with equality of educational opportunities in our public institutions, particularly at the elementary and secondary school levels. We have allowed discrimination in the operation of many of our private institutions of higher education, particularly in the North with respect to Jewish students.

Discrimination in public schools. The failure to give Negroes equal educational opportunities is naturally most acute in the South, where approximately 10 million Negroes live. The South is one of the poorer sections of the country and has at best only limited funds to spend on its schools. With 34.5 percent of the country's population, 17 southern states and the District of Columbia have 39.4 percent of our school children. Yet the South has only one-fifth of the taxpaying wealth of the nation. Actually, on a percentage basis, the South spends a greater share of its income on education than do the wealthier states in other parts of the country. For example, Mississippi, which has the lowest expenditure per school child of any state, is ninth in percentage of income devoted to education. A recent study showed Mississippi spending 3.41 percent of its income for education as against New York's figure of only 2.61 percent. But this meant $400 per classroom unit in Mississippi, and $4,100 in New York. Negro and white school children both suffer because of the South's basic inability to match the level of educational opportunity provided in other sections of the nation.

But it is the South's segregated school system which most directly discriminates against the Negro. This segregation is found today in 17 southern states and the District of Columbia. Poverty-stricken though it was after the close of the Civil War, the South chose to maintain two sets of public schools, one for whites and one for Negroes. With respect to education, as well as to other public services, the Committee believes that the "separate but equal" rule has not been obeyed in practice. There is a marked difference in quality between the educational opportunities offered white children and Negro children in the separate schools. Whatever test is used expenditure per pupil, teachers' salaries, the number of pupils per teacher, transportation of students, adequacy of school buildings and educational equipment, length of school term, extent of curriculum Negro students are invariably at a disadvantage. Opportunities for Negroes in public institutions of higher education in the South particularly at the professional graduate school level are severely limited.

Statistics in support of these conclusions are available. Figures provided by the United States Office of Education for the school year, 1943 44, show that the average length of the school term in the areas having separate schools was 173.5 days for whites, and 164 for Negroes; the number of pupils per teacher was 28 for white and 34 for Negroes; and the average annual salary for Negro teachers was lower than that for white teachers in all but three of the 18 areas.…

The South has made considerable progress in the last decade in narrowing the gap between educational opportunities afforded the white children and that afforded Negro children. For example, the gap between the length of the school year for whites and the shorter one for Negroes has been narrowed from 14.8 days in 1939 40 to 9.5 days in 1943 44. Similarly, the gap in student load per teacher in white and Negro schools has dropped from 8.5 students in 1939 40 to six students in 1943 44.

In spite of the improvement which is undoubtedly taking place, the Committee is convinced that the gap between white and Negro schools can never be completely eliminated by means of state funds alone. The cost of maintaining separate, but truly equal, school systems would seem to be utterly prohibitive in many of the southern states. It seems probable that the only means by which such a goal can finally be won will be through federal financial assistance. The extension of the federal grant-in-aid for educational purposes, already available to the land-grant colleges and, for vocational education, to the secondary school field, seems both imminent and desirable.

Whether the federal grant-in-aid should be used to support the maintenance of separate schools is an issue that the country must soon face.

In the North, segregation in education is not formal, and in some states is prohibited. Nevertheless, the existence of residential restrictions in many northern cities has had discriminatory effects on Negro education. In Chicago, for example, the schools which are most crowded and employ double shift schedules are practically all in Negro neighborhoods.

Other minorities encounter discrimination. Occasionally Indian children attending public schools in the western states are assigned to separate classrooms. Many Texas schools segregate Mexican American children in separate schools. In California segregation of Mexican American children was also practiced until recently. The combined effect of a federal court ruling, and legislative action repealing the statute under which school boards claimed authority to segregate, seems to have ended this pattern of discrimination in California schools.…

THE RIGHT TO HOUSING. Equality of opportunity to rent or buy a home should exist for every American. Today, many of our citizens face a double barrier when they try to satisfy their housing needs. They first encounter a general housing shortage which makes it difficult for any family without a home to find one. They then encounter prejudice and discrimination based upon race, color, religion or national origin, which places them at a disadvantage in competing for the limited housing that is available. The fact that many of those who face this double barrier are war veterans only underlines the inadequacy of our housing record.…

The restrictive covenant. Under rulings of the Supreme Court, it is legally impossible to segregate housing on a racial or religious basis by zoning ordinance. Accordingly, the restrictive covenant has become the most effective modern method of accomplishing such segregation. Restrictive covenants generally take the form of agreements written into deeds of sale by which property owners mutually bind themselves not to sell or lease to an "undesirable." These agreements have thus far been enforceable by court action. Through these covenants large areas of land are barred against use by various classes of American citizens. Some are directed against only one minority group, others against a list of minorities. These have included Armenians, Jews, Negroes, Mexicans, Syrians, Japanese, Chinese and Indians.

While we do not know how much land in the country is subject to such restrictions, we do know that many areas, particularly large cities in the North and West, such as Chicago, Cleveland, Washington, D.C., and Los Angeles, are widely affected. The amount of land covered by racial restrictions in Chicago has been estimated at 80 percent. Students of the subject state that virtually all new subdivisions are blanketed by these covenants. Land immediately surrounding ghetto areas is frequently restricted in order to prevent any expansion in the ghetto.…

The purpose of the restrictive covenant can only effectively be achieved in the final analysis by obtaining court orders putting the power of the state behind the enforcement of the private agreement. While our American courts thus far have permitted judicial power to be utilized for these ends, the Supreme Court of Ontario has recently refused to follow this course. The Ontario judge, calling attention to the policy of the United Nations against racial or religious discrimination, said:

> In my opinion, nothing could be more calculated to create or deepen divisions between existing religious and ethnic groups in this province than the sanction of a method of land transfer which would permit the segregation and confinement of particular groups to par> ticular business or residential areas, or conversely, would exclude particular groups from particular business or residential areas.

There is eminent judicial and professional opinion in this country that our courts cannot constitutionally enforce racial restrictive covenants. In a recent California case a lower court judge held that the courts could not enforce such an agreement. And in a strong dissenting opinion in a recent covenant case, Justice Edgerton of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, said:

> Suits like these, and the ghetto system they enforce are among our conspicuous failures to live together in peace. The question in these cases is not whether law should punish racial discrimination, or even whether law should try to prevent racial discrimination, or even whether law should interfere with it in any way. The question is whether law should affirmatively support and enforce racial discrimination.…

THE RIGHT TO HEALTH SERVICE. Increased attention is being given throughout the United States to the health needs of our people. Minority groups are sharing in the improvements which are taking place. But there is serious discrimination in the availability of medical care, and many segments of our population do not measure up to the standards of health which have been attained by our people as a whole.

For example, the death rate from all causes for the entire country in 1945 was 10.5 per thousand of estimated population. The Chinese, however, had a rate of 12.8; the Negroes, 12.0; the Indians, 12.0; and the Japanese, 11.5. Similarly, many diseases strike minorities much harder than the majority groups. Tuberculosis accounts for the death of more than twice as many Negroes as whites. Among Indians in rural United States, the death rate from tuberculosis is more than 10 times as high as that for whites; in Alaska, the native deaths from this cause are over 30 times greater. In Texas, seven Latin Americans died of tuberculosis for every Anglo American. Infant deaths furnish another example of this pattern. On a nationwide basis, the infant mortality rate was more than half again as high for Negroes as for whites. In Texas, it was almost three times as high for Latin as for Anglo infants. Maternal deaths show like disproportions. In New York City, where the vast majority of the Puerto Ricans in this country are located, reports from social workers and city health authorities indicate that the frequency of illness among the Puerto Ricans is much higher than among other groups.

There are many factors which contribute to the discrepancies between the health of the majority and the minorities. As has already been noted, our minorities are seriously handicapped by their economic status. Frequently, because of poverty, they are unable to afford even the minimum of medical care or a diet adequate to build up resistance to disease. The depressed economic status of many of our minorities combined with restrictive covenants in housing prevents them from living in a sanitary, health-giving environment. Children who are not admitted to clean, healthful playgrounds must find their fun in the crowded, dirty areas in which they are allowed. Discrimination in education withholds from many people the basic information and knowledge so essential to good health.

A more direct cause of unequal opportunity in the field of health is the discriminatory pattern that prevails with respect to medical facilities and personnel. Many hospitals will not admit Negro patients. The United States Public Health Service estimates on the basis of a preliminary survey that only approximately 15,000 hospital beds out of a total of one and one-half million beds are presently available to Negroes. Thus, though Negroes constitute about ten percent of the population, only one percent of the hospital beds are open to them. In Chicago, a study by the Mayor's Commission on Human Relations in 1946 disclosed that "although most hospital officials denied the existence of a discriminatory admission policy, Negroes represented a negligible percentage of patients admitted."

The situation is further complicated by the shortage of medical personnel available for the treatment of patients from minority groups. This is particularly evident among the Negroes; in 1937, only 35 percent of southern Negro babies were delivered by doctors, as compared to 90 percent of northern babies of both races. There were in 1940 only 3,530 Negro physicians and surgeons; 7,192 trained and student Negro nurses; and 1,471 Negro dentists in a total Negro population of 13,000,000. The ratio of Negro physicians to the total Negro population was about one to 3,377, while that of the total number of physicians to the general population of the country was one to 750. Moreover, a high proportion of these were employed in the North. In the South, with a Negro population of almost 10,000,000, there were in 1940 about 2,000 Negro doctors, or only one to every 4,900 colored persons.

One important reason for this acute shortage of skilled medical men is the discriminatory policy of our medical schools in admitting minority students.

Medical schools graduate approximately 5,000 students a year, but only about 145 of these are Negro. And of these 145, 130 are from two Negro schools; thus, only about fifteen Negroes are graduated from all the other medical schools of the country each year.

To these handicaps must be added the refusal of some medical societies and many hospitals to admit Negro physicians and interns for practice. Denied the facilities and training which are available to other doctors, Negro members of the profession are often unable to keep abreast of developments in medicine and to qualify as specialists. This discrimination contributes to the state of Negro health.

Though the expectation of life at birth is still lower for nonwhites than whites, the relative increase in life expectancy between 1930 and 1940 was nearly twice as great for nonwhites as whites. The life expectancy of Negro males in this period increased 9.9 percent; of Negro females, 11.5 per cent; of white males and females, 6.0 per cent and 7.0 percent respectively. However, the figure for white persons is still appreciably higher than for nonwhite persons; white males can expect to live sixty-three years as compared with fifty-two for Negro males, and white females sixty-seven years compared with fifty-five years for Negro females.

Progress has been made in reducing Negro deaths due to tuberculosis, diphtheria, whooping cough, diarrhea, enteritis, and syphilis. Among the Mexicans in Texas, vigorous programs have been undertaken by federal and local officials. Baby clinics, home nursing classes, family life courses, maternity clinics and other measures have been established. The Indian Service now operates 69 hospitals and sanatoria in the United States, 7 in Alaska; 14 school health centers; and 100 field dispensaries. Special efforts are being made to combat tuberculosis, a leading cause of illness and death among Indians. Another sign of progress is the decision of the American Nurses Association, in 1946, to accept all qualified applicants as members of the national organization, even when they cannot, for local reasons, enter county societies.

EXECUTIVE ORDER

ESTABLISHING THE PRESIDENT'S COMMITTEE ON EQUALITY OF TREATMENT AND OPPORTUNITY IN THE ARMED SERVICES

WHEREAS it is essential that there be maintained in the armed services of the United States the highest standards of democracy, with equality of treatment and opportunity for all those who serve in our country's defense:

NOW, THEREFORE, by virtue of the authority vested in me as President of the United States, by the Constitution and the statutes of the United States, and as Commander in Chief of the armed services, it is hereby ordered as follows:

1. It is hereby declared to be the policy of the President that there shall be equality of treatment and opportunity for all persons in the armed services without regard to race, color, religion or national origin. This policy shall be put into effect as rapidly as possible, having due regard to the time required to effectuate any necessary changes without impairing efficiency or morale.

2. There shall be created in the National Military Establishment an advisory committee to be known as the President's Committee on Equality of Treatment and Opportunity in the Armed Services, which shall be composed of seven members to be designated by the President.

3. The Committee is authorized on behalf of the President to examine into the rules, procedures and practices of the armed services in order to determine in what respect such rules, pro-

"There shall be equality of treatment and opportunity for all persons in the armed services without regard to race."

Overview

In 1948 racial divisions in the United States continued to run deep, but major changes in the social and legal climate were about to occur. During World War II, which the United States entered in 1941 and fought until the war's end in 1945, African Americans and other minorities, including Native Americans and Japanese Americans, fought with great distinction. On the home front, minority-group women made major contributions to the war effort. Nevertheless, segregation in nearly every facet of American life remained entrenched nowhere more so than in the U.S. armed forces.

In response to growing pressure to remedy this state of affairs, President Harry S. Truman issued Executive Order 9981. Specifically, the executive order was written with the intent of "Establishing the President's Committee on Equality of Treatment and Opportunity in the Armed Forces." The purpose of the order then was twofold. One purpose was to declare that it would be the policy of the United States to provide equality of opportunity for members of the armed forces without regard to race, color, religion, or national origin. In this sense, armed forces desegregation could be said to have launched the civil rights movement that dominated the 1950s and 1960s. The second, more specific, purpose was to establish a seven-member advisory committee to study and recommend specific steps that the armed forces could take to implement the desegregation policy. The order granted the committee investigative authority and ordered the armed forces and other federal executive agencies to provide testimony and documents that the committee needed to carry out its mandate.

Throughout American history, African Americans and members of other minority groups fought in the nation's wars with distinction. However, they did so generally in separate units that were segregated from all-white units. During the Civil War (1861 1865), for example, "colored" brigades were formed in the North, and even the Confederate States of America, starved for troops late in the war, formed brigades of black soldiers (although none ever fought).

In the decades following the Civil War, large numbers of African Americans, many of them former slaves, served in the U.S. Navy, but through the early decades of the twentieth century, they worked primarily in menial and service jobs. In the U.S. Navy and the Marine Corps, for example, many African Americans were pushed into the Steward's Branch, where they worked as cooks and served as waiters in the officers' mess halls. This state of affairs continued through World War II. During the war and its aftermath, minority groups fought in segregated units. There were few African American officers, and they all commanded African American units. The Marine Corps included few African Americans in its ranks, and the navy continued to limit the service of African Americans to such positions as cooks and stewards. Most military leaders believed that integrated units, where blacks and whites served side by side, would produce conflict and lower the morale of the troops.

President Franklin D. Roosevelt took an early step to remedy this situation in June 1941 when he issued Executive Order 8802. Arguing that the defense of the nation required the participation of all groups, he ordered that all defense contractors eliminate discrimination in employment. More specifically, he ordered that blacks be included in job-training programs at defense plants. He also ordered the formation of a Fair Employment Practices Committee. In 1942 Roosevelt took another step when he directed the navy to review its racial policies. The navy responded by allowing blacks to fill more positions in technical specialties, such as construction, supply, aviation, metalworking, and shore patrol. Later that year, as the military was rapidly increasing its manpower levels, Roosevelt issued a further executive order requiring that 10 percent of new draftees be black.

Roosevelt's executive orders had no impact on segregation in the military, but they did increase the number of African American troops. Although African Americans made up about 10 percent of the population and although about one million African Americans served during World War II, blacks continued to be assigned to segregated units. Opportunities for promotion were limited, black sailors were rarely allowed to serve at sea, and most blacks even those trained for more specialized and technical positions continued to fill service positions. Throughout this period, the navy took steps to integrate its officer corps by training twelve line officers and one warrant officer at a special training school in 1943. These officers, called the "Golden Thirteen," were the first black officers in the navy's history. Nevertheless, they were trained at a segregated school, and while some 160,000 African Americans served in the navy during World War II, just fifty-eight were officers. All of these were lower-ranking officers who served under the supervision of a white officer.

In the years immediately following the war, the U.S. Department of Defense faced a severe manpower shortage as those who had served in the war left for civilian employment. Nevertheless, the armed services continued to deter African Americans from serving. They tried to ensure that the proportion of African Americans remained no higher than 10 percent primarily by demanding that African Americans achieve higher scores on enlistment tests than their white counterparts. However, as the cold war with the Soviet Union deepened, it became apparent to President Truman and others that cutting off a valuable population of potential military recruits could hamper the nation's defense.

During these years, African American leaders were clamoring for changes in the nation's attitudes toward civil rights. One of the most outspoken leaders, A. Philip Randolph, formed the Committee against Jim Crow in Military Service; "Jim Crow" refers to the legal and social systems that segregated African Americans and kept them in inferior positions. Randolph and other African American leaders raised the possibility that black workers would go on strike, a situation that would have added to the economic turmoil caused by the nation's shift from a wartime to a peacetime economy. Additionally, the horrors of World War II, with the wholesale denial of human rights on the part of the German Nazi Party and the expansionist Japanese Empire, focused attention on human rights throughout the world. In 1948 the United Nations would issue its Universal Declaration of Human Rights, further drawing attention to the pressing issues of discrimination and civil rights. African American soldiers who served in Europe in the postwar years found greater acceptance and tolerance there, and they demanded this same level of acceptance from white American society.

Helping to improve the status of black military personnel was the appointment of James Forrestal as secretary of the navy. His predecessor, Frank Knox, had opposed integration, but Forrestal believed that integration might be a way to reduce racial tensions in the military. To that end, in 1944 1945 he ordered an experiment in which black personnel were placed on twenty-five ships at sea. The experiment proved successful, with few racial incidents reported.

It was in this climate that President Truman took on the issue of civil rights and desegregation in the years following World War II. In 1946 he created the President's Committee on Civil Rights. The committee recommended "more adequate and effective means and procedures for the protection of the civil rights of the people of the United States." In 1947 the committee issued its final report, To Secure These Rights, making specific recommendations for ways to ensure the civil rights of African Americans and other minority groups.

Truman urged Congress to enact the recommendations of the committee. However, he faced opposition from members of Congress, including southern senators who threatened to filibuster civil rights legislation. (The word filibuster refers to any delaying tactics, such as long, continuous speeches, to block action on proposed legislation.) Frustrated with Congress, Truman took matters into his own hands. He appointed an African American to a federal judgeship, he strengthened the civil rights division of the Department of Justice, and he appointed several African Americans to high-level administrative positions. Most important, he issued Executive Order 9981, calling for desegregation of the armed forces. Although the services resisted, they eventually implemented the president's order. By the end of the Korean War, segregation as a matter of military policy had largely ended.

About the Author

Harry S. Truman, the thirty-third president of the United States (1945 1953), was born in Lamar, Missouri, on May 8, 1884. (While it has become conventional to regard "S" as a middle initial, with a period, in fact the S does not stand for anything. It was his middle name, given to him by his parents to honor both of his grandfathers, whose names began with the letter S a practice not uncommon among people of Scots-Irish descent.) Early in his life, Truman worked as a drugstore clerk before turning to farming. In the 1920s he was co-owner of a men's clothing store, leading to his reputation as the "haberdasher" who became president. He was the nation's last president to serve without benefit of a college degree. In 1905 he joined the Missouri National Guard, remaining a member until 1911. An early goal was to attend the United States Military Academy at West Point, but extremely poor eyesight rendered this goal impossible. After the outbreak of World War I, he rejoined the National Guard; it is believed that he passed the eye examination by memorizing the eye chart. He served as a captain of an infantry battery in France, often organizing and disciplining his men with firmness. His experience as a military officer brought out leadership qualities that enabled him to succeed in politics.

Truman began his political career in 1922, when he was elected to the position of judge of the county court, though the position was not judicial but administrative. In 1933 he was appointed head of Federal Reemployment for Missouri, part of President Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal to overcome the effects of the Great Depression. In 1934 he was elected to the U.S. Senate, and in 1940 he was reelected, despite numerous allegations of irregularities and favoritism in the federal reemployment program. In 1944 Roosevelt, running for a fourth term as president, selected Truman as his running mate. The two were elected, but after just eighty-two days as vice president, Truman ascended to the presidency on April 12, 1945, upon Roosevelt's death.

The nearly eight years of Truman's presidency were eventful. He authorized the atomic bombing of Japan to end World War II. He then dealt with the labor turmoil and economic upheavals of the postwar years. He presided over the formation of the United Nations and the Marshall Plan for the reconstruction of Europe, the formation of the state of Israel, the Communist takeover of China, and increasing U.S. involvement in Indochina. The cold war with the Soviet Union deepened during the Berlin airlift of 1948 1949, the formation of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in 1949, and the Korean War (1950 1952). During the war Truman seized control of the striking steel industry in the interest of national security. One of the most noteworthy incidents of his administration was his reelection in 1948. Until the end of the campaign he badly trailed his opponent, Thomas Dewey. A famous photograph shows Truman holding a newspaper with the headline "Dewey Defeats Truman," run because few people had given Truman any chance to win. Truman died on December 26, 1972. He remains one of the nation's most popular presidents, highly regarded for his pragmatism and blunt outspokenness.

Executive Order 9981, similar to most executive orders, is relatively brief and to the point. The purpose of such an order is not to deal with details and procedures but to outline a broad policy or directive that the president wants to give the force of law. The first two paragraphs of the order contain a broad justification of the new policy. The president states that it is "essential" for the armed forces to maintain "standards of democracy" and for military personnel to have equality of opportunity. In the second paragraph, the president reiterates his authority as president and commander in chief to issue such an order.

Following the two introductory paragraphs are six specific goals. In the first, the president states that U.S. policy will ensure that all military personnel are treated equally without regard to their race, color, religion, or national origin. Although the status of African Americans in the military is of primary concern, the new policy applies to all ethnic, racial, and religious groups. While the president calls for the new policy to be implemented as soon as possible, he recognizes that it will not happen overnight that it has to happen in a way that maintains the efficiency and morale of the troops.

The second item creates a seven-member advisory committee called the President's Committee on Equality of Treatment and Opportunity in the Armed Forces. The president will appoint the members. The third item outlines the duties of the committee. These duties are to examine the policies and procedures of each of the armed forces with regard to racial segregation. The committee is to confer with and advise the secretaries of each of the military branches as well as the Department of Defense and to make recommendations to those branches and to the president.

The fourth item orders other agencies of the government's executive branch to cooperate with the committee as it gathers information, primarily by providing documents and the services of anyone who can help the committee. While the order does not say so, it was understood by all that the president, as the nation's chief executive officer, had the authority to compel cooperation only from the executive branch. The U.S. Constitution's separation of powers gives the president no authority over the legislative branch (Congress) or the judicial branch (the courts). Such agencies as the Department of Defense are part of the executive branch. The fifth item gives the committee the authority to compel testimony and to obtain documents from all federal executive departments in carrying out its work. The final item grants to the committee an indefinite life, noting that it will continue to exist until the president, through another executive order, terminates its existence.

Audience

The immediate audience for Executive Order 9981 was the Department of Defense and the commanders of the U.S. armed services, including the army, the army air forces (the precursor to today's air force, which is now a separate branch of the military), the coast guard, and the navy (including the Marine Corps). The U.S. Constitution identifies the president as the commander in chief of the nation's military, giving him the authority to order such a change in personnel policies. Through this executive order, the president instructed the various branches of the military to begin a program of desegregation.

A second, larger audience was the nation's population of African Americans and other groups defined in part by national origin, religion, and race. Although the executive order encompassed all such groups including, for example, Asian Americans, Hispanics, and Native Americans the reality was that the focus of the order was African Americans, who made up nearly 10 percent of the total U.S. population in the 1940s. By issuing this executive order, President Truman sought to assure African Americans that the federal government was making efforts to ensure racial equality. In this sense, the audience for Executive Order 9981 was the American population as a whole. The order was one of the first major steps on the part of the federal government to protect the rights of minorities. By issuing it, Truman sent a message to the American people that segregation was no longer to be tolerated.

A third audience was the U.S. Congress. In February 1948 the president spoke to Congress and urged the nation's senators and congressional representatives to address the problem of racial inequality. He pressed for the strengthening of civil rights laws, the establishment of a permanent commission on civil rights, protection against lynching, protection of the right to vote, the establishment of a fair employment commission, and other steps to promote civil rights. He believed, however, that Congress was not acting on these proposals as quickly and as forcefully as it should. In particular, he faced a filibuster (delaying tactics) by southern senators on civil rights legislation. By issuing Executive Order 9981, he was able to institute a major change without having to rely on Congress.

Impact

One of the essential problems that arose in connection with Executive Order 9981 and other documents bearing on racial matters in the military had to do with the definition of terms. Another problem concerned precisely how the president's policy might be implemented. Ultimately, the goal of the order was to have a completely integrated military, one in which no regard was given to race in the assignment of personnel to units, in their appointment to fill particular military jobs, and in the selection of officers. Many military commanders, however, believed that the forces under their command were "integrated" if there were units composed of African Americans attached to "parent" white units. Some military commanders, as well as legislators, believed that both blacks and whites should be allowed to serve in all-white or all-black units if they preferred to do so. Thus, for example, a battalion might have consisted of a number of all-white companies of soldiers and one all-black company, with the all-black company performing essentially the same job as the all-white companies. At bottom, the difficulty was distinguishing "segregation" from "discrimination." Some military commanders and legislators did not believe that a segregated military was discriminatory.

The result is that Truman's order did not have any immediate impact. Neither the army nor the navy altered its policies. The decision of these branches to maintain the status quo was based on their commanders' belief that they were already in compliance with the president's order because they were in compliance with such directives as Circular 124 and Circular Letter 48-46.

Through most of 1949, in the estimation of many historians, the armed services were slow in taking steps to implement the president's policy. Change, however, began to occur in late 1949. Both the navy and the air force significantly changed their racial policies, concluding that they needed to expand the pool of available sailors and airmen in a period when the size of the military was shrinking. The army was slower to respond, but finally, in 1950, the army issued Special Regulation 600-629-1, "Utilization of Negro Manpower in the Army," ordering that openings in critical specialties were to be filled without regard to race. The Marine Corps was slower still, but in 1951, during the Korean War, the corps ended its policy of segregation.

Other changes took place. Military recruiters no longer regarded the race of candidates for service. Training units were fully integrated. All-black units were gradually taken out of commission and replaced with fully integrated units.

Additional training was provided to ensure that African American enlistees could overcome the effects of poverty and poor schooling to succeed in the military. Finally, on October 30, 1954, the U.S. secretary of defense announced the abolishment of the last racially segregated unit in the military. In the decades that followed, the U.S. armed forces became a model for complete integration and for a culture in which race plays no role in determining a soldier's or a sailor's opportunities for advancement.

1. President Truman ordered the desegregation of the armed forces three years after the end of World War II. Discuss the impact of the war on his decision. What effect did the events of the war have on the position of African Americans and other minorities in the military?

2. The U.S. armed forces remained segregated until roughly 1950. However, the United States had participated in a number of wars throughout its history, including the Revolutionary War, the War of 1812, the Civil War, the Spanish American War, World War I, and World War II. To what extent did African Americans and other minorities, including Native Americans, take part in those wars? How did their participation change over time, if at all?

3. By 1948 the United States was entering the cold war with the Soviet Union. One of the battlegrounds on which this war would be fought was Korea. What impact did the cold war have on Truman's goal of desegregating the armed forces?

4. Some historians believe that in ordering desegregation of the armed forces, President Truman was motivated less by a desire for fairness and equality than by a desire to avoid labor strikes and other forms of public protest by African Americans. Further, they argue that the timing of the order suggests that Truman was trying to appeal to black voters in the upcoming 1948 presidential election. What evidence supports the view that Truman may have been motivated by politics rather than by a sense of what was right? What evidence suggests that this view is incorrect?

5. In 1954 the U.S. Supreme Court ordered the desegregation of the nation's public schools. To what extent did the desegregation of the armed forces contribute to the climate of public opinion that led to this decision?

6. In the 1990s President Bill Clinton dealt with the issue of gays and lesbians serving in the armed forces. To what extent was that issue similar to the issues Truman faced in the 1940s? What arguments that applied to African Americans in the 1940s were also applied to gays fifty years later? What arguments against allowing gays to serve in the military were also used in the 1940s in opposition to armed forces desegregation?

Executive Order 9981

Establishing the President's Committee on Equality of Treatment and Opportunity in the Armed Forces.

WHEREAS it is essential that there be maintained in the armed services of the United States the highest standards of democracy, with equality of treatment and opportunity for all those who serve in our country's defense:

NOW THEREFORE, by virtue of the authority vested in me as President of the United States, by the Constitution and the statutes of the United States, and as Commander in Chief of the armed services, it is hereby ordered as follows:

1. It is hereby declared to be the policy of the President that there shall be equality of treatment and opportunity for all persons in the armed services without regard to race, color, religion or national origin. This policy shall be put into effect as rapidly as possible, having due regard to the time required to effectuate any necessary changes without impairing efficiency or morale.

2. There shall be created in the National Military Establishment an advisory committee to be known as the President's Committee on Equality of Treatment and Opportunity in the Armed Services, which shall be composed of seven members to be designated by the President.

3. The Committee is authorized on behalf of the President to examine into the rules, procedures and practices of the Armed Services in order to determine in what respect such rules, procedures and practices may be altered or improved with a view to carrying out the policy of this order. The Committee shall confer and advise the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of the Army, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Air Force, and shall make such recommendations to the President and to said Secretaries as in the judgment of the Committee will effectuate the policy hereof.

4. All executive departments and agencies of the Federal Government are authorized and directed to cooperate with the Committee in its work, and to furnish the Committee such information or the services of such persons as the Committee may require in the performance of its duties.

5. When requested by the Committee to do so, persons in the armed services or in any of the executive departments and agencies of the Federal Government shall testify before the Committee and shall make available for use of the Committee such documents and other information as the Committee may require.

6. The Committee shall continue to exist until such time as the President shall terminate its existence by Executive order.

"The entire history of the Negro in this country has been a history of continuous, relentless progress over these barriers."

Overview

"The Barriers of Race Can Be Surmounted" Ralph J. Bunche's commencement address to the graduating class at Fisk University in Nashville, Tennessee, on May 30, 1949 is perhaps the most personal speech this normally private man ever made. Weeks earlier, after eighty-one days of nonstop negotiations on the Greek island of Rhodes, Bunche, the chief United Nations mediator for Palestine, successfully secured armistice agreements from the state of Israel and the Arab states of Egypt, Lebanon, Jordan, and Syria, bringing an end to the 1948 Arab-Israeli War. The Palestine Accords, as these agreements were known, earned Bunche international acclaim for bringing peace to the Middle East. In the United States the accords were seen as yet another triumph for a highly respected national figure, an African American whose career as a scholar and public servant had made him, at age forty-five, one of the most distinguished Americans of his generation.

In recognition of his public service, Fisk University awarded Bunche an honorary degree, the second of seventy that would come to him from universities in the United States, Canada, and Europe. One of the first of the historic black colleges and universities, Fisk held its first classes in Nashville's former Union army barracks in January 1866. The university became internationally known in subsequent decades for the Fisk Jubilee Singers, who introduced audiences in America and Europe to Negro spirituals as a unique American art form. Fisk was the first historic black college to earn accreditation from the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools (1930) and approval from the Association of American Universities (1933). Booker T. Washington, the most powerful African American in the country at the end of the nineteenth century, was on Fisk's board of trustees. A prominent early graduate was W. E. B. (William Edward Burghardt) Du Bois, class of 1888, whose scholarly writings influenced generations of African American intellectuals, including Ralph Bunche.

Context

In 1903 Du Bois, a professor of economics and history at Atlanta University in Georgia, published The Souls of Black Folk: Essays and Sketches, a seminal study of post Civil War African Americans. Its second chapter opens with the now famous sentence: "The problem of the twentieth century is the problem of the color-line the relation of the darker to the lighter races of men in Asia and Africa, in America and the islands of the sea" a stark assessment of race relations in 1900 that proved to be dead on the mark.

In 1900, 8.8 million African Americans lived in the United States. They experienced the problem of the color line on a daily basis, especially in the rural South, where an estimated 90 percent of them lived, the majority as sharecroppers renting their fields from white landowners. Their number had doubled from the 4.4 million in the census of 1860, when all but some four hundred and eighty thousand were chattel slaves. In the intervening years, slavery, of course, had been abolished, and constitutionally African Americans were free. In reality, however, their freedom throughout the southern states was substantially diminished by harsh Jim Crow laws that, since the end of Reconstruction in 1877, restricted or denied African Americans access to housing, medical care, public parks and pools, public transportation, and all levels of education because of their race. This segregation of blacks from whites was held to be constitutional by the U.S. Supreme Court in Plessy v. Ferguson in 1896, when the Court ruled that laws based on a "separate but equal" doctrine did not violate the Fourteenth Amendment's "equal protection" clause. In subsequent decisions well into the 1930s, the Court extended the reach of Plessy to almost every area of daily life in the South.

Efforts by African Americans to protest their status as second-class citizens often brought with them swift punishment by local police and courts or by lawless mobs that, according to statistics from the Tuskegee Institute, lynched 3,445 African American men, women, and children from 1882 to 1964. Few arrests were made, and when they were, all-white juries commonly set the accused killer or killers free. Sharecroppers who opposed Jim Crow laws often lost their leases and their lands; workers in towns were simply fired.

In consequence, as economic conditions worsened and racial violence increased after 1910, hundreds and then thousands of African Americans left the region for northern cities and the West in search of jobs, housing, and political and civil rights. By the 1930s the first wave of this Great Migration had carried 1.6 million African Americans out of the South. The seven million who remained behind with notable exceptions did little to openly challenge the segregated world in which they lived.

That passive accommodation to Jim Crow was exactly what Booker T. Washington, the president of the Tuskegee Institute in Alabama, proposed in his Atlanta Exposition Address at the Cotton States and International Exposition in Atlanta, Georgia, in September 1895. Speaking to a largely white audience, Washington, a former slave, argued that "my race" should for the moment abandon its demands for political power, civil rights, and higher education for its young people to concentrate on vocational and industrial training so that they could earn their rightful place in American life. He counseled, "It is at the bottom of life we must begin, and not at the top." African Americans would prosper and gain acceptance "as we learn to dignify and glorify common labor, and put brains and skill into the common occupations of life." Agitating "questions of social equality," he warned, "is the extremist folly." He emphasized his view that the separation of the races was the way to racial harmony: "We can be as separate as the fingers, yet one as the hand in all things essential to mutual progress."

Washington's call for conciliation and gradualism was an instant success with the white world both north and south, as was his 1901 autobiography, Up from Slavery, which carried a similar message. In time, a majority of African Americans accepted his precepts as he gained a national reputation as the voice of black America. White industrial leaders and philanthropists underwrote Washington's efforts to build five thousand rural schoolhouses throughout the South in which to teach young black people the virtues of honest labor and civic responsibility. He was invited to the White House, and the philosopher William James asked for his criticism of a draft essay on race. Having earned the white world's respect, Washington came to hold great power: Almost all charitable funds earmarked for African Americans passed through his hands; he was consulted on personnel matters; and he controlled coverage of black news in African American newspapers, thereby suppressing, when necessary, opposition to his advocacy of vocational training and his continuing counsel of compromise. To the white world he was the Wizard of Tuskegee who had created racial peace.

The principal challenge to Washington came from the leading African American intellectual of his time, W. E. B. Du Bois, a native of Great Barrington, Massachusetts, who held degrees from Fisk and Harvard (where he was the first African American to earn a PhD) and had studied at the University of Berlin. A brilliant and unyielding polemicist, he argued in the third chapter of The Souls of Black Folk that the effect of Washington's approach to racial harmony had shifted the burden of the Negro problem to the Negro's shoulders, "when in fact the burden belongs to the nation."

The Atlanta Exposition Address, Du Bois wrote, was in reality "the Atlanta Compromise." Its program for racial peace had won the approval of the South and the admiration of the North not because it benefited African Americans but because it promised to end "decades of bitter complaint" that had unsettled both regions. Washington's program of "of industrial education, conciliation of the South, and submission and silence to civil and political rights" was a series of half-truths that over time would prove counterproductive to securing long-term racial equality. After more than a decade of "tendering the palm branch," Du Bois noted, African Americans had been disenfranchised, were given second-class status with all its "emasculating effects," and had seen financial aid for their higher education gradually withdrawn.

These problems would be resolved, Du Bois declared in The Souls of Black Folk, only through "ceaseless agitation and insistent demand for equality" and in "the use of force of every sort: moral suasion, propaganda, and where possible even physical resistance." He wrote in his 1903 essay "The Talented Tenth" that the way forward would require effective African American leaders: "The Negro race, like all races, is going to be saved by its exceptional men," that is, by "the talented tenth," who would be prepared for leadership through a rigorous higher education curriculum that would give them broad "knowledge of the world that was and is, and of the relation of men to it." There could be no compromise. As he declared in his 1906 address at the second annual meeting of the short-lived Niagara Movement an organization of African American intellectuals "We claim for ourselves every single right that belongs to a freeborn American." But as perceptive as Du Bois's assessments of "the Negro problem" were, they were not powerful enough to overcome Washington's policies of accommodation. The "ceaseless agitation and insistent demands" would have to wait for another time.

Forty-one years after Du Bois raised the issue of the color line as the central problem of the twentieth century, Gunnar Myrdal, a Swedish social scientist and economist, published An American Dilemma: The Negro Problem and Modern Democracy (1944), a two-volume report on African American life that essentially proved that Du Bois's statement was correct and that the issues he raised were largely unresolved. Initially commissioned by the Carnegie Corporation in 1938 its publication delayed by World War II the report was based on a two-year field study by Myrdal and forty-eight researchers, who conducted interviews throughout the South and elsewhere. Ralph Bunche, then a professor of political science at Howard University, was Myrdal's chief assistant and a cowriter of the final report.

An American Dilemma documented an enlarging division between American values and the daily lives of African Americans. In every part of society, they were treated differently from whites: in education, employment, housing, transportation, and recreational facilities. This was especially true, Myrdal wrote, in the South, where the majority of African Americans lived and where they faced racial bias and unfair treatment as a direct result of the local authorities' failure to enforce the Constitution. Throughout the United States, discrimination regularly bred further discrimination.

Despite the data he and his team assembled, Myrdal was optimistic about America's ability to close the racial divide, principally by returning the nation to its founding principles. He advocated institutional changes in education and job creation and urged government-supported acceleration of black emigration from the rural South to the industrial North and West. In the end, however, he placed his faith in American idealism and in the Constitution as the means by which America could transform and transcend the segregated world that had kept African Americans subordinated and marginalized for so long.

Bunche's contribution to An American Dilemma was substantial. Like other black intellectuals of his generation, he wanted to understand what it meant to be black in America, so he served enthusiastically as Myrdal's personal guide on several extended trips through the Jim Crow South. He researched and wrote four chapters for the book, in which he focused, among other topics, on the political status of Negroes under the New Deal and on the nature of black leadership. Although his analyses and conclusions reflect something of W. E. B. Du Bois's arguments on these subjects particularly those in "The Talented Tenth" Bunche's voice is more temperate. He deplores the damage segregation has done to his race, but unlike Du Bois he does not despair. Rather, he shares Myrdal's optimism that the fairness and justice embodied in American idealism can and will effect real change. That the barriers to racial equality could be surmounted was the message he would bring to Fisk University in 1949.

About the Author

Ralph Johnson Bunche, Nobel laureate, UN official, international mediator, university scholar, and arguably the most celebrated African American of his generation, was born in Detroit, Michigan, on August 7, 1903. His father, Fred Bunche, was a barber; his mother, Olive Agnes Bunche, fostered in him a love of learning. Following the birth of a daughter, Grace, in 1915, the family moved to Albuquerque, New Mexico, in the hope that the dry climate would aid Olive Bunche's health problems, but she died within months of their relocation. The father's death came three months later, and the two orphaned children were placed in the care of their maternal grandmother, Lucy Taylor Johnson.

Johnson took the children to Los Angeles, where they lived in a mixed-race but largely white neighborhood. A tiny woman with a fierce will, Johnson (always called "Nana" by Bunche) refused to let school authorities enroll her grandson in a commercial training program a common fate of African American youngsters in a white school because, she insisted, he was going to college. Valedictorian of the class of 1922 at Jefferson High School, he was nonetheless denied membership in the school's academic honor society because of his race. (In 1952, when Bunche was world famous and had been heaped with honors, the high school offered him belated admission to the society.)

Bunche won an academic scholarship to the University of California at Los Angeles, where he starred in football and basketball until he sustained a knee injury that would bother him throughout his life and make him ineligible for military service in World War II. He was elected to Phi Beta Kappa and earned a bachelor of arts degree in 1927. At Harvard he earned a master of arts (1928) and a doctorate in international relations (1934), and he completed postdoctoral studies at Northwestern University, the London School of Economics, and the University of Cape Town, South Africa. Despite that résumé, he, like other African American scholars at the time, was not recruited by any white university and instead earned tenure at Howard University, a historically black college in Washington, D.C., where he founded and led the political science department.

In the early years of his teaching, Bunche was considered a radical in his political philosophy and in faculty politics. He was active on behalf of the NAACP in a number of demonstrations against segregation in Washington, but like other activists of the period he found little support from the local authorities. As a scholar, he developed an expertise on African colonialism and wrote a number of articles on racism in America that influenced the civil rights movement in the 1960s. In 1938 he was named chief associate to Gunnar Myrdal for the Carnegie Corporation's two-year study of African American life in America and accompanied Myrdal through the South to conduct interviews and gather data. On one occasion he and Myrdal drove all night across two states to elude a lynch mob that took exception to the kinds of questions the two were asking. Bunche wrote four chapters of the finished report, which was published in 1944 as An American Dilemma.

During World War II, Bunche worked in the War Department as an African and Far Eastern specialist and in the State Department, where, in 1944, he joined the team that helped to design the United Nations. A delegate to the San Francisco Conference in 1945, he wrote the two chapters of the UN Charter on colonial territories and trusteeships. In 1947 he joined the UN Secretariat as director of its Trusteeship Department, overseeing decolonization in Africa and Asia. In his twenty-two-year career with the United Nations, Bunche secured an armistice in the first Arab-Israeli War of 1948, for which he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1950 (the first black man so honored). He directed UN peacekeeping efforts at the Suez Canal (1956), in the Congo (1960), and in Cyprus (1964).

Bunche cared deeply about civil rights and was on occasion a blunt spokesman on their behalf, but most often, in keeping with his sensitive position at the United Natons, he worked out of the public eye. He served on the board of the NAACP for twenty-two years and in 1965 joined Martin Luther King, Jr., at marches in Selma and Montgomery, Alabama. Ill health forced him to retire in June 1971. At the time he was completing his fifteenth year as undersecretary for Special Political Affairs and principal adviser to the UN secretary-general. Bunche died on December 9, 1971.

Bunche's speech "The Barriers of Race Can Be Surmounted" was delivered within a few weeks of the peace agreements he had negotiated in the spring of 1949, bringing an end to an Arab-Israeli conflict in Palestine. Although he had been interviewed in the weeks following the peace talks and would shortly present his report on the Palestinian Accords to the United Nations, Bunche's appearance at Fisk University was an opportunity for him to reflect on his long career of teaching and public service, which had made him arguably the most visible and respected African American in the country. His speech, just over 2,200 words, is in many ways autobiographical; in it he deals with his fame and grapples with the question that W. E. B. Du Bois had first raised in The Souls of Black Folk nearly a half-century before: What does it mean to be a Negro in America?

It was appropriate for Bunche to raise that question at Fisk, a historically black school that had long been in the forefront of African American education. He spoke as the African American population nationally was approaching fifteen million, but only 13.7 percent of blacks had a high school diploma and only three hundred thousand held college degrees. The black population was again moving out of the South into the urban centers of the North, Midwest, and California in the second Great Migration, but whether in the rural South or the other regions of the country, most African Americans faced racial discrimination in its various forms and many saw themselves as second-class citizens.

Bunche speaks to these matters throughout using "Negro" rather than "African American," a term not current in his lifetime, to describe himself, his subject, and his audience. According to his biographer (who was also his friend and colleague at the United Nations), Brian Urquhart, Bunche almost always used that word because, he said, "It is an ethnic term with no objectionable connotation at all. It describes my ethnic roots, and I have always had a deep pride in those roots." On occasion he used "Black American."

Bunche notes at the outset that his remarks will be brief. (An experienced and fluent speaker, he probably spoke for fifteen minutes or less.) The introductory section in paragraphs 1 3 begins on a humorous note with Bunche's playful remarks about the traditional rituals that surround graduation day: the academic gowns and tasseled mortarboard hats; the entry of the graduates to the strains of a triumphal march; an audience of proud parents, families, and friends. He concludes, again humorously, that it is likely the graduates' celebrations actually preceded the day's ceremony.

Paragraphs 4 and 5 introduce Bunche's main theme: that the graduates before him are at once Americans, American citizens, and Negroes and that each of these identities carries with it a certain poignancy and a measure of responsibility. In paragraph 6, Bunche attempts to sketch briefly what it means to be American, emphasizing, as Myrdal had done in An American Dilemma, the idealism underlying the founding principles on which the nation is based. He speaks of inalienable rights and the dignity of man as the basis for "a great and virile democracy."

In paragraph 7, Bunche says it is the fundamental responsibility of every American citizen to preserve "a free and dignified existence" for all Americans. This leads him, in paragraphs 8 and 9, to examine briefly the irony of being a Negro in America. He is echoing here the dilemma that Du Bois introduced in his 1903 book, The Souls of Black Folk: that because of the color line African Americans must live behind the veil of race with a "double-consciousness," that is, with "a sense of always looking at one's self through the eyes of others." Negroes are Americans by birth, but because of their color, white Americans see them and treat them as a race apart, outsiders who are not really American.

In paragraphs 10 and 11, Bunche attacks the color line, asserting that the Fisk graduates, like Negroes everywhere, are "one hundred per cent American," and their goal is to enter the mainstream of American life. He dismisses the labels and stereotypes that keep them subordinate to white Americans. But he warns in paragraph 12 that it would be folly for him to tell them that their goal of attaining full citizenship is easily reached: To say that racism no longer endangers them "would be criminally misleading."

In paragraph 13, much like Myrdal in An American Dilemma, Bunche holds out hope that Negroes will secure their birthright as Americans because of the Constitution and the endorsement of the UN Charter, which he helped to write. Support for the Negroes' cause is building, he says, and time is on their side. But again, in a self-referential aside in paragraph 14, Bunche warns that the success of individual Negroes in crossing the color line is a rarity, so rare that it becomes front-page news. What lies behind this comment, of course, is his experience: Every triumph was shadowed by a racist setback. Bunche does not mention it here, but like other African American scholars of his generation who had earned doctorates from such schools as Harvard and Columbia, he was unable to find a teaching position at any white college or university. He had escaped lynch mobs in the South in 1938 while working with Gunnar Myrdal, and in 1948 he had rejected President Truman's offer of an appointment as undersecretary of state because he would have had to move to Washington from New York and submit to the Jim Crow laws that kept the capital city as segregated as any state in the South.

In paragraphs 15 through 18, Bunche lays out what the Fisk graduates and Negroes in general must do if they hope to enter the mainstream of American life. It is a capsule history of his own life, from his graduation as valedictorian of his high school class to his successes at Harvard graduate school to his rapid rise in the War Department and State Department during World War II and his recent triumphs with the United Nations. Although Bunche was too private and modest to name these successes outright, it is certain his listeners knew exactly what he was saying and whose progress had been described.

In paragraphs 19 through 22, Bunche pays a moving tribute to his maternal grandmother, Lucy Taylor Johnson, who helped him develop a sense of self-worth and self-confidence, to set goals and strive to reach them despite all obstacles the world might put in his way, to defend and remain true to the principles he had embraced, and to be proud of his heritage.

Bunche concludes his remarks in paragraphs 23 and 24 with brief affirmation of his faith in the goals of the United Nations: to create a world of peace, tolerance, freedom, and equality. These are among the principles that have undergirded his actions as a member of the UN Secretariat, that have made possible his achievements, and that have helped him overcome the color barrier these graduates will also face and can, like him, transcend.

Audience

The commencement audience comprised the graduates in the Fisk University class of 1949, their family and friends, and the Fisk faculty, including the university's first African American president, Charles Spurgeon Johnson. A reporter from the Associated Press, who was present, filed a brief account that appeared in newspapers across the country; it was published in the New York Times on May 31 under the headline: "Bunche Says Negro Will Win Equality."

Impact

Within a month "The Barriers of Race Can Be Surmounted" was printed in its entirety in the July 1, 1949, edition of Vital Speeches, a semimonthly magazine (at that time published in New York). The editor of the Negro Digest revised Bunche's words without his permission and published a shortened version (1949) with a new title: "Nothing Is Impossible for the Negro." Several key points of the speech those concerning the important role of Bunche's maternal grandmother as well as Bunche's perception of how the barriers of race could be overcome found their way into the 1950 Nobel Peace Prize presentation speech, given by Gunnar Jahn, chairman of the Nobel Committee. Bunche's full speech was included in Willard Hayes Yeager's Effective Speaking for Every Occasion, published by Prentice-Hall in 1951.

As it turned out, the temperate voice of the UN mediator, so evident in Bunche's speech at Fisk, was not heard in the tumultuous years of the 1960s. What linked him to the civil rights movement was his work with Myrdal on An American Dilemma, the predictive wisdom of which was tested by time. In November 1971, Myrdal would acknowledge that An American Dilemma had underestimated the level of bias outside the South. It erroneously predicted that American labor unions would support racial equality, and he and his researchers had not foreseen the postwar white flight to the suburbs that led to the decay of the nation's inner cities, nor did they anticipate the civil rights movement of the 1960s. Still, An American Dilemma played a major role in Brown v. Board of Education, the 1954 U.S. Supreme Court decision that ordered an end to segregation in the nation's public schools. In asserting that the long-standing "separate but equal" doctrine was, in fact, a cause of inequality and feelings of inferiority, the Court succinctly cited Myrdal's book as proof. Following the Brown decision, textbook publishers regularly included parts of Bunche's speech in middle and high school social studies texts until well into the 1970s.

Questions for Further Study

1. Compare this document with Alain Locke's "Enter the New Negro." What impact did Locke's views have on Bunche? How did the views of the two men differ?

2. What impact did Gunnar Myrdal's An American Dilemma have on the examination of race relations in the United States in the mid-twentieth century?

3. How did Bunche's address represent a reversal of the views expressed in Booker T. Washington's Atlanta Exposition Address (1895)?

4. Bunche places a great deal of emphasis on entering the "mainstream" of American life. Many black activists have disagreed, calling for separate black organizations and black nationalism. Which view do you believe has emerged as the dominant one in the African American community generally? Why?

5. Compare this document with To Secure These Rights, a report drafted by President Harry S. Truman's Committee on Civil Rights just two years before, in 1947. Discuss the extent to which the report, coupled with views such as those expressed by Bunche, began to represent a turning point in the issue of civil rights at midcentury.

Ralph J. Bunche: "The Barriers of Race Can Be Surmounted"

In the brief remarks I will make you will understand that today I think exclusively of these young Negro men and women who are graduating, and of the great number like them who will be graduating from other institutions of higher learning in the coming two or three weeks. I have been puzzled no little about what to say to them on this great day in their lives, this milestone along their road of progress in life.

This is, or certainly should be, a joyous occasion, an occasion so joyous, indeed, that all the participants must wear black robes and somber hats to leaven the joy, to keep it from effervescing excessively and to afford at least a semblance of solemnity, academic dignity and sobriety. Despite the black crepe and the mournful facade this is pure ritual a cultural lag one is tempted to be light hearted, and gay and poetic, to play with words and music, and preserve the fanciful mood. But in this age time is short even for the young. The sands run fast. And in any case, my poetry would be doggerel and my music discordant. A wise man always sticks to his last.

Unless young graduates have changed radically since the day twenty-two years ago when I first donned the academic gown, they have a number of things on their minds as they sit here. First, they are thinking of how they are going to celebrate when this final ritual is over or rather, continue the celebration, for unless I miss my guess, they began to celebrate as soon as it was certified that they would be sitting here today. And since there are undoubtedly timid souls amongst us, it would probably be tactful not to elaborate on the varied and even ingenious forms which such celebration may take. But I daresay there are also some very sober thoughts lurking in the recesses of the minds of these graduates.

For who are they these graduates? They are Americans, they are American citizens, and they are Negroes. And unless they have led remarkably sheltered lives, they undoubtedly have a poignant realization of the significance of at least the latter.

I would like to explore with them just what, at this very moment in this great nation, it means to be an American, a citizen, and a Negro. I cannot imagine that any question could be of more vital import to these young people on the threshold of a new adventure. Nor do I have any illusions that I can give them all the answers they must seek.

We Americans are part of a vast and powerful and dynamic nation, a great power whose responsibilities and influence in the modern world are frightening in their scope. The origin, traditions and creed of this nation are an inspiration to all freedom loving peoples. Our country's history is brave. Americans fought and died for their freedom and liberty. Having won by their blood the right to maintain an independent existence, our founding fathers established the nation on the cardinal principles of individual liberty and the equality of man. They spoke of inalienable rights, of the incontestable fact that all men are born free and equal, of the dignity of man. These were the essential virtues. In my view they still are. The founding fathers charted the way for the development of a great and virile democracy. They immortalized these concepts in our Constitution.

The American citizen is at once the benefactor and protector of this great American legacy. The privileges and rights of the American citizen of all American citizens are writ large in our Constitution, in our traditions, in what has been called the American creed. I need not detail them. But they guarantee to every citizen of this great nation all of the essential attributes of a free and dignified existence. In return, they require of the citizen that he meet his obligations to the State and to his fellow man in order that the American way of life may be preserved and perpetuated.

I am an American and I like the American way of life. I like freedom, and equality, and respect for the dignity of the individual. I believe that these graduates like them too. They like them so well that they bitterly resent being denied them because of an accident of birth.

There is a certain irony in the situation with which we are faced here. These Negro graduates of Fisk University today are better Americans than they are Negroes. They are Negroes primarily in a negative sense they reject that sort of treatment that deprives them of their birthright as Americans. Remove that treatment and their identification as Negroes in the American society would become meaningless, at least as meaningless as it is to be of English, or French, or German or Italian ancestry.

These graduates are one hundred per cent Americans. Who, indeed, is a better American, a better protector of the American heritage, of the American way, than he who demands the fullest measure of respect for those cardinal principles which are the pillars of our society?

If we could probe deeply into the minds of these graduates we would discover, I am sure, that the basic longing, the aspiration of every one of them, is to be an American in full. Not a semi-American. Not a Negro American. Not an Afro-American. Not a "Colored Gentleman." Not "one of our Colored Brethren." Just an American with no qualifications, no ifs or buts, no apologies, condescension or patronization. Just Americans, with a fair and equal opportunity as individuals to make or break their futures on the basis of their individual abilities without the un-American handicap of race. Can it be doubted that these young men and women must even now be calculating their chances to make their way into the mainstream of American life? And can it be doubted that they must be greatly tormented at the prospect that because of their race they may be kept out of the mainstream and shunted into the bayous and creeks and backwashes of American life?

And what may be told to them? That as Americans and citizens of this great democracy they are as entitled as the next man to negotiate the waters of the mainstream could be disputed only by racial bigots. But to encourage them to believe that their course is charted and the shoals of racialism no longer endanger them would be criminally misleading.

This, it seems to me, is what they should know. The democratic framework of our society is their great hope. The American Negro suffers cruel disabilities because of race which are in most flagrant violation of the constitutional tenets and ideals of the American democracy. But the saving grace for the Negro is the democratic warp and woof of the society which permits the Negro to carry on his incessant and heroic struggle to come into his own, to win those rights, that dignity and respect for the Negro, individually and collectively, which are his birthright as an American. And, fortunately, the American, white and black alike, has a conscience. The Negro American daily wins increasing support for his struggle from all those other Americans who aspire toward a democratic, not a semi-democratic America; who wish a four fourths, not a three fourths democracy. Moreover, the sympathy of the world is with him. The Charter of the United Nations endorses his aspirations.

This also, these graduates should know well and underscore. It is true that on occasion, an individual Negro may, by tremendous effort, successfully negotiate the racial rapids and find himself in the mainstream. But that this is a rarity and his group is far behind, is abundantly testified to by the fact that this very presence in the mainstream is front page news. The status of the individual, in the long view, can be no more secure than the status of his group.

We Negroes must be great realists: The road over which we must travel is clear, though the prospect may not be pleasant We suffer crippling disadvantages because of our origin. But we are Americans, in a basically democratic American society. That society is a competitive society. The going is hard even for white Americans. It is harder for us. To make his way, the Negro must have firm resolve, persistence, tenacity. He must gear himself to hard work all the way. He can never let up. He can never have too much preparation and training. He must be a strong competitor. He must adhere staunchly to the basic principle that anything less than full equality is not enough. If he ever compromises on that principle his soul is dead. He must realize that he and his group have not attained the goal until it is no longer necessary to make reference to the fact that "X" was the "first Negro" to do this or that, and until accomplishment by a Negro is taken by the public at large as a matter of fact.

This may have a harsh ring, but it is the gospel truth. The road of Negro progress is no road for weaklings. Those who cannot summon up the courage, the resolve and the stamina to travel along it can find refuge in a handy alibi: the disadvantages of race. And they can find ample documentation to support their plea. But a community of people cannot adopt an alibi, however credible, as its philosophy of life.

My own philosophy on such matters is quite simple: whatever is worthwhile is worth working, striving, sacrificing, and struggling for.

There is no substitute for hard work as the key to success in the American society. This is true for white Americans. It is even more true for black Americans. Few Americans of any color or creed can ever find easy the climb up the ladder.

But while nothing is easy for the Negro in America, neither is anything impossible. The barriers of race are formidable, but they can be surmounted. Indeed, the entire history of the Negro in this country has been a history of continuous, relentless progress over these barriers. Like "Old Man River," the Negro keeps "movin' along," and if I know my people, the Negro will keep on moving resolutely along until his goal of complete and unequivocal equality is attained.

If I may be pardoned for a personal reference, I should like to say that in my own struggle against the barriers of race, I have from early age been strongly fortified by the philosophy taught me by my maternal grandmother, and it may be of interest to you.

She was a tiny woman, but a personality of indomitable will and invincible moral and spiritual strength. "Nana" we all called her, and she was the ruler of our family "clan." She had come from Texas, married in Indian territory, and on the premature death of my grandfather, was left with five young children.

Nana had traveled the troubled road. But she had never flinched or complained. Her indoctrination of the youngsters of the "clan" began at an early age. The philosophy she handed down to us was as simple as it has proved invaluable. Your color, she counseled, has nothing to do with your worth. You are potentially as good as anyone. How good you may prove to be will have no relation to your color, but with what is in your heart and your head. That is something which each individual, by his own effort, can control. The right to be treated as an equal by all other men, she said, is man's birthright. Never permit any one to treat you otherwise. For nothing is as important as maintaining your dignity and self respect. She told us that there would be many and great obstacles in our paths and that this was the way of life. But only weaklings give up in the face of obstacles. Set a goal for yourself and determine to reach it despite all obstacles. Be honest and frank with yourself and the world at all times. Never compromise what you know to be the right. Never pick a fight, but never run from one if your principles are at stake. Never be content with any effort you make until you are certain you have given it the best you have in you. Go out into the world with your head high and keep it high at all times.

Nana's advice and philosophy is as good today for these graduates as it was when she gave it to me in my childhood. I certainly cannot improve upon it, nor would I try to do so. For me it has been a priceless heritage from a truly noble woman.

In conclusion, I may say only that I have great faith that the kind of world we all long for can and will be achieved. It is the kind of world the United Nations is working incessantly to bring about: a world at peace; a world in which people practice tolerance and live together in peace with one another as good neighbors; a world in which there is full respect for human rights and fundamental freedom for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion; a world in which all men shall walk together as equals and with dignity.

I trust that among these graduates there are many who will consecrate their lives to the struggle to achieve that kind of world.

"The Fourteenth Amendment requires that petitioner be admitted to the University of Texas Law School."

Overview

On June 5, 1950, the U.S. Supreme Court rendered its decision in the case Sweatt v. Painter. In 1946 an African American, Heman Marion Sweatt, applied for admission to the law school at the University of Texas in Austin; at the time, the president of the university was Theophilus Painter. The Texas constitution, however, prohibited integrated education; therefore, Sweatt was denied admission because of his race. He filed suit, but a Texas trial court delayed the case for six months to give the state time to establish a "separate but equal" law school for blacks in Houston; that law school would eventually evolve into Texas Southern University. Sweatt challenged this step in the Texas Court of Civil Appeals, which affirmed the trial court's ruling. After the Texas Supreme Court refused to hear the case on appeal, Sweatt, represented by William J. Durham and Thurgood Marshall (the future U.S. Supreme Court justice), appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court. The fundamental legal question the case presented was whether the University of Texas admissions policy violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The Court unanimously held that it did and ruled that Sweatt be admitted to the University of Texas Law School. In its ruling, written by Chief Justice Frederick Moore (Fred M.) Vinson, the Court stated that the law school for "Negroes," which had begun operation in 1947, was not equal to the University of Texas Law School in such matters as course selection, faculty, the library, and prestige. Further, the Court found that the proposed law school's separation from the University of Texas Law School would make it difficult for its graduates to compete in the legal profession.

Context

The backdrop for Sweatt v. Painter was the landmark case Plessy v. Ferguson, on which the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in 1896. After the Civil War, the Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution outlawed slavery in the United States. The Fourteenth Amendment was adopted on July 9, 1868, in large part to secure the civil liberties of newly freed slaves. The key section of the Fourteenth Amendment is Section 1, which states:

> All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Thus, the Fourteenth Amendment extends "equal protection of the laws" to all citizens.

In 1883 the Supreme Court heard a set of cases that had been consolidated into what are called the Civil Rights Cases. The Court's ruling in the Civil Rights Cases was a setback for African Americans, for it held that the Fourteenth Amendment applied only to the actions of government. Thus, segregation on the part of government was unconstitutional, but segregation on the part of private parties, including businesses, was not. Worse, the Court ruled that the Civil Rights Act of 1875 was unconstitutional. That act had said that > all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances on land or water, theaters, and other places of public amusement; subject only to the conditions and limitations established by law, and applicable alike to citizens of every race and color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude.

In the wake of the Civil Rights Cases decision, numerous states and municipalities, particularly (but not exclusively) in the South, passed so-called Jim Crow laws that segregated African Americans and kept them in subservient positions. One well-known law was Act 111, also known as the Separate Car Act, which the state of Louisiana passed in 1890 and required separate accommodations for blacks and whites on railroad cars. To challenge the law, the Citizens' Committee to Test the Separate Car Act enlisted Homer Plessy, who was one-eighth black (and thus black according to Louisiana law), to ride in a railroad car reserved for whites. While he was on the train, Plessy announced that he was black and submitted to arrest for violating the act. The committee had ensured that a detective was in the car to make the arrest.

Plessy's case wound its way to the Supreme Court, which in an eight-to-one decision held that the separate accommodations called for in the Louisiana law did not violate the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Writing for the majority, Justice Henry Billings Brown stated:

> We consider the underlying fallacy of the plaintiff's argument to consist in the assumption that the enforced separation of the two races stamps the colored race with a badge of inferiority. If this be so, it is not by reason of anything found in the act, but solely because the colored race chooses to put that construction upon it.

The lone dissenter was Justice John Marshall Harlan, who famously wrote:

> But in view of the Constitution, in the eye of the law, there is in this country no superior, dominant, ruling class of citizens. There is no caste here. Our Constitution is color-blind, and neither knows nor tolerates classes among citizens. In respect of civil rights, all citizens are equal before the law.

Harlan's view would ultimately gain acceptance, but for the next half century the Court's decision in Plessy v. Ferguson upheld the doctrine of "separate but equal." Determined to attack it was the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and its Legal Defense and Education Fund. Under the leadership of Charles Hamilton Houston and, later, Thurgood Marshall, the NAACP made the decision to launch an assault on Jim Crow in the courts by focusing on education.

One of the first cracks in the separate-but-equal doctrine appeared in the mid-1930s with the Murray v. Maryland case (sometimes referred to as Pearson et al. v. Murray). It was argued by Marshall, who himself had been denied admission to the University of Maryland Law School because he was black. Marshall's argument before the Baltimore City Circuit Court was that because the "white" and "black" law schools in Maryland were unequal, the only remedy was to allow the plaintiff, Donald Gaines Murray, to enroll in the University of Maryland Law School. The Maryland Court of Appeals agreed, ruling in January 1936 that "the state has undertaken the function of education in the law, but has omitted students of one race from the only adequate provision made for it, and omitted them solely because of their color," and Murray was admitted. The crack widened in 1938 with the Supreme Court's decision in Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada. (Ex rel. is an abbreviation of ex relatione, a Latin expression used in the law to mean "on behalf of.") The Court ruled that states with a school for white students must provide in-state education to blacks, either by allowing blacks and whites to attend the same school or by creating a second school for blacks. The problem with this ruling, of course, was that any such educational institution hurriedly thrown together solely for blacks was unlikely to be equal to all-white institutions in facilities, faculty, and prestige, but at least the Court was beginning to chip away at the denial of higher education to African Americans by all-white institutions.

During World War II, issues involving national security preoccupied the Court. After the war, however, civil rights began to dominate the Court's docket, and wider fissures opened in the separate-but-equal doctrine. The time for change was ripe. During the war, President Franklin Roosevelt had desegregated the defense industries and federal government hiring. After the war, the public was growing more aware of the atrocities that had been committed by Nazi Germany, including the wholesale denial of civil rights to Jews and other groups. On July 26, 1948, President Harry S. Truman issued Executive Order 9981, desegregating the military, and that year the United Nations passed the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. In this climate, other key Supreme Court cases challenged the separate-but-equal doctrine. In 1948 the Court ruled in Sipuel v. Board of Regents of the University of Oklahoma that Oklahoma was required to admit qualified African Americans to the previously all-white University of Oklahoma Law School. This was only a partial victory, for when Ada Lois Sipuel was finally admitted, she was compelled to sit in a raised chair apart from other students behind a sign that read "colored." She was also required to use a separate entrance to the law school and eat alone in the cafeteria. Later that year, the Court struck down restrictive racial covenants in housing in Shelley v. Kraemer. (A covenant is an agreement, in this case an agreement by a property owner not to sell his or her property to non-Caucasians.) On the same day that the Court issued its decision in Sweatt v. Painter, it also issued its decision in McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, ruling that African Americans admitted to a state university had to be granted full access to the school's facilities.

Heman Sweatt was born in 1912 in Houston, Texas. He graduated from college in 1934 and worked as a schoolteacher before entering the University of Michigan Medical School. He soon returned to Houston, however, and found work as a postal clerk. In the 1940s he became active in the civil rights movement; he attended meetings of the Houston branch of the NAACP and worked on voter-registration drives. During his efforts to end discrimination among postal workers, he became interested in the law and decided to pursue a law degree. His suit against the University of Texas Law School was a test case. The Houston NAACP had wanted to find an African American who would apply to the law school and, after that person inevitably had been rejected because of race, file suit. Sweatt volunteered to assume that role. As the case wound its way through the court system, Sweatt gave public presentations at NAACP fund-raising events; he was also subjected to threats and harassment. Finally, the Supreme Court heard oral arguments on the case on April 4, 1950, and issued its decision on June 5.

About the Author

Frederick Moore Vinson was the only member of the Supreme Court to have served in all three branches of government. He was born in Louisa, Kentucky, on January 22, 1890, and from an early age displayed a remarkable intellect, graduating at the top of his class from Kentucky Normal College in 1908. In 1911 he graduated from Centre College Law School with the highest scores in the school's history. A talented baseball player, he played semiprofessional ball in the Kentucky Blue Grass League and tried out for the Cincinnati Reds. But he returned to Louisa, where he became a small-town lawyer. He won his first elective office in 1921 as commonwealth attorney for the Thirty-second Judicial District of Kentucky. Three years later, Vinson won a special election to complete an unexpired term in the U.S. House of Representatives, where he served until 1938, except for the years from 1929 to 1931. For his support of New Deal programs, President Franklin Roosevelt appointed him to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, where he took his seat on the bench in 1938.

Vinson's service in the executive branch of government began in 1943, when he resigned from the court and became director of the Office of Economic Stabilization. There his chief task was controlling inflation during the war by fighting off requests from businesses for price increases and from organized labor for wage increases. Other posts in the executive branch soon followed. In March 1945 he became administrator of the Federal Loan Agency. One month later, he was appointed director of the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion, the purpose of which was to ensure the smooth conversion from a wartime to a peacetime economy. President Truman recognized Vinson's skills as a fiscal manager and in July 1945 appointed him secretary of the Treasury. In this post he played a major role in creating the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund.

In April 1946, Chief Justice Harlan Fiske Stone died. To replace him, Truman turned to Vinson, who took his seat on the High Court as chief justice on June 24, 1946, a position he held until his death. His tenure as chief justice coincided with the early years of the cold war and the nation's fear of Communism. Vinson supported the right of the federal government to legislate against groups that advocated the overthrow of the American system. Throughout his judicial career, he was deferential to executive and legislative authority. He upheld, for example, President Truman's emergency seizure of the coal mines following a nationwide strike in 1946, and in 1952 he dissented from a Court ruling that Truman had exceeded his authority by interceding in the steelworkers' strike during the Korean War and forcing a labor settlement, claiming wartime executive power. Truman held Vinson in high regard and mentioned his name as a possible successor as president. Vinson died of a heart attack in his apartment in Washington, D.C., on September 8, 1953. He had devoted nearly his entire career to public service and left behind an estate worth less than $1,000.

The written decision in Sweatt v. Painter begins with a number of legalities typically found in a Supreme Court written decision. Usually, these introductory remarks are prepared by the justice's clerk (often a recent law school graduate who does research for the justice). The opening paragraph, called the syllabus, is a brief description of the case. It identifies the petitioner (Sweatt) and the respondent (nominally Painter but in reality the University of Texas Law School) and summarizes the basis of the Court's ruling and the ruling itself. A person can read the syllabus and get the essence of the case without having to read the entire decision. The word Reversed indicates that the Court has reversed the decision of the lower court, in this instance the Texas Court of Civic Appeals. What follows is a brief description of the case's history, noting that it had begun in a Texas trial court, was appealed to the Texas Court of Civic Appeals, was returned to the trial court, and then was appealed to the Texas Supreme Court. The document states that the trial court "denied mandamus to compel [Sweatt's] admission to the University of Texas Law School." Mandamus is Latin for "we command" and is commonly used in law to refer to a court order requiring a lower court or a government official to perform a duty or to refrain from doing something. In this instance, the trial court refused to require the university law school to admit Sweatt, thus giving the state of Texas time to cobble together a law school for African Americans.

Further legalities follow. The document identifies the attorneys who argued the case for both the petitioner and the respondent. It then notes that amici curiae briefs were filed for both the plaintiff and the defendant. Amici curiae is a Latin expression meaning "friends of the court" and refers to briefs submitted by outside parties in support of one position or the other. In complex litigation, particularly a case with broad implications, it is common for individuals and organizations to attempt to sway the Court with analyses of the case and additional information that the Court might find useful. Typically, in a brief filed by one who appeals a case, in this instance Sweatt, the emphasis must be on legal errors that the lower courts made; the brief does not reargue the facts of the case or anything outside of the law. Amici curiae briefs often range widely in discussing the broader implications of the issues at hand.

With preliminaries disposed of, Vinson outlines the Court's decision. In the first paragraph, he presents the legal question the case raises: "To what extent does the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment limit the power of a state to distinguish between students of different races in professional and graduate education in a state university?" He goes on to note that "broader issues have been urged for our consideration," likely a reference to the content of the amici curiae briefs, but Vinson indicates that he is going to rule on the case strictly in conformity with the law as he sees it. This is an indication that the Court was not going to reexamine Plessy v. Ferguson.

Paragraphs 2 and 3 summarize the facts of the case and refer again to its history, from the trial court through the Texas Supreme Court. Vinson notes that mandamus was denied, which gave the state time to establish a law school for African Americans. Sweatt, though, refused to enroll in the new law school. The Texas Court of Civic Appeals then returned the case to the trial court "without prejudice," meaning that none of the rights or privileges of the persons involved was waived or lost. In other words, the court said that essentially the case was to begin again. In paragraph 4, Vinson notes that when the case was remanded, or sent back to the trial court, the court ruled that the new law school for African Americans was "substantially equivalent" to the University of Texas Law School. The Texas Court of Civic Appeals affirmed the ruling of the trial court, and the Texas Supreme Court refused to hear Sweatt's appeal of this ruling. Accordingly, Sweatt appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, which "granted certiorari," a legal term that means the Court has required the lower court to turn over the trial records; it also indicates that the Court has agreed to hear the case.

With paragraphs 5 and 6, Vinson begins his analysis of the case. He notes that the facilities at the two institutions were markedly different. At the University of Texas, the faculty was larger, and the law library contained considerably more materials. In contrast, the law school for African Americans was not accredited, though Vinson points out in paragraph 7 that the school, three years after its formation, was on its way toward accreditation. He also mentions that the new law school lacked the prestige of the University of Texas; for example, the new law school did not have an Order of the Coif, a prestigious national scholastic society whose members have an inside track to the best jobs as attorneys. In paragraph 8, Vinson concludes that the University of Texas Law School was clearly superior in the opportunities it afforded students. He also notes that the University of Texas was superior in intangible features: "reputation of the faculty, experience of the administration, position and influence of the alumni, standing in the community, traditions and prestige." Paragraph 10 goes on to point out another disadvantage that the African American students would face at a separate law school: They would be isolated from the 85 percent of the state's population, including judges, other attorneys, officials, and others who were part of the environment in which a person would practice law.

Paragraph 10 responds to the state's claim that excluding blacks from the University of Texas would be no different from excluding whites from the new law school. Vinson dismisses this argument by saying that as a practical matter, no University of Texas student would want to attend the new law school, given its obvious inferiority. Notice that Vinson cites Shelley v. Kraemer: "Equal protection of the laws is not achieved through indiscriminate imposition of inequalities." In paragraph 11, Vinson cites other precedents, including Sipuel v. Board of Regents of the University of Oklahoma and Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, to emphasize that the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment requires states to provide equal opportunities in legal education for their citizens. Bowing to these precedents, Vinson concludes in paragraph 12 that the "petitioner may claim his full constitutional right: legal education equivalent to that offered by the State to students of other races." Vinson rejects the view that Plessy v. Ferguson allowed the state to provide a pretense of equivalency. At the same time, he rejects the view that the Court should reexamine Plessy. Paragraph 13 concludes the decision: "We hold that the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment requires that petitioner be admitted to the University of Texas Law School."

Audience

The immediate audience for Vinson's decision in Sweatt v. Painter was, of course, the parties to the suit: Sweatt and the University of Texas in the person of its president, Theophilus Painter. A broader audience was the entire higher education community. This case, in combination with McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents decided on the same day, sent a message to state colleges and universities throughout Texas and the nation that the separate-but-equal doctrine would no longer stand in the provision of higher education for African Americans. A third audience consisted of members of the NAACP and those who sympathized with the organization's goals. Sweatt v. Painter was a test case, specifically engineered by the NAACP to challenge the separate-but-equal doctrine in the state of Texas. Although the ruling in the case did not specifically overturn the ruling in Plessy v. Ferguson, it represented a significant victory in the effort to render that case impotent and to dismantle the Jim Crow system.

Impact

One specific impact of the case was the establishment of what is today Texas Southern University in Houston, with an enrollment of more than nine thousand undergraduates and more than two thousand graduate students. The university was established on March 3, 1947, in response to Sweatt's lawsuit. At the time, the Houston College for Negroes was part of the Houston public school district. The state assumed control of the college, which then formed the core of what was originally called Texas State University for Negroes. The law school is now called the Thurgood Marshall School of Law.

The chief goal of the NAACP in the 1930s and 1940s was to overturn Plessy v. Ferguson. Thurgood Marshall and the NAACP had hoped that Sweatt v. Painter would have given the Supreme Court that opportunity. They were disappointed. The Court, under the leadership of Chief Justice Vinson, was essentially conservative, and Vinson himself was reluctant to overturn earlier Supreme Court decisions. He said as much in his decision in this case when he wrote: "Because of this traditional reluctance to extend constitutional interpretations to situations or facts which are not before the Court, much of the excellent research and detailed argument presented in these cases is unnecessary to their disposition." Near the end of his decision he stated explicitly that Plessy would not be reexamined. Put simply, the Court declined specifically to overturn Plessy v. Ferguson.

Matters did not end there, however. Civil rights advocates in 1950 recognized that Sweatt v. Painter, along with McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents and earlier cases with a bearing on equal protection in the realm of higher education, had undermined the separate-but-equal doctrine and that it was only a matter of time before the doctrine would collapse. That time arrived four years later with the watershed case Brown v. Board of Education, which Marshall argued before the Court. In a unanimous decision, the Court, under Chief Justice Earl Warren, held that "separate educational facilities are inherently unequal" and that racial segregation in public schools then mandated by law in the District of Columbia and seventeen states in the South and Midwest violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. (It should be noted that sixteen states in the Northeast, Midwest, and West specifically outlawed racial segregation in schools, and another eleven states had no laws on the matter.) This decision finally drove a stake through the heart of the separate-but-equal doctrine.

Sweatt enrolled at the University of Texas Law School in 1950. The case had taken a toll on his physical and emotional health, however, and he withdrew from the school in 1952. He then received a scholarship from the School of Social Work at Atlanta University and completed a master's degree there in 1954. In the ensuing years he worked for the NAACP in Cleveland, Ohio; returned to Atlanta as the assistant director of the city's chapter of the Urban League; and taught at Atlanta University. In 1987 the University of Texas Law School inaugurated the annual Heman Sweatt Symposium in Civil Rights and offers an annual scholarship in his name.

1. What was the "separate-but-equal" doctrine? Where and how did it originate? What impact did the doctrine have on African Americans?

2. Read this document in conjunction with Charles Hamilton Houston's "Educational Inequalities Must Go!" (1935). How was Sweatt v. Painter part of an overall strategy designed to challenge the separate-but-equal doctrine?

3. What other developments in the 1940s perhaps contributed to a climate of opinion that led to the Court's ruling in Sweatt v. Painter?

4. How did Sweatt v. Painter (and other Court cases) pave the way for the Court's landmark ruling in Brown v. Board of Education?

5. What is the meaning of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment? Why was this clause at the center of the Court's ruling in Sweatt v. Painter and other cases?

Sweatt v. Painter

Petitioner was denied admission to the state-supported University of Texas Law School, solely because he is a Negro and state law forbids the admission of Negroes to that Law School. He was offered, but he refused, enrollment in a separate law school newly established by the State for Negroes. The University of Texas Law School has 16 full-time and three part-time professors, 850 students, a library of 65,000 volumes, a law review, moot court facilities, scholarship funds, an Order of the Coif affiliation, many distinguished alumni, and much tradition and prestige. The separate law school for Negroes has five full-time professors, 23 students, a library of 16,500 volumes, a practice court, a legal aid association and one alumnus admitted to the Texas Bar; but it excludes from its student body members of racial groups which number 85% of the population of the State and which include most of the lawyers, witnesses, jurors, judges, and other officials with whom petitioner would deal as a member of the Texas Bar. Held: The legal education offered petitioner is not substantially equal to that which he would receive if admitted to the University of Texas Law School; and the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment requires that he be admitted to the University of Texas Law School.

Mr. Chief Justice Vinson delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case and McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, post, present different aspects of this general question: To what extent does the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment limit the power of a state to distinguish between students of different races in professional and graduate education in a state university? Broader issues have been urged for our consideration, but we adhere to the principle of deciding constitutional questions only in the context of the particular case before the Court. We have frequently reiterated that this Court will decide constitutional questions only when necessary to the disposition of the case at hand, and that such decisions will be drawn as narrowly as possible. Rescue Army v. Municipal Court, … (1947), and cases cited therein. Because of this traditional reluctance to extend constitutional interpretations to situations or facts which are not before the Court, much of the excellent research and detailed argument presented in these cases is unnecessary to their disposition.

In the instant case, petitioner filed an application for admission to the University of Texas Law School for the February, 1946 term. His application was rejected solely because he is a Negro. Petitioner thereupon brought this suit for mandamus against the appropriate school officials, respondents here, to compel his admission. At that time, there was no law school in Texas which admitted Negroes.

The state trial court recognized that the action of the State in denying petitioner the opportunity to gain a legal education while granting it to others deprived him of the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment. The court did not grant the relief requested, however, but continued the case for six months to allow the State to supply substantially equal facilities. At the expiration of the six months, in December, 1946, the court denied the writ on the showing that the authorized university officials had adopted an order calling for the opening of a law school for Negroes the following February. While petitioner's appeal was pending, such a school was made available, but petitioner refused to register therein. The Texas Court of Civil Appeals set aside the trial court's judgment and ordered the cause "remanded generally to the trial court for further proceedings without prejudice to the rights of any party to this suit."

On remand, a hearing was held on the issue of the equality of the educational facilities at the newly established school as compared with the University of Texas Law School. Finding that the new school offered petitioner "privileges, advantages, and opportunities for the study of law substantially equivalent to those offered by the State to white students at the University of Texas," the trial court denied mandamus. The Court of Civil Appeals affirmed … (1948). Petitioner's application for a writ of error was denied by the Texas Supreme Court. We granted certiorari … (1949), because of the manifest importance of the constitutional issues involved.

The University of Texas Law School, from which petitioner was excluded, was staffed by a faculty of sixteen full-time and three part-time professors, some of whom are nationally recognized authorities in their field. Its student body numbered 850. The library contained over 65,000 volumes. Among the other facilities available to the students were a law review, moot court facilities, … scholarship funds, and Order of the Coif affiliation. The school's alumni occupy the most distinguished positions in the private practice of the law and in the public life of the State. It may properly be considered one of the nation's ranking law schools.

The law school for Negroes which was to have opened in February, 1947, would have had no independent faculty or library. The teaching was to be carried on by four members of the University of Texas Law School faculty, who were to maintain their offices at the University of Texas while teaching at both institutions. Few of the 10,000 volumes ordered for the library had arrived; nor was there any full-time librarian. The school lacked accreditation.

Since the trial of this case, respondents report the opening of a law school at the Texas State University for Negroes. It is apparently on the road to full accreditation. It has a faculty of five full-time professors; a student body of 23; a library of some 16,500 volumes serviced by a full-time staff; a practice court and legal aid association; and one alumnus who has become a member of the Texas Bar.

Whether the University of Texas Law School is compared with the original or the new law school for Negroes, we cannot find substantial equality in the educational opportunities offered white and Negro law students by the State. In terms of number of the faculty, variety of courses and opportunity for specialization, size of the student body, scope of the library, availability of law … review and similar activities, the University of Texas Law School is superior. What is more important, the University of Texas Law School possesses to a far greater degree those qualities which are incapable of objective measurement but which make for greatness in a law school. Such qualities, to name but a few, include reputation of the faculty, experience of the administration, position and influence of the alumni, standing in the community, traditions and prestige. It is difficult to believe that one who had a free choice between these law schools would consider the question close.

Moreover, although the law is a highly learned profession, we are well aware that it is an intensely practical one. The law school, the proving ground for legal learning and practice, cannot be effective in isolation from the individuals and institutions with which the law interacts. Few students and no one who has practiced law would choose to study in an academic vacuum, removed from the interplay of ideas and the exchange of views with which the law is concerned. The law school to which Texas is willing to admit petitioner excludes from its student body members of the racial groups which number 85% of the population of the State and include most of the lawyers, witnesses, jurors, judges and other officials with whom petitioner will inevitably be dealing when he becomes a member of the Texas Bar. With such a substantial and significant segment of society excluded, we cannot conclude that the education offered petitioner is substantially equal to that which he would receive if admitted to the University of Texas Law School.

It may be argued that excluding petitioner from that school is no different from excluding white students from the new law school. This contention overlooks realities. It is unlikely that a member of a group so decisively in the majority, attending a school with rich traditions … prestige which only a history of consistently maintained excellence could command, would claim that the opportunities afforded him for legal education were unequal to those held open to petitioner. That such a claim, if made, would be dishonored by the State, is no answer. "Equal protection of the laws is not achieved through indiscriminate imposition of inequalities." Shelley v. Kraemer … (1948).

It is fundamental that these cases concern rights which are personal and present. This Court has stated unanimously that "The State must provide [legal education] for [petitioner] in conformity with the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and provide it as soon as it does for applicants of any other group." Sipuel v. Board of Regents … (1948). That case "did not present the issue whether a state might not satisfy the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment by establishing a separate law school for Negroes." Fisher v. Hurst … (1948). In Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada … (1938), the Court, speaking through Chief Justice Hughes, declared that "petitioner's right was a personal one. It was as an individual that he was entitled to the equal protection of the laws, and the State was bound to furnish him within its borders facilities for legal education substantially equal to those which the State there afforded for persons of the white race, whether or not other negroes sought the same opportunity." These are the only cases in this Court which present the issue of the constitutional validity of race distinctions in state-supported graduate and professional education.

In accordance with these cases, petitioner may claim his full constitutional right: legal education equivalent to that offered by the State to students of other races. Such education is not available to him in a separate law school as offered by the State. We cannot, therefore, … agree with respondents that the doctrine of Plessy v. Ferguson … (1896), requires affirmance of the judgment below. Nor need we

"In the South most poor whites feel they are better than Negroes and a black man has few rights."

Overview

Haywood Patterson, with the assistance of Earl Conrad, wrote Scottsboro Boy more than a decade after he was tried four times in one of the most notorious and racially controversial cases of the early twentieth century. Nine African American youths were charged with raping two white women while all of them were riding on a train. All but one were quickly sentenced to death, and the case attracted international attention. Both the Communists and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People wanted to defend the boys, but ultimately the Communists took the case, through their legal arm, International Labor Defense.

After several trials (with Patterson convicted four times and sentenced to death three times) and two appeals to the U.S. Supreme Court (with the Supreme Court refusing to hear a third case), all nine youths were eventually freed. Patterson escaped from prison in 1948, and in 1950, nineteen years after the case was first brought against him and at the dawn of the civil rights movement in America, he wrote Scottsboro Boy. In his book, published in June of that year, Patterson details his experiences during the trial and what he faced in the years of his imprisonment.

Context

The Scottsboro case began in many ways during Reconstruction, which preceded it by about sixty years. After the American Civil War, the United States promised to give equal rights, including the right to vote, to African Americans. To this end, the Fourteenth Amendment, guaranteeing equal protection of the laws and the right to due process, and the Fifteenth Amendment, requiring that the vote not be restricted on the basis of race, were passed. However, these guarantees were only as strong as the people enforcing them, and interest in equal rights for African Americans, both in the North and in the South, waned quickly. Americans disputed the outcome of the election of 1876 between the Republican Rutherford B. Hayes and the Democrat Samuel Tilden, and the resulting Compromise of 1877 gave concessions to the Democrats in return for their accepting Hayes's election. With that compromise, federal troops were withdrawn from the South, and southern whites were given free rein to treat blacks as they chose.

Most southern states limited opportunities for African Americans. Around 1900, Jim Crow laws sprang up in the South, segregating facilities and removing nearly all blacks from the voting rolls. The overall legal restrictions on blacks throughout the South were extensive. Separate schools, water fountains, bathrooms, and even separate Bibles in courtrooms existed and the separate facilities were not at all equal. Extralegal measures such as lynchings were also used against African Americans; it has been estimated that between 1865 and 1930 more than four thousand lynchings took place in the United States, most in the South and with most victims being black. The alleged offenses that brought about lynchings of blacks could be anything from making an improper advance to a white woman to failing to step aside when a white approached. The most publicized cause (though it factored in only a small percentage of cases) was accusations of rape, almost always by a white woman against a black man. This was the accusation made against the Scottsboro boys, and it almost resulted in their lynchings.

The Scottsboro boys' cases were also a product of the Great Depression. Besides causing millions to lose their jobs, the depression prompted huge numbers of people to migrate in search of work. While the most famous were the Okies, depicted in John Steinbeck's novel The Grapes of Wrath, millions of others, both black and white, migrated as well. Three groups of migrants played a role in the Scottsboro incident: a group of white youths, a group of black youths (the Scottsboro boys), and two white girls.

In March of 1931, the nine Scottsboro boys, ranging in age from twelve to nineteen (Clarence Norris, Charles Weems, Haywood Patterson, Olen Montgomery, Ozie Powell, Willie Roberson, Eugene Williams, Roy Wright, and Andy Wright) were riding a freight train from Chattanooga to Memphis, Tennessee four of them looking for work. (The youths were not all traveling together and did not all know each other.) Also traveling as hobos on the train was a group of white youths and two women. A few of the black youths got into a fight with the white youths and pushed some of the whites off the train. The white youths complained to the station master at Stevenson, Alabama, and the train was held at the next stop and searched by a deputized posse of fifty men. The nine African American youths, some of whom were in different parts of the train from where the fight occurred, were all arrested for assault. The two white girls, Ruby Bates and Victoria Price, who were prostitutes, were found on the train as well. Bates and Price, fearing that they would be arrested, accused the blacks of raping them. The nine blacks were taken to Scottsboro, Alabama, and jailed for trial, giving the case its name.

The youths were indicted for rape (a capital offense) on March 30. None of them was represented by an attorney. Most of them were illiterate, and none had any knowledge of criminal law or court procedure. The judge had ordered the Alabama bar to find attorneys for the defense, but when the trial started on April 6, no attorney had come forward. Finally, the youths' parents found two attorneys: a Chattanooga real estate lawyer, Stephen Roddy, and Milo Moody, a lawyer who had not defended a case at trial in decades. This was an inauspicious start to a complicated process that played out in the courts over the course of four trials and nineteen years. By 1950, all the Scottsboro boys had been released.

The Scottsboro boys' case was unique in a number of ways. It was the first to focus long-term international attention on African Americans in the South. The Scottsboro cases were also the first that the U.S. Supreme Court heard twice, and they resulted in two landmark rulings. The first was Powell v. Alabama (1932), in which the Supreme Court reversed the convictions of the youths sentenced to death by the Alabama courts on the ground that they had lacked effective counsel and had not received a fair trial as mandated by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. In the second case, Norris v. Alabama (1935), the Court ruled that blacks had to be included on the voting rolls and thus in the jury pool in order to have a fair trial. African Americans had been systematically excluded from the grand jury that indicted Clarence Norris and from the trial jury that convicted him, and so his conviction was overturned.

These cases were some of the longest in American history, even though no physical evidence suggested that any rape had occurred. They also were among the first in nearly sixty years, since perhaps the end of Reconstruction, in which blatant racism received front-page coverage not just in African American newspapers but in many mainstream white newspapers as well. In addition to the racism of the trials, racism and chicanery became evident at the Supreme Court hearings. To attempt to answer the defense's argument that there were no African Americans on the jury rolls, someone in the local government added the names of black voters at the end of the rolls before sending them to the Supreme Court. It was an inept and obvious forgery, and when the rolls were produced at the Supreme Court the justices were outraged.

In some ways, the cases also demonstrated progress toward civil rights. They showed that the national and international communities would pay attention to a case in the South and would put pressure upon the South to ensure that justice was done, even if it took nineteen years. They likewise showed progress, sadly enough, in that there was a trial at all. A lynch mob of nearly a hundred people gathered right after the nine were arrested, but this mob was unable to take any action. The state was also unable to carry out its own legal lynching, even though it tried to do so on several occasions, in that death sentences were often imposed simply on the word of one accuser. The fact that the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the Communist International Labor Defense were willing to spend the time and money to defend the boys also suggests a kind of progress. Before the 1930s such a case in the South might very well have been swept under the rug. That the cases went to the U.S. Supreme Court twice was unprecedented; before the 1930s the Supreme Court largely ignored race relations when it could. Progress is also evident in the Supreme Court's willingness to twice rule in favor of the Scottsboro boys; before the 1930s most legal rulings disadvantaged blacks. No defense attorneys were required at all for anyone when the trial started, and prison officials were allowed to listen in on conversations between defense counsel and their clients at the time of the case. Such practices are no longer allowed.

About the Author

Haywood Patterson, one of the leading defendants in the Scottsboro case, was born in Elberton, Georgia, in 1913 and then moved to Tennessee. He quit school after the third grade and took to riding the railways in the early years of the Great Depression, in search of work. He was viewed as the most violent and strong-willed of the defendants. For his alleged role in the Scottsboro affair, he was tried for rape four times and was sentenced to death three times. Two of the sentences were overturned, and a third was set aside. The fourth time, Patterson was sentenced to seventy-five years in jail, but he escaped from prison in 1948, ending up in Detroit.

While in Detroit, he wrote his memoir, Scottsboro Boy, which was published in June of 1950. Soon after its publication, he was arrested by the FBI. Alabama sought his extradition in order to return him to prison, but a large outcry and letter-writing effort persuaded the governor of Michigan not to extradite him. Later that year he was arrested after a barroom brawl in which a man died. Patterson was charged with murder and convicted of manslaughter in his third trial on the counts. He served about a year in prison, dying in 1952 from cancer at the age of thirty-nine.

Earl Conrad was born in 1912 in New York and worked primarily as a journalist. He also authored more than twenty books of history and criticism and ghostwrote several biographies, including one of the actor Errol Flynn. Several of his works focus on African Americans, including Harriet Tubman: Negro Soldier and Abolitionist (1942). Conrad died in 1986.

Scottsboro Boy covers Patterson's interaction with the Alabama prison system during his trial and years of incarceration. After telling of the trial and his convictions, Patterson discusses his life over his seventeen years in various Alabama prisons. The eleven-chapter book ends with his escape from prison in 1948. Four chapters are excerpted here.

The book begins with Patterson's recounting of the train journey that led to the black youths' arrests and trials. He assumes that everyone knows about riding the railways and does not explain why they were riding. Patterson then replays the interchange between himself and the white boys that led to the fight and explains why and how he resisted, noting how southern whites frequently felt that African Americans had no rights. He notes, too, that it is often forgotten that there were quite a few other African Americans on the train who were not arrested along with the Scottsboro boys. After the blacks had won a fight with some of the whites and forced them off the train, the whites complained to a station agent. The agent phoned ahead to the next stop, and the boys were arrested in the small town of Paint Rock, Alabama. Given the racial politics of the time, the word of the whites was accepted over any presumed innocence of the blacks. Further, the station agent failed to ask whether the whites were also fighting and to perhaps arrest them for illegally riding on the train. Patterson then describes the boys and points out that not all of those involved in the fight were arrested and that some were arrested solely for being black. After being taken to Scottsboro, they were accused of rape. Patterson describes the scene at night with the mob outside yelling for the chance to lynch the boys. He remarks that the lynchings might have happened if it were not for the opposition of the sheriff and his wife and the fact that the sheriff called for National Guard troops to protect them.

Patterson then discusses the trial. The boys were moved to Gadsden, Alabama, where they were protected and quickly tried. None of them saw a lawyer before the trial, he says, and they did not even know whether their parents were aware of their predicament, for they were not allowed to make phone calls. Of course, the concept of the "rights" of defendants was still decades in the future. So-called Miranda warnings, for example, were not mandated until 1966.

Patterson includes much description of small-town culture. He describes a large throng gathered for the trial and explains it as a combination of interest in seeing a lynching and local custom. As gruesome as it may sound, lynchings typically drew huge crowds in this period, and sometimes picture postcards were even sold. The local custom that drew the crowd on April 6 the day the trial started was Scottsboro's fair day. Fair day took place on the first Monday of the month. In many small towns, people gathered on certain days to buy, sell, and trade and generally to meet and discuss things. For Scottsboro, this was the day when area farmers came to town to sell their produce and buy supplies. Patterson also notes how weak his defense team was, in the persons of a local lawyer who was actually opposed to the boys and an attorney from Chattanooga who had little interest in defending them. The account never explains how the lawyer from Chattanooga became connected with the case.

The decisions collectively took only two days to be handed down; thus the juries reached their conclusions in less than sixteen hours of work. According to Patterson, the same jury heard all three cases. He comments that "that was one jury that got exercise," referring to how many times the jury had to walk in and out of the jury room (twelve times). In actuality there were three different juries. Patterson's trial took only three hours. He had seen the girls he was accused of raping only twice before the trial, once when they were arrested and a second time in the jail. He observes that the women were much more presentable in court, wearing dresses rather than the overalls in which they had been traveling.

Patterson also discusses the racial hostility in the packed courtroom. One of the more extended bits of the trial he recounts is the prosecution's closing argument to the jury, stating that the jury members should do their duty as men and quickly condemn the defendants. Patterson notes that there were very few African Americans in Scottsboro at the time of the trial and that the spectators in the courtroom cheered when the sentence was pronounced. Still, Patterson managed to keep his spirits up and told the prosecutor that he did not believe that the state would execute him quickly.

Patterson then launches into his own rebuttal of the charge of rape against him. He first notes that he prefers to be with African Americans and that he has always loved his own kind. He then argues that only a "fool or a crazy man" would attempt to rape a white woman, as all African Americans knew that death would result. Patterson adds that he did not ever have a desire to rape anyone, as plenty of women wanted him; he did not have to force himself on them. But he also says that his parents taught him to respect people, and so he would not have raped anyone. Patterson closes by saying that he is stating his views in this book for the first time. "No Alabama judge or jury in the four trials I had ever asked me for my views," he notes ironically. "Those Alabama people, they didn't believe I had any, nor the right to any."

The Scottsboro boys were taken back to the jail in Gadsden to await transfer to Kilby Prison in Montgomery, Alabama. There they started protesting, in large part because they knew that they were facing execution. "We didn't like nothing at all about the place; we didn't like our death sentence; and we decided to put on a kick." The main thing they protested directly was the food; even after they received the pork chops they had asked for, they still were not satisfied and continued to protest. The National Guard was sent in to take control, and the boys were beaten and handcuffed together so that they could not move. The guards left them there that day and the next without food, Patterson says, before transferring them to the city jail.

There the boys were separated and jailed with other inmates. Patterson was threatened until the other inmates discovered that he was one of the Scottsboro boys. At that point, he says they were all treated better, at least by the inmates. They were directly threatened, though, by the guards. Patterson recounts how they were all gathered together to be fingerprinted and how the jailers beat Charlie Weems when he did not spit out his gum fast enough. As a deterrent, the jailer also showed the boys the various punishments used against recalcitrant prisoners, including where they hung inmates by the fingers above the ground. Horrific punishments were quite common for those in jail in the South. Many spent their time in brutal convict labor camps, where the death rates were high. Even so, Patterson does not describe being afraid.

Patterson then moves on to the start of their successful defense, noting the arrival of two Jewish lawyers from the International Labor Defense. He did not have a problem with that, he says, as he had dealt with Jews in Chattanooga and they had treated him fairly. In some ways, Patterson is stereotyping in the same way as whites did in the South by assuming that all people of one race or one religion would act the same. The lawyers told the boys about the interest that their case was drawing. The jailer, Dick Barnes, came into the meeting and listened; this practice is illegal today, but "attorney-client privilege" was a right not granted for another thirty years. During the visit, the attorneys asked about the availability of medical care. As Patterson describes it, "The prison was very filthy. It was making me sick, making us all sick." When Patterson asked to see an outside doctor, Barnes insisted that the prison doctor was fine. Patterson argued that he needed medicine for lice, as the lice had "stole his cap" the night before. All that gained him, though, was a threat from Barnes.

Patterson then goes on to explain the rush of mail that arrived, along with money to buy items such as cigarettes, which had long served as currency inside many prisons. The boys were emboldened by the attention and began to demand more. The increased demand in reality brought only more attention from the jailer, and so they were eventually transferred to Kilby Prison in Montgomery, which also housed death row. Patterson notes that Kilby Prison was more substantially built than the ones in which the boys had previously been held. "It was a bitter thing to see the door of Kilby Prison.… Those walls looked so high and hard to get over. They were concrete." The boys were then moved to death row, but they could not see the execution chamber only "a dozen cells facing each other, six to a side, and a thirteenth cell for toilet work."

Patterson tells of meeting a man called Gunboat at Kilby, who immediately asks him, "Do you want a Bible to make your soul right? … You going to die tonight, you know. You Scottsboros better get busy with the Lord." And so Patterson took up reading the Bible. "You see, a man in the death cell, he clings to anything that gives him a little hope," he says. He notes that he had little formal education before being imprisoned and that he could hardly read; he found himself "stumbling through the small printed words." Two Scottsboro boys were imprisoned in each cell, which was big enough for only a single cot or a bunk bed. Patterson ends the chapter saying that he "dreamed bad dreams, with freight trains, guards' faces, and courtrooms mixed up with the look of the sky at night.

Audience

Scottsboro Boy was aimed primarily at the supporters of civil rights and the Scottsboro boys throughout their struggle, giving this group a firsthand account of what happened. Secondarily, the book addressed all those who were simply interested in learning more about the case. There also was a third audience, in Patterson's view anyone interested in paying for the book. This is not to suggest that Patterson was more mercenary than other people who sell their life stories but just that he had spent the better part of two decades behind bars and had very few marketable skills. The only tangible asset he had was his story, and he needed to sell it to live.

Impact

The short-term impact of this publication was relatively small. The basic details of the Scottsboro case were already known, and all of the Scottsboro boys were out of prison when the book was published; the resulting publicity thus changed little. The aim of the book was to help Patterson, but it did not accomplish that goal either. Soon after its publication, Patterson was arrested and convicted of manslaughter for his role in a man's death in a barroom fight. He was sentenced to at least six years in prison but died behind bars in 1952.

The real impact of this book is upon the historical record of the experience of the Scottsboro boys. Even if all of the legal details are known, the experience of the defendants cannot be fully understood without reading such a firsthand account. Such an account also contributes to an understanding of the legal processes of the time and the role racial prejudice played in court cases. Likewise, it gives a stark portrayal of prison conditions and the life of black inmates. This biography demonstrates that firsthand accounts are necessary to an understanding of how African Americans were

"But it happens in the South most poor whites feel they are better than Negroes and a black man has few rights."

"Round about dusk hundreds of people gathered around the jail-house. 'Let these niggers out,' they yelled. We could hear it coming in the window. 'If you don't, we're coming in after them.' White people were running around like mad ants, white ants, sore that someone had stepped on their hill. We heard them yelling like crazy about how they were coming in after us and what ought to be done with us."

(Chapter 1)

"When Bailey [the prosecutor] finished with me he said to the jury: 'Gentlemen of the jury, I don't say give that nigger the chair. I'm not going to tell you to give him the electric chair. You know your duty. I'm not going to tell you to give the nigger a life sentence. All I can say is, hide him. Get him out of our sight.'"

(Chapter 2)

"It was never in me to rape, not a black and not a white woman. Only a Negro who is a fool or a crazy man, he would chance his life for anything like that. A Negro with sound judgment and common sense is not going to do it. They are going to take his life away from him if he does. Every Negro man in the South knows that."

(Chapter 2)

"I could hardly make out the words in the book. The little training in reading I had had I never much followed up. Never read no papers, no books, nothing. I did not know how to pronounce things, could not even say 'Alabama' so you could understand me.… But the Bible felt solid in my hands."

treated in the South during the early twentieth century. White officials and participants in events like this often did not fully and accurately record them, and personal accounts help to paint a truthful picture and to demonstrate the underpinnings of the civil rights movement.

Questions for Further Study

1. In what ways was the Scottsboro boys case similar to the events surrounding the 1921 race riot in Tulsa, Oklahoma, detailed in Walter F. White's "The Eruption of Tulsa"?

2. In what sense was the Scottsboro boys case a product of the Great Depression? What impact did economics have on the events surrounding the case?

3. The Scottsboro boys case had at least one important judicial outcome that improved the criminal justice system for African Americans. What was that outcome, and why was it important?

4. Scottsboro Boy is a firsthand account of one man's encounter with a criminal justice system that was stacked against him. In what sense was his account a twentieth-century version of a slave narrative published in the nineteenth century? Consider the document in connection with, for example, The Narrative of the Life of Henry Box Brown, Written by Himself or Twelve Years a Slave: Narrative of Solomon Northup.

5. Scottsboro Boy was published on the eve of the civil rights movement in the United States. In what ways might the publication of this book have helped fuel the civil rights movement?

Chapter 1

The freight train leaving out of Chattanooga, going around the mountain curves and hills of Tennessee into Alabama, it went so slow anyone could get off and back on.

That gave the white boys the idea they could jump off the train and pick up rocks, carry them back on, and chunk them at us Negro boys.

The trouble began when three or four white boys crossed over the oil tanker that four of us colored fellows from Chattanooga were in. One of the white boys, he stepped on my hand and liked to have knocked me off the train. I didn't say anything then, but the same guy, he brushed by me again and liked to have pushed me off the car. I caught hold of the side of the tanker to keep from falling off.

I made a complaint about it and the white boy talked back mean, serious, white folks Southern talk.

That is how the Scottsboro case began … with a white foot on my black hand.

"The next time you want by," I said, "just tell me you want by and I let you by."

"Nigger, I don't ask you when I want by. What you doing on this train anyway?"

"Look, I just tell you the next time you want by you just tell me you want by and I let you by."

"Nigger bastard, this a white man's train. You better get off. All you black bastards better get off!"

I felt we had as much business stealing a ride on this train as those white boys hoboing from one place to another looking for work like us. But it happens in the South most poor whites feel they are better than Negroes and a black man has few rights. It was wrong talk from the white fellow and I felt I should sense it into him and his friends we were human beings with rights too. I didn't want that my companions, Roy and Andy Wright, Eugene Williams and myself, should get off that train for anybody unless it was a fireman or engineer or railroad dick who told us to get off.

"You white sons of bitches, we got as much right here as you!"

"Why, you goddamn nigger, I think we better just put you off!"

"Okay, you just try. You just try to put us off!"

Three or four white boys, they were facing us four black boys now, and all cussing each other on both sides. But no fighting yet.

The white boys went on up the train further.

We had just come out of a tunnel underneath Lookout Mountain when the argument started. The train, the name of it was the Alabama Great Southern, it was going uphill now, slow. A couple of the white boys, they hopped off, picked up rocks, threw them at us. The stones landed around us and some hit us. Then the white fellows, they hopped back on the train two or three cars below us. We were going toward Stevenson, Alabama, when the rocks came at us. We got very mad.

When the train stopped at Stevenson, I think maybe to get water or fuel, we got out of the car and walked along the tracks. We met up with some other young Negroes from another car. We told them what happened. They agreed to come in with us when the train started again.

Soon as the train started the four of us Chattanooga boys that was in the oil tanker got back in there and the white boys started throwing more rocks. The other colored guys, they came over the top of the train and met us four guys. We decided we would go and settle with these white boys. We went toward their car to fight it out. There must have been ten or twelve or thirteen of us colored when we came on a gang of six or seven white boys.

I don't argue with people. I show them. And I started to show those white boys. The other colored guys, they pitched in on these rock throwers too. Pretty quick the white boys began to lose in the fist fighting. We outmanned them in hand-to-hand scuffling. Some of them jumped off and some we put off. The train, picking up a little speed, that helped us do the job. A few wanted to put up a fight but they didn't have a chance. We had color anger on our side.

The train was picking up speed and I could see a few Negro boys trying to put off one white guy. I went down by them and told them not to throw this boy off because the train was going too fast. This fellow, his name was Orville Gilley. Me and one of the Wright boys pulled him back up.

After the Gilley boy was back on the train the fight was over. The four of us, Andy and Roy Wright, Eugene Williams and myself, we went back to the tanker and sat the same way we were riding when the train left Chattanooga.

The white fellows got plenty sore at the whupping we gave them. They ran back to Stevenson to complain that they were jumped on and thrown off and to have us pulled off the train.

The Stevenson depot man, he called up ahead to Paint Rock and told the folks in that little through-road place to turn out in a posse and snatch us off the train.

It was two or three o'clock in the afternoon, Wednesday, March 25, 1931, when we were taken off at Paint Rock.…

A mob of white farmers was waiting when the train rolled in. They closed in on the boxcars. Their pistols and shotguns pointed at us. They took everything black off the train. They even threw off some lumps of coal, could be because of its color. Us nine black ones they took off from different cars. Some of these Negroes I had not seen before the fight and a couple I was looking at now for the first time. They were rounding up the whites too, about a half dozen of them. I noticed among them two girls dressed in men's overalls and looking about like the white fellows.

I asked a guy who had hold of me, "What's it all about?"

"Assault and attempt to murder."

I didn't know then there was going to be a different kind of a charge after we got to the Jackson County seat, Scottsboro.

They marched us up a short road. We stopped in front of a little general store and post office. They took our names. They roped us up, all us Negroes together. The rope stretched from one to another of us. The white folks, they looked mighty serious. Everybody had guns. The guy who ran the store spoke up for us:

"Don't let those boys go to jail. Don't anybody harm them."

But that passed quick, because we were being put into trucks. I kind of remember this man's face, him moving around there in the storm of mad white folks, talking for us. There are some good white people down South but you don't find them very fast, them that will get up in arms for a Negro. If they come up for a Negro accused of something, the white people go against him and his business goes bad.

After we were shoved into the truck I saw for the first time all us to become known as "The Scottsboro Boys." There were nine of us. Some had not even been in the fight on the train. A few in the fight got away so the posse never picked them up.

There were the four from Chattanooga, Roy Wright, about fourteen; his brother, Andy Wright, nineteen; Eugene Williams, who was only thirteen; and myself. I was eighteen. I knew the Wright boys very well. I had spent many nights at their home and Mrs. Wright treated me as if I were her own son. The other five boys, they were Olen Montgomery, he was half blind; Willie Roberson, he was so sick with the venereal he could barely move around; a fellow from Atlanta named Clarence Norris, nineteen years old; Charlie Weems, the oldest one among us, he was twenty; and a fourteen-year-old boy from Georgia, Ozie Powell. I was one of the tallest, but Norris was taller than me.

All nine of us were riding the freight for the same reason, to go somewhere and find work. It was 1931. Depression was all over the country. Our families were hard pushed. The only ones here I knew were the other three from Chattanooga. Our fathers couldn't hardly support us, and we wanted to help out, or at least put food in our own bellies by ourselves. We were freight-hiking to Memphis when the fight happened.

Looking over this crowd, I figured that the white boys got sore at the whupping we gave them, and were out to make us see it the bad way.

We got to Scottsboro in a half hour. Right away we were huddled into a cage, all of us together. It was a little two-story jimcrow jail. There were flat bars, checkerboard style, around the windows, and a little hallway outside our cell.

We got panicky and some of the kids cried. The deputies were rough. They kept coming in and out of our cells. They kept asking questions, kept pushing us and shoving, trying to make us talk. Kept cussing, saying we tried to kill off the white boys on the train. Stomped and raved at us and flashed their guns and badges.

We could look out the window and see a mob of folks gathering. They were excited and noisy. We were hot and sweaty, all of us, and pretty scared. I laughed at a couple of the guys who were crying. I didn't feel like crying. I couldn't figure what exactly, but didn't have no weak feeling.

After a while a guy walked into our cell, with him a couple of young women.

"Do you know these girls?"

They were the two gals dressed like men rounded up at Paint Rock along with the rest of us brought off the train. We had seen them being hauled in. They looked like the others, like the white hobo fellows, to me. I paid them no mind. I didn't know them. None of us from Chattanooga, the Wrights, Williams, and myself, ever saw them before Paint Rock. Far as I knew none of the nine of us pulled off different gondolas and tankers ever saw them.

"No," everybody said.

"No," I said.

"No? You damn-liar niggers! You raped these girls!"

Round about dusk hundreds of people gathered about the jail-house. "Let these niggers out," they yelled. We could hear it coming in the window. "If you don't, we're coming in after them." White folks were running around like mad ants, white ants, sore that somebody had stepped on their hill. We heard them yelling like crazy how they were coming in after us and what ought to be done with us. "Give 'em to us," they kept screaming, till some of the guys, they cried like they were seven or eight years old. Olen Montgomery, he was seventeen and came from Monroe, Georgia, he could make the ugliest face when he cried. I stepped back and laughed at him.

As evening came on the crowd got to be to about five hundred, most of them with guns. Mothers had kids in their arms. Autos, bicycles, and wagons were parked around the place. People in and about them.

Two or three deputies, they came into our cell and said, "All right, let's go." They wanted to take us out to the crowd. They handcuffed us each separately. Locked both our hands together. Wanted to rush us outside into the hands of that mob. We fellows hung close, didn't want for them to put those irons on. You could see the look in those deputies' faces, already taking some funny kind of credit for turning us over.

High Sheriff Warren he was on our side rushed in at those deputies and said, "Where you taking these boys?"

"Taking them to another place, maybe Gadsden or some other jail."

"You can't take those boys out there! You'll be overpowered and they'll take the boys away from you."

The deputies asked for their handcuffs back and beat it out.

That was when the high sheriff slipped out the back way himself and put in a call to Montgomery for the National Guards.

He came back to our cell a few minutes later and said, "I don't believe that story the girls told."

His wife didn't believe it either. She got busy right then and went to the girls' cell not far from ours. We all kept quiet and listened while Mrs. Warren accused them of putting down a lie on us. "You know you lied," she said, so that we heard it and so did the white boys in their cell room. The girls stuck to their story; but us black boys saw we had some friends.

It had been a fair day, a small wind blowing while we rode on the freight. Now, toward evening, it was cool, and the crowd down there was stomping around to keep warm and wanting to make it real hot. When it was coming dark flashlights went on, and headlights from a few Fords lit up the jail. The noise was mainly from the white folks still calling for a lynching party. Every now and then one of them would yell, for us to hear, "Where's the rope. Bill?" or "Got enough rope, Hank?" They were trying to find something to help them to break into jail, begging all the while to turn us fellows over to them.

Round four o'clock in the morning we heard a heavy shooting coming into the town. It was the National Guards. They were firing to let the crowd know they were coming, they meant business, and we weren't to be burned or hung. The mob got scared and fussed off and away while the state soldiers' trucks came through.

I was young, didn't know what it was all about. I believed the National Guard was some part of the lynching bee. When they came into my cell I figured like the others that we were as good as long gone now.

First guard to walk in, he was full of fun. He asked some of the boys, "Where you want your body to go to?"

Willie Roberson, he had earlier told one of the deputies he was from Ohio, but now he took this guard serious. He said, "Send my body to my aunt at 992 Michigan Avenue, Atlanta." His aunt owned the place at that address. Others told false names, like people do at first when they're arrested.

Charlie Weems, he had a lot of guts. He understood it was a gag. He said, "Just bury me like you do a cat. Dig a hole and throw me in it." He understood the guard was funning, but the others didn't. I didn't very well understand it myself.

After the National Guards told us they were for us, I believed them. I told them right away where I came from, "Just over the state line, Chattanooga, Tennessee."

I don't tell people stories, I tell the truth.

I told the truth about my name and where I came from. I knew that was all right with my people, they would wade through blood for me.

And which they did.

Early the next morning we had breakfast. Then the National Guards led us out of the jail. We were going to Gadsden, Alabama, where it was supposed to be safer. Soon as we filed out of the jail-house another mob was there screaming the same stuff at us and talking mean to the National Guards. "We're going to kill you niggers!"

"You ain't going to do a goddamned thing," I yelled back at them. That made them wild.

They sat us down among other colored prisoners at the Gadsden jail. It was the same kind of a little old jimcrow lockup as the one at Scottsboro. White guys, they were in cells a little way down the hall. We talked back and forth with them.

We waited to see what the Jackson County law was going to do with us. The Scottsboro paper had something to say about us. In big headlines, editorials and everything, they said they had us nine fiends in jail for raping two of their girls. The editor had come rummaging around the jail himself.

Then we heard that on March 31 we were indicted at Scottsboro. A trial was set for April 6, only a week away. Down around that way they'll hoe potatoes kind of slow sometimes but comes to trying Negroes on a rape charge they work fast. We had no lawyers. Saw no lawyers. We had no contact with the outside. Our folks, as far as we knew, didn't know the jam we were in. I remember the bunch of us packed in the cell room, some crying, some mad. That was a thinking time, and I thought of my mother, Jannie Patterson, and my father, Claude Patterson. I thought of my sisters and brothers and wondered if they had read about us by now.

What little we heard was going on about us we got from the white inmates. Some were pretty good guys. They saw the papers, read them to us, and the guards talked with them. These fellows, they told us the story had got around all over Alabama and maybe outside the state. They told us, "If you ever see a good chance, you better run. They said they're going to give every one of you the death seat."

I couldn't believe that. I am an unbelieving sort.

Chapter 2

Came trial time, the National Guards took us to Scottsboro. We had to go down through the country from Gadsden to the county seat. We went in a truck. There were guards in front, at the side and behind. I never trusted these guards too much. They were white folks, Alabama folks at that, and I felt they could as lief knock us off as anyone else. State and federal and county law didn't make much difference to us down there. It was all law, and it was all against us, the way we figured.

Got to Scottsboro and there was just about the same crowd as when we left only much bigger. For two blocks either way they were thick as bees, bees with a bad sting and going to sting us pretty quick now.

The sixty or seventy National Guards, they got orders to make a lane through the crowd so we could get through. They had rifles, looked smart in their uniform. They could handle the crowd. When the guards formed a tunnel for us to walk through we heard the mob roaring what I heard a thousand times if I heard once:

"We going to kill you niggers!"

Later I found out why the crowd was so big. A "nigger lynching" might be enough to bring out a big crowd anyway, but this day was what they called "First Monday" or "horse-swapping day." First day of each month the Jackson County farmers came down from the hills into Scottsboro to swap horses and mules and talk. They'd bring in their families and have a time of it. It happened our trial opened on the same day so the mountain people living around here had two good reasons to come to town and there were thousands out. They were gathered around the courthouse square while we colored boys went into the courthouse. Near the courthouse was a brass band getting ready to celebrate either our burning or hanging, whichever it was going to be.

We boys sat there in court and watched how Judge E. A. Hawkins had a talk with a man named Stephen Roddy. Roddy said he was a lawyer sent in from Chattanooga to help us fellows. I had a hunch when I heard he was from Chattanooga that my folks and the Wrights had got wind of our jam and hired him. But I saw right away he wasn't much for us. Hawkins said to him, "You defending these boys?" Roddy answered, "Not exactly. I'm here to join up with any lawyers you name to defend them. Sort of help out." The judge asked, "Well, you defending them or aren't you?" Words about like that. So Roddy said, "Well, I'm not defending them, but I wouldn't want to be sent off the case. I'm not being paid or anything. Just been sent here to sort of take part." Then the judge, he said, "Oh, I wouldn't want to see you out of the case. You can stay."

Now that was the kind of defense we Scottsboro boys had when we first went on trial.

Right after that Judge Hawkins put a local guy named Milo Moody, an oldish lawyer, to represent us. But he didn't do anything for us. Not a damned thing. He got up and said a few words now and then: but he was against us.

Document Text

After Moody was set up to be our lawyer, the trials went on. The courtroom was packed. Jammed in, the people were. Standing up in back and along the sides. Not enough seats there. Weems and Norris were tried together. I was tried separate. The rest were tried together. The trials and convictions went on for about two days. The jury kept going in and out of the jury room and coming back with convictions.

That was one jury that got exercise.

I was tried on April 7, the second day of the trials. Solicitor H. G. Bailey, the prosecutor, he talked excited to the jurymen. They were backwoods farmers. Some didn't even have the education I had. I had only two short little periods of reading lessons. But these men passed a decision on my life.…

The girls I and the others were accused of raping I saw for the third time in court. The first I saw them was at Paint Rock when we were all picked up. The second was in Scottsboro jail when they were brought to our cell. And now in court. This time they were not wearing men's overalls, but dresses. Victoria Price, the older girl, she was to me a plain-looking woman. Ruby Bates was more presentable.

Solicitor Bailey, he asked me questions. The way he handled me was the same way he handled all of us. Like this:

"You ravished that girl sitting there."

"I ravished nobody. I saw no girl."

"You held a knife to her head while the others ravished her."

"I had no knife. I saw no knife. I saw no girl."

"You saw this defendant here ravish that girl there."

"I saw nobody ravish nobody. I was in a fight. That's all. Just a fight with white boys."

"You raped that girl. You did rape that girl, didn't you?"

"I saw no girl. I raped nobody."

Bailey, he kept firing that story at me just like that. He kept pounding the rape charge against me, against all of us. We all kept saying no, we saw no girls, we raped nobody, all we knew of was a fight.

The girls got up and kept on lying. There was only one thing the people in the courtroom wanted to hear. Bailey would ask, "Did the niggers rape you?"

"Yes," the girls would answer.

That's all the people in that court wanted to hear, wanted to hear "yes" from the girls' mouths.

When Bailey finished with me he said to the jury:

"Gentlemen of the jury, I don't say give that nigger the chair. I'm not going to tell you to give him the electric chair.

"You know your duty.

"I'm not going to tell you to give the nigger a life sentence. All I can say is, hide him. Get him out of our sight.

"Hide them. Get them out of our sight.

"They're not our niggers. Look at their eyes, look at their hair, gentlemen. They look like something just broke out of the zoo.

"Guilty or not guilty, let's get rid of these niggers."

I went on trial about nine o'clock in the morning. Within two hours the jury had come back with a conviction. I was convicted in their minds before I went on trial. I had no lawyers, no witnesses for me. All that spoke for me on that witness stand was my black skin which didn't do so good. Judge Hawkins asked the jurymen: "Have you reached a verdict?"

"Yes."

"Have the clerk read it."

The clerk read it off: "We, the jurymen, find the defendant guilty as charged and fix his punishment as death."

If I recollect right the verdicts against us all were in in two days. All of us got the death sentence except Roy Wright. He looked so small and pitiful on the stand that one juryman held out for life imprisonment. They declared a mistrial for Roy.

No Negroes were allowed in Scottsboro during the entire time. I didn't see a Negro face except two farmers in jail for selling corn. One of the National Guards, he fired a shot through the courtroom window about noon of the day I was convicted. Later he said that was an accident.

On the night of the first day's trials we could hear a brass band outside. It played, "There'll Be a Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight" and "Dixie."

It was April 9 when eight of us all but Roy Wright were stood up before Judge Hawkins for sentencing. He asked us if we had anything to say before he gave sentence. I said:

"Yes, I have something to say. I'm not guilty of this charge."

He said, "The jury has found you guilty and it is up to me to pass sentence. I set the date for your execution July 10, 1931 at Kilby Prison. May the Lord have mercy on your soul."

The people in the court cheered and clapped after the judge gave out with that. I didn't like it, people feeling good because I was going to die, and I got ruffed.

I motioned to Solicitor Bailey with my finger.

He came over. I asked him if he knew when I was going to die.

Document Text

He mentioned the date, like the judge gave it, and I said, "You're wrong. I'm going to die when you and those girls die for lying about me."

He asked me how I knew and I said that that was how I felt.

I looked around. That courtroom was one big smiling white face.

All my life I always loved my own people. I like my kind best because I understand them best. When I was a young man in Chattanooga, before the train ride that ended at Paint Rock, I knew and loved Negro girls, Negro people. My friends were of black color. I knew them as fellow human beings, as good as all others, and needing as good a chance. It was never in me to rape, not a black and not a white woman. Only a Negro who is a fool or a crazy man, he would chance his life for anything like that. A Negro with sound judgment and common sense is not going to do it. They are going to take his life away from him if he does. Every Negro man in the South knows that. No, most Negroes run away from that sort of thing, fear in their hearts. And nine of us boys, most unbeknownst to each other, a couple sick, all looking for work and a chance to live, and rounded up on a freight train like lost black sheep, we did not do such a thing and could not.

I wouldn't make advances on any woman that didn't want me. Too many women from my boyhood on have shown a desire for me so that I don't have to press myself on anyone not wanting me.

My mother and father, they lived together as husband and wife for thirty-seven years, honest working people. They had many children and they taught us to respect the human being and the human form.

I was also taught to demand respect from others.

Now it is a strange thing that what I have just said I never had a chance to say in an Alabama court. No Alabama judge or jury in the four trials I had ever asked me for my views. Nobody asked about my feelings. Those Alabama people, they didn't believe I had any, nor the right to any.

Back in Gadsden jail we could look outside and see where an old gallows was rigged up. Must have gone back to the slavey days. We didn't like nothing at all about the place; we didn't like our death sentence; and we decided to put on a kick. I said to the man who brought me a prison meal, "I don't want that stuff. Bring me some pork chops."

"Huh, pork chops?"

"Yes, pork chops. You got to get it. We're going to die and we can have anything we want."

All the fellows laid down a yell, "Pork chops!"

We crowded up to the bars. We put our hands out and shook fingers at him. We hollered, "Pork chops. Nothing else."

This guy, he went down someplace and got the pork chops. He brought it to us. Just the food I wanted. I always liked pork meats. After we ate, still we weren't satisfied.

The deputies and guards, they were scared of us now like we would make a jailbreak. Our heads were up against those checkerboard bars and we talked sharp.

The sheriff spoke to me because I was raising the most dust. He said. "Look here, nigger. See that gallows. If you don't quieten down I'll take you around to that gallows and hang you myself."

I had a broom in my hand and maybe he wondered what it was or where I got it. He came up to the bars to take a look at what it was. I jiggled the broom in his face. The fellows laughed.

That was the last that sheriff could take by himself. He beat it downstairs to call Governor B. M. Miller to send in some National Guards.

They came in serious. The cell door banged open. They beat on us with their fists. They pushed us against the walls. They kicked and tramped about on our legs and feet. They beat up most of the fellows, but Eugene Williams and me backed up in the dark of the cell and escaped the worst part of it.

The state soldiers handcuffed us in twos. They had a big rope. They fastened the rope in between the handcuffs and bound us all together.

We laid up against the walls and against each other like that till night. We were in a quiet misery, unable to move around. When it was night we tried to sleep like that but we couldn't. Morning came and we were still trussed to each other and tired. Day went on, no food, just laying there moaning atop each other; until it was seven o'clock in the evening.

The National Guards came up again. This time they had more rope. I said to the sheriff, "What you going to do, hang us?"

"I'd like to, goddamn your souls," he said.

They roped us together tighter, then chain-gang marched us outside to a big state patrol truck they called the dog wagon. They tied us to the sides so we couldn't make any break, so we couldn't even move. One of the guards asked, "What you guys raise so much hell for?"

"We just don't like that death sentence," I told him.

The kid I was handcuffed to, he slept rough, and by the time we got to the city jail those handcuffs had swollen my wrists.

They couldn't get the handcuffs off. They had to call in a blacksmith to get them loose.

They split up us Scottsboro boys so we couldn't raise any more sand like we had at Gadsden. They put us in with other prisoners two or three to a cell.

About the middle of the night I was stashed into a cell with two other guys. One was called Box Car. He had burgled a boxcar and had a fifteen-year sentence. The other was a lifer. I was played out and fell on the bunk. One of the guys woke me. "Get up."

I raised up and I looked at him.

"Did you bring my money?"

"What money?"

"Jail feed."

I knew what this was, kangaroo business. I had a pair of shears under the mattress. I had brought it from the Gadsden jail. I just rested my hands on the shears and said, "I got nothing."

This guy, he just kept insisting. Told me to get up. He wanted to see me. "If you don't pay us kangaroo money you know what it means."

"No, what it means?"

"It means we going to whup you."

They asked for twenty-five cents. If I wouldn't pay, it meant I would get twenty-five licks.

I raised up a little more and I said, "You can see me. In the morning you can see me."

"Hey, where you say you from?"

"Scottsboro."

"You one of them Scottsboro boys?"

When I told him yes he just gave right over, got tender. He felt sorry for me, brought me food and tried to give it to me. I was tired and I didn't accept it. I laid down to sleep, thinking how the word "Scottsboro" touched them. That was when I first learned that this word would mean special favors in prison and special torture.

Next day we were together again, all except Roy Wright, while they fingerprinted us.

Charlie Weems was chewing gum. The jailer, Dick Barnes, told Weems to spit the gum out. He refused to do it.

Barnes gave Weems a lick across the side of the head for that. Weems went down. When he got up he stood his distance from the jailer, a little quieter. Dick Barnes turned on me:

"You like ham and eggs?"

"I don't like nothing." I knew he was talking about the fuss we made at the other jail over pork chops.

"Patterson, I heard about you up in Gadsden ordering ham and eggs. You can get it here any time you want it. You love ham and eggs, don't you?"

"I don't love nothing." He wanted me to say something so he could beat on me, but I didn't give him the chance.

He changed tone, got serious. His voice dropped like from the high end of a piano to the low end, and he said, "We got your waters on to you here. Any time you fellows get funky we got your waters on here."

Right away he showed us what he meant. Took us all down in the basement where they gave punishment. He looked at me and said, "Nigger, keep quiet. If you don't behave …" He showed where you hang up by two fingers with your feet not touching the ground. There was a time limit they would hold you up that way.

It was supposed to frighten us and maybe it did scare some. I didn't like it either. But I always protested when I didn't like things. Down South I always talked like I wanted: before Scottsboro, during it, and since.

A few minutes afterward Barnes told a Negro trusty, "I sure like to be there when they execute these guys. You'll smell flesh burning a mile."

I asked the trusty, "How do you know they're going to kill me?"

"That chair sure going to get you," the trusty said.

I didn't believe nothing like that. Two days later there was the first sign Barnes and the trusty might be wrong and I might be right.…

Two guys from New York, head men from the International Labor Defense, brought us pops and candy and gave them to us boys in the visiting room. They were Jewish. Which was okay with me. I worked for Jews in Chattanooga. Did porter and delivery work and such for them and always got along well. They told us the people were up in arms over our case in New York and if they had our say-so they would like to appeal our case.

These were the first people to call on us, to show any feelings for our lives, and we were glad, We hadn't even heard from our own families; they weren't allowed to see us. But these lawyers got in.

About us nine boys unfairly sentenced, they said their organization was doing all it could to wake up the people in this country and Europe.

Jailer Dick Barnes, he came in and listened when these lawyers asked us whether we got the right medical treatment. They suggested to Barnes a doctor should be sent in. Barnes is the kind of a guy, if you are a Negro, you can read hate in his face and his voice. He said, "We got a doctor here. These boys don't need any treatment."

I wanted a doctor and I didn't want the prison doctor. The prison was very filthy. It was making me sick, making us all sick. It was an old jail. The bed lice would get all over you; they would come up close to you to warm up. I said, "Yes, I want a doctor."

Barnes said, "What do you want a doctor? We got any medicine you can name."

"You have any medicine for these lice?" I asked. "One of them stole my cap last night."

The lawyers and the fellows laughed.

After the visitors went Barnes said, "Nigger, you're too smart. If you want to get along with me you just keep your mouth."

Now we knew why we had been getting mail from white folks. The I.L.D., or the Labor Defense, as we got to call them, had been causing around the country. They had told people at meetings and in newspapers to send us letters and cigarettes to make it easier for us in jail. Mail from white people was confusing to me. All my life I was untrusting of them. Now their kind words and presents was more light than we got through the bars of the windows. The next few days the mail got heavier; and the prison officials were upset what to do. We had the money to get whatever we could buy at the jail commissary, and this outside pressure gave us guts. Me, at least. My guts went up so I could demand a bath which Jailer Dick Barnes promised but didn't let me have. "You'll get it Saturday," he said. Saturday came and he put me off. "I haven't got time to fool with you." I got tight with him. "I got to have a bath!" That jacked up the other Scottsboro fellows and all together we raised hell for a bath. Barnes, he came back and let us out three at a time for showers.

Prisoners told me registered mail wasn't supposed to be opened. I found out mine was being opened and even kept from me. I told the guards I wanted to have some words with somebody about it. A little old man named Ervin, he came around. "I got to okay your mail," he said. "I have to look in the mail of all you Scottsboro niggers."

That got me sore. "Now listen, don't you open no letter of mine. If you do I'll see what I can do about it."

Ervin beat it off, and one of my cellmates said, "You can't talk to him like that. He's a chief warden."

"I don't care if he's President Hoover."

From then on, whenever mail came to me, Ervin, he would bring it himself. I opened it, Ervin saw me take out the money, then he'd read the letter.

It went on like that for many days until Barnes got to hate me. I kept after him; he kept after me. I had my own fight in me to begin with and now I had white folks fronting for me. One day he came up to my door and shook his finger at me and said, "I'll have you sent to Kilby tomorrow."

Sure enough, the next day, April 23, Barnes banged on the cell door and said, "Okay, sonofabitch, you and the other niggers get ready. You going to the death row in Kilby. You can't take nothing with you either.… I hope they burn that black dick off of you first before they burn the rest of you."

My cigarettes I gave away. Then I walked out the cell.

Outside the jail I was put in a private car, handcuffed to Willie Roberson. Guards were on each side and in the front seat.

That ride I can remember. It was my last good feeling of the outdoors. It was a fast ride for several hours, with the day getting warmer, the sun hotter. There was no talk, even between Willie and me. My eyes took in everything along the roadsides. It was spring, my favorite time of year. I was a tight guy who would not show people tears, but I felt the water behind my lids.

Willie and myself were the first to reach Kilby.

It was a bitter thing to see the door of Kilby Prison, what the free people of Alabama call "the little green gate." Those walls looked so high and hard to get over. They were concrete. We could see guards in the shacks along the wall tops next to their machine guns. Barbed wire stretched on top of the walls all around. They took us in through steel gates.

Then, death row opened to us … a dozen cells facing each other, six to a side, and a thirteenth cell for toilet work.

Right off a guy in the cell opposite, he said, "So you're from Scottsboro. Been reading about you guys. The papers in New York making a big fuss about it. The governor will insist you go now."

"Go where?"

"To the chair … it's right there."

I tried twisting my neck and eyes out the front of the cell to see the death room: but it was just out of my sight.

Chapter 4

That guy opposite, they called him Gunboat, he kept talking. "Do you want a Bible to make your soul right?" He was holding up a little red book in his hands for us to see. "You going to die tonight, you know. You Scottsboros better get busy with the Lord."

Willie Roberson, he was leaning up against the door with me listening, and he put a frown on. Willie got scared and excited and started talking about things. "You sure we going to die tonight?" he asked. We were both afraid. We didn't know. Sometimes other prisoners, they heard about things before we did.

Another guy in a cell next to Gunboat's was shaking his head from side to side like we should pay no mind to him. This fellow, name of Ricketts, called Gunboat a liar and said, "You fellows ain't going to die tonight. Gunboat don't know nothing about your case."

Gunboat yelled out, "Them guys going to die tonight! Here, take this here Bible!"

Ricketts waved his hands and said, "Keep away from that thing. That Bible never did us niggers any good!"

I never had really read the Bible. Couldn't read much anyway. But I was upset and leaned toward what Gunboat said.…

"You better take to the Bible. You got souls and you better clean 'em."

Ricketts put it different. "You ain't got good lawyers, then you're done for. You ain't got white folks to front for you, then you're done for. But leave that thing alone!"

"What you heard about us getting the chair tonight?" Willie Roberson asked Gunboat.

"I know. Don't ask how I know."

"You heard something?"

"The Lord tell me so."

"Get that Bible across to me," I said to Gunboat.

"Don't take it!" Ricketts made a last try.

Gunboat, he tied a piece of wood to the end of a string and threw it over in front of my cell door. The Bible was on the other end and I started dragging it across to me.

Just then a tall, rawbony guard named L. J. Burrs saw Gunboat telegraphing the Bible to me. He stopped before our cell and said to Willie and me, "Pray, you goddamned black bastards. You'll still burn anyway."

"Hand me the book, will you?" I said to the guard.

"Q-o-h, you goddamned black sonofabitch. What you mean talking like that to me? Don't you know to call me Captain, call me Boss?"

"I don't call no one Captain. I don't call no one Boss."

"You nigger, you better get right with me before you get right with your Lord. You call me Captain when you talk to me."

He made to open the cell door, like he might come in to beat on me, then he changed his mind. Instead he kicked the Bible under my door and said, "I fix you, Patterson. You the ringleader of all these Scottsboro bastards. We got your record. You going to reckon with me." He walked down by the toilet.

I could hardly make out the words in the book. The little training in reading I had had I never much followed up. Never read no papers, no books, nothing. I did not know how to pronounce things, could not even say "Alabama" so you could understand me. I had to ask prisoners to tell me, and I would try and repeat it. Negroes called this way of speaking "flat talk."

But the Bible felt solid in my hands. I found myself stumbling through the small printed words.

Pretty soon the other fellows came in. They put Weems and Andy Wright in one cell, Powell and Norris together, and Eugene Williams and Olen Montgomery in another cell.

Right off Gunboat, he started to work on all of them, telling them the juice was going on tonight, and to get right with the Lord.

Charlie Weems wasn't easy to fool and he answered, "Aw, I know better than that. Our date set for July 10. They ain't going to do it before. You're a damned liar."

The religious stuff got going, all up and down the death row, them that was there trying to convert those of us just arrived. You see, a man in the death cell, he clings to anything that gives him a little hope.

That kind of talk mixed with the guessing about whether we would die tonight or in July. It went all up and down the twelve cells. My cell number was 222. I told the others my cell number and they told me theirs. Cell number 231 was right next to the chair room and none of us Tennessee and Georgia boys in the Scottsboro case had that one.

Each cell was just big enough for a single cot. Sometimes, when it was crowded in the death row, like now, they would put up a double-deck bed. Then you couldn't move around. One fellow would have to lay up on the bunk while the other could take about three steps forward and turn and take three steps back if he was nervous and needed to walk.

White and black were in the death row, but mostly Negroes. Around us were desperate men who tried to question us about the Scottsboro case. They were killers, stoolies, and crazy guys. Some hoped to hear something they could carry to the warden so as to escape punishment for their crimes. They got nothing out of us. There was nothing to get out of us anyway. We just kept quiet about the case, all of us.

Night pushed into death row. I knew there were stars outside. The face of the sky I could see and remember clearly because I had looked at it at night all my life. I laid on the top bunk, in a way still feeling I was on a moving freight. Nothing was standing still. I was busy living from minute to minute. Everything was rumbling. I dreamed bad dreams, with freight trains, guards' faces, and courtrooms mixed up with the look of the sky at night.

Brown v. Board of Education (National Archives and Records Administration)

Brown v. Board of Education

"In the field of public education, the doctrine of 'separate but equal' has no place."

Overview

Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka was the 1954 Supreme Court decision that declared that legally mandated segregation in public schools was unconstitutional under the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection clause. The landmark case was actually a combination of five cases that challenged school segregation in Delaware, South Carolina, Virginia, and Topeka, Kansas. In a companion case, Bolling v. Sharpe, segregation in the District of Columbia's public schools was declared unconstitutional under the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. Brown was a pivotal case in the history of the Supreme Court. Although Brown did not explicitly reverse the Court's earlier ruling in the 1896 case Plessy v. Ferguson, which permitted states to provide "separate but equal" facilities for people of different races, it was clearly the beginning of the end of the Supreme Court's willingness to give constitutional sanction to state-sponsored segregation. Brown was the first decision authored by the recently appointed Chief Justice Earl Warren and was a harbinger of the new, more activist role that the Court would take in protecting civil rights and civil liberties under his leadership.

Brown should be seen against the broader background of segregation in American history. By the end of the nineteenth century, southern states and, indeed, quite a few states outside the South were developing an American system of apartheid through what were often called Jim Crow laws. This system of segregation mandated the separation of blacks and whites in almost every observable facet of public life. Separate water fountains, park benches, railroad cars, and other facilities were common. All of the southern states and a number of border states also maintained separate school facilities for blacks and whites. Although the Supreme Court's decision in Plessy had declared that blacks could be required to use separate facilities if those facilities were equal to those provided for whites, states that maintained racially separate schools provided schools for African Americans that were usually greatly inferior in resources and programs to those provided for whites. Glaring inequalities in educational facilities prompted the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) to begin a decades-long litigation campaign to challenge segregation in public education. That campaign would eventually result in the decision in Brown.

Context

The NAACP began to develop its strategy to attack segregation in state schools in the 1930s. The organization began cautiously enough by attacking segregation in professional schools, principally law schools, of state universities. Law schools were selected because state university systems usually had only one law school each, and it would be relatively easy to make the case that providing a state law school for white students while providing none for blacks violated the principle that a state had to provide equal facilities. The NAACP also believed that litigation designed to force states to permit black students to attend state law schools would provoke less adverse political reaction than lawsuits designed to integrate public primary and secondary schools. The architect of the NAACP's litigation strategy, Charles Hamilton Houston, would achieve success before World War II with his victory in the 1938 case Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada. In that case the Supreme Court held that Missouri's exclusion of African Americans from the state's law school was unconstitutional even though Missouri was willing to pay tuition for black students to attend law school out of state. The NAACP met with success in similar litigation in other states.

While the NAACP had some success with litigation designed to desegregate professional schools before World War II, the changes in racial attitudes brought about by the war played a key role in paving the way for the decision in Brown. In particular, the war brought about a new assertiveness on the part of African Americans, as many blacks left the rural South and traditional patterns of racial domination for the armed forces and the industrial cities of the North and West. With these changes came a new willingness to struggle for equal rights. The fight against Nazi racism also caused many white Americans to question traditional racial attitudes. Furthermore, the social sciences were increasingly calling established racial prejudices into question. The publication in 1944 of the Swedish social scientist Gunnar Myrdal's book An American Dilemma:

- May 18
  In Plessy v. Ferguson, the Supreme Court declares the "separate but equal" doctrine, permitting segregation in government-run facilities.

- February 12
  A group to later be known as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) is formed to fight segregation.

- Charles Hamilton Houston is appointed vice-dean of Howard University Law School. Houston would transform the law school into a vehicle for training civil rights lawyers, including Thurgood Marshall, the principal lawyer for the NAACP in the Brown case.

1938

- December 12
  In Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, the Supreme Court holds that the state of Missouri must admit black students to the state law school.

- May 3
  In Shelley v. Kraemer, the Supreme Court bars the judicial enforcement of restrictive covenants used to prevent home owners from selling their homes to members of minority groups.
- July 26
  President Harry Truman issues Executive Order 9981, requiring equality of opportunity in and the desegregation of the armed forces.

- June 5
  In Sweatt v. Painter, the Court orders that black students be admitted to the University of Texas School of Law, declaring that the separate law school established for black students did not provide equal treatment.

The Negro Problem and Modern Democracy also had a significant impact, causing many university-educated people to question the practice of segregation.

The changes in the racial atmosphere in postwar America spurred the NAACP to confront legally mandated segregation. While the organization achieved significant victories in its fight against segregated professional education, other important victories came in the legal struggle against general discrimination. The 1948 case Shelley v. Kraemer, in which the Supreme Court declared that courts could not enforce restrictive covenants barring minorities from buying homes in white neighborhoods, was an indication of the Court's willingness to give the Fourteenth Amendment a broader reading than it had in the past. Following this decision, many in the NAACP believed that the time was right for a frontal assault on segregated education.

Between 1950 and 1952 the NAACP, under the leadership of Thurgood Marshall and his associates, began preparing the cases that would come to be known as Brown v. Board of Education. The case by which the litigation is known arose in Topeka, Kansas a state that, unlike those in the South, did not have statewide segregation. Instead, the state gave localities the option to have segregated schools. The elementary schools in Topeka were indeed segregated, and Oliver Brown, a black resident of the city, filed suit so that his daughter might attend a school reserved for whites. That school was nearer to the Brown home and had better facilities.

In 1952 the Supreme Court consolidated the different desegregation cases. The first set of oral arguments were heard by the Court in December of that year; in June 1953, the Court asked for a second set of oral arguments designed to specifically address the issue of whether or not the Fourteenth Amendment was intended to mandate school desegregation. As that issue was being researched, Chief Justice Frederick M. Vinson died in September 1953. He was replaced by Earl Warren. Most observers agree that the new chief justice made a critical difference to the outcome of the case.

About the Author

Earl Warren was born in Los Angeles, California, in 1891. He was a graduate of the University of California at Berkeley and of that university's law school. Warren served in the U.S. Army during World War I as an officer in charge of training troops deploying to France. He began his legal career in California in 1920 as a prosecutor with the Alameda County district attorney's office. In 1925 he was appointed district attorney to fill a vacancy. Elected district attorney in his own right the following year, he would remain in that office until his election as California's attorney general in 1938.

Warren was a product of the California Republican politics of the Progressive Era. As district attorney and as attorney general he was generally supportive of reforms in the criminal justice system, such as with his willingness to extend due process rights and legal representation to defendants in criminal cases. These were generally not required at the time by the federal courts, which by and large were not applying most of the criminal defendants' rights provisions of the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth amendments to the states. Warren was also somewhat ahead of the times in his attitudes toward African Americans. He considered appointing a black attorney to the attorney general's staff in 1938.

Ironically enough, anti-Asian bias probably helped propel Warren to the national stage. Warren shared the anti-Asian sentiments that were common among whites on the West Coast in the early part of the twentieth century. Near the beginning of his career he was a member of an anti-Asian group, Native Sons of the Golden West. As attorney general in the winter and spring of 1942, Warren was a leading advocate of Japanese internment, at first advocating internment only for Japanese aliens but later supporting the internment of Japanese Americans as well. His support for Japanese internment doubtless aided Warren in his gaining election as governor of California in 1942. Warren would run for vice president on the Republican ticket with Governor Thomas Dewey of New York in 1948.

Warren was appointed chief justice by President Dwight David Eisenhower in 1953 to replace Chief Justice Frederick M. Vinson, who had died in office. Warren's entire tenure as chief justice was marked by controversy, beginning with the decision in Brown and continuing until his retirement from the Supreme Court in 1969. Under Warren, the Court dealt with some of the most contentious issues in postwar American life, including school desegregation, reapportionment, the rights of criminal defendants, birth control, and the right to privacy, among others. Warren's critics charged that he extended the reach of the Court into areas unauthorized and unintended by the Constitution's framers and that he and his allies on the Court often employed dubious legal reasoning. Warren's supporters responded by noting that the Court under his direction was a vital force in making equal protection and the Bill of Rights living principles for millions of Americans. Later on as chief justice, at the direction of Lyndon B. Johnson, Warren would head the President's Commission on the Assassination of President Kennedy, often referred to as the Warren Commission. Warren died in 1974.

Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka is a Supreme Court case and as such begins with a syllabus presenting basic information about the case. This information includes the parties, the lower court whose decision is being appealed, and the dates that the case was argued before the Supreme Court. The case was taken on appeal from a decision by the District Court for the District of Kansas. An asterisked footnote relates that Brown is being consolidated with other school segregation cases from South Carolina, Virginia, and Delaware. The syllabus also gives a summary of the decision and lists the attorneys who made oral arguments before the Court on behalf of the parties in Brown and the companion cases. In addition, it lists briefs filed by amici curiae ("friends of the court," persons or organizations not party to a case who file a brief in support of a party or to inform the court with respect to a legal or policy issue) in Brown and the companion cases. Of special interest is the fact that the assistant attorney general J. Lee Rankin argued for the United States in support of desegregation.

◆ Chief Justice Earl Warren's Majority Opinion

Warren begins with a straightforward presentation of the issues. His first paragraph notes that the desegregation cases have come from different states Kansas, South Carolina, Virginia, and Delaware and that while each state presents somewhat different issues with respect to local laws and local conditions, the clear principal issue of legal segregation is common to all of the cases.

Stylistically, Warren's opinion makes extensive use of footnotes not only to cite relevant authorities but also to carry the burden of informing the reader of major legal and factual arguments. As had become common in twentieth-century legal writing, footnotes served to supply a judicial decision with a kind of supplemental narrative, augmenting the main points being made in the body of the opinion. This style of judicial writing was doubtless encouraged, perhaps mandated, by the practice of parties and amici curiae filing extensive briefs in major cases. The increasing use of "Brandeis briefs" briefs providing wide-ranging amounts of information to the Court from the social and physical sciences, as modeled after that filed by Louis Brandeis in Muller v. Oregon (1908) probably also hastened the development of the lengthy use of footnotes in judicial opinions.

The first footnote here discusses how Brown and the companion cases had fared in the U.S. district courts. Included in this discussion are the legal and factual findings of these courts. With respect to Brown, a three-judge panel of the District Court for the District of Kansas found that segregated public education indeed had a detrimental effect on black students, but that court nonetheless upheld segregated education because the facilities for blacks and whites were held to be equal with respect to buildings, transportation, curricula, and the educational qualifications of the teachers. The district court in South Carolina found that the facilities available to black students were inferior to those of whites, but that court nonetheless upheld segregation on the ground that South Carolina officials were making efforts to equalize facilities. In Virginia, the district court ordered officials to make efforts to equalize the schools. In Delaware, the state courts had ordered desegregation, and state officials were appealing that order.

Warren moves in the second and third paragraphs to presenting the central claims of the NAACP and of the parents who were bringing suit. He zeroes in on the crux of these claims in the third paragraph, noting, "The plaintiffs contend that segregated public schools are not 'equal' and cannot be made 'equal,' and that hence they are deprived of the equal protection of the laws." Warren's opinion spends relatively little time examining the history of this argument, but it is a claim with a long history, one that predates Brown by at least a century. In particular, the NAACP argued that segregation was inherently stigmatizing, an argument that was older than the Fourteenth Amendment (ratified in 1868) and its equal protection clause, under which Brown and the other cases were brought. This argument made its first judicial appearance in the antebellum Massachusetts school desegregation case Roberts v. City of Boston (1850). In that case, African American parents argued that Boston's system of school segregation essentially stigmatized black children by setting up a caste system dividing black and white. The Massachusetts supreme judicial court rejected the argument, in effect establishing the "separate but equal" doctrine, a point Warren notes in footnote 6. The argument that segregation stigmatized African Americans and hence violated the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of equal protection under the law would later be heard and rejected by the Supreme Court in Plessy v. Ferguson (1896), with the Supreme Court making the "separate but equal" doctrine a part of federal constitutional law.

Part of the NAACP's aim in Brown was to have segregated schools declared unconstitutional on the ground that the system of school segregation forced black children into schools that were vastly inferior to those reserved for white students. The systems of school segregation that prevailed in the southern states usually featured vast inequalities in the levels of education provided to black and white children. Black schools were typically funded at a fraction of the level of white schools. In many districts, blacks were confined to one-room schoolhouses in which all grades were to be educated, while whites had separate elementary and secondary schools. Black schools were usually separate and decidedly unequal with respect to the qualifications and pay for black teachers and the physical facilities in which black schools were housed. Correcting all of this was part of the NAACP's aim in litigating against school segregation. In addition, the civil rights organization shared the view held by its nineteenth-century predecessors that the very act of segregating, of singling out blacks for separate treatment, was inherently stigmatizing and more appropriate to a caste system than to the practices of American democracy. The NAACP advocate Thurgood Marshall, in his oral argument before Earl Warren and other members of the Court on December 8, 1953, presented the issue starkly: "Why of all the multitudinous groups in this country, you have to single out the Negroes and give them this separate treatment?"

This was clearly an issue involving the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection clause, and in the fourth and fifth paragraphs the new chief justice begins addressing the Fourteenth Amendment and what it mandated in these circumstances. Here, Warren begins moving into territory that would forever make Brown an object of controversy among constitutional commentators. He argues that the history of the Fourteenth Amendment is inconclusive regarding what it had to say with respect to school segregation. In fact, Warren frames Brown as a case pitting modern realities against inconclusive history. In the fifth paragraph he focuses on the history of public education at the time of the enactment of the Fourteenth Amendment, noting that public education had not yet taken hold in the South and that practically all southern blacks at the time were illiterate. He juxtaposes that situation with modern circumstances: "Today, in contrast, many Negroes have achieved outstanding success in the arts and sciences, as well as in the business and professional world." Warren uses this contrast between the relative lack of importance of public education at the time of the enactment of the Fourteenth Amendment and its much greater importance at the time of the Brown decision to set up what will be his principal argument in paragraphs 8 and 9, namely, that the question of segregated education and its constitutionality under the Fourteenth Amendment had to be considered in light of the importance of public education in modern that is, post World War II American society and not in light of its relative unimportance at the beginning of the Reconstruction era.

In the sixth paragraph Warren takes on the "separate but equal" doctrine, seeking to show that it is less than the solid precedent that its champions claimed. Indeed, the argument for the constitutionality of segregated schools rested on the "separate but equal" precedent provided in Plessy. The former solicitor general John W. Davis, representing South Carolina in an oral argument before the Supreme Court, emphasized the importance of Plessy, highlighting the fact that the lower federal courts and the Supreme Court had repeatedly reaffirmed the "separate but equal" doctrine and asserting that the Court should follow precedent and apply the doctrine in the case of school segregation. Davis's arguments were echoed by other supporters of school segregation.

Warren notes that the Court's earliest interpretations of the Fourteenth Amendment stressed that the amendment was designed to prohibit state-imposed racial discrimination; the "separate but equal" doctrine did not become part of the Supreme Court's jurisprudence until 1896 more than a generation after the enactment of the amendment. He also notes that Plessy involved transportation, not education. Warren further states that since Plessy, the Supreme Court had only heard six cases involving the "separate but equal" doctrine, with none reviewing the essential validity of the doctrine. He next cites the decisions involving segregation in graduate and professional schools. Warren's aims in this discussion are clear. While not directly challenging the Plessy precedent, he effectively isolates it as a decision that was not consistent with judicial interpretations made close to the enactment of the Fourteenth Amendment. He also gives Plessy a narrow reading so that it might be seen as a precedent that at most applies to the field of transportation. That case, according to Warren, was one that had not been thoroughly examined by the Court and in any event was made problematic, particularly in the field of education, by the graduate-school segregation cases.

Paragraphs 7 9 are used to frame the issues before the Court. Warren largely frames these issues in the way that the NAACP and the plaintiffs had presented them. The primary issue is segregation, and it is an issue that goes beyond tangible factors to encompass philosophical ones as well as the subtle reality of stigmatization. In paragraph 7 Warren uses footnote 9 to relate that the district court in Kansas had actually found substantial equality in the black and white schools. Warren indicates that regardless of this finding, segregation itself and its effect on public education remain of paramount concern.

Paragraph 8 is where Warren stakes out a clear claim as a proponent indeed, one of the earliest explicit proponents of the notion of a "living constitution," the idea that jurists should go beyond the concerns and assumptions of the framers of constitutional provisions and instead look at and reevaluate the Constitution in light of modern circumstances. He starts the paragraph, "In approaching this problem, we cannot turn the clock back to 1868, when the Amendment was adopted, or even to 1896, when Plessy v. Ferguson was written. We must consider public education in the light of its full development and its present place in American life throughout the Nation." In paragraphs 9 11 Warren goes on to outline the importance of education in modern American life and to conclude that segregated schools deprive members of minority groups of equal educational opportunities even when the tangible resources are equal.

Paragraph 12 lays a psychological basis for the opinion one that would leave the Brown decision with a lingering controversy that persists to the present day. Warren cites the works of a number of psychologists including, most prominently, the black psychologist Kenneth Clark on the effects of segregation on the self-esteem of black children. These citations would lead many critics to charge that the chief justice was engaging in sociology rather than jurisprudence. Even many critics sympathetic to the outcome in Brown later expressed some discomfort with the use of psychological evidence, claiming that it gave the decision less of a firm footing, such that it could potentially be undone by shifts in findings in the social sciences. Clearly, Warren was examining the plaintiffs' arguments that segregation stigmatized black students by comparing those claims to the findings of the psychological experts of the day.

Paragraph 14 provides the Court's conclusion that "in the field of public education, the doctrine of 'separate but equal' has no place." Paragraph 15 provides a hint about some of the behind-the-scenes negotiations that Warren and the other justices went through in order to secure a unanimous decision in Brown. Here, Warren calls for the reargument of the cases to allow the Court to consider remedies for school segregation. Warren recognized the importance of establishing the constitutional principle that segregated public schools violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. As such, he was greatly concerned with getting a unanimous Court to agree to that constitutional principle an achievement that had been very much in doubt during judicial conferences. Thus, as part of the strategy to obtain a unanimous opinion, Warren agreed to have Brown initially decide only the principle that segregated schools were unconstitutional, deferring the question of how the decision would be implemented for another day. Paragraph 14, the last paragraph, lays the groundwork for the second case, commonly known as Brown II, which would be heard the following year, and the more than two decades of desegregation litigation that would follow.

Brown v. Board of Education was first and foremost a Supreme Court decision designed to settle the constitutional question of whether or not segregated public schools were prohibited by the Fourteenth Amendment. Warren wrote the opinion to resolve that constitutional controversy and to inform states that they could no longer maintain segregated school systems. It was also written to inform African American parents that they had a legal right to send their children to nonsegregated schools.

Warren clearly also had a broader, national audience in mind while writing the decision. An experienced politician, the chief justice knew that the decision would be controversial and, indeed, hotly contested. He sought to write the decision in such a way as to present the policy case to the American public at large. His controversial use of psychological evidence to buttress the case against segregated schools was an attempt to appeal to the public by showing that children were being harmed by the policy of segregation. Warren's discussion of Negro accomplishments in education, business, and science can also be seen as an attempt to counter strong prejudices against African Americans, thus fortifying the case for school integration.

Impact

It is probably no exaggeration to say that Brown was the most significant case decided by the Supreme Court in its history. While the decision would take decades to implement, Brown was critical as a harbinger of the federal government's return to the civil rights arena, an arena from which it had been largely absent since Reconstruction. Brown would also provide a tremendous boost to the civil rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s. The knowledge that the Court was now going to interpret the Constitution as prohibiting the kind of caste-like distinctions that had been a feature of black life in the United States from the very beginning helped encourage a greater assertiveness on the part of African Americans, who proceeded to successfully protest the formal segregation of Jim Crow laws in the South and, later, more subtle forms of discrimination throughout the nation.

Brown's impact in the courts was a little more complicated. The case commonly known as Brown v. Board of Education led to a successor case of the same name, known as Brown II, in 1955. That case resulted in a ruling that required the desegregation of separate school systems with "all deliberate speed." This order, in turn, led to protracted battles in federal district courts over the precise details and timing of school desegregation plans, which lasted decades. Nonetheless, the decision in Brown effectively led to the death of the "separate but equal" doctrine as well as to the negation of the idea that governmental bodies could practice the kind of formal discrimination against members of minority groups that had been common before Brown.

1. Compare and contrast Chief Justice Earl Warren's opinion in Brown with Justice John Marshall Harlan's dissent in Plessy v. Ferguson. Although both opinions argue against the "separate but equal" doctrine, they do so in different ways. Which opinion do you believe is stronger and why?

2. Many have criticized Warren's opinion for ignoring the original intent of the Fourteenth Amendment. How important should the intentions of the framers be considered in modern constitutional interpretation?

3. In light of the continued existence of de facto school segregation in many communities, should Brown be judged a failure?

4. Some critics fault Warren for writing a weak decision that would take very long to implement. Other students of the case argue that if Warren had not written a cautious decision, he would have had difficulty getting a unanimous Court to agree with the decision, which would have brought about more resistance to Brown. Which argument do you find more persuasive?

5. Should Warren have included psychological evidence in his decision or should he have based his decision solely on legal sources?

Brown v. Board of Education

Syllabus

Segregation of white and Negro children in the public schools of a State solely on the basis of race, pursuant to state laws permitting or requiring such segregation, denies to Negro children the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment even though the physical facilities and other "tangible" factors of white and Negro schools may be equal.

(a) The history of the Fourteenth Amendment is inconclusive as to its intended effect on public education.

(b) The question presented in these cases must be determined not on the basis of conditions existing when the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted, but in the light of the full development of public education and its present place in American life throughout the Nation.

(c) Where a State has undertaken to provide an opportunity for an education in its public schools, such an opportunity is a right which must be made available to all on equal terms.

(d) Segregation of children in public schools solely on the basis of race deprives children of the minority group of equal educational opportunities, even though the physical facilities and other "tangible" factors may be equal.

(e) The "separate but equal" doctrine adopted in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537, has no place in the field of public education.

(f) The cases are restored to the docket for further argument on specified questions relating to the forms of the decrees.

Opinion

◆ Mr. Chief Justice Warren Delivered the Opinion of the Court

These cases come to us from the States of Kansas, South Carolina, Virginia, and Delaware. They are premised on different facts and different local conditions, but a common legal question justifies their consideration together in this consolidated opinion.

In each of the cases, minors of the Negro race, through their legal representatives, seek the aid of the courts in obtaining admission to the public schools of their community on a nonsegregated basis. In each instance, they had been denied admission to schools attended by white children under laws requiring or permitting segregation according to race. This segregation was alleged to deprive the plaintiffs of the equal protection of the laws under the Fourteenth Amendment. In each of the cases other than the Delaware case, a three-judge federal district court denied relief to the plaintiffs on the so-called "separate but equal" doctrine announced by this Court in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537. Under that doctrine, equality of treatment is accorded when the races are provided substantially equal facilities, even though these facilities be separate. In the Delaware case, the Supreme Court of Delaware adhered to that doctrine, but ordered that the plaintiffs be admitted to the white schools because of their superiority to the Negro schools.

The plaintiffs contend that segregated public schools are not "equal" and cannot be made "equal," and that hence they are deprived of the equal protection of the laws. Because of the obvious importance of the question presented, the Court took jurisdiction. Argument was heard in the 1952 Term, and reargument was heard this Term on certain questions propounded by the Court.

Reargument was largely devoted to the circumstances surrounding the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1868. It covered exhaustively consideration of the Amendment in Congress, ratification by the states, then-existing practices in racial segregation, and the views of proponents and opponents of the Amendment. This discussion and our own investigation convince us that, although these sources cast some light, it is not enough to resolve the problem with which we are faced. At best, they are inconclusive. The most avid proponents of the post-War Amendments undoubtedly intended them to remove all legal distinctions among "all persons born or naturalized in the United States." Their opponents, just as certainly, were antagonistic to both the letter and the spirit of the Amendments and wished them to have the most limited effect. What others in Congress and the state legislatures had in mind cannot be determined with any degree of certainty.

An additional reason for the inconclusive nature of the Amendment's history with respect to segregated schools is the status of public education at that time. In the South, the movement toward free common schools, supported by general taxation, had not yet taken hold. Education of white children was largely in the hands of private groups. Education of Negroes was almost nonexistent, and practically all of the race were illiterate. In fact, any education of Negroes was forbidden by law in some states. Today, in contrast, many Negroes have achieved outstanding success in the arts and sciences, as well as in the business and professional world. It is true that public school education at the time of the Amendment had advanced further in the North, but the effect of the Amendment on Northern States was generally ignored in the congressional debates. Even in the North, the conditions of public education did not approximate those existing today. The curriculum was usually rudimentary; ungraded schools were common in rural areas; the school term was but three months a year in many states, and compulsory school attendance was virtually unknown. As a consequence, it is not surprising that there should be so little in the history of the Fourteenth Amendment relating to its intended effect on public education.

In the first cases in this Court construing the Fourteenth Amendment, decided shortly after its adoption, the Court interpreted it as proscribing all state-imposed discriminations against the Negro race. The doctrine of "separate but equal" did not make its appearance in this Court until 1896 in the case of Plessy v. Ferguson, supra, involving not education but transportation. American courts have since labored with the doctrine for over half a century. In this Court, there have been six cases involving the "separate but equal" doctrine in the field of public education. In Cumming v. County Board of Education, 175 U.S. 528, and Gong Lum v. Rice, 275 U.S. 78, the validity of the doctrine itself was not challenged. In more recent cases, all on the graduate school level, inequality was found in that specific benefits enjoyed by white students were denied to Negro students of the same educational qualifications. Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U.S. 337; Sipuel v. Oklahoma, 332 U.S. 631; Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U.S. 629; McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U.S. 637. In none of these cases was it necessary to reexamine the doctrine to grant relief to the Negro plaintiff. And in Sweatt v. Painter, supra, the Court expressly reserved decision on the question whether Plessy v. Ferguson should be held inapplicable to public education.

In the instant cases, that question is directly presented. Here, unlike Sweatt v. Painter, there are findings below that the Negro and white schools involved have been equalized, or are being equalized, with respect to buildings, curricula, qualifications and salaries of teachers, and other "tangible" factors. Our decision, therefore, cannot turn on merely a comparison of these tangible factors in the Negro and white schools involved in each of the cases. We must look instead to the effect of segregation itself on public education.

In approaching this problem, we cannot turn the clock back to 1868, when the Amendment was adopted, or even to 1896, when Plessy v. Ferguson was written. We must consider public education in the light of its full development and its present place in American life throughout the Nation. Only in this way can it be determined if segregation in public schools deprives these plaintiffs of the equal protection of the laws.

Today, education is perhaps the most important function of state and local governments. Compulsory school attendance laws and the great expenditures for education both demonstrate our recognition of the importance of education to our democratic society. It is required in the performance of our most basic public responsibilities, even service in the armed forces. It is the very foundation of good citizenship. Today it is a principal instrument in awakening the child to cultural values, in preparing him for later professional training, and in helping him to adjust normally to his environment. In these days, it is doubtful that any child may reasonably be expected to succeed in life if he is denied the opportunity of an education. Such an opportunity, where the state has undertaken to provide it, is a right which must be made available to all on equal terms.

We come then to the question presented: Does segregation of children in public schools solely on the basis of race, even though the physical facilities and other "tangible" factors may be equal, deprive the children of the minority group of equal educational opportunities? We believe that it does.

In Sweatt v. Painter, supra, in finding that a segregated law school for Negroes could not provide them equal educational opportunities, this Court relied in large part on "those qualities which are incapable of objective measurement but which make for greatness in a law school." In McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, supra, the Court, in requiring that a Negro admitted to a white graduate school be treated like all other students, again resorted to intangible considerations: "… his ability to study, to engage in discussions and exchange views with other students, and, in general, to learn his profession." Such considerations apply with added force to children in grade and high schools. To separate them from others of similar age and qualifications solely because of their race generates a feeling of inferiority as to their status in the community that may affect their hearts and minds in a way unlikely ever to be undone. The effect of this separation on their educational opportunities was well stated by a finding in the Kansas case by a court which nevertheless felt compelled to rule against the Negro plaintiffs:

> Segregation of white and colored children in public schools has a detrimental effect upon the colored children. The impact is greater when it has the sanction of the law, for the policy of separating the races is usually interpreted as denoting the inferiority of the negro group. A sense of inferiority affects the motivation of a child to learn. Segregation with the sanction of law, therefore, has a tendency to [retard] the educational and mental development of negro children and to deprive them of some of the benefits they would receive in a racial[ly] integrated school system.

Whatever may have been the extent of psychological knowledge at the time of Plessy v. Ferguson, this finding is amply supported by modern authority. Any language in Plessy v. Ferguson contrary to this finding is rejected.

We conclude that, in the field of public education, the doctrine of "separate but equal" has no place. Separate educational facilities are inherently unequal. Therefore, we hold that the plaintiffs and others similarly situated for whom the actions have been brought are, by reason of the segregation complained of, deprived of the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment. This disposition makes unnecessary any discussion whether such segregation also violates the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Because these are class actions, because of the wide applicability of this decision, and because of the great variety of local conditions, the formulation of decrees in these cases presents problems of considerable complexity. On reargument, the consideration of appropriate relief was necessarily subordinated to the primary question the constitutionality of segregation in public education. We have now announced that such segregation is a denial of the equal protection of the laws. In order that we may have the full assistance of the parties in formulating decrees, the cases will be restored to the docket, and the parties are requested to present further argument on Questions 4 and 5 previously propounded by the Court for the reargument this Term. The Attorney General of the United States is again invited to participate. The Attorneys General of the states requiring or permitting segregation in public education will also be permitted to appear as amici curiae upon request to do so by September 15, 1954, and submission of briefs by October 1, 1954.

It is so ordered.

1956

"I had become, whether I liked it or not, a symbol, representing my people."

Overview

"Easter Sunday," an excerpt from Marian Anderson's autobiography, My Lord, What a Morning (1956) details the world-renowned contralto's recollections of her most famous performance. A landmark in African American history and a prelude to the civil rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s, Anderson's 1939 Easter Sunday concert at the Lincoln Memorial in Washington, D.C., developed when the Daughters of the American Revolution (DAR) denied her the opportunity to perform at Constitution Hall because of her race. Led by Walter White, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), an interracial coalition of influential individuals and organizations turned Anderson's plight into a national cause célèbre.

The mobilization of liberal outrage began in January 1939 and took on new life in late February after First Lady Eleanor Roosevelt publicly resigned from the DAR as a result of their snubbing of Anderson. In the weeks that followed, White; Roosevelt; the NAACP legal activist Charles Hamilton Houston; Secretary of the Interior Harold Ickes; Anderson's promotional agent, Sol Hurok; and many others worked behind the scenes to find some way of countering the DAR's decision. Eventually, with President Franklin Roosevelt's enthusiastic approval, they fastened upon the idea of inviting Anderson to sing at the Lincoln Memorial, a hallowed site fraught with democratic symbolism. At Hurok's urging, Anderson accepted the invitation, though neither she nor anyone else knew exactly what to expect. Anderson's "Easter Sunday" memoir provides a glimpse into the events leading up to her historic performance, her trepidations about performing at such a momentous event, and her reactions to the emotional experience.

On Easter Sunday (April 9) 1939, seventy-five thousand Americans gathered at the Lincoln Memorial in Washington to hear the sound of freedom. Young and old, black and white, they braved the elements on an unseasonably cold April afternoon to listen to the soulful voice of Marian Anderson, a forty-three-year-old African American from Philadelphia who had been denied the right to sing at Constitution Hall because she was black.

One of the world's most popular classical performers, Anderson had established her reputation in Europe during the early 1930s before returning to the United States in December 1935. Following a recital in Salzburg, Austria, in September 1935, the Italian maestro Arturo Toscanini exclaimed that Anderson's contralto was a voice that "one is privileged to hear only once in a hundred years." Many American concertgoers and critics came to hold her in similarly high regard, and in February 1936, Anderson interrupted a string of sold-out performances to sing at the White House, where she charmed President and Mrs. Roosevelt. None of this, however, seemed to carry any weight with the national leadership of the DAR, the venerable all-white heritage organization that owned and managed Constitution Hall, near the White House. Racial discrimination had long been a fact of life in the nation's capital, and DAR leaders claimed that they were simply following tradition when they turned Anderson away. But this time the discrimination did not go unchallenged.

In mid-February 1939, several dozen progressive organizations in the Washington area formed the Marian Anderson Citizens Committee, a broad-based civil rights coalition determined to overturn the DAR's decision. Spurred by the public's growing outrage, First Lady Eleanor Roosevelt resigned from the DAR on February 27, ensuring an ever-widening controversy and provoking a national press debate on the compatibility of democracy and racial discrimination. For several weeks, the Marian Anderson Citizens Committee, working in close collaboration with NAACP leaders, Sol Hurok, and a number of black intellectuals and activists associated with Howard University, pressured the DAR to end the "white artists only" policy at Constitution Hall. But they were eventually forced to seek an alternative venue for Anderson's performance. After an unsuccessful attempt to book the auditorium of Central High School, a segregated institution that had occasionally opened its doors to black groups on a limited basis, the committee and its allies reluctantly concluded that the only viable option was an outdoor concert.

By mid-March, Walter White had seized upon the idea of the Lincoln Memorial as "the most logical place" for Anderson's concert. The logic of holding a gathering at the seventeen-year-old Memorial was not as obvious in 1939 as it would become later. Over the coming decades, the Memorial would host literally hundreds of mass meetings, including the August 1963 March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom, which drew a quarter of a million people to the west end of the National Mall. But the notion of holding a rally, a concert, or any other mass assemblage at the site was both novel and daring in 1939. The federal agencies in charge of the site, the National Park Service and the Department of the Interior, had never granted a permit for a large gathering at the Memorial, and the only black organization of any size to use the site was the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, which had held a religious service there for two thousand people in 1926.

The choice of the Lincoln Memorial as the backdrop was a calculated gamble. The organizers could not be certain how the American public would respond to the juxtaposition of a black concert singer and a white Republican president from Illinois. Physically and aesthetically, the Memorial and the adjacent rectangular reflecting pool stretching eastward toward the Washington Monument represented a stunning site. But the political and cultural implications of staging a controversial concert on sacred ground were complex and potentially dangerous. The situation called for careful planning and just the right touches to ensure that the event communicated the right messages to the right people. With help from Secretary Ickes, who secured the president's approval, the organizers announced to the world on March 30 that Marian Anderson would sing at the Lincoln Memorial on Easter Sunday, April 9.

The organizers went to great lengths to ensure that the free, open-air concert would attract a large audience and that a number of dignitaries would be on hand to underscore the significance of the occasion. When Anderson arrived at the Memorial, she was stunned to learn that the platform from which she would sing contained two hundred seats reserved for Supreme Court justices, congressional leaders, cabinet officials, and other political and cultural luminaries. Even more shocking was the size of the crowd, the largest gathering since the Memorial's opening in 1922.

As soon as Anderson, a solitary figure wrapped in a fur coat to block the cold wind and drizzle, strode to the bank of microphones and began to sing the words to "America," it was obvious that an extraordinary event was unfolding. No one could have missed the symbolic irony of the opening lyrics: "My country 'tis of thee, / Sweet land of liberty." The Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., speaking to an even-larger gathering at the Lincoln Memorial a quarter-century later, would turn to the same anthem in his "I Have a Dream" speech. For him, as for Anderson, the closing words of the opening stanza "Let freedom ring" paid tribute to an unrealized ideal, engaging the audience in an aspiring celebration of democratic nationalism.

With the throng standing in rapt attention, Anderson went on to sing Franz Schubert's "Ave Maria" and several spirituals, culminating with "Nobody Knows the Troubles I've Seen." Following a thunderous final ovation, she tried to return the crowd's affection: "I am overwhelmed.… I just can't talk." she explained. "I can't tell you what you've done for me today. I thank you from the bottom of my heart." Moments later she had to be rushed from the stage as thousands of well-wishers pressed forward to congratulate her. Taken into the recesses of the Memorial by security guards, she stood for a few minutes under Daniel Chester French's towering sculpture of Lincoln before joining her mother and sisters in a rented limousine that whisked them to the private home where they would spend the night. That no hotel in the rigidly segregated capital city was willing to lift its color bar to accommodate the Andersons underscored the bittersweet character of the occasion.

The entire program, including a short intermission, lasted a mere half hour. In that brief space of time, Marian Anderson became an iconic figure, gaining a new life and identity. Already renowned as a singer, she became forever after a symbol of racial pride and democratic promise. "No one present at that moving performance ever forgot it," the historian Constance McLaughlin Green wrote in 1967. One suspects that Anderson's performance was only slightly less moving for those who listened to the live broadcast of the concert on the NBC radio network. In the days and weeks following the concert, millions more read about it in newspapers and magazines or watched the newsreel footage in movie houses. Most of the news coverage stressed Anderson's humility and dignity as well as the restraint and respectability of the crowd that had gathered to hear her sing. Not everyone welcomed her rising fame, especially in the white South, where Jim Crow segregation was not only a hallowed folkway but also the law of the land. Still, for many Americans, Anderson had become a model of African American achievement. Among black Americans her image took on heroic proportions, while for many northern whites her perceived mode of striving became an attractive alternative to the exploits of more menacing figures such as the boxer Joe Louis, the actor Paul Robeson, and the labor leader A. Philip Randolph. Occupying the moral high ground in her struggle with the DAR and Jim Crow, she helped to reawaken the nation's conscience and its commitment to the American creed of "liberty and justice for all."

About the Author

Born in Philadelphia in 1897, Marian Anderson grew up in a predominantly black neighborhood that exemplified both the strengths and the weaknesses of inner-city life. While her childhood was marked by poverty and the early death of her father, she enjoyed the benefits of being raised in a close-knit extended family that nurtured her personal and musical development. Both sides of her family had migrated to Pennsylvania from Virginia in the early 1890s.

All four of Anderson's grandparents had lived as slaves, but in Philadelphia her parents and grandparents found a measure of freedom and stability anchored in religious faith. Followed closely by two talented younger sisters, Anderson joined the Union Baptist Church junior choir at the age of six and eventually became the pride of the congregation. As an adolescent, she became the leading soloist of the People's Chorus, a revered institution among black Philadelphians. By the time she had reached the age of eighteen, Union Baptist and the surrounding community were raising funds for her musical education. The funds raised were modest, and Anderson was shunned by the first vocal school that she unwittingly tried to desegregate. But by 1917 her prospects for a professional career were brightening, and she had reason to hope that someday she would be able to share her talent with the wider world.

Anderson took her first trip to the South in December 1917, when at the age of twenty she sang before a mixed but segregated audience in Savannah, Georgia. During the mid-1920s, annual southern tours took her to as many as nine states and as far away as Florida. Over time she developed a loyal following among southern whites as well as blacks, but her growing popularity did not protect her from the humiliations of Jim Crow travel and segregated concert halls.

In late 1927, Anderson found a temporary refuge in London, joining the growing number of other black musicians studying and performing in Europe. She returned to the United States in October 1928, but in June 1930 a Rosenwald Fellowship funded an extended visit to Berlin, where she honed her skills as a classical singer of German lieder. By 1931, the escalating tensions of Weimar Germany had driven her to Scandinavia, where she remained for nearly three years. A wildly successful concert tour in 1933 1934 made her a celebrity throughout Scandinavia, and during the following year her fame spread to France, England, Austria, and beyond especially after she signed a contract with the legendary promotional agent Sol Hurok in the fall of 1934.

In 1935 Anderson returned to the United States, where she confronted the ambiguous realities of a depression-ravaged nation that had found a measure of hope in New Deal reforms. These ambiguities were especially apparent in matters of race, and nowhere was this more evident than in the nation's capital, where a rigid color line coexisted with the iconography of democracy and freedom. In mid-February 1936, Anderson sang before a mixed audience in the auditorium of an all-black Washington high school, and a few days later she entertained Franklin and Eleanor Roosevelt at the White House. Over the next three years, Anderson performed all across the nation to considerable acclaim, but her manager, Sol Hurok, had great difficulty arranging appropriate venues in the Jim Crow South and in Washington. In January 1939, Hurok's unsuccessful attempt to book an Anderson concert in Constitution Hall, the city's only large auditorium, provoked a national controversy that highlighted the racist conservatism of both the DAR and the nation's capital.

From 1939 until her death, Anderson maintained an active role in the civil rights movement. Beginning with her Easter Sunday concert, a series of events and honors reinforced her visibility as a symbol of democratic and racial promise. In July of 1939, at the NAACP's annual convention, Eleanor Roosevelt presented her with the organization's prestigious Spingarn Medal for outstanding achievement. In January of 1943, a mural commemorating her Lincoln Memorial concert was installed at the Department of the Interior. Later that year, she finally appeared at Constitution Hall at a war-relief benefit concert, and in March of 1953 she sang once more at Constitution Hall, this time to an integrated audience. Her celebrated appearance as Ulrica in the Metropolitan Opera's 1955 performance of Verdi's Un ballo in maschera broke the Met's long-standing color bar. In 1958 Anderson was appointed as an American delegate to the United Nations Human Rights Committee, and in 1961 she was invited to sing at the inauguration of President John F. Kennedy. Kennedy's successor, Lyndon B. Johnson, awarded her the Presidential Medal of Freedom in 1963. Her farewell tour began at Constitution Hall in October 1964, three months after the signing of the Civil Rights Act, and ended at Carnegie Hall on Easter Sunday 1965, three weeks after the Selma-to-Montgomery voting rights march.

In her twenty-five years of retirement, Anderson made only sporadic stage appearances, but she remained in the public eye as a philanthropist and as an enduring symbol of dignity and courage. When she died in 1993, at the age of ninety-six, there was an outpouring of tribute and affection as Americans of all races and political persuasions lamented the passing of a woman of unrivaled talent and character.

Although it is titled "Easter Sunday," Anderson's account actually provides relatively few details about the 1939 Lincoln Memorial Concert or the series of events that led up to it. She remarks that upon finding out that she had been denied access to Constitution Hall, "I was saddened, but as it is my belief that right will win I assumed that a way would be found." Indeed, Anderson appears almost entirely disengaged from the planning of the event, leaving the arrangements to her manager, Sal Hurok, and his staff. She mentions Eleanor Roosevelt's resignation from the DAR only briefly. Although it was a pivotal event in Washington and a large-scale scandal for the DAR, Anderson refers to it as a fleeting headline that caught her attention in passing a newstand.

Rather, in the lead-up to her arrival in Washington, Anderson's energy was focused on the sudden illness of her accompanist Kosti Vehanen. "Here was a crisis of immediate concern to me," she said and concentrated her attention on preparing her new accompanist, Franz Rupp. However, as Easter Sunday approached, Anderson could not avoid the uproar ongoing in Washington. Friends, fans, and reporters were clamoring to find out what she had to say about Washington. But, as she recalls, "I did not want to talk, and I particularly did not want to say anything about the D.A.R." Even nearly twenty years later in her autobiography, Anderson seems to hold back from being overly emotional about the facts. She admits that she "was saddened and ashamed" and describes the situation as mere "unpleasantness."

It is unclear how much she was holding back about her feelings. Anderson was a private person by nature and did not wish to reveal too much to the public. Her autobiography itself was an exercise in reconciling her private and public personae. She was initially opposed to the idea of releasing an autobiography at all, but Hurok persuaded her to allow the New York Times music critic Howard Taubman to ghostwrite the project. As Allan Keiler outlines in his biography of Anderson, Taubman spent several months interviewing and tape-recording his conversations with Anderson in order to compile the book. But he encountered difficulties in getting Anderson to open up about her experiences:

> Taubman found her unable to be frank about the difficulties of her childhood, or to talk easily about the prejudice and discrimination she faced. Whenever a subject arose that gave her any discomfort the music school that turned her away, the need to criticize others, the Lincoln Memorial incident she more often than not turned the tape recorder off before she was willing to go on.

Despite the difficulties in eliciting Anderson's memories about the Lincoln Memorial concert, the pages of "Easter Sunday" underscore Anderson's grace under pressure. She struggled with her role in a controversial and embarrassing situation but overcame her discomfort for the greater good. In discussing her decision to approve the concert plan, she admits that she hesitated, but ultimately said yes. She recalls, "I could see that my significance as an individual was small in this affair. I had become, whether I liked it or not, a symbol, representing my people. I had to appear."

Anderson's descriptions of the concert itself do not dwell on the symbolic nature of her performance or on her status as a burgeoning civil rights icon. Instead, she comments on nervousness about performing in front of such a crowd and how she is unsure how she even mustered the ability to sing. She is unfailingly modest about her role in the Lincoln Memorial concert. She avoids any characterizations of herself as a civil rights pioneer, giving herself no credit for influencing the DAR racial policies. She matter-of-factly states, "In time the policy at Constitution Hall changed." Nor does she espouse any sense of triumph at her first Constitution Hall recital: "I had no feeling different from what I have in other halls.… I felt that it was a beautiful concert hall, and I was happy to sing in it."

She ends the chapter remembering the bond she formed with Eleanor Roosevelt in the years following her Easter Sunday concert. The first lady's understated role in the DAR controversy and her quiet support for Anderson throughout her career created a lasting relationship between them. Drawn together by mutual admiration and common purpose, these two remarkable women from radically different backgrounds overcame barriers of race and class to bring about a pivotal moment in the history of the American freedom struggle.

Audience

By the 1950s Marian Anderson had become one of the most recognizable women in the world. Her soulful voice had attracted millions of followers from around the globe, and her role in the early civil rights movement had inspired generations. Anderson and Taubman's collaborative autobiography of 1956 was designed and marketed both as a resource for music lovers and as a book that would appeal to Anderson fans, black and white, who were curious about her views and reflections on topics related to her musical career, her personal life, and her experiences as a public figure.

Impact

Although it lasted for only a half-hour, the 1939 Lincoln Memorial concert had profound and lasting consequences, for Marian Anderson and for the nation. First, on a personal level it established Anderson as a civil rights icon, uniquely identified with the Lincoln Memorial, the Lincoln legacy, and the ongoing struggle for black rights and racial equality. For the remainder of her life, an eventful fifty-four years punctuated with civil rights milestones and public service, she enjoyed an eminence that transcended the world of music.

Second, the 1939 concert initiated a long tradition of civil rights protest and pageantry associated with the Lincoln Memorial. In the years since the original Anderson concert, the Memorial has served as the designated backdrop and ceremonial site for scores of social and political protest rallies, including the epochal August 1963 March for Jobs and Freedom. In 2009 the Memorial was the scene of a memorable pre-inauguration concert celebrating the election of the nation's first African American president, Barack Obama. And four days later, at the actual inauguration ceremony, the great soul singer Aretha Franklin evoked memories of the Easter Sunday concert when she sang "America," the same song that had opened Anderson's history-making performance seventy years earlier.

The third and most important consequence of the 1939 Lincoln Memorial Concert resides in its connection to the broad course of the civil rights movement. For the movement to gain strength and ultimately succeed, several changes had to occur, including the recognition that racial discrimination is a national, not just a sectional, problem that violations of the American creed of "liberty and justice for all" undermine national honor and the prospects for national greatness.

The "rediscovery" of racial discrimination as a national problem began during the mid-1930s, as the rising tide of totalitarianism in Europe brought attention to the dark side of racialist ideology and practice. This rediscovery hinged on a series of public events, of which the Lincoln Memorial concert was one of the most significant. The others included the 1936 Berlin Olympics, when the victorious African American track star Jesse Owens was snubbed by Adolf Hitler; the world heavyweight championship match of 1938, when the "Brown Bomber" Joe Louis defeated the German Max Schmeling at Yankee Stadium; A. Philip Randolph's threatened March on Washington in 1941; the controversy surrounding Jackie Robinson's desegregation of Major League baseball in 1947; and the desegregation of the American armed forces during the Truman Administration.

Each of these episodes helped to push the nation toward recognition of a long-neglected national problem, but the Easter 1939 concert was especially important in this regard. The concert help set the stage for later developments, and the "symbolic geography" of the controversy a segregated national capital, the Lincoln Memorial, and Constitution Hall, in the shadow of the White House magnified the episode's impact. The Washington backdrop a distinctively southern city that served as the

"I could see that my significance as an individual was small in this affair. I had become, whether I liked it or not, a symbol, representing my people. I had to appear."

"All I knew then as I stepped forward was the over-whelming impact of that vast multitude. There seemed to be people as far as the eye could see. The crowd stretched in a great semicircle from the Lincoln Memorial around the reflecting pool on to the shaft of the Washington Monument. I had a feeling that a great wave of good will poured out from these people, almost engulfing me."

"The essential point about wanting to appear in the hall was that I wanted to do so because I felt I had that right as an artist."

seat of national government, a community that tolerated and fostered a paradoxical mix of cradle-to-grave segregation and democratic pretense carried special significance for the cause of civil rights. Add to this the national scope and prominence of the DAR, and it made a dramatic conflict that could not help but disturb the complacency of many Americans.

The Anderson-DAR controversy made it difficult to dismiss racial discrimination as a mere sectional problem. For the remainder of her career, Anderson's almost unparalleled celebrity served as a reminder that the national commitment to equal opportunity requires eternal vigilance. By the mid-1950s, public opinion polls identified Anderson as one of the most admired women in the world, yet many

"Easter Sunday"

The division between time spent in Europe and in the United States changed gradually. In my second season under Mr. Hurok's management there was already more to do at home, and less time was devoted to Europe. Soon there were so many concerts to do in the cities of the United States that a trip abroad for concerts had to be squeezed in. There is no doubt that my work was drawing the attention of larger circles of people in wider areas of our country. Fees went up, and I hope that I was making a return in greater service.

Mr. Hurok's aim was to have me accepted as an artist worthy to stand with the finest serious ones, and he sought appearances for me in all the places where the best performers were expected and taken for granted. The nation's capital was such a place. I had sung in Washington years before in schools and churches. It was time to appear on the city's foremost concert platform Constitution Hall.

As it turned out, the decision to arrange an appearance in Constitution Hall proved to be momentous. I left bookings entirely to the management. When this one was being made I did not give it much thought. Negotiations for the renting of the hall were begun while I was touring, and I recall that the first intimation I had that there were difficulties came by accident. Even then I did not find out exactly what was going on; all I knew was the something was amiss. It was only a few weeks before the scheduled date for Washington that I discovered the full truth that the Daughters of the American Revolution, owners of the hall, had decreed that it could not be used by one of my race. I was saddened, but as it is my belief that right will win I assumed that a way would be found. I had no inkling that the thing would become a cause célèbre.

I was in San Francisco, I recall, when I passed a newsstand, and my eye caught a headline: Mrs. Roosevelt Takes Stand. Under this was another line, in bold print just a bit smaller: resigns from D.A.R., etc. I was on my way to the concert hall for my performance and could not stop to buy a paper. I did not get one until after the concert, and I honestly could not conceive that things had gone so far.

As we worked our way back East, continuing with our regular schedule, newspaper people made efforts to obtain some comment from me, but I had nothing to say. I really did not know precisely what the Hurok office was doing about the situation and, since I had no useful opinions to offer, did not discuss it. I trusted the management. I knew it must be working on every possible angle, and somehow I felt I would sing in Washington.

Kosti became ill in St. Louis and could not continue on tour. Here was a crisis of immediate concern to me. I was worried about Kosti's well-being and we had to find a substitute in a hurry. Kosti had had symptoms of this illness some time before and had gone to see a physician in Washington, who had recommended special treatment. It was decided now that Kosti should be taken to Washington and hospitalized there.

Franz Rupp, a young man I had never met before, was rushed out to St. Louis by the management to be the accompanist. I had a piano in my hotel room, and as soon as Franz, who is now my accompanist, arrived, we went over the program. I was impressed by the ease with which he handled the situation. He could transpose a song at sight, and he could play many of my numbers entirely from memory. I found out later that he had had a huge backlog of experience playing for instrumentalists and singers. He assured me that I had seen and heard him in Philadelphia when I had attended a concert by Sigrid Onegin years before, as he had been her accompanist.

Mr. Rupp and I gave the St. Louis concert, and then we filled two other engagements as we headed East. Our objective was Washington. We knew by this time that the date in Constitution Hall would not be filled, but we planned to stop in Washington to visit Kosti. I did not realize that my arrival in Washington would in itself be a cause for a commotion, but I was prepared in advance when Gerald Goode, the public-relations man on Mr. Hurok's staff, came down to Annapolis to board our train and ride into the capital with us.

Mr. Goode is another person who made a contribution to my career the value of which I can scarcely estimate. He was with Mr. Hurok when I joined the roster, and I am sure that he labored devotedly and effectively from the moment of my return from Europe for that first Hurok season in America. His publicity efforts were always constructive, and they took account of my aversion to things flamboyant. Everything he did was tasteful and helpful. And in the Washington affair he was a tower of strength.

Mr. Goode filled me in on developments as we rode into Washington, and he tried to prepare me for what he knew would happen a barrage of questions from the newspaper people. They were waiting for us in the Washington station. Questions flew at me, and some of them I could not answer because they involved things I did not know about. I tried to get away; I wanted to go straight to the hospital to see Kosti. There was a car waiting for me, and the reporters followed us in another car. I had some difficulty getting into the hospital without several reporters following me. They waited until I had finished my visit, and they questioned me again about Kosti's progress and his opinion of the Washington situation. Finally we got away and traveled on to New York.

The excitement over the denial of Constitution Hall to me did not die down. It seemed to increase and to follow me wherever I went. I felt about the affair as about an election campaign; whatever the outcome, there is bound to be unpleasantness and embarrassment. I could not escape it, of course. My friends wanted to discuss it, and even strangers went out of their way to express their strong feelings of sympathy and support.

What were my own feelings? I was saddened and ashamed. I was sorry for the people who had precipitated the affair. I felt that their behavior stemmed from a lack of understanding. They were not persecuting me personally or as a representative of my people so much as they were doing something that was neither sensible nor good. Could I have erased the bitterness, I would have done so gladly. I do not mean that I would have been prepared to say that I was not entitled to appear in Constitution Hall as might any other performer. But the unpleasantness disturbed me, and if it had been up to me alone I would have sought a way to wipe it out. I cannot say that such a way out suggested itself to me at the time, or that I thought of one after the event. But I have been in this world long enough to know that there are all kinds of people, all suited by their own natures for different tasks. It would be fooling myself to think that I was meant to be a fearless fighter; I was not, just as I was not meant to be a soprano instead of a contralto.

Then the time came when it was decided that I would sing in Washington on Easter Sunday. The invitation to appear in the open, singing from the Lincoln Memorial before as many people as would care to come, without charge, was made formally by Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior. It was duly reported, and the weight of the Washington affair bore in on me.

Easter Sunday in 1939 was April 9, and I had other concert dates to fill before it came. Wherever we went I was met by reporters and photographers. The inevitable question was, "What about Washington?" My answer was that I knew too little to tell an intelligent story about it. There were occasions, of course, when I knew more than I said. I did not want to talk, and I particularly did not want to say anything about the D.A.R. As I have made clear, I did not feel that I was designed for hand-to-hand combat, and I did not wish to make statements that I would later regret. The management was taking action. That was enough.

It was comforting to have concrete expressions of support for an essential principle. It was touching to hear from a local manager in a Texas city that a block of two hundred tickets had been purchased by the community's D.A.R. people. It was also heartening; it confirmed my conviction that a whole group should not be condemned because an individual or section of the group does a thing that is not right.

I was informed of the plan for the outdoor concert before the news was published. Indeed, I was asked whether I approved. I said yes, but the yes did not come easily or quickly. I don't like a lot of show, and one could not tell in advance what direction the affair would take. I studied my conscience. In principle the idea was sound, but it could not be comfortable to me as an individual. As I thought further, I could see that my significance as an individual was small in this affair. I had become, whether I liked it or not, a symbol, representing my people. I had to appear.

I discussed the problem with Mother, of course. Her comment was characteristic: "It is an important decision to make. You are in this work. You intend to stay in it. You know what your aspirations are. I think you should make your own decision."

Mother knew what the decision would be. In my heart I also knew. I could not run away from this situation. If I had anything to offer, I would have to do so now. It would be misleading, however, to say that once the decision was made I was without doubts.

We reached Washington early that Easter morning and went to the home of Gifford Pinchot, who had been Governor of Pennsylvania. The Pinchots had been kind enough to offer their hospitality, and it was needed because the hotels would not take us.

Then we drove over to the Lincoln Memorial. Kosti was well enough to play, and we tried out the piano and examined the public-address system, which had six microphones, meant not only for the people who were present but also for a radio audience.

When we returned that afternoon I had sensations unlike any I had experienced before. The only comparable emotion I could recall was the feeling I had had when Maestro Toscanini had appeared in the artist's room in Salzburg. My heart leaped wildly, and I could not talk. I even wondered whether I would be able to sing.

The murmur of the vast assemblage quickened my pulse beat. There were policemen waiting at the car, and they led us through a passageway that other officers kept open in the throng. We entered the monument and were taken to a small room. We were introduced to Mr. Ickes, whom we had not met before. He outlined the program. Then came the signal to go out before the public.

If I did not consult contemporary reports I could not recall who was there. My head and heart were in such turmoil that I looked and hardly saw, I listened and hardly heard. I was led to the platform by Representative Caroline O'Day of New York, who had been born in Georgia, and Oscar Chapman, Assistant Secretary of the Interior, who was a Virginian. On the platform behind me sat Secretary Ickes, Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau, Supreme Court Justice Black, Senators Wagner, Mead, Barkley, Clark, Guffey, and Capper, and many Representatives, including Representative Arthur W. Mitchell of Illinois, a Negro. Mother was there, as were people from Howard University and from churches in Washington and other cities. So was Walter White, then secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. It was Mr. White who at one point stepped to the microphone and appealed to the crowd, probably averting serious accidents when my own people tried to reach me.

I report these things now because I have looked them up. All I knew then as I stepped forward was the over-whelming impact of that vast multitude. There seemed to be people as far as the eye could see. The crowd stretched in a great semicircle from the Lincoln Memorial around the reflecting pool on to the shaft of the Washington Monument. I had a feeling that a great wave of good will poured out from these people, almost engulfing me. And when I stood up to sing our National Anthem I felt for a moment as though I were choking. For a desperate second I thought that the words, well as I know them, would not come.

I sang, I don't know how. There must have been the help of professionalism I had accumulated over the years. Without it I could not have gone through the program. I sang and again I know because I consulted a newspaper clipping "America," the aria "O mio Fernando," Schubert's "Ave Maria," and three spirituals "Gospel Train," "Trampin'," and "My Soul Is Anchored in the Lord."

I regret that a fixed rule was broken, another thing about which I found out later. Photographs were taken from within the Memorial, where the great statue of Lincoln stands, although there was a tradition that no pictures could be taken from within the sanctum.

It seems also that at the end, when the tumult of the crowd's shouting would not die down, I spoke a few words. I read the clipping now and cannot believe that I could have uttered another sound after I had finished singing. "I am overwhelmed," I said. "I just can't talk. I can't tell you what you have done for me today. I thank you from the bottom of my heart again and again."

It was the simple truth. But did I really say it?

There were many in the gathering who were stirred by their own emotions. Perhaps I did not grasp all that was happening, but at the end great numbers of people bore down on me. They were friendly; all they wished to do was to offer their congratulations and good wishes. The police felt that such a concentration of people was a danger, and they escorted me back into the Memorial. Finally we returned to the Pinchot home.

I cannot forget that demonstration of public emotion or my own strong feelings. In the years that have passed I have had constant reminders of that Easter Sunday. It is not at all uncommon to have people come backstage after a concert even now and remark, "You know, I was at that Easter concert." In my travels abroad I have met countless people who heard and remembered about that Easter Sunday.

In time the policy at Constitution Hall changed. I appeared there first in a concert for the benefit of China Relief. The second appearance in the hall, I believe, was also under charitable auspices. Then, at last, I appeared in the hall as does any other musical performer, presented by a concert manager, and I have been appearing in it regularly. The hall is open to other performers of my group. There is no longer an issue, and that is good.

It may be said that my concerts at Constitution Hall are usually sold out. I hope that people come because they expect to hear a fine program in a first-class performance. If they came for any other reason I would be disappointed. The essential point about wanting to appear in the hall was that I wanted to do so because I felt I had that right as an artist.

I wish I could have thanked personally all the people who stood beside me then. There were musicians who canceled their own scheduled appearances at Constitution Hall out of conviction and principle. Some of these people I did not know personally. I appreciate the stand they took.

May I say that when I finally walked into Constitution Hall and sang from its stage I had no feeling different from what I have in other halls. There was no sense of triumph. I felt that it was a beautiful concert hall, and I was happy to sing in it.

The story of that Easter Sunday had several sequels. A mural was painted in the Department of Interior Building in Washington, commemorating the event, and I was invited down for the unveiling. I met Mr. Ickes again, and as we talked and as I studied the immense mural the impact of it all was unmistakable. More recently I was in Kansas City for a concert, and a young man phoned me and asked whether he could come to see me. He had competed as a painter in the mural contest, and had won second prize. The purpose of his visit was to offer me the painting for the mural that he submitted in the contest. It was a huge picture and, like the prize-winning work, contained a message. I could not find space for so large a painting in my home, and I sent it to the Countee Cullen Foundation in Atlanta. Countee Cullen was a gifted American Negro poet who died prematurely.

I do not recall meeting Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt on that Easter Sunday. Some weeks later in 1939 I had the high privilege of making her acquaintance. It was on the occasion of the visit to this country of King George VI and his Queen, and I was one of those honored with an invitation to perform for the royal guests.

While waiting to sing I was in Mrs. Roosevelt's room in the White House. There was a traveling bag on a chair, and the tab on it indicated that she would soon be off again. I can still see it plainly.

Knowing that I would be introduced to the President, I tried to prepare a little speech suitable for such an occasion. When I met him, he spoke first. "You look just like your photographs, don't you?" he said, and my pretty speech flew right out of my head. All I could say was, "Good evening, Mr. President."

After the concert for the visitors was over, we were told that we would be presented to the King and Queen. I had returned to Mrs. Roosevelt's room to prepare myself. It occurred to me that it might be the right thing to curtsy. I had seen people curtsy in the movies, and it looked like the simplest thing in the world. I practiced a few curtsies in Mrs. Roosevelt's room. An aide came to call me, and I happened to be the first woman in line to meet Their Majesties. I remember that I was looking into the queen's eyes as I started my curtsy, and when I had completed it and was upright again I had turned a quarter- or half-circle and no longer faced the queen. I don't know how I managed it so inelegantly, but I never tried one again, not even for the king.

As I approached the center of the receiving line, there stood Mrs. Roosevelt, and at her right His Majesty the King. Mrs. Roosevelt put out her hand and said, "How do you do?"

I met Mrs. Roosevelt a number of times in the ensuing years, in New York, at Hyde Park, in Tokyo, and in Tel-Aviv. When I was in Japan several years ago I heard that Mrs. Roosevelt was about to arrive. I knew from my own experience with the Japanese that an extensive program would be arranged for her and that there would be an abundance of flowers waiting for her everywhere. I thought that an orchid might be the thing to get for her, so I went down to the lobby of the Imperial Hotel, intent on obtaining the orchid. But Mrs. Roosevelt arrived ahead of schedule, entered the hotel, and walked up several steps to where I had been caught standing before I could complete my errand. She stared at me. "Well, how long have you been here?" she asked.

I told her, adding that I was making a tour in Japan.

"When are you singing in Tokyo?" she asked.

"Tonight," I replied.

She turned to the people who were escorting her. "May I hear Marian Anderson tonight?"

I hesitate to think how her hosts had to rearrange their plans for her that evening, but she was at the concert. I know how crowded her schedule must have been, and I am sure that she did not have many minutes to herself. I shall never forget that she took the time to come and listen again.

When I was in Israel, more recently, Mrs. Roosevelt was there too. She was staying at the same hotel in Tel-Aviv, and she had left word at the desk that when I arrived she would like to be informed. We managed to have a brief visit, and soon she was on her way again.

She is one of the most admirable human beings I have ever met. She likes to have first-hand information about the things she talks about and deals with. Her bags seem to be ready for travel at any moment. Wherever she goes there is praise for her and what she stands for. I suspect that she has done a great deal for people that has never been divulged publicly. I know what she did for me.

Once when I was occupying the artist's room of a hall the stage manager told me with great enthusiasm that Mrs. Roosevelt would occupy the same room two days later. And so on the large mirror I left a greeting, written with soap.

"[Little Rock] dealt a stab in the back to American prestige as the leader of the free world."

Overview

"The Clock Will Not Be Turned Back" was a speech given by Roy Wilkins as head of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), the oldest and largest civil rights organization in the United States. The speech was delivered in San Francisco at the Commonwealth Club of California on November 1, 1957, just over a month after the end of the school desegregation crisis in Little Rock, Arkansas. Founded in 1903 by a group of leading Californians including the San Francisco Chronicle editorial writer Edward F. Adams and Frederick Burk, president of what would become San Francisco State University the Commonwealth Club is the nation's oldest public affairs forum, providing an arena where prominent figures can discuss issues of local, national, and international importance. Previous speakers had included former president Theodore Roosevelt, the film director Cecil B. DeMille, and the philosopher (and founder of the Aspen Institute) Mortimer J. Adler. Until 1971 membership in the club was restricted to men.

In his speech, Wilkins addressed directly the problem of racial discrimination in general and the issue of school segregation in particular. The civil rights leader's aim was to make clear that black Americans were entitled to first-class citizenship in all areas of American life, including education. Wilkins also used his speech to argue that civil rights was not simply a moral and legal issue but also a matter of critical importance to America's international prestige and leadership of the free world in the cold war struggle against Communism.

Context

In 1892 Homer Plessy was arrested for traveling in a "whites only" railroad car in his native state of Louisiana. In an effort to strike down segregation laws, Plessy, who was classified as seven-eighths white ("octoroon" in the idiom of his day), might have traveled without notice. As part of a preplanned strategy, however, he bought a first-class ticket and sat down in a "whites only" car. When confronted by the conductor, he refused to move and was arrested. A group of black professionals then challenged the constitutionality of the state's segregation law by appealing Plessy's conviction. In 1896 the case of Plessy v. Ferguson reached the U.S. Supreme Court, where, in an eight-to-one decision, the constitutionality of the segregation law was upheld. The decision in Plessy provided the legal foundation ("separate but equal") for the broader system of enforced racial segregation that came to characterize the America South.

The 1954 decision in Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, Kansas, in which the U.S. Supreme Court declared that segregated schooling was inherently unequal and thus unconstitutional, marked the crowning achievement of the NAACP's use of litigation to bring change to the South's racial order. Beginning in the 1930s the NAACP filed lawsuits that led to equal rates of pay for black and white teachers and opened up graduate schools to African American students, before launching an all-out assault on the Supreme Court's 1896 decision that the "separate but equal" system was constitutional. The Brown ruling actually involved five separate challenges to school segregation (from Delaware, the District of Columbia, Kansas, South Carolina, and Virginia) and numerous plaintiffs. The cases were consolidated as Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka (the Brown in question being Oliver Brown, an African American who wanted his daughter, Linda, to attend her local all-white school).

Those who hoped that the Brown decision might lead to the rapid demise of segregation were to be disappointed. Encouraged by President Dwight D. Eisenhower's lukewarm reaction to the ruling (in that he refused to state publicly whether he agreed with the justices) and by the court's rather weak enforcement decree in 1955 (Brown II) and alarmed by the NAACP's determination to press actively for speedy desegregation, white southerners mobilized to maintain the racial status quo. White Citizens' Councils, white supremacist organizations that sprang up across the South in the wake of the Brown decision, lobbied politicians, supported candidates for office who promised to resist desegregation, published alarmist tracts, and used intimidation in an effort to cement white opposition to civil rights. Many of the region's leading politicians began to play the race card for political gain pledging defiance of the Brown ruling and championing segregation. On March 12, 1956, all but three of the South's senators, along with the overwhelming majority of its congressional representatives, signed the "Southern Manifesto," which denounced the Brown ruling as an act of judicial tyranny, upheld the right of the states to govern their internal affairs, and pledged to use all lawful means to reverse the decision. Partly as a result of Massive Resistance, the policy declared by U.S. senator Harry Byrd, Sr., in 1956 to unite the white South in opposition to integration, progress on school desegregation proved painfully slow, and as late as 1963 1964 little more than 1 percent of black children in the South were attending school with whites.

Little Rock was not the only place where a southern governor sought to prevent school desegregation. (Texas governor Allan Shivers had used state troopers to prevent integration in Mansfield in August 1956.) Still, Little Rock was certainly the most famous. On September 2, 1957, Arkansas governor Orval Faubus ordered National Guard troops to Little Rock's Central High School to prevent nine black schoolchildren from attending classes. Faubus justified his actions and his defiance of the federal court ruling that had ordered the school's desegregation on the ground that he was preserving domestic order. On September 4 the black children attempted to attend class but were turned away by the National Guard troops as a hostile mob shoved and jostled the students and shouted abuse. One of the nine black children, Elizabeth Eckford, who had arrived at Central High before the others, had actually been pursued by angry whites who threatened to lynch her, before being spirited away by a sympathetic white woman, Grace Lorch. A subsequent series of tense negotiations involving Faubus, the U.S. Justice Department, and President Eisenhower failed to resolve the crisis, leaving the matter in the hands of the courts.

On September 20 a federal judge granted an injunction preventing any further interference with the desegregation of Central High, and Faubus ordered that the National Guard be withdrawn. He then flew to Georgia for a meeting of southern governors knowing that by having stoked racial tensions the withdrawal of the troops would likely lead to a breakdown of law and order. On September 23 a mob of angry whites surrounded Central High, and at 11 AM the black children were removed from the school for their own safety. The following morning white segregationists again assembled to prevent integration and with the local police unwilling to intervene and the situation deteriorating, Little Rock's mayor, Woodrow Wilson Mann, sent a telegram to the White House requesting that federal troops be deployed as a matter of urgency. That evening, Eisenhower announced that he would send one thousand paratroopers serving with the 101st Airborne Division to Little Rock to enforce federal law; he also placed the Arkansas National Guard under the control of the federal government. On September 25 federal troops escorted the nine black children to classes in Central High. The school desegregation crisis made Faubus, who had previously been a racial moderate, something of a hero to white segregationists. He easily won reelection in 1958 and eventually left the governor's mansion, undefeated, in 1967.

In his television and radio address to the nation explaining his decision to send federal troops to Little Rock, President Eisenhower emphasized the importance of upholding the federal court ruling and maintaining the rule of law. However, he also drew attention to the international repercussions of the crisis, arguing that Little Rock had implications for America's efforts to lead the "free world" in the cold war struggle against international Communism. The respective global positioning of the Soviet Union and United States would come to the forefront of the public consciousness when the Soviets launched Sputnik, the world's first man-made satellite, less than two weeks later, on October 4, 1957. In his address, the president noted that America's enemies had been "gloating" over the Little Rock incident, using it to discredit U.S. claims to support democracy and freedom, and the resulting damage done to America's standing in the world was considerable. Indeed, the American government was well aware that its domestic record on race relations was an issue of international significance, particularly because the Soviet Union used the persistence of racial discrimination to try to undermine America's democratic credibility. Moreover, civil rights leaders were eager to exploit this vulnerability to create pressure for meaningful civil rights reform at home; Wilkins's speech to the Commonwealth Club, delivered a month after the Little Rock crisis, demonstrates as much.

About the Author

Roy Wilkins dedicated more than fifty years of his life to the cause of civil rights for black Americans. Born in 1901 in St. Louis, Missouri, he was raised in St. Paul, Minnesota, by an aunt and uncle after his mother died of tuberculosis when Wilkins was four years old. In an early display of his love of journalism, Wilkins edited the student newspaper while he was a pupil at the integrated Mechanic Arts High School. At the University of Minnesota, where he majored in sociology and minored in journalism, Wilkins took a number of jobs (including slaughterhouse worker and Pullman car waiter) to support his studies, but he also made time to write for the university newspaper, the Minnesota Daily; edit the St. Paul Appeal, a black weekly; and join the local branch of the NAACP. After graduating in 1924, Wilkins moved to Kansas City to work for the Kansas City Call, an influential black newspaper. Rising quickly to the position of managing editor, Wilkins was something of a crusading journalist, using the pages of his paper to urge blacks to mobilize their voting strength to defeat racist politicians. In 1931 Walter White, the NAACP's executive secretary, appointed Wilkins as his assistant. Three years later Wilkins succeeded the legendary W. E. B. Du Bois as editor of the NAACP's magazine, The Crisis. In 1955, following Walter White's death, Wilkins became head of the NAACP (the position was later renamed executive director); he would lead the organization until his retirement in July 1977.

Throughout his career Wilkins remained firmly committed to the goal of integration, and he sought equal rights for black Americans within the framework of America's constitutional system. Indeed, Wilkins was a proud patriot who argued that blacks were entitled, as Americans, to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness and the equal protection of the laws. Uncomfortable with the civil rights movement's enthusiastic embrace of direct action during the early 1960s, Wilkins chose to emphasize the importance of litigation, court rulings, and legislative victories in winning black freedom. Not renowned as a public speaker, and not a little jealous of the fame and plaudits that came the way of the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., Wilkins was most effective when working behind the scenes negotiating with presidents and politicians, testifying before congressional committees, and lobbying for change. In 1950 he helped to found the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, a coalition of organizations that coordinated national efforts to produce civil rights legislation. During the mid-1960s Wilkins worked particularly closely with the presidential administration of Lyndon B. Johnson and it was Johnson who awarded the Presidential Medal of Freedom, the nation's highest civilian honor, to the NAACP chief in 1969. Often accused of exerting excessive control over the NAACP (as when he sought to eliminate any hint of Communism or racial separatism among the membership), Wilkins was succeeded by Benjamin Hooks in July 1977. Admitted to the New York University Medical Center in August 1981 suffering from heart trouble, Wilkins died from kidney failure, aged eighty, on September 8, 1981.

Unsurprisingly, during the fall of 1957 the crisis at Central High occupied a good deal of Wilkins's time and energy. Speaking in Georgia on September 23, for example, the NAACP chief condemned Faubus's actions and the "shameful spectacle" that had occurred in Little Rock. On October 11, in a keynote speech to the North Carolina NAACP state convention, Wilkins spoke at length on the Little Rock crisis, highlighting themes to which he would return in his Commonwealth Club speech, and on November 3 he addressed two thousand five hundred civil rights supporters at a New York City rally held to show support for the Little Rock Nine. Interestingly, Wilkins was not the first speaker to address the Commonwealth Club on the Little Rock crisis. On October 4, Mississippi judge Tom P. Brady, a staunch segregationist and leader of the Citizens' Council movement, had delivered a speech to the club in which he defended segregated schooling and denounced the Brown decision.

At the outset of his own speech, Wilkins seeks to create a sense of drama by arguing that white southerners' defiance of the U.S. Supreme Court over the question of school desegregation constitutes the gravest of crises. He then goes on to describe how in Little Rock angry mobs had assailed young black children beating, kicking, and spitting at them simply because they were attempting to attend school. Wilkins claims that the media coverage of these events had brought home to millions of Americans the "ugly" reality of what was happening in the South. But Wilkins was also keen to emphasize that Little Rock was not simply a domestic issue but, indeed, an international crisis one that imperiled America's prestige and standing abroad.

During the late 1940s and early 1950s the United States and the Soviet Union became embroiled in the cold war. Adopting the role of "leader of the free world," America and its allies sought to contain Soviet influence, resist the expansion of Communism, and promote democracy. The American government was particularly keen to win over countries in Africa and Asia that were emerging from European colonialism. Yet, as Wilkins points out, the existence of segregation in the American South was an international embarrassment for the United States and an obstacle to its cold war mission. Indeed, incidents such as the violence at Little Rock were seized upon by the Soviet Union as evidence of America's hypocrisy and made it more difficult for the United States to win the support of newly independent nonwhite nations. Desegregation was not simply a moral or legal issue, then it was also a matter of national security. And Wilkins is uncompromising in his use of language he accuses white segregationists of undermining America's international leadership by stabbing the nation in the back and thus weakening the forces of democracy. Wilkins was not alone in seeking to place the struggle for black rights within the wider international context. Numerous civil rights leaders, including Martin Luther King, Jr., claimed that segregation and the denial of black voting rights in the South undermined America's cold war leadership and argued that government action on civil rights would strengthen the nation's democratic credentials.

Wilkins is also keen to point out that education itself is of vital national importance; he argues that America needs all of its citizens, black as well as white, to achieve their full potential to help defeat the Communist threat. Segregation is, says Wilkins, a source of division that saps the nation's strength and leaves it vulnerable in the face of Soviet advances in science and technology. Indeed, Wilkins speaks of the shadow cast by Sputnik, the world's first satellite. When it was launched by the USSR in early October 1957, it had shocked the U.S. public, sparking alarm that the nation was falling behind the Russians. The NAACP chief again raises the stakes, claiming that an intelligent, informed, and educated citizenry is vital to the struggle against international Communism; the provision of equal educational opportunities could, says Wilkins, "mean the difference between democratic life and totalitarian death."

With white southerners seeking to hold the line against the civil rights movement and prevent meaningful change to the racial order, Wilkins makes clear that black Americans are not about to give up. The clock, in his words, is not going to be turned back, and he reminds his audience that the North won the Civil War (with the South's surrender at Appomattox) and that white southerners, despite their efforts, would not be able to overturn this defeat. Wilkins invokes African Americans' positive contribution to national life including their service in the U.S. military to justify the demand for equality, and he argues that white violence and obstruction has not shaken blacks' belief that they are entitled as Americans to first-class citizenship. Indeed, he uses the bravery and dignity of the Little Rock Nine, who maintained their composure in the face of enormous provocation, as proof that black Americans remained resolute in their commitment to achieving equal rights. But Wilkins has a message for northerners too that they must not sit back and simply observe the civil rights fight from afar, viewing it as a regional problem. Instead, they must make a collective decision to support decisive action on civil rights on the basis that it is in the interests not just of black Americans, but the nation as a whole.

Wilkins ends his speech on an optimistic and patriotic note, arguing that the virtues of America's founding values and the strength of her political institutions will help deliver a just solution to the racial problem. While the road to equality might not always run smooth, says Wilkins, it will ultimately lead to the establishment of the "kingdom of righteousness" a society in which all Americans, black as well as white, are able to enjoy justice, equality, dignity, and respect. Here, the NAACP leader goes as far as to claim that God is on the side of civil rights protesters. Like other black leaders, most notably Martin Luther King, Jr., Wilkins views the civil rights movement as being inspired,

"Can we afford to deny to any boy or girl the maximum of education, that education which may mean the difference between democratic life and totalitarian death?"

(Paragraph 8)

"To deny our ability to achieve a just solution within the framework of our Declaration of Independence and our Bill of Rights is to deny the genius of Americans."

(Paragraph 9)

in part, by Christian teaching and as enjoying divine sanction. His speech thus helps illustrate the importance of religion to the civil rights movement.

Audience

Wilkins's speech was delivered before an audience at the Commonwealth Club in San Francisco, California. Doubtless many, if not all, of the educated, civic-minded members of the audience were appalled by the recent violence in Little Rock and generally supportive of Wilkins's remarks. But Wilkins's words were also directed at the broader public in the North, whose support was needed to push forward the civil rights agenda, and his speech was carried on numerous radio stations. In emphasizing the negative impact that segregation had on America's cold war foreign policy, Wilkins was also seeking to increase the pressure on the federal government. Finally, Wilkins's remarks, particularly his emphasis on black dignity, pride, and African Americans' historic contribution to the nation's development, including service in its armed forces, were also intended to boost the morale and the resolve of the wider black community, particularly in the South, where the fight against white supremacy was being fought.

Impact

Wilkins's remarks are important because they reveal how the civil rights movement's leaders sought to invoke the nation's founding ideals of equality and liberty and use the cold war context as leverage in their efforts to secure meaningful change for African Americans. This tactic was particularly astute, given the fact that segregationists sought to portray the civil rights movement as part of an un-American Communist-orchestrated conspiracy. Attempts to use the cold war as leverage worked particularly effectively during the presidency of John F. Kennedy (1961 1963); Kennedy understood that his desire to strengthen America's position vis-à-vis the Soviet Union was threatened by high-profile incidents of discrimination against black Americans and the failure to make significant progress on civil rights. Ultimately, civil rights leaders' ability to portray their movement as firmly within the mainstream of American democracy and committed to patriotic values (rather than as a radical or subversive threat to them), along with the use of nonviolent protests rooted in Christian teaching, contributed to making the civil rights movement "respectable," thereby helping it win a significant measure of public (and political) support in the North.

In the short term, Faubus's opposition to school desegregation and his defiant stand against the federal government proved fruitful. Indeed, in August 1958, a year after the initial crisis, the governor persuaded a special session of the state legislature to grant him the power to close any school that had been ordered to integrate by the federal authorities. After he ordered that all of Little Rock's schools be shut down, voters in the affected school district endorsed his decision in a referendum by 19,470 votes to 7,561. Faubus's hard-line policy on segregation contributed to his election victory that November, making him only the second governor in the state's history to win a third consecutive term in office.

In the longer term, however, such tactics played into the hands of the civil rights movement. The failure of the Brown decision to lead quickly to comprehensive desegregation and the strength of Massive Resistance helped convince civil rights leaders and organizations that new tactics were required to complement litigation (which often proved both expensive and time-consuming). By the early 1960s, nonviolent direct action including sit-ins by blacks demanding service at segregated restaurants and other public facilities, mass marches, and voter registration drives became increasingly prominent. The proliferation of direct action and the stubborn and violent response of many white southerners (encouraged by political leaders who were pledged to Massive Resistance) helped to pressure the federal government to take decisive action. The Civil Rights Act of 1964, which outlawed Jim Crow segregation, and the Voting Rights Act of 1965, which led to the enfranchisement of millions of African Americans, resulted from civil rights campaigns (in Birmingham and Selma, respectively) in which black southerners and their allies took to the streets to demand equal rights, only to be met with violence by the white authorities. As for school desegregation, it would not be until the late 1960s following a series of assertive Supreme Court rulings and threats by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare to withhold federal funding from segregated school districts that meaningful integration took place in the South.

1. The Supreme Court case Brown v. Board of Education was and still is regarded as a major victory in the quest for equal rights. However, at the time, the consequences of Brown were disappointing. What subsequent events dramatically illustrated that Brown did not resolve the issue of civil rights?

2. In 2002, the majority leader in the U.S. Senate, Republican Trent Lott from Mississippi, was essentially driven out of office by remarks he made that were regarded as racially insensitive about events that had taken place over a half century earlier. Yet Democratic senator Robert Byrd of West Virginia remains in office as the longest-serving member of Congress in history after having been a member of the Ku Klux Klan in the 1940s and after leading the Senate filibuster of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. Do you see any inconsistency in the public reaction to these figures?

3. What impact did the events in Little Rock, Arkansas, have on the civil rights movement? How is this impact reflected in Wilkins's speech?

4. What role did the cold war between the United States and its allies and the Soviet Union and its satellite states have on the civil rights movement of the 1950s?

5. The focus of the civil rights movement from the mid-1930s through the 1950s was education. Using this document in conjunction with Charles Houston's "Educational Inequalities Must Go!", Sweatt v. Painter, and Brown v. Board of Education, prepare a time line of important cases in the effort to integrate education.

Roy Wilkins: "The Clock Will Not Be Turned Back"

It is no exaggeration, I think, to state that the situation presented by the resistance to the 1954 decision of the United States Supreme Court in the public school segregation cases is fully as grave as any which have come under the scrutiny and study of the Commonwealth Club.…

Little Rock brought the desegregation crisis sharply to the attention of the American people and the world. Here at home, it awakened many citizens for the first time to the ugly realities of a challenge to the very unity of our nation. Abroad, it dealt a stab in the back to American prestige as the leader of the free world and presented our totalitarian enemies with made-to-order propaganda for use among the very nations and peoples we need and must have on the side of democracy.…

The world cannot understand nor long respect a nation in which a governor calls out troops to bar little children from school in defiance of the Supreme Court of the land, a nation in which mobs beat and kick and stone and spit upon those who happen not to be white. It asks: "Is this the vaunted democracy? Is this freedom, human dignity and equality of opportunity? Is this fair play? Is this better than Communism?" No, the assertion that Little Rock has damaged America abroad does not call for sneers. Our national security might well hang in the balance.…

The Negro citizens of our common country, a country they have sweated to build and died to defend, are determined that the verdict at Appomattox will not be renounced, that the clock will not be turned back, that they shall enjoy what is justly theirs.…

Their little children, begotten of parents of faith and courage, have shown by their fearlessness and their dignity that a people will not be denied their heritage. Complex as the problem is and hostile as the climate of opinion may be in certain areas, Negro Americans are determined to press for not only a beginning, but a middle and a final solution, in good faith and with American democratic speed.

The Negro position is clear. Three years of intimidation on the meanest and most brutal of levels have not broken their ranks or shaken their conviction.

What of the rest of our nation? It must make a decision for morality and legality and move in support of it, not merely for the good of the Negroes, but for the destiny of the nation itself.

Already I have indicated that this is a new and dangerous world. This cold war is a test of survival for the West. The Soviet Sputnik, now silent and barely visible, casts a shadow not lightly to be brushed aside. Can we meet the challenge of Moscow in the sciences and in war with a country divided upon race and color? Can we afford to deny to any boy or girl the maximum of education, that education which mean the difference between democratic life and totalitarian death?

To deny our ability to achieve a just solution within the framework of our Declaration of Independence and our Bill of Rights is to deny the genius of Americans. To reject our moral precepts is to renounce our partnership with God in bringing the kingdom of righteousness into being here on earth.

We may falter and stumble, but we cannot fail.

1963

"From this Cradle of the Confederacy … we sound the drum for freedom as have our generations of forebears before us done."

Overview

George Wallace's inaugural address as governor of Alabama, delivered on January 14, 1963, served in many ways both to launch him into national politics and to symbolize the last futile public resistance of the American South in the 1960s to segregation. During the height of the civil rights movement, Wallace proclaimed in the opening of his inaugural address, "I say … segregation today … segregation tomorrow … segregation forever." The Deep South had long been the worst place for African Americans to live, and the white attitudes that brought about this treatment are well evidenced in this speech. However, within six months of Wallace's address, the University of Alabama was integrated, if just in a token manner. Wallace would nonetheless show the resiliency and pliability of politicians by winning office again in the 1970s and even the 1980s, with a majority of the black vote in his last election. He was a national force as well, running in the presidential primaries of 1964, 1972, and 1976 and in the presidential election of 1968, when during his best national showing he won 13.5 percent of the popular vote and five Deep South states with forty-six electoral votes, even though he ran as an independent candidate.

Context

In losing the Civil War, the South was forced to free all African American slaves. However, the South did not decide to treat the former slaves on an equal basis with whites. The North created Reconstruction and the Reconstruction Amendments, including the Fourteenth Amendment (1868), which broadened the definition of citizenship and required equal treatment of all citizens, and the Fifteenth Amendment (1870), which guaranteed male citizens the right to vote regardless of race. The Democratic Party, however, won back political power in the mid-1870s and vowed to reverse the moves toward equality that had occurred under Reconstruction.

Segregation was imposed, generally starting in the early 1890s, in all areas of life, ranging from separate street cars to separate Bibles to swear on in court. While the facilities provided to African Americans were not equal, the dubious "separate but equal" formula was approved by the Supreme Court in the infamous Plessy v. Ferguson case in 1896. Constitutions adopted throughout the South made segregation legal. These documents also generally disenfranchised African Americans through some combination of poll taxes, grandfather clauses (which created restrictions on voting except for those whose ancestors had the right to vote at the time of or shortly after the Civil War), and literacy tests.

African Americans protested at the time but accomplished little. Throughout the early twentieth century, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People fought discrimination in the courts, and this effort accelerated after World War II, resulting in the Supreme Court decision in Brown v. Board of Education (1954), which declared segregation in education unconstitutional. The administration of President Dwight D. Eisenhower, however, preferred to ignore or delay implementation of that ruling. In the early 1960s, the administration of President John F. Kennedy started haltingly to enforce desegregation in higher education. For residents of Alabama, this was most notable through actions taken nearby, at the University of Mississippi, in 1962. Federal troops were called in to escort James Meredith, the first African American student to attend that university, throughout the year, after unarmed federal marshals had come under attack when they earlier had tried to calmly and unobtrusively shepherd Meredith through the campus. A riot had ensued, resulting in two deaths and hundreds of injuries, including soldiers and federal marshals wounded by gunfire. Northerners viewed this national tragedy as the result of the South's refusal to follow the law, while many southerners intrepreted the federal presence as an imposition of northern values reminiscent of the Reconstruction era.

Thus, at the time of Wallace's speech, many were wondering how long it would take for the Kennedy administration to finally act and enforce all of the civil rights laws and court rulings across the South. But those who favored civil rights were not the target of Wallace's address; rather, his speech was aimed at winning the loyalty of those citizens who opposed civil rights. The divisiveness of the speech was heightened by the city in which he gave it: Montgomery, the state's capital. It was there that the modern civil rights movement was started with Rosa Parks' defiant stand that resulted in the Montgomery bus boycott, and it was there that Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., first came to national attention. Alabama remained one of the two most segregated states of the South, so it was an important battleground.

Wallace's own political history played into the content of his speech. He was first elected as a legislator after World War II and had his eye on higher office much of his life. He positioned himself to be a candidate for governor in 1958 but lost in the Democratic primary to John Patterson. Patterson was a more hard-core segregationist than Wallace, and Wallace vowed never to get outmaneuvered on the segregation issue again. He believed that hard-core segregation was the way to win political favor in the 1960s, and, aiming for national political prominence, that was what he endorsed in his inaugural address.

About the Author

Born in Clio, Alabama, in 1919, Wallace got his first taste of politics as a legislative page in his teens, and he became enraptured. He matriculated at the University of Alabama Law School at age eighteen, graduating in 1942. Wallace then entered the U.S. Army Air Forces and served for three years during World War II. In a show of political ambition, he decided to remain an enlisted man rather than becoming an officer, reasoning that there were more enlisted men than officers in the voting pool, and so remaining an enlisted man would help his political aspirations. In 1946 he won election to the Alabama House of Representatives and, in 1953, was elected a circuit judge. Throughout this period he was known as a moderate on racial issues and, most famously, refused to walk out of the 1948 Democratic National Convention when a strong civil rights plank was added to the Democratic platform. In 1949 Wallace was appointed as a trustee of Tuskegee Institute a private black university that had once been headed by the former slave Booker T. Washington. Wallace then ran for governor of Alabama in 1958, losing in the primaries. He ran as a progressive moderate and was even endorsed by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, while his successful opponent was endorsed by the Ku Klux Klan. Wallace then moved to the right and successfully ran for governor in 1962 as a hard-core segregationist.

Through his inaugural speech and initial performance as Alabama's governor, Wallace burst onto the national stage. He ran for president in 1964, winning one-third of the vote in primaries in Wisconsin, Maryland, and Indiana. Prevented by state law from running again for governor in 1966, he nominated his wife, who won and thus allowed Wallace to retain political influence until her death in 1968. Wallace then ran for president in the 1968 campaign on the American Independent Party ticket. He would also run in the 1972 and 1976 presidential primaries, but his best national showing was in the 1968 general election, where he won five states. Wallace was reelected Alabama's governor in 1970, 1974, and 1982. By 1982 he had experienced a change of heart, claiming that his earlier stance on segregation was a mistake, and in that election he courted the black vote and won handily. On May 15, 1972, Wallace was shot in an assassination attempt while campaigning for the Democratic nomination for president. He remained paralyzed for the rest of his life. At the end of his final stint as governor, Wallace retired from politics, his health in decline. He died in Montgomery on September 13, 1998.

Wallace begins his speech by offering his thanks to his hometown and others around the state (many named individually) for electing him and citing the "dear little old lady" and the "mountain man" by way of personalizing his message. His special thanks are reserved for his wife and particularly his mother: "I want my mother to know that I realize my debt to her."

◆ Duty

Wallace then embarks on a discussion of duty, or his version of duty, saying that his focus will be on "honesty and economy in our state government." He says that he will run the liquor agents out of town, returning the money to the people of the state. This was in reference to Alabama's state-controlled system of liquor sales, which supported an extensive patronage and kickbacks system whose beneficiaries were legislators and the governor. Wallace remarks that he is "filling orders for several hundred one-way tickets … out of Alabama" for these agents. In enumerating his duties, he pledges not to forget the senior citizen, the farmer, the laboring man, and children. Wallace next turns to the heart of his speech, a challenge thrown down to the rest of the country.

◆ Cradle of the Confederacy

Wallace invokes the name of the president of the Confederacy, noting that he stood to take his oath of office on the same spot where Jefferson Davis stood more than one hundred years before and that as Davis defended the southern way of life against the North's tyranny, Wallace would defend the South in similar fashion. He links segregation with freedom and argues that the only way to have freedom is to have segregation. It is here that he issues the famous words "In the name of the greatest people that have ever trod this earth, I draw the line in the dust and toss the gauntlet before the feet of tyranny … and I say … segregation today … segregation tomorrow … segregation forever."

Wallace defends the South by pointing out the difficulties that the North was having. He argues that the federal government, rather than desegregating the South, should be policing Washington, D.C. Wallace then suggests that the South will fight the efforts to change its lifestyle and will resist the "heel of tyranny," which was crushing it, in his estimation. The fact that not much of the South's lifestyle had actually changed and that, as of January 1963, no African Americans attended the University of Alabama made no difference to Wallace. The challenge came not in results for Wallace, but in the very idea that segregation should end.

1965	■ August 6 Congress passes the Voting Rights Act.
1968	■ Wallace runs for president as the American Independent Party candidate, winning five southern states and 14 percent of the vote.
1970	■ November 3 Wallace wins election as governor of Alabama.
1974	■ November 5 Wallace wins election for a third term as governor of Alabama.

Wallace then turns and urges the rest of the nation to support him. He posits that all who have left the South should rally to its defense. The speech also tries to enlist the support of those living beyond the South, arguing that all who love freedom should unite with it: "You are Southerners too and brothers with us in our fight." Freedom, of course, applied only to whites and, more specifically, white males. Wallace's speech was clearly not addressed to those who believed in the notion of freedom for all citizens.

◆ Alabama Blessed by God

Ending his call for whites to defend Alabama and the South, Wallace moves on, proudly referencing Alabama's blessings, her unparalleled natural resources: waterways, minerals, forestry, grasslands. He looks to a future that will see Alabama become a center for meatpacking and prepared foods. And he notes that Alabama is a tourist destination and is growing in importance in the space industry with the development of a "rocket center" in the Tennessee Valley. This reference is to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's first field center, the Marshall Space Flight Center in Huntsville, set up in 1961.

Wallace also notes Alabama's shipping industry, citing the port of Mobile as the "gateway" to South America and trade. He cites the rise of manufacturing and, with it, the expansion of settlement. He envisions the "trickle" of workers, growing to a "stream of enterprise and endeavor, capital and expansion." Throughout, Wallace argues that the federal government "encourages our fears" to increase its own power by creating crises and then demanding muscle to fix them. He asserts that Alabama should stand strong against such increased governmental authority. He ignores the negative impacts of segregation and racism while noting that the influx of capital derives from the North and that most of the profits leave the state.

Circling back, the governor then notes how freedom is required to build Alabama and how the federal government, in his estimation, is restricting the freedom of the state. As the government "must increase its expenditures of bounties, then this government must assume more and more police powers." Wallace predicts that if the federal concentration is not stopped, it will become a new god, replacing the Christian God. He heavily emphasizes religion and argues that religion should be at the core, not government. As he puts it, "we find we are become government-fearing people not God-fearing people."

Hand in hand with this, Wallace argues that individual rights and by implication the right to segregate and discriminate should be the main rights protected, rather than "human rights." He then offers up a defense of Alabama's practice of not allowing African Americans to vote, suggesting that voting rights should be given only to those who have the "spiritual responsibility of preserving freedom." Wallace never asserts directly that African Americans are not defenders of freedom. At the time of Wallace's address, African Americans were serving with distinction in the U.S. military and had fought recently in World War II and the Korean War.

Wallace returns to the subject of God and argues that the Ten Commandments were being challenged by progressive ideas. Although he does not mention President Franklin Delano Roosevelt directly by name, Wallace refers to him when he asserts that some politicians thought that the Constitution was written for "horse and buggy days." (Roosevelt had made that claim when the Supreme Court struck down much of his New Deal legislation.) Wallace disagrees with this assessment, adding sarcastically that the Ten Commandments were also "written for 'horse and buggy' days." His implication is that if the Constitution can be updated for progressives, then perhaps the Ten Commandments are also suspect.

◆ International White Minority

Wallace finds historical comparisons to what he believed was occurring in America. Adolph Hitler's Germany and the Roman Empire both had fallen because these societies had "rotted the souls of the builders," and he argues that the United States would be next if it continued on its present course. Turning civil rights on its head, he argues that the whites of Mississippi, who were unjustly wronged when the University of Mississippi was integrated, were a minority being persecuted by the majority: "As the national racism of Hitler's Germany persecuted a national minority to the whim of a national majority, so the international racism of the liberals seeks to persecute the international white minority to the whim of the international colored majority."

Continuing his attack on civil rights, Wallace denigrates the Brown v. Board of Education decision, even while never naming it. He combines anti civil rights rhetoric with anti-Communism by noting that many of the scholars cited by the Court in that decision belonged to "communist-front organizations" and continued to attack the Supreme Court, arguing that it was removing prayer from the schools and "In God We Trust" from the currency. Wallace distorts history when he states that the Founding Fathers added "In God We Trust" to the U.S. currency, when in, in fact, this change occurred only in the 1950s as part of the federal government's anti-Communist agenda. He attacks President Kennedy for issuing an executive order banning housing discrimination, claiming that it restricted the freedom of people to sell to those whom they chose, and he castigates Kennedy further for integrating the University of Mississippi, pointing out that the troops would be better defending Berlin against the Communists.

◆ Defying the Supreme Court

Not content to rely on God and anti-Communism, Wallace tries to seize the progressive label for himself. He contends that the real progressives were the Founding Fathers, who, in Wallace's interpretation of history, formed a government based on faith, hard work, and charity, not a fear of government. Wallace makes no mention of the First Amendment, with its emphasis on freedom from government establishment of religion and freedom of religion, and he neglects to comment on major changes since 1776, including the end of slavery.

Wallace directly challenges the authority of the Supreme Court. He notes Alabama's defiance in having set up a sign stating "In God We Trust" in the capitol, and he challenges the Court to "let them make the most of it." Here he is drawing a comparison between himself and Patrick Henry. In 1765, Henry rose in the Virginia House of Burgesses to present resolutions in a debate concerning the newly enacted Stamp Act. In his speech, he criticizes the British Parliament and King George III, allegedly saying that "Caesar had his Brutus and Charles the First his Cromwell" (references to assassinations of leaders) and that George III might "profit by their example." Henry went on to state that if his words were treason, the people of Virginia who were listening should "make the most of it" and rebel. Here Wallace was at least rhetorically calling for a new revolution, or so it would seem.

The governor defends the existence of the states and argues that they should be free to go their own way what might be called states' rights. He also argues that all religious groups, racial groups, and political parties should respect freedom. It is a sign of Alabama at the time that he lists, as examples of religions, "Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian, Church of Christ" and for political parties "Republican, Democrat, Prohibition." In his discussion of racial groups he proposes that all races have "separate stations" and that those who want to eliminate racial distinctions are Communists. That amalgamation will cause the United States to become "a mongrel unit of one under a single all powerful government," standing "for everything and for nothing."

Wallace then turns and extends a questionable hand of brotherhood to African Americans, offering to let them grow, as long as they stay in their "separate racial station." He refutes the "liberals' theory" that argued that racism and its effects namely, "poverty, discrimination, and lack of opportunity" needed to be addressed because it would lead to Communism. He posits that if such a theory were true, the whole South would have turned to Communism after it was destroyed by the North, with its "vulturous carpetbagger" and the "bayonets" of federal troops. Wallace makes no mention of how rich southerners had disenfranchised African Americans and most poor whites, thus denying them their desires for change. Wallace trumpets that "there are not enough native communists in the South to fill up a telephone booth, and THAT is a matter of public FBI record."

◆ Southland's Fathers

Wallace ends his address with a defense of the South, citing the region's contributions to the founding of America. He praises Patrick Henry, James Madison, George Washington, and others as leading Founding Fathers. Freedom for whites is a key element of his address, and he urges all Alabamians to defend it across America. He mentions the divine inspiration for freedom and argues that it is Alabama's destiny to protect freedom, particularly freedom from fear of government. Finally, Wallace states that he will "Stand Up for Alabama" and wants his listeners to do the same. He concludes his remarks with a prayer, seemingly at odds with the civil rights reforms that he has just stridently denounced: "And my prayer is that the Father who reigns above us will bless all the people of this great sovereign State and nation, both white and black."

Audience

Wallace had two main audiences for his speech. The first was the people who watched, listened to, or read a transcript of the speech, including most Alabamians of the time. Wallace wanted to start out his administration with a bang, and he probably achieved this goal with his speech. Those who favored segregation would have gotten a big boost from the speech. The second audience was composed of those people across the nation who opposed desegregation or big government or both. Wallace used the speech as vehicle to move himself onto a larger stage, and in this respect he clearly spoke to a national audience.

Impact

In his inaugural address, Wallace was directly throwing down the gauntlet and challenging those who wanted desegregation. As such, the speech clearly demonstrated that nearly ten years after the Brown Supreme Court decision, the South was not willing to accept even the slow progress toward desegregation that had been made during the presidential administrations of Dwight D. Eisenhower and John F. Kennedy. In fact, many court rulings and civil rights laws remained far from enforced after Wallace took office. In 1964, less than 1 percent of schoolchildren in the former Confederate states attended integrated schools. Thus, the Kennedy administration had been able to accomplish token change in the universities, but not elsewhere. The speech, and Wallace's national campaigns in the years that followed, also rallied further opposition to segregation and shifted the political landscape in the South. Wallace's efforts made it difficult for Kennedy to accomplish anything in civil rights, but he and other southern politicians were unable to stop Lyndon Johnson's juggernaut, which pushed through the civil rights legislation in 1964 and 1965. Wallace's campaigning and rhetoric also helped to push the South toward a political shift that resulted in Republican Party dominance in the area. In that it effec-

It is very appropriate then that from this Cradle of the Confederacy, this very Heart of the Great Anglo-Saxon Southland, that today we sound the drum for freedom as have our generations of forebears before us done, time and time again through history."

"Hear me, Southerners! You sons and daughters who have moved north and west throughout this nation.… We call on you from your native soil to join with us in national support and vote."

"But the strong, simple faith and sane reasoning of our founding fathers has long since been forgotten as the so-called 'progressives' tell us that our Constitution was written for 'horse and buggy' days. So were the Ten Commandments."

"We intend, quite simply, to practice the free heritage as bequeathed to us as sons of free fathers. We intend to re-vitalize the truly new and progressive form of government that is less than two hundred years old, a government first founded in this nation simply and purely on faith that there is a personal God who rewards good and punishes evil, that hard work will receive its just desserts."

"We invite the negro citizens of Alabama to work with us from his separate racial station, as we will work with him, to develop, to grow in individual freedom and enrichment. We want jobs and a good future for BOTH races, the tubercular and the infirm. This is the basic heritage of my religion, of which I make full practice, for we are all the handiwork of God."

"My pledge to you—to "Stand up for Alabama"—is a stronger pledge today than it was the first day I made that pledge. I shall "Stand up for Alabama," as Governor of our State. You stand with me, and we, together, can give courageous leadership to millions of people throughout this nation who look to the South for their hope in this fight to win and preserve our freedoms and liberties."

tively represented the enduring resistance of the South, Wallace's inaugural gubernatorial address catapulted him to national prominence. Those who opposed liberalism, integration, and social progress had no better spokesman throughout the 1960s.

From a modern perspective, historians today view Wallace's inaugural address both as a brilliant political document, in that it greatly improved Wallace's political standing, and as the last gasp of political support for public segregation. After Wallace's failed stance of the mid-1960s, and after President Johnson pushed through legislation that gave millions more African Americans the vote in the South, it was impossible to argue politically for segregation. Those who opposed civil rights for African Americans or who wanted to pander to those southern whites who opposed civil rights instead used terms like "law and order" and argued for limiting or eliminating such social programs as welfare. These politicians also allowed schools and areas to resegregate. These approaches, taken by politicians like Richard Nixon, were more successful than Wallace's bluntly segregationist efforts.

1. Do you believe Wallace's segregationist views were the result of political calculation or of deeply held personal convictions?

2. Many people would be surprised to learn that the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People endorsed Wallace's candidacy for governor in 1958 and that in 1982 he won the majority of the black vote in his race for reelection as governor. Why do you think that a man known for his segregationist views would be able to successfully court the black vote?

3. How did Wallace's inaugural speech reflect the ongoing tension in the United States between the power and authority of the federal government and the rights of individual states?

4. Wallace's address was not only a document with implications for the civil rights movement but also a document in the history of America's response to Communism during the cold war. How so?

5. What role did party politics play in the slow pace of integration during the late 1950s and early 1960s? How was Wallace able to exploit the hesitancy of leaders such as presidents Dwight Eisenhower and John Kennedy?

George Wallace's Inaugural Address as Governor

Before I begin my talk with you, I want to ask you for a few minutes patience while I say something that is on my heart: I want to thank those home folks of my county who first gave an anxious country boy his opportunity to serve in state politics. I shall always owe a lot to those who gave me that first opportunity to serve.

I will never forget the warm support and close loyalty at the folks of Suttons, Haigler's Mill, Eufaula, Beat 6 and Beat 14, Richards Cross Roads and Gammage Beat; at Baker Hill, Beat 8 and Comer, Spring Hill, Adams Chapel and Mount Andrew, White Oak, Baxter's Station, Clayton, Louisville and Cunnigham Place, Horns Crossroads, Texasville and Blue Springs, where the vote was 304 for Wallace and 1 for the opposition. And the dear little lady whom I heard had made that one vote against me, by mistake, because she couldn't see too well and she had pulled the wrong lever. Bless her heart. At Clio, my birthplace, and Elamville. I shall never forget them. May God bless them.

And I shall forever remember that election day morning as I waited, and suddenly at ten o'clock that morning the first return of a box was flashed over this state: it carried the message "Wallace 15, opposition zero," and it came from the Hamrick Beat at Putman's Mountain where live the great hill people of our state. May God bless the mountain man; his loyalty is unshakeable, he'll do to walk down the road with.

I hope you'll forgive me these few moments of remembering, but I wanted them and you to know, that I shall never forget.

And I wish I could shake hands and thank all of you in this state who voted for me and those of you who did not, for I know you voted your honest convictions, and now, we must stand together and move the great State of Alabama forward.

I would be remiss, this day, if I did not thank my wonderful wife and fine family for their patience, support and loyalty. And there is no man living who does not owe more to his mother than he can ever repay, and I want my mother to know that I realize my debt to her.

This is the day of my Inauguration as Governor of the State of Alabama. And on this day I feel a deep obligation to renew my pledges, my covenants with you, the people of this great state.

General Robert E. Lee said that "duty" is the sublimest word in the English language and I have come, increasingly, to realize what he meant. I SHALL do my duty to you, God helping, to every man, to every woman, yes, to every child in this state. I shall fulfill my duty toward honesty and economy in our state government so that no man shall have a part of his livelihood cheated and no child shall have a bit of his future stolen away.

I have said to you that I would eliminate the liquor agents in this state and that the money saved would be returned to our citizens. I am happy to report to you that I am now filling orders for several hundred one-way tickets and stamped on them are these words "for liquor agents destination: out of Alabama." I am happy to report to you that the big-wheeling cocktail-party boys have gotten the word that their free whiskey and boat rides are over, that the farmer in the field, the worker in the factory, the businessman in his office, the housewife in her home, have decided that the money can be better spent to help our children's education and our older citizens, and they have put a man in office to see that it is done. It shall be done. Let me say one more time: no more liquor drinking in your governor's mansion.

I shall fulfill my duty in working hard to bring industry into our state, not only by maintaining an honest, sober and free-enterprise climate of government in which industry can have confidence but in going out and getting it, so that our people can have industrial jobs in Alabama and provide a better life for their children.

I shall not forget my duty to our senior citizens, so that their lives can be lived in dignity and enrichment of the golden years, nor to our sick, both mental and physical, and they will know we have not forsaken them. I want the farmer to feel confident that in this state government he has a partner who will work with him in raising his income and increasing his markets. And I want the laboring man to know he has a friend who is sincerely striving to better his field of endeavor.

I want to assure every child that this State government is not afraid to invest in their future through education, so that they will not be handicapped on every threshold of their lives.

Today I have stood, where once Jefferson Davis stood, and took an oath to my people. It is very appropriate then that from this Cradle of the Confederacy, this very Heart of the Great Anglo-Saxon Southland, that today we sound the drum for freedom as have our generations of forebears before us done, time and time again through history. Let us rise to the call of freedom-loving blood that is in us and send our answer to the tyranny that clanks its chains upon the South. In the name of the greatest people that have ever trod this earth, I draw the line in the dust and toss the gauntlet before the feet of tyranny, and I say … segregation today … segregation tomorrow … segregation forever.

The Washington, D.C., school riot report is disgusting and revealing. We will not sacrifice our children to any such type school system and you can write that down. The federal troops in Mississippi could be better used guarding the safety of the citizens of Washington, D.C., where it is even unsafe to walk or go to a ballgame and that is the nation's capitol. I was safer in a B-29 bomber over Japan during the war in an air raid than the people of Washington are walking to the White House neighborhood. A closer example is Atlanta. The city officials fawn for political reasons over school integration and THEN build barricades to stop residential integration what hypocrisy!

Let us send this message back to Washington by our representatives who are with us today, that from this day we are standing up, and the heel of tyranny does not fit the neck of an upright man. That we intend to take the offensive and carry our fight for freedom across the nation, wielding the balance of power we know we possess in the Southland. That WE, not the insipid bloc of voters of some sections will determine in the next election who shall sit in the White House of these United States. That from this day, from this hour, from this minute, we give the word of a race of honor that we will tolerate their boot in our face no longer. And let those certain judges put that in their opium pipes of power and smoke it for what it is worth.

Hear me, Southerners! You sons and daughters who have moved north and west throughout this nation. We call on you from your native soil to join with us in national support and vote, and we know, wherever you are away from the hearths of the Southland that you will respond, for though you may live in the farthest reaches of this vast country, your heart has never left Dixieland.

And you native sons and daughters of old New England's rock-ribbed patriotism, and you sturdy natives of the great Midwest, and you descendants of the far West flaming spirit of pioneer freedom: We invite you to come and be with us, for you are of the Southern spirit and the Southern philosophy. You are Southerners too and brothers with us in our fight.

What I have said about segregation goes double this day, and what I have said to or about some federal judges goes TRIPLE this day.

Alabama has been blessed by God as few states in this Union have been blessed. Our state owns ten percent of all the natural resources of all the states in our country. Our inland waterway system is second to none and has the potential of being the greatest waterway transport system in the entire world. We possess over thirty minerals in usable quantities, and our soil is rich and varied, suited to a wide variety of plants. Our native pine and forestry system produces timber faster than we can cut it, and yet we have only pricked the surface of the great lumber and pulp potential.

With ample rainfall and rich grasslands, our livestock industry is in the infancy of a giant future that can make us a center of the big and growing meatpacking and prepared foods marketing. We have the favorable climate, streams, woodlands, beaches, and natural beauty to make us a recreational mecca in the booming tourist and vacation industry. Nestled in the great Tennessee Valley, we possess the rocket center of the world and the keys to the space frontier.

While the trade with a developing Europe built the great port cities of the East Coast, our own fast-developing port of Mobile faces as a magnetic gateway to the great continent of South America, well over twice as large and hundreds of times richer in resources, even now awakening to the growing probes of enterprising capital with a potential of growth and wealth beyond any present dream for our port development and corresponding results throughout the connecting waterways that thread our state.

And while the manufacturing industries of free enterprise have been coming to our state in increasing numbers, attracted by our bountiful natural resources, our growing numbers of skilled workers and our favorable conditions, their present rate of settlement here can be increased from the trickle they now represent to a stream of enterprise and endeavor, capital and expansion that can join us in our work of development and enrichment of the educational futures of our children, the opportunities of our citizens and the fulfillment of our talents as God has given them to us. To realize our ambitions and to bring to fruition our dreams, we as Alabamians must take cognizance of the world about us. We must redefine our heritage, re-school our thoughts in the lessons our forefathers knew so well, firsthand, in order to function and to grow and to prosper. We can no longer hide our head in the sand and tell ourselves that the ideology of our free fathers is not being attacked and is not being threatened by another idea, for it is. We are faced with an idea that if a centralized government assumes enough authority, enough power over its people, that it can provide a utopian life. That if given the power to dictate, to forbid, to require, to demand, to distribute, to edict and to judge what is best and enforce that will of judgment upon its citizens, it will produce only "good," and it shall be our father and our God. It is an idea of government that encourages our fears and destroys our faith, for where there is faith, there is no fear, and where there is fear, there is no faith. In encouraging our fears of economic insecurity it demands we place that economic management and control with government; in encouraging our fear of educational development it demands we place that education and the minds of our children under management and control of government, and even in feeding our fears of physical infirmities and declining years, it offers and demands to father us through it all and even into the grave. It is a government that claims to us that it is bountiful as it buys its power from us with the fruits of its rapaciousness of the wealth that free men before it have produced and builds on crumbling credit without responsibilities to the debtors, our children. It is an ideology of government erected on the encouragement of fear and fails to recognize the basic law of our fathers that governments do not produce wealth. People produce wealth free people, and those people become less free as they learn there is little reward for ambition; that it requires faith to risk, and they have none. As the government must restrict and penalize and tax incentive and endeavor and must increase its expenditures of bounties, then this government must assume more and more police powers, and we find we are become government-fearing people not God-fearing people. We find we have replaced faith with fear, and though we may give lip service to the Almighty, in reality, government has become our god. It is, therefore, a basically ungodly government and its appeal to the pseudo-intellectual and the politician is to change their status from servant of the people to master of the people, to play at being God without faith in God and without the wisdom of God. It is a system that is the very opposite of Christ, for it feeds and encourages everything degenerate and base in our people as it assumes the responsibilities that we ourselves should assume. Its pseudo-liberal spokesmen and some Harvard advocates have never examined the logic of its substitution of what it calls "human rights" for individual rights, for its propaganda play on words has appeal for the unthinking. Its logic is totally material and irresponsible as it runs the full gamut of human desires, including the theory that everyone has voting rights without the spiritual responsibility of preserving freedom. Our founding fathers recognized those rights, but only within the framework of those spiritual responsibilities. But the strong, simple faith and sane reasoning of our founding fathers has long since been forgotten as the so-called "progressives" tell us that our Constitution was written for "horse and buggy" days. So were the Ten Commandments.

Not so long ago men stood in marvel and awe at the cities, the buildings, the schools, the autobahns that the government of Hitler's Germany had built, just as centuries before they stood in wonder of Rome's building. But it could not stand, for the system that built it had rotted the souls of the builders and in turn rotted the foundation of what God meant that men should be. Today that same system on an international scale is sweeping the world. It is the "changing world" of which we are told; it is called "new" and "liberal." It is as old as the oldest dictator. It is degenerate and decadent. As the national racism of Hitler's Germany persecuted a national minority to the whim of a national majority, so the international racism of the liberals seeks to persecute the international white minority to the whim of the international colored majority so that we are footballed about according to the favor of the Afro-Asian bloc. But the Belgian survivors of the Congo cannot present their case to a war crimes commission, nor the Portuguese of Angola, nor the survivors of Castro, nor the citizens of Oxford, Mississippi.

It is this theory of international power politic that led a group of men on the Supreme Court for the first time in American history to issue an edict, based not on legal precedent, but upon a volume, the editor of which said our Constitution is outdated and must be changed and the writers of which, some had admittedly belonged to as many as half a hundred communist-front organizations. It is this theory that led this same group of men to briefly bare the ungodly core of that philosophy in forbidding little schoolchildren to say a prayer. And we find the evidence of that ungodliness even in the removal of the words "in God we trust" from some of our dollars, which was placed there as like evidence by our founding fathers as the faith upon which this system of government was built. It is the spirit of power thirst that caused a President in Washington to take up Caesar's pen and with one stroke of it make a law. A law which the law-making body of Congress refused to pass. A law that tells us that we can or cannot buy or sell our very homes, except by his conditions and except at HIS discretion. It is the spirit of power thirst that led the same President to launch a full offensive of twenty-five thousand troops against a university, of all places, in his own country and against his own people, when this nation maintains only six thousand troops in the beleaguered city of Berlin. We have witnessed such acts of "might makes right" over the world as men yielded to the temptation to play God, but we have never before witnessed it in America. We reject such acts as free men. We do not defy, for there is nothing to defy, since as free men we do not recognize any government right to give freedom or deny freedom. No government erected by man has that right. As Thomas Jefferson said, "The God who gave us life, gave us liberty at the same time; no King holds the right of liberty in his hands." Nor does any ruler in American government.

We intend, quite simply, to practice the free heritage as bequeathed to us as sons of free fathers. We intend to re-vitalize the truly new and progressive form of government that is less than two hundred years old, a government first founded in this nation simply and purely on faith that there is a personal God who rewards good and punishes evil, that hard work will receive its just desserts, that ambition and ingenuity and incentiveness … are admirable traits and goals that the individual is encouraged in his spiritual growth and from that growth arrives at a character that enhances his charity toward others and from that character and that charity so is influenced business and labor and farmer and government. We intend to renew our faith as God-fearing men, not government-fearing men nor any other kind of fearing-men. We intend to roll up our sleeves and pitch in to develop this full bounty God has given us, to live full and useful lives and in absolute freedom from all fear. Then can we enjoy the full richness of the Great American Dream.

We have placed this sign, "In God We Trust," upon our State Capitol on this Inauguration Day as physical evidence of determination to renew the faith of our fathers and to practice the free heritage they bequeathed to us. We do this with the clear and solemn knowledge that such physical evidence is evidently a direct violation of the logic of that Supreme Court in Washington, D.C., and if they or their spokesmen in this state wish to term this defiance, I say, then let them make the most of it.

This nation was never meant to be a unit of one but a united of the many. That is the exact reason our freedom-loving forefathers established the states, so as to divide the rights and powers among the states, insuring that no central power could gain master government control.

In united effort we were meant to live under this government, whether Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian, Church of Christ, or whatever one's denomination or religious belief each respecting the others right to a separate denomination; each, by working to develop his own, enriching the total of all our lives through united effort. And so it was meant in our political lives, whether Republican, Democrat, Prohibition, or whatever political party each striving from his separate political station, [each] respecting the rights of others to be separate and work from within their political framework, and each separate political station making its contribution to our lives.

And so it was meant in our racial lives each race, within its own framework has the freedom to teach, to instruct, to develop, to ask for and receive deserved help from others of separate racial stations. This is the great freedom of our American founding fathers. But if we amalgamate into the one unit as advocated by the communist philosophers, then the enrichment of our lives, the freedom for our development, is gone forever. We become, therefore, a mongrel unit of one under a single all powerful government, and we stand for everything and for nothing.

The true brotherhood of America, of respecting the separateness of others and uniting in effort, has been so twisted and distorted from its original concept that there is a small wonder that communism is winning the world.

We invite the negro citizens of Alabama to work with us from his separate racial station, as we will work with him, to develop, to grow in individual freedom and enrichment. We want jobs and a good future for BOTH races, the tubercular and the infirm. This is the basic heritage of my religion, of which I make full practice, for we are all the handiwork of God.

But we warn those, of any group, who would follow the false doctrine of communistic amalgamation that we will not surrender our system of government, our freedom of race and religion. That freedom was won at a hard price, and if it requires a hard price to retain it, we are able and quite willing to pay it.

The liberals' theory that poverty, discrimination and lack of opportunity is the cause of communism is a false theory. If it were true, the South would have been the biggest single communist bloc in the western hemisphere long ago. For after the great War between the States, our people faced a desolate land of burned universities, destroyed crops and homes, with manpower depleted and crippled, and even the mule, which was required to work the land, was so scarce that whole communities shared one animal to make the spring plowing. There were no government handouts, no Marshall Plan aid, no coddling to make sure that our people would not suffer; instead, the South was set upon by the vulturous carpetbagger and federal troops, all loyal Southerners were denied the vote at the point of bayonet, so that the infamous, illegal 14th Amendment might be passed. There was no money, no food and no hope of either. But our grandfathers bent their knee only in church and bowed their head only to God.

Not for a single instant did they ever consider the easy way of federal dictatorship and amalgamation in return for fat bellies. They fought. They dug sweet roots from the ground with their bare hands and boiled them in iron pots. They gathered poke salad from the woods and acorns from the ground. They fought. They followed no false doctrine. They knew what they wanted, and they fought for freedom! They came up from their knees in the greatest display of sheer nerve, grit and guts that has ever been set down in the pages of written history, and they won! The great writer Rudyard Kipling wrote of them that: "There in the Southland of the United States of America, lives the greatest fighting breed of man … in all the world!"

And that is why today, I stand ashamed of the fat, well-fed whimperers who say that it is inevitable that our cause is lost. I am ashamed of them, and I am ashamed for them. They do not represent the people of the Southland.

And may we take note of one other fact, with all the trouble with communists that some sections of this country have there are not enough native communists in the South to fill up a telephone booth, and THAT is a matter of public FBI record.

We remind all within hearing of this Southland that a Southerner, Peyton Randolph, presided over the Continental Congress in our nation's beginning … that a Southerner, Thomas Jefferson, wrote the Declaration of Independence, that a Southerner, George Washington, is the Father of our country … that a Southerner, James Madison, authored our Constitution, that a Southerner, George Mason, authored the Bill of Rights and it was a Southerner who said, "Give me liberty, or give me death," Patrick Henry.

Southerners played a most magnificent part in erecting this great divinely inspired system of freedom, and as God is our witnesses, Southerners will save it.

Let us, as Alabamians, grasp the hand of destiny and walk out of the shadow of fear and fill our divine destination. Let us not simply defend, but let us assume the leadership of the fight and carry our leadership across this nation. God has placed us here in this crisis. Let us not fail in this, our most historical moment.

You are here today, present in this audience, and to you over this great state, wherever you are in sound of my voice, I want to humbly and with all sincerity, thank you for your faith in me.

I promise you that I will try to make you a good governor. I promise you that, as God gives me the wisdom and the strength, I will be sincere with you. I will be honest with you.

I will apply the old sound rule of our fathers, that anything worthy of our defense is worthy of one hundred percent of our defense. I have been taught that freedom meant freedom from any threat or fear of government. I was born in that freedom. I was raised in that freedom. I intend to live in that freedom. And God willing, when I die, I shall leave that freedom to my children, as my father left it to me.

My pledge to you to "Stand up for Alabama" is a stronger pledge today than it was the first day I made that pledge. I shall "Stand up for Alabama," as Governor of our State. You stand with me, and we, together, can give courageous leadership to millions of people throughout this nation who look to the South for their hope in this fight to win and preserve our freedoms and liberties.

So help me God.

And my prayer is that the Father who reigns above us will bless all the people of this great sovereign State and nation, both white and black.

I thank you.

1963

"Injustice anywhere is a threat to justice everywhere."

Overview

In his "Letter from Birmingham Jail," Martin Luther King, Jr., delivered an important statement on civil rights and civil disobedience. The 1963 racial crisis in Birmingham, Alabama, was a critical turning point in the struggle for African American civil rights. Nonviolent protestors led by King faced determined opposition from hard-core segregationists. King and his organization, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), needed a victory to sustain the momentum of their movement. The integration of downtown stores and lunch counters was the primary focus of SCLC's "Project C" the "C" stood for confrontation. Demonstrations began one day after a new city government was elected. Many observers criticized King for protesting at a time when Birmingham's race relations appeared to be moving in a more positive direction. These critics included eight prominent white clergymen who published a statement characterizing these protests as "unwise and untimely" and asking African Americans to withdraw their support from King's efforts.

The SCLC timed its campaign to coincide with the Easter shopping season. Its strategy involved using economic pressure to force white businesses to remove segregated facilities, extend more courteous treatment to African American customers, and hire black salespeople. King was arrested on Good Friday in 1963 and remained imprisoned for eight days. He used his jail time to compose a response to the clergymen. In his "Letter from Birmingham Jail," King articulated a moral and philosophical defense of his tactics and delivered a stinging rebuke to those who counseled caution on civil rights. Although King's letter was not published until after the Birmingham crisis was resolved, it is widely regarded as the most important written document of the modern civil rights movement and a classic text on civil disobedience.

Birmingham had long had a reputation as one of the most racist and violent cities in the South. Starting in 1947 a series of bombings targeted the homes of African Americans who had moved into previously all-white neighborhoods. The Ku Klux Klan operated openly and was widely believed to be responsible for these attacks. When the outspoken black minister the Reverend Fred Shuttlesworth formed the Alabama Christian Movement for Human Rights to press for civil rights, the terrorists struck his home and church. Because no one was apprehended for any of the more than fifty explosions, Birmingham blacks concluded that the police were in league with the bombers. Public Safety Commissioner Eugene "Bull" Connor, an outspoken segregationist, used all resources at his disposal to preserve the Jim Crow system of laws and social practices that segregated and discriminated against African Americans.

Connor's heavy-handed methods aroused the ire of more temperate civic leaders, who hoped to create a more favorable image for their city. These leaders spearheaded an effort to oust Connor by shifting the form of city government from three commissioners to a mayor and a city council. On April 2, 1963, Birmingham voters rejected Connor and elected Albert Boutwell, a moderate segregationist, as their mayor. The losers immediately sued to prevent the new administration from taking office. For a time Birmingham had two competing city governments.

In January 1963 the SCLC decided to make Birmingham the site of its next major civil rights drive. The SCLC had suffered a serious setback the previous year in Albany, Georgia, where, despite months of nonviolent struggle and hundreds of arrests, African Americans were unable to wrest any concessions from an intransigent city government. Shuttlesworth, the most prominent Birmingham civil rights activist, assured the SCLC board that his city would be different; Connor could be counted on to react in his usual heavy-handed fashion. King also had a larger objective in mind: He hoped that by creating a crisis in Birmingham, he could force President John F. Kennedy to take much-needed action on civil rights.

After a delay in demonstrations until the Boutwell-Connor runoff election was resolved, protests began on April 3 with sit-ins and picketing at downtown department stores. On April 10, Judge W. A. Jenkins issued an injunction prohibiting King and other civil rights leaders from participating in or encouraging any civil disobedience. King decided to defy the court order, and on Good Friday (April 12) he, the Reverend Ralph Abernathy, and more than fifty other demonstrators were arrested. They were taken to the Birmingham City Jail, where King was placed in solitary confinement.

On April 12 a statement by eight white clergymen a rabbi, a Catholic bishop, and six prominent Protestant leaders appeared in the Birmingham News under the title "A Call for Unity." They characterized the demonstrations as "unwise and untimely" and claimed that the protests were likely to "incite to hatred and violence." The authors praised the Birmingham media and police for the "calm manner" in which they handled the civil rights forces and urged blacks to withdraw their support from King's efforts. They implied that King should return to Atlanta and allow local residents to resolve their differences without outside interference.

King probably read the churchmen's declaration in a newspaper smuggled into his cell. Taylor Branch, author of Parting the Waters: America in the King Years, 1954 63, credits Harvey Shapiro, an editor for the New York Times Magazine, for planting the idea that King write a letter from prison during the Albany campaign. That message never materialized, but now King realized the time was right. Almost immediately he began formulating a response. When King's lawyer, Clarence Jones, visited him on April 16, the jailed civil rights leader handed Jones the newspaper with his notes scribbled in the margins. S. Jonathan Bass, author of Blessed Are the Peacemakers: Martin Luther King, Jr., Eight White Religious Leaders, and the "Letter from Birmingham Jail," describes what happened next. The Reverend Wyatt T. Walker, SCLC executive director, deciphered King's "chicken scratch" handwriting and dictated to his secretary, Willie Pearl Mackey, who typed the first rough copy. Lawyers returned the draft to King, who continued writing on scraps of paper provided by a black jail trustee. When he was released from jail on April 20, the bulk of the letter was composed, but King, according to Bass, "continued writing, editing, and revising drafts several days after the date on the manuscript."

The SCLC sent the letter to national media in early May, but there was little immediate reaction. The New York Post printed excerpts in its May 19 edition. The American Friends Service Committee published the full text of the letter as a pamphlet on May 28. It subsequently appeared in Christian Century, the New Leader, Atlantic Monthly, and Ebony. A slightly revised version was included in King's 1964 book Why We Can't Wait.

About the Author

Martin Luther King, Jr., was the preeminent leader of the modern civil rights movement. His philosophy of nonviolent direct action and inspirational oratory helped overthrow the Jim Crow system of racial segregation and win greater rights for African Americans.

King was born in Atlanta, Georgia, on January 15, 1929, the son, grandson, and great-grandson of Baptist ministers. He was educated at Morehouse College and Crozier Theological Seminary. He studied philosophy at Boston University, receiving his doctorate in 1955.

In 1953 he married Coretta Scott, and together they had four children. Also in 1953 he accepted the pastorate of Dexter Avenue Baptist Church in Montgomery, Alabama. After Rosa Parks was arrested on December 1, 1955, for refusing to give up her bus seat to a white passenger, King was persuaded to head the Montgomery Improvement Association, an organization formed to coordinate the 381-day boycott of city buses. King's successful leadership of the boycott and his application of Gandhian nonviolence to civil rights issues thrust him into national prominence.

King and other African American ministers formed the SCLC in 1957 to expand the struggle against racial segregation in the South. In 1962 King and the SCLC suffered a major defeat in Albany, Georgia, where months of demonstrations had failed to desegregate any public facilities. Mass protests in Birmingham produced a more successful outcome. In response to growing pressure for legislative action, President John F. Kennedy introduced a comprehensive civil rights bill. On August 28, 1963, King delivered his "I Have a Dream" Speech before two hundred and fifty thousand people assembled for the March on Washington. He was named Time magazine's "Man of the Year" for 1963 and was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1964.

King and the SCLC focused on voting rights in 1965. Selma, Alabama, was targeted for demonstrations because of white authorities' determined opposition to African American voter registration. A vicious attack by Alabama state troopers on nonviolent protesters drew national attention. King then led marchers from Selma to Montgomery to press for national voting rights legislation. President Lyndon B. Johnson responded by sponsoring the Voting Rights Act, which became law that summer. In subsequent years King extended his crusade beyond the South, tackling slum housing in Chicago in 1966, declaring his opposition to the Vietnam War in 1967, and calling for a Poor People's Campaign for economic justice in 1968. King was assassinated in Memphis, Tennessee, on April 4, 1968, while supporting a strike by sanitation workers. In 1983 Congress declared King's birthday a national holiday.

King establishes a tone of rational dialogue as he begins his letter to the eight clergymen. He explains that he rarely responds to critics, but since they are "men of genuine good will" who are sincere in their criticism, he is making an exception. He hopes that they will find his remarks "patient and reasonable." Because they had questioned his presence in Birmingham, he relates that he was invited to their city by the Alabama Christian Movement for Human Rights. A more compelling reason, however, was the pervasive racial oppression in Birmingham. King compares himself to the apostle Paul, who spread the Christian faith among the Gentiles. Paul traveled more widely than any of the early Christian missionaries, preaching and establishing churches throughout Greece and Asia Minor. The "Macedonian call" mentioned in the third paragraph refers to Acts 16:9, in which a man appears to Paul in a dream, asking him to "come over into Macedonia, and help us." During his journeys Paul was persecuted for spreading unpopular beliefs and spent more than four years in prison before being executed by Roman authorities. Three of his famous epistles were written from jail. King justifies his arrest by invoking Paul's sufferings an example that the Christian ministers could appreciate. He further defends his presence in Alabama by citing the "interrelatedness of all communities." King asserts that people living outside Alabama cannot ignore blatant racism in Birmingham. Every citizen has an obligation to act against injustice wherever it may be found, King explains. Those who consider him an "outside agitator" reveal their own "narrow, provincial" outlook.

King takes the clergymen to task for their statement deploring the Birmingham demonstrations. Instead of worrying about threats to public order, they should be concerned about racism and inequality in their city the "underlying causes" that gave rise to the African American protests. Because the white leadership had been unresponsive to repeated appeals to dismantle the Jim Crow system, King contends that black citizens of Birmingham had "no alternative" other than to take to the streets.

King goes on to outline the stages of his nonviolent crusade. Fact finding was the first phase. Among the damaging information uncovered were Birmingham's long history of unpunished attacks on its black citizens and the failure of city fathers to negotiate in good faith with civil rights advocates. King reminds the clergymen that Birmingham merchants had not honored an earlier agreement to remove Jim Crow signs from their stores. African American activists also were mindful of the need to defeat Connor and thus delayed their demonstrations until the conclusion of the runoff election. Now the merchants must deal with the economic consequences of protests timed to coincide with the Easter shopping season. These actions were not irresponsible, King insists. Rather, black leaders exercised great restraint in the face of numerous provocations.

The second stage was negotiation. The clergymen had criticized King for resorting to confrontation instead of negotiating to achieve his goals. King claims that he, too, desires negotiation but explains that sometimes pressure must be applied to bring reluctant parties to the bargaining table. Rather than avoiding conflict and tension, he freely admits his intention to create a crisis in order to expose the evils of segregation. In support of his position, he cites Socrates, who maintained that mental tension stimulates intellectual growth.

The eight Birmingham clerics had claimed that the Birmingham demonstrations were "untimely." They were not the only observers voicing this objection. Attorney General Robert Kennedy and the Washington Post, among others, had complained that the new Boutwell administration should be given a chance to show that it was more open to change than the outgoing Connor regime. King rejects this reasoning. He maintains that those in positions of power cannot be expected to surrender their privileges voluntarily; they must be persuaded forcefully to do the right thing. In this assertion, he echoes the words of the great abolitionist Frederick Douglass, who said, "Power concedes nothing without a demand. It never did and it never will." He also cites the Protestant theologian Reinhold Niebuhr to support his contention that change is more difficult for groups than for individuals.

King points out that any action disrupting the status quo is likely to be considered poorly timed by those who are comfortable with existing arrangements. For those suffering from oppression, however, change cannot come soon enough. He then launches into an eloquent defense of his movement by concentrating on the word wait. Whites who counsel patience in the quest for civil rights, he asserts, have not personally experienced the harsh sting of discrimination. King explains why he and other African Americans are unwilling to slow the pace of their crusade. He quotes the nineteenth-century British jurist and prime minister William Gladstone, saying that "'justice … delayed is justice denied.'" To drive home the devastating impact of segregation, he recites a weary litany of potent examples of the injuries inflicted by racism. These range from lynch mobs to whites' refusal to use courtesy titles when addressing African Americans. Perhaps the most poignant is the plight of a black father who must explain to his young daughter why she cannot attend the amusement park she has seen advertised on television. One wonders whether this girl is one of King's own children. At the conclusion of this powerful passage, he pleads with the clergymen to understand the "legitimate and unavoidable impatience" felt by African Americans.

King next addresses the most difficult question raised by the Birmingham clergymen: How can he encourage his followers to violate some laws and at the same time urge whites to observe such legal decisions as Brown v. Board of Education? Here he draws on the concept of "natural law" developed by Saint Thomas Aquinas and other Catholic philosophers. A man-made law is just if it accords with the divinely established code to uplift the human spirit. All such laws should be obeyed. King cites the Jewish philosopher Martin Buber and the Protestant theologian Paul Tillich to give ecumenical sanction to his contention that segregation laws are immoral and therefore should not be obeyed. Other examples of unjust laws are those applied to one group (African Americans) but not another (whites) and laws adopted by legislatures, such as Alabama's, that exclude participation by large numbers of their citizens. Laws also may be unjust if used to deprive citizens of their constitutionally guaranteed rights.

King maintains that those who advocate civil disobedience do not contribute to anarchy. In the tradition of Henry David Thoreau and Mahatma Gandhi, he asserts that those who violate unjust laws must do so "openly, lovingly, and with a willingness to accept the penalty." Rather than expressing defiance, the protestor shows respect for the law by acting to remove injustice from a community. King cites several well-known examples of civil disobedience of which the eight clergymen would most certainly approve. These include the biblical story from the book of Daniel in which Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego are cast into a fiery furnace for refusing to worship the golden idol erected by the Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar. King contends that in the modern era religious people have a moral duty to confront Hitler's anti-Semitic codes and the atheistic decrees of Communist regimes.

The longest section of the letter addresses the role of the white moderate in the struggle for civil rights. King hits hard at the clergymen who objected to the Birmingham demonstrations, expressing his frustration with liberals who claimed to support the goal of equal rights while objecting to the methods of the movement. He accuses them of being almost as harmful as members of the Ku Klux Klan or the White Citizens' Council, a supremacist organization. The main reason for King's impatience is the moderates' frequently expressed insistence that change must be peaceful and orderly. These critics of the movement fail to understand the true source of the conflicts that surface during civil rights protests. These conflicts are not caused by those participating in civil disobedience; rather, the demonstrations bring to the surface long-standing community tensions. If they are to be resolved, they must first be exposed to public scrutiny.

Many detractors also denounced civil rights activists for precipitating violence from those opposed to integration. King has no patience with this line of reasoning. Accusing nonviolent demonstrators of causing violence is a classic example of blaming the victim. According to King, these critics suffer from distorted vision; they should defend those being attacked and condemn their attackers.

White moderates frequently argued that civil rights advocates like King were pressing too hard to transform southern society. If only African Americans could be more patient, they insisted, change would come in time. King forcefully rebuts this argument. Time is neutral, King insists; it can be used for good or evil. There is nothing inevitable about progress; the passage of time does not guarantee the solution of social problems. People of goodwill cannot afford to be silent in the face of injustice; they must "use time creatively" to realize "the promise of democracy."

The eight clergymen had described the Birmingham protestors as extremists. King at first repudiates this label. Rather than viewing himself as an extremist, he claims that he is a moderate caught between Uncle Toms who have acquiesced to segregation and the Black Muslims who charge that the white man is "the devil." In this context, the true extremists are those advocating separation from American society. Believers in nonviolent, direct action seek inclusion in the larger community, not its destruction. To call them extremists is an error. King even argues that demonstrations against segregation have therapeutic value. They allow African Americans to release their many "pent-up resentments and latent frustrations." Whites should not see them as a threat to the status quo but as a creative alternative to mass violence.

After considering the extremist label, however, King reverses course and embraces it. "Was not Jesus an extremist?" he asks. He then recites a long list of heroic figures who could be considered extremists: the Old Testament prophet Amos; the New Testament evangelist Paul; the Christian reformer Martin Luther; the English preacher and writer John Bunyan; Abraham Lincoln, who ended slavery; and Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence. All of these men were seen as extremists in their time. King implies that the United States needs more visionaries of this sort.

Although King harshly criticizes those moderates who had failed to defend the civil rights movement, he praises a handful of southern whites who risked persecution and ostracism by their public support of the movement. These people include the Atlanta editor Ralph McGill, the Georgia novelist Lillian Smith, the North Carolina writer Harry Golden, the South Carolina author James McBride Dabbs, the Alabama journalist Anne Braden, and Sarah Patton Boyle, who advocated racial integration in Virginia schools.

King then launches a sustained critique of established religion in the South. He acknowledges a few instances of courageous action by white churches, but these are "notable exceptions." During the Montgomery bus boycott, for example, the leaders of white congregations remained silent or actively opposed the protest. The same was true in Birmingham, where King's organization reached out to white denominations but was consistently rebuffed. King scorns the view that religion should focus solely on the hereafter and avoid involvement in social issues. He squarely embraces the Social Gospel tradition that calls upon Christians to work for the welfare of their fellow humans. The South was known for its strong religious institutions, yet King notes the ironic correlation of high rates of church membership and the popularity of racist governors, like Mississippi's Ross Barnett and Alabama's George Wallace. As the scion of a long line of Baptist ministers, King confesses his love of the church and, at the same time, his deep disappointment in it. He calls upon his white brethren to emulate early Christians who were not afraid to become "disturbers of the peace" while following their divine calling. A few members of the clergy had joined the movement in confronting segregation in the South, but not nearly enough. Nevertheless, despite the opposition of organized religion, King expresses confidence that the movement he leads eventually will be victorious because both the principles of American democracy and the "eternal will of God" require it.

King's final paragraphs dwell on the clergymen's ironic praise of the Birmingham police force for keeping order during the demonstrations. Three weeks after their statement was published, Connor ordered his men to turn police dogs and fire hoses on peaceful demonstrators, revealing to the world the lengths to which Alabama segregationists were willing to go in defense of the Jim Crow system. King points out that the police may have been restrained in public but were harsh in their treatment of jailed activists. He faults the ministers for not praising the discipline and courage of the African American protestors, who remained nonviolent in the face of great provocation. King's clerical critics reveal their one-sided perspective when they defend the white guardians of racial privilege and consistently find fault with those who seek to change this oppressive system.

King closes his letter on a brotherly note, apologizing for the length of his missive and asking for understanding. He expresses the hope that one day they may be able to meet person to person without the antagonism and misunderstanding that currently surround them.

Audience

Although the "Letter from Birmingham Jail" was nominally addressed to the eight white clergymen who had publicly urged African Americans to curtail their Birmingham demonstrations, King had a much wider audience in mind; his letter was produced for national consumption. Specifically, his letter was intended to answer his critics, especially white liberals who questioned the timing of his decision to initiate sit-ins, pickets, and marches following the electoral defeat of Connor. More generally, King hoped to explain the religious and philosophical foundations of nonviolent, direct action to all who shared his Judeo-Christian beliefs.

Impact

King's "Letter from Birmingham Jail" had no direct effect on his Birmingham campaign, since most issues were resolved prior to its publication. The eight white clergymen felt that King had singled them out unfairly. For the rest of their lives they would be known as the men who publicly chastised King. As the letter reached a larger audience, support for civil rights legislation began to swell. Liberal white religious organizations, especially the National Council of Churches, responded by unequivocally endorsing the movement's goals. Religious groups played a critical role in lobbying Congress on behalf of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. When King called upon church leaders to join him for the 1965 march from Selma to Montgomery, hundreds of ministers, rabbis, priests, and nuns came to Alabama to participate in the protest. Their consciences no doubt had been pricked by King's letter.

King's "Letter from Birmingham Jail" has been hailed as the most important written document of the modern civil rights struggle. In it King set forth in prophetic language the aspirations of African Americans to be accepted as human beings entitled to the same respect and rights as other Americans. He articulated the objectives of his movement and offered an eloquent defense of civil disobedience and nonviolent, direct action. His letter has been included in anthologies alongside the classic works of Thoreau and Gandhi. King's words and example have inspired people fighting for freedom around the world, from workers in Poland's Solidarity movement to Chinese students in Beijing's Tiananmen Square.

Essential Quotes

"Injustice anywhere is a threat to justice everywhere. We are caught in an inescapable network of mutuality, tied in a single garment of destiny. Whatever affects one directly, affects all indirectly."

(Paragraph 4)

"Nonviolent direct action seeks to create such a crisis and foster such a tension that a community that has constantly refused to negotiate is forced to confront the issue. It seeks to so dramatize the issue that it can no longer be ignored."

(Paragraph 10)

"We have not made a single gain in civil rights without determined legal and nonviolent pressure. Lamentably, it is an historical fact that privileged groups seldom give up their privileges voluntarily."

(Paragraph 12)

"We know through painful experience that freedom is never voluntarily given by the oppressor; it must be demanded by the oppressed. Frankly, I have yet to engage in a direct-action campaign that was 'well timed' in the view of those who have not suffered unduly from the disease of segregation. For years now I have heard the word 'Wait!' It rings in the ear of every Negro with piercing familiarity. This 'Wait' has almost always meant 'Never.'"

"One who breaks an unjust law must do so openly, lovingly, and with a willingness to accept the penalty. I submit that an individual who breaks a law that conscience tells him is unjust, and who willingly accepts the penalty of imprisonment in order to arouse the conscience of the community over its injustice, is in reality expressing the highest respect for law."

(Paragraph 20)

"I must confess that over the past few years I have been gravely disappointed with the white moderate … who is more devoted to 'order' than to justice."

(Paragraph 23)

Questions for Further Study

1. King argues that a person is justified in breaking unjust laws, but how does one distinguish between just and unjust laws? What are some examples of unjust laws in contemporary society?

2. In Birmingham nonviolent demonstrators repeatedly confronted the police, who eventually responded with police dogs and fire hoses. In this case, were the demonstrators guilty of provoking the police? To what extent, if any, were the demonstrators responsible for this violence?

3. King's critics often said that he pushed too hard for change and that he should have allowed his opponents more time to adjust to the social changes he advocated. Why did King reject these arguments? In his opinion, who should determine the timetable for social change? Why?

4. King often was accused of being an "extremist." Is this charge accurate? Why did King both reject and embrace this label?

5. In his letter, King takes white churches to task for not openly denouncing the evil of segregation, yet many ministers maintain that religious organizations should not take sides in partisan political issues. What is the proper role of the church in social issues? Should churches become involved in movements for social change? Why or why not?

Martin Luther King, Jr.: "Letter from Birmingham Jail"

My Dear Fellow Clergymen:

While confined here in the Birmingham city jail, I came across your recent statement calling my present activities "unwise and untimely." Seldom do I pause to answer criticism of my work and ideas. If I sought to answer all the criticisms that cross my desk, my secretaries would have little time for anything other than such correspondence in the course of the day, and I would have no time for constructive work. But since I feel that you are men of genuine good will and that your criticisms are sincerely set forth, I want to try to answer your statements in what I hope will be patient and reasonable terms.

I think I should indicate why I am here In Birmingham, since you have been influenced by the view which argues against "outsiders coming in." I have the honor of serving as president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, an organization operating in every southern state, with headquarters in Atlanta, Georgia. We have some eighty-five affiliated organizations across the South, and one of them is the Alabama Christian Movement for Human Rights. Frequently we share staff, educational and financial resources with our affiliates. Several months ago the affiliate here in Birmingham asked us to be on call to engage in a nonviolent direct-action program if such were deemed necessary. We readily consented, and when the hour came we lived up to our promise. So I, along with several members of my staff, am here because I was invited here. I am here because I have organizational ties here.

But more basically, I am in Birmingham because injustice is here. Just as the prophets of the eighth century B.C. left their villages and carried their "thus saith the Lord" far beyond the boundaries of their home towns, and just as the Apostle Paul left his village of Tarsus and carried the gospel of Jesus Christ to the far corners of the Greco-Roman world, so am I compelled to carry the gospel of freedom beyond my own home town. Like Paul, I must constantly respond to the Macedonian call for aid.

Moreover, I am cognizant of the interrelatedness of all communities and states. I cannot sit idly by in Atlanta and not be concerned about what happens in Birmingham. Injustice anywhere is a threat to justice everywhere. We are caught in an inescapable network of mutuality, tied in a single garment of destiny. Whatever affects one directly, affects all indirectly. Never again can we afford to live with the narrow, provincial "outside agitator" idea. Anyone who lives inside the United States can never be considered an outsider anywhere within its bounds.

You deplore the demonstrations taking place in Birmingham. But your statement, I am sorry to say, fails to express a similar concern for the conditions that brought about the demonstrations. I am sure that none of you would want to rest content with the superficial kind of social analysis that deals merely with effects and does not grapple with underlying causes. It is unfortunate that demonstrations are taking place in Birmingham, but it is even more unfortunate that the city's white power structure left the Negro community with no alternative.

In any nonviolent campaign there are four basic steps: collection of the facts to determine whether injustices exist; negotiation; self-purification; and direct action. We have gone through all these steps in Birmingham. There can be no gainsaying the fact that racial injustice engulfs this community. Birmingham is probably the most thoroughly segregated city in the United States. Its ugly record of brutality is widely known. Negroes have experienced grossly unjust treatment in the courts. There have been more unsolved bombings of Negro homes and churches in Birmingham than in any other city in the nation. These are the hard, brutal facts of the case. On the basis of these conditions, Negro leaders sought to negotiate with the city fathers. But the latter consistently refused to engage in good-faith negotiation

Then, last September, came the opportunity to talk with leaders of Birmingham's economic community. In the course of the negotiations, certain promises were made by the merchants for example, to remove the stores' humiliating racial signs. On the basis of these promises, the Reverend Fred Shuttlesworth and the leaders of the Alabama Christian Movement for Human Rights agreed to a moratorium on all demonstrations. As the weeks and months went by, we realized that we were the victims of a broken promise. A few signs, briefly removed, returned; the others remained.

As in so many past experiences, our hopes had been blasted, and the shadow of deep disappointment settled upon us. We had no alternative except to prepare for direct action, whereby we would present our very bodies as a means of laying our case before the conscience of the local and the national community. Mindful of the difficulties involved, we decided to undertake a process of self-purification. We began a series of workshops on nonviolence, and we repeatedly asked ourselves: "Are you able to accept blows without retaliating?" "Are you able to endure the ordeal of jail?" We decided to schedule our direct-action program for the Easter season, realizing that except for Christmas, this is the main shopping period of the year. Knowing that a strong economic withdrawal program would be the by-product of direct action, we felt that this would be the best time to bring pressure to bear on the merchants for the needed change.

Then it occurred to us that Birmingham's mayoralty election was coming up in March, and we speedily decided to postpone action until after election day. When we discovered that the Commissioner of Public Safety, Eugene "Bull" Connor, had piled up enough votes to be in the run-off, we decided again to postpone action until the day after the run-off so that the demonstrations could not be used to cloud the issues. Like many others, we waited to see Mr. Connor defeated, and to this end we endured postponement after postponement. Having aided in this community need, we felt that our direct-action program could be delayed no longer.

You may well ask: "Why direct action? Why sit-ins, marches and so forth? Isn't negotiation a better path?" You are quite right in calling for negotiation. Indeed, this is the very purpose of direct action. Nonviolent direct action seeks to create such a crisis and foster such a tension that a community which has constantly refused to negotiate is forced to confront the issue. It seeks so to dramatize the issue that it can no longer be ignored. My citing the creation of tension as part of the work of the nonviolent-resister may sound rather shocking. But I must confess that I am not afraid of the word "tension." I have earnestly opposed violent tension, but there is a type of constructive, nonviolent tension which is necessary for growth. Just as Socrates felt that it was necessary to create a tension in the mind so that individuals could rise from the bondage of myths and half-truths to the unfettered realm of creative analysis and objective appraisal, so must we see the need for nonviolent gadflies to create the kind of tension in society that will help men rise from the dark depths of prejudice and racism to the majestic heights of understanding and brotherhood.

The purpose of our direct-action program is to create a situation so crisis-packed that it will inevitably open the door to negotiation. I therefore concur with you in your call for negotiation. Too long has our beloved Southland been bogged down in a tragic effort to live in monologue rather than dialogue.

One of the basic points in your statement is that the action that I and my associates have taken in Birmingham is untimely. Some have asked: "Why didn't you give the new city administration time to act?" The only answer that I can give to this query is that the new Birmingham administration must be prodded about as much as the outgoing one, before it will act. We are sadly mistaken if we feel that the election of Albert Boutwell as mayor will bring the millennium to Birmingham. While Mr. Boutwell is a much more gentle person than Mr. Connor, they are both segregationists, dedicated to maintenance of the status quo. I have hope that Mr. Boutwell will be reasonable enough to see the futility of massive resistance to desegregation. But he will not see this without pressure from devotees of civil rights. My friends, I must say to you that we have not made a single gain in civil rights without determined legal and nonviolent pressure. Lamentably, it is an historical fact that privileged groups seldom give up their privileges voluntarily. Individuals may see the moral light and voluntarily give up their unjust posture; but, as Reinhold Niebuhr has reminded us, groups tend to be more immoral than individuals.

We know through painful experience that freedom is never voluntarily given by the oppressor; it must be demanded by the oppressed. Frankly, I have yet to engage in a direct-action campaign that was "well timed" in the view of those who have not suffered unduly from the disease of segregation. For years now I have heard the word "Wait!" It rings in the ear of every Negro with piercing familiarity. This "Wait" has almost always meant "Never." We must come to see, with one of our distinguished jurists, that "justice too long delayed is justice denied."

We have waited for more than 340 years for our constitutional and God-given rights. The nations of Asia and Africa are moving with jetlike speed toward gaining political independence, but we still creep at horse-and-buggy pace toward gaining a cup of coffee at a lunch counter. Perhaps it is easy for those who have never felt the stinging darts of segregation to say, "Wait." But when you have seen vicious mobs lynch your mothers and fathers at will and drown your sisters and brothers at whim; when you have seen hate-filled policemen curse, kick and even kill your black brothers and sisters; when you see the vast majority of your twenty million Negro brothers smothering in an airtight cage of poverty in the midst of an affluent society; when you suddenly find your tongue twisted and your speech stammering as you seek to explain to your six-year-old daughter why she can't go to the public amusement park that has just been advertised on television, and see tears welling up in her eyes when she is told that Funtown is closed to colored children, and see ominous clouds of inferiority beginning to form in her little mental sky, and see her beginning to distort her personality by developing an unconscious bitterness toward white people; when you have to concoct an answer for a five-year-old son who is asking: "Daddy, why do white people treat colored people so mean?"; when you take a cross-county drive and find it necessary to sleep night after night in the uncomfortable corners of your automobile because no motel will accept you; when you are humiliated day in and day out by nagging signs reading "white" and "colored"; when your first name becomes "nigger," your middle name becomes "boy" (however old you are) and your last name becomes "John," and your wife and mother are never given the respected title "Mrs."; when you are harried by day and haunted by night by the fact that you are a Negro, living constantly at tiptoe stance, never quite knowing what to expect next, and are plagued with inner fears and outer resentments; when you are forever fighting a degenerating sense of "nobodiness" then you will understand why we find it difficult to wait. There comes a time when the cup of endurance runs over, and men are no longer willing to be plunged into the abyss of despair. I hope, sirs, you can understand our legitimate and unavoidable impatience.

You express a great deal of anxiety over our willingness to break laws. This is certainly a legitimate concern. Since we so diligently urge people to obey the Supreme Court's decision of 1954 outlawing segregation in the public schools, at first glance it may seem rather paradoxical for us consciously to break laws. One may well ask: "How can you advocate breaking some laws and obeying others?" The answer lies in the fact that there are two types of laws: just and unjust. I would be the first to advocate obeying just laws. One has not only a legal but a moral responsibility to obey just laws. Conversely, one has a moral responsibility to disobey unjust laws. I would agree with St. Augustine that "an unjust law is no law at all."

Now, what is the difference between the two? How does one determine whether a law is just or unjust? A just law is a man-made code that squares with the moral law or the law of God. An unjust law is a code that is out of harmony with the moral law. To put it in the terms of St. Thomas Aquinas: An unjust law is a human law that is not rooted in eternal law and natural law. Any law that uplifts human personality is just. Any law that degrades human personality is unjust. All segregation statutes are unjust because segregation distorts the soul and damages the personality. It gives the segregator a false sense of superiority and the segregated a false sense of inferiority. Segregation, to use the terminology of the Jewish philosopher Martin Buber, substitutes an "I-it" relationship for an "I-thou" relationship and ends up relegating persons to the status of things. Hence segregation is not only politically, economically and sociologically unsound, it is morally wrong and sinful. Paul Tillich has said that sin is separation. Is not segregation an existential expression of man's tragic separation, his awful estrangement, his terrible sinfulness? Thus it is that I can urge men to obey the 1954 decision of the Supreme Court, for it is morally right; and I can urge them to disobey segregation ordinances, for they are morally wrong.

Let us consider a more concrete example of just and unjust laws. An unjust law is a code that a numerical or power majority group compels a minority group to obey but does not make binding on itself. This is difference made legal. By the same token, a just law is a code that a majority compels a minority to follow and that it is willing to follow itself. This is sameness made legal.

Let me give another explanation. A law is unjust if it is inflicted on a minority that, as a result of being denied the right to vote, had no part in enacting or devising the law. Who can say that the legislature of Alabama which set up that state's segregation laws was democratically elected? Throughout Alabama all sorts of devious methods are used to prevent Negroes from becoming registered voters, and there are some counties in which, even though Negroes constitute a majority of the population, not a single Negro is registered. Can any law enacted under such circumstances be considered democratically structured?

Sometimes a law is just on its face and unjust in its application. For instance, I have been arrested on a charge of parading without a permit. Now, there is nothing wrong in having an ordinance which requires a permit for a parade. But such an ordinance becomes unjust when it is used to maintain

l hope you are able to see the distinction I am trying to point out. In no sense do I advocate evading or defying the law, as would the rabid segregationist. That would lead to anarchy. One who breaks an unjust law must do so openly, lovingly, and with a willingness to accept the penalty. I submit that an individual who breaks a law that conscience tells him is unjust, and who willingly accepts the penalty of imprisonment in order to arouse the conscience of the community over its injustice, is in reality expressing the highest respect for law.

Of course, there is nothing new about this kind of civil disobedience. It was evidenced sublimely in the refusal of Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego to obey the laws of Nebuchadnezzar, on the ground that a higher moral law was at stake. It was practiced superbly by the early Christians, who were willing to face hungry lions and the excruciating pain of chopping blocks rather than submit to certain unjust laws of the Roman Empire. To a degree, academic freedom is a reality today because Socrates practiced civil disobedience. In our own nation, the Boston Tea Party represented a massive act of civil disobedience.

We should never forget that everything Adolf Hitler did in Germany was "legal" and everything the Hungarian freedom fighters did in Hungary was "illegal." It was "illegal" to aid and comfort a Jew in Hitler's Germany. Even so, I am sure that, had I lived in Germany at the time, I would have aided and comforted my Jewish brothers. If today I lived in a Communist country where certain principles dear to the Christian faith are suppressed, I would openly advocate disobeying that country's antireligious laws.

I must make two honest confessions to you, my Christian and Jewish brothers. First, I must confess that over the past few years I have been gravely disappointed with the white moderate. I have almost reached the regrettable conclusion that the Negro's great stumbling block in his stride toward freedom is not the White Citizens Counciler or the Ku Klux Klanner, but the white moderate, who is more devoted to "order" than to justice; who prefers a negative peace which is the absence of tension to a positive peace which is the presence of justice; who constantly says: "I agree with you in the goal you seek, but I cannot agree with your methods of direct action"; who paternalistically believes he can set the timetable for another man's freedom; who lives by a mythical concept of time and who constantly advises the Negro to wait for a "more convenient season." Shallow understanding from people of good will is more frustrating than absolute misunderstanding from people of ill will. Lukewarm acceptance is much more bewildering than outright rejection.

I had hoped that the white moderate would understand that law and order exist for the purpose of establishing justice and that when they fail in this purpose they become the dangerously structured dams that block the flow of social progress. I had hoped that the white moderate would understand that the present tension in the South is a necessary phase of the transition from an obnoxious negative peace, in which the Negro passively accepted his unjust plight, to a substantive and positive peace, in which all men will respect the dignity and worth of human personality Actually, we who engage in nonviolent direct action are not the creators of tension. We merely bring to the surface the hidden tension that is already alive. We bring it out in the open, where it can be seen and dealt with. Like a boil that can never be cured so long as it is covered up but must be opened with all its ugliness to the natural medicines of air and light, injustice must be exposed, with all the tension its exposure creates, to the light of human conscience and the air of national opinion before it can be cured.

In your statement you assert that our actions, even though peaceful, must be condemned because they precipitate violence. But is this a logical assertion? Isn't this like condemning a robbed man because his possession of money precipitated the evil act of robbery? Isn't this like condemning Socrates because his unswerving commitment to truth and his philosophical inquiries precipitated the act by the misguided populace in which they made him drink hemlock? Isn't this like condemning Jesus because his unique God-consciousness and never-ceasing devotion to God's will precipitated the evil act of crucifixion? We must come to see that, as the federal courts have consistently affirmed, it is wrong to urge an individual to cease his efforts to gain his basic constitutional rights because the quest may precipitate violence. Society must protect the robbed and punish the robber.

I had also hoped that the white moderate would reject the myth concerning time in relation to the struggle for freedom. I have just received a letter from a white brother in Texas. He writes: "All Christians know that the colored people will receive equal rights eventually, but it is possible that you are in too great a religious hurry. It has taken Christianity almost two thousand years to accomplish what it has. The teachings of Christ take time to come to earth." Such an attitude stems from a tragic misconception of time, from the strangely irrational notion that there is something in the very flow of time that will inevitably cure all ills. Actually, time itself is neutral; it can be used either destructively or constructively. More and more I feel that the people of ill will have used time much more effectively than have the people of good will. We will have to repent in this generation not merely for the hateful words and actions of the bad people but for the appalling silence of the good people. Human progress never rolls in on wheels of inevitability; it comes through the tireless efforts of men willing to be co-workers with God, and without this hard work, time itself becomes an ally of the forces of social stagnation. We must use time creatively, in the knowledge that the time is always ripe to do right. Now is the time to make real the promise of democracy and transform our pending national elegy into a creative psalm of brotherhood. Now is the time to lift our national policy from the quicksand of racial injustice to the solid rock of human dignity.

You speak of our activity in Birmingham as extreme At first I was rather disappointed that fellow clergymen would see my nonviolent efforts as those of an extremist. I began thinking about the fact that I stand in the middle of two opposing forces in the Negro community. One is a force of complacency, made up in part of Negroes who, as a result of long years of oppression, are so drained of self-respect and a sense of "somebodiness" that they have adjusted to segregation; and in part of a few middle-class Negroes who, because of a degree of academic and economic security and because in some ways they profit by segregation, have become insensitive to the problems of the masses. The other force is one of bitterness and hatred, and it comes perilously close to advocating violence. It is expressed in the various black nationalist groups that are springing up across the nation, the largest and best-known being Elijah Muhammad's Muslim movement. Nourished by the Negro's frustration over the continued existence of racial discrimination, this movement is made up of people who have lost faith in America, who have absolutely repudiated Christianity, and who have concluded that the white man is an incorrigible "devil."

I have tried to stand between these two forces, saying that we need emulate neither the "do-nothingism" of the complacent nor the hatred and despair of the black nationalist. For there is the more excellent way of love and nonviolent protest I am grateful to God that, through the influence of the Negro church, the way of nonviolence became an integral part of our struggle.

If this philosophy had not emerged, by now many streets of the South would, I am convinced, be flowing with blood. And I am further convinced that if our white brothers dismiss as "rabble-rousers" and "outside agitators" those of us who employ nonviolent direct action, and if they refuse to support our nonviolent efforts, millions of Negroes will, out of frustration and despair, seek solace and security in black-nationalist ideologies a development that would inevitably lead to a frightening racial nightmare.

Oppressed people cannot remain oppressed forever. The yearning for freedom eventually manifests itself, and that is what has happened to the American Negro. Something within has reminded him of his birthright of freedom, and something without has reminded him that it can be gained. Consciously or unconsciously, he has been caught up by the Zeitgeist and with his black brothers of Africa and his brown and yellow brothers of Asia, South America and the Caribbean, the United States Negro is moving with a sense of great urgency toward the promised land of racial justice. If one recognizes this vital urge that has engulfed the Negro community, one should readily understand why public demonstrations are taking place. The Negro has many pent-up resentments and latent frustrations, and he must release them. So let him march; let him make prayer pilgrimages to the city hall; let him go on freedom rides and try to understand why he must do so. If his repressed emotions are not released in nonviolent ways, they will seek expression through violence; this is not a threat but a fact of history. So I have not said to my people: "Get rid of your discontent." Rather, I have tried to say that this normal and healthy discontent can be channeled into the creative outlet of nonviolent direct action. And now this approach is being termed extremist.

But though I was initially disappointed at being categorized as an extremist, as I continued to think about the matter I gradually gained a measure of satisfaction from the label. Was not Jesus an extremist for love: "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you." Was not Amos an extremist for justice: "Let justice roll down like waters and righteousness like an everflowing stream." Was not Paul an extremist for the Christian gospel: "I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus." Was not Martin Luther an extremist: "Here I stand; I cannot do otherwise, so help me God." And John Bunyan: "I will stay in jail to the end of my days before I make a butchery of my conscience." And Abraham Lincoln: "This nation cannot survive half slave and half free." And Thomas Jefferson: "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal..." So the question is not whether we will be extremists, but what kind of extremists we will be. Will we be extremists for hate or for love? Will we be extremist for the preservation of injustice or for the extension of justice? In that dramatic scene on Calvary's hill three men were crucified. We must never forget that all three were crucified for the same crime the crime of extremism. Two were extremists for immorality, and thus fell below their environment. The other, Jesus Christ, was an extremist for love, truth and goodness, and thereby rose above his environment. Perhaps the South, the nation and the world are in dire need of creative extremists.

I had hoped that the white moderate would see this need. Perhaps I was too optimistic; perhaps I expected too much. I suppose I should have realized that few members of the oppressor race can understand the deep groans and passionate yearnings of the oppressed race, and still fewer have the vision to see that injustice must be rooted out by strong, persistent and determined action. I am thankful, however, that some of our white brothers in the South have grasped the meaning of this social revolution and committed themselves to it. They are still too few in quantity, but they are big in quality. Some such as Ralph McGill, Lillian Smith, Harry Golden, James McBride Dabbs, Ann Braden and Sarah Patton Boyle have written about our struggle in eloquent and prophetic terms. Others have marched with us down nameless streets of the South. They have languished in filthy, roach-infested jails, suffering the abuse and brutality of policemen who view them as "dirty nigger-lovers" Unlike so many of their moderate brothers and sisters, they have recognized the urgency of the moment and sensed the need for powerful "action" antidotes to combat the disease of segregation.

Let me take note of my other major disappointment. I have been so greatly disappointed with the white church and its leadership. Of course, there are some notable exceptions. I am not unmindful of the fact that each of you has taken some significant stands on this issue. I commend you, Reverend Stallings, for your Christian stand on this past Sunday, in welcoming Negroes to your worship service on a nonsegregated basis. I commend the Catholic leaders of this state for integrating Spring Hill College several years ago.

But despite these notable exceptions, I must honestly reiterate that I have been disappointed with the church. I do not say this as one of those negative critics who can always find something wrong with the church. I say this as a minister of the gospel, who loves the church; who was nurtured in its bosom; who has been sustained by its spiritual blessings and who will remain true to it as long as the cord of life shall lengthen.

When I was suddenly catapulted into the leadership of the bus protest in Montgomery, Alabama, a few years ago, I felt we would be supported by the white church. I felt that the white ministers, priests and rabbis of the South would be among our strongest allies. Instead, some have been outright opponents, refusing to understand the freedom movement and misrepresenting its leaders; all too many others have been more cautious than courageous and have remained silent behind the anesthetizing security of stained-glass windows.

In spite of my shattered dreams, I came to Birmingham with the hope that the white religious leadership of this community would see the justice of our cause and, with deep moral concern, would serve as the channel through which our just grievances could reach the power structure. I had hoped that each of you would understand. But again I have been disappointed.

I have heard numerous southern religious leaders admonish their worshipers to comply with a desegregation decision because it is the law, but I have longed to hear white ministers declare: "Follow this decree because integration is morally right and because the Negro is your brother." In the midst of blatant injustices inflicted upon the Negro, I have watched white churchmen stand on the sideline and mouth pious irrelevancies and sanctimonious trivialities. In the midst of a mighty struggle to rid our nation of racial and economic injustice, I have heard many ministers say: "Those are social issues, with which the gospel has no real concern." And I have watched many churches commit themselves to a completely other-worldly religion which makes a strange, un-Biblical distinction between body and soul, between the sacred and the secular.

I have traveled the length and breadth of Alabama, Mississippi and all the other southern states. On sweltering summer days and crisp autumn mornings I have looked at the South's beautiful churches with their lofty spires pointing heavenward. I have beheld the impressive outlines of her massive religious-education buildings. Over and over I have found myself asking: "What kind of people worship here? Who is their God? Where were their voices when the lips of Governor Barnett dripped with words of interposition and nullification? Where were they when Governor Wallace gave a clarion call for defiance and hatred? Where were their voices of support when bruised and weary Negro men and women decided to rise from the dark dungeons of complacency to the bright hills of creative protest?"

Yes these questions are still in my mind. In deep disappointment I have wept over the laxity of the church. But be assured that my tears have been tears of love. There can be no deep disappointment where there is not deep love. Yes, I love the church. How could I do otherwise? I am in the rather unique position of being the son, the grandson and the great-grandson of preachers. Yes, I see the church as the body of Christ. But oh! How we have blemished and scarred that body through social neglect and through fear of being nonconformists.

There was a time when the church was very powerful in the time when the early Christians rejoiced at being deemed worthy to suffer for what they believed. In those days the church was not merely a thermometer that recorded the ideas and principles of popular opinion; it was a thermostat that transformed the mores of society. Whenever the early Christians entered a town, the people in power became disturbed and immediately sought to convict the Christians for being "disturbers of the peace" and "outside agitators'" But the Christians pressed on, in the conviction that they were "a colony of heaven," called to obey God rather than man. Small in number, they were big in commitment. They were too God-intoxicated to be "astronomically intimidated." By their effort and example they brought an end to such ancient evils as infanticide and gladiatorial contests.

Things are different now. So often the contemporary church is a weak, ineffectual voice with an uncertain sound. So often it is an archdefender of the status quo. Far from being disturbed by the presence of the church, the power structure of the average community is consoled by the church's silent and often even vocal sanction of things as they are.

But the judgment of God is upon the church as never before. If today's church does not recapture the sacrificial spirit of the early church, it will lose its authenticity, forfeit the loyalty of millions, and be dismissed as an irrelevant social club with no meaning for the twentieth century. Every day I meet young people whose disappointment with the church has turned into outright disgust.

Perhaps I have once again been too optimistic. Is organized religion too inextricably bound to the status quo to save our nation and the world? Perhaps I must turn my faith to the inner spiritual church, the church within the church, as the true ekklesia and the hope of the world. But again I am thankful to God that some noble souls from the ranks of organized religion have broken loose from the paralyzing chains of conformity and joined us as active partners in the struggle for freedom. They have left their secure congregations and walked the streets of Albany, Georgia, with us. They have gone down the highways of the South on tortuous rides for freedom. Yes, they have gone to jail with us. Some have been dismissed from their churches, have lost the support of their bishops and fellow ministers. But they have acted in the faith that right defeated is stronger than evil triumphant. Their witness has been the spiritual salt that has preserved the true meaning of the gospel in these troubled times. They have carved a tunnel of hope through the dark mountain of disappointment.

I hope the church as a whole will meet the challenge of this decisive hour. But even if the church does not come to the aid of justice, I have no despair about the future. I have no fear about the outcome of our struggle in Birmingham, even if our motives are at present misunderstood. We will reach the goal of freedom in Birmingham and all over the nation, because the goal of America is freedom. Abused and scorned though we may be, our destiny is tied up with America's destiny. Before the pilgrims landed at Plymouth, we were here. Before the pen of Jefferson etched the majestic words of the Declaration of Independence across the pages of history, we were here. For more than two centuries our forebears labored in this country without wages; they made cotton king; they built the homes of their masters while suffering gross injustice and shameful humiliation and yet out of a bottomless vitality they continued to thrive and develop. If the inexpressible cruelties of slavery could not stop us, the opposition we now face will surely fail. We will win our freedom because the sacred heritage of our nation and the eternal will of God are embodied in our echoing demands.

Before closing I feel impelled to mention one other point in your statement that has troubled me profoundly. You warmly commended the Birmingham police force for keeping "order" and "preventing violence." I doubt that you would have so warmly commended the police force if you had seen its dogs sinking their teeth into unarmed, nonviolent Negroes. I doubt that you would so quickly commend the policemen if you were to observe their ugly and inhumane treatment of Negroes here in the city jail; if you were to watch them push and curse old Negro women and young Negro girls; if you were to see them slap and kick old Negro men and young boys; if you were to observe them, as they did on two occasions, refuse to give us food because we wanted to sing our grace together. I cannot join you in your praise of the Birmingham police department.

It is true that the police have exercised a degree of discipline in handling the demonstrators. In this sense they have conducted themselves rather "nonviolently" in public. But for what purpose? To preserve the evil system of segregation. Over the past few years I have consistently preached that nonviolence demands that the means we use must be as pure as the ends we seek. I have tried to make clear that it is wrong to use immoral means to attain moral ends. But now I must affirm that it is just as wrong, or perhaps even more so, to use moral means to preserve immoral ends. Perhaps Mr. Connor and his policemen have been rather nonviolent in public, as was Chief Pritchett in Albany, Georgia, but they have used the moral means of nonviolence to maintain the immoral end of racial injustice. As T. S. Eliot has said: "The last temptation is the greatest treason: To do the right deed for the wrong reason."

I wish you had commended the Negro sit-inners and demonstrators of Birmingham for their sublime courage, their willingness to suffer and their amazing discipline in the midst of great provocation. One day the South will recognize its real heroes. They will be the James Merediths, with the noble sense of purpose that enables them to face jeering, and hostile mobs, and with the agonizing loneliness that characterizes the life of the pioneer. They will be old, oppressed, battered Negro women, symbolized in a seventy-two-year-old woman in Montgomery, Alabama, who rose up with a sense of dignity and with her people decided not to ride segregated buses, and who responded with ungrammatical profundity to one who inquired about her weariness: "My feets is tired, but my soul is at rest." They will be the young high school and college students, the young ministers of the gospel and a host of their elders, courageously and nonviolently sitting in at lunch counters and willingly going to jail for conscience' sake. One day the South will know that when these disinherited children of God sat down at lunch counters, they were in reality standing up for what is best in the American dream and for the most sacred values in our Judaeo-Christian heritage, thereby bringing our nation back to those great wells of democracy which were dug deep by the founding fathers in their formulation of the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence.

Never before have I written so long a letter. I'm afraid it is much too long to take your precious time. I can assure you that it would have been much shorter if I had been writing from a comfortable desk, but what else can one do when he is alone in a narrow jail cell, other than write long letters, think long thoughts and pray long prayers?

If I have said anything in this letter that overstates the truth and indicates an unreasonable impatience, I beg you to forgive me. If I have said anything that understates the truth and indicates my having a patience that allows me to settle for anything less than brotherhood, I beg God to forgive me.

I hope this letter finds you strong in the faith. I also hope that circumstances will soon make it possible for me to meet each of you, not as an integrationist or a civil rights leader but as a fellow clergyman and a Christian brother. Let us all hope that the dark clouds of racial prejudice will soon pass away and the deep fog of misunderstanding will be lifted

"We are confronted primarily with a moral issue."

Overview

The modern American civil rights movement, which began with the Montgomery bus boycott in 1955, was aimed at regaining the ground that had been achieved in the aftermath of the Civil War, such as through the enactment of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth amendments to the U.S. Constitution and of civil rights laws in 1866 and 1875, and moving toward the complete elimination of racial inequality in all its forms. Civil rights organizations pursued a variety of tactics, including lawsuits, boycotts, lobbying, sit-ins, freedom rides, street demonstrations, and marches, in attempts to demand freedom, equality, jobs, dignity, and an end to racial segregation, disfranchisement, and second-class citizenship.

President John F. Kennedy's Civil Rights Address, delivered to the nation by radio and television, marked the first time that a president called on Americans to recognize civil rights as a lofty moral cause to which all persons should contribute, so that the nation might fully end discrimination against and provide equal treatment to African Americans. In 1963, the centennial year of President Abraham Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation, to which Kennedy alludes in his speech, the movement led by African Americans and their allies for civil rights reached the center stage of American politics. Although Kennedy had hesitated to seek progress with regard to civil rights during his first two years in the White House because of the strength of southern Democratic opponents in Congress, he now added the moral weight of the presidency to the demand for civil rights, and he emerged as an ally of the movement. Kennedy explained the economic, educational, and moral dimensions of racial discrimination and announced that he would be submitting legislation to ensure equal access to public accommodations and to address other aspects of ongoing discrimination. On July 2, 1964, seven months after Kennedy was assassinated, the Civil Rights Act of 1964, abolishing discrimination in public accommodations, employment, and federally funded programs, became law.

Context

Two sets of events in Alabama in the spring of 1963 brought the civil rights movement a new level of public attention. Television viewers witnessed the Birmingham sheriff Eugene "Bull" Connor's use of water hoses and dogs against demonstrators as young as nine years old who were seeking equal access to public accommodations as well as Governor George Wallace's campaign pledge to "stand in the schoolhouse door" to prevent the integration of any Alabama school. On June 11, 1963, President Kennedy ended Wallace's resistance by federalizing the Alabama National Guard to support the court-mandated entry of Vivian J. Malone and James A. Hood to the University of Alabama. The determination of civil rights demonstrators, the violent and repressive actions of Alabama authorities, the solidarity protests galvanized by national civil rights organizations, and widespread public sympathy for the cause led Kennedy to take dramatic action to support civil rights.

In taking to the television and radio airwaves later that same day (June 11, 1963) to support the civil rights cause, Kennedy abandoned his previous go-slow approach to the issue. Moreover, he departed radically from the silence held by the Republican president Dwight D. Eisenhower when the Supreme Court handed down the historic 1954 Brown v. Board of Education decision, overturning the Plessy v. Ferguson separate-but-equal precedent of 1896. Kennedy's speech was momentous because he called on the nation to support civil rights as a moral cause.

About the Author

John Fitzgerald Kennedy was born in Massachusetts in 1917, the second of nine children of Joseph P. and Rose Fitzgerald Kennedy. John Kennedy's maternal grandfather had served as mayor of Boston, while his father was a successful businessperson and had served President Franklin Roosevelt as head of the Securities and Exchange Commission and then as ambassador to Great Britain. Kennedy's childhood was shaped by his family's great wealth, his parents' aloofness, attendance at boarding schools beginning in the seventh grade, and frequent illnesses. Kennedy would contend with physical pain and a variety of illnesses throughout his life.

Rose Kennedy's focus on caring for her mentally retarded daughter, Rosemary, who was one year younger than John, led all the children to emulate their mother's example of caring. Kennedy graduated from Harvard College in 1940. Thanks to his father's prominence and the assistance of the New York Times columnist Arthur Krock, Kennedy succeeded in having his senior thesis published as a book, Why England Slept.

Kennedy and his older brother, Joseph Kennedy, Jr., both served in World War II, John as a PT boat commander; only John returned home safely. Their father had been grooming Joseph, Jr., for a political career that might culminate in the presidency. When John Kennedy decided to enter politics after a brief stint as a journalist, he received his father's financial and political backing. Kennedy was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1946 and served as a member of the Committee on Education and Labor. His principal interests were foreign and defense policies. He was strongly anti-Communist and critical of the administration of Harry Truman for being insufficiently aggressive. In 1952 he won election to the U.S. Senate.

Kennedy married Jacqueline Bouvier in 1953. The couple had three children, one of whom died in infancy. Kennedy had been promiscuous prior to his marriage, and this behavior continued during the marriage and during his presidency, but in this era the press customarily declined to focus on the private lives of officeholders.

Kennedy's stance on domestic economic issues was liberal, but he failed to join in the 1954 Senate vote to censure Senator Joseph McCarthy for his tactics in pursuing what McCarthy claimed were Communist subversion and sympathizers in the U.S. government. In 1956 Kennedy gained national attention with his unsuccessful bid to win the Democratic nomination for vice president. Kennedy's second book, Profiles in Courage, was awarded a Pulitzer Prize in 1957. The book highlights the careers of members of Congress who took principled stands, often in opposition to what was politically prudent. In the Senate, Kennedy served on a special committee on labor and on the Foreign Relations Committee. He was elected to a second term in the Senate in 1958, won the Democratic nomination for president in 1960, and claimed a narrow victory over the Republican candidate, Vice President Richard Nixon, in the general election later that year. Civil rights became a key issue in the campaign when Martin Luther King, Jr., was sentenced to four months of hard labor on a misdemeanor traffic charge, leading some civil rights leaders to fear that King would be killed in prison. Kennedy called Coretta King, King's wife, to express his sympathy, and his brother Robert called the judge and persuaded him to release King on bail. Kennedy won 70 percent of the black vote, 30 percent higher than the Democratic percentage in the 1956 election.

As president, Kennedy initially disappointed civil rights partisans by proceeding slowly with civil rights initiatives and appointing segregationist judges in the South. Kennedy had criticized the Eisenhower administration for failing to ban discrimination in federal housing via an executive order but then delayed the issuance of his own limited executive order addressing the matter until November 1962. Kennedy thought that an assertive approach to civil rights would hurt his chances for spurring legislative action on medical insurance, federal aid to education, and other initiatives, but he failed to achieve gains in these areas even with his go-slow approach to civil rights. His main focus was on an aggressive cold war foreign policy. The failure of the Bay of Pigs invasion in Cuba (in an attempt to overthrow the Communist regime of Fidel Castro) in 1961 and the October 1962 crisis with the Soviet Union over the placement of nuclear missiles in Cuba were key events in his presidency. He was also involved in increasing the number of U.S. military advisers in South Vietnam, where the U.S.-backed government was increasingly unpopular.

In the third and last year of his presidency, Kennedy moved toward rethinking the cold war and affirmative leadership on civil rights. He negotiated the Nuclear Test Ban Treaty with the Soviet Union and Great Britain, spoke out forcefully for civil rights, and submitted a major civil rights proposal to Congress. Kennedy was a popular president, and his assassination on November 22, 1963, shocked the nation. President Lyndon B. Johnson was able to carry to fruition Kennedy's domestic civil rights program.

After an initial greeting to his "fellow citizens" marking the familiar tone the president adopted throughout the address Kennedy reports on the day's events at the University of Alabama, where he had acted to enforce a U.S. district court decision for the admission of two African American students, Vivian Malone and James Hood. By federalizing the Alabama National Guard, the president overcame the resistance of Governor George Wallace and ended Alabama's status as the only remaining state with state universities closed to African Americans. In contrast to the president's similar experience with the desegregation of the University of Mississippi the previous year, no violence occurred. The president takes note of this fact and praises students at the University of Alabama "who met their responsibilities in a constructive way." In highlighting the good behavior of students, the president introduces one of the important themes of the address, the need for individual citizens to contribute to the solution of the civil rights crisis.

In the third paragraph the president begins to emphasize the key theme of the address, the morality of the civil rights cause, which he links to the responsibility of each American to act in accord with the nation's values and the principle of basic fairness. In an allusion to President Abraham Lincoln's Gettysburg Address, Kennedy notes that the nation was "founded on the principle that all men are created equal." He implicitly criticizes racist concepts regarding the nation's origins when he affirms that "this Nation was founded by men of many nations and backgrounds." In asserting that "the rights of every man are diminished when the rights of one man are threatened," the president alludes to a long-standing labor movement slogan, "An injury to one is the concern of all." Organized labor was a central constituency of the Democratic Party, and its leaders strongly supported the enactment of civil rights legislation.

In paragraphs 4 6, Kennedy introduces an important theme of the address that the "worldwide struggle to promote and protect the rights of all who wish to be free" was connected with the successful practice of the ideal of freedom for all in America. During World War II, many civil rights partisans raised the idea that eliminating racial discrimination at home was a logical and practical counterpart to the struggle against Fascism abroad, particularly against the Nazi ideology of Aryan racial superiority. In the ensuing cold war between the United States and the Soviet Union, the issue of the connection between freedom at home and freedom abroad loomed in a new way. The Soviet Union, and indeed the world Communist movement, had long criticized racial oppression in the United States and the imperialist oppression of peoples in the developing world. In advocating a heightened struggle against Communism and for the U.S. concept of freedom around the world in his Inaugural Address, Kennedy was aware of the need for the United States to improve its civil rights record at home and the quality of its interactions with nations in the developing world. In his commencement address at the American University (delivered on June 10, 1963 the day before his Civil Rights Speech), in which he promoted a new approach to the cold war, Kennedy called on Americans to "examine our attitude towards peace and freedom here at home. The quality and spirit of our own society must justify and support our efforts abroad.… Wherever we are, we must all, in our daily lives, live up to the age-old faith that peace and freedom walk together. In too many of our cities today, the peace is not secure because freedom is incomplete."

Noting in paragraph 4 that "we do not ask for whites only" when "Americans are sent to Viet-Nam or West Berlin," Kennedy then argues that Americans "of any color" should be able to attend any public university without needing backup from troops, to register to vote without "interference or fear of reprisal," and to receive "equal service" in public places. In the sixth paragraph, Kennedy couples the theme of equal rights with an allusion to the Golden Rule: "Every American ought to have the right to be treated as he would wish to be treated." A secular person, Kennedy nevertheless included in the address a few spiritual references.

In paragraphs 7 and 8, the president summarizes statistics on the vast economic, educational, and health gaps between blacks and whites and expresses concern about "a rising tide of discontent that threatens the public safety." The perception within the Kennedy administration that deterioration in the Birmingham situation could lead to uncontrollable outbursts by African Americans was, indeed, a major factor in the president's deciding to take to the public airwaves on the spur of the moment.

The president stresses in paragraph 8 that the issue of civil rights is neither a sectional nor a partisan issue. Although the central issue of equal access to public accommodations was primarily a problem in southern states, in keeping with his sense of responsibility as the leader of the entire country, the president asserts that "difficulties over segregation and discrimination" exist in every city and state. His references to the nationwide racial gap and to discontent in cities throughout the country place the issue of southern segregation in its larger national context perhaps to reduce white southerners' feeling that their section was being unfairly targeted. Kennedy's emphasis on nonpartisanship reflected the reality that the strongest opponents of civil rights were white southerners in his own party and evinced his determination to work with Republican leaders in Congress on his civil rights legislative proposal.

Paragraphs 9 11 are among the most important passages in the speech. After stating in paragraph 9 that the country is "confronted primarily with a moral issue," the president calls on all Americans to do the right thing, to put fairness above partisanship, sectionalism, and comfort with the racial status quo. Kennedy makes clear that the basis of his moral appeal is fairness and a concern for others and their rights when he links a religious reference with an allusion to a central secular document of the U.S. polity: "It is as old as the scriptures and is as clear as the American Constitution." As a secular politician, Kennedy personally confronted the issue of anti-Catholic prejudice in his run for the presidency in 1960 when he spoke before Protestant ministers in Houston, Texas, and assured them that he advocated "an America where the separation of church and state is absolute." In this instance, Kennedy used a nondenominational appeal to religious values to reinforce his attempt to inspire the country on a moral issue. Kennedy, like other presidents, had referred to God in his Inaugural Address.

In paragraph 10, Kennedy refers to the obligations of the Golden Rule "The heart of the question is … whether we are going to treat our fellow Americans as we want to be treated" and issues a creative call for white people to imagine how they would feel if they were black. What would you think, he asks, about being denied service at restaurants, access to the best public schools, the right to vote, and "the full and free life which all of us want"? The paragraph closes with an incisive critique of the moderate approach that he himself had earlier followed and which Martin Luther King, Jr., had so sharply criticized two months earlier in his "Letter from Birmingham Jail." The president asks, "Who among us would then be content with the counsels of patience and delay?" Kennedy is asking Americans to look beyond the sometimes disconcerting and disruptive means used by civil rights activists to see the justice of their cause. As the president himself had only recently come to perceive, the time for incremental changes that essentially left the Jim Crow system intact had passed. Those who saw the issue as a struggle between two extremes, violent racists and civil rights activists, were mistaken. Rather, the struggle was between justice and injustice.

To reinforce the notion that the time for ending racial equality had come, Kennedy notes in paragraph 11 that one hundred years had passed "since President Lincoln freed the slaves," yet "their heirs … are not fully free." A few years prior to the anniversary of the Emancipation Proclamation, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People had begun a "Free by '63" campaign. On the occasion of Lincoln's birthday in 1963, the president and the first lady hosted a reception for African American leaders and their spouses and distributed to the guests the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights report Freedom to the Free: Century of Emancipation, 1863 1963. In Paragraph 11, Kennedy also reiterates the opening theme from paragraph 3, the interconnection of one person's freedom with another's, remarking that the nation "will not be fully free until all its citizens are free."

Paragraph 12 focuses on the interconnection between the consequences for the U.S. advocacy of "freedom around the world" and for U.S. foreign policy brought about by the treatment of African Americans as "second-class citizens." As concerned as he was about foreign policy, the president maintains that a bigger problem is that people can "say … to each other that this is the land of the free except for the Negroes." Kennedy emphasizes the heinousness of this situation by alluding to Nazi ideology with the use of the term "master race." For Kennedy, who had fought in World War II, and for all those over the age of thirty-five or so, memories of the struggle against Nazi Germany and the other Axis powers were still vivid.

In paragraphs 13 17, Kennedy emphasizes that crisis conditions are at hand, calling for immediate action. The "cries for equality" are too great to ignore; the president declares in paragraph 14 that with "legal remedies" unavailable, people are taking to the streets in protests that "create tensions and threaten violence and threaten lives." The opponents of civil rights, of course, were the ones who committed the acts of violence. Although civil rights activists' decisions to violate the laws of segregation and to protest in the streets certainly contributed to confrontations, they were committed to nonviolence. Kennedy was worried, however, that spontaneous eruptions of anger among members of the black community could lead to violence. This is the only moment in the speech where the president seems to tilt against the civil rights movement. In the next paragraph he returns to the underlying positive theme of the address, asserting, "We face, therefore, a moral crisis as a country and as a people." He notes that he opposes "repressive police action." While the president says that the situation "cannot be left to increased demonstrations in the streets," he also calls for substantive action, not "token moves or talk," at all levels of society.

In paragraph 16, Kennedy calls on the nation to avoid both sectionalism and attempts to place blame. He characterizes the vast change needed as a "revolution" but notes that it should be "peaceful and constructive for all."

In paragraphs 18 21, Kennedy focuses on the need for civil rights legislation and announces that he will submit a proposal to Congress for equal access to public accommodations, which he characterizes as "an elementary right." He notes that without legislation, the only remedy that African American citizens have for wrongs inflicted on them "is in the street"; "in too many communities, in too many parts of the country," no "remedies at law" could be found. Kennedy maintains that the denial of access is "an arbitrary indignity that no American in 1963 should have to endure, but many do," thus appealing once again to white viewers and listeners to empathize with African Americans and to see that the recognition of equal rights is long overdue.

In paragraph 22 the president reports that he has met with many business leaders and is pleased that they have responded to his call for "voluntary action" to end discrimination in public accommodations. Kennedy comments that despite progress in more than seventy-five cities in the past two weeks, legislation is nevertheless needed because "many are unwilling to act alone."

In paragraphs 23 26, Kennedy outlines additional features of the civil rights legislation that he will propose, including federal government involvement in lawsuits to promote desegregation in schools and "greater protection for the right to vote." He notes that "too many" black students who entered segregated grade schools at the time of the Brown v. Board of Education Supreme Court decision "will enter segregated high schools this fall." Only a small percentage of black students had yet moved from segregated to desegregated schools. The consequence of this delayed desegregation, the president argues, is lost job opportunities.

In paragraph 26, the president again emphasizes the need for action "in the homes of every American in every community," while in paragraphs 27 and 28 he praises the "honor" and "courage" of those working for civil rights. Kennedy asserts that these individuals have acted "out of a sense of human decency" and compares them with "our soldiers and sailors" because "they are meeting freedom's challenge on the firing line." This was high praise, indeed, given the importance Kennedy attached to foreign policy and the stress that he placed on political and moral courage in his book Profiles in Courage.

In paragraph 29, the president highlights the economic gap between blacks and whites throughout the country. Kennedy argues that this is a problem that "faces us all," in "the North as well as the South." Describing in detail the crisis facing the nation, Kennedy again calls on "every citizen" to care and to act.

In paragraphs 30 and 31, Kennedy makes an appeal based on cultural pluralism, national unity, and equality: The United States "has become one country because all of us and all of the people who came here had an equal chance to develop their talents." He reiterates the need to give the "10 percent of the population" constituted by African Americans alternatives to discrimination and to demonstrations as the only means of gaining rights. The issue, he insists, is one of basic fairness and in the interests of all: "I think we owe them and we owe ourselves a better country than that."

In paragraph 32 the president makes an explicit appeal for people's help and reiterates the theme of treating people as one would want to be treated. In this and the following paragraph, the president emphasizes the theme of equality of opportunity and the importance of treating children right "to give a chance for every child to be educated to the limit of his talents." Kennedy uses exclusively male pronouns here and throughout most of the address.

In paragraph 34 Kennedy speaks of the reciprocal obligation to be held by black citizens ("be responsible … uphold the law") and by society ("the law will be fair … the Constitution will be color blind"). In advocating a color-blind Constitution, Kennedy alludes to John Marshall Harlan's use of this terminology in his dissent in the Plessy v. Ferguson separate-but-equal Supreme Court decision of 1896. In the closing paragraph, the president states that basic principles are at stake what the country "stands for" and again asks for the support of "all our citizens."

Audience

President Kennedy's audience for his Civil Rights Speech was the entire population of the United States. The address was carried on television and radio, so the vast majority of the population was in a position to hear the president's words. He asked the three major television networks for airtime for the address, and all readily agreed. As part of their licenses to use the public airwaves, the broadcast companies in the period prior to deregulation were expected to be responsive to such requests.

Although the president was speaking to all "fellow Americans," he was particularly addressing white Americans. For example, he asks people to put themselves in the place of a black person and imagine how they would feel about having their rights denied. Kennedy also says that "we" expect things of the black community but that "they" expect to have equal rights.

Kennedy directed his remarks to people of both parties, of all regions, and of all classes. His remarks included praise for businesspeople responding to his call for voluntary action to desegregate as well as for those working on the front lines of the struggle for racial justice. By appealing to fairness, Kennedy hoped to expand support for his civil rights initiative beyond the ranks of liberals and the left.

In using male language at several points, the president addresses himself primarily to men (as in "one-third as much chance of becoming a professional man," "law alone cannot make men see right," and "if an American, because his skin is dark"). In referring to the effort to secure the admission of two African American students to the University of Alabama, one of whom was female, the president uses gender-neutral language ("clearly qualified young Alabama residents"). In referring to student potential in the close of the address, he shifts between male ("his talents") and gender-neutral language ("their talent").

Impact

Civil rights movement leaders and activists were thrilled by President Kennedy's national address of June 11, 1963. Martin Luther King, Jr., immediately sent Kennedy a message praising the speech. The Kennedy administration had been lending assistance to the civil rights movement and was now staking its own political success on the achievement of fundamental reform in the civil rights arena; the administration acted as a good if imperfect ally of the movement. In fact, when civil rights leaders met with the president on June 22, 1963, the president acknowledged that he did not think that the planned march on Washington, D.C., was a good idea. The difference of opinion was resolved, and Kennedy ended up supporting the march. Although the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee leader John Lewis was pressured into modifying his address, the march of two hundred and fifty thousand people from the Washington Monument to the Lincoln Memorial was a great success and further expanded positive public attention for the movement.

Essential Quotes

"Today we are committed to a worldwide struggle to promote and protect the rights of all who wish to be free. And when Americans are sent to Viet-Nam or West Berlin, we do not ask for whites only. It ought to be possible, therefore, for American students of any color to attend any public institution they select without having to be backed up by troops."

(Paragraph 4)

"It ought to be possible for American consumers of any color to receive equal service in places of public accommodation … without being forced to resort to demonstrations in the street, and it ought to be possible for American citizens of any color to register to vote in a free election without interference or fear of reprisal."

(Paragraph 5)

"It ought to be possible, in short, for every American to enjoy the privileges of being American without regard to his race or his color. In short, every American ought to have the right to be treated as he would wish to be treated, as one would wish his children to be treated. But this is not the case."

(Paragraph 6)

"We are confronted primarily with a moral issue. It is as old as the scriptures and is as clear as the American Constitution."

(Paragraph 9)

"The heart of the question is whether all Americans are to be afforded equal rights and equal opportunities, whether we are going to treat our fellow Americans as we want to be treated. If an American, because his skin is dark, cannot eat lunch in a restaurant open to the public, if he cannot send his children to the best public school available, if he cannot vote for the public officials who will represent him, if, in short, he cannot enjoy the full and free life which all of us want, then who among us would be content to have the color of his skin changed and stand in his place? Who among us would then be content with the counsels of patience and delay?"

The Kennedy administration did experience some immediate negative political repercussions after the address, as southern Congress members withdrew support from other administration proposals. Also, disagreements with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People occurred over the details of the civil rights bill, with the administration seeking a more moderate version than was sought by the civil rights coalition. Kennedy met with Democratic and Republican House leaders on October 23 to craft a compromise that proved stronger than the administration's bill. The House Judiciary Committee approved the civil rights bill on November 20, 1963, but whether the bill would be successfully processed by the House Rules Committee, chaired by the segregationist Howard W. Smith, was uncertain. Kennedy would not have the opportunity to work on that problem because of his assassination. President Lyndon B. Johnson took up the banner, however, and worked effectively to secure the passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. As vice president, Johnson had urged Kennedy to take a moral stance on civil rights. As segregationists left the Democratic Party in the wake of the passage of the Civil Rights Act and the Voting Rights Act of 1965, the party's stance as an ally of the civil rights movement and of African Americans became a permanent fixture of the political landscape.

Questions for Further Study

1. Compare Kennedy's responses to civil rights crises with those of President Dwight D. Eisenhower to the Supreme Court's Brown v. Board of Education decision, to the rise of massive resistance, and to the 1957 Little Rock crisis.

2. In referring to the Supreme Court justice John Marshall Harlan's concept of a color-blind Constitution, was President Kennedy concerned with ending systematic discrimination against African Americans or with eliminating any reference to race in American law and practice, or with both?

3. Kennedy highlighted economic disparities between whites and African Americans in his address. Overcoming economic privation was one of the goals of the March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom of August 28, 1963, and the goal of the Poor People's Campaign, which Martin Luther King, Jr., was leading at the time of his assassination. Examine the extent of economic disparities in society today. To what degree would the universal implementation of affirmation action or a program of reparations contribute to substantially closing racial socioeconomic gaps? Might a modern-day president committed to civil rights take other initiatives to eliminate such gaps?

4. In the 1990s a trend toward the resegregation of public schools began taking place. The 2007 Supreme Court decision in Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District No. 1 against the use of race in assigning students to schools further undermined the promise of the Brown v. Board of Education decision that schools would be equal and integrated. What measures might be taken today to restore the goal of establishing equal educational opportunity championed by Kennedy in his Civil Rights Address to the nation?

Good evening my fellow citizens:

This afternoon, following a series of threats and defiant statements, the presence of Alabama National Guardsmen was required on the University of Alabama to carry out the final and unequivocal order of the United States District Court of the Northern District of Alabama. That order called for the admission of two clearly qualified young Alabama residents who happened to have been born Negro.

That they were admitted peacefully on the campus is due in good measure to the conduct of the students of the University of Alabama, who met their responsibilities in a constructive way.

I hope that every American, regardless of where he lives, will stop and examine his conscience about this and other related incidents. This Nation was founded by men of many nations and backgrounds. It was founded on the principle that all men are created equal, and that the rights of every man are diminished when the rights of one man are threatened.

Today we are committed to a worldwide struggle to promote and protect the rights of all who wish to be free. And when Americans are sent to Viet-Nam or West Berlin, we do not ask for whites only. It ought to be possible, therefore, for American students of any color to attend any public institution they select without having to be backed up by troops.

It ought to be possible for American consumers of any color to receive equal service in places of public accommodation, such as hotels and restaurants and theaters and retail stores, without being forced to resort to demonstrations in the street, and it ought to be possible for American citizens of any color to register to vote in a free election without interference or fear of reprisal.

It ought to be possible, in short, for every American to enjoy the privileges of being American without regard to his race or his color. In short, every American ought to have the right to be treated as he would wish to be treated, as one would wish his children to be treated. But this is not the case.

The Negro baby born in America today, regardless of the section of the Nation in which he is born, has about one-half as much chance of completing a high school as a white baby born in the same place on the same day, one-third as much chance of completing college, one-third as much chance of becoming a professional man, twice as much chance of becoming unemployed, about one-seventh as much chance of earning $10,000 a year, a life expectancy which is 7 years shorter, and the prospects of earning only half as much.

This is not a sectional issue. Difficulties over segregation and discrimination exist in every city, in every State of the Union, producing in many cities a rising tide of discontent that threatens the public safety. Nor is this a partisan issue. In a time of domestic crisis men of good will and generosity should be able to unite regardless of party or politics. This is not even a legal or legislative issue alone. It is better to settle these matters in the courts than on the streets, and new laws are needed at every level, but law alone cannot make men see right.

We are confronted primarily with a moral issue. It is as old as the scriptures and is as clear as the American Constitution.

The heart of the question is whether all Americans are to be afforded equal rights and equal opportunities, whether we are going to treat our fellow Americans as we want to be treated. If an American, because his skin is dark, cannot eat lunch in a restaurant open to the public, if he cannot send his children to the best public school available, if he cannot vote for the public officials who will represent him, if, in short, he cannot enjoy the full and free life which all of us want, then who among us would be content to have the color of his skin changed and stand in his place? Who among us would then be content with the counsels of patience and delay?

One hundred years of delay have passed since President Lincoln freed the slaves, yet their heirs, their grandsons, are not fully free. They are not yet freed from the bonds of injustice. They are not yet freed from social and economic oppression. And this Nation, for all its hopes and all its boasts, will not be fully free until all its citizens are free.

We preach freedom around the world, and we mean it, and we cherish our freedom here at home, but are we to say to the world, and much more importantly, to each other that this is the land of the free except for the Negroes; that we have no second-class citizens except Negroes; that we have no class or caste system, no ghettoes, no master race except with respect to Negroes?

Now the time has come for this Nation to fulfill its promise. The events in Birmingham and elsewhere have so increased the cries for equality that no city or State or legislative body can prudently choose to ignore them.

The fires of frustration and discord are burning in every city, North and South, where legal remedies are not at hand. Redress is sought in the streets, in demonstrations, parades, and protests which create tensions and threaten violence and threaten lives.

We face, therefore, a moral crisis as a country and as a people. It cannot be met by repressive police action. It cannot be left to increased demonstrations in the streets. It cannot be quieted by token moves or talk. It is time to act in the Congress, in your State and local legislative body and, above all, in all of our daily lives.

It is not enough to pin the blame of others, to say this a problem of one section of the country or another, or deplore the fact that we face. A great change is at hand, and our task, our obligation, is to make that revolution, that change, peaceful and constructive for all.

Those who do nothing are inviting shame as well as violence. Those who act boldly are recognizing right as well as reality.

Next week I shall ask the Congress of the United States to act, to make a commitment it has not fully made in this century to the proposition that race has no place in American life or law. The Federal judiciary has upheld that proposition in the conduct of its affairs, including the employment of Federal personnel, the use of Federal facilities, and the sale of federally financed housing.

But there are other necessary measures which only the Congress can provide, and they must be provided at this session. The old code of equity law under which we live commands for every wrong a remedy, but in too many communities, in too many parts of the country, wrongs are inflicted on Negro citizens and there are no remedies at law. Unless the Congress acts, their only remedy is in the street.

I am, therefore, asking the Congress to enact legislation giving all Americans the right to be served in facilities which are open to the public hotels, restaurants, theaters, retail stores, and similar establishments.

This seems to me to be an elementary right. Its denial is an arbitrary indignity that no American in 1963 should have to endure, but many do.

I have recently met with scores of business leaders urging them to take voluntary action to end this discrimination and I have been encouraged by their response, and in the last 2 weeks over 75 cities have seen progress made in desegregating these kinds of facilities. But many are unwilling to act alone, and for this reason, nationwide legislation is needed if we are to move this problem from the streets to the courts.

I am also asking the Congress to authorize the Federal Government to participate more fully in lawsuits designed to end segregation in public education. We have succeeded in persuading many districts to desegregate voluntarily. Dozens have admitted Negroes without violence. Today a Negro is attending a State-supported institution in every one of our 50 States, but the pace is very slow.

Too many Negro children entering segregated grade schools at the time of the Supreme Court's decision 9 years ago will enter segregated high schools this fall, having suffered a loss which can never be restored. The lack of an adequate education denies the Negro a chance to get a decent job.

The orderly implementation of the Supreme Court decision, therefore, cannot be left solely to those who may not have the economic resources to carry the legal action or who may be subject to harassment.

Other features will also be requested, including greater protection for the right to vote. But legislation, I repeat, cannot solve this problem alone. It must be solved in the homes of every American in every community across our country.

In this respect I want to pay tribute to those citizens North and South who have been working in their communities to make life better for all. They are acting not out of a sense of legal duty but out of a sense of human decency.

Like our soldiers and sailors in all parts of the world they are meeting freedom's challenge on the firing line, and I salute them for their honor and their courage.

My fellow Americans, this is a problem which faces us all in every city of the North as well as the South. Today there are Negroes unemployed, two or three times as many compared to whites, inadequate in education, moving into the large cities, unable to find work, young people particularly out of work without hope, denied equal rights, denied the opportunity to eat at a restaurant or lunch counter or go to a movie theater, denied the right to a decent education, denied almost today the right to attend a State university even though qualified. It seems to me that these are matters which concern us all, not merely Presidents or Congressmen or Governors, but every citizen of the United States.

This is one country. It has become one country because all of us and all the people who came here had an equal chance to develop their talents.

We cannot say to 10 percent of the population that you can't have that right; that your children cannot have the chance to develop whatever talents they have; that the only way that they are going to get their rights is to go into the streets and demonstrate. I think we owe them and we owe ourselves a better country than that.

Therefore, I am asking for your help in making it easier for us to move ahead and to provide the kind of equality of treatment which we would want ourselves; to give a chance for every child to be educated to the limit of his talents.

As I have said before, not every child has an equal talent or an equal ability or an equal motivation, but they should have an equal right to develop their talent and their ability and their motivation, to make something of themselves.

We have a right to expect that the Negro community will be responsible, will uphold the law, but they have a right to expect that the law will be fair, that the Constitution will be color blind, as Justice Harlan said at the turn of the century.

This is what we are talking about and this is a matter which concerns this country and what it stands for, and in meeting it I ask the support of all our citizens.

Thank you very much.

1963

"From every mountainside, let freedom ring."

Overview

On August 28, 1963, nearly a quarter of a million people arrived in the District of Columbia for the March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom. They had been summoned by the veteran African American labor leader A. Philip Randolph to urge the federal government to broaden economic opportunities for low-income families and to pressure Congress to pass the Civil Rights Act, which was then being debated. Delegations of civil rights supporters from cities across the United States thus joined together for a massive one-day protest.

The orderly crowd assembled in front of the Lincoln Memorial and listened as representatives of labor, religious, and civil rights organizations delivered short addresses. The day's final speaker was Martin Luther King, Jr., the nation's preeminent civil rights leader. The demonstrations against segregation led by King in Birmingham, Alabama, four months earlier had raised the issue of racial equality to the top of the national agenda. Sensing a changing mood in the country, President John F. Kennedy responded by proposing comprehensive civil rights legislation.

King reminded his listeners that day of African Americans' legitimate grievances and promised that they would not rest until full equality was won. As he neared the end of his speech, King departed from his prepared text to deliver his most memorable words: "I have a dream," he thundered, in the powerful preaching cadence of the black Baptist tradition. Using a series of riveting images, King shared his vision of a country free of racial hatred, in which black and white Americans would live as equals. His oration eclipsed the remarks of all other speakers that day and is among the most quoted American public addresses. The "I Have a Dream" speech has come to epitomize the aspirations of the modern civil rights movement.

Gathering in the nation's capital to petition Congress is a time-honored tradition of American political movements. In 1894 Jacob Coxey led an army of unemployed workers to Washington, demanding that the government create more jobs. Thirty thousand World War I veterans seeking early bonuses for their military service camped outside Washington for forty days in 1932, until routed by army troops. In 1941 A. Philip Randolph, the president of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, threatened to lead one hundred thousand African Americans down Pennsylvania Avenue, forcing President Franklin D. Roosevelt to act against racial discrimination in defense industries.

As civil rights protests gained momentum in the early 1960s, Randolph revived the idea of a march on Washington. Because he was concerned primarily about African American poverty and unemployment, Randolph proposed a two-day demonstration for jobs to be held in October 1963. He maintained that a massive assembly of black citizens was needed to prod a reluctant President Kennedy into action. Randolph's idea initially drew a lukewarm response from other black leaders until Martin Luther King, Jr., lent his support. King had just finished a successful campaign to desegregate stores and lunch counters in Birmingham, Alabama. Nationally televised scenes of police dogs and fire hoses battering youthful demonstrators roused public sympathy behind the crusade for equal rights. King was looking for a way to sustain the energy of his movement and press for needed civil rights legislation. When he announced his intention to participate in the march, rival civil rights leaders felt compelled to join. After Kennedy submitted his civil rights bill to Congress, the event was renamed the "March for Jobs and Freedom," the date was changed to late August, and the emphasis shifted from economic issues to support for the proposed legislation.

At a meeting at the White House in June, Kennedy tried to convince march organizers that a mass protest would actually derail support for his civil rights bill. When Randolph and King declared their determination to go ahead with the demonstration, the president offered the assistance of federal agencies to ensure that the march proceeded smoothly. In the weeks leading up to the event, Randolph's chief aide, Bayard Rustin, worked around the clock to nail down the smallest details. Marchers would arrive by chartered buses and trains on the morning of August 28 and depart that afternoon; they would carry only signs approved by the march committee; no sit-ins or civil disobedience would be staged; thousands of sandwiches would be prepared to feed the hungry throngs; and security would be provided by off-duty New York City police officers and federal personnel.

King began composing his speech four days before the march, asking advisers to prepare drafts for his consideration. When King arrived in Washington on August 27, he still did not have a version that he felt was satisfactory. That evening he retired to his room at the Willard Hotel to work on revisions; at four o'clock the next morning King handed his final handwritten text to aides for typing and distribution to the press.

The day's events began with a program of entertainment on a stage erected near the Washington Monument. Musicians performed, and celebrities were introduced to the well-dressed marchers, but the crowd grew restive. Around eleven o'clock people spontaneously began moving toward the Lincoln Memorial, and the assembled dignitaries had to scramble to catch up with the people they were supposed to be leading. As the huge crowd congregated on either side of the memorial's Reflecting Pool, the speakers took their turns at the podium in the shadow of the Great Emancipator's statue. John Lewis, the young head of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, delivered the day's most militant address, calling for a "great revolution" to "splinter the segregated south into a thousand pieces." Mahalia Jackson roused the crowd when she sang the traditional spiritual "I've Been 'Buked and I've Been Scorned." Then, Randolph introduced "the moral leader of our nation," Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., whose address sounded the climactic final note for the day's celebration.

When King concluded his speech, the throngs quickly dispersed, carrying a message of hope back to their home communities. Leaders of the march, in turn, adjourned to the White House, where they ate a hastily prepared lunch and were congratulated by President Kennedy, who was relieved and delighted that the event had gone off without serious controversy or disorder of any kind.

About the Author

Martin Luther King, Jr., was born and raised in Atlanta, Georgia, where both his father and grandfather pastored the Ebenezer Baptist Church. At the age of fifteen he entered Morehouse College to study sociology. He prepared for the ministry at Crozier Theological Seminary, in Pennsylvania, and then earned a doctorate in philosophy from Boston University. While he was in Boston he met and married Coretta Scott, an aspiring concert singer from Marion, Alabama.

In 1953 King returned to the South to become pastor of the Dexter Avenue Baptist Church in Montgomery, Alabama. When Rosa Parks was arrested in 1955 for refusing to give up her seat to a white passenger, King emerged as the leader of a year-long boycott of city buses. His application of Gandhian nonviolent resistance to fight Jim Crow laws and the successful outcome of the Montgomery protest thrust him into the national spotlight. In 1957 he founded the Southern Christian Leadership Conference to carry his fight for civil rights to other southern communities. Over the next decade King remained at the forefront of the rapidly growing civil rights movement. In 1963 he led a campaign of civil disobedience against segregation in Birmingham, Alabama one of the most violent southern cities. His "Letter from Birmingham Jail," written following his arrest while leading a demonstration, is an eloquent defense of his nonviolent tactics.

King's "I Have a Dream" speech at the March on Washington helped build public support for the landmark Civil Rights Act that was passed by Congress in 1964. In turn, the Voting Rights Act that became law the following year was enacted largely because of his efforts to dramatize the disenfranchisement of African American citizens in Selma, Alabama. In 1966 King turned his attention to the North, where he attacked slum conditions and segregated housing in Chicago. King's growing opposition to the Vietnam War put him in the front ranks of the antiwar movement. At the time of his assassination in 1968, he was preparing to lead the Poor People's Campaign, a multiracial effort to spur government action against poverty.

King received the Nobel Peace Prize in 1964. His birthday is commemorated by a national holiday, and his bust stands in the U.S. Capitol.

After a brief salutation, King reminds his listeners of the symbolic importance of the ground they occupy. By locating their rally in the shadow of the Great Emancipator's memorial, march organizers hoped to call attention to Abraham Lincoln's unfinished agenda; a century after the end of slavery, African Americans still were not free. King's use of the archaic "fivescore years ago" is an obvious echo of Lincoln's Gettysburg Address. He briefly mentions the triple problems of segregation, discrimination, and poverty that mark the unequal status of black Americans. King emphasizes the long gap between the Emancipation Proclamation's promise of equality and the lingering reality of pervasive racism by repeating "one hundred years" four times.

Using the words of the Declaration of Independence, King advises his listeners that African Americans are seeking only the rights guaranteed to all citizens. He accuses the United States of bad faith in delivering its pledge of freedom. The Constitution, then, can be viewed as a "promissory note" that has not yet been redeemed for people of color. King employs the metaphor of a bad check to describe the unrealized assurance of full citizenship. In the only trace of humor in this otherwise solemn declamation, he claims that the government's check has bounced owing to "insufficient funds." King does not dwell on past injustices, however. Rather, he concludes this passage on a hopeful note, stating his belief that the United States will soon honor its commitment to its black citizens.

King proceeds to assert that America cannot afford to wait any longer; its black citizens are demanding change now. Many critics were accusing the civil rights movement of impatience, of pressing too hard for reform, but King rejects this argument. He underscores the urgency of African American demands for equal rights by reiterating "now is the time" four times. The United States cannot afford to continue "business as usual," as the stakes are too great. He threatens that "there will be neither rest nor tranquility" until these demands are granted.

Lest he be accused of fomenting violence, King abruptly changes gears and admonishes his fellow African Americans to refrain from bitterness and a desire for revenge. They must conduct themselves with dignity and self-restraint; nonviolence must continue to be the hallmark of their movement. He acknowledges the presence of white supporters, estimated to be about 10 percent of the march's participants. White allies are essential for the movement's success, he insists, because "we cannot walk alone."

King then resumes a more militant tone, listing some of the top priorities of the civil rights movement: an end to police brutality, access to public accommodations, the elimination of housing segregation, the removal of Jim Crow signs, voting rights, and meaningful participation in political affairs. He repeats "we cannot be satisfied" or "we can never be satisfied" seven times as he enumerates black grievances. King then enlists biblical support for his position, ending this litany by paraphrasing the Old Testament prophet Amos in saying that blacks will not be satisfied until "justice rolls down like waters and righteousness like a mighty stream."

This section illustrates King's favorite literary device, anaphora a frequently repeated word or phrase. Drew Hansen, in his text The Dream: Martin Luther King, Jr., and the Speech That Inspired a Nation, observes that by using anaphora, "King could create a series of parallel images, which allowed him to suggest connections between seemingly unrelated topics."

King next turns his attention to those battle-scarred veterans of the civil rights movement in the audience; those who have suffered beatings and imprisonment for the sake of freedom. He salutes their sacrifices and courage. Some of them have questioned the effectiveness of Gandhian civil disobedience, but King encourages them to keep faith in nonviolence. They should return to the South to continue their work with confidence that victory is in sight.

If King had concluded at this point, as he had planned, his address probably would have been little remembered. As Hansen remarks, "There was nothing particularly unusual about the substance of the first ten minutes of King's speech." Many other politicians and activists had covered the same ground. Here, however, King departs from his prepared text to deliver an extemporaneous oration describing his vision for the future of America. David Garrow quotes King's recollection of this moment: "I started out reading the speech … and all of a sudden this thing came to me that I have used I'd used it many times before, that thing about 'I have a dream' and I just felt I wanted to use it here." This is a set piece he had used several times previously most recently in Birmingham in April and in Detroit in June but never more effectively than on this day. Indeed, the speech metamorphoses into a sermon at this point, with King switching to his role as preacher and with the massive audience as his spirited congregation. Using the distinctive call-and-response style perfected by his Baptist forbears, he enlists the crowd as a chorus to affirm and endorse his prophecy. Every time King reveals a new facet of his dream, the crowd replies with affirmation, clamoring for more. Each response sends King to a higher level of emotional intensity.

In the first glimpse of his dream, King refers again to the Declaration of Independence, asserting his belief that one day Americans truly will honor the words "all men are created equal." King then presents a series of vivid images describing what this new reality will look like. In outlining his vision, he utilizes a series of paired contrasting ideas: slavery and brotherhood; oppression and freedom; segregation and integration; despair and hope; and "jangling discord" and "a beautiful symphony." He foresees a society where the barriers of segregation dividing the races no longer will be enforced where blacks and whites will be able to sit down and eat together. Jim Crow laws and southern custom widely prohibited the sharing of meals by black and white people at the same table because this sharing would symbolize equal status and inclusion. King thus anticipates the day when blacks and whites in his native Georgia will be able to break bread together.

King's dream also extends to the state of Mississippi, home to some of the most violent defenders of white supremacy. King does not need to remind the assembled marchers of past injustices committed in the Magnolia State; they well know the names of African Americans lynched for alleged transgressions of the Jim Crow code, including fourteen-year-old Emmett Till, who was abducted from his uncle's home and then beaten and drowned, and Medgar Evers, the martyred leader of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, who was shot in the back with a high-powered rifle just ten weeks earlier. Despite this sorry record, King asserts that Mississippi will become "an oasis of freedom and justice."

King next makes the dream very personal by including his four young children. He maintains that one day, instead of being considered inferior beings and denied opportunities to develop their full human potential because of the color of their skin, they will be judged by "the content of their character."

Alabama would also be transformed in this renewed nation. King knew very well how difficult it was to bring change to this state, having led the Montgomery bus boycott and, more recently, having defeated hard-core segregationists in the streets of Birmingham. Without mentioning him by name, King attacks the state's governor, George C. Wallace, who made national headlines earlier that summer with his futile defiance of the federal government while trying to prevent black students from enrolling at the University of Alabama. King offers a vision of a time when "little black boys and black girls" will not be isolated from their white peers. Not only will they see each other as equals, but they will also join hands "as sisters and brothers." The physical intimacy King suggests by this simple act was no doubt offensive to rabid racists but presented a powerful image of innocent fraternity to those in his audience.

King turns back to the Old Testament for the next facet of his vision. Quoting the book of Isaiah, he recalls the prophet's description of the kingdom of God. It is a place where earthly imperfections will disappear; where the mighty will be humbled and the lowly will be exalted; and where "the glory of the Lord shall be revealed" for all to see. King embraces the prophetic role, testifying that the quest for civil rights is part of God's divine plan for America and equating the coming victory over segregation with the arrival of the millennium.

At this point King briefly returns to his prepared text for a few sentences affirming his faith in this vision. This faith gives him strength to resume the struggle for freedom in the South with hope for victory despite entrenched opposition; it gives him confidence that America can overcome its bitter divisions and emerge "into a beautiful symphony of brotherhood." Then, improvising again, he claims that the knowledge that "we will be free one day" is enough to sustain him and other civil rights activists through the difficult battles that undoubtedly lie ahead.

King continues spontaneously, describing a coming era when "all of God's children" will win their freedom. On that day, African Americans will be able to sing the patriotic hymn "America the Beautiful," confident at last that the verses apply to them. Here, King paraphrases a well-known address delivered by the Chicago minister Archibald Carey at the 1952 Republican National Convention. He seizes on the refrain "from every mountainside, let freedom ring," once again using anaphora to launch a series of references to specific geographic regions of the United States. The first five are mountain ranges outside of the South in New Hampshire, New York, Pennsylvania, Colorado, and California. The final three, then, are more poignant because they locate the need for freedom in the Deep South: King speaks of Georgia's Stone Mountain, Lookout Mountain in Tennessee, and even "every hill and molehill of Mississippi," a state without notable mountain ranges.

At this point the crowd in front of the Lincoln Memorial was cheering wildly. King's rhetoric had brought them to the emotional peak of his oration. He summons a vision of the day when freedom will ring "from every village and every hamlet" and when this message will be embraced by "all of God's children." He offers a closing image of blacks and whites, Jews and Gentiles, Protestants and Catholics all joining hands in brotherhood. Finally as he spoke, he raised his arm in a blessing King invokes an African American spiritual for his benediction: "Free at last, free at last, thank God Almighty, we are free at last."

The final seven minutes were what made King's speech a triumph of American oratory. These are the words that schoolchildren memorize, because King "added something completely fresh to the way that Americans thought about race and civil rights. He gave the nation a vision of what it could look like if all things were made new."

Audience

The immediate audience for King's speech was the approximately two hundred and fifty thousand people gathered on August 28, 1963, in front of the Lincoln Memorial and around the nearby Reflecting Pool. Additional millions listened on the radio and watched on television. King's words were aimed at all Americans. For black listeners they carried a message of hope with the promise that the goals of freedom and equality were within reach. For whites, King articulated the aspirations of African Americans, placing them squarely in the context of the American dream. Each year, on the national holiday commemorating his life, King's message is passed on to new generations.

Impact

King's words were broadcast live by the three major television networks into homes across the United States. Millions of people for whom King had been only a name in the news were thus able to witness the power of his oratory firsthand. One of the many who were impressed was President Kennedy, who remarked while viewing coverage of the march in the White House, "That guy is really good." Despite his privately expressed admiration, however, the chief executive was unwilling to praise King in public for fear of drawing the ire of die-hard segregationists.

Public reaction to the speech was largely favorable. The next day's edition of the New York Times was generous in its praise, with a front-page headline reading, "Peroration by Dr. King Sums Up a Day the Capital Will Remember." The Motown Company released an unauthorized recording of King's speech that sold briskly in African American record stores. A few black militants, however, chided march organizers for not taking a more critical stance toward the Kennedy administration. One of these naysayers was Malcolm X, who acidly lampooned the day's events as "the Farce in Washington."

King's powerful message undoubtedly helped build support for Kennedy's pending civil rights legislation. According to Drew Hansen, "by delivering a message of hope, and not something that was likely to be labeled as angry or extremist, King's speech could only help the civil rights bill." Nonetheless, while the success of the march boosted the morale of civil rights backers, it probably did not influence any congressional votes. The historian Lerone Bennett has pointed to the lack of concrete accomplishments flowing from the march. In his Confrontation: Black and White, he states, "It led nowhere and was not intended to lead anywhere. It was not planned as an event with a coherent plan of action. As a result, the march was a stimulating but detached and isolated episode." It would take ten months of bitter partisan wrangling and skillful political maneuvering by President Lyndon B. Johnson to secure the passage of the Civil Rights Act in July 1964.

Essential Quotes

"Now is the time to make real the promises of democracy. Now is the time to rise from the dark and desolate valley of segregation to the sunlit path of racial justice. Now is the time to lift our nation from the quicksands of racial injustice to the solid rock of brotherhood. Now is the time to make justice a reality for all of God's children."

(Paragraph 6)

"No, we are not satisfied and we will not be satisfied until 'justice rolls down like waters and righteousness like a mighty stream.'"

"I have a dream that my four little children will one day live in a nation where they will not be judged by the color of their skin but by the content of their character."

(Paragraph 16)

"I have a dream that one day down in Alabama … little black boys and black girls will be able to join hands with little white boys and white girls as sisters and brothers."

(Paragraph 17)

"Let freedom ring from Stone Mountain of Georgia. Let freedom ring from Lookout Mountain of Tennessee. Let freedom ring from every hill and molehill of Mississippi. From every mountainside, let freedom ring."

(Paragraphs 26–29)

"When we allow freedom [to] ring … we will be able to speed up that day when all of God's children, black men and white men, Jews and Gentiles, Protestants and Catholics, will be able to join hands and sing in the words of the old Negro spiritual, 'Free at last! Free at last! Thank God Almighty, we are free at last!'"

King's heightened public profile following the March on Washington inflamed the Federal Bureau of Investigation director J. Edgar Hoover's animus toward the civil rights leader. Where others saw eloquence, Hoover perceived demagoguery. Richard Gid Powers speaks of the "campaign to utterly discredit King, to destroy him personally and as a public figure" that was touched off by the "I Have a Dream" speech. The bureau had been monitoring King's activities for several years, but "after the March the bureau shifted from a hostile but relatively passive surveillance of King to an aggressive at times violently aggressive campaign to destroy him." The bureau's wiretaps, bugging of hotel rooms, and leaks to the press would continue until King's 1968 assassination in Memphis.

Although King's speech was widely hailed in the days following the march, by the time of his death, in Hansen's words, it "had nearly vanished from public view." In his cogent historical analysis of the speech, Hansen maintains that between 1963 and 1968 "few people spent substantial time talking or thinking about what King had said at the march." One reason for this was the increasingly militant stance taken by the black liberation movement. The Watts riot of 1965 in Los Angeles, in reaction to police brutality and widespread discrimination, and the periods of urban revolt that followed made the interracial harmony prophesied by King seem increasingly unattainable. Whites were offended in 1966 when the young radical Stokely Carmichael proclaimed that "Black Power" should replace "Freedom Now" as the motto of the movement. King himself also became more radical in his views. Faced with the intractable problems of poverty and the Vietnam War in addition to pervasive racism, he also grew increasingly pessimistic. In speeches after 1965 King began saying that his dream had turned into a nightmare. By the time of his death in 1968, the upbeat spirit of the "I Have a Dream" speech seemed hopelessly out of date. Only after King's murder was his speech elevated to the exalted position it now occupies.

According to Hansen, politicians focused on the "I Have a Dream" speech because it helped them "forget King's post-1965 career." Although the speech twice mentions racial problems in the North, its major emphasis is on the Jim Crow discrimination of the South. By the time a nation-

1. On April 3, 1968, the day before he was assassinated, Martin Luther King, Jr., delivered a speech in support of striking Memphis sanitation workers. Known as his "I See the Promised Land" speech, or "the Mountaintop" speech, it is second only to the "I Have a Dream" speech in popularity among King's speeches. Compare the two addresses. How do they differ in tone? How do they differ in content?

2. There is no substitute for watching a film of King's "I Have a Dream" speech. View the speech and closely observe the interaction between King and his audience. At what points of the speech do his listeners react most enthusiastically? How does the audience's response affect King's delivery? In what ways does the impact of the film version differ from the effect of the written document?

3. John Lewis also delivered an important address at the March on Washington. Both King and Lewis were working in the southern civil rights movement, and both came from strong religious backgrounds, yet their speeches are quite different. After reading Lewis's words, compare the two documents. How do they differ? What are the points of agreement? Why is King's speech remembered today while Lewis's is largely forgotten?

4. In 1895 the African American educator Booker T. Washington delivered a memorable speech—the Atlanta Exposition Address—at the Cotton States and International Exposition in Atlanta. Following his address, Washington was hailed—as King would be—as the unquestioned leader of his people. The thrust of Washington's words, however, is almost totally contradictory to that of King's. Compare the two speeches and identify the different historical circumstances that shaped them.

5. In 1852 the black abolitionist Frederick Douglass spoke at a rally commemorating the Declaration of Independence. His "What to the Slave Is the Fourth of July?" explored several of the same themes covered by Martin Luther King, Jr.'s "I Have a Dream" speech. Compare these two documents and discuss the historical circumstances that produced them.

al holiday in King's name was declared in 1983, corresponding with his mid-January birthday, "whites only" signs had disappeared, and discriminatory voting laws were safely in the past. The recycling of King's speech thus allowed the nation to celebrate the elimination of legally sanctioned segregation while ignoring the widespread racial inequality that remained unaffected by civil rights legislation. In an ironic twist, conservative commentators began to quote King's admonition to judge people not by the color of their skin but by "the content of their character" in arguing against affirmative action, a program King himself endorsed.

I am happy to join with you today in what will go down in history as the greatest demonstration for freedom in the history of our nation.

Fivescore years ago, a great American, in whose symbolic shadow we stand today, signed the Emancipation Proclamation. This momentous decree came as a great beacon light of hope to millions of Negro slaves who had been seared in the flames of withering injustice. It came as a joyous daybreak to end the long night of their captivity.

But one hundred years later, the Negro still is not free. One hundred years later, the life of the Negro is still sadly crippled by the manacles of segregation and the chains of discrimination. One hundred years later, the Negro lives on a lonely island of poverty in the midst of a vast ocean of material prosperity. One hundred years later the Negro is still languished in the corners of American society and finds himself an exile in his own land. And so we've come here today to dramatize a shameful condition.

In a sense we've come to our nation's capital to cash a check. When the architects of our republic wrote the magnificent words of the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence, they were signing a promissory note to which every American was to fall heir. This note was a promise that all men, yes, black men as well as white men, would be guaranteed the "unalienable Rights of Life, Liberty, and the pursuit of Happiness." It is obvious today that America has defaulted on this promissory note insofar as her citizens of color are concerned. Instead of honoring this sacred obligation, America has given the Negro people a bad check, a check which has come back marked "insufficient funds."

But we refuse to believe that the bank of justice is bankrupt. We refuse to believe that there are insufficient funds in the great vaults of opportunity of this nation. And so we've come to cash this check, a check that will give us upon demand the riches of freedom and the security of justice.

We have also come to this hallowed spot to remind America of the fierce urgency of now. This is no time to engage in the luxury of cooling off or to take the tranquilizing drug of gradualism. Now is the time to make real the promises of democracy. Now is the time to rise from the dark and desolate valley of segregation to the sunlit path of racial justice. Now is the time to lift our nation from the quicksands of racial injustice to the solid rock of brotherhood. Now is the time to make justice a reality for all of God's children.

It would be fatal for the nation to overlook the urgency of the moment. This sweltering summer of the Negro's legitimate discontent will not pass until there is an invigorating autumn of freedom and equality. Nineteen sixty-three is not an end, but a beginning. And those who hope that the Negro needed to blow off steam and will now be content will have a rude awakening if the nation returns to business as usual. There will be neither rest nor tranquility in America until the Negro is granted his citizenship rights. The whirlwinds of revolt will continue to shake the foundations of our nation until the bright day of justice emerges.

But there is something that I must say to my people, who stand on the warm threshold which leads into the palace of justice: In the process of gaining our rightful place, we must not be guilty of wrongful deeds. Let us not seek to satisfy our thirst for freedom by drinking from the cup of bitterness and hatred. We must forever conduct our struggle on the high plane of dignity and discipline. We must not allow our creative protest to degenerate into physical violence. Again and again, we must rise to the majestic heights of meeting physical force with soul force. The marvelous new militancy which has engulfed the Negro community must not lead us to a distrust of all white people, for many of our white brothers, as evidenced by their presence here today, have come to realize that their destiny is tied up with our destiny. And they have come to realize that their freedom is inextricably bound to our freedom. We cannot walk alone.

And as we walk, we must make the pledge that we shall always march ahead. We cannot turn back. There are those who are asking the devotees of civil rights, "When will you be satisfied?"

We can never be satisfied as long as the Negro is the victim of the unspeakable horrors of police brutality. We can never be satisfied as long as our bodies, heavy with the fatigue of travel, cannot gain lodging in the motels of the highways and the hotels of the cities. We cannot be satisfied as long as the Negro's basic mobility is from a smaller ghetto to a larger one.

We can never be satisfied as long as our children are stripped of their selfhood and robbed of their dignity by signs stating "for whites only." We cannot be satisfied as long as a Negro in Mississippi cannot vote and a Negro in New York believes he has nothing for which to vote. No, no, we are not satisfied and we will not be satisfied until "justice rolls down like waters and righteousness like a mighty stream."

I am not unmindful that some of you have come here out of great trials and tribulations. Some of you have come fresh from narrow jail cells. Some of you have come from areas where your quest for freedom left you battered by the storms of persecution and staggered by the winds of police brutality. You have been the veterans of creative suffering. Continue to work with the faith that unearned suffering is redemptive. Go back to Mississippi, go back to Alabama, go back to South Carolina, go back to Georgia, go back to Louisiana, go back to the slums and ghettos of our northern cities, knowing that somehow this situation can and will be changed. Let us not wallow in the valley of despair.

I say to you today, my friends, so even though we face the difficulties of today and tomorrow, I still have a dream. It is a dream deeply rooted in the American dream.

I have a dream that one day this nation will rise up and live out the true meaning of its creed: "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal."

I have a dream that one day on the red hills of Georgia, the sons of former slaves and the sons of former slave owners will be able to sit down together at the table of brotherhood.

I have a dream that one day even the state of Mississippi, a state sweltering with the heat of injustice, sweltering with the heat of oppression, will be transformed into an oasis of freedom and justice.

I have a dream that my four little children will one day live in a nation where they will not be judged by the color of their skin but by the content of their character. I have a dream today.

I have a dream that one day down in Alabama, with its vicious racists, with its governor having his lips dripping with the words of "interposition" and "nullification," one day right there in Alabama little black boys and black girls will be able to join hands with little white boys and white girls as sisters and brothers. I have a dream today.

I have a dream that one day "every valley shall be exalted, and every hill and mountain shall be made low; the rough places will be made plain, and the crooked places will be made straight; and the glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together."

This is our hope. This is the faith that I go back to the South with. With this faith we will be able to hew out of the mountain of despair a stone of hope. With this faith we will be able to transform the jangling discords of our nation into a beautiful symphony of brotherhood. With this faith we will be able to work together, to pray together, to struggle together, to go to jail together, to stand up for freedom together, knowing that we will be free one day. This will be the day, this will be the day when all of God's children will be able to sing with new meaning:

My Country, 'tis of thee, sweet land of liberty, of thee I Sing.
Land where my fathers died, land of the pilgrim's pride
From every mountainside, let freedom ring!

And if America is to be a great nation, this must become true.

And so let freedom ring from the prodigious hilltops of New Hampshire.

Let freedom ring from the mighty mountains of New York.

Let freedom ring from the heightening Alleghenies of Pennsylvania.

Let freedom ring from the curvaceous slopes of California.

But not only that: Let freedom ring from Stone Mountain of Georgia.

And when this happens, when we allow freedom to ring, when we let it ring from every village and every hamlet, from every state and every city; we will be able to speed up that day when all of God's children, black men and white men, Jews and Gentiles, Protestants and Catholics, will be able to join hands and sing in the words of the old Negro spiritual:

Free at last! Free at last!

Thank God Almighty, we are free at last!

An Act

To enforce the constitutional right to vote, to confer jurisdiction upon the district courts of the United States to provide injunctive relief against discrimination in public accommodations, to authorize the Attorney General to institute suits to protect constitutional rights in public facilities and public education, to extend the Commission on Civil Rights, to prevent discrimination in federally assisted programs, to establish a Commission on Equal Employment Opportunity, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Civil Rights Act of 1964".

TITLE I—VOTING RIGHTS

SEC. 101. Section 2004 of the Revised Statutes (42 U.S.C. 1971), as amended by section 131 of the Civil Rights Act of 1957 (71 Stat. 637), and as further amended by section 601 of the Civil Rights Act of 1960 (74 Stat. 90), is further amended as follows:

(a) Insert "1" after "(a)" in subsection (a) and add at the end of subsection (a) the following new paragraphs:

"(2) No person acting under color of law shall—

"(A) in determining whether any individual is qualified under State law or laws to vote in any Federal election, apply any standard, practice, or procedure different from the standards, practices, or procedures applied under such law or laws to other individuals within the same county, parish, or similar political subdivision who have been found by State officials to be qualified to vote;

"(B) deny the right of any individual to vote in any Federal election because of an error or omission on any record or paper relating to any application, registration, or other act requisite to voting, if such error or omission is not material in determining whether such individual is qualified under State law to vote in such election; or

"(C) employ any literacy test as a qualification for voting in any Federal election unless (i) such test is administered to each individual and is conducted wholly in writing, and (ii) a certified copy of the test and of the answers given by the individual is furnished to him within twenty-five days of the submission of his request made within the period of time during which records and papers are required to be retained and preserved pursuant to title III of the Civil Rights Act of 1960 (42 U.S.C. 1974–74e; 74 Stat. 88): Provided, however, That the Attorney General may enter into agreements with appropriate State or local authorities that preparation, conduct, and maintenance of such tests in accordance with the provisions of applicable State or local law, including such special provisions as are necessary in the prepara-

"All persons shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment ... of any place of public accommodation ... without discrimination or segregation on the ground of race."

Overview

Enacted on July 2, 1964 in the year after President John F. Kennedy's assassination; the bloody campaign to integrate Birmingham, Alabama; and the first March on Washington, which featured Martin Luther King, Jr.'s "I Have a Dream" Speech the Civil Rights Act of 1964 was the most important piece of civil rights legislation passed since the Reconstruction era. It outlawed discrimination on a number of bases, including race, color, religion, national origin, and, with respect to employment, sex. Also of importance was the breadth of areas in which discrimination was outlawed, as the act prohibited discrimination in places of public accommodations, public facilities, federally assisted programs, employment, and voting. It also pushed for the full desegregation of schools and expanded the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, which had been created by the Civil Rights Act of 1957. Last, the 1964 act created institutions for monitoring and facilitating the advancement of civil rights, such as the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, to enforce Title VII of the act, and the Community Relations Service, to assist "communities and persons therein in resolving disputes, disagreements, or difficulties relating to discriminatory practices based on race, color, or national origin."

In requiring equality, the Civil Rights Act of 1964 arguably provided many of the freedoms that African Americans should have already enjoyed as a result of the Fourteenth Amendment, extending that amendment close to its logical limit. However, the act went further than Fourteenth Amendment doctrine allowed in regulating purely private conduct in some instances. The regulation of private conduct required that the act be based on Congress's commerce clause power in addition to whatever authority Congress had under its Fourteenth Amendment enforcement power. The act's continual mention of interstate commerce is a nod to that requirement. In truth, without the regulation of private conduct, the act would not be nearly as important as it was and continues to be. Simply put, it remains the broadest, most effective, and most important civil rights bill passed since Reconstruction.

The 1964 act and the debate around it signaled a changing of the guard: Discrimination was officially repudiated, and equality was required in more places than previously imagined. The filibuster of the act by southern senators arguably represented the last-ditch efforts of desperate men who wished to hew to a bygone era. Those who wished to protect and perpetuate the old order were duly told to stand aside, as the United States entered a new era in which all of its citizens were to be treated as equal under the law and as full members of the polity.

Context

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 was passed in the middle of the turmoil and upheaval in American society of the 1950s and 1960s. Seminal events such as the Montgomery bus boycott, the Supreme Court case Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, the integration of Little Rock Central High School, and the March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom had already occurred. Many other events including the attacks in Selma, Alabama; the passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965; the assassinations of Martin Luther King, Jr., and Malcolm X; and the riots in major American cities were yet on the horizon.

The events that immediately precipitated the 1964 act's introduction in Congress and its eventual passage are fairly clear. President Kennedy originally sent the bill that would become the act to Congress on June 19, 1963, as a reaction to the violence that accompanied the civil rights movement's attempt to integrate Birmingham. The bill had not moved far at the time of President Kennedy's assassination in November 1963. In the immediate aftermath of Kennedy's death, President Lyndon B. Johnson called on Congress to pass the law as a fitting tribute to his predecessor. During the legislative debate on the bill, President Johnson used many of the favors he was owed from his longtime service in Congress to move the bill forward. In addition to Johnson's favors, the supporters of the civil rights legislation used many parliamentary maneuvers, voting power, and sheer will to shepherd the bill through Congress. The need for resolve intensified when the bill was significantly strengthened in the House Judiciary Committee after prodding by civil rights groups. Following passage in the House of Representatives, the bill was sent to the

About the Author

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 was shaped by a host of people. The original bill was crafted and drafted in the Department of Justice, headed by Attorney General Robert Kennedy. The drafting group almost certainly included Robert Kennedy and his assistant attorneys general, Burke Marshall and Nicholas Katzenbach, as well as the Justice Department lawyer Harold Greene (who later became a judge). As the bill moved through the committee process in the House of Representatives, it was significantly redrafted and strengthened by members and staff of the House Judiciary Committee, including the Democratic representative Emanuel Celler of New York and the Republican representative William McCulloch of Ohio and their aides. Many amendments were added from the floor of the House, with one of the most momentous being offered by the Democratic representative Howard W. Smith of Virginia, chairman of the House Rules Committee. Smith added the provision including sex discrimination to Title VII of the act as a prohibited mode of discrimination, apparently in an effort to derail the bill. The amendment passed, and the bill ultimately passed the House. On the Senate side, a number of amendments were offered and passed, but the bill was not overwhelmingly altered in substance; Everett Dirksen, a Republican senator from Illinois, was the Senate's most active amender of the bill.

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 begins with a simple recitation of its purpose, indicating the range of substantive areas it touches, the federal commissions it creates, and the methods of enforcement it provides. Title I (Voting Rights) is an amendment of the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960. It applies to federal elections, requiring that all voters be held to the same qualification standards and prohibiting discrimination on the basis of race, color, religion, or national origin. However, this title does not outlaw some of the methods that were being used to discriminate against African Americans, including literacy tests. Regarding such tests, Title I instead attempts to ensure that they are applied as equally as possible. For example, it requires that literacy tests be administered in writing and allows the attorney general to negotiate with state and local authorities regarding their use. This title also allows the attorney general to request that a three-judge panel hear allegations of voting rights violations arising under its statutes. Appeals from the three-judge panel would be directed to the Supreme Court.

Title I was largely superseded by the Voting Rights Act of 1965, which generally prohibited methods of discriminating against minorities, including literacy tests, and strengthened the right to vote in general. The Voting Rights Act was passed pursuant to the Fifteenth Amendment rather than to the Fourteenth Amendment.

Title II (Injunctive Relief against Discrimination in Places of Public Accommodation) prohibits discrimination on the basis of race, color, religion, or national origin in the provision of goods, services, facilities, privileges, advantages, and accommodations at any place of public accommodations. Title II also prohibits attempts to prevent any persons from attempting to enjoy their rights under its terms. Places of public accommodations are held to include lodging places of all kinds other than owner-occupied establishments with five or fewer rooms for rent or hire. Also included under the title's terms are restaurants, theaters, sports arenas, and all establishments located inside of such places if they serve the customers of those places. The title does not cover private clubs and other places not open to the public.

Title II was one of the act's most controversial titles because it struck at the heart of what some thought were the legitimate prerogatives of business owners. By elevating the right of minority patrons to receive equal treatment above the right of business owners to refuse service to anyone, the title became a public expression of the nation's new equality and made sit-ins at lunch counters unnecessary.

Rights granted under Title II could be vindicated in a number of different ways. If rights were violated or about to be violated, aggrieved individuals would be permitted to directly sue for injunctive relief, and under certain circumstances the attorney general could intervene in support of the plaintiff. However, if the activity held to be a violation were to occur in a state or locality that allowed local officials to "grant or seek relief from such practice or to institute criminal proceedings with respect thereto," those local officials had to be given the opportunity to address the issue before an action for federal injunctive relief could be brought. If the violation were to occur in a state or locality that did not authorize local officials to redress the activity, the aggrieved person could sue, although the court might refer the matter to the Community Relations Service, established in Title X of the act, to see whether voluntary compliance might be possible.

Title II tracks the public accommodations provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1875, which were deemed unconstitutional in the Civil Rights Cases (1883), although the 1964 act's provisions are somewhat narrower. In the 1964 act, Congress limited actionable discrimination to discrimination that involves state action or establishments whose operations affect commerce. In doing so, Congress guaranteed that the title was clearly within either Congress's Fourteenth Amendment enforcement power or its commerce clause power. Nonetheless, two challenges to Title II arose immediately after the 1964 act was passed, with both Heart of Atlanta Motel v. United States and Katzenbach v. McClung challenging the constitutionality of Title II that same year. In both cases, the Supreme Court determined that Title II was an acceptable exercise of Congress's commerce clause power. Once those cases were settled, the constitutionality of the 1964 act was not in doubt, and the task of fully integrating the country could begin.

Title III (Desegregation of Public Facilities) authorizes the attorney general to file suit on behalf of the United States against a state or locality under certain circumstances when the attorney general has received a complaint from an individual indicating that he or she is being denied equal protection rights because he or she is being denied equal use of a public facility. If the individual is unable to litigate the case fully or properly and if suit by the United States "will materially further the orderly progress of desegregation in public facilities," the attorney general may intervene. This title simply puts the resources of the federal government behind those who attempt to integrate public facilities that should have already been desegregated.

Title IV (Desegregation of Public Education) provides technical and financial assistance to school districts that experience problems with desegregation. It also provides help to those persons whose children are being denied the equal protection of the law by a school board or public college because of race, color, religion, or national origin and who are unable to fully and adequately prosecute the litigation. However, the title makes clear that it is not to apply to cases in which busing is sought to resolve issues of racial imbalance in schools. As with Title III, the resources of the federal government were being made available so that established constitutional requirements, in this case the desegregation of schools, could be met.

Title V (Commission on Civil Rights) renews and retools the mandate of the Commission on Civil Rights, which was created by the Civil Rights Act of 1957. The commission is authorized to investigate allegations related to voting rights and voting fraud allegations. In addition, it is tasked with studying and collecting information and appraising the laws and policies of the federal government regarding denials of equal protection based on race, color, religion, or national origin in the administration of justice. Last, the commission is to "serve as a national clearinghouse for information in respect to denials of equal protection of the laws because of race, color, religion or national origin, including but not limited to the fields of voting, education, housing, employment, the use of public facilities, and transportation, or in the administration of justice." However, the commission is restricted from investigating the membership practices of fraternal organizations, fraternities, sororities, private clubs, and religious organizations.

Title V's passage was not without problems, as debate occurred regarding whether merely to extend the life of the Commission on Civil Rights or to make it permanent. The 1964 act simply extended the life of the commission, but it has continued to exist through various extensions and reauthorizations.

Title VI (Nondiscrimination in Federally Assisted Programs) focuses on guaranteeing that federal tax money does not go to programs that discriminate on the basis of race, color, or national origin. It directs federal agencies and departments to issue rules and regulations consistent with the principles underlying Title VI and the act as a whole. Title VI was largely intended to discontinue the funds that were being provided to segregated schools in the South. However, the title clearly applies to all sorts of programs that receive federal funding, including hospitals, building projects, and road construction. Indeed, regulations stemming from Title VI may have been the biggest benefit to minority contractors in the country's history.

Title VII (Equal Employment Opportunity) is by far the longest title of the 1964 Civil Rights Act and possibly the act's most controversial. As originally submitted by the Kennedy administration, Title VII merely allowed the president to establish a commission on equal employment opportunity to regulate companies with government contracts. As finally enacted, the title dealt with guaranteeing equality in employment, an area that was historically thought to have been controlled by the prerogative of the employer. The limitation on how employment decisions could be made was arguably second only to the requirement that public accommodations be equal in its effect on the psyche of those whose actions were regulated by the act. The title restricts not only how employers can fill jobs but also how employment agencies can refer people for employment and how labor organizations can include and exclude people from membership. Simply put, under the terms of the act, none of these entities could discriminate against people and employees based on their race, color, religion, sex, or national origin. In addition, none of the entities would be permitted to retaliate against those who formally or informally opposed employment practices made unlawful by Title VII.

The most momentous aspect of Title VII was its inclusion of sex discrimination as a prohibited ground for discrimination. Sex was added as an amendment by the Democratic representative Howard Smith of Virginia. Although he was the powerful chairman of the House Rules Committee, he was outmaneuvered and overruled by those who were determined to pass the 1964 act. As one of his final attempts to derail the bill, he proposed the addition of sex to the terms. Rather than reject the proposal, the House, with the support of most of its female members, accepted the amendment and eventually the entire act. However, because sex was added to the terms near the very end of the legislative process, little legislative history exists to interpret what constitutes the clause. Consequently, courts have had a more difficult time determining what constitutes sex discrimination under Title VII than what constitutes race discrimination under Title VII.

Title VII also creates the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and gives it primary responsibility for investigating and processing discrimination claims, although the process of adjudicating such claims is largely left to the federal courts. In addition, the commission is to provide technical assistance to those employers and others who wish to properly discharge their responsibilities and duties under Title VII.

Title VII was controversial not only for what it did but also for what some believed it would do. Many claimed that Title VII's provisions would eventually require that businesses maintain quotas to ensure the racial balance of the workforce. A number of representatives and senators disputed this reading of the bill. Nevertheless, specific language was added to the bill to make clear that Title VII would never require a preference for one race based solely on a racial imbalance in the workplace.

Title VIII (Registration and Voting Statistics) authorizes the secretary of commerce to gather voting data on populations and parse the data based on race, color, and national origin. Rather than parsing data for the entire country, the data is to be gathered for whatever geographic areas are suggested by the Commission on Civil Rights. Given that the Bureau of the Census gathers statistics and is a part of the Department of Commerce, the act unsurprisingly tasks the commerce secretary with the responsibility outlined here.

Title IX (Intervention and Procedure after Removal in Civil Rights Cases) is purely procedural in nature. It dictates what is to occur when a case that was filed in state court and then removed to federal court is sent back to the state court. It also addresses when the federal government is allowed to intervene in a civil rights case and the implications of the intervention.

Title X (Establishment of Community Relations Service) creates the Community Relations Service to provide conciliation and mediation in local communities when issues of equality arise that can be solved through means less formal than court filings. The service is purely a problem-solving entity; it is not supposed to be involved in any litigation that might arise out of the matters it handles. The Community Relations Service can be thought of as a mechanism to turn down the heat on a community dispute before it boils over into discord or violence.

Title XI (Miscellaneous), as its title suggests, addresses various issues not dealt with anywhere else in the statute. For example, it addresses rules for criminal contempt in cases brought pursuant to the act. It also notes that nothing in the act should be construed to affect the ability of the attorney general or anyone acting in his stead from intervening in cases based on laws passed prior to the act. Last, the final title notes the severability of any part of the act found to be invalid meaning that if a part of the act were to be deemed unenforceable, the rest of the act would remain valid.

Audience

The intended audience for the 1964 act was the country as a whole. The message was to be sent to all citizens of the United States that discrimination would no longer be acceptable if the government could prevent it. Although the government could not change the hearts and minds of its citizens, it could guarantee equality in the most important spheres of life. People could not be required to think in a certain way; however, they could be influenced in their thinking by the country's collective thoughts on an issue, as expressed in its laws.

Of course, many of the nation's citizens did not need to have their mindsets changed by the act. According to Gallup and Harris polls taken in 1964, the bill had the support of more than half of the American public as it was moving toward passage. Consequently, the act did not have to be sold wholesale to the American people. Rather, the sale needed to be made to certain parts of the country and perhaps to certain segments in every part of the country that were quite vocal in their opposition to equality. Eventually, the chorus for equality drowned out the voices for inequality.

Impact

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 changed the landscape of American race relations forever by indicating that discrimination would no longer be the order of the day. The symbolic significance of the act cannot be overstated. By delving into the realm of private conduct and requiring equality in areas that many thought Congress would never regulate, the 1964 act made equality in public areas the new paradigm. It afforded African Americans everyday dignities that had been owed but not granted to black citizens. The act did not cure racial strife, but it helped make American life significantly more hospitable for minorities. The law may not have altered mindsets as much as it gave voice to the attitudes of the more progressive among the citizenry.

Essential Quotes

"An Act: To enforce the constitutional right to vote, to confer jurisdiction upon the district courts of the United States to provide injunctive relief against discrimination in public accommodations, to authorize the Attorney General to institute suits to protect constitutional rights in public facilities and public education, to extend the Commission on Civil Rights, to prevent discrimination in federally assisted programs, to establish a Commission on Equal Employment Opportunity, and for other purposes."

(Introduction)

"All persons shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the goods, services, facilities, and privileges, advantages, and accommodations of any place of public accommodation, as defined in this section, without discrimination or segregation on the ground of race, color, religion, or national origin."

(Section 201)

"Each of the following establishments which serves the public is a place of public accommodation within the meaning of this title if its operations affect commerce, or if discrimination or segregation by it is supported by State action: (1) any inn, hotel, motel, or other establishment which provides lodging to transient guests…; (2) any restaurant, cafeteria, lunchroom, lunch counter, soda fountain, or other facility principally engaged in selling food."

(Section 201)

"It shall be an unlawful employment practice for an employer—(1) to fail or refuse to hire or to discharge any individual, or otherwise to discriminate against any individual with respect to his compensation, terms, conditions, or privileges of employment, because of such individual's race, color, religion, sex, or national origin; or (2) to limit, segregate, or classify his employees in any way which would deprive or tend to deprive any individual of employment opportunities or otherwise adversely affect his status as an employee, because of such individual's race, color, religion, sex, or national origin."

Equally important, it removed the cover of law for those with discriminatory views. In the end, the law was accepted, grudgingly or not, and most calls to obey were heeded. Indeed, the law and its sanctions made it almost impossible for businesses to fail to comply.

In many ways, the 1964 act finished much of the work of the Reconstruction amendments. Those amendments provided a constitutional structure that was supposed to make all citizens equal before the law and full members of American society. While the Reconstruction amendments made minority Americans legal citizens, the 1964 act helped allow those citizens to enjoy their full rights of citizenship. Equality finally became the glue that is supposed to hold all Americans together.

The 1964 act was a powerful sequel to the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960. The 1957 act had been the first significant civil rights bill passed since the Reconstruction-era Civil Rights Act of 1875. However, the 1957 act focused on voting rights and did not have nearly the breadth and importance that the 1964 act would have. Similarly, the Civil Rights Act of 1960 was fairly weak. The 1964 act, to the contrary, opened the floodgates of change. In its immediate wake, Congress passed the Voting Rights Act of 1965, and additional strong antidiscrimination measures were passed soon after. Some, like the Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967, targeted the hiring practices of businesses. Others, such as the Fair Housing Act of 1968 and the Equal Credit Opportunity Act of 1974, targeted discrimination more broadly. Beyond the 1960s civil rights era, antidiscrimination legislation continued to be passed, both in the form of revisions, such as those to the 1964 act that occurred in 1972 and 1991, and in the form of new acts, such as the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990. Thus, the Civil Rights Act of 1964 paved the way for many other laws that have made America even more hospitable to all of her people.

Questions for Further Study

1. The Civil Rights Act of 1964 was justified both as an extension of the Fourteenth Amendment and as a proper application of the commerce clause. Would the Civil Rights Act of 1964 have been reasonable law if it had been passed during the Reconstruction era? How similar are some of its sections to laws passed during Reconstruction?

2. To ensure passage, the Civil Rights Act of 1964 underwent significant changes. In fact, the act as finalized proved stronger than the civil rights bill sent to Congress by President Kennedy in 1963. Does this circumstance reveal anything about President Kennedy's commitment to civil rights, or does it reveal his ability to divine Congress's tolerance for a strong civil rights bill, or does it reveal something entirely different?

3. What effect, if any, do you believe the Civil Rights Act of 1964 has had on the electoral results of the Democratic Party in the South from the 1960s to the present?

4. What might the United States have come to look like had the Civil Rights Act of 1964 not been passed? Would the act have passed had President Kennedy not been assassinated?

5. Arguably, the Civil Rights Act of 1964 was the culmination of the first stage of the civil rights era. Which act was more important to civil rights, the Civil Rights Act of 1964 or the Voting Rights Act of 1965?

Civil Rights Act of 1964

An Act: To enforce the constitutional right to vote, to confer jurisdiction upon the district courts of the United States to provide injunctive relief against discrimination in public accommodations, to authorize the Attorney General to institute suits to protect constitutional rights in public facilities and public education, to extend the Commission on Civil Rights, to prevent discrimination in federally assisted programs, to establish a Commission on Equal Employment Opportunity, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Civil Rights Act of 1964".

Title I—Voting Rights

SEC. 101. Section 2004 of the Revised Statutes (42 U.S.C. 1971), as amended by section 131 of the Civil Rights Act of 1957 (71 Stat. 637), and as further amended by section 601 of the Civil Rights Act of 1960 (74 Stat. 90), is further amended as follows:

(a) Insert "1" after "(a)" in subsection (a) and add at the end of subsection (a) the following new paragraphs:

"(2) No person acting under color of law shall

"(A) in determining whether any individual is qualified under State law or laws to vote in any Federal election, apply any standard, practice, or procedure different from the standards, practices, or procedures applied under such law or laws to other individuals within the same county, parish, or similar political subdivision who have been found by State officials to be qualified to vote;

"(B) deny the right of any individual to vote in any Federal election because of an error or omission on any record or paper relating to any application, registration, or other act requisite to voting, if such error or omission is not material in determining whether such individual is qualified under State law to vote in such election; or

"(C) employ any literacy test as a qualification for voting in any Federal election unless (i) such test is administered to each individual and is conducted wholly in writing, and (ii) a certified copy of the test and of the answers given by the individual is furnished to him within twenty-five days of the submission of his request made within the period of time during which records and papers are required to be retained and preserved pursuant to title III of the Civil Rights Act of 1960 (42 U.S.C. 1974-74e; 74 Stat. 88): Provided, however, That the Attorney General may enter into agreements with appropriate State or local authorities that preparation, conduct, and maintenance of such tests in accordance with the provisions of applicable State or local law, including such special provisions as are necessary in the preparation, conduct, and maintenance of such tests for persons who are blind or otherwise physically handicapped, meet the purposes of this subparagraph and constitute compliance therewith.

"(3) For purposes of this subsection

"(A) the term 'vote' shall have the same meaning as in subsection (e) of this section;

"(B) the phrase 'literacy test' includes any test of the ability to read, write, understand, or interpret any matter."

(b) Insert immediately following the period at the end of the first sentence of subsection (c) the following new sentence: "If in any such proceeding literacy is a relevant fact there shall be a rebuttable presumption that any person who has not been adjudged an incompetent and who has completed the sixth grade in a public school in, or a private school accredited by, any State or territory, the District of Columbia, or the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico where instruction is carried on predominantly in the English language, possesses sufficient literacy, comprehension, and intelligence to vote in any Federal election."

(c) Add the following subsection "(f)" and designate the present subsection "(f)" as subsection "(g)": "(f) When used in subsection (a) or (c) of this section, the words 'Federal election' shall mean any general, special, or primary election held solely or in part for the purpose of electing or selecting any candidate for the office of President, Vice President, presidential elector, Member of the Senate, or Member of the House of Representatives."

"(h) In any proceeding instituted by the United States in any district court of the United States under this section in which the Attorney General requests a finding of a pattern or practice of discrimination pursuant to subsection (e) of this section the Attorney General, at the time he files the complaint, or any defendant in the proceeding, within twenty days after service upon him of the complaint, may file with the clerk of such court a request that a court of three judges be convened to hear and determine the entire case. A copy of the request for a three-judge court shall be immediately furnished by such clerk to the chief judge of the circuit (or in his absence, the presiding circuit judge of the circuit) in which the case is pending. Upon receipt of the copy of such request it shall be the duty of the chief justice of the circuit or the presiding circuit judge, as the case may be, to designate immediately three judges in such circuit, of whom at least one shall be a circuit judge and another of whom shall be a district judge of the court in which the proceeding was instituted, to hear and determine such case, and it shall be the duty of the judges so designated to assign the case for hearing at the earliest practicable date, to participate in the hearing and determination thereof, and to cause the case to be in every way expedited.

"An appeal from the final judgment of such court will lie to the Supreme Court.

"In any proceeding brought under subsection (c) of this section to enforce subsection (b) of this section, or in the event neither the Attorney General nor any defendant files a request for a three-judge court in any proceeding authorized by this subsection, it shall be the duty of the chief judge of the district (or in his absence, the acting chief judge) in which the case is pending immediately to designate a judge in such district to hear and determine the case. In the event that no judge in the district is available to hear and determine the case, the chief judge of the district, or the acting chief judge, as the case may be, shall certify this fact to the chief judge of the circuit (or, in his absence, the acting chief judge) who shall then designate a district or circuit judge of the circuit to hear and determine the case.

"It shall be the duty of the judge designated pursuant to this section to assign the case for hearing at the earliest practicable date and to cause the case to be in every way expedited."

Title II—Injunctive Relief against Discrimination in Places of Public Accommodation

SEC. 201. (a) All persons shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the goods, services, facilities, and privileges, advantages, and accommodations of any place of public accommodation, as defined in this section, without discrimination or segregation on the ground of race, color, religion, or national origin.

(b) Each of the following establishments which serves the public is a place of public accommodation within the meaning of this title if its operations affect commerce, or if discrimination or segregation by it is supported by State action:

(1) any inn, hotel, motel, or other establishment which provides lodging to transient guests, other than an establishment located within a building which contains not more than five rooms for rent or hire and which is actually occupied by the proprietor of such establishment as his residence;

(2) any restaurant, cafeteria, lunchroom, lunch counter, soda fountain, or other facility principally engaged in selling food for consumption on the premises, including, but not limited to, any such facility located on the premises of any retail establishment; or any gasoline station;

(3) any motion picture house, theater, concert hall, sports arena, stadium or other place of exhibition or entertainment; and

(4) any establishment (A)(i) which is physically located within the premises of any establishment otherwise covered by this subsection, or (ii) within the premises of which is physically located any such covered establishment, and (B) which holds itself out as serving patrons of such covered establishment.

(c) The operations of an establishment affect commerce within the meaning of this title if (1) it is one of the establishments described in paragraph (1) of subsection (b); (2) in the case of an establishment described in paragraph (2) of subsection (b), it serves or offers to serve interstate travelers or a substantial portion of the food which it serves, or gasoline or other products which it sells, has moved in commerce; (3) in the case of an establishment described in paragraph (3) of subsection (b), it customarily presents films, performances, athletic teams, exhibitions, or other sources of entertainment which move in commerce; and (4) in the case of an establishment described in paragraph (4) of subsection (b), it is physically located within the premises of, or there is physically located within its premises, an establishment the operations of which affect commerce within the meaning of this subsection. For purposes of this section, "commerce" means travel, trade, traffic, commerce, transportation, or communication among the several States, or between the District of Columbia and any State, or between any foreign country or any territory or possession and any State or the District of Columbia, or between points in the same State but through any other State or the District of Columbia or a foreign country.

(d) Discrimination or segregation by an establishment is supported by State action within the meaning of this title if such discrimination or segregation (1) is carried on under color of any law, statute, ordinance, or regulation; or (2) is carried on under color of any custom or usage required or enforced by officials of the State or political subdivision thereof; or (3) is required by action of the State or political subdivision thereof.

(e) The provisions of this title shall not apply to a private club or other establishment not in fact open to the public, except to the extent that the facilities of such establishment are made available to the customers or patrons of an establishment within the scope of subsection (b).

SEC. 202. All persons shall be entitled to be free, at any establishment or place, from discrimination or segregation of any kind on the ground of race, color, religion, or national origin, if such discrimination or segregation is or purports to be required by any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, rule, or order of a State or any agency or political subdivision thereof.

SEC. 203. No person shall (a) withhold, deny, or attempt to withhold or deny, or deprive or attempt to deprive, any person of any right or privilege secured by section 201 or 202, or (b) intimidate, threaten, or coerce, or attempt to intimidate, threaten, or coerce any person with the purpose of interfering with any right or privilege secured by section 201 or 202, or (c) punish or attempt to punish any person for exercising or attempting to exercise any right or privilege secured by section 201 or 202.

SEC. 204. (a) Whenever any person has engaged or there are reasonable grounds to believe that any person is about to engage in any act or practice prohibited by section 203, a civil action for preventive relief, including an application for a permanent or temporary injunction, restraining order, or other order, may be instituted by the person aggrieved and, upon timely application, the court may, in its discretion, permit the Attorney General to intervene in such civil action if he certifies that the case is of general public importance. Upon application by the complainant and in such circumstances as the court may deem just, the court may appoint an attorney for such complainant and may authorize the commencement of the civil action without the payment of fees, costs, or security.

(b) In any action commenced pursuant to this title, the court, in its discretion, may allow the prevailing party, other than the United States, a reasonable attorney's fee as part of the costs, and the United States shall be liable for costs the same as a private person.

(c) In the case of an alleged act or practice prohibited by this title which occurs in a State, or political subdivision of a State, which has a State or local law prohibiting such act or practice and establishing or authorizing a State or local authority to grant or seek relief from such practice or to institute criminal proceedings with respect thereto upon receiving notice thereof, no civil action may be brought under subsection (a) before the expiration of thirty days after written notice of such alleged act or practice has been given to the appropriate State or local authority by registered mail or in person, provided that the court may stay proceedings in such civil action pending the termination of State or local enforcement proceedings.

(d) In the case of an alleged act or practice prohibited by this title which occurs in a State, or political subdivision of a State, which has no State or local law prohibiting such act or practice, a civil action may be brought under subsection (a): Provided, That the court may refer the matter to the Community Relations Service established by title X of this Act for as long as the court believes there is a reasonable possibility of obtaining voluntary compliance, but for not more than sixty days: Provided further, That upon expiration of such sixty-day period, the court may extend such period for an additional period, not to exceed a cumulative total of one hundred and twenty days, if it believes there then exists a reasonable possibility of securing voluntary compliance.

SEC. 205. The Service is authorized to make a full investigation of any complaint referred to it by the court under section 204(d) and may hold such hearings with respect thereto as may be necessary. The Service shall conduct any hearings with respect to any such complaint in executive session, and shall not release any testimony given therein except by agreement of all parties involved in the complaint with the permission of the court, and the Service shall endeavor to bring about a voluntary settlement between the parties.

SEC. 206. (a) Whenever the Attorney General has reasonable cause to believe that any person or group of persons is engaged in a pattern or practice of resistance to the full enjoyment of any of the rights secured by this title, and that the pattern or practice is of such a nature and is intended to deny the full exercise of the rights herein described, the Attorney General may bring a civil action in the appropriate district court of the United States by filing with it a complaint (1) signed by him (or in his absence the Acting Attorney General), (2) setting forth facts pertaining to such pattern or practice, and (3) requesting such preventive relief, including an application for a permanent or temporary injunction, restraining order or other order against the person or persons responsible for such pattern or practice, as he deems necessary to insure the full enjoyment of the rights herein described.

(b) In any such proceeding the Attorney General may file with the clerk of such court a request that a court of three judges be convened to hear and determine the case. Such request by the Attorney General shall be accompanied by a certificate that, in his opinion, the case is of general public importance. A copy of the certificate and request for a three-judge court shall be immediately furnished by such clerk to the chief judge of the circuit (or in his absence, the presiding circuit judge of the circuit) in which the case is pending. Upon receipt of the copy of such request it shall be the duty of the chief judge of the circuit or the presiding circuit judge, as the case may be, to designate immediately three judges in such circuit, of whom at least one shall be a circuit judge and another of whom shall be a district judge of the court in which the proceeding was instituted, to hear and determine such case, and it shall be the duty of the judges so designated to assign the case for hearing at the earliest practicable date, to participate in the hearing and determination thereof, and to cause the case to be in every way expedited. An appeal from the final judgment of such court will lie to the Supreme Court.

In the event the Attorney General fails to file such a request in any such proceeding, it shall be the duty of the chief judge of the district (or in his absence, the acting chief judge) in which the case is pending immediately to designate a judge in such district to hear and determine the case. In the event that no judge in the district is available to hear and determine the case, the chief judge of the district, or the acting chief judge, as the case may be, shall certify this fact to the chief judge of the circuit (or in his absence, the acting chief judge) who shall then designate a district or circuit judge of the circuit to hear and determine the case.

It shall be the duty of the judge designated pursuant to this section to assign the case for hearing at the earliest practicable date and to cause the case to be in every way expedited.

SEC. 207. (a) The district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction of proceedings instituted pursuant to this title and shall exercise the same without regard to whether the aggrieved party shall have exhausted any administrative or other remedies that may be provided by law.

(b) The remedies provided in this title shall be the exclusive means of enforcing the rights based on this title, but nothing in this title shall preclude any individual or any State or local agency from asserting any right based on any other Federal or State law not inconsistent with this title, including any statute or ordinance requiring nondiscrimination in public establishments or accommodations, or from pursuing any remedy, civil or criminal, which may be available for the vindication or enforcement of such right.

Title III—Desegregation of Public Facilities

SEC. 301. (a) Whenever the Attorney General receives a complaint in writing signed by an individual to the effect that he is being deprived of or threatened with the loss of his right to the equal protection of the laws, on account of his race, color, religion, or national origin, by being denied equal utilization of any public facility which is owned, operated, or managed by or on behalf of any State or subdivision thereof, other than a public school or public college as defined in section 401 of title IV hereof, and the Attorney General believes the complaint is meritorious and certifies that the signer or signers of such complaint are unable, in his judgment, to initiate and maintain appropriate legal proceedings for relief and that the institution of an action will materially further the orderly progress of desegregation in public facilities, the Attorney General is authorized to institute for or in the name of the United States a civil action in any appropriate district court of the United States against such parties and for such relief as may be appropriate, and such court shall have and shall exercise jurisdiction of proceedings instituted pursuant to this section. The Attorney General may implead as defendants such additional parties as are or become necessary to the grant of effective relief hereunder.

(b) The Attorney General may deem a person or persons unable to initiate and maintain appropriate legal proceedings within the meaning of subsection

(a) of this section when such person or persons are unable, either directly or through other interested persons or organizations, to bear the expense of the litigation or to obtain effective legal representation; or whenever he is satisfied that the institution of such litigation would jeopardize the personal safety, employment, or economic standing of such person or persons, their families, or their property.

SEC. 302. In any action or proceeding under this title the United States shall be liable for costs, including a reasonable attorney's fee, the same as a private person.

SEC. 303. Nothing in this title shall affect adversely the right of any person to sue for or obtain relief in any court against discrimination in any facility covered by this title.

SEC. 304. A complaint as used in this title is a writing or document within the meaning of section 1001, title 18, United States Code.

Title IV—Desegregation of Public Education

Definitions

SEC. 401. As used in this title (a) "Commissioner" means the Commissioner of Education.

(b) "Desegregation" means the assignment of students to public schools and within such schools without regard to their race, color, religion, or national origin, but "desegregation" shall not mean the assignment of students to public schools in order to overcome racial imbalance.

(c) "Public school" means any elementary or secondary educational institution, and "public college" means any institution of higher education or any technical or vocational school above the secondary school level, provided that such public school or public college is operated by a State, subdivision of a State, or governmental agency within a State, or operated wholly or predominantly from or through the use of governmental funds or property, or funds or property derived from a governmental source.

(d) "School board" means any agency or agencies which administer a system of one or more public schools and any other agency which is responsible for the assignment of students to or within such system.

◆ Survey and Report of Educational Opportunities

SEC. 402. The Commissioner shall conduct a survey and make a report to the President and the Congress, within two years of the enactment of this title, concerning the lack of availability of equal educational opportunities for individuals by reason of race, color, religion, or national origin in public educational institutions at all levels in the United States, its territories and possessions, and the District of Columbia.

◆ Technical Assistance

SEC. 403. The Commissioner is authorized, upon the application of any school board, State, municipality, school district, or other governmental unit legally responsible for operating a public school or schools, to render technical assistance to such applicant in the preparation, adoption, and implementation of plans for the desegregation of public schools. Such technical assistance may, among other activities, include making available to such agencies information regarding effective methods of coping with special educational problems occasioned by desegregation, and making available to such agencies personnel of the Office of Education or other persons specially equipped to advise and assist them in coping with such problems.

◆ Training Institutes

SEC. 404. The Commissioner is authorized to arrange, through grants or contracts, with institutions of higher education for the operation of short-term or regular session institutes for special training designed to improve the ability of teachers, supervisors, counselors, and other elementary or secondary school personnel to deal effectively with special educational problems occasioned by desegregation. Individuals who attend such an institute on a full-time basis may be paid stipends for the period of their attendance at such institute in amounts specified by the Commissioner in regulations, including allowances for travel to attend such institute.

◆ Grants

SEC. 405. (a) The Commissioner is authorized, upon application of a school board, to make grants to such board to pay, in whole or in part, the cost of

(1) giving to teachers and other school personnel inservice training in dealing with problems incident to desegregation, and

(2) employing specialists to advise in problems incident to desegregation.

(b) In determining whether to make a grant, and in fixing the amount thereof and the terms and conditions on which it will be made, the Commissioner shall take into consideration the amount available for grants under this section and the other applications which are pending before him; the financial condition of the applicant and the other resources available to it; the nature, extent, and gravity of its problems incident to desegregation; and such other factors as he finds relevant.

◆ Payments

SEC. 406. Payments pursuant to a grant or contract under this title may be made (after necessary adjustments on account of previously made overpayments or underpayments) in advance or by way of reimbursement, and in such installments, as the Commissioner may determine.

◆ Suits by the Attorney General

SEC. 407. (a) Whenever the Attorney General receives a complaint in writing

(1) signed by a parent or group of parents to the effect that his or their minor children, as members of a class of persons similarly situated, are being deprived by a school board of the equal protection of the laws, or

(2) signed by an individual, or his parent, to the effect that he has been denied admission to or not permitted to continue in attendance at a public college by reason of race, color, religion, or national origin, and the Attorney General believes the complaint is meritorious and certifies that the signer or signers of such complaint are unable, in his judgment, to initiate and maintain appropriate legal proceedings for relief and that the institution of an action will materially further the orderly achievement of desegregation in public education, the Attorney General is authorized, after giving notice of such complaint to the appropriate school board or college authority and after certifying that he is satisfied that such board or authority has had a reasonable time to adjust the conditions alleged in such complaint, to institute for or in the name of the United States a civil action in any appropriate district court of the United States against such parties and for such relief as may be appropriate, and such court shall have and shall exercise jurisdiction of proceedings instituted pursuant to this section, provided that nothing herein shall empower any official or court of the United States to issue any order seeking to achieve a racial balance in any school by requiring the transportation of pupils or students from one school to another or one school district to another in order to achieve such racial balance, or otherwise enlarge the existing power of the court to insure compliance with constitutional standards. The Attorney General may implead as defendants such additional parties as are or become necessary to the grant of effective relief hereunder.

(b) The Attorney General may deem a person or persons unable to initiate and maintain appropriate legal proceedings within the meaning of subsection

(a) of this section when such person or persons are unable, either directly or through other interested persons or organizations, to bear the expense of the litigation or to obtain effective legal representation; or whenever he is satisfied that the institution of such litigation would jeopardize the personal safety, employment, or economic standing of such person or persons, their families, or their property.

(c) The term "parent" as used in this section includes any person standing in loco parentis. A "complaint" as used in this section is a writing or document within the meaning of section 1001, title 18, United States Code.

SEC. 408. In any action or proceeding under this title the United States shall be liable for costs the same as a private person.

SEC. 409. Nothing in this title shall affect adversely the right of any person to sue for or obtain relief in any court against discrimination in public education.

SEC. 410. Nothing in this title shall prohibit classification and assignment for reasons other than race, color, religion, or national origin.

Title V—Commission on Civil Rights

SEC. 501. Section 102 of the Civil Rights Act of 1957 (42 U.S.C. 1975a; 71 Stat. 634) is amended to read as follows:

"Rules of Procedure of the Commission Hearings: SEC. 102. (a) At least thirty days prior to the commencement of any hearing, the Commission shall cause to be published in the Federal Register notice of the date on which such hearing is to commence, the place at which it is to be held and the subject of the hearing. The Chairman, or one designated by him to act as Chairman at a hearing of the Commission, shall announce in an opening statement the subject of the hearing.

"(b) A copy of the Commission's rules shall be made available to any witness before the Commission, and a witness compelled to appear before the Commission or required to produce written or other matter shall be served with a copy of the Commission's rules at the time of service of the subpoena.

"(c) Any person compelled to appear in person before the Commission shall be accorded the right to be accompanied and advised by counsel, who shall have the right to subject his client to reasonable examination, and to make objections on the record and to argue briefly the basis for such objections. The Commission shall proceed with reasonable dispatch to conclude any hearing in which it is engaged. Due regard shall be had for the convenience and necessity of witnesses.

"(d) The Chairman or Acting Chairman may punish breaches of order and decorum by censure and exclusion from the hearings.

"(e) If the Commission determines that evidence or testimony at any hearing may tend to defame, degrade, or incriminate any person, it shall receive such evidence or testimony or summary of such evidence or testimony in executive session. The Commission shall afford any person defamed, degraded, or incriminated by such evidence or testimony an opportunity to appear and be heard in executive session, with a reasonable number of additional witnesses requested by him, before deciding to use such evidence or testimony. In the event the Commission determines to release or use such evidence or testimony in such manner as to reveal publicly the identity of the person defamed, degraded, or incriminated, such evidence or testimony, prior to such public release or use, shall be given at a public session, and the Commission shall afford such person an opportunity to appear as a voluntary witness or to file a sworn statement in his behalf and to submit brief and pertinent sworn statements of others. The Commission shall receive and dispose of requests from such person to subpoena additional witnesses.

"(f) Except as provided in sections 102 and 105 (f) of this Act, the Chairman shall receive and the Commission shall dispose of requests to subpoena additional witnesses.

"(g) No evidence or testimony or summary of evidence or testimony taken in executive session may be released or used in public sessions without the consent of the Commission. Whoever releases or uses in public without the consent of the Commission such evidence or testimony taken in executive session shall be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned for not more than one year.

"(h) In the discretion of the Commission, witnesses may submit brief and pertinent sworn statements in writing for inclusion in the record. The Commission shall determine the pertinency of testimony and evidence adduced at its hearings.

"(i) Every person who submits data or evidence shall be entitled to retain or, on payment of lawfully prescribed costs, procure a copy or transcript thereof, except that a witness in a hearing held in executive session may for good cause be limited to inspection of the official transcript of his testimony. Transcript copies of public sessions may be obtained by the public upon the payment of the cost thereof. An accurate transcript shall be made of the testimony of all witnesses at all hearings, either public or executive sessions, of the Commission or of any subcommittee thereof.

"(j) A witness attending any session of the Commission shall receive $6 for each day's attendance and for the time necessarily occupied in going to and returning from the same, and 10 cents per mile for going from and returning to his place of residence. Witnesses who attend at points so far removed from their respective residences as to prohibit return thereto from day to day shall be entitled to an additional allowance of $10 per day for expenses of subsistence including the time necessarily occupied in going to and returning from the place of attendance. Mileage payments shall be tendered to the witness upon service of a subpoena issued on behalf of the Commission or any subcommittee thereof.

"(k) The Commission shall not issue any subpoena for the attendance and testimony of witnesses or for the production of written or other matter which would require the presence of the party subpoenaed at a hearing to be held outside of the State wherein the witness is found or resides or is domiciled or transacts business, or has appointed an agent for receipt of service of process except that, in any event, the Commission may issue subpoenas for the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of written or other matter at a hearing held within fifty miles of the place where the witness is found or resides or is domiciled or transacts business or has appointed an agent for receipt of service of process.

"(l) The Commission shall separately state and currently publish in the Federal Register (1) descriptions of its central and field organization including the established places at which, and methods whereby, the public may secure information or make requests; (2) statements of the general course and method by which its functions are channeled and determined, and (3) rules adopted as authorized by law. No person shall in any manner be subject to or required to resort to rules, organization, or procedure not so published."

SEC. 502. Section 103(a) of the Civil Rights Act of 1957 (42 U.S.C. 1975b(a); 71 Stat. 634) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 103. (a) Each member of the Commission who is not otherwise in the service of the Government of the United States shall receive the sum of $75 per day for each day spent in the work of the Commission, shall be paid actual travel expenses, and per diem in lieu of subsistence expenses when away from his usual place of residence, in accordance with section 5 of the Administrative Expenses Act of 1946, as amended (5 U.S.C 73b-2; 60 Stat. 808)."

SEC. 503. Section 103(b) of the Civil Rights Act of 1957 (42 U.S.C. 1975(b); 71 Stat. 634) is amended to read as follows:

"(b) Each member of the Commission who is otherwise in the service of the Government of the United States shall serve without compensation in addition to that received for such other service, but while engaged in the work of the Commission shall be paid actual travel expenses, and per diem in lieu of subsistence expenses when away from his usual place of residence, in accordance with the provisions of the Travel Expenses Act of 1949, as amended
(5 U.S.C. 835-42; 63 Stat. 166)."

SEC. 504. (a) Section 104(a) of the Civil Rights Act of 1957 (42 U.S.C. 1975c(a); 71 Stat. 635), as amended, is further amended to read as follows:

"Duties of the Commission: SEC. 104. (a) The Commission shall

"(1) investigate allegations in writing under oath or affirmation that certain citizens of the United States are being deprived of their right to vote and have that vote counted by reason of their color, race, religion, or national origin; which writing, under oath or affirmation, shall set forth the facts upon which such belief or beliefs are based;

"(2) study and collect information concerning legal developments constituting a denial of equal protection of the laws under the Constitution because of race, color, religion or national origin or in the administration of justice;

"(3) appraise the laws and policies of the Federal Government with respect to denials of equal protection of the laws under the Constitution because of race, color, religion or national origin or in the administration of justice;

"(4) serve as a national clearinghouse for information in respect to denials of equal protection of the laws because of race, color, religion or national origin, including but not limited to the fields of voting, education, housing, employment, the use of public facilities, and transportation, or in the administration of justice;

"(5) investigate allegations, made in writing and under oath or affirmation, that citizens of the United States are unlawfully being accorded or denied the right to vote, or to have their votes properly counted, in any election of presidential electors, Members of the United States Senate, or of the House of Representatives, as a result of any patterns or practice of fraud or discrimination in the conduct of such election; and

"(6) Nothing in this or any other Act shall be construed as authorizing the Commission, its Advisory Committees, or any person under its supervision or control to inquire into or investigate any membership practices or internal operations of any fraternal organization, any college or university fraternity or sorority, any private club or any religious organization."

(b) Section 104(b) of the Civil Rights Act of 1957 (42 U.S.C. 1975c(b); 71 Stat. 635), as amended, is further amended by striking out the present subsection "(b)" and by substituting therefore:

"(b) The Commission shall submit interim reports to the President and to the Congress at such times as the Commission, the Congress or the President shall deem desirable, and shall submit to the President and to the Congress a final report of its activities, findings, and recommendations not later than January 31, 1968."

SEC. 505. Section 105(a) of the Civil Rights Act of 1957 (42 U.S.C. 1975d(a); 71 Stat. 636) is amended by striking out in the last sentence thereof "$50 per diem" and inserting in lieu thereof "$75 per diem."

SEC. 506. Section 105(f) and section 105(g) of the Civil Rights Act of 1957 (42 U.S.C. 1975d (f) and (g); 71 Stat. 636) are amended to read as follows:

"(f) The Commission, or on the authorization of the Commission any subcommittee of two or more members, at least one of whom shall be of each major political party, may, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this Act, hold such hearings and act at such times and places as the Commission or such authorized subcommittee may deem advisable. Subpoenas for the attendance and testimony of witnesses or the production of written or other matter may be issued in accordance with the rules of the Commission as contained in section 102 (j) and (k) of this Act, over the signature of the Chairman of the Commission or of such subcommittee, and may be served by any person designated by such Chairman. The holding of hearings by the Commission, or the appointment of a subcommittee to hold hearings pursuant to this subparagraph, must be approved by a majority of the Commission, or by a majority of the members present at a meeting at which at least a quorum of four members is present.

"(g) In case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpoena, any district court of the United States or the United States court of any territory or possession, or the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, within the jurisdiction of which the inquiry is carried on or within the jurisdiction of which said person guilty of contumacy or refusal to obey is found or resides or is domiciled or transacts business, or has appointed an agent for receipt of service of process, upon application by the Attorney General of the United States shall have jurisdiction to issue to such person an order requiring such person to appear before the Commission or a subcommittee thereof, there to produce pertinent, relevant and nonprivileged evidence if so ordered, or there to give testimony touching the matter under investigation; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by said court as a contempt thereof."

SEC. 507. Section 105 of the Civil Rights Act of 1957 (42 U.S.C. 1975d; 71 Stat. 636), as amended by section 401 of the Civil Rights Act of 1960 (42 U.S.C. 1975d(h); 74 Stat. 89), is further amended by adding a new subsection at the end to read as follows:

"(i) The Commission shall have the power to make such rules and regulations as are necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act."

Title VI—Nondiscrimination in Federally Assisted Programs

SEC. 601. No person in the United States shall, on the ground of race, color, or national origin, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance.

SEC. 602. Each Federal department and agency which is empowered to extend Federal financial assistance to any program or activity, by way of grant, loan, or contract other than a contract of insurance or guaranty, is authorized and directed to effectuate the provisions of section 601 with respect to such program or activity by issuing rules, regulations, or orders of general applicability which shall be consistent with achievement of the objectives of the statute authorizing the financial assistance in connection with which the action is taken. No such rule, regulation, or order shall become effective unless and until approved by the President. Compliance with any requirement adopted pursuant to this section may be effected (1) by the termination of or refusal to grant or to continue assistance under such program or activity to any recipient as to whom there has been an express finding on the record, after opportunity for hearing, of a failure to comply with such requirement, but such termination or refusal shall be limited to the particular political entity, or part thereof, or other recipient as to whom such a finding has been made and, shall be limited in its effect to the particular program, or part thereof, in which such noncompliance has been so found, or (2) by any other means authorized by law: Provided, however, That no such action shall be taken until the department or agency concerned has advised the appropriate person or persons of the failure to comply with the requirement and has determined that compliance cannot be secured by voluntary means. In the case of any action terminating, or refusing to grant or continue, assistance because of failure to comply with a requirement imposed pursuant to this section, the head of the federal department or agency shall file with the committees of the House and Senate having legislative jurisdiction over the program or activity involved a full written report of the circumstances and the grounds for such action. No such action shall become effective until thirty days have elapsed after the filing of such report.

SEC. 603. Any department or agency action taken pursuant to section 602 shall be subject to such judicial review as may otherwise be provided by law for similar action taken by such department or agency on other grounds. In the case of action, not otherwise subject to judicial review, terminating or refusing to grant or to continue financial assistance upon a finding of failure to comply with any requirement imposed pursuant to section 602, any person aggrieved (including any State or political subdivision thereof and any agency of either) may obtain judicial review of such action in accordance with section 10 of the Administrative Procedure Act, and such action shall not be deemed committed to unreviewable agency discretion within the meaning of that section.

SEC. 604. Nothing contained in this title shall be construed to authorize action under this title by any department or agency with respect to any employment practice of any employer, employment agency, or labor organization except where a primary objective of the Federal financial assistance is to provide employment.

SEC. 605. Nothing in this title shall add to or detract from any existing authority with respect to any program or activity under which Federal financial assistance is extended by way of a contract of insurance or guaranty.

Title VII—Equal Employment Opportunity Definitions

SEC. 701. For the purposes of this title

(a) The term "person" includes one or more individuals, labor unions, partnerships, associations, corporations, legal representatives, mutual companies, joint-stock companies, trusts, unincorporated organizations, trustees, trustees in bankruptcy, or receivers.

(b) The term "employer" means a person engaged in an industry affecting commerce who has twenty-five or more employees for each working day in each of twenty or more calendar weeks in the current or preceding calendar year, and any agent of such a person, but such term does not include (1) the United States, a corporation wholly owned by the Government of the United States, an Indian tribe, or a State or political subdivision thereof, (2) a bona fide private membership club (other than a labor organization) which is exempt from taxation under section 501(c) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954: Provided, That during the first year after the effective date prescribed in subsection (a) of section 716, persons having fewer than one hundred employees (and their agents) shall not be considered employers, and, during the second year after such date, persons having fewer than seventy-five employees (and their agents) shall not be considered employers, and, during the third year after such date, persons having fewer than fifty employees (and their agents) shall not be considered employers: Provided further, That it shall be the policy of the United States to insure equal employment opportunities for Federal employees without discrimination because of race, color, religion, sex or national origin and the President shall utilize his existing authority to effectuate this policy.

(c) The term "employment agency" means any person regularly undertaking with or without compensation to procure employees for an employer or to procure for employees opportunities to work for an employer and includes an agent of such a person; but shall not include an agency of the United States, or an agency of a State or political subdivision of a State, except that such term shall include the United States Employment Service and the system of State and local employment services receiving Federal assistance.

(d) The term "labor organization" means a labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce, and any agent of such an organization, and includes any organization of any kind, any agency, or employee representation committee, group, association, or plan so engaged in which employees participate and which exists for the purpose, in whole or in part, of dealing with employers concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, rates of pay, hours, or other terms or conditions of employment, and any conference, general committee, joint or system board, or joint council so engaged which is subordinate to a national or international labor organization.

(e) A labor organization shall be deemed to be engaged in an industry affecting commerce if (1) it maintains or operates a hiring hall or hiring office which procures employees for an employer or procures for employees opportunities to work for an employer, or (2) the number of its members (or, where it is a labor organization composed of other labor organizations or their representatives, if the aggregate number of the members of such other labor organization) is (A) one hundred or more during the first year after the effective date prescribed in subsection (a) of section 716, (B) seventy-five or more during the second year after such date or fifty or more during the third year, or (C) twenty-five or more thereafter, and such labor organization

(1) is the certified representative of employees under the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, or the Railway Labor Act, as amended;

(2) although not certified, is a national or international labor organization or a local labor organization recognized or acting as the representative of employees of an employer or employers engaged in an industry affecting commerce; or

(3) has chartered a local labor organization or subsidiary body which is representing or actively seeking to represent employees of employers within the meaning of paragraph (1) or (2); or

(4) has been chartered by a labor organization representing or actively seeking to represent employees within the meaning of paragraph (1) or (2) as the local or subordinate body through which such employees may enjoy membership or become affiliated with such labor organization; or

(5) is a conference, general committee, joint or system board, or joint council subordinate to a national or international labor organization, which includes a labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce within the meaning of any of the preceding paragraphs of this subsection.

(f) The term "employee" means an individual employed by an employer.

(g) The term "commerce" means trade, traffic, commerce, transportation, transmission, or communication among the several States; or between a State and any place outside thereof; or within the District of Columbia, or a possession of the United States; or between points in the same State but through a point outside thereof.

(h) The term "industry affecting commerce" means any activity, business, or industry in commerce or in which a labor dispute would hinder or obstruct commerce or the free flow of commerce and includes any activity or industry "affecting commerce" within the meaning of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959.

(i) The term "State" includes a State of the United States, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, Guam, Wake Island, The Canal Zone, and Outer Continental Shelf lands defined in the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act.

◆ Exemption

SEC. 702. This title shall not apply to an employer with respect to the employment of aliens outside any State, or to a religious corporation, association, or society with respect to the employment of individuals of a particular religion to perform work connected with the carrying on by such corporation, association, or society of its religious activities or to an educational institution with respect to the employment of individuals to perform work connected with the educational activities of such institution.

SEC. 703. (a) It shall be an unlawful employment practice for an employer

(1) to fail or refuse to hire or to discharge any individual, or otherwise to discriminate against any individual with respect to his compensation, terms, conditions, or privileges of employment, because of such individual's race, color, religion, sex, or national origin; or

(2) to limit, segregate, or classify his employees in any way which would deprive or tend to deprive any individual of employment opportunities or otherwise adversely affect his status as an employee, because of such individual's race, color, religion, sex, or national origin.

(b) It shall be an unlawful employment practice for an employment agency to fail or refuse to refer for employment, or otherwise to discriminate against, any individual because of his race, color, religion, sex, or national origin, or to classify or refer for employment any individual on the basis of his race, color, religion, sex, or national origin.

(c) It shall be an unlawful employment practice for a labor organization

(1) to exclude or to expel from its membership, or otherwise to discriminate against, any individual because of his race, color, religion, sex, or national origin;

(2) to limit, segregate, or classify its membership, or to classify or fail or refuse to refer for employment any individual, in any way which would deprive or tend to deprive any individual of employment opportunities, or would limit such employment opportunities or otherwise adversely affect his status as an employee or as an applicant for employment, because of such individual's race, color, religion, sex, or national origin; or

(3) to cause or attempt to cause an employer to discriminate against an individual in violation of this section.

(d) It shall be an unlawful employment practice for any employer, labor organization, or joint labor-management committee controlling apprenticeship or other training or retraining, including on-the-job training programs to discriminate against any individual because of his race, color, religion, sex, or national origin in admission to, or employment in, any program established to provide apprenticeship or other training.

(e) Notwithstanding any other provision of this title, (1) it shall not be an unlawful employment practice for an employer to hire and employ employees, for an employment agency to classify, or refer for employment any individual, for a labor organization to classify its membership or to classify or refer for employment any individual, or for an employer, labor organization, or joint labor-management committee controlling apprenticeship or other training or retraining programs to admit or employ any individual in any such program, on the basis of his religion, sex, or national origin in those certain instances where religion, sex, or national origin is a bona fide occupational qualification reasonably necessary to the normal operation of that particular business or enterprise, and (2) it shall not be an unlawful employment practice for a school, college, university, or other educational institution or institution of learning to hire and employ employees of a particular religion if such school, college, university, or other educational institution or institution of learning is, in whole or in substantial part, owned, supported, controlled, or managed by a particular religion or by a particular religious corporation, association, or society, or if the curriculum of such school, college, university, or other educational institution or institution of learning is directed toward the propagation of a particular religion.

(f) As used in this title, the phrase "unlawful employment practice" shall not be deemed to include any action or measure taken by an employer, labor organization, joint labor-management committee, or employment agency with respect to an individual who is a member of the Communist Party of the United States or of any other organization required to register as a Communist-action or Communist-front organization by final order of the Subversive Activities Control Board pursuant to the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950.

(g) Notwithstanding any other provision of this title, it shall not be an unlawful employment practice for an employer to fail or refuse to hire and employ any individual for any position, for an employer to discharge any individual from any position, or for an employment agency to fail or refuse to refer any individual for employment in any position, or for a labor organization to fail or refuse to refer any individual for employment in any position, if

(1) the occupancy of such position, or access to the premises in or upon which any part of the duties of such position is performed or is to be performed, is subject to any requirement imposed in the interest of the national security of the United States under any security program in effect pursuant to or administered under any statute of the United States or any Executive order of the President; and

(2) such individual has not fulfilled or has ceased to fulfill that requirement.

(h) Notwithstanding any other provision of this title, it shall not be an unlawful employment practice for an employer to apply different standards of compensation, or different terms, conditions, or privileges of employment pursuant to a bona fide seniority or merit system, or a system which measures earnings by quantity or quality of production or to employees who work in different locations, provided that such differences are not the result of an intention to discriminate because of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin, nor shall it be an unlawful employment practice for an employer to give and to act upon the results of any professionally developed ability test provided that such test, its administration or action upon the results is not designed, intended or used to discriminate because of race, color, religion, sex or national origin. It shall not be an unlawful employment practice under this title for any employer to differentiate upon the basis of sex in determining the amount of the wages or compensation paid or to be paid to employees of such employer if such differentiation is authorized by the provisions of section 6(d) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended (29 U.S.C. 206(d)).

(i) Nothing contained in this title shall apply to any business or enterprise on or near an Indian reservation with respect to any publicly announced employment practice of such business or enterprise under which a preferential treatment is given to any individual because he is an Indian living on or near a reservation.

(j) Nothing contained in this title shall be interpreted to require any employer, employment agency, labor organization, or joint labor-management committee subject to this title to grant preferential treatment to any individual or to any group because of the race, color, religion, sex, or national origin of such individual or group on account of an imbalance which may exist with respect to the total number or percentage of persons of any race, color, religion, sex, or national origin employed by any employer, referred or classified for employment by any employment agency or labor organization, admitted to membership or classified by any labor organization, or admitted to, or employed in, any apprenticeship or other training program, in comparison with the total number or percentage of persons of such race, color, religion, sex, or national origin in any community, State, section, or other area, or in the available work force in any community, State, section, or other area.

◆ Other Unlawful Employment Practices

SEC. 704. (a) It shall be an unlawful employment practice for an employer to discriminate against any of his employees or applicants for employment, for an employment agency to discriminate against any individual, or for a labor organization to discriminate against any member thereof or applicant for membership, because he has opposed, any practice made an unlawful employment practice by this title, or because he has made a charge, testified, assisted, or participated in any manner in an investigation, proceeding, or hearing under this title.

(b) It shall be an unlawful employment practice for an employer, labor organization, or employment agency to print or publish or cause to be printed or published any notice or advertisement relating to employment by such an employer or membership in or any classification or referral for employment by such a labor organization, or relating to any classification or referral for employment by such an employment agency, indicating any preference, limitation, specification, or discrimination, based on race, color, religion, sex, or national origin, except that such a notice or advertisement may indicate a preference, limitation, specification, or discrimination based on religion, sex, or national origin when religion, sex, or national origin is a bona fide occupational qualification for employment.

◆ Equal Employment Opportunity Commission

SEC. 705. (a) There is hereby created a Commission to be known as the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, which shall be composed of five members, not more than three of whom shall be members of the same political party, who shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. One of the original members shall be appointed for a term of one year, one for a term of two years, one for a term of three years, one for a term of four years, and one for a term of five years, beginning from the date of enactment of this title, but their successors shall be appointed for terms of five years each, except that any individual chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the member whom he shall succeed. The President shall designate one member to serve as Chairman of the Commission, and one member to serve as Vice Chairman. The Chairman shall be responsible on behalf of the Commission for the administrative operations of the Commission, and shall appoint, in accordance with the civil service laws, such officers, agents, attorneys, and employees as it deems necessary to assist it in the performance of its functions and to fix their compensation in accordance with the Classification Act of 1949, as amended. The Vice Chairman shall act as Chairman in the absence or disability of the Chairman or in the event of a vacancy in that office.

(b) A vacancy in the Commission shall not impair the right of the remaining members to exercise all the powers of the Commission and three members thereof shall constitute a quorum.

(c) The Commission shall have an official seal which shall be judicially noticed.

(d) The Commission shall at the close of each fiscal year report to the Congress and to the President concerning the action it has taken; the names, salaries, and duties of all individuals in its employ and the moneys it has disbursed; and shall make such further reports on the cause of and means of eliminating discrimination and such recommendations for further legislation as may appear desirable.

(e) The Federal Executive Pay Act of 1956, as amended (5 U.S.C. 2201-2209), is further amended

(1) by adding to section 105 thereof (5 U.S.C. 2204) the following clause:

"(32) Chairman, Equal Employment Opportunity Commission"; and

(2) by adding to clause (45) of section 106(a) thereof (5 U.S.C. 2205(a)) the following: "Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (4)."

(f) The principal office of the Commission shall be in or near the District of Columbia, but it may meet or exercise any or all its powers at any other place. The Commission may establish such regional or State offices as it deems necessary to accomplish the purpose of this title.

(g) The Commission shall have power

(1) to cooperate with and, with their consent, utilize regional, State, local, and other agencies, both public and private, and individuals;

(2) to pay to witnesses whose depositions are taken or who are summoned before the Commission or any of its agents the same witness and mileage fees as are paid to witnesses in the courts of the United States;

(3) to furnish to persons subject to this title such technical assistance as they may request to further their compliance with this title or an order issued thereunder;

(4) upon the request of (i) any employer, whose employees or some of them, or (ii) any labor organization, whose members or some of them, refuse or threaten to refuse to cooperate in effectuating the provisions of this title, to assist in such effectuation by conciliation or such other remedial action as is provided by this title;

(5) to make such technical studies as are appropriate to effectuate the purposes and policies of this title and to make the results of such studies available to the public;

(6) to refer matters to the Attorney General with recommendations for intervention in a civil action brought by an aggrieved party under section 706, or for the institution of a civil action by the Attorney General under section 707, and to advise, consult, and assist the Attorney General on such matters.

(h) Attorneys appointed under this section may, at the direction of the Commission, appear for and represent the Commission in any case in court.

(i) The Commission shall, in any of its educational or promotional activities, cooperate with other departments and agencies in the performance of such educational and promotional activities.

(j) All officers, agents, attorneys, and employees of the Commission shall be subject to the provisions of section 9 of the Act of August 2, 1939, as amended (the Hatch Act), notwithstanding any exemption contained in such section.

◆ Prevention of Unlawful Employment Practices

SEC. 706. (a) Whenever it is charged in writing under oath by a person claiming to be aggrieved, or a written charge has been filed by a member of the Commission where he has reasonable cause to believe a violation of this title has occurred (and such charge sets forth the facts upon which it is based) that an employer, employment agency, or labor organization has engaged in an unlawful employment practice, the Commission shall furnish such employer, employment agency, or labor organization (hereinafter referred to as the "respondent") with a copy of such charge and shall make an investigation of such charge, provided that such charge shall not be made public by the Commission. If the Commission shall determine, after such investigation, that there is reasonable cause to believe that the charge is true, the Commission shall endeavor to eliminate any such alleged unlawful employment practice by informal methods of conference, conciliation, and persuasion. Nothing said or done during and as a part of such endeavors may be made public by the Commission without the written consent of the parties, or used as evidence in a subsequent proceeding. Any officer or employee of the Commission, who shall make public in any manner whatever any information in violation of this subsection shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year.

(b) In the case of an alleged unlawful employment practice occurring in a State, or political subdivision of a State, which has a State or local law prohibiting the unlawful employment practice alleged and establishing or authorizing a State or local authority to grant or seek relief from such practice or to institute criminal proceedings with respect thereto upon receiving notice thereof, no charge may be filed under subsection (a) by the person aggrieved before the expiration of sixty days after proceedings have been commenced under the State or local law, unless such proceedings have been earlier terminated, provided that such sixty-day period shall be extended to one hundred and twenty days during the first year after the effective date of such State or local law. If any requirement for the commencement of such proceedings is imposed by a State or local authority other than a requirement of the filing of a written and signed statement of the facts upon which the proceeding is based, the proceeding shall be deemed to have been commenced for the purposes of this subsection at the time such statement is sent by registered mail to the appropriate State or local authority.

(c) In the case of any charge filed by a member of the Commission alleging an unlawful employment practice occurring in a State or political subdivision of a State, which has a State or local law prohibiting the practice alleged and establishing or authorizing a State or local authority to grant or seek relief from such practice or to institute criminal proceedings with respect thereto upon receiving notice thereof, the Commission shall, before taking any action with respect to such charge, notify the appropriate State or local officials and, upon request, afford them a reasonable time, but not less than sixty days (provided that such sixty-day period shall be extended to one hundred and twenty days during the first year after the effective day of such State or local law), unless a shorter period is requested, to act under such State or local law to remedy the practice alleged.

(d) A charge under subsection (a) shall be filed within ninety days after the alleged unlawful employment practice occurred, except that in the case of an unlawful employment practice with respect to which the person aggrieved has followed the procedure set out in subsection (b), such charge shall be filed by the person aggrieved within two hundred and ten days after the alleged unlawful employment practice occurred, or within thirty days after receiving notice that the State or local agency has terminated the proceedings under the State or local, law, whichever is earlier, and a copy of such charge shall be filed by the Commission with the State or local agency.

(e) If within thirty days after a charge is filed with the Commission or within thirty days after expiration of any period of reference under subsection (c) (except that in either case such period may be extended to not more than sixty days upon a determination by the Commission that further efforts to secure voluntary compliance are warranted), the Commission has been unable to obtain voluntary compliance with this title, the Commission shall so notify the person aggrieved and a civil action may, within thirty days thereafter, be brought against the respondent named in the charge (1) by the person claiming to be aggrieved, or (2) if such charge was filed by a member of the Commission, by any person whom the charge alleges was aggrieved by the alleged unlawful employment practice. Upon application by the complainant and in such circumstances as the court may deem just, the court may appoint an attorney for such complainant and may authorize the commencement of the action without the payment of fees, costs, or security. Upon timely application, the court may, in its discretion, permit the Attorney General to intervene in such civil action if he certifies that the case is of general public importance. Upon request, the court may, in its discretion, stay further proceedings for not more than sixty days pending the termination of State or local proceedings described in subsection (b) or the efforts of the Commission to obtain voluntary compliance.

(f) Each United States district court and each United States court of a place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States shall have jurisdiction of actions brought under this title. Such an action may be brought in any judicial district in the State in which the unlawful employment practice is alleged to have been committed, in the judicial district in which the employment records relevant to such practice are maintained and administered, or in the judicial district in which the plaintiff would have worked but for the alleged unlawful employment practice, but if the respondent is not found within any such district, such an action may be brought within the judicial district in which the respondent has his principal office. For purposes of sections 1404 and 1406 of title 28 of the United States Code, the judicial district in which the respondent has his principal office shall in all cases be considered a district in which the action might have been brought.

(g) If the court finds that the respondent has intentionally engaged in or is intentionally engaging in an unlawful employment practice charged in the complaint, the court may enjoin the respondent from engaging in such unlawful employment practice, and order such affirmative action as may be appropriate, which may include reinstatement or hiring of employees, with or without back pay (payable by the employer, employment agency, or labor organization, as the case may be, responsible for the unlawful employment practice). Interim earnings or amounts earnable with reasonable diligence by the person or persons discriminated against shall operate to reduce the back pay otherwise allowable. No order of the court shall require the admission or reinstatement of an individual as a member of a union or the hiring, reinstatement, or promotion of an individual as an employee, or the payment to him of any back pay, if such individual was refused admission, suspended, or expelled or was refused employment or advancement or was suspended or discharged for any reason other than discrimination on account of race, color, religion, sex or national origin or in violation of section 704(a).

(h) The provisions of the Act entitled "An Act to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes," approved March 23, 1932 (29 U.S.C. 101-115), shall not apply with respect to civil actions brought under this section.

(i) In any case in which an employer, employment agency, or labor organization fails to comply with an order of a court issued in a civil action brought under subsection (e), the Commission may commence proceedings to compel compliance with such order.

(j) Any civil action brought under subsection (e) and any proceedings brought under subsection (i) shall be subject to appeal as provided in sections 1291 and 1292, title 28, United States Code.

(k) In any action or proceeding under this title the court, in its discretion, may allow the prevailing party, other than the Commission or the United States, a reasonable attorney's fee as part of the costs, and the Commission and the United States shall be liable for costs the same as a private person.

SEC. 707. (a) Whenever the Attorney General has reasonable cause to believe that any person or group of persons is engaged in a pattern or practice of resistance to the full enjoyment of any of the rights secured by this title, and that the pattern or practice is of such a nature and is intended to deny the full exercise of the rights herein described, the Attorney General may bring a civil action in the appropriate district court of the United States by filing with it a complaint (1) signed by him (or in his absence the Acting Attorney General), (2) setting forth facts pertaining to such pattern or practice, and (3) requesting such relief, including an application for a permanent or temporary injunction, restraining order or other order against the person or persons responsible for such pattern or practice, as he deems necessary to insure the full enjoyment of the rights herein described.

(b) The district courts of the United States shall have and shall exercise jurisdiction of proceedings instituted pursuant to this section, and in any such proceeding the Attorney General may file with the clerk of such court a request that a court of three judges be convened to hear and determine the case. Such request by the Attorney General shall be accompanied by a certificate that, in his opinion, the case is of general public importance. A copy of the certificate and request for a three-judge court shall be immediately furnished by such clerk to the chief judge of the circuit (or in his absence, the presiding circuit judge of the circuit) in which the case is pending. Upon receipt of such request it shall be the duty of the chief judge of the circuit or the presiding circuit judge, as the case may be, to designate immediately three judges in such circuit, of whom at least one shall be a circuit judge and another of whom shall be a district judge of the court in which the proceeding was instituted, to hear and determine such case, and it shall be the duty of the judges so designated to assign the case for hearing at the earliest practicable date, to participate in the hearing and determination thereof, and to cause the case to be in every way expedited. An appeal from the final judgment of such court will lie to the Supreme Court.

In the event the Attorney General fails to file such a request in any such proceeding, it shall be the duty of the chief judge of the district (or in his absence, the acting chief judge) in which the case is pending immediately to designate a judge in such district to hear and determine the case. In the event that no judge in the district is available to hear and determine the case, the chief judge of the district, or the acting chief judge, as the case may be, shall certify this fact to the chief judge of the circuit (or in his absence, the acting chief judge) who shall then designate a district or circuit judge of the circuit to hear and determine the case.

It shall be the duty of the judge designated pursuant to this section to assign the case for hearing at the earliest practicable date and to cause the case to be in every way expedited.

◆ Effect on State Laws

SEC. 708. Nothing in this title shall be deemed to exempt or relieve any person from any liability, duty, penalty, or punishment provided by any present or future law of any State or political subdivision of a State, other than any such law which purports to require or permit the doing of any act which would be an unlawful employment practice under this title.

◆ Investigations, Inspections, Records, State Agencies

SEC. 709. (a) In connection with any investigation of a charge filed under section 706, the Commission or its designated representative shall at all reasonable times have access to, for the purposes of examination, and the right to copy any evidence of any person being investigated or proceeded against that relates to unlawful employment practices covered by this title and is relevant to the charge under investigation.

(b) The Commission may cooperate with State and local agencies charged with the administration of State fair employment practices laws and, with the consent of such agencies, may for the purpose of carrying out its functions and duties under this title and within the limitation of funds appropriated specifically for such purpose, utilize the services of such agencies and their employees and, notwithstanding any other provision of law, may reimburse such agencies and their employees for services rendered to assist the Commission in carrying out this title. In furtherance of such cooperative efforts, the Commission may enter into written agreements with such State or local agencies and such agreements may include provisions under which the Commission shall refrain from processing a charge in any cases or class of cases specified in such agreements and under which no person may bring a civil action under section 706 in any cases or class of cases so specified, or under which the Commission shall relieve any person or class of persons in such State or locality from requirements imposed under this section. The Commission shall rescind any such agreement whenever it determines that the agreement no longer serves the interest of effective enforcement of this title.

(c) Except as provided in subsection (d), every employer, employment agency, and labor organization subject to this title shall (1) make and keep such records relevant to the determinations of whether unlawful employment practices have been or are being committed, (2) preserve such records for such periods, and (3) make such reports therefrom, as the Commission shall prescribe by regulation or order, after public hearing, as reasonable, necessary, or appropriate for the enforcement of this title or the regulations or orders thereunder. The Commission shall, by regulation, require each employer, labor organization, and joint labor-management committee subject to this title which controls an apprenticeship or other training program to maintain such records as are reasonably necessary to carry out the purpose of this title, including, but not limited to, a list of applicants who wish to participate in such program, including the chronological order in which such applications were received, and shall furnish to the Commission, upon request, a detailed description of the manner in which persons are selected to participate in the apprenticeship or other training program. Any employer, employment agency, labor organization, or joint labor-management committee which believes that the application to it of any regulation or order issued under this section would result in undue hardship may (1) apply to the Commission for an exemption from the application of such regulation or order, or (2) bring a civil action in the United States district court for the district where such records are kept. If the Commission or the court, as the case may be, finds that the application of the regulation or order to the employer, employment agency, or labor organization in question would impose an undue hardship, the Commission or the court, as the case may be, may grant appropriate relief.

(d) The provisions of subsection (c) shall not apply to any employer, employment agency, labor organization, or joint labor-management committee with respect to matters occurring in any State or political subdivision thereof which has a fair employment practice law during any period in which such employer, employment agency, labor organization, or joint labor-management committee is subject to such law, except that the Commission may require such notations on records which such employer, employment agency, labor organization, or joint labor-management committee keeps or is required to keep as are necessary because of differences in coverage or methods of enforcement between the State or local law and the provisions of this title. Where an employer is required by Executive Order 10925, issued March 6, 1961, or by any other Executive order prescribing fair employment practices for Government contractors and subcontractors, or by rules or regulations issued thereunder, to file reports relating to his employment practices with any Federal agency or committee, and he is substantially in compliance with such requirements, the Commission shall not require him to file additional reports pursuant to subsection (c) of this section.

(e) It shall be unlawful for any officer or employee of the Commission to make public in any manner whatever any information obtained by the Commission pursuant to its authority under this section prior to the institution of any proceeding under this title involving such information. Any officer or employee of the Commission who shall make public in any manner whatever any information in violation of this subsection shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not more than one year.

◆ Investigatory Powers

SEC. 710. (a) For the purposes of any investigation of a charge filed under the authority contained in section 706, the Commission shall have authority to examine witnesses under oath and to require the production of documentary evidence relevant or material to the charge under investigation.

(b) If the respondent named in a charge filed under section 706 fails or refuses to comply with a demand of the Commission for permission to examine or to copy evidence in conformity with the provisions of section 709(a), or if any person required to comply with the provisions of section 709(c) or (d) fails or refuses to do so, or if any person fails or refuses to comply with a demand by the Commission to give testimony under oath, the United States district court for the district in which such person is found, resides, or transacts business, shall, upon application of the Commission, have jurisdiction to issue to such person an order requiring him to comply with the provisions of section 709(c) or (d) or to comply with the demand of the Commission, but the attendance of a witness may not be required outside the State where he is found, resides, or transacts business and the production of evidence may not be required outside the State where such evidence is kept.

(c) Within twenty days after the service upon any person charged under section 706 of a demand by the Commission for the production of documentary evidence or for permission to examine or to copy evidence in conformity with the provisions of section 709(a), such person may file in the district court of the United States for the judicial district in which he resides, is found, or transacts business, and serve upon the Commission a petition for an order of such court modifying or setting aside such demand. The time allowed for compliance with the demand in whole or in part as deemed proper and ordered by the court shall not run during the pendency of such petition in the court. Such petition shall specify each ground upon which the petitioner relies in seeking such relief, and may be based upon any failure of such demand to comply with the provisions of this title or with the limitations generally applicable to compulsory process or upon any constitutional or other legal right or privilege of such person. No objection which is not raised by such a petition may be urged in the defense to a proceeding initiated by the Commission under subsection (b) for enforcement of such a demand unless such proceeding is commenced by the Commission prior to the expiration of the twenty-day period, or unless the court determines that the defendant could not reasonably have been aware of the availability of such ground of objection.

(d) In any proceeding brought by the Commission under subsection (b), except as provided in subsection (c) of this section, the defendant may petition the court for an order modifying or setting aside the demand of the Commission.

SEC. 711. (a) Every employer, employment agency, and labor organization, as the case may be, shall post and keep posted in conspicuous places upon its premises where notices to employees, applicants for employment, and members are customarily posted a notice to be prepared or approved by the Commission setting forth excerpts from or, summaries of, the pertinent provisions of this title and information pertinent to the filing of a complaint.

(b) A willful violation of this section shall be punishable by a fine of not more than $100 for each separate offense.

◆ Veterans' Preference

SEC. 712. Nothing contained in this title shall be construed to repeal or modify any Federal, State, territorial, or local law creating special rights or preference for veterans.

◆ Rules and Regulations

SEC. 713. (a) The Commission shall have authority from time to time to issue, amend, or rescind suitable procedural regulations to carry out the provisions of this title. Regulations issued under this section shall be in conformity with the standards and limitations of the Administrative Procedure Act.

(b) In any action or proceeding based on any alleged unlawful employment practice, no person shall be subject to any liability or punishment for or on account of (1) the commission by such person of an unlawful employment practice if he pleads and proves that the act or omission complained of was in good faith, in conformity with, and in reliance on any written interpretation or opinion of the Commission, or (2) the failure of such person to publish and file any information required by any provision of this title if he pleads and proves that he failed to publish and file such information in good faith, in conformity with the instructions of the Commission issued under this title regarding the filing of such information. Such a defense, if established, shall be a bar to the action or proceeding, notwithstanding that (A) after such act or omission, such interpretation or opinion is modified or rescinded or is determined by judicial authority to be invalid or of no legal effect, or (B) after publishing or filing the description and annual reports, such publication or filing is determined by judicial authority not to be in conformity with the requirements of this title.

◆ Forcibly Resisting the Commission or Its Representatives

SEC. 714. The provisions of section 111, title 18, United States Code, shall apply to officers, agents, and employees of the Commission in the performance of their official duties.

◆ Special Study by Secretary of Labor

SEC. 715. The Secretary of Labor shall make a full and complete study of the factors which might tend to result in discrimination in employment because of age and of the consequences of such discrimination on the economy and individuals affected. The Secretary of Labor shall make a report to the Congress not later than June 30, 1965, containing the results of such study and shall include in such report such recommendations for legislation to prevent arbitrary discrimination in employment because of age as he determines advisable.

◆ Effective Date

SEC. 716. (a) This title shall become effective one year after the date of its enactment.

(b) Notwithstanding subsection (a), sections of this title other than sections 703, 704, 706, and 707 shall become effective immediately.

(c) The President shall, as soon as feasible after the enactment of this title, convene one or more conferences for the purpose of enabling the leaders of groups whose members will be affected by this title to become familiar with the rights afforded and obligations imposed by its provisions, and for the purpose of making plans which will result in the fair and effective administration of this title when all of its provisions become effective. The President shall invite the participation in such conference or conferences of (1) the members of the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, (2) the members of the Commission on Civil Rights, (3) representatives of State and local agencies engaged in furthering equal employment opportunity, (4) representatives of private agencies engaged in furthering equal employment opportunity, and (5) representatives of employers, labor organizations, and employment agencies who will be subject to this title.

Title VIII—Registration and Voting Statistics

SEC. 801. The Secretary of Commerce shall promptly conduct a survey to compile registration and voting statistics in such geographic areas as may be recommended by the Commission on Civil Rights. Such a survey and compilation shall, to the extent recommended by the Commission on Civil Rights, only include a count of persons of voting age by race, color, and national origin, and determination of the extent to which such persons are registered to vote, and have voted in any statewide primary or general election in which the Members of the United States House of Representatives are nominated or elected, since January 1, 1960. Such information shall also be collected and compiled in connection with the Nineteenth Decennial Census, and at such other times as the Congress may prescribe. The provisions of section 9 and chapter 7 of title 13, United States Code, shall apply to any survey, collection, or compilation of registration and voting statistics carried out under this title: Provided, however, That no person shall be compelled to disclose his race, color, national origin, or questioned about his political party affiliation, how he voted, or the reasons therefore, nor shall any penalty be imposed for his failure or refusal to make such disclosure. Every person interrogated orally, by written survey or questionnaire or by any other means with respect to such information shall be fully advised with respect to his right to fail or refuse to furnish such information.

Title IX—Intervention and Procedure after Removal in Civil Rights Cases

SEC. 901. Title 28 of the United States Code, section 1447(d), is amended to read as follows:

"An order remanding a case to the State court from which it was removed is not reviewable on appeal or otherwise, except that an order remanding a case to the State court from which it was removed pursuant to section 1443 of this title shall be reviewable by appeal or otherwise."

SEC. 902. Whenever an action has been commenced in any court of the United States seeking relief from the denial of equal protection of the laws under the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution on account of race, color, religion, or national origin, the Attorney General for or in the name of the United States may intervene in such action upon timely application if the Attorney General certifies that the case is of general public importance. In such action the United States shall be entitled to the same relief as if it had instituted the action.

Title X—Establishment of Community Relations Service

SEC. 1001. (a) There is hereby established in and as a part of the Department of Commerce a Community Relations Service (hereinafter referred to as the "Service"), which shall be headed by a Director who shall be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate for a term of four years. The Director is authorized to appoint, subject to the civil service laws and regulations, such other personnel as may be necessary to enable the Service to carry out its functions and duties, and to fix their compensation in accordance with the Classification Act of 1949, as amended. The Director is further authorized to procure services as authorized by section 15 of the Act of August 2, 1946 (60 Stat. 810; 5 U.S.C. 55(a)), but at rates for individuals not in excess of $75 per diem.

(b) Section 106(a) of the Federal Executive Pay Act of 1956, as amended (5 U.S.C. 2205(a)), is further amended by adding the following clause thereto:

"(52) Director, Community Relations Service."

SEC. 1002. It shall be the function of the Service to provide assistance to communities and persons therein in resolving disputes, disagreements, or difficulties relating to discriminatory practices based on race, color, or national origin which impair the rights of persons in such communities under the Constitution or laws of the United States or which affect or may affect interstate commerce. The Service may offer its services in cases of such disputes, disagreements, or difficulties whenever, in its judgment, peaceful relations among the citizens of the community involved are threatened thereby, and it may offer its services either upon its own motion or upon the request of an appropriate State or local official or other interested person.

SEC. 1003. (a) The Service shall, whenever possible, in performing its functions, seek and utilize the cooperation of appropriate State or local, public, or private agencies.

(b) The activities of all officers and employees of the Service in providing conciliation assistance shall be conducted in confidence and without publicity, and the Service shall hold confidential any information acquired in the regular performance of its duties upon the understanding that it would be so held. No officer or employee of the Service shall engage in the performance of investigative or prosecuting functions of any department or agency in any litigation arising out of a dispute in which he acted on behalf of the Service. Any officer or other employee of the Service, who shall make public in any manner whatever any information in violation of this subsection, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year.

SEC. 1004. Subject to the provisions of sections 205 and 1003(b), the Director shall, on or before January 31 of each year, submit to the Congress a report of the activities of the Service during the preceding fiscal year.

Title XI—Miscellaneous

SEC. 1101. In any proceeding for criminal contempt arising under title II, III, IV, V, VI, or VII of this Act, the accused, upon demand therefore, shall be entitled to a trial by jury, which shall conform as near as may be to the practice in criminal cases. Upon conviction, the accused shall not be fined more than $1,000 or imprisoned for more than six months.

This section shall not apply to contempts committed in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, nor to the misbehavior, misconduct, or disobedience of any officer of the court in respect to writs, orders, or process of the court. No person shall be convicted of criminal contempt hereunder unless the act or omission constituting such contempt shall have been intentional, as required in other cases of criminal contempt.

Nor shall anything herein be construed to deprive courts of their power, by civil contempt proceedings, without a jury, to secure compliance with or to prevent obstruction of, as distinguished from punishment for violations of, any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the court in accordance with the prevailing usages of law and equity, including the power of detention.

SEC. 1102. No person should be put twice in jeopardy under the laws of the United States for the same act or omission. For this reason, an acquittal or conviction in a prosecution for a specific crime under the laws of the United States shall bar a proceeding for criminal contempt, which is based upon the same act or omission and which arises under the provisions of this Act; and an acquittal or conviction in a proceeding for criminal contempt, which arises under the provisions of this Act, shall bar a prosecution for a specific crime under the laws of the United States based upon the same act or omission.

SEC. 1103. Nothing in this Act shall be construed to deny, impair, or otherwise affect any right or authority of the Attorney General or of the United States or any agency or officer thereof under existing law to institute or intervene in any action or proceeding.

SEC. 1104. Nothing contained in any title of this Act shall be construed as indicating an intent on the part of Congress to occupy the field in which any such title operates to the exclusion of State laws on the same subject matter, nor shall any provision of this Act be construed as invalidating any provision of State law unless such provision is inconsistent with any of the purposes of this Act, or any provision thereof.

SEC. 1105. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

SEC. 1106. If any provision of this Act or the application thereof to any person or circumstances is held invalid, the remainder of the Act and the application of the provision to other persons not similarly situated or to other circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

"All of this is on account we want to register, to become first class citizens."

Overview

In 1964 at the Democratic National Convention, Fannie Lou Hamer testified before the party's Credentials Committee to explain the atmosphere of fear in which civil rights workers lived in Mississippi and to challenge the moral legitimacy of the state's "regular" delegation to the convention. Hamer and her colleagues from the Mississippi civil rights movement had generated momentum that year through the Freedom Summer project, which accomplished widespread education and registration of African American voters. The activists used this momentum to launch a new political institution, the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party (MFDP), to challenge the legitimacy of the state's traditional Democratic Party. (In the one-party Solid South, the Democratic Party was the only one that mattered.) They did so in part simply to bring national attention to Mississippi, but they also held hopes that their gambit would result in the national Democratic Party's stripping the state's traditional branch of its status and recognizing MFDP members instead as the representatives of the Magnolia State.

Hamer emerged as the group's most eloquent spokesperson. She had distinguished herself as a homegrown leader in the civil rights movement, one who excelled at describing the plight of rural black Mississippians and the changes they sought to bring about in vernacular to which rural black Mississippians themselves responded. When the Democratic National Committee held its quadrennial convention in Atlantic City, New Jersey, at the end of the summer, Hamer was a natural choice to speak on behalf of the MFDP. The Freedom Democrats lodged a formal complaint with the national party over the seating of the "regulars"; the complaint would be adjudicated by the national convention's Credentials Committee. The labor lawyer and Democratic Party insider Joseph L. Rauh, Jr., of Washington, D.C., who represented the MFDP in Atlantic City, called on Hamer to testify before the committee on August 22, 1964.

Context

Fannie Lou Hamer was forty-four years old when she first learned she was even eligible to vote. She made two attempts to register at the courthouse in Sunflower County, Mississippi, before her name finally appeared on the voter rolls in early 1963. At the time, fewer than 3 percent of black Mississippians over the age of twenty-one had been allowed to register to vote in the congressional district that included Hamer's home, and the numbers were little better in the rest of the state. Mississippi's schools were completely segregated providing separate and not even close to equal educational experiences for white and black students. The black schools in Hamer's part of the state, known as the Delta, had school years that were only half as long as those of the white schools, with long breaks for various cycles in cotton production. There were few jobs outside of farming available to African Americans; the separate and unequal system constrained their opportunities. As Hamer once said, "We Negroes know Mississippi education hasn't prepared us to live in any other state."

Mississippi blacks who dared challenge the system found themselves the victims of unimaginable amounts of violence. The state government itself was run by white supremacists for the interests of white supremacists. Indeed, many, if not all, of the most essential Mississippi institutions, from the educational to the political, actively worked to the detriment of black interests. African American activists decided that the state's Democratic Party was in many ways the worst of those institutions. Thus, while black activists worked to create better educational opportunities for their children, desegregate public accommodations, and register more black voters, they also organized to confront the state party.

The 1963 Freedom Vote initiative, also called the Freedom Ballot, was an effort to prove to the rest of the nation that black citizens in the state had been systematically denied the franchise but would exercise it if given the chance. The Council of Federated Organizations, an umbrella group coordinating the efforts of various civil rights groups in Mississippi, organized the Freedom Vote to collect and tally ballots cast by unregistered African American voters. The council accepted the volunteer efforts of several dozen white students from elite colleges to assist with the initiative. In the state's official gubernatorial election that year, with over three hundred thousand ballots cast, the segregationist Democratic lieutenant governor

- August
  Fannie Lou Hamer attends her first civil rights meeting and makes her first attempt at voter registration in Sunflower County, Mississippi.
- December
  Hamer becomes a paid field worker for the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC).

1963

- January
  Hamer's name is added to county voter rolls following her second attempt to register.
- June
  Returning from a citizenship-education and voter-registration workshop in South Carolina sponsored by the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, Hamer is arrested for attempting to desegregate a restaurant in Winona, Mississippi, and badly beaten by town police.
- November
  Mississippi's Council of Federated Organizations conducts the Freedom Vote initiative to demonstrate the political will of the state's African Americans.
- December
  The Council of Federated Organizations agrees to spearhead the 1964 Freedom Summer project, which would include alternative schools, voter-registration drives, and the organization of a shadow party to contest the "regular" Mississippi Democratic Party.

- August 6
  The Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party (MFDP) holds a state convention and announces its intention to challenge the state's "regular" party at the Democratic National Convention, to be held later that month. Hamer is elected vice chair of the MFDP delegation.

Paul B. Johnson, Jr., defeated the surprisingly strong Republican nominee, Reubel L. Phillips. The shadow vote, which was for obvious reasons unsanctioned by the state, gathered more than eighty-three thousand ballots, nearly all of which went for the "Freedom Ticket" of Aaron Henry for governor and the Reverend Edwin King for lieutenant governor. Henry, a black Clarksdale pharmacist, and King, a white chaplain at the integrated Tougaloo College, would both be active in the MFDP.

The Freedom Vote proved the point that black Mississippians wanted to practice the rights of citizenship and provided an organizational model for the following year's Freedom Summer project, but it had few other short-term practical effects. Its long-term effects, while admittedly difficult to quantify, were greater. Black Mississippians had been told all along that they were incapable of being citizens that they were not worth the time and resources it would take to educate them into knowledgeable voters. The Freedom Vote stripped that varnish away and revealed that voting was not, as the terminology of the time put it, simply "white people's business."

During the Freedom Summer of 1964, black and white college-aged volunteers associated with the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and the Congress of Racial Equality spent the summer building and teaching in "freedom schools" throughout the state and registering voters. The freedom schools served a variety of students, from the young to the elderly, and taught a radically alternative curriculum that emphasized the development of critical thinking skills in addition to voter education. It was during this time that the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party was created as a parallel institution to the state's white-dominated Democratic Party. The MFDP was one of the most significant outcomes of the Freedom Summer project. As a demonstration of the political will of Mississippi's African Americans, the MFDP challenged the status of the delegation elected by the nearly all-white "regular" Mississippi Democrats as the rightful representatives of the state at the 1964 Democratic National Convention, held that summer in Atlantic City, New Jersey. Hamer was among the MFDP representatives in attendance at the convention, and regarding the Freedom Democrats' challenge, she was chosen to testify before the convention's Credentials Committee to address the matter.

About the Author

Fannie Lou Townsend was born on October 6, 1917, the last of twenty children to her impoverished sharecropping parents. She first worked in the cotton fields of the Mississippi Delta at the age of six and dropped out of school after the sixth grade to work full time in the fields to help support her family. She married Perry "Pap" Hamer in 1944, and they would sharecrop on the Marlow plantation, on the outskirts of the Sunflower County town of Ruleville, for nearly twenty years. Fannie Lou Hamer's Delta was a land of contrast: She and millions of other blacks endured staggering poverty throughout their lifetimes, but the Delta's cotton economy, made possible by their labors, allowed plantation owners men like the U.S. senator James O. Eastland, Hamer's neighbor to live opulent lifestyles.

Young activists associated with the SNCC and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference moved into the Delta in the early 1960s and began holding community meetings to build support for voter-registration drives among the region's huge African American population. Hamer attended one of the meetings in the summer of 1962 and learned for the first time that she herself was eligible to vote. Hamer's mind began to race while she sat in the meeting, she later recalled. If she could vote, she could improve her community: "I could just see myself votin' people out of office that I know was wrong and didn't do nothin' to help the poor." She traveled with several others from Ruleville to the county seat of Indianola to attempt to register in August 1962; all were denied, and on their return to Ruleville the group was harassed by a state trooper, an Indianola policeman, and several local white segregationists. Because she refused to apologize for or revoke her attempt to register, Hamer was evicted from the Marlow plantation that night. She then decided to take her life into her own hands and threw herself into organizing for the SNCC.

After her eviction from the Marlow plantation, Hamer lived with a succession of friends, never spending more than a few nights at a time in the same place and with good reason, as on September 10, 1962, night riders blasted the homes of three Ruleville families that had stood up for their civil rights. The bullets that ripped into the house of Mary Tucker, the woman who had first introduced Hamer to civil rights work, struck the wall of the bedroom where Hamer had been sleeping only nights before. The incident was one of many in the Delta that fall. James Meredith's attempt to enter the University of Mississippi in nearby Oxford had emboldened white racists to defend segregation and white supremacy by any means necessary. They used horrific amounts of violence and intimidation to keep African American children out of previously all-white schools and deny all blacks their basic rights as citizens.

Hamer would not be intimidated, however. She began speaking and singing to small groups of blacks who showed an interest in standing up for their rights, and before long she embarked on a national fund-raising tour for the SNCC. Hamer's stories about the violent retaliation being inflicted on black would-be voters helped the SNCC raise the profile of its work in Mississippi. Her singing which she invariably included in any public presentation added a religious dimension to the crusade being waged by the civil rights workers. Hamer appropriated and repurposed hymns from the black church, some of which dated back to the struggle against slavery, and used them to share with others her strength for the fight. "This Little Light of Mine" was a particular favorite.

Hamer returned to Ruleville later that fall and dedicated herself to civil rights organizing, accepting full-time employment as a field worker for the SNCC. Hamer devoted herself to the work of distributing food and clothing that had been donated by friends of the SNCC in cities all over the country to African Americans in Sunflower County. Many black farmworkers in the county relied on federally funded, locally administered social welfare programs to make it through the winter (the fallow period of the cotton calendar). When blacks associated with Hamer began agitating for their rights as citizens, local officials made it difficult for them to receive the needed commodities. The SNCC stepped into the breach to provide the supplies, but Hamer, somewhat controversially, imposed a condition: She would dispense food and clothing only to black adults who attempted to register to vote and paid their poll tax. a result, the number of blacks making the trip to the registrar's office in Indianola skyrocketed.

Hamer attended her first citizenship education course at Dorchester, Georgia, in April 1963. Described by a fellow participant as a workshop for people like Hamer who had been deeply involved in civil rights work to "unbrainwash themselves," the citizenship education course taught local people skills they could then take back to their communities. For instance, the course provided basic literacy-education techniques that would help African American would-be voters pass registration tests. Hamer, the Greenwood teenager June Johnson, the Greenwood Southern Christian Leadership Conference activist Annelle Ponder, and a handful of other black Mississippians were selected to attend a second course, in South Carolina, the following month.

Vincent Harding, a civil rights movement participant and later one of its finest historians, was among the instructors at the South Carolina course. He encouraged the workshop attendees to begin living the changes they wanted to create in society. If they wanted to desegregate Mississippi, they had to refuse to be segregated themselves. If they wanted equality in society, they had to refuse to be treated as inferiors. Hamer's group took the lesson to heart. On their way home to the Delta they sat down at a lunch counter reserved for whites only in the town of Columbus, Mississippi. To their surprise, they were served without incident. They repeated the action in the town of Winona, but instead of being served they found themselves arrested and confined to the Montgomery County jail. Hamer's description of the group's treatment in the jail formed the basis of her testimony to the Democratic National Convention's Credentials Committee.

By 1964, when the SNCC, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, the Congress of Racial Equality, and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People coordinated efforts for what became known as the Freedom Summer project, Hamer was an experienced organizer and spokesperson for the SNCC. She epitomized the group's motto, "Let the People Decide": SNCC workers were to go into southern communities and help local blacks define for themselves the problems they faced and design their own solutions. Rather than acting as outside experts, SNCC workers facilitated and encouraged the development of local leaders. The SNCC helped Hamer develop her own abilities, and she reciprocated by taking the group's philosophy into new communities. Blessed with the ability to speak eloquently within the rhetorical tradition of the rural black church and the American political protest tradition, using simple language that anyone could understand, Hamer connected black Mississippians' struggles "to live as decent human beings" as phrased in her testimony with their collective desire to practice their rights as American citizens.

Hamer remained active in the MFDP after the disappointment of Atlantic City, and following four more years of dedication to political work, she was rewarded in being named one of the representatives in the integrated Loyalist coalition sent as the state's delegation to the Democratic National Convention in 1968. In the ensuing years, though she did run for elected office again and supported other black candidates for office, for the most part Hamer turned to alternative strategies for change. She founded Freedom Farm, a cooperative enterprise with high ambitions, in Sunflower County. In its short existence Freedom Farm succeeded in feeding dozens of families who would otherwise have gone hungry, but it proved to be an organizational challenge beyond Hamer's best efforts. She was hospitalized for nervous exhaustion at least twice in the early 1970s as she tried to sustain the farm's operations. Having survived polio as a girl and having fought diabetes, hypertension, and breast cancer as an adult, Hamer finally succumbed on March 14, 1977, to heart failure.

Hamer used plain speech at the Democratic National Convention to describe the hardships she had endured simply because she wanted to exercise the rights of citizenship. She "testified" before the Credentials Committee in two senses of the word: In some ways her speech reads like a legal affidavit attesting to her suffering as a civil rights worker, but she performed as though it were religious testimony. Hamer's appearance was but one part of a multipronged effort to persuade the members of the committee to award Mississippi's seats at the convention to the MFDP, an effort that would take most of an afternoon. Joseph L. Rauh, Jr., handled the legal arguments, and others would also testify as to the electoral benefits the party would reap in the South if the MFDP were seated. Hamer was to inject morality into the equation, and out of the dozens of hours of testimony heard by the Credentials Committee that year, it was Hamer's that everyone remembered.

In her testimony, Hamer recounts the indignities and horrific beatings she endured because she wanted African Americans in Mississippi to be able to vote. Her stories serve as illustrations not only of the determination of African Americans in the Deep South to be treated as equal citizens and human beings but also of the violence it took to maintain the region's system of white supremacy. Would national Democrats stand with the blacks of Mississippi and defend their rights? Hamer put them on the spot and demanded that they do so.

The testimony does include one minor inaccuracy: While the U.S. senator James O. Eastland did live and own a plantation empire in Sunflower County, Senator John C. Stennis did not (as Hamer seems to suggest in her introductory sentence). Everything else stated by Hamer was all too sadly true. The provocation with which she concluded her testimony may not have immediately won the case for the MFDP in the 1964 seating challenge, but it echoed into future conventions, all of which would demand that state delegations be integrated.

Hamer testified immediately following Aaron Henry and Edwin King, the victors of the Freedom Vote; Rita Schwer-ner (the widow of the slain civil rights organizer Michael Schwerner), the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People executive secretary Roy Wilkins, and Martin Luther King, Jr., followed her. Hamer spoke specifically to the 110 members of the Credentials Committee, but because her appearance was to be nationally televised, she delivered her testimony in a way that was intended to bring pressure from Democrats throughout the country on members of the committee and on party leaders, ideally forcing them to recognize the Freedom Democrats as the rightful Mississippi delegation.

President Lyndon B. Johnson, who was worried that white southern voters would break with the party over his handling of civil rights issues and fearful of the scene that would result if the Credentials Committee sided with the MFDP over the "regulars," attempted to defuse the situation by calling a press conference while Hamer testified. His plan backfired. The national television networks ended up broadcasting Hamer's dramatic testimony in full in prime time before a much larger viewing audience than would have been able to see her testify live in the daytime. The attention Hamer's testimony generated made her arguably the most famous poor woman in America at the time.

Impact

If Johnson had hoped that he could ignore the MFDP or sweep the party's concerns under the rug, he was sorely mistaken. Hamer's dramatic testimony brought an emotional dimension to what were normally dry proceedings turning on legalisms. The question of how democratic the Democratic Party's process of selecting state delegations was and the subject of civil rights more generally suddenly became the defining issues of the convention. The president tasked U.S. senator Hubert H. Humphrey, whom Johnson was considering as his nominee for vice president, with fashioning a compromise to satisfy both the MFDP's moral claim for the seats and the national party's desire not to drive white southerners out of the party.

Humphrey settled on a solution whereby Mississippi's "regulars" would be seated, the MFDP would be granted two at-large seats in the convention hall, and all parties concerned would agree to reforms that would democratize and desegregate state delegation procedures in the future. Tellingly, however, the "compromise" dictated that Henry and King would receive the two seats and provided no real chance for the rank and file of the MFDP to vote on whether or not to accept it, much less elect their own representatives. The compromise was accepted for them, but that did not stop the MFDP's membership from debating the settlement among themselves and with leaders from the national party and civil rights establishment. Those debates opened divides that eventually convinced many MFDP members that their interests would be best served outside of traditional electoral politics, or at least outside of the two existing parties. Hamer, for one, rejected the arrangement out of hand: "We didn't come all this way for no two seats," she announced, rejecting the argument that the arrangement at least comprised a moral victory.

Hamer's initial foray into electoral politics left a bad taste in her mouth, but it did not prevent her from returning to Mississippi to campaign for Johnson. She also continued to press for change via the traditional political process. Four MFDP candidates Hamer, Annie Devine, Victoria Gray, and Aaron Henry ran for three U.S. House seats and a U.S. Senate seat in the 1964 election. State officials, however, refused to place their names on the ballot, even though their candidacies met the specifications of state election laws. The officials' decision was foolish; the MFDP candidates could not have won a fair election because there were so few black registered voters at the time, and striking their names from the ballot opened an avenue to legal disputes.

Hamer, Devine, and Gray indeed challenged the seating of the three white U.S. representatives they had tried to run against, through both a federal suit and a House of Representatives rules challenge sponsored by the Democrat William Fitts Ryan of New York. Neither challenge had much hope of succeeding and, in fact, neither did but together they provided another national platform for Hamer and the MFDP. At the very least, Hamer, Devine, and Gray kept the issue of black disenfranchisement in the national spotlight and helped to build momentum for the legislation that would become the Voting Rights Act, signed into law by Johnson in 1965.

The most ignored plank of Humphrey's 1964 compromise the stipulation that state delegations would have to be integrated by 1968 provided what may have been the most important and long-lasting outcome of the 1964 convention challenge. In the months leading up to the 1968 national party convention, Hamer and the MFDP worked in coalition with white liberals, union organizers, and the state civil rights establishment to form the Loyal Democrats of Mississippi, or Loyalists. Again in 1968, the "regulars" systematically excluded blacks from their ranks and demonstrated how undemocratic the state Democratic Party machinery truly was. Again the challengers pressed their case before the national convention's Credentials Committee. This time the rules were indisputable, and the committee sided with the challengers, recognizing the Loyalists as the rightful representatives of Mississippi. The episode's outcome fundamentally altered the operations of the Democratic Party. Just as significantly, coming as it did on the heels of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which brought millions of blacks into the political process for the first time, it changed Democratic intraparty politics in the South forever.

For many Americans, nearly all of whom were introduced to Fannie Lou Hamer via her Atlantic City testimony, the humble civil rights activist was the embodiment of the physical courage and emotional strength demonstrated by black Mississippians in their decades-long efforts to kill Jim Crow. Her testimony offered a powerful moral rebuke to Mississippi officials and helped to convince Americans outside the state that what happened there affected them, too. By demanding to know "Is this America?" as she plaintively wondered, Hamer forced national officials and citizens everywhere to take a side. Ultimately, they took hers.

1. What was the "Solid South," and what role did it play in politics during this time period? What effect did the Solid South and concern about it in Washington, D.C., have on African Americans?

2. What impact did Fannie Lou Hamer and her colleagues have on the civil rights movement? What future events could be said to have grown out of her efforts?

3. Given the experiences that Hamer narrates, it seems almost unimaginable that by the end of the first decade of the twenty-first century, Mississippi had more black elected officials than any other state in the Union. What do you think accounts for this remarkable turnaround?

4. Compare this document with Sojourner Truth's "Ain't I a Woman?" speech. In what ways are the documents similar? How did the two women exercise the same kind of moral authority?

5. Make the argument that if it were not for the growing prevalence of television in American homes beginning in the 1950s, the civil rights movement would have been delayed.

Fannie Lou Hamer's Testimony at the Democratic National Convention

Mr. Chairman, and the Credentials Committee, my name is Mrs. Fannie Lou Hamer, and I live at 626 East Lafayette Street, Ruleville, Mississippi, Sunflower County, the home of Senator James O. Eastland, and Senator Stennis.

It was the 31st of August in 1962 that 18 of us traveled twenty-six miles to the county courthouse in Indianola to try to register to try to become first-class citizens. We was met in Indianola by Mississippi men, highway patrolmens and they only allowed two of us in to take the literacy test at the time. After we had taken this test and started back to Ruleville, we was held up by the City Police and the State Highway Patrolmen and carried back to Indianola, where the bus driver was charged that day with driving a bus the wrong color.

After we paid the fine among us, we continued on to Ruleville, and Reverend Jeff Sunny carried me four miles in the rural area where I had worked as a timekeeper and sharecropper for eighteen years. I was met there by my children, who told me that the plantation owner was angry because I had gone down to try to register.

After they told me, my husband came, and said that the plantation owner was raising cain because I had tried to register, and before he quit talking the plantation owner came, and said, "Fannie Lou, do you know did Pap tell you what I said?"

And I said, "yes, sir."

He said, "I mean that," he said, "If you don't go down and withdraw your registration, you will have to leave," said, "Then if you go down and withdraw," he said, "You will you might have to go because we are not ready for that in Mississippi."

And I addressed him and told him and said, "I didn't try to register for you. I tried to register for myself." I had to leave that same night.

On the 10th of September, 1962, sixteen bullets was fired into the home of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Tucker for me. That same night two girls were shot in Ruleville, Mississippi. Also Mr. Joe McDonald's house was shot in.

And in June, the 9th, 1963, I had attended a voter registration workshop, was returning back to Mississippi. Ten of us was traveling by the Continental Trailway bus. When we got to Winona, Mississippi, which is in Montgomery County, four of the people got off to use the washroom, and two of the people to use the restaurant two of the people wanted to use the washroom. The four people that had gone in to use the restaurant was ordered out. During this time I was on the bus. But when I looked through the window and saw they had rushed out, I got off of the bus to see what had happened, and one of the ladies said, "It was a state highway patrolman and a chief of police ordered us out."

I got back on the bus and one of the persons had used the washroom got back on the bus, too. As soon as I was seated on the bus, I saw when they began to get the four people in a highway patrolman's car. I stepped off of the bus to see what was happening and somebody screamed from the car that the four workers was in and said, "Get that one there," and when I went to get in the car, when the man told me I was under arrest, he kicked me.

I was carried to the county jail, and put in the booking room. They left some of the people in the booking room and began to place us in cells. I was placed in a cell with a young woman called Miss Euvester Simpson. After I was placed in the cell I began to hear the sound of licks and horrible screams, and I could hear somebody say, "Can you say, yes sir, nigger? Can you say yes, sir?"

And they would say other horrible names. She would say, "Yes, I can say yes, sir."

"So say it."

She says, "I don't know you well enough."

They beat her, I don't know how long, and after a while she began to pray, and asked God to have mercy on those people.

And it wasn't too long before three white men came to my cell. One of these men was a State Highway Patrolman and he asked me where I was from, and I told him Ruleville, he said, "We are going to check this." And they left my cell and it wasn't too long before they came back. He said, "You are from Ruleville all right," and he used a curse work, and he said, "We are going to make you wish you was dead."

I was carried out of that cell into another cell where they had two Negro prisoners. The State Highway Patrolmen ordered the first Negro to take the blackjack. The first Negro prisoner ordered me, by orders from the State Highway Patrolman for me, to lay down on a bunk bed on my face, and I laid on my face. The first Negro began to beat, and I was beat by the first Negro until he was exhausted, and I was holding my hands behind me at that time on my left side because I suffered from polio when I was six years old. After the first Negro had beat until he was exhausted the State Highway Patrolman ordered the second Negro to take the blackjack.

The second Negro began to beat and I began to work my feet, and the State Highway Patrolman ordered the first Negro who had beat to set on my feet to keep me from working my feet. I began to scream and one white man got up and began to beat me my head and told me to hush. One white man my dress had worked up high, he walked over and pulled my dress down and he pulled my dress back, back up.

I was in jail when Medgar Evers was murdered.

All of this is on account we want to register, to become first-class citizens, and if the freedom Democratic Party is not seated now, I question America, is this America, the land of the free and the home of the brave where we have to sleep with our telephones off of the hooks because our lives be threatened daily because we want to live as decent human beings, in America?

Thank you.

Malcolm X: "After the Bombing"

1965

"This society is controlled primarily by racists and segregationists ... who are in Washington, D.C., in positions of power."

Overview

On February 14, 1965, the African American activist Malcolm X addressed a crowd consisting primarily of college students at the Henry and Edsel Ford Auditorium in Detroit, Michigan, in what would be his final speech. The occasion of his speech was an event that had taken place the night before: the firebombing of his house in Queens, New York. He used this opportunity to address a wide range of issues of concern to him and to the African American community.

Born Malcolm Little in 1925, Malcolm X had witnessed racism firsthand as a child. He turned to a life of crime and was eventually convicted and incarcerated. While he was in prison, he converted to the religion known as the Nation of Islam. Throughout the 1950s and early 1960s, he was second only to the Nation of Islam's leader, Elijah Muhammad, as the public face of that organization. The Nation of Islam advocated African American separatism and pan-African unity and denounced nonviolence as a workable tactic for the civil rights movement. In 1964, though, Malcolm X broke with Muhammad but continued to speak out against racism and oppression worldwide. He converted to Sunni Islam, which he believed offered a path to racial harmony without requiring black separatism. The speech delivered at the Ford Auditorium in 1965 reflected this post Nation of Islam viewpoint, especially with respect to Malcolm X's view of colonialism and the need for unity between Africans and African Americans as well as his insistence that sometimes victims of oppression must resist "by any means necessary." His break with the Nation of Islam had resulted in death threats and the firebombing of his house. Just a week after his speech, Malcolm X was assassinated by members of the Nation of Islam.

Context

Malcolm X's final speech was given in the context of troubled times, with civil rights issues, the Vietnam War, and assassinations making the headlines and in the forefront of Americans' minds. The last years of Malcolm X's life corresponded with the heyday of the civil rights movement in the United States. While its roots extend back to the formation of the Republic, the modern civil rights movement can be said to have begun in May 1954 with the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Brown v. Board of Education. This decision brought about the desegregation of public education nationwide by striking down the separate-but-equal doctrine that had been enshrined in the Court's Plessy v. Ferguson decision issued in 1896. After the Brown decision, events in the civil rights movement unfolded rapidly, beginning with Rosa Parks's refusal to give up her seat on a bus to a white man, an event that sparked the Montgomery, Alabama, bus boycott of 1955 and 1956. It was this event that brought the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., to national prominence and made him the face of the civil rights movement.

In 1957 the nation's conscience was pricked when troops from the 101st Airborne Division had to protect black students who were trying to enroll at Central High School in Little Rock, Arkansas, after the state's governor, Orval Faubus, had resisted a federal order to integrate the school. Later, in 1963, Alabama Governor George Wallace tried to prevent the integration of the University of Alabama, going so far as to physically block the path of two black students who wanted to register for classes. The sit-in became a tool in the civil rights arsenal after college students in Greensboro, North Carolina, in 1960 peaceably sat at a segregated lunch counter at a Woolworth's store. The Freedom Rides of 1961, in which blacks and whites rode buses throughout the South and integrated restrooms, bus terminals, and drinking fountains, often led to violence when the Freedom Riders were attacked.

Voter registration drives, too, prompted violence in the South; in an infamous incident in June 1964, three civil rights workers were murdered by the Ku Klux Klan in Mississippi. In the spring of 1963, Americans were shocked by the heavy-handed tactics of Eugene "Bull" Connor, the commissioner of public safety in Birmingham, Alabama, after Martin Luther King. Jr., and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, a civil rights organization, organized a movement to integrate public facilities and places of business in the city's downtown. After King had led a march on the Birmingham city hall, he was arrested and briefly imprisoned; it was then that he wrote his famous "Letter from Birmingham Jail." Later that year, in September, four girls were killed in a Klan bombing of Birming-ham's Sixteenth Street Baptist Church. Also in 1963, Medgar Evers, a prominent civil rights leader, was murdered outside his home in Mississippi by a Klan member, dying just hours after President John F. Kennedy had delivered a major televised national address on civil rights. This address prefigured the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which was passed during the presidency of Lyndon B. Johnson after Kennedy's assassination in November 1963.

Also on the nation's mind was the deepening American involvement in Vietnam. In early August 1964, two U.S. naval destroyers in the Gulf of Tonkin reported having been attacked by Communist North Vietnamese forces. On August 5, Congress passed the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution by a unanimous vote in the House of Representatives and with just two nays in the Senate. This resolution (based on what seems to have been a false report) gave President Johnson the authority to send combat troops to South Vietnam. Less than one month after Malcolm X's death in February 1965, the first U.S. combat troops thirty-five hundred Marines joined twenty-three thousand U.S. military advisers already in Vietnam. By the end of 1965, nearly two hundred thousand American troops would be in Vietnam.

To some extent, turmoil within the Nation of Islam reflected the turmoil within U.S. society. The Nation of Islam had been formed in Detroit in 1930 by Wallace D. Fard, also known as Wallace D. Fard Muhammad. After Fard's disappearance in 1934, leadership of the Nation of Islam was assumed by one of his disciples, Elijah Poole, who later took the name Elijah Muhammad. One of the central tenets of the Nation of Islam was that African American youth were being put at a disadvantage by the nation's schools. Accordingly, the Nation of Islam established its own schools in various cities, often placing themselves at odds with state and local authorities because the schools were unaccredited. Although the Nation of Islam's members professed to be Muslims, they departed from traditional Islam in a number of important respects, notably in their belief that Fard was not only the Messiah of Christianity but also the Mahdi, or redeemer, of Islam. The Nation of Islam's teachings emphasized resistance to white supremacy. The organization argued that slavery and the African diaspora had been designed to deprive Africans of knowledge of their history, that blacks were the original humans, and that black separatism was the only hope for black Americans.

Throughout the late 1950s and early 1960s, Malcolm X was one of the Nation of Islam's most prominent spokesmen. He was also a highly controversial figure because of his belief that blacks were genetically superior to whites and for his provocative statements such as his remark that the white man was a "blue-eyed devil." That comment came at a time when he was fully under the influence of Elijah Muhammad and his belief that all whites were evil, a position Malcolm X would renounce after his conversion to Sunni Islam. Perhaps he referred to whites by reference to eye color rather than skin color because of his own lighter-than-average skin, a result of the fact that his mother was half white. Regardless of his skin tone, he became famous in large part through his inflammatory speeches and his public persona as an angry black man. He was critical of mainstream civil rights leaders such as Martin Luther King, rejecting King's doctrine of nonviolence and the Christian religion that was the source of King's inspiration.

In contrast to more radical groups such as the Black Panthers, Malcolm X did not preach revolution but rather a doctrine of self-help. He and his followers resisted confrontations with the police, arguing that the black community should police itself. He spoke with such power and eloquence that he was able to attract followers and supporters from outside the Nation of Islam, and it was this that had led to tensions between him and Elijah Muhammad and the Nation of Islam at large. When Malcolm X discovered that Muhammad had been having affairs with his secretaries, he became disillusioned with Muhammad and began to modify some of his positions. In particular, his travels in the Middle East convinced him that black separatism was not the path to racial equality and that Sunni Islam could provide a source of unity for peoples of all colors. Thus, just as King was growing more militant because of his opposition to the Vietnam War, Malcolm X was moving toward some of King's earlier positions. All of these strands of thought underpinned Malcolm X's final speech at Ford Auditorium in February 1965.

About the Author

Malcolm X was born Malcolm Little on May 19, 1925, in Omaha, Nebraska. Early in his life, he was exposed to issues of race and racism. His father, Earl Little, was a Baptist preacher and a supporter of Marcus Garvey, the flamboyant founder of the Universal Negro Improvement Association. The elder Little moved the family first to Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and then to Lansing, Michigan, to avoid death threats, but in 1929 the family's Lansing house was burned. Then, in 1931, Earl Little was killed by a streetcar in what authorities ruled was an accident. Malcolm, who was six at the time, believed that white supremacists had murdered Earl Little and made it appear to have been an accident.

Malcolm's mother, Louise Little, was half Scottish, and he had inherited light skin and reddish hair from her traits that troubled him throughout his life. Louise's mental condition deteriorated after Earl's death, and several years later she was declared insane; Malcolm and his six siblings were then sent to foster homes. Initially a good student, Malcolm dropped out of school in the eighth grade after a white teacher told him that his goal of becoming a lawyer was unrealistic for an African American. After living in several foster homes, Malcolm moved to Boston to live with an older sister in 1941. He drifted through various jobs in various cities, but in 1943 he landed in New York City's Harlem, where he became involved in a variety of criminal activities. He returned to Boston, where he continued his involvement in illegal enterprises. He was arrested and in early 1946 sentenced to eight to ten years at the Massachusetts State Prison on charges of larceny and breaking and entering. Although he was initially hostile to all religion, while in prison he became acquainted with Elijah Muhammad's Nation of Islam. He corresponded with Elijah Muhammad and by 1948, while still in prison, had become a member of the Nation of Islam.

When Malcolm was released in 1952, he visited Elijah Muhammad in Chicago and changed his last name from Little to X. As he stated in his autobiography, "For me, my 'X' replaced the white slavemaster name of 'Little' which some blue-eyed devil named Little had imposed upon my paternal forebears." In 1953, a year that also marked the beginning of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's surveillance of Malcolm X, he became an assistant minister at Temple No. 1 in Detroit (Nation of Islam temples were numbered in the order in which they were founded). He rose rapidly in the Nation of Islam through his tireless work and convincing rhetorical style. In his speeches, he advocated separatism for African Americans and rejected the more mainstream civil rights movement's call for nonviolence. His mesmerizing speeches helped increase membership in the Nation of Islam dramatically.

Shortly after the death of President John F. Kennedy in 1963, Malcolm X delivered a speech he had prepared titled "God's Judgment of White America," which expressed his familiar theme based on the biblical statement "As you sow, so shall you reap." His point was that white America would be punished by God for its racism and hypocrisy. Thus, when asked after the speech about the Kennedy assassination, he made an easy transition from the biblical quote to the more colloquial expression of the same meaning, about the "chickens coming home to roost," a remark he later said he delivered "without a second thought." Angry whites, he believed, had not stopped at killing innocent blacks but had killed their own president as well. He believed that many people around the world agreed with the notion that America's "climate of hate" had caused the assassination, but controversy sparked when the media seized on his remarks unfairly, he contended. Nonetheless, he was censured by the Nation of Islam and told he could not speak publicly for ninety days as a result of the remark.

That incident represented growing tension between Malcolm X and the Nation of Islam. In 1964 he broke with Elijah Muhammad after his discovery that Muhammad had engaged in a series of affairs with his secretaries. Malcolm X then founded Muslim Mosque, Inc., a religious organization, and, on the secular side, the Organization of Afro-American Unity. He also converted to the Sunni branch of Islam and made a pilgrimage to Mecca, Saudi Arabia, that spring. This pilgrimage led to an epiphany of sorts, for he came to believe that Islam could be a means to eliminate racial divisions. After the pilgrimage, he traveled throughout Africa, where he met with many prominent African leaders, and also visited Europe.

As Malcolm X continued his speaking engagements in the United States, he began receiving death threats from members of the Nation of Islam, which also sued to recover the New York City house in the borough of Queens in which he and his family were living. The Nation won the suit, but a hearing was scheduled for February 14, 1965, to argue for a postponement of his eviction date. However, the house was firebombed in the early-morning hours of that day. That evening, he delivered his "After the Bombing" address. This would prove to be his last speech, for on February 21, 1965, as he was speaking at a meeting of the Organization of Afro-American Unity, he was attacked by three men and shot to death. The three men, all members of the Nation of Islam, were convicted in the shooting.

Malcolm X's final speech, a portion of which is reproduced here, ranged over a broad variety of topics. But his first remarks place the speech in context. He begins, "Distinguished guests, brothers and sisters, ladies and gentlemen, friends and enemies." Although the FBI had opened a file on Malcolm X and monitored his activities, at this point he had more reason to be concerned about Black Muslims, who had made death threats against him and were the likely suspects in the firebombing of his house. Since he escaped the firebombing with literally the clothes on his back, he asks his audience to excuse his appearance.

◆ Colonialism and the African Revolution

Malcolm X then turns to the substantive points of his speech. First, he addresses the independence movements in Africa, arguing that the United States, along with Great Britain and France, was more worried about these movements than similar ones in Latin America and Asia because of the large number of African Americans in the United States. This statement reflects one of his persistent themes: stressing the unity of all persons of African origin, whether they were still in Africa or were part of the African diaspora in the United States and elsewhere. At the time, Africa and other portions of the world were throwing off colonialism. India had achieved independence from Great Britain in 1948, Algeria had begun to free itself from French influence with the Proclamation of the Algerian National Front in 1954, Patrice Lumumba had issued the Proclamation of Congolese Independence in 1960, and the Palestinian National Charter was adopted in May 1964. These and other events signaled a profound shift in the relationships between former colonial powers and nations in the developing world.

Malcolm X then castigates the African Americans he had seen while in Africa, arguing that they were "just socializing, [that] they had turned their back on the cause over here." He compares those African Americans unfavorably to people of African heritage in countries such as Ghana or Tanzania. He then goes on to describe his organizational efforts throughout Africa, in particular the establishment of a branch of the Organization of Afro-American United. Later, he organized a similar group in Paris.

◆ The Power Structure

Malcolm X points to what he regards as the fear of the colonial powers, arguing that colonialism and imperialism are not just confined to the United States, which, he says, is "in cahoots" with Britain and France. He sees this alignment as an effort to "suppress the masses of dark-skinned people all over the world and exploit them of their natural resources." He argues that "the newly awakened people all over the world pose a problem for what's known as Western interests … imperialism, colonialism, racism, and all these other negative isms or vulturistic isms." He then expresses his advocacy for a coalition of Africans, African Americans, Arabs, and Asians, which he says could be perceived as threatening by Western powers. In this context, he speaks of his meetings with Presidents Julius K. Nyerere of Tanzania, Jomo Kenyatta of Kenya, Nnamdi Azikiwe of Nigeria, Kwame Nkrumah of Ghana, and Ahmed Sékou Touré of Guinea, all of whom were major national figures in African independence movements who also supported the advancement of African Americans. Malcolm X also speaks of his meeting with Gamal Abdel Nasser of Egypt, who recently had challenged the West by nationalizing the Suez Canal, provoking an international crisis and threatening to cut off oil exports. He notes, too, the plight of "dark-skinned people in the Western Hemisphere," including people in Venezuela, Honduras, and other Central American countries, as well as the United States and Canada.

◆ Racism and Religion

Malcolm X then turns to issues of racism and religion, stating: "I don't believe in any form of racism. I don't believe in any form of discrimination or segregation. I believe in Islam. I am a Muslim." He stresses the unity of the three monotheistic religions Judaism, Christianity, and Islam and asserts that all believe in the same God and that Muhammad of Islam was simply the last in a line of prophets that stretched back to Abraham and had included Moses and Jesus. This theme of religious unity had started to appear in his speeches after his break with the Nation of Islam and his pilgrimage to Mecca ("Makkah" in the document). He goes on to observe that the religious beliefs espoused by the Nation of Islam were not "the real religion of Islam." He states that in reality Islam "doesn't teach anyone to judge another human being by the color of his skin" but rather judges people by their deeds. He indicates his rejection of the Black Muslim movement because it "didn't have the real religion of Islam." He comments favorably on his experience in Mecca, where "white" was simply an adjective. "White," he says, is a different thing in America, an indication of presumed racial superiority.

◆ Nonviolence

Malcolm X then articulates his position on violence in a "society … controlled primarily by racists and segregationists," the government of which has continued to perpetrate violence in such places as Saigon and Hanoi (in Vietnam) and the Congo. He states that he has "never advocated any violence" but adds that African Americans should defend themselves from violence perpetrated by the Ku Klux Klan and other groups. In contrast, Malcolm X views the efforts of those African Americans who have attempted to overcome violence solely with the "capacity to love" as disgraceful and even encouraging of further acts of violence against blacks. He points out the hypocrisy of the position of nonviolence, noting that governments perpetrate violence in many places in the world but then urge blacks to remain nonviolent in the face of lynchings. He also takes the mass media to task for creating the impression that he advocates violence.

At this point in his speech, Malcolm X builds to perhaps his most notorious statement. He discusses the "language" that racists understand, the language of "brute force," which cannot be met merely with overtures of peace. He states that since the Klan knows "one language," victims of the Klan's oppression need to "start learning a new language" that the Klan understands. He characterizes the Klan as a "cowardly outfit" that has been able to remain safe only by making blacks afraid. He then quotes the words of Christ as he was being crucified "Forgive them, Lord, they know not what they do" while bitterly noting how some blacks might have uttered something similar as the lynch rope was being placed around their necks. Unlike Christ's persecutors, the lynch mobs, says Malcolm, have very much known what they've been doing and have had plenty of practice at it. He then observes that, because the federal government is unwilling to take action, it is the duty of African Americans to organize themselves and stop the actions of the Klan. He concludes this portion of the speech by repeating his statement that he does not believe in violence, which is why he wants to stop violence. Violence cannot be stopped with love but only by "vigorous action in self-defense." That action, he says, is to be initiated "by any means necessary." In the view of many observers, this statement was a call to arms literally. This remark was taken out of context and was later used to accuse Malcolm X and his followers of having advocated violence.

Audience

Although Malcolm X enjoyed speaking before college audiences and was not averse to speaking to white and mixed audiences after his conversion from the Nation of Islam to Sunni Islam, he most often spoke in large cities in the Northeast, Midwest, and West before audiences of African Americans, many of whom may have been part of the civil rights movement but were discouraged with the speed of change the movement had thus far realized. With respect to the audience, then, his last speech, taking place in Detroit, Michigan, was typical northern, urban, and primarily though not exclusively black. The audience would not have contained any members of the Nation of Islam, as members of that organization were forbidden to attend his speeches, but would have included members of his Organization of Afro-American Unity.

Impact

Malcolm X's speeches, whether delivered for the Nation of Islam or later, like this one, on his own, always had significant effects on his audience. He was a forceful speaker who always drew listeners to his cause. His "After the Bombing" speech is well remembered and often used in anthologies because it was his last, but the main points could have been taken from many of the speeches he delivered in the final period of his life. He forcefully advocated community action paired with African American self-help; the rejection of tobacco, alcohol, drugs, and promiscuity; and, in his later years, unity regardless of race or religion. He also refused to forswear violence, though condoning it only in self-defense. In this respect he served as a counterbalance to Martin Luther King, Jr.'s nonviolent positions.

Indeed, Malcolm X's impact was in part based on his distinction from other black leaders. He specifically rejected the nonviolence of King and his followers, who advocated a civil rights movement that looked to the gradual integration of African Americans into American society. He also took issue with black churches and the role of Christianity in thwarting the hopes of African Americans. But by 1965 Malcolm X had evolved beyond his role as a Black Muslim dissenter and rejected the black separatism of the Nation of Islam. The change he underwent was seen less in his public speeches and more in his autobiography, in which he examines his life as a spiritual and political pilgrimage that in the end led him to question his radicalism and his views about revolution and the white power structure. Published after his death, The Autobiography of Malcolm X inspired and continues to inspire African Americans and others and remains required reading in many high schools and colleges.

Despite some softening of his positions, Malcolm X became no less assertive in his determination to secure freedom for black America. As an outspoken black leader who had abandoned the politics of black nationalism, he became a symbol of the individual's role in interpreting and making history. Historically, though, Malcolm X exemplified one extreme of black protest. In the 1950s and early 1960s the public saw him as the opposite of King, but through his evolution as a thinker and public leader, his critique of American culture in part began to converge with King's. Beyond that, the self-criticism with which Malcolm X infused the discussion of African American lives makes him a figure who transcends the particular views he expressed in his speeches, including "After the Bombing." One can only speculate what he might have done and said given more time to evolve his views. His was an independent mind searching the world over for a version of truth.

1. At the time, Malcolm X was regarded as a bit of a frightening figure by mainstream America—and perhaps he still is. Why do you think this was so? Based on his speech, how "frightening" do you think Malcolm X really was?

2. Why did Malcolm X break with the Nation of Islam and black nationalism? To what extent do you think his defection weakened that organization?

3. On what basis did Malcolm X castigate American blacks he encountered in Africa?

4. Malcolm X was often regarded as a foil to Martin Luther King, Jr., and the two men were seen as standing on opposite poles of the civil rights movement. On what basis did people think this? Do you believe that this is an accurate comparison? Explain.

5. Imagine that Malcolm X had not been assassinated. What impact do you think he might have had on the civil rights and antiwar movements of the late 1960s and into the 1970s?

Malcolm X: "After the Bombing"

Distinguished guests, brothers and sisters, ladies and gentlemen, friends and enemies:

I want to point out first that I am very happy to be here this evening and I'm thankful [to the Afro-American Broadcasting Company] for the invitation to come here to Detroit this evening. I was in a house last night that was bombed, my own. It didn't destroy all my clothes, not all, but you know what happens when fire dashes through they get smoky. The only thing I could get my hands on before leaving was what I have on now.

It isn't something that made me lose confidence in what I am doing, because my wife understands and I have children from this size on down, and even in their young age they understand. I think they would rather have a father or brother or whatever the situation may be who will take a stand in the face of any kind of reaction from narrow-minded people rather than to compromise and later on have to grow up in shame and in disgrace.

So I just ask you to excuse my appearance. I don't normally come out in front of people without a shirt and a tie. I guess that's somewhat a holdover from the "Black Muslim" movement, which I was in. That's one of the good aspects of that movement. It teaches you to be very careful and conscious of how you look, which is a positive contribution on their part. But that positive contribution on their part is greatly offset by too many other liabilities.…

Tonight one of the things that has to be stressed is that which has not only the United States very much worried but which also has France, Great Britain, and most of the powers, who formerly were known as colonial powers, worried also, and that primarily is the African revolution. They are more concerned with the revolution that's taking place on the African continent than they are with the revolution in Asia and in Latin America. And this is because there are so many people of African ancestry within the domestic confines or jurisdiction of these various governments.

There are four different types of people in the Western Hemisphere, all of whom have Africa as a common heritage, common origin, and that's the those of our people in Latin America, who are Black, but who are in the Spanish-speaking areas. Many of them ofttimes migrate back to Spain, the only difference being Spain has such bad economic conditions until many of the people from Latin America don't think it's worthwhile to migrate back there. And then the British and the French had a great deal of control in the Caribbean, in the West Indies. And so now you have many people from the West Indies migrating to both London rather both England and France. The people from the British West Indies go to London, and those from the French West Indies go to Paris. And it has put France and England since World War II in the precarious position of having a sort of a commonwealth structure that makes it easy for all of the people in the commonwealth territories to come into their country with no restrictions. So there's an increasing number of dark-skinned people in England and also in France.

When I was in Africa in May, I noticed a tendency on the part of the Afro-Americans to, what I call lollygag. Everybody else who was over there had something on the ball, something they were doing, something constructive. For instance, in Ghana, just to take Ghana as an example. There would be many refugees in Ghana from South Africa. But those who were in Ghana were organized and were serving as pressure groups, some were training for military some were being trained in how to be soldiers, but others were involved as a pressure group or lobby group to let the people of Ghana never forget what's happening to the brother in South Africa. Also you'd have brothers there from Angola and Mozambique. But all of the Africans who were exiles from their particular country and would be in a place like Ghana or Tanganyika, now Tanzania, they would be training. Their every move would still be designed to offset what was happening to their people back home where they had left.

The only difference on the continent was the American Negro. Those who were over there weren't even thinking about these over here. This was the basic difference. The Africans, when they escaped from their respective countries that were still colonized, they didn't try and run away from the problem. But as soon as they got where they were going, they then began to organize into pressure groups to get governmental support at the international level against the injustices they were experiencing back home.

And as I said, the American Negro, or the Afro-American, who was in these various countries, some working for this government, some working for that government, some just in business they were just socializing, they had turned their back on the cause over here, they were partying, you know.

And when I went through one country in particular, I heard a lot of their complaints and I didn't make any move on them.

But when I got to another country, I found the Afro-Americans there were making the same complaints. So we sat down and talked and we organized a branch in this particular country, a branch of the OAAU, Organization of Afro-American Unity. That one was the only one in existence at that time. Then during the summer, when I went back to Africa, I was able in each country that I visited, to get the Afro-American community together and organize them and make them aware of their responsibility to those of us who are still here in the lion's den.

They began to do this quite well, and when I got to Paris and London there are many Afro-Americans in Paris, and many in London. And in December no, November we organized a group in Paris and just within a very short time they had grown into a well-organized unit. And they, in conjunction with the African community, invited me to Paris, Tuesday, to address a large gathering of Parisians and Afro-Americans and people from the Caribbean and also from Africa who were interested in our struggle in this country and the rate of progress that we have been making.

But since the French government and the British government and this government here, the United States, know that I have been almost fanatically stressing the importance of the Afro-American uniting with the African and working as a coalition, especially in areas which are of mutual benefit to all of us. And the governments in these different places were frightened because they know that the Black revolution that's taking place on the outside of their house.

And I might point out right here that colonialism or imperialism, as the slave system of the West is called, is not something that's just confined to England or France or the United States. But the interests in this country are in cahoots with the interests in France and the interests in Britain. It's one huge complex or combine, and it creates what's known as not the American power structure or the French power structure, but it's an international power structure. And this international power structure is used to suppress the masses of dark-skinned people all over the world and exploit them of their natural resources.

So that the era in which you and I have been living during the past ten years most specifically has witnessed the upsurge on the part of the Black man in Africa against the power structure.

He wants his freedom.

Now, mind you, the power structure is international, and as such, its own domestic base is in London, in Paris, in Washington, D.C., and so forth. And the outside or external phase of the revolution, which is manifest in the attitude and action of the Africans today is troublesome enough. The revolution on the outside of the house, or the outside of the structure, is troublesome enough. But now the powers that be are beginning to see that this struggle on the outside by the Black man is affecting, infecting the Black man who is on the inside of that structure. I hope you understand what I'm trying to say.

The newly awakened people all over the world pose a problem for what's known as Western interests, which is imperialism, colonialism, racism, and all these other negative isms or vulturistic isms. Just as the external forces pose a grave threat, they can now see that the internal forces pose an even greater threat. But the internal forces pose an even greater threat only when they have properly analyzed the situation and know what the stakes really are.

Just by advocating a coalition of Africans, Afro-Americans, Arabs, and Asians who live within the structure, it automatically has upset France, which is supposed to be one of the most liberal heh! countries on earth, and it made them expose their hand. England the same way. And I don't have to tell you about this country that we are living in now.

So when you count the number of dark-skinned people in the Western Hemisphere you can see that there are probably over 100 million. When you consider Brazil has two-thirds what we call colored, or nonwhite, and Venezuela, Honduras and other Central American countries, Cuba and Jamaica, and the United States and even Canada when you total all these people up, you have probably over 100 million. And this 100 million on the inside of the power structure today is what is causing a great deal of concern for the power structure itself.

Not a great deal of concern for all white people, but a great deal of concern for most white people. See, if I said "all white people" then they would call me a racist for giving a blanket condemnation of things.

And this is true; this is how they do it. They take one little word out of what you say, ignore all the rest, and then begin to magnify it all over the world to make you look like what you actually aren't. And I'm very used to that.

So we saw that the first thing to do was to unite our people, not only unite us internally, but we have to be united with our brothers and sisters abroad. It was for that purpose that I spent five months in the Middle East and Africa during the summer. The trip was very enlightening, inspiring, and fruitful. I didn't go into any African country, or any country in the Middle East for that matter, and run into any closed door, closed mind, or closed heart. I found a warm reception and an amazingly deep interest and sympathy for the Black man in this country in regards to our struggle for human rights.

While I was traveling, I had a chance to speak in Cairo, or rather Alexandria, with President [Gamal Abdel-]Nasser for about an hour and a half. He's a very brilliant man. And I can see why they're so afraid of him, and they are afraid of him they know he can cut off their oil. And actually the only thing power respects is power. Whenever you find a man who's in a position to show power against power then that man is respected. But you can take a man who has power and love him all the rest of your life, nonviolently and forgivingly and all the rest of those ofttime things, and you won't get anything out of it.

So I also had a chance to speak to President [Julius K.] Nyerere in Tanganyika, which is now Tanzania, and also [President Jomo] Kenyata I know that all of you know him. He was the head of the Mau Mau, which really brought freedom to many of the African countries. This is true. The Mau Mau played a major role in bringing about freedom for Kenya, and not only for Kenya but other African countries. Because what the Mau Mau did frightened the white man so much in other countries until he said, "Well I better get this thing straight before some of them pop up here." This is good to study because you see what makes him react: Nothing loving makes him react, nothing forgiving makes him react. The only time he reacts is when he knows you can hurt him, and when you let him know you can hurt him he has to think two or three times before he tries to hurt you. But if you're not going to do nothing but return that hurt with love why good night! He knows you're out of your mind.

And also I had an opportunity to speak with President [Nnamdi] Azikiwe in Nigeria, President [Kwame] Nkrumah in Ghana, and President Sekou Toure in Guinea. And in all of these people I found nothing but warmth, friendship, sympathy, and a desire to help the Black man in this country in fighting our problem. And we have a very complex problem.

Before I get involved in anything nowadays, I have to straighten out my own position, which is clear. I am not a racist in any form whatsoever. I don't believe in any form of racism. I don't believe in any form of discrimination or segregation. I believe in Islam. I am a Muslim. And there's nothing wrong with being a Muslim, nothing wrong with the religion of Islam. It just teaches us to believe in Allah as the God. Those of you who are Christians probably believe in the same God, because I think you believe in the God who created the universe. That's the One we believe in, the one who created the universe, the only difference being you call Him God and I we call Him Allah. The Jews call him Jehovah. If you could understand Hebrew, you'd probably call him Jehovah too. If you could understand Arabic, you'd probably call him Allah.

But since the white man, your "friend," took your language away from you during slavery, the only language you know is his language. You know, your friend's language. So you call for the same God he calls for. When he's putting a rope around your neck, you call for God and he calls for God. And you wonder why the one you call on never answers you.

So that once you realize that I believe in the Supreme Being who created the universe, and believe in him as being one I also have been taught in Islam that one God only has one religion, and that religion is called Islam, and all of the prophets who came forth taught that religion Abraham, Moses, Jesus, Mohammed, all of them. And by believing in one God and one religion and all of the prophets, it creates unity. There's no room for argument, no need for us to be arguing with each other.

And also in that religion, of the real religion of Islam when I was in the Black Muslim movement, I wasn't they didn't have the real religion of Islam in that movement. It was something else. And the real religion of Islam doesn't teach anyone to judge another human being by the color of his skin. The yardstick that is used by the Muslim to measure another man is not the man's color but the man's deeds, the man's conscious behavior, the man's intentions. And when you use that as a standard of measurement or judgment, you never go wrong.

But when you just judge a man because of the color of his skin, then you're committing a crime, because that's the worst kind of judgment. If you judged him just because he was a Jew, that's not as bad as judging him because he's Black. Because a Jew can hide his religion. He can say he's something else and which a lot of them do that, they say they're something else. But the Black man can't hide. When they start indicting us because of our color that means we're indicted before we're born, which is the worst kind of crime that can be committed. The Muslim religion has eliminated all tendencies to judge a man according to the color of his skin, but rather the judgment is based upon his deeds.

And when, prior to going into the Muslim world, I didn't have any Elijah Muhammad had taught us that the white man could not enter into Makkah in Arabia, and all of us who followed him, we believed it. And he said the reason he couldn't enter was because he's white and inherently evil, it's impossible to change him. And the only thing that would change him is Islam, and he can't accept Islam because by nature he's evil. And therefore by not being able to accept Islam and become a Muslim, he could never enter Makkah. This is how he taught us, you know.

So when I got over there and went to Makkah and saw these people who were blond and blue-eyed and pale-skinned and all those things, I said, "Well!" But I watched them closely. And I noticed that though they were white, and they would call themselves white, there was a difference between them and the white one over here. And that basic difference was this: in Asia or the Arab world or in Africa, where the Muslims are, if you find one who says he's white, all he's doing is using an adjective to describe something that's incidental about him, one of his incidental characteristics; so there's nothing else to it, he's just white.

But when you get the white man over here in America and he says he's white, he means something else. You can listen to the sound of his voice when he says he's white, he means he's a boss. That's right. That's what "white" means in this language. You know the expression, "free, white, and twenty-one." He made that up. He's letting you know all of them mean the same. "White" means free, boss. He's up there. So that when he says he's white he has a little different sound in his voice. I know you know what I'm talking about.

This was what I saw was missing in the Muslim world. If they said they were white, it was incidental. White, black, brown, red, yellow, doesn't make any difference what color you are. So this was the religion that I had accepted and had gone there to get a better knowledge of it.

But despite the fact that I saw that Islam was a religion of brotherhood, I also had to face reality. And when I got back into this American society, I'm not in a society that practices brotherhood. I'm in a society that might preach it on Sunday, but they don't practice it on no day on any day. And so, since I could see that America itself is a society where there is no brotherhood and that this society is controlled primarily by racists and segregationists and it is who are in Washington, D.C., in positions of power. And from Washington, D.C., they exercise the same forms of brutal oppression against dark-skinned people in South and North Vietnam, or in the Congo, or in Cuba, or in any other place on this earth where they're trying to exploit and oppress. This is a society whose government doesn't hesitate to inflict the most brutal form of punishment and oppression upon dark-skinned people all over the world.

To wit, right now what's going on in and around Saigon and Hanoi and in the Congo and elsewhere. They are violent when their interests are at stake. But all of that violence that they display at the international level, when you and I want just a little bit of freedom, we're supposed to be nonviolent. They're violent. They're violent in Korea, they're violent in Germany, they're violent in the South Pacific, they're violent in Cuba, they're violent wherever they go. But when it comes time for you and me to protect ourselves against lynchings, they tell us to be nonviolent.

That's a shame. Because we get tricked into being nonviolent, and when somebody stands up and talks like I just did, they say, "Why, he's advocating violence!" Isn't that what they say? Every time you pick up your newspaper, you see where one of these things has written into it that I'm advocating violence. I have never advocated any violence. I've only said that Black people who are the victims of organized violence perpetrated upon us by the Klan, the Citizens' Council, and many other forms, we should defend ourselves. And when I say that we should defend ourselves against the violence of others, they use their press skillfully to make the world think that I'm calling on violence, period. I wouldn't call on anybody to be violent without a cause. But I think the Black man in this country, above and beyond people all over the world, will be more justified when he stands up and starts to protect himself, no matter how many necks he has to break and heads he has to crack.

I saw in the paper where they on the television where they took this Black woman down in Selma, Alabama, and knocked her right down on the ground, dragging her down the street. You saw it, you're trying to pretend like you didn't see it 'cause you knew you should've done something about it and didn't. It showed the sheriff and his henchmen throwing this Black woman on the ground on the ground.

And Negro men standing around doing nothing about it saying, "Well, let's overcome them with our capacity to love." What kind of phrase is that? "Overcome them with our capacity to love." And then it disgraces the rest of us, because all over the world the picture is splashed showing a Black woman with some white brutes, with their knees on her holding her down, and full-grown Black men standing around watching it. Why, you are lucky they let you stay on earth, much less stay in the country.

When I saw it I dispatched a wire to Rockwell; Rockwell was one of the agitators down there, Rockwell, this [George] Lincoln Rockwell [leader of the American Nazi Party].

And the wire said in essence that this is to warn him that I am no longer held in check from fighting white supremacists by Elijah Muhammad's separatist "Black Muslim" movement. And that if Rockwell's presence in Alabama causes harm to come to Dr. King or any other Black person in Alabama who's doing nothing other than trying to enjoy their rights, then Rockwell and his Ku Klux Klan friends would be met with maximum retaliation from those of us who are not handcuffed by this nonviolent philosophy. And I haven't heard from Rockwell since.

Brothers and sisters, if you and I would just realize that once we learn to talk the language that they understand, they will then get the point. You can't ever reach a man if you don't speak his language. If a man speaks the language of brute force, you can't come to him with peace. Why, good night! He'll break you in two, as he has been doing all along. If a man speaks French, you can't speak to him in German. If he speaks Swahili, you can't communicate with him in Chinese. You have to find out what does this man speak. And once you know his language, learn how to speak his language, and he'll get the point. There'll be some dialogue, some communication, and some understanding will be developed.

You've been in this country long enough to know the language the Klan speaks. They only know one language. And what you and I have to start doing in 1965 I mean that's what you have to do, because most of us already been doing it is start learning a new language. Learn the language that they understand. And then when they come up on our doorstep to talk, we can talk. And they will get the point. There'll be a dialogue, there'll be some communication, and I'm quite certain there will then be some understanding. Why? Because the Klan is a cowardly outfit. They have perfected the art of making Negroes be afraid. As long as the Negro's afraid, the Klan is safe. But the Klan itself is cowardly. One of them will never come after one of you. They all come together. Sure, and they're scared of you.

And you sit there when they're putting the rope around your neck saying, "Forgive them, Lord, they know not what they do." As long as they've been doing it, they're experts at it, they know what they're doing!

No, since the federal government has shown that it isn't going to do anything about it but talk, it is a duty, it's your and my duty as men, as human beings, it is our duty to our people, to organize ourselves and let the government know that if they don't stop that Klan, we'll stop it ourselves. And then you'll see the government start doing something about it. But don't ever think that they're going to do it just on some kind of morality basis, no. So I don't believe in violence that's why I want to stop it. And you can't stop it with love, not love of those things down there, no. So, we only mean vigorous action in self-defense, and that vigorous action we feel we're justified in initiating by any means necessary.

Moynihan Report

"Equality of opportunity almost insures inequality of results."

Overview

Few policy papers in American history have stirred more controversy than The Negro Family: The Case for National Action, otherwise known as the Moynihan Report. Drafted as an internal memo by a young assistant secretary of labor named Daniel Patrick Moynihan in 1965, the report threw gasoline on the highly flammable race question in the United States, blaming racial inequality on black illegitimacy and divorce. Convinced that the civil rights movement had vanquished formal inequality, Moynihan focused on the matriarchal black family as the primary impediment to black success.

Although it was unoriginal in many of its findings, Moynihan's report came at a critical time in American race relations. Not long after its completion, the largely African American Watts section of Los Angeles experienced one of the nation's biggest urban riots, leading conservative readers of Moynihan's report to blame black absentee fathers for the violence. Even liberals like President Lyndon B. Johnson adopted portions of the report, hoping to shift some of the burden of responsibility for racial reform onto black shoulders. While black activists expressed outrage, Moynihan survived the controversy generated by his work, using it to launch a long career as a policy expert, public intellectual, and U.S. senator.

Context

Drafted in the early months of 1965, the Moynihan Report emerged at a critical moment in American civil rights history. Just the summer before, Congress had enacted the 1964 Civil Rights Act, a sweeping move to end employment discrimination, housing discrimination, and segregated schools in the United States. Although the federal executive had cautiously stressed civil rights reform since Harry S. Truman issued "To Secure These Rights" in 1947, and the Supreme Court had mandated equal treatment at least since Brown v. Board of Education in 1954, congressional action proved halting until civil rights demonstrations began to rock the South in the 1960s.

The demonstrations began in Greensboro, North Carolina, in 1960, when four black college students sat at a whites-only lunch counter and demanded service. Similar protests quickly spread across the South, as did media coverage of white southerners attacking peaceful demonstrators. One year later, the Congress of Racial Equality organized integrated bus rides through the Deep South, again hoping to draw white resistance and generate publicity for the black plight in Dixie. When a white mob stopped and burned a bus outside of Anniston, Alabama, the "Freedom Riders" gained national attention.

Hoping to generate further support nationally, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference decided to stage a battery of demonstrations in Birmingham, Alabama, in the spring of 1963, and the noted activist minister Martin Luther King, Jr., held a mass rally in front of the Lincoln Memorial in Washington, D.C., later that year. As white Americans took inspiration from King and recoiled at the attacks by Birmingham police officers on black demonstrators, national opinion began to veer toward more robust federal enforcement of civil rights. Support for civil rights reform accelerated when President John F. Kennedy was assassinated in Dallas in November 1963 and his successor, Lyndon Johnson, made passage of a civil rights act a central part both of fulfilling Kennedy's legacy and his own political platform. With Johnson's help, northern and western senators overrode southern opposition in the 1964 spring session, pushing the nation's most robust civil rights act into law in July 1964.

Although the federal Civil Rights Act of 1964 was a categorical victory for the movement, more disturbing events clouded black hopes for truly radical reform. One was violence. Following the successful civil rights demonstrations in Birmingham in 1963, African Americans ambivalent about nonviolence rioted, spreading fear in Birmingham's white community. One year later, riots broke out in New York, Rochester, and Philadelphia, all northern cities with significant black populations. The following summer, a massive six-day riot exploded in the Watts neighborhood of Los Angeles, killing thirty-four and stunning the nation.

Complicating white understandings of Watts was the fact that only five months earlier, the civil rights movement had engaged in its most successful protest ever, a series of demonstrations in Selma, Alabama, that persuaded Congress to enact a robust Voting Rights Act removing obstacles to black voting in the South. Signed into law on August 6, 1965, the Voting Rights Act preceded the inferno in Watts by only five days, leading many to wonder what, precisely, was driving black unrest.

Clearly, civil rights reform in the American South did not satisfy residents of predominantly black ghettos in the North and West. Free from the overt legal repression suffered by their counterparts in the South, urban blacks elsewhere still encountered significant barriers to job entry, quality education, and decent housing. Exacerbating such concerns was a mass migration of blacks from the South to the North and West from the 1940s through the 1950s, a number upward of one million, dramatically altering the demographics of American cities. When such immigrants found themselves forced into urban ghettos with few economic or educational opportunities, hope turned to resentment, often exploding during moments of police intervention in ghetto areas. The ensuing riots proved difficult to understand for many whites, particularly when contrasted with the highly disciplined, well-organized civil rights demonstrations of the same era.

For federal leaders like Johnson, urban unrest brought with it the added problem of compromising America's cold war image. Already involved in a hot war against Communism in Vietnam, Johnson realized that the cold war had an ideological component as well, one compromised by Soviet propaganda highlighting American racial unrest. For precisely this reason, Johnson took an interest in the work of Daniel Patrick Moynihan, allowing him to cowrite the commencement address that Johnson delivered at historically black Howard University in June of 1965, based on the still-unpublished Moynihan Report. The report itself was originally intended as an internal memorandum providing support for Johnson's War on Poverty and remained unpublished until July.

About the Author

Born on March 16, 1927, Moynihan grew up in several poor neighborhoods of New York City, shining shoes and working odd jobs to help support his family. In an ironic foreshadowing of his later claims that absentee fathers were to be blamed for black problems, his own father abandoned his family when he was ten, leaving his mother to care for him, his sister, and his brother. Apparently unaffected, Moynihan briefly attended the City College of New York and then, after naval service, earned his bachelor's and master's degrees at Tufts University. He won a Fulbright Scholarship to the London School of Economics and then went on to gain a PhD in political science from the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy at Tufts. Moynihan obtained a job as assistant to the New York governor Averell Harriman from 1955 to 1959, directed the New York State Government Research Project at Syracuse University from 1959 to 1961, and then traveled to Washington, D.C., to be a part of John F. Kennedy's New Frontier. Upon Kennedy's death, Moynihan found himself serving as assistant secretary of labor and director of the Department of Labor's Office of Policy Planning and Research under Lyndon Johnson, a position that required him not simply to fulfill bureaucratic tasks but also to draft substantive policy reports. Drawing from his own experiences growing up in ethnically diverse New York, Moynihan became interested in ethnicity and injustice, coauthoring a book with the sociologist Nathan Glazer titled Beyond the Melting Pot: The Negroes, Puerto Ricans, Jews, Italians, and Irish of New York City (1963). Positive reviews stoked Moynihan's interest in race and ethnicity, leading him to focus exclusively on the plight of African Americans in urban centers in 1965. In later years Moynihan alternated between academic posts at Harvard University and government service. He was elected as a Democratic U.S. senator from New York State in 1976 and served until 2001. He died on March 26, 2003.

"The United States is approaching a new crisis in race relations," writes Moynihan in the introduction to his report. Although state and local governments had struggled to preserve racial segregation in the South, such reactionary politics were "doomed" by the civil rights movement, ushering in a "new period" during which African Americans would soon begin to demand "equal opportunities for them as a group." Impeding this process, however, were two obstacles: continued racial prejudice on the part of whites something that would inevitably last "for at least another generation" and the "crumbling" state of the black family.

Choosing to focus on the black family, Moynihan proceeds to document how precisely "conventional social relationships had all but disintegrated" in urban black communities. To accomplish this goal, he divides his report into five sections. The first reviews the achievements of the civil rights struggle, the second focuses on the black family structure, the third discusses historical origins of black familial collapse, the fourth analyzes what Moynihan identified as a "tangle of pathology" gripping black communities, and the fifth outlines policy implications.

◆ "Chapter I: The Negro American Revolution"

In the first chapter Moynihan declares the civil rights movement to be the "most important domestic event" following World War II. Noting that civil rights leaders and demonstrators acted "with the strictest propriety" something that Moynihan would argue black families were not doing he acknowledges the movement's significance for international cold war politics. Not only did the movement derive inspiration from Mohandas Gandhi's rebellion against British rule in India, says Moynihan, but it also consciously paralleled black freedom struggles against European colonial powers in Africa. To Moynihan's mind, such international events indicated that the nations of the world were preparing to "divide along color lines" making it all the more imperative that America continue its race revolution, precisely so that it could serve as a positive model of "what can, or must, happen in the world at large."

To truly become a model of racial harmony, however, the United States needed to acknowledge that the formal struggle for civil rights was over. This struggle, Moynihan argues, was a resounding success, consisting of three basic components: political organizing, "administrative events," and court rulings. Thanks to "disciplined" movement leadership, the civil rights movement developed close ties with "religious groups," "trade unions," and the administrations of John F. Kennedy and Lyndon B. Johnson, both of whom promised significant reform. And reforms came. Congress enacted a Manpower Development and Training Act in 1962 and passed a significant Economic Opportunity Act and an even more significant Civil Rights Act in 1964. Meanwhile, the Supreme Court "used every opportunity" that it had to "combat unequal treatment of Negro citizens," beginning with its 1954 ruling in Brown v. Board of Education. Thanks to the success of the civil rights movement, Moynihan declares that a new struggle was taking shape, one that did not focus simply on removing discriminatory laws but also on achieving racial equality. Equality, muses Moynihan, was not necessarily equal opportunity but had taken on "a different meaning for Negroes," one that implied equality of results. Convinced that equal outcomes were desirable, Moynihan ends by declaring that policy should be aligned with the goal of placing blacks and whites on equal footing, a goal that invariably required dealing with the primary obstacle to black advancement, namely the "Negro social structure, in particular the Negro family."

◆ "Chapter II: The Negro American Family"

"Nearly a Quarter of Urban Negro Marriages Are Dissolved," notes Moynihan in Chapter II of his report, observing that in the urban Northeast "26 percent of Negro women ever married are either divorced, separated, or have their husbands absent." Consequently, between 1940 and 1963, the average rate of illegitimate births in black communities spiked, jumping from 16.8 percent to 23.6 percent, compared with 2 percent and 3.07 percent, respectively, for whites. "As a direct result of this high rate of divorce, separation, and desertion," continues Moynihan, "a very large percentage of Negro families are headed by females," and, concomitantly, "the majority of Negro children receive public assistance under the AFDC [Aid to Families with Dependent Children] program at one point or another in their childhood."

As the result of such indicators of "family disorganization," asserts Moynihan, African American children did not receive the same level of socialization as white children. This meant that they were less likely to develop discipline, character, and a strong work ethic, robbing them of the ability to compete successfully with their white peers. Thus hobbled, black youth would inevitably turn to crime and delinquency both to advance their material position and to find the support network denied them by their weak, occasional fathers.

The single most important factor determining the fate of black youth, posits Moynihan, was the failure of fathers to play traditional gender roles, a problem necessitating public policy solutions aimed at enabling male parents to gain employment and return to their rightful position as patriarchs. "In essence," observes Moynihan, who was himself the product of a single-parent home, > the Negro community has been forced into a matriarchal structure which, because it is so out of line with the rest of the American society, seriously retards the progress of the group as a whole, and imposes a crushing burden on the Negro male and, in consequence, on a great many Negro women as well. Restoring patriarchy, Moynihan implies, should be the primary object of government, a nuanced policy goal that would prove both controversial and complex.

◆ "Chapter III: The Roots of the Problem"

How had the black family devolved so badly? In Chapter III of his report, Moynihan identifies the roots of the decline, beginning with slavery. Working off a popular slavery study by Stanley M. Elkins, Slavery: A Problem in American Institutional and Intellectual Life (1959), Moynihan begins by observing that American slavery was "the most awful the world has ever known" a quote from Nathan Glazer's introduction to Elkins's text. Not realizing that Elkins's findings were exaggerated (and would later be refuted by scholars like Eugene Genovese, Laura Edwards, and others), Moynihan adopts the thesis that southern plantations were, like Nazi concentration camps, places where family life was "vitiated" by the auctioning-off of slave parents and the forced creation of "a fatherless matrifocal (mother-centered) pattern."

Emancipation did little to help matters, as racial segregation imposed new burdens on African Americans, particularly black males. Under Jim Crow, black men were even more "humiliated" than black women, argues Moynihan, since "the black male was more likely to use public facilities," whose inferiority was "more destructive to the male than to the female personality."

Moynihan's gendered thesis evocatively weaves together the experiences of the black male during slavery and Jim Crow, both legal institutions that "worked against the emergence of a strong father figure." Yet the authorities that he relied on proved shaky over time. While Elkins had argued that slavery emasculated black men, studies such as his made inaccurate comparisons between southern plantations and Nazi concentration camps, ignored slave resistance, and downplayed the extent to which black family structures emerged and survived the antebellum plantation South, a subject that the historian Herbert Gutman would take on in his seminal work The Black Family in Slavery and Freedom, 1750 1925 (1976), written partly in response to Moynihan's report. Further, Moynihan's synthesis of sources was itself problematic. While Elkins did maintain that slavery engendered docility, the black sociologist E. Franklin Frazier argued that the opposite was true in the postbellum North. There, black males proved aggressive and violent, not docile as Moynihan claims. Inexplicably, Moynihan neglects to mention this aspect of Frazier's work, despite citing him twice. Moynihan also fails to mention the work of scholars like Abram Kardiner and Lionel Ovesey, both of whom had supported his thesis about black male inefficacy in the 1962 publication The Mark of Oppression: Explorations in the Personality of the American Negro, which did not provoke the sort of backlash that the Moynihan Report did.

Careful to veil his more speculative claims in terms that were as noncontroversial as possible, Moynihan clings to his thesis that American law had crippled the black male, stating that Jim Crow segregation, like slavery, humiliated African American men more than it did black women. To his mind, "the very essence of the male animal" was "to strut," a practice denied black males, for "the 'sassy nigger' [sic] was lynched." Such purple prose undermined the persuasive power of his work, leading many to doubt even his most solid scientific data, including numbers culled from Frazier and from other respected scholars like Thomas Pettigrew and Martin Deutsch. Indeed, not expecting the firestorm that his work would engender, Moynihan largely drew from the work of those several scholars, resulting in the banal reality that little of what he recounted was either "new or startling," as the historians Lee Rainwater and William Yancey would declare in 1967.

◆ "Chapter IV: The Tangle of Pathology"

Moynihan's report introduces a diagnostic term that, while not particularly new, would come to have a lasting effect. In Chapter IV, he summarizes the plight of the African American family as nothing short of a "tangle of pathology." Much of this pathology stemmed from the fact that matriarchal families were "out of line with the rest of the American society," producing a "subculture" that placed African Americans, and particularly black men, "at a distinct disadvantage."

Careful not to identify the black community as a whole as pathological, Moynihan stresses the existence of a more positive black middle class. He notes (in a passage not reproduced here) that up to one-half of the black community belongs to the middle class, a demographic in which family units are generally functioning and stable. But even the black middle class risked being compromised by contact with the pathological black underclass, owing to segregated housing patterns that forced the black middle class into neighborhoods adjoining those of the black poor. Moynihan recognizes (in another passage excluded here) that while whites also have their share of poor neighborhoods and matriarchal families, even the fatherless children at least perceive and absorb the notion that men usually work. Black children, on the other hand, perceive a different pattern, with women not only working but also staying in school longer, succeeding in school better, and remaining at home.

Female success, argues Moynihan, has a doubly negative effect on males, leading to criminality and withdrawal. Contrasting black life under slavery and segregation with black life in the midst of the civil rights movement, Moynihan warns that at least in the past black males had been an integral part of the southern workforce and had learned to deal with whites on a regular basis. In the post-Brown era, however, African American males rarely had any interaction with whites whatsoever, save perhaps with the police. The result of this "alienation" was that the tangle of pathology was "tightening."

Convinced that black pathology was intensifying, Moynihan uses the last chapter of his report to make a policy recommendation. Rather than focus on the expansion of civil rights or compensation for harms caused by slavery, Moynihan argues that governmental programs needed to be "directed towards the question of family structure." In short, the goal of federal policy should be to "strengthen the Negro family so as to enable it to raise and support its members as do other families."

How, precisely, the government was to accomplish this task remained unclear. Moynihan refrains from making any precise policy recommendations, partly because he felt that it was enough to simply establish that "the problem exists." Also, Moynihan concedes that an appropriate solution was at best "difficult" to discern and might not even be possible. "It is necessary to acknowledge the view," laments Moynihan, "that this problem may in fact be out of control." On this somewhat dour note, Moynihan concludes his report, leaving readers to presume that progress in matters of racial equality was no longer a goal that lent itself to easy political solutions.

Audience

Moynihan's immediate audience was the senior membership of the Department of Labor and the White House staff. Although both groups held the potential to affect policy, Moynihan gravitated to the White House, inspired in part by the study conducted by President Kennedy's Task Force on Manpower Conservation, published in 1964 as One-Third of a Nation: A Report on Young Men Found Unqualified for Military Service a document that informed President Johnson's War on Poverty proposals. Also, Moynihan held a joint appointment as director of the Office of Policy Planning and Research, an executive branch position that provided him with a remarkable degree of access to the president's staff. Were it not for this position, it is unlikely that Moynihan's report would have drawn the attention of Johnson as quickly as it did, nor is it likely that the report would have been leaked as quickly as it was. Hints of the report first emerged on July 11, 1965, from the Washington Star reporter Mary McGrory, who revealed that President Johnson had enlisted Moynihan as an expert to come up with policy recommendations for the government's role in the next phase of the civil rights struggle. One week later, the administration deliberately leaked contents of the report to the New York Times reporter John D. Pomfret, hoping that he would publicize its contents.

Although Moynihan had probably not intended it, his report received a warm reception from conservative pundits and political commentators, many of whom had grown tired of black rights demands and demonstrations. The Watts riot in the summer of 1965 only intensified this audience's respect for Moynihan, so much so that he later received an offer of employment in the Republican administration of President Richard M. Nixon. For many years, conservatives remained his most enthusiastic audience.

Moynihan's least responsive audience was the African American community. Pilloried by civil rights activists like Pauli Murray and John Lewis, Moynihan came to be remembered by many blacks as a reactionary, a blundering bureaucrat insensitive to black demands and ignorant of black urban realities. Even white liberals protested, prompting scholarly refutations, including Herbert Gutman's thoroughly researched 1976 book on the history of the African American family.

Impact

Although its conclusions echoed studies by black social scientists like Franklin Frazier and Kenneth Clark whose influential Dark Ghetto was also published in 1965 and made many of the same claims the Moynihan Report became a lightning rod for political dissension and debate. Much of this debate was recorded in Lee Rainwater and William L. Yancey's 1967 study The Moynihan Report and the Politics of Controversy: A Trans-action Social Science and Public Policy Report. The black activist and lawyer Pauli Murray read Moynihan's report as an indictment of black women, noting the irony that black women should be faulted for their efforts to persevere in a situation not of their own making. The civil rights activist Bayard Rustin concurred with the assessment that white society bore responsibility for the present circumstances of African Americans; he noted that it was "amazing" that "black families exist at all" given the history of the embattled black family under slavery, where children were often sold from parents and masters sexually exploited their female slaves. Perhaps the most intense attack was leveled by the Congress of Racial Equality leader James Farmer, who charged that > by laying off the primary blame for present-day inequalities on the pathological condition of the Negro family and community, Moynihan has provided a massive academic cop-out for the white conscience and clearly implied that Negroes in this nation will never secure a substantial measure of freedom until we learn to behave ourselves.

Even though black activists blasted Moynihan for trying to shift the burden of racial reform onto black shoulders, the Moynihan Report played a critical role in President Johnson's larger strategy of outflanking the civil rights movement. Until 1965, Johnson had been consistently pressured into making concessions to blacks, a posture that led him to seek a way to leapfrog the movement by coming up with a policy position that would shift some of the burden of reform off the shoulders of the federal government and onto the shoulders of African Americans. Moynihan's study gave Johnson a way to counter movement demands and return initiative to his administration.

Conservatives, in turn, took the report as a convenient explanation for growing racial unrest, particularly ghetto riots like the one that broke out in the Watts neighborhood of Los Angeles in August 1965. On August 14, three days after the outbreak of the riot, the Los Angeles Times printed a story by Thomas Foley asserting that the cause of the unrest was a breakdown in black family structure, a subtle allusion to black immorality and lack of sexual discipline. As he put it, "The administration is redirecting its main focus on racial problems from the South to large urban areas as the result of an unpublished Labor Department report that blames Negro unrest on the breakdown of the Negro family structure." The report in question, of course, was the one authored by Moynihan.

Two days later, the Wall Street Journal printed an article titled "Family Life Breakdown in Negro Slums Sows Seeds of Race Violence," declaring Moynihan's still-unpublished but widely leaked report to hold the explanation for the riots and claiming that the rioting was the result of the spreading disintegration of Negro family life in the northern and western cities. According to the article,

> The rioters who by yesterday had brought death to 31 people and injuries to another 676 and who had burned an estimated $175 million worth of property, including entire blocks, in Los Angeles were not protesting any specific civil rights grievances. They were primarily young hoodlums lashing out against society.… A growing army of such youths is being bred in the Negro sections of cities across the country by broken homes, illegitimacy and other social ills that have grown steadily worse in recent decades.

The emphasis on broken homes led directly to the citation of black illegitimacy rates. Borrowing from the same set of data that Moynihan focused on, the conservative paper noted that in New York City, for example, "one of every five Negro children born is illegitimate."

The Wall Street Journal was not the only major newspaper to identify black illegitimacy rates as a cause of rioting. On August 18, the conservative columnists Rowland Evans and Robert Novak expressly cited the Moynihan Report in the New York Times, stating, "Weeks before the Negro ghetto of Los Angeles erupted in violence, intense debate over how to handle such racial powder kegs was under way deep inside the Johnson administration." The crux of this debate, continued Novak and Evans, was the Moynihan Report, "a much suppressed, much leaked Labor Department document that strips away usual equivocations and exposes the ugly truth about the big-city Negro's plight."

Given a copy of the report by Moynihan himself, Evans and Novak framed the study as something that the Johnson administration was reluctant to endorse openly, saying that Secretary of Labor W. Willard Wirtz had stopped Moynihan from releasing it in fear that "evidence of Negro illegitimacy would be grist for racist propaganda mills." The idea that Moynihan's report might bolster southern critiques of black civil rights was not lost on the White House. Others within the Johnson administration expressed similar views, the special assistant and counsel to the president Harry McPherson among them.

Despite warnings, Moynihan continued to push his report, distributing it freely to anyone who indicated interest and eventually succeeding in getting the president's ear. Together with Johnson's aide Richard Goodwin, Moynihan used the report to draft a presidential speech at Howard University mere weeks after the civil rights movement's dramatic confrontations with southern police on the Edmund Pettus Bridge in Selma, Alabama. Johnson's decision to draw from the report at Howard was telling, particularly since few, if any, of the middle- and upper-middle-class African American students at the predominantly black university were from the kinds of slum backgrounds that Moynihan had described, and they hardly needed a lecture on prudence. Nor did they necessarily need a lecture on how African Americans were at least partly responsible for their plight. Johnson, however, needed a response to increasingly radical demands coming from the black elite, even as he hoped to keep his civil rights agenda on track. Watts threatened this agenda, endangering the very programs that Johnson had drafted to help ease racial inequality.

Although some contended that Johnson's Howard speech constituted an attempt to steal initiative from the civil rights movement, providing the White House with a reasoned argument for countering movement demands, Moynihan denied any such intention. Still, he did indicate that his report explained the race riots that started rocking the country during the summer of 1965, stating in the Jesuit publication America that the primary lesson in American history was that any community in which large numbers of males grew up in female-led broken homes could expect chaos as a result. Crime and violence were inevitable.

Moynihan's implication that female-dominated homes and not police brutality or racism had caused Watts was surprising, yet it reflected a larger concern on Moynihan's part that his report, and by extension his policy predictions, might be lost in the aftermath of violence. It also reflected his conviction that prevailing welfare policies, because they did not empower men, were detrimental to the family. Conservatives agreed, but not in a way that most would find familiar today. Lamenting the five days of rioting in Los Angeles, Senator Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia stood before Congress and called for family planning, saying that the high birth rate and illegitimacy among blacks played a part. To bolster his position, he cited the statistic that in New York City's Harlem (one scene of rioting) one of every five black children was illegitimate. Speaking for many of his white constituents in South Carolina, Senator Strom Thurmond agreed. "Dear Citizens," began a letter introduced by Thurmond into the Congressional Record in the wake of the Watts riots, "no society or nation is stronger than the homes that make up that nation or society. Until every man and woman is willing to stand before God and his neighbors and say: 'We are united 'til death do us part,' and every parent is willing to say: 'You are my child until death do us part,' we as a nation will find our Government corrupt."

Attention to marital fidelity and family planning were, if not entirely new components of American domestic politics, at least heightened by the coincidence of the Moynihan Report, ghetto rioting, and the climax of the civil rights movement. As late as 1959, President Dwight Eisenhower had vowed not to include family planning in his domestic agenda, saying that it was not the business of government. By the end of 1965, birth control had become very much a part of America's business. Lyndon Johnson promised to encourage it in his 1965 State of the Union address. The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, in line with the president's wishes, established both an assistant secretary for science and population as well as a secretary's Committee on Population and Family Planning. Even the Supreme Court in Griswold v. Connecticut (1965) sanctioned forays into family planning by creating a previously unknown right to privacy for couples desiring contraceptives, both married and unmarried.

As America sped down the road toward birth control and family planning, the South, contrary to its reputation for moral conservatism, led the way. As early as 1961, Charlotte, North Carolina, had already begun encouraging birth control as a matter of state policy. That the South had fewer moral qualms about interfering in the natural process of reproduction stemmed directly from its racial politics. The federal assault on Jim Crow led many white southerners to call for draconian policies of sexual discipline and control, partly out of a desire to punish blacks but also as an attempt to reframe resistance to integration as a moral crusade rather than a racist campaign. This crusade removed culpability from white shoulders at the same time that it provided opportunities for reducing welfare expenditures on blacks, a segment of the southern population that suddenly stood to command increased social services.

For Moynihan, the controversy over his report would lead to a central position in Republican policy making. Following his victory in the 1968 presidential election, Richard M. Nixon hired Moynihan to be in charge of domestic policy apart from economic matters. This gave Moynihan unprecedented freedom to pursue policy interests, including the plight of African Americans in the United States. On January 26, 1970, he sent Nixon a report documenting continued problems with racial inequality but suggesting that the president do nothing, adopting a policy of what Moynihan termed "benign neglect." Although public outrage ensued once the report was leaked, Moynihan cemented his reputation as an influential, bipartisan policy adviser, helping to lay the groundwork for future federal programs aimed at helping African American males, not least of them Richard Nixon's Office of Minority Business Enterprise and ensuing Philadelphia Plan, requiring government contractors to hire minority workers.

Questions for Further Study

1. The Moynihan Report seems essentially sympathetic to the plight of a people who had been subjected to slavery, discrimination, and poverty. Why do you think the report stirred so much controversy—that it became a "lightning rod"?

2. What were some of the intersections between race relations in America and international politics at the time?

3. What was Moynihan's principal purpose in writing the report?

4. What impact do you think the Moynihan Report had on the racial climate of the mid- to late 1960s?

5. How were Moynihan's views similar to—and different from—the views of earlier black authors who espoused a doctrine of black self-help, such as W. E. B. Du Bois and Malcolm X?

Document Text

Moynihan Report

Two hundred years ago, in 1765, nine assembled colonies first joined together to demand freedom from arbitrary power.

For the first century we struggled to hold together the first continental union of democracy in the history of man. One hundred years ago, in 1865, following a terrible test of blood and fire, the compact of union was finally sealed.

For a second century we labored to establish a unity of purpose and interest among the many groups which make up the American community.

That struggle has often brought pain and violence. It is not yet over.

State of the Union Message of President Lyndon B. Johnson, January 4, 1965.

The United States is approaching a new crisis in race relations.

In the decade that began with the school desegregation decision of the Supreme Court, and ended with the passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the demand of Negro Americans for full recognition of their civil rights was finally met.

The effort, no matter how savage and brutal, of some State and local governments to thwart the exercise of those rights is doomed. The nation will not put up with it least of all the Negroes. The present moment will pass. In the meantime, a new period is beginning.

In this new period the expectations of the Negro Americans will go beyond civil rights. Being Americans, they will now expect that in the near future equal opportunities for them as a group will produce roughly equal results, as compared with other groups. This is not going to happen. Nor will it happen for generations to come unless a new and special effort is made.

There are two reasons. First, the racist virus in the American blood stream still afflicts us: Negroes will encounter serious personal prejudice for at least another generation. Second, three centuries of sometimes unimaginable mistreatment have taken their toll on the Negro people. The harsh fact is that as a group, at the present time, in terms of ability to win out in the competitions of American life, they are not equal to most of those groups with which they will be competing. Individually, Negro Americans reach the highest peaks of achievement. But collectively, in the spectrum of American ethnic and religious and regional groups, where some get plenty and some get none, where some send eighty percent of their children to college and others pull them out of school at the 8th grade, Negroes are among the weakest.

The most difficult fact for white Americans to understand is that in these terms the circumstances of the Negro American community in recent years has probably been getting worse, not better.

Indices of dollars of income, standards of living, and years of education deceive. The gap between the Negro and most other groups in American society is widening.

The fundamental problem, in which this is most clearly the case, is that of family structure. The evidence not final, but powerfully persuasive is that the Negro family in the urban ghettos is crumbling. A middle-class group has managed to save itself, but for vast numbers of the unskilled, poorly educated city working class the fabric of conventional social relationships has all but disintegrated. There are indications that the situation may have been arrested in the past few years, but the general post-war trend is unmistakable. So long as this situation persists, the cycle of poverty and disadvantage will continue to repeat itself.

The thesis of this paper is that these events, in combination, confront the nation with a new kind of problem. Measures that have worked in the past, or would work for most groups in the present, will not work here. A national effort is required that will give a unity of purpose to the many activities of the Federal government in this area, directed to a new kind of national goal: the establishment of a stable Negro family structure.

This would be a new departure for Federal policy. And a difficult one. But it almost certainly offers the only possibility of resolving in our time what is, after all, the nation's oldest, and most intransigent, and now its most dangerous social problem. What Gunnar Myrdal said in An American Dilemma remains true today: "America is free to chose whether the Negro shall remain her liability or become her opportunity."

Chapter I: The Negro American Revolution

The Negro American revolution is rightly regarded as the most important domestic event of the postwar period in the United States.

Nothing like it has occurred since the upheavals of the 1930's which led to the organization of the great industrial trade unions, and which in turn profoundly altered both the economy and the political scene. There have been few other events in our history the American Revolution itself, the surge of Jacksonian Democracy in the 1830's, the Abolitionist movement, and the Populist movement of the late 19th century comparable to the current Negro movement.

There has been none more important. The Negro American revolution holds forth the prospect that the American Republic, which at birth was flawed by the institution of Negro slavery, and which throughout its history has been marred by the unequal treatment of Negro citizens, will at last redeem the full promise of the Declaration of Independence.

Although the Negro leadership has conducted itself with the strictest propriety, acting always and only as American citizens asserting their rights within the framework of the American political system, it is no less clear that the movement has profound international implications.

It was in no way a matter of chance that the nonviolent tactics and philosophy of the movement, as it began in the South, were consciously adapted from the techniques by which the Congress Party undertook to free the Indian nation from British colonial rule. It was not a matter of chance that the Negro movement caught fire in America at just that moment when the nations of Africa were gaining their freedom. Nor is it merely incidental that the world should have fastened its attention on events in the United States at a time when the possibility that the nations of the world will divide along color lines seems suddenly not only possible, but even imminent.

It is clear that what happens in America is being taken as a sign of what can, or must, happen in the world at large. The course of world events will be profoundly affected by the success or failure of the Negro American revolution in seeking the peaceful assimilation of the races in the United States. The award of the Nobel Peace Prize to Dr. Martin Luther King was as much an expression of the hope for the future, as it was recognition for past achievement.

It is no less clear that carrying this revolution forward to a successful conclusion is a first priority confronting the Great Society.

◆ The End of the Beginning

The major events of the onset of the Negro revolution are now behind us.

The political events were three: First, the Negroes themselves organized as a mass movement. Their organizations have been in some ways better disciplined and better led than any in our history. They have established an unprecedented alliance with religious groups throughout the nation and have maintained close ties with both political parties and with most segments of the trade union movement. Second, the Kennedy-Johnson Administration committed the Federal government to the cause of Negro equality. This had never happened before. Third, the 1964 Presidential election was practically a referendum on this commitment: if these were terms made by the opposition, they were in effect accepted by the President.

The overwhelming victory of President Johnson must be taken as emphatic popular endorsement of the unmistakable, and openly avowed course which the Federal government has pursued under his leadership.

The administrative events were threefold as well: First, beginning with the establishment of the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity and on to the enactment of the Manpower Development and Training Act of 1962, the Federal government has launched a major national effort to redress the profound imbalance between the economic position of the Negro citizens and the rest of the nation that derives primarily from their unequal position in the labor market. Second, the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964 began a major national effort to abolish poverty, a condition in which almost half of Negro families are living. Third, the Civil Rights Act of 1964 marked the end of the era of legal and formal discrimination against Negroes and created important new machinery for combating covert discrimination and unequal treatment. (The Act does not guarantee an end to harassment in matters such as voter registration, but does make it more or less incumbent upon government to take further steps to thwart such efforts when they do occur.)

The legal events were no less specific. Beginning with Brown. V. Board of Education in 1954, through the decade that culminated in the recent decisions upholding Title II of the Civil Rights Act, the Federal judiciary, led by the Supreme Court, has used every opportunity to combat unequal treatment of Negro citizens. It may be put as a general proposition that the laws of the United States now look upon any such treatment as obnoxious, and that the courts will strike it down wherever it appears.

◆ The Demand for Equality

With these events behind us, the nation now faces a different set of challenges, which may prove more difficult to meet, if only because they cannot be cast as concrete propositions of right and wrong.

The fundamental problem here is that the Negro revolution, like the industrial upheaval of the 1930's, is a movement for equality as well as for liberty.

Liberty and Equality are the twin ideals of American democracy. But they are not the same thing. Nor, most importantly, are they equally attractive to all groups at any given time nor yet are they always compatible, one with the other.

Many persons who would gladly die for liberty are appalled by equality. Many who are devoted to equality are puzzled and even troubled by liberty. Much of the political history of the American nation can be seen as a competition between these two ideals, as for example, the unending troubles between capital and labor.

By and large, liberty has been the ideal with the higher social prestige in America. It has been the middle class aspiration, par excellence. (Note the assertions of the conservative right that ours is a republic, not a democracy.) Equality, on the other hand, has enjoyed tolerance more than acceptance. Yet it has roots deep in Western civilization and "is at least coeval with, if not prior to, liberty in the history of Western political thought."

American democracy has not always been successful in maintaining a balance between these two ideals, and notably so where the Negro American is concerned. "Lincoln freed the slaves," but they were given liberty, not equality. It was therefore possible in the century that followed to deprive their descendants of much of their liberty as well.

The ideal of equality does not ordain that all persons end up, as well as start out equal. In traditional terms, as put by Faulkner, "there is no such thing as equality per se, but only equality to: equal right and opportunity to make the best one can of one's life within one's capability, without fear of injustice or oppression or threat of violence." But the evolution of American politics, with the distinct persistence of ethnic and religious groups, has added a profoundly significant new dimension to that egalitarian ideal. It is increasingly demanded that the distribution of success and failure within one group be roughly comparable to that within other groups. It is not enough that all individuals start out on even terms, if the members of one group almost invariably end up well to the fore, and those of another far to the rear. This is what ethnic politics are all about in America, and in the main the Negro American demands are being put forth in this now traditional and established framework.

Here a point of semantics must be grasped. The demand for Equality of Opportunity has been generally perceived by white Americans as a demand for liberty, a demand not to be excluded from the competitions of life at the polling place, in the scholarship examinations, at the personnel office, on the housing market. Liberty does, of course, demand that everyone be free to try his luck, or test his skill in such matters. But these opportunities do not necessarily produce equality: on the contrary, to the extent that winners imply losers, equality of opportunity almost insures inequality of results.

The point of semantics is that equality of opportunity now has a different meaning for Negroes than it has for whites. It is not (or at least no longer) a demand for liberty alone, but also for equality in terms of group results. In Bayard Rustin's terms, "It is now concerned not merely with removing the barriers to full opportunity but with achieving the fact of equality." By equality Rustin means a distribution of achievements among Negroes roughly comparable to that among whites.

As Nathan Glazer has put it, "The demand for economic equality is now not the demand for equal opportunities for the equally qualified: it is now the demand for equality of economic results.... The demand for equality in education ... has also become a demand for equality of results, of outcomes."

Some aspects of the new laws do guarantee results, in the sense that upon enactment and enforcement they bring about an objective that is an end in itself, e.g., the public accommodations titles of the Civil Rights Act.

Other provisions are at once terminal and intermediary. The portions of the Civil Rights Act dealing with voting rights will no doubt lead to further enlargements of the freedom of the Negro American.

But by and large, the programs that have been enacted in the first phase of the Negro revolution Manpower Retraining, the Job Corps, Community Action, et al. only make opportunities available. They cannot insure the outcome.

The principal challenge of the next phase of the Negro revolution is to make certain that equality of results will now follow. If we do not, there will be no social peace in the United States for generations.

◆ The Prospect for Equality

The time, therefore, is at hand for an unflinching look at the present potential of Negro Americans to move from where they now are to where they want, and ought to be.

There is no very satisfactory way, at present, to measure social health or social pathology within an ethnic, or religious, or geographical community. Data are few and uncertain, and conclusions drawn from them, including the conclusions that follow, are subject to the grossest error. Nonetheless, the opportunities, no less than the dangers, of the present moment, demand that an assessment be made.

That being the case, it has to be said that there is a considerable body of evidence to support the conclusion that Negro social structure, in particular the Negro family, battered and harassed by discrimination, injustice, and uprooting, is in the deepest trouble. While many young Negroes are moving ahead to unprecedented levels of achievement, many more are falling further and further behind.

After an intensive study of the life of central Harlem, the board of directors of Harlem Youth Opportunities Unlimited, Inc. summed up their findings in one statement: "Massive deterioration of the fabric of society and its institutions…."

It is the conclusion of this survey of the available national data, that what is true of central Harlem, can be said to be true of the Negro American world in general.

If this is so, it is the single most important social fact of the United States today.

Chapter II: The Negro American Family

At the heart of the deterioration of the fabric of Negro society is the deterioration of the Negro family.

It is the fundamental source of the weakness of the Negro community at the present time.

There is probably no single fact of Negro American life so little understood by whites.

The Negro situation is commonly perceived by whites in terms of the visible manifestation of discrimination and poverty, in part because Negro protest is directed against such obstacles, and in part, no doubt, because these are facts which involve the actions and attitudes of the white community as well. It is more difficult, however, for whites to perceive the effect that three centuries of exploitation have had on the fabric of Negro society itself. Here the consequences of the historic injustices done to Negro Americans are silent and hidden from view. But here is where the true injury has occurred: unless this damage is repaired, all the effort to end discrimination and poverty and injustice will come to little.

The role of the family in shaping character and ability is so pervasive as to be easily overlooked. The family is the basic social unit of American life; it is the basic socializing unit. By and large, adult conduct in society is learned as a child.

A fundamental insight of psychoanalytic theory, for example, is that the child learns a way of looking at life in his early years through which all later experience is viewed and which profoundly shapes his adult conduct.

It may be hazarded that the reason family structure does not loom larger in public discussion of social issues is that people tend to assume that the nature of family life is about the same throughout American society. The mass media and the development of suburbia have created an image of the American family as a highly standardized phenomenon. It is therefore easy to assume that whatever it is that makes for differences among individuals or groups of individuals, it is not a different family structure.

There is much truth to this; as with any other nation, Americans are producing a recognizable family system. But that process is not completed by any means. There are still, for example, important differences in family patterns surviving from the age of the great European migration to the United States, and these variations account for notable differences in the progress and assimilation of various ethnic and religious groups. A number of immigrant groups were characterized by unusually strong family bonds; these groups have characteristically progressed more rapidly than others.

But there is one truly great discontinuity in family structure in the United States at the present time:

that between the white world in general and that of the Negro American.

The white family has achieved a high degree of stability and is maintaining that stability.

By contrast, the family structure of lower class Negroes is highly unstable, and in many urban centers is approaching complete breakdown.

N.b. There is considerable evidence that the Negro community is in fact dividing between a stable middle-class group that is steadily growing stronger and more successful, and an increasingly disorganized and disadvantaged lower-class group. There are indications, for example, that the middle-class Negro family puts a higher premium on family stability and the conserving of family resources than does the white middle-class family. The discussion of this paper is not, obviously, directed to the first group excepting as it is affected by the experiences of the second an important exception. (See Chapter IV: The Tangle of Pathology.)

There are two points to be noted in this context.

First, the emergence and increasing visibility of a Negro middle-class may beguile the nation into supposing that the circumstances of the remainder of the Negro community are equally prosperous, whereas just the opposite is true at present, and is likely to continue so.

Second, the lumping of all Negroes together in one statistical measurement very probably conceals the extent of the disorganization among the lower-class group. If conditions are improving for one and deteriorating for the other, the resultant statistical averages might show no change. Further, the statistics on the Negro family and most other subjects treated in this paper refer only to a specific point in time. They are a vertical measure of the situation at a given movement. They do not measure the experience of individuals over time. Thus the average monthly unemployment rate for Negro males for 1964 is recorded as 9 percent. But during 1964, some 29 percent of Negro males were unemployed at one time or another. Similarly, for example, if 36 percent of Negro children are living in broken homes at any specific moment, it is likely that a far higher proportion of Negro children find themselves in that situation at one time or another in their lives.

◆ Nearly a Quarter of Urban Negro Marriages Are Dissolved

Nearly a quarter of Negro women living in cities who have ever married are divorced, separated, or are living apart from their husbands.

The rates are highest in the urban Northeast where 26 percent of Negro women ever married are either divorced, separated, or have their husbands absent.

On the urban frontier, the proportion of husbands absent is even higher. In New York City in 1960, it was 30.2 percent, not including divorces.

Among ever-married nonwhite women in the nation, the proportion with husbands present declined in every age group over the decade 1950 60 as follows: [chart not reproduced]

Although similar declines occurred among white females, the proportion of white husbands present never dropped below 90 percent except for the first and last age group.

◆ Nearly One-Quarter of Negro Births Are Now Illegitimate

Both white and Negro illegitimacy rates have been increasing, although from dramatically different bases. The white rate was 2 percent in 1940; it was 3.07 percent in 1963. In that period, the Negro rate went from 16.8 percent to 23.6 percent.

The number of illegitimate children per 1,000 live births increased by 11 among whites in the period 1940 63, but by 68 among nonwhites. There are, of course, limits to the dependability of these statistics. There are almost certainly a considerable number of Negro children who, although technically illegitimate, are in fact the offspring of stable unions. On the other hand, it may be assumed that many births that are in fact illegitimate are recorded otherwise. Probably the two opposite effects cancel each other out.

On the urban frontier, the nonwhite illegitimacy rates are usually higher than the national average, and the increase of late has been drastic.

In the District of Columbia, the illegitimacy rate for nonwhites grew from 21.8 percent in 1950, to 29.5 percent in 1964.

A similar picture of disintegrating Negro marriages emerges from the divorce statistics. Divorces have increased of late for both whites and nonwhites, but at a much greater rate for the latter. In 1940 both groups had a divorce rate of 2.2 percent. By 1964 the white rate had risen to 3.6 percent, but the nonwhite rate had reached 5.1 percent 40 percent greater than the formerly equal white rate.

◆ Almost One-Fourth of Negro Families Are Headed by Females

As a direct result of this high rate of divorce, separation, and desertion, a very large percent of Negro families are headed by females. While the percentage of such families among whites has been dropping since 1940, it has been rising among Negroes.

The percent of nonwhite families headed by a female is more than double the percent for whites. Fatherless nonwhite families increased by a sixth between 1950 and 1960, but held constant for white families.

It has been estimated that only a minority of Negro children reach the age of 18 having lived all their lives with both of their parents.

Once again, this measure of family disorganization is found to be diminishing among white families and increasing among Negro families.

◆ The Breakdown of the Negro Family Has Led to a Startling Increase in Welfare Dependency

The majority of Negro children receive public assistance under the AFDC program at one point or another in their childhood.

At present, 14 percent of Negro children are receiving AFDC assistance, as against 2 percent of white children. Eight percent of white children receive such assistance at some time, as against 56 percent of nonwhites, according to an extrapolation based on HEW data. (Let it be noted, however, that out of a total of 1.8 million nonwhite illegitimate children in the nation in 1961, 1.3 million were not receiving aid under the AFDC program, although a substantial number have, or will, receive aid at some time in their lives.)

Again, the situation may be said to be worsening. The AFDC program, deriving from the long established Mothers' Aid programs, was established in 1935 principally to care for widows and orphans, although the legislation covered all children in homes deprived of parental support because one or both of their parents are absent or incapacitated.

In the beginning, the number of AFDC families in which the father was absent because of desertion was less than a third of the total. Today it is two-thirds. HEW estimates "that between two-thirds and three-fourths of the 50 percent increase from 1948 to 1955 in the number of absent-father families receiving ADC may be explained by an increase in broken homes in the population."

A 1960 study of Aid to Dependent Children in Cook County, Ill. stated:

"The 'typical' ADC mother in Cook County was married and had children by her husband, who deserted; his whereabouts are unknown, and he does not contribute to the support of his children. She is not free to remarry and has had an illegitimate child since her husband left. (Almost 90 percent of the ADC families are Negro.)"

The steady expansion of this welfare program, as of public assistance programs in general, can be taken as a measure of the steady disintegration of the Negro family structure over the past generation in the United States.

Chapter III: The Roots of the Problem

◆ Slavery

The most perplexing question abut American slavery, which has never been altogether explained, and which indeed most Americans hardly know exists, has been stated by Nathan Glazer as follows: "Why was American slavery the most awful the world has ever known?" The only thing that can be said with certainty is that this is true: it was.

American slavery was profoundly different from, and in its lasting effects on individuals and their children, indescribably worse than, any recorded servitude, ancient or modern. The peculiar nature of American slavery was noted by Alexis de Tocqueville and others, but it was not until 1948 that Frank Tannenbaum, a South American specialist, pointed to the striking differences between Brazilian and American slavery. The feudal, Catholic society of Brazil had a legal and religious tradition which accorded the slave a place as a human being in the hierarchy of society a luckless, miserable place, to be sure, but a place withal. In contrast, there was nothing in the tradition of English law or Protestant theology which could accommodate to the fact of human bondage the slaves were therefore reduced to the status of chattels often, no doubt, well cared for, even privileged chattels, but chattels nevertheless.

Glazer, also focusing on the Brazil United States comparison, continues:

"In Brazil, the slave had many more rights than in the United States: he could legally marry, he could, indeed had to, be baptized and become a member of the Catholic Church, his family could not be broken up for sale, and he had many days on which he could either rest or earn money to buy his freedom. The Government encouraged manumission, and the freedom of infants could often be purchased for a small sum at the baptismal font. In short: the Brazilian slave knew he was a man, and that he differed in degree, not in kind, from his master."

"[In the United States,] the slave was totally removed from the protection of organized society (compare the elaborate provisions for the protection of slaves in the Bible), his existence as a human being was given no recognition by any religious or secular agency, he was totally ignorant of and completely cut off from his past, and he was offered absolutely no hope for the future. His children could be sold, his marriage was not recognized, his wife could be violated or sold (there was something comic about calling the woman with whom the master permitted him to live a 'wife'), and he could also be subject, without redress, to frightful barbarities there were presumably as many sadists among slaveowners, men and women, as there are in other groups. The slave could not, by law, be taught to read or write; he could not practice any religion without the permission of his master, and could never meet with his fellows, for religious or any other purposes, except in the presence of a white; and finally, if a master wished to free him, every legal obstacle was used to thwart such action. This was not what slavery meant in the ancient world, in medieval and early modern Europe, or in Brazil and the West Indies."

"More important, American slavery was also awful in its effects. If we compared the present situation of the American Negro with that of, let us say, Brazilian Negroes (who were slaves 20 years longer), we begin to suspect that the differences are the result of very different patterns of slavery. Today the Brazilian Negroes are Brazilians; though most are poor and do the hard and dirty work of the country, as Negroes do in the United States, they are not cut off from society. They reach into its highest strata, merging there in smaller and smaller numbers, it is true, but with complete acceptance with other Brazilians of all kinds. The relations between Negroes and whites in Brazil show nothing of the mass irrationality that prevails in this country."

Stanley M. Elkins, drawing on the aberrant behavior of the prisoners in Nazi concentration camps, drew an elaborate parallel between the two institutions. This thesis has been summarized as follows by Thomas Pettigrew:

"Both were closed systems, with little chance of manumission, emphasis on survival, and a single, omnipresent authority. The profound personality change created by Nazi internment, as independently reported by a number of psychologists and psychiatrists who survived, was toward childishness and total acceptance of the SS guards as father-figures a syndrome strikingly similar to the 'Sambo' caricature of the Southern slave. Nineteenth-century racists readily believed that the 'Sambo' personality was simply an inborn racial type. Yet no African anthropological data have ever shown any personality type resembling Sambo; and the concentration camps molded the equivalent personality pattern in a wide variety of Caucasian prisoners. Nor was Sambo merely a product of 'slavery' in the abstract, for the less devastating Latin American system never developed such a type."

"Extending this line of reasoning, psychologists point out that slavery in all its forms sharply lowered the need for achievement in slaves.... Negroes in bondage, stripped of their African heritage, were placed in a completely dependent role. All of their rewards came, not from individual initiative and enterprise, but from absolute obedience a situation that severely depresses the need for achievement among all peoples. Most important of all, slavery vitiated family life.... Since many slaveowners neither fostered Christian marriage among their slave couples nor hesitated to separate them on the auction block, the slave household often developed a fatherless matrifocal (mother-centered) pattern."

◆ The Reconstruction

With the emancipation of the slaves, the Negro American family began to form in the United States on a widespread scale. But it did so in an atmosphere markedly different from that which has produced the white American family.

The Negro was given liberty, but not equality. Life remained hazardous and marginal. Of the greatest importance, the Negro male, particularly in the South, became an object of intense hostility, an attitude unquestionably based in some measure of fear.

When Jim Crow made its appearance towards the end of the 19th century, it may be speculated that it was the Negro male who was most humiliated thereby; the male was more likely to use public facilities, which rapidly became segregated once the process began, and just as important, segregation, and the submissiveness it exacts, is surely more destructive to the male than to the female personality. Keeping the Negro "in his place" can be translated as keeping the Negro male in his place: the female was not a threat to anyone.

Unquestionably, these events worked against the emergence of a strong father figure. The very essence of the male animal, from the bantam rooster to the four-star general, is to strut. Indeed, in 19th century America, a particular type of exaggerated male boastfulness became almost a national style. Not for the Negro male. The "sassy nigger [sic]" was lynched.

In this situation, the Negro family made but little progress toward the middle-class pattern of the present time. Margaret Mead has pointed out that "In every known human society, everywhere in the world, the young male learns that when he grows up one of the things which he must do in order to be a full member of society is to provide food for some female and her young." This pattern is not immutable, however: it can be broken, even though it has always eventually reasserted itself.

"Within the family, each new generation of young males learn the appropriate nurturing behavior and superimpose upon their biologically given maleness this learned parental role. When the family breaks down as it does under slavery, under certain forms of indentured labor and serfdom, in periods of extreme social unrest during wars, revolutions, famines, and epidemics, or in periods of abrupt transition from one type of economy to another this delicate line of transmission is broken. Men may founder badly in these periods, during which the primary unit may again become mother and child, the biologically given, and the special conditions under which man has held his social traditions in trust are violated and distorted."

E. Franklin Frazier makes clear that at the time of emancipation Negro women were already "accustomed to playing the dominant role in family and marriage relations" and that this role persisted in the decades of rural life that followed.

◆ Urbanization

Country life and city life are profoundly different. The gradual shift of American society from a rural to an urban basis over the past century and a half has caused abundant strains, many of which are still much in evidence. When this shift occurs suddenly, drastically, in one or two generations, the effect is immensely disruptive of traditional social patterns.

It was this abrupt transition that produced the wild Irish slums of the 19th century Northeast. Drunkenness, crime, corruption, discrimination, family disorganization, juvenile delinquency were the routine of that era. In our own time, the same sudden transition has produced the Negro slum different from, but hardly better than its predecessors, and fundamentally the result of the same process.

Negroes are now more urbanized than whites.

Negro families in the cities are more frequently headed by a woman than those in the country. The difference between the white and Negro proportions of families headed by a woman is greater in the city than in the country.

The promise of the city has so far been denied the majority of Negro migrants, and most particularly the Negro family.

In 1939, E. Franklin Frazier described its plight movingly in that part of The Negro Family entitled "In the City of Destruction":

"The impact of hundreds of thousands of rural southern Negroes upon northern metropolitan communities presents a bewildering spectacle. Striking contrasts in levels of civilization and economic well-being among these newcomers to modern civilization seem to baffle any attempt to discover order and direction in their mode of life."

"In many cases, of course, the dissolution of the simple family organization has begun before the family reaches the northern city. But, if these families have managed to preserve their integrity until they reach the northern city, poverty, ignorance, and color force them to seek homes in deteriorated slum areas from which practically all institutional life has disappeared. Hence, at the same time that these simple rural families are losing their internal cohesion, they are being freed from the controlling force of public opinion and communal institutions. Family desertion among Negroes in cities appears, then, to be one of the inevitable consequences of the impact of urban life on the simple family organization and folk culture which the Negro has evolved in the rural South. The distribution of desertions in relation to the general economic and cultural organization of Negro communities that have grown up in our American cities shows in a striking manner the influence of selective factors in the process of adjustment to the urban environment." …

Chapter IV: The Tangle of Pathology

That the Negro American has survived at all is extraordinary a lesser people might simply have died out, as indeed others have. That the Negro community has not only survived, but in this political generation has entered national affairs as a moderate, humane, and constructive national force is the highest testament to the healing powers of the democratic ideal and the creative vitality of the Negro people.

But it may not be supposed that the Negro American community has not paid a fearful price for the incredible mistreatment to which it has been subjected over the past three centuries.

In essence, the Negro community has been forced into a matriarchal structure which, because it is so out of line with the rest of the American society, seriously retards the progress of the group as a whole, and imposes a crushing burden on the Negro male and, in consequence, on a great many Negro women as well.

There is, presumably, no special reason why a society in which males are dominant in family relationships is to be preferred to a matriarchal arrangement. However, it is clearly a disadvantage for a minority group to be operating on one principle, while the great majority of the population, and the one with the most advantages to begin with, is operating on another. This is the present situation of the Negro. Ours is a society which presumes male leadership in private and public affairs. The arrangements of society facilitate such leadership and reward it. A subculture, such as that of the Negro American, in which this is not the pattern, is placed at a distinct disadvantage.…

◆ Matriarchy

A fundamental fact of Negro American family life is the often reversed roles of husband and wife.

Robert O. Blood, Jr. and Donald M. Wolfe, in a study of Detroit families, note that "Negro husbands have unusually low power," and while this is characteristic of all low income families, the pattern pervades the Negro social structure: "the cumulative result of discrimination in jobs … , the segregated housing, and the poor schooling of Negro men." In 44 percent of the Negro families studied, the wife was dominant, as against 20 percent of white wives. "Whereas the majority of white families are equalitarian, the largest percentage of Negro families are dominated by the wife."

The matriarchal pattern of so many Negro families reinforces itself over the generations. This process begins with education. Although the gap appears to be closing at the moment, for a long while, Negro females were better educated than Negro males, and this remains true today for the Negro population as a whole.

The difference in educational attainment between nonwhite men and women in the labor force is even greater; men lag 1.1 years behind women.

The disparity in educational attainment of male and female youth 16 to 21 who were out of school in February 1963, is striking. Among the nonwhite males, 66.3 percent were not high school graduates, compared with 55.0 percent of the females. A similar difference existed at the college level, with 4.5 percent of the males having completed 1 to 3 years of college compared with 7.3 percent of the females.

The poorer performance of the male in school exists from the very beginning, and the magnitude of the difference was documented by the 1960 Census in statistics on the number of children who have fallen one or more grades below the typical grade for children of the same age. The boys have more frequently fallen behind at every age level. (White boys also lag behind white girls, but at a differential of 1 to 6 percentage points.)

In 1960, 39 percent of all white persons 25 years of age and over who had completed 4 or more years of college were women. Fifty-three percent of the nonwhites who had attained this level were women.…

◆ Alienation

…Along with the diminution of white middle-class contacts for a large percentage of Negroes, observers report that the Negro churches have all but lost contact with men in the Northern cities as well. This may be a normal condition of urban life, but it is probably a changed condition for the Negro American and cannot be a socially desirable development.

The only religious movement that appears to have enlisted a considerable number of lower class Negro males in Northern cities of late is that of the Black Muslims: a movement based on total rejection of white society, even though it emulates whites more.

In a word: the tangle of pathology is tightening.

Chapter V: The Case for National Action

The object of this study has been to define a problem, rather than propose solutions to it. We have kept within these confines for three reasons.

First, there are many persons, within and without the Government, who do not feel the problem exists, at least in any serious degree. These persons feel that, with the legal obstacles to assimilation out of the way, matters will take care of themselves in the normal course of events. This is a fundamental issue, and requires a decision within the government.

Second, it is our view that the problem is so interrelated, one thing with another, that any list of program proposals would necessarily be incomplete, and would distract attention from the main point of inter-relatedness. We have shown a clear relation between male employment, for example, and the number of welfare dependent children. Employment in turn reflects educational achievement, which depends in large part on family stability, which reflects employment. Where we should break into this cycle, and how, are the most difficult domestic questions facing the United States. We must first reach agreement on what the problem is, then we will know what questions must be answered.

Third, it is necessary to acknowledge the view, held by a number of responsible persons, that this problem may in fact be out of control. This is a view with which we emphatically and totally disagree, but the view must be acknowledged. The persistent rise in Negro educational achievement is probably the main trend that belies this thesis. On the other hand our study has produced some clear indications that the situation may indeed have begun to feed on itself. It may be noted, for example, that for most of the post-war period male Negro unemployment and the number of new AFDC cases rose and fell together as if connected by a chain from 1948 to 1962. The correlation between the two series of data was an astonishing .91. (This would mean that 83 percent of the rise and fall in AFDC cases can be statistically ascribed to the rise and fall in the unemployment rate.) In 1960, however, for the first time, unemployment declined, but the number of new AFDC cases rose. In 1963 this happened a second time. In 1964 a third. The possible implications of these and other data are serious enough that they, too, should be understood before program proposals are made.

However, the argument of this paper does lead to one central conclusion: Whatever the specific elements of a national effort designed to resolve this problem, those elements must be coordinated in terms of one general strategy.

What then is that problem? We feel the answer is clear enough. Three centuries of injustice have brought about deep-seated structural distortions in the life of the Negro American. At this point, the present tangle of pathology is capable of perpetuating itself without assistance from the white world. The cycle can be broken only if these distortions are set right.

In a word, a national effort towards the problems of Negro Americans must be directed towards the question of family structure. The object should be to strengthen the Negro family so as to enable it to raise and support its members as do other families. After that, how this group of Americans chooses to run its affairs, take advantage of its opportunities, or fail to do so, is none of the nation's business.

The fundamental importance and urgency of restoring the Negro American Family structure has been evident for some time.…

The President has committed the nation to an all out effort to eliminate poverty wherever it exists, among whites or Negroes, and a militant, organized, and responsible Negro movement exists to join in that effort.

Such a national effort could be stated thus:

The policy of the United States is to bring the Negro American to full and equal sharing in the

South Carolina v. Katzenbach

1966

"The Voting Rights Act was designed by Congress to banish the blight of racial discrimination in voting."

Overview

The case of South Carolina v. Katzenbach constituted the first time the U.S. Supreme Court ruled on the Voting Rights Act of 1965. Passed in March 1965, the Voting Rights Act gave the federal government sweeping new powers to combat the pervasive disenfranchisement of African Americans perpetuated by southern government officials. Many across the South denied Congress's power to pass such sweeping legislation. They argued that Congress had overstepped the bounds of the Fifth and Fifteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution. They also objected to the act's wider social and political objectives as a piece of civil rights legislation.

In South Carolina, the state attorney general, Daniel R. McCleod, quickly filed a bill of complaint directly with the Supreme Court attacking the constitutionality of the act and asking for an injunction against enforcement by the attorney general of the United States, Nicholas Katzenbach. McCleod challenged the Voting Rights Act as an unconstitutional encroachment on states' rights, as a violation of the principle of equality between the states, and as an illegal bill of attainder (a legislative punishment enforced without due process of law). More specifically, the complaint directly challenged the "triggering mechanism" in Section 4 of the act, which brought South Carolina under the act's provisions, and argued that Section 5's preclearance provisions (under which any changes to South Carolina's election laws or procedures had to be cleared in advance by the Department of Justice) exceeded Congress's constitutional powers.

South Carolina was joined in its attack on the Voting Rights Act by five other southern states: Georgia, Alabama, Louisiana, Virginia, and Mississippi. Twenty states, among them Illinois, Massachusetts, and California, filed amicus curiae (friend of the court) briefs in support of the act's provisions and powers. As a consequence, the case of South Carolina v. Katzenbach took on an even wider significance than normal in a state challenge to a new federal law. At issue in this case was the constitutional legitimacy not only of the Voting Rights Act but, indeed, of the entire federal effort to defend, uphold, and enhance minority civil rights.

Context

In the years following the Civil War, hope dawned for the nation's millions of African Americans that freedom would bring with it a full entry into American public life an entry best represented by the right to vote. Most Americans understood the Thirteenth Amendment's requirement (1865) that "neither slavery nor involuntary servitude … shall exist within the United States" to mean that newly freed blacks would acquire all aspects of freedom, including the right to vote. The Fourteenth Amendment's promise (1868) of equal protection and its defense of the "privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States" added support to newly freed African Americans' claims to the right to vote. Finally the Fifteenth Amendment (1870) declared: "The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." It seemed that the path to the polls would be a clear and simple one for African Americans.

Events proved otherwise. Most white southerners disliked the federally mandated program of postwar "Reconstruction" and opposed the Republican- and black-led governments organized under this process. As early as 1866, white terrorist organizations the Ku Klux Klan being the best known instituted waves of race-based violence and terror that soon spread across the South. In the worst instances, white mobs attacked entire groups of blacks, terrorizing most and killing many. Bad economic times, well-publicized political scandals, and heavy campaigning by Democrats among the region's white voters added to the Republicans' woes. The chilling effects of violence on black voting, not to mention election fraud by Democratic-leaning local white officials, led by the mid-1870s to the rise of Democratic "redeemer" governments opposed to all black civil and political rights.

Once in power, these white Democratic officials began a slow, steady, and ultimately successful campaign of race-based disenfranchisement. Among the techniques used to exclude black voters were the use of unfairly applied literacy or understanding tests in which voters had to read, understand, or interpret any section of the state constitution to the satisfaction of a white (and usually hostile) election official; complicated registration requirements that excluded minority voters on technical grounds; and financial barriers such as poll taxes. Intimidation and threats of violence were also effective means of keeping southern blacks from the polls. One of the simplest ways of undermining the black vote involved setting up polling places in areas inconvenient for blacks. Many polling places, for instance, were placed at distant locations or in the middle of white sections of the town or county. Similarly, some polls were established in businesses owned by known opponents of African American voting. Finally, in an effort to exclude all possibility that southern blacks could have a voice in government through the election process, state legislatures across the South implemented rules prohibiting blacks from voting in the politically dominant Democratic Party primaries. Since the Democratic candidate almost always won in the general election, this exclusion denied southern blacks a chance to participate in the one election that mattered most.

The results of such efforts were immediate and drastic. By 1896 black voter participation in Mississippi had declined to fewer than nine thousand out of a potential one hundred forty-seven thousand voting-age blacks. In Louisiana registered black voting had declined by 99 percent. Alabama had only three thousand registered black voters in 1902. Texas saw black voting decline to a mere five thousand votes by 1906. In Georgia, only 4 percent of black males were registered to vote as of 1910. In fact, across the entire region voter turnout fell from a high of 85 percent of all voters during Reconstruction to less than 50 percent for whites and single-digit percentages for blacks by the early twentieth century. Mid-twentieth-century attacks on a number of disenfranchising techniques in the federal courts resulted only in the revision and modification of these methods, not their abandonment. As late as 1940, only 3 percent of voting-age southern blacks were registered to vote. Fewer still were actually able to cast a meaningful ballot.

In the 1950s this situation began to change. By 1956, 25 percent of voting-age blacks were registered to vote; by 1964 this number had increased to 43.3 percent across the South. Raw numbers can be deceiving, however. Most registered black voters lived in the border states or in Florida; in the Deep South, where most blacks lived, African American voter registration stood at only 22.5 percent as late as 1964, with Mississippi setting the lowest standard at 6.7 percent (itself an increase from a rate of 1.98 percent a mere two years earlier). Worse yet, the application of such vote-dilution techniques as voting-list purges, at-large elections, and full-slate and majority-vote requirements not to mention the ever-present threat of economic reprisals and physical violence against any black trying to vote meant that, even in those areas where blacks could vote, actual African American voting rates were much lower.

The Voting Rights Act of 1965 was designed to directly combat this race-specific, regionally based disenfranchisement. Previous federal efforts to end southern black disenfranchisement in the courts had been ineffectual and even counterproductive. Civil rights legislation passed in 1957, 1960, and 1964 had expanded the federal government's role in minority vote protection, but with few concrete results to show for the effort. The problem lay with the enforcement tools available to the federal courts. Litigation as an enforcement mechanism was a slow and unwieldy process. It offered recalcitrant southern election officials (not to mention segregationist federal judges) numerous opportunities for delay and obstructionism. Every time the courts overturned laws aimed at disenfranchising southern black voters, southern election officials simply turned to new or different techniques to achieve the same discriminatory end techniques not covered by the courts' orders and thus still permissible until invalidated by another court proceeding. In consequence, opponents of black vote denial were forced to initiate case after case in their efforts to gain the vote with very little practical gain.

Expressly designed to attack the sources of delay in the case-by-case litigation approach, the nineteen sections of the Voting Rights Act imposed a completely new enforcement methodology for voting-rights violations. Not only did the act outlaw vote denial based on race or color in Section 2, it also gave both the executive branch and the federal courts a powerful new set of approaches for voting-rights enforcement. Among them were the power to appoint federal examiners and observers in whatever numbers the president felt necessary, prohibitions on literacy tests and poll taxes, and rules outlawing any action "under color of the law" that prevented qualified voters from voting or having their votes fairly counted. Most important of all, the act froze all southern election laws in place as of November 1, 1964. If local or state officials wanted to change an election law or procedure, they were required first to receive clearance from the Justice Department or the federal courts before acting. In this way, the southern strategy of using ever-shifting techniques of voter denial to derail election reforms was effectively ended. These enforcement provisions along with the more general issue of congressional authority to adopt such extreme and powerful provisions were what South Carolina challenged in South Carolina v. Katzenbach.

About the Author

The majority opinion in South Carolina v. Katzenbach was written by Chief Justice Earl Warren. He was joined in this majority by seven of his colleagues. One justice, Hugo L. Black, concurred as to the bulk of the opinion but dissented as to those sections upholding the constitutionality of Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act.

Warren had been appointed as chief justice in 1953 by President Dwight D. Eisenhower. A former state attorney general and governor of California, Warren had the reputation of being a fundamentally conservative, yet bipartisan Republican politician. Once on the Court, however, Warren swung quickly to the left on such key civil rights and liberties issues as school desegregation, the rights of the accused, and freedom of religion. He was joined in this shift by a majority of his brethren on the bench. Hence, by the time he wrote the opinion in South Carolina v. Katzenbach, Warren (who would retire in 1969) and the Court were approaching the end of a period of sweeping judicial activity that had transformed the constitutional status of individual civil rights and liberties in America.

The dissenting justice, Hugo Black, served on the Supreme Court for thirty-four years (1937 1971). Appointed to the Court by President Franklin D. Roosevelt, Black's judicial philosophy centered on a close textual reading of the U.S. Constitution, a reading that stressed the idea that the liberties guaranteed in the Bill of Rights were "incorporated" on the states by the Fourteenth Amendment. While this belief led Black to be a leader in the Warren Court's expansion of civil liberties and rights in most instances, in certain cases, such as Katzenbach, it pushed Black to oppose legislation that he felt exceeded the textual reach of the Constitution. As Black explained in his Katzenbach dissent, he saw "no reason to read into the Constitution meanings it did not have when it was adopted and which have not been put into it since."

The central question in South Carolina v. Katzenbach was the power of Congress to pass the Voting Rights Act of 1965, with all of its sweeping and transformative powers powers that the federal government had never before claimed or applied in the realm of voting rights. In its complaint, South Carolina had attacked the Voting Rights Act as an unconstitutional encroachment on "an area reserved to the States by the Constitution," as a violation of the principle of equality between the states, and as an illegal bill of attainder (a legislative punishment enforced without due process of law). More specifically, the complaint directly challenged the "triggering mechanism" in Section 4 that brought South Carolina under the act's provisions, objected to that section's "temporary suspension of a State's voting tests or devices," and argued that Section 5's preclearance provisions exceeded Congress's constitutional powers. Also receiving special notice was the act's use of examiners to supervise state electoral procedures.

The federal government had responded to these charges by noting the long history of race-based discrimination as practiced in South Carolina and other southern states, stressing the pressing need for reform, and showing the failure of the case-by-case litigation approach in combating voting discrimination under the Civil Rights Acts of 1957, 1960, and 1964. More generally, the government lawyers stressed Congress's supreme authority to act in these matters under its inherent legislative powers.

In responding to these arguments, Chief Justice Warren began the Court's opinion with the recognition that any ruling as to "the constitutional propriety of the Voting Rights Act of 1965" had to be "judged with reference to the historical experience which it reflected." That context was the extensive record of race-based discrimination found throughout the South. The Court identified "an insidious and pervasive evil which had been perpetuated in certain parts of our country through unremitting and ingenious defiance of the Constitution." Noting also the history of "unsuccessful remedies," it accepted the need for "sterner and more elaborate measures in order to satisfy the clear commands of the Fifteenth Amendment."

The Voting Rights Act of 1965 thus reflected "Congress' firm intention to rid the country of racial discrimination in voting." The crucial question before the Court, therefore, was the constitutional legitimacy of this "complex scheme of stringent remedies aimed at areas where voting discrimination has been most flagrant." Did Congress have the power to pass such laws? And assuming that Congress had such broad powers, were such new and innovative enforcement techniques as preclearance a legitimate application of Congress's powers under the Fifteenth Amendment? Moreover, did these new powers come into conflict with other fundamental constitutional rights and doctrines, such as that of "the equality of States," "due process," and the ban on federal courts issuing "advisory opinions"?

In terms of the general question of Congress's power to legislate, the Court's answer was short and direct: In light of the many years of southern obstruction, Congress had every right to decide "to shift the advantage of time and inertia from the perpetrators of the evil to its victims." The Fifteenth Amendment, combined with established constitutional interpretation, clearly authorized Congress to "effectuate the prohibition of racial discrimination in voting." Besides, noted Warren, the act's provisions strictly applied to those states where discrimination was most prevalent, which clearly constituted "a permissible method of dealing with the problem."

But what of the specific provisions of the act? The Court again came down fully in support of Congress's powers to act as it saw fit. In the case of the coverage formula, which limited the scope of the act to certain southern states and counties, the Court held that the formula was relevant to the specific problem. That was enough to justify congressional intervention under the "express powers under the Fifteenth Amendment."

The Court endorsed the act's temporary suspension of existing voting qualifications on the ground that Congress "knew that continuance of the tests and devices in use … , no matter how fairly administered in the future, would freeze the effect of past discrimination in favor of unqualified white registrants." Given this fact, Congress's determination that such tests were in violation of the Fifteenth Amendment was "a legitimate response to the problem, for which there is ample precedent under other constitutional provisions."

Perhaps most important, Warren found that the imposition of a preclearance requirement for any changes to existing or new election laws and procedures was constitutionally permissible. "This may have been an uncommon exercise of congressional power," explained Warren, "but the Court has recognized that exceptional conditions can justify legislative measures not otherwise appropriate." For years southern states had avoided the intent of the law by "the extraordinary stratagem" of devising ad hoc regulations to frustrate "adverse federal court decrees." Congress knew this and properly acted to put a stop to future evasions of the law. Given such "unique circumstances," Warren concluded, "Congress responded in a permissibly decisive manner."

In conclusion, Warren noted how "after enduring nearly a century of widespread resistance to the Fifteenth Amendment, Congress has marshalled an array of potent weapons against the evil, with authority in the Attorney General to employ them effectively." This was a good and necessary thing, one that should be applauded. "We here hold that the portions of the Voting Rights Act properly before us are a valid means for carrying out the commands of the Fifteenth Amendment." The opinion concludes by expressing hope for true equality of democratic participation for all: "We may finally look forward to the day when truly 'the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.'"

◆ "Mr. Justice Black, Concurring and Dissenting"

Only one justice dissented from this opinion, and he did so only in response to a single aspect of the ruling. Justice Hugo Black agreed with "substantially all of the Court's opinion sustaining the power of Congress under ß2 of the Fifteenth Amendment." His only concern was with Section 5 and preclearance.

First, on purely technical ground, Black argued that "the Constitution gives federal courts jurisdiction over cases and controversies only." Such was not the case with preclearance. Black found it hard "to believe that a justiciable controversy can arise in the constitutional sense from a desire by the United States Government or some of its officials to determine in advance what legislative provisions a State may enact or what constitutional amendments it may adopt." This was regulation, not litigation.

Second, and much more important, Section 5 distorted "our constitutional structure of government as to render any distinction drawn in the Constitution between state and federal power almost meaningless." The federal government was a limited government under a constitution that reserved all powers not explicitly granted to the federal government to the states or the people. Such was not the case with Section 5. Black feared that forcing local laws to be preapproved in Washington could "create the impression that the State or States treated in this way are little more than conquered provinces."

Despite Justice Black's worries and concerns, South Carolina v. Katzenbach was a sweeping endorsement of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. Notwithstanding that act's innovative and to some, constitutionally radical enforcement approaches, the justices concluded that the scope of the problem demanded extreme action and thus gave the act their full support,

Audience

There is an art to writing a Supreme Court opinion. Judicial opinions have a standard structure and purpose that dictate what goes into an opinion and what gets left out. Opinions are written to achieve very specific goals. They have to lay out in detail the unique situation underlying the legal dispute; they have to set out the key legal and constitutional questions raised by the case and then provide answers to these questions; and, finally, they have to explain why the justices ruled as they did and make clear the scope and extent of their rulings. In a very real sense, a justice writing a Supreme Court opinion is responsible to several constituencies. There are the litigants in the case, whose primary focus is winning and losing. Then there are the judges from whence the case originated, who need to be informed of their errors. Lower court judges hearing similar cases make up a third group, in need of a clear precedent regarding the meaning of a law or constitutional point. Finally, there is the wider community of Americans, for whom a Supreme Court ruling can act as an important means of education on the workings of our constitutional system of government.

Like most Supreme Court decisions, South Carolina v. Katzenbach was written with all three groups in mind. It represented a clear ruling on the specific charges and challenges brought by South Carolina and its fellow southern states. Similarly, it provided a strong set of guidelines to other judges on the permissible scope of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. Finally, the opinion made clear the Court's ongoing commitment to civil rights and the campaign to open the ballot box to all Americans, no matter their race or ethnicity. Discrimination of the sort attacked by the Voting Rights Act was not permissible in modern-day America. Any and all efforts to retain such discrimination even a remnant would have to go.

Impact

As with most landmark civil rights opinions, the Supreme Court's ruling in South Carolina v. Katzenbach is an important document. As a statement of intent by the Supreme Court that race-based disenfranchisement was not constitutionally permissible, the opinion made clear the Court's willingness to act (or, alternatively, to accept action on the part of the other branches of the federal government) in defense of African American voting rights. One cannot overstate the importance that this willingness of the Court to act had in the ongoing civil rights process in America. Although the Voting Rights Act shifted much of the enforcement from the courts to the executive branch of the federal government, the Justice Department (not to mention oppressed minority groups) was still going to need the willing assistance of the federal courts. Had the courts proved unwilling to help in these matters, the Justice Department's lawyers would have faced a much more difficult task in implementing what the voting-rights scholars Chandler Davidson and Bernard Grofman called the "Quiet Revolution" in their landmark book on this process.

Of course, South Carolina v. Katzenbach cannot be viewed in isolation. It was the first ruling by the Supreme Court on the constitutionality of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, but it was not the last. In the next few years, the Court would often return to elements of the act, upholding its provisions time and again. In some instances, such as Allen v. State Board of Elections (1969), which addressed race-based vote dilution as well as vote denial, the Court would significantly expand the reach of the Voting Rights Act. None of this would have happened if the Court had not first upheld the act's basic constitutionality in Katzenbach.

Questions for Further Study

1. On what constitutional basis did some states and individuals oppose the Voting Rights Act of 1965? How did other states respond to these objections?

2. In what ways did some states, particularly in the South, disenfranchise black voters? How did the Voting Rights Act attempt to correct this situation?

3. The Voting Rights Act was one piece of civil rights legislation passed in the 1960s. What other bills were passed during this era, and what effect did they have on the condition of African Americans?

4. What was the relationship between the Voting Rights Act and the Fifteenth Amendment to the Constitution? What role did this relationship play in South Carolina v. Katzenbach?

5. In the modern era, an increasing number of people object to gerrymandering, or the creation of bizarrely shaped electoral districts with a view to grouping together racial or ethnic groups into a single district. To what extent, if any, do you believe that this practice is a violation of the spirit of the Voting Rights Act and South Carolina v. Katzenbach?

South Carolina v. Katzenbach

Mr. Chief Justice Warren delivered the opinion of the Court

The Voting Rights Act was designed by Congress to banish the blight of racial discrimination in voting, which has infected the electoral process in parts of our country for nearly a century. The Act creates stringent new remedies for voting discrimination where it persists on a pervasive scale, and in addition the statute strengthens existing remedies for pockets of voting discrimination elsewhere in the country. Congress assumed the power to prescribe these remedies from § 2 of the Fifteenth Amendment, which authorizes the National Legislature to effectuate by "appropriate" measures the constitutional prohibition against racial discrimination in voting. We hold that the sections of the Act which are properly before us are an appropriate means for carrying out Congress' constitutional responsibilities and are consonant with all other provisions of the Constitution. We therefore deny South Carolina's request that enforcement of these sections of the Act be enjoined.

◆ I

The constitutional propriety of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 must be judged with reference to the historical experience which it reflects.…

Two points emerge vividly from the voluminous legislative history of the Act.… First: Congress felt itself confronted by an insidious and pervasive evil which had been perpetuated in certain parts of our country through unremitting and ingenious defiance of the Constitution. Second: Congress concluded that the unsuccessful remedies which it had prescribed in the past would have to be replaced by sterner and more elaborate measures in order to satisfy the clear commands of the Fifteenth Amendment.…

According to the evidence in recent Justice Department voting suits, [discriminatory application of voting tests] … is now the principal method used to bar Negroes from the polls. Discriminatory administration of voting qualifications has been found in all eight Alabama cases, in all nine Louisiana cases, and in all nine Mississippi cases which have gone to final judgment. Moreover, in almost all of these cases, the courts have held that the discrimination was pursuant to a widespread "pattern or practice." White applicants for registration have often been excused altogether from the literacy and understanding tests or have been given easy versions, have received extensive help from voting officials, and have been registered despite serious errors in their answers. Negroes, on the other hand, have typically been required to pass difficult versions of all the tests, without any outside assistance and without the slightest error. The good-morals requirement is so vague and subjective that it has constituted an open invitation to abuse at the hands of voting officials. Negroes obliged to obtain vouchers from registered voters have found it virtually impossible to comply in areas where almost no Negroes are on the rolls.

In recent years, Congress has repeatedly tried to cope with the problem by facilitating case-by-case litigation against voting discrimination.…

Despite the earnest efforts of the Justice Department and of many federal judges, these new laws have done little to cure the problem of voting discrimination. According to estimates by the Attorney General during hearings on the Act, registration of voting-age Negroes in Alabama rose only from 14.2% to 19.4% between 1958 and 1964; in Louisiana it barely inched ahead from 31.7% to 31.8% between 1956 and 1965; and in Mississippi it increased only from 4.4% to 6.4% between 1954 and 1964. In each instance, registration of voting-age whites ran roughly 50 percentage points or more ahead of Negro registration.

The previous legislation has proved ineffective for a number of reasons. Voting suits are unusually onerous to prepare, sometimes requiring as many as 6,000 manhours spent combing through registration records in preparation for trial. Litigation has been exceedingly slow, in part because of the ample opportunities for delay afforded voting officials and others involved in the proceedings. Even when favorable decisions have finally been obtained, some of the States affected have merely switched to discriminatory devices not covered by the federal decrees or have enacted difficult new tests designed to prolong the existing disparity between white and Negro registration. Alternatively, certain local officials have defied and evaded court orders or have simply closed their registration offices to freeze the voting rolls. The provision of the 1960 law authorizing registration by federal officers has had little impact on local maladministration because of its procedural complexities.…

◆ II

The Voting Rights Act of 1965 reflects Congress' firm intention to rid the country of racial discrimination in voting. The heart of the Act is a complex scheme of stringent remedies aimed at areas where voting discrimination has been most flagrant. Section 4 (a) (d) lays down a formula defining the States and political subdivisions to which these new remedies apply. The first of the remedies, contained in §4 (a), is the suspension of literacy tests and similar voting qualifications for a period of five years from the last occurrence of substantial voting discrimination. Section 5 prescribes a second remedy, the suspension of all new voting regulations pending review by federal authorities to determine whether their use would perpetuate voting discrimination. The third remedy, covered in §§6 (b), 7, 9, and 13 (a), is the assignment of federal examiners on certification by the Attorney General to list qualified applicants who are thereafter entitled to vote in all elections.…

◆ III

These provisions of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 are challenged on the fundamental ground that they exceed the powers of Congress and encroach on an area reserved to the States by the Constitution. South Carolina and certain of the amici curiae also attack specific sections of the Act for more particular reasons. They argue that the coverage formula prescribed in §4 (a)-(d) violates the principle of the equality of States, denies due process by employing an invalid presumption and by barring judicial review of administrative findings, constitutes a forbidden bill of attainder, and impairs the separation of powers by adjudicating guilt through legislation. They claim that the review of new voting rules required in §5 infringes Article III by directing the District Court to issue advisory opinions. They contend that the assignment of federal examiners authorized in §6 (b) abridges due process by precluding judicial review of administrative findings and impairs the separation of powers by giving the Attorney General judicial functions; also that the challenge procedure prescribed in §9 denies due process on account of its speed. Finally, South Carolina and certain of the amici curiae maintain that §§4 (a) and 5, buttressed by §14 (b) of the Act, abridge due process by limiting litigation to a distant forum.

Some of these contentions may be dismissed at the outset. The word "person" in the context of the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment cannot, by any reasonable mode of interpretation, be expanded to encompass the States of the Union, and to our knowledge this has never been done by any court.… Likewise, courts have consistently regarded the Bill of Attainder Clause of Article I and the principle of the separation of powers only as protections for individual persons and private groups, those who are peculiarly vulnerable to nonjudicial determinations of guilt.… Nor does a State have standing as the parent of its citizens to invoke these constitutional provisions against the Federal Government, the ultimate parens patriae of every American citizen.… The objections to the Act which are raised under these provisions may therefore be considered only as additional aspects of the basic question presented by the case: Has Congress exercised its powers under the Fifteenth Amendment in an appropriate manner with relation to the States?

The ground rules for resolving this question are clear. The language and purpose of the Fifteenth Amendment, the prior decisions construing its several provisions, and the general doctrines of constitutional interpretation, all point to one fundamental principle. As against the reserved powers of the States, Congress may use any rational means to effectuate the constitutional prohibition of racial discrimination in voting.… We turn now to a more detailed description of the standards which govern our review of the Act.

Section 1 of the Fifteenth Amendment declares that "the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." This declaration has always been treated as self-executing and has repeatedly been construed, without further legislative specification, to invalidate state voting qualifications or procedures which are discriminatory on their face or in practice.…These decisions have been rendered with full respect for the general rule, reiterated last Term in Carrington v. Rash … that States "have broad powers to determine the conditions under which the right of suffrage may be exercised." The gist of the matter is that the Fifteenth Amendment supersedes contrary exertions of state power. "When a State exercises power wholly within the domain of state interest, it is insulated from federal judicial review. But such insulation is not carried over when state power is used as an instrument for circumventing a federally protected right." …

South Carolina contends that the cases cited above are precedents only for the authority of the judiciary to strike down state statutes and procedures that to allow an exercise of this authority by Congress would be to rob the courts of their rightful constitutional role. On the contrary, §2 of the Fifteenth Amendment expressly declares that "Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation." By adding this authorization, the Framers indicated that Congress was to be chiefly responsible for implementing the rights created in §1. "It is the power of Congress which has been enlarged. Congress is authorized to enforce the prohibitions by appropriate legislation. Some legislation is contemplated to make the [Civil War] amendments fully effective." Ex parte Virginia.... Accordingly, in addition to the courts, Congress has full remedial powers to effectuate the constitutional prohibition against racial discrimination in voting.

Congress has repeatedly exercised these powers in the past, and its enactments have repeatedly been upheld. For recent examples, see the Civil Rights Act of 1957, which was sustained in United States v. Raines, ... United States v. Thomas, ... and Hannah v. Larche, ... and the Civil Rights Act of 1960, which was upheld in Alabama v. United States, ... Louisiana v. United States, ... and United States v. Mississippi.... On the rare occasions when the Court has found an unconstitutional exercise of these powers, in its opinion Congress had attacked evils not comprehended by the Fifteenth Amendment....

The basic test to be applied in a case involving §2 of the Fifteenth Amendment is the same as in all cases concerning the express powers of Congress with relation to the reserved powers of the States. Chief Justice Marshall laid down the classic formulation, 50 years before the Fifteenth Amendment was ratified:

"Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the constitution, are constitutional."...

The Court has subsequently echoed his language in describing each of the Civil War Amendments:

"Whatever legislation is appropriate, that is, adapted to carry out the objects the amendments have in view, whatever tends to enforce submission to the prohibitions they contain, and to secure to all persons the enjoyment of perfect equality of civil rights and the equal protection of the laws against State denial or invasion, if not prohibited, is brought within the domain of congressional power." ...

This language was again employed, nearly 50 years later, with reference to Congress' related authority under §2 of the Eighteenth Amendment....

We therefore reject South Carolina's argument that Congress may appropriately do no more than to forbid violations of the Fifteenth Amendment in general terms that the task of fashioning specific remedies or of applying them to particular localities must necessarily be left entirely to the courts. Congress is not circumscribed by any such artificial rules under §2 of the Fifteenth Amendment. In the oft-repeated words of Chief Justice Marshall, referring to another specific legislative authorization in the Constitution, "This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations, other than are prescribed in the constitution." ...

◆ IV

Congress exercised its authority under the Fifteenth Amendment in an inventive manner when it enacted the Voting Rights Act of 1965. First: The measure prescribes remedies for voting discrimination which go into effect without any need for prior adjudication. This was clearly a legitimate response to the problem, for which there is ample precedent under other constitutional provisions.... Congress had found that case-by-case litigation was inadequate to combat widespread and persistent discrimination in voting, because of the inordinate amount of time and energy required to overcome the obstructionist tactics invariably encountered in these lawsuits. After enduring nearly a century of systematic resistance to the Fifteenth Amendment, Congress might well decide to shift the advantage of time and inertia from the perpetrators of the evil to its victims. The question remains, of course, whether the specific remedies prescribed in the Act were an appropriate means of combating the evil, and to this question we shall presently address ourselves.

Second: The Act intentionally confines these remedies to a small number of States and political subdivisions which in most instances were familiar to Congress by name. This, too, was a permissible method of dealing with the problem. Congress had learned that substantial voting discrimination presently occurs in certain sections of the country, and it knew no way of accurately forecasting whether the evil might spread elsewhere in the future. In acceptable legislative fashion, Congress chose to limit its attention to the geographic areas where immediate action seemed necessary. The doctrine of the equality of States, invoked by South Carolina, does not bar this approach, for that doctrine applies only to the terms upon which States are admitted to the Union, and not to the remedies for local evils which have subsequently appeared.

Coverage formula.

We now consider the related question of whether the specific States and political subdivisions within §4 (b) of the Act were an appropriate target for the new remedies. South Carolina contends that the coverage formula is awkwardly designed in a number of respects and that it disregards various local conditions which have nothing to do with racial discrimination. These arguments, however, are largely beside the point. Congress began work with reliable evidence of actual voting discrimination in a great majority of the States and political subdivisions affected by the new remedies of the Act. The formula eventually evolved to describe these areas was relevant to the problem of voting discrimination, and Congress was therefore entitled to infer a significant danger of the evil in the few remaining States and political subdivisions covered by §4 (b) of the Act. No more was required to justify the application to these areas of Congress' express powers under the Fifteenth Amendment.…

To be specific, the new remedies of the Act are imposed on three States Alabama, Louisiana, and Mississippi in which federal courts have repeatedly found substantial voting discrimination. Section 4 (b) of the Act also embraces two other States Georgia and South Carolina plus large portions of a third State North Carolina for which there was more fragmentary evidence of recent voting discrimination mainly adduced by the Justice Department and the Civil Rights Commission. All of these areas were appropriately subjected to the new remedies. In identifying past evils, Congress obviously may avail itself of information from any probative source.…

The areas listed above, for which there was evidence of actual voting discrimination, share two characteristics incorporated by Congress into the coverage formula: the use of tests and devices for voter registration, and a voting rate in the 1964 presidential election at least 12 points below the national average. Tests and devices are relevant to voting discrimination because of their long history as a tool for perpetrating the evil; a low voting rate is pertinent for the obvious reason that widespread disenfranchisement must inevitably affect the number of actual voters. Accordingly, the coverage formula is rational in both practice and theory. It was therefore permissible to impose the new remedies on the few remaining States and political subdivisions covered by the formula, at least in the absence of proof that they have been free of substantial voting discrimination in recent years. Congress is clearly not bound by the rules relating to statutory presumptions in criminal cases when it prescribes civil remedies against other organs of government under §2 of the Fifteenth Amendment.…

It is irrelevant that the coverage formula excludes certain localities which do not employ voting tests and devices but for which there is evidence of voting discrimination by other means. Congress had learned that widespread and persistent discrimination in voting during recent years has typically entailed the misuse of tests and devices, and this was the evil for which the new remedies were specifically designed. At the same time, through §§3, 6 (a), and 13 (b) of the Act, Congress strengthened existing remedies for voting discrimination in other areas of the country. Legislation need not deal with all phases of a problem in the same way, so long as the distinctions drawn have some basis in practical experience.… There are no States or political subdivisions exempted from coverage under §4 (b) in which the record reveals recent racial discrimination involving tests and devices. This fact confirms the rationality of the formula.

Acknowledging the possibility of overbreadth, the Act provides for termination of special statutory coverage at the behest of States and political subdivisions in which the danger of substantial voting discrimination has not materialized during the preceding five years. Despite South Carolina's argument to the contrary, Congress might appropriately limit litigation under this provision to a single court in the District of Columbia, pursuant to its constitutional power under Art. III, §1, to "ordain and establish" inferior federal tribunals.… At the present time, contractual claims against the United States for more than $10,000 must be brought in the Court of Claims, and, until 1962, the District of Columbia was the sole venue of suits against federal officers officially residing in the Nation's Capital. We have discovered no suggestion that Congress exceeded constitutional bounds in imposing these limitations on litigation against the Federal Government, and the Act is no less reasonable in this respect.

South Carolina contends that these termination procedures are a nullity because they impose an impossible burden of proof upon States and political subdivisions entitled to relief. As the Attorney General pointed out during hearings on the Act, however, an area need do no more than submit affidavits from voting officials, asserting that they have not been guilty of racial discrimination through the use of tests and devices during the past five years, and then refute whatever evidence to the contrary may be adduced by the Federal Government. Section 4 (d) further assures that an area need not disprove each isolated instance of voting discrimination in order to obtain relief in the termination proceedings. The burden of proof is therefore quite bearable, particularly since the relevant facts relating to the conduct of voting officials are peculiarly within the knowledge of the States and political subdivisions themselves.…

The Act bars direct judicial review of the findings by the Attorney General and the Director of the Census which trigger application of the coverage formula. We reject the claim by Alabama as amicus curiae that this provision is invalid because it allows the new remedies of the Act to be imposed in an arbitrary way. The Court has already permitted Congress to withdraw judicial review of administrative determinations in numerous cases involving the statutory rights of private parties. For example, see United States v. California Eastern Line, … Switchmen's Union v. National Mediation Bd.… In this instance, the findings not subject to review consist of objective statistical determinations by the Census Bureau and a routine analysis of state statutes by the Justice Department. These functions are unlikely to arouse any plausible dispute, as South Carolina apparently concedes. In the event that the formula is improperly applied, the area affected can always go into court and obtain termination of coverage under §4 (b), provided of course that it has not been guilty of voting discrimination in recent years. This procedure serves as a partial substitute for direct judicial review.

Suspension of tests.

We now arrive at consideration of the specific remedies prescribed by the Act for areas included within the coverage formula. South Carolina assails the temporary suspension of existing voting qualifications, reciting the rule laid down by Lassiter v. Northampton County Bd. of Elections, … that literacy tests and related devices are not in themselves contrary to the Fifteenth Amendment. In that very case, however, the Court went on to say, "Of course a literacy test, fair on its face, may be employed to perpetuate that discrimination which the Fifteenth Amendment was designed to uproot." …

The record shows that in most of the States covered by the Act, including South Carolina, various tests and devices have been instituted with the purpose of disenfranchising Negroes, have been framed in such a way as to facilitate this aim, and have been administered in a discriminatory fashion for many years. Under these circumstances, the Fifteenth Amendment has clearly been violated.…

The Act suspends literacy tests and similar devices for a period of five years from the last occurrence of substantial voting discrimination. This was a legitimate response to the problem, for which there is ample precedent in Fifteenth Amendment cases. Underlying the response was the feeling that States and political subdivisions which had been allowing white illiterates to vote for years could not sincerely complain about "dilution" of their electorates through the registration of Negro illiterates. Congress knew that continuance of the tests and devices in use at the present time, no matter how fairly administered in the future, would freeze the effect of past discrimination in favor of unqualified white registrants. Congress permissibly rejected the alternative of requiring a complete re-registration of all voters, believing that this would be too harsh on many whites who had enjoyed the franchise for their entire adult lives.

Review of new rules.

The Act suspends new voting regulations pending scrutiny by federal authorities to determine whether their use would violate the Fifteenth Amendment. This may have been an uncommon exercise of congressional power, as South Carolina contends, but the Court has recognized that exceptional conditions can justify legislative measures not otherwise appropriate.… Congress knew that some of the States covered by §4 (b) of the Act had resorted to the extraordinary stratagem of contriving new rules of various kinds for the sole purpose of perpetuating voting discrimination in the face of adverse federal court decrees. Congress had reason to suppose that these States might try similar maneuvers in the future in order to evade the remedies for voting discrimination contained in the Act itself. Under the compulsion of these unique circumstances, Congress responded in a permissibly decisive manner.

For reasons already stated, there was nothing inappropriate about limiting litigation under this provision to the District Court for the District of Columbia, and in putting the burden of proof on the areas seeking relief. Nor has Congress authorized the District Court to issue advisory opinions, in violation of the principles of Article III invoked by Georgia as amicus curiae. The Act automatically suspends the operation of voting regulations enacted after November 1, 1964, and furnishes mechanisms for enforcing the suspension. A State or political subdivision wishing to make use of a recent amendment to its voting laws therefore has a concrete and immediate "controversy" with the Federal Government.... An appropriate remedy is a judicial determination that continued suspension of the new rule is unnecessary to vindicate rights guaranteed by the Fifteenth Amendment.

Federal examiners.

The Act authorizes the appointment of federal examiners to list qualified applicants who are thereafter entitled to vote, subject to an expeditious challenge procedure. This was clearly an appropriate response to the problem, closely related to remedies authorized in prior cases.... In many of the political subdivisions covered by §4 (b) of the Act, voting officials have persistently employed a variety of procedural tactics to deny Negroes the franchise, often in direct defiance or evasion of federal court decrees. Congress realized that merely to suspend voting rules which have been misused or are subject to misuse might leave this localized evil undisturbed. As for the briskness of the challenge procedure, Congress knew that in some of the areas affected, challenges had been persistently employed to harass registered Negroes. It chose to forestall this abuse, at the same time providing alternative ways for removing persons listed through error or fraud. In addition to the judicial challenge procedure, §7 (d) allows for the removal of names by the examiner himself, and §11 (c) makes it a crime to obtain a listing through fraud.

In recognition of the fact that there were political subdivisions covered by §4 (b) of the Act in which the appointment of federal examiners might be unnecessary, Congress assigned the Attorney General the task of determining the localities to which examiners should be sent. There is no warrant for the claim, asserted by Georgia as amicus curiae, that the Attorney General is free to use this power in an arbitrary fashion, without regard to the purposes of the Act. Section 6 (b) sets adequate standards to guide the exercise of his discretion, by directing him to calculate the registration ratio of non-whites to whites, and to weigh evidence of good-faith efforts to avoid possible voting discrimination. At the same time, the special termination procedures of §13 (a) provide indirect judicial review for the political subdivisions affected, assuring the withdrawal of federal examiners from areas where they are clearly not needed....

After enduring nearly a century of widespread resistance to the Fifteenth Amendment, Congress has marshalled an array of potent weapons against the evil, with authority in the Attorney General to employ them effectively. Many of the areas directly affected by this development have indicated their willingness to abide by any restraints legitimately imposed upon them. We here hold that the portions of the Voting Rights Act properly before us are a valid means for carrying out the commands of the Fifteenth Amendment. Hopefully, millions of non-white Americans will now be able to participate for the first time on an equal basis in the government under which they live. We may finally look forward to the day when truly "[t]he right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

The bill of complaint is Dismissed.

Mr. Justice Black, concurring and dissenting

I agree with substantially all of the Court's opinion sustaining the power of Congress under §2 of the Fifteenth Amendment to suspend state literacy tests and similar voting qualifications and to authorize the Attorney General to secure the appointment of federal examiners to register qualified voters in various sections of the country. Section 1 of the Fifteenth Amendment provides that "The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

In addition to this unequivocal command to the States and the Federal Government that no citizen shall have his right to vote denied or abridged because of race or color, §2 of the Amendment unmistakably gives Congress specific power to go further and pass appropriate legislation to protect this right to vote against any method of abridgment no matter how subtle. Compare my dissenting opinion in Bell v. Maryland.... I have no doubt whatever as to the power of Congress under §2 to enact the provisions of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 dealing with the suspension of state voting tests that have been used as notorious means to deny and abridge voting rights on racial grounds. This same congressional power necessarily exists to authorize appointment of federal examiners. I also agree with the judgment of the Court upholding §4 (b) of the Act which sets out a formula for determining when and where the major remedial sections of the Act take effect. I reach this conclusion, however, for a somewhat different reason than that stated by the Court, which is that "the coverage formula is rational in both practice and theory." I do not base my conclusion on the fact that the formula is rational, for it is enough for me that Congress by creating this formula has merely exercised its hitherto unquestioned and undisputed power to decide when, where, and upon what conditions its laws shall go into effect. By stating in specific detail that the major remedial sections of the Act are to be applied in areas where certain conditions exist, and by granting the Attorney General and the Director of the Census unreviewable power to make the mechanical determination of which areas come within the formula of §4 (b), I believe that Congress has acted within its established power to set out preconditions upon which the Act is to go into effect.…

Though, as I have said, I agree with most of the Court's conclusions, I dissent from its holding that every part of §5 of the Act is constitutional. Section 4 (a), to which §5 is linked, suspends for five years all literacy tests and similar devices in those States coming within the formula of §4 (b). Section 5 goes on to provide that a State covered by §4 (b) can in no way amend its constitution or laws relating to voting without first trying to persuade the Attorney General of the United States or the Federal District Court for the District of Columbia that the new proposed laws do not have the purpose and will not have the effect of denying the right to vote to citizens on account of their race or color. I think this section is unconstitutional on at least two grounds.

(a) The Constitution gives federal courts jurisdiction over cases and controversies only. If it can be said that any case or controversy arises under this section which gives the District Court for the District of Columbia jurisdiction to approve or reject state laws or constitutional amendments, then the case or controversy must be between a State and the United States Government. But it is hard for me to believe that a justiciable controversy can arise in the constitutional sense from a desire by the United States Government or some of its officials to determine in advance what legislative provisions a State may enact or what constitutional amendments it may adopt. If this dispute between the Federal Government and the States amounts to a case or controversy it is a far cry from the traditional constitutional notion of a case or controversy as a dispute over the meaning of enforceable laws or the manner in which they are applied. And if by this section Congress has created a case or controversy, and I do not believe it has, then it seems to me that the most appropriate judicial forum for settling these important questions is this Court acting under its original Art. III, §2, jurisdiction to try cases in which a State is a party. At least a trial in this Court would treat the States with the dignity to which they should be entitled as constituent members of our Federal Union.

The form of words and the manipulation of presumptions used in §5 to create the illusion of a case or controversy should not be allowed to cloud the effect of that section. By requiring a State to ask a federal court to approve the validity of a proposed law which has in no way become operative, Congress has asked the State to secure precisely the type of advisory opinion our Constitution forbids. As I have pointed out elsewhere, … some of those drafting our Constitution wanted to give the federal courts the power to issue advisory opinions and propose new laws to the legislative body. These suggestions were rejected. We should likewise reject any attempt by Congress to flout constitutional limitations by authorizing federal courts to render advisory opinions when there is no case or controversy before them. Congress has ample power to protect the rights of citizens to vote without resorting to the unnecessarily circuitous, indirect and unconstitutional route it has adopted in this section.

(b) My second and more basic objection to §5 is that Congress has here exercised its power under §2 of the Fifteenth Amendment through the adoption of means that conflict with the most basic principles of the Constitution. As the Court says the limitations of the power granted under §2 are the same as the limitations imposed on the exercise of any of the powers expressly granted Congress by the Constitution. The classic formulation of these constitutional limitations was stated by Chief Justice Marshall when he said in McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat.… "Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the constitution, are constitutional."

Section 5, by providing that some of the States cannot pass state laws or adopt state constitutional amendments without first being compelled to beg federal authorities to approve their policies, so distorts our constitutional structure of government as to render any distinction drawn in the Constitution between state and federal power almost meaningless. One of the most basic premises upon which our structure of government was founded was that the Federal Government was to have certain specific and limited powers and no others, and all other power was to be reserved either "to the States respectively, or to the people." Certainly if all the provisions of our Constitution which limit the power of the Federal Government and reserve other power to the States are to mean anything, they mean at least that the States have power to pass laws and amend their constitutions without first sending their officials hundreds of miles away to beg federal authorities to approve them. Moreover, it seems to me that §5 which gives federal officials power to veto state laws they do not like is in direct conflict with the clear command of our Constitution that "The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government." I cannot help but believe that the inevitable effect of any such law which forces any one of the States to entreat federal authorities in far-away places for approval of local laws before they can become effective is to create the impression that the State or States treated in this way are little more than conquered provinces. And if one law concerning voting can make the States plead for this approval by a distant federal court or the United States Attorney General, other laws on different subjects can force the States to seek the advance approval not only of the Attorney General but of the President himself or any other chosen members of his staff. It is inconceivable to me that such a radical degradation of state power was intended in any of the provisions of our Constitution or its Amendments. Of course I do not mean to cast any doubt whatever upon the indisputable power of the Federal Government to invalidate a state law once enacted and operative on the ground that it intrudes into the area of supreme federal power. But the Federal Government has heretofore always been content to exercise this power to protect federal supremacy by authorizing its agents to bring lawsuits against state officials once an operative state law has created an actual case and controversy. A federal law which assumes the power to compel the States to submit in advance any proposed legislation they have for approval by federal agents approaches dangerously near to wiping the States out as useful and effective units in the government of our country. I cannot agree to any constitutional interpretation that leads inevitably to such a result.

I see no reason to read into the Constitution meanings it did not have when it was adopted and which have not been put into it since. The proceedings of the original Constitutional Convention show beyond all doubt that the power to veto or negative state laws was denied Congress. On several occasions proposals were submitted to the convention to grant this power to Congress. These proposals were debated extensively and on every occasion when submitted for vote they were overwhelmingly rejected. The refusal to give Congress this extraordinary power to veto state laws was based on the belief that if such power resided in Congress the States would be helpless to function as effective governments. Since that time neither the Fifteenth Amendment nor any other Amendment to the Constitution has given the slightest indication of a purpose to grant Congress the power to veto state laws either by itself or its agents. Nor does any provision in the Constitution endow the federal courts with power to participate with state legislative bodies in determining what state policies shall be enacted into law. The judicial power to invalidate a law in a case or controversy after the law has become effective is a long way from the power to prevent a State from passing a law. I cannot agree with the Court that Congress denied a power in itself to veto a state law can delegate this same power to the Attorney General or the District Court for the District of Columbia. For the effect on the States is the same in both cases they cannot pass their laws without sending their agents to the City of Washington to plead to federal officials for their advance approval.

In this and other prior Acts Congress has quite properly vested the Attorney General with extremely broad power to protect voting rights of citizens against discrimination on account of race or color. Section 5 viewed in this context is of very minor importance and in my judgment is likely to serve more as an irritant to the States than as an aid to the enforcement of the Act. I would hold §5 invalid for the reasons stated above with full confidence that the Attorney General has ample power to give vigorous, expeditious and effective protection to the voting rights of all citizens.

Stokely Carmichael's "Black Power"

"The only time I hear people talk about nonviolence is when black people move to defend themselves against white people."

Overview

On October 29, 1966, Stokely Carmichael addressed an audience consisting primarily of college students at the open-air Greek Theater at the University of California at Berkeley. Carmichael was a leading spokesperson for the American civil rights movement as well as for international human rights and the relationship between the two movements; he was also an outspoken critic of the Vietnam War. Carmichael had first become known as a representative of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, or SNCC, commonly pronounced "snick." After breaking with SNCC in 1967, Carmichael became affiliated with the more militant Black Panther Party. Finally, after breaking with the Black Panthers, he spoke from his own platform during a period of self-imposed exile before his death in the Republic of Guinea. His UC Berkeley speech is usually referred to as the "Black Power" speech, although he gave other speeches that stressed the same theme and sometimes have been referred to by that same title. Carmichael touched on a broad range of issues in his UC Berkeley speech, including SNCC's condemnation of white America's "institutional racism" (a term he has been credited with coining) and fear of the term "Black Power." Carmichael also discussed the relationship between the American civil rights movement and unrest in much of the postcolonial world, the need for white activists to organize in white communities, nonviolence versus self-defense in the face of racial oppression, and the evil of the Vietnam War.

Carmichael was talking to an audience of largely left-leaning students on one of the most liberal, even radical, campuses in the country at a time when the civil rights movement had begun to hit its stride. He was speaking as a representative of SNCC and cited the positions taken as those of SNCC, whose platform he was largely responsible for developing and articulating. Although SNCC espoused nonviolence at the time and included whites in its membership, Carmichael was already moving away from white inclusion in SNCC, calling instead for whites to organize nonracist whites in their own communities. He was also questioning the workability of nonviolence in the face of violence against peaceful African American demonstrators by whites in positions of power. It would be these two issues that caused Carmichael to separate himself from SNCC which would itself move away from its dedication to nonviolence in the coming years and join the more radical Black Panther Party.

Context

The year 1966 was pivotal for both of Carmichael's major concerns: civil rights and the Vietnam War. His address was delivered at a time when the political and social climate of the country was being shaped by the assassinations of three major figures. President John F. Kennedy had been assassinated on November 22, 1963, and the black civil rights activist Malcolm X had been killed on February 21, 1965. Eighteen months after the UC Berkeley speech, on April 4, 1968, the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., would be murdered in Memphis, Tennessee. Several months before the UC Berkeley speech, Carmichael had taken part in the March against Fear from Memphis, Tennessee, to Jackson, Mississippi. The march had been organized by James Meredith, the first African American student at the University of Mississippi, where he had been subject to constant harassment. After graduation he organized the march, which began on June 5, 1966, in order to bring attention to black voting rights issues in the South and to help blacks overcome fear of violence. During the march he was shot in an assassination attempt by Aubrey James Norvell, but he survived. Several civil rights leaders, including Carmichael, joined the march after the shooting. Carmichael was arrested in Greenwood, Mississippi, while participating in the march. When he rejoined the marchers, he galvanized them with a speech at a rally; this speech has also been referred to as his "Black Power" speech.

At the time of his speech at UC Berkeley, Carmichael was still not only a member of SNCC but also in many ways its public face and certainly its most charismatic speaker. He was particularly highly regarded as a speaker on college campuses. SNCC, formed in 1960, was a major force in the civil rights movement. It organized voter registration drives throughout the South and events such as the 1963 March on Washington. Leaders of the organization included such notables of the civil rights movement as Julian Bond, John Lewis, Marion Barry, and Carmichael's successor as chairman, H. Rap Brown (later known as Jamil Abdullah Al-Amin). In addition to its "Black Power" focus, SNCC was also involved in protests against the Vietnam War.

On March 9, 1965, the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., arrived in Selma, Alabama, to lead a nonviolent march of activists, both black and white, to the state capital at Montgomery. The march had already begun two days earlier, but its participants had encountered violent resistance from state troopers and local law enforcement at the Edmund Pettus Bridge on Selma's outskirts. On March 25, the marchers, under King's leadership and the protection of National Guard troops authorized by President Lyndon Johnson, arrived in Montgomery. The march had attracted over twenty-five thousand participants in its final days, but its triumph would soon be overshadowed by other events. In August of that same year, riots erupted in the Watts section of Los Angeles. During the five days of disturbances, over fourteen thousand National Guard troops were sent to South Central Los Angeles. When the dust settled, thirty-four had died (most of them black), more than one thousand had been injured, and property damage had amounted to an estimated $40 million, possibly much more. During the following months up to the time of Carmichael's UC Berkeley speech, violent conflict involving blacks and local law enforcement swept through cities across the nation. These events prompted SNCC's leadership to begin to move away from strict adherence to the principle of nonviolence.

Also on the nation's mind was the deepening American involvement in Vietnam. In August 1964 the Communist North Vietnamese attacked two U.S. naval destroyers. In response, Congress passed the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution (unanimously in the House of Representatives and with just two nays in the Senate), which gave President Lyndon Johnson the authority to send combat troops to South Vietnam. In March 1965, the first U.S. combat troops thirty-five hundred Marines joined twenty-three thousand U.S. advisers and special forces already in Vietnam. By the end of that year nearly two hundred thousand American troops would be in Vietnam. Antiwar sentiment was strongly felt on many college campuses in the mid-1960s, but the liberal UC Berkeley campus was a hotbed of student protest. In the spring of 1965, the Vietnam Day Committee a coalition of student groups, political groups, labor organizations, and churches was formed on the campus by the activists Jerry Rubin, Abbie Hoffman, and others. A campus protest on May 21 and 22 of that year, during which President Johnson was burned in effigy, attracted some thirty-five thousand people. In his speech at UC Berkeley in 1966, Carmichael would have been speaking before a highly receptive audience.

About the Author

Stokely Carmichael, later in life known also as Kwame Ture, was born on June 29, 1941, in Port-of-Spain, Trinidad and Tobago. His parents left him in the care of his grandparents at an early age and immigrated to New York City, where they worked in blue-collar jobs. Carmichael eventually joined his parents in New York and attended the Bronx High School of Science. In 1960 he began attending Howard University, where he became involved with the newly formed SNCC. While he was a member of SNCC in 1965, Carmichael established his effectiveness as an organizer when he played a lead role in increasing the number of registered black voters in Lowndes County, Alabama, from seventy to twenty-six hundred. There he worked with the Lowndes County Freedom Organization. Coincidentally for the future member of the California-based Black Panther organization, the Lowndes County Freedom Organization had as its mascot a black panther, which it used in juxtaposition with the white-controlled Democratic Party's local mascot, a white rooster instead of the nationwide symbol of the donkey. As a representative of the militant wing of SNCC, Carmichael rose to become the organization's chairman in 1966.

Carmichael was at first supportive of the work of Martin Luther King. He joined with King in 1966 to continue James Meredith's March against Fear from Memphis, Tennessee, to Jackson, Mississippi, after Meredith had been shot by a white sniper. Carmichael would later repudiate King's nonviolent stance, although as late as April 15, 1967, he joined King in speaking out against the Vietnam War. Through the force of his rhetoric, Carmichael became a celebrity, but others in SNCC resented his prominence. He was replaced as chairman of SNCC by H. Rap Brown in 1967 and was soon formally expelled from the organization. That year, Carmichael joined the more militant Black Panther Party. As "honorary prime minister" of the Panthers, he became an even more forceful critic of the Vietnam War and lectured throughout the world and the United States, often on college campuses. However, Carmichael never rose to become the official spokesperson for the Panthers. Eventually, he broke with the Panthers over the issue of whether whites should be allowed to become members.

After the assassination of King on April 4, 1968, Carmichael was in Washington, D.C., and, although he was no longer officially a member of SNCC, led members of that organization in trying to maintain order. In 1969 he left the United States and the Panthers to live in the Republic of Guinea, which had gained independence from France in 1958. There he changed his name to Kwame Ture in honor of two figures: Guinea's president, Ahmed Sékou Touré, who ruled the country from its liberation until his death in 1984; and Kwame Nkrumah, the former president of Ghana, who, after he had been overthrown, was offered refuge by Touré. From his base in Guinea, Carmichael wrote and spoke, advocating pan-Africanism and Socialism.

Carmichael died of prostate cancer on November 15, 1998, at the age of fifty-seven, Before his death, he had claimed that the Federal Bureau of Investigation had infected him with a strain of cancer in order to assassinate him. It was later learned that he had been the subject of surveillance by the FBI and the Central Intelligence Agency since 1968.

Carmichael begins his speech at UC Berkeley with a mocking dig at his audience, in which he describes the university and its environs as the "white intellectual ghetto of the West." Continuing in this edgy but humorous vein, he announces that, based upon SNCC's successes at voter registration, he would be running for president, although he notes next that he is ineligible because he was not born in the United States. He then states that he would not get caught up in questions about the meaning of "Black Power" leaving that to the press though he mocks reporters, calling them "advertisers."

◆ Condemnation

Carmichael then turns to his first major point, the question of "whether or not a man can condemn himself." In breaking down this question, he turns to the thought of three intellectuals. Albert Camus and Jean-Paul Sartre were both French intellectuals and writers of the early- to mid-twentieth century. Camus, born in Algeria to parents of French and Spanish origin, was the first African-born writer to win the Nobel Prize. Although his name was often linked with existentialism, Camus rejected this label and thought of himself as an absurdist. He was also associated with the European Union movement and opposition to totalitarianism. Jean-Paul Sartre was a French existentialist and Communist who opposed French rule in Algeria. Frantz Fanon was a writer, philosopher, and revolutionary who was born in Martinique and whose books The Wretched of the Earth, Black Skin, White Masks, and A Dying Colonialism were key documents in the anticolonial movement and would likely have been familiar to many in Carmichael's UC Berkeley audience. Carmichael asserts that SNCC's leaders also believed that man cannot condemn himself. Carmichael's point is that since "white America cannot condemn herself," SNCC has condemned it. He then mentions Sheriff Lawrence Rainey in Neshoba County, Mississippi; this is a reference to the notorious murder in 1964 of three civil rights workers, two of them white and one black, through the collusion of local law enforcement agencies and the Ku Klux Klan.

◆ White Supremacy

With paragraph 6, Carmichael takes up the issue of white supremacy. He begins by arguing that integration is an "insidious subterfuge" that in fact maintains white supremacy. He compares integration to thalidomide, a drug given to pregnant women that infamously had turned out to cause severe birth defects. He makes reference to Ross Barnett, who had been the segregationist governor of Mississippi, and Jim Clark, the sheriff of Dallas County, Alabama, who had been responsible for authorizing the violent assaults and arrests of activists during the Selma-to-Montgomery march of 1965. He argues that American institutions are racist (Carmichael has been credited with having coined the term institutional racism) and then asks rhetorically what whites who are not racists can do to change the system.

Carmichael rejects the idea that whites can give anybody their freedom. "A man is born free" and then enslaved, so whites must stop denying freedom, rather than trying to "give" freedom. He then states that it follows logically that civil rights legislation, passed by white people, is ultimately for the benefit of white people. Laws regarding public accommodations and the right to vote, he argues, show white people that African Americans have certain rights; however, African Americans should already be aware that they are entitled to those rights. Voting, for example, is a right, not a privilege.

Carmichael next discusses white failures at democracy in the international sphere, citing Vietnam, South Africa, the Philippines, South America, and Puerto Rico. He states, in paragraph 11:

> We not only condemn the [United States] for what it's done internally, but we must condemn it for what it does externally. We see this country trying to rule the world, and someone must stand up and start articulating that this country is not God, and cannot rule the world.

In this vein he condemns missionary work in Africa as a component of white supremacy, arguing that missionary work was premised on the belief that Africans were uncivilized. He also portrays missionaries as exchanging Bibles for natives' land. Carmichael then links domestic endeavors such as Head Start to the same agenda. He rejects the notion that people are poor simply because they do not work. If this were actually the criterion for poverty, then such people as Nelson Rockefeller (the governor of New York and heir to the Standard Oil fortune), Bobby Kennedy (the brother of president John F. Kennedy), President Johnson and his wife, Lady Bird Johnson, and other powerful Americans should be poor, for in Carmichael's view, they do not work.

◆ Black Power

Carmichael then argues, in paragraph 16, that the debate over the use of the term Black Power is part of a psychological struggle over whether African Americans can use terms without white approval. He states that black Americans are often put in the position of having to defend their actions and maintains that it is time for white America to be put in the position of having to defend its actions "defending themselves as to why they have oppressed and exploited us." He draws attention to the extent of segregation by noting that only 6 percent of black children are enrolled in integrated schools. Although the particular source that gave him this statistic is uncertain, a number of contemporary documents cited such a figure, including the decision in United States v. Jefferson County Board of Education (1966) by Justice John Minor Wisdom of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, a judge who wrote a number of influential opinions on school desegregation. In paragraph 21, Carmichael draws his listeners' attention to the heavy-handed police presence in Oakland, California, and then asks what the nation's political parties can do to create institutions that "will become the political expressions of people on a day-to-day basis."

◆ White Activism

Carmichael then discusses true integration as being a two-way street. He argues that white activists must organize in the white community to change white society. He rejects the idea of whites working in the African American community as damaging on a psychological basis and concludes that his position on this is not "reverse racist." In this light, he alludes to the gubernatorial race in California; the election was held just over one week after his speech.

Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara pointing to a map of Vietnam at a press conference (Library of Congress)

The "two clowns" to whom he refers are the Democratic candidate and then-incumbent governor Edmund G. "Pat" Brown and the Republican candidate and future president Ronald Reagan, who would soon win by a margin of 15 percentage points. Interestingly, Carmichael asserts that SNCC did not believe that the Democratic Party represents the needs of black people. He argues that what was needed was a new coalition of voters who would start building new political and social institutions that would meet the needs of all people. After a reference to the nineteenth-century African American leader Frederick Douglass, Carmichael calls for a new generation of leaders in the black community, declaring, in paragraph 26, that "black people must be seen in positions of power, doing and articulating for themselves."

◆ The Vietnam War

Carmichael then turns to an attack on the Vietnam War as an "illegal and immoral war" and rhetorically asks the audience how it could be stopped. His answer is resistance to the draft. He refers to U.S. Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara as a "racist" and calls President Johnson a "buffoon" and describes American troops as "hired killers." The peace movement, he argues, has been ineffective because it consists of college students who are exempt from the draft anyway. A draft board classification of II-S ("2S" in the speech) gives deferred military service for students actively engaged in study. He calls attention to the irony of referring to black militancy as violent when black militant groups were fighting for human rights and the end of violence in places like Vietnam. As for African American soldiers who had been drafted and were fighting in Vietnam, he characterizes them as black mercenaries.

◆ Student Activism and Politics

Carmichael next challenges students on university campuses. He notes, in paragraph 34, that it is impossible for whites and blacks to form "human relationships" given the nature of the country's institutions. He refers to the "myths" about the United States, calling them "downright lies." He suggests that a form of social hypocrisy has become manifest in the economic insecurity of many African Americans and the unwillingness of most affluent whites to share their relative economic security with the black community. He calls on his listeners to examine "the histories that we have been told" and observes that in countries around the world students have led revolutions. He goes on to characterize American college students essentially his audience as "perhaps the most politically unsophisticated students in the world" and says that they, unlike many students throughout the rest of the world, have been unable or unwilling to become revolutionaries. Once again he lambastes the Democratic political establishment, including such people as Johnson, Bobby Kennedy, Wayne Morse (a U.S. senator from Oregon who, ironically, was one of only two U.S. senators who voted against the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution), James Eastland (a conservative U.S. senator from Mississippi), and George Wallace (the segregationist governor of Alabama). Carmichael states that it would be impossible to reach a common moral ground with these political figures, all of them at the time Democrats. Only the seizure of power by revolution would put these and other members of the political establishment out of business.

◆ SNCC

Carmichael then turns specifically to a discussion of SNCC. He states, in paragraph 42, that he does not want a "part of the American pie" and notes that a central purpose of SNCC was to raise questions. One of these questions was how the United States had come to be a world power and the world's wealthiest nation. He thus segues into a discussion of nonviolence at a time when he was coming to reject his initial stance and that of SNCC in favor of advocating violent social change. Groups like SNCC and the Quakers are not the ones who need to espouse nonviolence, he argues; rather, white supremacists in small Mississippi towns such as Cicero and Grenada need to be persuaded to act without violence toward peaceful demonstrators.

Once again Carmichael returns to the relationship between the American civil rights struggle and the international movement against postcolonialism, that is, Western domination of a postcolonial world largely inhabited by people of color. Again, he condemns the Peace Corps, as did Malcolm X, as a method of stealing nations' natural resources while teaching their citizens to read and write. He makes glancing references to hot spots in the world other than Vietnam. Among them are Santo Domingo (the capital of the Dominican Republic), South Africa (still in the grip of apartheid, or systematic segregation), and Zimbabwe (a former British colony then known as Rhodesia, which had recently declared its independence but was under white minority rule). He notes that the United States had tolerated oppression in these and other places as a way of opposing Communist expansion and aggression. He again alludes to the theft of smaller countries' natural resources through organizations like the Peace Corps, and again he urges (in paragraph 51) the white community "to have the courage to go into white communities and start organizing them." He then discusses the emergence of the organizational precursor to the Black Panther Party in Lowndes County, Alabama, as well as the fear that many white people have of anything black and the association of blackness with evil. Once more he stresses the double standard of urging nonviolence while the United States was "bombing the hell out [of] Vietnam." He sees a further irony in comments by the president and vice president (at the time, Hubert Humphrey) about looting during urban race riots, when the United States was in effect looting Vietnam. Carmichael challenges his listeners to consider whether Ho Chi Minh, the leader of Communist North Vietnam, would agree with him about America's illegal looting of Vietnam. He concludes his speech by stating that the chief issue facing African Americans was the psychological battle to define themselves and organize themselves as they saw fit. An important question related to this issue was how white activists could build new political institutions to destroy the old racist ones.

Audience

Stokely Carmichael's audience consisted of students at the University of California at Berkeley. At the time, the school was a major center of student activism; a large percentage of its students were, if not strident activists, opposed to the war in Vietnam and proponents of civil rights. Indeed, UC Berkeley was the home of the radical antiwar Berkeley Barb, and on October 16, 1965, the campus had been the starting point of a massive antiwar march to Oakland, one of the earliest mass protests in the antiwar movement.

Carmichael somewhat humorously attacks his audience as "the white intellectual ghetto of the West." The audience would have been primarily, though not exclusively, white. Carmichael plays off the left-wing leanings of his audience as well, with references to Albert Camus, Jean-Paul Sartre, and Frantz Fanon, all icons of the student left. His address has survived and has come to be regarded as a key document in the civil rights movement.

Impact

Although he was already questioning the direction of SNCC at the time of his UC Berkeley speech, Carmichael was then at the height of his prominence as SNCC's representative speaker both on and off college campuses. Along with King and Malcolm X, he was a leading figure in both the civil rights and the antiwar movements. All three men saw these movements as linked with issues of international human rights, yet there would be much debate over the successes and failures of the civil rights and antiwar movements as well as the extent of their broader influence. The year after the UC Berkeley speech, President Lyndon Johnson would name the first African American Supreme Court justice, Thurgood Marshall, but on April 4, 1968, King would be assassinated. Long before SNCC disbanded in the 1970s (a new branch, however, has recently been established at the University of Louisville), Carmichael would move to a more militant stance as a member of the Black Panther Party.

On October 15, 1966, two weeks before Carmichael's UC Berkeley speech, the Black Panther Party was formed in Oakland, California, by Bobby Seale and Huey P. Newton with the goal of protecting African American neighborhoods from police brutality. Carmichael's comments on the absurdity of counseling nonviolence to African Americans rather than to the white supremacists who constantly perpetrated violence against black people were indicative of the Black Panthers' stance on condoning violence in self-defense. The Panthers originally espoused black nationalism but ultimately came to reject that view and favor Socialism without race consciousness. The organization was known for its Ten-Point Program and its demand that African American men be exempted from the draft. In addition to Seale and Newton, the best known of the Panthers was Eldridge Cleaver, who edited its newspaper, raising circulation to two hundred fifty thousand. The Panthers quickly grew to national prominence, but its chapters in cities across the country became subject to extensive police harassment and federal surveillance ordered by FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover. At least two dozen members of the Panthers died at the hands of law enforcement agencies before the group faded out of existence in the 1970s.

Regardless of the fate of the Black Panther Party, the Black Power movement, in which Carmichael was a major leader, was a significant chapter in American history. On the international front, efforts to stop the Vietnam War were ongoing and growing with the elevating attention of the public reflecting Carmichael's association of the anti Vietnam War movement with the broader international human rights and anticolonialist movements prompting President Johnson to announce that he would not run for reelection in 1968. Meanwhile, both the war and the antiwar movement continued to escalate until the years of conflict at last drew to a close: the shootings of unarmed antiwar protesters by National Guard troops at Kent State University in Ohio took place on May 4, 1970; the last American was helicoptered off the roof of the U.S. embassy in Saigon, South Vietnam, marking the end of the Vietnam War, on April 29, 1975.

Questions for Further Study

1. Compare Carmichael's comments on the Democratic Party in this document with Fannie Lou Hamer's Testimony at the Democratic National Convention. What were the problems that some, perhaps many, African Americans had with the Democratic Party at that time, particularly in the South?

2. Do you agree with Carmichael that many people were afraid of Black Power primarily because of the word black and that if the movement had had a different name, people might have responded to it more favorably? Why or why not?

3. Compare Stokely Carmichael's opposition to the war in Vietnam with that of Martin Luther King, Jr., in "Beyond Vietnam: A Time to Break Silence." On what grounds did the two men oppose the war? Did they have differing reasons for opposing the war?

4. Carmichael was speaking to an audience of primarily university students. In what ways did he tailor his remarks to appeal to the interests and concerns of students at that time?

5. Carmichael refers to voting as a right, and he is correct. But is there not a sense in which voting is also a privilege? Agree or disagree, and explain.

Stokely Carmichael's "Black Power"

Thank you very much. It's a privilege and an honor to be in the white intellectual ghetto of the West. We wanted to do a couple of things before we started. The first is that, based on the fact that SNCC, through the articulation of its program by its chairman, has been able to win elections in Georgia, Alabama, Maryland, and by our appearance here will win an election in California, in 1968 I'm going to run for President of the United States. I just can't make it, 'cause I wasn't born in the United States. That's the only thing holding me back.

We wanted to say that this is a student conference, as it should be, held on a campus, and that we're not ever to be caught up in the intellectual masturbation of the question of Black Power. That's a function of people who are advertisers that call themselves reporters. Oh, for my members and friends of the press, my self-appointed white critics, I was reading Mr. Bernard Shaw two days ago, and I came across a very important quote which I think is most apropos for you. He says, "All criticism is a[n] autobiography." Dig yourself. Okay.

The philosophers Camus and Sartre raise the question whether or not a man can condemn himself. The black existentialist philosopher who is pragmatic, Frantz Fanon, answered the question. He said that man could not. Camus and Sartre does not. We in SNCC tend to agree with Camus and Sartre that a man cannot condemn himself. Were he to condemn himself, he would then have to inflict punishment upon himself. An example would be the Nazis. Any prisoner who any of the Nazi prisoners who admitted, after he was caught and incarcerated, that he committed crimes, that he killed all the many people that he killed, he committed suicide. The only ones who were able to stay alive were the ones who never admitted that they committed crimes against people that is, the ones who rationalized that Jews were not human beings and deserved to be killed, or that they were only following orders.

On a more immediate scene, the officials and the population the white population in Neshoba County, Mississippi that's where Philadelphia is could not could not condemn [Sheriff] Rainey, his deputies, and the other fourteen men that killed three human beings. They could not because they elected Mr. Rainey to do precisely what he did and that for them to condemn him will be for them to condemn themselves.

In a much larger view, SNCC says that white America cannot condemn herself. And since we are liberal, we have done it: You stand condemned. Now, a number of things that arises from that answer of how do you condemn yourselves. Seems to me that the institutions that function in this country are clearly racist, and that they're built upon racism. And the question, then, is how can black people inside of this country move? And then how can white people who say they're not a part of those institutions begin to move? And how then do we begin to clear away the obstacles that we have in this society, that make us live like human beings? How can we begin to build institutions that will allow people to relate with each other as human beings? This country has never done that, especially around the country of white or black.

Now, several people have been upset because we've said that integration was irrelevant when initiated by blacks, and that in fact it was a subterfuge, an insidious subterfuge, for the maintenance of white supremacy. Now we maintain that in the past six years or so, this country has been feeding us a "thalidomide drug of integration" and that some negroes have been walking down a dream street talking about sitting next to white people and that that does not begin to solve the problem, that when we went to Mississippi we did not go to sit next to Ross Barnett; we did not go to sit next to Jim Clark; we went to get them out of our way and that people ought to understand that; that we were never fighting for the right to integrate, we were fighting against white supremacy.

Now, then, in order to understand white supremacy we must dismiss the fallacious notion that white people can give anybody their freedom. No man can give anybody his freedom. A man is born free. You may enslave a man after he is born free, and that is in fact what this country does. It enslaves black people after they're born, so that the only acts that white people can do is to stop denying black people their freedom; that is, they must stop denying freedom. They never give it to anyone.

Now we want to take that to its logical extension, so that we could understand, then, what its relevancy would be in terms of new civil rights bills. I maintain that every civil rights bill in this country was passed for white people, not for black people. For example, I am black. I know that. I also know that while I am black I am a human being, and therefore I have the right to go into any public place. White people didn't know that. Every time I tried to go into a place they stopped me. So some boys had to write a bill to tell that white man, "He's a human being; don't stop him." That bill was for that white man, not for me. I knew it all the time. I knew it all the time.

I knew that I could vote and that that wasn't a privilege; it was my right. Every time I tried I was shot, killed or jailed, beaten or economically deprived. So somebody had to write a bill for white people to tell them, "When a black man comes to vote, don't bother him." That bill, again, was for white people, not for black people; so that when you talk about open occupancy, I know I can live anyplace I want to live. It is white people across this country who are incapable of allowing me to live where I want to live. You need a civil rights bill, not me. I know I can live where I want to live.

So that the failures to pass a civil rights bill isn't because of Black Power, isn't because of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee; it's not because of the rebellions that are occurring in the major cities. It is incapability of whites to deal with their own problems inside their own communities. That is the problem of the failure of the civil rights bill.

And so in a larger sense we must then ask, How is it that black people move? And what do we do? But the question in a greater sense is, How can white people who are the majority and who are responsible for making democracy work make it work? They have miserably failed to this point. They have never made democracy work, be it inside the United States, Vietnam, South Africa, Philippines, South America, Puerto Rico. Wherever American has been, she has not been able to make democracy work; so that in a larger sense, we not only condemn the country for what it's done internally, but we must condemn it for what it does externally. We see this country trying to rule the world, and someone must stand up and start articulating that this country is not God, and cannot rule the world.

Now, then, before we move on we ought to develop the white supremacy attitudes that were either conscious or subconscious thought and how they run rampant through the society today. For example, the missionaries were sent to Africa. They went with the attitude that blacks were automatically inferior. As a matter of fact, the first act the missionaries did, you know, when they got to Africa was to make us cover up our bodies, because they said it got them excited. We couldn't go bare-breasted anymore because they got excited.

Now when the missionaries came to civilize us because we were uncivilized, educate us because we were uneducated, and give us some literate studies because we were illiterate, they charged a price. The missionaries came with the Bible, and we had the land. When they left, they had the land, and we still have the Bible. And that has been the rationalization for Western civilization as it moves across the world and stealing and plundering and raping everybody in its path. Their one rationalization is that the rest of the world is uncivilized and they are in fact civilized. And they are un-civil-ized.

And that runs on today, you see, because what we have today is we have what we call "modern-day Peace Corps missionaries," and they come into our ghettos and they Head Start, Upward Lift, Bootstrap, and Upward Bound us into white society, 'cause they don't want to face the real problem which is a man is poor for one reason and one reason only: 'cause he does not have money period. If you want to get rid of poverty, you give people money period.

And you ought not to tell me about people who don't work, and you can't give people money without working, 'cause if that were true, you'd have to start stopping Rockefeller, Bobby Kennedy, Lyndon Baines Johnson, Lady Bird Johnson, the whole of Standard Oil, the Gulf Corp, all of them, including probably a large number of the Board of Trustees of this university. So the question, then, clearly, is not whether or not one can work; it's Who has power? Who has power to make his or her acts legitimate? That is all. And that in this country, that power is invested in the hands of white people, and they make their acts legitimate. It is now, therefore, for black people to make our acts legitimate.

Now we are now engaged in a psychological struggle in this country, and that is whether or not black people will have the right to use the words they want to use without white people giving their sanction to it; and that we maintain, whether they like it or not, we gonna use the word "Black Power" and let them address themselves to that; but that we are not going to wait for white people to sanction Black Power. We're tired waiting; every time black people move in this country, they're forced to defend their position before they move. It's time that the people who are supposed to be defending their position do that.

That's white people. They ought to start defending themselves as to why they have oppressed and exploited us.

Now it is clear that when this country started to move in terms of slavery, the reason for a man being picked as a slave was one reason because of the color of his skin. If one was black one was automatically inferior, inhuman, and therefore fit for slavery; so that the question of whether or not we are individually suppressed is nonsensical, and it's a downright lie. We are oppressed as a group because we are black, not because we are lazy, not because we're apathetic, not because we're stupid, not because we smell, not because we eat watermelon and have good rhythm. We are oppressed because we are black.

And in order to get out of that oppression one must wield the group power that one has, not the individual power which this country then sets the criteria under which a man may come into it. That is what is called in this country as integration: "You do what I tell you to do and then we'll let you sit at the table with us." And that we are saying that we have to be opposed to that. We must now set up criteria and that if there's going to be any integration, it's going to be a two-way thing. If you believe in integration, you can come live in Watts. You can send your children to the ghetto schools. Let's talk about that. If you believe in integration, then we're going to start adopting us some white people to live in our neighborhood.

So it is clear that the question is not one of integration or segregation. Integration is a man's ability to want to move in there by himself. If someone wants to live in a white neighborhood and he is black, that is his choice. It should be his rights. It is not because white people will not allow him. So vice versa: If a black man wants to live in the slums, that should be his right. Black people will let him. That is the difference. And it's a difference on which this country makes a number of logical mistakes when they begin to try to criticize the program articulated by SNCC.

Now we maintain that we cannot afford to be concerned about 6 percent of the children in this country, black children, who you allow to come into white schools. We have 94 percent who still live in shacks. We are going to be concerned about those 94 percent. You ought to be concerned about them too. The question is, Are we willing to be concerned about those 94 percent? Are we willing to be concerned about the black people who will never get to Berkeley, who will never get to Harvard, and cannot get an education, so you'll never get a chance to rub shoulders with them and say, "Well, he's almost as good as we are; he's not like the others"? The question is, How can white society begin to move to see black people as human beings? I am black, therefore I am; not that I am black and I must go to college to prove myself. I am black, therefore I am. And don't deprive me of anything and say to me that you must go to college before you gain access to X, Y, and Z. It is only a rationalization for one's oppression.

The political parties in this country do not meet the needs of people on a day-to-day basis. The question is, How can we build new political institutions that will become the political expressions of people on a day-to-day basis? The question is, How can you build political institutions that will begin to meet the needs of Oakland, California? And the needs of Oakland, California, is not 1,000 policemen with submachine guns. They don't need that. They need that least of all. The question is, How can we build institutions where those people can begin to function on a day-to-day basis, where they can get decent jobs, where they can get decent houses, and where they can begin to participate in the policy and major decisions that affect their lives? That's what they need, not Gestapo troops, because this is not 1942, and if you play like Nazis, we playing back with you this time around. Get hip to that.

The question then is, How can white people move to start making the major institutions that they have in this country function the way it is supposed to function? That is the real question. And can white people move inside their own community and start tearing down racism where in fact it does exist? Where it exists. It is you who live in Cicero and stop us from living there. It is white people who stop us from moving into Grenada. It is white people who make sure that we live in the ghettos of this country. it is white institutions that do that. They must change. In order for America to really live on a basic principle of human relationships, a new society must be born. Racism must die, and the economic exploitation of this country of non-white peoples around the world must also die must also die.

Now there are several programs that we have in the South, most in poor white communities. We're trying to organize poor whites on a basis where they can begin to move around the question of economic exploitation and political disfranchisement. We know we've heard the theory several times but few people are willing to go into there. The question is, Can the white activist not try to be a Pepsi generation who comes alive in the black community, but can he be a man who's willing to move into the white community and start organizing where the organization is needed? Can he do that? The question is, Can the white society or the white activist disassociate himself with two clowns who waste time parrying with each other rather than talking about the problems that are facing people in this state? Can you dissociate yourself with those clowns and start to build new institutions that will eliminate all idiots like them.

And the question is, If we are going to do that when and where do we start, and how do we start? We maintain that we must start doing that inside the white community. Our own personal position politically is that we don't think the Democratic Party represents the needs of black people. We know it don't. And that if, in fact, white people really believe that, the question is, if they're going to move inside that structure, how are they going to organize around a concept of whiteness based on true brotherhood and based on stopping exploitation, economic exploitation, so that there will be a coalition base for black people to hook up with? You cannot form a coalition based on national sentiment. That is not a coalition. If you need a coalition to redress itself to real changes in this country, white people must start building those institutions inside the white community. And that is the real question, I think, facing the white activists today. Can they, in fact, begin to move into and tear down the institutions which have put us all in a trick bag that we've been into for the last hundred years?

I don't think that we should follow what many people say that we should fight to be leaders of tomorrow. Frederick Douglass said that the youth should fight to be leaders today. And God knows we need to be leaders today, 'cause the men who run this country are sick, are sick. So that can we on a larger sense begin now, today, to start building those institutions and to fight to articulate our position, to fight to be able to control our universities we need to be able to do that and to fight to control the basic institutions which perpetuate racism by destroying them and building new ones? That's the real question that faces us today, and it is a dilemma because most of us do not know how to work, and that the excuse that most white activists find is to run into the black community.

Now we maintain that we cannot have white people working in the black community, and we mean it on a psychological ground. The fact is that all black people often question whether or not they are equal to whites, because every time they start to do something, white people are around showing them how to do it. If we are going to eliminate that for the generation that comes after us, then black people must be seen in positions of power, doing and articulating for themselves, for themselves.

That is not to say that one is a reverse racist; it is to say that one is moving in a healthy ground; it is to say what the philosopher Sartre says: One is becoming an "antiracist racist." And this country can't understand that. Maybe it's because it's all caught up in racism. But I think what you have in SNCC is an anti-racist racism. We are against racists. Now if everybody who is white see themself [sic] as a racist and then see us against him, they're speaking from their own guilt position, not ours, not ours.

Now then, the question is, How can we move to begin to change what's going on in this country. I maintain, as we have in SNCC, that the war in Vietnam is an illegal and immoral war. And the question is, What can we do to stop that war? What can we do to stop the people who, in the name of our country, are killing babies, women, and children? What can we do to stop that? And I maintain that we do not have the power in our hands to change that institution, to begin to recreate it, so that they learn to leave the Vietnamese people alone, and that the only power we have is the power to say, "Hell no!" to the draft.

We have to say to ourselves that there is a higher law than the law of a racist named McNamara. There is a higher law than the law of a fool named Rusk. And there's a higher law than the law of a buffoon named Johnson. It's the law of each of us. It's the law of each of us. It is the law of each of us saying that we will not allow them to make us hired killers. We will stand pat. We will not kill anybody that they say kill. And if we decide to kill, we're going to decide who we going to kill. And this country will only be able to stop the war in Vietnam when the young men who are made to fight it begin to say, "Hell, no, we ain't going."

Now then, there's a failure because the Peace Movement has been unable to get off the college campuses where everybody has a 2S and not going to get drafted anyway. And the question is, How can you move out of that into the white ghettos of this country and begin to articulate a position for those white students who do not want to go. We cannot do that. It is something, sometimes ironic that many of the peace groups [are] beginning to call us violent and say they can no longer support us, and we are in fact the most militant organization [for] peace or civil rights or human rights against the war in Vietnam in this country today. There isn't one organization that has begun to meet our stance on the war in Vietnam, 'cause we not only say we are against the war in Vietnam; we are against the draft. We are against the draft. No man has the right to take a man for two years and train him to be a killer. A man should decide what he wants to do with his life.

So the question then is it becomes crystal clear for black people because we can easily say that anyone fighting in the war in Vietnam is nothing but a black mercenary, and that's all he is. Any time a black man leaves the country where he can't vote to supposedly deliver the vote for somebody else, he's a black mercenary. Any time a black man leaves this country, gets shot in Vietnam on foreign ground, and returns home and you won't give him a burial in his own homeland, he's a black mercenary, a black mercenary.

And that even if I were to believe the lies of Johnson, if I were to believe his lies that we're fighting to give democracy to the people in Vietnam, as a black man living in this country I wouldn't fight to give this to anybody. I wouldn't give it to anybody. So that we have to use our bodies and our minds in the only way that we see fit. We must begin like the philosopher Camus to come alive by saying "No!" That is the only act in which we begin to come alive, and we have to say "No!" to many, many things in this country.

This country is a nation of thieves. It has stole everything it has, beginning with black people, beginning with black people. And that the question is, How can we move to start changing this country from what it is a nation of thieves. This country cannot justify any longer its existence. We have become the policeman of the world. The marines are at our disposal to always bring democracy, and if the Vietnamese don't want democracy, well dammit, "We'll just wipe them the hell out, 'cause they don't deserve to live if they won't have our way of life."

There is then in a larger sense, What do you do on your university campus? Do you raise questions about the hundred black students who were kicked off campus a couple of weeks ago? Eight hundred? Eight hundred? And how does that question begin to move? Do you begin to relate to people outside of the ivory tower and university wall? Do you think you're capable of building those human relationships, as the country now stands? You're fooling yourself. It is impossible for white and black people to talk about building a relationship based on humanity when the country is the way it is, when the institutions are clearly against us.

We have taken all the myths of this country and we've found them to be nothing but downright lies. This country told us that if we worked hard we would succeed, and if that were true we would own this country lock, stock, and barrel lock, stock, and barrel lock, stock, and barrel. It is we who have picked the cotton for nothing. It is we who are the maids in the kitchens of liberal white people. It is we who are the janitors, the porters, the elevator men; we who sweep up your college floors. Yes, it is we who are the hardest workers and the lowest paid, and the lowest paid.

And that it is nonsensical for people to start talking about human relationships until they're willing to build new institutions. Black people are economically insecure. White liberals are economically secure. Can you begin to build an economic coalition? Are the liberals willing to share their salaries with the economically insecure black people they so much love? Then if you're not, are you willing to start building new institutions that will provide economic security for black people? That's the question we want to deal with. That's the question we want to deal with.

We have to seriously examine the histories that we have been told. But we have something more to do than that. American students are perhaps the most politically unsophisticated students in the world. Across every country in this world, while we were growing up, students were leading the major revolutions of their countries. We have not been able to do that. They have been politically aware of their existence. In South America our neighbors down below the border have one every 24 hours just to remind us that they're politically aware.

And we have been unable to grasp it because we've always moved in the field of morality and love while people have been politically jiving with our lives. And the question is, How do we now move politically and stop trying to move morally? You can't move morally against a man like Brown and Reagan. You've got to move politically to put them out of business. You've got to move politically.

You can't move morally against Lyndon Baines Johnson because he is an immoral man. He doesn't know what it's all about. So you've got to move politically. You've got to move politically. And that we have to begin to develop a political sophistication which is not to be a parrot: "The two-party system is the best party in the world." There is a difference between being a parrot and being politically sophisticated.

We have to raise questions about whether or not we do need new types of political institutions in this country, and we in SNCC maintain that we need them now. We need new political institutions in this country. Any time Lyndon Baines Johnson can head a Party which has in it Bobby Kennedy, Wayne Morse, Eastland, Wallace, and all those other supposed-to-be-liberal cats, there's something wrong with that Party. They're moving politically, not morally. And that if that party refuses to seat black people from Mississippi and goes ahead and seats racists like Eastland and his clique, it is clear to me that they're moving politically, and that one cannot begin to talk morality to people like that.

We must begin to think politically and see if we can have the power to impose and keep the moral values that we hold high. We must question the values of this society, and I maintain that black people are the best people to do that because we have been excluded from that society. And the question is, we ought to think whether or not we want to become a part of that society. That's what we want to do.

And that that is precisely what it seems to me that the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee is doing. We are raising questions about this country. I do not want to be a part of the American pie. The American pie means raping South Africa, beating Vietnam, beating South America, raping the Philippines, raping every country you've been in. I don't want any of your blood money. I don't want it don't want to be part of that system. And the question is, How do we raise those questions? How do we begin to raise them?

We have grown up and we are the generation that has found this country to be a world power, that has found this country to be the wealthiest country in the world. We must question how she got her wealth? That's what we're questioning, and whether or not we want this country to continue being the wealthiest country in the world at the price of raping everybody else across the world. That's what we must begin to question. And that because black people are saying we do not now want to become a part of you, we are called reverse racists. Ain't that a gas?

Now, then, we want to touch on nonviolence because we see that again as the failure of white society to make nonviolence work. I was always surprised at Quakers who came to Alabama and counseled me to be nonviolent, but didn't have the guts to start talking to James Clark to be nonviolent. That is where nonviolence needs to be preached to Jim Clark, not to black people. They have already been nonviolent too many years. The question is, Can white people conduct their nonviolent schools in Cicero where they belong to be conducted, not among black people in Mississippi. Can they conduct it among the white people in Grenada?

Six-foot-two men who kick little black children can you conduct nonviolent schools there? That is the question that we must raise, not that you conduct nonviolence among black people. Can you name me one black man today who's killed anybody white and is still alive? Even after rebellion, when some black brothers throw some bricks and bottles, ten thousand of them has to pay the crime, 'cause when the white policeman comes in, anybody who's black is arrested, "'cause we all look alike."

So that we have to raise those questions. We, the youth of this country, must begin to raise those questions. And we must begin to move to build new institutions that's going to speak to the needs of people who need it. We are going to have to speak to change the foreign policy of this country. One of the problems with the peace movement is that it's just too caught up in Vietnam, and that if we pulled out the troops from Vietnam this week, next week you'd have to get another peace movement for Santo Domingo. And the question is, How do you begin to articulate the need to change the foreign policy of this country a policy that is decided upon race, a policy on which decisions are made upon getting economic wealth at any price, at any price.

Now we articulate that we therefore have to hook up with black people around the world; and that that hookup is not only psychological, but becomes very real. If South America today were to rebel, and black people were to shoot the hell out of all the white people there as they should, as they should then Standard Oil would crumble tomorrow. If South Africa were to go today, Chase Manhattan Bank would crumble tomorrow. If Zimbabwe, which is called Rhodesia by white people, were to go tomorrow, General Electric would cave in on the East Coast. The question is, How do we stop those institutions that are so willing to fight against "Communist aggression" but closes their eyes to racist oppression? That is the question that you raise. Can this country do that?

Now, many people talk about pulling out of Vietnam. What will happen? If we pull out of Vietnam, there will be one less aggressor in there we won't be there, we won't be there. And so the question is, How do we articulate those positions? And we cannot begin to articulate them from the same assumptions that the people in the country speak, 'cause they speak from different assumptions than I assume what the youth in this country are talking about.

That we're not talking about a policy or aid or sending Peace Corps people in to teach people how to read and write and build houses while we steal their raw materials from them. Is that what we're talking about? 'Cause that's all we do. What underdeveloped countries need information on how to become industrialized, so they can keep their raw materials where they have it, produce them and sell it to this country for the price it's supposed to pay; not that we produce it and sell it back to them for a profit and keep sending our modern day missionaries in, calling them the sons of Kennedy. And that if the youth are going to participate in that program, how do you raise those questions where you begin to control that Peace Corps program? How do you begin to raise them?

How do we raise the questions of poverty? The assumptions of this country is that if someone is poor, they are poor because of their own individual blight, or they weren't born on the right side of town; they had too many children; they went in the army too early; or their father was a drunk, or they didn't care about school, or they made a mistake. That's a lot of nonsense. Poverty is well calculated in this country. It is well calculated, and the reason why the poverty program won't work is because the calculators of poverty are administering it. That's why it won't work.

So how can we, as the youth in the country, move to start tearing those things down? We must move into the white community. We are in the black community. We have developed a movement in the black community. The challenge is that the white activist has failed miserably to develop the movement inside of his community. And the question is, Can we find white people who are going to have the courage to go into white communities and start organizing them? Can we find them? Are they here and are they willing to do that? Those are the questions that we must raise for the white activist.

And we're never going to get caught up in questions about power. This country knows what power is. It knows it very well. And it knows what Black Power is 'cause it deprived black people of it for 400 years. So it knows what Black Power is. That the question of, Why do black people Why do white people in this country associate Black Power with violence? And the question is because of their own inability to deal with "blackness." If we had said "Negro power" nobody would get scared. Everybody would support it. Or if we said power for colored people, everybody'd be for that, but it is the word "black" it is the word "black" that bothers people in this country, and that's their problem, not mine their problem, their problem.

Now there's one modern day lie that we want to attack and then move on very quickly and that is the lie that says anything all black is bad. Now, you're all a college university crowd. You've taken your basic logic course. You know about a major premise and minor premise. So people have been telling me anything all black is bad. Let's make that our major premise.

Major premise: Anything all black is bad.

Minor premise or particular premise: I am all black.

Therefore …

I'm never going to be put in that trick bag; I am all black and I'm all good, dig it. Anything all black is not necessarily bad. Anything all black is only bad when you use force to keep whites out. Now that's what white people have done in this country, and they're projecting their same fears and guilt on us, and we won't have it, we won't have it. Let them handle their own fears and their own guilt. Let them find their own psychologists. We refuse to be the therapy for white society any longer. We have gone mad trying to do it. We have gone stark raving mad trying to do it.

I look at Dr. King on television every single day, and I say to myself: "Now there is a man who's desperately needed in this country. There is a man full of love. There is a man full of mercy. There is a man full of compassion." But every time I see Lyndon on television, I said, "Martin, baby, you got a long way to go."

So that the question stands as to what we are willing to do, how we are willing to say "No" to withdraw from that system and begin within our community to start to function and to build new institutions that will speak to our needs. In Lowndes County, we developed something called the Lowndes County Freedom Organization. It is a political party. The Alabama law says that if you have a Party you must have an emblem. We chose for the emblem a black panther, a beautiful black animal which symbolizes the strength and dignity of black people, an animal that never strikes back until he's back so far into the wall, he's got nothing to do but spring out. Yeah. And when he springs he does not stop.

Now there is a Party in Alabama called the Alabama Democratic Party. It is all white. It has as its emblem a white rooster and the words "white supremacy for the right." Now the gentlemen of the Press, because they're advertisers, and because most of them are white, and because they're produced by that white institution, never called the Lowndes County Freedom Organization by its name, but rather they call it the Black Panther Party. Our question is, Why don't they call the Alabama Democratic Party the "White Cock Party"? (It's fair to us.) It is clear to me that that just points out America's problem with sex and color, not our problem, not our problem. And it is now white America that is going to deal with those problems of sex and color.

If we were to be real and to be honest, we would have to admit that most people in this country see things black and white. We have to do that. All of us do. We live in a country that's geared that way. White people would have to admit that they are afraid to go into a black ghetto at night. They are afraid. That's a fact. They're afraid because they'd be "beat up," "lynched," "looted," "cut up," et cetera, et cetera. It happens to black people inside the ghetto every day, incidentally, and white people are afraid of that. So you get a man to do it for you a policeman. And now you figure his mentality, when he's afraid of black people. The first time a black man jumps, that white man going to shoot him. He's going to shoot him. So police brutality is going to exist on that level because of the incapability of that white man to see black people come together and to live in the conditions. This country is too hypocritical and that we cannot adjust ourselves to its hypocrisy.

The only time I hear people talk about nonviolence is when black people move to defend themselves against white people. Black people cut themselves every night in the ghetto. Don't anybody talk about nonviolence. Lyndon Baines Johnson is busy bombing the hell of out Vietnam. Don't nobody talk about nonviolence. White people beat up black people every day. Don't nobody talk about nonviolence. But as soon as black people start to move, the double standard comes into being.

You can't defend yourself. That's what you're saying, 'cause you show me a man who would advocate aggressive violence that would be able to live in this country. Show him to me. The double standards again come into itself. Isn't it ludicrous and hypocritical for the political chameleon who calls himself a Vice President in this country to stand up before this country and say, "Looting never got anybody anywhere"? Isn't it hypocritical for Lyndon to talk about looting, that you can't accomplish anything by looting and you must accomplish it by the legal ways? What does he know about legality? Ask Ho Chi Minh, he'll tell you.

So that in conclusion we want to say that number one, it is clear to me that we have to wage a psychological battle on the right for black people to define their own terms, define themselves as they see fit, and organize themselves as they see it. Now the question is, How is the white community going to begin to allow for that organizing, because once they start to do that, they will also allow for the organizing that they want to do inside their community. It doesn't make a difference, 'cause we're going to organize our way anyway. We're going to do it. The question is, How are we going to facilitate those matters, whether it's going to be done with a thousand policemen with submachine guns, or whether or not it's going to be done in a context where it is allowed to be done by white people warding off those policemen. That is the question.

And the question is, How are white people who call themselves activists ready to start move into the white communities on two counts: on building new political institutions to destroy the old ones that we have? And to move around the concept of white youth refusing to go into the army? So that we can start, then, to build a new world. It is ironic to talk about civilization in this country. This country is uncivilized. It needs to be civilized. It needs to be civilized.

And that we must begin to raise those questions of civilization: What it is? And who do it? And so we must urge you to fight now to be the leaders of today, not tomorrow. We've got to be the leaders of today. This country is a nation of thieves. It stands on the brink of becoming a nation of murderers. We must stop it. We must stop it. We must stop it. We must stop it.

And then, therefore, in a larger sense there's the question of black people. We are on the move for our liberation. We have been tired of trying to prove things to white people. We are tired of trying to explain to white people that we're not going to hurt them. We are concerned with getting the things we want, the things that we have to have to be able to function. The question is, Can white people allow for that in this country? The question is, Will white people overcome their racism and allow for that to happen in this country? If that does not happen, brothers and sisters, we have no choice but to say very clearly, "Move over, or we're going to move on over you."

Thank you.

Bond v. Floyd

1966

"The manifest function of the First Amendment ... requires that legislators be given the widest latitude to express their views."

Overview

Argued on November 10, 1966, and decided on December 5, 1966, the case of Bond v. Floyd is probably best known for its result: stopping the Georgia House of Representatives from refusing to seat Julian Bond, an elected representative, based on his opposition to the Vietnam War. However, its import far outstrips its result. The opinion holds that legislators enjoy all of the First Amendment protections that citizens enjoy, including the right to dissent, and that their exercise of those rights allows constituents to know whether they are properly representing the constituents' interests. The U.S Supreme Court's conception of the role of the First Amendment in fostering a healthy relationship between legislator and constituent led to its judgment that legislatures are not allowed to refuse to seat a dissenter merely because the other members of the legislature do not like what the dissenting legislator says. This opinion guaranteed that candidates for office and elected legislators, including African Americans, who were just beginning to be elected in reasonable numbers at the time, could openly dissent on issues of foreign and domestic policy without worrying about whether they could be blocked from taking their seats because of their political views.

Context

The broad context of Bond v. Floyd involves the way in which dissent on American foreign policy by legislators is tolerated and how legislators may treat fellow legislators who dissent from the prevailing views. Legislators may be treated poorly by fellow legislators and by their constituents as a result of their dissenting views. However, it was unclear at the time whether a legislature could use its power to judge the qualifications of its members in order to refuse to seat a duly elected member merely for his or her opposition to war and dissent on foreign policy.

The narrow context of Bond v. Floyd involved the convergence of three powerful forces in 1960s America: the civil rights movement, anti Vietnam War sentiment, and the push toward equally populous districts that would lead to the election of African American candidates in significant numbers for the first time since Reconstruction. Julian Bond, a leader in the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) a major civil rights organization in the 1960s endorsed SNCC's anti Vietnam War statements and was consequently denied a seat in the Georgia legislature after being elected to a district that was created as a result.

War and civil rights had been linked for many generations prior to Bond v. Floyd. Whether the war at issue was the Civil War, World War I, or World War II, some discussion of the need for adequate civil rights for African American soldiers and African Americans in general had taken place. In these earlier wars, the demand for equal civil rights accompanied support for the war. The Vietnam War was different. Many who fought for civil rights at home questioned whether it made sense for African Americans to fight in the war when they did not have equal rights at home, particularly given that the Vietnam War was ostensibly being fought to keep or make Vietnam free. The linkage between support of civil rights and dissent on American war policy allowed some to renew their contempt for civil rights and for those who supported equality. Others thought that civil rights supporters should stick to advocating for civil rights and should not comment on war or foreign policy.

The struggle for Vietnam had been ongoing for years before the United States committed substantial emotional and physical resources in 1964. The escalation of America's role occurred in the wake of the Gulf of Tonkin resolution, which authorized President Lyndon Johnson to use force in Vietnam. Over the next year, President Johnson ordered significant aerial bombing of Vietnam, sent tens of thousands of troops to Vietnam, and authorized many tens of thousands more.

This escalation came at a momentous time for the civil rights movement. The Civil Rights Act of 1964, the most sweeping civil rights bill since Reconstruction, had been passed in no small measure because of President Johnson's support. Through a series of cases, the Supreme Court had declared that one-man, one-vote was required under the Constitution, leading to the redrawing of district lines to guarantee that districts would consist of equal populations. This redistricting promised that if African Americans were allowed to vote areas with high concentrations of

- The Selma voting rights campaign, led by SNCC since 1963, intensifies when the Southern Christian Leadership Conference becomes involved in the campaign.

African American citizens would be able to elect representatives to their liking for the first time in many years, if ever. The eventual passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 helped ensure that African Americans would be allowed to vote in areas of the country where their electoral voices had been stifled for years. American life was becoming relatively more equal and democratic. However, civil rights organizations, their leaders, and many others recognized that the United States had far to go before its citizens would become truly equal. This is why the U.S. claim that the war was being fought to guarantee freedom to the people of Vietnam struck a discordant note to some in civil rights organizations and triggered dissent. Some dissenters were philosophically opposed to war. Others were opposed to this particular war. In sum, the dissent was significant.

In August 1965 Martin Luther King, Jr., spoke out against U.S. involvement in the Vietnam War. Although some might have thought that the 1964 Nobel Peace Prize winner would understandably speak out against war, others argued that he should stick to civil rights rather than opine on American foreign policy. Nonetheless, King specifically linked civil rights and the war in Vietnam. His outspokenness was not appreciated by President Johnson or by some of his own supporters. Undaunted, King continued to oppose the war. Other civil rights leaders and organizations would speak out against the war when they deemed the time was right. In early 1966 SNCC did just that. It was their statement opposing the war that led directly to Bond v. Floyd.

When private citizens dissented with respect to the Vietnam War in particular and American foreign policy in general, legislators could do little to stop them. The First Amendment clearly protected the right to dissent. Indeed, legislators arguably had little reason to pay attention to the dissenters as long as the dissent did not involve violence. However, legislators could take additional interest if those dissenters were going to become colleagues. Julian Bond's criticism of American foreign policy and the Vietnam War as he was about to take office put him in the category of potential legislator-dissenter.

Julian Bond was elected to the Georgia legislature in 1965 in a special election that was required when Georgia had to redraw its electoral districts as a result of the Supreme Court's one-man, one-vote jurisprudence. Before he was sworn in, he noted his support for an official statement made by SNCC in January 1966 regarding opposition to the Vietnam War. Bond was the communications director of SNCC and a supporter from the organization's early days, but he had not drafted the statement. The statement was issued in response to the murder of Samuel Younge, Jr. (misspelled "Young" in the document), a member of SNCC and a Tuskegee Institute student who was killed in January 1966 for using the segregated bathroom at a Tuskegee gas station. The statement indicated SNCC's disapproval of American foreign policy as expressed in the country's involvement in the Vietnam War. The statement linked freedom at home with freedom abroad, suggesting that the U.S. government's claims to fight for freedom overseas appeared to be at odds with its refusal to fight for freedom at home. The statement also linked Younge's struggle for freedom and his ultimate death with the Vietnamese peasants' fight for freedom and potential death. SNCC's statement ultimately suggested that Americans ought to be allowed to avoid the military draft by working with organizations in the United States that sought to build democracy here.

A number of members of the Georgia legislature wanted to refuse to seat Bond because of his support for the statement and his opposition to the Vietnam War. It could be argued that the legislators merely claimed that Bond could not honestly take the oath of office and therefore could not be seated. However, whether Bond could profess support for the U.S. Constitution and the Georgia constitution, as required by the oath, was inextricably linked to the substance of the debate about the Vietnam War. The Court decided that whether a legislator could sincerely take an oath was to be decided by the legislator alone, not by the legislator's peers.

About the Author

Born on March 19, 1891, in Los Angeles, California, Earl Warren was chief justice of the United States from 1953 to 1969. Warren grew up in Bakersfield, California, the son of parents who were born in Scandinavia and raised in the United States. During his youth, Warren worked for the Southern Pacific Railroad as a call boy rounding up crews for the railroad. That experience exposed him to working men and labor issues in a way that some have suggested shaped his thoughts on the law, if not his entire outlook on life. After graduating from high school in 1908, he attended the University of California at Berkeley and its law school, Boalt Hall. Despite his discomfort with the narrowness of its curriculum, he graduated from Boalt Hall in 1914.

After practicing in the legal department of an oil company in San Francisco and with a small firm in Oakland, Warren joined the U.S. Army during World War I. He served stateside and left active duty at the end of the war. After clerking for the California legislature and working in Oakland's city attorney's office and as a deputy district attorney for Alameda County, California, Warren was appointed district attorney of the county. He was then elected to the post and served as district attorney for thirteen years before being elected attorney general of California in 1938. As attorney general, Warren played a significant role in the tragic and ill-conceived decision of the U.S. government to relocate Japanese and Japanese Americans during World War II. He later expressed regret for his role in the affair. After serving one term as attorney general of California, Warren was elected governor of California in 1942. He was reelected in 1946 and 1950, serving as governor until he was appointed to the Supreme Court in 1953.

Warren was also active in national politics. In 1948, during his second term as governor, Warren ran for the vice presidency as Republican Thomas Dewey's running mate. Warren sought the Republican Party's nomination for president in 1952, losing to Dwight Eisenhower. In early 1953, Warren accepted the post of solicitor general. However, following the death of Chief Justice Fred Vinson, Warren was appointed chief justice of the United States. After serving for several months, Warren was confirmed by the Senate on March 1, 1954. Although the Warren Court has been cheered by many and derided by others, the decisions issued during Warren's tenure as chief justice changed fundamental aspects of American law. Many of those seminal decisions were authored by Chief Justice Warren himself, including Brown v. Board of Education (1954) and its sequel, commonly called Brown II (1955); Reynolds v. Sims (1964); Miranda v. Arizona (1966); Loving v. Virginia (1967); and Terry v. Ohio (1968).

In the wake of the assassination of President John F. Kennedy, Warren served as the chair of the President's Commission on the Assassination of President Kennedy, commonly known as the Warren Commission. That commission's most famous conclusion that Lee Harvey Oswald acted alone in assassinating President Kennedy has been debated and challenged since the commission's report was issued in 1964. Earl Warren retired in 1969 at the close of the Court's term and died on July 9, 1974.

Chief Justice Warren begins the opinion by stating the question that the Court must answer: whether the Georgia House of Representatives could exclude Julian Bond based on statements Bond had made criticizing the war in Vietnam and the operation of the draft. In stating the question as such, Warren arguably asks simply whether elected officials enjoy the constitutional protection of freedom of speech. Warren suggests that the question might not be as straightforward as it seemed, but he ultimately would determine that the First Amendment fairly clearly protects Bond's right to free speech.

Before analyzing the issue, Warren sets the case in context. However, he omits some facts that might appear important to understanding the significance of the moment and precisely why Bond acted as he did. For example, Warren notes that Bond was elected from a district where more than 90 percent of the voters were African American, but he does not comment that the district and the election were direct results of the Court's one-man, one-vote jurisprudence.

◆ SNCC's Statement in Opposition to Vietnam War and Bond's Statement of Support

Warren then provides the immediate circumstances that triggered the litigation: a statement issued by SNCC on January 6, 1966, opposing the war in Vietnam and remarks made by Bond, SNCC's communications director, in support of the statement. SNCC's statement noted that the organization opposed U.S. involvement in the Vietnam War and indicated the basis for its opposition: The U.S. government had neither sought nor supported freedom for people of color. The statement said that SNCC found a rough equivalence in the U.S. treatment of people of color in the southern United States and of people of color in Vietnam, with rights guaranteed by law ignored if enforcing those rights ran counter to U.S. interests. The killing of Samuel Younge, in Tuskegee, Alabama, was cited as proof that the United States was not willing to protect its citizens' rights any more than it was willing to protect the rights of the Vietnamese. In addition, the statement suggested that the right to free elections ensured by the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965 was illusory, because those laws were not being fully implemented. Additionally, the U.S. government's commitment to free elections in other countries was questioned. The statement reasoned that, for many, it would not be sensible to fight for freedom abroad when freedom at home was impossible to achieve. Consequently, SNCC stated that "work[ing] in the civil rights movement and with other human rights organizations is a valid alternative to the draft" and urged those who agreed to embrace the alternative even though that embrace could cost them their lives.

SNCC's statement was issued the day after Samuel Younge, Jr., a member of the organization, a navy veteran, and a student at Tuskegee Institute, was murdered when he attempted to use a segregated restroom at a gas station in Tuskegee. After quoting portions of the SNCC statement (but passing over the context in which it was made), the Court's opinion notes and quotes Bond's remarks. In an interview about the statement on the day it was released, Bond endorsed it, though he had not written it. Bond commented that as a pacifist he opposed all wars and felt it to be his duty to encourage others to oppose war in general, the Vietnam War in particular, and the draft. He also observed that the statement correctly noted the hypocrisy of the U.S. government in encouraging freedom in foreign countries but not within its own borders. Consequently, Bond indicated that "as a second-class citizen" he did not feel compelled to support the war and that he did feel obliged to challenge situations he thought wrong. Bond's views on the war led to his belief "that people ought [not] to participate in it" and to his opposition to the draft. Nonetheless, Bond stated that he felt that his views on the war and American foreign policy did not conflict with his taking the oath of office under the Georgia constitution.

◆ Bond's Exclusion from the Georgia Legislature

The opinion then details the firestorm that led to Bond's exclusion from the Georgia House of Representatives. In the wake of Bond's comments supporting SNCC's statement, many members of the Georgia legislature filed protests against Bond's taking his seat. The petitions claimed that "Bond's statements gave aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States and Georgia, violated the Selective Service laws, and tended to bring discredit and disrespect on the House." In addition, the petitions argued that Bond could not take the oath necessary to be seated, which required that the taker swear to support the Constitution of the United States. The clerk of the legislature refused to give Bond the oath until the challenge petitions were resolved.

Bond responded by arguing that the petitions were racially motivated and had been filed to restrict his First Amendment rights. Given how the Court resolved the case, it never reached the question of whether the petitions were racially motivated. A special committee of the Georgia legislature was convened to resolve the dispute, with the only testimony being Bond's, during which he defended his support for SNCC's statement. Bond explained that he had voiced support for those who had the courage to do what they believed to be right even when they faced serious harm for doing so. He denied that he ever had suggested that laws should be broken or draft cards should be burned, noting that he carried his own draft card in his pocket. The special committee also considered Bond's statements made after the clerk of the legislature refused to administer the oath. Bond indicated that he was being forced to defend his statements about a matter of public concern when others had not been asked to do so as a prerequisite to being seated. He spoke directly to his constituents, reiterating that he did not advocate violating the law but that he favored extending the recognized justifications for avoiding the draft to "building democracy at home." He explained that he had no plans to stop speaking out on matters of public concern as a legislator, even when his views were at odds with the views of others, and he reiterated that he planned to take the customary oath required of Georgia legislators.

The special legislative committee considered Bond's statements as proof that he could not honestly swear to support the constitutions of Georgia and the United States. In addition, it found that Bond's statements proved that he gave aid and comfort to the enemies of Georgia and the United States, violated the selective service laws, and would likely "bring discredit to and disrespect of" the legislature. Consequently, the committee determined that Bond would not be allowed to take the oath and would not be seated as a representative.

◆ Procedural Background of the Case

The opinion next describes the legal proceedings that brought the case to the Supreme Court. In the wake of being excluded from the Georgia legislature, Bond filed suit seeking judgment that Georgia was not authorized to deny him a seat and that his First Amendment rights had been violated. The three-judge panel that heard the suit determined that Georgia law allowed the legislature to require qualifications of its members in addition to those specified in the Georgia constitution. The panel then determined that Bond's constitutional rights had not been violated. The legislature had satisfied procedural due process by providing a proper hearing in front of the special legislative committee. Similarly, according to the panel, substantive due process was satisfied because Bond's statements gave the legislature a reasonable basis for determining that Bond could not take the oath of office required of him. Two judges agreed that Bond's call to action to challenge the draft, rather than his dissent regarding policy, provided a basis for the legislature to believe that Bond "could not in good faith take an oath to support the State and Federal Constitutions." One judge dissented, arguing that barring Bond based on qualifications not in the Georgia constitution was beyond the legislature's authority under Georgia law.

The opinion notes that in the wake of the panel's decision and while Bond's appeal to the Supreme Court was pending, the governor of Georgia had ordered a special election to fill Bond's vacant seat. Bond won that election, and the legislature again refused to seat him. Bond also won the 1966 regular election to fill the seat.

◆ Legal Analysis of Case

The opinion next analyzes the substance of the case, noting the specific qualifications listed in the Georgia constitution that could be required of its legislators without constitutional concern. Thus, the various eligibility requirements for Georgia's legislators, such as age and residency qualifications, were legitimate. In addition, the exclusion of those who have been convicted of various crimes or suffer from certain mental infirmities was acceptable. Indeed, even the requirement that legislators take an oath affirming support for the Georgia and U.S. constitutions and act in the best interests of Georgia was acceptable. However, the opinion then analyzes whether the Georgia legislature is limited to requiring that the oath be taken or whether it can opine on the sincerity of the legislator who takes the oath.

The opinion addresses the Georgia legislature's claim that the formal requirement of an oath allowed the House of Representatives to determine whether the legislator planned to take the oath "with sincerity" and that the sincerity requirement would merely qualify as an additional acceptable qualification for office. The legislature argued that it had the ability to establish the qualifications of its members under the Georgia constitution. Although it conceded that it could not exclude a member based on race or other unconstitutional bases, it argued that ascertaining the sincerity of a legislator in taking the required oath was at the core of determining a member's qualification and should not be subject to judicial review. The opinion rejects the suggestion that the Court did not have jurisdiction, noting that the issue was whether the decision violated Bond's First Amendment rights. That question, the opinion notes, was a matter for the Supreme Court to decide.

After noting its jurisdiction over the matter, the opinion reaches the key question: Did the Georgia legislature's action violate Bond's First Amendment rights? The Georgia House of Representatives claimed that Bond's statements called for violations of the law and that even if a private citizen could have uttered those statements without repercussions, the state could hold its legislators to higher standards of loyalty than it held the public. The opinion agrees that Georgia could require that its legislators take an oath swearing fidelity to the U.S. Constitution and the Georgia constitution consistent with First Amendment principles, but it rejects the implications that the Georgia legislature suggested came with the oath requirement. The oath requirement did not limit the legislator's First Amendment rights. First, contrary to the Georgia legislature's claim, the Court found Bond's statements to be lawful expressions of dissent to American policy, rather than a call for lawless action. Any citizen would have been allowed to say what Bond said without repercussions. Second, the Court notes that the Constitution does not allow the state to restrict a legislator's rights to free expression any more than it can restrict an ordinary citizen's rights.

- The Representative's Obligation of Open and Free Expression

The opinion takes the issue one step further in discussing the role of the First Amendment in public discourse. The Georgia legislature had sought to limit Bond's rights to free expression because he was to become a legislator. The Court suggested that Bond's rights needed to be protected precisely because he was about to become a legislator. Rather than being limited by their elected positions, legislators are supposed to be free to speak at least as broadly and forcefully about national policy as ordinary citizens are. Indeed, their role in deciding issues of public policy makes it necessary for legislators to communicate their positions to their constituents through expressions of opinions on matters of public interest. If that opinion is dissent regarding state or national policy, it ought to be known to those who elected a legislator, so they could take it into account when deciding whether that legislator is a proper representative. Consequently, the Court held "that the disqualification of Bond from membership in the Georgia House because of his statements violated Bond's right of free expression under the First Amendment."

Audience

When the Supreme Court speaks on the breadth of constitutional rights and the fostering of democracy through representative-constituent dialogue, the entire country is its broad audience. Bond v. Floyd is no different with respect to its general views on the subjects. The public was told to expect candor from their representatives because candor was necessary for representatives to communicate with and adequately represent constituents. However, the narrower, more legalistic portions of the opinion were arguably addressed to a narrower segment of the populace: those legislators and legislatures that would seek to make orthodoxy king and would root out dissent wherever it could be found. Federal and state legislators were encouraged to take notice that their prerogatives regarding when they could decline to seat members were to be limited and that they had no right to stifle dissent regarding policy through the exercise of their power to judge the qualifications of other members.

Impact

Bond v. Floyd guaranteed that a legislator's admission to a legislature was to be validated by qualifications and election by the citizenry, not by that person's ability to convince other legislators that his or her views were sufficiently orthodox. Consequently, candidates for office were free to explain their views and encouraged to present those views to their constituents to ensure that those candidates would make appropriate representatives for their constituents. In addition, the decision freed candidates who might have come out of civil rights protest organizations and antiwar organizations to express themselves fully and run for office without fear that they might not be able to take the seats they had won. The list of legislators in state legislatures and the halls of Congress who fit this description is much longer than it would have been without Bond v. Floyd.

Questions for Further Study

1. How would you describe the relationship between the civil rights movement and the antiwar movement in the 1960s? How did the two movements overlap?

2. Why was opposition to the war in Vietnam so intense in the 1960s and early 1970s? What was different about this war and, say, World War I or World War II?

3. Compare this document with Martin Luther King, Jr.'s "Beyond Vietnam: A Time to Break Silence." Taken together, how do the two documents paint a picture of opposition to the Vietnam War and the intersection of race and national policy during this time period?

4. On what basis did the Warren Court conclude that the Georgia legislature had to seat Bond?

5. Very often, the outcome of a legal case affects only the parties involved and, by extension, others who could be involved in similar circumstances. What argument could be made that the Court's decision in Bond v. Floyd had very much a national audience and that the outcome of the case affected all Americans?

Bond v. Floyd

Mr. Chief Justice Warren delivered the opinion of the Court.

The question presented in this case is whether the Georgia House of Representatives may constitutionally exclude appellant Bond, a duly elected Representative, from membership because of his statements, and statements to which he subscribed, criticizing the policy of the Federal Government in Vietnam and the operation of the Selective Service laws. An understanding of the circumstances of the litigation requires a complete presentation of the events and statements which led to this appeal.

Bond, a Negro, was elected on June 15, 1965, as the Representative to the Georgia House of Representatives from the 136th House District. Of the District's 6,500 voters, approximately 6,000 are Negroes. Bond defeated his opponent, Malcolm Dean, Dean of Men at Atlanta University, also a Negro, by a vote of 2,320 to 487.

On January 6, 1966, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, a civil rights organization of which Bond was then the Communications Director, issued the following statement on American policy in Vietnam and its relation to the work of civil rights organizations in this country:

> The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee has a right and a responsibility to dissent with United States foreign policy on an issue when it sees fit. The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee now states its opposition to United States' involvement in Viet Nam on these grounds: [385 U.S. 119]
>
> We believe the United States government has been deceptive in its claims of concern for freedom of the Vietnamese people, just as the government has been deceptive in claiming concern for the freedom of colored people in such other countries as the Dominican Republic, the Congo, South Africa, Rhodesia and in the United States itself.
>
> We, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, have been involved in the black people's struggle for liberation and self-determination in this country for the past five years. Our work, particularly in the South, has taught us that the United States government has never guaranteed the freedom of oppressed citizens, and is not yet truly determined to end the rule of terror and oppression within its own borders.
>
> We ourselves have often been victims of violence and confinement executed by United States government officials. We recall the numerous persons who have been murdered in the South because of their efforts to secure their civil and human rights, and whose murderers have been allowed to escape penalty for their crimes.
>
> The murder of Samuel Young in Tuskegee, Ala., is no different than the murder of peasants in Viet Nam, for both Young and the Vietnamese sought, and are seeking, to secure the rights guaranteed them by law. In each case, the United States government bears a great part of the responsibility for these deaths.
>
> Samuel Young was murdered because United States law is not being enforced. Vietnamese are murdered because the United States is pursuing an aggressive policy in violation of international law. The United States is no respecter of persons or law [385 U.S. 120] when such persons or laws run counter to its needs and desires.
>
> We recall the indifference, suspicion and outright hostility with which our reports of violence have been met in the past by government officials.
>
> We know that, for the most part, elections in this country, in the North as well as the South, are not free. We have seen that the 1965 Voting Rights Act and the 1964 Civil Rights Act have not yet been implemented with full federal power and sincerity.

Document Text

> We question, then, the ability and even the desire of the United States government to guarantee free elections abroad. We maintain that our country's cry of "preserve freedom in the world" is a hypocritical mask behind which it squashes liberation movements which are not bound, and refuse to be bound, by the expediencies of United States cold war policies.
>
> We are in sympathy with, and support, the men in this country who are unwilling to respond to a military draft which would compel them to contribute their lives to United States aggression in Viet Nam in the name of the "freedom" we find so false in this country.
>
> We recoil with horror at the inconsistency of a supposedly "free" society where responsibility to freedom is equated with the responsibility to lend oneself to military aggression. We take note of the fact that 16 percent of the draftees from this country are Negroes called on to stifle the liberation of Viet Nam, to preserve a "democracy" which does not exist for them at home.
>
> We ask, where is the draft for the freedom fight in the United States? [385 U.S. 121]
> We therefore encourage those Americans who prefer to use their energy in building democratic forms within this country. We believe that work in the civil rights movement and with other human relations organizations is a valid alternative to the draft. We urge all Americans to seek this alternative, knowing full well that it may cost their lives as painfully as in Viet Nam.

On the same day that this statement was issued, Bond was interviewed by telephone by a reporter from a local radio station, and, although Bond had not participated in drafting the statement, he endorsed the statement in these words:

> Why, I endorse it, first, because I like to think of myself as a pacifist, and one who opposes that war and any other war, and eager and anxious to encourage people not to participate in it for any reason that they choose, and secondly, I agree with this statement because of the reason set forth in it because I think it is sorta hypocritical for us to maintain that we are fighting for liberty in other places and we are not guaranteeing liberty to citizens inside the continental United States.
> Well, I think that the fact that the United States Government fights a war in Viet Nam, I don't think that I, as a second class citizen of the United States, have a requirement to support that war. I think my responsibility is to oppose things that I think are wrong if they are in Viet Nam or New York, or Chicago, or Atlanta, or wherever.

When the interviewer suggested that our involvement in Vietnam was because "if we do not stop Communism [385 U.S. 122] there, that it is just a question of where will we stop it next," Bond replied:

> Oh, no, I'm not taking a stand against stopping World Communism, and I'm not taking a stand in favor of the Viet Cong. What I'm saying that is, first, that I don't believe in that war. That particular war. I'm against all war. I'm against that war in particular, and I don't think people ought to participate in it. Because I'm against war, I'm against the draft. I think that other countries in the World get along without a draft England is one and I don't see why we couldn't, too.
> … I'm not about to justify that war, because it's stopping International Communism, or whatever you know, I just happen to have a basic disagreement with wars for whatever reason they are fought … fought to stop International Communism, to promote International Communism, or for whatever reason. I oppose the Viet Cong fighting in Viet Nam as much as I oppose the United States fighting in Viet Nam. I happen to live in the United States. If I lived in North Viet Nam, I might not have the same sort of freedom of expression, but it happens that I live here not there.

The interviewer also asked Bond if he felt he could take the oath of office required by the Georgia Constitution, and Bond responded that he saw nothing inconsistent between his statements and the oath. Bond was also asked whether he would adhere to his statements if war were declared on North Vietnam and if his statements might become treasonous. He replied that he did not know "if I'm strong enough to place myself in a position where I'd be guilty of treason." [385 U.S. 123]

Before January 10, 1966, when the Georgia House of Representatives was scheduled to convene, petitions challenging Bond's right to be seated were filed by 75 House members. These petitions charged that Bond's statements gave aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States and Georgia, violated the Selective Service laws, and tended to bring discredit and disrespect on the House. The petitions further contended that Bond's endorsement of the SNCC statement > is totally and completely repugnant to and inconsistent with the mandatory oath prescribed by the Constitution of Georgia for a Member of the House of Representatives to take before taking his seat.

For the same reasons, the petitions asserted that Bond could not take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. When Bond appeared at the House on January 10 to be sworn in, the clerk refused to administer the oath to him until the issues raised in the challenge petitions had been decided.

Bond filed a response to the challenge petitions in which he stated his willingness to take the oath and argued that he was not unable to do so in good faith. He further argued that the challenge against his seating had been filed to deprive him of his First Amendment rights, and that the challenge was racially motivated. A special committee was appointed to report on the challenge, and a hearing was held to determine exactly what Bond had said and the intentions with which he had said it.

At this hearing, the only testimony given against Bond was that which he himself gave the committee. Both the opponents Bond had defeated in becoming the Representative of the 136th District testified to his good character and to his loyalty to the United States. A recording of the interview which Bond had given to the reporter after the SNCC statement was played, and Bond was called to the stand for cross-examination. He there admitted his statements and elaborated his views. He [385 U.S. 124] stated that he concurred in the SNCC statement "without reservation," and, when asked if he admired the courage of persons who burn their draft cards, responded:

> I admire people who take an action, and I admire people who feel strongly enough about their convictions to take an action like that knowing the consequences that they will face, and that was my original statement when asked that question.
> I have never suggested or counseled or advocated that any one other person burn their draft card. In fact, I have mine in my pocket, and will produce it if you wish. I do not advocate that people should break laws. What I simply tried to say was that I admired the courage of someone who could act on his convictions knowing that he faces pretty stiff consequences.

Tapes of an interview Bond had given the press after the clerk had refused to give him the oath were also heard by the special committee. In this interview, Bond stated:

> I stand before you today charged with entering into public discussion on matters of National interest. I hesitate to offer explanations for my actions or deeds where no charge has been levied against me other than the charge that I have chosen to speak my mind and no explanation is called for, for no member of this House, has ever, to my knowledge, been called upon to explain his public statements for public postures as a prerequisite to admission to that Body. I therefore, offer to my constituents a statement of my views. I have not counseled burning draft cards, nor have I burned mine. I have suggested that congressionally outlined alternatives to military service be extended to [385 U.S. 125] building democracy at home. The posture of my life for the past five years has been calculated to give Negroes the ability to participate in formulation of public policies. The fact of my election to public office does not lessen my duty or desire to express my opinions even when they differ from those held by others. As to the current controversy, because of convictions that I have arrived at through examination of my conscience, I have decided I personally cannot participate in war.
> I stand here with intentions to take an oath that oath they just took in there that will dispel any doubts about my convictions or loyalty.

The special committee gave general approval in its report to the specific charges in the challenge petitions that Bond's endorsement of the SNCC statement and his supplementary remarks showed that he " does not and will not" support the Constitutions of the United States and of Georgia, that he "adheres to the enemies of the … State of Georgia" contrary to the State Constitution, that he gives aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States, that his statements violated the Universal Military Training and Service Act, ß12, 62 Stat. 622, 50 U.S.C. App. ß462, and that his statements "are reprehensible, and are such as tend to bring discredit to and disrespect of the House." On the same day, the House adopted the committee report without findings and without further elaborating Bond's lack of qualifications, and resolved by a vote of 184 to 12 that > Bond shall not be allowed to take the oath of office as a member of the House of Representatives and that Representative-Elect Julian Bond shall not be seated as a member of the House of Representatives.

Bond then instituted an action in the District Court for the Northern District of Georgia for injunctive relief [385 U.S. 126] and a declaratory judgment that the House action was unauthorized by the Georgia Constitution and violated Bond's rights under the First Amendment. A three-judge District Court was convened under 28 U.S.C. ß2281. All three members of the District Court held that the court had jurisdiction to decide the constitutionality of the House action because Bond had asserted substantial First Amendment rights. On the merits, however, the court was divided.

Judges Bell and Morgan, writing for the majority of the court, addressed themselves first to the question of whether the Georgia House had power under state law to disqualify Bond based on its conclusion that he could not sincerely take the oath of office. They reasoned that separation of powers principles gave the Legislature power to insist on qualifications in addition to those specified in the State Constitution. The majority pointed out that nothing in the Georgia Constitution limits the qualifications of the legislators to those expressed in the constitution.

Having concluded that the action of the Georgia House was authorized by state law, the court considered whether Bond's disqualification violated his constitutional right of freedom of speech. It reasoned that the decisions of this Court involving particular state political offices supported an attitude of restraint in which the principles of separation of powers and federalism should be balanced against the alleged deprivation of individual constitutional rights. On this basis, the majority below fashioned the test to be applied in this case as being whether the refusal to seat Bond violated procedural or what it termed substantive due process. The court held that the hearing which had been given Bond by the House satisfied procedural due process. As for [385 U.S. 127] what it termed the question of substantive due process, the majority concluded that there was a rational evidentiary basis for the ruling of the House. It reasoned that Bond's right to dissent as a private citizen was limited by his decision to seek membership in the Georgia House. Moreover, the majority concluded, the SNCC statement and Bond's related remarks went beyond criticism of national policy and provided a rational basis for a conclusion that the speaker could not in good faith take an oath to support the State and Federal Constitutions:

> A citizen would not violate his oath by objecting to or criticizing this policy or even by calling it deceptive and false, as the statement did.
> But the statement does not stop with this. It is a call to action based on race; a call alien to the concept of the pluralistic society which makes this nation. It aligns the organization with "… colored people in such other countries as the Dominican Republic, the Congo, South Africa, Rhodesia.…" It refers to its involvement in the black people's "struggle for liberation and self-determination.…" It states that "Vietnamese are murdered because the United States is pursuing an aggressive policy in violation of international law." It alleges that Negroes, referring to American servicemen, are called on to stifle the liberation of Viet Nam.
> The call to action, and this is what we find to be a rational basis for the decision which denied Mr. Bond his seat, is that language which states that SNCC supports those men in this country who are unwilling to respond to a military draft.

Chief Judge Tuttle dissented. He reasoned that the question of the power of the Georgia House under the [385 U.S. 128] State Constitution to disqualify a Representative under these circumstances had never been decided by the state courts, and that federal courts should construe state law, if possible, so as to avoid unnecessary federal constitutional issues. Since Bond satisfied all the stated qualifications in the State Constitution, Chief Judge Tuttle concluded that his disqualification was beyond the power of the House as a matter of state constitutional law.

Bond appealed directly to this Court from the decision of the District Court under 28 U.S.C. ß1253. While this appeal was pending, the Governor of Georgia called a special election to fill the vacancy caused by Bond's exclusion. Bond entered this election and won overwhelmingly. The House was in recess, but the Rules Committee held a hearing in which Bond declined to recant his earlier statements. Consequently, he was again prevented from taking the oath of office, and the seat has remained vacant. Bond again sought the seat from the 136th District in the regular 1966 election, and he won the Democratic primary in September, 1966, and won an overwhelming majority in the election of November 8, 1966.

The Georgia Constitution sets out a number of specific provisions dealing with the qualifications and eligibility of state legislators. These provide that Representatives shall be citizens of the United States, at least 21 years of age, citizens of Georgia for two years, and residents for one year of the counties from which elected. The [385 U.S. 129] Georgia Constitution further provides that no one convicted of treason against the State, or of any crime of moral turpitude, or of a number of other enumerated crimes, may hold any office in the State. Idiots and insane persons are barred from office, and no one holding any state or federal office is eligible for a seat in either house. The State Constitution also provides:

> Election, returns, etc.; disorderly conduct. Each House shall be the judge of the election, returns and qualifications of its members and shall have power to punish them for disorderly behavior, or misconduct, by censure, fine, imprisonment, or expulsion; but no member shall be expelled, except by a vote of two-thirds of the House to which he belongs.

These constitute the only stated qualifications for membership in the Georgia Legislature, and the State concedes that Bond meets all of them. The Georgia Constitution also requires Representatives to take an oath stated in the Constitution:

> Oath of members. Each senator and Representative, before taking his seat, shall take the following oath, or affirmation, to-wit: "I will support the Constitution of this State and of the United States, and on all questions and measures which may come before me, I will so conduct myself, as will, in my judgment, be most conducive to the interests and prosperity of this State." [385 U.S. 130]

The State points out in its brief that the latter part of this oath, involving the admonition to act in the best interests of the State, was not the standard by which Bond was judged.

The State does not claim that Bond refused to take the oath to support the Federal Constitution, a requirement imposed on state legislators by Art. VI, cl. 3, of the United States Constitution:

> The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the Members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial Officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support this Constitution; but no religious Tests shall ever be required as a Qualification to any Office or public Trust under the United States.

Instead, it argues that the oath provisions of the State and Federal Constitutions constitute an additional qualification. Because, under state law, the legislature has exclusive jurisdiction to determine whether an elected Representative meets the enumerated qualifications, it is argued that the legislature has power to look beyond the plain meaning of the oath provisions, which merely require that the oaths be taken. This additional power is said to extend to determining whether a given Representative may take the oath with sincerity. The State does not claim that it should be completely free of judicial review whenever it disqualifies an elected Representative; it admits that, if a State Legislature excluded a legislator on racial or other clearly unconstitutional grounds, the federal (or state) judiciary would be justified in testing the exclusion by federal constitutional standards. But the State argues that there can be no [385 U.S. 131] doubt as to the constitutionality of the qualification involved in this case, because it is one imposed on the State Legislatures by Article VI of the United States Constitution. Moreover, the State contends that no decision of this Court suggests that a State may not ensure the loyalty of its public servants by making the taking of an oath a qualification of office. Thus, the State argues that there should be no judicial review of the legislature's power to judge whether a prospective member may conscientiously take the oath required by the State and Federal Constitutions.

We are not persuaded by the State's attempt to distinguish, for purposes of our jurisdiction, between an exclusion alleged to be on racial grounds and one alleged to violate the First Amendment. The basis for the argued distinction is that, in this case, Bond's disqualification was grounded on a constitutional standard the requirement of taking an oath to support the Constitution. But Bond's contention is that this standard was utilized to infringe his First Amendment rights, and we cannot distinguish, for purposes of our assumption of jurisdiction, between a disqualification under an unconstitutional standard and a disqualification which, although under color of a proper standard, is alleged to violate the First Amendment.

We conclude, as did the entire court below, that this Court has jurisdiction to review the question of whether the action of the Georgia House of Representatives deprived Bond of federal constitutional rights, and we now move to the central question posed in the case whether Bond's disqualification because of his statements violated the free speech provisions of the First Amendment as applied to the States through the Fourteenth Amendment.

The State argues that the exclusion does not violate the First Amendment because the State has a right, under Article VI of the United States Constitution, to insist on loyalty to the Constitution as a condition of office. A legislator, of course, can be required to swear to support the Constitution of the United States as a condition of holding office, but that is not the issue in this case, as the record is uncontradicted that Bond has repeatedly expressed his willingness to swear to the oaths provided for in the State and Federal Constitutions. Nor is this a case where a legislator swears to an oath pro forma while declaring or manifesting his disagreement with or indifference to the oath. Thus, we do not quarrel with the State's contention that the oath provisions of the United States and Georgia Constitutions do not violate the First Amendment. But this requirement does not authorize a majority of state legislators to test the sincerity with which another duly elected legislator can swear to uphold the Constitution. Such a power could be utilized to restrict the right of legislators to dissent from national or state policy or that of a majority of their colleagues under the guise of judging their loyalty to the Constitution. Certainly there can be no question but that the First Amendment protects expressions in opposition to national foreign policy in Vietnam and to the Selective Service system. The State does not contend otherwise. But it argues that Bond went beyond expressions of opposition, and counseled violations of the Selective Service laws, and that advocating violation of federal law demonstrates a lack of support for the Constitution. The State declines to argue that Bond's statements would violate any law if made by a private citizen, but it does argue that, even though such [385 U.S. 133] a citizen might be protected by his First Amendment rights, the State may nonetheless apply a stricter standard to its legislators. We do not agree.

Bond could not have been constitutionally convicted under 50 U.S.C. App. ß462(a), which punishes any person who "counsels, aids, or abets another to refuse or evade registration." Bond's statements were, at worst, unclear on the question of the means to be adopted to avoid the draft. While the SNCC statement said "We are in sympathy with, and support, the men in this country who are unwilling to respond to a military draft," this statement alone cannot be interpreted as a call to unlawful refusal to be drafted. Moreover, Bond's supplementary statements tend to resolve the opaqueness in favor of legal alternatives to the draft, and there is no evidence to the contrary. On the day the statement was issued, Bond explained that he endorsed it > because I like to think of myself as a pacifist and one who opposes that war and any other war and eager and anxious to [385 U.S. 134] encourage people not to participate in it for any reason that they choose.

In the same interview, Bond stated categorically that he did not oppose the Vietnam policy because he favored the Communists; that he was a loyal American citizen, and supported the Constitution of the United States. He further stated "I oppose the Viet Cong fighting in Viet Nam as much as I oppose the United States fighting in Viet Nam." At the hearing before the Special Committee of the Georgia House, when asked his position on persons who burned their draft cards, Bond replied that he admired the courage of persons who "feel strongly enough about their convictions to take an action like that knowing the consequences that they will face." When pressed as to whether his admiration was based on the violation of federal law, Bond stated:

> I have never suggested or counseled or advocated that any one other person burn their draft > card. In fact, I have mine in my pocket, and will produce it if you wish. I do not advocate that people should break laws. What I simply try to say was that I admired the courage of someone who could act on his convictions knowing that he faces pretty stiff consequences.

Certainly this clarification does not demonstrate any incitement to violation of law. No useful purpose would be served by discussing the many decisions of this Court which establish that Bond could not have been convicted for these statements consistently with the First Amendment. See, e.g., Wood v. Georgia, 370 U.S. 375 (1962); Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298 (1957); Terminiello v. Chicago, 337 U.S. 1 (1949). Nor does the fact that the District Court found the SNCC statement to have racial overtones constitute a reason for holding it outside [385 U.S. 135] the protection of the First Amendment. In fact, the State concedes that there is no issue of race in the case.

The State attempts to circumvent the protection the First Amendment would afford to these statements if made by a private citizen by arguing that a State is constitutionally justified in exacting a higher standard of loyalty from its legislators than from its citizens. Of course, a State may constitutionally require an oath to support the Constitution from its legislators which it does not require of its private citizens. But this difference in treatment does not support the exclusion of Bond, for while the State has an interest in requiring its legislators to swear to a belief in constitutional processes of government, surely the oath gives it no interest in limiting its legislators' capacity to discuss their views of local or national policy. The manifest function of [385 U.S. 136] the First Amendment in a representative government requires that legislators be given the widest latitude to express their views on issues of policy. The central commitment of the First Amendment, as summarized in the opinion of the Court in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 270 (1964), is that "debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust, and wide-open." We think the rationale of the New York Times case disposes of the claim that Bond's statements fell outside the range of constitutional protection. Just as erroneous statements must be protected to give freedom of expression the breathing space it needs to survive, so statements criticizing public policy and the implementation of it must be similarly protected. The State argues that the New York Times principle should not be extended to statements by a legislator because the policy of encouraging free debate about governmental operations only applies to the citizen-critic of his government. We find no support for this distinction in the New York Times case or in any other decision of this Court. The interest of the public in hearing all sides of a public issue is hardly advanced by extending more protection to citizen critics than to legislators. Legislators have an obligation to take positions on controversial political questions so that their constituents can be fully informed by them, and be better able to assess their qualifications for office; also so they may be represented in governmental debates [385 U.S. 137] by the person they have elected to represent them. We therefore hold that the disqualification of Bond from membership in the Georgia House because of his statements violated Bond's right of free expression under the First Amendment. Because of our disposition of the case on First Amendment grounds, we need not decide the other issues advanced by Bond and the amici.

The judgment of the District Court is Reversed.

1967

"If America's soul becomes totally poisoned, part of the autopsy must read Vietnam."

Overview

On April 4, 1967, one of America's greatest orators gave a speech on a subject he had previously been reluctant to address. Martin Luther King, Jr., was the preeminent civil rights leader of the 1960s, but as he stood in the pulpit of Riverside Church in New York City his topic was the Vietnam War. King had been an eloquent advocate of African American civil rights and a fearless opponent of racial bigotry. His words and deeds helped secure passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965. King, however, had said little in public about the Vietnam War, where large numbers of Americans troops were fighting and dying during 1965 and 1966. When he raised questions about the war or called for peace talks, critics replied that he was not qualified to speak about foreign policy. Friends counseled him to keep his distance from the controversies over the war lest he jeopardize support for the civil rights movement. By 1967, however, King felt compelled to speak out. In "Beyond Vietnam: A Time to Break Silence," King denounced the war for deepening the problems of African Americans and poor people. His critique went farther, as he condemned the "madness" of Vietnam as a "symptom of a far deeper malady" that put the United States at odds with the aspirations for social justice of people in the developing world. King endured hostile rebukes for his sweeping and radical criticisms of America's role in Vietnam and in other emerging nations. He insisted, however, that the civil rights movement was part of a global struggle against "racism, materialism, and militarism."

Context

When King delivered his "Beyond Vietnam" speech, the Vietnam War was a growing source of global controversy. More than four hundred thousand Americans in uniform were fighting in South Vietnam. President Lyndon B. Johnson had sent the first U.S. combat troops to that nation little more than two years earlier, in March 1965, transforming a conflict that the South Vietnamese had previously fought with U.S. advice and armaments into an American war. Johnson at first enjoyed widespread public support for what he said was a war of necessity to halt Communist aggression and preserve South Vietnam's right to self-determination. As more U.S. troops poured into South Vietnam, however, public discontent with the war increased. Administration officials maintained that U.S. forces were making progress in the war, but they also cautioned that years of hard fighting lay ahead and more troops would be necessary. By January 1967, polls showed that more Americans disapproved of the president's war policies than supported them. Some of these critics advocated a negotiated settlement, and a few favored a unilateral American withdrawal. Many Americans, however, thought the president had not used sufficient military force to secure victory. They became impatient with the gradual buildup of U.S. strength and called for more bombing and more troops to win the war on the battlefield. By the spring of 1967, Johnson was feeling considerable pressure from this public discontent over a war that was growing larger but had no end in sight.

The president also worried about the war's effects on his domestic reform program, the Great Society. Johnson had proclaimed his desire to build the Great Society in May 1964. During the next eighteen months, Congress approved his proposals for a War on Poverty, federal aid to education, Medicare and Medicaid, the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and the Voting Rights Act of 1965. Johnson envisioned the Great Society as his legacy. After he began sending combat troops to war in Southeast Asia, he insisted that the country was sufficiently powerful and wealthy to fight a war in Vietnam and build the Great Society. By early 1967, however, such optimism had faded. The war had become so large and costly that many members of Congress concluded that the country could not increase spending and indeed might have to reduce appropriations for programs like the War on Poverty.

King objected to sending U.S. forces to war in Southeast Asia, but, as he later wrote, he had not taken part in any of the marches or demonstrations against the war. During 1965, he did occasionally speak out, calling on the Johnson administration to seek a negotiated settlement. The president resented even such mild criticism. The White House tried to silence King; administration officials and members of Congress told King he had no competence in foreign policy and his public statements could harm sensitive negotiations to end the war. King complained about administration efforts to muzzle dissenters, but he made only infrequent public complaints about the widening war. Some of King's closest associates also encouraged him to refrain from antiwar activities. They worried that unpopular statements about the war could weaken public support for civil rights. King heeded their views, often confining his criticism of the war to its harmful effects on the War on Poverty.

Vietnam, however, became an urgent issue for King in early 1967 after he read a magazine article with horrifying pictures of children injured in the war. King declared that he could not ignore his conscience and felt obligated to campaign for an end to a war that was devastating Vietnamese and destroying hopes of Americans for a Great Society. He had heated arguments with other African American leaders, who warned that his antiwar activities would alienate many supporters who had contributed to his campaigns for civil rights, but King was adamantly unconcerned about the loss of financial backing. On February 25, 1967, he spoke to an antiwar conference in Los Angeles, California. In late March, in Chicago, Illinois, he participated in his first march against the war. Ten days later, he came to New York's Riverside Church to deliver a major address on the reasons he had decided to break his silence on Vietnam.

About the Author

Born Michael King, Jr., in Atlanta, Georgia, on January 15, 1929, King became Martin Luther King, Jr., in 1934 when his father changed his own and his son's name to honor the famous German theologian. King's grandfather and father were pastors of Atlanta's Ebenezer Baptist Church and leaders of the local branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. King, too, decided to study for the ministry after graduating from Morehouse College in 1948. He earned a divinity degree in 1951 at Crozier Theological Seminary, where he finished first in his class. Three years later, he graduated from Boston University with a PhD in theology. Long after King's death, a panel of experts appointed by the university concluded that King had plagiarized portions of his dissertation.

King gained national recognition as a civil rights activist during the Montgomery bus boycott that began in December 1955. African Americans had organized a boycott of the segregated local bus lines in Montgomery, Alabama, after the arrest of a black woman who had refused to give up her seat to a white patron and move to the back of the bus. King, who was pastor of a local Baptist church, became the most eloquent voice of the boycott movement, urging supporters to protest in a Christian fashion that is, with courage but also dignity and love. Although King faced intimidation and violence, including the bombing of his house, he insisted on nonviolent protest. In November 1956, the U.S. Supreme Court declared the southern bus segregation laws unconstitutional. In 1957, King founded the Southern Christian Leadership Conference to promote civil rights. In 1960 he returned to Atlanta, where, along with his father, he became copastor of the Ebenezer Baptist Church.

During the mid-1960s, King led the civil rights movement to two of its greatest victories. In spring 1963, he organized demonstrations in Birmingham, Alabama, to challenge racial segregation at lunch counters and secure job opportunities for African Americans. When television cameras showed local authorities using fire hoses and police dogs against the nonviolent demonstrators, many of them youths, national outrage led not only to desegregation in Birmingham but also to a decision on the part of President John F. Kennedy to ask Congress for civil rights legislation that would bar discrimination on account of race in employment and in public accommodations, such as restaurants, hotels, and theaters. On August 28, 1963, King spoke at a huge rally in Washington, D.C., to mobilize support for the legislation. Standing before the Lincoln Memorial, he famously proclaimed, "I have a dream," and his moving vision of a society where blacks and whites enjoyed equal rights helped build a broad coalition in favor of the legislation. On July 2, 1964, King attended the ceremony at which President Johnson signed into law the Civil Rights Act of 1964. In March 1965, demonstrations against discriminatory voting practices that King helped organize in Selma, Alabama, produced another ugly incident of police violence. The resulting national outcry led to the passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, which gave the federal government new powers to ensure that all citizens could exercise their constitutional right to vote.

King earned honors and acclaim for his nonviolent struggle for civil rights. He was Time magazine's Man of the Year for 1964, and he received the Nobel Peace Prize in December 1964. Yet despite his achievements, he endured a campaign of harassment carried on by the director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, J. Edgar Hoover. A fierce opponent of the civil rights movement, Hoover used information from wiretaps on King's telephones to try to discredit his leadership and prove that he was a Communist. King also faced criticism from younger African American leaders, who began calling for "Black Power" in the mid-1960s and advocating armed resistance to white oppression. King remained faithful to his nonviolent principles, and he maintained that "Black Power" was "a slogan without a program." Instead, he called for "a new turn toward greater economic justice" that would close the gap between rich and poor and eliminate the squalor in predominantly black inner-city neighborhoods. In November 1967, he announced the beginning of a Poor People's Campaign aimed at boosting federal efforts to reduce poverty. In March 1968, he led a march of striking sanitation workers in Memphis, Tennessee. King delivered his final speech in that city on the evening of April 3, when he told supporters, "I may not get there with you. But I want you to know tonight, that we, as a people, will get to the promised land." The next evening, he was shot dead by James Earl Ray as he stood on a Memphis motel balcony. In 1986, Americans began observing an annual federal holiday on the third Monday of January to honor his life and achievements.

Anticipating criticism, King begins by declaring that his position on the Vietnam War is a matter of "conscience." To remain silent would be "a betrayal" of principle. He acknowledges that it would be much easier to express "conformist thought" rather than "inner truth," especially when conviction leads to denunciation of government policies during wartime. Aware of this difficulty, he praises the organization to which he is speaking Clergy and Laymen Concerned about Vietnam for choosing "firm dissent" over "smooth patriotism." He then lists some of the objections that he has repeatedly encountered that he is imperiling the civil rights movement by taking an unpopular stand on the Vietnam War or that he is speaking about an issue of foreign policy that is beyond his expertise. King tries to neutralize these criticisms by insisting that they rest on "tragic misunderstandings" of public affairs and of his own career. Indeed, he asserts that his dissent from U.S. policies in Vietnam conforms to the principles that have guided him since he became a civil rights leader during the Montgomery bus boycott. King also maintains that while there is no simple way to stop the war, the United States has "the greatest responsibility" for "ending a conflict that has exacted a heavy price on both continents."

◆ "The Importance of Vietnam"

In the next section of his address, King enumerates specific reasons for opposing the Vietnam War, while emphasizing that the basis of his criticism is his "moral vision." Especially important to King are the detrimental effects of the war on America's poor. He condemns the war for draining funds from the Johnson administration's War on Poverty. His language suggests that the war has become so large and destructive that it has grown beyond human control as it claims resources "like some demonic destructive suction tube." Also troubling to King are the disproportionate numbers of poor and black soldiers who are fighting and dying in Vietnam. He emphasizes the irony of Americans in uniform fighting for liberties abroad that they did not enjoy at home. With sorrow and pain, he declares that Americans have become all too familiar with "Negro and white boys on TV screens as they kill and die together for a nation that has been unable to seat them in the same schools." This "cruel manipulation of the poor" compels him to speak out.

King then explains that his belief in nonviolence also accounts for his opposition to the war. He recounts his efforts to persuade angry young African Americans in neglected inner-city neighborhoods that violent protest would not solve their problems. How, then, he reasons, can he not similarly condemn the Vietnam policies of "the greatest purveyor of violence in the world today my own government." King's criticism is strong and sweeping, associating him with some of the most radical opponents of the war. He believes, however, that he cannot invoke his commitment to nonviolence selectively, lest he forfeit his credibility as an advocate for racial justice and his moral obligation to speak for American and Vietnamese victims of the war's violence.

King's responsibilities as a civil rights leader, a Nobel Peace Prize recipient, and a Christian also lead him to question the war. King deftly rebuts the charge that his work in the civil rights movement disqualifies him from speaking on issues of war and peace by reminding his audience that the goal of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference is "to save the soul of America." The poisonous effects of the war, he declares, are corrupting American values and preventing the achievement of racial justice. King also explains that his obligations as a recipient of an international prize for peace and as a Christian minister compel him to think beyond "national allegiances." He states that he cannot view the war only as an American. Instead, he is "called to speak for the voiceless, the victims of our nation and for those it calls enemy, for no document from human hands can make these humans any less our brothers."

◆ "Strange Liberators"

This lengthy section reviews the history of the Vietnam War in order to challenge the Johnson administration's position that the United States was fighting to halt aggression and advance democracy. King adopts the perspective of the Vietnamese who "have been living under the curse of the war for almost three continuous decades." His use of the term madness at the beginning of this section indicates how strongly he disagrees with President Johnson that the war is serving either U.S. or Vietnamese interests.

King argues that the United States has supported reaction and repression in Vietnam. Between 1945 and 1954, the United States aided French efforts to reestablish colonial control of Vietnam. After the French withdrew, U.S. leaders backed President Ngo Dinh Diem, the anti-Communist ruler of South Vietnam, whom King describes as a vicious dictator who suppressed political opposition and prevented reforms that would have given land to peasants. U.S. military assistance to Diem, according to King, belied promises of "peace and democracy." After Diem's overthrow in a coup on November 1, 1963, a succession of "military dictatorships" offered "no real change." Once American troops began fighting in South Vietnam in 1965, they caused horrible suffering, using heavy firepower that inflicted many civilian casualties and devastated villages and farmlands. King even goes so far as to compare American use of the "latest weapons" in Vietnam to Nazi Germany's tests of "new tortures in the concentration camps of Europe." Only the most extreme critics of U.S. policies made such assertions. King concludes that by looking at the war from the perspective of the Vietnamese caught in the brutality of conflict, Americans must seem to be "strange liberators." Indeed, he asserts, Vietnamese peasants probably see the United States as "their real enemy."

King then tries to explain the views of America's enemies, the National Liberation Front and North Vietnam. He maintains that the National Liberation Front, an opposition group that used guerrilla tactics to gain control of the South Vietnamese government, was the only party "in real touch with the peasants." He paints a highly sympathetic picture of the National Liberation Front, which he believes had good reason to take up arms against a corrupt government that jailed political opponents. King also maintains that it is not hard to understand why Ho Chi Minh, the leader of North Vietnam, distrusts the United States. Ho had led the Vietnamese fight for independence against the French, and he expected to become the leader of Vietnam according to the terms of the Geneva peace settlement of 1954. The United States, however, cooperated with Diem to divide Vietnam between North and South and to prevent the elections that would have brought Ho "to power over a united Vietnam." From Ho's perspective, the United States has been the aggressor by sending troops to Southeast Asia in violation of the Geneva agreements and dropping "thousands of bombs on a poor weak nation more than eight thousand miles away from its shores."

After these efforts to "give a voice to the voiceless of Vietnam," King concludes this section of his address by expressing his concern about the corrupting effects of the war on U.S. troops. In Vietnam, according to King, Americans in uniform experience a very different war than the one that government officials led them to expect. U.S. troops, King asserts, have intervened in a Vietnamese struggle "on the side of the wealthy and the secure while we create hell for the poor." The disparity between U.S. soldiers' expectations and the reality of the war produces a cynicism that compounds the brutalizing effects of combat.

◆ "This Madness Must Cease"

King next offers suggestions to halt the "madness" of Vietnam. His five proposals require drastic changes in U.S. policy as well as an admission "that we have been wrong from the beginning of our adventure in Vietnam." His views are not those of a mediator who is encouraging all major parties to make concessions for peace but of a moral critic who believes that Americans should "atone for our sins and errors in Vietnam." His harsh judgments about the U.S. war effort reflect what he described earlier in his address as "allegiances and loyalties which are broader and deeper than nationalism." He speaks as a brother to the suffering poor in Vietnam and the United States, a citizen of the world who is "aghast" at U.S. actions, and an American citizen who holds his nation accountable for expanding the war and for stopping it.

◆ "Protesting the War"

King next advocates protest against the war, including counseling young men to become conscientious objectors as an alternative to military service. Opposition to the current war, however, is insufficient, because, according to King, Vietnam is only a symptom of "a far deeper malady within the American spirit." In several other nations, U.S. military advisers or weapons were helping to suppress revolution. King charges that the United States has become an imperialist nation, exploiting overseas investments while stifling the ambitions of people in developing nations for peaceful change. King concedes that this allegation is "disturbing," but he insists that American values are skewed. Property rights and profits have become more important than people, thereby undermining efforts to eradicate "racism, materialism, and militarism."

King calls for "a true revolution of values" that will transform America's world role. Although he provides no specifics, he favors economic restructuring that will end "the glaring contrast" between poverty and wealth. His prescriptions for international reform mirror his vision for domestic change. In his writings, King insisted that "justice for black people cannot be achieved without radical changes in the structure of society." He demanded that America "face all its interrelated flaws racism, poverty, militarism, and materialism." King is optimistic that Americans can change their priorities "so that the pursuit of peace will take precedence over the pursuit of war." He also believes that a revolution in values will provide enormous benefits in America's cold war contest with Communism. Although his speech is full of scathing criticism of the foreign policies of the Johnson administration, King agrees with government officials that Communism appeals to people who lack basic necessities of life and hope for the future. Too often, however, U.S. policy makers' fears of Communist takeovers in other countries led them to pursue "negative anti-communism," including a resort to war. King instead favors "positive action" to "remove those conditions of poverty, insecurity and injustice" that lead to the spread of Communism.

Essential Quotes

"We are taking the black young men who had been crippled by our society and sending them eight thousand miles away to guarantee liberties in Southeast Asia which they had not found in southwest Georgia and East Harlem."

("The Importance of Vietnam")

"If America's soul becomes totally poisoned, part of the autopsy must read Vietnam."

("The Importance of Vietnam")

"Increasingly, by choice or by accident, this is the role our nation has taken—the role of those who make peaceful revolution impossible by refusing to give up the privileges and the pleasures that come from the immense profits of overseas investment."

("Protesting the War")

"A nation that continues year after year to spend more money on military defense than on programs of social uplift is approaching spiritual death."

("Protesting the War")

"We must find new ways to speak for peace in Vietnam and justice throughout the developing world—a world that borders on our doors. If we do not act we shall surely be dragged down the long dark and shameful corridors of time reserved for those who possess power without compassion, might without morality, and strength without sight."

("The People Are Important")

◆ "The People Are Important"

In this closing section, King tells his fellow Americans that they face revolutionary times and that they must find new ways to cooperate with people in developing nations. King mentions the Vietnam War only briefly as an example of a failed effort that puts the United States on the wrong side of history. Instead, he concentrates on the worldwide challenges to "old systems of exploitation and oppression" and the necessity of aligning the United States with "the shirtless and barefoot people" who "are rising up as never before." He believes that Western nations made essential contributions to this revolutionary spirit but that they have become rich, complacent, and reactionary. "Our only hope today," he declares, "lies in our ability to recapture the revolutionary spirit and go out into a sometimes hostile world declaring eternal hostility to poverty, racism, and militarism." Success requires thinking beyond one's community, race, or nation. Instead, he calls for "an overriding loyalty to mankind as a whole" based on the idea which "all of the great religions have seen as the supreme unifying principle of life" of love.

Although the term was not part of his vocabulary in 1967, King is speaking about a globalizing world that requires new ideas and new policies. The pace of change, he explains, has quickened. He uses a phrase from his famous "I Have a Dream" speech, as he asserts, "We are confronted with the fierce urgency of now." Nations and peoples that previously seemed distant now require attention. The developing world of Asia, Africa, and Latin America "borders on our doors." King acknowledges that the challenges of creating a new world are enormous. But just as he urged his fellow Americans to pursue the dream of freedom and justice at home, he calls on them to begin "the long and bitter but beautiful struggle for a new world."

Audience

King's audience for "Beyond Vietnam: A Time to Break Silence" was more than three thousand people who packed Riverside Church in New York, where he spoke. King, though, knew that his speech would receive wide coverage in newspapers and magazines, and he hoped that it would help to strengthen opposition to the Vietnam War. He realized, however, that some of his ideas about U.S. aggression and imperialism would be unpopular, even offensive. Yet he was willing to risk such criticism because he felt a moral compulsion to speak out. "At times you do things to satisfy your conscience," he explained.

Impact

The speech provoked a torrent of criticism. Many editorial writers and political commentators chided King for connecting two issues civil rights and Vietnam that they thought should be separate and distinct. The New York Times, for example, rebuked King for damaging both the civil rights and the peace movement. Other observers denounced King for adopting the views of America's enemies in Vietnam. Life magazine dismissed the speech as "demagogic slander that sounded like a script for Radio Hanoi." Even some African American publications, such as the Pittsburgh Courier, criticized King for "tragically misleading" blacks.

The most extreme reaction occurred at the White House. "What is that goddamned nigger preacher doing to me?" Johnson asked angrily. "We gave him the Civil Rights Act of 1964, we gave him the Voting Rights Act of 1965, we gave him the War on Poverty. What more does he want?" The federal intelligence director J. Edgar Hoover informed Johnson that King was cooperating with "subversive forces seeking to undermine our nation." Johnson's greatest fear, however, was that King's radical rhetoric was playing into the hands of opponents of civil rights and the War on Poverty. These critics of the Great Society could use King's supposedly dangerous and even disloyal dissent to block additional funding for antipoverty programs or prevent new civil rights reforms.

King made no concessions to his critics. On April 15, 1967, he led a march in New York City of one hundred twenty-five thousand antiwar protesters and then made a speech in which he repeated many of the criticisms of the war he had made at Riverside Church eleven days earlier. He called for more demonstrations against the war, and he formed a group called Negotiations Now to get one million Americans to sign a petition calling for peace talks. He told staff members of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference that he would continue his antiwar activities because it was the right thing to do. "I will not be intimidated," he insisted. "I will not be harassed. I will not be silent. And I will be heard."

1. What did King see as the connection between the Vietnam War and the issue of racial justice in the United States?

2. Compare this document with other critiques of the Vietnam War, in particular those contained in Malcolm X's "After the Bombing" (1965) and Stokely Carmichael's "Black Power" (1966). What similar arguments do the documents present? How did King's attitude toward Vietnam differ from that of the others, if at all?

3. Why did some of King's advisers urge him to sidestep the issue of the Vietnam War? Why do you think the war was such a divisive issue at the time?

4. What did President Lyndon Johnson and others see as the potential political consequences of the speech?

5. Many of King's arguments against the war in Vietnam could be applied to other conflicts, such as the U.S.-led wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. How persuasive do you find King's arguments? Would they be applicable to other conflicts?

Martin Luther King, Jr.: "Beyond Vietnam: A Time to Break Silence"

I come to this magnificent house of worship tonight because my conscience leaves me no other choice. I join with you in this meeting because I am in deepest agreement with the aims and work of the organization which has brought us together: Clergy and Laymen Concerned about Vietnam. The recent statements of your executive committee are the sentiments of my own heart and I found myself in full accord when I read its opening lines: "A time comes when silence is betrayal." That time has come for us in relation to Vietnam.

The truth of these words is beyond doubt but the mission to which they call us is a most difficult one. Even when pressed by the demands of inner truth, men do not easily assume the task of opposing their government's policy, especially in time of war. Nor does the human spirit move without great difficulty against all the apathy of conformist thought within one's own bosom and in the surrounding world. Moreover when the issues at hand seem as perplexed as they often do in the case of this dreadful conflict we are always on the verge of being mesmerized by uncertainty; but we must move on.

Some of us who have already begun to break the silence of the night have found that the calling to speak is often a vocation of agony, but we must speak. We must speak with all the humility that is appropriate to our limited vision, but we must speak. And we must rejoice as well, for surely this is the first time in our nation's history that a significant number of its religious leaders have chosen to move beyond the prophesying of smooth patriotism to the high grounds of a firm dissent based upon the mandates of conscience and the reading of history. Perhaps a new spirit is rising among us. If it is, let us trace its movement well and pray that our own inner being may be sensitive to its guidance, for we are deeply in need of a new way beyond the darkness that seems so close around us.

Over the past two years, as I have moved to break the betrayal of my own silences and to speak from the burnings of my own heart, as I have called for radical departures from the destruction of Vietnam, many persons have questioned me about the wisdom of my path. At the heart of their concerns this query has often loomed large and loud: Why are you speaking about war, Dr. King? Why are you joining the voices of dissent? Peace and civil rights don't mix, they say. Aren't you hurting the cause of your people, they ask? And when I hear them, though I often understand the source of their concern, I am nevertheless greatly saddened, for such questions mean that the inquirers have not really known me, my commitment or my calling. Indeed, their questions suggest that they do not know the world in which they live.

In the light of such tragic misunderstandings, I deem it of signal importance to try to state clearly, and I trust concisely, why I believe that the path from Dexter Avenue Baptist Church the church in Montgomery, Alabama, where I began my pastorate leads clearly to this sanctuary tonight.

I come to this platform tonight to make a passionate plea to my beloved nation. This speech is not addressed to Hanoi or to the National Liberation Front. It is not addressed to China or to Russia.

Nor is it an attempt to overlook the ambiguity of the total situation and the need for a collective solution to the tragedy of Vietnam. Neither is it an attempt to make North Vietnam or the National Liberation Front paragons of virtue, nor to overlook the role they can play in a successful resolution of the problem. While they both may have justifiable reason to be suspicious of the good faith of the United States, life and history give eloquent testimony to the fact that conflicts are never resolved without trustful give and take on both sides.

Tonight, however, I wish not to speak with Hanoi and the NLF, but rather to my fellow Americans, who, with me, bear the greatest responsibility in ending a conflict that has exacted a heavy price on both continents.

The Importance of Vietnam

Since I am a preacher by trade, I suppose it is not surprising that I have seven major reasons for bringing Vietnam into the field of my moral vision. There is at the outset a very obvious and almost facile connection between the war in Vietnam and the struggle I, and others, have been waging in America. A few years ago there was a shining moment in that struggle. It seemed as if there was a real promise of hope for the poor both black and white through the poverty program. There were experiments, hopes, new beginnings. Then came the buildup in Vietnam and I watched the program broken and eviscerated as if it were some idle political plaything of a society gone mad on war, and I knew that America would never invest the necessary funds or energies in rehabilitation of its poor so long as adventures like Vietnam continued to draw men and skills and money like some demonic destructive suction tube. So I was increasingly compelled to see the war as an enemy of the poor and to attack it as such.

Perhaps the more tragic recognition of reality took place when it became clear to me that the war was doing far more than devastating the hopes of the poor at home. It was sending their sons and their brothers and their husbands to fight and to die in extraordinarily high proportions relative to the rest of the population. We were taking the black young men who had been crippled by our society and sending them eight thousand miles away to guarantee liberties in Southeast Asia which they had not found in southwest Georgia and East Harlem. So we have been repeatedly faced with the cruel irony of watching Negro and white boys on TV screens as they kill and die together for a nation that has been unable to seat them together in the same schools. So we watch them in brutal solidarity burning the huts of a poor village, but we realize that they would never live on the same block in Detroit. I could not be silent in the face of such cruel manipulation of the poor.

My third reason moves to an even deeper level of awareness, for it grows out of my experience in the ghettoes of the North over the last three years especially the last three summers. As I have walked among the desperate, rejected and angry young men I have told them that Molotov cocktails and rifles would not solve their problems. I have tried to offer them my deepest compassion while maintaining my conviction that social change comes most meaningfully through nonviolent action. But they asked and rightly so what about Vietnam? They asked if our own nation wasn't using massive doses of violence to solve its problems, to bring about the changes it wanted. Their questions hit home, and I knew that I could never again raise my voice against the violence of the oppressed in the ghettos without having first spoken clearly to the greatest purveyor of violence in the world today my own government. For the sake of those boys, for the sake of this government, for the sake of hundreds of thousands trembling under our violence, I cannot be silent.

For those who ask the question, "Aren't you a civil rights leader?" and thereby mean to exclude me from the movement for peace, I have this further answer. In 1957 when a group of us formed the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, we chose as our motto: "To save the soul of America." We were convinced that we could not limit our vision to certain rights for black people, but instead affirmed the conviction that America would never be free or saved from itself unless the descendants of its slaves were loosed completely from the shackles they still wear. In a way we were agreeing with Langston Hughes, that black bard of Harlem, who had written earlier:

> O, yes,
> I say it plain,
> America never was America to me,
> And yet I swear this oath
> America will be!

Now, it should be incandescently clear that no one who has any concern for the integrity and life of America today can ignore the present war. If America's soul becomes totally poisoned, part of the autopsy must read Vietnam. It can never be saved so long as it destroys the deepest hopes of men the world over. So it is that those of us who are yet determined that America will be are led down the path of protest and dissent, working for the health of our land.

As if the weight of such a commitment to the life and health of America were not enough, another burden of responsibility was placed upon me in 1964; and I cannot forget that the Nobel Prize for Peace was also a commission a commission to work harder than I had ever worked before for "the brotherhood of man." This is a calling that takes me beyond national allegiances, but even if it were not present I would yet have to live with the meaning of my commitment to the ministry of Jesus Christ. To me the relationship of this ministry to the making of peace is so obvious that I sometimes marvel at those who ask me why I am speaking against the war. Could it be that they do not know that the good news was meant for all men for Communist and capitalist, for their children and ours, for black and for white, for revolutionary and conservative? Have they forgotten that my ministry is in obedience to the one who loved his enemies so fully that he died for them? What then can I say to the "Vietcong" or to Castro or to Mao as a faithful minister of this one? Can I threaten them with death or must I not share with them my life?

Finally, as I try to delineate for you and for myself the road that leads from Montgomery to this place I would have offered all that was most valid if I simply said that I must be true to my conviction that I share with all men the calling to be a son of the living God. Beyond the calling of race or nation or creed is this vocation of sonship and brotherhood, and because I believe that the Father is deeply concerned especially for his suffering and helpless and outcast children, I come tonight to speak for them.

This I believe to be the privilege and the burden of all of us who deem ourselves bound by allegiances and loyalties which are broader and deeper than nationalism and which go beyond our nation's self-defined goals and positions. We are called to speak for the weak, for the voiceless, for victims of our nation and for those it calls enemy, for no document from human hands can make these humans any less our brothers.

Strange Liberators

And as I ponder the madness of Vietnam and search within myself for ways to understand and respond to compassion my mind goes constantly to the people of that peninsula. I speak now not of the soldiers of each side, not of the junta in Saigon, but simply of the people who have been living under the curse of war for almost three continuous decades now. I think of them too because it is clear to me that there will be no meaningful solution there until some attempt is made to know them and hear their broken cries.

They must see Americans as strange liberators. The Vietnamese people proclaimed their own independence in 1945 after a combined French and Japanese occupation, and before the Communist revolution in China. They were led by Ho Chi Minh. Even though they quoted the American Declaration of Independence in their own document of freedom, we refused to recognize them. Instead, we decided to support France in its reconquest of her former colony.

Our government felt then that the Vietnamese people were not "ready" for independence, and we again fell victim to the deadly Western arrogance that has poisoned the international atmosphere for so long. With that tragic decision we rejected a revolutionary government seeking self-determination, and a government that had been established not by China (for whom the Vietnamese have no great love) but by clearly indigenous forces that included some Communists. For the peasants this new government meant real land reform, one of the most important needs in their lives.

For nine years following 1945 we denied the people of Vietnam the right of independence. For nine years we vigorously supported the French in their abortive effort to recolonize Vietnam.

Before the end of the war we were meeting eighty percent of the French war costs. Even before the French were defeated at Dien Bien Phu, they began to despair of the reckless action, but we did not. We encouraged them with our huge financial and military supplies to continue the war even after they had lost the will. Soon we would be paying almost the full costs of this tragic attempt at recolonization.

After the French were defeated it looked as if independence and land reform would come again through the Geneva agreements. But instead there came the United States, determined that Ho should not unify the temporarily divided nation, and the peasants watched again as we supported one of the most vicious modern dictators our chosen man, Premier Diem. The peasants watched and cringed as Diem ruthlessly routed out all opposition, supported their extortionist landlords and refused even to discuss reunification with the north. The peasants watched as all this was presided over by U.S. influence and then by increasing numbers of U.S. troops who came to help quell the insurgency that Diem's methods had aroused. When Diem was overthrown they may have been happy, but the long line of military dictatorships seemed to offer no real change especially in terms of their need for land and peace.

The only change came from America as we increased our troop commitments in support of governments which were singularly corrupt, inept and without popular support. All the while the people read our leaflets and received regular promises of peace and democracy and land reform. Now they languish under our bombs and consider us not their fellow Vietnamese the real enemy. They move sadly and apathetically as we herd them off the land of their fathers into concentration camps where minimal social needs are rarely met. They know they must move or be destroyed by our bombs. So they go primarily women and children and the aged.

They watch as we poison their water, as we kill a million acres of their crops. They must weep as the bulldozers roar through their areas preparing to destroy the precious trees. They wander into the hospitals, with at least twenty casualties from American firepower for one "Vietcong"-inflicted injury. So far we may have killed a million of them mostly children. They wander into the towns and see thousands of the children, homeless, without clothes, running in packs on the streets like animals. They see the children, degraded by our soldiers as they beg for food. They see the children selling their sisters to our soldiers, soliciting for their mothers.

What do the peasants think as we ally ourselves with the landlords and as we refuse to put any action into our many words concerning land reform? What do they think as we test our latest weapons on them, just as the Germans tested out new medicine and new tortures in the concentration camps of Europe? Where are the roots of the independent Vietnam we claim to be building? Is it among these voiceless ones?

We have destroyed their two most cherished institutions: the family and the village. We have destroyed their land and their crops. We have cooperated in the crushing of the nation's only non-Communist revolutionary political force the unified Buddhist church. We have supported the enemies of the peasants of Saigon. We have corrupted their women and children and killed their men. What liberators?

Now there is little left to build on save bitterness. Soon the only solid physical foundations remaining will be found at our military bases and in the concrete of the concentration camps we call fortified hamlets. The peasants may well wonder if we plan to build our new Vietnam on such grounds as these? Could we blame them for such thoughts? We must speak for them and raise the questions they cannot raise. These too are our brothers.

Perhaps the more difficult but no less necessary task is to speak for those who have been designated as our enemies. What of the National Liberation Front that strangely anonymous group we call VC or Communists? What must they think of us in America when they realize that we permitted the repression and cruelty of Diem which helped to bring them into being as a resistance group in the south? What do they think of our condoning the violence which led to their own taking up of arms? How can they believe in our integrity when now we speak of "aggression from the north" as if there were nothing more essential to the war? How can they trust us when now we charge them with violence after the murderous reign of Diem and charge them with violence while we pour every new weapon of death into their land? Surely we must understand their feelings even if we do not condone their actions. Surely we must see that the men we supported pressed them to their violence. Surely we must see that our own computerized plans of destruction simply dwarf their greatest acts.

How do they judge us when our officials know that their membership is less than twenty-five percent Communist and yet insist on giving them the blanket name? What must they be thinking when they know that we are aware of their control of major sections of Vietnam and yet we appear ready to allow national elections in which this highly organized political parallel government will have no part? They ask how we can speak of free elections when the Saigon press is censored and controlled by the military junta. And they are surely right to wonder what kind of new government we plan to help form without them the only party in real touch with the peasants. They question our political goals and they deny the reality of a peace settlement from which they will be excluded. Their questions are frighteningly relevant. Is our nation planning to build on political myth again and then shore it up with the power of new violence?

Here is the true meaning and value of compassion and nonviolence when it helps us to see the enemy's point of view, to hear his questions, to know his assessment of ourselves. For from his view we may indeed see the basic weaknesses of our own condition, and if we are mature, we may learn and grow and profit from the wisdom of the brothers who are called the opposition.

So, too, with Hanoi. In the north, where our bombs now pummel the land, and our mines endanger the waterways, we are met by a deep but understandable mistrust. To speak for them is to explain this lack of confidence in Western words, and especially their distrust of American intentions now. In Hanoi are the men who led the nation to independence against the Japanese and the French, the men who sought membership in the French commonwealth and were betrayed by the weakness of Paris and the willfulness of the colonial armies. It was they who led a second struggle against French domination at tremendous costs, and then were persuaded to give up the land they controlled between the thirteenth and seventeenth parallel as a temporary measure at Geneva. After 1954 they watched us conspire with Diem to prevent elections which would have surely brought Ho Chi Minh to power over a united Vietnam, and they realized they had been betrayed again.

When we ask why they do not leap to negotiate, these things must be remembered. Also it must be clear that the leaders of Hanoi considered the presence of American troops in support of the Diem regime to have been the initial military breach of the Geneva agreements concerning foreign troops, and they remind us that they did not begin to send in any large number of supplies or men until American forces had moved into the tens of thousands.

Hanoi remembers how our leaders refused to tell us the truth about the earlier North Vietnamese overtures for peace, how the president claimed that none existed when they had clearly been made. Ho Chi Minh has watched as America has spoken of peace and built up its forces, and now he has surely heard of the increasing international rumors of American plans for an invasion of the north. He knows the bombing and shelling and mining we are doing are part of traditional pre-invasion strategy. Perhaps only his sense of humor and of irony can save him when he hears the most powerful nation of the world speaking of aggression as it drops thousands of bombs on a poor weak nation more than eight thousand miles away from its shores.

At this point I should make it clear that while I have tried in these last few minutes to give a voice to the voiceless on Vietnam and to understand the arguments of those who are called enemy, I am as deeply concerned about our troops there as anything else. For it occurs to me that what we are submitting them to in Vietnam is not simply the brutalizing process that goes on in any war where armies face each other and seek to destroy. We are adding cynicism to the process of death, for they must know after a short period there that none of the things we claim to be fighting for are really involved. Before long they must know that their government has sent them into a struggle among Vietnamese, and the more sophisticated surely realize that we are on the side of the wealthy and the secure while we create hell for the poor.

This Madness Must Cease

Somehow this madness must cease. We must stop now. I speak as a child of God and brother to the suffering poor of Vietnam. I speak for those whose land is being laid waste, whose homes are being destroyed, whose culture is being subverted. I speak for the poor of America who are paying the double price of smashed hopes at home and death and corruption in Vietnam. I speak as a citizen of the world, for the world as it stands aghast at the path we have taken. I speak as an American to the leaders of my own nation. The great initiative in this war is ours. The initiative to stop it must be ours.

This is the message of the great Buddhist leaders of Vietnam. Recently one of them wrote these words:

"Each day the war goes on the hatred increases in the heart of the Vietnamese and in the hearts of those of humanitarian instinct. The Americans are forcing even their friends into becoming their enemies. It is curious that the Americans, who calculate so carefully on the possibilities of military victory, do not realize that in the process they are incurring deep psychological and political defeat. The image of America will never again be the image of revolution, freedom and democracy, but the image of violence and militarism."

If we continue, there will be no doubt in my mind and in the mind of the world that we have no honorable intentions in Vietnam. It will become clear that our minimal expectation is to occupy it as an American colony and men will not refrain from thinking that our maximum hope is to goad China into a war so that we may bomb her nuclear installations. If we do not stop our war against the people of Vietnam immediately the world will be left with no other alternative than to see this as some horribly clumsy and deadly game we have decided to play.

The world now demands a maturity of America that we may not be able to achieve. It demands that we admit that we have been wrong from the beginning of our adventure in Vietnam, that we have been detrimental to the life of the Vietnamese people. The situation is one in which we must be ready to turn sharply from our present ways.

In order to atone for our sins and errors in Vietnam, we should take the initiative in bringing a halt to this tragic war. I would like to suggest five concrete things that our government should do immediately to begin the long and difficult process of extricating ourselves from this nightmarish conflict:

1. End all bombing in North and South Vietnam.
2. Declare a unilateral cease-fire in the hope that such action will create the atmosphere for negotiation.
3. Take immediate steps to prevent other battlegrounds in Southeast Asia by curtailing our military buildup in Thailand and our interference in Laos.
4. Realistically accept the fact that the National Liberation Front has substantial support in South Vietnam and must thereby play a role in any meaningful negotiations and in any future Vietnam government.
5. Set a date that we will remove all foreign troops from Vietnam in accordance with the 1954 Geneva agreement.

Part of our ongoing commitment might well express itself in an offer to grant asylum to any Vietnamese who fears for his life under a new regime which included the Liberation Front. Then we must make what reparations we can for the damage we have done. We must provide the medical aid that is badly needed, making it available in this country if necessary.

Protesting the War

Meanwhile we in the churches and synagogues have a continuing task while we urge our government to disengage itself from a disgraceful commitment. We must continue to raise our voices if our nation persists in its perverse ways in Vietnam. We must be prepared to match actions with words by seeking out every creative means of protest possible.

As we counsel young men concerning military service we must clarify for them our nation's role in Vietnam and challenge them with the alternative of conscientious objection. I am pleased to say that this is the path now being chosen by more than seventy students at my own alma mater, Morehouse College, and I recommend it to all who find the American course in Vietnam a dishonorable and unjust one. Moreover I would encourage all ministers of draft age to give up their ministerial exemptions and seek status as conscientious objectors. These are the times for real choices and not false ones. We are at the moment when our lives must be placed on the line if our nation is to survive its own folly. Every man of humane convictions must decide on the protest that best suits his convictions, but we must all protest.

There is something seductively tempting about stopping there and sending us all off on what in some circles has become a popular crusade against the war in Vietnam. I say we must enter the struggle, but I wish to go on now to say something even more disturbing. The war in Vietnam is but a symptom of a far deeper malady within the American spirit, and if we ignore this sobering reality we will find ourselves organizing clergy- and laymen-concerned committees for the next generation. They will be concerned about Guatemala and Peru. They will be concerned about Thailand and Cambodia. They will be concerned about Mozambique and South Africa. We will be marching for these and a dozen other names and attending rallies without end unless there is a significant and profound change in American life and policy. Such thoughts take us beyond Vietnam, but not beyond our calling as sons of the living God.

In 1957 a sensitive American official overseas said that it seemed to him that our nation was on the wrong side of a world revolution. During the past ten years we have seen emerge a pattern of suppression which now has justified the presence of U.S. military "advisors" in Venezuela. This need to maintain social stability for our investments accounts for the counter-revolutionary action of American forces in Guatemala. It tells why American helicopters are being used against guerrillas in Colombia and why American napalm and green beret forces have already been active against rebels in Peru. It is with such activity in mind that the words of the late John F. Kennedy come back to haunt us. Five years ago he said, "Those who make peaceful revolution impossible will make violent revolution inevitable."

Increasingly, by choice or by accident, this is the role our nation has taken the role of those who make peaceful revolution impossible by refusing to give up the privileges and the pleasures that come from the immense profits of overseas investment.

I am convinced that if we are to get on the right side of the world revolution, we as a nation must undergo a radical revolution of values. We must rapidly begin the shift from a "thing-oriented" society to a "person-oriented" society. When machines and computers, profit motives and property rights are considered more important than people, the giant triplets of racism, materialism, and militarism are incapable of being conquered.

A true revolution of values will soon cause us to question the fairness and justice of many of our past and present policies. On the one hand we are called to play the good Samaritan on life's roadside; but that will be only an initial act. One day we must come to see that the whole Jericho road must be transformed so that men and women will not be constantly beaten and robbed as they make their journey on life's highway. True compassion is more than flinging a coin to a beggar; it is not haphazard and superficial. It comes to see that an edifice which produces beggars needs restructuring. A true revolution of values will soon look uneasily on the glaring contrast of poverty and wealth. With righteous indignation, it will look across the seas and see individual capitalists of the West investing huge sums of money in Asia, Africa and South America, only to take the profits out with no concern for the social betterment of the countries, and say: "This is not just." It will look at our alliance with the landed gentry of Latin America and say: "This is not just." The Western arrogance of feeling that it has everything to teach others and nothing to learn from them is not just. A true revolution of values will lay hands on the world order and say of war: "This way of settling differences is not just." This business of burning human beings with napalm, of filling our nation's homes with orphans and widows, of injecting poisonous drugs of hate into veins of people normally humane, of sending men home from dark and bloody battlefields physically handicapped and psychologically deranged, cannot be reconciled with wisdom, justice and love. A nation that continues year after year to spend more money on military defense than on programs of social uplift is approaching spiritual death.

America, the richest and most powerful nation in the world, can well lead the way in this revolution of values. There is nothing, except a tragic death wish, to prevent us from reordering our priorities, so that the pursuit of peace will take precedence over the pursuit of war. There is nothing to keep us from molding a recalcitrant status quo with bruised hands until we have fashioned it into a brotherhood.

This kind of positive revolution of values is our best defense against communism. War is not the answer. Communism will never be defeated by the use of atomic bombs or nuclear weapons. Let us not join those who shout war and through their misguided passions urge the United States to relinquish its participation in the United Nations. These are days which demand wise restraint and calm reasonableness. We must not call everyone a Communist or an appeaser who advocates the seating of Red China in the United Nations and who recognizes that hate and hysteria are not the final answers to the problem of these turbulent days. We must not engage in a negative anti-communism, but rather in a positive thrust for democracy, realizing that our greatest defense against communism is to take offensive action in behalf of justice. We must with positive action seek to remove those conditions of poverty, insecurity and injustice which are the fertile soil in which the seed of communism grows and develops.

The People Are Important

These are revolutionary times. All over the globe men are revolting against old systems of exploitation and oppression and out of the wombs of a frail world new systems of justice and equality are being born. The shirtless and barefoot people of the land are rising up as never before. "The people who sat in darkness have seen a great light." We in the West must support these revolutions. It is a sad fact that, because of comfort, complacency, a morbid fear of communism, and our proneness to adjust to injustice, the Western nations that initiated so much of the revolutionary spirit of the modern world have now become the arch anti-revolutionaries. This has driven many to feel that only Marxism has the revolutionary spirit. Therefore, communism is a judgment against our failure to make democracy real and follow through on the revolutions we initiated. Our only hope today lies in our ability to recapture the revolutionary spirit and go out into a sometimes hostile world declaring eternal hostility to poverty, racism, and militarism. With this powerful commitment we shall boldly challenge the status quo and unjust mores and thereby speed the day when "every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be made low, and the crooked shall be made straight and the rough places plain."

A genuine revolution of values means in the final analysis that our loyalties must become ecumenical rather than sectional. Every nation must now develop an overriding loyalty to mankind as a whole in order to preserve the best in their individual societies.

This call for a world-wide fellowship that lifts neighborly concern beyond one's tribe, race, class and nation is in reality a call for an all-embracing and unconditional love for all men. This oft misunderstood and misinterpreted concept so readily dismissed by the Nietzsches of the world as a weak and cowardly force has now become an absolute necessity for the survival of man. When I speak of love I am not speaking of some sentimental and weak response. I am speaking of that force which all of the great religions have seen as the supreme unifying principle of life. Love is somehow the key that unlocks the door which leads to ultimate reality. This Hindu-Moslem-Christian-Jewish-Buddhist belief about ultimate reality is beautifully summed up in the first epistle of Saint John:

Let us love one another; for love is God and everyone that loveth is born of God and knoweth God. He that loveth not knoweth not God; for God is love. If we love one another God dwelleth in us, and his love is perfected in us.

Let us hope that this spirit will become the order of the day. We can no longer afford to worship the god of hate or bow before the altar of retaliation. The oceans of history are made turbulent by the ever-rising tides of hate. History is cluttered with the wreckage of nations and individuals that pursued this self-defeating path of hate. As Arnold Toynbee says: "Love is the ultimate force that makes for the saving choice of life and good against the damning choice of death and evil. Therefore the first hope in our inventory must be the hope that love is going to have the last word."

We are now faced with the fact that tomorrow is today. We are confronted with the fierce urgency of now. In this unfolding conundrum of life and history there is such a thing as being too late. Procrastination is still the thief of time. Life often leaves us standing bare, naked and dejected with a lost opportunity. The "tide in the affairs of men" does not remain at the flood; it ebbs. We may cry out desperately for time to pause in her passage, but time is deaf to every plea and rushes on. Over the bleached bones and jumbled residue of numerous civilizations are written the pathetic words: "Too late." There is an invisible book of life that faithfully records our vigilance or our neglect. "The moving finger writes, and having writ moves on.… " We still have a choice today; nonviolent coexistence or violent co-annihilation.

We must move past indecision to action. We must find new ways to speak for peace in Vietnam and justice throughout the developing world a world that borders on our doors. If we do not act we shall surely be dragged down the long dark and shameful corridors of time reserved for those who possess power without compassion, might without morality, and strength without sight.

Now let us begin. Now let us rededicate ourselves to the long and bitter but beautiful struggle for a new world. This is the calling of the sons of God, and our brothers wait eagerly for our response. Shall we say the odds are too great? Shall we tell them the struggle is too hard? Will our message be that the forces of American life militate against their arrival as full men, and we send our deepest regrets? Or will there be another message, of longing, of hope, of solidarity with their yearnings, of commitment to their cause, whatever the cost? The choice is ours, and though we might prefer it otherwise we must choose in this crucial moment of human history.

As that noble bard of yesterday, James Russell Lowell, eloquently stated:

Once to every man and nation
Comes the moment to decide,
In the strife of truth and falsehood,
For the good or evil side;
Some great cause, God's new Messiah,
Off'ring each the bloom or blight,
And the choice goes by forever
Twixt that darkness and that light.
Though the cause of evil prosper,
Yet 'tis truth alone is strong;
Though her portion be the scaffold,
And upon the throne be wrong:
Yet that scaffold sways the future,
And behind the dim unknown,
Standeth God within the shadow

Loving v. Virginia

1967

"Restricting the freedom to marry solely because of racial classifications violates the central meaning of the Equal Protection Clause."

Overview

In 1967 in Loving v. Virginia, Chief Justice Earl Warren wrote on behalf of a unanimous Supreme Court to declare antimiscegenation laws in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Laws against interracial marriage were widespread in the United States into the 1960s. An interracial couple from Virginia, wanting to be "Mr. and Mrs. Richard Loving," found themselves taken to jail in 1958 and then to court because he was white and she was not. They were convicted of the crime of marrying each other, but eventually they appealed their convictions, and the case went to the U.S. Supreme Court. There, the Fourteenth Amendment, which had been in the Constitution for almost exactly a century, was for the first time interpreted to declare unconstitutional all state laws against interracial marriage. As a result, more than three hundred years after the first of such laws was passed, none could any longer be enforced. States retained their authority over the law of marriage in other respects but no longer as regarded racial classifications.

Thus, thirteen years after the Warren Court overturned segregated public schooling, all laws against interracial marriage — the last refuge for state-mandated segregation — were overturned as well. As with the Montgomery bus boycott, some citizens had protested the segregation laws, and their resistance led to the Supreme Court's ruling against those laws. The Lovings, then, can be seen as important actors in the civil rights movement. At the same time, Chief Justice Warren's decision to throw out the case against them can be seen as a crucial document, akin to President Harry S. Truman's Executive Order 9981 in 1948 against segregation in the U.S. armed forces, the Supreme Court's ruling in Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka in 1954, and the congressional passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965. Loving v. Virginia brought down the last of the Jim Crow laws that had segregated so much of American life for so long.

Context

Laws against interracial marriage were on the books of most of the American colonies before the Revolution. The term miscegenation, referring to sex or marriage between people of two different races, was coined in the course of President Abraham Lincoln's bid for reelection in 1864, when David Goodman Croly and George Wakeman, two Democratic newspapermen, produced a hoax pamphlet with that term as the title designed to give the impression that Lincoln favored interracial marriage. A majority of states retained their antimiscegenation laws through the nineteenth century and even beyond World War II. Those laws varied widely, however, in how they chose to define interracial, in whether they made interracial marriage a crime, and in whether they would recognize an interracial marriage that took place outside their borders. Some states repealed their laws and never restored them, while seven southern states, including Louisiana and Arkansas, dropped such laws in the 1870s but then restored them by the 1890s. As of 1895, interracial marriage was banned throughout the South. In 1912 the Georgia congressman Seaborn Roddenbery proposed an amendment to the U.S. Constitution to ban black-white marriages everywhere in the nation, but it did not pass. Nonetheless, between 1913 and 1948, thirty of the forty-eight states maintained laws against interracial marriage. Then, beginning with a four-to-three decision in Perez v. Sharp by the Supreme Court of California in 1948, followed by a series of legislative repeals, all the states outside the South shed those laws; after 1965 only the seventeen states of the South retained them. A newly reapportioned Maryland legislature passed a repeal measure in early 1967, to be effective on June 1, leaving sixteen states with antimiscegenation laws.

Over the years, the Supreme Court had addressed various matters related to marriage. The majority opinion in the 1857 Dred Scott case cited northern laws against interracial marriage as evidence that whites outside the South shared a common disinclination to recognize their African American neighbors as full citizens. In a major precedent, the Court ruled unanimously in Pace v. Alabama (1883) that, where a black man and a white woman had been convicted of living together outside marriage — and under Alabama law at the time, they could not have legally married — it was no violation of their rights that the punishment for their crime was greater than it would have been had they shared a racial identity, white or black. In the 1888 case

Maynard v. Hill, the Court stated that marriage has "always been subject to the control of the legislature." In Plessy v. Ferguson (1896), the Court made passing note of segregation statutes governing marriage on its way to upholding a segregation statute governing railway travel. Between 1954 and 1956 the Supreme Court refused to hear two cases, Jackson v. State of Alabama and the Virginia case Naim v. Naim, regarding antimiscegenation statutes, leaving the statutes intact. And in 1964 the Court expressly chose not to address interracial marriage in a case, McLaughlin v. Florida, that resembled Pace v. Alabama except that here the Court did throw out as unconstitutional Florida's statute against interracial cohabitation.

Virginia's first law against interracial marriage dated from 1691, when a white person who married a nonwhite was subject to exile from the colony though back in 1614, the marriage between the Native American Pocahontas and the Englishman John Rolfe had brought a peaceful respite to the awful warfare that had been going on between the two peoples. In 1878, following the Civil War and the end of slavery, the legislature overhauled the rules to now subject both parties in a black-white marriage to two to five years in the penitentiary as well as to provide that if a Virginia couple, seeking to evade the statute, went out of state to get married and then returned, the penalties would be the same. Throughout the nineteenth century, a person in Virginia was legally white if less than one-quarter black; that is, a person with three white grandparents and one black grandparent was black, but a person with seven white great-grandparents was white. That law was changed in 1910, so that a person as much as one-sixteenth black was "colored," and again in 1924, with the Racial Integrity Act, so that any traceable African ancestry resulted in classification as a colored person. Thus the "one-drop" rule of black racial identity came to Virginia's law of marriage in 1924. The one material change to the law thereafter reduced the minimum prison term to a single year for each party to a marriage between a "white" person and a "colored" person.

In Caroline County, a rural portion of eastern Virginia, Richard Perry Loving was born a white man in 1933, and Mildred Delores Jeter, of African and Native American descent, was born a "colored" woman in 1939. They drove to Washington, D.C., in June 1958 to get married, returned to Caroline County, and were living with her parents about a month later when three law enforcement officers walked into the unlocked house late one night, awoke them, and arrested them for their unlawful marriage. At trial the following January, they pled guilty in accordance with the terms of a plea bargain. Instead of being sent to prison for a year, they were exiled from Virginia; reluctantly, they moved to Washington, D.C.

In 1963, however, Mrs. Loving wrote to Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy at the U.S. Department of Justice for help, and her plea made its way to Bernard S. Cohen, a young lawyer for the American Civil Liberties Union with an office in Alexandria, Virginia. Subsequently joined by another young lawyer, Philip J. Hirschkop, Cohen appealed the 1959 outcome at trial to the original judge, Leon M.

Bazile. At issue under the Constitution were the due process and equal protection clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment, according to which governments must not intervene arbitrarily in people's lives or treat one racial group differently from another. In January 1965, Bazile wrote out a long opinion explaining why the law was constitutional and its application to the Lovings just; he remarked (as Warren would cite in Loving),

> Almighty God created the races white, black, yellow, malay and red, and he placed them on separate continents. And but for the interference with his arrangement there would be no cause for such marriages. The fact that he separated the races shows that he did not intend for the races to mix.

The case went next to the Virginia Supreme Court, which in 1966 upheld the trial judge, and then to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Under Chief Justice Warren, the Court had been relying on the equal protection clause to chip away at the edifice of Jim Crow all the way back to the 1954 Brown v. Board case (with considerable preliminary work along those lines having been accomplished even before Warren came on the Court). Even aside from race, the Warren Court had been attacking impediments to human freedom that state authorities often imposed, whether state failure to provide defense lawyers to indigent defendants in criminal proceedings or state laws restricting access to birth control for married couples. The decision in Loving v. Virginia reflected both impulses, as the case was resolved with the Court's landmark 1967 ruling striking down laws against interracial marriage.

About the Author

As chief justice, Earl Warren assigned to himself the task of writing the Court's opinion in Loving v. Virginia. In the way that law clerks often do much of the actual drafting, however, Warren's clerk Benno Schmidt did the heavy lifting in the Loving case, following his boss's directions as to the reasoning and also some of the content. For example, Warren directed Schmidt to center the opinion on racial discrimination and the right to marry and to definitely cite Judge Bazile's language about how God had created the separate races and wanted to keep them separate.

Earl Warren was born in Los Angeles, California, in 1891. The son of a railroad-car repairman, the young Warren also worked for a time on railroads. He went to college and law school at the University of California, Berkeley; served briefly in World War I; and then went to work in the office of the district attorney for Alameda County, California. He would work there for eighteen years, thirteen as district attorney himself, gaining extensive experience as a prosecutor; in a 1931 survey he was voted the best district attorney in the nation. Beyond prosecuting defendants, on their behalf he urged that they each, if necessary, have a public defender so as to be fairly represented in criminal court proceedings. In 1938 he was elected attorney general of California, to serve a four-year term. In 1942 he ran as a Republican for the governorship of California and was elected to the first of three four-year terms. He was nominated for the vice presidency in 1948 as Thomas Dewey's running mate, but the presidency instead went to Harry Truman. Warren helped Dwight Eisenhower win their party's nomination for the presidency in 1952 and was offered the position of solicitor general in the new administration, but he was then nominated as chief justice of the United States when Chief Justice Fred Vinson died in September 1953. Warren was quickly confirmed and took the helm of the Supreme Court the following month.

In joining the Court, Warren was not new to issues related to the laws of race and marriage. As California's attorney general back in 1939, he was obligated to interpret the state's racial restrictions on marriage. And in 1948 he was serving as governor when the Supreme Court of California struck down that state's law against interracial marriages. Within three years of his appointment as chief justice, two cases regarding the constitutionality of laws against interracial marriage came to the Court, and in each one from Virginia, one from Alabama he was in the minority as to whether the Court would hear the case and potentially overturn the law that had given rise to it. As late as 1964, in McLaughlin v. Florida, though ruling in favor of an unmarried interracial couple, the Court had not been prepared to overturn laws against interracial marriage. In Loving in 1967, Warren had the perfect case and the perfect occasion for ruling against such laws everywhere.

While serving as chief justice, Warren reluctantly accepted the chairmanship of a special commission set up by Congress to investigate the 1963 assassination of President John F. Kennedy. The Warren Commission, as it became known, found that Lee Harvey Oswald acted alone in his assassination, a controversial conclusion. In June 1968, one year after the ruling in Loving v. Virginia, Warren informed President Lyndon B. Johnson that he wished to retire as soon as his successor could be confirmed. Johnson chose the associate Supreme Court justice Abe Fortas, whose nomination ran into such trouble toward the end of Johnson's presidency that he eventually withdrew his name; Warren's successor, Warren E. Burger, was an appointee of the new president, Richard M. Nixon. Earl Warren was working on his memoirs when he died in 1974.

Chief Justice Warren declares in the opening sentence of his opinion, "This case presents a constitutional question never addressed by this Court." While he is pointing out the novelty of the question, and certainly of the position the Court took that day, at the same time the chief justice may be apologizing for the Court's failure to address the question of interracial marriage at any of several earlier opportunities, including three on his watch. He specifies the question of whether state laws against interracial marriage violate the equal protection and due process clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment. He does not reserve the punch line: indeed, those laws do conflict with the Fourteenth Amendment; so they must fall. He then recounts the long journey the Lovings had taken, from their wedding nine years earlier up until their triumph achieved as he then read the Court's unanimous ruling that their convictions could not stand.

And he quotes the trial judge's language about how God had "created the races" five are listed and wanted them not "to mix," though Warren misdates the trial judge's comments as coming from the original trial in 1959 rather than the actual occasion, the rehearing in 1965.

The chief justice quotes in full the statutory provisions that made it a crime for an interracial couple in Virginia to marry, not only inside the state but also outside of it if they planned to return to Virginia and live as a married couple there, as the Lovings had. He also supplies (in a lengthy footnote not reproduced here) the exact language that defined "white persons" and "colored persons" in Virginia. He notes that the Lovings had never contested their being classified, one as white and the other as colored, under those legal provisions (an approach sometimes taken by other interracial couples, who claimed to be both white or both nonwhite and therefore not subject to prosecution under the law). Warren mentions the extraordinary antiquity of Virginia's law, where "penalties for miscegenation arose as an incident to slavery and have been common in Virginia since the colonial period." But, as he observes, "the present statutory scheme dates from the adoption of the Racial Integrity Act of 1924," whose key provisions he recounts. A footnote (not provided here) lists the statutory provisions of the fifteen other states, all in the South, that still had such laws as Virginia's, and it also lists the fourteen states that, in the previous two decades, had repealed their antimiscegenation laws.

◆ Part I

In part I of the opinion, the chief justice reviews the charges against the Lovings and the leading arguments that the state of Virginia offered in its defense of its laws, and he rebuts each in turn. The Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia, whose ruling was under appeal in this case, had, as one of its arguments in support of the constitutionality of the state's antimiscegenation laws, reached for a ruling by that same court a decade earlier, Naim v. Naim (1955), regarding a Chinese man and a white woman. As Warren forthrightly assesses, the Virginia court had declared that the state's "legitimate purposes" in enacting, enforcing, and upholding such laws "were 'to preserve the racial integrity of its citizens,' and to prevent 'the corruption of blood,' 'a mongrel breed of citizens,' and 'the obliteration of racial pride,' obviously an endorsement of the doctrine of White Supremacy." As the chief justice notes a little later, Virginia had banned not all interracial marriages but "only interracial marriages involving white persons." He goes on, in a footnote (not reproduced here), to condemn racial classifications in criminal statutes regardless of whether the "integrity" of all races or only that of whites is to be protected. So from the Court's perspective, neither white supremacy nor concern for racial integrity passed muster as a defense of the Virginia laws.

In the opening sentence of the second paragraph, Chief Justice Warren seriously undercuts the state's reliance on the Tenth Amendment's declaration regarding the legitimate powers of the states, and thus the rightful limits on federal authority, to deflect arguments based upon the Fourteenth Amendment and the limits on state powers. But such arguments still had to be addressed. In presenting its case to the Supreme Court, the state of Virginia drew upon a ruling from 1888, Maynard v. Hill, in which the Court baldly stated that marriage, "having more to do with the morals and civilization of a people than any other institution, has always been subject to the control of the legislature." Warren chides the state of Virginia for mounting such an argument in support of its laws of race and marriage: "While the state court is no doubt correct in asserting that marriage is a social relation subject to the State's police power,… the State does not contend in its argument before this Court that its powers to regulate marriage are unlimited notwithstanding the commands of the Fourteenth Amendment. Nor could it do so," the chief justice goes on, in view of some important cases from long before the 1960s but long after the 1880s, including Meyer v. Nebraska (1923), in which the Court had spoken expressly of "the right … to marry."

The state also argued that the equal protection clause should be understood as reflecting an intent by the Framers that, so long as punishments visited upon people, both black and white, were the same for violating a given law, such as Virginia's against interracial marriage, then the requirements of equal protection were satisfied. Indeed, the Supreme Court had accepted that very argument in 1883 in Pace v. Alabama, a case that arose when a man classified as black and a woman classified as white had, upon conviction for living together without being married, suffered a more severe sentence than they would have had they both been white or both black. Judge Bazile, in writing his opinion in 1965 in support of the original outcome for the Lovings at trial six years before, called upon a wide range of precedents that supported him, but he ignored a 1964 ruling by the Supreme Court to the contrary viewing it as no more legitimate than he had perceived Brown v. Board of Education to be a decade earlier. That 1964 ruling, McLaughlin v. Florida, Chief Justice Warren now invokes, quoting the remark that "Pace represents a limited view of the Equal Protection Clause which has not withstood analysis in the subsequent decisions of this Court." Thus, Pace v. Alabama helped the state's case no more than did Maynard v. Hill. As to whether the Fourteenth Amendment protects against "classifications drawn by any statute" that "constitute an arbitrary and invidious discrimination," the Court had so held in McLaughlin v. Florida, and it is ruling so again in Loving v. Virginia. Warren has established that the equal protection clause sufficed to strike the Virginia laws and therefore the Lovings' convictions under those laws.

◆ Part II

The Lovings' attorneys had also argued on the basis of the due process clause, and this portion of the Fourteenth Amendment the Court also considers. To do so, the Court cites the 1942 case Skinner v. State of Oklahoma (which was primarily concerned with sterilization as legal punishment) as well as Maynard v. Hill, one of the key props in the state's case. That long-ago case from 1888, which on its face had nothing to do with race, spoke in very strong terms not only of legislative prerogative in the law of marriage but also of the supreme importance of marriage as an institution. So in the short final section on the due process clause, the chief justice speaks of "this fundamental freedom" and notes with reproof how antimiscegenation laws serve to "deprive all the State's citizens of liberty without due process of law." In short, though the Court does not use this precise language, Richard Loving had been denied not despite his being a white man but indeed because he was a white man the right to marry Mildred Jeter, and she had been similarly deprived of the right to marry him. In sum, this dual deprivation, and the Lovings' punishment for the crime of trying to be a married couple, constituted a denial of both equal protection and due process of law. So, the Court concludes, "These convictions must be reversed."

Audience

The Supreme Court could be said to have had three audiences for its ruling against laws that prevented couples defined as interracial from getting married. First was the Lovings themselves, who sought an end to their liability for prosecution for their marriage as well as an end to the enforcement of the terms of their plea bargain preventing their publicly living together back in Virginia. At the same time, the Court's audience consisted of public authorities in all sixteen states in which antimiscegenation laws had persisted as late as the time of the ruling. In light of Loving, those officials no longer had the authority to enforce such laws, whether in denying marriage licenses to interracial couples, prosecuting married couples under a criminal statute against interracial marriage, or denying inheritance benefits on the basis that a marriage, because interracial, had always been invalid in that state.

The third audience was all of America, and indeed the world, with the opinion announcing that new rules of race and marriage were now in place whereby African Americans might in every state be suitable marriage partners for Caucasians as the last wall in the edifice of American apartheid had been taken down. Looking further ahead, the ruling's sweeping language about "the freedom to marry" resonates up to the present time, as in state after state, same-sex couples seek to have the language and logic of Loving v. Virginia about "equal protection" and "the freedom to marry" applied to them.

Essential Quotes

"The clear and central purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment was to eliminate all official state sources of invidious racial discrimination in the States."

(Part I)

"There can be no doubt that restricting the freedom to marry solely because of racial classifications violates the central meaning of the Equal Protection Clause."

(Part I)

"The freedom to marry has long been recognized as one of the vital personal rights essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men."

(Part II)

"Under our Constitution, the freedom to marry, or not marry, a person of another race resides with the individual and cannot be infringed by the State."

(Part II)

Impact

The ruling's impact was immediate for the Lovings, who found themselves free to live openly together with their children in Virginia. There the children would grow to adulthood, and their parents would live out the rest of their lives. Richard Loving, among whose many occupations was that of bricklayer, symbolically heralded the family's new-found freedom by building a permanent new home of brick for them all.

Elsewhere, throughout the nation, public authorities could no longer enforce miscegenation laws. Interracial couples in Delaware, Arkansas, Louisiana, and many other states thus suddenly found that the key obstacle to their marrying had been taken down. Loving's impact also extended to different dimensions of the law of marriage. The outcome of litigation in Oklahoma, for example, took a new turn after Loving v. Virginia, since a 1939 marriage between a white man and an African American woman, under which the widow's daughter and granddaughter had sought to inherit property in the 1960s, was suddenly valid; thus it could not be successfully contested by a son from his father's earlier marriage who did not wish to share his father's estate. Some years later, in 1984, the Supreme Court had occasion to revisit the Loving case and expand its reach after a local court in Florida removed a white child from the custody of her divorced mother, Linda Sidoti, on the grounds that she had married a black man, Clarence Palmore, Jr. The Court decided that race could not be grounds for reassigning child custody when a parent remarries across racial lines.

Within four years of Loving v. Virginia, same-sex couples were going to court seeking to obtain marriage licenses, arguing on the basis of the language and logic of Loving that they should not be denied the right to marry. In state after state, beginning with Minnesota in 1971 in Baker v. Nelson, such arguments were rebuffed. State legislatures thus yet retained the authority to define marriage and to continue, on grounds other than race, to restrict people's freedom to marry. In the 1990s, however, state judges began to prove receptive to such arguments if couched in terms of the provisions of state constitutions rather than those of the Fourteenth Amendment. In Hawaii and Alaska, voters subsequently approved a change in the language of their respective state constitutions to undo rulings based upon judicial interpretation of the former language. But in Vermont, "civil unions" resulted from a state supreme court ruling in favor of same-sex litigants, Baker v. State of Vermont. And in Massachusetts even that degree of change was deemed too small, an unconstitutional infringement of a constitutional right to marry. In Goodrich v. Department of Public Health (2003), the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, relying in part on Loving v. Virginia, interpreted the Massachusetts state constitution to require that same-sex couples enjoy the full right to marry that heterosexual couples do.

Questions for Further Study

1. The Commonwealth of Virginia had a long legal history pertaining to African Americans. Compare this document with Virginia's Act III: Baptism Does Not Exempt Slaves from Bondage (1667) and the Virginia Slave Code (1860). How were the antimiscegenation laws in effect in Virginia as late as the 1960s an outgrowth of the commonwealth's history?

2. What was the "one drop rule"? Why was this "rule" important in the nation's racial history?

3. On what fundamental constitutional basis did the Warren Court negate Virginia's laws against interracial marriage? Did the Court use the same principle in its decision in Brown v. Board of Education (1954)? Explain.

4. What impact did the Court's decision in Loving v. Virginia have on the debate involving same-sex couples? According to some people, how does the logic of the decision extend to such couples?

5. According to the entry, the "last wall in the edifice of American apartheid had been taken down" through the Court's decision in this case. Do you agree with this conclusion?

LOVING V. VIRGINIA

Mr. Chief Justice Warren delivered the opinion of the Court

This case presents a constitutional question never addressed by this Court: whether a statutory scheme adopted by the State of Virginia to prevent marriages between persons solely on the basis of racial classifications violates the Equal Protection and Due Process Clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment. For reasons which seem to us to reflect the central meaning of those constitutional commands, we conclude that these statutes cannot stand consistently with the Fourteenth Amendment.

In June 1958, two residents of Virginia, Mildred Jeter, a Negro woman, and Richard Loving, a white man, were married in the District of Columbia pursuant to its laws. Shortly after their marriage, the Lovings returned to Virginia and established their marital abode in Caroline County. At the October Term, 1958, of the Circuit Court of Caroline County, a grand jury issued an indictment charging the Lovings with violating Virginia's ban on interracial marriages. On January 6, 1959, the Lovings pleaded guilty to the charge and were sentenced to one year in jail; however, the trial judge suspended the sentence for a period of 25 years on the condition that the Lovings leave the State and not return to Virginia together for 25 years. He stated in an opinion that:

> "Almighty God created the races white, black, yellow, malay and red, and he placed them on separate continents. And but for the interference with his arrangement there would be no cause for such marriages. The fact that he separated the races shows that he did not intend for the races to mix."

After their convictions, the Lovings took up residence in the District of Columbia. On November 6, 1963, they filed a motion in the state trial court to vacate the judgment and set aside the sentence on the ground that the statutes which they had violated were repugnant to the Fourteenth Amendment. The motion not having been decided by October 28, 1964, the Lovings instituted a class action in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia requesting that a three-judge court be convened to declare the Virginia antimiscegenation statutes unconstitutional and to enjoin state officials from enforcing their convictions. On January 22, 1965, the state trial judge denied the motion to vacate the sentences, and the Lovings perfected an appeal to the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. On February 11, 1965, the three-judge District Court continued the case to allow the Lovings to present their constitutional claims to the highest state court.

The Supreme Court of Appeals upheld the constitutionality of the antimiscegenation statutes and, after modifying the sentence, affirmed the convictions. The Lovings appealed this decision, and we noted probable jurisdiction on December 12, 1966, 385 U.S. 986.

The two statutes under which appellants were convicted and sentenced are part of a comprehensive statutory scheme aimed at prohibiting and punishing interracial marriages. The Lovings were convicted of violating ß 20 58 of the Virginia Code:

> "Leaving State to evade law. If any white person and colored person shall go out of this State, for the purpose of being married, and with the intention of returning, and be married out of it, and afterwards return to and reside in it, cohabiting as man and wife, they shall be punished as provided in ß 20 59, and the marriage shall be governed by the same law as if it had been solemnized in this State. The fact of their cohabitation here as man and wife shall be evidence of their marriage."

Section 20 59, which defines the penalty for miscegenation, provides:

> "Punishment for marriage. If any white person intermarry with a colored person, or any colored person intermarry with a white person, he shall be guilty of a felony and shall be punished by confinement in the penitentiary for not less than one nor more than five years."

Other central provisions in the Virginia statutory scheme are ß20 57, which automatically voids all marriages between "a white person and a colored person" without any judicial proceeding, and ßß20 54 and 1 14 which, respectively, define "white persons" and "colored persons and Indians" for purposes of the statutory prohibitions. The Lovings have never disputed in the course of this litigation that Mrs. Loving is a "colored person" or that Mr. Loving is a "white person" within the meanings given those terms by the Virginia statutes.

Virginia is now one of 16 States which prohibit and punish marriages on the basis of racial classifications. Penalties for miscegenation arose as an incident to slavery and have been common in Virginia since the colonial period. The present statutory scheme dates from the adoption of the Racial Integrity Act of 1924, passed during the period of extreme nativism which followed the end of the First World War. The central features of this Act, and current Virginia law, are the absolute prohibition of a "white person" marrying other than another "white person," a prohibition against issuing marriage licenses until the issuing official is satisfied that the applicants' statements as to their race are correct, certificates of "racial composition" to be kept by both local and state registrars, and the carrying forward of earlier prohibitions against racial intermarriage.

◆ I

In upholding the constitutionality of these provisions in the decision below, the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia referred to its 1955 decision in Naim v. Naim, 197 Va. 80, 87 S.E. 2d 749, as stating the reasons supporting the validity of these laws. In Naim, the state court concluded that the State's legitimate purposes were "to preserve the racial integrity of its citizens," and to prevent "the corruption of blood," "a mongrel breed of citizens," and "the obliteration of racial pride," obviously an endorsement of the doctrine of White Supremacy. Id., at 90, 87 S.E. 2d, at 756. The court also reasoned that marriage has traditionally been subject to state regulation without federal intervention, and, consequently, the regulation of marriage should be left to exclusive state control by the Tenth Amendment.

While the state court is no doubt correct in asserting that marriage is a social relation subject to the State's police power, Maynard v. Hill, 125 U.S. 190 (1888), the State does not contend in its argument before this Court that its powers to regulate marriage are unlimited notwithstanding the commands of the Fourteenth Amendment. Nor could it do so in light of Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923), and Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942). Instead, the State argues that the meaning of the Equal Protection Clause, as illuminated by the statements of the Framers, is only that state penal laws containing an interracial element as part of the definition of the offense must apply equally to whites and Negroes in the sense that members of each race are punished to the same degree. Thus, the State contends that, because its miscegenation statutes punish equally both the white and the Negro participants in an interracial marriage, these statutes, despite their reliance on racial classifications, do not constitute an invidious discrimination based upon race. The second argument advanced by the State assumes the validity of its equal application theory. The argument is that, if the Equal Protection Clause does not outlaw miscegenation statutes because of their reliance on racial classifications, the question of constitutionality would thus become whether there was any rational basis for a State to treat interracial marriages differently from other marriages. On this question, the State argues, the scientific evidence is substantially in doubt and, consequently, this Court should defer to the wisdom of the state legislature in adopting its policy of discouraging interracial marriages.

Because we reject the notion that the mere "equal application" of a statute containing racial classifications is enough to remove the classifications from the Fourteenth Amendment's proscription of all invidious racial discriminations, we do not accept the State's contention that these statutes should be upheld if there is any possible basis for concluding that they serve a rational purpose. The mere fact of equal application does not mean that our analysis of these statutes should follow the approach we have taken in cases involving no racial discrimination where the Equal Protection Clause has been arrayed against a statute discriminating between the kinds of advertising which may be displayed on trucks in New York City, Railway Express Agency, Inc. v. New York, 336 U.S. 106 (1949), or an exemption in Ohio's ad valorem tax for merchandise owned by a nonresident in a storage warehouse, Allied Stores of Ohio, Inc. v. Bowers, 358 U.S. 522 (1959). In these cases, involving distinctions not drawn according to race, the Court has merely asked whether there is any rational foundation for the discriminations, and has deferred to the wisdom of the state legislatures. In the case at bar, however, we deal with statutes containing racial classifications, and the fact of equal application does not immunize the statute from the very heavy burden of justification which the Fourteenth Amendment has traditionally required of state statutes drawn according to race.

The State argues that statements in the Thirty-ninth Congress about the time of the passage of the Fourteenth Amendment indicate that the Framers did not intend the Amendment to make unconstitutional state miscegenation laws. Many of the statements alluded to by the State concern the debates over the Freedmen's Bureau Bill, which President Johnson vetoed, and the Civil Rights Act of 1866, 14 Stat. 27, enacted over his veto. While these statements have some relevance to the intention of Congress in submitting the Fourteenth Amendment, it must be understood that they pertained to the passage of specific statutes and not to the broader, organic purpose of a constitutional amendment. As for the various statements directly concerning the Fourteenth Amendment, we have said in connection with a related problem, that although these historical sources "cast some light" they are not sufficient to resolve the problem; "[a]t best, they are inconclusive. The most avid proponents of the post-War Amendments undoubtedly intended them to remove all legal distinctions among 'all persons born or naturalized in the United States.' Their opponents, just as certainly, were antagonistic to both the letter and the spirit of the Amendments and wished them to have the most limited effect." Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483, 489 (1954). See also Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U.S. 303, 310 (1880). We have rejected the proposition that the debates in the Thirty-ninth Congress or in the state legislatures which ratified the Fourteenth Amendment supported the theory advanced by the State, that the requirement of equal protection of the laws is satisfied by penal laws defining offenses based on racial classifications so long as white and Negro participants in the offense were similarly punished. McLaughlin v. Florida, 379 U.S. 184 (1964).

The State finds support for its "equal application" theory in the decision of the Court in Pace v. Alabama, 106 U.S. 583 (1883). In that case, the Court upheld a conviction under an Alabama statute forbidding adultery or fornication between a white person and a Negro which imposed a greater penalty than that of a statute proscribing similar conduct by members of the same race. The Court reasoned that the statute could not be said to discriminate against Negroes because the punishment for each participant in the offense was the same. However, as recently as the 1964 Term, in rejecting the reasoning of that case, we stated "Pace represents a limited view of the Equal Protection Clause which has not withstood analysis in the subsequent decisions of this Court." McLaughlin v. Florida, supra, at 188. As we there demonstrated, the Equal Protection Clause requires the consideration of whether the classifications drawn by any statute constitute an arbitrary and invidious discrimination. The clear and central purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment was to eliminate all official state sources of invidious racial discrimination in the States. Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 71 (1873); Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U.S. 303, 307 308 (1880); Ex parte Virginia, 100 U.S. 339, 344 345 (1880); Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1 (1948); Burton v. Wilmington Parking Authority, 365 U.S. 715 (1961).

There can be no question but that Virginia's miscegenation statutes rest solely upon distinctions drawn according to race. The statutes proscribe generally accepted conduct if engaged in by members of different races. Over the years, this Court has consistently repudiated "[d]istinctions between citizens solely because of their ancestry" as being "odious to a free people whose institutions are founded upon the doctrine of equality." Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S. 81, 100 (1943). At the very least, the Equal Protection Clause demands that racial classifications, especially suspect in criminal statutes, be subjected to the "most rigid scrutiny," Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214, 216 (1944), and, if they are ever to be upheld, they must be shown to be necessary to the accomplishment of some permissible state objective, independent of the racial discrimination which it was the object of the Fourteenth Amendment to eliminate. Indeed, two members of this Court have already stated that they "cannot conceive of a valid legislative purpose … which makes the color of a person's skin the test of whether his conduct is a criminal offense." McLaughlin v. Florida, supra, at 198 (Stewart, J., joined by Douglas, J., concurring).

There is patently no legitimate overriding purpose independent of invidious racial discrimination which justifies this classification. The fact that Virginia prohibits only interracial marriages involving white persons demonstrates that the racial classifications must stand on their own justification, as measures designed to maintain White Supremacy. We have consistently denied the constitutionality of measures which restrict the rights of citizens on account of race. There can be no doubt that restricting the freedom to marry solely because of racial classifications violates the central meaning of the Equal Protection Clause.

◆ II

These statutes also deprive the Lovings of liberty without due process of law in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The freedom to marry has long been recognized as one of the vital personal rights essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men.

Marriage is one of the "basic civil rights of man," fundamental to our very existence and survival. Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535, 541 (1942). See also Maynard v. Hill, 125 U.S. 190 (1888). To deny this fundamental freedom on so unsupportable a basis as the racial classifications embodied in these statutes, classifications so directly subversive of the principle of equality at the heart of the Fourteenth Amendment, is surely to deprive all the State's citizens of liberty without due process of law. The Fourteenth Amendment requires that the freedom of choice to marry not be restricted by invidious racial discriminations. Under our Constitution, the freedom to marry, or not marry, a person of another race resides with the individual and cannot be infringed by the State.

These convictions must be reversed.

It is so ordered.

Kerner Commission Report Summary

1968

"Our nation is moving toward two societies, one black, one white separate and unequal."

Overview

There have been many presidential commissions, but few have been more famous or more controversial than the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, popularly known as the Kerner Commission. Appointed by President Lyndon B. Johnson in July 1967, as a series of deadly riots convulsed African American neighborhoods in many U.S. cities, the commission had the task of explaining why the violence was occurring and what to do about it. Johnson was a strong supporter of black rights and a champion of social reform to help the poor and minorities. The Kerner Commission proposed many reforms to augment the Johnson administration's efforts, but the president was cool to the recommendations because the Vietnam War had become so expensive that the country could no longer afford costly new social programs. In addition, the president worried that the commission's report, which asserted that white racism was the primary cause of inner-city problems, would alienate white, middle-class support for the programs it proposed. As a result, even though the Kerner Commission stated that racial problems were about to fracture American society, many of its recommendations went unheeded.

Context

During the Johnson presidency (1963 1969), Americans experienced several summers of racial strife. Most people called these civil disturbances "riots" frightening eruptions of violence that ended only when the police, the National Guard, or even U.S. Army troops restored order. Some people considered them rebellions uprisings against discriminatory institutions and practices that were forcing millions of African Americans in inner cities to endure poverty and second-class citizenship. Whatever one termed these disturbances, they were destructive, deadly, and common. During the summer of 1967 alone, 136 civil disturbances took place in all parts of the country.

These disturbances surprised, puzzled, and even outraged Johnson because of the notable advances in civil rights that had preceded them. The civil rights movement had achieved its greatest victories just as violence was beginning to plague America's cities. Tens of thousands of courageous citizens took enormous risks to protest against the racial segregation that prevented African Americans from voting, securing decent employment, buying or renting housing in many communities, and attending all-white schools. This grassroots movement for racial justice had many leaders, but the most prominent was Martin Luther King, Jr., who inspired blacks and whites alike with his commitment to using nonviolent action to achieve his dream of a harmonious, color-blind society. Johnson supported racial integration, and in July 1964 he signed the Civil Rights Act, which outlawed racial discrimination in public accommodations, such as restaurants and movie theaters, and in employment. A year later, he signed the Voting Rights Act, which gave the federal government new power to prevent states and localities from denying people of color the right to register to vote.

Eliminating racial injustice was an important step toward the creation of the Great Society, an ambitious effort, as Johnson explained, "to enrich and elevate our national life." A thriving national economy, popular confidence in federal efforts to improve American society, and large Democratic majorities in Congress gave Johnson, a Democrat, an unusual opportunity to secure the passage of one of the most remarkable programs of social reform in U.S. history. In 1964 and 1965 Congress approved many new Great Society initiatives that Johnson thought would benefit all Americans, including a War on Poverty, aid for elementary and secondary schools as well as colleges and universities, Medicare for senior citizens, and a Model Cities program to revitalize inner cities and improve housing.

Only five days after the president signed the 1965 Voting Rights Act, one of the worst racial disturbances in U.S. history began in Los Angeles in the predominantly African American neighborhood of Watts. On August 11, 1965, a small event a white police officer's arrest of an African American driver for a traffic violation triggered a huge explosion of violence. Over the course of six days, thirty-four people died, and $45 million worth of property was damaged. The arson, looting, and killing in Watts stunned President Johnson and millions of other Americans. "How is it possible after all we've accomplished?" he wondered. "How could it be?"

Part of the answer, according to a new group of black leaders, was that the Great Society programs provided too little too late. Stokely Carmichael (later known as Kwame Ture) gained prominence in 1966 by calling for Black Power, a slogan with many possible meanings, including racial pride, self-reliance, and unity. Yet Black Power also suggested a new militancy; as Carmichael declared, "I'm not going to beg the white man for anything I deserve; I'm going to take it." For Huey Newton and Bobby Seale, who established the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense in 1966, Black Power meant revolutionary action. Newton and Seale even carried guns in public to show that they rejected nonviolent protest in favor of self-defense. These new, aggressive leaders said that civil rights and voting rights legislation and Great Society reforms had not changed the basic conditions of life for the millions of African Americans who lived in segregated inner-city neighborhoods where poverty was pervasive, job opportunities were limited, and municipal services were ineffective and unreliable. They also had grown tired of waiting for change. Some even advocated separatism; they said that African Americans should not make integration their goal but should instead establish separate communities and institutions.

The rising racial tensions divided the American people. Many whites, alarmed by what they considered the disintegration of law and order, blamed Black Power advocates for violence in the streets. Great Society programs became increasingly controversial, as conservatives charged that they were wasteful and ineffective or provided benefits to militants who defied the law. Liberals also attacked Johnson because they thought that the president's commitment to the expanding and costly war in Vietnam was draining funds from the War on Poverty and other Great Society programs. King declared regretfully, "The promises of the Great Society have been shot down on the battlefield of Vietnam." Radical black leaders offered even more scathing criticism, as they alleged that the Great Society was just another example of tokenism rather than a genuine effort to eliminate poverty and racism.

America's inner cities erupted once more during the summer of 1967. In June violence flared in Tampa, Florida; Cincinnati, Ohio; and Atlanta, Georgia. On July 12, after six days of gunfire, arson, and street violence, a major disorder left twenty-three dead in Newark, New Jersey. The worst disturbance occurred in Detroit, Michigan, beginning on July 23. Once again a small incident a raid on an illegal drinking establishment known as a "blind pig" started a wave of violence that resulted in forty-three deaths. To quell this disturbance, Johnson ordered U.S. Army troops, some of whom had served in Vietnam, to Detroit.

On July 27, as the violence in Detroit ended, President Johnson delivered an address to the American people. He condemned the lawlessness that had devastated Detroit and other cities and stated bluntly that "looting, arson, plunder, and pillage" had nothing to do with the quest for civil rights. Yet while he called for those who had committed these crimes to be brought to justice, he asserted that "the only genuine, long-range solution" to the problem of civil disorders was "an attack … upon the conditions that breed despair and violence …: ignorance, discrimination, slums, poverty, disease, not enough jobs." He also announced the appointment of a special National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, made up of eleven members led by the Democratic Illinois governor Otto Kerner and the Republican New York City mayor John Lindsay, to determine the causes of the riots and what to do to prevent new ones. People commonly called this group the Kerner Commission.

About the Author

No single individual wrote the Kerner Commission Report. The document was the product of a collective effort that included dozens of staff assistants as well as the eleven members of the committee. The chair of the commission was Otto Kerner, and the vice chair was John Lindsay.

Otto Kerner, Jr., was born in Chicago on August 15, 1908; graduated from Brown University in 1930; and earned a law degree from Northwestern University in 1934. His father was a prominent lawyer who had served as attorney general of Illinois. Kerner started working for his father's law firm in 1934, the same year he married Helena Cermak Kenlay, the daughter of the late Democratic mayor of Chicago, Anton Cermak. Political connections helped Kerner secure an appointment in 1947 as U.S. attorney for the Northern District of Illinois. After twice being elected as a circuit court judge in Cook County (which includes Chicago) during the 1950s, Kerner won the governorship of Illinois as a Democrat in 1960. He proved popular with voters, gaining reelection in 1964. Illinois experienced strong economic growth while Kerner was in the statehouse, and he championed many reforms, including increased state aid to education and an improved mental health program. Kerner resigned as governor in May 1968 after President Johnson nominated him to serve on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit. In 1973, he was convicted on corruption charges for providing political favors when he was governor in return for financial benefits. He served eight months in jail and died not long after, on May 9, 1976.

John Vliet Lindsay was born on November 24, 1921, in New York City into a prosperous family. He graduated from Yale University in 1944, served in the U.S. Navy during World War II, and earned a degree from Yale Law School in 1948. Running as a Republican in 1958, he won the first of four terms in the House of Representatives from a district in Manhattan. In Congress, he earned a reputation as a liberal reformer. In 1965 he was elected mayor of New York City, and he won a second term four years later. He was sensitive to the concerns of African Americans and Hispanics but lost the support of many white, middle-class voters because of rising welfare costs and the increasing crime rate. In 1971 he became a Democrat, and he made an unsuccessful bid for that party's presidential nomination in 1972. After he left the mayor's office in 1973, he practiced law. He died on December 19, 2000.

The Kerner Commission had nine other members. I. W. Abel was the president of the United Steelworkers of America and a strong supporter of civil rights. Edward Brooke, a Republican senator from Massachusetts, was the first African American to be elected to the Senate since Reconstruction. James C. Corman was a Democratic member of the House from California who helped secure the passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Fred R. Harris, a Democratic senator from Oklahoma, was known for his support of civil rights and Indian rights. Herbert Jenkins was the police chief of Atlanta, serving longer than any previous occupant of the position. William M. McCulloch was a Republican member of the House who was conservative on most issues but a supporter of the Civil Rights Act and the Voting Rights Act. Katherine Graham Peden was Kentucky's commissioner of commerce and had also served on the President's Commission on the Status of Women from 1961 to 1963. Charles B. Thornton was one of the founders of Litton Industries and its chief executive officer. Roy Wilkins was the executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and a critic of the Black Power movement who believed that the best way to advance African American interests was through legal and political action.

◆ "Introduction"

The introduction quickly sets the tone for the summary of the Kerner Commission Report: It is blunt, direct, and unsettling. After a few preliminary sentences, the commissioners state their basic conclusion in stark and alarming language: "Our nation is moving toward two societies, one black, one white separate and unequal." By placing this finding so early in the report, the commissioners call attention to the gravity and urgency of America's racial problems. They later emphasize that they completed the report four months before the deadline. The speed with which they performed the work underlined their belief that there was "no higher priority for national action and no higher claim on the nation's conscience" than addressing the issues causing the violent disturbances in America's cities. The commissioners also wanted to finish the study as quickly as possible so that it might help in formulating policies that could head off another "long, hot summer" in 1968.

Dealing with the problem of civil disorders, however, would require confronting some unpleasant truths, the commissioners believed. For many whites in comfortable suburbs, small towns, and rural communities, the problems of predominantly black inner cities seemed remote, the product of circumstances for which they bore no responsibility and in which they may have had little interest. The Kerner Commission challenged that outlook, asserting in the report, "What white Americans have never fully understood but what the Negro can never forget is that white society is deeply implicated in the ghetto." Preventing new explosions of violence would require more than effective law enforcement or new programs to alleviate poverty or teach job skills. What would also be necessary on the part of "every American" were "new attitudes, new understanding, and, above all, new will." The report establishes at the outset that the riots of the 1960s were not an urban problem or a black problem but a national problem of the greatest magnitude and urgency.

◆ "Part I—What Happened?"

This section of the report summary provides brief accounts of the disturbances in several cities during the summer of 1967. The Kerner Commission Report moves beyond the details of each disorder, however, to find patterns in the violence. While there was no "'typical' riot," the instances of disorder shared some important common characteristics. The central conclusion of this section of the report is that the civil disorders involved "Negroes acting against local symbols of white American society, authority, and property in Negro neighborhoods rather than against white persons." Especially powerful were grievances about police practices, lack of employment, and poor housing.

The Kerner Commission found no evidence to support the widespread belief that inner-city disturbances were the result of a domestic or foreign plot. J. Edgar Hoover, the director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, thought that Communists were somehow involved in the violence. Hoover was extremely suspicious of black leaders, including mainstream advocates of civil rights like Martin Luther King, Jr. Hoover insisted that King took advice from Communists and was so convinced that King was a dangerous radical that he even carried on a secret campaign to destroy King's reputation. Hoover also thought that Black Power advocates were treacherous enemies of law and order. Some did espouse Socialist principles or urge African Americans to rise up against white oppression. Nonetheless, the Kerner Commission looked carefully at many sources of information, including Federal Bureau of Investigation documents, and found no proof that any group or individuals had planned the inner-city violence. Conspiracy did not explain the turbulent summer of 1967. Rather, a combination of national problems and local conditions produced an inflammatory mixture that ignited in dozens of American cities.

◆ "Part II—Why Did It Happen?"

Explaining the historical roots of the racial problems of the 1960s is the goal of the next part of the report. The commissioners assert that white racism was the most fundamental reason for the "explosive mixture" in American cities. In this section of the report, as in the introduction, the most important finding appears near the beginning. Once more, the conclusion is alarming and unsettling, especially for white readers.

The report uses history to explain that the development of large, segregated communities in urban areas commonly called "ghettos" in the 1960s was a fairly recent phenomenon. In 1910, 91 percent of the nation's black population lived in the South. Black migration out of the South accelerated during World War I and increased even more during World War II, as the growth of defense industries created job opportunities in northern factories. The movement to northern cities continued when peace came in 1945, in part because the mechanization of southern agriculture reduced the demand for farm labor. By the time the Kerner Commission was established, about 45 percent of African Americans lived outside the South, mainly in central cities. During the 1950s and 1960s, cities like Detroit, Chicago, Cleveland, and Philadelphia became increasingly black, since most of the growth in white population during those decades was in suburbs. "White exodus" increased the proportion of African Americans in these cities and in certain neighborhoods within them. Discriminatory practices, including unwillingness among owners to rent or sell housing to blacks in some areas and among banks to make home loans to qualified black buyers who wished to move into predominantly white neighborhoods, confined the bulk of the black population to segregated inner city districts or ghettos.

Deprivation combined with segregation to create bitterness and resentment that could eventually lead to explosive violence. Conditions of life in many inner cities were horrendous. The report provides statistical measures of the pervasiveness of poverty and the severity of unemployment and underemployment. Blacks were almost four times more likely than whites to live in poverty and more than twice as likely to be unemployed. A nonwhite baby had a 58 percent greater chance than a white baby of dying during the first month of life. Far more frequently than other Americans, inner city residents became victims of crime or unfair commercial or financial practices, such as high food prices and credit scams.

African Americans endured these deplorable conditions of life while the economy was thriving and while more and more people were achieving the American dream of success and prosperity. Inner city residents heard government officials praise the achievements of the civil rights movement, the advances in desegregation, and the progress in making equality of opportunity a reality for all Americans. The report explains how this combination of rising expectations and frustrated hopes produced intense, widespread bitterness.

Disillusionment and alienation, according to the Kerner Commission, led some African Americans to embrace Black Power in the hope of advancing racial unity and achieving independent economic and political power. The report provides a scathing critique of those who thought Black Power should lead to separatism. Their ideas were not really new, the commissioners maintain, but echoed those of the late-nineteenth-century African American leader Booker T. Washington. The comparison to Washington was devastating. Washington had urged blacks not to challenge segregation but instead to concentrate on economic self-improvement. In a similar manner, black separatists of the 1960s, according to the report, backed away from confronting white racism by not demanding further integration.

At the end of this section, the commissioners address a common question: Why was it more difficult for African Americans than for European immigrants "to escape from the ghetto and from poverty?" The report offers several reasons, but especially important is the assertion that Europeans never faced as intense and widespread discrimination as did blacks.

◆ "Part III—What Can Be Done?"

The Kerner Commission studied a severe national problem, but their recommendations for dealing with it begin with local action. Many suggestions concern improving communication so that inner city problems would not go neglected until they led to violence. The commissioners deem especially important the bettering of police-community relations so as to strengthen law enforcement, avoid the "indiscriminate and excessive use of force," and prevent incidents like those that had occurred in Detroit from trigger-ing civil disturbance. They also consider necessary changes in local court systems, which suffered from "long-standing structural deficiencies," and the preparation of emergency plans, formulated with "broad community participation," to deal with civil disturbances.

The report warns that the future of many large cities with growing African American populations is "grim" and that a continuation of current policies would have "ominous consequences for our society." To do nothing different would "make permanent the division" between a predominantly black and poor society in inner cities and a white and affluent society concentrated in suburbs. The report asserts that integration is essential; that new programs must help blacks move out of inner cities; and that the most important goal "must be a single society, in which every citizen will be free to live and work according to his capabilities and desires, not his color."

Specific proposals for federal action concentrate on employment, education, the welfare system, and housing. The commissioners urge "immediate action" to create two million new jobs over the coming three years and to eliminate racial barriers in hiring and promotion. Also considered essential are dramatic efforts to improve education, including federal action to eliminate segregation in schools and increased aid for new and better programs serving disadvantaged students. The commissioners recommend substantial reforms in the welfare system, including increased federal funds to raise benefits in the short term and the creation of a new system of income supplementation over the long term. Changes in housing programs are also held to be crucial because existing federal efforts had done "comparatively little" to help the disadvantaged. Especially important would be the passage of a federal open housing law, to ban discrimination in the sale or rental of housing on account of race, and new efforts to build more low-income housing outside predominantly black inner cities.

The Kerner Commission concludes its report by reiterating that Americans could not continue to delay in confronting these pressing problems. The commissioners admit that they have "uncovered no startling truths, no unique insights"; as the distinguished and perceptive scholar Kenneth Clark pointed out, investigations after earlier riots had produced similar analyses and similar recommendations. Those previous studies had produced few, if any changes, however, and the Kerner Commission warns of the dangers of inaction yet again. Improving conditions in inner cities would be expensive and require "national action on an unprecedented scale." Just as important as money would be the need "to generate new will." Only such a widespread and wholehearted commitment, the commission concludes, could "end the destruction and the violence, not only in the streets … but in the lives of people."

Audience

In the body of their report, the commissioners explain that they address their study to the institutions of government. They hoped that their analysis and recommendations would help the president and Congress take action to deal with the problems contributing to civil disturbances. They were also writing for local and state officials those who made policies and provided funding for schools, police, welfare programs, and other social services that had such profound effects on the lives of inner city residents.

The audience, however, was far larger than government officials. The Kerner Commission hoped to touch "the conscience of the nation" and "the minds and hearts of each citizen." The increasing racial polarization of the 1960s affected all Americans; only a national commitment to alleviate the underlying causes could reverse the trend. The commissioners declare in their report, "The responsibility for decisive action, never more clearly demanded in the history of our country, rests on all of us."

Impact

The report of the Kerner Commission produced strong but divided reactions. The New York Times (March 2, 1968) praised it for making a powerful case for "escalation of the war against poverty and discrimination at home." The Washington Star (as quoted in the New York Times, March 10, 1968), however, complained that the report "does not put as much emphasis on forthrightly condemning riots and rioters as it does on offering excuses for them." Seven mayors whose cities had experienced civil disturbances endorsed the commission's recommendations. Richard Nixon, who was campaigning for the Republican nomination for president, reached the opposite conclusion and declared that the commission's report "blames everybody for the riots except the rioters."

President Johnson at first made no public comment. In private, he was angry because he thought that the report gave insufficient credit to his administration for its many efforts to end discrimination and alleviate poverty. Nonetheless, the president agreed that social and economic deprivation created the conditions for urban violence, and he knew that the Great Society, however ambitious, had by no means done enough to prevent another riot-filled summer. He also worried that the emphasis on white racism would undermine the support of middle-class and working-class white Americans for essential social reforms. An even bigger obstacle to new social programs was the rising cost of the Vietnam War, in which more than five hundred thousand Americans were engaged in battle by early 1968. The Kerner Commission Report did not state the costs of the programs it proposed. The White House estimated that $75 $100 billion would be needed over several years to implement the commission's recommendations, at a time when the entire federal budget was about $180 billion. Even with a tax increase, which the president approved in June 1968, Congress was determined to reduce new expenditures to cut the federal deficit.

Johnson did persuade Congress to approve two important new reforms. On April 11, the president signed the new

Civil Rights Act of 1968, which banned racial discrimination in the sale and rental of most of the nation's housing. Johnson had proposed the legislation even before the Kerner Commission endorsed that reform in its report. Still, only after another national tragedy the assassination of Martin Luther King, Jr., on April 4, 1968, and rioting in more than one hundred cities did the House of Representatives pass the measure. On August 1, a new housing program became law, one that authorized funds to build or renovate 1.7 million housing units and also provided mortgage assistance to low-income families who wanted to buy their own homes.

On several occasions over the next thirty years, study groups reviewed the nation's progress in dealing with the problems of inner cities and reached pessimistic conclusions. The first assessment occurred only a year after the Kerner Commission Report and concluded that "the nation has not reversed the movement apart. Blacks and whites remain deeply divided." Twenty years afterward, the 1988 Commission on the Cities, a nongovernmental group of experts that included the Kerner Commission member Fred Harris, warned that America "is again becoming two separate societies," one white, one black and Hispanic. Ten years later, the Milton S. Eisenhower Foundation sponsored another look back at the Kerner Commission. This study concluded that a greater percentage of Americans lived in poverty in 1998 than in 1968 and that "inner cities have become America's poorhouses from which many, now, have little hope of escape." These different assessments seemed to confirm what Kenneth Clark had told the Kerner Commission about efforts to improve the conditions of life in inner cities: "the same analysis, the same recommendations, and the same inaction."

Questions for Further Study

1. The Kerner Commission issued a controversial report about a difficult and divisive subject. Explain how each of the following persons probably would have reacted to the report's analysis and conclusions: an African American female living below the poverty line in the inner city, a white male working-class laborer living in the same city as the African American female, a white liberal Democrat female in a northern city who supported the civil rights movement and had voted for Lyndon Johnson in 1964, and a male Black Power advocate living in the inner city. Be sure to explain which of the report's main conclusions or recommendations each would have approved and which ones each would have criticized and why.

2. Although the Kerner Commission proposed many new government programs and policies, it also maintained that "new attitudes" were necessary on the part of every American. What new attitudes do you think were required? How important were changes in outlook, thinking, or attitude in resolving the problems of poverty and racism?

3. Many years have passed since the Kerner Commission issued its report and warned that America was moving toward two separate societies divided by race. Do you think that America today still faces that danger? How would you compare fundamental conditions of life in inner cities now and in the 1960s? What improvements have occurred? What problems remain? Have conditions in inner cities deteriorated?

4. Americans continue to differ over how to deal with poverty, racism, discrimination, and inequality. Discuss your views about the role of each of the following in dealing with these issues: individual responsibility; family; community organizations; local government; the news media; the federal government; social activists.

Kerner Commission Report Summary

Introduction

The summer of 1967 again brought racial disorders to American cities, and with them shock, fear and bewilderment to the nation.

The worst came during a two-week period in July, first in Newark and then in Detroit. Each set off a chain reaction in neighboring communities.

On July 28, 1967, the President of the United States established this Commission and directed us to answer three basic questions:

What happened?

Why did it happen?

What can be done to prevent it from happening again?

To respond to these questions, we have undertaken a broad range of studies and investigations. We have visited the riot cities; we have heard many witnesses; we have sought the counsel of experts across the country.

This is our basic conclusion: Our nation is moving toward two societies, one black, one white separate and unequal.

Reaction to last summer's disorders has quickened the movement and deepened the division. Discrimination and segregation have long permeated much of American life; they now threaten the future of every American.

This deepening racial division is not inevitable. The movement apart can be reversed. Choice is still possible. Our principal task is to define that choice and to press for a national resolution.

To pursue our present course will involve the continuing polarization of the American community and, ultimately, the destruction of basic democratic values.

The alternative is not blind repression or capitulation to lawlessness. It is the realization of common opportunities for all within a single society.

This alternative will require a commitment to national action compassionate, massive and sustained, backed by the resources of the most powerful and the richest nation on this earth. From every American it will require new attitudes, new understanding, and, above all, new will.

The vital needs of the nation must be met; hard choices must be made, and, if necessary, new taxes enacted.

Violence cannot build a better society. Disruption and disorder nourish repression, not justice. They strike at the freedom of every citizen. The community cannot it will not tolerate coercion and mob rule.

Violence and destruction must be ended in the streets of the ghetto and in the lives of people.

Segregation and poverty have created in the racial ghetto a destructive environment totally unknown to most white Americans.

What white Americans have never fully understood but what the Negro can never forget is that white society is deeply implicated in the ghetto. White institutions created it, white institutions maintain it, and white society condones it.

It is time now to turn with all the purpose at our command to the major unfinished business of this nation. It is time to adopt strategies for action that will produce quick and visible progress. It is time to make good the promises of American democracy to all citizens urban and rural, white and black, Spanish-surname, American Indian, and every minority group.

Our recommendations embrace three basic principles:

To mount programs on a scale equal to the dimension of the problems:

To aim these programs for high impact in the immediate future in order to close the gap between promise and performance;

To undertake new initiatives and experiments that can change the system of failure and frustration that now dominates the ghetto and weakens our society.

These programs will require unprecedented levels of funding and performance, but they neither probe deeper nor demand more than the problems which called them forth. There can be no higher priority for national action and no higher claim on the nation's conscience.

We issue this Report now, four months before the date called for by the President. Much remains that can be learned. Continued study is essential.

As Commissioners we have worked together with a sense of the greatest urgency and have sought to compose whatever differences exist among us. Some differences remain. But the gravity of the problem and the pressing need for action are too clear to allow further delay in the issuance of this Report.

Part I—What Happened?

Chapter I Profiles of Disorder

The report contains profiles of a selection of the disorders that took place during the summer of 1967. These profiles are designed to indicate how the disorders happened, who participated in them, and how local officials, police forces, and the National Guard responded. Illustrative excerpts follow:

Newark

… It was decided to attempt to channel the energies of the people into a nonviolent protest. While Lofton promised the crowd that a full investigation would be made of the Smith incident, the other Negro leaders began urging those on the scene to form a line of march toward the city hall.

Some persons joined the line of march. Others milled about in the narrow street. From the dark grounds of the housing project came a barrage of rocks. Some of them fell among the crowd. Others hit persons in the line of march. Many smashed the windows of the police station. The rock throwing, it was believed, was the work of youngsters; approximately 2,500 children lived in the housing project.

Almost at the same time, an old car was set afire in a parking lot. The line of march began to disintegrate. The police, their heads protected by World War I-type helmets, sallied forth to disperse the crowd. A fire engine, arriving on the scene, was pelted with rocks. As police drove people away from the station, they scattered in all directions.

A few minutes later a nearby liquor store was broken into. Some persons, seeing a caravan of cabs appear at city hall to protest Smith's arrest, interpreted this as evidence that the disturbance had been organized, and generated rumors to that effect. However, only a few stores were looted. Within a short period of time, the disorder appeared to have run its course.

… On Saturday, July 15, [Director of Police Dominick] Spina received a report of snipers in a housing project. When he arrived he saw approximately 100 National Guardsmen and police officers crouching behind vehicles, hiding in corners and lying on the ground around the edge of the courtyard.

Since everything appeared quiet and it was broad daylight, Spina walked directly down the middle of the street. Nothing happened. As he came to the last building of the complex, he heard a shot. All around him the troopers jumped, believing themselves to be under sniper fire. A moment later a young Guardsman ran from behind a building.

The Director of Police went over and asked him if he had fired the shot. The soldier said yes, he had fired to scare a man away from a window; that his orders were to keep everyone away from windows.

Spina said he told the soldier: "Do you know what you just did? You have now created a state of hysteria. Every Guardsman up and down this street and every state policeman and every city policeman that is present thinks that somebody just fired a shot and that it is probably a sniper."

A short time later more "gunshots" were heard. Investigating, Spina came upon a Puerto Rican sitting on a wall. In reply to a question as to whether he knew "where the firing is coming from?" the man said:

"That's no firing. That's fireworks. If you look up to the fourth floor, you will see the people who are throwing down these cherry bombs."

By this time four truckloads of National Guardsmen had arrived and troopers and policemen were again crouched everywhere looking for a sniper. The Director of Police remained at the scene for three hours, and the only shot fired was the one by the Guardsman.

Nevertheless, at six o'clock that evening two columns of National Guardsmen and state troopers were directing mass fire at the Hayes Housing Project in response to what they believed were snipers….

Detroit

… A spirit of carefree nihilism was taking hold. To riot and destroy appeared more and more to become ends in themselves. Late Sunday afternoon it appeared to one observer that the young people were "dancing amidst the flames."

A Negro plainclothes officer was standing at an intersection when a man threw a Molotov cocktail into a business establishment at the corner.… In the heat of the afternoon, fanned by the 20 to 25 m.p.h. winds of both Sunday and Monday, the fire reached the home next door within minutes. As residents uselessly sprayed the flames with garden hoses, the fire jumped from roof to roof of adjacent two- and three-story buildings. Within the hour the entire block was in flames. The ninth house in the burning row belonged to the arsonist who had thrown the Molotov cocktail….

… Employed as a private guard, 55-year-old Julius L. Dorsey, a Negro, was standing in front of a market when accosted by two Negro men and a woman.

Document Text

They demanded he permit them to loot the market. He ignored their demands. They began to berate him. He asked a neighbor to call the police. As the argument grew more heated, Dorsey fired three shots from his pistol into the air.

The police radio reported: "Looters, they have rifles." A patrol car driven by a police officer and carrying three National Guardsmen arrived. As the looters fled, the law enforcement personnel opened fire. When the firing ceased, one person lay dead.

He was Julius L. Dorsey…

… As the riot alternately waxed and waned, one area of the ghetto remained insulated. On the northeast side the residents of some 150 square blocks inhabited by 21,000 persons had, in 1966, banded together in the Positive Neighborhood Action Committee (PNAC). With professional help from the Institute of Urban Dynamics, they had organized block clubs and made plans for the improvement of the neighborhood….

When the riot broke out, the residents, through the block clubs, were able to organize quickly. Youngsters, agreeing to stay in the neighborhood, participated in detouring traffic. While many persons reportedly sympathized with the idea of a rebellion against the "system," only two small fires were set one in an empty building.

… According to Lt. Gen. Throckmorton and Col. Bolling, the city, at this time, was saturated with fear. The National Guardsmen were afraid, the residents were afraid, and the police were afraid. Numerous persons, the majority of them Negroes, were being injured by gunshots of undetermined origin. The general and his staff felt that the major task of the troops was to reduce the fear and restore an air of normalcy.

In order to accomplish this, every effort was made to establish contact and rapport between the troops and the residents. The soldiers 20 percent of whom were Negro began helping to clean up the streets, collect garbage, and trace persons who had disappeared in the confusion. Residents in the neighborhoods responded with soup and sandwiches for the troops. In areas where the National Guard tried to establish rapport with the citizens, there was a smaller response.

New Brunswick

… A short time later, elements of the crowd an older and rougher one than the night before appeared in front of the police station. The participants wanted to see the mayor.

Mayor [Patricia] Sheehan went out onto the steps of the station. Using a bullhorn, she talked to the people and asked that she be given an opportunity to correct conditions. The crowd was boisterous. Some persons challenged the mayor. But, finally, the opinion, "She's new! Give her a chance!" prevailed.

A demand was issued by people in the crowd that all persons arrested the previous night be released. Told that this already had been done, the people were suspicious. They asked to be allowed to inspect the jail cells.

It was agreed to permit representatives of the people to look in the cells to satisfy themselves that everyone had been released.

The crowd dispersed. The New Brunswick riot had failed to materialize….

Chapter 2 Patterns of Disorder

The "typical" riot did not take place. The disorders of 1967 were unusual, irregular, complex and unpredictable social processes. Like most human events, they did not unfold in an orderly sequence. However, an analysis of our survey information leads to some conclusions about the riot process. In general:

- The civil disorders of 1967 involved Negroes acting against local symbols of white American society, authority and property in Negro neighborhoods rather than against white persons.
- Of 164 disorders reported during the first nine months of 1967, eight (5 percent) were major in terms of violence and damage; 33 (20 percent) were serious but not major; 123 (75 percent) were minor and undoubtedly would not have received national attention as "riots" had the nation not been sensitized by the more serious outbreaks.
- In the 75 disorders studied by a Senate subcommittee, 83 deaths were reported. Eighty-two percent of the deaths and more than half the injuries occurred in Newark and Detroit. About 10 percent of the dead and 38 percent of the injured were public employees, primarily law officers and firemen. The overwhelming majority of the persons killed or injured in all the disorders were Negro civilians.
- Initial damage estimates were greatly exaggerated. In Detroit, newspaper damage estimates at first ranged from $200 million to $500 million; the highest recent estimate is $45 million. In Newark, early estimates ranged from $15 to $25 million. A month later damage was estimated at $10.2 million, over 80 percent in inventory losses.

In the 24 disorders in 23 cities which we surveyed:

• The final incident before the outbreak of disorder, and the initial violence itself, generally took place in the evening or at night at a place in which it was normal for many people to be on the streets.

• Violence usually occurred almost immediately following the occurrence of the final precipitating incident, and then escalated rapidly. With but few exceptions, violence subsided during the day, and flared rapidly again at night. The night-day cycles continued through the early period of the major disorders.

• Disorder generally began with rock and bottle throwing and window breaking. Once store windows were broken, looting usually followed.

• Disorder did not erupt as a result of a single "triggering" or "precipitating" incident. Instead, it was generated out of an increasingly disturbed social atmosphere, in which typically a series of tension-heightening incidents over a period of weeks or months became linked in the minds of many in the Negro community with a reservoir of underlying grievances. At some point in the mounting tension, a further incident in itself often routine or trivial- became the breaking point and the tension spilled over into violence.

• "Prior" incidents, which increased tensions and ultimately led to violence, were police actions in almost half the cases; police actions were "final" incidents before the outbreak of violence in 12 of the 24 surveyed disorders.

• No particular control tactic was successful in every situation. The varied effectiveness of control techniques emphasizes the need for advance training, planning, adequate intelligence systems, and knowledge of the ghetto community.

• Negotiations between Negroes including your militants as well as older Negro leaders and white officials concerning "terms of peace" occurred during virtually all the disorders surveyed. In many cases, these negotiations involved discussion of underlying grievances as well as the handling of the disorder by control authorities.

• The typical rioter was a teenager or young adult, a lifelong resident of the city in which he rioted, a high school dropout; he was, nevertheless, somewhat better educated than his nonrioting Negro neighbor, and was usually underemployed or employed in a menial job. He was proud of his race, extremely hostile to both whites and middle-class Negroes and, although informed about politics, highly distrustful of the political system.

• A Detroit survey revealed that approximately 11 percent of the total residents of two riot areas admitted participation in the rioting, 20 to 25 percent identified themselves as "bystanders," over 16 percent identified themselves as "counter-rioters" who urged rioters to "cool it," and the remaining 48 to 53 percent said they were at home or elsewhere and did not participate. In a survey of Negro males between the ages of 15 and 35 residing in the disturbance area in Newark, about 45 percent identified themselves as rioters, and about 55 percent as "noninvolved."

• Most rioters were young Negro males. Nearly 53 percent of arrestees were between 15 and 24 years of age; nearly 81 percent between 15 and 35.

• In Detroit and Newark about 74 percent of the rioters were brought up in the North. In contrast, of the noninvolved, 36 percent in Detroit and 52 percent in Newark were brought up in the North.

• What the rioters appeared to be seeking was fuller participation in the social order and the material benefits enjoyed by the majority of American citizens. Rather than rejecting the American system, they were anxious to obtain a place for themselves in it.

• Numerous Negro counter-rioters walked the streets urging rioters to "cool it." The typical counter-rioter was better educated and had higher income than either the rioter or the noninvolved.

• The proportion of Negroes in local government was substantially smaller than the Negro proportion of population. Only three of the 20 cities studied had more than one Negro legislator; none had ever had a Negro mayor or city manager. In only four cities did Negroes hold other important policy-making positions or serve as heads of municipal departments.

• Although almost all cities had some sort of formal grievance mechanism for handling citizen complaints, this typically was regarded by Negroes as ineffective and was generally ignored.

• Although specific grievances varied from city to city, at least 12 deeply held grievances can be identified and ranked into three levels of relative intensity: '

First Level of Intensity

1. Police practices
2. Unemployment and underemployment
3. Inadequate housing

Second Level of Intensity

4. Inadequate education
5. Poor recreation facilities and programs
6. Ineffectiveness of the political structure and grievance mechanisms

Third Level of Intensity

7. Disrespectful white attitudes

8. Discriminatory administration of justice
9. Inadequacy of federal programs
10. Inadequacy of municipal services
11. Discriminatory consumer and credit practices
12. Inadequate welfare programs

• The results of a three-city survey of various federal programs manpower, education, housing, welfare and community action indicate that, despite substantial expenditures, the number of persons assisted constituted only a fraction of those in need.

The background of disorder is often as complex and difficult to analyze as the disorder itself. But we find that certain general conclusions can be drawn:

• Social and economic conditions in the riot cities constituted a clear pattern of severe disadvantage for Negroes compared with whites, whether the Negroes lived in the area where the riot took place or outside it. Negroes had completed fewer years of education and fewer had attended high school. Negroes were twice as likely to be unemployed and three times as likely to be in unskilled and service jobs. Negroes averaged 70 percent of the income earned by whites and were more than twice as likely to be living in poverty. Although housing cost Negroes relatively more, they had worse housing three times as likely to be overcrowded and substandard. When compared to white suburbs, the relative disadvantage is even more pronounced.

A study of the aftermath of disorder leads to disturbing conclusions. We find that, despite the institution of some postriot programs:

• Little basic change in the conditions underlying the outbreak of disorder has taken place. Actions to ameliorate Negro grievances have been limited and sporadic; with but few exceptions, they have not significantly reduced tensions.

• In several cities, the principal official response has been to train and equip the police with more sophisticated weapons. In several cities, increasing polarization is evident, with continuing breakdown of inter-racial communication, and growth of white segregationist or black separatist groups.

Chapter 3 Organized Activity

The President directed the Commission to investigate "to, what extent, if any, there has been planning or organization in any of the riots."

To carry out this part of the President's charge, the Commission established a special investigative staff supplementing the field teams that made the general examination of the riots in 23 cities. The unit examined data collected by federal agencies and congressional committees, including thousands of documents supplied by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, gathered and evaluated information from local and state law enforcement agencies and officials, and conducted its own field investigation in selected cities.

On the basis of all the information collected, the Commission concludes that:

The urban disorders of the summer of 1967 were not caused by, nor were they the consequence of, any organized plan or "conspiracy."

Specifically, the Commission has found no evidence that all or any of the disorders or the incidents that led to them were planned or directed by any organization or group, international, national or local.

Militant organizations, local and national, and individual agitators, who repeatedly forecast and called for violence, were active in the spring and summer of 1967. We believe that they sought to encourage violence, and that they helped to create an atmosphere that contributed to the outbreak of disorder.

We recognize that the continuation of disorders and the polarization of the races would provide fertile ground for organized exploitation in the future.

Investigations of organized activity are continuing at all levels of government, including committees of Congress. These investigations relate not only to the disorders of 1967 but also to the actions of groups and individuals, particularly in schools and colleges, during this last fall and winter. The Commission has cooperated in these investigations. They should continue.

Part II—Why Did It Happen?

Chapter 4 The Basic Causes

In addressing the question "Why did it happen?" we shift our focus from the local to the national scene, from the particular events of the summer of 1967 to the factors within the society at large that created a mood of violence among many urban Negroes.

These factors are complex and interacting; they vary significantly in their effect from city to city and from year to year; and the consequences of one disorder, generating new grievances and new demands, become the causes of the next. Thus was created the "thicket of tension, conflicting evidence and extreme opinions" cited by the President.

Despite these complexities, certain fundamental matters are clear. Of these, the most fundamental is the racial attitude and behavior of white Americans toward black Americans.

Race prejudice has shaped our history decisively; it now threatens to affect our future.

White racism is essentially responsible for the explosive mixture which has been accumulating in our cities since the end of World War II. Among the ingredients of this mixture are:

• Pervasive discrimination and segregation in employment, education and housing, which have resulted in the continuing exclusion of great numbers of Negroes from the benefits of economic progress.

• Black in-migration and white exodus, which have produced the massive and growing concentrations of impoverished Negroes in our major cities, creating a growing crisis of deteriorating facilities and services and unmet human needs.

• The black ghettos where segregation and poverty converge on the young to destroy opportunity and enforce failure. Crime, drug addiction, dependency on welfare, and bitterness and resentment against society in general and white society in particular are the result.

At the same time, most whites and some Negroes outside the ghetto have prospered to a degree unparalleled in the history of civilization. Through television and other media, this affluence has been flaunted before the eyes of the Negro poor and the jobless ghetto youth.

Yet these facts alone cannot be said to have caused the disorders. Recently, other powerful ingredients have begun to catalyze the mixture:

• Frustrated hopes are the residue of the unfulfilled expectations aroused by the great judicial and legislative victories of the Civil Rights Movement and the dramatic struggle for equal rights in the South.

• A climate that tends toward approval and encouragement of violence as a form of protest has been created by white terrorism directed against nonviolent protest; by the open defiance of law and federal authority by state and local officials resisting desegregation; and by some protest groups engaging in civil disobedience who turn their backs on nonviolence, go beyond the constitutionally protected rights of petition and free assembly, and resort to violence to attempt to compel alteration of laws and policies with which they disagree.

• The frustrations of powerlessness have led some Negroes to the conviction that there is no effective alternative to violence as a means of achieving redress of grievances, and of "moving the system." These frustrations are reflected in alienation and hostility toward the institutions of law and government and the white society which controls them, and in the reach toward racial consciousness and solidarity reflected in the slogan "Black Power."

• A new mood has sprung up among Negroes, particularly among the young, in which self-esteem and enhanced racial pride are replacing apathy and submission to "the system."

• The police are not merely a "spark" factor. To some Negroes police have come to symbolize white power, white racism and white repression. And the fact is that many police do reflect and express these white attitudes. The atmosphere of hostility and cynicism is reinforced by a widespread belief among Negroes in the existence of police brutality and in a "double standard" of justice and protection one for Negroes and one for whites.

To this point, we have attempted to identify the prime components of the "explosive mixture." In the chapters that follow we seek to analyze them in the perspective of history. Their meaning, however, is clear:

In the summer of 1967, we have seen in our cities a chain reaction of racial violence. If we are heedless, none of us shall escape the consequences.

Chapter 5 Rejection and Protest: An Historical Sketch

The causes of recent racial disorders are embedded in a tangle of issues and circumstances social, economic, political and psychological which arise out of the historic pattern of Negro-white relations in America.

In this chapter we trace the pattern, identify the recurrent themes of Negro protest and, most importantly, provide a perspective on the protest activities of the present era.

We describe the Negro's experience in America and the development of slavery as an institution. We show his persistent striving for equality in the face of rigidly maintained social, economic and educational barriers, and repeated mob violence. We portray the ebb and flow of the doctrinal tides accommodation, separatism, and self-help and their relationship to the current theme of Black Power. We conclude:

The Black Power advocates of today consciously feel that they are the most militant group in the Negro protest movement. Yet they have retreated from a direct confrontation with American society on the issue of integration and, by preaching separatism, unconsciously function as an accommodation to white racism. Much of their economic program, as well as their interest in Negro history, self-help, racial solidarity and separation, is reminiscent of Booker T. Washington. The rhetoric is different, but the ideas are remarkably similar.

Chapter 6 The Formation of the Racial Ghettos

Throughout the 20th century the Negro population of the United States has been moving steadily from rural areas to urban and from South to North and West. In 1910, 91 percent of the nation's 9.8 million Negroes lived in the South and only 27 percent of American Negroes lived in cities of 2,500 persons or more. Between 1910 and 1966 the total Negro population more than doubled, reaching 21.5 million, and the number living in metropolitan areas rose more than fivefold (from 2.6 million to 14.8 million). The number outside the South rose eleven-fold (from 880,000 to 9.7 million).

Negro migration from the South has resulted from the expectation of thousands of new and highly paid jobs for unskilled workers in the North and the shift to mechanized farming in the South. However, the Negro migration is small when compared to earlier waves of European immigrants. Even between 1960 and 1966, there were 1.8 million immigrants from abroad compared to the 613,000 Negroes who arrived in the North and West from the South.

As a result of the growing number of Negroes in urban areas, natural increase has replaced migration as the primary source of Negro population increase in the cities. Nevertheless, Negro migration from the South will continue unless economic conditions there change dramatically.

Basic data concerning Negro urbanization trends indicate that:

- Almost all Negro population growth (98 percent from 1950 to 1966) is occurring within metropolitan areas, primarily within central cities.
- The vast majority of white population growth (78 percent from 1960 to 1966) is occurring in suburban portions of metropolitan areas. Since 1960, white central-city population has declined by 1.3 million.
- As a result, central cities are becoming more heavily Negro while the suburban fringes around them remain almost entirely white.
- The twelve largest central cities now contain over two-thirds of the Negro population outside the South, and one-third of the Negro total in the United States.

Within the cities, Negroes have been excluded from white residential areas through discriminatory practices. Just as significant is the withdrawal of white families from, or their refusal to enter, neighborhoods where Negroes are moving or already residing. About 20 percent of the urban population of the United States changes residence every year. The refusal of whites to move into "changing" areas when vacancies occur means that most vacancies eventually are occupied by Negroes.

The result, according to a recent study, is that in 1960 the average segregation index for 207 of the largest United States cities was 86.2. In other words, to create an unsegregated population distribution, an average of over 86 percent of all Negroes would have to change their place of residence within the city.

Chapter 7 Unemployment, Family Structure, and Social Disorganization

Although there have been gains in Negro income nationally, and a decline in the number of Negroes below the "poverty level," the condition of Negroes in the central city remains in a state of crisis. Between 2 and 2.5 million Negroes 16 to 20 percent of the total Negro population of all central cities live in squalor and deprivation in ghetto neighborhoods.

Employment is a key problem. It not only controls the present for the Negro American but, in a most profound way, it is creating the future as well. Yet, despite continuing economic growth and declining national unemployment rates, the unemployment rate for Negroes in 1967 was more than double that for whites….

Equally important is the undesirable nature of many jobs open to Negroes and other minorities. Negro men are more than three times as likely as white men to be in low paying, unskilled or service jobs. This concentration of male Negro employment at the lowest end of the occupational scale is the single most important cause of poverty among Negroes.

In one study of low-income neighborhoods, the "subemployment rate," including both unemployment and underemployment, was about 33 percent, or 8.8 times greater than the overall unemployment rate for all United States workers.

Employment problems, aggravated by the constant arrival of new unemployed migrants, many of them from depressed rural areas, create persistent poverty in the ghetto. In 1966, about 11.9 percent of the nation's whites and 40.6 percent of its nonwhites were below the "poverty level" defined by the Social Security Administration (currently $3,335 per year for an urban family of four). Over 40 percent of the nonwhites below the poverty level live in the central cities.

Employment problems have drastic social impact in the ghetto. Men who are chronically unemployed or employed in the lowest status jobs are often unable or unwilling to remain with their families. The handicap imposed on children growing up without fathers in an atmosphere of poverty and deprivation is increased as mothers are forced to work to provide support.

The culture of poverty that results from unemployment and family breakup generates a system of ruthless, exploitative relationships within the ghetto. Prostitution, dope addiction, and crime create an environmental "jungle" characterized by personal insecurity and tension. Children growing up under such conditions are likely participants in civil disorder.

Chapter 8 Conditions of Life in the Racial Ghetto

A striking difference in environment from that of white, middle-class Americans profoundly influences the lives of residents of the ghetto.

Crime rates, consistently higher than in other areas, create a pronounced sense of insecurity. For example, in one city one low-income Negro district had 35 times as many serious crimes against persons as a high-income white district. Unless drastic steps are taken, the crime problems in poverty areas are likely to continue to multiply as the growing youth and rapid urbanization of the population outstrip police resources.

Poor health and sanitation conditions in the ghetto result in higher mortality rates, a higher incidence of major diseases, and lower availability and utilization of medical services. The infant mortality rate for nonwhite babies under the age of one month is 58 percent higher than for whites; for one to 12 months it is almost three times as high. The level of sanitation in the ghetto is far below that in high income areas. Garbage collection is often inadequate. Of an estimated 14,000 cases of rat bite in the United States in 1965, most were in ghetto neighborhoods.

Ghetto residents believe they are "exploited" by local merchants; and evidence substantiates some of these beliefs. A study conducted in one city by the Federal Trade Commission showed that distinctly higher prices were charged for goods sold in ghetto stores than in other areas.

Lack of knowledge regarding credit purchasing creates special pitfalls for the disadvantaged. In many states garnishment practices compound these difficulties by allowing creditors to deprive individuals of their wages without hearing or trial.

Chapter 9 Comparing the Immigrant and Negro Experience

In this chapter, we address ourselves to a fundamental question that many white Americans are asking: why have so many Negroes, unlike the European immigrants, been unable to escape from the ghetto and from poverty. We believe the following factors play a part:

- The Maturing Economy: When the European immigrants arrived, they gained an economic foothold by providing the unskilled labor needed by industry. Unlike the immigrant, the Negro migrant found little opportunity in the city. The economy, by then matured, had little use for the unskilled labor he had to offer.
- The Disability of Race: The structure of discrimination has stringently narrowed opportunities for the Negro and restricted his prospects. European immigrants suffered from discrimination, but never so pervasively.
- Entry into the Political System: The immigrants usually settled in rapidly growing cities with powerful and expanding political machines, which traded economic advantages for political support. Ward-level grievance machinery, as well as personal representation, enabled the immigrant to make his voice heard and his power felt. By the time the Negro arrived, these political machines were no longer so powerful or so well equipped to provide jobs or other favors, and in many cases were unwilling to share their influence with Negroes.
- Cultural Factors: Coming from societies with a low standard of living and at a time when job aspirations were low, the immigrants sensed little deprivation in being forced to take the less desirable and poorer-paying jobs. Their large and cohesive families contributed to total income. Their vision of the future one that led to a life outside of the ghetto provided the incentive necessary to endure the present.

Although Negro men worked as hard as the immigrants, they were unable to support their families. The entrepreneurial opportunities had vanished. As a result of slavery and long periods of unemployment, the Negro family structure had become matriarchal; the males played a secondary and marginal family role one which offered little compensation for their hard and unrewarding labor. Above all, segregation denied Negroes access to good jobs and the opportunity to leave the ghetto. For them, the future seemed to lead only to a dead end.

Today, whites tend to exaggerate how well and quickly they escaped from poverty. The fact is that immigrants who came from rural backgrounds, as many Negroes do, are only now, after three generations, finally beginning to move into the middle class.

By contrast, Negroes began concentrating in the city less than two generations ago, and under much less favorable conditions. Although some Negroes have escaped poverty, few have been able to escape the urban ghetto.

Part III—What Can Be Done?

Chapter 10 The Community Response

Our investigation of the 1967 riot cities establishes that virtually every major episode of violence was foreshadowed by an accumulation of unresolved grievances and by widespread dissatisfaction among Negroes with the unwillingness or inability of local government to respond.

Overcoming these conditions is essential for community support of law enforcement and civil order. City governments need new and more vital channels of communication to the residents of the ghetto; they need to improve their capacity to respond effectively to community needs before they become community grievances; and they need to provide opportunity for meaningful involvement of ghetto residents in shaping policies and programs which affect the community.

The Commission recommends that local governments:

• Develop Neighborhood Action Task Forces as joint community government efforts through which more effective communication can be achieved, and the delivery of city services to ghetto residents improved.

• Establish comprehensive grievance-response mechanisms in order to bring all public agencies under public scrutiny.

• Bring the institutions of local government closer to the people they serve by establishing neighborhood outlets for local, state and federal administrative and public service agencies.

• Expand opportunities for ghetto residents to participate in the formulation of public policy and the implementation of programs affecting them through improved political representation, creation of institutional channels for community action, expansion of legal services, and legislative hearings on ghetto problems.

In this effort, city governments will require state and federal support.

The Commission recommends:

• State and federal financial assistance for mayors and city councils to support the research, consultants, staff and other resources needed to respond effectively to federal program initiatives.

• State cooperation in providing municipalities with the jurisdictional tools needed to deal with their problems; a fuller measure of financial aid to urban areas; and the focusing of the interests of suburban communities on the physical, social and cultural environment of the central city.

Chapter 11 Police and the Community

The abrasive relationship between the police and the minority communities has been a major and explosive source of grievance, tension and disorder. The blame must be shared by the total society.

The police are faced with demands for increased protection and service in the ghetto. Yet the aggressive patrol practices thought necessary to meet these demands themselves create tension and hostility. The resulting grievances have been further aggravated by the lack of effective mechanisms for handling complaints against the police. Special programs for bettering police-community relations have been instituted, but these alone are not enough. Police administrators, with the guidance of public officials, and the support of the entire community, must take vigorous action to improve law enforcement arid to decrease the potential for disorder.

The Commission recommends that city government and police authorities:

• Review police operations in the ghetto to ensure proper conduct by police officers, and eliminate abrasive practices.

• Provide more adequate police protection to ghetto residents to eliminate their high sense of insecurity, and the belief of many Negro citizens in the existence of a dual standard of law enforcement.

• Establish fair and effective mechanisms for the redress of grievances against the police, and other municipal employees.

• Develop and adopt policy guidelines to assist officers in making critical decisions in areas where police conduct can create tension.

• Develop and use innovative programs to ensure widespread community support for law enforcement.

• Recruit more Negroes into the regular police force, and review promotion policies to ensure fair promotion for Negro officers.

• Establish a "Community Service Officer" program to attract ghetto youths between the ages of 17 and 21 to police work. These junior officers would perform duties in ghetto neighborhoods, but would not have full police authority. The federal government should provide support equal to 90 percent of the costs of employing CSOs on the basis of one for every ten regular officers.

Chapter 12 Control of Disorder

Preserving civil peace is the first responsibility of government. Unless the rule of law prevails, our society will lack not only order but also the environment essential to social and economic progress.

The maintenance of civil order cannot be left to the police alone. The police need guidance, as well as support, from mayors and other public officials. It is the responsibility of public officials to determine proper police policies, support adequate police standards for personnel and performance, and participate in planning for the control of disorders.

To maintain control of incidents which could lead to disorders, the Commission recommends that local officials:

- Assign seasoned, well-trained policemen and supervisory officers to patrol ghetto areas, and to respond to disturbances.
- Develop plans which will quickly muster maximum police man power and highly qualified senior commanders at the outbreak of disorders.
- Provide special training in the prevention of disorders, and prepare police for riot control and for operation in units, with adequate command and control and field communication for proper discipline and effectiveness.
- Develop guidelines governing the use of control equipment and provide alternatives to the use of lethal weapons. Federal support for research in this area is needed.
- Establish an intelligence system to provide police and other public officials with reliable information that may help to prevent the outbreak of a disorder and to institute effective control measures in the event a riot erupts.
- Develop continuing contacts with ghetto residents to make use of the forces for order which exist within the community.
- Establish machinery for neutralizing rumors, and enabling Negro leaders and residents to obtain the facts. Create special rumor details to collect, evaluate, and dispel rumors that may lead to a civil disorder.

The Commission believes there is a grave danger that some communities may resort to the indiscriminate and excessive use of force. The harmful effects of overreaction are incalculable. The Commission condemns moves to equip police departments with mass destruction weapons, such as automatic rifles, machine guns and tanks. Weapons which are designed to destroy, not to control, have no place in densely populated urban communities.

The Commission recognizes the sound principle of local authority and responsibility in law enforcement, but recommends that the federal government share, in the financing of programs for improvement of police forces, both in their normal law enforcement activities as well as in their response to civil disorders.

To assist government authorities in planning their response to civil disorder, this report contains a Supplement on Control of Disorder. It deals with specific problems encountered during riot-control operations, and includes:

- Assessment of the present capabilities of police, National Guard and Army forces to control major riots, and recommendations for improvement;
- Recommended means by which the control operations of those forces may be coordinated with the response of other agencies, such as fire departments, and with the community at large;
- Recommendations for review and revision of federal, state and local laws needed to provide the framework for control efforts and for the call-up and interrelated action of public safety forces.

Chapter 13 The Administration of Justice Under Emergency Conditions

In many of the cities which experienced disorders last summer, there were recurring breakdowns in the mechanisms for processing, prosecuting and protecting arrested persons. These resulted mainly from long-standing structural deficiencies in criminal court systems, and from the failure of communities to anticipate and plan for the emergency demands of civil disorders.

In part, because of this, there were few successful prosecutions for serious crimes committed during the riots. In those cities where mass arrests occurred many arrestees were deprived of basic legal rights.

The Commission recommends that the cities and states:

- Undertake reform of the lower courts so as to improve the quality of justice rendered under normal conditions.
- Plan comprehensive measures by which the criminal justice system may be supplemented during civil disorders so that its deliberative functions are protected, and the quality of justice is maintained.

Such emergency plans require broad community participation and dedicated leadership by the bench and bar. They should include:

- Laws sufficient to deter and punish riot conduct.
- Additional judges, bail and probation officers, and clerical staff.

• Arrangements for volunteer lawyers to help prosecutors and to represent riot defendants at every stage of proceedings.

• Policies to ensure proper and individual bail, arraignment, pre-trial, trial and sentencing proceedings.

• Procedures for processing arrested persons, such as summons and release, and release on personal recognizance, which permit separation of minor offenders from those dangerous to the community, in order that serious offenders may be detained and prosecuted effectively.

• Adequate emergency processing and detention facilities.

Chapter 14 Damages: Repair and Compensation

The Commission recommends that the federal government:

• Amend the Federal Disaster Act which now applies only to natural disasters to permit federal emergency food and medical assistance to cities during major civil disorders, and provide long-term economic assistance afterwards.

• With the cooperation of the states, create incentives for the private insurance industry to provide more adequate property-insurance coverage in inner-city areas.

The Commission endorses the report of the National Advisory Panel on Insurance in Riot-Affected Areas: "Meeting the Insurance Crisis of our Cities."

Chapter 15 The News Media and the Disorders

In his charge to the Commission, the President asked: "What effect do the mass media have on the riots?"

The Commission determined that the answer to the President's question did not lie solely in the performance of the press and broadcasters in reporting the riots. Our analysis had to consider also the overall treatment by the media of the Negro ghettos, community relations, racial attitudes, and poverty-day by day and month by month, year in and year out. A wide range of interviews with government officials, law enforcement authorities, media personnel and other citizens, including ghetto residents, as well as a quantitative analysis of riot coverage and a special conference with industry representatives, leads us to conclude that:

• Despite instances of sensationalism, inaccuracy and distortion, newspapers, radio and television tried on the whole to give a balanced, factual account of the 1967 disorders.

• Elements of the news media failed to portray accurately the scale and character of the violence that occurred last summer. The overall effect was, we believe, an exaggeration of both mood and event.

• Important segments of the media failed to report adequately on the causes and consequences of civil disorders and on the underlying problems of race relations. They have not communicated to the majority of their audience which is white a sense of the degradation, misery and hopelessness of life in the ghetto.

These failings must be corrected, and the improvement must come from within the industry. Freedom of the press is not the issue. Any effort to impose governmental restrictions would be inconsistent with fundamental constitutional precepts.

We have seen evidence that the news media are becoming aware of and concerned about their performance in this field. As that concern grows, coverage will improve. But much more must be done, and it must be done soon.

The Commission recommends that the media:

• Expand coverage of the Negro community and of race problems through permanent assignment of reporters familiar with urban and racial affairs, and through establishment of more and better links with the Negro community.

• Integrate Negroes and Negro activities into all aspects of coverage and content, including newspaper articles and television programming. The news media must publish newspapers and produce programs that recognize the existence and activities of Negroes as a group within the community and as a part of the larger community.

• Recruit more Negroes into journalism and broadcasting and promote those who are qualified to positions of significant responsibility. Recruitment should begin in high schools and continue through college; where necessary, aid for training should be provided.

• Improve coordination with police in reporting riot news through advance planning, and cooperate with the police in the designation of police information officers, establishment of information centers, and development of mutually acceptable guidelines for riot reporting and the conduct of media personnel.

• Accelerate efforts to ensure accurate and responsible reporting of riot and racial news, through adoption by all news gathering organizations of stringent internal staff guidelines.

• Cooperate in the establishment of a privately organized and funded Institute of Urban Communications to train and educate journalists in urban affairs, recruit and train more Negro journalists, develop methods for improving police-press relations, review coverage of riots and racial issues, and support continuing research in the urban field.

Chapter 16 The Future of the Cities

By 1985, the Negro population in central cities is expected to increase by 72 percent to approximately 20.8 million. Coupled with the continued exodus of white families to the suburbs, this growth will produce majority Negro populations in many of the nation's largest cities.

The future of these cities, and of their burgeoning Negro populations, is grim. Most new employment opportunities are being created in suburbs and outlying areas. This trend will continue unless important changes in public policy are made.

In prospect, therefore, is further deterioration of already inadequate municipal tax bases in the face of increasing demands for public services, and continuing unemployment and poverty among the urban Negro population:

Three choices are open to the nation:

• We can maintain present policies, continuing both the proportion of the nation's resources now allocated to programs for the unemployed and the disadvantaged, and the inadequate and failing effort to achieve an integrated society.

• We can adopt a policy of "enrichment" aimed at improving dramatically the quality of ghetto life while abandoning integration as a goal.

• We can pursue integration by combining ghetto "enrichment" with policies which will encourage Negro movement out of central city areas.

The first choice, continuance of present policies, has ominous consequences for our society. The share of the nation's resources now allocated to programs for the disadvantaged is insufficient to arrest the deterioration of life in central city ghettos. Under such conditions, a rising proportion of Negroes may come to see in the deprivation and segregation they experience, a justification for violent protest, or for extending support to now isolated extremists who advocate civil disruption. Large-scale and continuing violence could result, followed by white retaliation, and, ultimately, the separation of the two communities in a garrison state.

Even if violence does not occur, the consequences are unacceptable. Development of a racially integrated society, extraordinarily difficult today, will be virtually impossible when the present black ghetto population of 12.5 million has grown to almost 21 million.

To continue present policies is to make permanent the division of our country into two societies; one, largely Negro and poor, located in the central cities; the other, predominantly white and affluent, located in the suburbs and in outlying areas.

The second choice, ghetto enrichment coupled with abandonment of integration, is also unacceptable. It is another way of choosing a permanently divided country. Moreover, equality cannot be achieved under conditions of nearly complete separation. In a country where the economy, and particularly the resources of employment, are predominantly white, a policy of separation can only relegate Negroes to a permanently inferior economic status.

We believe that the only possible choice for America is the third a policy which combines ghetto enrichment with programs designed to encourage integration of substantial numbers of Negroes into the society outside the ghetto.

Enrichment must be an important adjunct to integration, for no matter how ambitious or energetic the program, few Negroes now living in central cities can be quickly integrated. In the meantime, large-scale improvement in the quality of ghetto life is essential.

In the meantime, large-scale improvement in the quality of ghetto life is essential.

But this can be no more than an interim strategy. Programs must be developed which will permit substantial Negro movement out of the ghettos. The primary goal must be a single society, in which every citizen will be free to live and work according to his capabilities and desires, not his color.

Chapter 17 Recommendations for National Action

Introduction

No American white or black can escape the consequences of the continuing social and economic decay of our major cities.

Only a commitment to national action on an unprecedented scale can shape a future compatible with the historic ideals of American society.

The great productivity of our economy, and a federal revenue system which is highly responsive to economic growth, can provide the resources.

The major need is to generate new will the will to tax ourselves to the extent necessary, to meet the vital needs of the nation.

We have set forth goals and proposed strategies to reach those goals. We discuss and recommend programs not to commit each of us to specific parts of such programs but to illustrate the type and dimension of action needed.

The major goal is the creation of a true union a single society and a single American identity. Toward that goal, we propose the following objectives for national action:

• Opening up opportunities to those who are restricted by racial segregation and discrimination, and eliminating all barriers to their choice of jobs, education and housing.

• Removing the frustration of powerlessness among the disadvantaged by providing the means for them to deal with the problems that affect their own lives and by increasing the capacity of our public and private institutions to respond to these problems.

• Increasing communication across racial lines to destroy stereotypes, to halt polarization, end distrust and hostility, and create common ground for efforts toward public order and social justice.

We propose these aims to fulfill our pledge of equality and to meet the fundamental needs of a democratic and civilized society domestic peace and social justice.

Employment

Pervasive unemployment and underemployment are the most persistent and serious grievances in minority areas. They are inextricably linked to the problem of civil disorder.

Despite growing federal expenditures for manpower development and training programs, and sustained general economic prosperity and increasing demands for skilled workers, about two million white and nonwhite are permanently unemployed. About ten million are underemployed, of whom 6.5 million work full time for wages below the poverty line.

The 500,000 "hard-core" unemployed in the central cities who lack a basic education and are unable to hold a steady job are made up in large part of Negro males between the ages of 18 and 25. In the riot cities which we surveyed, Negroes were three times as likely as whites to hold unskilled jobs, which are often part time, seasonal, low-paying and "dead end."

Negro males between the ages of 15 and 25 predominated among the rioters. More than 20 percent of the rioters were unemployed, and many who were employed held intermittent, low status, unskilled jobs which they regarded as below their education and ability.

The Commission recommends that the federal government:

• Undertake joint efforts with cities and states to consolidate existing manpower programs to avoid fragmentation and duplication.

• Take immediate action to create 2,000,000 new jobs over the next three years one million in the public sector and one million in the private sector to absorb the hard-core unemployed and materially reduce the level of underemployment for all workers, black and white. We propose 250,000 public sector and 300,000 private sector jobs in the first year.

• Provide on-the-job training by both public and private employers with reimbursement to private employers for the extra costs of training the hard-core unemployed, by contract or by tax credits.

• Provide tax and other incentives to investment in rural as well as urban poverty areas in order to offer to the rural poor an alternative to migration to urban centers.

• Take new and vigorous action to remove artificial barriers to employment and promotion, including not only racial discrimination but, in certain cases, arrest records or lack of a high school diploma. Strengthen those agencies such as the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, charged with eliminating discriminatory practices, and provide full support for Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act allowing federal grant-in-aid funds to be withheld from activities which discriminate on grounds of color or race.

The Commission commends the recent public commitment of the National Council of the Building and Construction Trades Unions, AFL-CIO, to encourage and recruit Negro membership in apprenticeship programs. This commitment should be intensified and implemented.

Education

Education in a democratic society must equip children to develop their potential and to participate fully in American life. For the community at large, the schools have discharged this responsibility well. But for many minorities, and particularly for the children of the ghetto, the schools have failed to provide the educational experience which could overcome the effects of discrimination and deprivation.

This failure is one of the persistent sources of grievance and resentment within the Negro community. The hostility of Negro parents and students toward the school system is generating increasing conflict and causing disruption within many city school districts. But the most dramatic evidence of the relationship between educational practices and civil disorders lies in the high incidence of riot participation by ghetto youth who have not completed high school.

The bleak record of public education for ghetto children is growing worse. In the critical skills verbal and reading ability Negro students are falling further behind whites with each year of school completed. The high unemployment and underemployment rate for Negro youth is evidence, in part, of the growing educational crisis.

We support integration as the priority education strategy; it is essential to the future of American society. In this last summer's disorders we have seen the consequences of racial isolation at all levels, and of attitudes toward race, on both sides, produced by three centuries of myth, ignorance and bias. It is indispensable that opportunities for interaction between the races be expanded.

We recognize that the growing dominance of pupils from disadvantaged minorities in city school populations will not soon be reversed. No matter how great the effort toward desegregation, many children of the ghetto will not, within their school careers, attend integrated schools.

If existing disadvantages are not to be perpetuated, we must drastically improve the quality of ghetto education. Equality of results with all-white schools must be the goal.

To implement these strategies, the Commission recommends:

- Sharply increased efforts to eliminate de facto segregation in our schools through substantial federal aid to school systems seeking to desegregate either within the system or in cooperation with neighboring school systems.
- Elimination of racial discrimination in Northern as well as Southern schools by vigorous application of Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.
- Extension of quality early childhood education to every disadvantaged child in the country.
- Efforts to improve dramatically schools serving disadvantaged children through substantial federal funding of year-round compensatory education programs, improved teaching, and expanded experimentation and research.
- Elimination of illiteracy through greater federal support for adult basic education.
- Enlarged opportunities for parent and community participation in the public schools.
- Reoriented vocational education emphasizing work-experience training and the involvement of business and industry.
- Expanded opportunities for higher education through increased federal assistance to disadvantaged students.
- Revision of state aid formulas to assure more per student aid to districts having a high proportion of disadvantaged school-age children.

The Welfare System

Our present system of public welfare is designed to save money instead of people, and tragically ends up doing neither. This system has two critical deficiencies:

First, it excludes large numbers of persons who are in great need, and who, if provided a decent level of support, might be able to become more productive and self-sufficient. No federal funds are available for millions of men and women who are needy but neither aged, handicapped nor the parents of minor children.

Second, for those included, the system provides assistance well below the minimum necessary for a decent level of existence, and imposes restrictions that encourage continued dependency on welfare and undermine self-respect.

A welter of statutory requirements and administrative practices and regulations operate to remind recipients that they are considered untrustworthy, promiscuous and lazy. Residence requirements prevent assistance to people in need who are newly arrived in the state. Regular searches of recipients' homes violate privacy. Inadequate social services compound the problems.

The Commission recommends that the federal government, acting with state and local governments where necessary, reform the existing welfare system to:

- Establish uniform national standards of assistance at least as high as the annual "poverty level" of income, now set by the Social Security Administration at $3,335 per year for an urban family of four.
- Require that all states receiving federal welfare contributions participate in the Aid to Families with Dependent Children Unemployed Parents program (AFDC-UP) that permits assistance to families with both father and mother in the home, thus aiding the family while it is still intact.
- Bear a substantially greater portion of all welfare costs at least 90 percent of total payments.
- Increase incentives for seeking employment and job training, but remove restrictions recently enacted by the Congress that would compel mothers of young children to work.
- Provide more adequate social services through neighborhood centers and family-planning programs.
- Remove the freeze placed by the 1967 welfare amendments on the percentage of children in a state that can be covered by federal assistance.
- Eliminate residence requirements.

As a long-range goal, the Commission recommends that the federal government seek to develop a national system of income supplementation based strictly on need with two broad and basic purposes:

• To provide, for those who can work or who do work, any necessary supplements in such a way as to develop incentives for fuller employment;

• To provide, for those who cannot work and for mothers who decide to remain with their children, a minimum standard of decent living, and to aid in the saving of children from the prison of poverty that has held their parents.

A broad system of implementation would involve substantially greater federal expenditures than anything now contemplated. The cost will range widely depending on the standard of need accepted as the "basic allowance" to individuals and families, and on the rate at which additional income above this level is taxed. Yet if the deepening cycle of poverty and dependence on welfare can be broken, if the children of the poor can be given the opportunity to scale the wall that now separates them from the rest of society, the return on this investment will be great indeed.

Housing

After more than three decades of fragmented and grossly underfunded federal housing programs, nearly six million substandard housing units remain occupied in the United States.

The housing problem is particularly acute in the minority ghettos. Nearly two-thirds of all non-white families living in the central cities today live in neighborhoods marked with substandard housing and general urban blight. Two major factors are responsible.

First: Many ghetto residents simply cannot pay the rent necessary to support decent housing. In Detroit, for example, over 40 percent of the non-white occupied units in 1960 required rent of over 35 percent of the tenants' income.

Second: Discrimination prevents access to many non-slum areas, particularly the suburbs, where good housing exists. In addition, by creating a "back pressure" in the racial ghettos, it makes it possible for landlords to break up apartments for denser occupancy, and keeps prices and rents of deteriorated ghetto housing higher than they would be in a truly free market.

To date, federal programs have been able to do comparatively little to provide housing for the disadvantaged. In the 31-year history of subsidized federal housing, only about 800,000 units have been constructed, with recent production averaging about 50,000 units a year. By comparison, over a period only three years longer, FHA insurance guarantees have made possible the construction of over ten million middle and upper-income units.

Two points are fundamental to the Commission's recommendations:

First: Federal housing programs must be given a new thrust aimed at overcoming the prevailing patterns of racial segregation. If this is not done, those programs will continue to concentrate the most impoverished and dependent segments of the population into the central-city ghettos where there is already a critical gap between the needs of the population and the public resources to deal with them.

Second: The private sector must be brought into the production and financing of low and moderate rental housing to supply the capabilities and capital necessary to meet the housing needs of the nation.

The Commission recommends that the federal government:

• Enact a comprehensive and enforceable federal open housing law to cover the sale or rental of all housing, including single family homes.

• Reorient federal housing programs to place more low and moderate income housing outside of ghetto areas.

• Bring within the reach of low and moderate income families within the next five years six million new and existing units of decent housing, beginning with 600,000 units in the next year.

To reach this goal we recommend:

• Expansion and modification of the rent supplement program to permit use of supplements for existing housing, thus greatly increasing the reach of the program.

• Expansion and modification of the below-market interest rate program to enlarge the interest subsidy to all sponsors and provide interest-free loans to nonprofit sponsors to cover pre-construction costs, and permit sale of projects to nonprofit corporations, cooperatives, or condominiums.

• Creation of an ownership supplement program similar to present rent supplements, to make home ownership possible for low-income families.

• Federal writedown of interest rates on loans to private builders constructing moderate-rent housing.

• Expansion of the public housing program, with emphasis on small units on scattered sites, and leasing and "turnkey" programs.

• Expansion of the Model Cities program.

• Expansion and reorientation of the urban renewal program to give priority to projects directly assisting low-income households to obtain adequate housing.

Conclusion

One of the first witnesses to be invited to appear before this Commission was Dr. Kenneth B. Clark, a distinguished and perceptive scholar. Referring to the reports of earlier riot commissions, he said:

> I read that report … of the 1919 riot in Chicago, and it is as if I were reading the report of the investigating committee on the Harlem riot of '35, the report of the investigating committee on the Harlem riot of '43, the report of the McCone Commission on the Watts riot.

I must again in candor say to you members of this Commission it is a kind of Alice in Wonderland with the same moving picture re-shown over and over again, the same analysis, the same recommendations, and the same inaction.

These words come to our minds as we conclude this report.

We have provided an honest beginning. We have learned much. But we have uncovered no startling truths, no unique insights, no simple solutions. The destruction and the bitterness of racial disorder, the harsh polemics of black revolt and white repression have been seen and heard before in this country.

It is time now to end the destruction and the violence, not only in the streets of the ghetto but in the lives of people.

Glossary

de facto segregation	segregation that exists not because of law or government requirement but because of residential patterns or other social practices
exodus	the emigration, departure, or movement of a large group of people
Molotov cocktail	an improvised firebomb thrown by hand and usually consisting of a bottle filled with a liquid that will burn and a rag for a wick
Negro	common term for an African American in the 1960s
nihilism	the view that destroying existing society is necessary to bring about social improvement polemics	controversial arguments
underemployment	inadequate employment in a part-time instead of full-time job, labor in a low-paying position, or work that requires skills that are less than the worker possesses

Eldridge Cleaver's "Education and Revolution"

1969

"In order to transform the American social order, ... we have to overthrow the government."

Overview

In November 1969, Eldridge Cleaver's essay "Education and Revolution" was published in The Black Scholar, a progressive journal that takes a black perspective on such issues as education, culture, and politics. Cleaver at the time was a member of the Black Panther Party, a militant revolutionary organization founded earlier in the decade. The initial goal of the Black Panthers was to promote self-defense in the black community at a time when many urban blacks saw police forces as oppressive and racist. In time, the Black Panthers broadened their goals to include charitable work, principally by providing schoolchildren with breakfasts, and efforts to promote black self-awareness in the schools. The Black Panthers were also strong advocates of Socialism as a mode of social organization. In his essay, Cleaver articulates the Socialist goals of the Black Panthers and explains why, from his perspective, the black community has to take charge of its children's education as a means of overthrowing an oppressive capitalist system.

Context

The Black Panther Party was a principal offshoot of the Black Power movement of the 1960s. Black Power had its origins in the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC). Formed in 1960, the SNCC organized voter-registration drives throughout the South and events such as the 1963 March on Washington, where Martin Luther King, Jr., made his famous "I Have a Dream" speech. Leaders of the organization included such notable civil rights activists as Stokely Carmichael, Julian Bond, John Lewis, Marion Barry, and H. Rap Brown. A key event in the civil rights movement occurred in March 1965, when King led a nonviolent march of some twenty-five thousand people from Selma to Montgomery, Alabama, to protest racial injustice. But in August of that year, riots in the Watts section of Los Angeles erupted. During the five days of disturbance, thirty-five thousand African Americans squared off against sixteen thousand National Guardsmen. By the riot's end, thirty-four people had died (most of them black), a thousand had been injured, and property damage had amounted to an estimated $40 million. This event, along with other instances of violence in black neighborhoods, prompted the SNCC to begin an evolution away from the principles of nonviolence.

It was in this climate that Bobby Seale and Huey Newton formed the Black Panther Party for Self-Defense in the racially troubled city of Oakland, California, on October 15, 1966. Soon, chapters of the party could be found in many major cities. The founders drew inspiration from the Lowndes County Freedom Organization in Alabama, which Carmichael had formed and which had adopted a black panther as its emblem. Black Panthers were instantly recognizable for their uniforms: blue shirts, black pants, black leather jackets, black berets, and openly displayed loaded shotguns, which, Newton had discovered, could be carried in public under California law as long as they were pointed at no one. The initial goal of the organization was to protect black neighborhoods from police brutality. Originally the group espoused the principles of black nationalism, drawing inspiration from the writings and speeches of civil rights firebrands such as Malcolm X, but in time it came to reject that position in favor of a more Socialist agenda.

In addition to Seale and Newton, the best known of the Panthers was Eldridge Cleaver, who edited the party's newspaper, The Black Panther, and raised its circulation to two hundred and fifty thousand. At its founding, the party promulgated a Ten-Point Program. Among the ten points were "power to determine the destiny of our black and oppressed communities," full employment, "an end to the robbery by the capitalists," decent housing, exemption from military service (at a time when opposition to the Vietnam War was growing), an end to police brutality (with a call for blacks to arm themselves in self-defense), freedom for black prisoners in jails and prisons, trial of accused black people by black juries, and "land, bread, housing, education, clothing, justice, peace, and people's community control of modern technology."

Of particular relevance to "Education and Revolution" was the fifth of the ten points: "We want decent education for our people that exposes the true nature of this decadent American society. We want education that teaches us our true history and our role in the present-day society." This demand reflected the pedagogy espoused by numerous civil rights leaders at the time. In the vanguard of promoting this approach to education was the SNCC, which created a network of "freedom schools" in Mississippi as part of the Mississippi Freedom Summer in 1964. Based on the premise that segregated schools distorted black self-awareness, freedom schools organized with the help of white activists adopted a curriculum that emphasized the personal experiences of students and upheld the belief that integration was still possible and desirable.

In the years that followed, however, that viewpoint eroded. The SNCC began to retreat from its integrationist perspective in southern schools to focus instead on northern urban ghettos, where racism seemed entrenched despite civil rights legislation and the labors of civil rights groups. The SNCC began to rely less on the help of white activists in forming, for example, the Residential Freedom School for black youth in Chicago. Georgia's Atlanta Project was an effort to create black schools in that city, and proposals were made to start a "liberation school" in Washington, D.C. The premise underlying these initiatives was that African Americans could not achieve their goals through integration. Racism, it was argued, was too permanent, and the American experience that formed the core of traditional education could not meet the needs of black youth. These progressive schools, therefore, emphasized culture and politics from a black perspective.

The Black Panther Party played a leading role in these efforts by establishing liberation schools on the West Coast. At the first such school, founded in Berkeley, California, in 1969, elementary and middle school students marched to songs about "pigs" (a term commonly used in the 1960s to refer to the police) and revolutionary principles. The school's curriculum emphasized that the struggle was not about race as much as it was about class and the exploitation of the lower classes. A similar school was formed in San Francisco, where students played revolutionary games and sang revolutionary songs. Topics in the curriculum included racism, Fascism, capitalism, Socialism, and Black Panther ideology. Later, in 1971, an elementary school for Black Panther Party members was created in Oakland. Called the Intercommunal Youth Institute, the school emphasized community organizing and instruction in the party's ideology. It also included visits to prisons and attendance at court sessions with a view to showing students the criminal justice system in operation. The school's name was changed to the Oakland Community School in 1974, and it graduated its last students in 1982. In "Education and Revolution," published in November 1969, Cleaver articulated the goals of progressive education from the perspective of the Black Panther Party.

About the Author

Eldridge Cleaver was born on August 31, 1935, in Wabbaseka, Arkansas, though later his family moved to Phoenix, Arizona, and then to Los Angeles. As a teenager, Cleaver was arrested for such petty crimes as marijuana possession and spent time in juvenile detention centers. In 1957 he was arrested and charged with rape and attempted murder; he was convicted of assault with intent to murder and sentenced to prison.

While he was in prison, Cleaver wrote the work for which he is best known, Soul on Ice, a book that became one of the intellectual foundations of the Black Power movement in the 1960s. The book began as a series of essays he published in Ramparts, a leftist publication that, at its height, reached over a quarter million subscribers. In the book, he acknowledged that he was a serial rapist, stating that he regarded his actions as insurrectionary, performed to shock the white community. After he was released from prison in 1966, he became a member of the Black Panther Party in Oakland, assuming the position of the party's minister of information and editor of its newspaper, The Black Panther. In 1967 he joined with a number of other prominent black radicals, including Malcolm X, to form the Black House political and cultural center in San Francisco (not to be confused with the infamous Black House Church of Satan formed in San Francisco at about the same time). In 1968 Cleaver was selected as the presidential candidate for the Peace and Freedom Party, a minor leftist party that advocated Socialism and an end to the Vietnam War, and he actually garnered about thirty-six thousand votes. That year Cleaver was part of a shootout in which Black Panther Bobby Hutton was killed and two police officers were injured; he later confessed that the Black Panthers had deliberately provoked the shootout by attempting to ambush the officers. Cleaver was charged with murder, but he fled the country, first to Cuba, then to Algeria and later France, where he lived underground.

At this point, Cleaver parted ways with Huey Newton, the party's minister of defense. Cleaver wanted the organization to engage in armed insurrection and urban guerrilla warfare, but Newton argued that violence would alienate most of the black community and was beginning to call for more pragmatic reform. In 1975 Cleaver returned to the United States, where he was placed on probation for assault as a result of the 1968 shootout, and he renounced the Black Panthers. In 1978 he published Soul on Fire, a book that detailed his years in exile, his fear for his life, his inability to control the revolutionaries who had followed him to Algeria, and his conversion to fundamentalist Christianity which led to his formation of a short-lived revivalist ministry called Eldridge Cleaver Crusades.

In the later years of his life, Cleaver adopted a benign posture at odds with his earlier radicalism. He was baptized as a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints the Mormon Church and attended the Peninsula Bible Church in Palo Alto, California. This church was known primarily as the church supported by Chuck Colson, the first member of the administration of President Richard Nixon to be imprisoned on charges that grew out of the Watergate scandal that led to Nixon's resignation. Around the time of his incarceration, Colson became a born-again Christian, and he remains a prominent leader of the Christian right. During the 1980s Cleaver became a conservative Republican, even endorsing Ronald Reagan for president. In 1986 he mounted an unsuccessful campaign for a U.S. Senate seat in California. (Reagan refused to return the favor and endorse him.) Cleaver died on May 1, 1998, in Pomona, California.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

"Education and Revolution" would have found an appreciative audience during the turbulence of the late 1960s. It was a time when writers and speakers were espousing black nationalism, when student groups were engaging in protest some of it violent against the Vietnam War, and when the names of numerous revolutionaries and activists were routinely in the news. The tone of "Education and Revolution" is relatively sober and serious; it was not intended to be a fiery denunciation of capitalism and the current state of traditional education. Nevertheless, it contains a bare-knuckled attack on American institutions and articulates Cleaver's and the Black Panthers' vision of a very different kind of social order.

◆ "The Essence of Education"

Cleaver begins his essay in a measured way. His starting point is that the purpose of education is to pass "the heritage, learning, the wisdom and the technology of human history to the coming generations." He draws a distinction between the natural world and the social world. Education provides humans with the means to harness the natural world to ensure human survival. Just as people have an "antagonistic" relationship with the natural world, so too they have an antagonistic relationship with the social world. Most people are not directly involved in struggling against the natural environment; in contrast, most people are involved with struggling against the social environment, which historically emphasized agriculture, industry, and the economic system ways that humans coped with their natural environment.

◆ "The Struggle within the Social Environment"

In the next section of the essay, Cleaver goes into more detail about people's struggle with their social environment. In describing this environment, he adopts the terminology of Karl Marx, the nineteenth-century German philosopher and historian whose works have provided the intellectual foundations of Communism. Marx saw history as essentially the history of class struggle, in which the proletariat, or working people, rose up against the entrenched interests of the owners of the means of production. Cleaver argues, in paragraph 4, that the struggle in the natural realm takes place with the means of production, that is, the "economic base" that provides resources and tools for creating commodities and material wealth. The struggle in the social realm, though, takes place on a "superstructure" that has been built on this economic base and that the base sustains. This superstructure includes hospitals, the postal service, and any other organized aspect of society. It also includes the education system.

Cleaver then turns to an examination of the educational system. Education, he points out, was simple when the only enemy was the natural order. Fathers passed along to their sons the knowledge they needed to grow crops, for example, or to hunt. But as the social system became more complex, so did the educational system. As people became more specialized in their economic functions, education had to be institutionalized and centralized. The educational process became less individual and more community based, as schools, colleges, and universities existed for the community as a whole. Complicating matters, however, is that humans and human institutions often find themselves in conflict. Much of that disharmony is a result of class and ethnic divisions, which gave rise to institutions such as slavery. The upshot is that those who own the wealth and the means of production also control the social institutions. Even those who are not wealthy can gain positions of control because of their extensive education. Those who control social institutions are able to appoint judges, elect candidates for office, and select officials at universities. Thus, the struggle waged by African Americans, ethnic groups, and poor whites is a struggle against the social system that is imposed on them from above. Race and class are the characteristics used to divide Americans.

◆ "The Struggle of the Exploited People"

In this section, Cleaver's tone becomes edgier. He points out that the struggle against exploitation is centered on college and high school campuses. This, says Cleaver in paragraph 11, is understandable, for "those who are interested in keeping people in oppressed positions and then dominating their perspective and their outlook on life, know that it is necessary for them to control the learning process in order to brainwash people, in order to camouflage the true nature of the society." He suggests that those in control have to "sanctify" their position by teaching people who are exploited to love the system that exploits them. The "oligarchy" that is, the few in control controls the curriculum so that it "does not expose the true nature of the decadent and racist society that we live in." Oppressed people, on the other hand, want to expose the nature of the society they live in and their struggle against it. Cleaver goes on to say that the struggle is against the entire capitalist system, which functions by turning the word "revolution" against those who use it, giving it a "bad name." Revolution, according to Cleaver, is nothing more than the struggle against the system "that has historically enslaved our people, has continually exploited us, has discriminated against us and made our lives miserable and kept us underdeveloped and kept us blind and kept us in a form of slavery."

◆ "Revolution"

Cleaver defends the concept of revolution, saying in paragraph 16 that it "should be a beautiful word because it's a word that promises us hope, that promises us a better life." The alternative to revolution is to remain satisfied as slaves. He goes on to state that the "enemy" talks about revolution by using such phrases as "crime in the street." These phrases are meant to confuse and turn exploited groups against each other. Cleaver wishes that exploited peoples could form an alliance to overthrow the capitalist system and remove from positions of power those who denounce the struggle, for as long as capitalism exists, some people will have to be exploited. Revolution holds out hope that the means of production can be placed in the hands of those who are currently exploited in order to create a better life for everybody.

◆ "The Struggle in the Educational Arena"

Cleaver sees the effort to include black studies in curricula as part of a wider struggle to liberate both blacks and whites from an educational system that keeps "black people and so-called minorities ignorant" and that simultaneously "indoctrinates" white students to keep them "in harmony with this system." Cleaver calls the system "evil" and argues that a historical opportunity exists to bring it down. Efforts made by capitalists and their "watchdogs" to criminalize protest are simply part of an effort to perpetuate the system as it exists. In the past, the slave system denied blacks the ability even to read and write. Today, though, African Americans want to be in control of what they read and write. Opponents of this effort "are nothing but the descendants of the outright racist slavemasters who opposed us in our attempts to learn how to read and write on the plantations during the days of slavery."

◆ "Repression against the Movement"

Although Cleaver is ostensibly writing about education, in this brief section he argues against a single-minded focus on education, noting in paragraph 23, "The struggle that we wage is against the total social organism." Those who control education also control other social institutions, so the struggle against oppression has to be mounted on all fronts. Cleaver expresses a note of optimism by arguing that efforts to repress the movement are a sign not of the strength but of the weakness of the ruling class.

◆ "One Ruling Class"

In this section Cleaver de-emphasizes the issue of black and white by arguing that the division is one perpetrated by the ruling class. The difference between black and white revolutionary struggles, in Cleaver's view, is inconsequential, for the struggle is against the same ruling class. Cleaver notes that many people who are not connected to the college community often tend to think that what takes place on college campuses is none of their business, but Cleaver rejects this view, arguing that the campus is part of the larger human community. Further, the stratification of the college campus is an emblem of the stratification of the larger society. Campuses are administered by members of the ruling class to the exclusion of the poor and powerless people whose interests are supposedly being served. Cleaver concludes, in paragraph 32, that > poor black people and poor white people and middle class people who are not themselves directly involved in the college situation, need to be made to understand that something of their own precious liberty, which either they never had or they thought they had, is being decisively determined in the struggles that are going down on the campuses today.

◆ "Universal Brainwashing"

Cleaver argues that it is the duty of the state to provide people with medical care, housing, employment, and education. Any government that fails to do so is "not worthy of existing." In the educational arena, education is supposedly universal, but in Cleaver's view what is taking place is "universal brainwashing." This section of the essay essentially repeats the ideas that Cleaver has already expressed: that the educational system is under the control of the ruling class. Therefore, the system has to be not "reformed" but overthrown. The goal is not reform but revolution.

◆ "Transforming the Social Order"

In the essay's concluding section, Cleaver emphasizes revolutionary goals: "We have to destroy the present structure of power in the United States, we have to overthrow the government." He argues that the courts, the legislatures, and the executive branches at both the state and federal level are instruments of the ruling class and therefore have to be replaced that the "machinery" of government must be replaced by "new machinery." Cleaver indicates that the only way to do so is through violence. "We are involved in a war," says Cleaver, and a war is not a "game." Cleaver's startling conclusion is that overthrowing the ruling class can begin with the college president, who derives his power from corporations: This attack might "be through boycotts of the products of that corporation, or through the physical destruction of the property of the corporation, or the physical elimination of him as an individual."

Audience

Cleaver's essay was published in The Black Scholar, an education journal founded in 1969 that continues to focus on progressive education, culture, and politics from the perspective of the black community. Its list of contributors over the years reads like a who's who of black intellectuals and writers: Amiri Baraka, Angela Davis, Julian Bond, Shirley Chisholm, Stokely Carmichael, Maya Angelou, Alice Walker, and many others. Publication in a scholarly journal such as The Black Scholar would lend an essay such as Cleaver's credibility. Clearly, however, Cleaver was writing primarily for an audience that was already inclined to accept his point of view, though it should be noted that many African Americans at the time regarded the Black Panthers with suspicion because of their extreme militancy and allegations that they were involved in criminal activity. Thus, Cleaver was in the position of having to convince black readers, as well as white readers, of the legitimacy of the Panthers' position on the issue of education.

Impact

The Black Panthers were an unabashedly revolutionary organization, one that called for the overthrow of the capitalist system. During the late 1960s and early 1970s, the organization was the subject of extensive investigation by the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Writing in the New York Times, FBI director J. Edgar Hoover stated:

> The Black Panthers are the greatest threat to the internal security of the country. Schooled in the Marxist-Leninist ideology and the teaching of Chinese Communist leader Mao Tse-tung, its members have perpetrated numerous assaults on police officers and have engaged in violent confrontations with police throughout the country. Leaders and representatives of the Black Panther Party travel extensively all over the United States preaching their gospel of hate and violence not only to ghetto residents, but to students in colleges, universities and high schools as well.

The FBI took action, using wiretaps, searches, infiltration, and other techniques some of questionable legality to disrupt the activities of the Black Panthers and, particularly, to sow the seeds of discord in the organization. While some historians regard the Black Panthers as a significant social movement, others have condemned the organization. Among the latter group is Sol Stern, who in 1967 had written a laudatory piece about the Panthers and Huey Newton for the New York Times but in 2003 wrote that "within a few years, I understood that I should have described Newton and his cadres as psychopathic criminals, not social reformers."

In many ways, the educational program Cleaver outlined proved to be ephemeral. Throughout the 1970s the schools formed by the Black Panthers shifted their curricula away from revolutionary principles to the political mission of integrating black youth in urban ghettos into mainstream American society. Handbooks for teachers no longer referred to the Black Panthers, as attention shifted to such traditional classroom topics as phonics, grammar, and the teaching of Standard English. That said, the type of progressive education that Cleaver espoused is by no means dead, though determining how much life remains in it depends on one's definition of "progressive education." Many scholars and schools continue to promote the belief that education is best founded on real-life experience, the type of lived experience that the Panthers stressed. Curricula from grade school to college in the United States include attention not only to the work of traditional canonical authors but also to that of oppressed minorities. History courses routinely give attention to African Americans and other minority groups, and the so-called bottom-up approach to history shifts the attention away from kings, treaties, and wars (the "top-down" approach) to the circumstances of ordinary people whose lives are affected by major events. Books such as Howard Zinn's A People's History of the United States, which won a National Book Award in 1980 and has been often adopted as a school textbook, examine history from the standpoint not of the cultural elites but of oppressed minorities, women, labor unions, working people, and victims of imperialism. While Cleaver's vision was doomed by its utopianism, parts of it survive, making "Education and Revolution" an important early document in the shift in attitudes that has led to a more open, diverse curriculum in American schools.

Questions for Further Study

1. Later in his life, Cleaver adopted a posture that was remarkably more benign compared with the militancy of his younger years, even to the point of joining the more conservative Republican Party. What do you think may have accounted for this change?

2. What is your opinion of the type of "progressive" education Cleaver advocated? Do you see any manifestations of this type of education in your own school? Explain.

3. Cleaver's essay and the views he expressed in it were based not on race but on social class. Explain.

4. How—and why—did Cleaver draw a connection between education designed to help people survive in the physical environment and that designed to help them survive in the social environment? How persuasive do you find this connection?

5. Why do you think that the kind of educational system Cleaver advocated never really took off and in large part disappeared in the 1970s and beyond?

Eldridge Cleaver's "Education and Revolution"

One way of understanding what's going on, on the college and the high school campuses in the United States today, is to examine the essence of education. Basically an education passes the heritage, learning, the wisdom and the technology of human history to the coming generations. We want this information to be passed on to enable and to help mankind continue to survive and cope with the environment. In terms of surviving and coping with our environment, basically, we have two worlds to deal with. We have the natural world the task of surviving against the given world, the task of eking a living from the earth itself, for which technology has been designed. On the other hand we have the social world, the social situation. We have an antagonistic orientation to both of these worlds. We speak about the natural enemies of man, including everything from animals to the weather, and these elements have been given the label of enemy because they can kill people. We have to be able to harness these forces, we have to be able to adapt to the natural situation so that our survival will be enhanced, and for this purpose, science and technology, agriculture and industry, all of these tools have been developed by mankind through practice in coping with this physical environment.

We are in the habit of speaking about certain things that happen in the social situation that are hostile and inimical to the prospect of survival for mankind, and we also label these with the same designation of enemy. The distinction between the struggle for survival against the physical environment, and the struggle against the antagonistic forces and situations in the social realm is a very important distinction to make, because often the struggle in the social realm is really the only struggle that many people are caught up in. They are not directly involved in struggling against the physical environment, but their survival does depend upon struggling within the social realm, in terms of how the economy is organized, how the political system is organized, and how the social system itself is organized, so that many lives are played out against this background of struggling against the way civilization is presently organized.

The struggle against the physical environment, of course, is primary. We have organized our social situation in order to cope with the physical environment. The way that we organize agriculture, the way that we organize industry, the way that we organize the economy as a whole, the way that we organize the political situation, all historically have been towards facilitating and better enabling us to cope with the physical environment.

At this point I think it would be useful to establish some terminology. The best terminology I know of, for discussing this distinction between the struggle within the physical environment and the struggle within the social environment, is the terminology developed by Karl Marx. He designates the struggle against or within the physical environment as taking place within the economic base of society. And, upon the economic base of society is erected the superstructure of society. Thus the struggle within the social realm takes place within the superstructure and the struggle in the physical realm takes places within the economic base. In the economic base we find the natural resources, the technology, the industry, all the machines and the tools and the means that mankind has developed for coping with the physical environment. They are designated as the means of production, the means of producing material wealth, goods and commodities from the natural resources themselves. But all of the institutions of society, everything from the educational facilities to the hospitals and the postal service, everything belonging to the organized aspect of society, exist within the social superstructure, which has been built and sustained by our means of producing material wealth.

Let's get to the essence of an education. In a very simple-structured social organization, where technology and learning have not become complex, it would be possible for one's Father or one's uncle to pass on the technology. Your father could teach you how to fish or your father could teach you how to farm at a rudimentary agricultural level. He could teach you how to hunt with a spear or a rock, or bow and arrow. But as the economic condition becomes more complex, and as the level of information and knowledge and understanding of the environment increases, to the extent that society requires people to specialize in passing on this information, then the problem of education really sets in. When it was necessary for people to be designated as teachers and to specialize in, or devote all their time to, passing on this information, the learning situation itself had to be centralized as an institution. Schools, universities, etc., were developed so that the maximum productive use of a man's time and energy could be made. Now you can readily understand how in a very complex social situation it would be understood by the community, by everybody involved in the social unit, that these places or institutions of learning were there to serve and to benefit the community as a whole. It would be absurd For a teacher or one who is charged with administering the learning process as a whole, it would be absurd for him to alienate himself from the community as a whole or to claim that he owns the body of information that is a heritage to mankind; this would be absurd, it would not be tolerated by the community.

Of course I have been writing as though society was an organism in which people were in harmony with each other, in which they cooperated with each other and in which they were not waging wars of aggression against each other and were not in conflict with each other. But in actual fact and in terms of human history such harmony has not been the case.

In human history, we see that society has been broken up into classes, into antagonistic ethnic and economic groups that struggle against each other for survival as each sees it. They enslave each other and make their living at the expense of other groups, special interest groups are formed, etc. So that in reality we have to look at our own situation, have to look at the situation that exists in the economic base in terms of the class struggle, also in terms of the ethnic struggles that have gone on. When we look at our own situation today in the United States, we find that those who are very powerful in our society are powerful because of their relationship to the means of production, because they are rich, because they own the factories and because they own the natural resources. With this economic power they are able to gain control of all the institutions in society, they are able to appoint people who themselves may not be rich, or may not own stock, or have any control over the means of production of the natural resources, but because of their extensive education are able to be appointed to positions of managing society.

But at the top of the social organization in the United States, we have the ruling class mentioned; and because of the wealth of this ruling class, it is able to dominate American society and control American society, able to determine what judges are appointed to the judicial system, able to determine who is appointed to the Board of Regents to administer the colleges, and able even to determine who is elected to office, because it controls the wealth, and has vast amounts of money at its disposal to wage a political campaign.

Those who control the economy of the United States are able to control the rest of society. Those of us who are not in this advantaged position, black people, Mexican-Americans, Puerto Ricans, Indians, Eskimos, virtually every ethnic group including poor white people and also middle class college students, all find ourselves in the position wherein our lives are manipulated and controlled by those who have this advantaged social position.

We have to struggle in order to survive. But we're not struggling against the natural environment, our struggle is not in reality taking place against nature itself, but we are struggling against the way society has been organized. We are struggling against those who have organized society to their advantage, in order to continue their control and rule of the entire social unit. It is very important for us to understand that we are called upon to wage this struggle with the same desperation and the same "do or die" necessity that a caveman in some forgotten time in human history had to struggle against the natural elements. In reality, our adversaries are other men, other women and other social classes. In terms of the racial strife within the United States our class struggle is often hidden by our ethnic struggle. We are manipulated along the color line as well as along the class line. We are exploited economically, and we are discriminated against racially, also.

Today, as always, the struggle of the exploited people within the United States is taking place on all fronts, but the most sensational and explosive clashes are being centered and focussed more and more on the college campuses and on the high school campuses. We understand that those who control the mind can control the body, so that those who are interested in keeping people in oppressed positions and then dominating their perspective and their outlook on life, know that it is necessary for them to control the learning process in order to brainwash people, in order to camouflage the true nature of the society. In order to sanctify their system, they teach the exploited people and the oppressed people to virtually love the system that is exploiting and oppressing them. This oligarchy has an interest in seeing to it that the content of the curriculum is to its liking, and that it does not expose the true nature of the decadent and racist society that we live in.

On the other hand, the exploited and oppressed people have the opposite interest in exposing the true nature of the society and in educating ourselves and our children on the nature of the struggle and in transferring to them the means for waging the struggle so they can be aware of the level of the struggle, of the progress and the history of the struggle and the nature of the enemy and the true vulnerability of the enemy. In other words, we want to be able to teach ourselves and our children the necessity for struggling against this ruling class.

What we have to realize above all else is that our enemy and that which we in fact are struggling against is not an individual college president or high school principal or a board of regents or a board of education, but the entire social structure. We are struggling against the capitalist system which organized itself in a way that purchases our lives, that exploits us and forces us into a position wherein we have to wage a struggle against the social organization in order to survive.

One of the techniques or one of the weapons that the enemy uses against us in our struggle is to turn words against us, to define our struggle in terms that place our struggle in a bad light, so that the word "revolution" is given a bad name, is looked upon as a negative term.

But what revolution means and what it means to us is that we are trying to change a system that has historically enslaved our people, has continually exploited us, has discriminated against us and made our lives miserable and kept us underdeveloped and kept us blind and kept us in a form of slavery, one form of slavery or another. Of course, our struggle has continually forced the slavemaster to modify the terms of the slavery, but every modification that has been made has only been made because the slavemaster found it necessary to make a few minor adjustments in order to continue his exploitation of us on a new level.

The process of breaking out of slavery, the process of breaking out of a set of social arrangements, out of a social organization that is killing us, this process is named revolution; we are revolting and rebelling and moving against a system that is our enemy. For us the word "revolution" should be a beautiful word because it's a word that promises us hope, that promises us a better life and we should not be ashamed to call ourselves revolutionaries. We are a revolutionary people, our very social situation forces us to be a revolutionary people. If we are not going to be revolutionary people, we have to accept the designation of satisfied slaves; if we aren't satisfied, then that means we have a revolutionary consciousness. It is important for us to be consciously revolutionary, to understand that we are revolutionaries, and to understand that it is right for us to be revolutionaries and that in fact the enemies are the ones who are wrong.

The enemy uses words against us, talks about "crime in the streets," talks about "disorders," talks about "law and order," all of these words are smoke screens, are smoke screens to confuse us, to create conflicts between the various exploited groups and to turn them against each other. It is the old technique of divide and conquer. What we need and what if we had any sense at all what we would be working for is to create an alliance between all the exploited people within the society so that we could join together to create machinery, coordinate our struggle, and coordinate our attack against the capitalist system and destroy it. Because as along as the capitalist system exists, by its very nature some people will have to be exploited in order for others to be rich and powerful, so that the exploited are powerless and in an oppressed position. Therefore revolution is a glorious term, it is a term to be proud of and we should know that we are morally right, we are right in every sense of the term and that the oppressor is the one who is wrong and that the oppressor has no rights which the oppressed are bound to respect.

History is on our side and justice is on our side and it is only a question of removing from positions of power those who are able to judge our struggle and to pass out judgements that denounce us and that deny us the right to survive. If we had revolutionary members from the exploited classes sitting on the Supreme Court, in the halls of Congress and in the Executive Branch of the Government, then these revolutionaries in office would give out revolutionary decisions, the revolutionaries on the benches of the court would give out revolutionary decisions on the court cases and the capitalists and the racist police would be judged wrong.

They would be the ones who would be sent to prison. They would be the ones who would be penalized. They would be the ones who would be forced to raise a hundred thousand dollars in order to get out on bail. In other words, the oppressed people have to take control of the government, they have to take control of the state, so that in their hands these instruments of power would be turned against the exploiters. The exploitative system would be dismantled and we could build another system that would be based on cooperation, not on a "dog-eat-dog" epic of competition, of corrupt methods of exploiting people. It would be based on how best to organize the industries, the means of production, in order to give everybody a good life.

Our struggle to gain black studies departments on college campuses, our struggle to have black studies added to the curriculum across the nation is a struggle that the enemy sees as a grave danger. The enemy also recognizes the struggle of young white people on the college campuses and high schools as a grave danger and he is right. It is a grave danger because what we realize is that the education that is given is designed to perpetuate a system of exploitation. On the one hand it is designed to keep black people and so-called minorities ignorant, and on the other hand it is designed to keep the masses of white students in harmony with this system, to keep them supporting the system, to indoctrinate them to fight the wars that protect the system, and that extend the influence and the power of the system. We are all becoming conscious of the evil of the system, conscious of the fact that this system can no longer survive, that we have a historic opportunity for attacking the system and destroying it at its root. Thus all of the manipulations that the capitalists and the watchdogs of the capitalists go through are designed to destroy the thrust of the movement, to designate as criminals those who are in the forefront of the struggle and those who are guiding the struggle.

Historically the struggle in the educational arena, in terms of black people, has been waged from, on the one hand the slavemaster not even wanting black people to learn how to read and write, to black people wanting to learn how to read and write on the other. The struggle then transposed itself over into what black people were allowed to read and write, until today black people have reached a point where they want to control totally what they read and write.

This has been a steady struggle against the opposition of the slavemaster, it has been defeat after defeat for the slavemaster, until now we have burst into consciousness, until now we have realized the necessity of taking control of our education. When we see this long line of progression from the struggle to become literate to the struggle today to control totally the education, we can see the true nature of the opposition that we face now and faced then. All of these racists and liberals who are opposing our moves today to gain control of our education, are nothing but the descendants of the outright racist slavemasters who opposed us in our attempts to learn how to read and write on the plantations during the days of slavery. Hence all of their rhetoric, all of their arguments, all of the changes that they go through, in the last analysis, are a continuation of the desire and the necessity of the slavemaster to keep us ignorant and unable to manipulate ideas; because in order to organize a revolutionary struggle, we must be able to manipulate ideas. We must have knowledge of ourselves and of our enemy, and of the situations that we find ourselves in, in order to organize a true revolution to move against the oppressor.

One of the great dangers that our revolutionary struggle faces, perhaps the greatest danger, is that we historically have tended to compartmentalize our struggle; that is, we get hung up on one aspect of the struggle, without having an overall revolutionary perspective and without realizing that the struggle that we wage is against the total social organism. We focus all of our attention and all of our energy on the educational system, and we don't realize or our tactics and our strategy would seem to indicate that we don't realize that this is only one aspect of our struggle and that the same people who control the educational facilities, control the rest of the social structure. Everything, the economy, the judiciary, the political parties, the political instruments, every aspect of society is in the same hands. We need a broader strategy, a revolutionary strategy that aims at overthrowing the rule of this class as a whole, so we will not just be going through changes on the college campuses.

The repression against the movement that the United States is now mobilizing is not a sign of strength on the part of the ruling class, but rather the sign of weakness of the ruling class, and a sign of the strength and effectiveness of the movement. All of the lies, the subterfuges, the hypocrisy of the ruling class has been exposed, for if can no longer hope to control or manipulate the movement by words alone. It has to resort to the brutal, repressive forces of the police department. The movement itself has drawn several lessons from this reaction of repression by the ruling class. The clear cut nature of power in the United States and the racist policies of the ruling class are revealed.

On the one hand the rebellion of black students and black people thoroughly exposes the racist policies of the administrations of the various colleges and high schools and on the other hand there is the repression that the blacks and the allies of blacks are receiving. It's really incorrect to speak of the white section of the movement as being the allies of blacks, because in reality there is no such thing as a black movement and a white movement in the United States. These are merely categories of thought, that only have reality in terms of the lines that the ruling class itself has drawn and is enforcing among the people.

Because the United States is controlled by one ruling class, one single structure, and the whole drama of the black liberation struggle, and the revolutionary struggle in the white community is being played on one stage. Because of the division that the ruling class has historically implanted amongst the people, because of the different experiences of black people from white people, the reality of the division is more apparent than real, because at the top opposed to both black people and white revolutionaries is a single ruling class, there's not a ruling class for blacks and a ruling class for whites, but there's one single ruling class that rules all, that controls all and that manipulates all, that has a different set of tactics for each group, depending upon the tactics used by the groups, in the struggle for liberation.

One of the great weaknesses in the movement at this particular time is in the campus aspect of the attack upon the ruling class and the power of the ruling class. In the compartmentalized thinking of the traditional American society, the college community and the college campus is viewed as something separate and distinct from the rest of the community. The college is not really looked upon as a part of the community. People who are not concerned with themselves going to college or who have no children in college feel that what's going on, on the campus is none of their business. But nothing could be farther from the truth, because in reality they are the people's colleges, institutions that have been set aside to perpetuate the human heritage, and to pass on human wisdom, the knowledge and technical skills for the further development of society and civilization. And every single individual living in a given society has a stake in what goes on in them; he has a stake in seeing to it that what happens on the campus is proper, and that the best interest of all the community is being served.

On the other hand, the attacks focused on the college campuses serve to expose the nature of power in the United States. When we look at the composition of the board of regents and administrations, and councils that control the colleges, we find them replete with military men, retired generals, foundation personnel, and big businessmen. We could say that the boards that administer the universities are a good barometer, or a clear diagram of the stratification of power in the society as a whole. We don't see poor people represented on the boards of administration of the institutions of learning, for in the society beyond the college campus, poor people do not exercise or possess any power. If they did have the power, they would be in a position to see to it that some of their members were appointed to these boards.

But those who control the economy, those who control the various sources and levels of power in the community and around it, are able to have their lackeys and their flunkies appointed to administer these institutions of learning. The composition of the boards of administration of the institutions of learning indicate clearly, the powerlessness of the various sectors of society and this fact needs to be brought out much more clearly and brought home to the community. A connection needs to be made between the college campus and the community so that the repression and the tactics of the ruling class can be defeated by the total community being involved. As long as the pigs are able to vamp on the college campuses and to commit mess arrests and brutality against the students and there is not solid and massive community support, then they will be able to get away with it, and slowly but surely they will be able to grind the movement to a halt by cutting off wave after wave of leadership, by expelling the leadership, and hounding the leadership out of existence.

It's a mistake to think that the ruling class cannot be successful if a proper response is not made from the movement, a mistake that has been made time and time again in the various revolutionary struggles around the world. There have been cases of the revolutionary movement being very highly advanced, very well organized, much more organized than we are in the United States, with a higher theoretical understanding, and with very good party machinery, etc. and they have been crushed because the power structure would resort to unlimited brutality it would kill, it would imprison. It had the mass media in its control, and it could use the mass media to justify this, and to brainwash other people who were not organized enough to do anything about their repressors.

So that it's a question of time. The movement is always behind, the movement has the initiative. The power structure, by over-reacting seeks to buy time for itself, and the pressure that the movement puts on the power structure determines the amount of time that is left. Because if the struggle progresses slowly enough to allow the ruling class to devise means of coping with the movement, then all is lost and the movement itself is doomed to failure. So that a broadening of those involved, or those concerned, and those whose support is now latent is what is required.

Poor black people and poor white people and middle class people who are not themselves directly involved in the college situation, need to be made to understand that something of their own precious liberty, which either they never had or they thought they had, is being decisively determined in the struggles that are going down on the campuses today. Every black mother, every black father, every Mexican mother, every Mexican father, every father and every mother in every group, white, Puerto Rican, Indian, Eskimo, Arab, Jew, Chinese, Japanese, whatever ethnic group they happen to be in, in the United States, need to be made to understand, that if they have no child or teenager involved in the educational process today because they were not able to afford to send them to college or something of that nature, that this in itself is a criticism of the structure of education in the United States.

It is the duty of any society to see to it that every individual in that society is invested with the human heritage and provided with the technology, the skills, and the knowledge that will enable him to cope with his environment, to survive and to live a good life. It is the duty of the society to provide this education, just as it is the duty of the society to provide the highest level of medical assistance, housing and employment, of every benefit that exists in society, it's the duty of the government to provide that. As long as the state is not providing these benefits, it is not worthy of existing, and under our kind of state which is called a representative democracy, it is not possible for a capitalistic economy to provide a universal education for the people. What it has been providing is universal brainwashing that masquerades as universal education. The quality of the education is contemptible, it is inhumane, and it is only geared to provide a level of intelligence or a level of competence that will enable the product of the educational system to become war material, to be exploited by the capitalistic economic entities within the United States.

So what we're into today is not only sitting back and criticizing, but actively reaching out and challenging the authority of those who control the various institutions in society, not simply challenging this authority, but by actively moving to disrupt the functioning of these facilities in the best interests of the community as a whole. These facilities can no longer serve the interests of the crosswork monopolies that are being administered by racists and by pigs who only want to exploit people and sentence people to be cogs in a wheel. In the final analysis, the struggle that is now going on on the college campuses cannot be settled on the college campuses. It has to be settled in the community, because those that sit on the boards of administration of the colleges do not derive their power from the fact that they are sitting on the board, but rather, they sit on the board because they have power in the community.

Their power is based on the economic institutions of society and other institutions that form the power structure, and because of their relation to these sources of power, they're able to be appointed to these positions of administration.

We have to destroy their power in the community, and we're not reformists, we're not in the movement to reform the curriculum of a given university or a given college or to have a Black Students Union recognized at a given high school. We are revolutionaries, and as revolutionaries, our goal is the transformation of the American social order.

In order to transform the American social order, we have to destroy the present structure of power in the United States, we have to overthrow the government. For too long we've been intimidated into not speaking out clearly what our task is, our task is the overthrow of the government, which has to be understood as being nothing but the instrument of the ruling class. The court, the congress, the legislature and the executive branches of the state and federal government are nothing but instruments in the hands of the ruling class, to see after the affairs of the ruling class, and to conduct the life of society in the interest of the ruling class. So we're out to destroy this, to smash this machinery and to erect new machinery. But new machinery cannot be erected until the present machinery is destroyed. It is not the task of revolutionaries to keep their heads up in the sky, wondering about what they will do when they have power. What they have to do at the present time is to have their minds centered on destruction. We are out to destroy the present machinery of the ruling class, that is our task.

We must do this by the only means possible, because the only means possible is the means that's necessary, and the only means possible is the violent overthrow of the machinery of the oppressive ruling class. That means that we will not allow the ruling class to use brutality and force upon us, without using the same force and brutality upon them. We must destroy their institutions from which they derive their power. A given college president may have his power as a result of being involved in a corporation. We must attack him on the campus but we must also pursue him off the campus and attack him in his lair, the lair of his power, in his corporations! Such attack could be through boycotts of the products of that corporation, or through the physical destruction of the property of the corporation, or the physical elimination of him as an individual.

We must not get into a bag or thinking that we're involved in a game: a revolution is not a game, it is a war. We are involved in a war a people's war against those who oppress the people, and this is the war in the clearest sense of the word. It is only our resistance that is under developed and it is our resistance that is underdeveloped because the ruling class has formidable arsenals of the materials of war to unleash upon us, and they are only using timid materials at this particular time, because our resistance to their aggression has heretofore been timid.

Jesse Owens's Blackthink: My Life as Black Man and White Man

"Blackthink pro Negro, antiwhite bigotry is what makes the new Negro and white extremists of today tick."

Overview

At the Olympic Games in Mexico City on October 16, 1968, Tommie Smith and John Carlos, two African American sprinters who had just won gold and bronze medals, respectively, appeared at their medal ceremony shoeless but wearing black socks (to symbolize black poverty) and a black glove on one hand. They bowed their heads when the "The Star-Spangled Banner" was played and, instead of saluting the American flag, pointedly looked away from it, raising their black-gloved clenched fists in a Black Power salute.

The immediate occasion for Carlos and Smith's protest was that earlier in 1968 the president of the International Olympic Committee, Avery Brundage, had announced that South Africa would be allowed to compete in the Olympic Games to be held in Mexico City. This was despite the fact that South Africa was an apartheid state in which political and economic power was monopolized by the minority white population and the majority black population were treated as second-class citizens, denied basic civil and political rights, and forced to endure daily socioeconomic deprivation. Other African countries, including Algeria and Ethiopia, responded by threatening to withdraw from the Olympics if South Africa competed.

A year earlier, in November 1967, Harry Edwards, a twenty-five-year-old assistant professor of sociology, had launched a boycott campaign in the United States, urging African American athletes not to take part in the Olympics. The boycott movement made a series of demands, including an end to sporting competition between the United States and South Africa and the expulsion of Avery Brundage as president of the International Olympic Committee. There were also calls for the appointment of an African American to the U.S. Olympic Committee and an additional black American coach for the games. On April 20, 1968, the committee reversed its earlier decision and expelled South Africa from the Olympics. The Olympic boycott campaign within the United States was subsequently abandoned, but individual African American athletes were encouraged to express their discontent at the Olympics as they saw fit. This is what Carlos and Smith did. The incident attracted worldwide media attention. Jesse Owens, who was present at the Olympics, condemned their action and unsuccessfully tried to persuade the two athletes to make a public apology. Condemned, in turn, by some Black Power radicals for his intervention, Owens subsequently wrote Blackthink to explain why he found the protests so objectionable.

Context

The mid- to late 1960s were eventful in the modern African American freedom struggle. Some of the most important advances and events of the postwar civil rights movement occurred between 1963 and 1965. Among them, Martin Luther King, Jr., delivered his memorable "I Have a Dream" speech to some two hundred thousand supporters at the March on Washington in August 1963, which was followed by the signing of the 1964 Civil Rights Act and the 1965 Voting Rights Act. These two pieces of federal legislation played a key role in ending legally enforced segregation and the denial of black voting rights.

Despite such achievements, by the mid-1960s the younger generations of African Americans were becoming frustrated by what they saw as the shortcomings of the civil rights movement. They questioned King's insistence on nonviolent protest, instead finding inspiration in the armed struggles of third world independence movements against white colonial rule. These feelings were reinforced by mounting concern at the rapidly escalating involvement of the United States in the Vietnam War between 1965 and 1968. Many Americans became increasingly convinced that the conflict not only was unnecessary but also was an unjust war of colonial oppression.

There was growing awareness within the United States that the emphasis on achieving desegregation and voting rights for blacks ignored the socioeconomic disadvantages experienced by many African American communities. In particular, the focus on challenging racial injustice in the South led to a neglect of the problems of African Americans in the cities of the North, including poverty, poor housing and education, and high unemployment levels. The failure of federal, state, and city authorities to address these issues, combined with the heightened expectations created by the civil rights movement, contributed to the outbreak of serious urban disorders across the United States. From 1964 to 1968 in what became known as the five "long, hot summers" more than two hundred U.S. cities experienced outbreaks of racial violence and rioting.

In June 1966, Stokely Carmichael, recently appointed chair of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, an important civil rights organization, captured these growing concerns when he issued a call for "Black Power" during a protest march in Mississippi. Although the phrase was not new, it took on fresh life and quickly became the slogan of a radical protest movement, expressing the pent-up feelings of those who were frustrated by, or excluded from, the civil rights struggle.

Carmichael and other newly emerging leaders, like H. Rap Brown, who succeeded him as chair of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee in 1967, and Floyd McKissick and Roy Innis of the Congress of Racial Equality, rejected nonviolence in favor of armed self-defense. They also called for greater racial pride and consciousness. This was to be achieved by developing political and cultural links with African nations, the introduction of black studies programs in American colleges and universities, and African Americans' taking full leadership roles in their own civil rights organizations. These developments highlighted growing racial and generational divisions within the civil rights movement. In the next year or two, most white activists either had been forced out of or had voluntarily departed from the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee and the Congress of Racial Equality. Older civil rights leaders voiced concern at the changing agenda. Martin Luther King, Jr., expressed fears that Black Power had negative connotations of black-on-white violence. Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the nation's oldest civil rights organization, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, argued that it amounted to a form of reverse racism.

In 1968 the Olympic Games in Mexico City became a focus for Black Power protest. By this time the movement was at its height. The question of South African participation in or exclusion from the Olympics made the event an arena of controversy. In April 1967, the black athlete Muhammad Ali had been stripped of his world heavyweight boxing title for refusing induction into the army for service in the Vietnam War. Black Power advocates saw the Olympics as an opportunity to protest this action and demand that it be reversed. Then, in April 1968, just six months before the Olympics, King was assassinated by a white supremacist in Memphis, Tennessee, heightening the sense of anger and frustration felt in African American communities throughout the United States. White hesitancy in condemning apartheid in South Africa, the assassination of King, and the stripping of a black athlete of his world title were major factors in radicalizing younger African Americans like Harry Edwards, John Carlos, and Tommie Smith. Owens, however, was a member of the generation that had fled the South to find economic opportunity in the North and that had joined the national effort to win World War II. Owens's winning of four gold medals at the 1936 Olympics, as the German chancellor Adolf Hitler watched, was no small part of that effort.

About the Author

Jesse Owens, born on September 12, 1913, was the last of ten surviving children of a sharecropper family in Oakville, Alabama. Like most African American sharecroppers in the South at this time, the family struggled to make a living and was exploited by their white landlord. An added concern for Owens's parents was that he was a sickly child who came close to death on a number of occasions. Seeking to escape from poverty and to find more healthy living conditions for Jesse, the family moved north to Cleveland in the early 1920s. In doing so they became part of what is called the Great Migration of some 1.25 million African Americans who left the South in the period from 1910 to 1930 looking for a better life in the cities of the North.

In Cleveland, Owens's health improved. Attending Fairmount Junior High School, he demonstrated promise on the athletics track, attracting the attention of the sports coach Charles Riley, who became a mentor and father figure to Owens. Encouraged by Riley, in 1933 Owens secured an athletic scholarship at Ohio State University. He excelled in sporting competition, setting three new world records and equaling a fourth within the space of forty-five minutes at the Big Ten athletic championships in Ann Arbor, Michigan, in 1935.

This success earned Owens a place on the U.S. track-and-field team for the 1936 Olympics. The venue for the Olympic Games that year was Berlin. Adolf Hitler, who had become German chancellor in 1933, sought to use the occasion as a propaganda event to promote the achievements of his Nazi regime and to prove his theories of Aryan racial superiority through victories won by German athletes. Although Germany indeed claimed more medals than any other nation, it was the achievements of Owens that captured the attention of the international media. Within the space of four days he won four gold medals, setting new world or Olympic records in each event. Sports journalists portrayed the Olympics as a personal contest between Owens and Hitler. It was reported that Hitler snubbed Owens by refusing to shake his hand after one event. On another occasion the German leader reputedly left the stadium abruptly, furious that victory by the African American made a mockery of Nazi beliefs in white racial supremacy. Although later historians have questioned the authenticity of such stories, the duel between Owens and Hitler has become the most enduring popular memory of the 1936 Olympics.

In America, Owens's achievements made him a national hero and arguably the best-known sporting personality in the world. Despite this fame, when he returned home the climate of race relations in the United States made it difficult for him to secure employment or translate his sporting success into material gains.

By the time of the 1968 Olympic Games in Mexico City, Owens had acquired the status of a respected elder statesman within the U.S. Olympic movement and was well known as a public speaker. Legendary for his achievement in surmounting racial bigotry at the 1936 Olympics, Owens inevitably became a focus of media attention in his opposition to the proposed boycott of the Mexico Olympics by Black Power activists. This stance, together with his condemnation of the Black Power salutes given by the two African American athletes, Tommie Smith and John Carlos, at their Olympic medal ceremony, highlighted generational divisions within the African American community. The controversy at the Mexico City Olympic Games notwithstanding, Owens continues to be best remembered for his feats in Berlin in 1936. He died at the age of sixty-six on March 31, 1980.

Blackthink is made up of twelve chapters totaling 215 pages. In the earlier chapters, Owens reflects on his life and career before moving on to discuss the 1968 Olympic Games and to attack what he sees as the misguided thinking of Black Power radicals in the 1960s. The document extracts reflect this unfolding analytical narrative. They comprise sections from three individual chapters, Chapter 2: "Henry Owens' Tortures," Chapter 3: "But Equality Is Here," and Chapter 4: "Negroes Have Human Hangups."

◆ Chapter 2: "Henry Owens' Tortures"

Owens refers to the Emancipation Proclamation of January 1, 1863, issued by Abraham Lincoln during the American Civil War to free African Americans from slavery. He notes that growing up as "an Alabama sharecropper's child in the First World War," he had seen little improvement to the quality of life of his family and other African Americans in the region as a result of the proclamation. Under the sharecropping system, black farmers were still as good as owned by white landowners. They were free only "to work eighteen hours a day" and to see their "labor add up to a debt at the year's end."

Owens also identifies the central target of criticism in the book, "blackthinkers," or young Black Power radicals of the 1960s. In his view, they were the beneficiaries of the civil rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s who enjoyed access to "integrated high-rises, restaurants and universities." Owens believed that their complaints about continuing racial injustice were unwarranted, given the advantages they enjoyed compared with African Americans of his generation. In the remaining paragraphs Owens recalls his early life. This narrative serves a number of purposes. It highlights the major advances in race relations that had been achieved by the late 1960s and encourages readers to develop empathy for Owens as they are made aware of the deprivations he experienced in his childhood.

For the benefit of readers who might not be familiar with its operation, Owens explains why the system of sharecropping was unjust. Sharecroppers did not receive a regular wage. Instead, they were provided with land and the tools to farm it by the white landowner. To feed and clothe himself and his family during the year, Owens's father had to obtain supplies on credit from the local white-owned grocery store. The storekeeper and the white landowner negotiated an agreement for this purpose. In theory, when the crop almost invariably cotton was harvested at the end of the year, black farmers could use their share of the profits, typically 33 50 percent of the proceeds, to pay off this credit and keep the surplus.

In reality the system was subject to flagrant abuse. Storekeepers could charge virtually any price they saw fit, and at high rates of interest, for goods obtained on credit in this way. Without access to ready money, sharecroppers had no other way to buy the goods they needed. Moreover, many sharecroppers, like Owens's father, found it difficult to read and write and had little or no skill with numbers. This made it possible for dishonest storekeepers to add further, nonexistent, transactions to the credit records of sharecroppers to increase the amount they owed. When black farmers came to settle their accounts at the end of the year, they had no money left over from their share of the crop. Frequently, they still had outstanding debts, which they had to carry forward to the next year. Such abuse worked to the mutual interest of both the storekeeper and the white landowner. The storekeeper was able to enjoy inflated profits. The landowner benefited from a permanent supply of cheap labor by ensuring that farmworkers were trapped in a system of debt peonage. Sharecroppers were never able to save enough money to buy their own land or set up in business on their own.

Owens notes that faced with such depressing prospects "a few Negroes had left and gone North." This is something of an understatement. In the years 1910 1930 some 1.25 million African Americans in the South joined what became known as the Great Migration. They left the region to seek jobs in the factories of the North, taking advantage of increased employment opportunities created during World War I. The war years also put an end to large-scale immigration from Europe, prompting northern industrialists to look to African American migrants as an alternative source of labor.

Owens explains why, despite new opportunities, his father, like many African Americans, chose to remain in the South. In contrast to most migrants, who were typically young adults, Henry Owens was "over forty years old." For him, it initially seemed too late in life "to pull up roots." He was also the grandson of slaves and knew that, bad as life was, things had been even worse for his grandparents. Generational change is an important theme in the book. The deprivations suffered by Jesse Owens in the 1920s and 1930s meant that he had little time for the complaints of Black Power radicals in the late 1960s. By the same token, because the young radicals' formative years coincided with a time of improving race relations, they had higher expectations of equality and fairness than older African Americans like Owens.

Owens goes on to describe how, in the early 1920s, Henry Owens overcame his fears about seeking a better life in the North. This change of heart was brought about by a variety of factors. There was concern over Jesse's recurring bad health. He was also influenced by the despair and suicide of a neighbor. Then, in February 1921, when Owens enjoyed a "particularly good crop" that would enable him to pay off all his debts, the landowner, John Clannon, retrospectively changed the terms of their sharecropper agreement to cheat him out of his just reward.

At the end of Chapter 2, Owens reflects that the Black Power leaders of the 1960s, "the Rap Browns and Stokely Carmichaels" at times "sound like the Clannons." He speculates that the Clannon family, of Irish descent, might have suffered anti-Irish bigotry on arriving in the United States. This could have prompted them to take out their bitterness on black sharecropper families like the Owenses. Similarly, prejudice against African Americans has led "blackthink" radicals to encourage "pro-Negro, antiwhite bigotry."

◆ Chapter 3: "But Equality Is Here"

Chapter 3 recounts Owens's return to the United States after the 1936 Berlin Olympics. Despite mass public acclaim, he was unable to secure a job good enough to provide for his wife and family and pay his way through Ohio State University. He was forced to take a job as "a Cleveland playground instructor for $30 a week." Later, in desperation, Owens accepted an offer from two white promoters to race against a horse. "I was no longer a proud man who had won four Olympic gold medals. I was a spectacle, a freak who made his living by competing dishonestly against dumb animals."

Owens concludes by comparing his experiences with the much-greater opportunities available to African Americans in the 1960s. This comparison provides him with a further opportunity to denounce young black radicals of the time. Despite their enhanced opportunities in life, "that isn't nearly enough today for a lot of black students." Indeed, "it isn't enough for them to attend the finest universities in the world. They want to run them, appoint the teachers, tell the president what courses to have taught. And when they don't get their way, many of them bomb the campuses or burn the libraries." This is a reference to the widespread protests by African American students that took place in 1968 at leading universities across the United States, including the University of California, Princeton University, Michigan State University, and the universities of Texas, Kansas, and Oklahoma. The protesters typically complained of the patronizing attitudes of white sports coaches and demanded the hiring of more African American teachers and the introduction of courses in black studies.

◆ Chapter 4: "Negroes Have Human Hangups"

Chapter 4 deals with Owens's experiences at the 1968 Olympics in Mexico City. He begins by highlighting the sporting achievements of African Americans like Bob Beamon and Randy Matson who, like Owens himself in 1936, won gold medals and set new world and Olympic records. For Owens the best way to make a personal statement at the Olympic Games was by winning in athletic competition, just as he had done at Berlin. However, in Mexico it was not the real achievements of the likes of Beamon and Matson that would be remembered but the Black Power salute of Tommie Smith and John Carlos.

After noting that their actions "supposedly had tremendous overtones for all the American athletes and for the race problem itself," Owens seeks to downplay the significance of the protest. He depicts it as an example of immature, childish behavior, "two grammar school kids trying to create a tidal wave by skipping stones in the Pacific Ocean." He notes the failure of the Olympic Games boycott campaign that preceded it. He claims that apart from "a couple of wild ones," no other American athletes at the Olympics had any time for the protest, preferring to concentrate on what mattered, winning a gold medal.

Owens is quick to point out that black African athletes, including Kip Keino, Nate Temu, and Mamo Wolde, took no part in protest meetings. This is significant because Black Power advocates in the United States often cited the ideas and achievements of third world leaders, such as the Martinique-born Algerian nationalist Frantz Fanon, as inspiration for their actions. Turning to those athletes who supported protest activity, Owens seeks to downplay their significance by suggesting that they behaved in this way only because they were unable to achieve sporting success on the track and field. Thus, there were "a few British instigators," but "England didn't do too well in the Games and wasn't in many of the finals." Hal Connolly, "the one white American militant" "had lost out in his own event."

Owens's claims are only partially accurate. Although some African American athletes decided not to take part in protests, others did show support for the campaign. Lee Evans, Larry James, and Ron Freeman gold, silver, and bronze medal winners, respectively, in the 400-meter dash wore black berets at their awards ceremony. Evans and Freeman, together with Larry James and Vince Matthews (other African American members of the gold medal winning U.S. 4 X 400 meters relay team), wore black berets and gave a clenched-fist salute. Similarly, Bob Beamon and Ralph Boston, who came in first and third, respectively, in the long jump, appeared shoeless and wearing black socks when presented with their medals. It is notable that Owens fails to mention any of this earlier, when he praises Beamon's victory.

Owens also questions the patriotism of the protesters. He contrasts "the idea of dipping our flag as a symbol of black protest" with one of the most enduring popular images of World War II that of American servicemen raising the Stars and Stripes on Iwo Jima after capturing the island from the Japanese in 1945. In contrast, he describes Smith and Carlos's clenched-fist Black Power protests as "Nazi salutes."

Because Smith won the gold medal in his event, Owens is unable to explain away his involvement in the protest as the result of sporting failure. He thus tries to dismiss Smith's actions in other ways. He notes the role of white doctors on the U.S. team in ensuring that Smith was physically fit enough to compete in the Olympics. He also suggests that Smith's protest could be attributed to the influence of John Carlos and of Smith's wife, "who is really extreme on the subject of black power," rather than being an act of genuine conviction. Owens concludes by noting that, whatever its motivation, the protests and expulsion of Smith and Carlos "caused hardly a brief murmur" among the other athletes. This is a contradiction of his earlier statement that their protest was the most memorable incident of the Olympic Games.

Audience

Owens believed that the militant leaders of the Black Power movement were a vocal minority who did not represent the views of the majority of African Americans. In laying out his philosophy in book form, he hoped to appeal to moderate, mainstream Americans, the people President Richard M. Nixon had called the "silent majority" a year earlier, in 1969. Owens, in providing a detailed explanation of his thinking and in recalling the segregation and discrimination that he had endured when he was young, hoped to win the empathy and understanding of his readers. He believed that most ordinary Americans shared his views on race relations rather than those of the young Black Power radicals who had been critical of Owens for his conservatism and deference to authority.

Impact

The book did not yield the results that Owens had hoped for. His stridently worded attacks on black radicals made him appear ill-tempered, out of touch with the concerns of the younger generation, and lacking in racial pride. Even the black shoeshine man at the Chicago barbershop frequented by Owens joked that the Olympic legend was selling his house because African Americans had moved into the neighborhood. Within two years Owens felt obliged to write a follow-up book, I Have Changed, which modified the views he had expressed in his earlier work. In it he acknowledged that many African Americans suffered from poverty and social deprivation and that protest against such inequalities was justified.

Despite such admissions, Owens in many respects remained conservative in outlook. The publication of I Have Changed coincided with the staging of the 1972 Olympics in Munich, the first time they had been held in Germany since 1936. Attending as an honored guest, Owens again became involved in controversy following another protest by two African American athletes, Vincent Matthews and Wayne Collett. The gold and silver medalists, respectively, in the 400 meters, the two runners turned their backs on the American flag during the medal ceremony and refused to stand to attention during the playing of the American national anthem. Responding just as he had four years earlier, Owens subsequently became involved in a heated argument with the two men, unsuccessfully trying to persuade them to apologize for their actions. Although Matthews and Collett were expelled from the Olympics, their protest was overshadowed by the killing of eleven Israeli athletes in Munich by members of the militant Palestinian organization Black September. For present-day audiences, the Olympic Games of 1936, 1968, and 1972 provide good historical examples of the controversies that can, and do, arise as a result of the relationships between national sports and politics.

Questions for Further Study

1. What did Owens mean when he referred to "blackthinkers"? What was his attitude to the people he referred to by this word?

2. In narrating the experiences of his family, Owens seems to suggest that sharecropping in the South was as bad as—and perhaps even worse than—slavery. Why did he seem to think this? In what ways might he have been correct?

3. How would you describe Owens's attitude to the Carlos-Smith Black Power incident at the Olympic Games? Why might this attitude be somewhat surprising, given Owens's early life experiences?

4. The United States has had many black Olympians, and many of those Olympians have won several medals. Why, though, does the name Jesse Owens stand out among black Olympians?

5. What is your opinion of using the Olympic Games as a forum for making protest or political statements? Do you believe, for example, that a country should boycott the Games to protest human rights violations in another country that is participating?

Chapter 2: Henry Owens' Tortures

No one called me nigger until I was seven.

That was because an Alabama sharecropper's child in the First World War years almost never saw the white man who owned his every breath.

Owned.

In theory, the Emancipation Proclamation had been a wonderful thing. But in 1915 in Alabama it was only a theory. The Negro had been set free free to work eighteen hours a day, free to see all his labor add up to a debt at the year's end, free to be chained to the land he tilled but could never own any more than if he were still a slave. The blackthinkers of today, often talking from their integrated high-rises, restaurants and universities, don't know what it is to really be shut out like we were then, shut out so tight you actually wondered sometimes if you really existed.

You won't find Oakville, Alabama, on the map today. Eight miles from Decatur, in the northern strip of the state, it was more an invention of the white landowners than a geographical place. Whatever had the smack of civilization to it was in Decatur.

The grocery store was in Oakville, though. Just across the creek. But that wasn't as nice as it sounds, The white man owned the grocery store and he made sure it was awfully convenient. My parents tried not to end up there any more than they had to. Sometimes my father and my older brother Prentis would get up an hour earlier than their usual 4A.M. to try and shoot a few rabbits for supper. And my mother would find time somehow to tend a little vegetable garden in the back.

But those few rabbits and vegetables didn't go very far with nine mouths to feed. So you always ended up at the owner's store for food, just as you had to go there for tools. My father never paid any money at the grocery. The owner's man just entered our debt on a sheet of paper with £1 at the top we were the first of eight families who worked his spread of two hundred and fifty acres and in December of every year, the white man totaled up what you owed against the worth of your crop to find out how much you were ahead.

Only you never came out ahead. It always happened that those "cheap" tools and supplies you bought cost more than the nearly quarter of a million square feet they helped you to plant, just as the weekly potatoes and beans and corn bread (you only bought meat two times a year, on the holidays) always came to more than the six thousand pounds of cotton you enabled the owner to send North,

Each year that it happened, my father went into an angry fit and swore that he was going to learn to read to make sure they were only writing down on that list what he was actually buying. And Mother vowed that she'd learn numbers to check that they weren't charging us too much for it. But there was no one in Oakville to teach those things to them and no time to learn anyway. Besides, my father wouldn't go near a book he was superstitious about them. That was another holdover from slave days. So one December became the next, and with each one we became a little deeper in debt even though we usually put out more cotton every year than the one before, unless the weevils or some fungus disease had come along.

Our debt was small, though, compared to the other sharecroppers'. We were the "luckiest" family for miles around. My father had been blessed with four sons who had lived. I was the only one who couldn't help, not because I was too young but because I was too sick. Every winter for as long as I could remember, I'd come down with pneumonia. A couple of those years, I was close to never seeing spring.

Yet somehow my mother always pulled me through. Afterward, she'd take my father aside and plead with him to think about leaving the South and sharecropping. He sensed that she was right every Negro we knew was on a never-ending treadmill of poverty and ignorance but his fear of the unknown was even greater.

A few Negroes had left and gone North. But Henry Owens was over forty years old, an age not made by half a dozen Negro sharecroppers in Morgan County. It was late to pull up roots. And like most other sharecroppers, he was the son of the son of a slave. His own grandfather had told him the stories of being legally shot out, stories of death that came in the night, sometimes at the hands of the white man and sometimes through simple starvation. So, deep down in that invisible place where a man decides what to do, my father felt that we could have it even worse than we did in Oakville. He wasn't going to dare take a chance on that. The whole world would have to jerk out of orbit for him to pack us up and leave.

And that's just what happened. The whole world, Henry Owens' world, went completely out of orbit.

The first jolt was when I got sick again. This time was different. This time blood came up every time I coughed, and for about a week I didn't know where I was. My mother worked her homemade magic once more, but we all knew it would be the last time. My lungs were too weak.

Our neighbor a mile down was dead. That was the second jolt. My father began sharecropping about the same time Joe had. Joe was a few years younger, and my father had always kind of treated him like a little brother, telling what he knew about better ways to work the land, even lending out one of my brothers to him when things were pretty good, though that wasn't often.

Joe had to work his land alone because his wife kept having stillborn babies. Each time she'd get pregnant they didn't pray for a son but just for something alive. A child would have made life bearable. Yet the years passed and all Joe and Betsy shared were new grave markers in back of their house each twelve months or so.

Then Joe got a "sign." Something told him that Betsy would become pregnant again soon and that this time the baby would not only live but would be a son. When her belly began to swell, Joe's skeleton of a body stopped feeling tired. He worked as never before and whistled every day until the baby came, It came, dead as always. Only this time it took Betsy with it.

So Joe Steppart killed himself.

My father changed after that. Not enough to leave, but enough to begin to think out loud about what that white man and his system were doing to all of us. The white man's name was John Clannon, by the way, and his home was on the top of the one large hill on the other side of the creek. It was too far, of course, for him to see down into our little house. But at night when all the lights were shining on the hill, I imagined I saw him at his big living room window, a window larger than our whole house, watching us.

John Clannon owned two hundred and fifty acres of land with eight men sharecropping it for him. We had the largest spread, fifty acres, because we had the most sons. All the eight houses of the Negroes were on the one side of the creek. John Clannon had never crossed over to that side since he bought the land and carved it up. None of the Negroes ever went on his side, either, unless they were sent for by one of his men.

On a cool night in February of 1921, he sent for my father. We all waited, busying ourselves but not really able to get anything done. "I wonder what the owner can want with Papa," someone would mutter every now and then. What we really meant was, "What was the owner going to do to Papa?" And to us.

For even though we didn't realize it then, we lived with constant fear. That is the crucial difference between 1920 and, say, 1960. Negroes of a decade or two ago began in poverty and degradation, but the massive machinery of our society was moving to sweep it away. In 1920 there was no machinery. The man on the hill was everything. He was worse in one way than the "benevolent" white despots on slave plantations, because the Negro then wasn't plagued every day by the agonizing choice of what to do with his freedom, whether or not to leave.

In theory, of course, my folks had a fifty-fifty deal with John Clannon, but fifty percent of nothing amounts to nothing. So we lived in fear of him and of his power, and the fear was justified. That February night proved it. My father trudged back into the house almost an hour later and took aside my mother and my older brothers Prentis and Quincy. In our little cardboard house, though, as soon as his voice got agitated it wasn't hard to overhear what he was telling them.

We'd had a particularly good crop that year. Even with exorbitant grocery bills every week, it had still gotten us out of debt. That threatened John Clannon's hold over us, I guess, and he wanted to do something about it right away. What he proposed to do was to revise his deal with my father. Sixty-forty instead of fifty-fifty. Retroactive.

My father had stood still for everything else, but he couldn't stand still for that. The years of resentment had risen up in him and finally become words. He was an uneducated man, but he was a fair man, and he said that this wasn't fair. He didn't get to say it to Clannon himself, though. An "assistant" talked to "the niggers."

"Fair?" the assistant had replied. "What does fair have to do with you?" My father was an example, he said. If he could "get the best" of Clannon, the others might think they could too.

"And what about my family?" my father bad shot back, finally beginning to lose forty-two years of control. "We work hard. I want my sons to amount to more than I have!"

"Your sons will never amount to anything just be grateful if they survive!" the man had shouted back.

That last statement had stuck in my father's craw. He struggled to spit it out for the next two days, but it only lodged deeper. That Sunday after church he told us that we were leaving Oakville for Cleveland.

We still owed John Clannon some money, but we had our tools and our house and our animals. That would more than pay what we owed and keep us eating in Cleveland long enough, my father figured, for him to find steady work.

My father never found steady work in Cleveland, and we'd had barely enough money to get us North. Clannon offered us next to nothing for everything we owned, including the five mules from Canada my father had scraped and saved for one by one by one. It wasn't just greed that made Clannon do it. He didn't want to let us go. A healthy Negro with three sons who knew the ropes was hard to find.

But we got the hell out. As I said, for my father Cleveland wasn't much different from Oakville. Yet for me it was like another planet. It gave me a chance. And one chance is all you need, no matter what the blackthinkers say.

As I think back, though, I can see part of it was that the white man's words had stuck in my craw, too. Your sons will never amount to anything. I wanted to amount to something. I had to. So did a lot of other Negroes whose names you'll never hear, but who have amounted to something. That's why when I hear some black militant telling me and them that we've never made anything of ourselves and that our sons and daughters never will, I wonder if it isn't John Clannon's assistant talking again.

It's no accident that the Rap Browns and Stokely Carmichaels sometimes sound like the Clannons.

Because blackthink pro-Negro, antiwhite bigotry is what makes the new Negro and white extremists of today tick, and it's not much different from John Clannon's whitethink. Irrationality and violence, above all, are at blackthink's gut. It might sound shocking at first, what with all the brainwashing that goes on, but if you think about it you'll see that America's blackthinking extremists may be the new George Wallaces.

Bigotry always begins with a hurt. For the John Clannons it might have been when they got off the boat from Ireland and found signs that said NO IRISH ALLOWED or ran into employer after employer who thought that Irish was another word for drunk. Some of those John Clannons couldn't take it. And their way of copping out wasn't going on a binge or sailing back to Ireland. What they did was to work their knuckles to the bone, with bitterness their twenty-four-hour-a-day boss, and when they got power and money they took it out on my father and seven other men and their families. The grandsons of some of those families became the Raps and Harrys of today.…

Chapter 3: But Equality Is Here

I came back from Berlin and the 1936 Olympics to a welcome few people have ever experienced. The streets of New York were lined with tens of thousands of men and women and children wanting to see me to touch me as I moved through on the top of a new convertible. It was something else. But it didn't completely fool an Oakville sharecropper's son. Every newspaper had a picture of my face on its front page, and people I'd never met from society and business were buttonholing me to come to their plush suites for drinks and dinners and yachting trips; but one omission stood out more and more as the months passed.

No one had offered me a job.

My mother was taking care of our first daughter back in Cleveland, and now it seemed as though another were on the way. So soon Ruth wouldn't be able to work anymore. It was going to be impossible for me to support a family of four and still get my degree. My brother Sylvester volunteered to help put me through, but I couldn't let him. He was the one who should've gone to college in the first place. He was always the bright one. But like all the others in our family except for me, he didn't even have a chance to finish high school. I couldn't keep taking from them all my life, so I didn't go back to Ohio State University as a senior that fall of 1936. I went to work.

It wasn't as a star halfback for a professional football team, though I think I might have made a good one. Nor was it as a center fielder for a major league baseball team. Negroes hadn't broken into any of that yet. But you could say that I went into the general field of athletics and that I capitalized on the ten years of torturous training I'd put my body through.

I became a Cleveland playground instructor for $30 a week.

Fifteen hundred and sixty dollars a year was enough to support a small family, but it wasn't enough to put me back in college. Negroes hadn't offered me anything better because they didn't have anything better to offer, and the white men who wanted me to travel at their expense to their homes all over the country and drink with their sons and chat with their daughters didn't seem to have any openings in their firms except for delivery boys or bathroom attendants.

"What does it pay?" I finally asked one of them.

"Oh, Jesse," he said, putting his plump, pale fingers on my shoulder, "you wouldn't want to do something like that after what you've had."

So I didn't do something like that. I worked at the playground and came home every night and thought of what I'd had and went off in a corner of our two-room apartment where I hoped Ruth couldn't hear me and put some week-old newspapers in front of my face to try to hide my sadness.

Ruth never said a word. But she knew. It was almost the same for her as it was for me. We'd been childhood sweethearts and had come the long road together. She'd watched me exercise before school every morning until I was slowly molded from a sick, skinny kid into a real athlete and finally into a champion, had walked with me after school to the different jobs I worked. When we did marry at sixteen we'd been able to save only six dollars, and the license, hotel and wedding dinner (a hot dog with all the relish the man would allow) took a lot of that.

But then the good times started to come, the running and jumping records, the headlines, the reporters, the Olympics. My family and I never said it to each other in those words, Ruth and I never even talked about it, but we were all thinking: Can I have broken out? Can a Negro, a poorer-than-poor colored kid from Alabama, have really broken out? Was it possible that, even for one black boy, the American dream was more than a cruel fairy tale?

My father never would believe it. He didn't want to spoil the fairy tale for me, but a couple of times he did take me aside. "J.C.," he confided (James Cleveland was my real name and he never got used to the new name given me by people up North), "it don't do a colored man no good to get himself too high. 'Cause it's a helluva drop back to the bottom."

And it was.

As the days passed after the Olympics and the best I could do was make $130 a month watching kids on the swings, Ruth and I began to feel as though we were being sucked back into that dark, endless tunnel where every Negro has to end up.

I couldn't let it happen. I had known too much, not only in the Olympics, but in my dreams. Yet what could I do about it? I had jumped farther and run faster than any man ever had before, and it left me with next to nothing.

College was the only answer. If I could just get back to Ohio State and finish my senior year, something would come of it. I didn't know how, but I felt that getting a B.A. would somehow make all the difference. Yet I couldn't return to college while supporting a family of four on my salary, I had begun to hate my job at the playground as I'd hated John Clannon. But like my father, I was afraid to leave.

Then two white promoters came to my apartment one night. They had an idea, Negro baseball, and they needed a "name" to publicize it. Naturally there were no well-known colored baseball players because none had been allowed in the major leagues, so they had to go outside of baseball. I was a natural choice.

The idea really grabbed me at first. I thought they wanted me to play or at least be manager of one of two teams they planned to have touring the country playing against each other. But that wasn't quite what they had in mind. I wasn't to be connected to the baseball end of it at all. Though, once again, you could say that my athletic prowess would be used.

They wanted me to run a hundred yards against a thoroughbred racehorse before the game each night.

When they said it, I wanted to throw up. They tried to tell me it would be a challenge. I'd beaten every man on earth, now I'd prove I could beat every animal. And I would beat the horse, they confided. Because the race would begin with a starter's gun held right near the animal's ear. Before the watching crowd knew it, I would be off to a big lead while the frightened horse was trying to get his bearings. He would cut that lead once he got started but, with my speed and only a hundred yards to run, I'd win by a few inches.

"Nothing doing," I told them in a temper.

"You think about it," one of them said shrewdly. "We'll be back on Sunday."

For five days I swore under my breath at those two white men. For five days I kept telling myself how I hated their idea. But when they returned on Sunday, all the pain of the playground and everything it represented suddenly seemed to well up in me, Before either one of them could get a word out I heard myself say, "I've decided to do it."

So I sold myself into a new kind of slavery. I was no longer a proud man who had won four Olympic gold medals. I was a spectacle, a freak who made his living by competing dishonestly against dumb animals. I hated it, hated it worse than working at the playground. But I ran against those horses three times a week, and five cents of every dollar the people paid to watch went into my pocket. It was degrading and humiliating. But it meant that next fall I could go back to college.

Today it's a little different. Like most whites, Negroes who want to go to college do go. And often without having to hold jobs while there or even without a pair of middle-class parents to send them. If "ghetto" high schools haven't properly prepared them, there are hundreds of university-connected programs across the country where they can spend a year boning up before they enter. In fact, not only are Negroes going to college virtually whenever they really want to, but they're going where they want.

Of course, that isn't nearly enough today for a lot of black students. It isn't enough for them to attend the finest universities in the world. They want to run them, appoint the teachers, tell the president what courses to have taught, And when they don't get their way, many of them bomb the campuses or burn the libraries.…

Chapter 4: Negroes Have Human Hangups

The sad fact is that a hypersensitive and naive public, an often out-of-touch "moderate" leadership and a sometimes headline-hungry press have played perfectly into the hands of the blackthinkers. The last Olympics were an example. What will be remembered by the American public? Bob Beamon's incredible twenty-nine-foot leap in the broad jump? Randy Matson's breaking the Olympic record in his first shotput try? Al Oerter's fourth straight gold medal in the discus (when he worked in an aircraft factory and could practice only forty-five minutes a day)? Billy Toomey's decathlon record? Wyomia Tyus's great hundred-meter triumph? No, the 1968 Olympics will always be remembered here for the Smith-Carlos incident, where two black runners from the U.S. gave a black-power salute on the victory platform and were sent home by the Olympic Committee.

Big deal.

I've seen whole countries pull out of the Olympics. And there have been athletes sent home for misconduct every year since the Games were formed, and that goes back to ancient Greece. Whenever you get thousands of young men together, you're bound to have a few that will become too rowdy. But this wasn't merely a case of rowdyism. This supposedly had tremendous overtones for all the American athletes and for the race problem itself.

Believe me, the Smith-Carlos incident had as many overtones in Mexico City as two grammar school kids trying to create a tidal wave by skipping stones in the Pacific Ocean. I know what Life magazine said. I know what virtually every newspaper in the United States said. And I also know the truth because I was there, not only living with these athletes, but chairman of the Consultant's Committee that dealt with both their personal and political problems.

And I want you to know that the whole incident was another "black herring." It wasn't part of any big effort to make the case for black power at the Games. If you'll remember, the whole "black boycott" that Harry Edwards tried to pull off for that Olympiad fell flatter on its face than a one-legged hurdler, as Dave Albritton used to say.

Sure the newspapers in America kept guessing about it beforehand. But those of us who really were in the know didn't. Because we knew the competitors. We knew there were a couple of wild ones but that almost overwhelmingly the American athletes were most interested in doing what was really their thing at Mexico. Like Jimmy Hines, the record-breaking sprint man and new "world's fastest human." He wanted to win at Mexico City and break a record to boot, so that he could get himself a good professional football contract. Or Bob Beamon and Ralph Boston, the champion black broad jumpers. They're sympathetic to the Negro cause, as I am and as I hope everyone is, but they wouldn't have dreamed of copying the Smith-Carlos stuff. The same goes for virtually all the rest, Negro and white. The proof is that there weren't any other incidents.

And there weren't any among the athletes of the other thirty-eight nations there. Think of all those seven thousand plus performers from every nook and cranny of the world, then realize that not one went along with Smith and Carlos, and you'll see what a tempest in a teapot a broken teapot the whole thing was. The African athletes in particular showed no sympathy for what John and Tommy did. Kenya's Kip Keino, for example, didn't have time for black-power meetings. He already had the power. He proved it by heating our Jim Ryun in the 1,500 meters in less than three minutes and thirty-five seconds, an amazing speed for that staggering Mexico City altitude, which sent behemoths like Australia's record holder Ron Clarke to the hospital.

The same went for Keino's teammate, Nate Temu, who won the 10,000 meters, and for Mamo Wolde, the Ethiopian who was right behind him. No meetings for them. No warm hellos to Smith and Carlos, either. No hellos at all, as far as I could see. The Africans weren't even friendly with our black athletes. They usually stayed with their own countrymen, but when they didn't they were perfectly at ease with the athletes from other countries, eating or sleeping, talking or laughing, black or white.

There were a few British instigators. England didn't do too well in the Games and wasn't in many of the finals. I don't like the idea of "team" totals in the Olympics, but it is interesting to note that England was in thirteenth place overall beneath countries like Rumania. And of course there was one American white militant, Hal Connolly. He had lost out in his own event, and was with Carlos constantly. Hal believed that there should be a demonstration at the Games to dramatize what seemed to him the Negro's plight in America. At one meeting, for instance, he brought up the idea of dipping our flag as a symbol of black protest.

I asked him if he knew about the tradition of never letting the flag dip.

He looked confused. Sometimes it's easy to forget that these are nineteen-, twenty-, twenty-five-year-old kids, most of whom weren't even born until World War II was over. But Hal is nearly forty.

I told him about the tradition. I didn't like the Vietnam War, either, I said, but explained that fighting the Nazis and the Japanese was something else. That flag he was talking about was planted on Iwo Jima by men like his father. Iwo Jima represented a principle the same principle Hal wanted to uphold by dipping the flag.

They didn't dip the flag.

Carlos and Smith did give the black-power salute, of course. But even their thoughts at the Olympics weren't consumed by the race situation. First, they had to worry about winning. If they didn't get up there on the medalists' pedestal, they weren't going to be giving any salutes at all. And Tommy Smith's feat in winning the two hundred meters took monolithic concentration on that event and nothing else. It was even more amazing because that afternoon he pulled a muscle in his groin, one of the more painful injuries a sprinter can have. In the beginning, it didn't seem as though he'd be running the finals at all a few hours later. But a white physician from Oklahoma named Cooper worked on him, and Tommy ran. And broke not only the Olympic record but the world mark.

Tommy is a high-class boy, and I think that much of what he did at the Games was influenced by John Carlos and by Tommy's wife, who is really extreme on the subject of black power. And speaking of wives, there wouldn't have been any demonstration at all if the Consultant's Committee hadn't found places for

"black herring"	a play on the phrase "red herring," meaning a diversion or distraction (as a fish dragged across its path would distract a dog)
Emancipation Proclamation	two executive orders issued by President Abraham Lincoln; the order in September 1862 declared that any slave in a Confederate state would be free if the state did not return to Union control by the first day of 1863; the second, issued on January 1, 1863, specified the ten states in which the first order would apply.
George Wallaces	a reference to George Wallace, the segregationist governor of Alabama
Harrys	probably a reference to Harry Edwards, who launched a movement urging black athletes to boycott the 1968 Olympic Games
Iwo Jima	a Pacific island that was the site of a major battle against the Japanese in World War II in 1945, famous for an iconic photograph of five Marines and one Navy corpsman raising the U.S. flag on Mount Suribachi
Rap Browns	a reference to civil rights activist H. Rap Brown, chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee and later the "justice minister" of the Black Panther Party sharecropper	a farmer who works another person's land in return for a share of the land's production
Smith-Carlos incident	a reference to Tommie Smith and John Carlos, two black U.S. Olympic athletes who caused controversy by raising their fists in a Black Power salute on the medal stand
Stokely Carmichaels	a reference to Stokely Carmichael, a leader of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee and the Black Panther Party and popularizer of the phrase "Black Power" the wives to live. Carlos had brought his wife Kim, and she was living unauthorized in a segment of the athletes' quarters. The Olympic Committee was about to remove her, and I think if she had been sent home, her husband would have gone with her. Without John, I wonder if Tommy Smith would have given any Nazi salutes. But I met with them and then with the Olympic Committee, and the next day Mrs. Carlos had a place of her own to stay in, with the Committee paying for it.

So Olympic committees picked up tabs and white doctors healed pulled muscles and as a result Tommy Smith and John Carlos were able to make sick headlines in every town in America. Actually, they double-crossed some of their own black teammates who wanted a more organized, meaningful demonstration, by doing what they did. After it happened, I met with them to try and stop their expulsion from the Games. I knew what the Olympic Committee was going to do, and I realized that unless we could come up with a pretty good argument, Tommy and John would be sent packing.

I had hopes they'd be reasonable, Tommy in particular. But they arrived at the meeting with Hal, who was fanning the fire. Negro militants always become more militant before white audiences. Carlos lost his cool right away, I kept asking him to tell it to me like it really was so that I could make the Olympic Committee understand. "It don't make no difference what I say or do," Carlos would keep repeating. "I'm lower than dirt, man. I'm black." And every time he said something like that, Hal Connolly just about cheered.

Finally, I got fed up. "You know, Carlos," I yelled, "you talk about Whitey this and Whitey that. Everything's 'get Whitey out of my hair!' But when it comes to the most private kind of meeting of all, here you are with good old Whitey! He goes everywhere you go. Man, I can get along without him. How come you can't?"

The meeting was over. I went to the Olympic Committee and did what I could. It wasn't enough.

But life went on. In the Olympic village, in fact, the Smith-Carlos dismissal caused hardly a brief murmur among the American athletes. And nothing at all among the rest.

Angela Davis's "Political Prisoners, Prisons, and Black Liberation"

1971

"The prison is a key component of state's coercive apparatus."

Overview

In 1971 the civil rights activist Angela Davis was a prisoner in the Marin County, California, jail. There she wrote "Political Prisoners, Prisons, and Black Liberation," published that year in a collection she edited, If They Come in the Morning: Voices of Resistance. The essay marks Davis's early commitment to prison reform and the liberation of black prisoners. She was in jail at the time because of the death of California Superior Court Judge Harold Haley, who was shot with a gun registered in Davis's name during a botched effort to free a prisoner from a California courtroom. Davis's incarceration drew international attention, and she was eventually acquitted of all charges, but her life was forever marked by this incident. Not only did it influence her career as an activist, it also informed and directed her efforts for prison reform. Davis, a prolific writer and lecturer, focused throughout her life on issues of social inequality. Outlining the sociopolitical mechanisms underlying gender, race, sex, and class divisions and disparities, Davis's writings analyze a variety of cultural and artistic trends. "Political Prisoners, Prisons, and Black Liberation" typifies the kind of social analysis Davis pursued in her early activist days and in her long academic career.

Context

Davis's formative years saw the nonviolent actions of the 1950s civil rights protests yield to the more confrontational Black Power movement of the late 1960s. Although legislative changes were enacted in the mid-1960s, much work still needed to be done. The Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Voting Rights Act of 1965, the Immigration and Nationality Services Act of 1965, and the Civil Rights Act of 1968 all moderated institutionalized racial discrimination, but racial violence and white supremacist groups continued to flourish. By 1966 Stokely Carmichael had adopted the slogan "Black Power," and Huey Newton and Bobby Seale had created the Black Panther Party to combat the violence of the Ku Klux Klan, noting that the police did little to protect the rights and lives of black citizens. The Black Panther Party and the Black Power movement espoused the ideology of Malcolm X, the assassinated leader who believed that confrontation and even violence were necessary to alter the public's racial consciousness. Unlike the peace marches of Martin Luther King, Jr., the Black Panther Party advocated a policy of action, a theme that became immensely popular within the prison community.

The Black Panthers represented the revolutionary fervor of the American Left, much of it focused on the issues of civil rights and black liberation. Prominent members of the party included H. Rap Brown, Stokely Carmichael, Eldridge Cleaver, and Fred Hampton. The Panthers were an avowedly revolutionary organization that openly called for the overthrow of the capitalist system. During the late 1960s and early 1970s, the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Counter Intelligence Program conducted extensive surveillance mostly illegal of numerous individuals and organizations who espoused leftist and Communist principles, including the Black Panthers, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, the Congress of Racial Equality, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Weather Underground, and various militant black nationalist groups. It should be acknowledged that the FBI also investigated white supremacist groups such as the Ku Klux Klan and other right-wing organizations. After the assassination of Martin Luther King, Jr., in 1968, Davis joined the Communist Party USA, guaranteeing that she and her associates would come to the attention of the FBI. Bureau director J. Edgar Hoover deemed the Black Panther Party the most dangerous subversive organization in the country.

In August 1970, Davis was accused of complicity in the killing of Superior Court Judge Harold Haley. The incident involved the Soledad Brothers, three African American inmates in California's Soledad Prison, near San Francisco. The inmates, including the Black Panther activist George Jackson (who has been described variously as Davis's friend or lover), were charged with murdering a prison guard earlier that year in retaliation for the shooting of three black inmates in an alleged escape attempt. On August 7, a group of African American men led by Jonathan Jackson, George Jackson's younger brother, invaded the Marin County courtroom demanding the release of the Soledad Brothers. Judge Haley was taken hostage and killed in the escape from the botched assault. Guns purchased in Davis's name were linked to the shooting, and she openly admitted to having ties to the gunmen. Davis fled the state and was placed on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted list. She was captured in New York, where she spent months in solitary confinement, and was remanded to California, where she awaited trial. Davis's case became international news, polarizing the American population, already deeply troubled during a year of Vietnam War protests and the May campus shootings at Kent State University in Ohio and Jackson State College in Mississippi. Activists from around the globe moved into high gear, and through their action Davis was allowed to integrate with the rest of the prison population. Later, she was released on bail. Sixteen months after her arrest, she was acquitted, but the incident, predictably, was perceived differently in the opposing camps of a polarized society. Some believed that Davis was guilty but had escaped due punishment; others believed she was innocent and was freed only because of the watchful eyes of the world. It was during Davis's pretrial imprisonment that she wrote "Political Prisoners, Prisons, and Black Liberation."

About the Author

Angela Yvonne Davis was born in Birmingham, Alabama, on January 26, 1944. She grew up in an area known as "Dynamite Hill" because it was frequently bombed by white supremacist groups working to force black families like the Davises out of white communities. She won a scholarship to study at Elisabeth Irwin High School, a progressive institution in New York City, in 1959 and then went on to Brandeis University, with studies at the University of Paris in her junior year. She was deeply influenced by the 1963 bombing of the Sixteenth Street Baptist Church in Birmingham. The four girls who died in the bombing, carried out at the hands of the Ku Klux Klan, had been friends of the Davis family. This event as well as other racially charged incidents of the 1960s spurred her activism. While completing her doctoral dissertation in philosophy at the Humboldt University of East Berlin, Davis obtained a short-lived academic post at the University of California, Los Angeles, in 1969. The California Board of Regents pressured the university to remove Davis from her position because of her affiliation with the Communist Party. Although the university initially backed Davis, it released her when she became the Los Angeles chair of the Soledad Brothers Defense Committee.

Davis was eventually cleared of all charges in connection with the courtroom killings, and her life's work became increasingly focused upon the need to reform the prison system and the racially biased judicial system. Having become the focus of massive national and international attention, Davis became an icon of black radicalism, demonized by some and lionized by others. From 1975 to 1977, she was a lecturer in African American Studies at Claremont College. She then taught women's and ethnic studies at San Francisco State University. In 1979 she visited the Soviet Union to receive the Lenin Peace Prize and was named an honorary professor at Moscow State University. In 1980 and 1984, she ran for vice president of the United States on the Communist Party ticket. In 1988 she was one of the cofounders of Critical Resistance, a grassroots organization formed to dismantle the U.S. prison system. In 1991 she ended her connection with the Communist Party, in part because of her refusal to support the hard-line coup against Mikhail Gorbachev in the Soviet Union, identifying herself instead as a Democratic Socialist. Davis has lectured at numerous universities and taught in the history of consciousness program at the University of California, Santa Cruz. She continues to lecture and write about the cultural system that, in her view, not only divides the population along racial and gender lines but also fosters class divisions that employ systemic violence as a means to maintain a gendered and racial hierarchical structure. Davis's body of work is extensive, spanning over forty years. She continues to develop her approach to teaching, and she inspires both intellectuals and activists as she illuminates inequality based upon race, gender, sexual orientation, and economic class.

Angela Davis is a prolific writer who pulls together the individual components of inequality to analyze systemic failures. Focusing on feminism and antiracism, Davis creates a political philosophy based upon liberation theory, which guides her analysis and activism. Weaving together the component parts of U.S. and, ultimately, global culture, Davis demonstrates how race and gender are used to control economic and societal power. Her work in the Black Panther Party and the Communist Party, under the banner of which she twice ran for U.S. vice president, cost her professionally. Her desire to correct what she saw as sexual and racial divisiveness in the Communist Party prevented her from running for reelection within the party and forced her to abandon the party entirely. In "Political Prisoners, Prisons, and Black Liberation" Davis notes the connections between the nation's slave history and the modern penal system, equating the disparity of racial representation within jails with a new form of slavery.

In the opening paragraphs, Davis announces her theme in her references to the "unjust immoral laws" of the American penal system and the "oppressive social order from which they emanate." "Bitter experience" has taught Americans that being "patient" is fruitless, for people have little control over their social and legal circumstances.

◆ Historical Perspective

Davis gives extensive attention to the circumstances of American history that have affected African Americans although it should always be remembered that while her focus is African Americans, much of what she says applies to other minorities and even to much of the white working-class community. Central to this discussion is slavery and its perpetuation through such laws as the fugitive slave laws.

Time Line

- Davis cofounds Critical Resistance, an organization dedicated to eliminating the prison system.

These unjust "reflections of existing social inequalities" have required the oppressed to forge "effective channels of resistance," in effect forcing them to violate laws though even when they do not violate laws, their very resistance is branded as criminal. She cites as an example of this "extra-legal anti-slavery activity" the Underground Railroad, the informal system of guides, routes, and safe houses that allowed slaves to escape to the North and, in many instances, to Canada. She refers to the case of Anthony Burns, a Virginia slave whose supporters, among them the prominent abolitionist Thomas Wentworth Higginson, took up arms to free him. She also alludes to John Brown, a white abolitionist who led an abortive raid on the federal arsenal at Harpers Ferry, Virginia, in 1859. Brown was executed that year, but he was regarded as a heroic figure in many quarters.

Davis goes on to note that throughout the abolitionist era and beyond, blacks and progressive whites had to violate the law. She refers to the post Civil War Black Codes laws passed in the southern states to deny blacks their civil rights and keep them in subservient positions, usually by inhibiting their freedom of movement and freedom to contract for their labor. Typical of these codes was the code in Mississippi, which read, in part:

> All contracts for labor made with freedmen, free Negroes, and mulattoes for a longer period than one month shall be in writing and a duplicate, attested and read to said freedman, free Negro, or mulatto, by a beat, city or county officer, or two disinterested white persons of the county in which the labor is to be performed, of which each party shall have one; … and if the laborer shall quit the service of the employer, before the expiration of his term of service, without good cause, he shall forfeit his wages for that year, up to the time of quitting.

Davis points out that blacks took up arms to defend themselves from "codified racism and terror" during this era. In the twentieth century, figures such as Marcus Garvey, the founder of the Universal Negro Improvement Association, called on people to flout discriminatory laws to protect themselves from "legalized terror" and from such organizations as the Ku Klux Klan. During the civil rights movement of the 1950s and early 1960s, sit-ins (where, for example, blacks would sit at segregated lunch counters) were conducted in violation of the law.

◆ The Political Prisoner

These and other instances led Davis to conclude that the "common denominator" linking those who violated the law and were then imprisoned was that they were political prisoners. She notes that there is a difference between someone who commits a crime for his or her own self-interest and one who violates a law because the law oppresses a class of people. The former are criminals; the latter are revolutionaries, and when they are captured, they are political prisoners. The political prisoner is one whose words or deeds have "brought him into acute conflict with the state." In this context, the alleged crime is of little importance. The accused may stand trial for a crime, but the crime does not exist or has only "nominal existence." She cites as an example the case of Joe Hill, an organizer for the Industrial Workers of the World (the "Wobblies"), a radical labor organization that espoused ideals that many regarded as Communist. Davis asserts that the murder charge against him was a "blatant fabrication" and that he was arrested solely because the authorities wanted to silence "a militant crusader against oppression."

Davis acknowledges that the authorities often feel a sense of ambivalence about political prisoners. As an example she cites the judge in the Sacco and Vanzetti case, a notorious episode in which two Italian immigrants, Ferdinando Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti, were accused of murdering two men during an armed robbery in Massachusetts and, after a series of appeals, were executed in 1927. It was widely believed at the time, and still today, that the two may have been innocent of the crime, but their anarchist associations doomed them at a time when the nation was beset by fear of Communism. She cites the example of a Nazi jurist who advanced the theory that a person might be a thief, and thus liable to the penalties of the law, without having committed an overt act of theft. According to Davis, President Richard Nixon and his FBI director, J. Edgar Hoover, subscribed to a similarly Fascist doctrine. As a further example she cites the instances when Martin Luther King, Jr., was arrested for "nominal crimes" when his real "crime" was opposition to racism. Yet another example was Robert Williams, a North Carolina civil rights activist and the author of Negroes with Guns. In 1971 Williams was accused of kidnapping after offering refuge to a white couple who were passing through town during a time of racial disturbance. His real "crime," in Davis's estimation, was "advocacy of black people's incontestable right to bear arms in their own defense." After living in exile in Cuba and China, Williams returned voluntarily to the United States in 1969 and was eventually extradited to North Carolina, where, after the legal proceedings dragged on, charges were dropped in 1976.

Davis goes into more detail about the definition of a political prisoner, describing such a prisoner as one who boldly challenges "fundamental social wrongs fostered and reinforced by the state." She gives further historical examples, including that of Nat Turner, who led a slave rebellion in 1831 in Virginia and was caught, tried, and executed, in much the same way that John Brown was. Davis believes that the execution of these men was intended to "terrorize the anti-slavery movement in general" and to discourage abolitionist activity. In defending Turner against the charge of murder, she argues that his acts were little different from killings that resulted when colonial Americans took up arms against the British.

◆ Modern Civil Disobedience

Davis calls attention to modern civil disobedience, again stressing that the authorities work to subvert liberation movements. She discusses a 1970 incident in Los Angeles in which the Black Panthers took up arms to defend themselves from the police. A key point for her is that such people are demonized as pathological criminals, with little attention paid to their positive accomplishments. She states that self-defense is "twisted and distorted" by the authorities and "rendered synonymous with criminal aggression." The police, though, are exonerated as having committed "justifiable" acts of homicide. She calls these distortions "ideological acrobatics"; the purpose of criminalizing these acts is to discredit radical and revolutionary movements. The irony for her is that while the authorities do not acknowledge the political nature of their own actions, they nonetheless introduced Black Panther literature as evidence of criminal intent in a noted New York trial. Davis lays these distortions at the feet of President Nixon, Vice President Spiro Agnew, and California governor Ronald Reagan. In sum, Davis argues that the judicial and penal system is a tool used "in the state's fight to preserve the existing conditions of class domination, therefore racism, poverty and war."

Next, Davis alludes to an indictment that had been handed down in 1951 of W. E. B. Du Bois, a prominent black intellectual in the early part of the century. From 1949 to 1955, Du Bois was vice chairman of the Council on African Affairs, cited by the U.S. attorney general as a "subversive" organization. In 1950 he became the chairman of the Peace Information Center in New York City. During this period, fears of espionage and Communist influence abounded. The infamous hearings led by Wisconsin senator Joseph McCarthy were held to root out suspected Communists in the government and elsewhere. Du Bois's association with leftist groups made him suspect. In 1951 he was tried on the charge of failing to register as a foreign agent. Although he was acquitted, Du Bois remained in the eye of government agencies, and the State Department revoked his passport. Later, Du Bois officially joined the Communist Party and became a citizen of Ghana, where he died. The quotation is from his 1952 book, In Battle for Peace.

Davis sees Du Bois's realization as the beginning of a movement that has focused on political prisoners, particularly people of color. She sees a mass movement developing around political prisoners, who have become a "catalyst" for political action because they are able to expose the "oppressive structures of the penal system" and its ability to suppress social movements.

◆ The Prison System

Davis argues that the prison system is an "instrument of class domination" that focuses less on the alleged criminal act and more on the person who commits it. She argues that crime is a function of the unequal distribution of property and reflects social needs borne of poverty that is, that crime is a challenge to capitalism. In building her argument, she naturally refers to the nineteenth-century philosopher Karl Marx and to Marxism, the strand of historical-philosophical thought that provided the ideological underpinnings of Communism. Lumpenproletariat (literally "rag proletariat") is the German word Marx used for those working-class people who would never achieve class consciousness (awareness of their own predicament) and who were therefore of little use in the struggle to overthrow capitalism. The Paris Commune was a working-class government that briefly assumed power in France in 1871. Davis here argues, contra some contemporary Marxists, that the "lumpen" can indeed be aroused and educated, as they were in Paris, and that they are capable of heroic action. She endorses the same kind of action on the part of Americans especially blacks and other people of color who could easily be dismissed as too poor and too marginal to take part in the revolutionary struggle. With the unemployment rate among black youth so high, it is little wonder that some turned to crime in order to survive. Hence the need for groups like the Black Panthers to organize these members of the lumpenproletariat.

Davis goes into some detail about the inequities of the prison system, noting, first, that not all prisoners have committed crimes and second, that prison terms meted out to black and brown inmates are disproportionately long. Imprisonment brings the inmate face to face with racism as an institutional phenomenon, leading more and more prisoners to recognize that they are, in fact, political prisoners. This growing awareness was reflected in such documents as the Folsom Prisoners' Manifesto of Demands and Anti-Oppression Platform, issued in conjunction with a nineteen-day inmate strike at the Folsom State Prison in California in 1970.

◆ Prison and Revolutionary Movements

Davis's tone sharpens when she refers to the "ruling circles" of America and their "repressive measures" and "fascist tactics" designed to curtail revolutionary movements, including the movement to end the war in Indochina (the Vietnam War). Herbert Marcuse, a German social and political theorist who had mentored Davis at Brandeis, was an opponent of capitalism, and a favorite writer among leftist revolutionaries. Specific instances of brutality at Soledad Prison are cited here, especially the men who were killed by a prison guard, the incident that sparked the Soledad Brothers case. She calls the Soledad Brothers "frame-up victims."

Davis moves beyond literal imprisonment to address "racist oppression … on an infinite variety of levels." Blacks, she says, are imprisoned by an economic system that fails to provide jobs with decent pay. Unemployment in the ghettos is high. Unemployment among black youth is 30 percent. Schools are substandard, medical care is poor, and housing in dilapidated. Amid this poverty in places like Birmingham in Alabama, Harlem in New York City, and the Watts district of Los Angeles, the police are numerous and ever present in a "grotesque caricature" of the mission of serving and protecting. The police "encircle the community with a shield of violence." In this regard she refers to Franz Fanon, a mid-twentieth-century philosopher and revolutionary from Martinique whose work on colonial history, like that of Marcuse, was highly influential among leftists. Davis then goes into detail about how the judicial system abets the police as part of an "apparatus" that "summarily railroads black people into jails and prisons." All of this is part of black ghetto existence, causing deep hatred of the police.

◆ African American Resistance

In the final section Davis begins with the premise that "black people as a group have exhibited a greater potential for resistance than any other part of the population." She rails against the racism and exploitation perpetrated, in her view, by the Nixon administration an oppression that extends not only to blacks but also to Chicanos (that is, Hispanics), Puerto Ricans, and the antiwar movement. Despite the resistance of authorities, "black people are rushing full speed ahead" toward an understanding of repression and racism and are seeking liberation through armed revolution.

Essential Quotes

"But having been taught by bitter experience, we know that there is a glaring incongruity between democracy and the capitalist economy which is the source of our ills."

(Historical Perspective)

"Needless to say, the history of the Unites States has been marred from its inception by an enormous quantity of unjust laws, far too many expressly bolstering the oppression of black people."

(Historical Perspective)

"The offense of the political prisoner is political boldness, the persistent challenging—legally or extra-legally—of fundamental social wrongs fostered and reinforced by the state."

(The Political Prisoner)

"The ideological acrobatics characteristic of official attempts to explain away the existence of the political prisoner do not end with the equation of the individual political act with the individual criminal act. The political act is defined as criminal in order to discredit radical and revolutionary movements."

(Modern Civil Disobedience)

"The prison is a key component of state's coercive apparatus, the overriding function of which is to ensure social control."

(The Prison System)

"The ruling circles of America are expanding and intensifying repressive measures designed to nip revolutionary movements in the bud as well as to curtail radical-democratic tendencies, such as the movement to end the war in Indochina."

(Prison and Revolutionary Movements)

"Fascist," in the leftist rhetoric of the 1960s, refers not merely to the right-wing ideology of Adolf Hitler's Germany and Benito Mussolini's Italy but to any kind of repression directed against the poor, minorities, women, and other groups. In what Davis sees as a Fascist climate, thousands of people are political prisoners, including the Harrisburg Eight. The Harrisburg Eight, later Seven, were a group of religiously motivated antiwar activists led by Philip Berrigan, a Catholic priest, who were alleged to have plotted bombings and kidnappings in protest against the Vietnam War. For Davis, another symptom of this Fascism is the Nixon administration's 1970 "Crime Bill" that gave the government, among other provisions, greater latitude to conduct wiretaps. These and other examples are evidence for Davis that revolutionaries must nip Fascism in the bud; she argues, too, that the mass of ordinary citizens have an interest in doing so, and one way they can take action is to take part in the struggle to abolish the prison system. In support of this view she quotes Georgi Dimitrov, the Bulgarian Communist leader who had been prosecuted by the Nazis in 1933. Davis concludes by arguing that the white worker has a vested interest in issues of racism and political imprisonment, for "the merciless proliferation of the power of monopoly capital may ultimately push him inexorably down the very same path of desperation."

Audience

Angela Davis was writing chiefly to supporters and like-minded people. However, her intended audience was wider than that. Using Marxist theories to comment upon her own incarceration as well as her view of the biased nature of the U.S. penal code, Davis calls attention to the racial, class, and gender disparities in the American legal system. Particularly toward the end of her essay, she includes whites in her audience by arguing, in effect, that oppression of blacks can create a political system in which whites are equally vulnerable. At the time of the essay's publication, Davis was widely regarded by the American public as a dangerous radical yet another "revolutionary" from the turbulent 1960s. Passions have cooled with time, and Davis herself has slightly moderated her positions. Nevertheless, her early work, including "Political Prisoners, Prisons, and Black Liberation," has come to be regarded as an important window into a time of rapid social change in the United States.

Impact

The body of Angela Davis's writing has had a significant impact on both political and academic thought. Because her work spans over forty years and has evolved to incorporate a variety of issues, it has become increasingly important for those working on the sociopolitical analysis of class and race. Davis's work on critical race theory and the interconnections between race, gender, and class has influenced academics and activists since the 1960s. Since her earliest writings and her court case, which propelled her to the national spotlight, attitudes toward her work have shifted and softened. Although it was initially rejected by the mainstream as too radical, much of Davis's work is now recognized as foundational material by such prison abolition organizations as the Anarchist Black Cross, the Anarchist Prisoners' Legal Aid Network, Justice Now, Socialist Resistance, and the Prison Activist Resource Center.

Questions for Further Study

1. Compare this document with Eldridge Cleaver's "Education and Revolution." What similar views did the two authors express?

2. What is the fundamental basis for Davis's view that the prison system should be abolished?

3. Why do you think Angela Davis became an icon of black radicalism? What do you think was the attitude of mainstream Americans to Davis during the 1970s?

4. Summarize the influence of Marxist thought on Davis's views. Why did her Marxism render her a dangerous character in the 1970s in the view of many people?

5. Many revolutionaries of the 1960s and 1970s, including Davis and Eldridge Cleaver, later toned down their rhetoric and became somewhat more mainstream, or at least less radical, in their views. What do you think may have accounted for this change of heart?

Angela Davis's "Political Prisoners, Prisons, and Black Liberation"

Despite a long history of exalted appeals to man's inherent right to resistance, there has seldom been agreement on how to relate in practice to unjust immoral laws and the oppressive social order from which they emanate. The conservative, who does not dispute the validity of revolutions deeply buried in history, invokes visions of impending anarchy in order to legitimize his demand for absolute obedience. Law and order, with the major emphasis on order, is his watchword. The liberal articulates his sensitivity to certain of society's intolerable details, but will almost never prescribe methods of resistance that exceed the limits of legality redress through electoral channels is the liberal's panacea.

In the heat of our pursuit of fundamental human rights, black people have been continually cautioned to be patient. We are advised that as long as we remain faithful to the existing democratic order, the glorious moment will eventually arrive when we will come into our own as full-fledged human beings.

But having been taught by bitter experience, we know that there is a glaring incongruity between democracy and the capitalist economy which is the source of our ills. Regardless of all rhetoric to the contrary, the people are not the ultimate matrix of the laws and the system which govern them certainly not black people and other nationally oppressed people, but not even the mass of whites. The people do not exercise decisive control over the determining factors of their lives.

Officials' assertions that meaningful dissent is always welcome, provided it falls within the boundaries of legality, are frequently a smokescreen obscuring the invitation to acquiesce in oppression. Slavery may have been unrighteous, the constitutional precision for the enslavement of blacks may have been unjust, but conditions were not to be considered so bearable (especially since they were profitable to a small circle) as to justify escape and other acts proscribed by law. This was the import of the fugitive slave laws.

Needless to say, the history of the Unites States has been marred from its inception by an enormous quantity of unjust laws, far too many expressly bolstering the oppression of black people. Particularized reflections of existing social inequities, these laws have repeatedly born witness to the exploitative and racist core of the society itself. For blacks, Chicanos, for all nationally oppressed people, the problem of opposing unjust laws and the social conditions which nourish their growth, has always had immediate practical implications. Our very survival has frequently been a direct function of our skill in forging effective channels of resistance. In resisting we have been compelled to openly violate those laws which directly or indirectly buttress our oppression. But even containing our resistance within the orbit of legality, we have been labeled criminals and have been methodically persecuted by a racist legal apparatus.

Under the ruthless conditions of slavery, the underground railroad provided the framework for extra-legal anti-slavery activity pursued by vast numbers of people, both black and white. Its functioning was in flagrant violation of the fugitive slave law; those who were apprehended were subjected to severe penalties. Of the innumerable recorded attempts to rescue fugitive slaves from the clutches of slave catchers, one of the most striking is the case of Anthony Burns, a slave from Virginia, captured in Boston in 1853. A team of his supporters, in attempting to rescue him by force during the course of his trial, engaged the police in a fierce courtroom battle. During the gun fight, a prominent Abolitionist, Thomas Wentworth Higginson, was wounded. Although the rescuers were unsuccessful in their efforts, the impact of this incident "did more to crystallize Northern sentiment against slavery than any other except the exploit of John Brown, 'and this was the last time a fugitive slave was taken from Boston. It took twenty-two companies of state militia, four platoons of marines, a battalion of United States artillerymen, and the city's police force … to ensure the performance of this shameful act, the cost of which, the Federal government alone, came to forty thousand dollars.'"

Throughout the era of slavery, blacks, as well as progressive whites, repeatedly discovered that their commitment to the anti-slavery cause frequently entailed the overt violation of the laws of the land. Even as slavery faded away into a more subtle yet equally pernicious apparatus to dominate black people, "illegal" resistance was still on the agenda. After the Civil War, Black Codes, successors to the old Slave Codes, legalized convict labor, prohibited social intercourse between blacks and whites, gave white employers an excessive degree of control over the private lives of black workers, and generally codified racism and terror. Naturally, numerous individual as well as collective acts of resistance prevailed. On many occasions, blacks formed armed teams to protect themselves from white terrorists who were, in turn, protected by law enforcement agencies, if not actually identified with them.

By the second decade of the twentieth century, the mass movement, headed by Marcus Garvey, proclaimed in its Declaration of Rights that black people should not hesitate to disobey all discriminatory laws. Moreover, the Declaration announced, they should utilize all means available to them, legal or illegal, to defend themselves from legalized terror as well as Ku Klux Klan violence. During the era of intense activity around civil rights issues, systematic disobedience of oppressive laws was a primary tactic. The sit-ins were organized transgressions of racist legislation.

All these historical instances involving the overt violation of the laws of the land converge around an unmistakable common denominator. At stake has been the collective welfare and survival of a people. There is a distinct and qualitative difference between one breaking a law for one's own individual self-interest and violating it in the interests of a class of people whose oppression is expressed either directly or indirectly through that particular law. The former might be called criminal (though in many instances he is a victim), but the latter, as a reformist or revolutionary, is interested in universal social change. Captured, he or she is a political prisoner.

The political prisoner's words or deed have in one form or another embodied political protests against the established order and have consequently brought him into acute conflict with the state. In light of the political content of his act, the "crime" (which may or may not have been committed) assumes a minor importance. In this country, however, where the special category of political prisoners is not officially acknowledged, the political prisoner inevitably stands trial for a specific criminal offense, not for a political act. Often the so-called crime does not even have a nominal existence. As in the 1914 murder frame-up of the IWW organizer, Joe Hill, it is a blatant fabrication, a mere excuse for silencing a militant crusader against oppression. In all instances, however, the political prisoner has violated the unwritten law which prohibits disturbances and upheavals in the status quo of exploitation and racism. This unwritten law has been contested by actually and explicitly breaking a law or by utilizing constitutionally protected channels to educate, agitate, and organize masses to resist.

A deep-seated ambivalence has always characterized the official response to the political prisoner. Charged and tried for the criminal act, his guilt is always political in nature. This ambivalence is perhaps best captured by Judge Webster Thayer's comment upon sentencing Bartolomeo Vanzetti to fifteen years for an attempted payroll robbery: "This man, although he may not have actually committed the crime attributed to him, is nevertheless morally culpable, because he is an enemy of our existing institutions." (The very same judge incidentally, sentences Sacco and Vanzetti to death for a robbery and murder of which they were manifestly innocent). It is not surprising that Nazi Germany's foremost constitutional lawyer, Carl Schmitt, advanced the theory which generalized thus a priori culpability. A thief, for example, was not necessarily one who had committed an overt act of theft, but rather one whose character renders him a thief (wer nach seinem wesen win Dieb ist). [President Richard] Nixon's and [FBI Director] J. Edgar Hoover's pronouncements lead one to believe that they would readily accept Schmitt's fascist legal theory. Anyone who seeks to overthrow oppressive institutions, whether or not he has engaged in an overt act, is a priori a criminal who must be buried away in one of America's dungeons.

Even in all of Martin Luther King's numerous arrests, he was not so much charged with the nominal crimes of trespassing, and disturbance of the peace, as with being an enemy of the southern society, an inveterate foe of racism. When Robert Williams was accused of kidnapping, this charge never managed to conceal his real offense the advocacy of black people's incontestable right to bear arms in their own defense.

The offense of the political prisoner is political boldness, the persistent challenging legally or extralegally of fundamental social wrongs fostered and reinforced by the state. The political prisoner has opposed unjust laws and exploitative, racist social conditions in general, with the ultimate aim of transforming these laws and this society into an order harmonious with the material and spiritual needs and interests of the vast majority of its members.

Nat Turner and John Brown were political prisoners in their time. The acts for which they were charged and subsequently hanged were the practical extensions of their profound commitment to the abolition of slavery. They fearlessly bore the responsibility for their actions. The significance of their executions and the accompanying widespread repression did not lie so much in the fact that they were being punished for specific crimes, nor even in the effort to use their punishment as an implicit threat to deter others from similar armed acts of resistance. These executions, and the surrounding repression of slaves, were intended to terrorize the anti-slavery movement in general; to discourage and diminish both legal and illegal forms of abolitionist activity. As usual, the effect of repression was miscalculated and in both instances, anti-slavery activity was accelerated and intensified as a result.

Nat Turner and John Brown can be viewed as examples of the political prisoner who has actually committed an act which is defined by the state as "criminal". They killed and were consequently tried for murder. But did they commit murder? This raises the question of whether American revolutionaries had murdered the British in their struggle for liberation. Nat Turner and his followers killed some sixty-five white people, yet shortly before the revolt had begun, Nat is reputed to have said to the other rebelling slaves: "Remember that ours is not war for robbery nor to satisfy our passions, it is a struggle for freedom. Ours must be deeds and not words."

The very institutions which condemned Nat Turner and reduced his struggle for freedom to a simpler criminal case of murder, owed their existence to the decision, made a half-century earlier, to take up arms against the British oppressor.

The battle for the liquidation of slavery had no legitimate existence in the eyes of the government and therefore the special quality of deeds carried out in the interests of freedom was deliberately ignored. There were no political prisoners, there were only criminals; just as the movement out of which these deeds flowed was largely considered criminal.

Likewise, the significance of activities which are pursued in the interests of liberation today is minimized not so much because officials are unable to see the collective surge against oppression, but because they have consciously set out to subvert such movements. In the Spring of 1970, Los Angeles Panthers took up arms to defend themselves from an assault initiated by the local police force on their office and on their persons. They were charged with criminal assault. If one believed the official propaganda, they were bandits and rogues who pathologically found pleasure in attacking policemen. It was not mentioned that their community activities educational work, services such as free breakfast and free medical programs which had legitimized them in the black community, were the immediate reason for which the wrath of the police had fallen upon them. In defending themselves from the attack waged by some 600 policemen (there were only eleven Panthers in the office) they were defending not only their lives, but even more important their accomplishments in the black community surrounding them, and in the broader thrust for black liberation. Whenever blacks in struggle have recourse to self-defense, particular armed self-defense, it is twisted and distorted on official levels and ultimately rendered synonymous with criminal aggression. On the other hand, when policemen are clearly indulging in acts of criminal aggression, officially they are defending themselves through "justifiable assault" or "justifiable homicide".

The ideological acrobatics characteristic of official attempts to explain away the existence of the political prisoner do not end with the equation of the individual political act with the individual criminal act. The political act is defined as criminal in order to discredit radical and revolutionary movements. A political event is reduced to a criminal event in order to affirm the absolute invulnerability of the existing order. In a revealing contradiction, the court resisted the description of the New York Panther 21 trial as "political", yet the prosecutor entered as evidence of criminal intent, literature which represented, so he purported, the political ideology of the Black Panther Party.

The legal apparatus designates the black liberation fighter a criminal, prompting Nixon, [Vice President Spiro] Agnew, [California Governor Ronald] Reagan et al. to process to mystify with their demagogy millions of Americans whose senses have been dulled and whose critical powers have been eroded by the continual onslaught of racist ideology.

As the black liberation movement and other progressive struggles increase in magnitude and intensity, the judicial system and its extension, the penal system, consequently become key weapons in the state's fight to preserve the existing conditions of class domination, therefore racism, poverty and war.

In 1951, W.E.B. Du Bois, as Chairman of the Peace Information Center, was indicted by the federal government for "failure to register as an agent of a foreign principal." In assessing this ordeal, which occurred in the ninth decade of his life, he turned his attention to the inhabitants of the nation's jails and prisons:

> What turns me cold in all this experience is the certainty that thousands of innocent vic> tims are in jail today because they had neither money nor friends to help them. The eyes of the world were on our trial despite the desperate efforts of press and radio to suppress the facts and cloud the real issues; the courage and money of friends and of strangers who dared stand for a principle freed me; but God only knows how many who were as innocent as I and my colleagues are today in hell. They daily stagger out of prison doors embittered, vengeful, hopeless, ruined. And of this army of the wronged, the proportion of Negroes is frightful. We protect and defend sensational cases where Negroes are involved. But the great mass of arrested or accused black folk have no defense. There is desperate need of nationwide organizations to oppose this national racket of railroading to jails and chain gangs the poor, friendless and black.

Almost two decades passed before the realization attained by Du Bois on the occasion of his own encounter with the judicial system achieved extensive acceptance. A number of factors have combined to transform the penal system into a prominent terrain of struggle, both for the captives inside and the masses outside. The impact of large numbers of political prisoners both on prison populations and on the mass movement has been decisive. The vast majority of political prisoners have not allowed the fact of imprisonment to curtail their educational, agitational, and organizing activities, which they continue behind prison walls. And in the course of developing mass movements around political prisoners, a great deal of attention has inevitably been focused on the institutions in which they are imprisoned. Furthermore the political receptivity of prisoners especially black and brown captives has been increased and sharpened by the surge of aggressive political activity rising out of black, Chicano, and other oppressed communities. Finally, a major catalyst for intensified political action in and around prisons has emerged out of the transformation of convicts, originally found guilty of criminal offenses, into exemplary political militants. Their patient educational efforts in the realm of exposing the specific oppressive structures of the penal system in their relation to the larger oppression of the social system have had a profound effect on their fellow captives.

The prison is a key component of state's coercive apparatus, the overriding function of which is to ensure social control. The etymology of the term "penitentiary" furnishes a clue to the controlling idea behind the "prison system" at its inception. The penitentiary was projected as the locale for doing penitence for an offense against society, the physical and spiritual purging of proclivities to challenge rules and regulations which command total obedience. While cloaking itself with the bourgeois aura of universality imprisonment was supposed to cut across all class lines, as crimes were to be defined by the act, not the perpetrator the prison has actually operated as an instrument of class domination, a means of prohibiting the have-nots from encroaching upon the haves.

The occurrence of crime is inevitable in a society in which wealth is unequally distributed, as one of the constant reminders that society's productive forces are being channeled in the wrong direction. The majority of criminal offenses bear a direct relationship to property. Contained in the very concept of property, crimes are profound but suppressed social needs which express themselves in anti-social modes of action. Spontaneously produced by a capitalist organization of society, this type of crime is at once a protest against society and a desire to partake of its exploitative content. It challenges the symptoms of capitalism, but not its essence.

Some Marxists in recent years have tended to banish "criminals" and the lumpenproletariat as a whole from the arena of revolutionary struggle. Apart from the absence of any link binding the criminal to the means of production, underlying this exclusion has been the assumption that individuals who have recourse to anti-social acts are incapable of developing the discipline and collective orientation required by revolutionary struggle.

With the declassed character of lumpenproletarians in mind, Marx had stated that they are as capable of "the most heroic deeds and the most exalted sacrifices, as of the basest banditry and the dirtiest corruption." He emphasized the fact that the provisional government's mobile guards under the Paris Commune some 24,000 troops were largely formed out of young lumpenproletarians from fifteen to twenty years of age. Too many Marxists have been inclined to overvalue the second part of Marx's observation that the lumpenproletariat is capable of the basest banditry and the dirtiest corruption while minimizing or indeed totally disregarding his first remark, applauding the lumpen for their heroic deeds and exalted sacrifices.

Especially today when so many black, Chicano, and Puerto Rican men and women are jobless as a consequence of the internal dynamic of the capitalist system, the role of the unemployed, which includes the lumpenproletariat in revolutionary struggle, must be given serious thought. Increased unemployment, particularly for the nationally oppressed, will continue to be an inevitable by-product of technological development. At least 30 percent of black youth are presently without jobs. In the context of class exploitation and national oppression it should be clear that numerous individuals are compelled to resort to criminal acts, not as a result of conscious choice implying other alternatives but because society has objectively reduced their possibilities of subsistence and survival to this level. This recognition should signal the urgent need to organize the unemployed and lumpenproletariat, as indeed the Black Panther Party as well as activists in prison have already begun to do.

In evaluating the susceptibility of the black and brown unemployed to organizing efforts, the peculiar historical features of the US, specifically racism and national oppression, must be taken into account. There already exists in the black and brown communities, the lumpenproletariat included, a long tradition of collective resistance to national oppression.

Moreover, in assessing the revolutionary potential of prisoners in America as a group, it should be borne in mind that not all prisoners have actually committed crimes. The built-in racism of the judicial system expresses itself, as Du Bois has suggested, in the railroading of countless innocent blacks and other national minorities into the country's coercive institutions.

One must also appreciate the effects of disproportionately long prison terms on black and brown inmates. The typical criminal mentality sees imprisonment as a calculated risk for a particular criminal act. One's prison term is more or less rationally predictable. The function of racism in the judicial-penal complex is to shatter that predictability. The black burglar, anticipating a two-to four-year term, may end up doing ten to fifteen years, while the white burglar leaves after two years.

Within the contained, coercive universe of the prison, the captive is confronted with the realities of racism, not simply as individual acts dictated by attitudinal bias; rather he is compelled to come to grips with racism as an institutional phenomenon collectively experienced by the victims. The disproportionate representation of the black and brown communities, the manifest racism of parole boards, the intense brutality inherent in the relationship between prison guards and black and brown inmates all this and more causes the prisoner to be confronted daily, hourly, with the concentrated systematic existence of racism.

For the innocent prisoner, the process of radicalization should come easy; for the "guilty" victim, the insight into the nature of racism as it manifests itself in the judicial-penal complex can lead to a questioning of his own past criminal activity and a re-evaluation of the methods he has used to survive in a racist and exploitative society. Needless to say, this process is not automatic, it does not occur spontaneously. The persistent educational work carried out by the prison's political activists plays a key role in developing the political potential of captive men and women.

Prisoners especially blacks, Chicanos and Puerto Ricans are increasingly advancing the proposition that they are political prisoners. They contend that they are political prisoners in the sense that they are largely the victims of an oppressive politico-economic order, swiftly becoming conscious of the causes underlying their victimization. The Folsom Prisoners' Manifesto of Demands and Anti-Oppression Platform attests to a lucid understanding of the structures of oppression within the prison structures which contradict even the avowed function of the penal institution: "The program we are submitted to, under the ridiculous title of rehabilitation, is relative to the ancient stupidity of pouring water on the drowning man, in as much as we are treated for our hostilities by our program administrators with their hostility for medication." The Manifesto also reflects an awareness that the severe social crisis taking place in this country, predicated in part on the ever-increasing mass consciousness of deepening social contradictions, is forcing the political function of the prisons to surface in all its brutality. Their contention that prisons are being transformed into the "fascist concentration camps of modern America," should not be taken lightly, although it would be erroneous as well as defeatist in a practical sense, to maintain that fascism has irremediably established itself.

The point is this, and this is the truth which is apparent in the Manifesto: the ruling circles of America are expanding and intensifying repressive measures designed to nip revolutionary movements in the bud as well as to curtail radical-democratic tendencies, such as the movement to end the war in Indochina. The government is not hesitating to utilize an entire network of fascist tactics, including the monitoring of congressman's telephone calls, a system of "preventive fascism", as Marcuse has termed it, in which the role of the judicial-penal systems looms large. The sharp edge of political repression, cutting through the heightened militancy of the masses, and bringing growing numbers of activists behind prison walls, must necessarily pour over into the contained world of the prison where it understandably acquires far more ruthless forms.

It is a relatively easy matter to persecute the captive whose life is already dominated by a network of authoritarian mechanisms. This is especially facilitated by the indeterminate sentence policies of many states, for politically conscious prisoners will incur inordinately long sentences on the original conviction. According to Louis S. Nelson, warden of the San Quentin Prison, "if the prisons of California become known as schools for violent revolution, the Adult Authority would be remiss in their duty not to keep the inmates longer" (San Francisco Chronicle, May 2, 1971). Where this is deemed inadequate, authorities have recourse to the whole spectrum of brutal corporal punishment, including out and out murder. At San Quentin, Fred Billingslea was teargassed to death in February 1970. W. L. Nolen, Alvin Miller, and Cleveland Edwards were assassinated by a prison guard in January 1970, at Soledad Prison. Unusual and inexplicable "suicides" have occurred with incredible regularity in jails and prisons throughout the country.

It should be self-evident that the frame-up becomes a powerful weapon within the spectrum of prison repression, particularly because of the availability of informers, the broken prisoners who will do anything for a price. The Soledad Brothers and the Soledad Three are leading examples of frame-up victims. Both cases involve militant activists who have been charged with killing Soledad prison guards. In both cases, widespread support has been kindled within the California prison system. They have served as occasions to link the immediate needs of the black community with a forceful fight to break the fascist stronghold in the prisons and therefore to abolish the prison system in its present form.

Racist oppression invades the lives of black people on an infinite variety of levels. Blacks are imprisoned in a world where our labor and toil hardly allow us to eke out a decent existence, if we are able to find jobs at all. When the economy begins to falter, we are forever the first victims, always the most deeply wounded. When the economy is on its feet, we continue to live in a depressed state. Unemployment is generally twice as high in the ghettos as it is in the country as a whole and even higher among black women and youth. The unemployment rate among black youth has presently skyrocketed to 30 percent. If one-third of America's white youths were without a means of livelihood, we would either be in the thick of revolution or else under the iron rule of fascism. Substandard schools, medical care hardly fit for animals, over-priced, dilapidated housing, a welfare system based on a policy of skimpy concessions, designed to degrade and divide (and even this may soon be canceled) this is only the beginning of the list of props in the overall scenery of oppression which, for the mass of blacks, is the universe.

In black communities, wherever they are located, there exists an ever-present reminder that our universe must remain stable in its drabness, its poverty, its brutality. From Birmingham to Harlem to Watts, black ghettos are occupied, patrolled and often attacked by massive deployments of police. The police, domestic caretakers of violence, are the oppressor's emissaries, charged with the task of containing us within the boundaries of our oppression.

The announced function of the police, "to protect and serve the people," becomes the grotesque caricature of protecting and preserving the interests of our oppressors and serving us nothing but injustice. They are there to intimidate blacks, to persuade us with their violence that we are powerless to alter the conditions of our lives. Arrests are frequently based on whims. Bullets from their guns murder human beings with little or no pretext, aside from the universal intimidation they are charged with carrying out. Protection for drug-pushers, and Mafia-style exploiters, support for the most reactionary ideological elements of the black community (especially those who cry out for more police), are among the many functions of forces of law and order. They encircle the community with a shield of violence, too often forcing the natural aggression of the black community inwards. Fanon's analysis of the role of colonial police is an appropriate description of the function of the police in America's ghettos.

It goes without saying that the police would be unable to set into motion their racist machinery were they not sanctioned and supported by the judicial system. The courts not only consistently abstain from prosecuting criminal behavior on the part of the police, but they convict, on the basis of biased police testimony, countless black men and women. Court-appointed attorneys, acting in the twisted interests of overcrowded courts, convince 85 percent of the defendants to plead guilty. Even the manifestly innocent are advised to cop a plea so that the lengthy and expensive process of jury trials is avoided. This is the structure of the apparatus which summarily railroads black people into jails and prisons. (During my imprisonment in the New York Women's House of Detention, I encountered numerous cases involving innocent black women who had been advised to plead guilty. One sister had entered her white landlord's apartment for the purpose of paying rent. He attempted to rape her and in the course of the ensuing struggle, a lit candle toppled over, burning a tablecloth. The landlord ordered her arrested for arson. Following the advice of her court-appointed attorney, she entered a guilty plea, having been deceived by the attorney's insistence that the court would be more lenient. The sister was sentenced to three years.)

The vicious circle linking poverty, police courts, and prison is an integral element of ghetto existence. Unlike the mass of whites, the path which leads to jails and prisons is deeply rooted in the imposed patterns of black existence. For this very reason, an almost instinctive affinity binds the mass of black people to the political prisoners. The vast majority of blacks harbor a deep hatred of the police and are not deluded by official proclamations of justice through the courts.

For the black individual, contact with the law-enforcement-judicial-penal network, directly or through relatives and friends, is inevitable because he or she is black. For the activist become political prisoner, the contact has occurred because he has lodged a protest, in one form or another, against the conditions which nail blacks to this orbit of oppression.

Historically, black people as a group have exhibited a greater potential for resistance than any other part of the population. The iron-clad rule over our communities, the institutional practice of genocide, the ideology of racism have performed a strictly political as well as an economic function. The capitalists have not only extracted super profits from the underpaid labor of over 15 percent of the American population with the aid of a superstructure of terror. This terror and more subtle forms of racism have further served to thwart the flowering of a resistance even a revolution that would spread to the working class as a whole.

In the interests of the capitalist class, the consent to racism and terror has been demagogically elicited from the white population, workers included, in order to more efficiently stave off resistance. Today, Nixon, [Attorney General John] Mitchell and J. Edgar Hoover are desperately attempting to persuade the population that dissidents, particularly blacks, Chicanos, Puerto Ricans, must be punished for being members of revolutionary organizations; for advocating the overthrow of the government; for agitating and educating in the streets and behind prison walls. The political function of racist domination is surfacing with accelerated intensity. Whites who have professed their solidarity with the black liberation movement and have moved in a distinctly revolutionary direction find themselves targets of the same repression. Even the anti-war movement, rapidly exhibiting an anti-imperialist consciousness, is falling victim to government repression.

Black people are rushing full speed ahead towards an understanding of the circumstances that give rise to exaggerated forms of political repression and thus an overabundance of political prisoners. This understanding is being forged out of the raw material of their own immediate experiences with racism. Hence, the black masses are growing conscious of their responsibility to defend those who are being persecuted for attempting to bring about the alleviation of the most injurious immediate problems facing black communities and ultimately to bring about total liberation through armed revolution, if it must come to this.

The black liberation movement is presently at a critical juncture. Fascist methods of repression threaten to physically decapitate and obliterate the movement. More subtle, yet no less dangerous ideological tendencies from within threaten to isolate the black movement and diminish its revolutionary impact. Both menaces must be counteracted in order to ensure our survival. Revolutionary blacks must spearhead and provide leadership for a broad anti-fascist movement.

Fascism is a process, its growth and development are cancerous in nature. While today, the threat of fascism may be primarily restricted to the use of the law-enforcement-judicial-penal apparatus to arrest the overt and latent revolutionary trends among nationally oppressed people, tomorrow it may attack the working class en masse and eventually even moderate democrats. Even in this period, however, the cancer has already commenced to spread. In addition to the prison army of thousands and thousands of nameless Third World victims of political revenge, there are increasing numbers of white political prisoners draft resisters, anti-war activists such as the Harrisburg Eight, men and women who have involved themselves on all levels of revolutionary activity.

Among the further symptoms of the fascist threat are official efforts to curtail the power of organized labor, such as the attack on the manifestly conservative construction workers and the trends towards reduced welfare aid. Moreover, court decisions and repressive legislation augmenting police powers such as the Washington no-knock law, permitting police to enter private dwellings without warning, and Nixon's "Crime Bill" in general can eventually be used against any citizen. Indeed congressmen are already protesting the use of police-state wire-tapping to survey their activities. The fascist content of the ruthless aggression in Indo-China should be self-evident.

One of the fundamental historical lessons to be learned from past failures to prevent the rise of fascism is the decisive and indispensable character of the fight against fascism in its incipient phases. Once allowed to conquer ground, its growth is facilitated in geometric proportion. Although the most unbridled expressions of the fascist menace are still tied to the racist domination of blacks, Chicanos, Puerto Ricans, Indians, it lurks under the surface wherever there is potential resistance to the power of monopoly capital, the parasitic interests which control this society. Potentially it can profoundly worsen the conditions of existence for the average American citizen. Consequently, the masses of people in this country have a real, direct, and material stake in the struggle to free political prisoners, the struggle to abolish the prison system in its present form, the struggle against all dimensions of racism.

No one should fail to take heed of Georgi Dimitrov's warning: "Whoever does not fight the growth of fascism at these preparatory stages is not in a position to prevent the victory of fascism, but, on the contrary, facilitates that victory" (Report to the VIIth Congress of the Communist International, 1935). The only effective guarantee against the victory of fascism is an indivisible mass movement which refuses to conduct business as usual as long as repression rages on. It is only natural that blacks and other Third World peoples must lead this movement, for we are the first and most deeply injured victims of fascism. But it must embrace all potential victims and most important, all working-class people, for the key to the triumph of fascism is its ideological victory over the entire working class. Given the eruption of a severe economic crisis, the door to such an ideological victory can be opened by the active approval or passive toleration of racism. It is essential that white workers become conscious that historically through their acquiescence in the capitalist-inspired oppression of blacks they have only rendered themselves more vulnerable to attack.

The pivotal struggle which must be waged in the ranks of the working class is consequently the open, unreserved battle against entrenched racism. The white worker must become conscious of the threads which bind him to a James Johnson, a black auto worker, member of UAW, and a political prisoner presently facing charges for the killings of two foremen and a job setter. The merciless proliferation of the power of monopoly capital may ultimately push him inexorably down the very same path of desperation. No potential victim [of the fascist terror] should be without the knowledge that the greatest menace to racism and fascism is unity!

Clay v. United States

"The record shows that the petitioner's beliefs are founded on tenets of the Muslim religion as he understands them."

Overview

The U.S. Supreme Court's June 1971 decision in Cassius Marsellus Clay, Jr. also known as Muhammad Ali v. United States, commonly known as Clay v. United States, unanimously overturned professional boxing champion Muhammad Ali's 1967 conviction for refusing induction into the armed services. Specifically, the Court concluded that the Kentucky Selective Service Appeal Board had received erroneous advice from the Department of Justice in rejecting Ali's application for conscientious objector status. Having converted to Islam in 1964, Ali born Cassius Clay, Jr. claimed that serving as a member of the U.S. Army in Vietnam violated his religious principles. In a now-famous quote on his reasons for refusing military service, Ali stated: "I ain't got no quarrel with them Vietcong."

Americans were baffled by Ali: Always flamboyant, undeniably brash, and some might say downright smug, he referred to himself as both "the prettiest" and "the Greatest," belittled his boxing opponents with disparaging rhymes, and was alternately viewed as a scoundrel and a hero by a nation embroiled in social and political turmoil. Ali's rejection of the draft sparked considerable controversy, prompting some observers to label him a draft dodger. However, his case gradually took on more significance culturally than it did legally, as it foreshadowed a growing anti-war movement in the United States. As the heavyweight champion of the world, Ali risked all claims to his title and his future in professional sports by not complying with the military's induction orders. During the ordeal, he was banned from fighting and lost an estimated $4 million in potential earnings. He also gambled with his popularity: The Vietnam War era was a tension-filled time in the United States, and the Nation of Islam was viewed by many as a divisive force that was motivated more by political than religious principles.

Following a three-and-a-half-year suspension from boxing, Ali's conviction of "willful refusal to submit to induction" was reversed by the 1971 Supreme Court decision in Clay v. United States. Even before that final decision was made, however, various boxing commissions were mulling over the possibility of allowing Ali to fight again. Because the state of Georgia had no boxing commission, Ali was able to resume his boxing career in the fall of 1970 in a match held in Atlanta. He beat his opponent, Jerry Quarry, in just three rounds, setting the stage for a dramatic comeback.

The invalidation of Ali's conviction cleared away any remaining obstacles to his relicensing by state boxing commissions and to his reclaiming the titles that had been stripped from him nearly four years earlier. But because the Court failed to address the controversial merits of Ali's claim to "selective" conscientious objector status, the decision holds little value as legal precedent.

Context

The Supreme Court decided Ali's conscientious objector case against the backdrop of a country increasingly divided over the civil war in Vietnam and the use of the draft to select the American soldiers needed to continue the conflict. By 1970, the year before the Court's decision in Clay v. United States, the debate had become almost ubiquitous within American public institutions except the Supreme Court. Indeed, the Court repeatedly resisted attempts by legislators, draftees, and even states to have it pronounce on the underlying legality of the war in Vietnam, resting on strained notions of judicial restraint to avoid taking sides. However, there was one class of Vietnam-related cases the Court did try routinely: those based on claims to exemptions and deferments from conscription, particularly claims of conscientious objector status. Under section 6(j) of the Military Selective Service Act, individuals could not be subjected to "combatant training and service in the armed forces" if, "by reason of religious training and belief," they were "conscientiously opposed to participation in war in any form."

One of the questions that invariably arose in such cases was whether conscientious objection to a particular war, rather than objection to war as such, qualified the objector for such an exemption. Thus the question became, Does the statute support the idea of "selective" conscientious objection? Three months before it decided Ali's case, the Supreme Court answered that question in the negative in Gillette v. United States, with Justice Thurgood Marshall best known for arguing the landmark school desegregation case of Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka writing for an eight-to-one majority. As Marshall explained, "However the statutory clause be parsed, it remains that conscientious objection must run to war in any form." For Ali, one of the more visible members of the Nation of Islam, the war in Vietnam was an unjust one fought by nonbelievers. Indeed, contemporary news stories and even some judicial opinions often repeat an inflammatory quote that may well have been misattributed to Ali that "no Vietnamese ever called me a nigger." Ali's case therefore raised a question the Court had yet to answer: whether a religiously grounded but nonpacifistic belief was a legally protected basis for objecting to military service.

A separate but equally important element in Ali's case was the issue of race. Well into the mid-1960s, African Americans were heavily underrepresented on local draft boards, leading to claims that the boards routinely acted in a manner that was racially discriminatory. In 1967 only 0.2 percent of 641 local board members in Kentucky were black, even though African Americans constituted 7.1 percent of the state's total population. In Texas, only 1.1 percent of the local board members were black, as compared with 12.4 percent of the total population. Many of these concerns were bolstered by the 1967 report of the National Advisory Commission on Selective Service, which recommended a number of reforms that were not adopted at least not initially. Instead, inductees turned to the courts and to arguments that such underrepresentation on the local draft boards violated constitutional principles of equal protection.

Ali's case therefore became a lightning rod for some of the most heated religious, racial, social, and political conflicts of the day. In such an atmosphere, it is perhaps unsurprising that the Supreme Court ultimately rested its decision on what may fairly be described as a legal technicality, avoiding the harder and more divisive questions that the case raised.

To fully understand Ali's case, it is worth reviewing the U.S. method of filling its military ranks in the 1960s. Between 1948 and 1973, the United States utilized a conscription system rather than an all-volunteer military. Whether America was engaged in a war or not, young men were required to register for the Selective Service, the agency charged with implementing a military draft. Vacancies in the armed forces were filled from this pool of eligible men when the number of volunteer soldiers in the U.S. military fell short. In 1960, when Ali (then still going by his birth name, Cassius Clay) registered for the Selective Service, men between the ages of eighteen and a half and twenty-five were eligible for the draft.

Early in 1966, after Local Board 47 in Louisville, Kentucky, had classified Clay I-A, meaning that he was fully qualified for induction into the military, he filed a Special Form for Conscientious Objector, seeking a religious exemption from combatant training and service in the armed forces. He based his claim for exclusion from military service on his adherence to the tenets of the Nation of Islam. Ali's application for conscientious objector status, or, alternatively, classification as a Muslim minister, was rejected both by Local Board 47 and by the Kentucky Appeal Board, which then referred the matter to the U.S. Department of Justice. Following an extensive investigation by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, a Justice Department hearing officer concluded on August 23, 1966, that Ali was sincere in his beliefs and recommended that Ali's request for conscientious objector status be granted. Despite that conclusion, in a letter dated three months later, the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel formally recommended to the Kentucky Appeal Board that Ali's request be denied. Specifically, the letter asserted that Ali failed to meet the three basic tests that the Supreme Court had established for conscientious objector status: that he objected to all forms of war, that his objection was grounded in religious training and belief rather than in politics, and that his objection was sincere. Pivotal to the future of the case was the fact that the Justice Department failed to specify which of the three tests Ali had failed to meet.

Following the Justice Department's recommendation, the Kentucky Appeal Board formally denied Ali's request for conscientious objector status. Although Ali proceeded to file a series of lawsuits seeking to block his induction, all of them were dismissed. Ali reported for induction into the U.S. military on April 28, 1967, in Houston, Texas (since he resided in Texas at the time), as ordered, but he declined to step forward when his name was called. Ten days later, he was indicted by a federal grand jury in Houston for knowingly and willfully refusing induction into the armed services a criminal offense punishable by up to five years in prison and a $10,000 fine. After a two-day trial in June 1967, he was convicted by a jury and given that maximum sentence. The jury, composed of six white men and six white women, reportedly deliberated for just twenty-one minutes.

Ali appealed his conviction to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit on several different points. In addition to claiming that his request for both conscientious objector status and ministerial exemption had been wrongly denied, he argued that the composition of the Selective Service draft boards was racially disproportionate (with blacks heavily underrepresented), and so the boards were themselves unconstitutional. But in a unanimous ruling handed down on May 8, 1968, a three-judge panel of the Fifth Circuit rejected each of Ali's claims. The Court of Appeals sidestepped Ali's challenge to the racial composition of the local Selective Service boards, noting first that, even if the claim were factually accurate, that would not automatically void the decisions in the case and also emphasizing the de novo, or in-depth, review by the racially diverse National Appeal Board, which, in the court's view, necessarily removed any hint of racial prejudice from Ali's case. As to Ali's claims that he was entitled either to a ministerial exemption or to conscientious objector status, the Fifth Circuit further noted that the denial of those claims had some "basis in fact"; the court concluded that the National Appeal Board had properly resolved Ali's case and that his conviction was therefore valid.

Ali's last hope for a reversal of his conviction was a hearing by the U.S. Supreme Court. His case, Clay v. United States, was argued before the Court with Justice Thurgood Marshall not participating on April 19, 1971, and the Court handed down its unanimous decision ten weeks later.

About the Author

The Supreme Court's opinion in Ali's case was per curiam, or "for the Court," meaning that the identity of its actual author was not made public. All of the members of the Court other than Justice Thurgood Marshall (who excluded himself for unstated reasons) participated in the decision in Ali's case, including Chief Justice Warren Burger and associate justices Hugo Black, William O. Douglas, John Marshall Harlan II, William J. Brennan, Jr., Potter Stewart, Byron White, and Harry A. Blackmun the latter being the most recent addition to the Court in June 1970. Ali's was among the last of the cases heard by Justices Black and Harlan prior to their retirement from the Supreme Court later in 1971.

Indeed, the Supreme Court that decided Ali's case was a Court in transition. President Richard Nixon had appointed Warren Burger to replace Earl Warren as chief justice in 1969, thereby signaling the end to one of the most progressive if not radical eras in the Court's history. During Warren's sixteen years in the Court's center seat, the justices moved self-consciously and decidedly to the left, rigorously endorsing sweeping federal regulatory power in the civil rights sphere while adopting similarly robust views of the limits that the federal Constitution placed on state and local governments, especially where racial discrimination or the rights of criminal defendants were at issue. This was the Court that had decided Brown v. Board of Education (1954), holding that race-based segregation in public schools violated the equal protection clause; Mapp v. Ohio (1961), holding that evidence obtained in violation of the Fourth Amendment must generally be excluded from admission at trial; Gideon v. Wainwright (1963), holding that the Sixth Amendment right to counsel requires that states provide attorneys to indigent defendants; Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), holding that the U.S. Constitution protects a right to privacy; Miranda v. Arizona (1966), requiring that defendants be notified of their right to speak to a lawyer and holding that statements obtained in the absence of such notification were inadmissible in court; and a host of other lesser-known but no-less-important precedents. Together with Justices Black, Douglas, and Brennan, Warren formed a liberal bloc that controlled much of the Court's agenda throughout the 1960s especially from 1962 through Warren's departure, thanks to the additions of Arthur Goldberg, as succeeded by Abe Fortas in 1965, and Thurgood Marshall. Even the more "conservative" justices on the Warren Court Harlan, Stewart, and White were, by modern-day standards, moderates who routinely joined their more liberal brethren.

Nixon's victory in the 1968 presidential election after a campaign that was highly critical of the Court and vowed to restore "law and order" spelled the beginning of the end for this coalition. Within three years of taking office, Nixon was able to make four appointments to the Court replacing Warren with Burger, Fortas with Harry Blackmun, Black with Lewis F. Powell, Jr., and Harlan with William H. Rehnquist. Each of these appointments moved the Court further to the right. In that sense, the decision in Clay proved to be a relic of a soon-to-be forgotten era, in which unanimous decisions invalidating criminal convictions such as Ali's were commonplace.

The Supreme Court's decision in Clay v. United States is surprisingly brief. In Part I of the majority opinion, which runs a little over one page, the Court provides a condensed overview of the facts of the case. Then, in two short paragraphs, Part II rehashes the "basis in fact" standard, which the government urged was sufficient to affirm the decision. The "basis in fact" standard was articulated by the Court in Estep v. United States (1946). Under this standard, > courts are not to weigh the evidence to determine whether the classification made by the local boards was justified. The decisions of the local boards made in conformity with the regulations are final even though they may be erroneous. The question of jurisdiction of the local board is reached only if there is no basis in fact for the classification which it gave the registrant.

Congress codified this rule through the Military Selective Service Act of 1967. The government's central argument before the Supreme Court in Clay was that the Fifth Circuit properly applied this standard in affirming Ali's conviction and that it should therefore be affirmed. The Court, however, concludes Part II with a key statement regarding the question of whether Ali opposed all wars or just certain wars: "Even if the Government's position on this question is correct, the conviction before us must still be set aside for another quite independent reason."

Part III of the opinion its analytical core identifies that "independent reason" as the incorrect advice that the Justice Department had provided to the Kentucky Appeal Board. Apparently, the Justice Department had questioned Ali's convictions on the basis "of the circumstances and timing" of his claim, noting that he did not file for conscientious objector status until the possibility of his being drafted became a certainty. The Supreme Court states that its review revealed no reason to question the sincerity of Ali's beliefs and asserts that these beliefs were indeed "founded on tenets of the Muslim religion as he understands them."

As such, the government conceded that two of the three grounds offered by the Justice Department for rejecting Ali's claim were no longer valid. Only one basic test for establishing conscientious objector status remained, and that was whether Ali objected to war in a universal or selective sense. Because the Appeal Board failed to specify which of the three grounds it used as the basis for its denial of a conscientious objector exemption for Ali, the conviction could not be allowed to stand. The precedent for this opinion was the 1955 case of Sicurella v. United States. Thus, without tackling the merits of whether Ali should or should not have received conscientious objector status, the Court was able to invalidate his conviction in light of the errors that pervaded the Justice Department's advice to the Kentucky Appeal Board. Although the Court's decision is significant in establishing that Ali's beliefs were in fact "religious," rather than "political and racial," it does not address the underlying question of whether Ali condoned war under certain circumstances.

Perhaps the most intriguing part of the decision is the concurring opinion authored by Justice William O. Douglas, who offers his own view on the merits of the sole remaining ground upon which Ali's application for conscientious objector status could legally be denied: that Ali did not oppose participating in war "in any form" but rather specifically opposed the conflict in Vietnam. Douglas had been the lone voice of dissent just two months earlier, when the Supreme Court made its ruling in Gillette v. United States, another conscientious objector suit. In that case, the Court ruled against objections to "specific" wars as grounds for conscientious objection. The Gillette case turned on the distinction between "just" and "unjust" wars, with the majority opinion holding that conscientious objector status be granted only to those who oppose war "in any form." Douglas disagreed with the decision in Gillette, and his difference of opinion carried over to Clay v. United States: Whereas one of two defendants in Gillette was Catholic and the other a self-described "humanist," Ali's visible adherence to Islam, and his membership in the Nation of Islam in particular, led Douglas to draw analogies between the religious practices.

Specifically, Douglas devotes virtually all of his concurrence in Ali to a careful examination of both Ali's statements and the teachings of the Koran. In his words:

> The jihad is the Moslem's counterpart of the 'just' war as it has been known in the West. Neither Clay nor Negre [one of the defendants in Gillette, Louis Negre] should be subject to punishment because he will not renounce the 'truth' of the teaching of his respective church that wars indeed may exist which are just wars in which a Moslem or Catholic has a respective duty to participate.

In essence, Douglas supported the ultimate outcome in Ali's case but disagreed with the reasoning used by the Court to arrive at that decision. He expresses clear support for religiously grounded opposition to participation in wars that are inconsistent with that particular religion, even if the religion itself is not pacifistic. If the First Amendment protects the right to worship by any religion, Douglas reasons, it necessarily protects the right to be a selective, rather than categorical, conscientious objector and to support only those wars that are consistent with one's faith.

The opinion in Clay v. United States concludes with a separate concurrence by Justice John Marshall Harlan II, noting his narrow agreement with the proposition that reversal was "required under Sicurella." It was unclear, he writes, whether and to what extent the Kentucky Appeal Board had relied upon the Justice Department's advice, but he asserts that it was clearly wrong for the Justice Department to question the sincerity of Ali's beliefs.

Audience

Although the Clay v. United States litigation was watched closely by Ali supporters, antiwar protesters, and other interest groups, it is unlikely that the opinion handed down by the Court had much of an intended audience outside legal circles. The decision hinged on a technicality that cleared Ali's record but left intact the government's view of selective conscientious objector claims stated two months earlier in Gillette. Similarly, it is hard to imagine that Justice Harlan's one-paragraph concurrence one of the last opinions of his distinguished judicial career was itself intended to be widely read.

Justice Douglas's concurrence, however, devotes a significant amount of attention to the distinction between "just" and "unjust" wars under Islamic doctrine. Given the racial and religious fervor that had, at times, marked the dispute over Ali's conduct, Douglas's opinion may well have represented an attempt on the part of the Court's most liberal member to educate the public to identify important similarities between Catholicism (one of the religions at issue in Gillette) and Islam, at least insofar as selective conscientious objection was concerned.

Impact

Relying, as it did, on a technicality established by an earlier precedent, the Court's decision itself has had little precedential value. Even Justice Douglas's more useful concurrence, which offered thought-provoking ideas on the true implications of religious freedom in the context of selective conscientious objection to military service, has largely been lost to time, cited only rarely and often for unrelated or at least tangential points. If anything, the Court's decision in Clay may best be understood as a reflection of its Vietnam-era legacy avoiding decisive rulings on the most divisive controversial questions and finding ways to reach what it believed to be appropriate results through other means.

Douglas's specific argument about the First Amendment and religiously grounded selective conscientious objection was never put to the test. By the time of the Court's decision, the U.S. government had already begun moving toward an all-volunteer army, and so the hard questions that the Court had not yet answered about the extent to which the Constitution protected religiously based selective conscientious objection remain unanswered today. And although Ali went on to complete a remarkable career that culminated with his selection by Sports Illustrated as the "sportsman of the century," his controversial position on the war in Vietnam, and the litigation arising out of his refusal to be inducted, have remained an inescapable part of his enigmatic legacy.

In the decades since the Supreme Court decision in the case of Clay v. United States, numerous critics have analyzed Ali's impact on American culture. In a Sports Illustrated "Flashback," William Nack stated that "he not only came to personify the turbulent '60s but also became one of the decade's most hated figures." Thirty years later, though, Ali managed to "navigat[e] the sweet land of liberty and religious freedom" and, according to Nack, was "as loved and embraced as he once was scorned and despised." Clearly, the fighter's antidraft stance sparked a heated debate about the depth of his patriotism, but as John C. Walter pointed out, his performance at the 1960 Olympics in Rome, Italy, revealed not only his athletic prowess but also a deeply rooted devotion to his country: A Soviet reporter had brought up the issue of segregation in the United States, and the then-eighteen-year-old gold medalist responded, "The U.S.A. is still the best country in the world, including yours."

Between 1967 and 1971 the years separating Ali's conviction and his ultimate victory in the Supreme Court U.S. support for the Vietnam War eroded. At the same time, Ali's popularity grew. No longer dismissed as a draft evader, he came to symbolize the antiwar, pro civil rights movement in America. He had weathered a public firestorm with unwavering courage, given up his heavyweight title and more than three years of boxing in the prime of his career, and maintained his beliefs in the process.

Ali was able to resume his boxing career at the end of 1970, when the state of Georgia, which did not have a boxing commission, allowed him to fight. His match in Atlanta against Jerry Quarry was over in the third round: "The Greatest" had returned to the ring. On March 8, 1971, three months before the Court's final decision in Clay v. United States, Ali took on Joe Frazier in the Fight of the Century. Like Ali, Frazier who had been named boxing's heavyweight champion after Ali was stripped of the title had never lost a fight. Frazier retained his title, beating Ali by a unanimous decision after fifteen grueling rounds. Ali put up such a fight that his loss in the final round was characterized as courageous, and even heroic, by the media.

In 1973 George Foreman became the world's reigning heavyweight champion by defeating Frazier. Ali was able to regain the heavyweight title that same year, knocking out Foreman in the eighth round of their legendary fight in Zaire known as the Rumble in the Jungle. Nearly a year after defeating Foreman, Ali and Frazier met again in a stunning rematch in the Philippines. The so-called Thrilla in Manila was among the most brutal boxing matches ever fought. Ali withstood more than four hundred punishing blows from Frazier before being declared the winner in the fourteenth round.

Ali's passion in the ring solidified his claim to the title of "the Greatest." He retired from boxing in 1981. Three years later he went public with his Parkinson's disease diagnosis a direct result, doctors say, of repeated trauma to the head. The ravaging effects of the disease have taken their toll on Ali, but he has established himself as a tireless philanthropist, raising funds for a variety of charities, most notably the Muhammad Ali Parkinson Center at Barrow Neurological Institute. In an interesting footnote to a complex life story, Ali went to Vietnam in 1994 in a show of support for families of American soldiers still missing in action.

Questions for Further Study

1. One of the requirements for conscientious objector status is sincerity of belief. How can a draft board or a court measure the sincerity of a person's beliefs? What evidence might it rely on?

2. Do you think that the outcome of this case would have been different if Clay had been an ordinary citizen rather than a highly admired athlete? Why or why not?

3. What is your position on the issue of whether the Nation of Islam opposed the war in Vietnam on religious rather than political and racial grounds? For help, see Stokely Carmichael's "Black Power" and Malcolm X's "After the Bombing."

4. By 1971, it was becoming apparent that the U.S. effort in Vietnam was failing. Further, there was considerable discussion of moving to an all-volunteer army, which became a reality in 1973. To what extent do you think these developments might have influenced the Court's decision?

5. In your opinion, were the religious grounds that Clay/Ali cited for opposing war legitimate? Did they provide ample grounds for the Court's reversal of Clay's conviction?

CLAY V. UNITED STATES

Petitioner appealed his local draft board's rejection of his application for conscientious objector classification. The Justice Department, in response to the State Appeal Board's referral for an advisory recommendation, concluded, contrary to a hearing officer's recommendation, that petitioner's claim should be denied, and wrote that board that petitioner did not meet any of the three basic tests for conscientious objector status. The Appeal Board then denied petitioner's claim, but without stating its reasons. Petitioner refused to report for induction, for which he was thereafter tried and convicted. The Court of Appeals affirmed. In this Court the Government has rightly conceded the invalidity of two of the grounds for denial of petitioner's claim given in its letter to the Appeal Board, but argues that there was factual support for the third ground. Held: Since the Appeal Board gave no reason for the denial of a conscientious objector exemption to petitioner, and it is impossible to determine on which of the three grounds offered in the Justice Department's letter that board relied, petitioner's conviction must be reversed. Sicurella v. United States, 348 U. S. 385.

430 F. 2d 165, reversed.

Chauncey Eskridge argued the cause for petitioner. With him on the briefs were Jack Greenberg, James M. Nabrit III, Jonathan Shapiro, and Elizabeth B. DuBois.

Solicitor General Griswold argued the cause for the United States. With him on the brief were Assistant Attorney General Wilson and Beatrice Rosenberg.

Per Curiam

The petitioner was convicted for willful refusal to submit to induction into the Armed Forces. 62 Stat. 622, as amended, 50 U. S. C. App. ß462 (a) (1964 ed., Supp. V). The judgment of conviction was affirmed by the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit. We granted certiorari, 400 U. S. 990, to consider whether the induction notice was invalid because grounded upon an erroneous denial of the petitioner's claim to be classified as a conscientious objector.

◆ I

The petitioner's application for classification as a conscientious objector was turned down by his local draft board, and he took an administrative appeal. The State Appeal Board tentatively classified him I-A (eligible for unrestricted military service) and referred his file to the Department of Justice for an advisory recommendation, in accordance with then-applicable procedures. 50 U. S. C. App. ß456 (j) (1964 ed., Supp. V). The FBI then conducted an "inquiry" as required by the statute, interviewing some 35 persons, including members of the petitioner's family and many of his friends, neighbors, and business and religious associates.

There followed a hearing on "the character and good faith of the [petitioner's] objections" before a hearing officer appointed by the Department. The hearing officer, a retired judge of many years' experience, heard testimony from the petitioner's mother and father, from one of his attorneys, from a minister of his religion, and from the petitioner himself. He also had the benefit of a full report from the FBI. On the basis of this record the hearing officer concluded that the registrant was sincere in his objection on religious grounds to participation in war in any form, and he recommended that the conscientious objector claim be sustained.

Notwithstanding this recommendation, the Department of Justice wrote a letter to the Appeal Board, advising it that the petitioner's conscientious objector claim should be denied. Upon receipt of this letter of advice, the Board denied the petitioner's claim without a statement of reasons. After various further proceedings which it is not necessary to recount here, the petitioner was ordered to report for induction. He refused to take the traditional step forward, and this prosecution and conviction followed.

◆ II

In order to qualify for classification as a conscientious objector, a registrant must satisfy three basic tests. He must show that he is conscientiously opposed to war in any form. Gillette v. United States, 401 U. S. 437. He must show that this opposition is based upon religious training and belief, as the term has been construed in our decisions. United States v.

Seeger, 380 U. S. 163; Welsh v. United States, 398 U. S. 333. And he must show that this objection is sincere. Witmer v. United States, 348 U. S. 375. In applying these tests, the Selective Service System must be concerned with the registrant as an individual, not with its own interpretation of the dogma of the religious sect, if any, to which he may belong. United States v. Seeger, supra; Gillette v. United States, supra; Williams v. United States, 216 F. 2d 350, 352.

In asking us to affirm the judgment of conviction, the Government argues that there was a "basis in fact," cf. Estep v. United States, 327 U. S. 114, for holding that the petitioner is not opposed to "war in any form," but is only selectively opposed to certain wars. See Gillette v. United States, supra. Counsel for the petitioner, needless to say, takes the opposite position. The issue is one that need not be resolved in this case. For we have concluded that even if the Government's position on this question is correct, the conviction before us must still be set aside for another quite independent reason.

◆ III

The petitioner's criminal conviction stemmed from the Selective Service System's denial of his appeal seeking conscientious objector status. That denial, for which no reasons were ever given, was, as we have said, based on a recommendation of the Department of Justice, over-ruling its hearing officer and advising the Appeal Board that it "finds that the registrant's conscientious-objector claim is not sustained and recommends to your Board that he be not [so] classified." This finding was contained in a long letter of explanation, from which it is evident that Selective Service officials were led to believe that the Department had found that the petitioner had failed to satisfy each of the three basic tests for qualification as a conscientious objector.

As to the requirement that a registrant must be opposed to war in any form, the Department letter said that the petitioner's expressed beliefs "do not appear to preclude military service in any form, but rather are limited to military service in the Armed Forces of the United States.... These constitute only objections to certain types of war in certain circumstances, rather than a general scruple against participation in war in any form. However, only a general scruple against participation in war in any form can support an exemption as a conscientious objector under the Act. United States v. Kauten, 133 F. 2d 703."

As to the requirement that a registrant's opposition must be based upon religious training and belief, the Department letter said: "It seems clear that the teachings of the Nation of Islam preclude fighting for the United States not because of objections to participation in war in any form but rather because of political and racial objections to policies of the United States as interpreted by Elijah Muhammad.... It is therefore our conclusion that registrant's claimed objections to participation in war insofar as they are based upon the teachings of the Nation of Islam, rest on grounds which primarily are political and racial."

As to the requirement that a registrant's opposition to war must be sincere, that part of the letter began by stating that "the registrant has not consistently manifested his conscientious-objector claim. Such a course of overt manifestations is requisite to establishing a subjective state of mind and belief." There followed several paragraphs reciting the timing and circumstances of the petitioner's conscientious objector claim, and a concluding paragraph seeming to state a rule of law that "a registrant has not shown overt manifestations sufficient to establish his subjective belief where, as here, his conscientious-objector claim was not asserted until military service became imminent. Campbell v. United States, 221 F. 2d 454. United States v. Corliss, 280 F. 2d 808, cert. denied, 364 U. S. 884."

In this Court the Government has now fully conceded that the petitioner's beliefs are based upon "religious training and belief," as defined in United States v. Seeger, supra: "There is no dispute that petitioner's professed beliefs were founded on basic tenets of the Muslim religion, as he understood them, and derived in substantial part from his devotion to Allah as the Supreme Being. Thus, under this Court's decision in United States v. Seeger, 380 U. S. 163, his claim unquestionably was within the 'religious training and belief' clause of the exemption provision." This concession is clearly correct. For the record shows that the petitioner's beliefs are founded on tenets of the Muslim religion as he understands them. They are surely no less religiously based than those of the three registrants before this Court in Seeger. See also Welsh v. United States, 398 U. S. 333.

The Government in this Court has also made clear that it no longer questions the sincerity of the petitioner's beliefs. This concession is also correct. The Department hearing officer the only person at the administrative appeal level who carefully examined the petitioner and other witnesses in person and who had the benefit of the full FBI file found "that the registrant is sincere in his objection." The Department of Justice was wrong in advising the Board in terms of a purported rule of law that it should disregard this finding simply because of the circumstances and timing of the petitioner's claim. See Ehlert v. United States, 402 U. S. 99, 103 104; United States ex rel. Lehman v. Laird, 430 F. 2d 96, 99; United States v. Abbott, 425 F. 2d 910, 915; United States ex rel. Tobias v. Laird, 413 F. 2d 936, 939-940; Cohen v. Laird, 315 F. Supp. 1265, 1277 1278.

Since the Appeal Board gave no reasons for its denial of the petitioner's claim, there is absolutely no way of knowing upon which of the three grounds offered in the Department's letter it relied. Yet the Government now acknowledges that two of those grounds were not valid. And, the Government's concession aside, it is indisputably clear, for the reasons stated, that the Department was simply wrong as a matter of law in advising that the petitioner's beliefs were not religiously based and were not sincerely held.

This case, therefore, falls squarely within the four corners of this Court's decision in Sicurella v. United States, 348 U. S. 385. There as here the Court was asked to hold that an error in an advice letter prepared by the Department of Justice did not require reversal of a criminal conviction because there was a ground on which the Appeal Board might properly have denied a conscientious objector classification. This Court refused to consider the proffered alternative ground:

"[W]e feel that this error of law by the Department, to which the Appeal Board might naturally look for guidance on such questions, must vitiate the entire proceedings at least where it is not clear that the Board relied on some legitimate ground. Here, where it is impossible to determine on exactly which grounds the Appeal Board decided, the integrity of the Selective Service System demands, at least, that the Government not recommend illegal grounds. There is an impressive body of lower court cases taking this position and we believe that they state the correct rule." Id., at 392.

The doctrine thus articulated 16 years ago in Sicurella was hardly new. It was long ago established as essential to the administration of criminal justice. Stromberg v. California, 283 U. S. 359. In Stromberg the Court reversed a conviction for violation of a California statute containing three separate clauses, finding one of the three clauses constitutionally invalid. As Chief Justice Hughes put the matter, "[I]t is impossible to say under which clause of the statute the conviction was obtained." Thus, "if any of the clauses in question is invalid under the Federal Constitution, the conviction cannot be upheld." Id., at 368.

The application of this doctrine in the area of Selective Service law goes back at least to 1945, and Judge Learned Hand's opinion for the Second Circuit in United States v. Cain, 149 F. 2d 338. It is a doctrine that has been consistently and repeatedly followed by the federal courts in dealing with the criminal sanctions of the selective service laws. See, e. g., United States v. Lemmens, 430 F. 2d 619, 623 624 (CA7 1970); United States v. Broyles, 423 F. 2d 1299, 1303 1304 (CA4 1970); United States v. Houghton, 413 F. 2d 736 (CA9 1969); United States v. Jakobson, 325 F. 2d 409, 416 417 (CA2 1963), aff'd sub nom. United States v. Seeger, 380 U. S. 163; Kretchet v. United States, 284 F. 2d 561, 565 566 (CA9 1960); Ypparila v. United States, 219 F. 2d 465, 469 (CA10 1954); United States v. Englander, 271 F. Supp. 182 (SDNY 1967); United States v. Erikson, 149 F. Supp. 576, 578 579 (SDNY 1957). In every one of the above cases the defendant was acquitted or the conviction set aside under the Sicurella application of the Stromberg doctrine.

The long established rule of law embodied in these settled precedents thus clearly requires that the judgment before us be reversed.

It is so ordered.

Mr. Justice Marshall took no part in the consideration or decision of this case.

Mr. Justice Douglas concurring

I would reverse this judgment of conviction and set the petitioner free.

In Sicurella v. United States, 348 U. S. 385, the wars that the applicant would fight were not "carnal" but those "in defense of Kingdom interests." Id., at 389. Since it was impossible to determine on exactly which grounds the Appeal Board had based its decision, we reversed the decision sustaining the judgment of conviction. We said: "It is difficult for us to believe that the Congress had in mind this type of activity when it said the thrust of conscientious objection must go to 'participation in war in any form.'" Id., at 390.

In the present case there is no line between "carnal" war and "spiritual" or symbolic wars. Those who know the history of the Mediterranean littoral know that the jihad of the Moslem was a bloody war.

This case is very close in its essentials to Negre v. Larsen, 401 U. S. 437, decided March 8, 1971. The church to which that registrant belonged favored "just" wars and provided guidelines to define them.

Document Text

The church did not oppose the war in Vietnam but the registrant refused to comply with an order to go to Vietnam because participating in that conflict would violate his conscience. The Court refused to grant him relief as a conscientious objector, overruling his constitutional claim.

The case of Clay is somewhat different, though analogous. While there are some bits of evidence showing conscientious objection to the Vietnam conflict, the basic objection was based on the teachings of his religion. He testified that he was "sincere in every bit of what the Holy Qur'an and the teachings of the Honorable Elijah Muhammad tell us and it is that we are not to participate in wars on the side of nobody who on the side of nonbelievers, and this is a Christian country and this is not a Muslim country, and the Government and the history and the facts shows that every move toward the Honorable Elijah Muhammad is made to distort and is made to ridicule him and is made to condemn him and the Government has admitted that the police of Los Angeles were wrong about attacking and killing our brothers and sisters and they were wrong in Newark, New Jersey, and they were wrong in Louisiana, and the outright, every day oppressors and enemies are the people as a whole, the whites of this nation. So, we are not, according to the Holy Qur'an, to even as much as aid in passing a cup of water to the even a wounded. I mean, this is in the Holy Qur'an, and as I said earlier, this is not me talking to get the draft board or to dodge nothing. This is there before I was borned and it will be there when I'm dead but we believe in not only that part of it, but all of it."

At another point he testified: "[T]he Holy Qur'an do teach us that we do not take part of in any part of war unless declared by Allah himself, or unless it's an Islamic World War, or a Holy War, and it goes as far the Holy Qur'an is talking still, and saying we are not to even as much as aid the infidels or the nonbelievers in Islam, even to as much as handing them a cup of water during battle.

"So, this is the teachings of the Holy Qur'an before I was born, and the Qur'an, we follow not only that part of it, but every part."

The Koran defines jihad as an injunction to the believers to war against nonbelievers:

"O ye who believe! Shall I guide you to a gainful trade which will save you from painful punishment? Believe in Allah and His Apostle and carry on warfare (jihad) in the path of Allah with your possessions and your persons. That is better for you. If ye have knowledge, He will forgive your sins, and will place you in the Gardens beneath which the streams flow, and in fine houses in the Gardens of Eden: that is the great gain." M. Khadduri, War and Peace in the Law of Islam 55 56 (1955).

The Sale edition of the Koran, which first appeared in England in 1734, gives the following translation at 410 411 (9th ed. 1923):

"Thus God propoundeth unto men their examples. When ye encounter the unbelievers, strike off their heads, until ye have made a great slaughter among them; and bind them in bonds; and either give them a free dismission afterwards, or exact a ransom; until the war shall have laid down its arms. This shall ye do. Verily if God pleased he could take vengeance on them, without your assistance; but he commandeth you to fight his battles, that he may prove the one of you by the other. And as to those who fight in defence of God's true religion, God will not suffer their works to perish: he will guide them, and will dispose their heart aright; and he will lead them into paradise, of which he hath told them. O true believers, if ye assist God, by fighting for his religion, he will assist you against your enemies; and will set your feet fast…."

War is not the exclusive type of jihad; there is action by the believer's heart, by his tongue, by his hands, as well as by the sword. War and Peace in the Law of Islam 56. As respects the military aspects it is written:

"The jihad, in other words, is a sanction against polytheism and must be suffered by all non-Muslims who reject Islam, or, in the case of the dhimmis (Scripturaries), refuse to pay the poll tax. The jihad, therefore, may be defined as the litigation between Islam and polytheism; it is also a form of punishment to be inflicted upon Islam's enemies and the renegades from the faith. Thus in Islam, as in Western Christendom, the jihad is the bellum justum." Id., at 59.

The jihad is the Moslem's counterpart of the "just" war as it has been known in the West. Neither Clay nor Negre should be subject to punishment because he will not renounce the "truth" of the teaching of his respective church that wars indeed may exist which are just wars in which a Moslem or Catholic has a respective duty to participate.

What Clay's testimony adds up to is that he believes only in war as sanctioned by the Koran, that is to say, a religious war against nonbelievers. All other wars are unjust.

That is a matter of belief, of conscience, of religious principle. Both Clay and Negre were "by reason of religious training and belief" conscientiously opposed to participation in war of the character proscribed by their respective religions. That belief is a matter of conscience protected by the First Amendment which Congress has no power to qualify or dilute as it did in ß 6 (j) of the Military Selective Service Act of 1967, 50 U. S. C. App. ß456 (j) (1964 ed., Supp. V) when it restricted the exemption to those "conscientiously opposed to participation in war in any form." For the reasons I stated in Negre and in Gillette v. United States, 401 U. S. 437, 463 and 470, that construction puts Clay in a class honored by the First Amendment, even though those schooled in a different conception of "just" wars may find it quite irrational.

I would reverse the judgment below.

Mr. Justice Harlan concurring in the result susceptible of the reading that petitioner's proof of sincerity was insufficient as a matter of law because his conscientious objector claim had not been timely asserted. This would have been erroneous advice had the Department's letter been so read. Since the Appeals Board might have acted on such an interpretation of the letter, reversal is required under Sicurella v. United States, 348 U. S. 385 (1955).

Jackie Robinson's I Never Had It Made

1972

"I had started the season as a lonely man, often feeling like a black Don Quixote tilting at a lot of white windmills."

Overview

I Never Had It Made is the 1972 autobiography of baseball legend Jackie Robinson, the man who integrated Major League Baseball (MLB). The historic role of Robinson in the integration of professional athletics and more broadly in the U.S. civil rights movement cannot be overestimated. It has been said that the major leagues were slightly ahead of the curve in expanding the rights of all players based on talent rather than skin color.

Robinson's autobiography is a significant document because it details his life both on and off the field. As a role model for all African Americans, he understood that he would have to surpass white athletes in order to earn the respect of his teammates, opposing players, and the nation's sports fans. Robinson was acutely aware of the revolutionary task ahead of him: He literally stepped up to the plate to try to make the United States a land of opportunity for everyone. Robinson's story resonates even in the twenty-first century, especially as he reminds us that it was not so long ago that a person of color could be openly jeered at and humiliated on the public stage with little fear of retribution for the perpetrators. I Never Had It Made stands as one of the first autobiographies by a sports legend to go beyond the playing field and out into the larger world.

Context

For much of its history, MLB did not permit African American players in its ranks. There were a few scattered examples of African American or Hispanic players in the nineteenth century, including Moses "Fleetwood" Walker and Bud Fowler, but by the 1890s an unwritten rule forbade people of color from participating in Organized Baseball. In response, black ballplayers formed their own professional clubs, playing each other as well as white semiprofessional teams. Talented stars like the famous shortstop John Henry Lloyd (often called the black Honus Wagner) were virtually unknown in the larger white community but continued to sharpen their skills on all-black teams. There were a few aborted attempts to hire African American players, including one by John McGraw of the Baltimore Orioles, who in 1901 attempted to pass off his new player, Chief Charlie Tokohama, as a full-blooded Native American. In reality, the chief was an African American player, Charlie Grant, who played with the Page Fence Giants, an independent team from Adrian, Michigan. Several fans recognized Grant, and he was forced off the team. Racial bias thus closed off a large pool of potential players for Organized Baseball, which was expanding in the early twentieth century.

Despite the deliberate segregation promulgated by Organized Baseball, teams like the Cuban Giants and the Harrisburg Giants drew crowds among urban black communities. Besides playing on organized teams, African Americans played baseball on sandlots and in other urban spaces just as their white counterparts did. Barnstorming tours were particularly popular: Black teams would travel from town to town, presenting a dazzling display of athletic ability and showmanship to attract people to the game. Colorful costumes and exuberant antics were all a part of the show. Often, the players engaged in horseplay and clowning during the game much like the later Harlem Globetrotters basketball team. Barnstormers brought baseball to smaller communities, which normally did not have access to professional athletic talent.

While there were several attempts to form African American professional leagues, none lasted more than a season, until 1920. That year, Andrew "Rube" Foster, a pitcher who also managed the Leland Giants and later was the main booking agent for black midwestern teams, organized the first black professional league, the National Negro League (NNL). Eight teams comprised the original NNL: the Chicago American Giants, the Chicago Giants, the Cuban Stars, the Dayton Marcos, the Detroit Stars, the Indianapolis ABCs, the Kansas City Monarchs, and the St. Louis Giants. The NNL constantly struggled to survive. Teams came and went, although the Monarchs and the Chicago American Giants were constants.

NNL teams played about sixty to eighty games a year with each other, but they also played other teams, including white semiprofessional teams on their open dates. In 1923 a second Negro League, the Eastern Colored League, began play. This league was composed of teams from the East Coast, including the Hilldale (Philadelphia) Club, the Cuban Stars East, the Royal Giants, the Bacharach (New York) Giants, the Lincoln Giants, and the Baltimore Black Sox. The two leagues faced off in their own World Series. This lasted for four years, from 1923 to 1927. The Eastern Colored League folded shortly thereafter.

With the onset of the Great Depression, the NNL as well as white Organized Baseball faced serious difficulties. In 1930, following the death of Rube Foster, the NNL disbanded; three years later it was reborn under the leadership of William A. "Gus" Greenlee. Owner of the Pittsburgh Crawfords, Greenlee had a rather checkered career as a fight promoter, bootlegger, and speakeasy owner not to mention operator of a successful numbers racket. Greenlee took over ownership of the Crawfords to provide himself with a convenient shelter for his illegal activities. One of his best decisions was to hire the inimitable black pitcher Leroy "Satchel" Paige in 1931.

The NNL was followed in 1937 by another new league, the Negro American League (NAL), which was organized by H. G. Hall, president of the Chicago American Giants. With the birth of the NAL, the NNL soon became a league of eastern teams, while the NAL franchises were mostly in the Midwest and South. The NAL, which hung on until 1960, absorbed some of the NNL teams after the latter's demise in 1948.

The Negro Leagues attracted thousands of fans throughout the nation, thanks in part to the rising incomes of a growing African American middle class. African Americans were segregated in their own venues, which actually added to the popularity of the Negro Leagues. The high quality of play further increased the fan base, even during the hard years of the Great Depression. It was only a matter of time, however, before Organized Baseball would finally erase the color line, making the Negro Leagues obsolete.

There were earlier rumblings among sportswriters about the MLB's shortsightedness in not tapping black athletic talent for its teams. The death in 1944 of the longtime MLB commissioner Kenesaw Mountain Landis, who was given the job of cleaning up the game following the infamous "Black Sox" scandal of 1919 (in which eight members of the Chicago White Sox, including "Shoeless" Joe Jackson, were accused of throwing the 1919 World Series, to be acquitted but banned from the league) gave hope to those who wanted to integrate the game. Landis's replacement as commissioner, A. P. "Happy" Chandler, both advocated and pursued the notion of finally ending segregation. Besides the inherent racism, opponents of integration feared financial loss, especially in the South, where most of the teams migrated for spring training. Those who promoted integration talked about the contributions African Americans had made during World War II, putting their lives on the line for their country. It would take the courage of one man Branch Rickey to finally erase the color line in American baseball.

The Ohio-born Rickey, owner of the Brooklyn Dodgers, was determined to build his National League team into a winner. He recognized that one way to accomplish this was to go after the unmined talent in the Negro Leagues. During World War II, his staff scouted the Negro Leagues to find a suitable player to integrate professional baseball as a member of the Brooklyn Dodgers. Jackie Robinson of the Kansas City Monarchs had the right combination of talent, maturity, and cool headedness to become the first black player in Organized Baseball. Robinson was signed in 1946, beginning his career with the Dodgers' farm team, the Montreal Royals. On April 15, 1947, Robinson played his first game as a Dodger at Ebbets Field in Brooklyn. Robinson's success in the majors not to mention the fact that his very presence increased attendance led to the signing of other black ballplayers to MLB contracts. Larry Doby was signed in 1947 by the Cleveland Indians, thus breaking the race barrier in the American League. The following season, the Indians hired the legendary pitcher Satchel Paige.

The ending of segregation in MLB foreshadowed the burgeoning civil rights movement of the 1950s. Indeed, the momentous debut of Jackie Robinson in a Dodger uniform coincided with President Harry S. Truman's Executive Order 9981 desegregating the U.S. armed forces in 1948. Although Robinson's road in the MLB was anything but smooth, his bold strike for equality and perseverance in the face of opposition changed the sport forever.

About the Author

The grandson of slaves, Jack Roosevelt Robinson was born in Cairo, Georgia, on January 31, 1919. His parents, Mallie and Jerry Robinson, were both sharecroppers. Jackie Robinson was the youngest of five children. Six months following Robinson's birth, his father abandoned the family, running off with a neighbor's wife. Mallie Robinson decided to sell everything she could and move her family to California, where she had a brother. She worked hard as a laundress, trying to support her young family. As an adult, Robinson expressed his admiration for the courage and tenacity of his mother in keeping the family together through rough times. Even as a youth, Robinson tried to help support the family with a paper route and other odd jobs.

Looking back on his youth, Robinson noted that he fell in with a rough crowd and might have become a juvenile delinquent if not for the influence of two men: Carl Anderson and the Reverend Karl Downs. Anderson, an auto mechanic at a shop near Robinson's home, pointed out that should Robinson persist with his gang activity, he would be hurting his mother as well as himself. Robinson's pastor, the Reverend Downs, made his church a safe haven for neighborhood youths; he was a good listener, and Robinson spoke with him often, sharing his concerns and problems.

While he was attending John Muir Technical High School, Robinson earned letters in football, basketball, baseball, and track. He continued to excel at Pasadena Junior College, where he received a great deal of publicity regarding his achievements. The attention brought out the college recruiters, and he eventually selected the University of California at Los Angeles (UCLA) because of its proximity to his home. His eldest brother, Frank, who was one of his biggest fans and supporters, was killed in a motorcycle accident just about the time Robinson began attending UCLA. In 1941 Robinson became the first person to letter in four sports at UCLA, namely, basketball, baseball, football, and track. While at the university, he met his future wife, Rachel Isum, a nursing student, whom he married in 1945. Robinson never completed his degree, as he had to leave UCLA owing to his financial circumstances. He played football for a short time with the Honolulu Bears, a pro team, returning to California at the end of the 1941, just two days before Pearl Harbor was attacked by the Japanese.

With the entry of the United States into World War II, Robinson enlisted in the U.S. Army, where he was sent to Fort Riley, Kansas. He applied for Officer Candidate School, but the "Jim Crow Army," as Robinson called it, stalled over admitting the African American candidates. After the army was pressured by officials in Washington, D.C., the African American soldiers miraculously found themselves in Officer Candidate School. In January 1943 Robinson became a second lieutenant. He quickly discovered the inbred racism that permeated the armed forces. In trying to fight racial injustice, Robinson finally went too far when he refused to sit at the back of an army bus on the grounds of Fort Hood, Texas. He was brought to trial but was honorably discharged.

Returning to civilian life, Robinson, through his old pastor, Reverend Downs, became athletic director at Sam Houston College in Texas. In 1945 the Kansas City Monarchs offered Robinson $400 a month to play for them, a princely sum for an African American athlete in the 1940s. He played shortstop for the team, batting .387 in forty-seven games, with five home runs. Robinson's great athletic ability and versatility made him an attractive addition to the team and was among the reasons he was considered one of the top ballplayers to cross Organized Baseball's color line.

Brooklyn Dodgers owner Branch Rickey was determined to integrate MLB. He began looking at several talented Negro League athletes, including Josh Gibson, Satchel Paige, Roy Campanella, and Buck Leonard. Rickey finally decided on Robinson for a number of reasons.

Robinson was not the best player among those Rickey scouted, but he certainly was one of the most versatile and athletically adept. He also had the right background and the experience Rickey felt would help the first African American player deal with the hostility he would face. Robinson had grown up in an integrated neighborhood, played on integrated teams, and demonstrated an emotional maturity that stood him in good stead as a pioneer in desegregating professional sports. His courage off the field in standing up to discrimination in the armed forces and elsewhere also weighed in his favor.

Rickey signed Robinson to a contract to play for the minor league Montreal Royals at $600 a month for the 1946 season. The Royals, a farm team for the Dodgers, played in the International League; spring training was in Florida. Robinson made his debut in an exhibition game with the Dodgers on March 17, 1946. While he did face some hostility, the Montreal fans generally embraced him, and attendance at Royals games grew. Robinson batted .349 for the season and won the International League's Most Valuable Player award.

The next season Robinson made his debut with the Brooklyn Dodgers on April 15, 1947, at Ebbets Field. His performance earned him the Major League's Rookie of the Year honors. It was not easy for Robinson, facing discrimination, racial epithets, and general hostility on and off the field. The following season, the presence of other African American players, including Larry Doby, who broke the American League's racial barrier by signing with the Cleveland Indians, took some of the heat off of Robinson.

Robinson worked hard to improve his performance, especially his batting. Working with former player and Dodger adviser George Sisler, he raised his average from .296 in 1947 to .342 two years later. He had improved so much that Robinson was named the National League's MVP in 1949. That same year, he became the first African American to play in the All Star League, voted in by the fans to be starting second baseman. His success in MLB made him a fan favorite and a symbol of racial equality for all Americans. Hollywood quickly jumped on Robinson's popularity and produced The Jackie Robinson Story, which was released in 1950. Robinson played himself, and the actress Ruby Dee played his wife, Rachel. He continued to play baseball into the 1950s, but by 1956 he was feeling the effects of diabetes and decided to retire. He officially retired on January 5, 1957, and became director of personnel for Chock full o'Nuts coffee shops. In 1962 Robinson was inducted into the Baseball Hall of Fame in Cooperstown, New York. It was the first year he was eligible, and he was elected on the first ballot. Three years later he became the first African American sports analyst for ABC-TV's Major League Game of the Week.

Understanding his own role in furthering the cause of civil rights, Robinson was actively involved in the movement. He served as the chair of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People's million-dollar Freedom Fund drive in 1956 and continued on its board until 1967. He was cofounder in 1964 of the Freedom National Bank, which was based in Harlem and owned and operated by African Americans. In 1970 Robinson founded the Jackie Robinson Construction Company, which built residences for low-income people.

Robinson received many honors and accolades during his own lifetime and even after his death from a heart attack on October 24, 1972. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People awarded him the Spingarn Medal, the highest award for contributions by an African American, in 1956. The Dodgers retired his number, 42, in June 1962; Major League Baseball followed suit on the fiftieth anniversary of his MLB debut in 1997. In 1987 the Rookie of the Year Award in both the National and American leagues was renamed in his honor. Time magazine selected him as one of the hundred most important people of the twentieth century. President Ronald Reagan posthumously awarded him the Presidential Medal of Freedom in 1984, and George W. Bush honored him with the Congressional Gold Medal in 2005. Robinson's contributions both on and off the field make him a remarkable and courageous person who gave of himself in all aspects of his life.

I Never Had It Made, Jackie Robinson's autobiography as told to Alfred Duckett, was published in 1972, the same year Robinson died. The book stands out because of Robinson's candor, intelligence, and humor. His story tells not only about his life on the field but also about his personal life, even recounting his son's struggle with drug addiction and his early death in an automobile accident. Throughout the book, Robinson reveals his feelings about politics, the civil rights movement, the Vietnam War, and the progress (or lack thereof) of African Americans in society. He openly confronts the critics who accused him of being a black man "made by white people." He acknowledges three white men who were like godfathers to him in different aspects of his life: Branch Rickey in athletics, Bill Black (from Chock full o'Nuts) in business, and Nelson Rockefeller in politics. Robinson felt especially close to Rickey and greatly admired him for his sharp business acumen and courage in integrating MLB.

Robinson understood his position as a role model for African Americans. He dedicated himself to improving the status of blacks in American society. In the tumultuous 1950s and 1960s, he used his celebrity to advance the cause of civil rights. He astutely observes that the route to improving the lot of African Americans was "the ballot and the buck." Incisive observations permeate Robinson's autobiography. He discusses major political leaders, especially Nelson Rockefeller, with whom he became especially close. He shows particular admiration for Rockefeller's staunch support of civil rights.

I Never Had It Made is an apt selection for the title of Robinson's autobiography. "Everything I ever got I fought hard for," he notes in the book's epilogue. "I cannot possibly believe I have it made while so many of my black brothers and sisters are hungry, inadequately housed, insufficiently clothed, denied their dignity as they live in slums or barely exist on welfare." Although the book was originally published in 1972, a new edition appeared in 1995, with introductions by the Princeton University professor of African American Studies Cornel West and the home run king and all-around baseball legend Henry "Hank" Aaron. The excerpt here is the fourth chapter ("The Major Leagues") of the 1995 edition of the book, in which Robinson describes his MLB debut.

◆ The Big Question

The chapter opens with the birth of Robinson's first child, Jackie, Jr., on November 18, 1946. It was a momentous year in many ways for Robinson and his wife. That spring, he had made his debut with the Brooklyn Dodgers' farm team, the Montreal Royals but not before facing the reality of the segregated South. Spring training was held in Florida, which meant that Robinson could not stay with the rest of the team in a hotel; he had to be put up in a private home. The Dodgers did not own their own spring-training facility at the time, so they relied on local officials for scheduling games. In the segregated South, several communities refused to allow the Royals to play if Robinson was on the roster. Finally, Robinson was able to make his debut in Daytona Beach's City Island Ball Park on March 17, 1946, in an exhibition game with the parent team, the Dodgers. His actual MLB debut was at the Royals' season opener against the Jersey City Giants on April 18, 1946. The strain of his first year playing in the major leagues, even in the farm system, took its toll. To minimize the stress on her husband, Rachel who was expecting their first son at the time spared Robinson the details of the troubles she experienced during her pregnancy; she even insisted on traveling with Robinson, so she could provide support during those difficult times.

Robinson then recounts how tensions mounted as spring training for the 1947 season drew closer. Branch

Branch Rickey (Library of Congress)

Rickey had to decide whether or not to bring Robinson up to the Dodgers. Robinson's strong performance with Montreal led to much speculation in the sporting world about his status; the end of the color line seemed imminent. He comments on his admiration for Rickey's tact and skill in proceeding on the path toward desegregation and goes on to tell about being ordered to report for training in Cuba with the Royals in January 1947. By that time, the Dodgers had hired three other African American players, catcher Roy Campanella and pitchers Don Newcombe and Roy Partlow. All four men were sent to Cuba, where they stayed in separate quarters at a hotel fifteen miles from the practice field. According to Robinson, Rickey told him that he was trying to avoid any racially motivated missteps that might jeopardize his plans for the players' entry into the big leagues. Robinson was also assigned to play first base, which sent up flags that Rickey was planning to bring him up to the Dodger organization.

This set off a conspiracy among a few white Dodger players who agreed to sign a petition stating they would not play on the team with Robinson. A southern player, Kirby Higbe, leaked the plot to one of Rickey's aides. Rickey promptly notified the ringleaders of the scheme that he was going ahead with his plans and anyone who did not like it could quit. In the meantime, Rickey continued to give Robinson advice about doing his best and impressing not only the Dodger players but also the sportswriters who would be sending back stories to New York. Rickey's ulterior motive was to have the Dodger players clamor to have Robinson on the team, but this did not happen. Rickey then decided to have his manager, Leo Durocher, tell the sportswriters that he believed the Dodgers could win the pennant with a talented first baseman and that Robinson was the best prospect. This strategy backfired, however, when Commissioner Happy Chandler suspended Durocher for "unbecoming conduct." Rickey finally decided to ease the negative publicity from Durocher's suspension with the positive story of Robinson's signing with the Dodgers on April 9, 1947.

◆ Debuts with Brooklyn

Robinson's debut at Ebbets Field on April 15, 1947, was less than auspicious. As he describes it, he fell into an early season slump and began to question his own abilities, ruminating about a comment by Cleveland pitcher Bob Feller that he was "good field, no hit." Early that season, Robinson experienced what he refers to as one of the worst times of his career, when the Philadelphia Phillies arrived in Brooklyn for a three-game series. The Phillies were notorious for taunting the other team's players; in Robinson's case, however, they were relentless, spewing vicious and demeaning insults during the entire game. He notes that the abuse was directed by the Phillies' manager, Ben Chapman. Robinson was so enraged that he came close to losing his cool and doing exactly what Branch Rickey had told him not to do: blowing up at the perpetrators. But Robinson recalls thinking about how much faith Rickey had placed in him and credits that sense of gratitude and trust with helping him to stay the course. The Phillies continued to abuse Robinson for the next two games, partly because Brooklyn had been victorious in the first game. Finally, by the third game, Dodger Ed Stankey turned on the Phillies and shouted them down. Other Dodger players told the press how angry they were about the Phillies' behavior. Robinson notes that the Phillies organization tried to cover for the team and claimed that Chapman was not a racist, since he readily used racial slurs on whites as well: For instance, Chapman referred to the Italian American baseball legend Joe DiMaggio as a "the Wop" and Whitey Kurowski of the Cardinals as "the Polack." Robinson says he believed Rickey was wrong in telling him to shake hands with Chapman; for Robinson, having his picture taken while shaking hands with Chapman was one of the most humiliating things he ever had to do.

◆ Clash with the Cardinals

Throughout his first season with the Dodgers, Robinson faced hostility and racist abuse from various quarters. He relates a shocking incident involving Brooklyn's first meeting with the Cardinals in St. Louis in 1947. Stanley Woodward, sports editor of the New York Herald Tribune, discovered and "exposed a plot that was brewing among the … Cardinals." The team intended to initiate a protest strike against Robinson's participation in the game. Had the plan succeeded, it might have spread throughout Organized Baseball and kept the major leagues white. The National League president, Ford Frick, warned the Cardinal players that they would not get away with a strike. Frick, who later served as MLB commissioner, was determined that the National League back Robinson, no matter what. Robinson reports that he received much hate mail, including threats against himself and his family. The series Brooklyn played in Philadelphia was remarkably unpleasant for Robinson, as he recalls not only being refused lodging at the Benjamin Franklin Hotel but also being heckled and taunted constantly, with some tormentors actually pointing bats at him from the dugout and making "machine-gunlike noises" in his direction.

Essential Quotes

"For one wild and rage-crazed minute I thought, 'To hell with Mr. Rickey's "noble experiment." It's clear it won't succeed. I have made every effort to work hard, to get myself into shape. My best is not good enough for them.' I thought what a glorious, cleansing thing it would be to let go. To hell with the image of the patient black freak I was supposed to create."

"Getting a hero's welcome in September made me remember how bad the beginning of my first season with the Dodgers had been. At that time I still wasn't looking like any kind of winner, even though the increasing acceptance of my teammates had begun to help me out of a terrible slump. I seriously wondered if I could make the Rickey experiment a success."

"I had started the season as a lonely man, often feeling like a black Don Quixote tilting at a lot of white windmills. I ended it feeling like a member of a solid team. The Dodgers were a championship team because all of us had learned something. I had learned how to exercise self-control—to answer insults, violence, and injustice with silence—and I learned how to earn the respect of my teammates."

"Karl Downs ranked with Roy Wilkins, Whitney Young, and Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., in ability and dedication, and had he lived he would have developed into one of the front line leaders on the national scene. He was able to communicate with people of all colors because he was endowed with the ability to inspire confidence. It was hard to believe that God had taken the life of a man with such a promising future."

While Robinson faced his share of hostility on the field, he also developed close friendships. He writes, for example, of the unwavering support shown by Pee Wee Reese, the Dodgers' shortstop: The southern-born Reese exhibited courage and decency, defending his black teammate in the face of racist taunts and jeers. Other Dodger teammates followed Reese's example and rallied around Robinson's cause. However, not everyone was happy about the pioneering Rickey's efforts. Robinson recounts a particularly unnerving incident involving boorish behavior at a team poker game. When one of his southern teammates, Hugh Casey, baited him with a vulgar racist comment, Robinson keeping in mind Rickey's words about having "guts enough not to fight back" ignored it and continued playing. According to Robinson, though, most of the team came around to support him and their other black teammates. Robinson also drew satisfaction that the Dodgers set the example for other teams, and he applauded the signing of the African American players Larry Doby with the Cleveland Indians and Willard Brown and Henry Thompson with the St. Louis Browns.

◆ 1947 World Series

The first season with the Dodgers ended in triumph, with the team winning the National League pennant. Robinson finished the season with a .296 batting average, twelve home runs, and a league-leading twenty-seven stolen bases. He closes this chapter of his autobiography by reflecting on the contrast between the beginning and end of the 1947 season. He had started out feeling lonely and isolated but eventually learned to win people's respect with his behavior on and off the field. By the end of the season, he was truly a part of the team; he had played well and was even given a hero's welcome when the team returned to Brooklyn that September, after clinching the National League title. Robinson ends the chapter on a sad note with the death of his mentor, the Reverend Karl Downs. Having fallen ill while visiting the Robinsons in New York, Downs seemed to recover after being hospitalized. When he returned home to Texas, however, his illness returned, and he was treated in a segregated hospital, where he passed away. Robinson remained convinced that Downs would have survived if he had remained up north, where hospitals were integrated. Robinson felt the loss of his old friend when the World Series opened; the fans, he recalls, were very kind to him, even though the Dodgers lost to their rival Yankees.

Audience

I Never Had It Made was meant for a general audience. Putnam and Sons, the original publisher, distributed the book throughout the United States and abroad. Nearly forty years after its release, Robinson's autobiography appeals to a variety of readers those interested in the history of baseball, sports in general, African American history, reform in the United States, or biography would find Robinson's book of great interest. His story is fascinating, and his character, intelligence, and courage come through in this work. At the time of its publication in 1972, the United States was still reeling from the effects of decades of racism. Robinson's autobiography graphically illustrates many of the issues confronting the nation at the time, especially race relations but also politics and the Vietnam War. As seen through the eyes of a true pioneer, Robinson's story remains a valuable piece of social history.

Impact

By the time his autobiography appeared in 1972, Jackie Robinson had transcended the concept of race that so divided Americans. I Never Had It Made is a warts-and-all story that captures Robinson's doubts and dreams. The man who erased Organized Baseball's color line lives on in his own words, speaking with candor and clarity to an entirely new generation of readers in the twenty-first century. As Cornel West, the author of the introduction to the 1995 edition, put it: "The most striking features of the book are its honesty, its courage and its wisdom. Here is a great American hero who refuses to be a mythical hero."

Questions for Further Study

1. It has been argued that athletics and the military are the only institutions in which racism has essentially disappeared. Would you agree with this view? Why or why not?

2. In his account, Robinson makes the following statement: "Others genuinely wouldn't know how to be friendly with me." To what extent have you ever felt this way with regard to a person of a different race or nationality? Alternatively, have you ever felt that this was how others were reacting to you? How did you deal with that situation?

3. Compare Robinson's account with that of another athlete, Jesse Owens, as chronicled in Blackthink: My Life as Black Man and White Man, which was published just two years earlier. What similar experiences did the two men share? How were their experiences different? Do you think that Robinson faced a different kind of reaction because he was breaching the color line in America's "national pastime"?

4. In the twenty-first century, Jackie Robinson's name has achieved almost mythical status; merely mention the name, and baseball fans, sports fans, and the public in general will immediately picture the constellation of events in which Robinson was involved. Based on your reading of I Never Had It Made, what do you think Robinson's reaction to this mythologizing might be? Explain.

5. Make the argument that putting aside all of the "official" pronouncements about race—To Secure These Rights in 1947, President Harry Truman's executive order desegregating the military in 1948, and various Supreme Court decisions—Robinson's desegregation of baseball was the most important civil rights event of a generation.

Jackie Robinson's I Never Had It Made

"The Major Leagues"

Jackie Robinson, Jr., was born in November, 1946. If there is anything to the theory that the influences affecting expectant parents have important impact on the developing child, our baby son was predestined to lead a very complicated and complex life.

Rachel had had problems during her pregnancy that I was not aware of. She accepted them with uncomplaining courage because of her conviction that, since I had a job to do in baseball that was demanding and difficult, I should be as free as possible to deal with it without the further complications of family worries. She was determined, therefore, that, while she shared my problems with me, she would keep me from knowing about her own fears and anxieties. She did a good job of keeping her Problems to herself. It wasn't until after Jackie was born that I learned that Rae had occasionally experienced fevers seemingly unconnected with the normal process of pregnancy. Her temperature would rise to 103 and 104 degrees and she would take sulfa drugs and aspirin to bring her fever down. She had insisted on traveling with me during the first season with Montreal because she knew I needed her. Often I would come home tired, discouraged, wondering if I could go on enduring the verbal abuse and even the physical provocations and continue to "turn the other cheek." Rachel knew exactly how I felt, and she would have the right words, the perfect way of comforting me. Rachel's understanding love was a powerful antidote for the poison of being taunted by fans, sneered at by fellow-players, and constantly mistreated because of my blackness.

In the eighth month of her pregnancy, I insisted that Rachel go home to Los Angeles to have the baby. Two weeks after she returned to her mother's home, I was able to get back to Los Angeles and be there the night she went into labor. When the time came, I got her to the hospital fast and our boy was born with unusual speed. We'll never forget that day November 18, 1946.

The big question, as spring training for the 1947 season became imminent, was whether Branch Rickey would move me out of the minor league and up to the Brooklyn Dodgers. Because of my successful first season with Montreal, it was a question being asked in sportswriting and baseball circles. Even those who were dead set against a black man coming into the majors knew there was a strong possibility that Mr. Rickey would take the big step.

Mr. Rickey had to move cautiously and with skill and strategy. Rae and I never doubted that Mr. Rickey would carry out his intention, but we lived in suspense wondering when. In the latter part of January I was ordered to report back to the Montreal Royals for spring training in Cuba. I would not be able to afford to take Rachel and the baby with me. I had to go it alone.

Although we could not understand Mr. Rickey's reasons for the delay in bringing me up to the Dodgers, we believed he was working things out the best way possible. We thought it was a hopeful sign that both the Dodgers and the Royals would be training in Havana. It could be reasonably expected that the racist atmosphere I had had to face in Florida and other parts of the United States would not exist in another country of non-whites. The Royals now had three more black players Roy Campanella, a catcher; Don Newcombe and Roy Partlow, both pitchers. I learned, on arriving in Havana, that we black players would be housed in separate quarters at a hotel fifteen miles away from the practice field. The rest of the team was living at a military academy, and the Dodgers were headquartered at the beautiful Nacional Hotel. I expressed my resentment that the Cuban authorities would subject us to the same kind of segregation I had faced in Florida and was promptly informed that living arrangements had not been made by local authorities but by Mr. Rickey. I was told that he felt his plans for us were on the threshold of success and he didn't want a possible racial incident to jeopardize his program. I reluctantly accepted the explanation.

I was told I must learn to play first base. This disturbed me because I felt it might mean a delay in reaching the majors. However, it was felt that the Dodgers, in order to become contenders for the pennant, had to strengthen the first base position.

The fact that I had been assigned to first base aroused fear in the Dodger camp. They sensed that Mr. Rickey was planning to bring me up to the Dodgers. Some of the players got together and decided to sign a petition declaring they would not play with me on the team. Ironically, the leak about the planned revolt came from a Southerner, Kirby Higbe, of South Carolina. Higbe had a few too many beers one night, and he began feeling uncomfortable about the conspiracy. He revealed the plot to one of Mr. Rickey's aides and Mr. Rickey put down the rebellion with steamroller effectiveness. He said later, "I have always believed that a little show of force at the right time is necessary when there's a deliberate violation of law.… I believe that when a man is involved in an overt act of violence or in destruction of someone's rights, that it's no time to conduct an experiment in education or persuasion."

He found out who the ringleaders were Hugh Casey, a good relief pitcher from Georgia; Southerner Bobby Bragan, a respected catcher; Dixie Walker of Alabama; and Carl Furrillo. Walker had deliberately taken a trip so he wouldn't appear to be in on the scheme. The ringleaders were called in individually, and Mr. Rickey told each one that petitions would make no difference. He said he would carry out his plan, regardless of protest. Anyone who was not willing to have a black teammate could quit. The petition protest collapsed before it got started.

Mr. Rickey was very direct with me during those early 1947 spring training days. He told me I couldn't rest on the victories I'd had with Montreal. I should, in fact, forget them as much as possible. My league record meant nothing. The true test would be making the grade on the field against major league pitching.

"I want you to be a whirling demon against the Dodgers," he said. "I want you to concentrate, to hit that ball, to get on base by any means necessary. I want you to run wild, to steal the pants off them, to be the most conspicuous player on the field but conspicuous only because of the kind of baseball you're playing. Not only will you impress the Dodger players, but the stories that the newspapermen send back to the Brooklyn and New York newspapers will help create demand on the part of the fans that you be brought up to the majors."

With this kind of marching order, I simply had to give my best. I batted .625 and stole seven bases during seven Royals-Dodgers games. Not even this made the Brooklyn players ask for me as Mr. Rickey had hoped. He had wanted, when promoting me, to appear to be giving in to tremendous pressure from my teammates-to-be.

When this strategy failed, Mr. Rickey, a resourceful man, arranged to have Manager Leo Durocher tell the sportswriters that his Brooklyn team could win the pennant with a good man on first base and that I was the best prospect. Leo would add he was going to try to convince Mr. Rickey to sign me. That plan failed, too, because on April 9 before it could be carried out, Baseball Commissioner Chandler suspended Durocher for a year "for conduct detrimental to baseball." Durocher and the commissioner's office had been in conflict for some time. The commissioner's office had challenged Leo's "questionable associations" off the playing field. Durocher had hit back by noting that some very well-known gangsters had been seen near the Yankee dugout during a Dodger-Yankee game. He said no one had done anything about that. This sparked an exchange between the commissioner's office, Durocher, Mr. Rickey, and Yankee President Larry MacPhail. It had been common belief that the storm had blown over. Ironically, on the same April morning that Mr. Rickey hoped to make his move, Durocher was suspended.

Quickly, Mr. Rickey saw that signing the first black in the major leagues would virtually wipe the Durocher story, a negative one, off the front pages. His action would cause controversy, but he believed it would be like a shot in the arm to the club. On the morning of April 9, 1947, just before an exhibition game, reporters in the press box received a single sheet of paper with a one-line announcement. It read: "Brooklyn announces the purchase of the contract of Jack Roosevelt Robinson from Montreal. Signed, Branch Rickey."

That morning turned into a press Donnybrook. The sports-writers snatched up telephones. The telegraph wires relayed the message to the sports world.

Less than a week after I became Number 42 on the Brooklyn club, I played my first game with the team. I did a miserable job. There was an overflow crowd at Ebbets Field. If they expected any miracles out of Robinson, they were sadly disappointed. I was in another slump. I grounded out to the third baseman, flied out to left field, bounced into a double play, was safe on an error, and, later, was removed as a defensive safeguard. The next four games reflected my deep slump. I went to plate twenty times without one base hit. Burt Shotton, a man I respected and liked, had replaced Durocher as manager. As my slump deepened, I appreciated Shotton's patience and understanding. I knew the pressure was on him to take me out of the lineup. People began recalling Bob Feller's analysis of me. I was "good field, no hit." There were others who doubted that I could field and some who hoped I would flunk out and thus establish that blacks weren't ready for the majors. Shotton, however, continued to encourage me.

Document Text

Early in the season, the Philadelphia Phillies came to Ebbets Field for a three-game series. I was still in my slump and events of the opening game certainly didn't help. Starting to the plate in the first inning, I could scarcely believe my ears. Almost as if it had been synchronized by some master conductor, hate poured forth from the Phillies dugout.

"Hey, nigger, why don't you go back to the cotton field where you belong?"

"They're waiting for you in the jungles, black boy!"

"Hey, snowflake, which one of those white boys' wives are you dating tonight?"

"We don't want you here, nigger."

"Go back to the bushes!"

Those insults and taunts were only samples of the torrent of abuse which poured out from the Phillies dugout that April day.

I have to admit that this day, of all the unpleasant days in my life, brought me nearer to cracking up than I ever had been. Perhaps I should have become inured to this kind of garbage, but I was in New York City and unprepared to face the kind of barbarism from a northern team that I had come to associate with the Deep South. The abuse coming out of the Phillies dugout was being directed by the team's manager, Ben Chapman, a Southerner. I felt tortured and I tried just to play ball and ignore the insults. But it was really getting to me. What did the Phillies want from me? What, indeed, did Mr. Rickey expect of me? I was, after all, a human being. What was I doing here turning the other cheek as though I weren't a man? In college days I had had a reputation as a black man who never tolerated affronts to his dignity. I had defied prejudice in the Army. How could I have thought that barriers would fall, that, indeed, my talent could triumph over bigotry?

For one wild and rage-crazed minute I thought, "To hell with Mr. Rickey's 'noble experiment.' It's clear it won't succeed. I have made every effort to work hard, to get myself into shape. My best is not enough for them." I thought what a glorious, cleansing thing it would be to let go. To hell with the image of the patient black freak I was supposed to create. I could throw down my bat, stride over to that Phillies dugout, grab one of those white sons of bitches and smash his teeth in with my despised black fist. Then I could walk away from it all. I'd never become a sports star. But my son could tell his son someday what his daddy could have been if he hadn't been too much of a man.

Then, I thought of Mr. Rickey how his family and friends had begged him not to fight for me and my people. I thought of all his predictions, which had come true. Mr. Rickey had come to a crossroads and made a lonely decision. I was at a crossroads. I would make mine. I would stay.

The haters had almost won that round. They had succeeded in getting me so upset that I was an easy out. As the game progressed, the Phillies continued with the abuse.

After seven scoreless innings, we got the Phillies out in the eighth, and it was our turn at bat. I led off. The insults were still coming. I let the first pitch go by for a ball. I lined the next one into center field for a single. Gene Hermanski came up to hit and I took my lead.

The Phillies pitcher, a knuckle expert, let fly. I cut out for second. The throw was wide. It bounced past the shortstop. As I came into third, Hermanski singled me home. That was the game.

Apparently frustrated by our victory, the Phillies players kept the heat on me during the next two days. They even enlarged their name-calling to include the rest of the Brooklyn team.

"Hey, you carpetbaggers, how's your little reconstruction period getting along?"

That was a typical taunt. By the third day of our confrontation with these emissaries from the City of Brotherly Love, they had become so outrageous that Ed Stanky exploded. He started yelling at the Phillies.

"Listen, you yellow-bellied cowards," he cried out, "why don't you yell at somebody who can answer back?" It was then that I began to feel better. I remembered Mr. Rickey's prediction. If I won the respect of the team and got them solidly behind me, there would be no question about the success of the experiment.

Stanky wasn't the only Brooklyn player who was angry with the Phillies team. Some of my other teammates told the press about the way Chapman and his players had behaved. Sports columnists around the country criticized Chapman. Dan Parker, sports editor of the New York Daily Mirror, reported:

> Ben Chapman, who during his career with the Yankees was frequently involved in unpleasant incidents with fans who charged him with shouting anti-Semitic remarks at them from the ball field, seems to be up to his old trick of stirring up racial trouble. During the recent series between the Phils and the Dodgers, Chapman and three of his players poured a stream of abuse at Jackie Robinson. Jackie, with admirable restraint, ignored the gutter-snipe language coming from the Phils dugout, thus stamping himself as the only gentleman among those involved in the incident.

The black press did a real job of letting its readers know about the race baiting which had taken place. The publicity in the press built so much anti-Chapman public feeling that the Philadelphia club decided steps must be taken to counteract it. Chapman met with representatives of the black press to try to explain his behavior. The Phillies public relations people insisted, as Ben Chapman did, that he was not anti-Negro. Chapman himself used an interesting line of defense in speaking with black reporters. Didn't they want me to become a big-time big leaguer? Well, so did he and his players. When they played exhibitions with the Yanks, they razzed DiMaggio as "the Wop," Chapman explained. When they came up against the Cards, Whitey Kurowski was called "the Polack." Riding opposition players was the Phils' style of baseball. The Phils could give it out and they could take it. Was I a weakling who couldn't take it? Well, if I wasn't a weakling, then I shouldn't expect special treatment. After all, Chapman said, all is forgotten after a ball game ends.

The press, black and white, didn't buy that argument. They said so. Commissioner Happy Chandler wasn't having any either. His office warned the Phils to keep racial baiting out of the dugout bench jockeying.

A fascinating development of the nastiness with the Phils was the attitude of Mr. Rickey and the reaction of my Brooklyn teammates. Mr. Rickey knew, better than most people, that Chapman's racial prejudice was deeper than he admitted. Bob Carpenter, the Phils' president, had phoned Rickey before game time to try to persuade him not to include me in the lineup. If I played, Carpenter threatened, his team would refuse to play. Mr. Rickey's response was that this would be fine with him. The Dodgers would then take all three games by default. The Dodgers' president wasn't angry with Chapman or his players. As a matter of fact, in later years, Mr. Rickey commented, "Chapman did more than anybody to unite the Dodgers. When he poured out that string of unconscionable abuse, he solidified and unified thirty men, not one of whom was willing to sit by and see someone kick around a man who had his hands tied behind his back Chapman made Jackie a real member of the Dodgers."

Privately, at the time, I thought Mr. Rickey was carrying his "gratitude" to Chapman a little too far when he asked me to appear in public with Chapman. The Phillies manager was genuinely in trouble as a result of all the publicity on the racial razzing. Mr. Rickey thought it would be gracious and generous if I posed for a picture shaking hands with Chapman. The idea was also promoted by the baseball commissioner. I was somewhat sold but not altogether on the concept that a display of such harmony would be "good for the game." I have to admit, though, that having my picture taken with this man was one of the most difficult things I had to make myself do.

There were times, after I had bowed to humiliations like shaking hands with Chapman, when deep depression and speculation as to whether it was all worthwhile would seize me. Often, when I was in this kind of mood, something positive would happen to give me new strength. Sometimes the positive development would come in response to a negative one. This was exactly what happened when a clever sports editor exposed a plot that was brewing among the St. Louis Cardinals. The plan was set to be executed on May 9, 1947, when Brooklyn was to visit St. Louis for the first game of the season between the two clubs. The Cards were planning to pull a last-minute protest strike against my playing in the game. If successful, the plan could have had a chain reaction throughout the baseball world with other players agreeing to unite in a strong bid to keep baseball white. Stanley Woodward, sports editor of the New York Herald Tribune, had learned of the plot and printed an exclusive scoop exposing it. Ford Frick reacted immediately and notified the Cardinal players in no uncertain terms that they would not be permitted to get away with a strike.

"If you do this you will be suspended from the league," Frick warned. "You will find that the friends you think you have in the press box will not support you, that you will be outcasts. I do not care if half the league strikes. Those who do it will encounter quick retribution. They will be suspended and I don't care if it wrecks the National League for five years. This is the United States of America, and one citizen has as much right to play as another.

"The National League," Frick continued, "will go down the line with Robinson whatever the consequence. You will find if you go through with your intention that you have been guilty of complete madness."

The hot light of publicity about the plot and the forthright hard line that Frick laid down to the plotters helped to avert what could have been a disaster for integration of baseball. Many writers and baseball personalities credited Woodward with significant service to baseball and to sportsmanship.

While some positive things were happening, there were others that were negative. Hate mail arrived daily, but it didn't bother me nearly as much as the threat mail. The threat mail included orders to me to get out of the game or be killed, threats to assault Rachel, to kidnap Jackie, Jr. Although none of the threats materialized, I was quite alarmed. Mr. Rickey, early in May, decided to turn some of the letters over to the police.

That same spring the Benjamin Franklin Hotel in Philadelphia, where my teammates were quartered, refused to accommodate me. The Phillies heckled me a second time, mixing up race baiting with childish remarks and gestures that coincided with the threats that had been made. Some of those grown men sat in the dugout and pointed bats at me and made machine-gunlike noises. It was an incredibly childish display of bad will.

I was helped over these crises by the courage and decency of a teammate who could easily have been my enemy rather than my friend. Pee Wee Reese, the successful Dodger shortstop, was one of the most highly respected players in the major leagues. When I first joined the club, I was aware that there might well be a real reluctance on Reese's part to accept me as a teammate. He was from Ekron, Kentucky. Furthermore, it had been rumored that I might take over Reese's position on the team. Mischief-makers seeking to create trouble between us had tried to agitate Reese into regarding me as a threat a black one at that. But Reese, from the time I joined Brooklyn, had demonstrated a totally fair attitude.

Reese told a sportswriter, some months after I became a Dodger, "When I first met Robinson in spring training, I figured, well, let me give this guy a chance. It may be he's just as good as I am. Frankly, I don't think I'd stand up under the kind of thing he's been subjected to as well as he has."

Reese's tolerant attitude of withholding judgment to see if I would make it was translated into positive support soon after we became teammates. In Boston during a period when the heckling pressure seemed unbearable, some of the Boston players began to heckle Reese. They were riding him about being a Southerner and playing ball with a black man. Pee Wee didn't answer them. Without a glance in their direction, he left his position and walked over to me. He put his hand on my shoulder and began talking to me. His words weren't important. I don't even remember what he said. It was the gesture of comradeship and support that counted. As he stood talking with me with a friendly arm around my shoulder, he was saying loud and clear, "Yell. Heckle. Do anything you want. We came here to play baseball."

The jeering stopped, and a close and lasting friendship began between Reese and me. We were able, not only to help each other and our team in private as well as public situations, but to talk about racial prejudices and misunderstanding.

At the same time Mr. Rickey told me that when my teammates began to rally to my cause, we could consider the battle half won; he had also said that one of my roughest burdens would be the experience of being lonely in the midst of a group my teammates. They would be my teammates on the field. But back in the locker rooms, I would know the strain and pressure of being a stranger in a crowd of guys who were friendly among themselves but uncertain about how to treat me. Some of them would resent me but would cover the resentment with aloofness or just a minimum amount of courtesy. Others genuinely wouldn't know how to be friendly with me. Some would even feel I preferred to be off in a corner and left out. After the games were over, my teammates had normal social lives with their wives, their girls, and each other. When I traveled, during those early days, unless Wendell Smith or some other black sportswriter happened to be going along, I sat by myself while the other guys chatted and laughed and played cards. I remember vividly a rare occasion when I was invited to join a poker game. One of the participants was a Georgia guy, Hugh Casey, the relief pitcher. Casey's luck wasn't too good during the game, and at one point he addressed a remark directly to me that caused a horrified silence.

"You know what I used to do down in Georgia when I ran into bad luck?" he said. "I used to go out and find me the biggest, blackest nigger woman I could find and rub her teats to change my luck."

I don't believe there was a man in that game, including me, who thought that I could take that. I had to force back my anger. I had the memory of Mr. Rickey's words about looking for a man "with guts enough not to fight back." Finally, I made myself turn to the dealer and told him to deal the cards.

Traveling had its problems but being at home with Rachel and little Jackie was great even if our living conditions left something to be desired. If we had been living away from our home base, the club would have found some type of separate living arrangement for us. But in the excitement of converting me into a Dodger, no one seemed to have given a thought to our accommodations. We were living three of us in one room in the McAlpin Hotel in midtown Manhattan. It was miserable for Rae. In that one room that seemed constantly overrun with newsmen, she had to fix the baby's formula, change his diapers, bathe him, and do all the things mothers do for small babies. We had no relatives in New York and no one to turn to for babysitting. Rae brought our son out to the ball park for the first game I played with the Dodgers. She was determined not to miss that game. Never having lived in the East, she brought little Jackie dressed in a coat which, in California, would have been a winter coat. He would not have been able to stand the cold, dressed as he was, if Roy Campanella's mother-in-law hadn't kept him with her under her fur coat. Rae warmed bottles at a hot dog stand. At four and a half months, Jackie began what was to be the story of his young life growing up in the ball park. He came to many games with his mother, and when he was old enough, he became very popular with some of the Dodger players who would keep him on their laps and play with him.

Before the season ended, we did manage to escape from the hotel. We found a place in Brooklyn where there was a small sleeping room for little Jackie, a bedroom, and use of a kitchen for us. We had no place to entertain the few friends we were making, but it certainly beat living in the hotel and we were grateful.

We were glad, too, that we could see some tangible results from our sacrifices. Not only were the other black players on the Dodger team winning acceptance, but other teams started to follow Mr. Rickey's example. Larry Doby became the first black player in the American League, signing on with the Cleveland Indians, and Willard Brown and Henry Thompson had been hired by the St. Louis Browns.

The Dodgers won the pennant that year, and when our club came home in September from a swing across the West, we were joyfully received by our fans. Their enthusiasm for me was so great that I once went into a phone booth to call Rae and was trapped in that phone booth by admirers who let up only when policemen arrived on the scene to liberate me.

Getting a hero's welcome in September made me remember how bad the beginning of my first season with the Dodgers had been. At that time I still wasn't looking like any kind of winner, even though the increasing acceptance of my teammates had begun to help me out of a terrible slump. I seriously wondered if I could ever make the Rickey experiment a success. Both Manager Burt Shotton and Mr. Rickey believed I would eventually come through. Clyde Sukeforth with his quiet confidence helped as much as anybody else.

During the season I was under even greater pressure than in my Montreal days. It was there that I had earned a reputation for stealing bases, and the pressure eased when I began stealing them again. Late in June, in a night game at Pittsburgh, with the score tied 2-2 I kept a careful eye on pitcher Fitz Ostermueller. I noticed he had become a little careless and relaxed. I began dancing off third base. Ostermueller paid me the insult of winding up, ignoring my movements as antics. The pitch was a ball. Easing open my lead off third, I made a bold dash for home plate and slid in safe. That put us in the lead 3-2. It was the winning run of the game. As I ran I heard the exhilarating noise that is the best reward a player can get. The roar of the crowd.

After I made that comeback, I think Mr. Rickey was as happy as I was. He said to some friends at the time, "Wait! You haven't seen Robinson in action yet not really. You may not have seen him at his best this year at all, or even next year. He's still in his shell. When he comes out for good, he'll be compared to Ty Cobb."

Mr. Rickey's words meant a great deal to me but not as much as something he did. Howie Schultz, the player who had been mentioned as a possible replacement for me during the bad days of my slump, was sold by the club.

That 1947 season was memorable in many ways. Some of the incidents that occurred resulted in far-reaching changes for the club. In late August we played the St. Louis Cardinals. In one of the last games, Enos Slaughter, a Cards outfielder, hit a ground ball. As I took the throw at first from the infielder, Slaughter deliberately went for my leg instead of the base and spiked me rather severely.

It was an act that unified the Dodger team. Teammates such as Hugh Casey of the poker game incident came charging out on the field to protest. The team had always been close to first place in the pennant race, but the spirit shown after the Slaughter incident strengthened our resolve and made us go on to win the pennant. The next time we played the Cards, we won two of the three games.

I had started the season as a lonely man, often feeling like a black Don Quixote tilting at a lot of white windmills. I ended it feeling like a member of a solid team. The Dodgers were a championship team because all of us had learned something. I had learned how to exercise self-control to answer insults, violence, and injustice with silence and I had learned how to earn the respect of my teammates. They had learned that it's not skin color but talent and ability that counts. Maybe even the bigots had learned that, too.

The press had also changed. When I came up to the majors, the influential Sporting News had declared that a black man would find it almost impossible to succeed in organized baseball. At the end of the season, when they selected me as Rookie of the Year, that same publication said:

> That Jackie Roosevelt Robinson might have had more obstacles than his first year competitors, and that he perhaps had a harder fight to gain even major league recognition, was no concern of this publication. The sociological experiment that Robinson represented, the trail-blazing that he did, the barriers he broke down, did not enter into the decision. He was rated and examined solely as a freshman player in the big leagues on the basis of his hitting, his running, his defensive play, his team value.

Dixie Walker summed it up in a few words the other day when he said: "No other ballplayer on this club with the possible exception of Bruce Edwards has done more to put the Dodgers up in the race than Robinson has. He Rachel and I moved again. She had managed to find more satisfactory living quarters in Brooklyn, where we had our own kitchen and living room and even a guest bedroom. I was delighted when I learned that the man I had admired so much as a youngster, the Reverend Karl Downs, wanted to visit us. I had kept in touch with Karl over the years. Before I'd gone into service, he had left Pasadena to become president of Sam Houston State College in Texas. When I left UCLA, I heard from Karl who said he was on the spot. He needed a coach for his basketball team. There was very little money involved, but I knew that Karl would have done anything for me, so I couldn't turn him down. I went to Texas and took the job but could only stay for a few months before financial pressures caught up with me. When Rachel and I were married, Karl, insisting on paying his own expenses, had set aside all his duties in Texas to fly to Los Angeles and officiate at our wedding. I was delighted by the prospect of his visit to Brooklyn.

One day, during his visit, Karl had come out to see one of the games. Suddenly he felt sick and decided to go back home to rest and wait for us. I had no idea his sickness was serious. That evening when I reached home, Rachel had taken him to the hospital. Several days later, apparently recovered, Karl had returned to Texas. In a few days, he was dead.

Karl's death, in itself, was hard enough to take. But when we learned the circumstances, Rae and I experienced the bitter feeling that Karl Downs had died a victim of racism. We are convinced that Karl Downs would not have died at that time if he had remained in Brooklyn for the operation he required.

When he returned to Texas, Karl went to a segregated hospital to be operated on. As he was being wheeled back from the recovery room, complications set in. Rather than returning his black patient to the operating room or to a recovery room to be closely watched, the doctor in charge let him go to the segregated ward where he died. We believe Karl would not have died if he had received proper care, and there are a number of whites who evidently shared this belief. After Karl's death the doctor who performed the operation was put under such pressure that he was forced to leave town.

Karl Downs ranked with Roy Wilkins, Whitney Young, and Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., in ability and dedication, and had he lived he would have developed into one of the front line leaders on the national scene. He was able to communicate with people of all colors because he was endowed with the ability to inspire confidence. It was hard to believe that God had taken the life of a man with such a promising future.

I especially missed Karl at the opening day of the 1947 world series. Seventy-five thousand fans, many of whom were black, turned out for that first series game. During the game, the fans were very kind to me, and there was an avalanche of crowd approval in the first inning as I drew a base on balls from Frank Shea and stole second. Pete Reiser hit a ground ball to shortstop and I tried for third, but I was caught in the run down. Fortunately my stops and starts gave Reiser a chance to reach second and, from that position, to score the first run of the game. In that series, our team was the underdog. We were up against that spectacular New York Yankees team that included some of the greats in baseball: Joe DiMaggio, Tommy Henrich, Yogi Berra, Johnny Lindell, Phil Rizzuto, and George McQuinn. We fought hard, but the Yankees were a great baseball club. Even though we lost we still felt we had acquitted ourselves well.

During the winter I went on a speaking tour of the South. It was a successful tour except for the fact that almost every night we were treated to some of the best Southern cooking available in private homes. We ate like pigs, and for me it was disastrous.

Final Report of the Tuskegee Syphilis Study Ad Hoc Advisory Panel

"Penicillin therapy should have been made available to the participants in this study."

Overview

The Final Report of the Tuskegee Syphilis Study Ad Hoc Advisory Panel was written for officials at the U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare (DHEW) when the agency was facing increasing public scrutiny about a bioethical scandal. The report was a response from the DHEW (today's Department of Health and Human Services) to revelations that hundreds of black men in Alabama had been the unknowing subjects of a government-operated medical research project. These men were not treated for their disease (syphilis), even though a treatment had been discovered and widely disseminated since the mid-1940s. Furthermore, since these patients were allowed to remain infected with syphilis, many of their wives and infants became infected with the disease as well. The DHEW organized the Tuskegee Syphilis Study Ad Hoc Advisory Panel in early 1972 as the Tuskegee Syphilis Study (TSS) became increasingly publicized and shocked large segments of the nation.

The TSS was initiated in 1932 by physician-researchers at the U.S. Public Health Service. The purpose of the project was to investigate the effects of untreated syphilis in black males. The TSS was set up to attract participants from the largely poor and segregated black communities of Macon County, Alabama. Overall, some 399 black males already infected with syphilis prior to their enrollment in the study were selected, along with another two hundred uninfected black males serving as a control group for the project. A number of government agencies, physician groups, and local institutions, including one of the nation's most famous black colleges, the Tuskegee Institute, cooperated with or acquiesced in the TSS project activities. The research proceeded for forty years, with the infected men left deliberately untreated during these decades. When newspaper reports revealed the TSS to the American public in the early 1970s, a firestorm of criticism was unleashed against government health officials and the nation's medical profession as a whole. As a result, the assistant secretary of DHEW implemented the TSS Ad Hoc Advisory Panel to explore the project's current state and then recommend appropriate policy actions for DHEW.

Context

The TSS project proceeded for decades without attracting public controversy. The "scientific" outcomes of the TSS were reported in at least twelve published research articles that appeared between 1932 and 1972. In the meantime, evidence of the decline in the health of TSS subjects was followed throughout medical and public health professional circles. As early as 1936 the U.S. Public Health Service researchers involved with the TSS reported at a meeting of the American Medical Association that 84 percent of the infected subjects were demonstrating symptoms of sickness. By 1955 approximately one-third of the infected subjects who had died had succumbed primarily to the effects of the disease. In addition, surviving TSS participants were afflicted with the most serious syphilis complications. Moreover, forty wives of the subjects had become infected with syphilis, and nineteen of the subjects' children had birth defects attributed to the disease.

By the late 1960s a keen awareness of racial injustice pervading American institutional life became widespread throughout the nation, much of that awareness the result of the 1968 report of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, also called the Kerner Commission. The report drew national attention to the deeply rooted nature of antiblack discrimination in the fields of employment, housing, education, and criminal justice in American cities. There was also growing dissatisfaction with discriminatory patterns in health and medical care that disproportionately affected black Americans and the nation's other disadvantaged segments. Also, in the 1960s and early 1970s black-white race relations in the United States were reaching a boiling point. Black American political militancy was on the rise, despite historic federal initiatives such as the Civil Rights Act (1964) and the War on Poverty federal programs. Title VI of the Civil Rights Act removed the "separate-but-equal" clause from the 1946 Hill-Burton Act that financed segregated hospital construction. This was a major step in the elimination of segregated health care facilities throughout the nation. Nevertheless, the civil rights movement had lost the leadership of its most brilliant nonviolent leader, Martin Luther King, Jr. Racial flare-ups in schools and on city streets as well as in police encounters and courtrooms were widespread and daily publicized in the national media. As the political expectations of black Americans reached this historical high mark, black political officials at all levels were organizing in ways to try to become a permanent source of pressure on electoral institutions, federal agencies, and the presidency. One example is the formation of the Congressional Black Caucus in 1971.

Meanwhile, in 1947 the Nuremberg Code had established international ethical standards that made voluntary consent from subjects a requirement for any biomedical research involving human experimentation. The code was embodied in a judicial verdict issued against German Nazi physicians as part of the Nuremberg trials after World War II, held by the victorious Allied forces to prosecute the political and military leaders of Nazi Germany for war crimes. Among the Nazis' many outrages was medical experimentation on unwitting subjects. The key provision of the code for purposes of the TSS was the first:

> The voluntary consent of the human subject is absolutely essential. This means that the person involved should have legal capacity to give consent; should be so situated as to be able to exercise free power of choice, without the intervention of any element of force, fraud, deceit, duress, over-reaching, or other ulterior form of constraint or coercion; and should have sufficient knowledge and comprehension of the elements of the subject matter involved as to enable him to make an understanding and enlightened decision.

Then, in 1964, the Eigtheenth World Medical Assembly adopted the Declaration of Helsinki (Finland). These standards stressed that in any research on human beings, the potential subjects were to be informed about the nature of and risks entailed in their participation in the research. For those potential subjects not competent to provide informed consent (for example, minors and the mentally ill), a legal guardian's consent was required. In 1966 the U.S. Public Health Service endorsed procedures designed to protect human subjects in agency-related clinical research. These guidelines required all investigators associated with a project to establish a committee to review and assure the rights and welfare of their research project's human subjects and groups. The TSS fit within these projects but nonetheless was allowed to proceed. Clearly, the TSS violated both the Nuremberg and Helsinki standards and the Public Health Service's own standards.

The story broke in 1972 when the nation's most influential newspaper, the New York Times, published a front-page article with the headline "Syphilis Victims in U.S. Study Went Untreated for 40 Years." Later that year, the nation's most widely circulated black American magazine, Ebony, published an article on the TSS experiments titled "Condemned to Die for Science." In this context, forestalling the potentially explosive political nature of the TSS exposé was foremost among the concerns of national political and health officials at the time the TSS Ad Hoc Advisory Panel was formed. Making the evaluation of the TSS a public matter and placing this task in the hands of a distinguished interracial group of public service oriented educational, medical, and religious professionals was the most expedient approach for federal administrators and public health officials. Therefore, in the summer of 1972 the federal DHEW implemented the TSS Ad Hoc Advisory Panel, and the panel issued its final report the following year.

About the Author

Facing increased pressure to halt the study by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the Congressional Black Caucus, the DHEW decided to convene the TSS Ad Hoc Advisory Panel and selected its chair and members, who were highly respected in black American professional and medical circles. The panel had nine members in all, five blacks and four whites. It included members who were in tune with activists across the nation and who were striving to expand legal protections and rights for patients and others such as the physically disabled and mentally ill under the care of the medical professions.

Dr. Broadus N. Butler was appointed chair of the TSS Ad Hoc Advisory Panel. He was president of Dillard University and a nationally prominent figure in black higher education. Born in Mobile, Alabama, Butler was educated at Talladega College, a highly ranked historically black college. By the 1980s Butler was recognized as a leading figure throughout the national community of historically black colleges and universities, including their umbrella organization, the National Negro College Fund.

In addition to his educational achievements, after graduating in 1941 Butler had gone into military service and became one of the famous Tuskegee Airmen. At the outset of World War II, the U.S. armed forces were strictly segregated. However, the Tuskegee Airmen pilots won widespread acclaim for their heroic actions through the course of the war. Their effectiveness and bravery as pilots helped erase racial lines in the U.S. military. Butler went on to receive graduate degrees in philosophy at the University of Michigan and began a series of teaching and federal education administration posts. He assumed the presidency of Dillard University in New Orleans in 1969 and was in that position when he became chair of the ad hoc committee. Butler died on January 29, 1996.

Another member of the committee was attorney Ronald H. Brown. Born in Washington, D.C., in 1941, Brown grew up in Harlem in a middle-class family. He attended Middlebury College and St. John's University Law School. Attracted to the civil rights movement, Brown from the earliest period of his career focused on public service law and politics. At the time of his appointment to the panel, he had become the general counsel for the National Urban League. In later years he would become a lead attorney and campaign manager for Senator Edward Kennedy as well as for the Democratic National Committee. From 1989 to 1992 Brown served as the nation's first African American leader of a major U.S. political party when he headed the Democratic National Committee. During his career, Brown maintained especially deep ties to black political activism within the Democratic Party, serving as the Reverend Jesse Jackson's campaign manager during Jackson's 1988 presidential bid. Brown died in a plane crash on April 3, 1996.

Time Line

- August 28
  Dr. Merlin K. DuVal, assistant secretary for Health and Scientific Affairs, Department of Health, Education and Welfare, formally recognizes the Tuskegee Syphilis Study Ad Hoc Advisory Panel.
- November
  Ebony magazine publishes an article on the TSS experiments, "Condemned to Die for Science."

1973

- April 28
  The Final Report of the Tuskegee Syphilis Study Ad Hoc Advisory Panel is transmitted to the U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare.
- June
  The Final Report of the Tuskegee Syphilis Study Ad Hoc Advisory Panel is submitted to the U.S. Congress.

1974

- July 12
  The National Medical Research Act of 1974 creates the National Commission for the Protection of Human Subjects of Biomedical and Behavioral Research.

1996

- May 20
  The final report of the Tuskegee Syphilis Study Legacy Committee is issued.

1997

- May 16
  President Bill Clinton issues an apology to the survivors of the TSS and their families.

Like Butler and Brown, most of the other members of the panel had links to civil rights, the medical profession, or community activism. Three of the committee's members had strong reputations in fields linked to medical ethics, pastoral care, and labor organizations. These were Seward Hiltner, a prominent religious scholar at Princeton Theological Seminary, and Barry H. Weeks of the Alabama Labor Council. Additionally, Jacob ("Jay") Katz, whose "Reservations about the Panel Report on Charge I" was included as part of the report, was a medical ethicist on the faculty at the Yale Law School.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

The Final Report of the Tuskegee Syphilis Study Ad Hoc Panel spells out the specific charges to the panel presented by the assistant secretary of DHEW. First, the panel was to address whether the study was justified at its origins in 1932 (Charge I-A). Second, the report was to investigate whether the men should have received penicillin treatment once this treatment became widely available (Charge I-B). Third, the panel was to address the issue of whether the rights of patients in general participating in health research projects connected with the DHEW were adequately protected by existing policies (Charge III). An additional concern was directed to the panel: In the event that the study was terminated, how could it been done in a way that protected the rights and health needs of the project's remaining participants?

◆ "Report on Charge I-A"

To address these issues, the panel traced the origins of the TSS, noting that it extended back to 1926. After a review of the facts surrounding the origins of the TSS, the panel states: "There is no protocol which documents the original intent of the study." This led the panel to assume that it was intended to be a long-term study. Then the panel makes its devastating judgment: "There is no evidence that informed consent was gained from the human participants in this study." The panel goes on to say that "submitting voluntarily" to the study is not the same thing as giving "informed consent," which would require that a participant be apprised of the study's risks. What made the study so problematic was that, as the panel notes, about 85 percent of people with syphilis who are treated recover from the disease. Making matters worse, the study was deceptive, in that it described its subjects as "untreated" black males, though in fact a significant percentage of control subjects in the study who contracted syphilis were then moved to the "untreated" category. Finally, the panel notes that the study employed no standard evaluative procedures that are essential to a valid scientific study.

The panel states that the study was "ethically unjustified in 1932." The panel concedes that there might have been some justification for a short-term study of this nature, but it was unable to pass judgment on this matter because of an absence of information on the way in which the study had been conducted. In the era before penicillin, when treatments for syphilis involved highly toxic substances, the study might have had validity. But because it was so poorly conducted and because participants were not informed of the risks, the panel is forced to conclude that the study was, in its words, "scientifically unsound."

◆ "Report on Charge I-B"

This section of the report addresses the issue of whether the study should have been continued after penicillin became widely available. The panel notes that it is unclear whether those who wanted treatment were able to receive it. Some documentation suggested that treatment was deliberately withheld, but other documentation indicated that those wanting treatment were not denied treatment. Reference is made to Raymond Vonderlehr, who was appointed the on-site director of the study in 1932 and who was responsible for converting it into a long-term study and who convinced participants that they were being examined and treated for "bad blood." (While the term "positive blood" is used in the panel report, "bad blood" was commonly used throughout the rural South as the informal name for syphilis.) The panel notes a damning fact: In 1941 1942, a number of participants in the study were called for army duty and tested positive for syphilis. The draft board, however, was given the names of 256 men along with a request that these men "be excluded from the list of draftees needing treatment!" Giving them treatment would have interfered with the study as it was then being conducted. This evidence suggests that, at least at that time, treatment was being deliberately withheld. In its judgment on Charge I-B, the panel clearly states that "penicillin therapy should have been made available to the participants in this study especially as of 1953 when penicillin became generally available." The panel goes on to say that withholding of penicillin was an "injustice" and a "violation of basic ethical principles."

◆ "Reservations about the Panel Report on Charge I"

This section of the report was written by the panel member Jay Katz, a member of the faculty at Yale Law School and a leading scholar of medical ethics. In this portion of the report, Katz does not express any reservations per se. He does, however, put aside the neutral, scholarly language of the report to openly and roundly condemn the study. He confirms the panel's judgments about the ethics of the study, saying that the participants were "exploited, manipulated, and deceived." He notes that the study continued after the Nuremberg Code was widely disseminated and after the Public Health Service promulgated guidelines for the "ethical conduct of research." He further notes that a review of the study was conducted in 1969 but that nothing was done in response to this review. He concludes by asking rhetorically when the medical and research community would begin to take seriously its responsibilities "particularly to the disadvantaged in our midst who so consistently throughout history had been the first to be selected for human research."

◆ "Addendum to Panel Report on Charge II"

In this brief addendum, Katz concurs with the panel's judgment with regard to Charge II (not reproduced here) recommending termination of the study. In its deliberations, the panel failed to include as one of its reasons for termination that the study produced no findings of scientific merit. The panel's reasoning, according to Katz, was "that recording this fact might create the impression that it was the major reason" for making its recommendation. Otherwise, some readers of the report might get the impression that the panel recommended termination not because of the study's unethical nature but rather because the study failed to provide scientists with useful information. Katz challenges this view, arguing that the panel should have included "no scientific merit" in its reasons for ending the study. His reasoning is that in any scientific study involving human subjects, a balancing act must be performed between useful results and risk to the participants. As any such study is reviewed, there must be a "relentless inquiry into the harmful consequence to the participants." Katz states that he wants there to be recognition that "no interests of science are surrendered by terminating the Tuskegee Syphilis Study" and that therefore there is "nothing to balance."

◆ "Final Report on Charge III"

The final section takes up the issue of DHEW's current policy regarding protection of human subjects in biomedical research. The panel emphasizes that DHEW needed to develop specific procedures to convey possible risks and benefits to potential human research subjects not just in medical research but in other arenas where human subjects are used, such as psychiatry, sociology, education, and the law. It recommends that a centralized body be formed to develop specific standards for the operation of institutional review committees at the institutions applying to sponsor human subject research. Moreover, for all research projects seeking DHEW funding, a review by an institutional committee was also to be followed by a review by specialists within DHEW itself.

The document concludes with a brief philosophical commentary on the issues the TSS presented. It notes that the there is an "unresolved conflict between two strongly held values: the dignity and integrity of the individual, and the freedom of scientific inquiry." Numerous professionals have to rely on their own discretion when they intervene in the lives of subjects in the name of scientific progress. Sometimes ethical obligations are ignored for what is perceived as the greater good, and "society" acquiesces in this because it wants the fruits of scientific inquiry. The report concludes by expressing the belief that "the goal of scientific progress can be harmonized with the need to assure the protection of human subjects."

Audience

The Final Report of the Tuskegee Syphilis Study Ad Hoc Advisory Panel gained an audience that went well beyond the DHEW. Indeed, this was the intention of DHEW officials. From the start of the panel, DHEW released news about the group's formation, membership, and purpose immediately after its decisions. One month before the report was officially transmitted to the panel's supervisory DHEW official, its contents were released by the press. Shortly after the completed report was submitted to the assistant secretary of DHEW in April 1973, the report was submitted to Congress (in June 1973).

Beyond DHEW and Congress, the final report's contents became the subject of news media coverage. The report helped to make the TSS one of a series of public controversies over medical mistreatment and experimentation involving vulnerable populations. Reporters and columnists criticized the immorality of the TSS and similar incidents of nonconsensual research involving mentally handicapped children, patients with chronic diseases, and other vulnerable populations. Through the intervening decades, medical historians, bioethicists, legalists, health care policy makers, and political leaders have debated the TSS as a race relations and bioethical tragedy. Many hold up the TSS as one of the most egregious incidents of unethical medical experimentation on patients since the concentration-camp medical experiments of Nazi physicians and scientists during World War II. The facts and positions contained in this document go a long way toward explaining why.

Impact

In the final report the panel recommended that the TSS be terminated immediately and that the study's participants be given the necessary care to treat disabilities resulting from their participation in the study. The growing publicity over the TSS brought the subject into congressional hearings that were under way on abuse of patients and medical care. The public outcry and federal activities relating to the TSS contributed to the passage of the National Medical Research Act of 1974. The act created the National Commission for the Protection of Human Subjects of Biomedical and Behavioral Research. These were significant first steps in the total overhaul and building of national standards and policies to protect the medical rights of patients and to guard patients from unethical medical experimentation.

As for the men who were the subject of the TSS, the veteran civil rights attorney Fred Gray filed a $1.8 billion civil suit on behalf of these men against the federal government. The case, Pollard v. United States, led to a settlement that provided each surviving participant a sum of $37,000 and the estate of deceased participants $15,000.

In the decades following the final report, the TSS has been a recurrent public issue in American race relations, medical bioethics, government health affairs, and medical law. In 1994 a group comprising medical academicians, historians, health officials, and bioethicists held a conference on the TSS at the Claude Moore Health Sciences

Known as the TSS Legacy Committee, the group issued a report, dated May 20, 1996, highlighting the history and ongoing bioethical impact that the TSS caused the nation. Citing President Bill Clinton's apology on behalf of the government to victims of nuclear radiation experiments, the Legacy Committee urged the president to issue a formal apology to the TSS participants and their families. On May 16, 1997, President Clinton presented the apology to the living participants of the TSS and their families. Also participating in the program were Vice President Al Gore, Centers for Disease Control and Prevention director David Satcher, and members of the TSS Legacy Committee. Plays, movies, television shows, and countless academic studies, news reports, and public debates about the legacy of TSS continue to appear to this day.

Questions for Further Study

1. The report makes the distinction between "submitting voluntarily" to a medical study and giving "informed consent." What is the distinction, and why is it important?

2. In many drug trials, one group of patients is given the actual drug, while another group is given a placebo—that is, a substance that has no therapeutic effect. In a sense, then, the second group is being denied treatment. Is this ethical? How would the panel respond to charges that it is not?

3. Sometimes good can grow out of evil. What "good," if any, could be said to have resulted from the Tuskegee study and, particularly, the final report of the study's advisory panel?

4. In 1997 President Bill Clinton apologized to the survivors of the Tuskegee Syphilis Study, one of several such apologies the Clinton administration issued. Then, in 2009, the U.S. Senate passed a resolution "Apologizing for the Enslavement and Racial Segregation of African Americans." Of what value do you think these kinds of official apologies are? Explain.

5. In your opinion, were the people who designed and conducted the Tuskegee Syphilis Study evil, similar to Nazi doctors before and during World War II? Or were they ignorant and misguided? Explain your view

Final Report of the Tuskegee Syphilis Study Ad Hoc Advisory Panel

Report on Charge I-A

Statement of Charge I-A: Determine whether the study was justified in 1932.

◆ Background Data

The Tuskegee Study was one of several investigations that were taking place in the 1930's with the ultimate objective of venereal disease control in the United States. Beginning in 1926, the United States Public Health Service, with the cooperation of other organizations, actively engaged in venereal disease control work. In 1929, the United States Public Health Service entered into a cooperative demonstration study with the Julius Rosenwald Fund and state and local departments of health in the control of venereal disease in six southern states: Mississippi (Bolivar County); Tennessee (Tipton County); Georgia (Glynn County); Alabama (Macon County); North Carolina (Pitt County); Virginia (Albermarle County). These syphilis control demonstrations took place from 1930 1932 and disclosed a high prevalence of syphilis (35%) in the Macon County survey. Macon County was 82.4% Negro. The cultural status of this Negro population was low and the illiteracy rate was high.…

◆ Facts and Documentation Pertaining to Charge I-A

1. There is no protocol which documents the original intent of the study.…

In the absence of an original protocol, it can only be assumed that between 1932 and 1936 (when the first report of the study was made) the decision was made to continue the study as a long-term study.…

2. There is no evidence that informed consent was gained from the human participants in this study. Such consent would and should have included knowledge of the risk of human life for the involved parties and information re possible infections of innocent, nonparticipating parties such as friends and relatives. Reports such as "Only individuals giving a history of infection who submitted voluntarily to examination were included in the 399 cases" are the only ones that are documentable. Submitting voluntarily is not informed consent.

3. In 1932, there was a known risk to human life and transmission of the disease in latent and late syphilis was believed to be possible. Moore 1932 reported satisfactory clinical outcome in 85% of patients with latent syphilis that were treated in contrast to 35% if no treatment is given.

4. The study as announced and continually described as involving "untreated" male Negro subjects was not a study of "untreated" subjects. Caldwell in 1971 reported that: All but one of the originally untreated syphilitics seen in 1968 1970 have received therapy,…

5. There is evidence that control subjects who became syphilitic were transferred to the "untreated" group.…

6. In the absence of a definitive protocol, there is no evidence or assurance that standardization of evaluative procedures, which are essential to the validity and reliability of a scientific study, existed at any time.…

◆ Panel Judgments on Charge I-A

1. In retrospect, the Public Health Service Study of Untreated Syphilis in the Male Negro in Macon County, Alabama, was ethically unjustified in 1932. This judgment made in 1973 about the conduct of the study in 1932 is made with the advantage of hindsight acutely sharpened over some forty years, concerning an activity in a different age with different social standards. Nevertheless one fundamental ethical rule is that a person should not be subjected to avoidable risk of death or physical harm unless he freely and intelligently consents. There is no evidence that such consent was obtained from the participants in this study.

2. Because of the paucity of information available today on the manner in which the study was conceived, designed and sustained, a scientific justification for a short term demonstration study cannot be ruled out. However, the conduct of the longitudinal study as initially reported in 1936 and through the years is judged to be scientifically unsound and its results are disproportionately meager compared with known risks to human subjects involved. Outstanding weaknesses of this study, supported by the lack of written protocol, include lack of validity and reliability assurances; lack of calibration of investigator responses; uncertain quality of clinical judgments between various investigators; questionable data base validity and questionable value of the experimental design for a long term study of this nature.

The position of the Panel must not be construed to be a general repudiation of scientific research with human subjects. It is possible that a scientific study in 1932 of untreated syphilis, properly conceived with a clear protocol and conducted with suitable subjects who fully understood the implications of their involvement, might have been justified in the pre-penicillin era. This is especially true when one considers the uncertain nature of the results of treatment of late latent syphilis and the highly toxic nature of therapeutic agents then available.

Report on Charge I-B

Statement of Charge l-B: Determine whether the study should have been continued when penicillin became generally available.

◆ Facts and Documentation re Charge I-B…

3. Reports regarding the withholding of treatment from patients in this study are varied and are still subject to controversy.…

What is clearly documentable (in a series of letters between Vonderlehr and Health officials in Tuskegee taking place between February 1941 and August 1942) is that known seropositive, untreated males under 45 years of age from the Tuskegee Study had been called for army duty and rejected on account of a positive blood. The local board was furnished with a list of 256 names of men under 45 years of age and asked that these men be excluded from the list of draftees needing treatment! According to the letters, the board agreed with this arrangement in order to make it possible to continue this study on an effective basis.…

◆ Panel Judgments on Charge I-B

The ethical, legal and scientific implications which are evoked from the facts presented in the previous section led the Panel to the following judgment:

That penicillin therapy should have been made available to the participants in this study especially as of 1953 when penicillin became generally available.

Withholding of penicillin, after it became generally available, amplified the injustice to which this group of human beings had already been subjected. The scientific merits of the Tuskegee Study are vastly overshadowed by the violation of basic ethical principles pertaining to human dignity and human life imposed on the experimental subjects.…

TOPIC: Reservations about the Panel Report on Charge I

I should like to add the following findings and observations to the majority opinion:

(1) There is ample evidence in the records available to us that the consent to participation was not obtained from the Tuskegee Syphilis Study subjects, but that instead they were exploited, manipulated, and deceived. They were treated not as human subjects but as objects of research. The most fundamental reason for condemning the Tuskegee Study at its inception and throughout its continuation is not that all the subjects should have been treated, for some might not have wished to be treated, but rather that they were never fairly consulted about the research project, its consequences for them, and the alternatives available to them. Those who for reasons of intellectual incapacity could not have been so consulted should not have been invited to participate in the study in the first place.

(2) It was already known before the Tuskegee Syphilis Study was begun, and reconfirmed by the study itself, that persons with untreated syphilis have a higher death rate than those who have been treated. The life expectancy of at least forty subjects in the study was markedly decreased for lack of treatment.

(3) In addition, the untreated and the "inadvertently" (using the word frequently employed by the investigators) but inadequately treated subjects suffered many complications which could have been ameliorated with treatment. This fact was noted on occasion in the published reports of the Tuskegee Syphilis Study and as late as 1971. However the subjects were not apprised of this possibility.

(4) One of the senior investigators wrote in 1936 that since "a considerable portion of the infected

Negro population remained untreated during the entire course of syphilis … an unusual opportunity (arose) to study the untreated syphilitic patient from the beginning of the disease to the death of the infected person." Throughout, the investigators seem to have confused the study with an "experiment in nature." But syphilis was not a condition for which no beneficial treatment was available, calling for experimentation to learn more about the condition in the hope of finding a remedy. The persistence of the syphilitic disease from which the victims of the Tuskegee Study suffered resulted from the unwillingness or incapacity of society to mobilize the necessary resources for treatment. The investigators, the USPHS, and the private foundations who gave support to this study should not have exploited this situation in the fashion they did. Unless they could have guaranteed knowledgeable participation by the subjects, they all should have disappeared from the research scene or else utilized their limited research resources for therapeutic ends. Instead, the investigators believed that the persons involved in the Tuskegee Study would never seek out treatment; a completely unwarranted assumption which ultimately led the investigators deliberately to obstruct the opportunity for treatment of a number of the participants.

(5) In theory if not in practice, it has long been "a principle of medical and surgical morality (never to perform) on man an experiment which might be harmful to him to any extent, even though the result might be highly advantageous to science" (Claude Bernard 1865), at least without the knowledgeable consent of the subject. This was one basis on which the German physicians who had conducted medical experiments in concentration camps were tried by the Nuremberg Military Tribunal for crimes against humanity. Testimony at their trial by official representatives of the American Medical Association clearly suggested that research like the Tuskegee Syphilis Study would have been intolerable in this country or anywhere in the civilized world. Yet the Tuskegee study was continued after the Nuremberg findings and the Nuremberg Code had been widely disseminated to the medical community. Moreover, the study was not reviewed in 1966 after the Surgeon General of the USPHS promulgated his guidelines for the ethical conduct of research, even though this study was carried on within the purview of his department.

(6) The Tuskegee Syphilis Study finally was reviewed in 1969. A lengthier transcript of the proceedings, not quoted by the majority, reveals that one of the five members of the reviewing committee repeatedly emphasized that a moral obligation existed to provide treatment for the "patients." His plea remained unheeded. Instead the Committee, which was in part concerned with the possibility of adverse criticism, seemed to be reassured by the observation that "if we established good liaison with the local medical society, there would be no need to answer criticism."

(7) The controversy over the effectiveness and the dangers of arsenic and heavy metal treatment in 1932 and of penicillin treatment when it was introduced as a method of therapy is beside the point. For the real issue is that the participants in this study were never informed of the availability of treatment because the investigators were never in favor of such treatment. Throughout the study the responsibility rested heavily on the shoulders of the investigators to make every effort to apprise the subjects of what could be done for them if they so wished. In 1937 the then Surgeon General of the USPHS wrote: "(f)or late syphilis no blanket prescription can be written. Each patient is a law unto himself. For every syphilis patient, late and early, a careful physical examination is necessary before starting treatment and should be repeated frequently during its course." Even prior to that, in 1932, ranking USPHS physicians stated in a series of articles that adequate treatment "will afford a practical, if not complete guaranty of freedom from the development of any late lesions.…"

In conclusion, I note sadly that the medical profession, through its national association, its many individual societies, and its journals, has on the whole not reacted to this study except by ignoring it. One lengthy editorial appeared in the October 1972 issue of the Southern Medical Journal which exonerated the study and chastised the "irresponsible press" for bringing it to public attention. When will we take seriously our responsibilities, particularly to the disadvantaged in our midst who so consistently throughout history have been the first to be selected for human research?

SUBJECT: Addendum to Panel Report on Charge II

I entirely concur in the Panel's recommendations and in the reasons given therefor. However, one additional piece of evidence lends even greater conviction, if any is still needed, to the decision to terminate the Tuskegee Syphilis Study. We have been informed that no scientific knowledge of any consequence would be derived from its continuation. The Panel felt that recording this fact might create the impression that it was the major reason for terminating the study. I believe that its inclusion should not, and would not, be so construed.

There are cogent reasons for not dismissing the issue of scientific merit. As long as society continues to favor the pursuit of medical knowledge for the possible benefit of the patients participating in research or for the benefit of future patients, a balancing of risks and benefits is inevitable. We must acknowledge this reality in order to confront such questions as: Do we wish to preserve this balancing process and, if we do, how might we learn to minimize inevitable harm to subjects and science? We urgently need to establish an orderly process which will permit the assessment of the conflicting claims inherent in decisions to initiate, continue or terminate research projects. Such an assessment might proceed in four steps: (1) a relentless inquiry into the harmful consequences to the participants; (2) an appraisal of the benefits which may accrue to science as well as to society: (3) a balancing of the risks to the participants against the benefits to them and/or science; and (4) an anticipatory rebuttal to the charge that either the interests of the participants or of science have not been sufficiently considered. In the light of the finding that no interests of science are surrendered by terminating the Tuskegee Syphilis Study, there is nothing to balance and nothing to rebut, and continuance of the study would for this reason alone be inadmissible.

I appreciate that had the conclusion been otherwise, the study would in all probability still have to be terminated because of the other findings set forth in the Panel's report, findings which will be further explored in our deliberations with respect to Charge One ("whether the study was justified"). Moreover, I should note that the four factors, listed above, do not directly address themselves to such other important considerations as: who should be selected for research, what disclosures must be made to participants in research, etc. This will surely be considered in our response to Charge Three ("whether existing (research) policies are adequate and effective"). Finally, I also leave unconsidered for now another question which emerges from the finding of "no scientific merit": why was the study not terminated at a time prior to the appointment of this Panel? One of the benefits of including a finding of scientific merit in every assessment is that many more projects might be terminated sooner, because the reviewer would be hard pressed to make an affirmative finding on this issue.

Report on Charge III

TO: The Assistant Secretary for Health

FROM: Tuskegee Syphilis Study Ad Hod Advisory Panel

TOPIC: Final Report on Charge III

◆ I. Introduction

In his third charge to the Tuskegee Syphilis Study Ad Hoc Advisory Panel, Dr. Merlin K. DuVal, the HEW Assistant Secretary for Health and Scientific Affairs, has asked us to determine whether existing policies to protect the rights of patients participating in health research conducted or supported by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare are adequate and effective and to recommend improvements in these policies, if needed.

Our response to this charge, embodied in this report, should not be viewed simply as a reaction to a single ethically objectionable research project. For the Tuskegee Syphilis Study, despite its widespread publicity was not an isolated phenomenon. We believe that the revelations from Macon County merely brought to the surface once again the unresolved problems which have long plagued medical research activities. Indeed, we hasten to add that although we refer in this report almost exclusively to physicians and to biomedical investigations, the issues we explore also arise in the context of non-medical investigations with human beings, conducted by psychologists, sociologists, educators, lawyers and others. The scope of the DHEW Policy on Protection of Human Subjects, broadened in 1971 to encompass such research, attests to the increasing significance of non-medical investigations with human beings.

Our initial determination that the protection of human research subjects is a current and widespread problem should not be surprising, especially in light of the recent Congressional hearings and bills focusing on the regulation of experimentation. In the past decade the press has publicized and debated a number of experiments which raised ethical questions: for example, the injection of cancer cells into aged patients at the Jewish Chronic Disease Hospital in Brooklyn, the deliberate infection of mentally retarded children with hepatitis at Willowbrook, the development of heart transplantation techniques, the enormous amount of drug research conducted in American prisons, the whole-body irradiation treatment of cancer patients at the University of Cincinnati, the advent and spread of "psychosurgery," and the Tuskegee Syphilis. Study itself.

With so many dramatic projects coming to the attention of the general public, more must he beneath the surface. Evidence for this too has been forthcoming. In 1966, Dr. Henry K. Beecher, the eminent Dorr Professor of Research in Anesthesia at the Harvard Medical School, charged in the prestigious New England Journal of Medicine that "many of the patients (used in experiments which Dr. Beecher investigated and reported) never had the risk satisfactorily explained to them, and … further hundreds have not known that they were the subjects of an experiment although grave consequences have been suffered as the direct result…." Dr. Beecher concluded that "unethical or questionably ethical procedures are not uncommon." Quite recently this charge has been corroborated by the sociologist Bernard Barber and his associates, who interviewed biomedical researchers about their own research practices. Despite the expected tendency of researchers to minimize ethical problems in their own work, Barber et al. were able to conclude that "while the large majority of our samples of biomedical researchers seems to hold and live up to high ethical standards, a significant minority may not."

The problem of ethical experimentation is the product of the unresolved conflict between two strongly held values: the dignity and integrity of the individual, and the freedom of scientific inquiry. Professionals of many disciplines, and researchers especially, exercise unexamined discretion to intervene in the lives of their subjects for the sake of scientific progress. Although exposure to needless harm and neglect of the duty to obtain the subject's consent have generally been frowned upon in theory, the infliction of unnecessary harm and infringements on informed consent are frequently accepted, in practice, as the price to be paid for the advancement of knowledge. How have investigators come to claim this sweeping prerogative? If the answer to this question is that "society" has authorized professionals to choose between scientific progress and individual human dignity and welfare, should not "society" retain some control over the research enterprise? We agree with philosopher Hans Jonas that a slower progress in the conquest of disease would not threaten society, grievous as it is to those who have to deplore that their particular disease be not yet conquered, but that society would indeed be threatened by the erosion of those moral values whose loss, possibly caused by too ruthless a pursuit of scientific progress, would make its most dazzling triumphs not worth having.

We have, as will be seen, made far-reaching recommendations for change. We do not propose these changes lightly. But throughout, in accordance with our mandate, our concern has not been just to define the ethical issues, but also to examine the structures and policies thus far devised to deal with those issues. In urging greater societal involvement in the research enterprise, we believe that the goal of scientific progress can be harmonized with the need to assure the protection of human subjects.

FBI Report on Elijah Muhammad

"We Want To Unite the scattered tribes of the Black Man into one Nation and build for ourselves a strong Nation."

Overview

Made available to the public under the Freedom of Information Act, the report of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) on the Nation of Islam (NOI) leader Elijah Muhammad dates to 1973. The report is typical of the files the FBI maintained on prominent Americans, particularly under the long tenure (1924 1972) of its controversial director, J. Edgar Hoover. Many of these Americans were leaders in the civil rights movement and the protest movements of the 1960s; among them were Martin Luther King, Jr., Malcolm X, Abbie Hoffman (founder of the Youth International Party, or "Yippies"), and innumerable others. Hoover maintained his power in Washington, D.C., in part by accumulating large amounts of information on people whose political beliefs he saw as a threat to American security. During the height of the civil rights movement in the 1950s and 1960s, various organizations fell under the scrutiny of the FBI, including the NOI, which the bureau regarded as a radical, subversive group. The report itself, though, expresses few judgments about Muhammad. It summarizes the known facts of his life and includes portions of a published interview with him and excerpts from articles he had written. The report's significance is more one of implication: the mere existence of a report by the nation's chief law-enforcement agency at a time when that agency was preoccupied with foreign and domestic threats suggests that at the highest levels of the nation's government, Muhammad was seen as a dangerous, perhaps subversive, character who had to be watched. And in fact a form attached to the file indicates that Muhammad was under investigation as "potentially dangerous because of background, emotional instability or activity in groups engaged in activities inimical to the U.S."

Context

The NOI was formed in Detroit in 1930 by Wallace Fard Muhammad. Little is known about Fard's early life, and even his true identity is disputed, with names on record including Wallace Dodd Ford, Wallace Dodd, Wallie Dodd Fard, W. D. Fard, David Ford-el, Wali Farad, Farrad Mohammed, and F. Mohammed Ali. It is known, however, that in 1929 he joined the Moorish Science Temple of America founded by Timothy Drew, known as Noble Drew Ali. As far back as 1931 the FBI extensively investigated the Moorish Science Temple of America for sedition, spreading Japanese propaganda, and other possible crimes, though it eventually found no grounds for prosecution. After Drew's death in 1929, Fard assumed leadership of a faction of the organization in Chicago, moved to Detroit, and renamed his group the Allah Temple of Islam. He created the University of Islam, an elementary school operating under Islamic principles that evolved into a series of such institutions; the Fruit of Islam, an all-male security force; and a number of other black Muslim organizations. Fard disappeared in 1934; it is unclear whether he died, moved to Saudi Arabia, or moved to New Zealand, but some evidence suggests that he lived until the 1960s. After his disappearance, the leadership of what was now called the Nation of Islam was assumed by one of his disciples, Elijah Poole, an unemployed Detroit assembly-line worker who first came under Fard's influence about 1930 and who later took the name Elijah Muhammad.

Members of the NOI are commonly called Black Muslims, though the organization has had conflicted relations with mainstream Islam, and many African American Muslims, then and now, are unaffiliated with it. The NOI's teachings departed from traditional Islam in a number of important respects, notably their belief that Wallace Fard Muhammad was both the Messiah of Christianity and the Mahdi, or redeemer, of Islam. Fard believed in the imminence of the biblical Armageddon the final battle between good and evil that will mark the end of the world (Revelation 16). In his view, Christianity was a white religion imposed on blacks by slave owners to subordinate them. Further, he argued that the original faith of black people was Islam and that originally the people of the world were all black. In his view, whites were a race of "devils" created on the Greek island of Patmos by a scientist named Yakub. Black people, he said, were divine in origin, created by Allah from the dark substance of space. He placed great emphasis on the biblical book of Ezekiel, which, he said, described a "Mother Plane" or "wheel" (chapter 1) that would destroy whites for their evil. A central tenet of the NOI was that African American youth were being disadvantaged by the nation's school system. Muhammad and his followers argued that African Americans had an obligation to learn about their purpose and origins but that the circumstances of the African diaspora denied them knowledge of their history and deprived them of any control over their future. In response, the NOI established its own schools in various cities, often over the objections of state and local authorities because the schools were unaccredited.

The NOI arose during an era when a number of prominent black militants were espousing black nationalism, the belief that blacks could gain true liberation only by uniting and gaining power and, in the belief of some, establishing a separate black nation. The doctrine of black nationalism reached back at least to the work of Martin R. Delany, the author of an 1852 book, The Condition, Elevation, Emigration, and Destiny of the Colored People of the United States, Politically Considered. In the twentieth century, black nationalism underpinned the work of Marcus Garvey, the flamboyant founder of the Universal Negro Improvement Association in 1917 and advocate of black capitalism and a return to Africa. During the 1930s one of the most prominent black nationalists was Paul Robeson, a college All-American football player, actor, and singer whose rich bass voice electrified audiences. Robeson was a Communist sympathizer, though he was never a member of the Communist Party. In the 1930s he visited the Soviet Union on several occasions and concluded that the Communist nation did not carry the same burden of racism that the United States did. During the early years of the cold war, the U.S. State Department revoked his passport, and Hoover labeled him one of the most dangerous men in the world. Even the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People distanced itself from him, scrubbing his name from a list of winners of the prestigious Spingarn Medal.

After the Russian Revolution in 1917, people began to fear that Soviet Communism might spread, possibly even to the United States. In response to this fear, the House Committee on Un-American Activities was formed in 1938, and over the next decade the committee conducted numerous hearings that "exposed" Communists and their sympathizers, including authors and members of the entertainment industry such as Charlie Chaplin, Dashiell Hammett, Leonard Bernstein, Edward G. Robinson, Pete Seeger, and Orson Welles. These people and others were almost always confronted on the basis of innuendo, rumor, and statements they had made that could be seen as sympathetic to Communism. Attention focused on colleges and universities, believed to be hotbeds of leftist and "un-American" viewpoints, as well as on the labor movement. Communism in general and the Soviet Union in particular were regarded as a menace, a threat to world stability. In the United States, fear grew that American Communists were working as spies and saboteurs for the Soviets, and for this reason Communist sentiments were criminalized.

It was in this climate of fear some would say near paranoia that the FBI began to investigate and keep files on civil rights organizations and persons or groups suspected of subversive tendencies. By some measures, the FBI's concerns were almost comical. The bureau kept a file, for example, on the issue of whether the lyrics to the Kingmen's 1963 version of the classic rock song "Louie Louie" were obscene. More and more entertainers, musicians, and artists came under scrutiny, especially for associating with Communists or joining the Communist Party, including the Beatles, Marilyn Monroe, Frank Sinatra, Andy Warhol, and Pablo Picasso. Regarding more serious threats, the FBI kept extensive files on genuine Soviet espionage as well as on crime families, serial murderers, the Ku Klux Klan, the 1964 murder of civil rights workers in Mississippi, and a host of other criminal activities and threats to the nation's security.

As the civil rights movement gained momentum in the 1950s and 1960s, the FBI kept track of numerous organizations, and as the movement overlapped with the anti Vietnam War movement, student protests, and other conflicts after 1965, many other groups also fell under FBI investigation. Martin Luther King, suspected of Communist sympathies and an outspoken opponent of the war in Vietnam, came under investigation. So did Stokely Carmichael, the leader of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, who urged black men to resist the draft, and Malcolm X, who emerged as one of the most prominent and fiery spokesmen for the NOI. The black nationalism of the NOI under its leader, Elijah Muhammad, would have been high on the FBI's list. Accordingly, in common with many Americans, Muhammad had his name on an FBI file.

About the Author

It is unknown who actually composed the FBI's report on Elijah Muhammad, which was likely the work of numerous agents. The compilers were certainly acting under the authority of the FBI's director, J. Edgar Hoover, so the very existence of the report reflected Hoover's preoccupations. Little is known about Hoover's early life. John Edgar Hoover was born on January 1, 1885, in Washington, D.C. He attended George Washington University, where he completed a law degree in 1917. During World War I, he worked at the U.S. Justice Department, where he earned an appointment as the head of the Enemy Aliens Registration Section at a time when Americans felt deep unease about potentially subversive foreign influences and about immigration, particularly from places like Russia and eastern Europe. In 1919 he was appointed head of the Justice Department's General Intelligence Division, which over the next two years arrested some ten thousand suspected political radicals. Hoover was appointed deputy director of what was then called the Bureau of Investigation in 1921. In 1924 he was appointed acting head of the bureau. On May 10, 1924, President Calvin Coolidge appointed him director of the bureau, which changed its name to the Federal Bureau of Investigation in 1935.

For nearly five decades Hoover dominated federal law enforcement. Almost single-handedly, he forged the image of American "G-men" (government men) who exhibited "Fidelity, Bravery, and Integrity" (the FBI's motto) in fighting crime. Beginning in 1924 until his death in 1972, he turned the bureau into a highly efficient professional organization. His reputation was perhaps greatest during the Great Depression, when many Americans came to see the nation's financial institutions as adversaries. Accordingly, when a rash of daring bank robberies broke out in the 1930s, some Americans were almost sympathetic to the colorful, quasi-romantic outlaws who became household names, including John Dillinger, "Machine Gun" Kelly, Ma Barker, and Clyde Barrow and Bonnie Parker the infamous "Bonnie and Clyde." Local authorities, helpless to stop these robberies, called in the bureau's help. Many of its investigations, including the one that led to the gunning down of John Dillinger in Chicago, were highly publicized and captured the public's imagination. It was largely as a result of these successes that the bureau's powers were expanded.

During the 1930s, Hoover took advantage of the FBI's growing reputation and influence to expand its recruitment efforts, create the FBI Laboratory to examine forensic evidence, and form the Identification Division, which assembled the world's largest collection of fingerprints. In the years leading up to World War II and beyond, Hoover's greatest concern was the threat of foreign subversives and saboteurs on American soil. This concern with subversion deepened during the cold war, when Hoover's focus was on Communism and then on antiwar and revolutionary groups, including members of the civil rights movement and anyone associated with the Black Power or black nationalist movements. Hoover died on May 2, 1972.

Any list of persons and organizations that the FBI investigated during the years of the civil rights movement reads like a who's who of protest and reform movements. The FBI had extensive files on the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (with a separate file on Communist influences in the organization), the Black Panthers, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Organization of Afro-American Unity, and the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee. Individuals included Paul Robeson, W. E. B. Du Bois, Roy Wilkins, Thurgood Marshall, Adam Clayton Powell, Jesse Jackson, among numerous others. Most of these files were dry accumulations of factual information. The file on Elijah Muhammad was little different, though undoubtedly the unorthodox views Muhammad expressed were of concern to federal law enforcement.

◆ "I. Background"

The file begins with background information on Muhammad, including his original name (Elijah Poole), his address, and his occupation in connection with Muhammad's Temple 2 in Chicago reflecting the NOI's practice of numbering each of its temples in the order they were created. The file then provides basic information on the NOI, with emphasis on the notion that white people are to be regarded as "devils" and that NOI members are not to arm themselves but are required to defend the NOI and its members at all costs.

◆ "II. Personal History"

The second portion of the FBI file reproduces an interview with Elijah Muhammad that was published in the yearbook of "Muhammad University of Islam No. 2" for 1973. In a question-and-answer format, "Messenger Muhammad" provides details about his background when and where he was born and how he was given the name Elijah, for example. The reader learns that when Muhammad moved to Detroit, he heard Wallace Fard Muhammad speak and believed that he was listening to the voice of Allah, or God. He describes how Fard gave him the name Elijah Karriem typical of the way Fard provided his followers with Islamic-sounding names for a fee of ten dollars. He then describes how Fard appointed him as "Supreme Minister" and gave him the name Muhammad. Throughout the discussion, Fard is referred to as the Savior and Muhammad is referred to as a "humble" little man.

The interview goes on to elicit odd details about the movements of Fard and Muhammad in the early 1930s, disputes within the organization, Fard's "persecution" and disappearance, and Muhammad's assumption of the leadership of the NOI. Muhammad then discusses his arrest and imprisonment for failing to register for the draft, claiming that he would not take part in a war (World War II) on behalf of "infidels." The interview also provides details about how the NOI was run during Muhammad's absence, when the day-to-day operations were taken over by Muhammad's wife, "Sister Clara Muhammad."

◆ "III. Teachings"

The third section of the FBI's file reproduces portions of three documents written by Muhammad. The first is taken from a 1973 edition of the NOI's publication, Muhammad Speaks. In this article Muhammad explains some of the NOI's theological doctrines, many of them adopted from the Old Testament prophetic book of Ezekiel, though this source is never named. He explains that there is a ship, or plane, that is made like a wheel and is the means by which Allah will carry out his aims in the world, particularly his aim of creating a new world "under the Eyes and Guidance of Allah." He claims that this wheel, "the most miraculous mechanical building of a plane that has ever been Imagined by man," measures a half mile by a half mile and is capable of holding many people and of destroying the earth. Muhammad then makes an enigmatic reference when he asks, "After trillions of years should we let a baby, only six months old (6,000 years old) outwit us?" The meaning of this comment is unclear, but it is probably a reference to the emergence of the white race, a "baby" in comparison with the much-older black race. He goes on to assert that the "Black Man" created the heavens and the earth and that white people want to keep blacks "dumb" to the power of God. The passage concludes with assertions that whites want to shoot down the plane with military weapons and that the wheel will continue to protect the black man on earth.

The second article quoted in this section also appeared in Muhammad Speaks and is titled "Indians in America." It begins with the assertion, derived from Wallace Fard Muhammad, that the American Indians are the descendents of black Asians, specifically from India. According to this theory, they were exiled from their native land sixteen thousand years earlier and arrived in North America by crossing, on foot, the Bering Straits the narrow channel that separates Russia and Alaska and that in earlier ages was above water. They were driven away from India because they did not recognize Allah and the religion of Islam. Arriving in North America without guidance, they suffered further punishment at the hands of white men for their disobedience to Allah. Muhammad asserts that the "so-called Negro in America" is suffering a similar fate conquest by the white man because he, too, refuses to follow Allah.

Muhammad then states that the white man, too, is an exile, having been expelled from Arabia some six thousand years ago for spreading lies about Islam an odd belief, given that Islam was founded in the seventh century by the prophet Muhammad. Blacks, though, arrived in the Western Hemisphere in a way different from the Indians and whites, for "we were kidnapped by the white man and brought here by force against our will, for the purpose of evil slavery and mistreatment." Thus, to Muhammad it is clear that the black man arrived in North America without a burden of sin and therefore has a better chance of succeeding than do Indians and whites. Throughout this discussion, Muhammad emphasizes that Allah has manifested himself in the person of Fard, "To Whom Praises are Due forever."

Muhammad rallies Black Muslims by telling them that their purpose is to create a new government, one that is dedicated to freedom, justice, and equality. He urges American Indians to join in his movement based on the notion that the Indians have a remnant of black blood. Even though Indians and blacks are two peoples, they share a common ancestry. He concludes by saying that "we want to unite the scattered tribes of the Black Man into one Nation and build for ourselves a strong Nation.

The third article, titled "We Want Earth," is again from the publication Muhammad Speaks. Muhammad begins with the assertion that black people are the original people on earth and that they acquired the name Negroes from their slave masters. This excerpt is the most explicitly black nationalistic one of the three articles, for he states that "we must have some of this earth to live free on so that we can exercise freedom of action." Former slaves cannot rely on their former masters for the necessities of life but have to provide them for themselves. He asserts that blacks make a boast of their freedom and reiterates that blacks have to provide for their own welfare. He reminds his readers that the slave masters robbed blacks both morally and physically and imposed on them a false religion. He asks black America to bring forward its scientists and educated people to help black Americans achieve prosperity and independence.

◆ "IV. Foreign Contacts"

The fourth section of the FBI report has been heavily edited. This is common for files released to the public. It is impossible to say what has been omitted or why. Readers can only conclude that the decision was made to withhold some information for diplomatic or national security concerns, to avoid placing foreign people in embarrassing situations, to avoid revealing sensitive foreign intelligence, or some similar reason. In what remains, the section comments on some domestic contacts directly and indirectly associated with Muhammad, starting with a reference to "Hanafi American Mussulman." An NOI member named Khalifa Hamaas Abdul Khaalis, whose original name was Ernest T. McGee, created a rift in the NOI because he wanted to bring the organization in line with orthodox Sunni Islam. In 1958 he created a splinter organization somewhat cumbersomely named the Al-Hanif, Hanifi, Madh-Hob Center, Islam Faith, United States of America, American Mussulmans in Washington, D.C. The group gained publicity in 1973 when members of Abdul Khaalis's family mostly his children as well as a follower were murdered by members of the NOI in Philadelphia. As the FBI file states, Abdul Khaalis believed that Elijah Muhammad was responsible for these killings. Later, in 1977, the Hanafis would seize buildings in Washington, D.C., and take hostages in an effort to force the government to turn over the NOI members convicted for the killing of Abdul Khaalis's family members as well as to halt the screening of a movie called Mohammad, Messenger of God, which they regarded as sacrilegious. Abdul Khaalis was sentenced to prison for his role in the event.

Reference is made to two additional figures. One is Kareem Abdul-Jabbar, known as Lew Alcindor throughout his college career as an All-American basketball player at the University of California at Los Angeles. Abdul-Jabbar was affiliated with the American Mussulmen and, the file asserts, owned the house in which the 1973 murders took place. Malcolm X, born Malcolm Little, became the most prominent spokesperson for the NOI in the 1950s and early 1960s, but when his views began to conflict with those of Muhammad, he defected from the organization to form his own more orthodox Islamic group. He was assassinated on February 21, 1965, by three members of the NOI.

Audience

The audience for an FBI report would, of course, have been primarily the FBI itself. The purpose of such a report was to assemble investigative information about people and organizations that the FBI deemed suspicious. Such a report would be available to anyone within the organization or the government who needed information about its subject and had authorization to view the file. After the Freedom of Information Act was signed into law on September 6, 1966, and went into effect the next year, numerous citizens and organizations began filing requests for government documents never previously released to the public. Many such documents have remained classified because they have a bearing on national security. And many of the documents that are released are "redacted," meaning that portions of the document are blacked out, usually to avoid revealing information that has national security implications or to protect the identities of FBI agents and informants, who might be subject to reprisals. Nevertheless, the Freedom of Information Act has opened a window into governmental activities and helped to create greater transparency in government operations. While the FBI report on

Essential Quotes

"The NOI is an all-black nationwide organization … under the guidance of Elijah Muhammad, self-styled "Messenger of Allah" and alleged divinely appointed leader of the black race in the United States. Its purpose is separation of the black man from the "devil" (white race) through establishment of a black nation."

("I. Background")

"The Wheel is in fact a ship (plane) made like a wheel. And it is made for the Purpose of Allah (God) Carrying out His Aim upon this world. This Wheel is by no means to be taken lightly! After The Wheel has done its Work it will have Made Way for a New World to be Built under the Eyes and Guidance of Allah (God)."

("III. Teachings")

"But, it is our Black People who the white man is desirous to keep dumb to the Power of our God, Allah. But, Think Over It! If the Black Man created the heavens and the earth. And The Black Man Did Create The Heavens And The Earth … then what man is fool enough to challenge the Black Man."

("III. Teachings")

"The American White Man is an exile from Arabia. They were exiled into Europe 6,000 years ago because of their disobedience and causing dissatisfaction, fighting and blood-shed among the righteous due to their spreading lies between the Muslims. That is what they were made for."

("III. Teachings")

"We Want To Unite the scattered tribes of the Black Man into one Nation and build for ourselves a strong Nation."

("III. Teachings")

Elijah Muhammad does not contain any startling revelations virtually all of the information contained in it could have been found in other sources, including NOI publications the mere fact of its existence sheds as much light on the FBI's concerns as it does on the NOI.

Impact

After J. Edgar Hoover's death in 1972 and in light of abuses during the Watergate scandal that enveloped the presidency of Richard Nixon that year (leading to his resignation in 1974), historians and politicians began a reexamination of Hoover's legacy and tactics. In 1976 the FBI's activities were investigated by the U.S. Senate's Select Committee to Study Governmental Operations with Respect to Intelligence Activities, usually referred to as the Church Committee after its chairman, Senator Frank Church of Idaho. The committee's investigation revealed that FBI investigations often relied on infiltration of suspected subversive groups and on psychological warfare, including the planting of rumors, false reports, and other "dirty tricks"; harassment through the legal system; and illegal activities, including wiretapping, break-ins, vandalism, and violence. The FBI indeed used such methods in investigating the NOI, including infiltration one of Malcolm X's bodyguards was an FBI plant wiretapping, and camera surveillance. In the eyes of many historians, these extralegal activities reflected the views and personality of the FBI's longtime director, a public hero for much of his career, whose reputation was thus irretrievably tarnished.

The NOI survived, although its form would change radically. After the death of Elijah Muhammad in 1975, leadership of the organization passed to his son, Warith Deen Mohammad. The son, however, rejected the deification of Wallace Fard Muhammad, brought the organizations closer to mainstream Islamic thinking, admitted white people, and changed the NOI's name several times, eventually settling on American Society of Muslims. Numerous NOI members, though, resisted these changes and broke with the organization. Notable among them was Louis Farrakhan (Louis Eugene Walcott), who in 1981 created his own organization and adopted for it the name Nation of Islam. Farrakhan has continued to lead the reconstituted NOI into the twenty-first century and in the process has attracted considerable controversy for his allegedly anti-Semitic comments as well as for views that some observers regard as outlandish. One was that Hurricane Katrina, which struck the Gulf Coast in 2005, did so much damage because a hole was allowed to remain in the levee around New Orleans in a deliberate effort to wipe out the city's black population. Another was that the H1N1 ("swine flu") vaccine was developed as part of a conspiracy to reduce the earth's population. Mainstream Americans regard Farrakhan and his organization as something of a fringe group, but both continue to elicit admiration among dispossessed Americans.

Questions for Further Study

1. If you had been the director of the FBI in the 1950s and 1960s, would you have ordered the investigation of the Nation of Islam? Why or why not?

2. What is the connection between black nationalism and the Nation of Islam?

3. Based on the material presented in the FBI file, do you believe that the Nation of Islam is (or was) a racist organization? Explain.

4. Using such documents as Malcolm X's "After the Bombing" speech and Louis Farrakhan's Million Man March Pledge, explain how the modern-day Nation of Islam is different from the organization as it was conceived by Fard and Elijah Muhammad.

5. Muhammad expressed a number of views that run counter to known facts and accepted beliefs; examples include his view of the origin of American Indians and his apparent belief that Mars is populated. To what extent do you think that these highly unorthodox views undermine Elijah Muhammad's message—if at all?

FBI Report on Elijah Muhammad

File:105-24822
Details:

I. Background

Elijah Muhammad, true name Elijah Poole, resides at 4847 South Woodlawn Avenue, Chicago, Illinois. He also maintains a residence at 2118 East Violet Drive, Phoenix, Arizona, but rarely utilizes same. Muhammad is the leader of the Nation of Islam (NOI). He claims to be the Messenger of Allah and the only divinely appointed leader of the black man in North America. He formulates and/or approves all teachings, policies and programs in the NOI… He is considered to be Minister of Muhammad's Temple (MT) 2, 7351 South Stony Island Avenue, Chicago. He performs the above tasks, which are his sole occupation, from his residence and through MT 2. …

The NOI is an all-black nationwide organization headquartered at Muhammad's Temple 2, 7351 South Stony Island Avenue, Chicago, Illinois, under the guidance of Elijah Muhammad, self-styled "Messenger of Allah" and alleged divinely appointed leader of the black race in the United States. Its purpose is separation of the black man from the "devil" (white race) through establishment of a black nation. Followers are instructed to obey the laws of the land if they do not conflict with NOI laws and not to carry weapons but are to defend NOI officials, their property, women and themselves if attacked at all costs and are to take weapons away from their attackers and use same on the attacker.

II. Personal History

"Muhammad University of Islam No. 2 1973" Year Book on page 24 sets forth an article titled "History," which is as follows:

Q. What year, month and day was Messenger Muhammad born?

A. He was born in October, 1897.

Q. Where was Messenger Muhammad born?

A. Messenger Muhammad was born in Sandersville, Georgia, not many miles from his hometown he grew up in Macon, Georgia.

Q. How large was his family?

A. Messenger Muhammad was the seventh child of thirteen children.

Q. Who gave him the name of Elijah?

A. A paternal grandfather gave him the name Elijah, and always addressed him as Elijah the Prophet.

Q. Did Messenger Muhammad show leadership traits early?

A. Yes, the older children in the family would always come to him to settle disputes and at fifteen; he was a foreman over a crew of men much older than he.

Q. How old was Messenger Muhammad when he married and migrated to Detroit?

A. Messenger Muhammad was twenty-five years of age, and be moved to Detroit in April, 1923.

Q. What was the first meeting of Allah and Elijah Poole like?

A. Someone, one day went excitedly to tell Mr. Elijah Poole that there was a certain man in town teaching that which he just had to go hear for himself. So, Mr. Elijah Poole went down to the meeting hall to hear this certain man speak, According to the best reports, as soon as he walked into the room he realized that the one who was speaking was God, Himself. When shaking the man's hand after the meeting, Mr. Elijah Poole said, "I know who you are, you're God Himself." The certain man whispered to him, that's right, but don't tell it now: It is not yet time for it to be known.

Q. When did Master Fard Muhammad name Elijah Poole Elijah Karriem?

A. The Savior Master Fard Muhammad named Elijah Poole Elijah Karriem shortly after he accepted his own.

Q. How was Elijah Karriem appointed as Supreme Minister and describe how it took place. Did he receive the name Muhammad then?

A. The Savior, Master Fard Muhammad, used a system of permitting the student ministers to select their own minister from among themselves. They would always select the most articulate, smooth-talking one. However, one day the Savior decided to select his own."I've let you select yours for awhile," he told the student ministers. "Now I'll select mine." "Hey, you over there, Karriem!" Master Fard called out to the humble little man seated in the corner rear of the classroom. "Who me?" The Messenger asked humbly. "Yes, you Elijah Karriem," The Savior commanded. "Come up here with me." The humble little man went to the front of the class and stood beside his Master. The Savior put his right arm around the little man's shoulder and said, "From now on this is My Minister." The Savior gave Elijah the name of Muhammad, His name. Muhammad was given the title "Supreme Minister" until later on when he received the title "Messenger of Allah," a title which he was not to use until the Savior had gone because it was not to be revealed until then that Savior Himself was Allah in person.

Q. Why did Master Fard Muhammad allow himself to be persecuted?

A. Master Fard Muhammad allowed Himself to be persecuted because he chose to suffer three and one-half years to show His love for His people who have suffered over 300 years at hands of a people who by nature are evil and wicked and have no good in them. He was persecuted, sent to jail in 1932 and ordered out of Detroit on May 26, 1933.

In 1933 he came to Chicago and was arrested almost immediately on His arrival and placed behind prison bars.

Q. Why did Master Fard Muhammad always call Messenger Muhammad to Him when He went Jail?

A. He submitted himself with all humbleness to his persecutors. "Each time he was arrested, He sent for me so that I might see and learn the price of truth for us, the so-called American Negroes (members of the Asiatic Nation). He was able to save Himself from such suffering, but how else was the scripture to be fulfilled? We followed in His footsteps suffering the same persecution."

Q. How many years did Master Fard Muhammad teach Messenger Muhammad?

A. Messenger Muhammad was taught by Allah for three years and four or five months.

Q. When did Master Fard Muhammad leave and how many books did he leave for Messenger Muhammad to find and read?

A. He left in 1934 and left 104 books for Messenger Muhammad to find.

Q. Why did Messenger Muhammad leave Detroit?

A. Sometime in 1934 Allah left. As they had agreed before Master Fard Muhammad left, Elijah Muhammad began teaching that the one who had been known as Prophet Fard was in fact Allah (God) Himself, in the Person of Master Fard Muhammad, Some of the former student ministers disagreed. They didn't want to believe that the most humble among them had been chosen to be The Messenger of Allah - they began disbelieving in Allah after they had said that they believed; they became hypocrites.

Q. Where did Messenger Muhammad go during the period of 1934?

A. Messenger Muhammad moved to Chicago in 1934. In 1935, The Honorable Elijah Muhammad fled to Washington, D. C. from the hypocrites.

Q. Where did Messenger Muhammad go during the period of flight?

A. He went from city to city teaching Islam on the east coast, mainly.

Q. How did he go about establishing the different Mosques?

A. While on the run.

Q. In what year did Chicago become the Headquarters?

A. In September, 1934.

Q. When did Messenger Muhammad go to jail for five years?

A. "I was arrested on May 8, 1942, in Washington, D. C. by the F.B.I. for not registering for the draft. When the call was made for all males between 18 and 44, I refused and would not take part in war and especially not on the side with the infidels. Second, I was 45 years of age and was not, according to the law, required to register." Brother Emmanuel Muhammad speaking of his father: "What has impressed me most, I think, was my stay with my father in prison. He set up a Temple in the prison despite the difficulties he experienced with the blackboard and all. He set up classes right there in prison. He would teach on Wednesday and Friday evenings until the bugle was blown for us to go to bed. He also taught on Sunday afternoons at 2:00 p.m. He made many, many converts in prison. Even the devils who came by to steal an earful wound up bowing in agreement, an unconscious bearing of witness to the truth The Messenger taught.

"There are, in my mind, many memorable instances of my father's love for Allah, but the one that sticks in me most is of the tears Allah and The Messenger shed the day Allah left us.

"I also recall seeing my father reading the Bible after breakfast; or whatever they called breakfast during the depression He would read all day, and this reading would bring tears to His eyes. The tears would fall at the time he was reading. …"

Q. How was the Nation of Islam run during this period?

Document Text

A. Sister Clara Muhammad was the first of the family to accept the mission of The Honorable Elijah Muhammad. She held the Muhammad family together all the while He was on the run. And, while He was in prison, the remaining officials would seek information from her. "She would bring understanding from my father on questions she could not answer. She gathered and sent or brought to my father and I whatever literature the prison permitted. She typed verses from the Holy Quran and sent them to us." Where were the meeting places in those days? In 1945, Messenger Elijah Muhammad sent instructions for us not to pay any more rent but to hold our meetings in one of the believer's homes and to purchase a building. In the winter of 1955 56 in October, the building at 5333-35 South Greenwood was purchased. In June, 1972, a new Temple was purchased at 7351 Stoney Island Avenue. Messenger Muhammad and his followers across the Nation are determined to build an Educational Center at this site, second to none on Chicago's southside, which will serve as memorial to the dedicated mission of God's Messenger. The Honorable Elijah Muhammad, here in America.…

III. Teachings

"Muhammad Speaks" (MS), September 7, 1973, page 12, sets forth an article titled "O Wheel - Mother of Planes," by Elijah Muhammad. He wrote:

… The Wheel is in fact a ship (plane) made like a wheel. And it is made for the Purpose of Allah (God) Carrying out His Aim upon this world. This Wheel is by no means to be taken lightly!

After The Wheel has done its Work it will have Made Way for a New World to be Built under the Eyes and Guidance of Allah (God).

The Wheel is so wonderful that even the prophet had to declare it in these words, "O Wheel, O Wheel" meaning that he is admiring his vision that he was receiving from Allah (God).

The Wheel is the most wonderful and the most miraculous mechanical building of a plane that has ever been Imagined by man. The planes on this Wheel will be sent down, earthward and are capable of destroying the world almost at once. The Wheel, (the Mother Plane) is capable of carrying many people in it! The Wheel is 1⁄2 mile by 1⁄2 mile in size.

The Wheel is capable of sitting up above earth's atmosphere for a whole year before coming down into earth's atmosphere to take on more oxygen and hydrogen for the people who are on this plane (The Wheel) O she is a wonderful thing!

The Planes that she uses to send earthward are so swift that they can make their flight and return their plane to The Wheel, the Mother Plane, almost like a flash of lightning. O Wheel!

Think Over It: After trillions of years should we let a baby, only six months old (6,000 years old) outwit us? This I say to those ignorant people of mine. I do not say this to the white man, for the white man knows, too.

But, it is our Black People who the white man is desirous to keep dumb to the Power of our God, Allah. But, Think Over It! If the Black Man created the heavens and the earth. And The Black Man Did Create The Heavens And The Earth … then what man is fool enough to challenge the Black Man.

It Is Not that the white man is a fool to try to challenge Allah. It is the intention of the white man to make a fool out of the Black Man and to try to show Allah that he can make a fool out of the Black Man.

But, in a twinkling of an eye, Allah (God) can take away the heavens and the earth, not to think over a few little people just made six days ago (6,000 years ago). O Wheel, the greatest most miraculous plane ever built. There never was such a plane made before this Wheel. There never was a need for such a plane before now.

You may wish Mr. Enemy that you could get a shot at The Wheel with your jet planes and other military weapons, but you should just go home and go to sleep. No one can harm this plane, The Wheel. They are going to fix you up first, Before The Wheel ever comes into sight!

You cannot live on the moon, only just so long as your oxygen and hydrogen last you. The moon is about the closest platform that I know of, that you could probably try to use.

Venus And Mars … you cannot use Venus and Mars. The people on Mars will not let you light (land) on Mars. If they do let you land on Mars, they will be silly to do so.

You would like to see what the people on Mars look like. That is not, say, impossible. O Wheel … the greatest mechanical defender, powered by the Spirit of Allah, to Protect us, the Black People On The Face Of The Earth.

MS newspaper is self-described as published weekly by MT 2 in Chicago.

MS, October 12, 1973, page 12, sets forth an article titled "Indians in America" by Elijah Muhammad. He wrote

Document Text

Allah (God) Who Came in the Person of Master Fard Muhammad, To Whom Praises are due forever, taught me, that the Indians, who are so-called American Indians, are descendants from an old Ancient People, the Black Man of Asia, in that part of the country that is known as India. They are by no means a modern people.

The Indians, who are here in the Western Hemisphere are non-American, therefore I use the word, so-called American Indians. They were captured and subdued by the Americans, but this does not mean that they are Americanized.

The So-Called American Indians, so Allah (God) Who Came in the Person of Master Fard Muhammad, To Whom Praises are Due forever, taught me, were exiled from their native land (India) and people, 16,000 years ago. They migrated, by walking from the country that is now known as India and entered this country, by way of the Bering Straits.

They Were Driven Out Of India because of their unbelief in Allah and their failure to worship in His True Religion, Islam. They had to walk all that way because their fathers rebelled against Allah and His Religion, Islam.

They Suffered for a long time trying to get into this part of the earth. Imagine, if you would start out to walk to America through the Bering Straits to India, you would probably never reach there alive. To even walk across the continent of America would probably get a man for life. So imagine these people walking thousands and tens of thousands of miles to get into this part of the earth. It takes a long time.

They Had To Take Such terrible chastisement due to the spirit of Allah (God) against these people, because of their disobedience to Allah (God) and His Religion, Islam.

The So-Called American Indians were completely guideless. Allah allowed this to happen to them because of their disobedience. They built many kinds of gods with their own hands and bowed down and worshiped the work of their own hands as they are still doing in India, today. They are not successful in India, except those who turn to Islam.

And Since the Western Hemisphere became a prison exile for the American Indians, Allah (God) sent another exiled enemy (white man) to chase this (Indian) exile and to bring him into subjection to the late white exile and give the Indians another whipping.

Here In America, the white man has almost annihilated the Indian from the face of the earth. I want you to see into the work of God upon a people who refuse Him, as the so-called Negro in America desires to do, today. They Ignore Allah (God) and follow an exiled enemy of God.

The American White Man is an exile from Arabia They were exiled into Europe 6,000 years ago because of their disobedience and causing dissatisfaction, fighting and blood-shed among. the righteous due to their spreading lies between the Muslims. That is what they were made for.

The So-Called Negro in America came into America in such a different way than that of the Indians and the white man. We were not exiled from our native country and people. We were kidnapped by the white man and brought here by force against our will, for the purpose of evil slavery and mistreatment.

The So-Called Negro has no divine Charge or sin placed against them, by God, for being here or for doing anything in the way of other than righteous. The so-called Negro in America is cleared by Allah (God) Who Came in the Person of Master Fard Muhammad, To Whom Praises are Due forever.

Since Allah (God) has forgiven us for what was put upon us by the slavemaster (other than righteous), we have the better chance than the former two (the exiled enemy Indian and the exiled enemy white man).

We, The So-Called Negro in America, have a Defender in God, The All-Wise, The Best-Knower, The All-Powerful, The Mighty God and the Greatest of Them all, Allah, In the Person of Master Fard Muhammad, To Whom Praises are Due forever, Who is on our side.

Allah (God) Desires to use us, the descendants of our Black Nation, the best and the greatest of the Black Nation of Earth, since the time of its creation. The fact about it, He wants to build a new and Eternal Government of Freedom, Justice and Equality, out of us, for the Nation of Black People of the Earth.

However, The Door Is Open, to the remnant of the American Indians, so I turn my attention to this all but annihilated people, to see if they will come and follow me to Allah. Allah (God) Who Came in the Person of Master Fard Muhammad, To Whom Praises are Due forever, discussed them with me. So if you desire to live, my once-brothers, the Indians of America, seek me and I will Seek God, for you, that you may live, yet again. Allah (God) taught me that we can get along with the Indians of America, for they yet have some blood of the aboriginal Black people.

We Are Two People, who have been nearly destroyed. I seek the Indians. There are various newly made races of people here in the Western Hemisphere. They are mixed with the blood of this people and that people, but if you notice there is a trace of the blood of the Black Man in most of them.

We Want To Unite the scattered tribes of the Black Man into one Nation and build for ourselves a strong Nation.

MS, October 19, 1973, page 12, sets forth an article titled "We Want Earth:" by Elijah Muhammad. He wrote:

We, The Lost and Found Members of our Nation, the Original Black Nation of the Earth, called Negroes a name given to us by the slavemasters along with their own, which have no divine meaning need some of this earth on which we can build a home of our own. If we now are free and must go for self, we must have some of this earth to live free on so that we can exercise freedom of action.

The freed slave is not to depend on his ex-slavemaster for the necessities of life. This is the free slave's responsibility. The slave must be educated into the knowledge of how to do for self. He is not to depend on his former master if he is to become self independent.

We Boast that we are free. We love to tell the world that we are free. Freedom means that we are free to do what we like. We cannot yell to the world that we are free while begging to be freed.

It is the free man's duty to accept his own responsibilities accompanying freedom. If we turn back pleading to the master who freed us to feed, clothe and shelter us, we are still in slavery to the master. The Bible refers to this type of person as a "home-born slave."

If One Were to care for us, taking the responsibility for us, we would become a servant to that one. We are in bondage to whosoever takes our responsibilities to care for us.

Can we blame the masters for the treatment they give their own slaves? Yes, and no. They have robbed us both physically and mentally. They have spiritually blinded us to the knowledge of ourself and kind, God, the devil and true religion. This truth would bring to us eternal salvation.

We Love freedom. If we love freedom for self, remember that we must assume our own responsibility, so we are free to exercise the freedom of actions as well as freedom of thinking. Both the clergy and political classes of our people should remember this and preach it.

Where are our degreed scholars' and scientists' works in the way of trying to help themselves and their people to self independence?

We are a nation in a nation, with a population, according to the census, between 20 to 30 million ex-slaves roaming the country over seeking the master's pity. If we do something for self we accept our own pity.

IV. Foreign Contacts…

It is public knowledge that in January 1973, seven members of the Hanafi American Mussulman, Washington, D. C. were murdered, that Hamaas Khalis, leader of the group and former secretary of MT 2 in the late 1950's, true name Ernest McGhee, publicly stated Elijah Muhammad was responsible for the murder of the seven members of his family and the critically wounding of two others.

It is public knowledge that Kareem Abdul Jabbar, renowned basketball player with the Milwaukee Bucks of the National Basketball Association, was affiliated with the Hanafi American Mussulman and the murder occurred in a house purchased by Jabbar.

Malcolm X Little in the early 1960's was a leading spokesman for Elijah Muhammad and was Minister of MT 7, New York City, New York. He defected, founded his own organization based on Orthodox Islam and was murdered in New York City in 1965.

Shirley Chisholm (Library of Congress)

Shirley Chisholm: "The Black Woman in Contemporary America"

1974

"Black women have a duty to move from the periphery of organized political activity into its main arena."

Overview

Selected as the keynote speaker for a national conference on black women held at the University of Missouri in Kansas City, Shirley Chisholm enumerated the key issues facing African American women. She pointedly reminded her audience that black women were not interested in being addressed as "Ms." or in gaining access to all-male social clubs. Rather, African American women's top priority was the welfare of their families and communities. Black and white women should unite around issues such as improved day-care facilities and increased job opportunities. At the same time that Chisholm was criticizing white feminists, she chided African American spokesmen who suggested that black women step aside to allow black men to monopolize leadership positions. Only by working together as equals could black men and women create the programs and policies needed by their communities. This speech typified Chisholm's fighting spirit, her willingness to confront contentious issues head on, and her rousing oratorical style.

As the first African American woman elected to Congress and a candidate for the 1972 Democratic presidential nomination, Chisholm was the most prominent black female political leader of the 1970s. An articulate and fiery public speaker, Chisholm was not afraid to challenge established power brokers or take a stand on controversial issues. Her arrival on the national stage coincided with growing African American political power and the emergence of the women's liberation movement. At a time when many women of color criticized white feminists for pursuing goals irrelevant to minority communities, Chisholm attempted to bridge the racial divide. She frequently claimed that she was more often discriminated against because she was a woman than because she was black.

Context

As America entered the 1970s, the social movements that defined the tumultuous 1960s evolved and, in some cases, began to disintegrate. The civil rights movement that had been a powerful force for societal change a decade earlier no longer dominated the national agenda. Militant groups such as the Black Panther Party that had advocated armed revolution were forcefully suppressed. Other organizations concentrated their energies on developing black consciousness and building black studies programs on college and university campuses. As U.S. forces were withdrawn from Vietnam, the antiwar movement fell apart. Protest on college campuses receded, and the youthful counterculture began to wane.

In their place new forces appeared. The 1969 Stonewall Riots in New York City launched a gay pride movement that grew in strength during the next decade. A nascent environmental movement urged Americans to stop polluting the atmosphere and treat the earth with greater respect. The most potent inspiration for social change during the 1970s, however, came from the women's liberation movement. Influenced by the rhetoric of the civil rights struggle, American women began questioning their roles in the home, the economy, and the political system. The National Organization for Women, the foremost feminist organization of the 1960s, initially focused on legislative and economic goals such as ending discriminatory hiring practices and expanding educational opportunities. Across the country small groups of women gathered in "consciousness raising" sessions that critically examined relations between the sexes and encouraged women to seek fulfillment beyond their domestic roles. More young women sought higher education and delayed marriage and childbearing to pursue careers outside the home.

The emerging women's movement encompassed many interests and divergent ideological factions, but the most pronounced split was the racial divide. Since its origins in the early 1960s, its most articulate and visible figures had been college educated, middle-class white women. Betty Friedan's widely read book The Feminine Mystique (1963) identified "the problem without a name" the lack of fulfillment felt by affluent suburban housewives whose status was defined by their husbands and whose lives revolved around child care and homemaking.

For many African American women this problem seemed inconsequential; they were preoccupied with more fundamental issues of family stability and economic survival. Although black feminists recognized the need for women of color to resist male chauvinism, they were reluctant to make common cause with white women. Mississippi civil rights icon Fannie Lou Hamer acidly observed that she was not interested in being liberated from a man she liked her black husband just fine.

Young black women faced many challenging questions in the 1970s. Should they pursue newly opened career opportunities in the larger society or use their energies to build institutions within the black community? Should they take up the cause of gender equality or concentrate on eliminating racism from American society? Should they unite in the call for gender equity with women of other races or form independent all-black organizations?

These were some of the contentious issues being debated when Shirley Chisholm appeared at the conference on black women in contemporary America. As one of the most prominent and outspoken African American women, Chisholm was an ideal choice to deliver the keynote address. In Congress she vigorously championed the interests of her mostly black and Latino constituents. At the same time, she maintained ties to the largely white women's movement. As a former teacher, Chisholm enjoyed speaking to youthful audiences, especially college students.

About the Author

Shirley Anita St. Hill was born in Brooklyn, New York, on November 30, 1924, to West Indian immigrant parents. Her father, Charles St. Hill, was a factory worker and a follower of Jamaican black nationalist Marcus Garvey. Ruby Seale, her mother was a seamstress and domestic worker. At the age of three Chisholm was sent with her sisters to the Caribbean island of Barbados, where they were raised on a farm by their maternal grandparents. There she received her early education in strict, British-style schools that she credited for much of her later success.

Chisholm rejoined her parents in the Bedford-Stuyvesant area of Brooklyn in 1934. A shy, serious student, she attended Girls High School and qualified for tuition scholarships at Oberlin and Vassar colleges. Because her family could not afford to pay room and board, she lived at home and attended Brooklyn College, graduating with honors in 1946. She found work as a nursery school teacher. In 1949 she married Conrad Chisholm, a private investigator. They had no children and divorced in 1977. Chisholm earned a master's degree in elementary education from Columbia University in 1952. From 1953 to 1959 she was director of the Hamilton-Madison Child Care Center in Manhattan and later was employed as a consultant for the New York City Division of Day Care.

Chisholm's involvement in politics began during her college years when she and other students pushed for a course on "Negro history" and petitioned Congress to outlaw poll taxes. After college she became active in local Democratic politics, repeatedly challenging the white-dominated Brooklyn machine. Chisholm worked with insurgent organizations to increase African American representation, expand employment opportunities, and improve city services for her neighbors in Bedford-Stuyvesant. In 1964 she announced her candidacy for a vacant seat in the New York State Assembly. Although some leaders were reluctant to endorse a female candidate, Chisholm's strong grass-roots organization won impressive victories in the primary and general elections. As a member of the assembly she sponsored legislation to aid the poor, increase educational opportunities for low-income students, and eliminate racial discrimination. She also introduced bills to assist women, such as expanding day care for working mothers and preserving seniority benefits for public school teachers on maternity leave.

In 1967 a new congressional district centered in Bedford-Stuyvesant was created. A coalition of African American organizations endorsed Shirley Chisholm for the seat. She ran as an independent fighter, committed to the welfare of her community. Her campaign slogan, "Fighting Shirley Chisholm Unbought and Unbossed," expressed her willingness to take on political bosses. She defeated two other Democrats in the primary and outpolled the nationally known civil rights leader James Farmer in the general election. On January 3, 1969, Chisholm was sworn in as the first African American woman member of Congress.

From the start of her congressional career, Representative Chisholm asserted her independence. She refused to accept an appointment to the Agriculture Committee, insisting that this assignment was utterly inappropriate for her urban district. House leaders backed down and named her to a seat on the Veterans Affairs Committee instead. Her stubborn refusal to "play ball" with powerful congressional leaders, however, limited her legislative effectiveness. She cosponsored bills to increase the right of workers to unionize, provide health insurance for domestic workers, reform welfare laws, abolish the draft, lower the voting age to eighteen, and drastically cut back military spending, but few of these measures became law. She later was appointed to the influential Education and Labor Committee. In 1977 she accepted a seat on the House Rules Committee.

Chisholm used her position in Congress to speak out on issues of the day. She attacked the Vietnam War and vowed to vote against war-related spending bills, she urged passage of the Equal Rights Amendment, and she advocated the legalization of abortion. Chisholm also collaborated with other elected officials to form the Congressional Black Caucus and the National Women's Political Caucus.

Increasingly frustrated with national political leaders, Chisholm declared her candidacy for president of the Unites States in January 1972. She pledged to work for the elimination of poverty, end the Vietnam War, and build a more just society. She envisioned a movement of marginalized people women, young people, African Americans, Latinos, Native Americans, and the poor to revitalize the American political system. Although Chisholm's candidacy drew enthusiastic support from many feminists and African American groups, including the Black Panther Party, her drive for the nomination suffered from inadequate funding, lacked an experienced campaign staff, and never developed a strong national presence. Reporters and pundits regarded her candidacy as a symbolic gesture and not a serious effort to win the presidency. Chisholm was especially disappointed in the tepid support she received from black male leaders and the failure of the National Black Political Convention to endorse her. At the Democratic National Convention in Miami she received 152 first-round votes.

Chisholm returned to Congress, where she continued to push for welfare reform, extension of the minimum wage, and a federal child-care program. She was in great demand as a speaker, frequently lecturing on college campuses. Chisholm did not seek reelection in 1982. After leaving Congress, she held distinguished professorships at Mount Holyoke College and Spellman College. She wrote two political biographies, Unbought and Unbossed (1970) and The Good Fight (1973). Chisholm supported the Reverend Jesse Jackson's presidential campaigns in 1984 and 1988. She retired to Florida in 1991 with Arthur Hardwick, Jr., her second husband, and died there on January 1, 2005, following a series of strokes.

In her keynote speech for the conference on the African American woman, Chisholm ranges widely from the era of slavery to an imagined future time when racism and sexism are no longer important problems. Her main objective, however, was to inspire other women to enter the political arena. Drawing on her twenty-year public career, Chisholm alerts her audience to the barriers they will face but insists they are not insurmountable obstacles. She criticizes white feminists for pursuing goals unrelated to the needs of the African American community and also faults black men for suggesting that women take a back seat to male leaders. Only by working side by side as equals, she maintains, could African American men and women create the unified movement needed to achieve their common goals.

Chisholm introduces her topic by explaining that her speech would not be a scholarly dissertation on the black woman in contemporary America. Rather, she bases her remarks on two decades of involvement in local and national affairs, during which time she encountered "all kinds of obstacles." Her audience, no doubt, was well aware of these problems, most notably the opposition she experienced during her 1972 run for the Democratic presidential nomination.

In the second paragraph, she places the current situation of black women in historical perspective. Understanding the "emasculation" of the black male is fundamental to appreciating the distinct role of the black woman, she notes. During slavery, black men frequently were separated from their wives and families. The fruits of their labor were not used to support their families but instead appropriated by slave owners. Black men were unable to protect their wives and daughters from assault and exploitation. As a result, black women had to take a more active role in their families, providing both economic support and social stability. Black women often were able to find work when their men were unemployed or imprisoned. To keep her family intact, the black woman developed strengths that today are viewed negatively by sociologists. The most prominent example of this trend is found the work of the future senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan, who was at the time a social scientist working for the U.S. Department of Labor and who prepared a 1965 study titled The Negro Family: The Case for National Action. In a section labeled "The Tangle of Pathology," he wrote, "The Negro community has been forced into a matriarchal structure which, because it is out of line with the rest of the American society, seriously retards the progress of the group as a whole, and imposes a crushing burden on the Negro male."

African American scholars and activists took issue with Moynihan's analysis, branding it simplistic, condescending, and racist. In a 1966 article titled "Moynihan of the Moynihan Report," the New York Times reporter Thomas Meehan quoted civil rights leader Floyd McKissick's attack on Moynihan's report:

> It assumes that middle-class American values are the correct values for everyone in America.… Moynihan thinks that everyone should have a family structure like his own. Moynihan also emphasizes the negative aspects of the Negroes and then seems to say that it's the individual's fault when it's the damn system that really needs changing.

Chisholm clearly shared this view.

In the third paragraph, Chisholm articulates her main thesis that black women "have much to offer" and that only by pooling their collective talents and abilities would black men and women achieve "the liberation of their people." In the next two paragraphs Chisholm deals with the proposal put forward by some black nationalists, most notably spokesmen of the Nation of Islam, that black women should bolster the authority of African American men by declining leadership positions within the black freedom struggle. She emphatically rejects this notion as "historically incorrect" and as "a scapegoating technique" that prevents the unification of African Americans in pursuit of shared objectives. Sowing discord and distrust between men and women, the proponents of this view aid "the enemy" by distracting African Americans from the common goal of racial advancement. Chisholm points out that it is unreasonable to expect educated black women to sit on the sidelines, leaving the liberation struggle to men alone. Those who advocate this position act irresponsibly and do not constructively contribute to solving the problems facing African Americans.

In the sixth paragraph Chisholm takes issue with white feminists, whose objectives sometimes appear ill advised to African American women. She cites two infamous examples: picketing a New York cocktail lounge for excluding female patrons and insisting on the use of "Ms." instead of "Mrs." as a courtesy title. Neither issue, she asserts, speaks to the interests of black women, who have other, more pressing concerns. She mocks white women for their preoccupation with labels and urges them to focus on more substantive issues.

This did not mean, to Chisholm, that the women's liberation movement was irrelevant, however. Chisholm goes on to offer the nationalization of day care as an issue around which black and white women could build a meaningful partnership; it was a goal that would benefit working women of all races. Black women must not adopt a go-it-alone stance, she notes, but should seek alliances with people in other "humanitarian" movements, educating them to the needs of the black community and acting as catalytic agents to turn these coalitions in more beneficial directions.

Chisholm asserts in the eighth paragraph that black women were beginning to realize that they had to free themselves from male domination to fully contribute to black liberation. They had to stand up to men who would restrict them to secondary roles while monopolizing top positions for themselves. This, unfortunately, was the case in the civil rights movement, where few women occupied prominent public roles. A handful, like Coretta Scott King and Betty Shabazz, were well known because of their husbands (Martin Luther King, Jr., and Malcolm X, respectively). Other women made valuable contributions working behind the scenes while seldom receiving the recognition they deserved. Because they had to struggle against male domination in addition to racial oppression, African American women were among the most committed freedom fighters. Chisholm names the antilynching crusader Ida Wells as an example of this militant spirit, along with the Little Rock, Arkansas, leader of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Daisy Bates, and Nashville sit-in pioneer Diane Nash.

Black women faced the double jeopardy of racism and sexism; their problems could not be compared with the obstacles faced by white women. In the ninth paragraph Chisholm notes the beginning of a new movement by African American women. Because the unique political and cultural constraints they faced had been addressed by neither the black movement nor the women's movement, they were moving in new directions. Nowhere was this trend more evident than in the realm of politics. Chisholm's tenth paragraph traces the evolution of the civil rights movement of the 1960s into the activism of the 1970s. Young black women were beginning to realize that they could exercise power through electoral politics. By registering new voters and forming grassroots organizations, black women were reshaping the political landscape. Chisholm's pathbreaking challenge and ultimate defeat of the Brooklyn Democratic machine is an early example of this potential.

Chisholm recounts the long-standing barriers to women's meaningful political participation in her eleventh paragraph. Undoubtedly recalling her own painful initiation into patriarchal politics, she lists the trivial tasks once assigned to women "opening envelopes, hanging up posters, and giving teas." In addition to the handicap imposed by their gender, black women belonged to a politically marginalized group. These factors made the recent emergence of African American women in politics even more remarkable.

Chisholm next asserts that changes within the black community have given birth to a new generation of African American women who understand that their well-being could be affirmed only "in connection with the total black struggle." Their work in the civil rights movement helped them realize the importance of political involvement. Chisholm predicts that these women would form a vanguard fashioning new kinds of political participation. African American women were uniquely situated to address the most critical issues facing their communities, in "their unusual proximity to the most crucial issues affecting black people today." In paragraph 13, Chisholm praises New York City welfare mothers for calling attention to problems threatening the survival of the black family. She declares that black women have a duty to their families to press for increases in the minimal welfare allowances that contribute to the breakdown of black family life. To accomplish this goal, they must move into the "main arena" of American political life.

Chisholm then repeats a message she delivered in countless speeches to women's groups across the United States. Involvement in politics is not a question of competition against men, she states; it is a question of women realizing their responsibility to their own families. She encourages women in her audience "to give everything that is within ourselves to give" to create a better future for their children. Chisholm quotes Frances Beal, author of the 1969 pamphlet "Black Women's Manifesto," in paragraph 15. In this pamphlet, Beal reiterates the low status of black women and claims that they were being used as scapegoats for the evils that American society inflicted on the black man. They had been maligned and molested; their labor had been exploited to the neglect of their own children. Not only had black women been degraded, but they were also powerless to improve their situation.

In the next two paragraphs, Chisholm cites the work of Susan Johnson, a young African American scholar. Johnson asserted that the success of the black woman in politics resulted from her capacity to free herself from the constraints imposed by the double burdens of racism and sexism. By taking an active role in politics she threatened the status of the black male as well as the deeply entrenched structure of white supremacy. Striking a positive note, however, Johnson observed that because the African American woman was seen as less dangerous than her male counterpart, white politicians sometimes underestimated her ability. This view provided "the necessary leverage for political mobility."

Chisholm notes that psychologists, sociologists, and psychiatrists had tried without success to define and interpret the African American woman. Usually this resulted in misunderstanding and misinterpretation. Everyone had joined the act except black women themselves. She declares that it is time for black women to take control of their destiny. Chisholm urges the women in her audience to "stand up and be counted." In paragraph 19 she prays that in years to come the division between male and female will disappear. When that day arrives, all people would be able to employ their god-given talents for the benefit of humanity. Chisholm then reminds her listeners that no racial group had a monopoly on wisdom or ignorance, and neither did one gender. Americans should understand the historical forces and contemporary pressures that prevented black women and men from forming a powerful united movement. Creating this common front, however, should remain their objective.

Civil rights leader James Farmer (Library of Congress)

Using her career as a case in point, in paragraph 21 Chisholm admonishes her audience not to listen to critics and naysayers. Black women would not make progress unless they concentrated on their strengths. During the coming conference she advises participants to openly confront the dangerous and difficult issues that might easily be ignored. She paraphrases the old adage that "the truth shall make you free." In her concluding paragraph Chisholm encourages her listeners to reject old politics and obsolete morality. Young activists, she says, must cast off outdated traditions and conventions to find their own way. Only by standing up for the right as determined by their consciences would Americans achieve the greatness to which they aspired.

Audience

The immediate audience for Chisholm's address consisted of delegates to a national conference on the status of black women. It is safe to assume that a majority of the participants were young African American women, but men and whites were not excluded. More broadly, her comments were intended for all persons working for social change. Although some examples and references may seem dated, Chisholm's message remains relevant: Black women must struggle against the twin barriers of racism and sexism to create a more just society for themselves and their children. She argued that political power could be a tool for social change and that black women must not be afraid to seek it.

Impact

In an era when women are represented at all levels of government, when they occupy influential seats in the presidential cabinet and on the U.S. Supreme Court, and when they make up a growing portion of the nation's governors and senators, it is easy to forget that only a few decades ago a woman running for elective office was a rarity. Pioneering female politicians like Shirley Chisholm and Congresswoman Barbara Jordan overcame monumental barriers. Their success required enormous personal commitment and great sacrifice.

Chisholm was the first African American woman to be elected to Congress, but she was far from the last. By 2010 fourteen black women sat in the House of Representatives. Many accomplished female politicians took their inspiration from Chisholm's career. She was a role model for a generation of female activists. Her victories proved that racism and sexism need not be insurmountable obstacles to political power.

Shirley Chisholm believed that she had a duty to spread the gospel of political empowerment. That is why, after her 1968 election, she devoted much of her time to public speaking. While it is difficult to accurately assess the impact of her Kansas City speech, there is no denying the cumulative effect of hundreds of similar addresses delivered to young women who packed college auditoriums to listen to her advice and learn from her example. All her life Chisholm fought against entrenched privilege to give a voice to those excluded from the corridors of power. Her courage and dedication remain an inspiration to all who hear her message.

Questions for Further Study

1. Compare this document with Mary Church Terrell's "The Progress of Colored Women," an address delivered in 1898. What do you think Church Terrell's reaction to Chisholm's speech would have been? How were Chisholm's circumstances similar to, and different from, those surrounding Church Terrell?

2. What was Chisholm's relationship with the burgeoning feminist movement? Was she critical of that movement in any way? Explain.

3. Compare this document with the 1965 Moynihan Report. How did Chisholm respond to the findings of that report?

4. What historical circumstances, in Chisholm's view, forced upon African American women the need to be strong leaders in their communities?

5. Chisholm once said that she felt more discriminated against because she was a woman than because she was black. Does this statement surprise you? Why do you think she made this claim?

Shirley Chisholm: "The Black Woman in Contemporary America"

Ladies and gentlemen, and brothers and sisters all I'm very glad to be here this evening. I'm very glad that I've had the opportunity to be the first lecturer with respect to the topic of the black woman in contemporary America. This has become a most talked-about topic and has caused a great deal of provocation and misunderstandings and misinterpretations. And I come to you this evening to speak on this topic not as any scholar, not as any academician, but as a person that has been out here for the past twenty years, trying to make my way as a black and a woman, and meeting all kinds of obstacles.

The black woman's role has not been placed in its proper perspective, particularly in terms of the current economic and political upheaval in America today. Since time immemorial the black man's emasculation resulted in the need of the black woman to assert herself in order to maintain some semblance of a family unit. And as a result of this historical circumstance, the black woman has developed perseverance; the black woman has developed strength; the black woman has developed tenacity of purpose and other attributes which today quite often are being looked upon negatively. She continues to be labeled a matriarch. And this is indeed a played-upon white sociological interpretation of the black woman's role that has been developed and perpetrated by Daniel Moynihan and other sociologists.

Black women by virtue of the role they have played in our society have much to offer toward the liberation of their people. We know that our men are coming forward, but the black race needs the collective talents and the collective abilities of black men and black women who have vital skills to supplement each other.

It is quite perturbing to divert ourselves on the dividing issue of the alleged fighting that absorbs the energies of black men and black women. Such statements as "the black woman has to step back while her black man steps forward" and "the black woman has kept back the black man" are grossly, historically incorrect and serve as a scapegoating technique to prevent us from coming together as human beings some of whom are black men and some are black women.

The consuming interest of this type of dialogue abets the enemy in terms of taking our eyes off the ball, so that our collective talents can never redound in a beneficial manner to our ethnic group. The black woman who is educated and has ability cannot be expected to put said talent on the shelf when she can utilize these gifts side-by-side with her man. One does not learn, nor does one assist in the struggle, by standing on the sidelines, constantly complaining and criticizing. One learns by participating in the situation listening, observing and then acting.

It is quite understandable why black women in the majority are not interested in walking and picketing a cocktail lounge which historically has refused to open its doors a certain two hours a day when men who have just returned from Wall Street gather in said lounge to exchange bits of business transactions that occurred on the market. This is a middle-class white woman's issue. This is not a priority of minority women. Another issue that black women are not overly concerned about is the "M-S" versus the "M-R-S" label. For many of us this is just the use of another label which does not basically change the fundamental inherent racial attitudes found in both men and women in this society. This is just another label, and black women are not preoccupied with any more label syndromes. Black women are desperately concerned with the issue of survival in a society in which the Caucasian group has never really practiced the espousal of equalitarian principles in America.

An aspect of the women's liberation movement that will and does interest many black women is the potential liberation, is the potential nationalization of daycare centers in this country. Black women can accept and understand this agenda item in the women's movement. It is important that black women utilize their brainpower and focus on issues in any movement that will redound to the benefit of their people because we can serve as a vocal and a catalytic pressure group within the so-called humanistic movements, many of whom do not really comprehend the black man and the black woman.

An increasing number of black women are beginning to feel that it is important first to become free as women, in order to contribute more fully to the task of black liberation. Some feel that black men like all men, or most men have placed women in the stereotypes of domestics whose duty it is to stay in the background cook, clean, have babies, and leave all of the glory to men. Black women point to the civil rights movement as an example of a subtle type of male oppression, where with few exceptions black women have not had active roles in the forefront of the fight. Some like Coretta King, Katherine Cleaver, and Betty Shabazz have come only to their positions in the shadows of their husbands. Yet, because of the oppression of black women, they are strongest in the fight for liberation. They have led the struggle to fight against white male supremacy, dating from slavery times. And in view of these many facts it is not surprising that black women played a crucial role in the total fight for freedom in this nation. Ida Wells kept her newspaper free by walking the streets of Memphis, Tennessee, in the 1890s with two pistols on her hips. And within recent years, this militant condition of black women, who have been stifled because of racism and sexism, has been carried on by Mary McLeod Bethune, Mary Church Terrell, Daisy Bates, and Diane Nash.

The black woman lives in a society that discriminates against her on two counts. The black woman cannot be discussed in the same context as her Caucasian counterpart because of the twin jeopardy of race and sex which operates against her, and the psychological and political consequences which attend them. Black women are crushed by cultural restraints and abused by the legitimate power structure. To date, neither the black movement nor women's liberation succinctly addresses itself to the dilemma confronting the black who is female. And as a consequence of ignoring or being unable to handle the problems facing black women, black women themselves are now becoming socially and politically active.

Undoubtedly black women are cultivating new attitudes, most of which will have political repercussions in the future. They are attempting to change their conditions. The maturation of the civil rights movement by the mid '60s enabled many black women to develop interest in the American political process. From their experiences they learned that the real sources of power lay at the root of the political system. For example, black sororities and pressure groups like the National Council of Negro Women are adept at the methods of participatory politics particularly in regard to voting and organizing. With the arrival of the '70s, young black women are demanding recognition like the other segments of society who also desire their humanity and their individual talents to be noticed. The tradition of the black woman and the Afro-American subculture and her current interest in the political process indicate the emergence of a new political entity.

Historically she has been discouraged from participating in politics. Thus she is trapped between the walls of the dominant white culture and her own subculture, both of which encourage deference to men. Both races of women have traditionally been limited to performing such tasks as opening envelopes, hanging up posters and giving teas. And the minimal involvement of black women exists because they have been systematically excluded from the political process and they are members of the politically dysfunctional black lower class. Thus, unlike white women, who escape the psychological and sociological handicaps of racism, the black woman's political involvement has been a most marginal role.

But within the last six years, the Afro-American subculture has undergone tremendous social and political transformation and these changes have altered the nature of the black community. They are beginning to realize their capacities not only as blacks, but also as women. They are beginning to understand that their cultural well-being and their social well-being would only be affirmed in connection with the total black struggle. The dominant role black women played in the civil rights movement began to allow them to grasp the significance of political power in America. So obviously black women who helped to spearhead the civil rights movement would also now, at this juncture, join and direct the vanguard which would shape and mold a new kind of political participation.

This has been acutely felt in urban areas, which have been rocked by sporadic rebellions. Nothing better illustrates the need for black women to organize politically than their unusual proximity to the most crucial issues affecting black people today. They have struggled in a wide range of protest movements to eliminate the poverty and injustice that permeates the lives of black people. In New York City, for example, welfare mothers and mothers of schoolchildren have ably demonstrated the commitment of black women to the elimination of the problems that threaten the well-being of the black family. Black women must view the problems of cities such as New York not as urban problems, but as the components of a crisis without whose elimination our family lives will neither survive nor prosper. Deprived of a stable family environment because of poverty and racial injustice, disproportionate numbers of our people must live on minimal welfare allowances that help to perpetuate the breakdown of family life. In the face of the increasing poverty besetting black communities, black women have a responsibility. Black women have a duty to bequeath a legacy to their children. Black women have a duty to move from the periphery of organized political activity into its main arena.

I say this on the basis of many experiences. I travel throughout this country and I've come in contact with thousands of my black sisters in all kinds of conditions in this nation. And I've said to them over and over again: it is not a question of competition against black men or brown men or red men or white men in America. It is a questions of the recognition that, since we have a tremendous responsibility in terms of our own families, that to the best of our ability we have to give everything that is within ourselves to give in terms of helping to make that future a better future for our little boys and our little girls, and not leave it to anybody.

Francis Beal describes the black woman as a slave of a slave. Let me quote: "By reducing the black man in America to such abject oppression, the black woman had no protector and she was used and is still being used in some cases as the scapegoat for the evils that this horrendous system has perpetrated on black men. Her physical image has been maliciously maligned. She has been sexually molested and abused by the white colonizer. She has suffered the worst kind of economic exploitation, having been forced to serve as the white woman's maid and wetnurse for white offspring, while her own children were more often starving and neglected. It is the depth of degradation to be socially manipulated, physically raped and used to undermine your own household and then to be powerless to reverse this syndrome."

However, Susan Johnson notes a bit of optimism. Because Susan, a brilliant young black woman, has said that the recent strides made by the black woman in the political process is a result of the intricacies of her personality. And that is to say that as a political animal, she functions independently of her double jeopardy. Because confronted with a matrifocal past and present, she is often accused of stealing the black male's position in any situation beyond that of housewife and mother. And if that were not enough to burden the black woman, she realizes that her political mobility then threatens the doctrine of white supremacy and male superiority so deeply embedded in the American culture.

So choosing not to be a victim of self-paralysis, the black woman has been able to function in the political spectrum. And more often than not, it is the subconsciousness of the racist mind that perceives her as less harmful than the black man and thus permits her to acquire the necessary leverage for political mobility. This subtle component of racism could prove to be essential to the key question of how the black woman has managed some major advances in the American political process.

It is very interesting to note that everyone with the exception of the black woman herself has been interpreting the black woman. It is very interesting to note that the time has come that black women can and must no longer be passive, complacent recipients of whatever the definitions of the sociologists, the psychologists and the psychiatrists will give to us. Black women have been maligned, misunderstood, misinterpreted who knows better than Shirley Chisholm?

And I stand here tonight to tell to you, my sisters, that if you have the courage of your convictions, you must stand up and be counted. I hope that the day will come in America when this business of male versus female does not become such an overriding issue, so that the talents and abilities that the almighty God have given to people can be utilized for the benefit of humanity.

One has to recognize that there are stupid white women and stupid white men, stupid black women and stupid black men, brilliant white women and brilliant white men, and brilliant black women and brilliant black men. Why do we get so hung-up in America on this question of sex? Of course, in terms of the black race, we understand the historical circumstances. We understand, also, some of the subtle maneuverings and machinations behind the scenes in order to prevent black women and black men from coming together as a race of unconquerable men and women.

And I just want to say to you tonight, if I say nothing else: I would never have been able to make it in America if I had paid attention to all of the doomsday-criers about me. And I want to say in conclusion that as you have this conference here for the next two weeks, put the cards out on the table and do not be afraid to discuss issues that perhaps you have been sweeping under the rug because of what people might say about you. You must remember that once we are able to face the truth, the truth shall set all of us free.

In conclusion, I just want to say to you, black and white, north and east, south and west, men and women: the time has come in America when we should no longer be the passive, complacent recipients of whatever the morals or the politics of a nation may decree for us in this nation. Forget traditions! Forget conventionalisms! Forget what the world will say whether you're in your place or out of your place. Stand up and be counted. Do your thing, looking only to God whoever your God is and to your consciences for approval. I thank you.

Thurgood Marshall's Equality Speech

"You are in competition with a well trained white lawyer and you better be at least as good as he, and if you expect to win, you better be better."

Overview

Thurgood Marshall's Equality Speech as his untitled address came to be known was delivered on November 18, 1978, at Howard University School of Law in Washington, D.C., at a convocation honoring Wiley A. Branton, its new dean. An associate justice of the U.S. Supreme Court and a 1933 graduate of the school, Marshall had come to Howard to praise his old friend and partner in the fight to integrate the schools of Little Rock, Arkansas, some two decades earlier. In addition, he would celebrate the Howard law school's legacy: its trained corps of African American lawyers who, at great personal risk, went into the American South in the second third of the twentieth century to change the racially segregated world that Jim Crow laws had produced and reinforced since the end of Reconstruction in 1877.

As chief counsel to the Legal Defense and Educational Fund, an organization developed by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), until 1961, Marshall supervised many of those lawyers in civil rights cases throughout the South and elsewhere. As the lead litigator in the landmark 1954 Supreme Court case Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, which had opened the way to desegregating the nation's public schools, Marshall and his teams of lawyers laid the legal foundation for the civil rights movement in the 1960s. Now, as a new chapter in the law school's history was beginning, Marshall would look back on more than four decades of civil rights litigation to offer a rueful assessment of African American equality in 1978.

Context

The civil rights movement of the 1960s had its roots in the actions of African American lawyers, who, in the 1930s, entered all-white southern courtrooms to challenge the harsh Jim Crow laws that, since the end of the nineteenth century, had restricted or denied African Americans in the South access to housing, medical care, public parks, swimming pools, public transportation, all levels of education, and well-paid jobs because of their race. As late as the mid-1950s in the South, public drinking fountains and restrooms, dime store lunch counters, restaurants, hotels, and theaters were strictly segregated with many such facilities available only to whites. African Americans were routinely denied access to voting rolls and jury service. Southern public and private colleges routinely refused to admit African Americans and denied them admission to graduate and professional schools as well. Elsewhere, informal racial quotas limited African American enrollments. In many parts of the country marriage of interracial couples was strictly prohibited. Real estate deeds in the 1950s often contained restrictive racial covenants preventing sales of homes to African Americans. Neighborhoods were "redlined" by banks the term refers to lines drawn on urban maps to identify ethnic concentrations so as to preserve privileged white enclaves by withholding mortgages from African Americans seeking to move in. Professional sports were rigidly segregated, as were the military forces in both world wars.

These racially biased practices were protected by an 1896 decision of the U.S. Supreme Court, Plessy v. Ferguson. Voting seven to one (with one justice not participating), the Court upheld a Louisiana law requiring separate passenger cars for blacks and whites on intrastate railroads and ruled that state laws based on a "separate but equal" doctrine did not violate the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection clause. That amendment, the Court said, provides only for political, not social, equality. Southern governments soon applied the decision's "separate but equal" standard to every area of life to keep the races apart, and the Supreme Court, until the 1930s, consistently gave them the right to do so. In interstate transportation, for example, southern states required passengers to obey segregation laws while in transit from state to state. African Americans traveling, say, from the Midwest to Mississippi had to give up their seats to white passengers if they were ordered to do so by the bus driver or train conductor once they had crossed into a segregated state.

Change, when it arrived, came slowly and grudgingly through a series of lawsuits brought to the nation's courtrooms by teams of lawyers supported by the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund. Over time, some of these cases reached the U.S. Supreme Court, producing victories that incrementally deemed unconstitutional the Jim Crow laws that had kept African Americans from full equality. This legal approach was the brainchild of Charles Hamilton Houston, the African American dean of the Howard University School of Law in the 1930s, who trained his students as "social engineers" with the legal skills necessary to change America's civil rights landscape. Proposing to challenge segregation and its legal sanctions in the courts rather than through political action, Houston, aided by Thurgood Marshall, developed a simple courtroom strategy: Plessy would be attacked by applying the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to social as well as political equality. Through two decades African American lawyers consistently argued that the South's separate but equal laws were inherently unequal and in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment's promised protections.

In 1935, using Houston's approach, Marshall, who was then in private practice in Baltimore but working under contract for the NAACP, persuaded the Maryland Court of Appeals to order the University of Maryland Law School to admit an African American applicant it had earlier rejected because of his race and, in the future, to admit all qualified students regardless of color. It was a sweet victory for Marshall, who had been denied admission to the same school five years earlier on racial grounds. In 1938 Houston himself secured a ruling from the U.S. Supreme Court invalidating state laws that forced African American students to attend out-of-state graduate schools because their race barred them from the states' all-white schools.

Succeeding Houston as the NAACP's special counsel in 1938, Marshall was appointed the first director and chief counsel of the newly independent Legal Defense and Educational Fund in 1940. Over the course of twenty years, he traveled throughout the South assisting African American lawyers in implementing hundreds of legal attacks on segregation and serving as lead counsel in the cases that, on appeal, reached the nation's highest court. During this long period of litigation, Marshall argued thirty-two major civil rights cases before the Court, winning twenty-nine of them, including decisions that granted African American teachers pay equal to whites (1940); forced the state of Texas to abandon policies barring blacks from primary elections (1944); banned state statutes requiring racial segregation on interstate railroads and buses (1946); ordered Oklahoma (1948) and Texas (1950) to admit African Americans to their law schools; and granted African American graduate students equal admission to dormitories and classrooms in graduate schools (1950).

During the 1950s Marshall won cases in the Supreme Court that led to the desegregation of public parks, swimming pools, local bus systems, and athletic facilities. His most important legal victory came on May 17, 1954, when a unanimous Supreme Court in Brown v. Board of Education effectively overturned Plessy v. Ferguson, holding segregation in the nation's public schools unconstitutional and in violation of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. That decision was the forerunner of other judicial enforcement of African American rights, including decisions upholding affirmative action policies in education and employment. It opened the way to Martin Luther King, Jr.'s, leadership of the 1960s civil rights movement and, through that movement, to the comprehensive Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965, which gave African Americans in the South federal protection when they registered to vote.

Brown secured Marshall's national reputation as a litigator and led to his three successive appointments in the federal government first as an appellate judge, then as solicitor general, and finally as the first African American justice on the Supreme Court. In each of these roles, he continued to defend racial equality, the subject of his speech in 1978.

About the Author

Thurgood Marshall, a civil rights lawyer, solicitor general, and the first African American associate justice of the U.S. Supreme Court was born in the segregated city of Baltimore, Maryland, on July 2, 1908. Growing up in a middle-class home his mother was an elementary school teacher and his father supervised the dining room staff at a local country club Marshall graduated from Lincoln University in Pennsylvania in 1930. Refused admission to the University of Maryland School of Law because of his race, he commuted daily to the Howard University School of Law, where Charles Hamilton Houston mentored him. He finished first in his class in 1933.

After two years in private practice, Marshall went to New York to become a staff lawyer for the NAACP. In 1939 he replaced Houston as the association's chief counsel to lead an aggressive program litigating civil rights cases across the nation, but principally in the South. As lead counsel, he argued thirty-two cases before the Supreme Court, winning twenty-nine and earning a national reputation as a brilliant litigator. In 1961 President John F. Kennedy appointed him to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit (New York, Connecticut, and Vermont).

In 1965 President Lyndon B. Johnson appointed Marshall U.S. solicitor general, the first African American to serve as the nation's chief litigator, representing the federal government in legal arguments before the Supreme Court. Two years later President Johnson appointed him to the Supreme Court, where Marshall became best known for his hundreds of dissents, his championing of civil rights, his opposition to the death penalty, and especially his promotion of affirmative action policies designed to heal the wounds of slavery and racial bias. Although Marshall insisted that he would never retire, his health failed him in the end, and he left the bench in 1991. He died of heart failure on January 24, 1993.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

The document reproduced here is a copy of the verbatim transcript of Marshall's address to the convocation audience at the Howard University School of Law on Saturday, November 18, 1978. Marshall spoke extemporaneously, using only a few notes. Lee Roy Clemons, a law student, who was both a certified court reporter and court stenographer, compiled the transcript, which was subsequently published in The Barrister, the student newspaper.

  Marshall gives his Equality Speech at the Howard University School of Law in Washington, D.C.

Speaking informally, Marshall drew on ideas and themes from speeches he had delivered over the years to civil rights groups or university audiences as a lawyer or to bar associations as a judge. His seemingly impromptu comments about the history of the law school, for example, and especially those concerning his mentor, Charles Hamilton Houston, echo a more formal talk he gave in the spring of 1978 at Amherst College in a program honoring Houston, an Amherst alumnus.

◆ Introductory Remarks

The speech at Howard moves through several stages. The first five paragraphs are the customary informal remarks that set the stage; they serve to introduce the speaker, to thank the institution that has invited him, and to set a cordial tone before proceeding to the main themes of the event. In this case the topics that follow are a brief history of the school, Marshall's personal recollections of Charles Hamilton Houston and his students, and his final, powerful assessment of the state of African American lives in 1978.

In the first paragraph, Marshall offers a salutation to Warren Burger, the chief justice of the United States, and to Dr. James Edward Cheek, president of Howard University. He acknowledges as well, though he does not name them, other judges in attendance from the federal and state courts. His acknowledgment of these dignitaries establishes the importance of the occasion.

Paragraphs 2 5 reflect Marshall's well-known reputation as a playful teller of parable-like tales that he often used in trials to lighten the proceedings and drive home a point of law in terms understandable to juries. As a legal tactic, he used such stories to mask his own abilities and lead white attorneys in white southern courtrooms to view him as an easy adversary. His opponents often underestimated his legal mind because his language was often couched in folksy images, but he moved easily and quickly, at the appropriate time, from field or street language to academic and lawyerly sophistication. He was a master at giving a different voice to each character in the tales he told, and it is likely he did so here.

◆ The Importance of Howard University

Marshall explains why he has chosen to speak extemporaneously rather than to rely on speechwriters. The long and funny Las Vegas tale that follows is a setup for the transition to the school's history and its importance in the civil rights movement. Marshall begins his reflection on the history of the school with an emphasis on the importance of any educational institution's reputation to the success of the school's mission a point he would return to several times. Much of what the Howard University School of Law was able to accomplish was a result of the rigor that successive deans, beginning with Houston, brought to its curriculum and its classrooms.

In the next half-dozen paragraphs, Marshall contrasts the current Howard law campus with the school of his youth, in order to highlight the dramatic changes in the school's appearance and reputation and to introduce his theme centering on changes to African American lives in the same period. Until 1933 the School of Law met in a small university-owned house on Fifth Street in the District of Columbia. The next year the school moved to larger facilities on Howard's main campus and, forty years later still, to a twenty-two-acre campus in northwest Washington, once the site of Dunbarton College, which closed in 1973. Marshall was speaking in the newly renovated Moot Court Room in Houston Hall, the main administrative and classroom building.

◆ Charles Hamilton Houston: A Pragmatic Approach to the Law

Marshall offers a warm and extensive remembrance of Charles Hamilton Houston and how he transformed the law school. Houston was a summa cum laude graduate of Amherst College and of Harvard Law School, where he was also the first African American editor of the law review. He became dean of the Howard School of Law at age thirty-five and immediately attacked its many deficiencies, developing more rigorous courses, demanding greater discipline and self-direction from his students, and securing accreditation from the major legal associations. A charismatic figure, Houston attracted nationally acclaimed legal scholars to lecture at the small house on Fifth Street (often at no fee) to introduce his students to a wider world of law and possibility.

Marshall describes Houston's pragmatic approach to the law. Wall Street was left to Harvard and the eastern law schools. Howard students would be social engineers trained for the courtroom and community service; they would be "hands on" lawyers, who would work together for change. Marshall describes one such team project initiated by a fellow student, Oliver Hill, that became a model for the careful strategic pretrial planning that was the hallmark of Marshall's later civil rights career.

William H. Hastie, mentioned here, was, like Houston, a graduate of Amherst and Harvard and later dean of the Howard School of Law (1939 1946). The passing reference to "a man named Crawford" concerns a sensational trial in Leesburg, Virginia, in 1933, where Houston, a team of NAACP lawyers, and Marshall, a third-year student, faced an all-white jury and daily threats of violence in their courtroom defense of George Crawford, a Negro chauffeur accused of murdering his wealthy employer's wife and daughter. Marshall provided much of the legal research and participated in the nightly strategy sessions that earned Crawford a life sentence instead of the death penalty. The experience turned Marshall into a lifelong opponent of capital punishment.

In the following paragraphs, Marshall describes other aspects of Houston's approach to legal training, his realistic assessment of the difficulties African American lawyers could expect to encounter in the all-white courtrooms where they would plead their cases, and his justification for the rigor he was demanding from them as students. There is an honor roll of African American lawyers (from Howard and eastern law schools) who were closely linked to civil rights gains before and after World War II; many of them played a part in the Brown case. James Nabrit and Spottswood Robinson, like Houston and Hastie, became deans of the law school.

The brief paragraph about the "other side" refers to white educators who supported the civil rights movement. Charles Black was a Columbia University law professor who wrote key briefs in Brown. In the next paragraph, "a certain wild guy over there in Arkansas" is, of course, Wiley A. Branton, the new dean of the law school.

Marshall next recalls Damon J. Keith, a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit (who had introduced Marshall to the convocation audience) for mentioning how Houston had trained Howard's lawyers, including Marshall and himself, to work as teams and to hold lengthy pretrial dry runs, or moot courts, to uncover possible weaknesses in their cases. Marshall here elaborates on these simulated trials and team approaches to courtroom preparation as the key to the Legal Defense and Educational Fund's successful litigation of cases throughout the South and to his team's victory in Brown. In fact, Marshall makes the point that the trial judges they faced were far less rigorous that the moot court referees. The law school continues to use moot courts as a central teaching device, and as proof of their value, Marshall praises the legal brief presented by Herbert O. Reid, Sr., of the Howard law faculty, in the recently concluded Bakke case before the Supreme Court.

◆ Looking to the Future

Marshall gives further praise to Dean Branton and then makes a transition to the third and central theme of his address, stressing the need to move beyond mere praise of accomplishments thus far: "That's not enough because we have got to look to the future. They are still laying traps for us." It is the obligation of the Howard University School of Law, he affirms, to continue preparing its students to work with the poor by providing legal services to those who need them most. In the ensuing paragraphs Marshall develops this theme by illustrating what he means by traps, invoking a warning from Houston and adding a warning of his own, buttressed by a quotation from President John F. Kennedy's commencement address at Yale University on June 11, 1962. (Marshall slightly misspeaks. Kennedy actually said, "For the great enemy of the truth is very often not the lie deliberate, contrived and dishonest but the myth persistent, persuasive, and unrealistic.")

Marshall elaborates on Kennedy's thought. His opening line "Be aware of that myth, that everything is going to be all right" is a reference to the contemporary politicians, editorial writers, and commentators who argued that all that needed to be done to rectify the past evils of slavery and the injustices of Jim Crow laws had been done. Affirmative action, they claimed, had leveled the playing field in housing, education, and employment for African Americans; it was time for them to assume responsibility for their own actions and lives.

Marshall's dismissal of these traps, or myths, as he calls them, is actually a subtle criticism of the 1970s Supreme Court, which during his tenure had changed from a liberal-centrist orientation to an increasingly conservative one, a shift that threatened, he believed, much of his life's work. By 1978 it had become clear to Marshall that he and his close friend William J. Brennan, Jr., were the only liberal justices on the Court. Although protocol discouraged open criticism of fellow justices, Marshall here implicitly chides his colleagues in a nonjudicial setting. His audience, most of them legally trained, surely understood this. Because his listeners were familiar with his judicial writings (increasingly at this time, dissenting from the majority opinions), they were doubtless aware of his disappointment at the Court's narrowing or eliminating recently won protections of civil rights for African Americans, most notably in the Bakke decision. The chief significance of Marshall's message in this address lies in these concluding thoughts.

Twice Marshall quotes Chief Justice Earl Warren, who served on the Supreme Court from 1953 to 1969 and led his fellow justices to the unanimous decision in Brown v. Board of Education. The two quotations are from Warren's A Republic, If You Can Keep It. The first is from Justice Louis Brandeis, the first Jew appointed to the Supreme Court, who served with distinction from 1916 until his retirement in 1939. The second quotation is Warren's own. The remark, which inspired Warren's title, is attributed to Benjamin Franklin allegedly his reply to a woman in Philadelphia who asked him as he left the Constitutional Convention in 1787 what kind of government the Constitution created. Marshall says that Warren (who had died in 1974) wrote only one book, but, in fact, there is a second: The Memoirs of Earl Warren was published posthumously in 1977.

The remaining paragraphs pull together the speech's several themes: First, despite past successes in ending racial discrimination, Marshall believes that there is still much to be done in broadening education and in extending economic opportunity to African Americans in places where, despite laws to the contrary, it was still denied. Second, it is his conviction that the Howard University School of Law, which has been in the forefront of bringing about the legal end of racial segregation, will continue, under the leadership of Dean Branton, to be a strong defender against further erosions of the rights already won.

"Home" in the penultimate paragraph refers to Africa as the ancestral home of African Americans a concept inspired by Roots, the phenomenally popular twelve-hour television miniseries first aired in January 1977 and based on Alex Haley's novel of the same name, which told the dramatic story of several generations of a slave family, from its West African beginnings to its emancipation in the American Civil War. Almost half the nation's population watched the final episode, and it was estimated that 85 percent of American households saw a portion of the miniseries. It inspired genealogical searches among African Americans, a number of whom journeyed to Africa in search of their own roots, and in its skillful combination of fact and fiction led many white Americans to an new understanding of the brutal nature of slavery in their nation's past.

Marshall himself had made several trips to Kenya, which he came to think of as his ancestral home. He helped to draft its constitution in the early 1960s, and he toured the country in the summer of 1963 as the personal representative of President Kennedy. On December 12, 1963, he returned to celebrate Kenya's first Independence Day and hear fifty thousand people chant "Harambee," a Swahili word variously translated as "pull together," "let's pull together," or "all pull together." His last visit to Kenya was made just weeks before his speech at Howard, in order to attend President Jomo Kenyatta's funeral on August 31, 1978. Marshall's final words, delivered with warmth and humor, urge his audience to "pull together" with the new dean of the law school to continue to defend and protect the civil liberties so recently won.

Audience

The audience for Marshall's speech was essentially limited to the federal and state judges, law school faculty, alumni,

"Harvard was training people to join big Wall Street firms. Howard was teaching lawyers to go out and go in court."

"There are people that tell us today, and there are movements that tell us, tell Negroes, 'Take it easy man. You made it. No more to worry about. Everything is easy.' Again, I remind you about what Charlie Houston said, 'You have got to be better, boy. You better move better.' "

"Back in the 30's and 40's, we could go no place but to court. We knew then, the court was not the final solution. Many of us knew then the final solution would have to be politics, if for no other reason, politics is cheaper than lawsuits."

and students attending the convocation that Saturday in November 1978. A reporter from the Washington Post was present and filed a 573-word account of Marshall's remarks for the Sunday edition (November 19, 1978), and the school's student newspaper, The Barrister, published the transcript of the speech for the law school community the following week. The paper's editor in chief told the Washington Business Journal in 2002 that immediately after The Barrister was distributed, the dean's office was inundated with phone calls from people around the world asking for copies, but no other newspaper coverage at the time has come to light.

Impact

The immediate impact of the Equality Speech was limited to those who heard or read it in November 1978, but viewed over time the speech is an important part of Marshall's legacy: Its informality reveals the man behind the words and its substance the central role the Howard University School of Law played in his life and in the civil rights movement from the 1930s to the 1970s. Marshall's tribute to the school's alumni provides an honor roll of the school's graduates, who shaped the legal battles of their time and won key victories for African Americans in particular and the American people in general. His rueful comments about the myths that continue to challenge the twin principles of equal justice and opportunity for all and his veiled disappointment in the rightward drift of the Supreme Court presaged two important later addresses: "The Sword and the Robe" (May 8, 1981), in which he deplored recent decisions of the Court, where he believed the justices had too often bowed to public pressure instead of maintaining their neutrality, and "The Bicentennial Speech" (May 18, 1987), in which he argued against the veneration of the Constitution as a perfect document because of its slavery provisions and the relegation of African Americans to second-class citizenship for so many years. The Equality Speech also highlighted several principles that governed his legal and judicial career: the power of the law evenhandedly applied to change lives for the better, the importance of individual liberty to a free society, the centrality of freedom of speech to society, and the continuing need for affirmative action to heal the lingering damage of slavery and Jim Crow.

Questions for Further Study

1. Summarize the role Thurgood Marshall played in the civil rights movement.

2. In his address, Marshall makes the following statement: "It's not a republic if we keep it. With me: 'It's a democracy, if we can keep it.'" What is the distinction between a republic and a democracy? Is Marshall correct when he suggests that the United States is a democracy, not a republic?

3. Read this document in conjunction with Charles Hamilton Houston's "Educational Inequalities Must Go!" To what extent did Marshall continue the legal strategy that Houston adopted?

4. In recent years there has been much discussion of "activist" judges—that is, judges whose decisions are influenced by certain social views. Was Marshall an "activist" judge? Do you think it is proper for members of the judiciary to impose their own views in their decisions? Explain.

5. By his own admission, Marshall's remarks were not particularly organized because they were not written down. In his speech, he reminisces, tells stories, makes jokes, and, it could be argued, wanders. Yet the speech has been reprinted in anthologies, and when it was published in the student newspaper, the university received many requests for copies. Why do you think this speech has attracted so much attention?

Thurgood Marshall's Equality Speech

Mr. Chief Justice, Mr. President, My friends: It is a great day. I am particularly happy that people like the Chief Justice of the United States is here, and other Chief Judges. I want to confess, I begged him not to come; because I know how much work he has to do. By statute, he has jurisdiction over I don't know how many different outfits in this country, which he has to go to. And then he has to preside over some five hundred Federal Judges, each of whom is an individual prima donna. And with all of that, he shouldn't find time to come something like this. But, he insisted. To him, it was that important; and to me that truly demonstrates how important it is.

I would like to start off by having a couple of true stories on the record. I do not have a written speech. I have gotten away from written speeches since I heard about that legislator who had a speech committee in his office, and they would write up these speeches for him. He wouldn't even look at them before he delivered them. He just read them off. And this day he said, "Look! Next Monday night I am speaking for Senator Johnson; and I want a speech, twenty minutes, and I want it on energy." And they said, "What are …?" And he said, "That's it. Just go do it." And they did.

And on Monday they gave him the speech and he went out, got in his car, got in the place, got there, got in another car, went there. When he was called on to speak, he opened up his speech, and on the first page he went on telling stories like this. Except mine is true. Then he went on talking in general about the energy problem. And then he said, "He has an airtight program for taking care of the entire energy program. It was very elaborate; and it was set up in five different phases, all five of which, I shall set forth before you tonight." And he turned over the page and to his utter surprise, he saw "Now, you sucker, you are on your own."

I have given up that idea when I decided to come. I am not too much in the line of notes. But the one that really is what I am going to talk about today is a Las Vegas story.

This guy went out from California to Las Vegas and did what all others do. He lost his money. All of it, including his fare home. And he was commiserating with himself, and as sometimes happens, he had to go. And when he got to the toilet room he found out, that they had not nickel or dime [slots], they had quarter ones. And he didn't have a nickel. So he was in pretty bad shape. And just then a gentleman came by and he told the gentleman his problem. The guy said, "I will give you a quarter." And the guy said, "Well look, you don't know me." "I don't care if you give it back to me or not. You are no problem. Here's a quarter."

He took the quarter and went in the room there, and just as he was about to put the quarter in the slot to open the door, the door had been left open for somebody. So he put the quarter in his pocket. He went on in, and when he finished, he went upstairs. A quarter wasn't going to get him back to Los Angeles. A quarter wasn't even going to feed him. So, he put the quarter in the slot machine. And it wouldn't be any story if he didn't hit the jackpot. Then he hit the bigger jackpot and he went to the craps table; he went to the roulette table. He ended up with about ten or fifteen thousand dollars worth.

He went back to Los Angeles [and] invested in the right stock. He got the right business together. And in pretty short order, about fifteen years, he became the second-wealthiest man in the world. And on television, they asked him about it; and he said he would like to tell his story. And he told the story. And he said, "I am so indebted to that benefactor of mine. That man who made all of this possible. And if he comes forth and proves it, that he was the man, I will give him half of my wealth in cash. So a man came forth. They had all the elaborate, private detective investigation, and sure enough, "That was the man." The guy said, "Well look. Are you sure you are the one I am looking for?" He said, "Why certainly." He said, "Who are you?" He said, "I am the man that gave you that quarter." He said, "Heck, I'm not looking for him. I am looking for the man who left the door opened. Because you see, if he hadn't left the door open, I would have had to put the quarter in the slot."

I figure at a stage like this in our development of our law school, we have to be sure we know just what we are after.

Why do we have occasions like this? Well, I will tell you why. Everything in any question of education depends on the reputation of the school. And a part of the reputation of the school, is the reputation of the dean. And being so old as I am, you almost scared me to death, Wiley, talking about the oldest graduate was here.

In order to find out just where we stand, and to be in a room like this, and on a campus like this, I had to go back. But you know it's an awful long way from Fifth Street which, incidentally, I went by not too long ago. Those of you that hadn't been by, it's gone. They have torn it down. It was a marvelous place when it was there.

But today, you know, we have reached the place where people say, "We've come a long way." But so have other people come a long way. And so have other schools come a long way. Has the gap been getting smaller? It's getting bigger. Everybody's been doing better. And so, as you took at the law school today, and that's what you have to look at, you look back, and people say we are better off today. Better than what?

You know, I used to be amazed at people who would say that "The poorest Negro kid in the South was better off than the kid in South Africa." So what! We are not in South Africa. We are here. "You ought to go around the country and show yourself to Negroes; and give them inspiration." For what? These Negro kids are not fools. They know to tell them there is a possibility that someday you'll have a chance to be the o-n-l-y Negro on the Supreme Court, those odds aren't too good.

When I do get around the country like recently, I have been to places like unfortunately for funerals like New Orleans, Houston, Dallas, et cetera when I get out and talk with the people in the street, I still get the same problems. "You know, like years ago, you told us things were going to get better. But they are not a darn bit better for me. I am still having trouble getting to work. I have trouble eating." And guess what I am getting now? "You not only told me that, you told my father that. And he's no better off, and neither am I. And can you tell me my children will be better off?" Well, all I am trying to tell you [is] there's a lot more to be done.

Now, think of those good old days. We started at Howard with Charlie Houston as dean. The school had several things that they did not have [which] would be more important. They did not have a reputation, and they did not have any accreditation, and they did not have anything it looked to me.

Charlie Houston took over and in two or three years got full accreditation: American Bar Association, Association of American Law Schools, et cetera. He did it the hard way.

And for any students that might be interested, for these of you who came to this school later and had complaints: You should have been there when I was there.

We named Charlie the only repeatable names I could give him as "Iron Shoes and Cement Pants." We had a lot of others but

He even installed the cutback system that would keep you on the books all the time. And that was that, a professor could take five points off your mark for no reason at all. So the only way you could really make it is to get around 95.

He gave an examination in evidence in our second year that started at nine o'clock in the morning and ended at five in the afternoon. One subject.

In our first year he told us, "Look at the man on your right, took at the man on your left, and at this time next year, two of you won't be here."

I know my class started, as I remember, it was around thirty; and it ended up with six. He brought in people not on the faculty; but who were coming by Washington. And because of his reputation and background he could get them.

And the people I would list. Every time they came to Washington, they would come by; and we would close up the school and listen to them, in our moot courtroom, which held about fifteen.

For example, a man by the name of Roscoe Pound who just happened to be Dean of Harvard Law School, would talk and lecture to us on the Common Law. And it just so happened that at that time he was the greatest authority in the world.

Then we had Bill Lewis, a Negro lawyer from Boston, Massachusetts who had the distinction of being Assistant Attorney General, a little while back, under Theodore Roosevelt. He would tell us about how to try a lawsuit; and how to argue with the judges; because he was a master of it. And we would run to the Supreme Court and hear him argue.

Then Garfield Hayes would drop by from the American Civil Liberties Union. The first time, I was very impressed with the fact, he was en route from Birmingham, Alabama where he had defended a poor Negro. He was then en route to Boston, Massachusetts to defend the Ku Klux Klan. He explained to me about the constitution being colorblind.

Then you had people like Clarence Darrow, who told us the importance of sociology and other studies rather than law which he considered to be unimportant. As witness one time, he was trying a case in North Carolina. A Negro beating up a white man. And his whole argument to the jury was he had never touched the facts of the case that this was a waste of time for him to stand up there and argue to this all white Southern prejudiced jury; that no way in the world they could give this Negro a chance. They just couldn't do it because they were too prejudiced. And he argued that for two and a half hours; and the jury went out and came back and proved to him that they weren't prejudiced. And they turned the man loose.

We had Vaughn S. Cooke, a great expert on Conflict Law. People like that because the emphasis was not theory. The emphasis in this school was on practice. How to get it done.

Harvard was training people to join big Wall Street firms. Howard was teaching lawyers to go out and go in court. Charlie's phrase was Social Engineer. To be a part of the community. And have the lawyer to take over the leadership in the community.

And we used to hold forth in our little library down there, after school, at night. And start out on research problems sometimes sponsored by him and sometimes on our own.

Indeed, I remember one time, one night. One guy, I believe it was Oliver Hill. He got to work on something, we all joined in. And we found out that in codifying the Code of the District of Columbia, they had just left out the Civil Rights Statute. So, since it didn't apply to anybody but us, they left it out. We eventually got through in court and got that straightened out. And we got to work on segregation. What are we going to do about that?

I for one was very interested in it because I couldn't go to the University of Maryland. I had to ride the train every day, twice a day. Back and forth. I didn't like that.

Well, it ended up Bill Hastie went down to North Carolina and filed our first University case which we lost on a technicality. But Hastie laid the groundwork for the future.

Then we had a criminal case dealing with a man named Crawford. We did more litigating, I guess, than any school ever did.

But I emphasize that it was aimed at working in the community. The other thing that Charlie beat in our heads I think that it is very important. He says, "You know when a doctor makes a mistake, he buries his mistake. When a lawyer makes a mistake, he makes it in front of God and everybody else."

When you get in the courtroom you can't say "Please, Mr. Court have mercy on me because I am a Negro." You are in competition with a well-trained white lawyer and you better be at least as good as he, and if you expect to win, you better be better. If I give you five cases to read overnight, you read eight. And when I say eight, you read ten. You go that step further; and you might make it. And then you had all these other people, Charles H. Houston, William H. Hastie, George E.C. Hayes, Leon A. Ransom, Edward P. Lovett, James Nabrit, Spottswood W. Robinson III.

Then later you had Robert L. Carter, Constance Baker Motley, A.T. Walden in Atlanta, Arthur Shores in Birmingham, A.P. Tureaud, Sr., in New Orleans.

Then on the other side you had a very good group of professors from other schools. Charles Black and others.

Then we had a certain wild guy over there in Arkansas. I would just like to mention it at this point, because it is very important, I think, to realize that in those days, "it was rough." And I think Wiley is an example of one part of it. I got the credit mostly. But I would go to those places, and I would get out on the fastest damn thing that moved. I couldn't wait for the plane. And then I couldn't wait for the jet.… He stayed there. He didn't go. He stayed right there. He had not once, but crosses were burned on his lawn. He had everything they could try. He laughed at them. He stayed there, and made them take it and like it. I mentioned that because it seems to me, that while we had this whole movement going along, we were beginning to touch it.

Then we had those dry runs that Damon was talking about. We would have both of the lawyers who were going to argue tomorrow's case before the Supreme Court, to come before a panel of judges in our old moot courtroom, when we were in the library down there on the campus. This went on all during the 1940's. The faculty members who set as members of the Court were deliberately urged to be rougher and excuse me, "nastier than the judges would be." And you know, it worked well; because once you got through with that slugging match with them, you didn't worry about anything the next day. It was like going to an ice cream party because the members of the court were so polite and nice to you. Well, I keep reminding you that this was done at Howard; all of it. How much it was necessary to the success of those cases, is left to anybody. And finally on that point, I want you to know, that starting with that research in the library of finding the Civil Rights Statute, through all these cases in the Supreme Court, clean up to the present time, in the Bakke case, I will tell anybody, and I will dispute anybody who does not agree, that the brief filed by Herb Reid was one of the best briefs. He didn't pay me a nickel for it.

Now, you know, Wiley integrated the University of Arkansas. He went back down in there; and cases that were mentioned, I know several other criminal cases that were just unbelievable. He went from there to Atlanta; and up here to Washington. I hate to get down into the gutter; but "Wiley" stands for, "brains and guts." I know both of them; I have seen him in action. It seems to me, that what are we going to do now, other than, all of us to give our blessings to what I consider a perfect marriage; Branton and the Howard Law School.

That's not enough because we have got to look to the future. They are still laying traps for us.

I have just requested a book which I heard about. Believe it or not, somebody found out the Klan (Ku Klux Klan) is still around. I could have told them that. The Klan never died. They just stopped wearing the sheets, because the sheets cost too much. When I say they, I think we all know who they would include. We have them in every phase of American life. And as we dedicate this courtroom, as we launch Wiley on his road, we just have to continue that basic theory of practice; and not just theory. With these clinics that have been set up, you note we can give the poor people in the ghettoes for peanuts better legal protection than the millionaires get. If, we could just get them to bring their legal problems to the lawyer, before they sign them. That's how to stay out of trouble. And that can be done with clinics. And I think this law school has to insist on that. And here I have a note which says all of this has to be done and it has to be done together.

There are people that tell us today, and there are movements that tell us, tell Negroes, "Take it easy man. You made it. No more to worry about. Everything is easy." Again, I remind you about what Charlie Houston said, "You have got to be better, boy. You better move better."

Be careful of these people who say, "You have made it. Take it easy; you don't need any more help." I would like to read, for these people who tell you, "to take it easy. Don't worry, et cetera": "The great enemy of truth very often is not the lie; deliberate, contrived and dishonest; but the myth persistent, persuasive, and unrealistic." [John F. Kennedy]

Be aware of that myth, that everything is going to be all right. Don't give in. I add that, because it seems to me, that what we need to do today is to refocus. Back in the 30's and 40's, we could go no place but to court. We knew then, the court was not the final solution. Many of us knew the final solution would have to be politics, if for no other reason, politics is cheaper than lawsuits. So now we have both. We have our legal arm, and we have our political arm. Let's use them both. And don't listen to this myth that it can be solved by either or that it has already been solved. Take it from me, it has not been solved.

I will conclude if I may with a conclusion from another great American, the late Chief Justice [Earl] Warren in his one book. And this is the conclusion of his book. And more important and as we move more in what I consider to be this new phase, he says [quoting Louis Brandeis] : "Those who won our independence believed … that the greatest menace to freedom is an inert people, that public discussion is a political duty and that this should be a fundamental principle of the American government.… They eschewed silence coerced by law."

And then again, Chief Justice Warren,

> No, the democratic way of life is not easy. It conveys great privileges with constant vigilance needed to preserve them. This vigilance must be maintained by those responsible for the government: and in our country those responsible are "we the people" no one else. Responsible citizenship is therefore the … anchor of our Republic. With it, we can withstand the storm; without it, we are helplessly at sea.

It is beyond question the ingredient Benjamin Franklin had in mind when he said: "A republic, if you can keep it."

To me, that means much. It's not a republic if we keep it. With me: "It's a democracy, if we can keep it. And in order to keep it, you can't stand still. You must move, and if you don't move, they will run over you."

This law school has been in the front. It's been the bellwether. It's been the fulcrum of pressure.

In driving on, I am just as certain as I have ever been in my life, that under the leadership of Wiley Branton, it will not only continue: it will broaden, increase and continue to be the bulwark that we all can be proud of.

This is a great day. We are entering a great era. And let's do as many of us did back home. You know some people have been going home with the Roots business and all that. I have been going over there since the late 50's, when Kenya got its independence in 1963, and to see all those hundreds of thousands of people when freedom was declared in unison yelled, "Harambee" …"Pull Together."

We could, and with Wiley and this school, we will continue to do it. Anything I can do to help, I will do, "that is except raise money." Because there are a couple of committees of the Judiciary that say, "No."

Jesse Jackson (Library of Congress)

Jesse Jackson's Democratic National Convention Keynote Address

1984

"Our flag is red, white, and blue, but our nation is a rainbow red, yellow, brown, black, and white."

Overview

When the Reverend Jesse L. Jackson stood on the rostrum at the Democratic National Convention in San Francisco, California, on July 17, 1984, he was in an unusual and historic position. He was only the second African American to become a serious candidate for the presidential nomination of a major American political party. Twelve years earlier, Representative Shirley Chisholm of New York had made a bid for the Democratic presidential nomination. Chisholm's candidacy was mainly symbolic, but Jackson's was highly substantive. He had run in all of the primaries and caucuses, and he had won sufficient support from voters to command influence in the party, even if his delegate total was far short of the number needed for the nomination. Jackson used his keynote address to insist that the Democratic Party had to be a stronger advocate for the needy and the neglected. "They have voted in record numbers," he declared. "The Democratic Party must send them a signal that we care." Jackson called his supporters the "rainbow coalition," since they were diverse in background, ethnicity, and religion. Yet while Jackson had attracted enthusiastic support during his campaign, he had also aroused controversy because of his willingness to negotiate with hostile or adversarial foreign leaders and owing to his inflammatory remarks about American Jews. Jackson's speech was the culmination of his candidacy, and it produced an electrifying response. Delegates in the convention center cheered and cried; listeners were moved by his powerful voice and emotional appeals. His message hardly satisfied all his critics, but his speech proved that African Americans had achieved a new level of prominence and power in presidential politics.

Context

On November 3, 1983, Jackson announced his candidacy for president and became only the second African American to seek the presidential nomination of a major political party. In 1972 Shirley Chisholm had also sought the Democratic nomination, but she had run a limited campaign, entering only twelve primaries and earning less than 3 percent of the vote in those contests. Jackson planned to run in all the Democratic primaries and declared that his main goal was to "help restore a moral tone, a redemptive spirit, and a sensitivity to the poor and the dispossessed of the nation." A severe recession had raised unemployment to more than 10 percent of the workforce and increased the number of Americans living in poverty. Jackson blamed President Ronald Reagan for policies that had exacerbated the difficulties of the poor and minorities, and he also criticized the other declared Democratic presidential candidates for having failed to speak out strongly enough on behalf of people in need. Jackson said he would represent African Americans as well as Hispanics, Native Americans, Asian Americans, European Americans, workers, and women. Together, he said, these groups would form what he termed a "rainbow coalition," and at that time he also founded a national advocacy organization of that same name. He told an enthusiastic audience of twenty-five-hundred supporters who attended the announcement of his candidacy, "Our time has come."

Jackson's candidacy produced strong reactions. Some African American political leaders, such as Richard Hatcher, the mayor of Gary, Indiana, quickly pledged their support. Others, such as Detroit's mayor, Coleman Young, insisted that Jackson had no chance of winning the nomination and endorsed former Vice President Walter Mondale, the candidate who had been leading in the polls. Mondale also believed that Jackson could not win but worried about losing so much minority support to Jackson that one of their rivals could emerge with the nomination. Jackson also aroused controversy because of his foreign policy positions. He favored the creation of a Palestinian homeland, and during a trip to the Middle East in 1979 he had embraced Yasser Arafat, the head of the Palestine Liberation Organization, at a time when the governments of both the United States and Israel considered the organization a terrorist group. On December 29, 1983, Jackson flew to Syria, where he negotiated the release of U.S. Navy Lieutenant Robert O. Goodman, Jr., an African American flyer who had been captured when his plane was shot down earlier that month. Jackson believed that he had undertaken a humanitarian mission, but critics questioned his decision to negotiate with a government that the U.S. State Department considered a state sponsor of terrorism.

  The Washington Post carries an article, "Peace with American Jews Eludes Jackson," quoting Jackson as using a derogatory term for Jews during a conversation with the reporter Milton Coleman in January.

Jackson aroused even greater controversy in February 1984, when newspapers quoted derogatory language that he had used to describe Jews. At first, he maintained that he had never made such comments; later, he insisted that his remarks had been part of a private conversation and interpreted out of context. Eventually, Jackson apologized, but he continued to face charges that he was insensitive to Jews or even anti-Semitic because of his association with Louis Farrakhan, the head of the Nation of Islam. Farrakhan held no official position in the campaign, but he had accompanied Jackson to Syria to negotiate Goodman's release. During the controversy over Jackson's pejorative comments about Jews, Farrakhan gave a speech in which he praised the German leader Adolf Hitler. Jewish leaders and organizations denounced Farrakhan and criticized Jackson for having failed to cut all ties to Farrakhan.

Despite such turmoil, Jackson proved to be an effective candidate. He won two primaries, Louisiana and the District of Columbia, as well as the caucuses in Virginia and in his native state, South Carolina. These victories along with winning 20 percent or more of the vote in primaries in several large states, including New York, Illinois, and New Jersey helped him finish the series of nomination contests in third place behind Mondale and Senator Gary Hart of Colorado, with 18.6 percent of the total vote. Jackson, however, was upset with party rules that awarded him only 12 percent of the convention delegates, a significantly smaller share than his percentage of the popular vote. When the Democratic National Convention began in San Francisco on July 16, Jackson and his supporters proposed changes in rules governing the selection of delegates and additions to the party's platform, the Democrats' official position on key issues that would be important in the campaign. Jackson lost on most of his challenges, although he secured stronger language on affirmative action in the platform and a promise to establish a commission to consider reforms in delegate selection. Mondale, who was assured the Democratic presidential nomination, wanted party unity and recognized the need to accommodate Jackson, who had demonstrated his appeal to African American voters. Mondale revised the convention schedule, allowing Jackson to deliver a keynote address during prime television time on the night before the delegates nominated their candidate. Mondale's aides did not know what Jackson would say, but they hoped for a memorable speech that would prepare the party for the fall campaign against President Ronald Reagan.

About the Author

Jesse Jackson was born on October 8, 1941, in Greenville, South Carolina, to a single mother, Helen Burns. Three years later, she married Charles Jackson, who adopted Jackson in 1957. As a high school student in Greenville, Jackson was an honor student and an outstanding athlete. He earned a football scholarship to the University of Illinois in 1959, but transferred after his first year to the Agricultural and Technical College of North Carolina, a historically black institution now known as North Carolina Agricultural and Technical State University. Jackson excelled at his new school, playing quarterback on the football team, winning election as student body president, and earning a BA in sociology in 1964. After graduation, Jackson began training for the ministry at Chicago Theological Seminary, where he studied for two years but failed to complete his course work. He was nonetheless ordained as a Baptist minister in 1968.

Shortly after he moved to Chicago, civil rights work became Jackson's main activity. In March 1965, he traveled to Selma, Alabama, where he met the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., who was organizing demonstrations to protest the denial of voting rights to African Americans. Partly through Jackson's efforts, King came to Chicago, where he organized marches and rallies against racial discrimination in housing in 1966. During a visit to Chicago, King offered Jackson a job as coordinator of the Chicago branch of Operation Breadbasket, an organization established in 1962 by the Southern Christian Leadership Conference that focused on improving economic opportunities for African Americans. By means of boycotts, picketing, and publicity, Jackson opened up job opportunities in businesses that had previously excluded African Americans and persuaded retail chains to expand shelf space for products made by minority-owned firms. On April 4, 1968, Jackson was in Memphis, Tennessee, when King was murdered in that city. Jackson quickly returned to Chicago, where riots had erupted in outrage over King's killing. Jackson then vowed that he would remain faithful to King's principle of nonviolent protest.

During the 1970s, Jackson became one of the nation's most prominent African American leaders. In 1971 he resigned from Operation Breadbasket and founded Operation PUSH (People United to Save Humanity). Operation PUSH engaged in a variety of activities to advance minority interests, including sponsoring educational programs and pressing major corporations to adopt affirmative action programs. A charismatic speaker, Jackson became one of the most eloquent and recognized advocates for social justice. He spoke throughout the United States and also to international audiences, journeying, for example, to South Africa in 1979 to denounce apartheid.

During the 1980s, Jackson became an important figure in national politics and international diplomacy. He campaigned for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1984, finishing third in the balloting behind front-runner and nominee Walter Mondale at the Democratic National Convention in San Francisco. In 1988 Jackson campaigned again for his party's presidential nomination. He ran an even stronger campaign in which he won several primaries and caucuses, finishing with the second-highest total of convention delegates after Michael Dukakis. In early January 1984, Jackson completed negotiations for the release of a captured U.S. pilot in Syria. Later that year, he went to Cuba and gained the release of forty-eight prisoners, including twenty-seven Americans. In 1989 he moved to Washington, D.C., where he served from 1991 until 1997 as a statehood senator, an office designed to encourage Congress to grant statehood to the District of Columbia.

Jackson continues to work as a prominent activist for human rights and social justice. He has undertaken diplomatic missions to many international trouble spots, including Iraq (1990), Kosovo (1999), and Libya (2004) to negotiate the release of prisoners or hostages and mediate disputes. He still serves as president of the organization he founded, now known as the Rainbow/PUSH Coalition. In March 2007 he became an early supporter of Barack Obama's candidacy for president.

Jackson begins with an affirmation of faith in God, loyalty to country, and commitment to the Democratic Party.

The pledge of support for the party was particularly important, since Jackson had challenged the Democratic platform in 1984 and complained about the party's rules for selecting delegates. With his assertion that the party, even if imperfect, was still "the best hope for redirecting our nation," Jackson quieted fears that he would be a disruptive force in Democratic politics after the nomination of Walter Mondale for president, scheduled for the following evening.

◆ Mission and Leadership

Jackson's main concerns at the outset of his speech were the issues he considered important and their effects on those groups on whose behalf he spoke. Jackson here uses "mission," a word with religious connotations, to emphasize the importance of the Democrats' obligation to help those in need. His specific language "to feed the hungry; to clothe the naked; to house the homeless" recalls passages in the Bible, especially a passage in the Gospel of Matthew about good works. Jackson declares that he represents "the desperate, the damned, the disinherited, the disrespected, and the despised." His use of alliteration, a series of words that begin with the same letter, is one of the notable characteristics of his speaking style; alliterative sequences gain the attention of the audience and lend prominence to his ideas. At this point, Jackson does not further identify the constituencies he represents, but he insists that the party has an obligation to them because they had "voted in record numbers" during the primaries and caucuses.

Jackson then shifts to a discussion of leadership, asserting that it is the key to solving the nation's problems. He focuses on political leadership, particularly the Democrats' choice of their next presidential nominee. Once again, Jackson uses biblical imagery, when he asserts that "leadership can part the waters and lead our nation in the direction of the Promised Land." In this section, as in other parts of his address, Jackson blends the attributes of a political speech with those of a sermon. He refers to the contest for the Democratic presidential nomination, which began with eight candidates and then narrowed to three: Mondale, Hart, and Jackson himself. Jackson asks the delegates who supported his candidacy to vote for him as a sign of their commitment to "a new direction for this Party and this nation." He pledges, however, to support the convention's nominee, who he knows would be Mondale, and he commends Mondale's choice of Representative Geraldine Ferraro as the party's candidate for vice president the first woman nominated by a major party for that office. Once again, he finds inspiration in the Bible, specifically the book of Ecclesiastes, when he concedes that the contest for the nomination has concluded and that loyal Democrats must rally around Mondale. "There is a time to compete," he declares, "and a time to cooperate."

◆ Apology

In perhaps the most important part of his address, Jackson apologizes for mistakes made during the campaign. He mentions no specific errors; he only asks for forgiveness for any "word, deed, or attitude" that has "caused anyone discomfort, created pain, or revived someone's fears." It is clear, however, that Jackson is referring to his derogatory language about Jews and his association with Louis Farrakhan that led to charges of anti-Semitism. Again, Jackson frames his discussion of a political issue in religious terms, as he asserts that "God is not finished with me yet." He also invokes the example of Hubert Humphrey, the Democratic nominee who lost the presidential election of 1968 to Richard Nixon, to justify his conviction that "we must forgive each other … and move on."

◆ Celebration of Diversity

Celebrating the diversity of the American people is the theme of the next section of the speech. Jackson uses two metaphors to describe ethnic, racial, religious, and political differences. The first is a rainbow "red, yellow, brown, black and white." During his campaign, Jackson had described his supporters as "the rainbow coalition," which mirrored the name of the organization he had then founded, the National Rainbow Coalition. The second metaphor is a quilt consisting of "many pieces, many colors, many sizes," yet "held together by a common thread." While celebrating difference, Jackson calls for cooperation, since "we have not proven that we can win and make progress without each other." He cites the achievements in civil rights during the preceding twenty years, making reference to Fannie Lou Hamer, an African American who participated in a challenge to the all-white Mississippi delegation to the Democratic convention in Atlantic City in 1964. He emphasizes the pain that has accompanied progress, including the murders of the Martin Luther King, Jr., Malcolm X, Medgar Evers, Robert Kennedy, and John F. Kennedy as well as the killings of the civil rights activist Viola Liuzzo after the Selma-to-Montgomery march in Alabama and of three young civil rights workers, Michael Schwerner, Andrew Goodman, and James Chaney, in Mississippi during the Freedom Summer of 1964, a campaign to register African American voters in that state. He refers once more to the tensions between the black and Jewish communities that occurred during his campaign. He emphasizes, however, the common values and goals of blacks and Jews, inspired by religious principles and embodied in two great spiritual leaders, Martin Luther King and Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel, who marched together for voting rights in Selma, Alabama, in 1965. He urges African Americans and Jews to renew their partnership by turning "to each other and not on each other."

Next, Jackson appeals to the Democratic Party to welcome members of his rainbow coalition. He lists specific constituencies, including Arab Americans, Hispanic Americans, Native Americans, Asian Americans, young people, disabled veterans, small farmers, lesbians, and gays. Jackson maintains that these groups have been victimized, ostracized, or ignored, and he insists that inclusion rather than exclusion must be the hallmark of the Democratic Party. "Don't leave anybody out," he declares while counseling against hate, which he believes is often the result of "ignorance, anxiety, paranoia, fear, and insecurity." By representing the interests of this rainbow coalition, Jackson asserts that Democrats would be empowered to "expand our Party, heal our Party, and unify our Party." This part of the speech amounts to a plea to the party leadership to give more attention to minorities and their concerns as a way of building the party's strength for the 1984 election.

◆ Critique of Reagan's Policies

Jackson then begins an extensive critique of Ronald Reagan's first term as president. One of the main goals of a national convention was to rally support for the party's candidates and issues. Jackson's speech contributes to that goal with its denunciation of the Reagan administration for having made the world more "miserable" and more "dangerous."

Jackson particularly criticizes the president's policies for having made life harsher for the nation's poor. A severe recession had occurred during 1981 1982, after which an economic recovery began in 1983. Jackson maintains, however, that the poor had experienced none of the benefits of the recovery. He condemns the president's reductions in spending on social programs such as Social Security and school lunch programs as "cruel and unfair." He maintains that the president's program of tax cuts had disproportionately benefited big corporations and wealthy individuals while producing record budget deficits. Jackson then explains that the administration had tried to reduce the deficit with spending cuts on government-subsidized programs for people in need. Jackson echoed other critics, including some members of the president's own party, such as Vice President George H. W. Bush and Representative John Anderson of Illinois, both of whom had challenged Reagan for the Republican presidential nomination in 1980 and warned of dangers ahead if Reagan were to implement his economic plans and policies. According to Jackson, Reaganomics a combination of tax cuts, increases in the defense budget, and reductions in funding for social programs had brought about a "superficial economic recovery" with high unemployment and a national debt that had diminished the quality of life for poor people and had made the U.S. economy heavily dependent on foreign loans.

Jackson also harshly criticizes Reagan's national security policies. He deplores the loss of American lives in the bombing of a U.S. Marine barracks in Lebanon as well as the casualties that occurred during the U.S. invasion of Grenada. He also maintains that the steep increases in defense spending had not strengthened security against Soviet threats. "The danger index," Jackson warns, "has risen for everybody."

Jackson then looks to the future, as he outlines what he believes will be a winning strategy for Democrats. He tells his supporters that they had raised "the right questions," even if they had lost votes about the party's platform. He nonetheless believes that the platform provides "a solid foundation on which to build." The South, in his view, held the key to progressive politics, since there was the potential for a significant number of African Americans and Hispanics to be elected to Congress from that region. Jackson emphasizes that the triumph of one constituency would lead to the success of others, as he declares, "We must all come up together." A key to his vision was enforcement of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, which protected the right of minorities to exercise the franchise and to gain political representation.

Jackson then contrasts his ideas about peace and justice with Reagan administration policies. He asserts that the United States has been "at its best" when it fed hungry people but "at its worst" when it mined the harbors of Nicaragua and tried to overthrow the government of that nation. During Reagan's first term, the Central Intelligence Agency had placed mines in the harbor of Managua, Nicaragua's capital, and provided training and weapons to counter-revolutionaries in an effort to overthrow the Nicaraguan government, which the Reagan administration considered Communist. Jackson also condemns the "moral disgrace" of the Reagan administration's "partnerships" with South Africa. Prior to the end of apartheid in South Africa, a white minority government had enforced a system of racial segregation that oppressed the black majority. Jackson also calls for greater attention to Arab and Palestinian interests in the quest for Middle Eastern peace. Although he avoids specificity in an effort to appease supporters of Israel, he implies that U.S. policy makers have too often used a double standard in judging the human rights policies of Israel and its Arab neighbors. Overall, Jackson asserts that policies that promise peace and jobs and that shift spending from military to social programs will ensure that "the whole nation will come running to us."

◆ Optimism and Hope

In the final section of his address, Jackson preaches a message of optimism: hope for those disappointed that his candidacy had not led to his nomination and hope for Democrats who yearned for victory in the November election. Jackson particularly appeals to young people and their ability to imagine a better future. Much as he uses alliterative phrases earlier in his address, he uses a rhyming slogan to make an important point, when he challenges youth "to put hope in their brains not dope in their veins." Hope and imagination, he counsels them, can be "weapons of survival and progress." He ends by repeating his campaign slogan, "Our time has come." He speaks to those who support his candidacy, telling them, "Our faith, hope, and dreams will prevail." Yet he also addresses all Democrats, when he assures them that in November their time, too, will come. He ends on a note of triumph, confident that his candidacy has proved that African Americans have gained a central role in national politics. He also emphasizes unity, when he declares, "We must leave racial battle ground and come to economic common ground and moral high ground." In the end, Jackson maintains that the vibrant differences of the people within his coalition were less important than their common concerns.

Audience

Jackson's audience for his keynote address consisted of over twenty thousand delegates, alternates, party officials, and other spectators who attended the Democratic National Convention at the Moscone Center in San Francisco, California. The speech occurred during prime-time viewing hours and was carried on major broadcast and cable television channels. Thirty-three million viewers across the United States saw Jackson speak. Included among them were Democrats, Republicans, and independents who had been given an exceptional opportunity to learn more about one of the first African American candidates for president of the United States.

Impact

Jackson's address created great anticipation, and it did not disappoint. "We are seeing something historic," declared ABC News commentator David Brinkley as Jackson was about to begin his address. "Just twenty years ago, Jesse Jackson was leading demonstrations demanding the right to eat at the Woolworth lunch counter." CBS News anchor Dan Rather echoed Brinkley's assessment. "Jackson's address, whatever you think of him," Rather suggested, "may be one for the history books." Many commentators agreed that the speech met those high expectations. "If you are a human being and weren't affected by what you just heard," Florida governor Bob Graham exclaimed, "you may be beyond redemption." Jackson's rhythmic cadences, alliterative phrases, and emotional delivery had a powerful effect on listeners. Delegates applauded, roared, and cried. Lucius J. Barker, an African American delegate from Missouri who supported Jackson, recalled, "Tears rolled down my face … [and] when I looked around, others' eyes were also flowing with tears." A Washington Post editorial asserted that Jackson had given a great speech; a few commentators thought it was the most remarkable speech that had been given at a party convention to that point in the twentieth century.

There were some dissenting reactions, however. A few Jackson delegates, who thought that the party should have acceded to their platform proposals, criticized their candidate for having been too conciliatory in his address. While many Jewish leaders praised Jackson for having helped bridge political differences between blacks and Jews, some still emphasized that he had taken only a first step.

For many African Americans, Jackson's address was a source of pride and satisfaction. The author James Baldwin summarized the importance of Jackson's candidacy and speech by proclaiming, "Nothing will ever again be what it was before." Barker also thought the speech was significant because Jackson had showed that he was "the

1. Jesse Jackson ran for the presidency in 1984 and 1988, and although he surprised some observers with a strong showing, he was never really regarded as an electable candidate? Why?

2. What was Jackson's primary political mission during this time?

3. What political considerations prompted the Democratic Party's nominee, Walter Mondale, to allow Jackson to deliver the convention's keynote address?

4. Jackson's speeches have often been admired for their emotion and soaring rhetoric. What types of rhetorical devices did Jackson use in this speech to sweep his listeners along with him?

5. Compare this speech with Barack Obama's Inaugural Address. In what ways are Jackson and Obama similar? How do they differ—in style, points of view, and the like?

Jesse Jackson's Democratic National Convention Keynote Address

Tonight we come together bound by our faith in a mighty God, with genuine respect and love for our country, and inheriting the legacy of a great Party, the Democratic Party, which is the best hope for redirecting our nation on a more humane, just, and peaceful course.

This is not a perfect party. We are not a perfect people. Yet, we are called to a perfect mission. Our mission: to feed the hungry; to clothe the naked; to house the homeless; to teach the illiterate; to provide jobs for the jobless; and to choose the human race over the nuclear race.

We are gathered here this week to nominate a candidate and adopt a platform which will expand, unify, direct, and inspire our Party and the nation to fulfill this mission. My constituency is the desperate, the damned, the disinherited, the disrespected, and the despised. They are restless and seek relief. They have voted in record numbers. They have invested the faith, hope, and trust that they have in us. The Democratic Party must send them a signal that we care. I pledge my best not to let them down.

There is the call of conscience, redemption, expansion, healing, and unity. Leadership must heed the call of conscience, redemption, expansion, healing, and unity, for they are the key to achieving our mission. Time is neutral and does not change things. With courage and initiative, leaders change things.

No generation can choose the age or circumstance in which it is born, but through leadership it can choose to make the age in which it is born an age of enlightenment, an age of jobs, and peace, and justice. Only leadership that intangible combination of gifts, the discipline, information, circumstance, courage, timing, will and divine inspiration can lead us out of the crisis in which we find ourselves. Leadership can mitigate the misery of our nation. Leadership can part the waters and lead our nation in the direction of the Promised Land. Leadership can lift the boats stuck at the bottom.

I have had the rare opportunity to watch seven men, and then two, pour out their souls, offer their service, and heal and heed the call of duty to direct the course of our nation. There is a proper season for everything. There is a time to sow and a time to reap. There's a time to compete and a time to cooperate.

I ask for your vote on the first ballot as a vote for a new direction for this Party and this nation a vote of conviction, a vote of conscience. But I will be proud to support the nominee of this convention for the Presidency of the United States of America. Thank you.

I have watched the leadership of our party develop and grow. My respect for both Mr. Mondale and Mr. Hart is great. I have watched them struggle with the crosswinds and crossfires of being public servants, and I believe they will both continue to try to serve us faithfully.

I am elated by the knowledge that for the first time in our history a woman, Geraldine Ferraro, will be recommended to share our ticket.

Throughout this campaign, I've tried to offer leadership to the Democratic Party and the nation. If, in my high moments, I have done some good, offered some service, shed some light, healed some wounds, rekindled some hope, or stirred someone from apathy and indifference, or in any way along the way helped somebody, then this campaign has not been in vain.

For friends who loved and cared for me, and for a God who spared me, and for a family who understood, I am eternally grateful.

If, in my low moments, in word, deed or attitude, through some error of temper, taste, or tone, I have caused anyone discomfort, created pain, or revived someone's fears, that was not my truest self. If there were occasions when my grape turned into a raisin and my joy bell lost its resonance, please forgive me. Charge it to my head and not to my heart. My head so limited in its finitude; my heart, which is boundless in its love for the human family. I am not a perfect servant. I am a public servant doing my best against the odds. As I develop and serve, be patient: God is not finished with me yet.

This campaign has taught me much; that leaders must be tough enough to fight, tender enough to cry, human enough to make mistakes, humble enough to admit them, strong enough to absorb the pain, and resilient enough to bounce back and keep on moving.

For leaders, the pain is often intense. But you must smile through your tears and keep moving with the faith that there is a brighter side somewhere.

I went to see Hubert Humphrey three days before he died. He had just called Richard Nixon from his dying bed, and many people wondered why. And I asked him. He said, "Jesse, from this vantage point, the sun is setting in my life, all of the speeches, the political conventions, the crowds, and the great fights are behind me now. At a time like this you are forced to deal with your irreducible essence, forced to grapple with that which is really important to you. And what I've concluded about life," Hubert Humphrey said, "When all is said and done, we must forgive each other, and redeem each other, and move on."

Our party is emerging from one of its most hard fought battles for the Democratic Party's presidential nomination in our history. But our healthy competition should make us better, not bitter. We must use the insight, wisdom, and experience of the late Hubert Humphrey as a balm for the wounds in our Party, this nation, and the world. We must forgive each other, redeem each other, regroup, and move on. Our flag is red, white and blue, but our nation is a rainbow red, yellow, brown, black and white and we're all precious in God's sight.

America is not like a blanket one piece of unbroken cloth, the same color, the same texture, the same size. America is more like a quilt: many patches, many pieces, many colors, many sizes, all woven and held together by a common thread. The white, the Hispanic, the black, the Arab, the Jew, the woman, the native American, the small farmer, the businessperson, the environmentalist, the peace activist, the young, the old, the lesbian, the gay, and the disabled make up the American quilt.

Even in our fractured state, all of us count and fit somewhere. We have proven that we can survive without each other. But we have not proven that we can win and make progress without each other. We must come together.

From Fannie Lou Hamer in Atlantic City in 1964 to the Rainbow Coalition in San Francisco today; from the Atlantic to the Pacific, we have experienced pain but progress, as we ended American apartheid laws. We got public accommodations. We secured voting rights. We obtained open housing, as young people got the right to vote. We lost Malcolm, Martin, Medgar, Bobby, John, and Viola. The team that got us here must be expanded, not abandoned.

Twenty years ago, tears welled up in our eyes as the bodies of Schwerner, Goodman, and Chaney were dredged from the depths of a river in Mississippi. Twenty years later, our communities, black and Jewish, are in anguish, anger, and pain. Feelings have been hurt on both sides. There is a crisis in communications. Confusion is in the air. But we cannot afford to lose our way. We may agree to agree; or agree to disagree on issues; we must bring back civility to these tensions.

We are co-partners in a long and rich religious history the Judeo-Christian traditions. Many blacks and Jews have a shared passion for social justice at home and peace abroad. We must seek a revival of the spirit, inspired by a new vision and new possibilities. We must return to higher ground. We are bound by Moses and Jesus, but also connected with Islam and Mohammed. These three great religions, Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, were all born in the revered and holy city of Jerusalem.

We are bound by Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and Rabbi Abraham Heschel, crying out from their graves for us to reach common ground. We are bound by shared blood and shared sacrifices. We are much too intelligent, much too bound by our Judeo-Christian heritage, much too victimized by racism, sexism, militarism, and anti-Semitism, much too threatened as historical scapegoats to go on divided one from another. We must turn from finger pointing to clasped hands. We must share our burdens and our joys with each other once again. We must turn to each other and not on each other and choose higher ground.

Twenty years later, we cannot be satisfied by just restoring the old coalition. Old wine skins must make room for new wine. We must heal and expand. The Rainbow Coalition is making room for Arab Americans. They, too, know the pain and hurt of racial and religious rejection. They must not continue to be made pariahs. The Rainbow Coalition is making room for Hispanic Americans who this very night are living under the threat of the Simpson-Mazzoli bill; and farm workers from Ohio who are fighting the Campbell Soup Company with a boycott to achieve legitimate workers' rights.

The Rainbow is making room for the Native American, the most exploited people of all, a people with the greatest moral claim amongst us. We support them as they seek the restoration of their ancient land and claim amongst us. We support them as they seek the restoration of land and water rights, as they seek to preserve their ancestral homeland and the beauty of a land that was once all theirs. They can never receive a fair share for all they have given us. They must finally have a fair chance to develop their great resources and to preserve their people and their culture.

The Rainbow Coalition includes Asian Americans, now being killed in our streets scapegoats for the failures of corporate, industrial, and economic policies.

The Rainbow is making room for the young Americans. Twenty years ago, our young people were dying in a war for which they could not even vote. Twenty years later, young America has the power to stop a war in Central America and the responsibility to vote in great numbers. Young America must be politically active in 1984. The choice is war or peace. We must make room for young America.

The Rainbow includes disabled veterans. The color scheme fits in the Rainbow. The disabled have their handicap revealed and their genius concealed; while the able-bodied have their genius revealed and their disability concealed. But ultimately, we must judge people by their values and their contribution. Don't leave anybody out. I would rather have Roosevelt in a wheelchair than Reagan on a horse.

The Rainbow is making room for small farmers. They have suffered tremendously under the Reagan regime. They will either receive 90 percent parity or 100 percent charity. We must address their concerns and make room for them. The Rainbow includes lesbians and gays. No American citizen ought be denied equal protection from the law.

We must be unusually committed and caring as we expand our family to include new members. All of us must be tolerant and understanding as the fears and anxieties of the rejected and the party leadership express themselves in many different ways. Too often what we call hate as if it were some deeply-rooted philosophy or strategy is simply ignorance, anxiety, paranoia, fear, and insecurity. To be strong leaders, we must be long-suffering as we seek to right the wrongs of our Party and our nation. We must expand our Party, heal our Party, and unify our Party. That is our mission in 1984.

We are often reminded that we live in a great nation and we do. But it can be greater still. The Rainbow is mandating a new definition of greatness. We must not measure greatness from the mansion down, but the manger up. Jesus said that we should not be judged by the bark we wear but by the fruit that we bear. Jesus said that we must measure greatness by how we treat the least of these.

President Reagan says the nation is in recovery. Those 90,000 corporations that made a profit last year but paid no federal taxes are recovering. The 37,000 military contractors who have benefited from Reagan's more than doubling of the military budget in peacetime, surely they are recovering. The big corporations and rich individuals who received the bulk of a three-year, multibillion tax cut from Mr. Reagan are recovering. But no such recovery is under way for the least of these.

Rising tides don't lift all boats, particularly those stuck at the bottom. For the boats stuck at the bottom there's a misery index. This Administration has made life more miserable for the poor. Its attitude has been contemptuous. Its policies and programs have been cruel and unfair to working people. They must be held accountable in November for increasing infant mortality among the poor. In Detroit one of the great cities of the western world, babies are dying at the same rate as Honduras, the most underdeveloped nation in our hemisphere. This Administration must be held accountable for policies that have contributed to the growing poverty in America. There are now 34 million people in poverty, 15 percent of our nation. 23 million are White; 11 million Black, Hispanic, Asian, and others mostly women and children. By the end of this year, there will be 41 million people in poverty. We cannot stand idly by. We must fight for a change now.

Under this regime we look at Social Security. The '81 budget cuts included nine permanent Social Security benefit cuts totaling 20 billion over five years. Small businesses have suffered under Reagan tax cuts. Only 18 percent of total business tax cuts went to them; 82 percent to big businesses. Health care under Mr. Reagan has already been sharply cut. Education under Mr. Reagan has been cut 25 percent. Under Mr. Reagan there are now 9.7 million female head families. They represent 16 percent of all families. Half of all of them are poor. 70 percent of all poor children live in a house headed by a woman, where there is no man. Under Mr. Reagan, the Administration has cleaned up only 6 of 546 priority toxic waste dumps. Farmers' real net income was only about half its level in 1979.

Many say that the race in November will be decided in the South. President Reagan is depending on the conservative South to return him to office. But the South, I tell you, is unnaturally conservative. The South is the poorest region in our nation and, therefore, [has] the least to conserve. In his appeal to the South, Mr. Reagan is trying to substitute flags and prayer cloths for food, and clothing, and education, health care, and housing.

Mr. Reagan will ask us to pray, and I believe in prayer. I have come to this way by the power of prayer. But then, we must watch false prophecy. He cuts energy assistance to the poor, cuts breakfast programs from children, cuts lunch programs from children, cuts job training from children, and then says to an empty table, "Let us pray." Apparently, he is not familiar with the structure of a prayer. You thank the Lord for the food that you are about to receive, not the food that just left. I think that we should pray, but don't pray for the food that left. Pray for the man that took the food to leave. We need a change. We need a change in November.

Under Mr. Reagan, the misery index has risen for the poor. The danger index has risen for everybody. Under this administration, we've lost the lives of our boys in Central America and Honduras, in Grenada, in Lebanon, in nuclear standoff in Europe. Under this Administration, one-third of our children believe they will die in a nuclear war. The danger index is increasing in this world. All the talk about the defense against Russia; the Russian submarines are closer, and their missiles are more accurate. We live in a world tonight more miserable and a world more dangerous.

While Reaganomics and Reaganism is talked about often, so often we miss the real meaning. Reaganism is a spirit, and Reaganomics represents the real economic facts of life. In 1980, Mr. George Bush, a man with reasonable access to Mr. Reagan, did an analysis of Mr. Reagan's economic plan. Mr. George Bush concluded that Reagan's plan was "voodoo economics." He was right. Third-party candidate John Anderson said "a combination of military spending, tax cuts, and a balanced budget by '84 would be accomplished with blue smoke and mirrors." They were both right.

Mr. Reagan talks about a dynamic recovery. There's some measure of recovery. Three and a half years later, unemployment has inched just below where it was when he took office in 1981. There are still 8.1 million people officially unemployed; 11 million working only part-time. Inflation has come down, but let's analyze for a moment who has paid the price for this superficial economic recovery.

Mr. Reagan curbed inflation by cutting consumer demand. He cut consumer demand with conscious and callous fiscal and monetary policies. He used the Federal budget to deliberately induce unemployment and curb social spending. He then weighed and supported tight monetary policies of the Federal Reserve Board to deliberately drive up interest rates, again to curb consumer demand created through borrowing. Unemployment reached 10.7 percent. We experienced skyrocketing interest rates. Our dollar inflated abroad. There were record bank failures, record farm foreclosures, record business bankruptcies; record budget deficits, record trade deficits.

Mr. Reagan brought inflation down by destabilizing our economy and disrupting family life. He promised he promised in 1980 a balanced budget. But instead we now have a record 200 billion dollar budget deficit. Under Mr. Reagan, the cumulative budget deficit for his four years is more than the sum total of deficits from George Washington to Jimmy Carter combined. I tell you, we need a change.

How is he paying for these short-term jobs? Reagan's economic recovery is being financed by deficit spending 200 billion dollars a year. Military spending, a major cause of this deficit, is projected over the next five years to be nearly 2 trillion dollars, and will cost about 40,000 dollars for every taxpaying family. When the Government borrows 200 billion dollars annually to finance the deficit, this encourages the private sector to make its money off of interest rates as opposed to development and economic growth.

Even money abroad, we don't have enough money domestically to finance the debt, so we are now borrowing money abroad, from foreign banks, governments and financial institutions: 40 billion dollars in 1983; 70-80 billion dollars in 1984 40 percent of our total; over 100 billion dollars 50 percent of our total in 1985. By 1989, it is projected that 50 percent of all individual income taxes will be going just to pay for interest on that debt. The United States used to be the largest exporter of capital, but under Mr. Reagan we will quite likely become the largest debtor nation.

About two weeks ago, on July the 4th, we celebrated our Declaration of Independence, yet every day supply-side economics is making our nation more economically dependent and less economically free. Five to six percent of our Gross National Product is now being eaten up with President Reagan's budget deficits. To depend on foreign military powers to protect our national security would be foolish, making us dependent and less secure. Yet, Reaganomics has us increasingly dependent on foreign economic sources. This consumer-led but deficit-financed recovery is unbalanced and artificial. We have a challenge as Democrats to point a way out.

Democracy guarantees opportunity, not success.

Democracy guarantees the right to participate, not a license for either a majority or a minority to dominate.

The victory for the Rainbow Coalition in the Platform debates today was not whether we won or lost, but that we raised the right issues. We could afford to lose the vote; issues are non-negotiable. We could not afford to avoid raising the right questions. Our self-respect and our moral integrity were at stake. Our heads are perhaps bloody, but not bowed. Our back is straight. We can go home and face our people. Our vision is clear.

When we think, on this journey from slave-ship to championship, that we have gone from the planks of the Boardwalk in Atlantic City in 1964 to fighting to help write the planks in the platform in San Francisco in '84, there is a deep and abiding sense of joy in our souls in spite of the tears in our eyes. Though there are missing planks, there is a solid foundation upon which to build. Our party can win, but we must provide hope which will inspire people to struggle and achieve; provide a plan that shows a way out of our dilemma and then lead the way.

In 1984, my heart is made to feel glad because I know there is a way out justice. The requirement for rebuilding America is justice. The linchpin of progressive politics in our nation will not come from the North; they, in fact, will come from the South. That is why I argue over and over again. We look from Virginia around to Texas, there's only one black Congressperson out of 115. Nineteen years later, we're locked out of the Congress, the Senate and the Governor's mansion. What does this large black vote mean? Why do I fight to win second primaries and fight gerrymandering and annexation and at-large [elections]. Why do we fight over that? Because I tell you, you cannot hold someone in the ditch unless you linger there with them. Unless you linger there.

If you want a change in this nation, you enforce that Voting Rights Act. We'll get 12 to 20 Black, Hispanics, female and progressive congresspersons from the South. We can save the cotton, but we've got to fight the boll weevils. We've got to make a judgment. We've got to make a judgment.

It is not enough to hope ERA will pass. How can we pass ERA? If Blacks vote in great numbers, progressive Whites win. It's the only way progressive Whites win. If Blacks vote in great numbers, Hispanics win. When Blacks, Hispanics, and progressive Whites vote, women win. When women win, children win. When women and children win, workers win. We must all come up together. We must come up together.

Thank you.

For all of our joy and excitement, we must not save the world and lose our souls. We should never short-circuit enforcing the Voting Rights Act at every level. When one of us rise[s], all of us will rise. Justice is the way out. Peace is the way out. We should not act as if nuclear weaponry is negotiable and debatable.

In this world in which we live, we dropped the bomb on Japan and felt guilty, but in 1984 other folks [have] also got bombs. This time, if we drop the bomb, six minutes later we, too, will be destroyed. It's not about dropping the bomb on somebody. It is about dropping the bomb on everybody. We must choose to develop minds over guided missiles, and think it out and not fight it out. It's time for a change.

Our foreign policy must be characterized by mutual respect, not by gunboat diplomacy, big stick diplomacy, and threats. Our nation at its best feeds the hungry. Our nation at its worst, at its worst, will mine the harbors of Nicaragua, at its worst will try to overthrow their government, at its worst will cut aid to American education and increase the aid to El Salvador; at its worst, our nation will have partnerships with South Africa. That's a moral disgrace. It's a moral disgrace. It's a moral disgrace.

We look at Africa. We cannot just focus on Apartheid in Southern Africa. We must fight for trade with Africa, and not just aid to Africa. We cannot stand idly by and say we will not relate to Nicaragua unless they have elections there, and then embrace military regimes in Africa overthrowing democratic governments in Nigeria and Liberia and Ghana. We must fight for democracy all around the world and play the game by one set of rules.

Peace in this world. Our present formula for peace in the Middle East is inadequate. It will not work. There are 22 nations in the Middle East. Our nation must be able to talk and act and influence all of them. We must build upon Camp David, and measure human rights by one yard stick. In that region we have too many interests and too few friends.

There is a way out jobs. Put America back to work. When I was a child growing up in Greenville, South Carolina, the Reverend Sample used to preach every so often a sermon relating to Jesus. And he said, "If I be lifted up, I'll draw all men unto me." I didn't quite understand what he meant as a child growing up, but I understand a little better now. If you raise up truth, it's magnetic. It has a way of drawing people.

With all this confusion in this Convention, the bright lights and parties and big fun, we must raise up the simple proposition: If we lift up a program to feed the hungry, they'll come running; if we lift up a program to study war no more, our youth will come running; if we lift up a program to put America back to work, and an alternative to welfare and despair, they will come working.

If we cut that military budget without cutting our defense, and use that money to rebuild bridges and put steel workers back to work, and use that money and provide jobs for our cities, and use that money to build schools and pay teachers and educate our children and build hospitals and train doctors and train nurses, the whole nation will come running to us.

As I leave you now, we vote in this convention and get ready to go back across this nation in a couple of days. In this campaign, I've tried to be faithful to my promise. I lived in old barrios, ghettos, and reservations and housing projects. I have a message for our youth. I challenge them to put hope in their brains and not dope in their veins. I told them that like Jesus, I, too, was born in the slum. But just because you're born in the slum does not mean the slum is born in you, and you can rise above it if your mind is made up. I told them in every slum there are two sides. When I see a broken window that's the slummy side. Train some youth to become a glazier that's the sunny side. When I see a missing brick that's the slummy side. Let that child in the union and become a brick mason and build that's the sunny side. When I see a missing door that's the slummy side. Train some youth to become a carpenter that's the sunny side. And when I see the vulgar words and hieroglyphics of destitution on the walls that's the slummy side. Train some youth to become a painter, an artist that's the sunny side.

We leave this place looking for the sunny side because there's a brighter side somewhere. I'm more convinced than ever that we can win. We will vault up the rough side of the mountain. We can win. I just want young America to do me one favor, just one favor. Exercise the right to dream. You must face reality that which is. But then dream of a reality that ought to be that must be. Live beyond the pain of reality with the dream of a bright tomorrow. Use

"I was aware that he could affect my future career and did not wish to burn all my bridges."

Overview

Anita Hill's opening statement in 1991 at the proceedings conducted by the Senate Judiciary Committee regarding the nomination of Clarence Thomas to the U.S. Supreme Court was a bold and revealing account of sexual harassment in the workplace that also brought up issues related to gender discrimination and racism. During the course of the grueling Senate confirmation hearing, startling accusations of sexual harassment were raised by Hill against Thomas. A law professor at the University of Oklahoma who had been one of Thomas's coworkers, Hill only reluctantly came forward with detailed allegations. Her statement and subsequent testimony, which were broadcast on national television, provided a public glimpse into the confirmation process as well as the complex web of issues surrounding sexual harassment, gender discrimination, and racial stereotyping. Despite the controversy over his nomination, Thomas was confirmed by a close vote on the Senate floor, and he was sworn in as the 106th U.S. Supreme Court justice on October 23, 1991. He became only the second African American to hold the position, replacing the first African American Supreme Court justice, Thurgood Marshall.

Hill's opening statement was historically and culturally significant in a number of ways. It showed that as an issue, sexual harassment transcended considerations solely about race, and it exposed the profound damage that could be inflicted by verbal rather than physical sexual harassment. Moreover, Hill's account demonstrated that the "he said, she said" dilemma posed by many sexual harassment claims could be a difficult hurdle to overcome. Hill's statement also gave expression to the gender and racial discrimination she had endured and how they had been important factors in her decision to come forward. The statement was also significant because it pitted two African Americans against each other in the public eye and provoked widespread disagreement in the black community.

Context

On June 27, 1991, Thurgood Marshall, the first African American justice to serve on the Supreme Court, announced that he was retiring. Marshall had been a prominent figure in the civil rights movement prior to his appointment to the nation's highest court. As chief counsel for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Marshall had argued and won the landmark civil rights case Brown v. Board of Education. During his twenty-four-year tenure on the Supreme Court, the liberal Marshall championed constitutional protections of individual and civil rights. As a result of Marshall's resignation, President George H. W. Bush was charged with the difficult task of replacing him.

At the time of Marshall's pronouncement, the composition of the Supreme Court was shifting. During the administrations of both the elder Bush and Ronald Reagan, when a vacancy occurred at the Supreme Court, the presidents had chosen to fill it with a conservative justice. In 1987 President Reagan attempted to nominate Judge Robert Bork, a conservative, to the Supreme Court. However, key Democratic members of the Senate Judiciary Committee were concerned about Bork's views and vehemently opposed his nomination. As a result, Bork's nomination was easily defeated when it came to a vote in the Senate. Mindful of what had happened to Bork, President Bush did not want his nominee to be similarly defeated, but he also did not want to replace Marshall with a liberal-leaning justice.

Republicans felt that Judge Clarence Thomas, who had served on the federal court of appeals since 1990, was the best person to replace the retiring Marshall. Unlike Marshall, Thomas was a conservative African American male who had sharply critiqued affirmative action. Although Thomas was an anomaly among African American legal professionals, Republicans believed that by stressing his humble beginnings in Pin Point, Georgia, he would eventually gain African American support. Thomas was a Yale Law School graduate, who from 1981 to 1982 had been the assistant secretary for civil rights in the Department of Education and from 1982 to 1990 had served as chairman of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC). Conservative Washington insiders knew of Thomas from his government service and had suggested him to President Bush.

Civil right activists, leaders of civil rights groups, and liberal organizations were concerned about Thomas's disdain for affirmative action and other progressive causes. Members of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People overwhelmingly opposed his nomination, and the National Abortion Rights Action League was concerned about his views on abortion, especially his take on the Roe v. Wade decision (1973), granting women wider rights to abortion. Moreover, Thomas's lack of judicial experience was a point of contention for the American Bar Association. Typically, the bar association rated Supreme Court justices "well qualified." Because of Thomas's limited experience on the federal court of appeals, however, the bar association gave Thomas only a "qualified" rating. In response, the White House obtained support from conservative groups to mount an attack against liberal groups that opposed Thomas. This campaign helped bolster Thomas's reputation in the right-wing community but did little to sway his many critics.

In August 1991, one month before the start of Thomas's Senate confirmation hearing, newspaper reporters and Washington insiders began to hear rumors that centered on Anita Hill, a former coworker of Thomas's, who claimed that she had been sexually harassed by him repeatedly. As the confirmation hearing neared, opponents of Thomas contacted Hill, a University of Oklahoma law professor, to determine the veracity of her claims. At first, Hill was hesitant to talk to reporters and staff members of the Senate Judiciary Committee, fearing that her anonymity would be jeopardized. She was first contacted by Gail Laster, counsel to the Judiciary Committee's Labor Subcommittee. Laster asked Hill generally about the rumors of sexual harassment; Hill did not tell Laster about the harassing behavior she herself had endured at the EEOC. Ricki Seidman, chief investigator of the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee, twice communicated with Hill about the sexual harassment allegations. During her second conversation with Seidman, Hill told her some details of Thomas's behavior but also expressed her desire for confidentiality.

James Brudney, chief counsel to the Judiciary Committee's Labor Subcommittee, chaired by Senator Howard Metzenbaum, next contacted Hill about the rumors. After Hill explained the details of Thomas's conduct to Brudney, he spoke to Metzenbaum, who suggested contacting Harriet Grant of the office of Senator Joseph Biden, chairman of the Judiciary Committee. In the weeks prior to Hill's testimony before the Judiciary Committee, both Grant and Brudney spoke to Hill about revealing her information to the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI). Eventually, Hill agreed to be interviewed by the FBI and also submitted a written, notarized statement to the Senate Judiciary Committee memorializing her experiences with Thomas. Thereafter, the FBI report on Hill was submitted to some committee members.

Thomas began the confirmation process on September 10, 1991. Each senator on the Judiciary Committee gave an opening statement that either supported Thomas or expressed concerns about his past. For the most part, the committee, which consisted of seven Democrats and six Republicans, was divided along party lines. The committee's Democrats were much harder on Thomas than were their Republican counterparts, questioning him about his past speeches and articles, his views on natural law, decisions made while at the EEOC, and abortion rights. Typically, after a Democratic member finished questioning Thomas, a Republican member asked him an easier question in order to repair his credibility with the committee. During the initial confirmation hearing, Thomas was unaware of Hill's allegations. He endured the Senate Judiciary Committee's questioning for five days before other witnesses were called.

One of Thomas's key opponents was Sylvia Law, a professor of constitutional law in the areas of personal and privacy rights, who was concerned about Thomas's conservative views on women's reproductive rights. Other opponents included Molly Yard, president of the National Organization of Women; representatives from the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations; Kate Michelman, executive director of the National Abortion Rights Action League; Faye Wattleton, president of the Planned Parenthood Federation of America; and Julius Chambers, from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People's Legal Defense and Educational Fund. Speaking in support of Thomas, Guido Calabresi, then the dean of Yale Law School, praised his ability to remain independent and his potential to grow with the Supreme Court. Thomas's proponents also included Robert Woodson, president of the National Center for Neighborhood Enterprise; John E. Palmer, representing the Heartland Coalition for the Confirmation of Judge Clarence Thomas; and the Republican Black Caucus chair George C. Dumas.

Only days before the committee vote, Thomas was informed of the FBI report claiming that he had sexually harassed Hill when they both had worked at the Department of Education and EEOC. Thomas emphatically denied Hill's accusations, but the damage had been done. When the Judiciary Committee voted on the confirmation on September 27, the result was a seven-to-seven tie, and the nomination was sent to the Senate floor with no endorsement. Meanwhile, the news media took hold of the sexual harassment rumors and made Anita Hill a household name. The salacious details of the harassment were cast into the world of public opinion. In turn, the Senate, at the request of Thomas, delayed its confirmation vote. Finally, on October 11, 1991, Hill and Thomas appeared in front of the Senate Judiciary Committee to tell their sides of the story.

About the Author

The thirteenth child born to a poor farm family, Anita Faye Hill was born in 1956 in Okmulgee County, Oklahoma. Her father, Albert Hill, and mother, Erma Hill, both worked on the farm. From a young age, Anita Hill knew that hard work and dedication would be the keys to her success. She attended integrated schools and was shielded from racial tensions for much of her childhood. After she graduated from high school, Hill attended Oklahoma State University and graduated with honors in 1977. She received a JD degree from Yale Law School in 1980.

Hill's initial job out of law school was at the Washington, D.C., law firm Wald, Harkrader & Ross. While working for the law firm, she met Clarence Thomas. Soon afterward, in 1981, Thomas was appointed the assistant secretary for civil rights in the Department of Education, and he asked Hill if she would become his assistant. She accepted the job offer, and she followed Thomas to the EEOC when he became its chairman.

In 1983, Hill left the EEOC and took a position as an assistant law professor at the O.W. Colburn School of Law at Oral Roberts University. She subsequently became a professor at the College of Law at the University of Oklahoma, a position that she held at the time she appeared before the Senate Judiciary Committee. After testifying before the committee, she returned to her position at the University of Oklahoma. She was asked to speak at a number of events about her experience at the hearing and about sexual harassment. After controversy over a proposed and sponsored professorship in her name, she left the University of Oklahoma in 1996. As of 2010 she was employed at Brandeis University's Heller School for Social Policy and Management as a professor of social policy, law, and women's studies.

Explanation and Analysis of Document

This document contains four distinct topics: Hill's early life and career, the details of Thomas's harassing behavior, her decision not to come forward, and her subsequent decision to tell her story. Hill was also concerned about silently held biases against her as a result of the sexual harassment claim. It was important for her to make the members of the Senate Judiciary Committee, all of them white men, understand that women do not intentionally invite sexually harassing behavior. As a further obstacle to stating her case, Hill's legal career placed her, in the opinion of the committee, in a different category of women from those in many harassment cases, because, from a legal standpoint, she must have known right from wrong with respect to her professional relationship with Thomas.

◆ Early Life and Career

Hill's statement begins with a brief discussion of her educational experiences and her background, emphasizing her parents' struggles, her family ties, and her personal religious beliefs. She touches on her childhood poverty and her educational success at Oklahoma State University and Yale Law School. In addition, she notes her early work experiences at Wald, Harkrader & Ross, the Office for Civil Rights within the Department of Education, and the EEOC. All this background information was meant to demonstrate to the fourteen committee members that she was an intelligent, hardworking, and credible witness. Furthermore, Hill had to make herself appear first and foremost as an individual giving testimony, rather than emphasize being a woman or black. Indeed, she never mentions the words gender discrimination or racism; however, her background information reveals that she was concerned about both, specifically, the obstacles of poverty and racial prejudice that many African American women have had to overcome. Hill was thus portraying herself as someone who had overcome her disadvantaged childhood and become a successful lawyer.

◆ Details of Harassing Behavior

The second part of Hill's statement to the Senate Judiciary Committee focuses on explaining what constituted harassing behavior by Clarence Thomas. Hill starts with a discussion of the harassment that had occurred while she worked as Thomas's assistant in the Office for Civil Rights at the Department of Education. She states that at first Thomas did not exhibit such behavior toward her; however, she then observes that he began to harass her by repeatedly asking her to go out with him socially and even describing to her in detail pornographic films he had seen. After Hill provides these examples, she explains that she told Thomas that she did not want to jeopardize their working relationship and that sexual topics of conversation made her feel uncomfortable. Hill then notes how Thomas's harassing behavior ended before their transfer to the EEOC.

While he was chairman of the EEOC, Hill testifies, Thomas resumed making inappropriate overtures toward her. She describes how he started to make comments about her appearance and whether her clothes were "more or less sexually attractive." Again, she rebuffed Thomas's advances; however, he wanted an explanation as to why she would not go out with him. Hill then details specific episodes of Thomas's harassing behavior, including a conversation he had with her about his sexual prowess. As a result of Thomas's behavior, Hill felt severe stress while she was working at the EEOC.

Throughout her description of Thomas's behavior, Hill relates not only how she repeatedly declined Thomas's invitations but also how he continued to approach her and even questioned why she would not go out with him. These examples support Hill's allegations of workplace sexual harassment and, more important, show how she had become psychologically victimized how she had come to blame herself for having been in such a situation. Indeed, she could have told the Senate Judiciary Committee only the details of Thomas's behavior, but that alone might not have been sufficient information to suggest sexual harassment. Thus, she takes the extra step of explaining that regardless of how she tried to ward off Thomas's advances, he would not listen to her. Hill became both a victim and her own advocate in order to clarify her allegations to the male members of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Incidentally, Hill's detailed account of Thomas's descriptions of pornographic films and his sexual prowess can be seen as perpetuating stereotypes about African Americans. It is possible that Hill had anticipated that some white male members of the Senate Judiciary Committee would not have given her statement the same weight if she had omitted these details. Although the vivid descriptions Hill gave to the committee could be perceived as reinforcing sexual myths about African Americans, she hardly could have been expected to withhold accurate testimony or make it less graphic for fear of contributing to racial stereotypes.

◆ Decision Not to Come Forward

The third section of Hill's statement focuses on her initial decision not to come forward. She begins by explaining her fear of reprisal from Thomas whenever she chose not to go out with him. These fears included being given less important work assignments and even the possibility of dismissal from her job. Because of these fears, Hill started to look for another job; however, the opportunities were minimal. She eventually found another position and informed Thomas. Hill then pointedly notes to the committee how she agreed to a final dinner with Thomas, during which "he said that if I ever told anyone about his behavior toward me it could ruin his career."

Hill's initial decision not to come forward and expose Thomas reflected a former trend in female reporting of workplace sexual harassment claims. In the early 1980s, sexual harassment claims by women were not prevalent, and these claims were often extremely difficult to prove. Although laws and regulations were already in place to prevent workplace sexual harassment, the support needed to provide credibility to a claim was difficult to obtain. The Civil Rights Act of 1964, signed by President Lyndon Johnson, was the first piece of legislation enacted to help prevent workplace sexual harassment. Title VII of that act prohibits discrimination based upon race, color, religion, national origin, or sex. In 1972 Congress passed the Equal Employment Opportunity Act, which amended the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and established the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. The EEOC was given the authority to prevent persons from engaging in unlawful employment discrimination practices.

In 1980, the EEOC promulgated regulations titled Guidelines on Discrimination Because of Sex. These regulations helped to further define sexual harassment and what were considered acceptable workplace practices. By the mid-1980s, eighteen states had enacted legislation that specifically prohibited sexual harassment. In addition, as many as twenty-eight other states had laws that prohibited sex discrimination. An important decision by the U.S. Supreme Court, Meritor Savings Bank v. Vinson (1986), made it easier to prove sexual harassment under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Unfortunately for Hill, that case was decided after her experiences of sexual harassment, which had occurred during the early 1980s.

Hill's decision not to leave either the Department of Education or the EEOC as well as to follow Thomas from the Department of Education to the EEOC was likely the result of both gender and race discrimination. First, employment opportunities for female attorneys in the 1980s were not abundant. Female attorneys were often relegated to lower-level positions in comparison to those held by their male peers. Second, workplace racial discrimination was still an obstacle in the 1980s, despite laws and regulations that prohibited it. Hill was an African American female attorney working in a primarily white male world. In her statement she opines that at the time it would have been hard for her to find a position outside the Department of Education or EEOC. Thus, the possibility of being discriminated against when applying for other jobs was a significant factor not only in Hill's decision to follow Thomas to the EEOC but also in her delay in seeking other employment.

◆ Decision to Come Forward

The final section of Hill's statement explains her decision to testify about the sexual harassment claims. Hill concedes that she had not felt comfortable coming forward and making her allegations public to the Senate Judiciary Committee and the world. She also admits that her delay in coming forward might have been the result of poor judgment. Finally, Hill testifies that she eventually decided to come forward with the information because she had a duty to tell the truth.

Audience

Hill's comments in the final paragraph of her statement reflect the extreme degree of public scrutiny she knew she would have to endure. The broadcast media was captivated by the Anita Hill Clarence Thomas controversy. Accordingly, the audience for Hill's opening statement was anyone interested in Thomas's confirmation hearing, whether for professional reasons or merely out of curiosity. More specifically, Hill's statement was watched with interest by women and by members of the African American community. In certain respects, her decision to come forward and testify in front of the Judiciary Committee eradicated many gender stereotypes surrounding women. Stereotypes that describe female behavior include passivity, a pleasing nature, and a demeanor that is emotional and feminine. While feminist groups have worked hard to change how women are perceived in the workplace and media, not all women believe that these stereotypes are wrong. In this case, many women viewed Hill's delayed decision to expose Thomas's harassing behavior as an incorrect course of action. In particular, some African American women questioned why it had taken her so long to come forward. In addition, these same women also believed that she should have left her position in the Department of Education once the harassment started. Many African American women also thought Hill should have never raised allegations against Thomas because he was a prominent and successful African American male. Thomas's conservatism, particularly his opposition to abortion and disbelief in affirmative action policies, did bolster support for him in the conservative community. Thus, regardless of Hill's allegations against Thomas, many women supported his nomination.

Hill's choice to come forward did not, however, anger everyone. She was seen by many as a pioneer in the fight against workplace discrimination. Even though it had taken her years to tell her story, she finally had come forward under intense public scrutiny; because of that, many recognized her courage and supported her. Unwittingly, she became a role model for women. For instance, Hill's missteps in coming forward demonstrated that immediate action should be taken against a sexual harasser. Her narrative of what had transpired with Thomas in the Department of Education and the EEOC also helped people learn to gauge what actions were or were not appropriate in the workplace. Most important, Hill's stated belief that she was doing what was right, regardless of the outcome, was an important step in gender equality. In the end, Supreme Court historians and others who write about the Court and the judicial confirmation process, as well as researchers interested in issues of gender and race, will continue to have an interest in Hill's statement.

Impact

Hill's opening statement and testimony became the focal point of Thomas's confirmation hearing, even though she appeared before the Senate Judiciary Committee toward the end of the hearing process, after the committee had voted on whether to recommend Thomas's nomination. Once Hill made her opening statement, she spent the remainder of October 11, 1991, being grilled by the members of the committee. In particular, she was asked many questions about her personal life that had little to do with the sexual harassment claim. Senator Arlen Specter engaged in a concerted effort to discredit Hill. Referring to her statement to the FBI and her testimony to the Senate Judiciary Committee, he pointed out discrepancies between the two and questioned why certain facts were not included in the FBI report. He inquired further as to why Hill did not come forward with her sexual harassment claim until Thomas's confirmation hearing. In addition, Specter introduced an affidavit from John Doggett, a friend to both Hill and Thomas, in which Doggett claimed that Hill was unstable and had fantasized about him. Specter also asked Hill questions related to the number of times she and Thomas had spoken since she left the EEOC; in doing this, Specter attempted to insinuate that Hill was in contact with Thomas for more than professional reasons.

Among the others questioning Hill, Senator Howell Heflin, in order to call her testimony into doubt, accused her of fantasizing about Thomas. Some committee members intimated that her story should be presumed to be fictional because she had chosen to come forward late in the confirmation process. When Hill's testimony was complete, Thomas, angered by her accusations, testified and expressed his disdain for the proceedings as "high-tech lynching for uppity blacks." At that point, the confirmation hearing turned into a "he said, she said" nightmare for both Thomas and Hill, during which the purpose of the confirmation hearing, namely, to determine whether Thomas was the best person for the job, was lost. Eventually, Thomas was confirmed by a Senate vote of fifty-two to forty-eight, one of the narrowest such votes in U.S. history.

Hill's testimony before the committee captivated and educated audiences on issues surrounding sexual harassment in the workplace. Reporting of sexual harassment rose after Anita Hill came forward, as claims of sexual harassment began to be taken more seriously. Furthermore, her testimony made employers more aware of what constituted sexually harassing behavior, encouraging employers to monitor employee interactions more effectively and thus prevent sexually harassing behavior. In addition, many employers began to make it easier for victims of alleged sexual harassment to come forward without having to reveal their identities. This commitment to anonymity assuaged victims' fears of accuser retaliation and job dismissal. Many companies changed their personnel policies to ensure that all employees would comply with sexual harassment laws and regulations.

An unfortunate aspect of the Thomas confirmation hearing was that the process itself, which could have been relatively straightforward, turned into a public spectacle. Once the Senate Judiciary Committee had been informed that Thomas, a conservative African American, was President Bush's Supreme Court nominee, Democratic and Republican committee members set out to find information that would either help or hurt his chances of confirmation. Democrats on the committee had become aware of Hill's allegations before any Republicans had been informed; therefore, Thomas and Hill became engrossed in a political clash between Democrats and Republicans. The proceedings became unnecessarily acrimonious, as committee members tried to separate truth from lies with respect to Hill's charges of sexual harassment. As a result, the testimonies of both Thomas and Hill were not taken seriously, and the confirmation process was seen as a failure.

The proceedings had a massive impact on the African American community. Two successful African Americans were pitted against each other. On one hand was Clarence Thomas, a conservative who for the most part disliked affirmative action. On the other was Anita Hill, a law professor who some perceived as having turned on "one of her own." Indeed, the conflict over whom to believe created more questions than answers. Although Thomas was uncomfortable with affirmation action, he was nevertheless a nominee to the Supreme Court. Not many African Americans had been offered such a prestigious honor, and many believed that Thomas was a good model of what an African American man could achieve. In addition, many empathized with the struggle against racism and discrimination that Thomas had navigated successfully. Accordingly, some African Americans were willing to ignore Thomas's shortcomings in favor of what they thought his confirmation could do to promote positive views of African Americans.

Like Thomas, Hill had overcome racism and discrimination throughout her career. Notwithstanding, she did not

Questions for Further Study

1. Describe the politics that surrounded the Clarence Thomas nomination. Who supported him and why? What groups opposed his nomination and why?

2. To what extent do you believe that the personal views of a nominee for a judgeship are relevant to that person's qualifications for the job?

3. Many observers at the time simply disbelieved Hill's allegations. How credible do you find Hill's testimony?

4. During the administration of President Bill Clinton, which began shortly after Thomas's ascension to the Supreme Court, numerous allegations were made of sexual misconduct on the president's part, including a sexual relationship with a young White House intern. Yet many of the same people who vigorously opposed Thomas supported the president or at least remained quiet. What would account for the difference?

5. In 1987 Robert Bork's nomination to the Supreme Court failed, in large part because of a rapid, well-organized, and well-financed campaign to discredit him, despite his extensive qualifications (including a faculty position at the Yale University law school, where Anita Hill was one of his students). The result was the emergence of a slang term, "to bork," defined as "to defame or vilify a person systematically, especially in the mass media, usually with the aim of preventing his or her appointment to public office." Do you believe that Thomas was "borked"? Why or why not?

fare as well as Thomas in African American public opinion. For example, there was a male-versus-female difference of opinion about her among African Americans. Some believed that Hill, as a black woman, should have remained quiet and not publicly revealed that she had been sexually harassed by a black man. Furthermore, Hill's accomplishments as a black woman were not accorded the same weight as Thomas's achievements. This caused confusion as to who, either Hill or Thomas, was best equipped to advance the interests of the African American community, and the two were inadvertently caught in a political nightmare that had both racial and gender ramifications. For these reasons, Hill's opening statement will have a lasting imprint on American history.

Anita Hill's Opening Statement at the Senate Confirmation Hearing of Clarence Thomas

Mr. Chairman, Senator Thurmond, Members of the Committee, my name is Anita F. Hill, and I am a Professor of Law at the University of Oklahoma. I was born on a farm in Okmulge, Oklahoma in 1956, the 13th child, and had my early education there. My father is Albert Hill, a farmer of that area. My mother's name is Erma Hill; she is also a farmer and housewife. My childhood was the childhood of both work and poverty; but it was one of solid family affection as represented by my parents who are with me as I appear here today. I was reared in a religious atmosphere in the Baptist faith and I have been a member of the Antioch Baptist Church in Tulsa since 1983. It remains a warm part of my life at the present time.

For my undergraduate work I went to Oklahoma State University and graduated in 1977. I am attaching to this statement my resume with further details of my education. I graduated from the university with academic honors and proceeded to the Yale Law School where I received my J.D. degree in 1980.

Upon graduation from law school I became a practicing lawyer with the Washington, D.C. firm of Wald, Harkrader & Ross. In 1981, I was introduced to now Judge Thomas by a mutual friend. Judge Thomas told me that he anticipated a political appointment shortly and asked if I might be interested in working in that office. He was in fact appointed as Assistant Secretary of Education, in which capacity he was the Director of the Office for Civil Rights. After he was in that post, he asked if I would become his assistant and I did then accept that position. In my early period there I had two major projects. The first was an article I wrote for Judge Thomas' signature on "Education of Minority Students." The second was the organization of a seminar on high risk students, which was abandoned because Judge Thomas transferred to the EEOC before that project was completed.

During this period at the Department of Education, my working relationship with Judge Thomas was positive. I had a good deal of responsibility as well as independence. I thought that he respected my work and that he trusted my judgment. After approximately three months of working together, he asked me to go out with him socially. I declined and explained to him that I thought that it would only jeopardize what, at the time, I considered to be a very good working relationship. I had a normal social life with other men outside of the office and, I believed then, as now, that having a social relationship with a person who was supervising my work would be ill-advised. I was very uncomfortable with the idea and told him so.

I thought that by saying "no" and explaining my reasons, my employer would abandon his social suggestions. However, to my regret, in the following few weeks he continued to ask me out on several occasions. He pressed me to justify my reasons for saying "no" to him. These incidents took place in his office or mine. They were in the form of private conversations which would not have been overheard by anyone else.

My working relationship became even more strained when Judge Thomas began to use work situations to discuss sex. On these occasions he would call me into his office for reports on education issues and projects or he might suggest that because of time pressures we go to lunch at a government cafeteria. After a brief discussion of work, he would turn the conversation to discussion of sexual matters. His conversations were very vivid. He spoke about acts that he had seen in pornographic films involving such matters as women having sex with animals and films showing group sex or rape scenes. He talked about pornographic materials depicting individuals with large penises or large breasts involved in various sex acts. On several occasions Thomas told me graphically of his own sexual prowess.

Because I was extremely uncomfortable talking about sex with him at all and particularly in such a graphic way, I told him that I did not want to talk about those subjects. I would also try to change the subject to education matters or to nonsexual personal matters such as his background or beliefs. My efforts to change the subject were rarely successful.

Throughout the period of these conversations, he also from time-to-time asked me for social engagements. My reaction to these conversations was to avoid having them by eliminating opportunities for us to engage in extended conversations. This was difficult because I was his only assistant at the Office for Civil Rights. During the latter part of my time at the Department of Education, the social pressures and any conversations of this offensive kind ended. I began both to believe and hope that our working relationship could be on a proper, cordial and professional base.

When Judge Thomas was made Chairman of the EEOC, I needed to face the question of whether to go with him. I was asked to do so. I did. The work itself was interesting and at that time it appeared that the sexual overtures which had so troubled me had ended. I also faced the realistic fact that I had no alternative job. While I might have gone back to private practice, perhaps in my old firm or at another, I was dedicated to civil rights work and my first choice was to be in that field. Moreover, the Department of Education itself was a dubious venture; President Reagan was seeking to abolish the entire Department at that time.

For my first months at the EEOC, where I continued as an assistant to Judge Thomas, there were no sexual conversations or overtures. However, during the Fall and Winter of 1982, these began again. The comments were random and ranged from pressing me about why I didn't go out with him to remarks about my personal appearance. I remember his saying that someday I would have to give him the real reason that I wouldn't go out with him. He began to show real displeasure in his tone of voice, his demeanor and his continued pressure for an explanation. He commented on what I was wearing in terms of whether it made me more or less sexually attractive. The incidents occurred in his inner office at the EEOC.

One of the oddest episodes I remember was an occasion in which Thomas was drinking a Coke in his office. He got up from the table at which we were working, went over to his desk to get the Coke, looked at the can, and said, "Who has put pubic hair on my Coke?" On other occasions he referred to the size of his own penis as being larger than normal and he also spoke on some occasions of the pleasures he had given to women with oral sex.

At this point, late 1982, I began to feel severe stress on the job. I began to be concerned that Clarence Thomas might take it out on me by downgrading me or not giving me important assignments. I also thought that he might find an excuse for dismissing me. In January of 1983, I began looking for another job. I was handicapped because I feared that if he found out, he might make it difficult for me to find other employment and I might be dismissed from the job I had. Another factor that made my search more difficult was that this was a period of a government hiring freeze. In February, 1983, I was hospitalized for five days on an emergency basis for an acute stomach pain which I attributed to stress on the job. Once out of the hospital, I became more committed to find other employment and sought further to minimize my contact with Thomas. This became easier when Allyson Duncan became office director because most of my work was handled with her and I had contact with Clarence Thomas mostly in staff meetings.

In the Spring of 1983, an opportunity to teach law at Oral Roberts University opened up. I agreed to take the job in large part because of my desire to escape the pressures I felt at the EEOC due to Thomas. When I informed him that I was leaving in July, I recall that his response was that now I "would no longer have an excuse for not going out with" him. I told him that I still preferred not to do so. At some time after that meeting, he asked if he could take me to dinner at the end of my term. When I declined, he assured me that the dinner was a professional courtesy only and not a social invitation. I reluctantly agreed to accept that invitation but only if it was at the very end of a workday. On, as I recall, the last day of my employment at the EEOC in the summer of 1983, I did have dinner with Clarence Thomas. We went directly from work to a restaurant near the office. We talked about the work I had done both at Education and at EEOC. He told me that he was pleased with all of it except for an article and speech that I done for him when we were at the Office for Civil Rights. Finally, he made a comment which I vividly remember. He said that if I ever told anyone about his behavior toward me it could ruin his career. This was not an apology nor was there any explanation. That was his last remark about the possibility of our going out or reference to his behavior.

In July 1983, I left the Washington, D.C. area and have had minimal contacts with Judge Clarence Thomas since.

I am of course aware from the press that some question has been raised about conversations I had with Judge Clarence Thomas after I left the EEOC. From 1983 until today I have seen Judge Clarence Thomas only twice. On one occasion I needed to get a reference from him and on another he made a public appearance in Tulsa. On one occasion he called me at home and we had an inconsequential conversation. On one other occasion he called me without reaching me and I returned the call without reaching him and nothing came of it. I have, on at least three occasions been asked to act as a conduit for others.

I knew his secretary, Diane Holt, well when I was with the EEOC. There were occasions on which I spoke to her and on some of those occasions undoubtedly I passed on some casual comment to Thomas.

There was a series of calls in the first three months of 1985 occasioned by a group in Tulsa which wished to have a civil rights conference; they wanted Thomas to be the speaker, and enlisted my assistance for this purpose. I did call in January and February to no effect and finally suggested to the person directly involved, Susan Cahall, that she put the matter back into her own hands and call directly. She did do that in March of 1985. In connection with that March invitation to Tulsa by Ms. Cahall, which was for a seminar conference some research was needed; I was asked to try to get the research work and did attempt to do so by a call to Thomas. There was another call about another possible conference in July of 1985.

In August of 1987, I was in Washington and I did call Diane Holt. In the course of this conversation she asked me how long I was going to be in town and I told her; she recorded it as August 15; it was in fact August 20. She told me about Thomas' marriage and I did say "congratulate him."

It is only after a great deal of agonizing consideration that I am able to talk of these unpleasant matters to anyone but my closest friends. Telling the world is the most difficult experience of my life. I was aware that he could affect my future career and did not wish to burn all my bridges. I may have used poor judgment; perhaps I should have taken angry or even militant steps both when I was in the agency or after I left it, but I must confess to the world that the course I took seemed to me to be the better as well as the easier approach. I declined any comment to newspapers, but later, when Senate staff asked me about these matters, I felt I had a duty to report. I have no personal vendetta against Clarence Thomas. I seek only to provide the Committee with information which it may regard as relevant. It would have been more comfortable to remain silent. I took no initiative to inform anyone. But when I was asked by a representative of this committee to report my experience, I felt that I had no other choice but to tell the truth.

A. Leon Higginbotham: "An Open Letter to Justice Clarence Thomas from a Federal Judicial Colleague"

"The choice as to whether you will build a decisional record of true greatness or of mere mediocrity is yours."

Overview

On November 29, 1991, Judge A. Leon Higginbotham wrote an open letter to the newest Supreme Court justice titled "An Open Letter to Justice Clarence Thomas from a Federal Judicial Colleague" and published it in the University of Pennsylvania Law Review in January 1992. Clarence Thomas was confirmed as the 106th Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court on October 15, 1991. His nomination and confirmation provoked great controversy. One aspect of that controversy was his well-known conservative judicial philosophy, which was compounded by the fact that he was nominated to replace Justice Thurgood Marshall, one of the heroes of the civil rights movement, the first African American appointed to the Court, and one of the Court's "liberal lions."

In his letter, Higginbotham stated his belief that Thomas, as the second African American ever to serve on the Supreme Court, bore a unique and grave responsibility and had the opportunity to "preserve or dilute the gains this country has made in the struggle for equality." Higginbotham's letter criticized Thomas's judicial philosophy and Thomas himself as being insensitive to concerns about equality and divorced from the long history of discrimination in the United States.

Context

President George H. W. Bush's nomination of Clarence Thomas to the Supreme Court caused immediate and sustained controversy. The criticisms centered on three areas: his relative lack of judicial experience, his conservative legal views, and, most explosively, allegations of sexual harassment leveled against him by Anita Hill. Because Thomas had served as a federal appellate judge for only two years prior to his nomination to the Supreme Court, critics charged that he was not the most qualified candidate for the open seat on the Court. Critics also opposed Thomas's nomination because of his conservative legal philosophy, in particular because of his opposition to affirmative action and concerns about whether he would vote to reverse Roe v. Wade, protecting the right to privacy with regard to abortion.

Higginbotham's "Open Letter" addressed Thomas's legal philosophy regarding equality and individual rights. Higginbotham's letter came toward the end of his own lengthy career as a prominent lawyer, jurist, and legal scholar. As a scholar, he had immersed himself in American legal history with regard to issues of race and equality, writing two significant books and over two dozen law review articles on issues of race, civil rights, American legal history, judging, and comparative constitutional law. He was also part of the generation of African Americans who lived through institutionalized discrimination and segregation as well as the civil rights period that followed in the 1950s and 1960s, when the force of the law turned from exclusion to inclusion. As the Supreme Court moved in a more conservative direction in the 1980s and 1990s, Higginbotham wrote in the "Open Letter" that he wondered if Thomas would be part of the Court's continued retreat from rulings aimed at protecting minorities, women, and the poor.

About the Author

Judge A. Leon Higginbotham is often described as a giant in American law, both because of his physical stature (he stood six feet, six inches) and, more important, because of his intellect, tirelessness, and impact on the legal profession. Yet he came from very humble beginnings. Aloysius Leon Higginbotham was born on February 25, 1928, in Ewing, New Jersey. His mother, Emma Lee Higginbotham, was a domestic worker. His father, Aloysius Leon Higginbotham, Sr., was a laborer. He was raised in a predominantly African American neighborhood and attended a segregated grammar school, where his mother insisted he be tutored in Latin, which was a required subject usually denied to African American students. He became the first African American to attend Central High School in Trenton, New Jersey. After graduation, he enrolled at Purdue University at the age of sixteen, which he left because of his experiences with racism there.

In the preface to his book In the Matter of Color: Race and the American Legal Process (1978), Higginbotham recounts at length his encounter with institutionalized racism at Purdue and the effect it had on his views of race and social justice. At the university, in West Lafayette, Indiana, African American students were forced to live in a crowded private house instead of in the on-campus dormitories provided for their white classmates. When Higginbotham was there, the twelve enrolled students of color slept "barracks-style in an unheated attic." One morning, after suffering through a night with temperatures close to zero, Higginbotham went to the office of Edward Charles Elliott, Purdue's president. He requested that the university's black students be allowed to stay in some section of the state-owned dormitories, even if it were segregated. President Elliott answered, "Higginbotham, the law doesn't require us to let colored students in the dorm, and you either accept things as they are or leave the University immediately." Earlier that morning, Higginbotham had heard a lecture on the history of the Declaration of Independence, the nation's most symbolic document, yet under the existing law the dozen black students at Purdue could still be treated with less respect than were their six thousand white classmates. Higginbotham wondered how a legal system that prided itself on the mantra "equal justice for all" could deny an innocent sixteen-year-old student even a semblance of dignity. He knew that he had been touched in a way he had never been touched before and that one day he would work to make things different.

Upon leaving Purdue, Higginbotham enrolled at Antioch College in Yellow Springs, Ohio, from which he received a BA in sociology in 1949. Because of his outstanding academic performance, members of the faculty and the board of trustees at Antioch encouraged him to go to law school. He enrolled in Yale Law School in the fall of 1949, arriving with a cardboard suitcase and, by his own recounting, little understanding of the challenges he would face. He was initially overwhelmed by his fellow students, many of them the sons of the elite, such as lawyers, judges, and politicians. Nonetheless, he thrived at Yale, earning more honors in oral advocacy than anyone else in the law school. (Notably, in 1969 he was elected as the first black trustee of Yale University.) Higginbotham later said that the most significant event of his law school career was traveling to Washington, D.C., in 1950 to watch Thurgood Marshall's oral argument before the Supreme Court in the case of Sweatt v. Painter. The Court in Sweatt struck down Texas's attempt to establish a separate "blacks only" law school rather than integrating the University of Texas Law School, a decision that paved the way for the Court to later overrule, in Brown v. Board of Education (1954), the "separate but equal" doctrine that the Court had upheld in Plessy v. Ferguson (1896). From that point forward, Higginbotham committed himself to fighting for equality under law.

Despite having graduated with honors from one of the nation's premier law schools, because of his race Higginbotham had substantial difficulty finding a job at any major law firm in Philadelphia, a city near his New Jersey hometown. He instead began his legal career in 1952 as a law clerk for Judge Curtis Bok on the Philadelphia Court of Common Pleas. Higginbotham then worked for the city's district attorney's office, becoming both the youngest and the first African American assistant district attorney in Philadelphia. Higginbotham left the district attorney's office after two years to start the law firm Norris, Schmidt, Green, Harris & Higginbotham, Philadelphia's first African American law firm. (Clifford Scott Green, another of the firm's founding partners later became, like Higginbotham, an esteemed federal judge.) While he was in private practice, Higginbotham also served in a variety of public roles, including president of the Philadelphia chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), special hearing officer for the United States Department of Justice, commissioner of the Pennsylvania Human Rights Commission, and special deputy attorney general of Pennsylvania.

Higginbotham remained with the firm until 1962, when President John F. Kennedy appointed him to the Federal Trade Commission, making him the first African American member of a federal administrative agency. In 1963, he was nominated to be a federal judge on the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, but Senator James Eastland, a staunch segregationist, delayed his confirmation. In 1964, after Kennedy's death, President Lyndon Johnson appointed Higginbotham to the Eastern District. At the age of thirty-five, Higginbotham was one of the youngest persons ever to be appointed as a federal judge. He nonetheless received a painful reminder on his very first day as a federal judge of the role race plays even for the most accomplished African Americans. As he later recounted in his article "Justice Clarence Thomas in Retrospect,"

> I parked in the spot clearly reserved for federal judges, got out of the car, took out my two attaché cases, and proceeded to walk to the street. After I had gone only a few feet, someone yelled to me, "Hey, boy, you can't park your car there." I continued to walk, and he said, "Hey, boy, didn't you hear me? You can't park your car there." Now at that point a sense of reality came. I knew that I had two attaché cases in my hand, and he had a gun in his holster. So I turned around and calmly said, "What is the problem, officer?" He said, "That spot is reserved for federal judges only." And I responded, "I know. That is why I parked there." And then, with his face flushed, he said, "Oh! You're Judge Higginbotham. Welcome." And I walked into the courthouse considering it just another typical incident Black people experience as part of their daily duality challenge. I knew that if I had been White, dressed as I was, he would not have called me "boy." The difference between being called "boy" or "sir" was solely the color of my skin.

In 1977, President Jimmy Carter elevated Higginbotham to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit. He served as chief judge of the Third Circuit from 1989 to 1991 and as a senior judge until his retirement from the bench in 1993. Upon retiring from the Third Circuit Court in 1993, Higginbotham became counsel to the law firm of Paul, Weiss, Rifkind & Wharton and a professor at

- June 12
  The Supreme Court decides Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Pena, holding that all racial classifications, whether local, state, or federal, must be analyzed under a standard of strict scrutiny—a significant obstacle for proponents of affirmative action; Thomas is part of the five-justice majority striking down a program aimed at increasing the number of African American contractors servicing the federal government.

- July 29
  Justice Thomas speaks before the National Bar Association, the nation's largest organization of African American attorneys and judges, at their annual convention in Memphis, Tennessee—an appearance denounced publicly by several senior members, including Higginbotham, who criticized Thomas for "turn[ing] back the clock of racial progress" more than any other African American in history.

Harvard University's John F. Kennedy School of Government. Higginbotham also became deeply involved in legal and policy work in South Africa, including service as an international mediator for the country's first post-apartheid elections in 1994 and as a consultant to President Nelson Mandela, assisting the South African government in drafting its new constitution. In addition, he served as counsel to the Congressional Black Caucus in a series of voting rights cases before the U.S. Supreme Court, was appointed to the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights by President Bill Clinton in 1995, and testified before the House Judiciary Committee regarding the impeachment of President Clinton in 1998.

Higginbotham published two groundbreaking and award-winning books concerning race, civil rights, and American legal history: In the Matter of Color: Race and the American Legal Process (1978) and Shades of Freedom: Racial Politics and Presumptions of the American Legal Process (1998). He also wrote dozens of law review articles and taught at some of the nation's most prominent law schools, such as Yale, Harvard, Stanford, the University of Pennsylvania, and New York University. Higginbotham received more than sixty honorary degrees and the highest awards of many legal and human rights organizations, including the Presidential Medal of Freedom (the nation's highest civilian honor), the Raoul Wallenberg Humanitarian Award, and the Spingarn Medal from the NAACP. Higginbotham, who died on December 14, 1998, also received numerous posthumous awards and honors.

"An Open Letter" begins with an introductory section in which Higginbotham notes his ambivalence about making his letter public in addition to sending it to Justice Thomas privately. He has done so, he says, because he decided the letter should serve "as a public record so that this generation can understand the challenges you face as an Associate Justice to the Supreme Court, and the next can evaluate the choices you have made or will make." In later explaining why he wrote the letter, Higginbotham noted, in an article titled "Justice Clarence Thomas in Retrospect" published in 1994 in the Hastings Law Review, that he had made no public statements regarding Justice Thomas during the confirmation process because > I was then sitting as a federal judge, and I did not want to make any personal statement that would be considered inappropriate, or distorted by the media, or misunderstood by the public. Only after his hearings were finished and he had been confirmed did I publicly express my concerns.

◆ "I. Measures of Greatness or Failure of Supreme Court Justices"

Higginbotham begins by referring to past Supreme Court justices. He notes a 1977 study in which a panel of a hundred scholars evaluated all the justices who had ever served on the Court. The conclusion of the study was that eight justices were "failures," six were "below average," fifty-five were "average," fifteen were "near great," and twelve were "great." He notes that Thomas had been critical of the Court presided over by Chief Justice Earl Warren, generally regarded as a liberal judge, but that Warren was accounted one of the "great" justices. Higginbotham goes on to argue that the "great" justices all regarded the Constitution as an "instrument for justice." After giving his opinion that certain current Supreme Court justices will be highly regarded by future generations, he urges Thomas to join them by becoming "an exemplar of fairness and the rational interpretation of the Constitution." At the same time he cautions Thomas not to become "an archetype of inequality and the retrogressive evaluation of human rights," leaving behind a record of "mere mediocrity."

◆ "II. Our Major Similarity"

Prior to describing his concerns about Justice Thomas's legal philosophy, Higginbotham, in section II, "Our Major Similarity," discusses one likeness shared by the two men: Both had attended Yale Law School (Higginbotham twenty-two years before Thomas). Higginbotham notes that all of the other justices then on the Supreme Court had also attended elite law schools but urges Thomas not to be "overly impressed" by this fact. In the second paragraph of section II, Higginbotham reminds Thomas of Plessy v. Ferguson (a case that established the "separate but equal" doctrine), which he characterized as "the most wretched decision ever rendered against black people in the past century." Four of the justices in the Plessy majority were northerners who had attended the nation's most elite law schools (Yale and Harvard), while the ringing dissent rejecting the majority's legalization of Jim Crow segregation was written by Justice John Harlan, a graduate of a small, non-elite law school in Kentucky (and himself a former slave owner). Higginbotham states in paragraph 6 of section II that the problem in Plessy was not "that the Justices had the 'wrong' education, or that they attended the 'wrong' law schools …, [but that they] had the wrong values, and … these values poisoned this society for decades." Higginbotham therefore urges Thomas to focus on what values he and the other justices draw from or impose upon their constitutional law and to be part of the "evolutionary movement" of the Constitution toward greater equality.

◆ "III. Your Critiques of Civil Rights Organizations and the Supreme Court during the Last Eight Years"

Higginbotham's substantive legal analysis in "An Open Letter," which begins with the third section, "Your Critiques of Civil Rights Organizations and the Supreme Court during the Last Eight Years," is directed at drawing Thomas's attention to three issues: the history of civil rights lawyers and organizations, the law and history of voting rights, and the law and history of housing and privacy rights. With regard to the first issue, Higginbotham cites Thomas's many critiques of civil rights lawyers and organizations over the years. Having read Thomas's public writings and comments, Higginbotham says that he "could not find one shred of evidence suggesting an insightful understanding on your part on how the evolutionary movement of the Constitution and the work of civil rights organizations have benefitted you."

◆ "IV. The Impact of the Work of Civil Rights Lawyers and Civil Rights Organizations on Your Life"

In this section, largely a continuation of the last, Higginbotham offers several examples of how civil rights organizations not only promoted positive social change but also could be seen to have had a direct impact on Thomas's life and career. For example, Higginbotham notes that the NAACP and other civil rights organizations, which Thomas had criticized, secured legal victories such as the Supreme Court's decision in Brown v. Board of Education, which reversed Plessy and declared segregation unconstitutional. Higginbotham asks Thomas to consider whether, without their work and the Supreme Court precedent that resulted, Thomas would himself have been able to attend elite integrated universities such as Holy Cross and Yale Law School or have been able to obtain the employment opportunities that eventually led him to the Supreme Court. Higginbotham contends that "if you and I had not gotten many of the positive reinforcements that these organizations fought for and that the post-Brown era made possible, probably neither you nor I would be federal judges today."

◆ "V. What Have the Conservatives Ever Contributed to African-Americans?"

"An Open Letter" also addresses Thomas's self-identification as a "black conservative." In section V, "What Have the Conservatives Ever Contributed to African-Americans?" Higginbotham argues in paragraph 2 that "it was primarily the conservatives who attacked the Warren Court relentlessly because of Brown v. Board of Education and who stood in the way of almost every measure to ensure gender and racial advancement." Higginbotham writes that it is ironic at best for Thomas to adopt conservative legal philosophy, when that same philosophy, had it been successful in defeating legal efforts at equal justice, would have meant, for example, that Thomas could never have been assistant secretary for civil rights or chair of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, because such agencies never would have existed. He therefore asks Thomas, in the last paragraph of section V, to "reflect on the evolution of American constitutional and statutory law, as it has affected your personal options and improved the options for so many Americans, particularly non-whites, women, and the poor."

◆ "VI. The Impact of Eradicating Racial Barriers to Voting"

Higginbotham's letter also asks Thomas to reflect upon how civil rights progress in the area of voting rights has affected Thomas's life and legal career. By fully enfranchising African Americans and other minorities, the Voting Rights Act (1965) and civil rights litigation ensured that politicians would have to respond to the needs and views of minority communities. "An Open Letter" contends that many of the southern senators who voted to confirm Justice Thomas's appointment to the Supreme Court may have done so not because they believed that he was objectively the most qualified nominee, but instead because they perceived political benefits in doing so because of the large African American voting constituencies in their states. Thus, Higginbotham contends, Thomas has benefited from the very advancements in civil rights law that he has criticized.

◆ "VII. Housing and Privacy"

Section VII, "Housing and Privacy," which is the last substantive section of "An Open Letter," addresses how civil rights advances in housing and privacy law affected

Essential Quotes

"You can become an exemplar of fairness and the rational interpretation of the Constitution, or you can become an archetype of inequality and the retrogressive evaluation of human rights. The choice as to whether you will build a decisional record of true greatness or of mere mediocrity is yours."

("I. Measures of Greatness or Failure of Supreme Court Justices")

"If the conservative agenda of the 1950s, '60s, and '70s had been implemented, what would have been the results of the important Supreme Court cases that now protect your rights and the rights of millions of other Americans who can now no longer be discriminated against because of their race, religion, national origin, or physical disabilities?"

("V. What Have the Conservatives Ever Contributed to African-Americans?")

"While there are many other equally important issues that you must consider … none will determine your place in history as much as your defense of the weak, the poor, minorities, women, the disabled and the powerless."

("Conclusion")

Thomas's private life. Higginbotham notes that Thomas lives, with his white wife, in a house in a comfortable Virginia neighborhood. Higginbotham points out that such communities were racially segregated in the past. It was only through the efforts of the NAACP and other civil rights organizations that a constitutional framework was established for dismantling housing segregation so that African Americans, Thomas included, are now able to live in such neighborhoods. Moreover, Higginbotham observes, it would have been illegal under Virginia's so-called Racial Integrity Act of 1924, "which the Virginia State Supreme Court as late as 1966" upheld, for Thomas to be married to his own wife had it not been for the efforts of civil rights organizations and the evolution of constitutional law.

◆ "Conclusion"

Higginbotham concludes "An Open Letter" by noting that although he is skeptical of how Thomas will perform as a Supreme Court justice, he holds out the hope that Thomas might adopt a more expansive view of constitutional law and civil rights than he had previously expressed. He ends "An Open Letter" by stating "with hope to balance my apprehensions, I wish you well as a thoughtful and worthy successor to Justice Marshall in the ever ongoing struggle to assure equal justice under law for all persons."

Audience

Higginbotham's immediate audience for "An Open Letter" was Justice Clarence Thomas, to whom he sent the letter. He published it as an open letter to also address the public at large because, as he says in the third paragraph of the letter's opening, he felt that "all Americans need to understand the issues [Justice Thomas would] face on the Supreme Court." The University of Pennsylvania Law Review, in which the letter was published, is widely read by legal academics, lawyers, judges, and law students.

Impact

Higginbotham's "Open Letter" received enormous attention, both positive and negative, in the legal community and beyond. After its publication, the University of Pennsylvania Law Review received more than seventeen thousand requests for reprints of the letter. "An Open Letter" has been cited and discussed in over seventy subsequent law review articles by legal scholars and was the subject of articles in major national newspapers, including the New York Times, the Wall Street Journal, the Chicago Tribune, and the Los Angeles Times. Higginbotham personally received more than eight hundred letters in response to the article, from a wide spectrum of people. The letter garnered such attention both because it was from one prominent African American judge to another on the opposite side of an ideological divide and because it expressed the frustrations of many in the civil rights and African American communities regarding Thomas's appointment to the Supreme Court. Despite the article's popularity, Thomas's supporters criticized the letter as a premature and somewhat condescending "scolding" of the young justice by Higginbotham. Many felt that Higginbotham was holding Thomas to a higher standard than he did the eight other justices on the court, based solely on the fact that Thomas was African American. As far as has been documented, Thomas never publicly responded to Higginbotham's letter.

Questions for Further Study

1. Read this document in conjunction with Anita Hill's Opening Statement at the Senate Confirmation Hearing of Clarence Thomas. Why was the appointment of Clarence Thomas so controversial? What concerns did various groups and individuals have about him?

2. At the time of Higginbotham's letter, Justice Thomas had not yet issued a decision on any Supreme Court case. In light of this, how fair do you think Higginbotham's views were? Was he guilty of prejudging Thomas? What is your reaction to Higginbotham's apparent suggestion that Thomas's record could perhaps be one of "mere mediocrity"?

3. Why is the notion of a black conservative so troubling to so many people? If the goal has been greater inclusion of African Americans in public life, what difference should the person's perceived political leanings have?

4. Read Clarence Thomas's Concurrence/Dissent in Grutter v. Bollinger. To what extent, if any, did Thomas's views in that case confirm or refute the feats Higginbotham expressed in his letter?

Document Text

A. Leon Higginbotham: "An Open Letter to Justice Clarence Thomas from a Federal Judicial Colleague"

November 29, 1991

Dear Justice Thomas:

The President has signed your Commission and you have now become the 106th Justice of the United States Supreme Court. I congratulate you on this high honor!

It has been a long time since we talked. I believe it was in 1980 during your first year as a Trustee at Holy Cross College. I was there to receive an honorary degree. You were thirty-one years old and on the staff of Senator John Danforth. You had not yet started your meteoric climb through the government and federal judicial hierarchy. Much has changed since then.

At first I thought that I should write you privately the way one normally corresponds with a colleague or friend. I still feel ambivalent about making this letter public but I do so because your appointment is profoundly important to this country and the world, and because all Americans need to understand the issues you will face on the Supreme Court. In short, Justice Thomas, I write this letter as a public record so that this generation can understand the challenges you face as an Associate Justice to the Supreme Court, and the next can evaluate the choices you have made or will make.

The Supreme Court can be a lonely and insular environment. Eight of the present Justices' lives would not have been very different if the Brown case had never been decided as it was. Four attended Harvard Law School, which did not accept women law students until 1950. Two attended Stanford Law School prior to the time when the first Black matriculated there. None has been called a "nigger" or suffered the acute deprivations of poverty. Justice O'Connor is the only other Justice on the Court who at one time was adversely affected by a white-male dominated system that often excludes both women and minorities from equal access to the rewards of hard work and talent.

By elevating you to the Supreme Court, President Bush has suddenly vested in you the option to preserve or dilute the gains this country has made in the struggle for equality. This is a grave responsibility indeed. In order to discharge it you will need to recognize what James Baldwin called the "force of history" within you. You will need to recognize that both your public life and your private life reflect this country's history in the area of racial discrimination and civil rights. And, while much has been said about your admirable determination to overcome terrible obstacles, it is also important to remember how you arrived where you are now, because you did not get there by yourself.

When I think of your appointment to the Supreme Court, I see not only the result of your own ambition, but also the culmination of years of heartbreaking work by thousands who preceded you. I know you may not want to be burdened by the memory of their sacrifices. But I also know that you have no right to forget that history. Your life is very different from what it would have been had these men and women never lived. That is why today I write to you about this country's history of civil rights lawyers and civil rights organizations; its history of voting rights; and its history of housing and privacy rights. This history has affected your past and present life. And forty years from now, when your grandchildren and other Americans measure your performance on the Supreme Court, that same history will determine whether you fulfilled your responsibility with the vision and grace of the Justice whose seat you have been appointed to fill: Thurgood Marshall.

I. Measures of Greatness or Failure of Supreme Court Justices

In 1977 a group of one hundred scholars evaluated the first one hundred justices on the Supreme Court. Eight of the justices were categorized as failures, six as below average, fifty-five as average, fifteen as near great and twelve as great. Among those ranked as great were John Marshall, Joseph Story, John M. Harlan, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., Charles E. Hughes, Louis D. Brandeis, Harlan F. Stone, Benjamin N. Cardozo, Hugo L. Black, and Felix Frankfurter. Because you have often criticized the Warren Court, you should be interested to know that the list of great jurists on the Supreme Court also included Earl Warren.

Even long after the deaths of the Justices that I have named, informed Americans are grateful for the extraordinary wisdom and compassion they brought to their judicial opinions. Each in his own way viewed the Constitution as an instrument for justice. They made us a far better people and this country a far better place. I think that Justices Thurgood Marshall, William J. Brennan, Harry Blackmun, Lewis Powell, and John Paul Stevens will come to be revered by future scholars and future generations with the same gratitude. Over the next four decades you will cast many historic votes on issues that will profoundly affect the quality of life for our citizens for generations to come. You can become an exemplar of fairness and the rational interpretation of the Constitution, or you can become an archetype of inequality and the retrogressive evaluation of human rights. The choice as to whether you will build a decisional record of true greatness or of mere mediocrity is yours.

II. Our Major Similarity

My more than twenty-seven years as a federal judge made me listen with intense interest to the many persons who testified both in favor of and against your nomination. I studied the hearings carefully and afterwards pondered your testimony and the comments others made about you. After reading almost every word of your testimony, I concluded that what you and I have most in common is that we are both graduates of Yale Law School. Though our graduation classes are twenty-two years apart, we have both benefitted from our old Eli connections.

If you had gone to one of the law schools in your home state, Georgia, you probably would not have met Senator John Danforth who, more than twenty years ago, served with me as a member of the Yale Corporation. Dean Guido Calabresi mentioned you to Senator Danforth, who hired you right after graduation from law school and became one of your primary sponsors. If I had not gone to Yale Law School, I would probably not have met Justice Curtis Bok, nor Yale Law School alumni such as Austin Norris, a distinguished black lawyer, and Richardson Dilworth, a distinguished white lawyer, who became my mentors and gave me my first jobs. Nevertheless, now that you sit on the Supreme Court, there are issues far more important to the welfare of our nation than our Ivy League connections. I trust that you will not be overly impressed with the fact that all of the other Justices are graduates of what laymen would call the nation's most prestigious law schools.

Black Ivy League alumni in particular should never be too impressed by the educational pedigree of Supreme Court Justices. The most wretched decision ever rendered against black people in the past century was Plessy v. Ferguson. It was written in 1896 by Justice Henry Billings Brown, who had attended both Yale and Harvard Law Schools. The opinion was joined by Justice George Shiras, a graduate of Yale Law School, as well as by Chief Justice Melville Fuller and Justice Horace Gray, both alumni of Harvard Law School.

If those four Ivy League alumni on the Supreme Court in 1896 had been as faithful in their interpretation of the Constitution as Justice John Harlan, a graduate of Transylvania, a small law school in Kentucky, then the venal precedent of Plessy v. Ferguson, which established the federal "separate but equal" doctrine and legitimized the worst forms of race discrimination, would not have been the law of our nation for sixty years. The separate but equal doctrine, also known as Jim Crow, created the foundations of separate and unequal allocation of resources, and oppression of the human rights of Blacks.

During your confirmation hearing I heard you refer frequently to your grandparents and your experiences in Georgia. Perhaps now is the time to recognize that if the four Ivy League alumni all northerners of the Plessy majority had been as sensitive to the plight of black people as was Justice John Harlan, a former slave holder from Kentucky, the American statutes that sanctioned racism might not have been on the books and many of the racial injustices that your grandfather, Myers Anderson, and my grandfather, Moses Higginbotham, endured would never have occurred.

The tragedy with Plessy v. Ferguson, is not that the Justices had the "wrong" education, or that they attended the "wrong" law schools. The tragedy is that the Justices had the wrong values, and that these values poisoned this society for decades. Even worse, millions of Blacks today still suffer from the tragic sequelae of Plessy a case which Chief Justice Rehnquist, Justice Kennedy, and most scholars now say was wrongly decided.

As you sit on the Supreme Court confronting the profound issues that come before you, never be impressed with how bright your colleagues are. You must always focus on what values they bring to the task of interpreting the Constitution. Our Constitution has an unavoidable though desirable level of ambiguity, and there are many interstitial spaces which as a Justice of the Supreme Court you will have to fill in. To borrow Justice Cardozo's elegant phrase: "We do not pick our rules of law full blossomed from the trees." You and the other Justices cannot avoid putting your imprimatur on a set of values. The dilemma will always be which particular values you choose to sanction in law. You can be part of what Chief Justice Warren, Justice Brennan, Justice Blackmun, and Justice Marshall and others have called the evolutionary movement of the Constitution, an evolutionary movement that has benefitted you greatly.

III. Your Critiques of Civil Rights Oranizations and the Supreme Court during the Last Eight Years

I have read almost every article you have published, every speech you have given, and virtually every public comment you have made during the past decade. Until your confirmation hearing I could not find one shred of evidence suggesting an insightful understanding on your part on how the evolutionary movement of the Constitution and the work of civil rights organizations have benefitted you. Like Sharon McPhail, the President of the National Bar Association, I kept asking myself: Will the Real Clarence Thomas Stand Up? Like her, I wondered: "Is Clarence Thomas a 'conservative with a common touch' as Ruth Marcus refers to him … or the 'counterfeit hero' he is accused of being by Haywood Burns.…"

While you were a presidential appointee for eight years, as Chairman of the Equal Opportunity Commission and as an Assistant Secretary at the Department of Education, you made what I would regard as unwarranted criticisms of civil rights organizations, the Warren Court, and even of Justice Thurgood Marshall. Perhaps these criticisms were motivated by what you perceived to be your political duty to the Reagan and Bush administrations. Now that you have assumed what should be the non-partisan role of a Supreme Court Justice, I hope you will take time out to carefully evaluate some of these unjustified attacks.

In October 1987, you wrote a letter to the San Diego Union & Tribune criticizing a speech given by Justice Marshall on the 200th anniversary celebration of the Constitution. Justice Marshall had cautioned all Americans not to overlook the momentous events that followed the drafting of that document, and to "seek … a sensitive understanding of the Constitution's inherent defects, and its promising evolution through 200 years of history."

Your response dismissed Justice Marshall's "sensitive understanding" as an "exasperating and incomprehensible … assault on the Bicentennial, the Founding, and the Constitution itself." Yet, however high and noble the Founders' intentions may have been, Justice Marshall was correct in believing that the men who gathered in Philadelphia in 1787 "could not have imagined, nor would they have accepted, that the document they were drafting would one day be construed by a Supreme Court to which had been appointed a woman and the descendant of an African slave." That, however, was neither an assault on the Constitution nor an indictment of the Founders. Instead, it was simply a recognition that in the midst of the Bicentennial celebration, "some may more quietly commemorate the suffering, the struggle and sacrifice that has triumphed over much of what was wrong with the original document, and observe the anniversary with hopes not realized and promises not fulfilled."

Justice Marshall's comments, much like his judicial philosophy, were grounded in history and were driven by the knowledge that even today, for millions of Americans, there still remain "hopes not realized and promises not fulfilled." His reminder to the nation that patriotic feelings should not get in the way of thoughtful reflection on this country's continued struggle for equality was neither new nor misplaced. Twenty-five years earlier, in December 1962, while this country was celebrating the 100th anniversary of the emancipation proclamation, James Baldwin had written to his young nephew:

> This is your home, my friend, do not be driven from it; great men have done great things here, and will again, and we can make America what America must become.… But you know, and I know that the country is celebrating one hundred years of freedom one hundred years too soon.

Your response to Justice Marshall's speech, as well as your criticisms of the Warren court and civil rights organizations, may have been nothing more than your expression of allegiance to the conservatives who made you Chairman of the EEOC, and who have now elevated you to the Supreme Court. But your comments troubled me then and trouble me still because they convey a stunted knowledge of history and an unformed judicial philosophy. Now that you sit on the Supreme Court you must sort matters out for yourself and form your own judicial philosophy, and you must reflect more deeply on legal history than you ever have before. You are no longer privileged to offer flashy one-liners to delight the conservative establishment. Now what you write must inform, not entertain. Now your statements and your votes can shape the destiny of the entire nation.

Notwithstanding the role you have played in the past, I believe you have the intellectual depth to reflect upon and rethink the great issues the Court has confronted in the past and to become truly your own man. But to be your own man the first in the series of questions you must ask yourself is this: Beyond your own admirable personal drive, what were the primary forces or acts of good fortune that made your major achievements possible? This is a hard and difficult question. Let me suggest that you focus on at least four areas: (1) the impact of the work of civil rights lawyers and civil rights organizations on your life; (2) other than having picked a few individuals to be their favorite colored person, what it is that the conservatives of each generation have done that has been of significant benefit to African-Americans, women, or other minorities; (3) the impact of the eradication of racial barriers in the voting on your own confirmation; and (4) the impact of civil rights victories in the area of housing and privacy on your personal life.

IV. The Impact of the Work of Civil Rights Lawyers and Civil Rights Organizations on Your Life

During the time when civil rights organizations were challenging the Reagan Administration, I was frankly dismayed by some of your responses to and denigrations of these organizations. In 1984, the Washington Post reported that you had criticized traditional civil rights leaders because, instead of trying to reshape the Administration's policies, they had gone to the news media to "bitch, bitch, bitch, moan and moan, whine and whine." If that is still your assessment of these civil rights organizations or their leaders, I suggest, Justice Thomas, that you should ask yourself every day what would have happened to you if there had never been a Charles Hamilton Houston, a William Henry Hastie, a Thurgood Marshall, and that small cadre of other lawyers associated with them, who laid the groundwork for success in the twentieth-century racial civil rights cases? Couldn't they have been similarly charged with, as you phrased it, bitching and moaning and whining when they challenged the racism in the administrations of prior presidents, governors, and public officials? If there had never been an effective NAACP, isn't it highly probable that you might still be in Pin Point, Georgia, working as a laborer as some of your relatives did for decades?

Even though you had the good fortune to move to Savannah, Georgia, in 1955, would you have been able to get out of Savannah and get a responsible job if decades earlier the NAACP had not been challenging racial injustice throughout America? If the NAACP had not been lobbying, picketing, protesting, and politicking for a 1964 Civil Rights Act, would Monsanto Chemical Company have opened their doors to you in 1977? If Title VII had not been enacted might not American companies still continue to discriminate on the basis of race, gender, and national origin?

The philosophy of civil rights protest evolved out of the fact that black people were forced to confront this country's racist institutions without the benefit of equal access to those institutions. For example, in January of 1941, A. Philip Randolph planned a march on Washington, D.C., to protest widespread employment discrimination in the defense industry. In order to avoid the prospect of a demonstration by potentially tens of thousands of Blacks, President Franklin Delano Roosevelt issued Executive Order 8802 barring discrimination in defense industries or government. The order led to the inclusion of anti-discrimination clauses in all government defense contracts and the establishment of the Fair Employment Practices Committee.

In 1940, President Roosevelt appointed William Henry Hastie as civilian aide to Secretary of War Henry L. Stimson. Hastie fought tirelessly against discrimination, but when confronted with an unabated program of segregation in all areas of the armed forces, he resigned on January 31, 1943. His visible and dramatic protest sparked the move towards integrating the armed forces, with immediate and far-reaching results in the army air corps.

A. Philip Randolph and William Hastie understood though I wonder if you do what Frederick Douglass meant when he wrote:

> The whole history of the progress of human liberty shows that all concessions yet made to her august claims, have been born of earnest struggle.... If there is no struggle there is no progress.... This struggle may be a moral one, or it may be a physical one, and it may be both moral and physical, but it must be a struggle.

> Power concedes nothing without a demand. It never did and it never will.

The struggles of civil rights organizations and civil rights lawyers have been both moral and physical, and their victories have been neither easy nor sudden. Though the Brown decision was issued only six years after your birth, the road to Brown started more than a century earlier. It started when Prudence Crandall was arrested in Connecticut in 1833 for attempting to provide schooling for colored girls. It was continued in 1849 when Charles Sumner, a white lawyer and abolitionist, and Benjamin Roberts, a black lawyer, challenged segregated schools in Boston. It was continued as the NAACP, starting with Charles Hamilton Houston's suit, Murray v. Pearson, in 1936, challenged Maryland's policy of excluding Blacks from the University of Maryland Law School. It was continued in Gaines v. Missouri, when Houston challenged a 1937 decision of the Missouri Supreme Court. The Missouri courts had held that because law schools in the states of Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, and Nebraska accepted Negroes, a twenty-five-year-old black citizen of Missouri was not being denied his constitutional right to equal protection under the law when he was excluded from the only state supported law school in Missouri. It was continued in Sweatt v. Painter in 1946, when Heman Marion Sweatt filed suit for admission to the Law School of the University of Texas after his application was rejected solely because he was black. Rather than admit him, the University postponed the matter for years and put up a separate and unaccredited law school for Blacks. It was continued in a series of cases against the University of Oklahoma, when, in 1950, in McLaurin v. Oklahoma, G.W. McLaurin, a sixty-eight-year-old man, applied to the University of Oklahoma to obtain a Doctorate in education. He had earned his Master's degree in 1948, and had been teaching at Langston University, the state's college for Negroes. Yet he was "required to sit apart at … designated desks in an anteroom adjoining the classroom … and on the mezzanine floor of the library, … and to sit at a designated table and to eat at a different time from the other students in the school cafeteria."

The significance of the victory in the Brown case cannot be overstated. Brown changed the moral tone of America; by eliminating the legitimization of state-imposed racism it implicitly questioned racism wherever it was used. It created a milieu in which private colleges were forced to recognize their failures in excluding or not welcoming minority students. I submit that even your distinguished undergraduate college, Holy Cross, and Yale University were influenced by the milieu created by Brown and thus became more sensitive to the need to create programs for the recruitment of competent minority students. In short, isn't it possible that you might not have gone to Holy Cross if the NAACP and other civil rights organizations, Martin Luther King and the Supreme Court, had not recast the racial mores of America? And if you had not gone to Holy Cross, and instead had gone to some underfunded state college for Negroes in Georgia, would you have been admitted to Yale Law School, and would you have met the alumni who played such a prominent role in maximizing your professional options?

I have cited this litany of NAACP cases because I don't understand why you appeared so eager to criticize civil rights organizations or their leaders. In the 1980s, Benjamin Hooks and John Jacobs worked just as tirelessly in the cause of civil rights as did their predecessors Walter White, Roy Wilkins, Whitney Young, and Vernon Jordan in the 1950s and '60s. As you now start to adjudicate cases involving civil rights, I hope you will have more judicial integrity than to demean those advocates of the disadvantaged who appear before you. If you and I had not gotten many of the positive reinforcements that these organizations fought for and that the post-Brown era made possible, probably neither you nor I would be federal judges today.

V. What Have the Conservatives Ever Contributed to African-Americans?

During the last ten years, you have often described yourself as a black conservative. I must confess that, other than their own self-advancement, I am at a loss to understand what is it that the so-called black conservatives are so anxious to conserve. Now that you no longer have to be outspoken on their behalf, perhaps you will recognize that in the past it was the white "conservatives" who screamed "segregation now, segregation forever!" It was primarily the conservatives who attacked the Warren Court relentlessly because of Brown v. Board of Education and who stood in the way of almost every measure to ensure gender and racial advancement.

For example, on March 11, 1956, ninety-six members of Congress, representing eleven southern states, issued the "Southern Manifesto," in which they declared that the Brown decision was an "unwarranted exercise of power by the Court, contrary to the Constitution." Ironically, those members of Congress reasoned that the Brown decision was "destroying the amicable relations between the white and negro races," and that "it had planted hatred and suspicion where there had been heretofore friendship and understanding." They then pledged to use all lawful means to bring about the reversal of the decision, and praised those states which had declared the intention to resist its implementation. The Southern Manifesto was more than mere political posturing by Southern Democrats. It was a thinly disguised racist attack on the constitutional and moral foundations of Brown. Where were the conservatives in the 1950s when the cause of equal rights needed every fair-minded voice it could find?

At every turn, the conservatives, either by tacit approbation or by active complicity, tried to derail the struggle for equal rights in this country. In the 1960s, it was the conservatives, including the then-senatorial candidate from Texas, George Bush, the then-Governor from California, Ronald Reagan, and the omnipresent Senator Strom Thurmond, who argued that the 1964 Civil Rights Act was unconstitutional. In fact Senator Thurmond's 24 hour 18 minute filibuster during Senate deliberations on the 1957 Civil Rights Act set an all-time record. He argued on the floor of the Senate that the provisions of the Act guaranteeing equal access to public accommodations amounted to an enslavement of white people. If twenty-seven years ago George Bush, Ronald Reagan, and Strom Thurmond had succeeded, there would have been no position for you to fill as Assistant Secretary for Civil Rights in the Department of Education. There would have been no such agency as the Equal Employment Commission for you to chair.

Thus, I think now is the time for you to reflect on the evolution of American constitutional and statutory law, as it has affected your personal options and improved the options for so many Americans, particularly non-whites, women, and the poor. If the conservative agenda of the 1950s, '60s, and '70s had been implemented, what would have been the results of the important Supreme Court cases that now protect your rights and the rights of millions of other Americans who can now no longer be discriminated against because of their race, religion, national origin, or physical disabilities? If, in 1954, the United States Supreme Court had accepted the traditional rationale that so many conservatives then espoused, would the 1896 Plessy v. Ferguson case, which announced the nefarious doctrine of "separate but equal," and which allowed massive inequalities, still be the law of the land? In short, if the conservatives of the 1950s had had their way, would there ever have been a Brown v. Board of Education to prohibit state-imposed racial segregation?

VI. The Impact of Eradicating Racial Barriers to Voting

Of the fifty-two senators who voted in favor of your confirmation, some thirteen hailed from nine southern states. Some may have voted for you because they agreed with President Bush's assessment that you were "'the best person for the position.'" But, candidly, Justice Thomas, I do not believe that you were indeed the most competent person to be on the Supreme Court. Charles Bowser, a distinguished African-American Philadelphia lawyer, said, "'I'd be willing to bet … that not one of the senators who voted to confirm Clarence Thomas would hire him as their lawyer.'"

Thus, realistically, many senators probably did not think that you were the most qualified person available. Rather, they were acting solely as politicians, weighing the potential backlash in their states of the black vote that favored you for emotional reasons and the conservative white vote that favored you for ideological reasons. The black voting constituency is important in many states, and today it could make a difference as to whether many senators are or are not re-elected. So here, too, you benefitted from civil rights progress.

No longer could a United States Senator say what Senator Benjamin Tillman of South Carolina said in anger when President Theodore Roosevelt invited a moderate Negro, Booker T. Washington, to lunch at the White House: "'Now that Roosevelt has eaten with that nigger Washington, we shall have to kill a thousand niggers to get them back to their place.'" Senator Tillman did not have to fear any retaliation by Blacks because South Carolina and most southern states kept Blacks "in their place" by manipulating the ballot box. For example, because they did not have to confront the restraints and prohibitions of later Supreme Court cases, the manipulated "white" primary allowed Tillman and other racist senators to profit from the threat of violence to Blacks who voted, and from the disproportionate electoral power given to rural whites. For years, the NAACP litigated some of the most significant cases attacking racism at the ballot box. That organization almost single-handedly created the foundation for black political power that led in part to the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

Moreover, if it had not been for the Supreme Court's opinion in Smith v. Allright, a case which Thurgood Marshall argued, most all the southern senators who voted for you would have been elected in what was once called a "white primary" a process which precluded Blacks from effective voting in the southern primary election, where the real decisions were made on who would run every hamlet, township, city, county and state. The seminal case of Baker v. Carr, which articulated the concept of one man-one vote, was part of a series of Supreme Court precedents that caused southern senators to recognize that patently racist diatribes could cost them an election. Thus your success even in your several confirmation votes is directly attributable to the efforts that the "activist" Warren Court and civil rights organizations have made over the decades.

VII. Housing and Privacy

If you are willing, Justice Thomas, to consider how the history of civil rights in this country has shaped your public life, then imagine for a moment how it has affected your private life. With some reluctance, I make the following comments about housing and marriage because I hope that reflecting on their constitutional implications may raise your consciousness and level of insight about the dangers of excessive intrusion by the state in personal and family relations.

From what I have seen of your house on television scans and in newspaper photos, it is apparent that you live in a comfortable Virginia neighborhood. Thus I start with Holmes's view that "a page of history is worth a volume of logic." The history of Virginia's legislatively and judicially imposed racism should be particularly significant to you now that as a Supreme Court Justice you must determine the limits of a state's intrusion on family and other matters of privacy.

It is worthwhile pondering what the impact on you would have been if Virginia's legalized racism had been allowed to continue as a viable constitutional doctrine. In 1912, Virginia enacted a statute giving cities and towns the right to pass ordinances which would divide the city into segregated districts for black and white residents. Segregated districts were designated white or black depending on the race of the majority of the residents. It became a crime for any black person to move into and occupy a residence in an area known as a white district. Similarly, it was a crime for any white person to move into a black district.

Even prior to the Virginia statute of 1912, the cities of Ashland and Richmond had enacted such segregationist statutes. The ordinances also imposed the same segregationist policies on any "place of public assembly." Apparently schools, churches, and meeting places were defined by the color of their members. Thus, white Christian Virginia wanted to make sure that no black Christian churches were in their white Christian neighborhoods.

The impact of these statutes can be assessed by reviewing the experiences of two African-Americans, John Coleman and Mary Hopkins. Coleman purchased property in Ashland, Virginia in 1911. In many ways he symbolized the American dream of achieving some modest upward mobility by being able to purchase a home earned through initiative and hard work. But shortly after moving to his home, he was arrested for violating Ashland's segregation ordinance because a majority of the residents in the block were white. Also, in 1911, the City of Richmond prosecuted and convicted a black woman, Mary S. Hopkins, for moving into a predominantly white block.

Coleman and Hopkins appealed their convictions to the Supreme Court of Virginia which held that the ordinances of Ashland and Richmond did not violate the United States Constitution and that the fines and convictions were valid.

If Virginia's law of 1912 still prevailed, and if your community passed laws like the ordinances of Richmond and Ashland, you would not be able to live in your own house. Fortunately, the Virginia ordinances and statutes were in effect nullified by a case brought by the NAACP in 1915, where a similar statute of the City of Louisville was declared unconstitutional. But even if your town council had not passed such an ordinance, the developers would in all probability have incorporated racially restrictive covenants in the title deeds to the individual homes. Thus, had it not been for the vigor of the NAACP's litigation efforts in a series of persistent attacks against racial covenants you would have been excluded from your own home. Fortunately, in 1948, in Shelley v. Kraemer, a case argued by Thurgood Marshall, the NAACP succeeded in having such racially restrictive covenants declared unconstitutional.

Yet with all of those litigation victories, you still might not have been able to live in your present house because a private developer might have refused to sell you a home solely because you are an African-American. Again you would be saved because in 1968 the Supreme Court, in Jones v. Alfred H. Mayer Co., in an opinion by Justice Stewart, held that the 1866 Civil Rights Act precluded such private racial discrimination. It was a relatively close case; the two dissenting justices said that the majority opinion was "ill considered and ill-advised." It was the values of the majority which made the difference. And it is your values that will determine the vitality of other civil rights acts for decades to come.

Had you overcome all of those barriers to housing and if you and your present wife decided that you wanted to reside in Virginia, you would nonetheless have been violating the Racial Integrity Act of 1924, which the Virginia Supreme Court as late as 1966 said was consistent with the federal constitution because of the overriding state interest in the institution of marriage. Although it was four years after the Brown case, Richard Perry Loving and his wife, Mildred Jeter Loving were convicted in 1958 and originally sentenced to one year in jail because of their interracial marriage. As an act of magnanimity the trial court later suspended the sentences, "'for a period of 25 years upon the provision that both accused leave Caroline County and the state of Virginia at once and do not return together or at the same time to said county and state for a period of 25 years.'"

The conviction was affirmed by a unanimous Supreme Court of Virginia, though they remanded the case back as to the re-sentencing phase. Incidentally, the Virginia trial judge justified the constitutionality of the prohibition against interracial marriages as follows:

> Almighty God created the races white, black, yellow, Malay and red, and he placed them on separate continents. And but for the interference with his arrangement there would be no cause for such marriages. The fact that he separated the races shows that he did not intend for the races to mix.

If the Virginia courts had been sustained by the United States Supreme Court in 1966, and if, after your marriage, you and your wife had, like the Lovings, defied the Virginia statute by continuing to live in your present residence, you could have been in the penitentiary today rather than serving as an Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court.

I note these pages of record from American legal history because they exemplify the tragedy of excessive intrusion on individual and family rights. The only persistent protector of privacy and family rights has been the United States Supreme Court, and such protection has occurred only when a majority of the Justices has possessed a broad vision of human rights. Will you, in your moment of truth, take for granted that the Constitution protects you and your wife against all forms of deliberate state intrusion into family and privacy matters, and protects you even against some forms of discrimination by other private parties such as the real estate developer, but nevertheless find that it does not protect the privacy rights of others, and particularly women, to make similarly highly personal and private decisions?

Conclusion

This letter may imply that I am somewhat skeptical as to what your performance will be as a Supreme Court Justice. Candidly, I and many other thoughtful Americans are very concerned about your appointment to the Supreme Court. But I am also sufficiently familiar with the history of the Supreme Court to know that a few of its members (not many) about whom there was substantial skepticism at the time of their appointment became truly outstanding Justices. In that context I think of Justice Hugo Black. I am impressed by the fact that at the very beginning of his illustrious career he articulated his vision of the responsibility of the Supreme Court. In one of his early major opinions he wrote, "courts stand … as havens of refuge for those who might otherwise suffer because they are helpless, weak, out-numbered, or … are non-conforming victims of prejudice and public excitement."

While there are many other equally important issues that you must consider and on which I have not commented, none will determine your place in history as much as your defense of the weak, the poor, minorities, women, the disabled and the powerless. I trust that you will ponder often the significance of the statement of Justice Blackmun, in a vigorous dissent of two years ago, when he said: "Sadly … one wonders whether the majority [of the Court] still believes that … race discrimination or more accurately, race discrimination against nonwhites is a problem in our society, or even remembers that it ever was."

You, however, must try to remember that the fundamental problems of the disadvantaged, women, minorities, and the powerless have not all been solved simply because you have "moved on up" from Pin Point, Georgia, to the Supreme Court. In your opening remarks to the Judiciary Committee, you described your life in Pin Point, Georgia, as "far removed in space and time from this room, this day and this moment." I have written to tell you that your life today, however, should be not far removed from the visions and struggles of Frederick Douglass, Sojourner Truth, Harriet Tubman, Charles Hamilton Houston, A. Philip Randolph, Mary McLeod Bethune, W.E.B. Dubois, Roy Wilkins, Whitney Young, Martin Luther King, Judge William Henry Hastie, Justices Thurgood Marshall, Earl Warren, and William Brennan, as well as the thousands of others who dedicated much of their lives to create the America that made your opportunities possible. I hope you have the strength of character to exemplify those values so that the sacrifices of all these men and women will not have been in vain.

I am sixty-three years old. In my lifetime I have seen African-Americans denied the right to vote, the opportunities to a proper education, to work, and to live where they choose. I have seen and known racial segregation and discrimination. But I have also seen the decision in Brown rendered. I have seen the first African-American sit on the Supreme Court. And I have seen brave and courageous people, black and white, give their lives for the civil rights cause. My memory of them has always been without bitterness or nostalgia. But today it is sometimes without hope; for I wonder whether their magnificent achievements are in jeopardy. I wonder whether (and how far) the majority of the Supreme Court will continue to retreat from protecting the rights of the poor, women, the disadvantaged, minorities, and the powerless. And if, tragically, a majority of the Court continues to retreat, I wonder whether you, Justice Thomas, an African-American, will be part of that majority.

No one would be happier than I if the record you will establish on the Supreme Court in years to come demonstrates that my apprehensions were unfounded. You were born into injustice, tempered by the hard reality of what it means to be poor and black in America, and especially to be poor because you are black. You have found a door newly cracked open and you have escaped. I trust you shall not forget that many who preceded you and many who follow you have found, and will find, the door of equal opportunity slammed in their faces through no fault of their own. And I also know that time and the tides of history often call out of men and women qualities that even they did not know lay within them. And so, with

Colin Powell's Commencement Address at Howard University

"There is utter foolishness, evil, and danger in the message of hatred, or of condoning violence, however cleverly the message is packaged."

Overview

Colin Powell's commencement address delivered to the graduates of Howard University on May 14, 1994, is among the most remembered speeches of an impressively influential African American in the late twentieth century. The speech helped keep the recently retired General Powell in the headlines at a time when many thought he might be the first black candidate for the presidency on a major party ticket. Like most commencement addresses, Powell's remarks were designed to urge the listening graduates and their friends and families to aspire to greater philosophical and career goals. But because of his unusually popular public reputation and his potential presidential candidacy, Powell's address had a much larger public audience. Today, this speech has been largely overshadowed by some of Powell's remarks as secretary of state during the presidential administration of George W. Bush.

The Howard University commencement speech was given to several hundred graduates, their friends and families, and the faculty of the nation's largest historically black university. Although the circumstances surrounding Powell's appearance were controversial, his remarks were in the main well received by the assembled listeners and even more enthusiastically by the local and national press corps.

Context

After a long and distinguished career in the American military, General Powell announced his retirement from active duty in 1993. Because he had most recently been chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff in the presidential administrations of George H. W. Bush and for a brief time under Bill Clinton, General Powell was widely acknowledged to be one of the primary architects of America's successful participation in the First Gulf War. By late 1993, Powell enjoyed unprecedented popularity among voters in both major parties and many independents as well. Interestingly, some polls showed that he was actually more popular with white voters than with blacks, some of whom were wary of Powell's cozy relationship with the Republican Party. Although he made no public announcements about his flirtation with national politics in 1994, it was widely believed that Powell was contemplating a run for the nation's highest office. Powell hesitated to reveal his party affiliation, and both Democrats and Republicans made it clear that they would welcome his endorsement and perhaps his candidacy.

Powell took full advantage of the forthcoming publication of his memoir, My American Journey, in a long series of public-speaking appearances in 1994 and 1995, which many thought were thinly disguised campaign speeches. Commencement addresses at a variety of institutions were among his most frequent appearances during these months. Virtually all of these graduation speeches were formulaic attempts to urge his listeners to embrace traditional values of diligence and hard work and to dedicate at least part of their lives to public service. But the Howard speech departed sharply from that pattern in that it spoke directly to the issue of race hatred. The early 1990s had witnessed a spate of incidents on college campuses among them some of the nation's most prestigious institutions which revealed that racial tensions could quickly boil over into public spectacle. In 1994 the dramatic murder trials of Colin Ferguson and O. J. Simpson would be brutal reminders of just how serious the racial divide continued to be in American culture generally. Ferguson, a Jamaican American, was convicted of murder after weeks of outrageous courtroom tactics in which he attempted to defend himself for the shooting of six white passengers on a Long Island commuter train. That same year, O. J. Simpson, the legendary black football star and sometime Hollywood actor, was acquitted of the brutal Los Angeles slaying of his white former wife and her male companion in one of the most controversial murder trials of modern times.

In April 1994, barely three weeks before Powell's speech, Khalid Abdul Muhammad, a one-time lieutenant of the Nation of Islam's leader, Louis Farrakhan, was among several black activist speakers at a rally at Howard University whose remarks struck many as racially inflammatory. Muhammad himself excoriated whites, especially Jews, as untrustworthy allies in the continuing civil rights struggle. Muhammad had made similar remarks on the campus of Kean College in New Jersey in late 1993, a performance so controversial that students at Emory University had canceled a scheduled appearance by Muhammad on that campus on the grounds that his rhetoric might fuel a racial disturbance. In Canada, officials at the University of Toronto canceled their invitation to Muhammad on more philosophical grounds. In the Kean speech, Muhammad characterized Jews as "bloodsuckers," called for the genocide of white people, insulted Pope John Paul II, and excoriated gay rights. The Anti-Defamation League, a Jewish civil rights organization, responded by taking out a full page advertisement in the New York Times condemning Muhammad's rhetoric. Shortly thereafter, Congress voted unanimously to reject Muhammad's speech as "outrageous hatemongering" of the worst type. Even Louis Farrakhan was moved to oust Muhammad from his official post in the Nation of Islam in response to the public outcry.

In his second appearance at Howard University in five months, on April 19, 1994, Khalid Muhammad attacked the legend of the Holocaust by insulting its survivors: "You make me sick always got some old crinkly, wrinkled cracker that you bring up, talking about, 'this is one of the Holocaust victims.' Goddamn it! I'm looking at a whole audience full of Holocaust victims." But Muhammad also ridiculed America's black elite particularly the Reverend Jesse Jackson as "boot-licking, buck dancing" traitors who sold their souls and those of their people to whites. In short, Muhammad specialized in an outrageous and unusually militant version of the rhetoric of black nationalism and black supremacy, which unfailingly received a riotous reception from his disciples but was roundly condemned by more conventional audiences both black and white. Muhammad would continue to be a public figure in America's black nationalist movement for many years. He surfaced as the founder of the New Black Panther Party in 1995 and was perhaps the most visible organizer of the aborted "Million Youth" march in New York in 1997 and a rally in that city in 1998 as well as a smaller one in 1999. He died suddenly in Atlanta, Georgia, of a brain hemorrhage in 2001 at age fifty-three.

At Howard University, Muhammad's remarks created more than their usual share of controversy. Almost immediately, the Anti-Defamation League denounced his rhetoric, and several donors to the United Negro College Fund threatened to recall their contributions. Muhammad attempted to explain his Howard rhetoric before a national television audience on The Phil Donahue Show a few weeks later, which convinced no one save his most enthusiastic followers. Moreover, the Howard University president, Dr. Franklyn Jenifer, defended his institution's policy of free speech though not the content of Muhammad's remarks but resigned his post in the face of mounting public criticism. It was in the midst of these emotionally charged circumstances that Colin Powell, among the nation's best-known and most respected African Americans, gave his speech on racial hatred at Howard University on May 14, 1994.

About the Author

Colin Powell was not a typical African American leader. He did not have a résumé as a civil rights advocate, nor did he have any significant ties to the larger African American community. He was a Protestant, but his religious affiliations were not an important part of his background, and as an Episcopalian he seldom saw black parishioners in his congregation let alone in positions of leadership. Rather, Powell rose to prominence through the U.S. Army and not as a result of partisan politics or community activism. Partly because of his extraordinary organizational talents and partly because of fortuitous circumstances, Powell achieved the highest rank in the American military through a series of appointments in the executive branch of the national government. At the peak of his career in the early 1990s, Powell was arguably America's most experienced and successful expert on issues of national defense.

Colin Luther Powell was born in Harlem, New York City, on April 5, 1937, the second of two children of Jamaican immigrant parents. Four years later, he and his parents moved to a four-room apartment in the South Bronx, where Powell would spend his formative years in a mixed-race environment. In his neighborhood no ethnic group could claim to be in the majority, and young Powell would grow up in an atmosphere of racial tolerance. Colin was an indifferent student in public schools despite his parent's hope that he would excel in his studies. After graduation from Morris High School in the Bronx, he gained admission to the City College of New York, where he initially intended to study engineering. Low grades in mathematics, however, persuaded him to change to the less-challenging curriculum in geology, and he graduated with a BS degree in 1958. Along the way, Powell discovered that his real love was participating in the City College of New York Reserve Officers Training Corps program, in which he established a brilliant record. He was a C student in most of his college courses, but he excelled in Reserve Officers Training Corps courses and summer encampments.

Despite the fact that his postgraduation officer training was in the segregated South at Fort Benning, Georgia, Powell was determined not to be distracted by racial bigotry. He later observed in his autobiography that even though he felt the sting of southern racism, he "was not going to let bigotry make me a victim." Focused and determined, he finished in the top ten of his officer class. After tours of duty in Germany and Vietnam as an infantry commander, Powell was promoted to the rank of major in 1964 after only eight years of service, a clear indication that he was on a fast track to success. In 1967 he was among the top ten in his class at the Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, general staff and command school. After finishing a graduate degree in management at George Washington University, he was promoted to lieutenant colonel. Two years later he graduated from the National War College and was promoted to the rank of full colonel.

Although he often longed for a field command, Powell's destiny led him to Washington, D.C., instead. He served first in the Pentagon during the presidential administration of Jimmy Carter and later under President Ronald Reagan as a military adviser in the Department of Defense, reporting to Frank Carlucci and Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger. When Carlucci became national security adviser to President Ronald Reagan, Powell was his chief assistant. Just months later, in 1987, Powell succeeded him as national security adviser and head of the National Security Council. In the George H. W. Bush administration, Powell was promoted to the rank of four-star general and became the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the highest-ranking officer in the military. As the chief commander of American forces in the First Gulf War, coordinating the efforts of his field commander, Norman Schwarzkopf, Powell was the symbol of American military success in Iraq and widely admired for his "Powell Doctrine" of controlled and pragmatic use of military force.

Powell's meteoric rise in the military (made more impressive by the fact that he was not a graduate of a military academy) and his reputation for sound judgment and practical wisdom inevitably brought him to the attention of politicians who saw in him untapped political potential. George H. W. Bush flirted with asking Powell to be his vice presidential running mate, President Bill Clinton wanted the general to be his secretary of state, and Senator Robert Dole offered him a place on his 1996 Republican ticket. Moreover, thanks to his leadership in the First Gulf War, Powell became a household name to many Americans whose admiration for him was reflected in several opinion polls and magazine articles during 1991 and 1992, which showed that he was well liked by a majority of Democrats and Republicans as well as independents.

Powell retired from military service in 1993 and began a lengthy process of evaluating his future in national politics. At the same time, he began work on his autobiography, My American Journey (1996), and launched an extensive speaking schedule to promote his book and himself during 1994 and 1995. The Howard address was part of that campaign of self-promotion. Powell eventually decided not to run for president, but he did accept an offer from George W. Bush to serve as secretary of state, a position he held during Bush's first term from 2001 to 2004. Powell resigned his post amid the controversy surrounding his justification for the invasion of Iraq, although he has since remained quiet about his role in the events leading up to the war. In the month before the presidential election of 2008, General Powell publicly endorsed Barack Obama.

In 2010 Colin Powell was living in retirement with his wife of almost fifty years, Alma, in a suburb of Washington, D.C. Together, they headed America's Promise, a nonprofit corporation that aids disadvantaged young people in a program that reflects Powell's philosophy of self-help, education, and high moral standards.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

Powell begins by establishing an informal, almost humorous tone to his remarks by pointing out how difficult it is to gauge the appropriate length of a graduation speech. Students want a short speech, he observes, while faculty are usually content with a longer address. Parents, because they have so much invested in their children's graduation, in both real and psychic terms, want to bask in the full glow of a lengthy address. He ends these preliminary remarks by asking for frequent applause early on, and in return he promises to keep his speech brief. He quips that if there is no applause, or infrequent applause, then his address is likely to be much longer. In his words, "If you … applaud a lot early on, you get a nice, short speech. If you make me work for it, we're liable to be here a long time."

◆ Free Speech and Race Hatred

But Powell moves quickly almost abruptly into the serious part of his text by announcing clearly that his speech will address the controversial nature of Howard University's free speech policy, a policy that had attracted national attention when Howard administrators allowed black militant and self-proclaimed "truth terrorist" Khalid Muhammad to speak on campus barely a month earlier. Powell never mentions Muhammad or any other participant in the Howard free speech controversy by name, but his intentions are obvious. As he so disarmingly puts it, "Since many people have been giving advice about how to handle this matter, I thought I might as well too." Not surprisingly, he briefly reviews Howard University's distinguished service to the African American community as its most prestigious and largest institution of higher learning and quickly reassures his listeners that in his view Howard would continue its tradition of excellence despite the recent controversy. What Powell wisely avoided, however, was pointing out that Howard did face an uncertain future. For one thing, it could no longer count on automatically attracting the best and the brightest black students, as it had in the past, because the civil rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s had opened the doors of competitive white colleges and universities to black applicants both faculty and students. The unintended result was a kind of brain drain that threatened to alter the unique and privileged status of Howard in black educational circles. But in this speech and to this audience, Powell diplomatically focused on the subject of race hatred and free speech, which had brought the institution unwanted public attention and embarrassing criticism. A year later he would have to confront other challenges to Howard's status as a member of its board of trustees.

Powell is careful to reassure his listeners that the university's position in support of the principle of free speech is one that he endorses. Without mentioning the fact that the outgoing president was widely criticized in the white press for allowing Muhammad to speak, Powell is obviously supportive of the institution's policy. As he puts it, "I have every confidence in the ability of the administration, the faculty and the students of Howard to determine who should speak on this campus. No outside help needed, thank you." Later, in the middle of his script, he reiterates his support of Howard by saying that "I believe with all my heart that Howard must continue to serve as an institute of learning excellence where freedom of speech is strongly encouraged and rigorously protected. That is the very essence of a great university and Howard is a great university." Powell carefully omitted from his text the fact that the university had cancelled the appearance of a white Yale University professor, David Brion Davis, who intended to refute the claims of Khalid. Howard administrators said that in blocking Davis's speech they acted only to protect his personal safety, but critics condemned their actions as a violation of the principles of free speech that they claimed to uphold.

Powell avoids some troubled waters by artfully drawing a thin line between the support of free speech in philosophical terms and the dangers of accepting every opinion as truth. As he put it, the permission of the "widest range of views" should be matched by the responsibility of the university and its students "to make informed, educated judgments about what they hear." His conclusion, which he draws carefully, goes to the heart of his whole point: "But for this freedom to hear all views, you bear a burden to sort out wisdom from foolishness." Here, at the end of the first third of his remarks, Powell returns to a more conventional message that "there is great wisdom" in the old-fashioned virtues of diligence, hard work, and family values, but there "is utter foolishness, evil, and danger in the message of hatred, or of condoning violence, however cleverly the message is packaged." These ideas form an important part of his worldview. Powell is essentially a racial optimist who is convinced that traditional values triumph. His own life story in the military convinced him that although race prejudice could be annoying and frustrating, excellence and success ultimately triumph. In many ways, these ideas form an important theme that runs through his remarkably candid autobiography in which he refused, in his words, "to be a victim of racism."

◆ Racial Cooperation

At the core of Powell's Howard remarks is a brilliantly argued case for the triumph of racial cooperation over racial and ethnic hatred. His primary audience, of course, is those assembled at the graduation exercises, but there are at least two other groups to whom he is speaking. One of those is obviously the national press, whose following he had been courting and would continue to do so for months to come. Another is Khalid Abdul Muhammad and his followers, to whom Powell never directly alludes, but his choice of words and his frame of argument are almost certainly aimed at their principles. Take, for instance, his example of the demise of South Africa's system of apartheid and the election of the black activist Nelson Mandela as president of a new and racially liberated South Africa. In Powell's speech, President Mandela becomes a South African Martin Luther King, Jr., by using "his liberation to work his former tormenters to create a new South Africa and to eliminate the curse of apartheid from the face of the earth. What a glorious example! What a glorious day it was!" Powell must have known, of course, that Khalid Muhammad had frequently referred to Mandela in his own speeches as an example of a black leader like Jesse Jackson in the United States who had been used as a tool by the white power structure to prevent full racial liberation and to create only the illusion of progress. Powell uses the same rebuttal technique in his second example of the recently signed peace accord between the Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin and Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, two seemingly intractable enemies whom Powell rather optimistically (and prematurely, it turns out) claims have tried "to end hundreds of years of hatred and two generations of violence." This Middle East settlement, Powell insists, created "a force of moral authority more powerful than any army." Powell, of course, was fully aware that Khalid Muhammad had savaged Jews time and again as the enemies of world peace, and his use of the Middle East peace accord was intended as another rejection of Muhammad's anti-Semitism. For Powell, these two examples prove that for African Americans the "future lies in the philosophy of love and understanding and caring and building. Not of hatred and tearing down."

The instance of racial cooperation to which Powell devotes most of his speech is that of the Buffalo Soldiers, a contingent of black cavalry in the U.S. Army who had distinguished themselves in a series of military engagements in the post Civil War West. His discussion of the Buffalo Soldiers allows Powell to touch on several points that are central to his Howard message. Powell's connection to the Buffalo Soldiers is, of course, his own service in the military and more directly in his personal efforts to establish a national monument in their honor. In a rather impassioned sentence of the speech, he argues that the military gave him and his forbears including the Buffalo Soldiers, the Tuskegee Airmen, and other black men and women the chance to demonstrate their ability when given the opportunity. "I climbed on their backs," he exclaimed, "and stood on their shoulders to reach the top of my chosen profession." Furthermore, he reminds his audience, the Buffalo Soldiers were formed in 1867, the same year that Howard was founded. Similarly, both were begun and directed in their infancy by well-meaning and right-minded whites who were essential to the survival of both enterprises. This same interracial cooperation, Powell asserts, was instrumental in his own success in the military and, in some ways, in the achievements of the Howard class of 1994 as well.

◆ Patriotic and Ethnic Pride

Powell's patriotic conclusion is aimed most directly at his young black listeners and perhaps secondarily to the black community at large: "Never lose faith in America," he says. "America is a family. There may be differences and disputes in the family, but we must not allow the family to be broken into warring factions." By all means, he instructs the graduates, retain "your heritage." He continues:

> Study your origins. Teach your children racial pride.… Not as a way of drawing back from American society and its European roots. But as a way of showing that there are other roots as well. African and Caribbean roots that are also a source of nourishment for the American family tree.… From the diversity of our people let us draw strength and not cause weakness.

Essential Quotes

"There is great wisdom in the message of self reliance, of education, of hard work, and of the need to raise strong families. There is utter foolishness, evil, and danger in the message of hatred, or of condoning violence, however cleverly the message is packaged or entertainingly it is presented."

(Free Speech and Race Hatred)

"I have no doubt that this controversy will pass and Howard University will emerge even stronger, even more than ever a symbol of hope, of promise, and of excellence."

(Racial Cooperation)

"Study your origins. Teach your children racial pride and draw strength and inspiration from the cultures of our forebears. Not as a way of drawing back from American society and its European roots. But as a way of showing that there are other roots as well. African and Caribbean roots that are also a source of nourishment for the American family tree."

(Patriotic and Ethnic Pride)

And he concludes. "Believe in America with all your heart and soul and mind. It remains the 'last best hope of Earth.'"

Audience

Although Powell's speech was given directly to hundreds of Howard University's 1994 graduates, their friends, families, and the university community of faculty and administrators, it also had a much wider audience. In part, Powell was rebutting the racial attitudes and strategies of Khalid Abdul Muhammad and those of his followers and sympathizers who embraced his philosophy. Additionally, he was addressing a national media audience who may have wrongly associated Howard University with violent black nationalism in an effort to rescue the university's public image; it was not coincidental that Powell was subsequently appointed to Howard's board of regents. And, finally, Powell's speech was also aimed at a national voting audience, black and white, who were potential supporters had he actually decided to throw his political hat into the presidential ring.

Impact

Powell's words were received by his immediate audience with general approval. Several graduates gave him high marks in personal interviews, and presumably they reflected the views of their parents and families, too. The fact that Powell was named to Howard's board of regents a few months after his speech also suggests that the university's administration was suitably impressed. But his most enthusiastic audience was the national press corps. The New York Times and Washington Post gave Powell enthusiastic reviews as a voice of reason on the subject of Howard University and as a reassuring rejection of black supremacists who advocated violence as an important component to full racial liberation; the black mainstream press echoed these impressions. Moreover, one should remember that Powell gave this address at a crucial moment in his consideration of a political career, which included the possibility of running for president of the United States. Bluntly put, the Howard commencement address was, in some sense, an effective campaign speech.

In the years following his Howard remarks, Powell's potential presidential aspirations were largely forgotten along with the historical context of his speech. Today, Powell's words on this occasion are most often found in anthologies of great civil rights speeches rather than in discussions of his political ambitions, which in the mid-1990s may have rivaled those about Barack Obama in the early twenty-first century. Thus, Powell's Howard speech is a fascinating example of how the political rhetoric of one moment can become the timeless wisdom of another.

Questions for Further Study

1. In recent years, the issue of free speech has arisen with regularity on college campuses. Various speakers have been barred from campuses or have had their appearances canceled because of protest on the part of those who do not like the speaker's views. Numerous speakers have been heckled or shouted down and have had eggs and other objects thrown at them. Under what circumstances, if any, do you think a speaker should be barred from appearing on a college campus, or anywhere? Does hosting a speaker constitute endorsement of his or her views? At what point does legitimate protesting of views cross over to a denial of free speech?

2. Why might Colin Powell's appearance at Howard University have perhaps been seen as controversial by some?

3. As a military figure, Powell appeals to his audience by linking the history of Howard University with that of the military, particularly the role of African American soldiers in the nineteenth century. How does he accomplish this aim? What does making such a connection add to his speech?

4. Powell makes reference to Nelson Mandela and F. W. de Klerk of South Africa. What purpose does this reference serve in the speech? What is the linkage between this reference and his reference to the controversy surrounding Khalid Abdul Muhammad?

5. To what extent, if any, might Powell's speech have been a "campaign speech"?

Colin Powell's Commencement Address at Howard University

The real challenge in being a commencement speaker is figuring out how long to speak.

The graduating students want a short speech, five to six minutes and let's get it over. They are not going to remember who their commencement speaker was anyway. P O W E L L.

Parents are another matter. Arrayed in all their finery they have waited a long time for this day, some not sure it would ever come, and they want it to last. So go on and talk for two or three hours. We brought our lunch and want our money's worth.

The faculty member who suggested the speaker hopes the speech will be long enough to be respectable, but not so long that he has to take leave for a few weeks beginning Monday. So the poor speaker is left figuring out what to do. My simple rule is to respond to audience reaction. If you are appreciative and applaud a lot early on, you get a nice, short speech. If you make me work for it, we're liable to be here a long time.

You know, the controversy over Howard's speaking policy has its positive side. It has caused the university to go through a process of self-examination, which is always a healthy thing to do. Since many people have been giving advice about how to handle this matter, I thought I might as well too.

First, I believe with all my heart that Howard must continue to serve as an institute of learning excellence where freedom of speech is strongly encouraged and rigorously protected. That is at the very essence of a great university and Howard is a greet university.

And freedom of speech means permitting the widest range of views to be present for debate, however controversial those views may be. The First Amendment right of free speech is intended to protect the controversial and even outrageous word, and not just comforting platitudes, too mundane to need protection.

Some say that by hosting controversial speakers who shock our sensibilities, Howard is in some way promoting or endorsing their message. Not at all. Howard has helped put their message in perspective while protecting their right to be heard. So that the message can be exposed to the full light of day.

I have every confidence in the ability of the administration, the faculty and the students of Howard to determine who should speak on this campus. No outside help needed, thank you.

I also have complete confidence in the students of Howard to make informed, educated judgments about what they hear.

But for this freedom to hear all views, you bear a burden to sort out wisdom from foolishness.

There is great wisdom in the message of self reliance, of education, of hard work, and of the need to raise strong families. There is utter foolishness, evil, and danger in the message of hatred, or of condoning violence, however cleverly the message is packaged or entertainingly it is presented. We must find nothing to stand up and cheer about or applaud in a message of racial or ethnic hatred.

I was at the inauguration of President Mandela in South Africa earlier this week. You were there too by television and watched that remarkable event. Together, we saw what can happen when people stop hating and begin reconciling. DeKlerk the jailer became DeKlerk the liberator, and Mandela the prisoner became Mandela the president. Twenty-seven years of imprisonment did not embitter Nelson Mandela. He invited his three jail keepers to the ceremony. He used his liberation to work his former tormentors to create a new South Africa and to eliminate the curse of apartheid from the face of the earth. What a glorious example! What a glorious day it was!

Last week you also saw Prime Minister Rabin and PLO Chairman Arafat sign another agreement on their still difficult, long road to peace, trying to end hundreds of years of hatred and two generations of violence. Palestinian authorities have now begun entering Gaza and Jericho.

In these two historic events, intractable enemies of the past have shown how you can join hands to create a force of moral authority more powerful than any army and which can change the world.

Although there are still places of darkness in the world where the light of reconciliation has not penetrated, these two beacons of hope show what can be done when men and women of goodwill work together for peace and for progress.

There is a message in these two historic events for us assembled here today. As the world goes forward, we cannot start going backward.

Document Text

African Americans have come too far and we have too far yet to go to take a detour into the swamp of hatred.

We, as a people who have suffered so much from the hatred of others must not now show tolerance for any movement or philosophy that has at its core the hatred of Jews or anyone else.

Our future lies in the philosophy of love and understanding and caring and building. Not of hatred and tearing down.

We know that. We must stand up for it and speak up for it!

We must not be silent if we would live up to the legacy of those who have gone before us from this campus.

I have no doubt that this controversy will pass and Howard University will emerge even stronger, even more than ever a symbol of hope, of promise, and of excellence. That is Howard's destiny!

Ambassador Annenberg, one of your honorees today, is a dear friend of mine and is one of America's leading businessmen and greatest philanthropists. You have heard of his recent contribution to American education and his generous gift to Howard.

A few years ago I told Mr. Annenberg about a project I was involved in to build a memorial to the Buffalo Soldiers, those brave black cavalrymen of the West whose valor had long gone unrecognized. Ambassador Annenberg responded immediately, and with his help the memorial now stands proudly at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas.

The Buffalo Soldiers were formed in 1867, at the same time as Howard University. It is even said that your mascot, the bison, came from the bison, or buffalo, soldiers. Both Howard and the Buffalo Soldiers owe their early success to the dedication and faith of white military officers who served in the Civil War. In Howard's case, of course, it was your namesake, Major General Oliver Howard. For the 10th Cavalry Buffalo Soldiers, it was Colonel. Benjamin Grierson who formed and commanded that regiment for almost twenty five years. And he fought that entire time to achieve equal status for his black comrades.

Together, Howard University and the Buffalo Soldiers showed what black Americans were capable of when given the education and opportunity; and when shown respect and when accorded dignity.

I am a direct descendant of those Buffalo Soldiers, of the Tuskegee Airmen, and of the navy's Golden Thirteen, and Montford Point Marines, and all the black men and women who served this nation in uniform for over three hundred years. All of whom served in their time and in their way and with whatever opportunity existed then to break down the walls of discrimination and racism to make the path easier for those of us who came after them. I climbed on their backs and stood on their shoulders to reach the top of my chosen profession to become chairman of the American Joint Chiefs of Staff.

I will never forget my debt to them and to the many white "Colonel Griersons" and "General Howards" who helped me over the thirty-five years of my life as a soldier. They would say to me now, "Well done. And now let others climb up on your shoulders."

Howard's Buffalo Soldiers did the same thing, and on their shoulders now stand governors and mayors and congressman and generals and doctors and artists and writers and teachers and leaders in every segment of American society. And they did it for the class of 1994. So that you can now continue climbing to reach the top of the mountain, while reaching down and back to help those less fortunate.

You face "Great Expectations." Much has been given to you and much is expected from you. You have been given a quality education, presented by a distinguished faculty who sit here today in pride of you. You have inquiring minds and strong bodies given to you by God and by your parents, who sit behind you and pass on to you today their still unrealized dreams and ambitions. You have been given citizenship in a country like none other on earth, with opportunities available to you like nowhere else on earth, beyond anything available to me when I sat in a place similar to this thirty-six years ago.

What will be asked of you is hard work. Nothing will be handed to you. You are entering a life of continuous study and struggle to achieve your goals.

A life of searching to find that which you do well and love doing. Never stop seeking. I want you to have faith in yourselves. I want you to believe to the depth of your soul that you can accomplish any task that you set your mind and energy to. I want you to be proud of your heritage. Study your origins. Teach your children racial pride and draw strength and inspiration from the cultures of our forebears.

Not as a way of drawing back from American society and its European roots. But as a way of showing that there are other roots as well. African and Caribbean roots that are also a source of nourishment for the American family tree. To show that African Americans are more than a product of our slave experience. To show that our varied backgrounds are as rich as that of any other American, not better or greater, but every bit as equal.

Our black heritage must be a foundation stone we can build on, not a place to withdraw into.

I want you to fight racism. But remember, as Dr. King and Dr. Mandela have taught us, racism is a disease of the racist. Never let it become yours. White South Africans were cured of the outward symptoms of the disease by President Mandela's inauguration, just as surely as black South Africans were liberated from apartheid.

Racism is a disease you can help cure by standing up for your rights and by your commitment to excellence and to performance. By being ready to take advantage of your rights and the opportunities that will come from those rights. Never let the dying hand of racism rest on your shoulder, weighing you down. Let racism always be someone else's burden to carry.

As you seek your way in the world, never fail to find a way to serve your community. Use your education and your success in life to help those still trapped in cycles of poverty and violence.

Above all, never lose faith in America. Its faults are yours to fix, not to curse.

America is a family. There may be differences and disputes in the family, but we must not allow the family to be broken into warring factions. From the diversity of our people, let us draw strength and not cause weakness.

Believe in America with all your heart and soul and mind. It remains the "last best hope of Earth." You are its inheritors and its future is today placed in your hands.

Go forth from this place today inspired by those who went before you. Go forth with the love of your families and the blessings of your teachers.

Go forth to make this a better country and society. Prosper, raise strong families, remembering that

Louis Farrakhan's Million Man March Pledge

1995

"I ... will strive to improve myself ... for the benefit of myself, my family and my people."

Overview

On October 16, 1995, the Reverend Louis Farrakhan, the leader of the Nation of Islam, brought African American men from around the nation together in Washington, D.C., for a demonstration of unity, pride, and strength. Known as the Million Man March, the daylong assembly culminated with a two-hour speech by Farrakhan that included the recitation of a pledge to secure a better future for African Americans. Unlike Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.'s March on Washington in 1963, where participants were asked to face westward toward the Lincoln Memorial, Farrakhan asked those present "to face eastward toward a new dawn," noted Arthur J. Magida in Prophet of Rage: A Life of Louis Farrakhan and His Nation.

The goals set for the Million Man March were atonement, reconciliation, and responsibility. Farrakhan asked the men in his audience to repent for their sins against themselves and their communities, to forgive those who had done them wrong, and to take responsibility for their families. The day was filled with prayers and speeches given by many prominent African American orators, religious figures, politicians, artists, and entertainers. Most men on the National Mall that day endorsed neither Farrakhan nor the Nation of Islam, but they gathered there to recapture the spirit and integrity of the black male. Farrakhan's closing speech began by outlining the historical oppression of the black man and ended with a pledge each man was asked to recite as a call for individual and collective action.

Context

In his prophetic 1903 book The Souls of Black Folk, the African American activist, editor, and scholar W. E. B. Du Bois foresaw that one of the central concerns of the twentieth century would be the persisting division of American society along racial lines. He and others soon founded the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, an interracial organization that became instrumental in leading the struggle to break through legal and economic barriers to equality during the twentieth century. However, as decades passed, black activists began to feel as though the call for integration had fallen on deaf ears. Some observers believed that racism in the United States was so deeply rooted that it could be countered only by a more assertive ideology an ideology that came to be known as black nationalism.

The basic tenets of black nationalism include two beliefs: first, that African Americans are trapped in a white-dominated society that refuses to grant them comparable civil liberties and economic opportunities and, second, that because the power-holding white majority would continue to oppress them, African Americans had to create their own institutions to provide the goods and services necessary for survival. Black nationalist sentiments gave voice to a growing feeling of disillusionment among people of color, who, rather than feeling like Americans, saw themselves as Africans living in the United States. The outgrowth of black nationalist assumptions was that African Americans had to do one of two things in order to survive and flourish: Create either a separate nation-state outside the United States or an independent African American nation within the southern states.

The sociologist Michael O. West describes "four black nationalist moments" in history. The first of these "moments" occurred during the period referred to as the "Decade of Crisis" before the outbreak of the Civil War. From 1850 to 1861, antiblack social and political policies arose in the United States, compounding racial inequities and prompting many free blacks to view emigration to Haiti as an attractive alternative to the troubling turmoil over slavery. For instance, the Fugitive Slave Act of 1850 compelled Americans to assist in the return of runaway slaves to their owners, even if the slaves had made their way to a free state. Seven years later, the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in the Dred Scott v. Sandford case denied the prospect of citizenship to all blacks, whether slaves or freedpeople. Once the Civil War broke out, the nationalists joined the integrationists to support the Union cause, hoping that black emancipation and equal rights would follow.

The second black nationalist "moment" occurred between 1919 and 1925, after the end of World War I and during the Great Migration in the United States, when large numbers of African Americans moved from the South to the North. Racial tensions reached a peak in American culture and politics at this time, as blacks began to compete with whites for scarce job opportunities. In this context, the Jamaican-born black activist Marcus Garvey and his Universal Negro Improvement Association gained prominence. Garvey's slogan, "Africa for Africans, at home and abroad," called for a renewal of black nationalism and encouraged black capitalism and black pride. Controversy over Garvey's leadership style and actions ended this movement by 1925, but his efforts set the stage for a new vision of black identity later in the twentieth century.

The third black nationalist "moment" began in 1964, roughly a decade into the modern civil rights movement, and ended in the early 1970s with the decline of political nationalist groups such as the Black Panthers. The Supreme Court's trailblazing 1954 decision in Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka which stated that "separate" could never be "equal" energized integrationists to organize and mobilize for full equality for African Americans. Martin Luther King, Jr., and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference encouraged nonviolent resistance as the South exploded with racial conflict. Two important pieces of legislation, the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965, brought an end to legal segregation. The nation seemed poised to rise above its racist history; in reality, however, few African Americans saw any real change in their everyday lives. The prolonged discontent among black Americans led to the emergence of Malcolm X and the Nation of Islam, led by Elijah Muhammad, with a new call for black nationalism. Elijah Muhammad added a religious component to conservative black nationalism while revitalizing the push for black pride and self-sufficiency. Under Muhammad's leadership, the Nation of Islam taught its members that whites were "devils" who were incapable of overcoming their racial prejudices. Muhammad promoted "black capitalism" through black entrepreneurship as a way for African Americans to prosper, free from the constraints of an oppressive white society.

The charismatic Malcolm X became an influential speaker for the Nation of Islam until he broke with the movement on moral grounds in 1964. Shortly before his assassination in 1965, he underwent a spiritual transformation during a hajj to Mecca. His journey led him to abandon his black separatist views and found the Organization of Afro-American Unity. Malcolm's desire to look for common ground with the members of the American civil rights movement posed an ideological threat to the Nation of Islam and is believed to have been the motive for his death. As an outspoken critic of Malcolm X, Louis Farrakhan quickly stepped in as a spokesperson for the Nation of Islam and ultimately became its leader by 1978, after the death of Elijah Muhammad.

While the black Muslims provided religious support for this third black nationalist "moment," the Black Panthers added their own style of secular militarism to help impoverished and frustrated African Americans find solutions to their problems. The Watts riot in 1965 uncovered the intensity of the struggles of African Americans in the nation's urban areas. A predominantly black neighborhood located in south-central Los Angeles, Watts came to embody the long-term effects of unyielding poverty, unemployment, crime, blight, and racial conflict on a community. In the early evening hours of August 11, 1965, a white police officer arrested a black motorist for allegedly driving while intoxicated. This incident ignited deeply held racial tensions and sparked a major riot in Watts marked by six days of violence, looting, and burning. The California-based Black Power movement, which gained a following in the 1960s and 1970s, offered a divergent, radical approach to black nationalism after this violent event. Appealing mostly to the African American working class and urban youth, the Panthers offered a ten-point plan to improve employment, housing, education, and racial justice. Unlike another Black Power organization called Us, founded by Dr. Maulana Karenga, which included only blacks and called for a cultural rebirth, the Panthers worked with Native Americans, Hispanics, and white antiwar protesters to help alleviate the plight of blacks in America's urban areas. The Black Panthers' violent revolutionary nature and open challenges to authority led to the group's demise by the early 1970s. However, the cultural black nationalists survived this period by utilizing less radical tactics of protest. Their efforts resulted in the establishment of black studies programs in American colleges and universities and the solidifying of black cultural practices into American society (for example, through the creation of Kwanzaa by Karenga in 1966).

The growth of conservative ideology in American politics brought about the fourth black nationalist "moment." In the early 1980s U.S. president Ronald Reagan and his Republican administration removed many social programs that blacks perceived were working to level the playing field in American society, such as affirmative action. In this vein, black Americans turned to religious leaders for hope, and the popularity of the Nation of Islam swelled. As poverty, unemployment, and civil unrest grew in the 1980s, ethnic and racial connections and nationalist feelings took on renewed importance; the Nation of Islam's radicalism became more attractive to black Americans who felt the political, social, and economic gaps were widening between the races. In his 1996 book In the Name of Elijah Muhammad: Louis Farrakhan and the Nation of Islam, the Swedish religious scholar Mattias Gardell offers insights into Farrakhan's rise to power in the 1980s. Farrakhan's charisma and his ability to speak to black America's youth, along with the emergence of hip-hop culture and rap music as venues for communication within the black community, helped young people gravitate toward his nationalist message. According to Gardell, at a time of declining faith in mainstream American politicians, the actions of the Nation of Islam to combat gang violence, crime, drugs, and poverty were seen as successful attempts to curb the problems affecting blacks in the United States.

It was against this backdrop that Louis Farrakhan initiated the idea for the Million Man March in 1995, when black men were called to Washington, D.C., for atonement and reconciliation around the overall theme of unity. Held on October 16, 1995, on the National Mall in Washington, the Million Man March proved to be the largest black demonstration in the history of black America and, according to Gardell, a turning point for acceptance of the Nation of Islam within mainstream black America. The National Park Service estimated attendance at four hundred thousand, while the Nation of Islam claimed that nearly two million men were present on the Mall that day. An independent group of researchers, led by the director of the Boston University Center for Remote Sensing, estimated the count to be 837,214, with a margin of error of 20 percent.

Farrakhan and the other event planners intended this day of atonement, reconciliation, and responsibility to include both Muslim and Christian black men and to be understood at two levels. As explained by Gardell, first, black men and their leaders needed to atone for "having allowed the community to embark on the path of self-destruction." Farrakhan asked black men to take responsibility for destroying their families and their communities with antisocial and criminal behaviors. Second, the government, representing white America, needed to "acknowledge the burden of guilt" by atoning for the horrors of slavery and working toward an end to white supremacy. The mission statement for the march explains in detail this challenge to the U.S. government. Included is a request for the government to admit to and apologize for its role in the "Holocaust of African Enslavement," to more thoroughly teach the appalling truth about slavery, and to pay reparations to African Americans. Also included is a call to fortify gains in voting rights, health care, and housing, along with a request to adopt an "economic bill of rights" with a plan for rebuilding urban areas. With regard to foreign policy, the mission statement urges the government to provide for equal treatment of refugees of color from Africa, the Caribbean, and other developing nations, to forgive foreign debt of former colonies, and to change the way the United States intervenes in the Middle East and around the world to promote other nations' sense of self-determination.

Part of Farrakhan's reconciliation message was directed at the Nation of Islam. Although critics, according to West, suggested that behind this rhetoric lurked the twin black nationalist ideas of patriarchy and black capitalism, many who were not supporters of the Nation of Islam and its separatist beliefs still benefited from the energy and camaraderie of this event. Rather than demanding a separate state to promote black nationalism, Farrakhan instead reached out to President Bill Clinton to join a unified black movement. He also spoke about reconciling with groups he had targeted in the past, such as Jews and other more moderate organizations such as the Urban League and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, which had boycotted the march.

The full title of the march included the subheading "The Day of Absence." Farrakhan and his organizers asked black women to stay at home and organize and mobilize their communities in support of the Million Man March. This controversial request angered many African American women's groups, which protested their exclusion. Farrakhan also called upon those unable to attend the march to stay away from work, school, businesses, and places of entertainment to help focus the nation on the themes of atonement, reconciliation, and responsibility.

The Reverend Jesse Jackson spoke on the afternoon of the march, delivering a speech that helped to clarify the question, Why march? Jackson cited facts and statistics highlighting the inequities within American society and suggested what the men present must do. He observed, for example, that there were two hundred thousand more blacks in jail than in college, that the media portrayed blacks as unintelligent and violent, that blacks were less able to borrow money in a system built on credit, and that three-strike drug laws unfairly punished smalltime dealers, who were more likely to be black than white, rather than the bigger drug traffickers, who tended to be white. In an article for Maclean's, Carl Mollins pointed to other researchers who showed "that blacks constitute 13% of drug users, but make up 35% of arrests, 55% of convictions and 74% of imprisonments for drug possession."

Further statistics from the 1990s demonstrate the differences between white and black America that Jackson and Farrakhan described. According to the Department of Commerce, during that decade blacks fared poorly compared with their white counterparts in a variety of economic and social measures. The unemployment rate among blacks was more than twice the amount found for whites (at 11 percent and 5 percent, respectively), and almost three times the number of blacks compared with whites fell below the poverty level (at 31 percent and 12 percent, respectively). The life expectancy for blacks was sixty-nine years of age, compared with seventy-six years for whites, and blacks were seven times more likely to become homicide victims than were whites. The need for improvement in areas such as these became a rallying cry at the Million Man March. Overall, the march gained historical significance as a prime example of peaceful, well-organized political action in twentieth-century America. Farrakhan's pledge focused national attention on African American ideals and helped renew black America's commitment to social change.

About the Author

Louis Abdul Farrakhan, originally named Louis Eugene Walcott, was born on May 11, 1933, in the Bronx, New York, and later raised in Boston. He graduated with honors from the prestigious Boston English High School. After dropping out of college in 1953, he earned the title of "the Charmer" because he performed professionally on the Boston nightclub circuit as a violinist, dancer, and singer of calypso and country songs. In 1955 he joined the Nation of Islam after being invited to attend a local convention in Chicago, Illinois, thereby choosing to give up music for a life dedicated to the teachings of Elijah Muhammad. He changed his name to Louis X, which was a custom followed by members of the Nation of Islam, who believed their family names originated with white slaveholders. He worked closely with Malcolm X in Harlem and was later given the name Abdul Haleem Farrakhan by Elijah Muhammad.

After Malcolm X's assassination in 1965, Farrakhan was given the job of head minister at Harlem's Temple No.7 in New York City and became the second in command of the organization. When Elijah Muhammad died in 1975, the Nation of Islam fragmented, and Elijah's son, Warith Deen Muhammad, emerged as its new leader with the goal of steering the focus of the organization away from radical black nationalism and separatist teachings. Farrakhan's disappointment over not being selected as the group's leader led him to break away in 1975 to form a splinter group, still called the Nation of Islam, which preserved the original teachings of Elijah Muhammad. Farrakhan is credited with rebuilding the Nation of Islam throughout the 1980s according to its militant, black nationalist roots but at the same time helping it to gain acceptance in a nation built on a Christian tradition.

Although Farrakhan was a prominent leader within the Nation of Islam, it was not until the 1984 presidential campaign that mainstream America was introduced to his rhetoric. A series of controversies over Farrakhan's praise of Adolf Hitler and his use of anti-Semitic statements arose during the campaign of the Reverend Jesse Jackson, who was vying for the Democratic nomination for U.S. president in 1984. Farrakhan played on the perceived exploitation of blacks by American Jews, resulting in the alienation of a significant number of moderate Democrats who had shown early support for Jackson. Farrakhan's utterance during the campaign that Judaism was a "gutter religion" further fueled his critics. According to Dennis Walker in Islam and the Search for African-American Nationhood: Elijah Muhammad, Louis Farrakhan and the Nation of Islam, many Jackson supporters on the secular Left believed that Farrakhan was "using the presidential primaries as a 'step up for the Nation of Islam' more than as a way to mobilize blacks to vote for Jesse." Farrakhan eventually withdrew his support for the Jackson campaign. Despite these controversies, between 1983 and 1985 Farrakhan gained momentum as a national black leader who reached across America's divide to attract followers from all corners of the black community.

In 1993 Farrakhan battled prostate cancer and the resulting conflicts within the Nation of Islam over his possible successor. That same year, the acclaimed black filmmaker Spike Lee's Malcolm X revived the accusation that Farrakhan might be responsible for Malcolm's death. In the film, Lee portrays Elijah Muhammad and his inner circle in the Nation of Islam as secretly plotting the assassination of Malcolm X. In the last year of his life, Malcolm broke ties with the Nation of Islam, journeyed to Mecca, and rejected the philosophy of black separatism. After embracing the idea of an interracial solution to the civil rights crisis in America, Malcolm was viewed as a turncoat by the leaders of the Nation of Islam. Two months before the assassination, Farrakhan voiced his displeasure with Malcolm's rebirth as an integrationist, writing in the Nation's newspaper, "The die is set, and Malcolm shall not escape.… Such a man as Malcolm is worthy of death."

Dr. Betty Shabazz, Malcolm's widow, stated publicly that she felt Farrakhan was somehow involved in the murder of her husband. Farrakhan, however, has repeatedly refuted any connections to Malcolm's assassins. In 2000 he was interviewed by the 60 Minutes correspondent Mike Wallace, and an account of that interview states that Farrakhan "denied ordering the assassination but later admitted to having 'helped create the atmosphere' that led to it." Farrakhan found himself at the center of another assassination plot in 1994, when the Federal Bureau of Investigation implicated one of the daughters of Malcolm X, Qubilah Shabazz, in the hiring of a hit man to kill Farrakhan. The charges against Shabazz were later dropped.

Since the mid-1990s, Farrakhan has been most recognized nationally and internationally as the primary organizer of the Million Man March of October 16, 1995, which led to subsequent marches over the next ten years. The Million Woman March, staged on October 25, 1997, drew over one million women to the streets of Philadelphia to promote solidarity for black women and to address such issues as human rights abuses against blacks and the crack cocaine trade in black neighborhoods. In 2000, the Million Family March focused on family unity and racial and religious harmony; African American men, women, and children, along with members of all races, were invited to convene in Washington, D.C., to discuss important social and political issues such as abortion, health care, education, welfare, and substance abuse. Five years later, on the tenth anniversary of the Million Man March, the Millions More March was held to unite black men, women, and children. The Millions More March suggested a need to end divisiveness among blacks and black organizations and called for the pooling of financial and intellectual resources to work toward the common goal of uplifting the African American community.

Following a near-death experience in 2000 resulting from complications of prostate cancer, Farrakhan toned down his racial rhetoric and attempted to reach out to other minorities, including Native Americans, Hispanics, and Asians. As of 2010, he continued to lead the Nation of Islam, traveling extensively throughout the United States and the rest of the world, to promote black nationalism and his vision for unity and world peace.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

The Million Man March Pledge was the Reverend Louis Farrakhan's way of publicly reaffirming the values of the black community in the United States. Considered by many to be the high point of the daylong assembly, it was recited in unison by the attendees of the march at the close of Farrakhan's long awaited two-hour speech. The speech itself was a dramatic event, with the minister standing behind a bulletproof glass screen, immaculately dressed and surrounded by uniformed Fruit of Islam bodyguards.

Scholars note that it is helpful to interpret and evaluate Farrakhan's speech and the pledge that followed with an eye toward the historical and current perspectives of the black community. Farrakhan's success as the most anticipated speaker of the march ties in with his commanding stage presence and effective use of oratory devices such as rhythm, reliance upon myths, and repetition. Rhythm was evident throughout the entire march with the use of music, but it also appeared in Farrakhan's speech as he varied the volume, pitch, rate, and pauses in his delivery. This tactic reflects the traditional use of rhythm in African culture to enhance spirituality and connection to God. According to Jessica M. Henry in an article for the Howard Journal of Communications, "African Americans tend to use mythoforms to help explain the human condition, to preserve links to the past, and as an answer to the problem of existence in a racist society." Farrakhan used this approach when he quoted Negro spirituals and passages from the Bible during his speech; he explained the condition of African Americans by connecting the past and present through these stories.

Repetition is a device that helps an audience remember a speaker's message; it also allows an orator to move from one level of intensity to another. The pledge was a good example of the effective use of repetition. Farrakhan repeated the obvious themes of the march atonement, reconciliation, and responsibility and continually brought his audience back to the importance of God and religion. For every request in the Pledge, Farrakhan asked the men to recite after him: "I [insert your name here] pledge that from this day forward I will" thereby emphasizing the personal nature of the promises that were made by the audience.

The purpose of the pledge was to mobilize and organize the men into action. Its first two sentences provide an overview of the ways black men must improve to benefit themselves, their families, and their people. They are asked to make an ongoing commitment to living fuller and more meaningful lives and building strong, loving families. The third sentence suggests ways to better the African American community economically. Specifically, Farrakhan and the organizing committee called on the audience to contribute to a Black Economic Development Fund to build up black communities. They began by taking donations that day and urged participants to continue to pledge money to this fund when possible. They also called for a massive voter registration drive to jumpstart political activity among blacks and help enact meaningful legislation to better the lives of people of color in the United States.

The second paragraph asks black men to take responsibility for their families and to cease the abuse of black women and children. The language is surprisingly direct and targets the very destructive nature of domestic abuse. Farrakhan reiterates his request for black men to be accountable and dependable while they build family relationships based upon equality and mutual respect.

The last paragraph calls for community involvement in the struggle against drugs, crime, and violence and seeks stronger actions to end poverty and increase employment. Farrakhan suggests that black men needed to organize and support positive role models for black youth and support black media outlets as a way to improve the image of blacks in America. He emphasizes the need for volunteerism and strong leadership to correct the societal problems within black communities.

Audience

Louis Farrakhan's Million Man March Pledge was delivered to an estimated eight to nine hundred thousand attendees on October, 16, 1995, but it is clear that he intended it to reach the millions of other black men who would hear this pledge repeated as a call to action across the nation. It was a statement heard through the media by whites as well, encouraging racial understanding and a sense of reconciliation throughout the nation. Furthermore, Farrakhan's message targeted the U.S. government, advocating dialogue and change in national political, economic, and social policies to help black America overcome its struggles. And finally, it was a call for foreign governments to increase their financial responsibility to the world's black communities.

Impact

Although there are many ways to examine African American history, Louis Farrakhan's Million Man March Pledge can best be understood as one course of proposed actions

Essential Quotes

"I … will strive to improve myself spiritually, morally, mentally, socially, politically and economically for the benefit of myself, my family and my people."

(Paragraph 1)

"I pledge from this day forward I will support black newspapers, black radio, and black television. I will support black artists who clean up their acts to show respect for themselves, respect for their people, and respect for the ears of the human family."

offering hope to a group of people who were still struggling to achieve equal status in America in the 1990s. Supporters of the march, such as Dr. Cornel West of Princeton University, suggested it was a success not only because it displayed a black united front but also because it sent a sign of hope and renewed possibilities to African Americans. Many observers noted that in the year following the march, more black men registered to vote, volunteered for neighborhood and mentorship programs, and in the case of divorced fathers took responsibility for their families by increasing their child support payments, therefore demonstrating that follow-up actions were taken as a result of the pledge.

Critics, however, have argued that the Million Man March was unsuccessful both in the planning of the event and in the aftermath, when antagonism and financial mismanagement loomed. Because of the many controversies surrounding Louis Farrakhan, the mastermind of the event, they questioned whether it was possible to separate "the message from the messenger." For some, messages associated with Farrakhan are seen as founded in hatred, especially because of his history of anti-Semitic comments toward Jews and the black supremacist teachings of the Nation of Islam. Yet many observers believe that the appeals to racial pride, personal responsibility, and economic empowerment inherent in the Million Man March captured the hearts and minds of those who attended and spread hope throughout the black community.

Questions for Further Study

1. In your opinion, was it a mistake for the Million Man March to exclude women?

2. On the one hand, Farrakhan chastised African American men for ""having allowed the community to embark on the path of self-destruction." On the other hand, he chastises the white community for the history of enslavement and white supremacy. Do you see these views as inconsistent? Or do you see them as complementary views, both of which are valid?

3. In the twenty-first century, Louis Farrakhan is regarded by many people as a somewhat frightening figure because of his outspokenness and militancy. Further, his position as leader of the Nation of Islam renders him suspect in the eyes of some because of instances of Islamic terrorism, including the September 11, 2001, attack on the United States. Do you believe that this characterization of Farrakhan is fair? Do you believe that it is "possible to separate 'the message from the messenger'"?

4. Farrakhan called for members of his audience to support black institutions such as newspapers, businesses, and cultural figures. Do you believe that it is possible for the black community to solve problems of unemployment and poverty by the establishment of and support for exclusively black organizations?

5. What do you think Elijah Muhammad, Stokely Carmichael, or Malcolm X would have thought of the Million Man March and its pledge? For help, see Malcolm X's "After the Bombing," Stokely Carmichael's "Black Power," and the FBI Report on Elijah Muhammad.

Louis Farrakhan's Million Man March Pledge

I pledge that from this day forward I will strive to love my brother as I love myself. I, from this day forward, will strive to improve myself spiritually, morally, mentally, socially, politically and economically for the benefit of myself, my family and my people. I pledge that I will strive to build business, build houses, build hospitals, build factories and enter into international trade for the good of myself, my family and my people.

I pledge that from this day forward I will never raise my hand with a knife or a gun to beat, cut, or shoot any member of my family or any human being except in self-defense. I pledge from this day forward I will never abuse my wife by striking her, disrespecting her, for she is the mother of my children and the producer of my future. I pledge that from this day forward I will never engage in the abuse of children, little boys or little girls for sexual gratification. For I will let them grow in peace to be strong men and women for the future of our people.

I will never again use the "B word" to describe any female. But particularly my own black sister. I pledge from this day forward that I will not poison my body with drugs or that which is destructive to my health and my well-being. I pledge from this day forward I will support black newspapers, black radio, black television. I will support black artists who clean up their acts to show respect for themselves and respect for their people and respect for the ears of the human family. I will do all of this so help me god.

One America in the 21st Century

"America's greatest promise in the 21st century lies in our ability to harness the strength of our racial diversity."

Overview

On September 18, 1998, the panel that carried out President Bill Clinton's Initiative on Race released its final report, One America in the 21st Century. Earlier, on June 13, 1997, Clinton had issued Executive Order 13050, which charged the panel with investigating the state of American race relations at the end of the twentieth century. The directive asked the panel to advise him "on matters of race and racial reconciliation," to "promote a constructive national dialogue to confront and work through challenging issues that surround race," and to "identify, develop, and implement solutions to problems in areas in which race has a substantial impact, such as education, economic opportunity, housing, health care, and the administration of justice." To carry out these tasks, he called on seven distinguished experts led by the panel's chairman, the historian John Hope Franklin. For some fifteen months the members of the panel traveled throughout the United States, conducting town hall meetings and public forums and talking with people about their experiences regarding race. The excerpt reproduced here is the executive summary from their final report.

Context

In 1905, W. E. B. Du Bois, one of the leading voices of what would become the Harlem Renaissance, wrote in The Souls of Black Folk that "the problem of the Twentieth Century is the problem of the color-line." Nearly a century later, the persistence of the "color-line" was manifest to many Americans, including President Bill Clinton.

Clinton was not the first president to march up to the color line and try to breach it. In the 1930s, Franklin D. Roosevelt gathered an informal group of African American advisers that came to the called the Black Cabinet. Led by such figures as Mary McLeod Bethune, this group kept the president abreast of developments and concerns in the black community in the later years of the Great Depression. In 1946, in the aftermath of World War II, Roosevelt's successor, Harry S. Truman, issued an executive order that formed the Committee on Civil Rights. The committee's report, To Secure These Rights, was delivered to the president on October 29, 1947. Among the concrete outcomes of Truman's initiative were two executive orders dated July 26, 1948. Executive Order 9980 desegregated the federal workforce, and Executive Order 9981 desegregated the armed forces.

Much work, though, remained to be done, particularly because Truman's 1948 civil rights legislation proposals were blocked in Congress by recalcitrant southern legislators and later, near the end of his second term, Truman was distracted by the Korean War. Racism and segregation remained widespread into the 1960s, prompting a civil rights movement that was arguably the most significant campaign for social change in the nation's history. In a climate of considerable racial unrest, President Lyndon B. Johnson invited more than two thousand five hundred participants to the White House Conference on Civil Rights, which met on June 1 2, 1966. The conference was contentious. The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, a leading civil rights organization, boycotted the event, and many black leaders were disturbed by the findings of the recently published Moynihan Report. This document, prepared by Assistant Secretary of Labor Daniel Patrick Moynihan, seemed to attribute problems in the black community to a "pathology" that was undermining the black family. Nevertheless, the conference issued a final report, To Fulfill These Rights, an allusion to the unfinished work of the Truman committee. The report suggested ways to overcome the economic, social, and legal problems that resulted from racial discrimination.

Although Johnson had successfully achieved long-sought sweeping civil rights legislation in 1964 and 1965, the mid-1960s were nevertheless a racial cauldron. Riots erupted in major U.S. cities, including Detroit and Newark. The militant Black Panther Party was formed in late 1966. Demands for "Black Power" were replacing the peaceful calls for racial harmony coming from Martin Luther King, Jr. Further, the war in Vietnam was becoming a major distraction for Johnson, and the war's cost, both economic and political, was undermining his "Great Society" domestic agenda. In this climate, on July 28, 1967, Johnson formed the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, informally known as the Kerner Commission after its chairman, Governor Otto Kerner of Illinois. In 1968 the commission issued its final report, and despite the moderate political makeup of the commission, it laid the problems of poverty and urban despair at the feet of white racism: "Our nation is moving toward two societies, one black, one white separate and unequal." With regard to the ghetto, the commission concluded: "White institutions created it, white institutions maintain it, and white society condones it." The commission also stated that "white racism is essentially responsible for the explosive mixture that has been accumulating in our cities since the end of World War II." Nothing came of the report, however. Johnson continued to be absorbed by the highly unpopular war in Vietnam, and that year he announced that he would not run for reelection. A weary Johnson was angered that the commission did not sufficiently recognize his civil rights accomplishments which had also included ending the filibuster of the Civil Rights Act of 1960 as Senate majority leader and that his legacy would be Vietnam, not, for example, the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Johnson was convinced that the urban rioting was the work of agitators and Communists. His successor in office, Richard M. Nixon, ran on a platform of law and order, pushing initiatives for civil rights and racial reconciliation to the back burner, though he did support desegregation and affirmative action.

When Bill Clinton assumed the presidency in 1993, the position of African Americans was mixed. On the one hand, the barriers of segregation had been breached in government. In the previous two decades the number of black elected officials nationwide had risen from about three thousand five hundred to over eight thousand. Mississippi, long considered a bastion of segregation and discrimination, had the highest number of black elected officials of any state in the Union by the end of Clinton's presidency. In 1992 voters in Illinois elected the nation's first black woman to the U.S. Senate. The U.S. House of Representatives had forty black members, and black mayors were at the helm of such major cities as Atlanta, New York, Detroit, New Orleans, and Birmingham.

Progress on the economic front was slower. When Clinton took office in 1993, the median annual income for blacks was just over $21,000, but for whites it was nearly $39,000. The poverty rate among blacks was double that of the nation at large. An economic divide appeared in the black community as more and more blacks were moving decisively into the middle class while a permanent underclass seemed to remain trapped in poverty. During the Clinton administration, a conservative Supreme Court issued decisions that weakened the "affirmative action" programs that courts and legislatures had designed to help counteract the effects of past discrimination. Clinton himself backed a 1996 welfare reform bill the Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act of 1996 that, in the view of many, adversely affected African Americans, given the persistent poverty found in many black communities.

Other disparities existed as well. Whites were twice as likely as blacks to have a bachelor's degree. Black men were six times more likely than white men to be imprisoned at some point in their lives, and their sentences tended to be longer. While blacks were about 13 percent of the population, they made up 30 percent of federal offenders. Bill Clinton inherited these and other disparities when he assumed office in January 1993. He had won the election in part because of strong support among African Americans. Although he came from Arkansas, a state that had played an infamous role in the racial tensions of the 1950s notably the violence that surrounded the integration of Little Rock Central High School he had shown a commitment to racial equality early in his political career. As state attorney general, and later during several terms as governor, he appointed numerous blacks (including many women) to government positions. Eighty percent of African American voters cast their ballots for him in the 1992 presidential election; that figure rose to 84 percent in 1996.

Racial tensions, though, continued to percolate. In March 1991 the infamous Rodney King incident took place in Los Angeles. King, driving while intoxicated, was involved in a high-speed chase with Los Angeles police and California Highway Patrol officers in pursuit. When the officers were finally able to pull him over and drag him from his car, they Tasered him and beat him with batons actions that a bystander caught on a videotape that was repeatedly played on news broadcasts. Later, the officers would testify that King was hostile and possibly on drugs and that they were merely trying to bring him under control. The dramatic videotape, however, led many to conclude that the officers were guilty of police brutality. In 1992, during the campaign season that led to Clinton's election, a jury acquitted the four officers involved in the incident of charges that they had used excessive force. The verdict touched off riots in Los Angeles that led to over fifty deaths, nearly two thousand four hundred injuries, damage to more than three thousand businesses, and property damage of nearly a billion dollars.

Thus, despite some progress toward a more racially harmonious society, Clinton perceived that the struggle was ongoing. He forecast the Initiative on Race in his 1997 inaugural address when he said, "The challenge of our past remains the challenge of our future will we be one nation, one people, with one common destiny, or not? Will we all come together, or come apart?" He went on to say that "the divide of race has been America's constant curse" but also said that "our rich texture of racial, religious, and political diversity will be a godsend in the 21st century. Great rewards will come to those who can live together, learn together, work together, forge new ties that bind together." With these goals in mind, he launched the Initiative on Race in 1997.

About the Author

As chairman of the panel, the principal author of One America in the 21st Century was the historian John Hope Franklin. Franklin was born on January 2, 1915, in Rentiesville, Oklahoma. He was named after John Hope, one of the founders (in 1905) of the assertive black rights organization known as the Niagara Movement. He and his parents were survivors of the infamous Tulsa, Oklahoma, riot of 1921. After graduating from Fisk University in Nashville in 1935 and earning a doctorate in history from Harvard University in 1941, Franklin tried to offer his services to the military during World War II but was rejected because he was black. Instead, he began his teaching career at Fisk, then in North Carolina at St. Augustine's College and North Carolina College. Beginning in 1947 he taught at Howard University, but he left in 1956 to chair the history department at Brooklyn College. In 1964 he joined the faculty at the University of Chicago, where he remained until 1982. The following year he accepted a professorship at Duke University, and although he "retired" in 1985, he continued to teach legal history at the Duke University law school until 1992. Meanwhile, during the 1950s, Franklin was part of the team of researchers who worked with the attorney and future Supreme Court justice Thurgood Marshall to provide the sociological background material that contributed to the Court's decision ending racial segregation in schools in Brown v. Board of Education (1954).

Franklin was tireless in his profession as an editor of the Journal of Negro History and as a speaker, writer, and member of various professional organizations and government delegations and commissions, such as the National Council on the Humanities. Among his major publications were The Emancipation Proclamation, The Militant South, The Free Negro in North Carolina, Reconstruction after the Civil War, A Southern Odyssey: Travelers in the Antebellum North, From Slavery to Freedom: A History of African-Americans, and The Color Line: Legacy for the Twenty-first Century. Franklin died on March 25, 2009.

Other members of the president's panel included Linda Chavez-Thompson, the executive vice president of the American Federation of Labor Congress of Industrial Organizations and, since 1997, the vice chairperson of the Democratic National Committee. Suzan D. Johnson Cook

The William Winter Institute for Racial Reconciliation at the University of Mississippi is named in his honor.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

The portion of the document excerpted here is the executive summary. This type of synopsis is often included in government and business reports to provide readers with a snapshot of the document as a whole. It calls attention to the high points without going into specific detail. Readers can locate topics of interest in the executive summary, then go to the body of the report for details and supporting data.

◆ Introduction

The summary begins with a quotation from the president. The day after he had issued the executive order launching the Initiative on Race, he gave the commencement address at the University of California at San Diego. He used the opportunity to publicize the initiative and to rally public support for it. The text then goes on to outline the goals of the initiative. What is noteworthy is that unlike similar reports in the past, this report promises to focus less on overt racism and more on diversity, the notion that the United States, a "multiracial democracy," is a diverse mixture of racial and ethnic groups and that the nation is stronger for it. Thus, the emphasis is less on assigning blame for racial problems than on finding new ways to ensure "racial inclusion."

The introduction then sums up the facts surrounding the Initiative on Race, referring to the president's original executive order and listing the panel's membership. The panel, then, was "tasked with examining race, racism, and the potential for racial reconciliation in America using a process of study, constructive dialogue, and action." The operating procedure is briefly summarized. For fifteen months, the panel "canvassed the country," holding meetings on college campuses and with church, business, Indian, and other leaders that focused on such issues as civil rights enforcement, education, poverty, employment, housing, stereotyping, the administration of justice, health care, and immigration. The panel points out that it had no authority to commit federal resources, and it acknowledges that it could not provide a "definitive analysis of the state of race relations in America today." The mission was to record findings and impressions and to recommend ways to implement positive change.

◆ "Chapter One—Searching for Common Ground"

As the title suggests, the purpose of the first chapter, as summarized in the executive summary, is to emphasize the shared goals and aspirations of all Americans: equality, fairness, freedom, housing, education, health care, and decent employment. Reference is made to Pathways to One America in the 21st Century: Promising Practices for Racial Reconciliation, a reference guide the panel produced in 1999. Promising Practices highlighted 124 community-based and national organizations and projects that worked toward the improvement of racial and ethnic relationships. These programs all met the panel's criteria of promoting racially inclusive collaboration, educating on racial issues, fostering civic engagement, and generally encouraging racial harmony. The panel emphasizes the need for "strong leadership in the corporate, religious, and youth sectors of our society."

◆ "Chapter Two—Struggling with the Legacy of Race and Color"

The executive summary notes that the second chapter focuses on the historical record, the way that "each minority group shares a common history of legally mandated or socially and economically imposed subordination." The panel emphasizes that racial progress can be made only if all Americans understand this historical legacy. The panel also makes clear that its investigation included not just African Americans but also Native Americans, Latinos, Asians and Pacific Islanders, and white Americans who, because of their ethnicity, might continue to face discrimination.

The summary states that the report pays particular attention to the issue of affirmative action, that is, to programs that go beyond equal opportunity to encourage positive efforts to recruit members of racial minorities in business, academia, the government, and so forth. Affirmative action became government policy during the presidential administrations of John F. Kennedy and Lyndon B. Johnson in the 1960s but was widely contested as "reverse discrimination" from the 1970s onward. The subject remained highly controversial during the Clinton years, for in the eyes of some observers, it created a "quota" system for hiring minorities and sometimes appeared to place white candidates for the same jobs at a disadvantage or to favor some minorities (such as blacks and Latinos) over others (notably Asian Americans). In a 1996 case, Hopwood v. University of Texas Law School, the U.S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals invalidated an affirmative action admissions program at the law school, holding that a "diverse" student body was not a compelling state interest. Then in 1996, California voters approved Proposition 209, which abolished all forms of affirmative action; the state of Washington followed suit in 1998. Thus, affirmative action and questions about its fundamental fairness and race neutrality were on the minds of policy makers during these years. The panel asserts that "properly constructed" affirmative action programs have played a major role in reducing discrimination over the past two decades and attributes the controversy to a "lack of knowledge and understanding about the genesis and consequences of racial discrimination."

◆ "Chapter Three—The Changing Face of America"

In recent years, the emphasis in discussions of race has been less on the legacy of white racism and more on the concept of diversity, that is, the more positive notion that a nation's diverse ethnic and racial makeup can strengthen it by ensuring inclusion of differing viewpoints and experiences in business decisions, education, and other arenas. The summary calls attention to the changing ethnic makeup of America and to predictions that in the year 2050 the nation's demographics would be considerably different than they were at the end of the twentieth century. As intermarriage becomes more common, states the summary, concepts of "black" and "white" are eroding, since more and more children are of mixed race. The panel also emphasizes that attention must be given to the needs of less visible minorities, such as Native Americans and Pacific Islanders.

◆ "Chapter Four—Bridging the Gap"

The summary notes that Chapter Four points to some of the specific findings and recommendations to emerge from the panel's investigations. Key areas of focus include civil rights enforcement (including enforcement of laws against racially motivated "hate crimes") and education. With reference to education, the panel cites the need to implement the administration's Comprehensive Indian Education Policy, launched the previous year. The panel goes on to outline goals in other areas, including antipoverty initiatives (for example, job training, raising the minimum wage, providing assistance to small businesses), improvements in access to affordable housing (by, for instance, providing funds for community revitalization), stereotyping, and law enforcement. With regard to law enforcement, the panel calls attention to racial profiling that is, the use of race to help identify likely criminals and disparities in drug law enforcement. For example, many observers at the time believed that by imposing longer sentences for users of

- "Chapter Five—Forging a New Future"

Chapter Five looks forward. The summary draws attention to the President's Council for One America, again shifting the focus away from assigning blame for past actions and focusing on a future, more united America; the council was formed essentially to continue the work of the panel by exploring long-term solutions to racial problems and to make public policy recommendations. The summary then notes that the report calls for comprehensive multimedia educational programs about race, community leadership, and leadership among youth. The summary also promises that Chapter Five will touch on a miscellaneous group of ancillary issues, such as environmental justice (for example, the issue of whether minorities are relegated to the most environmentally distressed areas of cities), police misconduct, and stereotyping in the media. It concludes with a promise to list ten suggestions "on how Americans can help to build on the momentum that will lead our Nation into the 21st century as one America."

Audience

The audience for One America in the 21st Century was the nation at large. Clinton believed that it was time for the nation to have a dialogue on race, and his Initiative on Race was a major part of that dialogue. His goal was to provoke thought about ongoing racial barriers and, more important, thought about how to dismantle those barriers. Given his long commitment to civil rights and equality of opportunity going back to his days as attorney general and governor of Arkansas, he also wanted to reassure the African American community that he remained committed to their goals and aspirations. By assembling a panel that was balanced along racial, gender, political, and sectional lines, he hoped to involve all Americans in the discussion. To that end, numerous ancillary documents, including discussion and teaching guides such as the One America Dialogue Guide, were published along with the report and remain available. These documents are intended for use not only by educators but also by any group or organization formed with the goal of promoting discussion of racial issues. Oddly, the report itself was not published in book form until 2008.

Impact

Although he had been reelected as president in 1996, Clinton knew that his legacy was being tarnished because of the scandals that surrounded him, some of them dating from before his presidency. During the investigation surrounding these allegations, Clinton lied under oath about an improper sexual relationship he had had with Monica Lewinsky, a White House intern. Eventually, this evasion led to impeachment proceedings in 1998 1999, culminating in Clinton's acquittal by the U.S. Senate on charges of perjury and obstruction of justice. Even Clinton's supporters were willing to admit that his race initiative and One America in the 21st Century were partly intended to shift the focus away from his personal failings, refurbish his image, and create a more positive legacy.

The question, then, is whether he succeeded. In the eyes of many observers, the race initiative was a noble effort but one that had few if any concrete outcomes. Some observers, in reacting to the report, argued that it was motivated primarily by politics. Clinton, a Democrat, launched the effort during his second term, when the U.S. Congress had come under Republican control. Thus, there was little likelihood that any specific legislation would emerge from the undertaking, so Clinton faced little political risk by putting forward the initiative when he did. Others criticized the effort for failing to create an overarching strategy for dealing with racial problems, particularly at a time when the very concept of "race" in America was in flux, especially because of immigration, legal and illegal, from Mexico and Central America. Still others observed that the initiative was undermined by lack of a clear need; then by tactical miscues, lack of focus, public meetings whose purpose was unclear; and finally by the Lewinsky scandal, which drowned out the race initiative in the media. Others criti-

Questions for Further Study

1. Author Toni Morrison famously referred to Bill Clinton as the nation's "first black president." Clinton, of course, is white. What do you think Morrison meant by this characterization? Do you think that there is some element of truth to it? What might President Barack Obama think of this characterization, particularly since his major Democratic opponent in his run for the presidency was Bill Clinton's wife, Hillary Rodham Clinton?

2. What good do you think programs such as Clinton's Initiative on Race do? Can they lead to substantial discussion and progress, or are they a type of political theater? Explain.

3. Compare One America in the 21st Century with To Secure These Rights, produced in 1947 under the administration of President Harry Truman. Do the documents share similar concerns? How was each document a product of its time?

4. What role, if any, do you believe politics played in the Initiative on Race? Do you believe that the political context of the Initiative on Race and of One America in the 21st Century was important?

5. Compare this document and its goals with U.S. Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas's Concurrence/Dissent in Grutter v. Bollinger, issued in 2003. What do you think the panel that prepared One America in the 21st Century thought of Thomas's views? How do the two documents represent somewhat polar views of race in America?

6. Read this document in conjunction with the U.S. Senate Resolution Apologizing for the Enslavement and Racial Segregation of African Americans, passed in 2009. To what extent do you think the Senate's apology helped carry out the goals of the Initiative on Race?

cized the initiative for vagueness and timidity. Despite these criticisms, many of Clinton's supporters contended that race had not been seriously discussed for a generation and that the initiative shifted the discussion in a positive direction, from white racism to the less volatile issue of racial and cultural diversity in America.

One America in the 21st Century

Today, I ask the American people to join me in a great national effort to perfect the promise of America for this new time as we seek to build our more perfect union.... That is the unfinished work of our time, to lift the burden of race and redeem the promise of America.

President Clinton, June 14, 1997

America's greatest promise in the 21st century lies in our ability to harness the strength of our racial diversity. The greatest challenge facing Americans is to accept and take pride in defining ourselves as a multiracial democracy. At the end of the 20th century, America has emerged as the worldwide symbol of opportunity and freedom through leadership that constantly strives to give meaning to democracy's fundamental principles. These principles justice, opportunity, equality, and racial inclusion must continue to guide the planning for our future.

On June 13, 1997, President William Jefferson Clinton issued Executive Order No. 13050 (the "Executive Order"), which created the Initiative on Race (the "Initiative") and authorized the creation of an Advisory Board to advise the President on how to build one America for the 21st century. The Board, consisting of Dr. John Hope Franklin (chairman), Linda Chavez-Thompson, Reverend Dr. Suzan D. Johnson Cook, Thomas H. Kean, Angela E. Oh, Bob Thomas, and William F. Winter, was tasked with examining race, racism, and the potential for racial reconciliation in America using a process of study, constructive dialogue, and action.

Board members have spent the last 15 months seeking ways to build a more united and just America. They have canvassed the country meeting with and listening to Americans who revealed how race and racism have impacted their lives. Board meetings focused on the role race plays in civil rights enforcement, education, poverty, employment, housing, stereotyping, the administration of justice, health care, and immigration. Members have convened forums with leaders from the religious and corporate sectors.

This Report, a culmination of the Board's efforts, is not a definitive analysis of the state of race relations in America today. Board members had no independent authority to commit Federal resources to a particular problem, community, or organization. Rather, this Report is an account of the Board's experiences and impressions and includes all of the recommendations for action submitted by the Board to the President following its formal meetings, Many have already been implemented or are awaiting congressional action.

Chapter One—Searching for Common Ground

Throughout the year, the Board heard stories and shared experiences that reinforced its belief that we are a country whose citizens are more united than divided. All too often, however, racial differences and discrimination obstruct our ability to move beyond race and color to recognize our common values and goals. Common values include the thirst for freedom, desire for equal opportunity, and a belief in fairness and justice; collective goals are securing a decent affordable home, a quality education, and a job that pays decent wages. All people, regardless of race, want financial and personal security, adequate and available health care, and children who are healthy and well-educated. Chapter One discusses these shared goals and values and also describes how the Initiative used dialogue as a tool for finding common ground. Through One America Conversations, the Campus Week of Dialogue, Statewide Days of Dialogue, tribal leaders meetings, and the One America Dialogue Guide, the Initiative was able to spark dialogue across the country. The chapter also points to the importance of recruiting a cadre of leaders to provide strong leadership in the corporate, religious, and youth sectors of our society and provides examples of Promising Practices.

Chapter Two—Struggling with the Legacy of Race and Color

Chapter Two confronts the legacy of race in this country and in so doing, answers the question of whether race matters in America. Our Nation still struggles with the impact of its past policies, practices, and attitudes based on racial differences. Race and ethnicity still have profound impacts on the extent to which a person is fully included in American society and provided the equal opportunity and equal protection promised to all Americans. All of these characteristics continue to affect an individual's opportunity to receive an education, acquire the skills necessary to maintain a good job, have access to adequate health care, and receive equal justice under the law.

Americans must improve their understanding of the history of race in this country and the effect this history has on the way many minorities and people of color are treated today. Each minority group shares a common history of legally mandated and/or socially and economically imposed subordination to white European-Americans and their descendants. In this chapter, the experiences of American Indians and Alaska Natives, African Americans, Latinos, Asian Pacific Americans, and white immigrants are highlighted.

The lesson of this chapter is that the absence of both knowledge and understanding about the role race has played in our collective history continues to make it difficult to find solutions that will improve race relations, eliminate disparities, and create equal opportunities in all areas of American life. This absence also contributes to conflicting views on race and racial progress held by Americans of color and white Americans.

This is especially relevant in the context of race-conscious affirmative action programs. Lack of knowledge and understanding about the genesis and consequences of racial discrimination in America often make it difficult to discuss affirmative action remedies productively. It also obscures the significant progress made in the last two decades in eliminating racial disparities in the workplace and in educational institutions through the use of properly constructed affirmative action strategies.

Chapter Three—The Changing Face of America

In Chapter Three, the Board examines the changing face of America. The discussion of race in this country is no longer a discussion between and about blacks and whites. Increasingly, conversations about race must include all Americans, including, but not limited to, Hispanics, American Indians and Alaska Natives, and Asian Pacific Americans. Statistics show that by the year 2050, the population in the United States will be approximately 53 percent white, 25 percent Hispanic, 14 percent black, 8 percent Asian Pacific American, and 1 percent American Indian and Alaska Native. This represents a significant shift from our current demographics of 73 percent white, 12 percent black, 11 percent Hispanic, 4 percent Asian Pacific American, and 1 percent American Indian and Alaska Native.

Further complicating the discussions of race is the increasing amount of interracial marriages. Americans are marrying persons of a different race at consistently high rates. U.S. Census data show that 31 percent of native-born Hispanic husbands and wives, between ages 25 and 34, have white spouses. In the native-born Asian Pacific American category, 36 percent of the men and 45 percent of the women marry white spouses.

The complexities, challenges, and opportunities that arise from our growing diversity point to the need for a new language, one that accurately reflects this diversity. Our dialogue must reflect the steps being taken to close the gap in data reporting on America's less visible racial groups American Indians, Alaska Natives, Native Hawaiians, and all of the subgroups of Asian Pacific Americans and Hispanics.

Chapter Four—Bridging the Gap

Chapter Four summarizes key facts and background information that emerged from each of the Board's formal meetings and the recommendations made to the President on civil rights enforcement, education, economic opportunity, stereotypes, criminal justice, health care, and the immigrant experience. The data show that although minorities and people of color have made progress in terms of the indicators used to measure quality of life, persistent barriers to their full inclusion in American society remain.

In the area of civil rights enforcement, the Board made the following recommendations:

- Strengthen civil rights enforcement.
- Improve data collection on racial and ethnic discrimination.
- Strengthen laws and enforcement against hate crimes.

Two of the early Board meetings focused on the role of education in helping to overcome racial disparities. These meetings stressed the importance of educating children in high-quality, integrated schools, where they have the opportunity to learn about and from each other. These meetings served as the basis for the following recommendations:

Document Text

• Enhance early childhood learning.
• Strengthen teacher preparation and equity.
• Promote school construction.
• Promote movement from K 12 to higher education.
• Promote the benefits of diversity in K 12 and higher education.
• Provide education and skills training to overcome increasing income inequality that negatively affects the immigrant population.
• Implement the Comprehensive Indian Education Policy.

The Board analyzed the issue of economic opportunity through formal meetings on employment and poverty. Information gathered showed that a substantial amount of disparity remains between the economic prosperity of whites and most minority groups. Also, the Board found clear evidence of active forms of discrimination in employment, pay, housing, and consumer and credit markets. The Board made the following recommendations for correcting these disparities:

• Examine income inequality.
• Support supplements for Small Business Administration programs.
• Use the current economic boom to provide necessary job training and to increase the minimum wage.
• Evaluate anti-poverty program effectiveness.
• Provide a higher minimum wage for low-wage workers and their families.
• Improve racial data collection.
• Evaluate the effectiveness of job-training programs designed to reach minority and immigrant communities.
• Commission a study to examine American Indian economic development.
• Support the right of working people to engage in collective bargaining.

The U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development convened a meeting for the Board on race and housing. Active forms of racial discrimination continue to plague our housing markets. According to current statistics, blacks and Hispanics are likely to be discriminated against roughly half of the time that they go to look for a home or apartment. The recommendations for addressing the disparities in the area of housing follow;

• Continue to use testing to develop evidence of continuing discrimination.
• Highlight housing integration efforts.
• Support the increase and targeting of Federal funds for urban revitalization.
• Support community development corporations.
• Promote American Indian access to affordable housing.

In one meeting, the Board addressed the issues surrounding negative racial stereotypes, which are the core elements of discrimination and racial division. Stereotypes influence how people of different races and ethnicities view and treat each other. The Board's recommendations on stereotypes, which follow, focus on using both public and private institutions and individuals to challenge policymakers and institutional leaders to examine the role stereotypes play in policy development, institutional practices, and our view of our own racial identity:

• Hold a Presidential event to discuss stereotypes.
• Institutionalize the Administration's promotion of racial dialogue.
• Convene a high-level meeting on the problem of racial stereotypes with leaders from the media.

At the Board meeting on race, crime, and the administration of justice, experts explained how racial disparities and prejudices affect the way in which minorities are treated by the criminal system. Examples of this phenomenon can be found in the use of racial profiling in law enforcement and in the differences in the rates of arrest, conviction, and sentencing between whites and minorities and people of color. These discoveries led to the following recommendations:

• Expand data collection and analysis.
• Consider restricting the use of racial profiling.
• Eliminate racial stereotypes and diversify law enforcement.
• Reduce or eliminate drug sentencing disparities.
• Promote comprehensive efforts to keep young people out of the criminal justice system.
• Continue to enhance community policing and related strategies.
• Support initiatives that improve access to courts.
• Support American Indian law enforcement.

The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services sponsored a meeting on race and health for the Board. Disparities in the treatment of whites and minorities and people of color by the health care system can be attributed to disparities in employment, income, and wealth. The Board made the following recommendations as a result of information received at this meeting:

• Continue advocating for broad-based expansions in health insurance coverage.
• Continue advocacy of increased health care access for underserved groups.

Document Text

• Continue pushing Congress for full funding of the Race and Ethnic Health Disparities Initiatives.

• Increase funding for existing programs targeted to under served and minority populations.

• Enhance financial and regulatory mechanisms to promote culturally competent care.

• Emphasize the importance of cultural competence to institutions training health care providers.

The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace and the Georgetown University Law Center jointly sponsored a meeting for the Board that explored immigration and race. Evidence showed that race is the source of a fundamental rift in American society that affects immigrants and their experiences with discrimination. The Board issued the following recommendations as a result of the information it received in this meeting:

• Strongly enforce anti-discrimination measures on behalf of every racial and ethnic minority group.

• Back programs that would promote a clear understanding of the rights and duties of citizenship.

• Support immigrant-inclusion initiatives.

Chapter Five—Forging a New Future

Chapter Five calls for the continuation of the Initiative to complete the work already begun. The following elements are the most critical in developing a meaningful long-term strategy to advance race relations in the 21st century:

• A President's Council for One America. This year's effort has been vital in laying the foundation for the larger task that lies ahead. The creation of a President's Council for One America speaks to the need for a long-term strategy dedicated to building on the vision of one America. Its main function would be to coordinate and monitor the implementation of policies designed to increase opportunity and eliminate racial disparities.

• A public education program using a multimedia approach. A public education program could assist in keeping the American public informed on the facts about race in America, pay tribute to the different racial and ethnic backgrounds of Americans, and emphasize and highlight the common values we share as a racially diverse Nation.

• A Presidential "call to action" of leaders from all sectors of our society. A call to action should come from the President to leaders in State and local government and private sector organizations to address the racial and ethnic divides in their communities. Public/private partnerships can demonstrate leadership by working collaboratively to make racial reconciliation a reality in all communities across America.

• A focus on youth. Young Americans are this Nation's greatest hope for realizing the goal of one America. Young people must be engaged in efforts to bridge racial divides and promote racial reconciliation. Organizations and groups that encourage the development of youth leaders must be supported.

This chapter also includes a brief discussion of other critical issues, such as environmental justice, media and stereotyping, and police misconduct, that the Advisory Board believes deserve further dialogue. Among these issues is affirmative action, which the Board believes remains an important tool among many for overcoming racial discrimination and promoting the benefits of diversity in education, employment, and other contexts.

Chapter Five concludes with the 10 suggestions on how Americans can help to build on the momentum that will lead our Nation into the 21st century as one America.

Glossary

affirmative action	any program that takes positive steps to increase the representation of minority groups in employment, college admissions, and the like collective bargaining	negotiation between an employer and a labor union hate crimes	crimes that are motivated by animus against a particular group, such as African Americans, gays, or women
K–12	kindergarten through twelfth grade
racial profiling	in law enforcement, the practice of singling out members of a racial (or ethnic) group for closer scrutiny, based on the belief that such people are more likely to commit crimes

Clarence Thomas's Concurrence/Dissent in Grutter v. Bollinger

2003

"The Constitution abhors classifications based on race."

Overview

In 2003 the U.S. Supreme Court decided Grutter v. Bollinger, with the majority opinion sanctioning the use of affirmative action in higher education. Justice Clarence Thomas wrote a separate opinion, concurring in part and dissenting in part from the Court's judgment, in order to emphasize his view that government consideration of race for any purpose is unconstitutional. The case involved a challenge to the constitutionality of the University of Michigan Law School's admission policies, under which the race of any applicant from a historically disadvantaged minority group was considered a "plus" factor in the evaluation of that applicant. The plaintiff, an unsuccessful white applicant, sued the law school, alleging that its use of such affirmative action in admissions violated the Constitution's equal protection clause. The Court upheld the law school's admission program, holding that institutions of higher education may consider an applicant's race as one of many factors in a holistic, individualized assessment of each applicant in an effort to compose a diverse student body. Justice Thomas concurred in the majority's reasoning that affirmative action programs should be viewed with suspicion, but he dissented from the Court's holding that the law school's admission program passed such heightened judicial scrutiny.

Context

The first contemporary reference to affirmative action was made on March 6, 1961, when President John F. Kennedy issued Executive Order 10925. That order mandated that government contractors "take affirmative action" to ensure that their hiring and employment practices became free of racial bias. On September 24, 1965, President Lyndon B. Johnson issued Executive Order 11246, which superseded President Kennedy's order. Among other conditions, Johnson's order required that government contractors set concrete goals in their hiring of minorities, create specific measures to reach those goals, and report their progress in reaching those goals to the federal government. In essence, Johnson's order adopted the theory that civil rights laws prohibiting discrimination alone were not enough to remedy racial discrimination.

Initially, the concept of affirmative action received widespread support from both conservatives and liberals, as evidenced by President Richard Nixon's implementation of the "Philadelphia Order," a program designed by Arthur Fletcher, an African American Republican who eventually earned the distinction of being called "the father of affirmative action." The Philadelphia Order created a test program that specified required goals and timetables in the hiring and retention of minorities by craft unions and the construction industry in Philadelphia. The plan was later used a national model for federal contractors. President Nixon recalled in his memoirs his belief that affirmative action was justified, stating:

> A good job is as basic and important a civil right as a good education.… I felt that [affirmative action] was both necessary and right. We would not impose quotas, but would require federal contractors to show affirmative action to meet the goals of increasing minority employment.

On June 28, 1978, the U.S. Supreme Court issued its first decision analyzing the constitutionality of a racial classification benefiting minorities. In Regents of the University of California v. Bakke (1978), the Court held that the separate admissions program for minorities at the School of Medicine of the University of California, Davis, which set aside sixteen out of one hundred places for minority students, unfairly discriminated against the plaintiff, a white applicant whom the university had denied admission despite his having scored significantly higher on admissions tests than some admitted minority applicants. In a split opinion, the Court found that the medical school's admissions plan was unconstitutional as implemented because it amounted to a rigid quota. However, the Court noted that race could be a permissible consideration in higher education admissions in some circumstances.

The Court's rejection of strict race-based quotas in Bakke triggered an aggressive campaign by conservatives to eliminate affirmative action programs, which they characterized as "reverse discrimination" against white Americans. The split among the justices in Bakke foreshadowed the difficulties the Court would face over the next two decades in developing a coherent constitutional framework for analyzing racial classifications intended to ameliorate the effects of past discrimination or to ensure diversity.

Just a year after Bakke, the Supreme Court upheld a different affirmative action plan. In United Steelworkers of America v. Weber (1979), an employer adopted an affirmative action plan to remedy racial imbalance in the workforce resulting from past discrimination. Prior to the affirmative action plan, the employer had hired as skilled "craft workers" only those persons who previously had such experience. Because African Americans had long been excluded from craft unions, very few African Americans had the necessary credentials, and therefore very few were eligible to be hired under the employer's policy. To remedy the racial imbalance, the employer had adopted a plan under which it would hire from the ranks of its own lower-skilled workers; it established a training program for those workers and required that at least half of new trainees be African American until such time as the percentage of African American skilled craft workers approximated the percentage of African Americans in the local labor force. The Court ruled that the plan did not impermissibly discriminate against white employees. The Court held that measures taken to remedy a conspicuous racial imbalance that exists owing to past discrimination are permissible if they are temporary and do not "unnecessarily trammel the interests" of white employees or present an absolute bar to their advancement.

In 1989 in City of Richmond v. J. A. Croson Co., on the other hand, the Court held that a program setting aside a portion of the city's construction funds for minority-owned firms was not "narrowly tailored" to serve a "compelling governmental interest" and was therefore unconstitutional under the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. In Croson, a majority of the Court held for the first time that affirmative action programs designed to aid racial minorities were subject to the same high degree of judicial skepticism "strict scrutiny" under the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection clause as government action intended to injure racial minorities. The next year, however, in Metro Broadcasting, Inc. v. Federal Communications Commission (1990), the Supreme Court distinguished federal affirmative action programs from those adopted by a state, holding that such federal programs were subject to a lesser degree of judicial skepticism, known as "intermediate scrutiny." Among other reasons, the Court believed that the special constitutional role of Congress in enforcing the post Civil War constitutional amendments (the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments) justified a greater degree of judicial deference to congressional remedies for racial inequality than was appropriate for state action in the area.

Yet the Court's tolerance for federal affirmative action programs proved to be short lived. In 1995 in Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, the Court reversed the Metro Broadcasting decision and held that "federal racial classifications, like those of a State, must serve a compelling governmental interest, and must be narrowly tailored to further that interest." Applying this heightened standard, the Court struck down a federal affirmative action program that provided a financial incentive to contractors who employed subcontracting firms owned by members of historically disadvantaged minority groups.

In Adarand, Justice Thomas agreed with the Court's decision striking down the federal affirmative action program but wrote a separate concurring opinion to express his belief that laws designed to benefit a historically oppressed racial group are as morally and constitutionally troubling as laws designed to subjugate such a group. The reasoning employed by Justice Thomas in his Adarand concurrence challenged both the constitutionality and moral underpinnings of government-sponsored affirmative action programs. Adarand was the last major Supreme Court case prior to Grutter v. Bollinger to assess the permissibility of race-conscious government action intended to correct racial imbalances or achieve racial diversity.

Coincident with Grutter, on June 23, 2003, the Court decided Gratz v. Bollinger, declaring unconstitutional the University of Michigan's undergraduate admissions program, which awarded additional admissions points based upon an applicant's membership in an underrepresented minority group. In Grutter v. Bollinger, the Court would address a constitutional challenge to the University of Michigan Law School's admission program, which considered an applicant's race as one of many factors in an individualized assessment of each applicant in order to create a diverse student body. As Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's majority opinion notes, the law school's admissions policy aimed to "focus on academic ability coupled with a flexible assessment of applicants' talents, experiences, and potential 'to contribute to the learning of those around them.'" In addition to considering numerical factors such as each applicant's Law School Admission Test scores and undergraduate grade point average, the law school also considered a variety of "'soft' variables," such as the applicant's personal essay, recommendation letters, and areas of undergraduate study.

The policy also directed admissions officers to consider what contribution an applicant could make to the diversity of the law school's student body. While the policy directed consideration of the "many possible bases for diversity admissions," it also reaffirmed the law school's long-standing commitment to "racial and ethnic diversity with special reference to the inclusion of students from groups which have been historically discriminated against, like African-Americans, Hispanics and Native Americans, who without this commitment might not be represented in our student body in meaningful numbers." The law school's policy did not employ quotas or seek a predefined number of such students in each entering class. It did, however, seek to enroll a "critical mass" of students from underrepresented minority groups in order to ensure "their ability to make unique contributions to the character of the Law School" and to avoid racial isolation.

A rejected white applicant sued the law school. She alleged that the law school's consideration of race, even though it did not amount to a rigid quota, violated various civil rights statutes and the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection clause, which provides that no state shall "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

The Supreme Court, in Justice O'Connor's majority opinion, upheld the law school's admission policy. The Court applied its most stringent standard of review, known as strict scrutiny, which requires that the use of race be justified by a "compelling governmental interest" and that the means used to further that interest be "narrowly tailored," with no "less restrictive means" apparent. The Court held that the law school's judgment that a diverse student body provides educational benefits to all students was entitled to judicial respect, and the Court agreed that consideration of race in order to achieve a diverse student body served a compelling governmental interest. The Court reasoned that substantial educational benefits flow from a diverse student body. Diversity, the opinion states, quoting the district court, "promotes 'cross-racial understanding,' helps to break down racial stereotypes, and 'enables [students] to better understand persons of different races.' These benefits are 'important and laudable,' because 'classroom discussion is livelier, more spirited, and simply more enlightening and interesting' when the students have 'the greatest possible variety of backgrounds.'" The Court also held that the law school's limited consideration of race as a "plus" factor in an individualized, holistic, flexible assessment of each candidate was narrowly tailored to achieving these interests. The Court cautioned, however, that it believed that in twenty-five years, consideration of race in admissions even in the limited fashion approved in Grutter should no longer be necessary to achieve racial diversity. In a separate opinion, Thomas agreed with some of the majority's opinions, but in the main he rejected the view that race consciousness in the law school's admissions policy was constitutional.

About the Author

Clarence Thomas, the second African American justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, was born in Pin Point, Georgia, in 1948. Thomas's mother raised him and his two siblings, Myers and Emma, after their father abandoned the family. Pin Point was an impoverished community; the town lacked a sewage system and paved roads. When Thomas was seven years old, a fire destroyed the family's Pin Point home, and Thomas's mother sent the future justice and his younger brother to live with their maternal grandparents, Myers and Christine Anderson, in Savannah, Georgia.

The Andersons provided what many African Americans considered a middle-class upbringing for the Thomas brothers. That did not shield the young Clarence from being put to work by his self-made grandfather, who often woke the child at 3 AM to help with his fuel business and to complete household chores. The Andersons paid for their grandson's private school education at the all-black elementary school run by Saint Benedict the Moor Catholic Church in Savannah.

Thomas distinguished himself as an exceptional student at Saint Benedict, despite feeling that he did not fit in with the middle-class African American children there. For example, he still had a Creole-based Gullah accent, a result of the time he had spent with his grandfather on the coasts of South Carolina and Georgia. Some classmates nicknamed Thomas "ABC: America's Blackest Child" because of his full lips, coarse hair, and dark skin. Nonetheless, as one of his biographers has noted, Thomas was a "legend" in the black Catholic community, serving as an altar boy and volunteering at Mass and also as a recruiter for Saint Benedict at area elementary schools.

After two years at the Catholic all-black Saint Pius X High School, Thomas enrolled at Saint John Vianney Minor Seminary, an exclusive virtually all-white school on an island six miles from Savannah. Thomas wanted to become the first African American priest in Savannah; he was one of only two African American seminarians during the 1964 school year. Thomas excelled at the seminary, despite feeling alienated there by some of the white seminarians.

Upon graduating from Saint John Vianney in 1967, Thomas enrolled at Conception Seminary in northwest Missouri. Thomas spent only one year in Missouri owing to both the fundamental changes that occurred within the Catholic Church during the 1960s and the racial turmoil of the times. On April 4, 1968, a fellow seminarian, upon hearing that Martin Luther King, Jr., had been shot, used an epithet to state that he hoped King died. Disturbed by the racial tension at Conception, Thomas left Missouri for the College of the Holy Cross in Worcester, Massachusetts.

At Holy Cross, Thomas helped to form the school's first Black Student Union, immersed himself in the speeches of Malcolm X, grew his hair out into an Afro, and daily donned what many of his classmates considered a Black Panther style outfit: army fatigues, leather jacket, and a beret. During his senior year at Holy Cross, he became less enthused with protesting and being what he considered "drunk with anger." He instead focused on putting his education to use as a civil rights lawyer in Savannah.

During his senior year at Holy Cross, Thomas decided to next attend Yale Law School. While at Yale, he worked hard to distinguish himself. During his summer of law school, he worked at one of the most prominent civil rights law firms in Georgia. Thomas impressed the partners at the Georgia firm, who offered him a position, but he declined, focusing on obtaining a job in private practice. However, he eventually instead accepted a position with the attorney general of Missouri, John C. Danforth. Thomas worked as an assistant attorney general under Danforth, primarily handling tax matters. After Danforth's election to the U.S. Senate, Thomas soon moved to Washington, D.C., to work as a legislative assistant in his office.

In 1981, President Ronald Reagan appointed Thomas as the assistant secretary of education for the Office of Civil Rights in the U.S. Department of Education and subsequently appointed him chairman of the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. In June 1989, President George H. W. Bush appointed Thomas to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. On July 1, 1991, following Justice Thurgood Marshall's announcement of his retirement, President Bush nominated Thomas to the Supreme Court of the United States. After a contentious hearing, the Senate confirmed his nomination by a vote of fifty-two to forty-eight, the narrowest margin in favor of a Supreme Court nominee in over a century. With his appointment, Thomas became the second African American Supreme Court justice in history. Upon joining the Court, he immediately aligned himself with its most conservative members. Justice Thomas regularly voted to strike down affirmative action programs, to limit the right to reproductive freedom, and to narrow the scope of federal civil rights laws, such as the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

Justice Thomas, joined by Justice Antonin Scalia, both concurred with and dissented from the Court's ruling. Thomas's opinion adheres to his view that the government cannot take account of race under any circumstances unless pressing emergency circumstances (such as national security) are at stake. For Thomas, "our Constitution is color-blind" a quote taken from Justice John Marshall Harlan's dissent in the landmark 1896 case Plessy v. Ferguson, which established the "separate but equal" doctrine forbidding governmental consideration of race in nearly all circumstances, whether intended to harm or help historically oppressed groups.

In the introductory paragraphs of his opinion, Thomas announces his position. He begins with a quotation from an address delivered by the abolitionist Frederick Douglass in 1865, entitled "What the Black Man Wants." In that speech Douglass says: "If the negro cannot stand on his own legs, let him fall also. All I ask is, give him a chance to stand on his own legs!" With this quotation, Thomas makes clear that he opposes affirmative action programs. Such programs, he reasons, are benevolent, but they are also condescending and unconstitutional: "The majority upholds the Law School's racial discrimination not by interpreting the people's Constitution, but by responding to a faddish slogan of the cognoscenti." After expressing agreement with some incidental conclusions in the majority opinion, he launches into his dissent.

In Part I of his opinion, Thomas argues that none of the law school's proffered reasons could justify its use of race in admissions. Under the existing case law, he contends, governmental consideration of race is permitted only when done in the interest of national security or to remedy past discrimination for which the government is responsible. Consideration of race for the purpose of achieving a diverse student body is not permissible because, in his view, "diversity" is not a "compelling governmental interest." He declares, quoting his own concurrence in Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña, that racial classifications, regardless of the purposes for which they are utilized, "ultimately have a destructive impact on the individual and our society."

In Part II, Thomas iterates that achieving racial diversity for its own sake cannot be a compelling governmental interest. He argues, rather, that consideration of race in law school admissions should be permitted only if it furthers some other goal, such as the putative educational benefits that a more diverse learning environment provides a stated goal of the school. However, Thomas asserts, the law school failed to try other race-neutral alternatives, such as changing its admissions criteria across the board, to achieve the same educational benefits asserted to flow from racial diversity.

Thomas argues in Part III that admissions programs that try to ensure diversity do not meet the "compelling governmental interest" requirement because the goal of law school diversity is not a pressing public necessity. He contends, in fact, that states do not have a compelling interest in operating state-run law schools at all because operating law schools is not a "pressing public necessity" and that it therefore follows that they cannot have a compelling interest in running an elite law school where high admissions requirements result in the lack of diversity that the law school is concerned with. The only possible compelling interest a state could have in this field, he argues, would be in the training of its citizens to become lawyers within the state. The University of Michigan Law School, however, as an elite law school, trains relatively few Michigan citizens, and relatively few of its graduates remain in Michigan to practice law.

In Part IV, Justice Thomas asserts that Justice O'Connor's majority opinion erroneously applied the governing legal standards in deciding the case. Specifically, Thomas contends that the law school's admissions program is not "narrowly tailored" to achieve its educational interest. Under the Court's precedents, he writes, governmental consideration of race is permitted only when it is the single method of achieving a compelling goal. Thomas argues that

"The majority upholds the Law School's racial discrimination not by interpreting the people's Constitution, but by responding to a faddish slogan of the cognoscenti."

(Introduction)

"The Constitution abhors classifications based on race, not only because those classifications can harm favored races or are based on illegitimate motives, but also because every time the government places citizens on racial registers and makes race relevant to the provision of burdens or benefits, it demeans us all."

such is not the case in Grutter. Among other possibilities, he believes that if the law school were to adopt "different admissions methods, such as accepting all students who meet minimum qualifications" perhaps using lower Law School Admission Test and grade-point-average thresholds "the Law School could achieve its vision of the racially aesthetic student body without the use of racial discrimination." The majority opinion did not require the law school to explore such possibilities because it deferred to the school's judgment that its present admissions program was necessary, doing so in view of the educational autonomy grounded in the First Amendment that has traditionally been granted to institutions of higher education. Thomas argues, however, that First Amendment notions of academic freedom do not lessen the scrutiny that courts should apply when assessing whether a state university's race-conscious action violates the equal protection clause.

In Part V of his opinion Thomas criticizes the law school's use of highly selective admissions criteria, primarily the Law School Admissions Test (LSAT). He argues that no law school is required to use the LSAT as its primary admissions criterion, but having decided to do so, a law school must be aware of the racially disproportionate results in LSAT scores. Thus, having determined to rely heavily on the LSAT, Thomas states, the law school "must accept the constitutional burdens that come with this decision." The law school, he states, should not be permitted to employ an admissions device that will cause a racial imbalance and then seek to correct that imbalance through consideration of race in the admissions process.

Thomas contests the idea that affirmative action is beneficial to racial minorities in Part VI. To the contrary, such programs, he writes once more quoting his Adarand concurrence are a form of discrimination that "engender[s] attitudes of superiority or, alternatively, provoke[s] resentment among those who believe that they have been wronged by the government's use of race," and they also "stamp minorities with a badge of inferiority and may cause them to develop dependencies or to adopt an attitude that they are 'entitled' to preferences." Justice Thomas here expands upon the "stigma" he believed is imposed on racial minorities by affirmative action in university admissions:

> The majority of blacks are admitted to the Law School because of discrimination, and because of this policy all are tarred as undeserving.... When blacks take positions in the highest places of government, industry, or academia, it is an open question today whether their skin color played a part in their advancement. The question itself is the stigma because either racial discrimination did play a role, in which case the person may be deemed "otherwise unqualified," or it did not, in which case asking the question itself unfairly marks those blacks who would succeed without discrimination.

Finally, in Part VII of his opinion, Thomas states that he agrees with the majority opinion on two points. First, he agrees that law schools may not distinguish between different groups of underrepresented minorities in admissions. Second, he agrees with the majority's remark that any consideration of race in admissions by state-run law schools would be illegal in twenty-five years, as he believes them to be illegal currently.

Justice Thomas's opinion in Grutter is grounded in his view that the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection clause, both textually and as a matter of the framers' original intent, presumptively forbids all government consideration of race, regardless of whether the government is acting to aid or injure historically oppressed groups. Other justices have criticized this view for focusing on formal equal treatment rather than or in addition to issues of substantive equality. Justices and legal scholars supporting substantive equality have argued that equal protection sometimes permits differential treatment to account for unequal circumstances and that the framers of the equal protection clause themselves engaged in a form of race-conscious "affirmative action," through the variety of measures directly and solely aimed at aiding free blacks after the Civil War.

Audience

Supreme Court opinions are addressed to the parties affected by the judgment, such as private or governmental litigants whose conduct is found to be illegal or unconstitutional. Supreme Court opinions are also addressed to the lower courts, where they either affirm the lower courts' judgments in the case at hand or reverse them by clarifying, modifying, or overruling earlier cases or adopting a new interpretation of the Constitution or a federal statute. Separate concurring or dissenting opinions, such as Justice Thomas's in Grutter, are not part of the Court's ruling and, as such, are not controlling law. Such opinions, therefore, are most directly addressed to the other justices on the Supreme Court, as intended to explain areas of disagreement. Perhaps more important, dissenting opinions are also addressed to a much larger audience of lower-court judges, lawyers, academics, and the general public to explain why the dissenting justice believes the Court's holding to be incorrect and to convince this larger audience that the dissenting justice's view is correct. Among this audience may be individuals who could contribute in the future, as litigants, lawyers, or justices, to the reversal of the opinion in question.

Impact

Justice Thomas's opinion in Grutter has been the subject of wide discussion in subsequent cases and legal scholarship regarding racial equality, diversity, and affirmative action. His view that the Constitution forbids the government from considering race under any circumstance was embraced by a plurality of the Court in Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District No. 1 (2007). In that case, the Court severely constrained the ability of school districts to consider race in making student assignments in order to prevent incidental resegregation of public schools. Meanwhile, legal scholars have engaged in debate over the views expressed by Thomas in his Grutter opinion. Some have noted that his "color-blind" position is inconsistent with his professed commitment to interpreting

Questions for Further Study

1. Compare this document with A. Leon Higginbotham: "An Open Letter to Justice Clarence Thomas from a Federal Judicial Colleague." Higginbotham was highly skeptical of Thomas's appointment to the Supreme Court, arguing that the new justice might set back the cause of civil rights. Do you think that Thomas confirmed Higginbotham's fears with his decision in Grutter v. Bollinger?

2. What is your opinion of the type of race-based admissions policy that was the bone of contention in this case? Do you believe such a policy is fair? Would you agree with Thomas that such a policy potentially stigmatizes African Americans?

3. Thomas uses quotations from the abolitionist Frederick Douglass and Justice John Marshall Harlan's dissent in the 1896 case Plessy v. Ferguson, which created the legal basis for Jim Crow segregation. What did Thomas gain from using these figures and their words in buttressing his argument?

4. Both the entry and the document make reference to the 1978 case Regents of the University of California v. Bakke. How did the outcome of Grutter v. Bollinger differ from that of Bakke? What might have changed in the social and legal environment to account for any difference?

5. The word diversity is often used in academic, business, and other environments to refer to the notion that all student bodies, workplaces, and the like benefit from the presence of people of various races and ethnicities. Do you believe this is true? How would you respond to the argument that historically black colleges lack racial diversity?

the Constitution according to the original intent of its drafters, because the very drafters of the equal protection clause enacted race-conscious laws to aid newly freed African Americans after the Civil War. Others have argued that while governmental color blindness in all circumstances might be a laudable ideal, it is not a practical solution in a society yet shaped by racial inequalities. As of early 2010, Thomas's view of the equal protection clause as forbidding the government from engaging in affirmative action to achieve or maintain diversity had not yet commanded the agreement of a majority of his colleagues on the Supreme Court.

Clarence Thomas's Concurrence/Dissent in Grutter v. Bollinger

Justice Thomas, with whom Justice Scalia joins as to Parts I VII, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

Frederick Douglass, speaking to a group of abolitionists almost 140 years ago, delivered a message lost on today's majority:

"[I]n regard to the colored people, there is always more that is benevolent, I perceive, than just, manifested towards us. What I ask for the negro is not benevolence, not pity, not sympathy, but simply justice. The American people have always been anxious to know what they shall do with us.... I have had but one answer from the beginning. Do nothing with us! Your doing with us has already played the mischief with us. Do nothing with us! If the apples will not remain on the tree of their own strength, if they are worm-eaten at the core, if they are early ripe and disposed to fall, let them fall! ... And if the negro cannot stand on his own legs, let him fall also. All I ask is, give him a chance to stand on his own legs! Let him alone! ... [Y]our interference is doing him positive injury." What the Black Man Wants: An Address Delivered in Boston, Massachusetts, on 26 January 1865, reprinted in 4 The Frederick Douglass Papers 59, 68 (J. Blassingame & J. McKivigan eds. 1991) (emphasis in original).

Like Douglass, I believe blacks can achieve in every avenue of American life without the meddling of university administrators. Because I wish to see all students succeed whatever their color, I share, in some respect, the sympathies of those who sponsor the type of discrimination advanced by the University of Michigan Law School (Law School). The Constitution does not, however, tolerate institutional devotion to the status quo in admissions policies when such devotion ripens into racial discrimination. Nor does the Constitution countenance the unprecedented deference the Court gives to the Law School, an approach inconsistent with the very concept of "strict scrutiny."

No one would argue that a university could set up a lower general admission standard and then impose heightened requirements only on black applicants. Similarly, a university may not maintain a high admission standard and grant exemptions to favored races. The Law School, of its own choosing, and for its own purposes, maintains an exclusionary admissions system that it knows produces racially disproportionate results. Racial discrimination is not a permissible solution to the self-inflicted wounds of this elitist admissions policy.

The majority upholds the Law School's racial discrimination not by interpreting the people's Constitution, but by responding to a faddish slogan of the cognoscenti. Nevertheless, I concur in part in the Court's opinion. First, I agree with the Court insofar as its decision, which approves of only one racial classification, confirms that further use of race in admissions remains unlawful. Second, I agree with the Court's holding that racial discrimination in higher education admissions will be illegal in 25 years. See ante, at 31 (stating that racial discrimination will no longer be narrowly tailored, or "necessary to further" a compelling state interest, in 25 years). I respectfully dissent from the remainder of the Court's opinion and the judgment, however, because I believe that the Law School's current use of race violates the Equal Protection Clause and that the Constitution means the same thing today as it will in 300 months.

I

The majority agrees that the Law School's racial discrimination should be subjected to strict scrutiny. Ante, at 14. Before applying that standard to this case, I will briefly revisit the Court's treatment of racial classifications.

The strict scrutiny standard that the Court purports to apply in this case was first enunciated in Korematsu v. United States (1944). There the Court held that "[p]ressing public necessity may sometimes justify the existence of [racial discrimination]; racial antagonism never can." Id., at 216. This standard of "pressing public necessity" has more frequently been termed "compelling governmental interest," see, e.g., Regents of Univ. of Cal. v. Bakke, 299 (1978) (opinion of Powell, J.). A majority of the Court has validated only two circumstances where "pressing public necessity" or a "compelling state interest" can possibly justify racial discrimination by state actors. First, the lesson of Korematsu is that national security constitutes a "pressing public necessity," though the government's use of race to advance that objective must be narrowly tailored. Second, the Court has recognized as a compelling state interest a government's effort to remedy past discrimination for which it is responsible. Richmond v. J. A. Croson Co., 504 (1989).

The contours of "pressing public necessity" can be further discerned from those interests the Court has rejected as bases for racial discrimination. For example, Wygant v. Jackson Bd. of Ed., (1986), found unconstitutional a collective-bargaining agreement between a school board and a teachers' union that favored certain minority races. The school board defended the policy on the grounds that minority teachers provided "role models" for minority students and that a racially "diverse" faculty would improve the education of all students. See Brief for Respondents, O. T. 1984, No. 84 1340, pp. 27 28; 476 U. S., at 315 (Stevens, J., dissenting) ("[A]n integrated faculty will be able to provide benefits to the student body that could not be provided by an all-white, or nearly all-white faculty"). Nevertheless, the Court found that the use of race violated the Equal Protection Clause, deeming both asserted state interests insufficiently compelling. Id., at 275 276 (plurality opinion); id., at 295 (White, J., concurring in judgment) ("None of the interests asserted by the [school board] … justify this racially discriminatory layoff policy").

An even greater governmental interest involves the sensitive role of courts in child custody determinations. In Palmore v. Sidoti, (1984), the Court held that even the best interests of a child did not constitute a compelling state interest that would allow a state court to award custody to the father because the mother was in a mixed-race marriage. Id., at 433 (finding the interest "substantial" but holding the custody decision could not be based on the race of the mother's new husband).

Finally, the Court has rejected an interest in remedying general societal discrimination as a justification for race discrimination. See Wygant, supra, at 276 (plurality opinion); Croson, 488 U.S., at 496 498 (plurality opinion); id., at 520 521 (Scalia, J., concurring in judgment). "Societal discrimination, without more, is too amorphous a basis for imposing a racially classified remedy" because a "court could uphold remedies that are ageless in their reach into the past, and timeless in their ability to affect the future." Wygant, supra, at 276 (plurality opinion). But see Gratz v. Bollinger, ante, (Ginsburg, J., dissenting).

Where the Court has accepted only national security, and rejected even the best interests of a child, as a justification for racial discrimination, I conclude that only those measures the State must take to provide a bulwark against anarchy, or to prevent violence, will constitute a "pressing public necessity." Cf. Lee v. Washington, 334 (1968) (per curiam) (Black, J., concurring) (indicating that protecting prisoners from violence might justify narrowly tailored racial discrimination); Croson, supra, at 521 (Scalia, J., concurring in judgment) ("At least where state or local action is at issue, only a social emergency rising to the level of imminent danger to life and limb … can justify [racial discrimination]").

The Constitution abhors classifications based on race, not only because those classifications can harm favored races or are based on illegitimate motives, but also because every time the government places citizens on racial registers and makes race relevant to the provision of burdens or benefits, it demeans us all. "Purchased at the price of immeasurable human suffering, the equal protection principle reflects our Nation's understanding that such classifications ultimately have a destructive impact on the individual and our society." Adarand Construction, Inc. v. Peña, 240 (1995) (Thomas, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment).

II

Unlike the majority, I seek to define with precision the interest being asserted by the Law School before determining whether that interest is so compelling as to justify racial discrimination. The Law School maintains that it wishes to obtain "educational benefits that flow from student body diversity," Brief for Respondents Bollinger et al. 14. This statement must be evaluated carefully, because it implies that both "diversity" and "educational benefits" are components of the Law School's compelling state interest. Additionally, the Law School's refusal to entertain certain changes in its admissions process and status indicates that the compelling state interest it seeks to validate is actually broader than might appear at first glance.

Undoubtedly there are other ways to "better" the education of law students aside from ensuring that the student body contains a "critical mass" of underrepresented minority students. Attaining "diversity," whatever it means, is the mechanism by which the Law School obtains educational benefits, not an end of itself. The Law School, however, apparently believes that only a racially mixed student body can lead to the educational benefits it seeks. How, then, is the Law School's interest in these allegedly unique educational "benefits" not simply the forbidden interest in "racial balancing," ante, at 17, that the majority expressly rejects?

A distinction between these two ideas (unique educational benefits based on racial aesthetics and race for its own sake) is purely sophistic so much so that the majority uses them interchangeably. Compare ante, at 16 ("[T]he Law School has a compelling interest in attaining a diverse student body"), with ante, at 21 (referring to the "compelling interest in securing the educational benefits of a diverse student body" (emphasis added)). The Law School's argument, as facile as it is, can only be understood in one way: Classroom aesthetics yields educational benefits, racially discriminatory admissions policies are required to achieve the right racial mix, and therefore the policies are required to achieve the educational benefits. It is the educational benefits that are the end, or allegedly compelling state interest, not "diversity." But see ante, at 20 (citing the need for "openness and integrity of the educational institutions that provide [legal] training" without reference to any consequential educational benefits).

One must also consider the Law School's refusal to entertain changes to its current admissions system that might produce the same educational benefits. The Law School adamantly disclaims any race-neutral alternative that would reduce "academic selectivity," which would in turn "require the Law School to become a very different institution, and to sacrifice a core part of its educational mission." Brief for Respondents Bollinger et al. 33 36. In other words, the Law School seeks to improve marginally the education it offers without sacrificing too much of its exclusivity and elite status.

The proffered interest that the majority vindicates today, then, is not simply "diversity." Instead the Court upholds the use of racial discrimination as a tool to advance the Law School's interest in offering a marginally superior education while maintaining an elite institution. Unless each constituent part of this state interest is of pressing public necessity, the Law School's use of race is unconstitutional. I find each of them to fall far short of this standard.

A close reading of the Court's opinion reveals that all of its legal work is done through one conclusory statement: The Law School has a "compelling interest in securing the educational benefits of a diverse student body." Ante, at 21. No serious effort is made to explain how these benefits fit with the state interests the Court has recognized (or rejected) as compelling, see Part I, supra, or to place any theoretical constraints on an enterprising Court's desire to discover still more justifications for racial discrimination. In the absence of any explanation, one might expect the Court to fall back on the judicial policy of stare decisis. But the Court eschews even this weak defense of its holding, shunning an analysis of the extent to which Justice Powell's opinion in Regents of Univ. of Cal. v. Bakke, (1978), is binding, ante, at 13, in favor of an unfounded wholesale adoption of it.

Justice Powell's opinion in Bakke and the Court's decision today rest on the fundamentally flawed proposition that racial discrimination can be contextualized so that a goal, such as classroom aesthetics, can be compelling in one context but not in another. This "we know it when we see it" approach to evaluating state interests is not capable of judicial application. Today, the Court insists on radically expanding the range of permissible uses of race to something as trivial (by comparison) as the assembling of a law school class. I can only presume that the majority's failure to justify its decision by reference to any principle arises from the absence of any such principle. See Part VI, infra.

◆ B

Under the proper standard, there is no pressing public necessity in maintaining a public law school at all and, it follows, certainly not an elite law school. Likewise, marginal improvements in legal education do not qualify as a compelling state interest.

1. While legal education at a public university may be good policy or otherwise laudable, it is obviously not a pressing public necessity when the correct legal standard is applied. Additionally, circumstantial evidence as to whether a state activity is of pressing public necessity can be obtained by asking whether all States feel compelled to engage in that activity. Evidence that States, in general, engage in a certain activity by no means demonstrates that the activity constitutes a pressing public necessity, given the expansive role of government in today's society. The fact that some fraction of the States reject a particular enterprise, however, creates a presumption that the enterprise itself is not a compelling state interest. In this sense, the absence of a public, American Bar Association (ABA) accredited, law school in Alaska, Delaware, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and

Rhode Island, see ABA LSAC Official Guide to ABA-Approved Law Schools (W. Margolis, B. Gordon, J. Puskarz, & D. Rosenlieb, eds. 2004) (hereinafter ABA LSAC Guide), provides further evidence that Michigan's maintenance of the Law School does not constitute a compelling state interest.

2. As the foregoing makes clear, Michigan has no compelling interest in having a law school at all, much less an elite one. Still, even assuming that a State may, under appropriate circumstances, demonstrate a cognizable interest in having an elite law school, Michigan has failed to do so here.

This Court has limited the scope of equal protection review to interests and activities that occur within that State's jurisdiction. The Court held in Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, (1938), that Missouri could not satisfy the demands of "separate but equal" by paying for legal training of blacks at neighboring state law schools, while maintaining a segregated law school within the State. The equal protection "obligation is imposed by the Constitution upon the States severally as governmental entities each responsible for its own laws establishing the rights and duties of persons within its borders. It is an obligation the burden of which cannot be cast by one State upon another, and no State can be excused from performance by what another State may do or fail to do. That separate responsibility of each State within its own sphere is of the essence of statehood maintained under our dual system." Id., at 350 (emphasis added).

The Equal Protection Clause, as interpreted by the Court in Gaines, does not permit States to justify racial discrimination on the basis of what the rest of the Nation "may do or fail to do." The only interests that can satisfy the Equal Protection Clause's demands are those found within a State's jurisdiction.

The only cognizable state interests vindicated by operating a public law school are, therefore, the education of that State's citizens and the training of that State's lawyers. James Campbell's address at the opening of the Law Department at the University of Michigan on October 3, 1859, makes this clear:

"It not only concerns the State that every one should have all reasonable facilities for preparing himself for any honest position in life to which he may aspire, but it also concerns the community that the Law should be taught and understood.... There is not an office in the State in which serious legal inquiries may not frequently arise.... In all these matters, public and private rights are constantly involved and discussed, and ignorance of the Law has frequently led to results deplorable and alarming.... [I]n the history of this State, in more than one instance, that ignorance has led to unlawful violence, and the shedding of innocent blood." E. Brown, Legal Education at Michigan 1859 1959, pp. 404 406 (1959) (emphasis added).

The Law School today, however, does precious little training of those attorneys who will serve the citizens of Michigan. In 2002, graduates of the University of Michigan Law School made up less than 6% of applicants to the Michigan bar, Michigan Lawyers Weekly, available at http://www.michiganlawyersweekly.com / barpassers0202.cfm, barpassers0702.cfm (all Internet materials as visited June 13, 2003, and available in Clerk of Court's case file), even though the Law School's graduates constitute nearly 30% of all law students graduating in Michigan.

Ibid. Less than 16% of the Law School's graduating class elects to stay in Michigan after law school. ABA LSAC Guide 427. Thus, while a mere 27% of the Law School's 2002 entering class are from Michigan, see University of Michigan Law School Website, available at http://www.law.umich.edu/prospectivestudents/Admissions/index.htm, only half of these, it appears, will stay in Michigan.

In sum, the Law School trains few Michigan residents and overwhelmingly serves students, who, as lawyers, leave the State of Michigan. By contrast, Michigan's other public law school, Wayne State University Law School, sends 88% of its graduates on to serve the people of Michigan. ABA LSAC Guide 775. It does not take a social scientist to conclude that it is precisely the Law School's status as an elite institution that causes it to be a way-station for the rest of the country's lawyers, rather than a training ground for those who will remain in Michigan. The Law School's decision to be an elite institution does little to advance the welfare of the people of Michigan or any cognizable interest of the State of Michigan.

Again, the fact that few States choose to maintain elite law schools raises a strong inference that there is nothing compelling about elite status. Arguably, only the public law schools of the University of Texas, the University of California, Berkeley (Boalt Hall), and the University of Virginia maintain the same reputation for excellence as the Law School. Two of these States, Texas and California, are so large that they could reasonably be expected to provide elite legal training at a separate law school to students who will, in fact, stay in the State and provide legal services to its citizens. And these two schools far outshine the Law School in producing in-state lawyers. The University of Texas, for example, sends over three-fourths of its graduates on to work in the State of Texas, vindicating the State's interest (compelling or not) in training Texas' lawyers. Id., at 691.

3. Finally, even if the Law School's racial tinkering produces tangible educational benefits, a marginal improvement in legal education cannot justify racial discrimination where the Law School has no compelling interest in either its existence or in its current educational and admissions policies.

IV

The interest in remaining elite and exclusive that the majority thinks so obviously critical requires the use of admissions "standards" that, in turn, create the Law School's "need" to discriminate on the basis of race. The Court validates these admissions standards by concluding that alternatives that would require "a dramatic sacrifice of … the academic quality of all admitted students," ante, at 27, need not be considered before racial discrimination can be employed. In the majority's view, such methods are not required by the "narrow tailoring" prong of strict scrutiny because that inquiry demands, in this context, that any race-neutral alternative work "'about as well.'" Ante, at 26 27 (quoting Wygant, 476 U.S., at 280, n. 6). The majority errs, however, because race-neutral alternatives must only be "workable," ante, at 27, and do "about as well" in vindicating the compelling state interest. The Court never explicitly holds that the Law School's desire to retain the status quo in "academic selectivity" is itself a compelling state interest, and, as I have demonstrated, it is not. See Part III B, supra. Therefore, the Law School should be forced to choose between its classroom aesthetic and its exclusionary admissions system it cannot have it both ways.

With the adoption of different admissions methods, such as accepting all students who meet minimum qualifications, see Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae 13 14, the Law School could achieve its vision of the racially aesthetic student body without the use of racial discrimination. The Law School concedes this, but the Court holds, implicitly and under the guise of narrow tailoring, that the Law School has a compelling state interest in doing what it wants to do. I cannot agree. First, under strict scrutiny, the Law School's assessment of the benefits of racial discrimination and devotion to the admissions status quo are not entitled to any sort of deference, grounded in the First Amendment or anywhere else. Second, even if its "academic selectivity" must be maintained at all costs along with racial discrimination, the Court ignores the fact that other top law schools have succeeded in meeting their aesthetic demands without racial discrimination.

The Court bases its unprecedented deference to the Law School a deference antithetical to strict scrutiny on an idea of "educational autonomy" grounded in the First Amendment. Ante, at 17. In my view, there is no basis for a right of public universities to do what would otherwise violate the Equal Protection Clause.

The constitutionalization of "academic freedom" began with the concurring opinion of Justice Frankfurter in Sweezy v. New Hampshire, (1957). Sweezy, a Marxist economist, was investigated by the Attorney General of New Hampshire on suspicion of being a subversive. The prosecution sought, inter alia, the contents of a lecture Sweezy had given at the University of New Hampshire. The Court held that the investigation violated due process. Id., at 254.

Justice Frankfurter went further, however, reasoning that the First Amendment created a right of academic freedom that prohibited the investigation. Id., at 256 267 (opinion concurring in result). Much of the rhetoric in Justice Frankfurter's opinion was devoted to the personal right of Sweezy to free speech. See, e.g., id., at 265 ("For a citizen to be made to forgo even a part of so basic a liberty as his political autonomy, the subordinating interest of the State must be compelling"). Still, claiming that the United States Reports "need not be burdened with proof," Justice Frankfurter also asserted that a "free society" depends on "free universities" and "[t]his means the exclusion of governmental intervention in the intellectual life of a university." Id., at 262. According to Justice Frankfurter: "[I]t is the business of a university to provide that atmosphere which is most conducive to speculation, experiment and creation. It is an atmosphere in which there prevail 'the four essential freedoms' of a university to determine for itself on academic grounds who may teach, what may be taught, how it shall be taught, and who may be admitted to study.'" Id., at 263 (citation omitted).

In my view, "[i]t is the business" of this Court to explain itself when it cites provisions of the Constitution to invent new doctrines including the idea that the First Amendment authorizes a public university to do what would otherwise violate the Equal Protection Clause. The majority fails in its summary effort to prove this point. The only source for the Court's conclusion that public universities are entitled to deference even within the confines of strict scrutiny is Justice Powell's opinion in Bakke. Justice Powell, for his part, relied only on Justice Frankfurter's opinion in Sweezy and the Court's decision in Keyishian v. Board of Regents of Univ. of State of N. Y., (1967), to support his view that the First Amendment somehow protected a public university's use of race in admissions. Bakke, 438 U.S., at 312. Keyishian provides no answer to the question whether the Fourteenth Amendment's restrictions are relaxed when applied to public universities. In that case, the Court held that state statutes and regulations designed to prevent the "appointment or retention of 'subversive' persons in state employment," 385 U.S., at 592, violated the First Amendment for vagueness. The statutes covered all public employees and were not invalidated only as applied to university faculty members, although the Court appeared sympathetic to the notion of academic freedom, calling it a "special concern of the First Amendment." Id., at 603. Again, however, the Court did not relax any independent constitutional restrictions on public universities.

I doubt that when Justice Frankfurter spoke of governmental intrusions into the independence of universities, he was thinking of the Constitution's ban on racial discrimination. The majority's broad deference to both the Law School's judgment that racial aesthetics leads to educational benefits and its stubborn refusal to alter the status quo in admissions methods finds no basis in the Constitution or decisions of this Court.

1. The Court's deference to the Law School's conclusion that its racial experimentation leads to educational benefits will, if adhered to, have serious collateral consequences. The Court relies heavily on social science evidence to justify its deference. See ante, at 18 20; but see also Rothman, Lipset, & Nevitte, Racial Diversity Reconsidered, 151 Public Interest 25 (2003) (finding that the racial mix of a student body produced by racial discrimination of the type practiced by the Law School in fact hinders students' perception of academic quality). The Court never acknowledges, however, the growing evidence that racial (and other sorts) of heterogeneity actually impairs learning among black students. See, e.g., Flowers & Pascarella, Cognitive Effects of College Racial Composition on African American Students After 3 Years of College, 40 J. of College Student Development 669, 674 (1999) (concluding that black students experience superior cognitive development at Historically Black Colleges (HBCs) and that, even among blacks, "a substantial diversity moderates the cognitive effects of attending an HBC"); Allen, The Color of Success: African-American College Student Outcomes at Predominantly White and Historically Black Public Colleges and Universities, 62 Harv. Educ. Rev. 26, 35 (1992) (finding that black students attending HBCs report higher academic achievement than those attending predominantly white colleges).

At oral argument in Gratz v. Bollinger, ante, counsel for respondents stated that "most every single one of [the HBCs] do have diverse student bodies." Tr. of Oral Arg. in No. 02 516, p. 52. What precisely counsel meant by "diverse" is indeterminate, but it is reported that in 2000 at Morehouse College, one of the most distinguished HBC's in the Nation, only 0.1% of the student body was white, and only 0.2% was Hispanic. College Admissions Data Handbook 2002 2003, p. 613 (43d ed. 2002) (hereinafter College Admissions Data Handbook). And at Mississippi Valley State University, a public HBC, only 1.1% of the freshman class in 2001 was white. Id., at 603. If there is a "critical mass" of whites at these institutions, then "critical mass" is indeed a very small proportion.

The majority grants deference to the Law School's "assessment that diversity will, in fact, yield educational benefits," ante, at 16. It follows, therefore, that an HBC's assessment that racial homogeneity will yield educational benefits would similarly be given deference. An HBC's rejection of white applicants in order to maintain racial homogeneity seems permissible, therefore, under the majority's view of the Equal Protection Clause. But see United States v. Fordice, 748 (1992) (Thomas, J., concurring) ("Obviously, a State cannot maintain … traditions by closing particular institutions, historically white or historically black, to particular racial groups"). Contained within today's majority opinion is the seed of a new constitutional justification for a concept I thought long and rightly rejected racial segregation.

2. Moreover one would think, in light of the Court's decision in United States v. Virginia, (1996), that before being given license to use racial discrimination, the Law School would be required to radically reshape its admissions process, even to the point of sacrificing some elements of its character. In Virginia, a majority of the Court, without a word about academic freedom, accepted the all-male Virginia Military Institute's (VMI) representation that some changes in its "adversative" method of education would be required with the admission of women, id., at 540, but did not defer to VMI's judgment that these changes would be too great. Instead, the Court concluded that they were "manageable." Id., at 551, n. 19. That case involved sex discrimination, which is subjected to intermediate, not strict, scrutiny. Id., at 533; Craig v. Boren, 197 (1976). So in Virginia, where the standard of review dictated that greater flexibility be granted to VMI's educational policies than the Law School deserves here, this Court gave no deference. Apparently where the status quo being defended is that of the elite establishment here the Law School rather than a less fashionable Southern military institution, the Court will defer without serious inquiry and without regard to the applicable legal standard.

◆ C

Virginia is also notable for the fact that the Court relied on the "experience" of formerly single-sex institutions, such as the service academies, to conclude that admission of women to VMI would be "manageable." 518 U.S., at 544 545. Today, however, the majority ignores the "experience" of those institutions that have been forced to abandon explicit racial discrimination in admissions.

The sky has not fallen at Boalt Hall at the University of California, Berkeley, for example. Prior to Proposition 209's adoption of Cal. Const., Art. 1, §31(a), which bars the State from "grant[ing] preferential treatment … on the basis of race … in the operation of … public education," Boalt Hall enrolled 20 blacks and 28 Hispanics in its first-year class for 1996. In 2002, without deploying express racial discrimination in admissions, Boalt's entering class enrolled 14 blacks and 36 Hispanics. University of California Law and Medical School Enrollments, available at http://www.ucop.edu/acadadv/datamgmt/lawmed/law-enrolls-eth2.html. Total underrepresented minority student enrollment at Boalt Hall now exceeds 1996 levels. Apparently the Law School cannot be counted on to be as resourceful. The Court is willfully blind to the very real experience in California and elsewhere, which raises the inference that institutions with "reputation[s] for excellence," ante, at 16, 26, rivaling the Law School's have satisfied their sense of mission without resorting to prohibited racial discrimination.

Putting aside the absence of any legal support for the majority's reflexive deference, there is much to be said for the view that the use of tests and other measures to "predict" academic performance is a poor substitute for a system that gives every applicant a chance to prove he can succeed in the study of law. The rallying cry that in the absence of racial discrimination in admissions there would be a true meritocracy ignores the fact that the entire process is poisoned by numerous exceptions to "merit." For example, in the national debate on racial discrimination in higher education admissions, much has been made of the fact that elite institutions utilize a so-called "legacy" preference to give the children of alumni an advantage in admissions. This, and other, exceptions to a "true" meritocracy give the lie to protestations that merit admissions are in fact the order of the day at the Nation's universities. The Equal Protection Clause does not, however, prohibit the use of unseemly legacy preferences or many other kinds of arbitrary admissions procedures. What the Equal Protection Clause does prohibit are classifications made on the basis of race. So while legacy preferences can stand under the Constitution, racial discrimination cannot. I will not twist the Constitution to invalidate legacy preferences or otherwise impose my vision of higher education admissions on the Nation. The majority should similarly stay its impulse to validate faddish racial discrimination the Constitution clearly forbids.

In any event, there is nothing ancient, honorable, or constitutionally protected about "selective" admissions. The University of Michigan should be well aware that alternative methods have historically been used for the admission of students, for it brought to this country the German certificate system in the late 19th century. See H. Wechsler, The Qualified Student 16 39 (1977) (hereinafter Qualified Student). Under this system, a secondary school was certified by a university so that any graduate who completed the course offered by the school was offered admission to the university. The certification regime supplemented, and later virtually replaced (at least in the Midwest), the prior regime of rigorous subject-matter entrance examinations. Id., at 57 58. The facially race-neutral "percent plans" now used in Texas, California, and Florida, see ante, at 28, are in many ways the descendents of the certificate system.

Certification was replaced by selective admissions in the beginning of the 20th century, as universities sought to exercise more control over the composition of their student bodies. Since its inception, selective admissions has been the vehicle for racial, ethnic, and religious tinkering and experimentation by university administrators. The initial driving force for the relocation of the selective function from the high school to the universities was the same desire to select racial winners and losers that the Law School exhibits today. Columbia, Harvard, and others infamously determined that they had "too many" Jews, just as today the Law School argues it would have "too many" whites if it could not discriminate in its admissions process. See Qualified Student 155 168 (Columbia); H. Broun & G. Britt, Christians Only: A Study in Prejudice 53 54 (1931) (Harvard).

Columbia employed intelligence tests precisely because Jewish applicants, who were predominantly immigrants, scored worse on such tests. Thus, Columbia could claim (falsely) that "'[w]e have not eliminated boys because they were Jews and do not propose to do so. We have honestly attempted to eliminate the lowest grade of applicant [through the use of intelligence testing] and it turns out that a good many of the low grade men are New York City Jews.'" Letter from Herbert E. Hawkes, dean of Columbia College, to E. B. Wilson, June 16, 1922 (reprinted in Qualified Student 160 161). In other words, the tests were adopted with full knowledge of their disparate impact. Cf. DeFunis v. Odegaard, 335 (1974) (per curiam) (Douglas, J., dissenting).

Similarly no modern law school can claim ignorance of the poor performance of blacks, relatively speaking, on the Law School Admissions Test (LSAT). Nevertheless, law schools continue to use the test and then attempt to "correct" for black underperformance by using racial discrimination in admissions so as to obtain their aesthetic student body. The Law School's continued adherence to measures it knows produce racially skewed results is not entitled to deference by this Court. See Part IV, supra. The Law School itself admits that the test is imperfect, as it must, given that it regularly admits students who score at or below 150 (the national median) on the test. See App. 156 203 (showing that, between 1995 and 2000, the Law School admitted 37 students 27 of whom were black; 31 of whom were "underrepresented minorities" with LSAT scores of 150 or lower). And the Law School's amici cannot seem to agree on the fundamental question whether the test itself is useful. Compare Brief for Law School Admission Council as Amicus Curiae 12 ("LSAT scores … are an effective predictor of students' performance in law school") with Brief for Harvard Black Law Students Association et al. as Amici Curiae 27 ("Whether [the LSAT] measure[s] objective merit.… is certainly questionable").

Having decided to use the LSAT, the Law School must accept the constitutional burdens that come with this decision. The Law School may freely continue to employ the LSAT and other allegedly merit-based standards in whatever fashion it likes. What the Equal Protection Clause forbids, but the Court today allows, is the use of these standards hand-in-hand with racial discrimination. An infinite variety of admissions methods are available to the Law School. Considering all of the radical thinking that has historically occurred at this country's universities, the Law School's intractable approach toward admissions is striking.

The Court will not even deign to make the Law School try other methods, however, preferring instead to grant a 25-year license to violate the Constitution. And the same Court that had the courage to order the desegregation of all public schools in the South now fears, on the basis of platitudes rather than principle, to force the Law School to abandon a decidedly imperfect admissions regime that provides the basis for racial discrimination.

VI

The absence of any articulated legal principle supporting the majority's principal holding suggests another rationale. I believe what lies beneath the Court's decision today are the benighted notions that one can tell when racial discrimination benefits (rather than hurts) minority groups, see Adarand, 515 U.S., at 239 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment), and that racial discrimination is necessary to remedy general societal ills. This Court's precedents supposedly settled both issues, but clearly the majority still cannot commit to the principle that racial classifications are per se harmful and that almost no amount of benefit in the eye of the beholder can justify such classifications.

Putting aside what I take to be the Court's implicit rejection of Adarand's holding that beneficial and burdensome racial classifications are equally invalid, I must contest the notion that the Law School's discrimination benefits those admitted as a result of it. The Court spends considerable time discussing the impressive display of amicus support for the Law School in this case from all corners of society. Ante, at 18 19. But nowhere in any of the filings in this Court is any evidence that the purported "beneficiaries" of this racial discrimination prove themselves by performing at (or even near) the same level as those students who receive no preferences. Cf. Thernstrom & Thernstrom, Reflections on the Shape of the River, 46 UCLA L. Rev. 1583, 1605 1608 (1999) (discussing the failure of defenders of racial discrimination in admissions to consider the fact that its "beneficiaries" are underperforming in the classroom).

The silence in this case is deafening to those of us who view higher education's purpose as imparting knowledge and skills to students, rather than a communal, rubber-stamp, credentialing process. The Law School is not looking for those students who, despite a lower LSAT score or undergraduate grade point average, will succeed in the study of law. The Law School seeks only a façade it is sufficient that the class looks right, even if it does not perform right.

The Law School tantalizes unprepared students with the promise of a University of Michigan degree and all of the opportunities that it offers. These overmatched students take the bait, only to find that they cannot succeed in the cauldron of competition. And this mismatch crisis is not restricted to elite institutions. See T. Sowell, Race and Culture 176 177 (1994) ("Even if most minority students are able to meet the normal standards at the 'average' range of colleges and universities, the systematic mismatching of minority students begun at the top can mean that such students are generally overmatched throughout all levels of higher education"). Indeed, to cover the tracks of the aestheticists, this cruel farce of racial discrimination must continue in selection for the Michigan Law Review, see University of Michigan Law School Student Handbook 2002 2003, pp. 39 40 (noting the presence of a "diversity plan" for admission to the review), and in hiring at law firms and for judicial clerkships until the "beneficiaries" are no longer tolerated. While these students may graduate with law degrees, there is no evidence that they have received a qualitatively better legal education (or become better lawyers) than if they had gone to a less "elite" law school for which they were better prepared. And the aestheticists will never address the real problems facing "underrepresented minorities," instead continuing their social experiments on other people's children.

Beyond the harm the Law School's racial discrimination visits upon its test subjects, no social science has disproved the notion that this discrimination "engender[s] attitudes of superiority or, alternatively, provoke[s] resentment among those who believe that they have been wronged by the government's use of race." Adarand, 515 U.S., at 241 (Thomas, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment). "These programs stamp minorities with a badge of inferiority and may cause them to develop dependencies or to adopt an attitude that they are 'entitled' to preferences." Ibid.

It is uncontested that each year, the Law School admits a handful of blacks who would be admitted in the absence of racial discrimination. See Brief for Respondents Bollinger et al. 6. Who can differentiate between those who belong and those who do not? The majority of blacks are admitted to the Law School because of discrimination, and because of this policy all are tarred as undeserving. This problem of stigma does not depend on determinacy as to whether those stigmatized are actually the "beneficiaries" of racial discrimination. When blacks take positions in the highest places of government, industry, or academia, it is an open question today whether their skin color played a part in their advancement. The question itself is the stigma because either racial discrimination did play a role, in which case the person may be deemed "otherwise unqualified," or it did not, in which case asking the question itself unfairly marks those blacks who would succeed without discrimination. Is this what the Court means by "visibly open"? Ante, at 20.

Finally, the Court's disturbing reference to the importance of the country's law schools as training grounds meant to cultivate "a set of leaders with legitimacy in the eyes of the citizenry," ibid., through the use of racial discrimination deserves discussion. As noted earlier, the Court has soundly rejected the remedying of societal discrimination as a justification for governmental use of race. Wygant, 476 U.S., at 276 (plurality opinion); Croson, 488 U.S., at 497 (plurality opinion); id., at 520 521 (Scalia, J., concurring in judgment). For those who believe that every racial disproportionality in our society is caused by some kind of racial discrimination, there can be no distinction between remedying societal discrimination and erasing racial disproportionalities in the country's leadership caste. And if the lack of proportional racial representation among our leaders is not caused by societal discrimination, then "fixing" it is even less of a pressing public necessity.

The Court's civics lesson presents yet another example of judicial selection of a theory of political representation based on skin color an endeavor I have previously rejected. See Holder v. Hall, 899 (1994) (Thomas, J., concurring in judgment). The majority appears to believe that broader utopian goals justify the Law School's use of race, but "[t]he Equal Protection Clause commands the elimination of racial barriers, not their creation in order to satisfy our theory as to how society ought to be organized." DeFunis, 416 U.S., at 342 (Douglas, J., dissenting).

VII.

As the foregoing makes clear, I believe the Court's opinion to be, in most respects, erroneous. I do, however, find two points on which I agree.

◆ A

First, I note that the issue of unconstitutional racial discrimination among the groups the Law School prefers is not presented in this case, because petitioner has never argued that the Law School engages in such a practice, and the Law School maintains that it does not. See Brief for Respondents Bollinger et al. 32, n. 50, and 6 7, n. 7. I join the Court's opinion insofar as it confirms that this type of racial discrimination remains unlawful. Ante, at 13 15. Under today's decision, it is still the case that racial discrimination that does not help a university to enroll an unspecified number, or "critical mass," of underrepresented minority students is unconstitutional. Thus, the Law School may not discriminate in admissions between similarly situated blacks and Hispanics, or between whites and Asians. This is so because preferring black to Hispanic applicants, for instance, does nothing to further the interest recognized by the majority today. Indeed, the majority describes such racial balancing as "patently unconstitutional." Ante, at 17. Like the Court, ante, at 24, I express no opinion as to whether the Law School's current admissions program runs afoul of this prohibition.

◆ B

The Court also holds that racial discrimination in admissions should be given another 25 years before it is deemed no longer narrowly tailored to the Law School's fabricated compelling state interest. Ante, at 30. While I agree that in 25 years the practices of the Law School will be illegal, they are, for the reasons I have given, illegal now. The majority does not and cannot rest its time limitation on any evidence that the gap in credentials between black and white students is shrinking or will be gone in that timeframe. In recent years there has been virtually no change, for example, in the proportion of law school applicants with LSAT scores of 165 and higher who are black. In 1993 blacks constituted 1.1% of law school applicants in that score range, though they represented 11.1% of all applicants. Law School Admission Council, National Statistical Report (1994) (hereinafter LSAC Statistical Report). In 2000 the comparable numbers were 1.0% and 11.3% LSAC Statistical Report (2001). No one can seriously contend, and the Court does not, that the racial gap in academic credentials will disappear in 25 years. Nor is the Court's holding that racial discrimination will be unconstitutional in 25 years made contingent on the gap closing in that time.

Indeed, the very existence of racial discrimination of the type practiced by the Law School may impede the narrowing of the LSAT testing gap. An applicant's LSAT score can improve dramatically with preparation, but such preparation is a cost, and there must be sufficient benefits attached to an improved score to justify additional study. Whites scoring between 163 and 167 on the LSAT are routinely rejected by the Law School, and thus whites aspiring to admission at the Law School have every incentive to improve their score to levels above that range. See App. 199 (showing that in 2000, 209 out of 422 white applicants were rejected in this scoring range). Blacks, on the other hand, are nearly guaranteed admission if they score above 155. Id., at 198 (showing that 63 out of 77 black applicants are accepted with LSAT scores above 155). As admission prospects approach certainty, there is no incentive for the black applicant to continue to prepare for the LSAT once he is reasonably assured of achieving the requisite score. It is far from certain that the LSAT test-taker's behavior is responsive to the Law School's admissions policies. Nevertheless, the possibility remains that this racial discrimination will help fulfill the bigot's prophecy about black underperformance just as it confirms the conspiracy theorist's belief that "institutional racism" is at fault for every racial disparity in our society.

I therefore can understand the imposition of a 25-year time limit only as a holding that the deference the Court pays to the Law School's educational judgments and refusal to change its admissions policies will itself expire. At that point these policies will clearly have failed to "'eliminat[e] the [perceived] need for any racial or ethnic'" discrimination because the academic credentials gap will still be there. Ante, at 30 (quoting Nathanson & Bartnika, The Constitutionality of Preferential Treatment for Minority Applicants to Professional Schools, 58 Chicago Bar Rec. 282, 293 (May June 1977)). The Court defines this time limit in terms of narrow tailoring, see ante, at 30, but I believe this arises from its refusal to define rigorously the broad state interest vindicated today. Cf. Part II, supra. With these observations, I join the last sentence of Part III of the opinion of the Court.

For the immediate future, however, the majority has placed its imprimatur on a practice that can only weaken the principle of equality embodied in the Declaration of Independence and the Equal Protection Clause. "Our Constitution is color-blind, and neither knows nor tolerates classes among citizens." Plessy v. Ferguson, 559 (1896) (Harlan, J., dissenting). It has been nearly 140 years since Frederick Douglass asked the intellectual ancestors of the Law School to "[d]o nothing with us!" and the Nation adopted the Fourteenth Amendment. Now we must wait another 25 years to see this principle of equality vindicated. I therefore respectfully dissent from the remainder of the Court's opinion and the judgment.

Barack Obama: "A More Perfect Union"

"I can no more disown [Reverend Wright] than I can my white grandmother."

Overview

On March 18, 2008, Barack Obama, then running for the Democratic Party presidential nomination, delivered a speech at the National Constitution Center in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. He opened his speech by quoting the first line of the U.S. Constitution: "We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union," giving the speech its informal title. In the eyes of many political observers, the speech may have been one of the most important Obama delivered during the campaign, and some even argue that the speech put him over the top in winning the nomination and the presidency later that year.

The speech was significant because issues of race were beginning to swirl around the candidate, who went on to become the nation's first black president. In particular, questions were being raised about Obama's association with a Chicago pastor, the Reverend Jeremiah Wright, who was on record as having made comments from the pulpit that were extremely critical of the United States and that could themselves be regarded as racist or at best, highly incendiary. Further, there was a perception among some observers that in the quest for the nomination, Obama's opponents were "playing the race card" by insinuating that a black candidate was ultimately unelectable. Under mounting pressure, Obama needed to respond to the Wright controversy. Accordingly, in his speech he addressed issues of race and inequality in America and discussed head-on such issues as "white resentment" and "black anger." The speech was widely publicized, and numerous politicians, media commentators, academics, and members of the public responded to it. Obama's supporters argued that the speech was a thoughtful examination of the issue of race in America; his opponents, while conceding that the speech was memorable, continued to question the candidate's association with the Reverend Wright, which in turn, they said, raised questions about Obama's loyalties and judgment.

Context

Barack Obama, then the junior U.S. senator from Illinois, announced his candidacy for president of the United States on February 10, 2007. He had attracted national attention by delivering the keynote address at the Democratic National Convention in 2004, and he quickly emerged as the first African American candidate in the nation's history who had a realistic chance of being elected. Although numerous Democrats entered the race, Obama's chief opponent was Hillary Rodham Clinton, then a U.S. senator from New York and the wife of former president Bill Clinton. Because she had long been in the public eye as first lady and senator, Clinton was widely regarded as the presumptive Democratic nominee, but many of her opponents and some voters were put off because, they argued, she seemed to feel entitled to the nomination. What emerged was a hotly contested race, with the candidates trading wins in primaries and caucuses. Obama tended to perform better in caucus states that is, in states that do not select a candidate in a primary election but rather in a party meeting. Clinton, in contrast, tended to do better in primary election states. Thus, Obama won the early Iowa caucus, while Clinton won the first primary in New Hampshire. With some exceptions, this pattern continued throughout the contest.

The issue of race hovered in the background, with some bloggers and others questioning whether Obama, the son of a Kenyan man and a white American woman, had even been born in the United States (a requirement for the office of president). Some were put off by his middle name, Hussein, and maintained that he was a secret Muslim. (Hussein was the last name of the Iraqi dictator whom U.S.-led forces deposed in the war that began in 2003.) These were fringe views, but the issue of race moved to the forefront of the campaign in February and March 2008 as the South Carolina primary approached. After Iowa, New Hampshire, and a caucus in Nevada, South Carolina would be the first contested state with a large black population (nearly 29 percent). On January 26, Obama won by a two-to-one margin, carrying some 90 percent of the state's black vote. But in response, Bill Clinton, campaigning for his wife, seemed to dismiss the Obama victory by noting that the Reverend Jesse Jackson, an unsuccessful African American candidate for the Democratic nomination in 1984 and 1988, had won South Carolina both times. The implication of his remark seemed to be that South Carolina would vote for any black candidate, regardless of his or her electability or positions on the issues.

Also during the run-up to the South Carolina primary, Senator Clinton made remarks on a radio show that some listeners interpreted as disparaging to the accomplishments of Martin Luther King, Jr., in the creation of the civil rights legislation of the 1960s. Racial divides continued in future contests. On March 11, for example, Obama won Mississippi, garnering 90 percent of the black vote while Clinton won 70 percent of the white vote. Another minor controversy arose when Geraldine Ferraro, the Democratic vice presidential candidate in 1984 and a Clinton supporter, remarked publicly that Obama was a major presidential candidate only because he was a black man. Ferraro tried to clarify her remark by suggesting that Obama's racial heritage made him a new and exciting phenomenon in American politics and that the press was treating him with kid gloves in contrast to Clinton, whom, Ferraro said, the press was brutalizing. Ultimately, Obama pulled ahead and in early June was able to claim the lead in delegates to the Democratic National Convention and thus the nomination.

Perhaps the most significant controversy with racial implications was that surrounding Obama's association with the Reverend Jeremiah Wright, the fiery, defiant pastor of the Trinity United Church of Christ in Chicago. Wright had been Obama's pastor for twenty years. He had officiated at the marriage of Obama and his wife, Michelle, and had baptized their two daughters. One of Wright's sermons was the source of the phrase "audacity of hope," which Obama used as the title of a memoir. But in March 2008 videos of some of Wright's sermons surfaced, and for weeks snippets were played on television news and commentary programs. Many Americans took offense at comments such as this one:

> The government gives them [African Americans] the drugs, builds bigger prisons, passes a three-strike law and then wants us to sing "God Bless America." No, no, no, God damn America, that's in the Bible for killing innocent people. God damn America for treating our citizens as less than human. God damn America for as long as she acts like she is God and she is supreme.

Likewise this remark was provoking:

> We bombed Hiroshima, we bombed Nagasaki, and we nuked far more than the thousands in New York and the Pentagon, and we never batted an eye. We have supported state terrorism against the Palestinians and black South Africans, and now we are indignant because the stuff we have done overseas is now brought right back to our own front yards. America's chickens are coming home to roost.

The second remark was made shortly after the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the United States and seemed to suggest that the United States got what it deserved. In other sermons, Wright accused the U.S. government of lying to its citizens. He cited, for example, the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, which dragged the United States into World War II in 1941, and claimed that government officials, including the president, knew about the impending attack. He maintained that the government had infected African American men with syphilis during the infamous Tuskegee experiments of the 1950s. (In fact, the experiments withheld treatment from men who already had the disease.) He also asserted that the government caused the HIV/AIDS epidemic in order to control the black population. He referred to the nation as the "United States of KKK," a reference to the white supremacist group, the Ku Klux Klan.

At first Obama tried to ignore the controversy. Then he tried to dismiss it by saying that Wright was like the "crazy old uncle" found in every family who says things designed to provoke but whom everyone ignores. He also stated that he was not at the church when these and other inflammatory comments were made. Some observers suggested that this position was not credible that a person could not attend a church for twenty years and not know of the pastor's views. They maintained that Obama would have shown better judgment the kind of judgment required from a president if he had withdrawn from the church. Compounding the problem was Obama's loose association in Chicago with William Ayers, a political extremist and founder of the radical Weather Underground Organization, or Weathermen, who had been involved in the bombing of public buildings during the Vietnam era.

As the controversy raged, Obama and his campaign advisers decided that the candidate had to address the matter head-on. Wright had been a member of the candidate's African American Religious Leadership Committee, but on March 14 the campaign announced that Wright had been removed from the committee. Meanwhile, Obama denounced Wright's remarks. Nevertheless, it was widely felt that his denunciations were not forceful enough and that he had to make a major address on the subject. Obama's usual practice (and the practice of most candidates for high office) was to have a speechwriter develop such a speech. In this instance, though, Obama wrote the speech himself, working on it late into the night of March 17 18. He chose the National Constitution Center in Philadelphia as the venue, thus attempting to place the speech symbolically in the context of American history.

About the Author

Barack Obama was born on August 4, 1961, in Honolulu, Hawaii. His father, Barack Obama, Sr., was Kenyan; his mother, Ann Dunham, was a white woman from Kansas. His parents were separated when he was two years old, and they divorced in early 1964. After Dunham remarried, to an Indonesian, Obama lived and attended school in Jakarta, Indonesia, before returning to Honolulu to live with his maternal grandparents at age ten. After graduating from high school, he attended Occidental College in Los Angeles and then transferred to Columbia University in New York City, where he earned a bachelor's degree in 1983. He worked for four years in New York before moving to Chicago to head the Developing Communities Project, an agency that provided job training, tutoring, and other community services. In 1988 he entered Harvard Law School, becoming editor of the prestigious Harvard Law Review and graduating in 1991. He returned to Chicago, and until 1996 he worked for a civil rights litigation law firm and for various community service organizations. He also taught constitutional law at the University of Chicago from 1992 to 2004.

Obama's political career began in 1996, when he was elected to the Illinois Senate; he was reelected in 1998 and 2002. In 2004 he delivered the keynote address at the Democratic National Convention, elevating his profile on the national stage. That year, too, he won election to the U.S. Senate with 70 percent of the vote. In 2008, after a contentious and closely fought race against Hillary Rodham Clinton, he won his party's nomination for president, and in November of that year he and his vice presidential candidate, Joe Biden, defeated the Republican ticket of John McCain and Sarah Palin. He took the oath of office on January 20, 2009.

In the early days of his presidency, Obama was highly popular with the electorate and enjoyed soaring approval ratings; his election to the presidency was regarded as a historic event and was widely seen as a rejection of the policies of his predecessor, George W. Bush. Throughout the first year of his presidency, however, Obama faced numerous thorny issues: a severe economic recession, high unemployment, ongoing wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, challenging energy policies, and the continued threat of terrorism. Democrats enjoyed strong majorities in both houses of Congress and were thus able to pass a controversial multibillion-dollar economic stimulus bill. On March 23, 2010, President Obama signed a landmark health-reform bill into law. By 2010 the president's job approval rating had fallen sharply, but one bright spot was his winning the Nobel Peace Prize for 2009.

Explanation and Analysis of the Document

Obama's "A More Perfect Union" speech offers reflections on the issue of race as it has played out historically in the United States. The candidate addresses the Reverend Wright controversy and reflects on his own experiences as a black man living in the United States, and he uses the speech to urge Americans to put aside racial division for the good of all Americans.

◆ The Nation's Narrative and His Own

In the opening paragraphs, Obama makes explicit reference to the U.S. Constitution. He opens the speech by quoting the first line of the Constitution and then refers to the Constitutional Convention of 1787 that produced the document. He notes, however, that the work of the Constitution remains unfinished, for "it was stained by this nation's original sin of slavery." He alludes to the framers' disagreement about slavery and its decision to defer the issue of slavery for twenty years. Article 1, Section 9 of the Constitution states: "The Migration or Importation of such Persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the Year one thousand eight hundred and eight." In fact, the United States abolished the importation of slaves, but not slavery itself, in 1808. The candidate's key point is that the Constitution was an imperfect document that had to be perfected over time by those willing to "narrow that gap between the promise of our ideals and the reality of their time." Obama then turns briefly to his personal story. He mentions the hope of his campaign to bring unity to the American people and provides details that suggest that his knowledge of America, white and black, rich and poor, is a product of his own diverse background. He calls it "my own American story" and notes that "in no other country on Earth is my story even possible." Shortly after, he suggests that he resisted the temptation to build a campaign based on race and expresses pride in his ability to forge coalitions of blacks and whites in a state such as South Carolina, with its large black population.

◆ Reverend Jeremiah Wright

The next portion of the speech tackles the issue of Obama's association with Wright. He notes that racial polarization had not been an issue in the campaign so far, but, in the following paragraph, he observes that the issue had taken a "divisive turn." He acknowledges that some observers regarded his candidacy as an "exercise in affirmative action," an effort on the part of white liberals to "purchase racial reconciliation on the cheap." He then turns to the Wright controversy and reminds listeners that he condemned Wright's comments. He uses a rhetorical question-and-answer device that is common in his speeches: "Did I know? … Of course." He concedes that he had heard Wright express views with which he disagrees. He makes clear his rejection of Wright's statements, noting that they were not simply statements against racial injustice but that they represented a "distorted" view of America, emphasizing what is wrong without giving due credit to what is right. He characterizes Wright's comments as "divisive."

Obama then launches into a partial defense of Wright. He suggests that the comments that were being replayed in the media are only part of the story. He goes on to emphasize the good that Wright had done, including his service in the U.S. Marine Corps. He also gives white America some insight into black churches and how the exuberance of the congregation forged a unity that linked the African American experience with the Christian Bible: "Trinity embodies the black community in its entirety the doctor and the welfare mom, the model student and the former gang-banger. Like other black churches, Trinity's services are full of raucous laughter and sometimes bawdy humor. They are full of dancing, clapping, screaming and shouting." The implication is that Wright and his church could not be judged by the same standards as one might use to judge a supposedly more sober church whose members were predominantly white. He goes on to describe his personal relationship with Wright, thereby producing one of the most oft-quoted statements in the speech: "I can no more disown him than I can disown the black community."

◆ A Conversation about Race

The speech takes a turn when Obama suggests that the politically expedient thing to do would be to simply ignore the broader issue of race and hope that it disappeared. It would be easy, he says, to dismiss Wright as a "crank or a demagogue," just as it would be easy to dismiss the comments made by former vice presidential candidate Geraldine Ferraro as indicative of racism. Earlier that month, Ferraro, a Clinton supporter, had told a California newspaper: "If Obama was a white man, he would not be in this position. And if he was a woman of any color, he would not be in this position. He happens to be very lucky to be who he is. And the country is caught up in the concept." Obama goes on to suggest that the controversy offers the nation an opportunity to have a conversation about "complexities of race in this country that we've never really worked through a part of our union that we have yet to perfect." Using a quotation from William Faulkner's novel Requiem for a Nun, he argues that many of the injustices that African Americans had suffered historically were still part of the African American mind-set. He enumerates some of them: slavery, Jim Crow laws, segregated schools, inferior education even after the Supreme Court case Brown v. Board of Education desegregated public education in 1954, legalized discrimination such as the inability to get home loans or to join labor unions, the lack of basic services in black neighborhoods, violence, "blight," and "neglect."

◆ Anger and Resentment Find Voice

With these injustices as a historical backdrop, Obama returns to Reverend Wright, stating, "This is the reality in which Reverend Wright and other African-Americans of his generation grew up." He argues, then, that people such as Wright inevitably would carry with them vestiges of anger and resentment and that anger sometimes "finds voice" in the pulpit. The anger is not always productive, he says, but it is real and cannot be dismissed or wished away. Obama at this point notes that the white community, too, sometimes feels anger and resentment over such issues as the loss of jobs, stagnant wages, immigration, or the lack of opportunity. At this point, Obama's speech begins to resemble a campaign speech as he uses the opportunity to promote a traditional Democratic agenda, particularly by railing against "economic policies that favor the few over the many." He refers to the Reagan Coalition, that is, the alliance of traditional Republicans and moderate Democrats that swept the Republican Ronald Reagan into the White House in 1980. In light of the lingering animosity and differences between significant portions of the nation's black and white communities, Obama concludes that the nation has reached a racial "stalemate."

◆ Racial Division

Addressing his black audience, Obama urges the African American community to embrace "the burdens of our past without becoming victims of our past" and to bind its grievances to the "aspirations of all Americans" for a better life. He argues that African Americans have to take responsibility for their own actions and their own families, noting that this was a doctrine that Reverend Wright preached. Distilling his thoughts to characterize the essence of his disagreement with Wright, Obama states that Wright "spoke as if our society was static" and as if all Americans are "still irrevocably bound to a tragic past." He notes that the "genius" of America is the possibility for change.

Obama next turns to his white audience to urge members of that audience to acknowledge the legitimate grievances of the African American community. Turning to scripture, he urges all Americans to be their brother's keepers and calls for an end to cynicism and division. He notes that race is too often treated as a "spectacle" and cites as an example the "OJ trial." This is a reference to the trial of O. J. Simpson, the black former football star who in 1995 was acquitted of the 1994 murder of his former wife and an acquaintance after a highly publicized trial; reactions to the not-guilty verdict tended to polarize along racial lines, with many African Americans applauding it and white Americans condemning it. He also makes reference to Hurricane Katrina, a deadly storm that flooded the Gulf Coast in 2005 and that raised racial conflict because of its devastating impact on black neighborhoods in and around New Orleans, Louisiana. He argues that Americans could continue to focus on racial division but repeatedly urges his listeners to say "Not this time." Again he goes into campaign mode by outlining a political agenda and referring to the war in Iraq, which, he says, "never should've been waged."

◆ The Quest for a More Perfect Union

Obama draws toward his conclusion by referencing one of the major themes of his campaign, "hope." The Union, he says, "may never be perfect, but generation after generation has shown that it can always be perfected." He concludes with a common technique used in speeches of this type. He tells the story of a woman named Ashley who was a campaign organizer in South Carolina. He details the hardships of Ashley's life and links Ashley's story to his own campaign for health care reform, economic growth, opposition to the war in Iraq, and the like. He concludes by stating that the reason he was running for president was to help people like Ashley. In the final paragraph, he comes full circle to refer to the nation's founders and the ongoing quest for a more perfect union.

Audience

Although Obama was addressing an audience at the National Constitution Center in Philadelphia, his speech was clearly directed at all of America, in an effort to quell the controversy spawned by his association with the Reverend Jeremiah Wright. Coming as it did in the middle of the primary election season, the address was also a campaign speech designed to allay the fears of some Americans that Obama was sympathetic to Wright's more inflammatory views. The speech, which was broadcast live on television, was widely reported on and publicized. On the popular Web site YouTube, a video of the speech had 1.2 million hits within twenty-four hours and 4.5 million hits by the end of March 2008. A Pew Research Center poll showed that 85 percent of Americans knew something about the speech and that 54 percent claimed to know a lot about it.

Impact

As might be expected, reactions to "A More Perfect Union" were divided along political lines. Democrats and liberals almost overwhelmingly praised the speech, and while many Republicans and conservatives conceded that the speech was thoughtful and well delivered, they continued to question the candidate's judgment in remaining associated with a pastor who held such incendiary views. Polling organizations, including network news organizations, conducted numerous surveys on the electorate's reaction to the speech, asking such questions as whether people believed that Obama shared Wright's views (most said they did not), whether the speech would influence their voting decisions, and whether the speech effectively ended the controversy. And since the speech was made in

(A Conversation about Race)

"For the men and women of Reverend Wright's generation, the memories of humiliation and doubt and fear have not gone away; nor has the anger and the bitterness of those years."

(Anger and Resentment Find Voice)

"And yet, to wish away the resentments of white Americans, to label them as misguided or even racist, without recognizing they are grounded in legitimate concerns—this too widens the racial divide, and blocks the path to understanding."

(Anger and Resentment Find Voice)

"The profound mistake of Reverend Wright's sermons is not that he spoke about racism in our society. It's that he spoke as if our society was static; as if no progress has been made; as if this country—a country that has made it possible for one of his own members to run for the highest office in the land … is still irrevocably bound to a tragic past."

(Racial Division)

the middle of an election campaign, pollsters wanted to know what effect it had on the contest between Obama and Clinton. The speech demonstrated the growing power of the Internet and social media such as Facebook in politics, with millions of people watching recordings of the speech and sending them as a link to others.

Virtually every newspaper, editorialist, and commentator weighed in on the speech. At one end of the political spectrum, the generally liberal New York Times wrote that > Mr. Obama's eloquent speech should end the debate over his ties to Mr. Wright since there is nothing to suggest that he would carry religion into government. But he did not stop there. He put Mr. Wright, his beliefs and the reaction to them into the larger context of race relations with an honesty seldom heard in public life.

In contrast, the conservative editorialist Charles Krauthammer, writing in the Washington Post, called the speech a "brilliant fraud" and "little more than an elegantly crafted, brilliantly sophistic justification" for Obama's association with Wright. He concluded his editorial column by saying:

> This contextual analysis of Wright's venom, this extenuation of black hate speech as a product of white racism, is not new. It's the Jesse Jackson politics of racial grievance, expressed in Ivy League diction and Harvard Law nuance. That's why the speech made so many liberal commentators swoon: It bathed them in racial guilt while flattering their intellectual pretensions.

It would not be unfair to say that Obama's speeches, including this one, were a vessel into which people poured their own political views and aspirations, though much the same could be said of any political candidate.

Questions for Further Study

1. What political developments during his presidential campaign prompted Barack Obama to make this speech at this particular time?

2. Many people believe that Obama's longstanding association with the Reverend Jeremiah Wright in some way disqualified him to be president—that he should have shown better judgment in ending the association. In his speech, Obama offers a defense of Wright while rejecting Wright's more inflammatory comments. What is your position on this issue? Do you think that most candidates for high office have associations in their past that might raise questions and doubts in the minds of voters?

3. A theme that runs through Obama's speech is that of forging "a more perfect union." What is the origin of this phrase? What do you think the phrase meant to Obama in his speech? In what sense is the United States of America an ongoing project?

4. Obama suggests that he wants the nation to have a conversation about race. In this regard, compare his speech with One America in the 21st Century, the report issued by President Bill Clinton's Initiative on Race in 1999. To what extent did the latter document initiate a conversation about race? Do you believe that the nation needs to have such a conversation, or do you believe that the nation is constantly talking about race?

5. What effect do you think this speech had on the outcome of the 2008 presidential election? Do you find Obama's arguments convincing?

Barack Obama: "A More Perfect Union"

"We the people, in order to form a more perfect union."

Two hundred and twenty one years ago, in a hall that still stands across the street, a group of men gathered and, with these simple words, launched America's improbable experiment in democracy. Farmers and scholars; statesmen and patriots who had traveled across an ocean to escape tyranny and persecution finally made real their declaration of independence at a Philadelphia convention that lasted through the spring of 1787.

The document they produced was eventually signed but ultimately unfinished. It was stained by this nation's original sin of slavery, a question that divided the colonies and brought the convention to a stalemate until the founders chose to allow the slave trade to continue for at least twenty more years, and to leave any final resolution to future generations.

Of course, the answer to the slavery question was already embedded within our Constitution a Constitution that had at its very core the ideal of equal citizenship under the law; a Constitution that promised its people liberty, and justice, and a union that could be and should be perfected over time.

And yet words on a parchment would not be enough to deliver slaves from bondage, or provide men and women of every color and creed their full rights and obligations as citizens of the United States. What would be needed were Americans in successive generations who were willing to do their part through protests and struggle, on the streets and in the courts, through a civil war and civil disobedience and always at great risk to narrow that gap between the promise of our ideals and the reality of their time.

This was one of the tasks we set forth at the beginning of this campaign to continue the long march of those who came before us, a march for a more just, more equal, more free, more caring and more prosperous America. I chose to run for the presidency at this moment in history because I believe deeply that we cannot solve the challenges of our time unless we solve them together unless we perfect our union by understanding that we may have different stories, but we hold common hopes; that we may not look the same and we may not have come from the same place, but we all want to move in the same direction towards a better future for our children and our grandchildren.

This belief comes from my unyielding faith in the decency and generosity of the American people. But it also comes from my own American story.

I am the son of a black man from Kenya and a white woman from Kansas. I was raised with the help of a white grandfather who survived a Depression to serve in Patton's Army during World War II and a white grandmother who worked on a bomber assembly line at Fort Leavenworth while he was overseas. I've gone to some of the best schools in America and lived in one of the world's poorest nations. I am married to a black American who carries within her the blood of slaves and slaveowners an inheritance we pass on to our two precious daughters. I have brothers, sisters, nieces, nephews, uncles and cousins, of every race and every hue, scattered across three continents, and for as long as I live, I will never forget that in no other country on Earth is my story even possible.

It's a story that hasn't made me the most conventional candidate. But it is a story that has seared into my genetic makeup the idea that this nation is more than the sum of its parts that out of many, we are truly one.

Throughout the first year of this campaign, against all predictions to the contrary, we saw how hungry the American people were for this message of unity. Despite the temptation to view my candidacy through a purely racial lens, we won commanding victories in states with some of the whitest populations in the country. In South Carolina, where the Confederate Flag still flies, we built a powerful coalition of African Americans and white Americans.

This is not to say that race has not been an issue in the campaign. At various stages in the campaign, some commentators have deemed me either "too black" or "not black enough." We saw racial tensions bubble to the surface during the week before the South Carolina primary. The press has scoured every exit poll for the latest evidence of racial polarization, not just in terms of white and black, but black and brown as well.

And yet, it has only been in the last couple of weeks that the discussion of race in this campaign has taken a particularly divisive turn.

On one end of the spectrum, we've heard the implication that my candidacy is somehow an exercise in affirmative action; that it's based solely on the desire of wide-eyed liberals to purchase racial reconciliation on the cheap. On the other end, we've heard my former pastor, Reverend Jeremiah Wright, use incendiary language to express views that have the potential not only to widen the racial divide, but views that denigrate both the greatness and the goodness of our nation; that rightly offend white and black alike.

I have already condemned, in unequivocal terms, the statements of Reverend Wright that have caused such controversy. For some, nagging questions remain. Did I know him to be an occasionally fierce critic of American domestic and foreign policy? Of course. Did I ever hear him make remarks that could be considered controversial while I sat in church? Yes. Did I strongly disagree with many of his political views? Absolutely — just as I'm sure many of you have heard remarks from your pastors, priests, or rabbis with which you strongly disagreed.

But the remarks that have caused this recent firestorm weren't simply controversial. They weren't simply a religious leader's effort to speak out against perceived injustice. Instead, they expressed a profoundly distorted view of this country — a view that sees white racism as endemic, and that elevates what is wrong with America above all that we know is right with America; a view that sees the conflicts in the Middle East as rooted primarily in the actions of stalwart allies like Israel, instead of emanating from the perverse and hateful ideologies of radical Islam.

As such, Reverend Wright's comments were not only wrong but divisive, divisive at a time when we need unity; racially charged at a time when we need to come together to solve a set of monumental problems — two wars, a terrorist threat, a falling economy, a chronic health care crisis and potentially devastating climate change; problems that are neither black or white or Latino or Asian, but rather problems that confront us all.

Given my background, my politics, and my professed values and ideals, there will no doubt be those for whom my statements of condemnation are not enough. Why associate myself with Reverend Wright in the first place, they may ask? Why not join another church? And I confess that if all that I knew of Reverend Wright were the snippets of those sermons that have run in an endless loop on the television and You Tube, or if Trinity United Church of Christ conformed to the caricatures being peddled by some commentators, there is no doubt that I would react in much the same way

But the truth is, that isn't all that I know of the man. The man I met more than twenty years ago is a man who helped introduce me to my Christian faith, a man who spoke to me about our obligations to love one another; to care for the sick and lift up the poor. He is a man who served his country as a U.S. Marine; who has studied and lectured at some of the finest universities and seminaries in the country, and who for over thirty years led a church that serves the community by doing God's work here on Earth — by housing the homeless, ministering to the needy, providing day care services and scholarships and prison ministries, and reaching out to those suffering from HIV/AIDS.

In my first book, Dreams from My Father, I described the experience of my first service at Trinity:

> People began to shout, to rise from their seats and clap and cry out, a forceful wind carrying the reverend's voice up into the rafters.… And in that single note — hope! — I heard something else; at the foot of that cross, inside the thousands of churches across the city, I imagined the stories of ordinary black people merging with the stories of David and Goliath, Moses and Pharaoh, the Christians in the lion's den, Ezekiel's field of dry bones. Those stories — of survival, and freedom, and hope — became our story, my story; the blood that had spilled was our blood, the tears our tears; until this black church, on this bright day, seemed once more a vessel carrying the story of a people into future generations and into a larger world. Our trials and triumphs became at once unique and universal, black and more than black; in chronicling our journey, the stories and songs gave us a means to reclaim memories that we didn't need to feel shame about … memories that all people might study and cherish — and with which we could start to rebuild.

That has been my experience at Trinity. Like other predominantly black churches across the country, Trinity embodies the black community in its entirety — the doctor and the welfare mom, the model student and the former gang-banger. Like other black churches, Trinity's services are full of raucous laughter and sometimes bawdy humor. They are full of dancing, clapping, screaming and shouting that may seem jarring to the untrained ear. The church contains in full the kindness and cruelty, the fierce intelligence and the shocking ignorance, the struggles and successes, the love and yes, the bitterness and bias that make up the black experience in America.

And this helps explain, perhaps, my relationship with Reverend Wright. As imperfect as he may be, he has been like family to me. He strengthened my faith, officiated my wedding, and baptized my children. Not once in my conversations with him have I heard him talk about any ethnic group in derogatory terms, or treat whites with whom he interacted with anything but courtesy and respect. He contains within him the contradictions — the good and the bad — of the community that he has served diligently for so many years.

I can no more disown him than I can disown the black community. I can no more disown him than I can my white grandmother — a woman who helped raise me, a woman who sacrificed again and again for me, a woman who loves me as much as she loves anything in this world, but a woman who once confessed her fear of black men who passed by her on the street, and who on more than one occasion has uttered racial or ethnic stereotypes that made me cringe.

These people are a part of me. And they are a part of America, this country that I love.

Some will see this as an attempt to justify or excuse comments that are simply inexcusable. I can assure you it is not. I suppose the politically safe thing would be to move on from this episode and just hope that it fades into the woodwork. We can dismiss Reverend Wright as a crank or a demagogue, just as some have dismissed Geraldine Ferraro, in the aftermath of her recent statements, as harboring some deep-seated racial bias.

But race is an issue that I believe this nation cannot afford to ignore right now. We would be making the same mistake that Reverend Wright made in his offending sermons about America — to simplify and stereotype and amplify the negative to the point that it distorts reality.

The fact is that the comments that have been made and the issues that have surfaced over the last few weeks reflect the complexities of race in this country that we've never really worked through — a part of our union that we have yet to perfect. And if we walk away now, if we simply retreat into our respective corners, we will never be able to come together and solve challenges like health care, or education, or the need to find good jobs for every American.

Understanding this reality requires a reminder of how we arrived at this point. As William Faulkner once wrote, "The past isn't dead and buried. In fact, it isn't even past." We do not need to recite here the history of racial injustice in this country. But we do need to remind ourselves that so many of the disparities that exist in the African-American community today can be directly traced to inequalities passed on from an earlier generation that suffered under the brutal legacy of slavery and Jim Crow.

Segregated schools were, and are, inferior schools; we still haven't fixed them, fifty years after Brown v. Board of Education, and the inferior education they provided, then and now, helps explain the pervasive achievement gap between today's black and white students.

Legalized discrimination — where blacks were prevented, often through violence, from owning property, or loans were not granted to African-American business owners, or black homeowners could not access FHA mortgages, or blacks were excluded from unions, or the police force, or fire departments — meant that black families could not amass any meaningful wealth to bequeath to future generations. That history helps explain the wealth and income gap between black and white, and the concentrated pockets of poverty that persists in so many of today's urban and rural communities.

A lack of economic opportunity among black men, and the shame and frustration that came from not being able to provide for one's family, contributed to the erosion of black families — a problem that welfare policies for many years may have worsened. And the lack of basic services in so many urban black neighborhoods — parks for kids to play in, police walking the beat, regular garbage pick-up and building code enforcement — all helped create a cycle of violence, blight and neglect that continue to haunt us.

This is the reality in which Reverend Wright and other African-Americans of his generation grew up. They came of age in the late fifties and early sixties, a time when segregation was still the law of the land and opportunity was systematically constricted. What's remarkable is not how many failed in the face of discrimination, but rather how many men and women overcame the odds; how many were able to make a way out of no way for those like me who would come after them.

But for all those who scratched and clawed their way to get a piece of the American Dream, there were many who didn't make it — those who were ultimately defeated, in one way or another, by discrimination. That legacy of defeat was passed on to future generations those young men and increasingly young women who we see standing on street corners or languishing in our prisons, without hope or prospects for the future. Even for those blacks who did make it, questions of race, and racism, continue to define their worldview in fundamental ways. For the men and women of Reverend Wright's generation, the memories of humiliation and doubt and fear have not gone away; nor has the anger and the bitterness of those years. That anger may not get expressed in public, in front of white co-workers or white friends. But it does find voice in the barbershop or around the kitchen table. At times, that anger is exploited by politicians, to gin up votes along racial lines, or to make up for a politician's own failings.

And occasionally it finds voice in the church on Sunday morning, in the pulpit and in the pews. The fact that so many people are surprised to hear that anger in some of Reverend Wright's sermons simply reminds us of the old truism that the most segregated hour in American life occurs on Sunday morning. That anger is not always productive; indeed, all too often it distracts attention from solving real problems; it keeps us from squarely facing our own complicity in our condition, and prevents the African-American community from forging the alliances it needs to bring about real change. But the anger is real; it is powerful; and to simply wish it away, to condemn it without understanding its roots, only serves to widen the chasm of misunderstanding that exists between the races.

In fact, a similar anger exists within segments of the white community. Most working- and middle-class white Americans don't feel that they have been particularly privileged by their race. Their experience is the immigrant experience as far as they're concerned, no one's handed them anything, they've built it from scratch. They've worked hard all their lives, many times only to see their jobs shipped overseas or their pension dumped after a lifetime of labor. They are anxious about their futures, and feel their dreams slipping away; in an era of stagnant wages and global competition, opportunity comes to be seen as a zero sum game, in which your dreams come at my expense. So when they are told to bus their children to a school across town; when they hear that an African American is getting an advantage in landing a good job or a spot in a good college because of an injustice that they themselves never committed; when they're told that their fears about crime in urban neighborhoods are somehow prejudiced, resentment builds over time.

Like the anger within the black community, these resentments aren't always expressed in polite company. But they have helped shape the political landscape for at least a generation. Anger over welfare and affirmative action helped forge the Reagan Coalition. Politicians routinely exploited fears of crime for their own electoral ends. Talk show hosts and conservative commentators built entire careers unmasking bogus claims of racism while dismissing legitimate discussions of racial injustice and inequality as mere political correctness or reverse racism.

Just as black anger often proved counterproductive, so have these white resentments distracted attention from the real culprits of the middle class squeeze a corporate culture rife with inside dealing, questionable accounting practices, and short-term greed; a Washington dominated by lobbyists and special interests; economic policies that favor the few over the many. And yet, to wish away the resentments of white Americans, to label them as misguided or even racist, without recognizing they are grounded in legitimate concerns this too widens the racial divide, and blocks the path to understanding.

This is where we are right now. It's a racial stalemate we've been stuck in for years. Contrary to the claims of some of my critics, black and white, I have never been so naive as to believe that we can get beyond our racial divisions in a single election cycle, or with a single candidacy particularly a candidacy as imperfect as my own.

But I have asserted a firm conviction a conviction rooted in my faith in God and my faith in the American people that working together we can move beyond some of our old racial wounds, and that in fact we have no choice if we are to continue on the path of a more perfect union.

For the African-American community, that path means embracing the burdens of our past without becoming victims of our past. It means continuing to insist on a full measure of justice in every aspect of American life. But it also means binding our particular grievances for better health care, and better schools, and better jobs to the larger aspirations of all Americans the white woman struggling to break the glass ceiling, the white man whose been laid off, the immigrant trying to feed his family. And it means taking full responsibility for own lives by demanding more from our fathers, and spending more time with our children, and reading to them, and teaching them that while they may face challenges and discrimination in their own lives, they must never succumb to despair or cynicism; they must always believe that they can write their own destiny.

Ironically, this quintessentially American — and yes, conservative — notion of self-help found frequent expression in Reverend Wright's sermons. But what my former pastor too often failed to understand is that embarking on a program of self-help also requires a belief that society can change.

The profound mistake of Reverend Wright's sermons is not that he spoke about racism in our society. It's that he spoke as if our society was static; as if no progress has been made; as if this country — a country that has made it possible for one of his own members to run for the highest office in the land and build a coalition of white and black; Latino and Asian, rich and poor, young and old — is still irrevocably bound to a tragic past. But what we know — what we have seen — is that America can change. That is the true genius of this nation. What we have already achieved gives us hope — the audacity to hope — for what we can and must achieve tomorrow.

In the white community, the path to a more perfect union means acknowledging that what ails the African-American community does not just exist in the minds of black people; that the legacy of discrimination — and current incidents of discrimination, while less overt than in the past — are real and must be addressed. Not just with words, but with deeds — by investing in our schools and our communities; by enforcing our civil rights laws and ensuring fairness in our criminal justice system; by providing this generation with ladders of opportunity that were unavailable for previous generations. It requires all Americans to realize that your dreams do not have to come at the expense of my dreams; that investing in the health, welfare, and education of black and brown and white children will ultimately help all of America prosper.

In the end, then, what is called for is nothing more, and nothing less, than what all the world's great religions demand — that we do unto others as we would have them do unto us. Let us be our brother's keeper, Scripture tells us. Let us be our sister's keeper. Let us find that common stake we all have in one another, and let our politics reflect that spirit as well.

For we have a choice in this country. We can accept a politics that breeds division, and conflict, and cynicism. We can tackle race only as spectacle — as we did in the OJ trial — or in the wake of tragedy, as we did in the aftermath of Katrina — or as fodder for the nightly news. We can play Reverend Wright's sermons on every channel, every day and talk about them from now until the election, and make the only question in this campaign whether or not the American people think that I somehow believe or sympathize with his most offensive words. We can pounce on some gaffe by a Hillary supporter as evidence that she's playing the race card, or we can speculate on whether white men will all flock to John McCain in the general election regardless of his policies.

We can do that.

But if we do, I can tell you that in the next election, we'll be talking about some other distraction. And then another one. And then another one. And nothing will change.

That is one option. Or, at this moment, in this election, we can come together and say, "Not this time." This time we want to talk about the crumbling schools that are stealing the future of black children and white children and Asian children and Hispanic children and Native American children. This time we want to reject the cynicism that tells us that these kids can't learn; that those kids who don't look like us are somebody else's problem. The children of America are not those kids, they are our kids, and we will not let them fall behind in a 21st century economy. Not this time.

This time we want to talk about how the lines in the Emergency Room are filled with whites and blacks and Hispanics who do not have health care; who don't have the power on their own to overcome the special interests in Washington, but who can take them on if we do it together.

This time we want to talk about the shuttered mills that once provided a decent life for men and women of every race, and the homes for sale that once belonged to Americans from every religion, every region, every walk of life. This time we want to talk about the fact that the real problem is not that someone who doesn't look like you might take your job; it's that the corporation you work for will ship it overseas for nothing more than a profit.

This time we want to talk about the men and women of every color and creed who serve together, and fight together, and bleed together under the same proud flag. We want to talk about how to bring them home from a war that never should've been authorized and never should've been waged, and we want to talk about how we'll show our patriotism by caring for them, and their families, and giving them the benefits they have earned.

I would not be running for President if I didn't believe with all my heart that this is what the vast majority of Americans want for this country. This union may never be perfect, but generation after generation has shown that it can always be perfected. And today, whenever I find myself feeling doubtful or cynical about this possibility, what gives me the most hope is the next generation the young people whose attitudes and beliefs and openness to change have already made history in this election.

There is one story in particularly that I'd like to leave you with today a story I told when I had the great honor of speaking on Dr. King's birthday at his home church, Ebenezer Baptist, in Atlanta.

There is a young, twenty-three year old white woman named Ashley Baia who organized for our campaign in Florence, South Carolina. She had been working to organize a mostly African-American community since the beginning of this campaign, and one day she was at a roundtable discussion where everyone went around telling their story and why they were there.

And Ashley said that when she was nine years old, her mother got cancer. And because she had to miss days of work, she was let go and lost her health care. They had to file for bankruptcy, and that's when Ashley decided that she had to do something to help her mom.

She knew that food was one of their most expensive costs, and so Ashley convinced her mother that what she really liked and really wanted to eat more than anything else was mustard and relish sandwiches. Because that was the cheapest way to eat.

She did this for a year until her mom got better, and she told everyone at the roundtable that the reason she joined our campaign was so that she could help the millions of other children in the country who want and need to help their parents too.

Now Ashley might have made a different choice. Perhaps somebody told her along the way that the source of her mother's problems were blacks who were on welfare and too lazy to work, or Hispanics who were coming into the country illegally. But she didn't. She sought out allies in her fight against injustice.

Anyway, Ashley finishes her story and then goes around the room and asks everyone else why they're supporting the campaign. They all have different stories and reasons. Many bring up a specific issue. And finally they come to this elderly black man who's been sitting there quietly the entire time. And Ashley asks him why he's there. And he does not bring up a specific issue. He does not say health care or the economy. He does not say education or the war. He does not say that he was there because of Barack Obama. He simply says to everyone in the room, "I am here because of Ashley."

"I'm here because of Ashley." By itself, that single moment of recognition between that young white girl and that old black man is not enough. It is not enough to give health care to the sick, or jobs to the jobless, or education to our children

But it is where we start. It is where our union grows stronger. And as so many generations have come to realize over the course of the two-hundred and twenty one years since a band of patriots signed that document in Philadelphia, that is where the perfection begins.

Barack Obama's Inaugural Address

2009

"The world has changed, and we must change with it."

Overview

As he stood in the brittle winter sunshine on the west portico of the Capitol on January 20, 2009, Barack Obama gave the most anticipated political speech of the first decade of the twenty-first century. Obama delivered his inaugural address before a crowd of 1.8 million people, more than had ever before seen a president take the oath of office. Obama created such excitement partly because, as the first African American president, his election proved, as he himself had declared on election night in November 2008, that "America is a place where all things are possible." He had inspired millions of Americans with his eloquence and his promise to bring "change" at a time when an economic collapse was devastating individual lives and when American forces remained engaged in two long and controversial wars. In his first speech as president, Obama offered the American people hope that the nation would meet these serious challenges, but he stated frankly that success would not come easily or "in a short span of time." He asked his fellow citizens to join him in "a new era of responsibility" and to draw on the values of the past to "begin again the work of remaking America."

Context

The interval between Obama's election on November 4, 2008, and his inauguration on January 20, 2009, was a time of enormous anticipation. Obama's election was an event that many people could hardly believe the presidential victory of an African American whose own father could not have obtained service at segregated lunch counters or hotels in the United States. Millions of people were eager to witness an unprecedented event to be "a part of history" and to celebrate the vitality of American democracy when he took the presidential oath. Indeed, many Americans counted the days until the beginning of Obama's presidency, especially since they expected a sharp change from the current administration. President George W. Bush's approval ratings had fallen to less than 30 percent; people had lost confidence in his leadership, especially in his handling of the economy. Obama promised not only new policies but also new politics an end to the usual partisan divisions, as he would reach out across ideological, cultural, and racial divisions.

Anticipation mixed with anxiety, however, when the weeks between the election and the inauguration brought frightening economic developments. What only months earlier had seemed primarily to be problems in the mortgage and banking industries had become a global economic crisis. The stock market dropped by more than 17 percent; some corporations, including General Motors, faced bankruptcy; hundreds of thousands of workers lost their jobs each week; and ordinary Americans saw their retirement and college-savings accounts severely depleted. Federal aid to banks and businesses could not slow the contraction of the economy, and statements by President Bush and other high government officials could not stop the plunging of consumer confidence. As the inauguration neared, Obama as president-elect revealed some of his plans to restore prosperity, including a major economic stimulus program and new regulations for financial markets. As Americans continued hearing the worst financial news since the Great Depression of the 1930s, they awaited the new president and hoped that Obama could indeed bring change.

The speech that Obama gave on inauguration day was a collaborative effort with his chief speechwriter, Jon Favreau. Just twenty-seven years old, Favreau had worked for Obama during the campaign and had drafted some of his most important speeches. He studied Obama's writings and speech patterns carefully, and he read previous inaugural addresses. After Obama explained what he wanted to say in his inaugural speech, Favreau wrote the first draft, and Obama and Favreau then took turns editing and revising. Some words may be Obama's and others his speechwriter's. The ideas and the vision are the president's.

the country of his birth; Obama's parents divorced in 1964. His mother, Stanley Ann Dunham, later married Lolo Soetoro, an Indonesian who was studying at the University of Hawaii. In 1967 the family moved to Jakarta, Indonesia, and Obama became familiar with the nation's culture and society. For the first time, he saw widespread want and deprivation, as beggars "seemed to be everywhere, . . . some without arms, others without feet," as he described it in Dreams from My Father. He later said that living in Indonesia made him "more mindful of . . . the ways that fate can determine the lives of young children, so that one ends up being fabulously wealthy and another ends up being extremely poor." His mother supplemented his formal schooling with tutorials in African American history. She also made him get up at 4 AM five days a week to take English lessons before going to school.

In 1971 Obama returned to Hawaii, where he lived with his maternal grandparents and attended the Punahou School, an elite private academy that allowed him, as he later explained, to make contacts that "would last a lifetime." During the Christmas season, his mother and father joined him for an extended visit. This two-week family reunion provided Obama with his only memories of his father; Obama did not see his father again before an automobile accident in Kenya took his life in 1982.

Like many adolescents, Obama, who went by the name of "Barry," engaged in what he called "a fitful interior struggle" to establish his own identity. Complicating his efforts were the permanent absence of his father and the return of his mother to Indonesia for several years to do fieldwork for her graduate degree in anthropology. Obama learned from friends, grandparents, and the books he read most evenings in his room. Yet the role models he discovered and the advice he received provided limited help, as he was the son of an African father and a white mother who was living in a state where most people were Asian Americans or Pacific Islanders. "I was trying to raise myself to be a black man in America," Obama wrote, but "no one around me seemed to know exactly what that meant." Obama eventually wrote Dreams from My Father: A Story of Race and Inheritance (1995) as a candid and poignant account of his efforts to understand himself and the world around him.

Obama became politically active while he attended Occidental College, in Los Angeles. He participated in demonstrations against the South African practice of apartheid. He engaged in lengthy discussions with friends about politics, learned that he had a talent for public speaking, and became "Barack" instead of "Barry." In 1981, after two years at Occidental, he transferred to Columbia University, where he earned a bachelor's degree in political science in 1983.

After working for two years in New York, Obama became a community organizer in Chicago in 1985. He found that helping African American residents in the poor neighborhoods of Chicago's South Side on projects such as asbestos removal from apartment buildings or improving city services was "the best education I ever received." As he later wrote in The Audacity of Hope, community organizing "deepened my resolve to lead a public life, . . . fortified my racial identity, and confirmed my belief in the capacity of ordinary people to do extraordinary things."

Concluding that he needed additional training to do his work more effectively, Obama enrolled in Harvard Law School. In 1990 he was elected editor of the Harvard Law Review, becoming the first African American to hold that position. After graduating in 1991, Obama moved back to Chicago and, the following year, married Michelle Robinson, also a graduate of Harvard Law. He worked for a law firm that took on many civil rights cases, and he also taught constitutional law at the University of Chicago Law School.

In 1996 Obama won the first of two consecutive terms in the Illinois Senate, representing a district in Hyde Park on Chicago's South Side. He suffered a defeat at the polls in 2000, when he challenged the incumbent Democrat Bobby Rush for a seat in the U.S. Congress. Obama regained his seat in the Illinois Senate in 2002. During that campaign, he spoke out against going to war with Iraq, maintaining that such a conflict would "fan the flames" of opposition to the United States in the Middle East and "strengthen the recruitment arm of al Qaeda," the terrorist organization responsible for the attacks of September 11, 2001. Obama announced his candidacy for the U.S. Senate shortly after returning to the state senate. He won the Democratic nomination by a wide margin in the March 2004 Illinois primary, and his candidacy gained a boost when he gave the keynote address at the Democratic National Convention on July 27, 2004. In November, Obama won election to the Senate by the widest margin in Illinois history.

In the Senate, Obama served on the Foreign Relations Committee and sponsored ethics reform legislation, but he soon began considering a run for the presidency. He declared his candidacy on February 10, 2007, in Springfield, Illinois, conceding that there was "a certain presumptuousness a certain audacity to this announcement." While he admitted that he had not "spent a lot of time learning the ways of Washington," he insisted that he had "been there long enough to know that the ways of Washington must change." During most of 2007, polls showed that Obama was far behind the front-runner for the Democratic nomination, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York. Obama, however, campaigned tirelessly, built an extensive and remarkably effective campaign organization, raised large amounts of money from small donors by relying on the Internet, and emphasized that he stood for "change," especially the ending of the war in Iraq. Obama surged into the lead for the nomination with a victory in the Iowa caucuses in early January 2008 but then narrowly lost to Clinton in the first primary in New Hampshire. He regained the advantage in a cluster of primaries that all occurred on February 5, or "Super Tuesday." At the end of the primaries and caucuses on June 3, Obama claimed that he had enough delegates to win the nomination. Clinton suspended her campaign four days later, ensuring that Obama would be the Democrats' choice for president when the party held its national convention in Denver at the end of August.

Polls indicated that the race between Obama and the Republican nominee, Senator John McCain of Arizona, was close until mid-September, when McCain asserted, "The fundamentals of our economy are strong." That statement was made as the financial difficulties that had troubled the U.S. economy for more than a year worsened so dramatically that President George W. Bush sought emergency legislation to provide $700 billion in aid to ailing banks and investment firms. As the economy weakened, Obama's message of change resonated with more voters. On November 4, Obama was elected the nation's forty-fourth president, winning overwhelmingly with 52.9 percent of the popular vote and 365 electoral votes.

After thanking President Bush, Obama quickly introduces the two main themes of his address. The first is that America faces a crisis, one brought about by a faltering economy and two wars. The second is that enduring national principles and values would enable the nation to meet the challenges it faces. Obama maintains that leaders in high office, like himself, as well as the American people must together take responsibility for weathering the "gathering clouds and raging storms." On a day of celebration, the new president's speech is sober, purposeful, and resolute.

In matter-of-fact language the new president sketches the causes of the crisis. He declares that the United States "is at war against a far-reaching network of violence and hatred." His wording suggests that the primary enemy is the terrorist organization al Qaeda. Also implicit in his statement is the view that the war in Iraq is a diversion from the battle against terrorism, a position he took throughout his campaign for president. He blames the "badly weakened" economy both on individual "greed and irresponsibility" and on "collective failure to make hard choices" and "prepare . . . for a new age." He links the symptoms of economic recession mortgage foreclosures, unemployment, and business closings to longer-term problems, such as expensive health care, ineffective schools, and wasteful and dangerous energy consumption. By doing so, he implies that restoring economic health requires major reforms to address these larger problems.

Obama maintains that the American people can overcome the grim realities of crisis, but he offers a frank assessment of the work ahead; he tells his fellow citizens to expect economic problems to deepen and persist. He also understands that the most corrosive effects of an economic recession can be psychological. People lose hope both for themselves and for their children. The results, he explains, are "a sapping of confidence" and "a nagging fear" that "the next generation" must settle for less. Obama tries to reassure his fellow citizens that better times are ahead, but he does so in spare, temperate language. The current challenges, he asserts, "will not be met easily or in a short span of time. But know this America: They will be met."

In the next section of his address, Obama situates contemporary problems in the broad sweep of American history. He believes that a presidential inauguration is an important symbolic occasion, when Americans reaffirm their "enduring spirit" and continue the journey of earlier generations. Obama reminds his fellow citizens that the United States remains a great nation, but "greatness is never a given. It must be earned." He thus asks the American people to continue the work of "the risk-takers, the doers, the makers of things." Some of the people who have contributed to national greatness are the celebrated heroes of the Revolutionary War (such as at Concord, Massachusetts), the Civil War (at Gettysburg, Pennsylvania), World War II (at Normandy, France), and the Vietnam War (at Khe Sanh). Others, such as factory workers, slaves, farmers, and immigrants, never gained individual recognition but still "carried us up the long rugged path towards prosperity and freedom." While the economy might have stalled or shrunk, "our capacity remains undiminished." To renew their strength, the American people must no longer tolerate the practices "that for far too long have strangled our politics." Politics as usual will not suffice, a judgment that he believes voters confirmed in the November election. The nation's "time of standing pat, of protecting narrow interests and putting off unpleasant decisions . . . has surely passed," he affirms.

In what may be the most significant section of his address, Obama asserts that it is time to "begin again the work of remaking America" in profoundly new ways. He favors projects that will rebuild the nation's infrastructure and that will create new jobs. Even more important, though, is his desire to "lay a new foundation for growth" of the economy. The speech provides a few indications as to how he proposes to do so during his presidency. As important as roads and bridges are the digital lines essential to electronic communication and commerce. The reference to restoring "science to its rightful place" foreshadows his decision in early March to lift restrictions on stem-cell research in the hope that such work could yield dramatic improvements in the treatment of disease. Obama also pledges to "transform" schools and colleges so that they, too, could contribute to a new age of economic growth. Achieving these goals could bring about one of the greatest periods of reform in U.S. history.

Obama tries to forestall criticism from those "who suggest that our system cannot tolerate too many big plans." He maintains that such critics do not appreciate what Americans have accomplished at times "when imagination is joined to common purpose." He also insists that his election shows that voters have repudiated the cynics' "stale political arguments that have consumed us for so long." In short, Obama maintains that change both in national objectives and in how Americans achieve them is essential to economic recovery.

The new president concludes his discussion of the economic crisis by examining the roles of government and the market in restoring prosperity. There are echoes of Ronald Reagan in Obama's words. Taking office in January 1981 at a time of severe economic problems, Reagan declared in his first inaugural address that government was the reason for the nation's economic difficulties and that he was determined to make government work. Although his views about the government's powers and responsibilities are far different from Reagan's, Obama agrees with his predecessor that in a time of economic crisis, government must work and must be accountable. As was Reagan's, his goal is to "restore the vital trust between a people and their government," albeit in different ways. Also as did Reagan, Obama lauds the nation's market economy for its ability "to generate wealth and expand freedom." Yet Obama deviates sharply from the agendas of Reagan and George W. Bush when he calls for stronger government regulation of markets and businesses. In the year before Obama's election, several large banks and other financial institutions failed, with inadequate government oversight having contributed to their problems. In addition, some people lost their life savings after unscrupulous investment managers defrauded them while federal regulators ignored warnings of suspicious activity. Obama states what many Americans already understood all too well: "This crisis has reminded us that without a watchful eye, the market can spin out of control."

Turning to international affairs, Obama embraces principles different from those that prevailed during the Bush administration to guide his approach to protecting the nation's security. He rejects "as false the choice between our safety and our ideals," promising not to compromise the latter "for expedience sake." These statements indirectly criticize the Bush administration for weakening civil liberties in efforts to prevent another terrorist attack like that of September 11, 2001. Referring to earlier generations that had faced the challenges of world war and cold war, Obama explains that they understood that "power alone cannot protect us, nor does it entitle us to do as we please." Again, there is unmistakable criticism of the preceding administration for launching military action against Iraq in 2003 despite the objections of many allied and friendly nations and for deprecating the leaders and nations who expressed their disagreements. Obama reiterates what had been a major promise of his campaign that "we will begin to responsibly leave Iraq to its people and forge a hard-earned peace in Afghanistan." He affirms that he will work with allies and former adversaries to lessen the dangers of nuclear war and global warming. He offers friendship to "each nation and every man, woman and child who seeks a future of peace and dignity." And in perhaps the sharpest criticism of his predecessor, he declares, "We are ready to lead once more."

Leadership, according to Obama, also requires staunch defense of "our way of life." In words that elicited vigorous applause from his audience at the Capitol, Obama promises fortitude against terrorists who slaughter innocents: "Our spirit is stronger," he states confidently, "and we will defeat you." Finding hope in the increased strength and unity that Americans experienced after the nation's dark chapters of "civil war and segregation," Obama envisions a similar transformation on a global scale. "The old hatreds shall someday pass," he declares hopefully. "Our common humanity shall reveal itself," and "a new era of peace" shall begin. Yet he knows that such sweeping change can occur only incrementally and only if America changes along with the rest of the world. Accordingly, he offers "the Muslim world . . . a new way forward, based on mutual interest and mutual respect." He also pledges new cooperation with the people of poor nations, because "we can no longer afford indifference to the suffering outside our borders, nor can we consume the world's resources without regard to effect."

As he honors those Americans who have worn the uniform of their country, Obama returns to the theme that traditional values will enable Americans to meet contemporary challenges. He praises "the fallen heroes who lie in Arlington" National Cemetery and the "guardians of our liberty" stationed in Afghanistan and Iraq for their "willingness to find meaning in something greater than themselves." He maintains that their "spirit of service . . . must inhabit us all" and that it "will define a generation." Along with service, Obama hails traditional values "honesty and hard work, courage and fair play, tolerance and curiosity, loyalty and patriotism" that have accounted for progress throughout American history. He calls for "a new era of responsibility" in which the American people accept obligations to themselves, their country, and the world. His words recall those of John F. Kennedy, who in his inaugural address forty-eight years earlier made a summons to service a stirring challenge to better the world: "Ask not what your country can do for you," Kennedy told his fellow Americans. "Ask what you can do for your country."

In connecting service to the extension of liberty, Obama makes his only reference to being the nation's first African American president. He notes that people of every race and faith have gathered on the mall that stretches from the Capitol to the Lincoln Memorial to join in a celebration of liberty. A measure of the nation's achievement is that only two generations earlier, because of racial segregation, Obama's father would not have been able to obtain service at some local restaurants. Now his son can "stand before you to take a most sacred oath."

Obama closes with a reference to a desperate moment in the Revolutionary War, perhaps revealing how serious he considers the crisis faced by Americans at the beginning of his presidency. British troops occupied New York City, the Continental army had lost a series of battles, and American soldiers left for home as their enlistments expired during the winter cold of December 1776. General George Washington appealed to the virtue and spirit of those who remained, ordering them to cross the icy waters of the Delaware River and leading them to critical victories in New Jersey at Trenton and Princeton. Obama asks that Americans once more rely on their "hope and virtue" during a far different "winter of . . . hardship." Steadfast adherence to the values of the past, he insists, will enable the American people to deliver "to future generations" the "great gift of freedom" that their predecessors have bequeathed to them.

Audience

Obama spoke to the biggest crowd ever to witness a presidential inauguration an estimated 1.8 million people. Thirty-eight million more Americans watched Obama's speech on television, slightly below the record of forty-two million viewers for Ronald Reagan's first inaugural in 1981. Millions more saw Obama's address on the Internet, however, which was not possible when Reagan took the oath of office. Tens of millions of people around the world also viewed Obama's address, either on the Internet or on television. There were crowds near public televisions in world capitals such as Paris and Mexico City, in U.S. military bases in Afghanistan and Iraq, and in Kisumu, Kenya, capital of the province where Obama's father was born. For his first speech as president, Obama truly had a global audience, perhaps the largest ever to hear an inaugural address.

Impact

Americans usually remember inaugural addresses for two reasons. Either they contain language that has a timeless eloquence, or they chart new courses for the nation at times of exceptional promise or peril. Often those two reasons coincide. Abraham Lincoln asked the American people in his second inaugural address, at the end of the Civil War in 1865, to "to bind up the nation's wounds," "with malice toward none, with charity for all." Franklin D. Roosevelt, in his first inaugural address, told his fellow citizens during the worst days of the Great Depression in 1933 that "the only thing we have to fear is fear itself" and then promised a "program of action" that became the New Deal. John F. Kennedy, determined to meet the challenges of the cold war, proclaimed that the United States would "pay any price, bear any burden, meet any hardship, support any

Essential Quotes

"Today I say to you that the challenges we face are real. They are serious and they are many. They will not be met easily or in a short span of time. But know this America: They will be met."

(Paragraph 7)

"Starting today, we must pick ourselves up, dust ourselves off, and begin again the work of remaking America."

(Paragraph 12)

"What the cynics fail to understand is that the ground has shifted beneath them, that the stale political arguments that have consumed us for so long no longer apply."

(Paragraph 14)

"And so, to all other peoples and governments who are watching today, from the grandest capitals to the small village where my father was born, know that America is a friend of each nation, and every man, woman and child who seeks a future of peace and dignity. And we are ready to lead once more."

(Paragraph 18)

"We will not apologize for our way of life, nor will we waver in its defense. And for those who seek to advance their aims by inducing terror and slaughtering innocents, we say to you now that our spirit is stronger and cannot be broken—you cannot outlast us, and we will defeat you."

(Paragraph 21)

"The world has changed, and we must change with it."

(Paragraph 25)

"What is required of us now is a new era of responsibility—a recognition on the part of every American that we have duties to ourselves, our nation and the world, duties that we do not grudgingly accept, but rather seize gladly, firm in the knowledge that there is nothing so satisfying to the spirit, so defining of our character, than giving our all to a difficult task."

(Paragraph 30)

friend, oppose any foe to assure the survival and the success of liberty."

Obama's address does not contain what one former presidential speechwriter, William Safire, calls a "quotable quote," a sentence or phrase as striking as Lincoln's, Roosevelt's, or Kennedy's. Some commentators have suggested that the absence of soaring language may have been intentional. Obama may have wished to emphasize the sobering realities of an economic recession whose magnitude and severity could still not be fully understood when he began his presidency. Plain, direct, and unadorned language may have suited his purpose, and yet in such prose there is still a simple eloquence.

A more important measure of the impact of an inaugural address is how well it maps the route the president follows. Early indications are that Obama does indeed intend to strive for the sweeping reforms he suggested in his speech. As the president's chief of staff, Rahm Emanuel, explained in an interview, there are opportunities in crisis to bring about reforms that would not be possible in normal circumstances. In his first weeks as president, Obama secured the passage of major economic stimulus legislation, which included funds to begin laying the new foundation he envisions for future growth. He has also outlined ambitious programs for education and health-care reform. The ultimate importance of Obama's inaugural address will depend in large measure on what he achieves in office. The most memorable inaugural addresses have usually been given by those presidents who have had highly successful administrations.

Questions for Further Study

1. "Change" was an important theme of Barack Obama's campaign for the presidency in 2008. In what ways is Obama's inaugural address a message of change? Which domestic or foreign policies does he suggest he would alter? What new approaches does he propose to such issues as energy production and consumption, health-care quality and cost, and education? To what extent does he promise continuity—that he would deal with national issues according to long-standing traditions, values, or ideals?

2. Most recent presidents have hoped that their inaugural address would be inspirational—that it would appeal to the high ambitions and best values of the American people. Do you think that President Obama's address is inspirational? Explain how Obama's ideas and the words he uses to express them account for your conclusion.

3. Has Obama's inaugural address been a reliable guide to his presidency? Did he include in his speech the main issues he would address and programs he would propose after becoming president? Does his address fail to mention any important action that he took after becoming president? If so, why do you think that he chose not to discuss that action in his inaugural address?

4. President Obama said that he delivered his inaugural address, as had some other presidents, "amidst gathering clouds and raging storms." Compare his address to one of the following: President Abraham Lincoln's second inaugural address (1865), President Franklin D. Roosevelt's first inaugural address (1933), or President Ronald Reagan's first inaugural address (1981). What were the "gathering clouds and raging storms" when the president you chose was speaking? How did that president propose to weather the storms? Are there any major similarities or differences between that president's inaugural address and Obama's?

Barack Obama's Inaugural Address

My fellow citizens: I stand here today humbled by the task before us, grateful for the trust you have bestowed, mindful of the sacrifices borne by our ancestors.

I thank President Bush for his service to our nation as well as the generosity and cooperation he has shown throughout this transition.

Forty-four Americans have now taken the presidential oath. The words have been spoken during rising tides of prosperity and the still waters of peace. Yet, every so often the oath is taken amidst gathering clouds and raging storms. At these moments, America has carried on not simply because of the skill or vision of those in high office, but because We the People have remained faithful to the ideals of our forbears, and true to our founding documents.

So it has been. So it must be with this generation of Americans.

That we are in the midst of crisis is now well understood. Our nation is at war against a far-reaching network of violence and hatred. Our economy is badly weakened, a consequence of greed and irresponsibility on the part of some but also our collective failure to make hard choices and prepare the nation for a new age.

Homes have been lost, jobs shed, businesses shuttered. Our health care is too costly, our schools fail too many, and each day brings further evidence that the ways we use energy strengthen our adversaries and threaten our planet.

These are the indicators of crisis, subject to data and statistics. Less measurable, but no less profound, is a sapping of confidence across our land; a nagging fear that America's decline is inevitable, that the next generation must lower its sights.

Today I say to you that the challenges we face are real, they are serious and they are many. They will not be met easily or in a short span of time. But know this America: They will be met.

On this day, we gather because we have chosen hope over fear, unity of purpose over conflict and discord. On this day, we come to proclaim an end to the petty grievances and false promises, the recriminations and worn-out dogmas that for far too long have strangled our politics.

We remain a young nation, but in the words of Scripture, the time has come to set aside childish things. The time has come to reaffirm our enduring spirit; to choose our better history; to carry forward that precious gift, that noble idea, passed on from generation to generation: the God-given promise that all are equal, all are free, and all deserve a chance to pursue their full measure of happiness.

In reaffirming the greatness of our nation, we understand that greatness is never a given. It must be earned. Our journey has never been one of shortcuts or settling for less. It has not been the path for the faint-hearted, for those who prefer leisure over work, or seek only the pleasures of riches and fame. Rather, it has been the risk-takers, the doers, the makers of things — some celebrated, but more often men and women obscure in their labor — who have carried us up the long, rugged path towards prosperity and freedom.

For us, they packed up their few worldly possessions and traveled across oceans in search of a new life. For us, they toiled in sweatshops and settled the West, endured the lash of the whip and plowed the hard earth. For us, they fought and died in places like Concord and Gettysburg; Normandy and Khe Sahn.

Time and again these men and women struggled and sacrificed and worked till their hands were raw so that we might live a better life. They saw America as bigger than the sum of our individual ambitions; greater than all the differences of birth or wealth or faction.

This is the journey we continue today. We remain the most prosperous, powerful nation on Earth. Our workers are no less productive than when this crisis began. Our minds are no less inventive, our goods and services no less needed than they were last week or last month or last year. Our capacity remains undiminished. But our time of standing pat, of protecting narrow interests and putting off unpleasant decisions — that time has surely passed.

Starting today, we must pick ourselves up, dust ourselves off, and begin again the work of remaking America. For everywhere we look, there is work to be done.

The state of our economy calls for action: bold and swift. And we will act not only to create new jobs but to lay a new foundation for growth.

We will build the roads and bridges, the electric grids and digital lines that feed our commerce and bind us together.

We will restore science to its rightful place and wield technology's wonders to raise health care's quality and lower its costs. We will harness the sun and the winds and the soil to fuel our cars and run our factories. And we will transform our schools and colleges and universities to meet the demands of a new age.

All this we can do. All this we will do.

Now, there are some who question the scale of our ambitions, who suggest that our system cannot tolerate too many big plans. Their memories are short, for they have forgotten what this country has already done, what free men and women can achieve when imagination is joined to common purpose and necessity to courage.

What the cynics fail to understand is that the ground has shifted beneath them, that the stale political arguments that have consumed us for so long, no longer apply.

The question we ask today is not whether our government is too big or too small, but whether it works, whether it helps families find jobs at a decent wage, care they can afford, a retirement that is dignified. Where the answer is yes, we intend to move forward. Where the answer is no, programs will end.

And those of us who manage the public's knowledge will be held to account, to spend wisely, reform bad habits, and do our business in the light of day, because only then can we restore the vital trust between a people and their government.

Nor is the question before us whether the market is a force for good or ill. Its power to generate wealth and expand freedom is unmatched. But this crisis has reminded us that without a watchful eye, the market can spin out of control. The nation cannot prosper long when it favors only the prosperous.

The success of our economy has always depended not just on the size of our gross domestic product, but on the reach of our prosperity; on the ability to extend opportunity to every willing heart not out of charity, but because it is the surest route to our common good.

As for our common defense, we reject as false the choice between our safety and our ideals. Our founding fathers faced with perils that we can scarcely imagine, drafted a charter to assure the rule of law and the rights of man, a charter expanded by the blood of generations.Those ideals still light the world, and we will not give them up for expedience's sake.

And so, to all other peoples and governments who are watching today, from the grandest capitals to the small village where my father was born: know that America is a friend of each nation and every man, woman and child who seeks a future of peace and dignity, and we are ready to lead once more.

Recall that earlier generations faced down fascism and communism not just with missiles and tanks, but with the sturdy alliances and enduring convictions. They understood that our power alone cannot protect us, nor does it entitle us to do as we please. Instead, they knew that our power grows through its prudent use. Our security emanates from the justness of our cause; the force of our example; the tempering qualities of humility and restraint.

We are the keepers of this legacy, guided by these principles once more, we can meet those new threats that demand even greater effort, even greater cooperation and understanding between nations. We'll begin to responsibly leave Iraq to its people and forge a hard-earned peace in Afghanistan.

With old friends and former foes, we'll work tirelessly to lessen the nuclear threat and roll back the specter of a warming planet. We will not apologize for our way of life nor will we waver in its defense.

And for those who seek to advance their aims by inducing terror and slaughtering innocents, we say to you now that, "Our spirit is stronger and cannot be broken. You cannot outlast us, and we will defeat you."

For we know that our patchwork heritage is a strength, not a weakness. We are a nation of Christians and Muslims, Jews and Hindus, and nonbelievers. We are shaped by every language and culture, drawn from every end of this Earth. And because we have tasted the bitter swill of civil war and segregation and emerged from that dark chapter stronger and more united, we cannot help but believe that the old hatreds shall someday pass; that the lines of tribe shall soon dissolve; that as the world grows smaller, our common humanity shall reveal itself; and that America must play its role in ushering in a new era of peace.

To the Muslim world, we seek a new way forward, based on mutual interest and mutual respect. To those leaders around the globe who seek to sow conflict or blame their society's ills on the West, know that your people will judge you on what you can build, not what you destroy.

To those who cling to power through corruption and deceit and the silencing of dissent, know that you are on the wrong side of history, but that we will extend a hand if you are willing to unclench your fist.

To the people of poor nations, we pledge to work alongside you to make your farms flourish and let clean waters flow; to nourish starved bodies and feed hungry minds. And to those nations like ours that enjoy relative plenty, we say we can no longer afford indifference to the suffering outside our borders, nor can we consume the world's resources without regard to effect. For the world has changed, and we must change with it.

As we consider the road that unfolds before us, we remember with humble gratitude those brave Americans who, at this very hour, patrol far-off deserts and distant mountains. They have something to tell us, just as the fallen heroes who lie in Arlington whisper through the ages.

We honor them not only because they are guardians of our liberty, but because they embody the spirit of service: a willingness to find meaning in something greater than themselves. And yet, at this moment, a moment that will define a generation, it is precisely this spirit that must inhabit us all. For as much as government can do and must do, it is ultimately the faith and determination of the American people upon which this nation relies.

It is the kindness to take in a stranger when the levees break; the selflessness of workers who would rather cut their hours than see a friend lose their job which sees us through our darkest hours. It is the firefighter's courage to storm a stairway filled with smoke, but also a parent's willingness to nurture a child, that finally decides our fate.

Our challenges may be new, the instruments with which we meet them may be new, but those values upon which our success depends, honesty and hard work, courage and fair play, tolerance and curiosity, loyalty and patriotism these things are old.

These things are true. They have been the quiet force of progress throughout our history. What is demanded then is a return to these truths. What is required of us now is a new era of responsibility a recognition, on the part of every American, that we have duties to ourselves, our nation and the world, duties that we do not grudgingly accept but rather seize gladly, firm in the knowledge that there is nothing so satisfying to the spirit, so defining of our character than giving our all to a difficult task.

This is the price and the promise of citizenship. This is the source of our confidence: the knowledge that God calls on us to shape an uncertain destiny. This is the meaning of our liberty and our creed, why men and women and children of every race and every faith can join in celebration across this magnificent mall. And why a man whose father less than 60 years ago might not have been served at a local restaurant can now stand before you to take a most sacred oath.

So let us mark this day in remembrance of who we are and how far we have traveled.

In the year of America's birth, in the coldest of months, a small band of patriots huddled by nine campfires on the shores of an icy river. The capital was abandoned. The enemy was advancing. The snow was stained with blood. At a moment when the outcome of our revolution was most in doubt, the father of our nation ordered these words be read to the people:

"Let it be told to the future world that in the depth of winter, when nothing but hope and virtue could survive, that the city and the country, alarmed at one common danger, came forth to meet it."

America, in the face of our common dangers, in this winter of our hardship, let us remember these timeless words; with hope and virtue, let us brave once more the icy currents, and endure what storms may come; let it be said by our children's children that when we were tested we refused to let this journey end, that we did not turn back nor did we falter; and with eyes fixed on the horizon and God's grace upon us, we carried forth that great gift of freedom and delivered it safely to future generations.

Thank you. God bless you. And God bless the United States of America.

U.S. Senate Resolution Apologizing for the Enslavement and Racial Segregation of African Americans

2009

"The Congress acknowledges the fundamental injustice, cruelty, brutality, and inhumanity of slavery and Jim Crow laws."

Overview

On June 18, 2009, the U.S. Senate passed a resolution apologizing for slavery and racial segregation, including the "Jim Crow" laws that underpinned the nation's division along racial lines from the end of Reconstruction to the 1960s. The resolution was concurrent within Congress, meaning that the same resolution was passed by the U.S. House of Representatives. The resolution reviews the tragic history of slavery and racial segregation and asserts that a federal apology for past injustices committed against African Americans can be a way to help the nation bind its racial wounds. Notably, the resolution sidesteps calls for monetary reparations to be paid to the descendants of slaves. The resolution is nonbinding, meaning that it does not have the force of law; as phrased in the eighteenth and final clause, it is a "sense of the Congress" resolution that expresses a sentiment about something but has no legal effect. For this reason, it was not necessary for the Senate to forward the resolution to the president for his signature. While many political observers believed that such an apology was long overdue and welcomed it, others found it to be "too little, too late" and asserted that its only value was symbolic. Moreover, the apology renewed the contentious debate over the issue of reparations that is, monetary payments to atone for past wrongs for the descendants of slaves.

Context

As the turn of the third millennium approached and arrived, governments and other institutions throughout the world were prompted to look back on their histories and make amends to those peoples they had wronged in the past. The twentieth century had been torn by two destructive world wars, followed by half a century of a brutally expensive cold war that sometimes threatened nuclear annihilation. Aside from the prolonged tension, the cold war precipitated flare-ups of conflict throughout the world as the democratic West and the Communist Soviet bloc vied for influence most dramatically in Korea and in Vietnam, for example. The cold war ultimately ended with the demise of the Soviet Union, while the era of colonialism drew to a close through such momentous events as the withdrawal of the French from Algeria and from Southeast Asia and India's gaining independence from British rule. Nations throughout Africa as well as in Asia became independent in the 1950s and 1960s. Meanwhile, nations and global organizations devoted attention to resolving conflict at societal levels. The United Nations crafted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1948, largely in response to the genocides of World War II. In the United States, Supreme Court decisions led by Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka in 1954 and pivotal legislation such as the Civil Rights Act of 1964 eliminated at least some of the worst vestiges of racial segregation. In 1994, South Africa was freed from the grip of apartheid. In this climate, states and institutions reviewed their histories and strove to make at least symbolic amends for past injustices and abuses.

Many societal apologies were issued by religious institutions. For example, the Southern Baptist Convention apologized to African Americans for its past support of slavery and segregation; the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America apologized to Jews for the anti-Semitism of Lutheranism's founder, Martin Luther; and the United Methodist Church apologized to American Indians for a brutal massacre led by a Methodist preacher during the Civil War. On Easter Sunday in 1996, a coalition of Christians began what was called the Reconciliation Walk, an effort to retrace the original route of the First Crusade, begun nine hundred years earlier, and to apologize for the atrocities committed against Muslims and Jews throughout the Crusades the two-hundred-year period of intermittent warfare waged as European Christians conquered and tried to hold the Holy Land in and around Jerusalem.

The Catholic Church came to apologize for a wide range of past abuses. In 1992 the church apologized for its persecution of Galileo Galilei, the seventeenth-century Italian scientist who challenged the traditional belief that the earth was the center of the universe and for his trouble was accused of heresy and sentenced to house arrest. In 1998 the church issued "We Remember: A Reflection on the Shoah," recognizing that too many Catholics remained silent and did nothing in the face of the Nazi Holocaust of World War II, during which six million Jews lost their lives. (Shoah is the Hebrew word for the Holocaust.) An ongoing debate concerns the failure of Pope Pius XII to speak out more forcefully against the Nazis; at the time he faced genuine fear of Nazi reprisals that could have made matters worse. Then, in 2000, the church confessed to past errors and sins in a document titled "Memory and Reconciliation: The Church and the Faults of the Past." The document was vague in specifying what those faults were, but it hinted at such abuses as the persecution of accused witches, the Cathars (a schismatic French sect), and other heretics in the Inquisition. In 2010, Pope Benedict XVI apologized to Irish Catholics for sexual abuse that had been committed by priests in the past, and Catholic apologies for sexual misconduct have recently been reported by the national news media on a regular basis.

Meanwhile, numerous nations apologized to others for histories of conquest and colonialism. In 1990 the Japanese emperor Akihito expressed regret for the colonization of Korea from 1910 until 1945; the Japanese prime minister Toshiki Kaifu went further and extended apologies to Korea. In 2002 Prime Minister Helen Clark issued a formal apology for the role New Zealand had played in its sometimes tragic colonial administration of Samoa. In 2000 the German president Johannes Rau, addressing the Israeli Knesset (the parliament), apologized to Jews for the Nazi-era Holocaust. Then, in 2004, Germany apologized for a colonial-era crackdown that killed sixty-five thousand ethnic Hereros in Namibia. In 2008 Italy agreed to pay the equivalent of $5 billion to Libya to compensate the African nation for injustices suffered when it was an Italian colony. In 2008 the government of Australia offered a formal apology to the nation's Aborigines, singling out the "stolen generation" of native children forcibly removed from their families. As a matter of course, not all nations have participated in this trend. France has consistently refused to apologize to Algeria for its 132 years of colonial rule, and Great Britain has resisted pleas for an apology to its former colony of India. The Canadian prime minister Stephen Harper caused controversy with a remark that his nation has no history of colonialism, but he later implicitly recanted this remark when he offered an apology to Canada's First Nations the term favored in Canada to refer to indigenous peoples in 2008.

In the United States, some effort was made to apologize for past wrongs. In 1988, Congress passed the Civil Liberties Act, which apologized for the internment of nearly one hundred and twenty thousand Japanese Americans in camps during World War II and provided a payment of $20,000 in reparations to each survivor. Then, in 1993, President Bill Clinton signed Public Law 103-150, called the Apology Resolution, whose purpose was "to acknowledge the 100th anniversary of the January 17, 1893 overthrow of the Kingdom of Hawaii, and to offer an apology to Native Hawaiians on behalf of the United States." In 2005 the U.S. Senate passed a resolution "apologizing to the victims of lynching and the descendants of those victims for the failure of the Senate to enact anti-lynching legislation" in the early decades of the twentieth century. Also in 2005 a joint resolution was introduced in Congress "to acknowledge a long history of official depredations and ill-conceived policies by the United States Government regarding Indian tribes and offer an apology to all Native Peoples on behalf of the United States." The resolution would finally be passed by the Senate in October 2009.

Yet the U.S. government had never offered an apology for slavery. In 2003, President George W. Bush traveled to the African nation of Senegal, and in a speech on July 8 at Gorée Island, one of the most significant centers of the Atlantic slave trade, he acknowledged the evils of slavery and slavery's damaging legacy. In 1997 President Clinton launched his Initiative on Race, which resulted in the 1998 report One America in the 21st Century. Although this document was not an official apology, its recognition of the historical ills of slavery and segregation represented an acknowledgment of the government's role in perpetuating slavery and the Jim Crow laws of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. In the meantime, some legislators were advocating an official apology. The Michigan Democratic representative John Conyers, Jr., an African American who began serving in the House in 1965, had tried since 1989 to pass a bill that would create a commission to study slavery's impact and possible remedies, including reparations. The white U.S. congressman Tony Hall, an Ohio Democrat, proposed an apology in 1997. Little, though, came of these efforts.

A breakthrough occurred in 2007 when the Virginia legislature passed a resolution expressing "profound regret" for slavery. Several other states followed suit: That year the Maryland legislature passed a similar resolution, followed by North Carolina and Alabama. In 2008 New Jersey and Florida, too, passed legislative resolutions apologizing for slavery. These various apologies, perhaps in combination with the election of the nation's first black president, Barack Obama, spurred the federal legislature to action, and both houses of Congress soon introduced resolutions. On July 29, 2008, the House of Representatives passed its resolution, which had been sponsored chiefly by Steve Cohen, a Tennessee Democrat, along with 120 others. The chief backers of the identical Senate resolution were Senator Tom Harkin of Iowa, a Democrat, and Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas, a Republican. Expectations were that the Senate would pass its resolution in 2008, but those hopes were overly optimistic. Finally, the Senate housed in a Capitol built in part by slaves unanimously approved the resolution on June 18, 2009. In this way the federal government's apology for slavery and segregation became a joint resolution.

About the Author

With the federal apology, as with most congressional legislation, it is difficult to determine who composed the words that wound up on paper for the legislature's consideration. Typically, the sponsors of bills and resolutions the representatives or senators who introduce the legislation are regarded as their authors, though staff members typically do the actual writing. Among the resolution's backers, three figures stand out. The first is the sponsor of the resolution in the House of Representatives, Steve Cohen. Stephen Cohen was born in Memphis, Tennessee, in 1949. He graduated from Vanderbilt University in 1971 and then earned a law degree at Memphis State University (now the University of Memphis) in 1973. He began his political career as a member of the state's constitutional convention. In 1982 he was elected to the Tennessee General Assembly as a senator, a position he held for twenty-four years. In 1996 he ran for a U.S. House seat, but his bid was unsuccessful. Ten years later, in 2006, he was elected as the state's first Jewish congressman, the first Jew to represent a majority black district, and one of Congress's few white legislators representing a majority black district.

In the Senate, the Democratic sponsor of the resolution was Tom Harkin of Iowa. Thomas Harkin was born in Cumming, Iowa, in 1939. After graduating from Iowa State University in 1962, he served for five years as a U.S. Navy pilot. He completed his law degree at the Catholic University of America in 1972. His political career began in 1974, when he was elected to the House of Representatives, a position he held until 1985; that year he became a U.S. senator, and he went on to win reelection in the next four contests, to be slated to serve through 2014. In 1992 he entered the primary race for president and won early contests in Iowa, Idaho, and Minnesota. His candidacy stalled, however, and he was the first to drop out of the race and give his support to Clinton. That year and in 2004 he was on the short list for the vice president's slot on the Democratic ticket.

The Senate Republican who sponsored the resolution was Sam Brownback of Kansas. (It is customary, whenever possible, for congressional legislation to have cosponsors, one Democrat and one Republican.) Samuel Brownback was born in Garnett, Kansas, in 1956. After graduating from Kansas State University and receiving a law degree from the University of Kansas in 1982, he practiced as an attorney before entering politics as the state's secretary of agriculture in 1986. In 1996 he won election to the U.S. Senate (in a special election to fill the seat of Senator Bob Dole, who was running for president). He won a full term in 1998, and in 2004 he was reelected with 69 percent of the vote. In 2007 he launched a brief bid for the Republican nomination for president. For 2010, he announced that he would not run for reelection to the Senate but would instead run for governor of Kansas.

Like many such resolutions, this one begins with a long list of "whereas" clauses. In effect, these clauses form a preamble that outlines the justification for the resolution. The resolution begins by acknowledging that the United States has become a "symbol of democracy and freedom" in the world and that African Americans are an important part of the nation's legacy. It then goes on to note the historical fact that from 1619 to 1865, millions of African Americans were enslaved. Beginning with the fourth clause, the document touches on the evils of slavery. Slaves were "brutalized, humiliated, dehumanized, and subjected to the indignity of being stripped of their names and heritage." With regard to names, most slaves were given the names of their masters, and in the twentieth century, numerous black activists, such as Malcolm X born Malcolm Little, who changed his surname to X to represent his lost African name have rejected the names they were born with as "slave names." The resolution additionally notes that slave families were torn apart because members were sold separately. The result of slavery was "visceral racism" that is, a kind of automatic racism about which people did not even think that was "enmeshed in the social fabric" of the nation. The institution of slavery did not fully end until after the Emancipation Proclamation, the end of the Civil War, and the passage of the Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

Beginning with the eighth clause, the document turns to the residual effects of the slave system. The eighth clause refers to Reconstruction, the period from the end of the Civil War until 1877 when the rebellious southern states were readmitted to the Union, federal troops in the South protected newly freed slaves, and in many states blacks were elected to state and federal office. The document recognizes that the gains made by African Americans during that period were fleeting. The former Confederacy resisted Reconstruction; the Ku Klux Klan began its reign of terror, with white supremacists lynching hundreds of blacks for the slimmest of reasons or no reason at all; blacks were routinely denied their right to vote by poll taxes, literacy tests, and the general obstinacy of office-holding whites; and Black Codes restricted the movements of African Americans and forced them into employment, such as sharecropping, that was little better than slavery.

The ninth clause refers to "de jure racial segregation," where de jure is a Latin phrase used in legal writing to refer to something accomplished "by law" or by state action. In this regard, the document refers to Jim Crow legislation, as the social and legal system that kept blacks in subservient positions was informally called. The name Jim Crow comes from a popular nineteenth-century minstrel-show character. Clause 9 also uses the phrase "separate and unequal," an allusion to the Supreme Court's landmark decision in 1896 in Plessy v. Ferguson. This case, brought as a challenge to segregated railcars in Louisiana, established the "separate but equal" doctrine that would entrench legal segregation for another half century. Through the 1950s and 1960s, the Supreme Court and Congress were able to dismantle Jim Crow through, for example, Brown v. Board of Education (1954), which overturned Plessy, and the Civil Rights Act of 1964 but vestiges of discrimination persisted. As the resolution asserts, African Americans have continued to suffer "enormous damage and loss" under the social patterns established through the centuries of slavery and Jim Crow, and the nation should not forget these historical ills.

Beginning with the fourteenth clause, the resolution makes reference to specific current events. In 2003 President George W. Bush visited the African nation of Senegal and, speaking at Gorée Island, one of the most notorious centers of the Atlantic slave trade, acknowledged the unfortunate legacy of slavery and expressed hope that its evils could in time be overcome. Reference is also made to President Bill Clinton's dialogue on race a reference to the Initiative on Race, launched by the president by executive order in 1997 and culminating in the 1998 report One America in the 21st Century.

The resolution then begins to build toward a conclusion. The sixteenth clause acknowledges that nothing can erase the nation's history of slavery and its effects. However, that clause expresses the hope that recognition of past injustices and a formal apology can help "bind the wounds of the Nation that are rooted in slavery." In apologizing, the U.S. government can honor the endurance and history of African Americans as well as all other Americans. The seventeenth clause notes that various state legislatures, including those of Virginia, Maryland, Alabama, North Carolina, and Florida, have passed resolutions apologizing or expressing "profound regret" for slavery and that similar resolutions were under consideration in other states.

Having established the historical record, the resolution turns from "whereas" to "be it resolved." The core of the resolution is the actual, formal apology for "the fundamental injustice, cruelty, brutality, and inhumanity of slavery and Jim Crow laws," presented in the eighteenth and final clause. Apology is made to all African Americans, many of whose ancestors were slaves. Additionally, drawing on language from the Declaration of Independence, the resolution expresses a commitment to "the principle that all people are created equal and endowed with inalienable rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

The resolution ends with a formal disclaimer. It states first that nothing in the resolution "authorizes or supports any claim against the United States." This means that the Senate was not explicitly or implicitly acknowledging any right to reparations on the part of African Americans. A fear was that an acknowledgment of culpability would lead to renewed and increased demands for monetary or other forms of reparations and that the resolution, with its acknowledgment of guilt, would serve as a prominent exhibit in such demands. The second part of the disclaimer notes that the resolution in no way "serves as a settlement of any claim against the United States."

Audience

An apology to African Americans on the part of the federal government was regarded by some as long overdue. The Senate, along with the House of Representatives, arguably hoped that with the election of Barack Obama as president, the resolution could help usher in a period of racial reconciliation. In this sense, the audience was the entire nation. Clearly, African Americans, to whom the government was apologizing, were the primary focus of the intended audience. All of the major sponsors of the resolution were white, so one hope was certainly that African Americans could take some satisfaction in official recognition of past wrongs on the part of largely white legislators. The resolution also had an international audience; as other nations were recognizing the ill effects of past actions, sentiment was growing that the United States should do so as well.

Impact

As with most official apologies to groups that have been victimized, the nature of the impact lies in the eye of the beholder. The Senate resolution is almost exclusively symbolic, as it has no legal force, nor does it propose any concrete action. Certainly many African Americans were gratified that the federal government finally recognized its culpability for slavery and Jim Crow. But many observers regarded the apology as a flimsy manifestation of "white guilt." According to this view, issuing the apology allowed some to buy racial reconciliation on the cheap, while the apology did nothing to change history, nor did it do anything to alter the position of American Americans in modern society. Thus for some, the apology was merely a gesture, an act of political theater, or a manifestation of what has been called "political correctness" the notion that there are certain "correct" opinions to be held as much for show as for substance.

The Senate's apology did have one important effect, in that it renewed the debate about reparations for African Americans particularly because the resolution evades the notion that it supports calls for reparations. To some observers, the apology seems to outright reject any prospect of reparations. To other observers, though, the apology is vague on this issue and leaves open the possibility of reparations sometime in the future. For example, Senator Roland Burris, an Illinois Democrat, stated on the Senate floor that the "disclaimer in no way would eliminate future actions that may be brought before this body that may deal with reparations."

The reparations movement can be said to have begun during the Civil War, when General William Tecumseh Sherman issued Special Field Order No. 15, which promised forty acres and a mule to free blacks in the Sea Islands around Charleston, South Carolina. Sherman's order, while initially providing a refuge for freedpeople, ultimately had little effect, for much of the land was reclaimed by white owners, and many of the blacks who had settled on the land were eventually removed by the army and the Freedmen's Bureau. Although in 1893 Henry McNeal Turner organized a convention that called for remedies for African Americans, including reparations which he calculated to be $49 billion the movement for reparations died during the Jim Crow era.

Such demands, however, have been renewed in recent years by such figures as Representative John Conyers, Jr., of Michigan; the Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan; and the Green Party presidential candidate Ralph Nader. Additionally, various organizations, such as the American Bar Association, have called for congressional investigations into the issue of reparations. According to polls taken early in the 2000s, just over half of African Americans supported some sort of cash reparations, as did about one in ten whites. One of the arguments that has been made in support of reparations in addition to the obvious one that slavery and its aftermath were gross injustices that deprived African Americans of the ability to accumulate wealth is that the government provided reparations to Japanese Americans for their internment in World War II, and African Americans are no less deserving. The response has been that the World War II internment was the direct result of federal mandate, but slavery was conducted by private individuals.

Some efforts have been made to calculate just how much the United States would owe the descendants of slaves. One estimate, based on payment for some 222 million hours of forced labor, compounded at 6 percent, would lead to a total of $97 trillion dollars, money that the government, of course, does not have. Even more modest proposals have led to estimates that reparations would cost Americans not of African descent tens of thousands of dollars apiece. Numerous other objections to reparations have been made: that the government has provided implicit reparations through a range of government welfare-type programs and affirmative action programs that benefit African Americans; that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to determine who would have a valid claim to descent from a slave; that some African Americans themselves owned slaves; that the majority of whites in the South and the vast majority in the North were not slave owners; that slavery in America could not have existed without the complicity of African and Muslim slave traders; that many thousands of whites died in the Civil War, leaving their descendants bereft, in part to end slavery; that millions of immigrants to the United States arrived long after slavery ended and thus should not be obligated to make any sacrifices; and that far from contributing to America's accumulated wealth, slavery was most prevalent in the nation's poorest states while those states where slavery ended early, such as Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania, became the nation's richest states. Thus, the Senate's apology inadvertently or perhaps deliberately renewed the long-simmering debate over the question of what America owes, if anything, to the descendants of slaves and what, if anything, can ever be done to atone for the evils of slavery and Jim Crow.

Questions for Further Study

1. Why do you think it took so long for a U.S. government body to apologize for slavery and segregation?

2. What is your reaction to the Senate's apology? Do you regard it as something that can lead to racial reconciliation? Or do you see it as an empty gesture?

3. What is your position with regard to reparations for African American descendants of slavery? What arguments support the view that reparations should be paid? What are the arguments against reparations?

4. In recent years there have been many such apologies for colonialism, imperialism, genocide, and other ills and abuses of the past. What accounts for these many apologies from governments and other institutions? Do you think these apologies accomplish anything?

5. Representative Steve Cohen, a sponsor of the concurrent apology in the U.S. House of Representatives, was involved in a close 2008 reelection race in his Tennessee district, which is a majority black district. Do you think that political considerations may have motivated his sponsorship of the apology? Why or why not?

Barack Obama's Address to the NAACP Centennial Convention

"If we are to be true to our past, then we also have to seize our own future, each and every day."

Overview

On July 16, 2009, President Barack Obama delivered a speech at the New York Hilton to participants attending "100 Years Bold Dreams, Big Victories," the 2009 annual convention of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP). He spoke for forty-five minutes to several thousand attendees. Obama used the one-hundred-year anniversary of the NAACP as an opportunity to review the history of the civil rights movement to date and to lay out what he saw as the next steps for fulfilling the organization's mission. He described changes in law and public policy as the result of the efforts of individuals committed to the ideals of equal rights and justice, some whose contributions are well documented and others whose sacrifices are largely unknown. While acknowledging that racism still existed, Obama asserted that its impact was less strongly felt than at any other time in U.S. history. He continued his "big tent" approach to change: that bettering conditions for all Americans would result in improvements for African Americans. He argued that the path forward would be one in which government action would continue to be consequential but where personal responsibility was the essential component. With approaches that shared elements of politician and preacher, President Obama called for a sense of hope and urgency and a renewed commitment to social justice in improving the nation.

Context

The NAACP is the oldest and most influential civil rights organization in the United States. It was formed in 1909 as an outgrowth of the Niagara Movement to fight the lynching of blacks. Founders of the NAACP included the activist, scholar, and editor W. E. B. Du Bois; the Jewish physician and civil rights advocate Henry Moskowitz; the suffragist, activist, writer, and Socialist Party member Mary White Ovington; the future editor and owner of The Nation Oswald Garrison Villard; the southern-born Socialist, journalist, and labor reformer William E. Walling; and the antilynching champion, women's rights advocate, and journalist Ida B. Wells. The association's mission is "to ensure the political, educational, social, and economic equality of rights of all persons and to eliminate racial hatred and racial discrimination."

The NAACP played a major role in every significant civil rights issue in the past century. During the 1930s it led the campaign for federal legislation against lynching, and although such a bill was never passed, the NAACP was able to pressure the government into taking its first steps in defending the rights of African Americans. The organization's Legal Defense and Education Fund sought equal justice in the court system, and from 1935 to the 1950s it backed lawsuits that led to landmark Supreme Court rulings outlawing segregation, notably the 1954 decision in Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, which struck down segregated schools. The NAACP's recent history, however, had been marred by weakened numbers and funding crises: In 2007 it laid off more than a third of its staff because of a budget shortfall; at the time of the speech, the organization had two hundred fifty thousand members compared with eight hundred thousand at its strongest point in 1964.

Despite a remarkably consistent record every U.S. president since Warren Harding had spoken to an annual convention of the NAACP President Barack Obama's address was eagerly anticipated. This would be a celebration of African Americans' aspirations, a promise of things to come, and a marked departure from the contentious relationship the NAACP had had under Obama's predecessor, George W. Bush.

The speech raises four substantial barriers to black success: economics, insufficient health care, high incarceration rates, and the HIV/AIDS epidemic. About a year before Obama's election, a severe economic recession began to unfold in the United States. The recession hit African Americans harder than it did other segments of the population, particularly since African Americans' economic circumstances were already troublesome. For example, at the end of 2008 the unemployment rate for African Americans was 11.5 percent; for Hispanics it was 8.9 percent; for whites it was just 6.3 percent. And while unemployment was growing for all groups, it was growing faster among African Americans. Thus, during 2008 the unemployment rate for whites grew by 2.1 percentage points, while the unemployment rate for African Americans grew by 2.9 percentage points. In terms of income, the weekly earnings of African Americans stood at $554.99 in the third quarter of 2008, compared with $696.33 for whites. Throughout the first decade of the twenty-first century, the family income of African Americans declined; in 2005 the median black family earned only 60.2 percent of the median white family's income, and by the end of 2008 white family income stood at a median of $55,530, while that of African American families was $34,218. At the same time the poverty rate among African Americans increased from 19.3 percent in 2001 to 24.4 percent in 2007. Also in 2007, more than 75 percent of whites owned their own homes; in contrast, just over 47 percent of African Americans were homeowners.

Similar disparities existed in other areas. With regard to health care, for example, in 2007, 19.2 percent of African Americans lacked health insurance; in contrast, 10.4 percent of whites were without health insurance. Yet African Americans faced an increased likelihood of contracting serious diseases. To cite just one example, according to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, 26.5 percent of black men suffered from hypertension compared with 17.4 percent of whites of the same age. Additionally, the impact of HIV and AIDS on African Americans was disproportionate: In a 2007 Centers for Disease Control and Prevention survey, blacks accounted for 51 percent of new HIV/AIDS diagnoses and 48 percent of people living with HIV/AIDS.

With regard to imprisonment, an adult African American man was about 7.4 times more likely to be incarcerated than his white counterpart (though that figure is actually lower in states regarded as conservative and higher in states regarded as progressive). The issue, though, is whether the justice system is biased or whether the crime rate among blacks is actually higher. The famed comedian Bill Cosby had taken up this issue in a May 2004 speech to the NAACP in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the Brown v. Board of Education decision. The speech came to be known as the "pound cake" speech because of these lines:

> These are people going around stealing Coca-Cola. People getting shot in the back of the head over a piece of pound cake and then we run out and we are outraged, [saying,] "The cops shouldn't have shot him." What the hell was he doing with the pound cake in his hand?

Cosby's message was one of personal responsibility in a speech that was sharply critical of school dropouts, teenage pregnancy, poor language skills, and criminality in the black underclass.

Education was yet another arena in which African Americans were struggling to catch up. The controversial No Child Left Behind Act had been instigated by President Bill Clinton and signed into law by President George W. Bush in 2002. The act aspired to narrow the achievement gap between African American and white students while raising achievement for all subgroups. While the achievement gap between African American and white students is difficult to measure, most indicators confirm its magnitude: In 2004, for example, white students averaged 22 to 29 percentage points higher than black students on reading and math assessments on the National Assessment of Educational Progress (commonly known as "the nation's report card").

This was the context in which Obama addressed the NAACP. In a February 2009 press conference, NAACP president Benjamin T. Jealous pressed the Obama administration and Congress to spend more on education, establish a nine-month moratorium on mortgage foreclosures, and ensure that the stimulus package the president's response to the economic recession was distributed equitably. But another contextual issue hovered in the background. During Obama's campaign for the presidency, many of his idealistic supporters looked on him as a potential "postracial" president, one whose racial heritage would help put the difficult and contentious issues of race behind the nation, at least in part. While Obama and his Republican presidential opponent, Senator John McCain, purposely avoided race as an issue, numerous pundits, bloggers, and others focused on the topic of race and racial politics. Even in the African American community, some argued that Obama was not "black enough" as did Ta-Nehisi Coates in Time magazine or that throughout his career he had "sold out" to be accepted by the white political establishment. Some black commentators warned that Obama had so thoroughly adapted to Caucasian culture that he would not look out for African American interests. On the other hand, some critics speculated that many of Obama's white supporters were motivated, at least in part, by white guilt. They believed, so this line of reasoning went, that they could demonstrate that the United States is not a racist country by electing a black president. Speculations about voters' motivations cannot be confirmed or denied, but they suggest that in addressing the nation's most venerable civil rights organization, the president needed to establish his credentials as one concerned about civil rights and the welfare of black Americans.

About the Author

Barack Obama was born on August 4, 1961, in Honolulu, Hawaii. His father, Barack Obama, Sr., was Kenyan; his white mother, Ann Dunham, was from Kansas. When Barack was two years old, his parents separated, and two years later they divorced. Dunham remarried, to an Indonesian, and Obama lived and attended school in Jakarta, Indonesia, before returning to Honolulu to live with his maternal grandparents at age ten.

After graduating from high school, Obama enrolled at Occidental College in California, but he transferred to New York's Columbia University, where he earned a bachelor's degree in 1983. For four years he worked in New York City and then moved to Chicago to head the Developing Communities Project, an agency that provided job training, tutoring, and other community services to black urban neighborhoods. In 1988 he entered Harvard Law School, becoming editor of the prestigious Harvard Law Review and graduating in 1991. After returning to Chicago, he worked until 1996 for a civil rights litigation law firm and for various community service organizations. Additionally, he taught constitutional law at the University of Chicago from 1992 to 2004.

Obama's political career began in 1996, when he was first elected to the Illinois Senate. He elevated his profile on the national stage in 2004, when he delivered the keynote address at the Democratic National Convention. That same year he won election to the U.S. Senate with 70 percent of the vote. In 2008, after a contentious and closely fought primary race against Hillary Rodham Clinton, Obama won his party's nomination for U.S. president. He and his vice presidential running mate, Joe Biden, defeated the Republican ticket of John McCain and Sarah Palin in the November elections. Obama took the oath of office on January 20, 2009.

Early in his presidency, Obama's popularity and approval ratings were high; his election to the office of the president was regarded as an event of historic proportions and was widely viewed as a repudiation of the policies of his predecessor, George W. Bush. Throughout the first year of his presidency, though, Obama faced numerous stubborn issues: a severe economic downturn, soaring unemployment, ongoing conflicts in Afghanistan and Iraq, and the continued threat of terrorism against the United States. With the backing of strong Democratic majorities in both houses of Congress, he was able to pass a controversial multibillion-dollar economic stimulus bill in 2009; Congress was also hammering out the details of a hotly debated health care reform bill. But by early 2010 the president's job approval rating had fallen sharply. One high point was his winning the Nobel Peace Prize for 2009, and a strong majority of Americans gave the president high marks for his immediate response to the devastating earthquake in Haiti on January 12, 2010. However, the election of Republican Scott Brown of Massachusetts to the U.S. Senate seat left vacant by the death of Democrat Edward Kennedy posed more problems for Obama: It signaled the end of the Democratic Party's sixty-vote supermajority in the Senate and seriously threatened the president's planned overhaul of the American health care system. Obama is the author of two books: Dreams from My Father: A Story of Race and Inheritance, an autobiography first published in 1995; and The Audacity of Hope: Thoughts on Reclaiming the American Dream, a 2006 book in which he lays out his political vision.

In the opening of his centennial speech, Obama comments on the origins of the NAACP in 1909, commemorating the success of the organization and its support for civil rights activists. When the Niagara Movement formed in 1905, its members, he states, "understood that unjust laws needed to be overturned; that legislation needed to be passed; and that Presidents needed to be pressured into action." He speaks of the courage of activists who risked their lives to demand an end to lynchings and Jim Crow segregation. He summons three iconic images of the civil rights movement: Freedom Rides, where civil rights activists boarded segregated trains and buses to test laws mandating segregation; lunch counter sit-ins, including the famous one that began in Greensboro, South Carolina, in February 1960, when black college students sat at a segregated lunch counter at a Woolworth's store; and the voter registration drives of the early 1960s. He reminds his listeners that those involved risked their lives to combat racism. Through struggle, he says, the nation moved from one in which "Jim Crow was a way of life" to one in which the segregation-ending Supreme Court case of Brown v. Board of Education (1954), the passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and the passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 could all be celebrated. Visible markers of those victories, he notes, are found in black corporate chief executive officers and elected leaders. Obama builds toward the most extraordinary victory his election as president of the United States. "Because of them I stand here tonight," he states, "on the shoulders of giants. And I'm here to say thank you to those pioneers and thank you to the NAACP."

◆ "Many Barriers Still Remain"

"And yet," he says in transition, "too many barriers still remain." Among them, he refers to the disproportionate suffering of African Americans in the realm of economics, health care, the prison system, and HIV/AIDS. He argues that because these obstacles are different from the ones fought in the 1930s and 1940s by the team of NAACP lawyers led by Charles Hamilton Houston (who battled Jim Crow and laid the groundwork for the Brown Supreme Court victory, which was argued by the future justice Thurgood Marshall), the steps to overcome them must be different as well. While they demand a different approach, he calls for them to be met with the same sense of urgency and aspiration. Again, Obama describes that history of fighting for social justice as not unique to the African American experience but, at its core, the American spirit. He points to the NAACP's mission as fostering the American Dream for all: "All Americans. Of every race. Of every creed. From every region of the country. We want everybody to participate in the American Dream. That's what the NAACP is all about."

While prejudice and discrimination continue against African Americans, women, immigrants, and gays and the need for the NAACP's mission continues, "prejudice and discrimination … are not … the steepest barriers to opportunity today," according to Obama. He lists structural inequalities that demand action. He turns to policy changes advocated by his administration that will affect all Americans: economic changes to better the future of the working class; health care reform; energy reform; and financial reform. His solution for the suffering of black Americans is to better the lives of all Americans, a rising tide that will lift all ships.

◆ "Education is a Prerequisite for Success"

A little more than a third of the way through his speech, Obama turns to the issue of education, stating, "A world-class education is a prerequisite for success. There's no two ways about it." He recalls the focal role schools have played in civil rights struggles and notes that poor schooling serves as the ultimate barrier to betterment in both domestic and international arenas. He acknowledges the role of governmental leadership in improving "overcrowded classrooms, and crumbling schools, and corridors of shame" and stresses the importance of bipartisan solutions to educational inequities. Obama then highlights what he views as the unlikely collegiality of the civil rights activist Al Sharpton, the Democratic mayor of New York City Mike Bloomberg, and the former Republican speaker of the House of Representatives Newt Gingrich. All three men were linked by the Education Equality Project, a nonpartisan effort launched in 2008 with the stated goal of ensuring equality of educational opportunities for all American students.

As for policy steps his administration will take, about halfway through his speech Obama points to the push for increasing support for college students to graduate, a "Race to the Top" fund, and early-learning-program funding. He discusses innovation grant funding provided to governors on a competitive basis. None of these measures differs radically from his predecessors' national education policies: They continue the accountability model developed under President Bill Clinton and codified under President George W. Bush, albeit with a commitment of greater funding. For an example of educational successes, Obama draws attention to Geoffrey Canada's Harlem Children's Zone, a charter school experiment dedicated to improving the educational performance of black students in a ninety-seven-block section of New York City.

◆ "Your Destiny Is in Your Hands"

At this point in the speech, Obama switches from a discussion of government policy to an examination of the role personal responsibility plays in success. Regardless of the obstacles many African American youth face, he urges students, parents, and community members to maintain high expectations: "Your destiny is in your hands you cannot forget that. That's what we have to teach all of our children. No excuses." This message is one with a long history. It is found, for example, in the writings of both the Tuskegee Institute founder and black accommodationist Booker T. Washington and the ardent civil rights activist and editor of The Crisis W. E. B. Du Bois. More recently, it was a message espoused by entertainer Bill Cosby, whose 2004 "pound cake" speech was attacked by many members of the African American community. Coming from an African American who had just been elected president of the United States of America, however, the message found greater resonance.

Obama follows this message by telling his life story and that of his wife, Michelle. He emphasizes the role of a caring matriarch as the key element in avoiding a life of street gangs and drug addiction, insisting that those who would follow that less honorable path are no less gifted or talented than he. He calls for the replacement of dreams of fame in music or sports with schooled professions. (LeBron refers to LeBron James, the star of the Cleveland Cavaliers basketball team; Lil Wayne, born Michael Dewayne Carter, Jr., is a prominent rap musician who has achieved multiplatinum sales and earned four Grammy Awards in 2009.) By example, Obama portrays the message that anyone, regardless of skin color or socioeconomic status, can aspire to become president of the United States a message that would have been summarily dismissed even one year earlier.

◆ "Cape Coast Castle"

Obama's conclusion links to the historic tone of the evening. He speaks of his visit to an African slave dungeon in Ghana and the indignities suffered by those held captive there. Then, he refers to the civil rights struggles fought in the United States as evidence of perseverance and courage. He describes this tradition of a fight for justice that is "American" rather than uniquely African American, citing the 1964 murders of James Chaney, Andrew Goodman, and Michael Schwerner in Mississippi. This was a notorious case in which Chaney, a twenty-one-year-old black civil rights worker; Goodman, a twenty-year-old white civil rights activist from New York; and Schwerner, a white organizer for the Congress of Racial Equality, traveled to Mississippi to register voters. They decided to investigate the burning of a black church and were arrested and later murdered by members of the Ku Klux Klan. The case served as the basis for several movies, including Mississippi Burning, released in 1988. Some of the conspirators were tried for depriving the three victims of their civil rights, but not for their murders. They received prison sentences, though none served more than six years. The case was reopened in 2005, when one of the ringleaders was tried and convicted of murder the first time the state of Mississippi had taken legal action in the case. Obama cites the example of the three slain men as an inspiring interethnic comingling of sacrifice and commitment that should inspire a postracial America, true to the vision that infused his presidential campaign.

He also mentions Emmett Till, a fourteen-year-old Chicago youth who was brutally murdered in Mississippi in 1955 for allegedly whistling at a white woman; and John Lewis, a U.S. congressional representative from Georgia who was active in the civil rights movement of the 1960s. Lewis played a prominent role in the Selma-to-Montgomery marches in Alabama in 1965, when he was severely beaten, and as the chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee in the 1960s. Obama uses these stories of courage to inspire hope and healing among a new generation of Americans so that the next hundred years of NAACP history reflects "the rising sun of a new day begun."

Audience

The immediate audience for President Obama's address was the NAACP and those who attended its Centennial Celebration, titled "Bold Dreams, Big Victories," held from July 11 to July 16, 2009, in New York City. The event also featured Obama's attorney general Eric Holder and many icons of the civil rights movement. Part policy speech, part history lesson, part personal testimony, the speech was the president's first to a predominantly black audience since taking office, though White House press secretary Robert Gibbs stated in the New York Times, "I think the first speech to black America … was the Inaugural Address." But any presidential pronouncement has a much broader audience, in this case the entire African American community and, indeed, all Americans. A substantial portion of the ultimate audience included nonblack Americans.

Impact

It is difficult to calculate the specific impact of Obama's 2009 speech before the NAACP. In terms of policy, it is in keeping with many themes of the early Obama administration: a focus on domestic issues aimed at bettering the lives of the poor and working class through health care reform; a continuation of previous administrations' education policies with their focus on accountability through testing; encouragement of charter schools and early childhood education (albeit differing from those policies with additional funding); and a revivification of the civil rights division of the Department of Justice. It suggests, however, a transition from legislative and policy efforts as the focal point of the civil rights struggle toward a "no excuses," "postracial" striving for success. That said, the issue of racism remains unavoidable: On the same day Obama delivered this speech, the renowned black scholar and Harvard University professor Henry Louis Gates, Jr., was arrested for disorderly conduct at his home, forcing Obama to confront the issue of racism once again. Gates was returning from a trip abroad to conduct genealogical research for an upcoming PBS broadcast. He had to break into his own house because he could not find his key, but a neighbor called the police thinking an intruder was on the grounds. When Gates refused to cooperate with the responding officer (who was white), he was arrested. Obama inserted himself into the debate that ensued when he stated publicly that the police had "acted stupidly" and, later, offered to mediate between Gates and the white police officer over a beer what came to be called the "beer summit." The incident suggested that issues of race remain close to the surface in American life and can erupt in the unlikeliest of places in this instance, Cambridge, Massachusetts, the home of Harvard University.

Essential Quotes

"Because ordinary people did such extraordinary things … because of their efforts I made a little trip to Springfield, Illinois, a couple years ago—where Lincoln once lived, and race riots once raged—and began the journey that has led me to be here tonight as the 44th President of the United States of America. Because of them I stand here tonight, on the shoulders of giants."

"I believe that overall, there probably has never been less discrimination in America than there is today. I think we can say that. But make no mistake: The pain of discrimination is still felt in America."

"Your destiny is in your hands—you cannot forget that. That's what we have to teach all of our children. No excuses."

"Our kids can't all aspire to be LeBron or Lil Wayne. I want them aspiring to be scientists and engineers—doctors and teachers—not just ballers and rappers. I want them aspiring to be a Supreme Court Justice. I want them aspiring to be the President of the United States of America. I want their horizons to be limitless."

"Yes, government must be a force for equality. But ultimately, if we are to be true to our past, then we also have to seize our own future, each and every day."

Questions for Further Study

1. According to Barack Obama, what are the chief barriers to black success? What did he propose doing to overcome those barriers?

2. What political considerations hovered in the background when Obama addressed the NAACP?

3. Do you agree with Obama when he stated, "I believe that overall, there probably has never been less discrimination in America than there is today."

4. Why do you think that membership in the NAACP has gone down dramatically, from eight hundred thousand in 1964 to two hundred fifty thousand when Obama spoke?

5. How do you think the members of the audience at the NAACP convention responded to Obama's speech? Would they have been pleased? Might any of the audience members have had reservations? Explain.

Barack Obama's Address to the NAACP Centennial Convention

Thank you. What an extraordinary night, capping off an extraordinary week, capping off an extraordinary 100 years at the NAACP.

So Chairman Bond, Brother Justice, I am so grateful to all of you for being here. It's just good to be among friends.

It is an extraordinary honor to be here, in the city where the NAACP was formed, to mark its centennial. What we celebrate tonight is not simply the journey the NAACP has traveled, but the journey that we, as Americans, have traveled over the past 100 years.

It's a journey that takes us back to a time before most of us were born, long before the Voting Rights Act, and the Civil Rights Act, Brown v. Board of Education; back to an America just a generation past slavery. It was a time when Jim Crow was a way of life; when lynchings were all too common; when race riots were shaking cities across a segregated land.

It was in this America where an Atlanta scholar named W. E. B. Du Bois a man of towering intellect and a fierce passion for justice, sparked what became known as the Niagara movement; where reformers united, not by color, but by cause; where an association was born that would, as its charter says, promote equality and eradicate prejudice among citizens of the United States.

From the beginning, these founders understood how change would come just as King and all the civil rights giants did later. They understood that unjust laws needed to be overturned; that legislation needed to be passed; and that Presidents needed to be pressured into action. They knew that the stain of slavery and the sin of segregation had to be lifted in the courtroom, and in the legislature, and in the hearts and the minds of Americans.

They also knew that here, in America, change would have to come from the people. It would come from people protesting lynchings, rallying against violence, all those women who decided to walk instead of taking the bus, even though they were tired after a long day of doing somebody else's laundry, looking after somebody else's children. It would come from men and women of every age and faith, and every race and region taking Greyhounds on Freedom Rides; sitting down at Greensboro lunch counters; registering voters in rural Mississippi, knowing they would be harassed, knowing they would be beaten, knowing that some of them might never return.

Because of what they did, we are a more perfect union. Because Jim Crow laws were overturned, black CEOs today run Fortune 500 companies. Because civil rights laws were passed, black mayors, black governors, and members of Congress served in places where they might once have been able [sic] not just to vote but even take a sip of water. And because ordinary people did such extraordinary things, because they made the civil rights movement their own, even though there may not be a plaque or their names might not be in the history books, because of their efforts I made a little trip to Springfield, Illinois, a couple years ago where Lincoln once lived and race riots once raged and began the journey that has led me to be here tonight as the 44th President of the United States of America.

Because of them I stand here tonight, on the shoulders of giants. And I'm here to say thank you to those pioneers and thank you to the NAACP.

And yet, even as we celebrate the remarkable achievements of the past 100 years; even as we inherit extraordinary progress that cannot be denied; even as we marvel at the courage and determination of so many plain folk we know that too many barriers still remain.

We know that even as our economic crisis batters Americans of all races, African Americans are out of work more than just about anybody else a gap that's widening here in New York City, as a detailed report this week by Comptroller Bill Thompson laid out.

We know that even as spiraling health care costs crush families of all races, African Americans are more likely to suffer from a host of diseases but less likely to own health insurance than just about anybody else.

We know that even as we imprison more people of all races than any nation in the world, an African American child is roughly five times as likely as a white child to see the inside of a prison.

We know that even as the scourge of HIV/AIDS devastates nations abroad, particularly in Africa, it is devastating the African American community here at home with disproportionate force. We know these things.

These are some of the barriers of our time. They're very different from the barriers faced by earlier generations. They're very different from the ones faced when fire hoses and dogs were being turned on young marchers; when Charles Hamilton Houston and a group of young Howard lawyers were dismantling segregation case by case across the land.

But what's required today, what's required to overcome today's barriers is the same as what was needed then. The same commitment. The same sense of urgency. The same sense of sacrifice. The same sense of community. The same willingness to do our part for ourselves and one another that has always defined America at its best and the African American experience at its best.

And so the question is, where do we direct our efforts? What steps do we take to overcome these barriers? How do we move forward in the next 100 years?

The first thing we need to do is make real the words of the NAACP charter and eradicate prejudice, bigotry, and discrimination among citizens of the United States. I understand there may be a temptation among some to think that discrimination is no longer a problem in 2009. And I believe that overall, there probably has never been less discrimination in America than there is today. I think we can say that.

But make no mistake: The pain of discrimination is still felt in America. By African American women paid less for doing the same work as colleagues of a different color and a different gender. By Latinos made to feel unwelcome in their own country. By Muslim Americans viewed with suspicion simply because they kneel down to pray to their God. By our gay brothers and sisters, still taunted, still attacked, still denied their rights.

On the 45th anniversary of the Civil Rights Act, discrimination cannot stand not on account of color or gender; how you worship or who you love. Prejudice has no place in the United States of America. That's what the NAACP stands for. That's what the NAACP will continue to fight for as long as it takes.

But we also know that prejudice and discrimination at least the most blatant types of prejudice and discrimination are not even the steepest barriers to opportunity today. The most difficult barriers include structural inequalities that our nation's legacy of discrimination has left behind; inequalities still plaguing too many communities and too often the object of national neglect.

These are barriers we are beginning to tear down one by one by rewarding work with an expanded tax credit; by making housing more affordable; by giving ex-offenders a second chance. These are barriers we're targeting through our White House Office on Urban Affairs, through programs like Promise Neighborhoods that builds on Geoffrey Canada's success with the Harlem Children's Zone, that foster a comprehensive approach to ending poverty by putting all children on a pathway to college, and giving them the schooling and after-school support that they need to get there.

I think all of us understand that our task of reducing these structural inequalities has been made more difficult by the state and structure of our broader economy; an economy that for the last decade has been fueled by a cycle of boom and bust; an economy where the rich got really, really rich, but ordinary folks didn't see their incomes or their wages go up; an economy built on credit cards, shady mortgage loans; an economy built not on a rock, but on sand.

That's why my administration is working so hard not only to create and save jobs in the short-term, not only to extend unemployment insurance and help for people who have lost their health care in this crisis, not just to stem the immediate economic wreckage, but to lay a new foundation for growth and prosperity that will put opportunity within the reach of not just African Americans, but all Americans. All Americans. Of every race. Of every creed. From every region of the country. We want everybody to participate in the American Dream. That's what the NAACP is all about.

Now, one pillar of this new foundation is health insurance for everybody. Health insurance reform that cuts costs and makes quality health coverage affordable for all, and it closes health care disparities in the process. Another pillar is energy reform that makes clean energy profitable, freeing America from the grip of foreign oil; putting young people to work upgrading low-income homes, weatherizing, and creating jobs that can't be outsourced. Another pillar is financial reform with consumer protections to crackdown on mortgage fraud and stop predatory lenders from targeting black and Latino communities all across the country.

All these things will make America stronger and more competitive. They will drive innovation, they will create jobs, they will provide families with more security. And yet, even if we do all that, the African American community will still fall behind in the United States and the United States will fall behind in the world unless we do a far better job than we have been doing of educating our sons and daughters.

I hope you don't mind I want to go into a little detail here about education. In the 21st century when so many jobs will require a bachelor's degree or more, when countries that out-educate us today will out-compete us tomorrow a world-class education is a prerequisite for success.

There's no two ways about it. There's no way to avoid it. You know what I'm talking about. There's a reason the story of the civil rights movement was written in our schools. There's a reason Thurgood Marshall took up the cause of Linda Brown. There's a reason why the Little Rock Nine defied a governor and a mob. It's because there is no stronger weapon against inequality and no better path to opportunity than an education that can unlock a child's God-given potential.

And yet, more than half a century after Brown v. Board, the dream of a world-class education is still being deferred all across the country. African American students are lagging behind white classmates in reading and math an achievement gap that is growing in states that once led the way in the civil rights movement. Over half of all African American students are dropping out of school in some places. There are overcrowded classrooms, and crumbling schools, and corridors of shame in America filled with poor children not just black children, brown and white children as well.

The state of our schools is not an African American problem; it is an American problem. Because if black and brown children cannot compete, then America cannot compete. And let me say this, if Al Sharpton, Mike Bloomberg, and Newt Gingrich can agree that we need to solve the education problem, then that's something all of America can agree we can solve. Those guys came into my office. Just sitting in the Oval Office I kept on doing a double-take. So that's a sign of progress and it is a sign of the urgency of the education problem. All of us can agree that we need to offer every child in this country every child.

Got an "Amen corner" back there. Every child, every child in this country the best education the world has to offer from cradle through a career.

That's our responsibility as leaders. That's the responsibility of the United States of America. And we, all of us in government, have to work to do our part by not only offering more resources, but also demanding more reform. Because when it comes to education, we got to get past this whole paradigm, this outdated notion that somehow it's just money, or somehow it's just reform, but no money, and embrace what Dr. King called the "both-and" philosophy. We need more money and we need more reform.

When it comes to higher education we're making college and advanced training more affordable, and strengthening community colleges that are the gateway to so many with an initiative that will prepare students not only to earn a degree, but to find a job when they graduate; an initiative that will help us meet the goal I have set of leading the world in college degrees by 2020. We used to rank number one in college graduates. Now we are in the middle of the pack. And since we are seeing more and more African American and Latino youth in our population, if we are leaving them behind we cannot achieve our goal, and America will fall further behind and that is not a future that I accept and that is not a future that the NAACP is willing to accept.

We're creating a Race to the Top fund that will reward states and public school districts that adopt 21st century standards and assessments. We're creating incentives for states to promote excellent teachers and replace bad ones, because the job of a teacher is too important for us to accept anything less than the best.

We also have to explore innovative approaches such as those being pursued here in New York City; innovations like Bard High School Early College and Medgar Evers College Preparatory School that are challenging students to complete high school and earn a free associate's degree or college credit in just four years.

And we should raise the bar when it comes to early learning programs. It's not enough just to have a babysitter. We need our young people stimulated and engaged and involved. We need our folks involved in child development to understand the latest science. Today, some early learning programs are excellent. Some are mediocre. And some are wasting what studies show are by far a child's most formative years.

That's why I've issued a challenge to America's governors: If you match the success of states like Pennsylvania and develop an effective model for early learning; if you focus reform on standards and results in early learning programs; if you demonstrate how you will prepare the lowest income children to meet the highest standards of success then you can compete for an Early Learning Challenge Grant that will help prepare all our children to enter kindergarten all ready to learn.

So these are some of the laws we're passing. These are some of the policies we are enacting. We are busy in Washington. Folks in Congress are getting a little tuckered out. But I'm telling them I'm telling them we can't rest, we've got a lot of work to do. The American people are counting on us. These are some of the ways we're doing our part in government to overcome the inequities, the injustices, the barriers that still exist in our country.

But all these innovative programs and expanded opportunities will not, in and of themselves, make a difference if each of us, as parents and as community leaders, fail to do our part by encouraging excellence in our children. Government programs alone won't get our children to the Promised Land. We need a new mind set, a new set of attitudes because one of the most durable and destructive legacies of discrimination is the way we've internalized a sense of limitation; how so many in our community have come to expect so little from the world and from themselves.

We've got to say to our children, yes, if you're African American, the odds of growing up amid crime and gangs are higher. Yes, if you live in a poor neighborhood, you will face challenges that somebody in a wealthy suburb does not have to face. But that's not a reason to get bad grades. That's not a reason to cut class. That's not a reason to give up on your education and drop out of school. No one has written your destiny for you. Your destiny is in your hands you cannot forget that. That's what we have to teach all of our children. No excuses. No excuses.

You get that education; all those hardships will just make you stronger, better able to compete. Yes we can.

To parents: we can't tell our kids to do well in school and then fail to support them when they get home. You can't just contract out parenting. For our kids to excel, we have to accept our responsibility to help them learn. That means putting away the Xbox, putting our kids to bed at a reasonable hour. It means attending those parent-teacher conferences and reading to our children and helping them with their homework.

And by the way, it means we need to be there for our neighbor's sons and daughters. We need to go back to the time, back to the day when we parents saw somebody, saw some kid fooling around and it wasn't your child, but they'll whup you anyway. Or at least they'll tell your parents the parents will. You know. That's the meaning of community. That's how we can reclaim the strength and the determination and the hopefulness that helped us come so far; helped us make a way out of no way.

It also means pushing our children to set their sights a little bit higher. They might think they've got a pretty good jump shot or a pretty good flow, but our kids can't all aspire to be LeBron or Lil Wayne. I want them aspiring to be scientists and engineers, doctors and teachers not just ballers and rappers. I want them aspiring to be a Supreme Court Justice. I want them aspiring to be the President of the United States of America.

I want their horizons to be limitless. I don't tell them they can't do something. Don't feed our children with a sense that somehow because of their race that they cannot achieve.

Yes, government must be a force for opportunity. Yes, government must be a force for equality. But ultimately, if we are to be true to our past, then we also have to seize our own future, each and every day.

And that's what the NAACP is all about. The NAACP was not founded in search of a handout. The NAACP was not founded in search of favors. The NAACP was founded on a firm notion of justice; to cash the promissory note of America that says all of our children, all God's children, deserve a fair chance in the race of life.

It's a simple dream, and yet one that all too often has been denied and is still being denied to so many Americans. It's a painful thing, seeing that dream denied. I remember visiting a Chicago school in a rough neighborhood when I was a community organizer, and some of the children gathered 'round me. And I remember thinking how remarkable it was that all of these children seemed so full of hope, despite being born into poverty, despite being delivered, in some cases, into addiction, despite all the obstacles they were already facing you could see that spark in their eyes. They were the equal of children anywhere.

And I remember the principal of the school telling me that soon that sparkle would begin to dim, that things would begin to change; that soon, the laughter in their eyes would begin to fade; that soon, something would shut off inside, as it sunk in because kids are smarter than we give them credit for as it sunk in that their hopes would not come to pass. Not because they weren't smart enough, not because they weren't talented enough, not because of anything about them inherently, but because, by accident of birth, they had not received a fair chance in life.

I know what can happen to a child who doesn't have that chance. But I also know what can happen to a child that does. I was raised by a single mom. I didn't come from a lot of wealth. I got into my share of trouble as a child. My life could have easily taken a turn for the worse. When I drive through Harlem or I drive through the South Side of Chicago and I see young men on the corners, I say, there but for the grace of God go I. They're no less gifted than me. They're no less talented than me.

But I had some breaks. That mother of mine, she gave me love; she pushed me, she cared about my education; she took no lip; she taught me right from wrong. Because of her, I had a chance to make the most of my abilities. I had the chance to make the most of my opportunities. I had the chance to make the most of life.

The same story holds true for Michelle. The same story holds true for so many of you. And I want all the other Barack Obamas out there, and all the other Michelle Obamas out there, to have the same chance the chance that my mother gave me; that my education gave me; that the United States of America has given me. That's how our union will be perfected and our economy rebuilt. That is how America will move forward in the next 100 years.

And we will move forward. This I know for I know how far we have come. Some, you saw, last week in Ghana, Michelle and I took Malia and Sasha and my mother-in-law to Cape Coast Castle, in Ghana. Some of you may have been there. This is where captives were once imprisoned before being auctioned; where, across an ocean, so much of the African American experience began.

We went down into the dungeons where the captives were held. There was a church above one of the dungeons which tells you something about saying one thing and doing another. We walked through the "Door of No Return." I was reminded of all the pain and all the hardships, all the injustices and all the indignities on the voyage from slavery to freedom.

But I was reminded of something else. I was reminded that no matter how bitter the rod, how stony the road, we have always persevered. We have not faltered, nor have we grown weary. As Americans, we have demanded, and strived for, and shaped a better destiny. And that is what we are called on to do once more. NAACP, it will not be easy. It will take time. Doubts may rise and hopes may recede.

But if John Lewis could brave Billy clubs to cross a bridge, then I know young people today can do their part and lift up our community.

If Emmet Till's uncle, Mose Wright, could summon the courage to testify against the men who killed his nephew, I know we can be better fathers and better brothers and better mothers and sisters in our own families.

If three civil rights workers in Mississippi black, white, Christian and Jew, city-born and country-bred could lay down their lives in freedom's cause, I know we can come together to face down the challenges of our own time. We can fix our schools, we can heal our sick, we can rescue our youth from violence and despair.

And 100 years from now, on the 200th anniversary of the NAACP, let it be said that this generation did its part; that we too ran the race; that full of faith that our dark past has taught us, full of the hope that the present has brought us, we faced, in our lives and all across this nation, the rising sun of a new day begun.

Thank you, God bless you. God bless the United States of America.

The following activity guide corresponds to the National History Standards as published by the National Center for History in the schools. The documents in Milestone Documents in African American History relate to most, though not all, of the eras and standards found in the National History Standards.

Era 2: Colonization and Settlement (1585–1763)

Standard 1: Why the Americas attracted Europeans, why they brought enslaved Africans to their colonies, and how Europeans struggled for control of North America and the Caribbean

Focus Question: What factors converged in the New World to make slavery a viable institution?

- Ask students to think about this question: Why did African slavery turn out to be a more viable labor option than either Native Americans or indentured servants in the southern colonies? Have students create a T-chart that lists the pros and cons of using all three groups as a source of labor in the plantation economy of the South.
- John Rolfe, of the Jamestown colony in Virginia, provides the first official record of the coming of Africans to America in a letter to Sir Edwin Sandys, which forms part of the Record of the Virginia Company of London. In that letter, referring to the arrival of a Dutch man-of-war under the direction of "Captain Jope," he says only, "He brought not anything but 20 and odd Negroes, which the Governor and Cape Merchant bought for victuals (whereof he was in great need as he pretended) at the best and easiest rate they could." This mention seems quite unimportant, except that in this letter Rolfe also describes the establishment of new plantations and the division of land under a new system. Have students research the headright system of land distribution used in the colonies. Based on their understanding of the system, have students write an essay that explains how the headright system created a need for labor that resulted in the use of indentured servants and eventually slaves.

Standard 3: How the values and institutions of European economic life took root in the colonies and how slavery reshaped European and African life in the Americas

Focus Question: What role did religion play in the early resistance to the institution of slavery during the colonial period?

- Have students use John Woolman's essay Some Considerations on the Keeping of Negroes (1754) and "A Minute against Slavery, Addressed to Germantown Monthly Meeting" (1688) to create a list of arguments against slavery that emerged prior to the Declaration of Independence.
- After students research the Quakers in colonial America, have them create a Wiki where each student can add information that explains the Quaker impact on the origin and philosophy of passive resistance, or moral suasion, in the early abolitionist movement. What Quaker doctrines were brought to the movement? Entries on the Wiki should provide evidence of events, speeches, and other documentation as support.
- Ask students to read Virginia's Act XII: Negro Women's Children to Serve according to the Condition of the Mother (1662) and Virginia's Act III: Baptism Does Not Exempt Slaves from Bondage (1667). After the students summarize the main points of each act, have the class debate the role of religion in the creation of these legal rulings. What reasons did the colonial governments have for issuing these decrees? Were they really religious or were they economic decrees?
- How could religion be used to both support and refute slavery? Have students write a persuasive essay or present a persuasive speech supporting either side using information from the documents of this era as support.

Era 3: Revolution and the New Nation (1754–1820s)

Standard 1: The causes of the American Revolution, the ideas and interests involved in forging the Revolutionary movement, and the reasons for the American victory

Focus Question: In what ways were the ideas of the Declaration of Independence a contradiction to the realities of slavery?

- Just six months after the signing of the Declaration of Independence, Prince Hall and seven other African Americans petitioned the Massachusetts General Court (1777) to free all slaves. Ask students to read the petition and find examples in his petition of the ideas and principles used in the Declaration of Independence. Students should then create a poster that Hall might have used to promote his petition to the court.
- Conduct a class discussion about the content of Lord Dunmore's Proclamation of 1775. Ask students to speculate on the colonial reaction to it. Ask students to decide which colonies would have supported it and which would have opposed it. Finally, have students assess whether the Proclamation affected the intent of the Declaration of Independence one year later to deal with the issue of slavery.
- Lord Dunmore's Proclamation, among others, led to the formation of several black regiments in the British army, among them Dunmore's Ethiopian Regiment. Black Loyalists served in a variety of positions for the British during the Revolution. Have the students research the Black Loyalists and write a brief history of their service.

Standard 2: The impact of the American Revolution on politics, economy, and society

Focus Question: What effect did the American Revolution have on the abolition movement in the colonies?

- Ask students to read Pennsylvania's Act for the Gradual Abolition of Slavery (1780) and lead a discussion on how this was an important step in the growth of the abolitionist movement. Have students create a time line of dates when other American colonies abolished slavery and of other important legislation that encouraged the end of slavery as the United States added territories. The last item on the time line should be the Thirteenth Amendment (1865).
- Provide students with the text of Thomas Jefferson's Notes on the State of Virginia (1784) and Benjamin Banneker's Letter to Thomas Jefferson (1791). Tell students to think about whether Benjamin Banneker had read Jefferson's notes before he wrote to him regarding emancipation in 1791. Have students write a response from Jefferson to Banneker.

Standard 3: The institutions and practices of governments created during the Revolution and how they were revised between 1787 and 1815 to create the foundation of the American political system based on the U.S. Constitution and the Bill of Rights Focus Question: How did the U.S. Constitution and the Bill of Rights address the issue of slavery in the new nation?

- Despite being created from the Northwest Ordinance of 1787, which banned slavery, Ohio's Black Code (1804) seemed to violate the spirit of the Ordinance as well as that of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights regarding free men. Have students research the provisions of the Northwest Ordinance and outline the examples of violations in the Black Code of Ohio to the spirit of that document and the Constitution and Bill of Rights.
- The Fugitive Slave Act was enacted by the U.S. Congress in 1793. Ask students to read it and write a letter to the editor in which they discuss the provisions in the Bill of Rights that would have been violated if they had been applied to slaves in 1793.
- The word slavery is not used in the Constitution (1787) until the addition of the Thirteenth Amendment in 1865. Slavery, however, is discussed in the text of the Constitution and in several of the amendments. Divide the class into small groups and have the groups compete to see which group can find the five instances where slavery shaped the content of the document without being mentioned by name.

Era 4: Expansion and Reform (1801–1861)

Standard 2: How the Industrial Revolution, increasing immigration, the rapid expansion of slavery, and the westward movement changed the lives of Americans and led toward regional tensions

Focus Question: How did slavery influence debate over sectionalism and states' rights?

- Ask students to read and compare the Fugitive Slave Act of 1793 with the Fugitive Slave Act of 1850. When they have finished, have the students create a Venn diagram to record their comparison. Then discuss as a class the role western expansion played in the changes between the two acts.
- Organize a class debate on the constitutional, political, and moral issues involved with ending the slave trade in 1808. Provide the students with Peter William's "Oration on the Abolition of the Slave Trade" (1808) and Solomon Northup's description of a slave auction in Twelve Years a Slave (1853) as starting points for gathering arguments for each side.

Standard 3: The extension, restriction, and reorganization of political democracy after 1800

Focus Question: How did the rapid growth of slavery after 1800 affect the lives of African Americans, both slave and free?

- Divide the class into groups and assign each group one of the documents of David Walker, William Wells Brown, John S. Rock, Henry Brown, Martin Delany, Frederick Douglass, or others. Have each group give a short multimedia presentation that summarizes each document. Then ask the students to consider the common themes found in the writings of African Americans prior to the Civil War. What are their goals, dreams, and complaints? Consider the audience for each document when comparing the themes. What differences can be found in these documents' approach to the issue of freedom for African Americans? Have each student summarize their conclusions in an essay.
- Ask students to read Harriet Jacob's Incidents in the Life of a Slave Girl (1861), an autobiographical account of her life, including her time as a fugitive slave living in the North. Have students choose an incident from the narrative and draw an illustration for that event. Remind students to write an appropriate caption.
- Have groups of students analyze the court cases State v. Mann (1830), United States v. Amistad (1841), Prigg v. Pennsylvania (1842), Roberts v. City of Boston (1850), and Dred Scott v. Sandford (1857), along with other cases found in research, to create a time line of decisions regarding slavery or the lives of African Americans between 1801 and 1861. Then ask the students to review the time line and determine how the courts helped or hindered the rights of African Americans during this time. What principles seemed to guide the judges and justices in these cases?

Standard 4: The sources and character of cultural, religious, and social reform movements in the antebellum period

Focus Question: What ideas and principles drove the abolition movement in the antebellum period?

- Have students assess the role of religion in the abolition movement by researching online and in these volumes and adding information that they find about churches, denominations, and religious leaders' role in the abolition movement to a class Wiki on the subject.
- After reading The Confessions of Nat Turner (1831), have students evaluate the impact of his slave rebellion by writing an 1831 newspaper editorial taking the position that he either helped or hurt the cause of abolition with his actions or his words.

Era 5: Civil War and Reconstruction (1850–1877)

Standard 1: The causes of the Civil War

Focus Question: Was slavery really the cause of the Civil War?

- Ask students to support the argument that John Brown's raid on the federal arsenal at Harpers Ferry, Virginia, was really the first salvo in the Civil War by reading it and other accounts of the raid and comparing it with the account of the only survivor of the trials and executions following the raid, Osborne P. Anderson, in A Voice from Harper's Ferry (1861). Then provide students with the lyrics of "The John Brown Song," (available at http:www.loc.gov/teachers/lyrical/songs/docs/john_brown_trans.pdf) Have students research the song's history and report on the impact of the song on the Civil War.
- Have students read the revised Virginia Slave Code from 1860. Lead a class discussion about the message sent to the federal government and to the supporters of the abolition movement in these revisions. Have students rank the revisions in order of importance to Virginians as they anticipated the coming of a crisis.

Standard 2: The course and character of the Civil War and its effects on the American people

Focus Question: How did the Civil War affect the lives of African Americans, both free and slave?

- Have students conduct research to provide examples of the contributions and participation by African Americans on the side of the Confederacy and the Union during the course of the war. Ask students to write a short story or a poem or create a comic book that tells the story of a heroic African American during the Civil War.
- Have students read Abraham Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation (1863). On the computer, have students run the text of the document through Wordle (or a similar program) to create a word cloud that emphasizes the most important terms in the document. Then have students analyze the document, in an essay or poster, in terms of Lincoln's audience, timing, and purpose in issuing it.

Standard 3: How various Reconstruction plans succeeded or failed

Focus Question: Other than ending slavery, what did the period of Reconstruction achieve?

- Ask students to research the origin of the Ku Klux Klan. Instruct them to find out how the Ku Klux Klan arose and became a powerful source of intimidation in the South despite the passage of the Ku Klux Klan Act of 1871. Discuss with students the goals and provisions of the act. Have students speculate on why the legislation failed and what impact it had on the future of race relations.
- Assign one of the sections of the Black Code of Mississippi (1865) to groups of students. Ask the students to create a flier that could be used to educate African Americans in Mississippi on the rules to be instituted in that section. Remind students that literacy rates were very low and to be creative in designing the message. When all the fliers are completed, post them around the classroom and have student groups attempt to interpret them.
- Set up a mock committee hearing and have students reenact the testimony of the seven African American participants who testified in 1866 before the Joint Committee on Reconstruction on Atrocities in the South against Blacks. Some students can play the part of those testifying. and others can take the role of the committee members. Then conduct a class discussion using the following questions: What concerns did the seven African Americans who testified have about the state of southern society and the future of African Americans in the region? What did they propose for the direction of Reconstruction? What might have happened if their concerns had been addressed?
- Ask students to read and outline the major changes to the U.S. Constitution as listed in the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments known collectively as the Reconstruction Amendments. Create a graphic organizer for students to list the provisions of each amendment and then have students review the amendments to establish the reason that they were not enforced for nearly a century. Have students record that information on the organizer.
- Have students read Henry McNeal Turner's Speech on His Expulsion from the Georgia Legislature (1868), George White's Farewell Address to Congress (1901), and Richard Harvey Cain's speech "All That We Ask Is Equal Laws, Equal Legislation, and Equal Rights" (1874). All were African American legislators during or immediately after Reconstruction. Then tell students to research the statistics on the number of African Americans who served in state legislatures and the U.S. Congress between 1865 and 1900. What problems did the trio foresee for post-Reconstruction America? How did their speeches reflect the frustration of the end of Reconstruction for African Americans? Ask students to write essays that address these questions and provide evidence of their statistical research within the essay.
- Review with the class the facts of the 1876 Supreme Court case United States v. Cruikshank. Ask students to read Chief Justice Morrison R. Waite's opinion of the Court. Help students define the concept of "dual citizenship." Discuss with the class how it effectively blocked enforcement of the Fourteenth Amendment (1868). Then have students research the main provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965, which finally overturned this ruling. Have them explain how those two pieces of historic legislation ended the idea of dual citizenship.

Era 6: The Development of the Industrial United States (1870–1900)

Standard 2: Massive immigration after 1870 and how new social patterns, conflicts, and ideas of national unity developed amid growing cultural diversity

Focus Question: Did the new immigration after the Civil War help or hinder the efforts of African Americans to achieve economic and social parity?

- Have students compare and contrast the views of Booker T. Washington (in his Atlanta Exposition Address of 1895) and W. E. B. Du Bois (in "Of Mr. Booker T. Washington and Others," from The Souls of Black Folk, written in1903) on the path that African Americans should take toward gaining equality with whites in the United States. Organize a class debate that utilizes the words of the two African American leaders to argue whether economic or political rights should be fought for first and the ways in which to go about gaining parity with whites.
- Consider both sides of the "separate but equal" doctrine in the Plessy v. Ferguson (1896) Supreme Court case. Was the decision in Plessy inevitable once the Court backed away from vigorous federal implementation of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments in the case of United States v. Cruikshank (1873)? Have students read the opinion of the court for both cases. Ask students to write an essay that argues that the interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment in Cruikshank can be seen in the Plessy decision.
- How did John E. Bruce believe that African Americans should strive to achieve equality? Contrast his view, as set forth in "Organized Resistance Is Our Best Remedy" (1889), with the ideas of the civil rights movement led by Martin Luther King, Jr., in the 1960s. Instruct students to read the Bruce speech and several of King's essays and speeches, including "Letter from Birmingham Jail" and "I Have a Dream." Have students create a chart that lists the principles and actions on which the two agreed and the points on which they differed. Then ask students to brainstorm the ways history might have changed if African Americans had chosen to follow Bruce's plan.

Standard 3: The rise of the American labor movement and how political issues reflected social and economic changes

Focus Question: How were African Americans included in the rising organized labor movement of the late 1800s?

- In his letter to the editor, "In the Lion's Mouth" (1891), John L. Moore of the Colored Farmers' National Alliance and Cooperative Union says that he believes that only the protected right to vote will help African Americans achieve equality. Ask students to read the letter. Then have them research the Populist and Progressive movements to find out if any of his proposals were included in the platforms of the two movements. How many of his proposals are part of today's electoral process?
- In his speech "The Present Relations of Labor and Capital" (1886), the African American newspaper editor and civil rights and labor organizer T. Thomas Fortune argued that class conflict, not strictly race, was the source of the African American struggle in the years after the Civil War. Why did he think that white racism and an exploitative economic system acted together to subjugate blacks? The speech was printed in his newspaper, the New York Freeman. Ask students to write a letter to the editor based on an assigned persona (labor organizer, robber baron, African American factory worker, African American sharecropper, or southern landowner, for example). Letters should take the point of view of the assigned persona and address directly the points of Fortune's speech.

Era 7: The Emergence of Modern America (1890–1930)

Standard 1: How Progressives and others addressed problems of industrial capitalism, urbanization, and political corruption

Focus Question: In what ways did the failure of the Progressive movement to address the needs of African Americans and other minorities lead to more racial tension in the United States in the 1920s?

- Ask students to define lynching and trace its legal history in the United States. Discuss with students the arguments of Ida B. Wells-Barnett, in "Lynch Law in America" (1900), and the NAACP, in Thirty Years of Lynching (1919), in their pleas to make lynching a crime.
- Have students prepare a written defense for the statement that African American women had the most difficult status in American society. Allow students to use the documents of Mary Church Terrell in "The Progress of Colored Women" (1898) and Alice Moore Dunbar-Nelson in "The Negro Woman and the Ballot" (1927) to support their position. What specific problems were unique to African American women? Have students post responses to an online discussion board created by the teacher and respond to the posts of other students.
- Ask students to determine why the Supreme Court case Guinn v. United States (1915) failed to improve voting rights for African Americans. Tell them to analyze the opinion to draw their conclusions. Discuss with students the various methods used by southern states to disenfranchise African American voters.

Standard 2: The changing role of the United States in world affairs through World War I Focus Question: Why did World War I not result in any gains in the fight for equality for African American?

- Have students research the Brownsville raid of 1906. Then have students consult Theodore Roosevelt's Brownsville Legacy Special Message to the Senate (1906). Ask them to evaluate his message based on what was discovered in the research. Have them respond to the following questions in a classroom discussion: Does it appear that he got all sides of the story? Was he given accurate information? Did he have any reason to distort the facts? Do you think that the Brownsville raid had an impact on the decision to keep the military segregated in World War I?
- What arguments in Monroe Trotter's Protest to Woodrow Wilson (1914) could have been used to support desegregation during wartime to bolster mobilization efforts? Using Glogster or other online poster-making programs, have students create posters that could be used in a campaign to persuade Wilson to desegregate the federal government during World War I.

Standard 3: How the United States changed from the end of World War I to the eve of the Great Depression

Focus Question: Why were the 1920s a time of great change for African Americans despite the failure of the Progressive movement and World War I to further their cause of equality?

- Discuss with students the ongoing debate over the goals African Americans should focus on in their struggle for equality political or economic, segregation or integration, assimilation or maintenance of a distinct culture. Have students create a list of the principles that encompassed black nationalism and alternative movements that emerged in the early twentieth century. Instruct them to use the documents of W. E. B. Du Bois, Marcus Garvey, Cyril Briggs, the Niagara Movement, and William Pickens to compile the list of ideas on both sides of the debate.
- After they have created the list of principles, have students sort them into two categories based on whether the principle supports integration into white society or separatism (creation of a separate society).
- Ask students to decide which approach they think they would have supported during the 1920s and what they think different groups of Americans would have supported. Tell students to defend their decision using facts from the reading and other research.
- Ask students to draw or use UMapper to create an illustrated map of the Harlem described by James Weldon Johnson in his article "Harlem: The Culture Capital" (1925). Illustrations should include pictures of buildings, people, and artifacts that help describe the Harlem Renaissance.

Era 8: The Great Depression and World War II (1929–1945)

Standard 1: The causes of the Great Depression and how it affected American society

Focus Question: Did the severe economic downturn of the Great Depression lead to increased instances of racism in the United States?

- Have students review Chapter 2 of Haywood Patterson's book Scottsboro Boy (1950). Discuss instances of racial hostility that he witnessed during his trials. What role did racial prejudice play in the legal processes? Ask students to write a short newspaper article as if they had interviewed him in jail.
- Ask students why they think the NAACP chose to focus on educational inequality rather than political or economic inequality during the 1930s. Tell students to read Charles Hamilton Houston's "Educational Inequalities Must Go" (1935) and look for indications that the Great Depression might have played a role in the NAACP's decision.
- Invite students to create a cartoon or storybook presentation (hand drawn or using computer software) of the events surrounding Marian Anderson's 1939 Easter Sunday concert at the Lincoln Memorial in Washington, D.C., as recounted in her autobiography, My Lord, What a Morning (1956). Remind students to address how her treatment was representative of the times and the legal reasons that prevented her from performing at Constitution Hall.

Standard 2: How the New Deal addressed the Great Depression, transformed American federalism, and initiated the welfare state

Focus Question: Why can it be argued that the New Deal was not a "good deal" for African Americans?

- Have students make a list of the problems that John P. Davis saw, program by program, with the New Deal, in terms of its effect on African Americans, in "A Black Inventory of the New Deal" (1935).
- Next, instruct students to read Robert C. Weaver's essay "The New Deal and the Negro: A Look at the Facts" (1935) and make a list of the ways Weaver saw the New Deal helping the plight of African Americans.
- Finally, ask students to research statistics on poverty, homelessness, and unemployment for African Americans between 1933 and 1940. Then have students debate whether Davis or Weaver was most accurate in his assessment of the effect of the New Deal.

Standard 3: The causes and course of World War II, the character of the war at home and abroad, and its reshaping of the U.S. role in world affairs

Focus Question: What steps did minorities use to secure an end to segregation in the defense industries and the military during World War II?

- Have students read the union organizer A. Philip Randolph's 1941 article "Call to Negro America to March on Washington." Ask students to research Executive Order 8802, issued by President Franklin Roosevelt. Discuss whether the order was a satisfactory reason for the cancellation of the march on Washington, D.C., called for by Randolph. Discuss with students Randolph's role in the 1963 March on Washington.
- Ask students to write an essay about whether Mary McLeod Bethune's speech "What Does American Democracy Mean to Me?" is a good example of the frustration of African Americans regarding racial inequality and injustice in 1940. Remind students to draw on their knowledge of the Great Depression and the New Deal and its impact on minorities and women to support their essay and her points.

Era 9: Postwar United States (1945 to early 1970s)

Standard 3: Domestic policies after World War II

Focus Question: Did President Harry Truman improve the legacy of the New Deal in the area of minority rights?

- Have students outline the answers that the President's Commission on Civil Rights report To Secure These Rights (1947) provided to the four questions it posed for its investigation.
- Then have students decide which question from the civil rights report was addressed by President Truman's Executive Order 9981(1948) and discuss why the president chose this area to address first. Instruct students to research the history of segregation in the military to add to the understanding of this order.

Standard 4: The struggle for racial and gender equality and for the extension of civil liberties

Focus Question: What impact did the civil rights movement have on society in the 1950s and 1960s and beyond?

- Ask students to analyze what made the civil rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s different from prior attempts to achieve voting rights and end segregation. Students should focus their analysis on the goals, strategies, leadership, and support for the movement.
- Divide the class into groups to read the Supreme Court's decisions in Sweatt v. Painter (1950), Brown v. Board of Education (1954), Bond v. Floyd (1966), South Carolina v. Katzenbach (1966), and Loving v. Virginia (1967). Have each group present a short summary of each decision regarding civil rights. Discuss as a class what message the nearly unanimous decisions sent to those in southern states resisting the upholding of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments within their borders. Have a class discussion concerning why the decisions in these cases were not enough to force southern states to uphold the amendments.
- Have students read the Moynihan Report issued by the Department of Labor in 1965 and the Kerner Commission Report from 1968. What points do they both make? Where do they differ? Which was more accurate? Ask students to create a Venn diagram to log their answers to those questions. Then have students log on to an online discussion board set up by the teacher to respond to the following question: Was the Kerner Commission Report optimistic or pessimistic about the future of race relations and minority status in the United States? Assess its accuracy forty years later.
- Ask students to compare in an essay the themes in Martin Luther King, Jr.'s 1967 speech "Beyond Vietnam: A Time to Break the Silence" with his earlier works, such as the "Letter from Birmingham Jail" and "I Have a Dream" speech. Suggest that students look at the Kerner Commission Report to help formulate reasons for the change.
- Ask students to summarize the main provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the points made by John F. Kennedy's in his Civil Rights Address of 1963. Then lead a class discussion about whether, if Kennedy had still been alive, he would have felt that the proposals in his Civil Rights Address had been achieved.
- Despite the passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965, some African Americans felt that the civil rights movement was too conservative and moved too slowly. Have students read Malcolm X's speech "After the Bombing" (1965) and Stokely Carmichael's "Black Power" (1966), along with Eldridge Cleaver's essay "Education and Revolution" (1969). Ask students to write a letter from one of the men to Martin Luther King, Jr., defending his point of view about the direction of the movement.

Era 10: Contemporary United States (1968 to the present)

Standard 2: Economic, social, and cultural developments in contemporary United States

Focus Question: What issues have been important to African Americans since the passage of the landmark civil rights legislation of the middle 1960s?

- Ask students to use Shirley Chisholm's speech "The Black Woman in Contemporary America" (1974) to decide whether she thought that African American women were part of the women's rights movement of the 1970s. Ask students to record their responses on a teacher-created online discussion board.
- Have students debate whether Angela Davis believed that African Americans in prison are political prisoners based on her comments in the essay "Political Prisoners, Prison, and Black Liberation" (1971). Remind each side that they must provide evidence from her essay in their arguments.
- Ask students to trace the message about race relations in the documents of these major African American political figures in each of the following decades: Thurgood Marshall (1970s), Jesse Jackson (1980s), and Colin Powell (1990s). Have students create a chart to organize the similarities and differences in their messages. Then have students research the progress made by African Americans in each decade in economic, political, educational, and social equality. Have them make charts and graphs to show the progress in numerical terms.
- Instruct students to conduct research into the life, career, and philosophy of Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas. Create a Wiki space for students to add information as they find it about him. Then have students use the Wiki information and his written opinion to determine why he dissented in the affirmative action case of Grutter v. Bollinger in 2003.
- African American athletes have been important figures in the ongoing quest for equality in the United States. Have students analyze the messages about race relations presented in Jesse Owens's Blackthink: My Life as Black Man and White Man (1970) and Jackie Robinson's I Never Had It Made (1972). Then have students create for each athlete a 30-second public service announcement for radio that expresses his message about race relations.
- In 2009, the first African American president, Barack Obama, was inaugurated. Ask students to read his speech "A More Perfect Union" (2008) and his Address to the NAACP Centennial Convention (2009). Then have students create a chart that identifies the issues regarding race as he sees them and examine his proposals to tackle each issue.
